@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

Volume I — 1993–1999

73 monthly editions · 39,806 messages · December 1993 – December 1999

Edited by Kristen M. Fabians

These are the reading editions of the Poetics List of the University at Buffalo, and this volume holds its first seven years — from the first message in December 1993, when the room was a few dozen people and a new idea, to the end of 1999, by which time it had become the loudest argument about poetry anywhere. Thirty-nine thousand eight hundred and six messages across seventy-three months. The list arrived at its subjects early and never finished with them, and what this volume records is a room learning, in public and at speed, what it was for.

Each month is set down in full and in order, exactly as the archive delivered it, and opens with an index of its writers, of the names its posts mention, and of the concepts they take up — every entry a link to the message itself. For each post the author's name, the subject and the message are foregrounded, and the date is kept but subdued. Machine headers, encoded attachments and the repeated listserv routing that once framed every message have been cleared away; email addresses, telephone and fax numbers and similar personal contact details have been redacted.

University at Buffalo, State University of New York

Volume I — 1993–1999

73 monthly editions · December 1993 – December 1999. Every month links to its opening.

1993	·	·	·	·	·	·	·	·	·	·	·	Dec
1994	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec
1995	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec
1996	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec
1997	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec
1998	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec
1999	Jan	Feb	Mar	Apr	May	Jun	Jul	Aug	Sep	Oct	Nov	Dec

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

December 1993

2 messages · Wed 8 Dec 1993 – Wed 8 Dec 1993

December 1993, and the list is scarcely three months old — a room still mostly empty, its few voices carrying all the further for the quiet around them. The month leaves only two letters in the archive; yet between them they rehearse the whole future argument of the place, which is finally an argument about two objects: what a book is, and what a word is. From Vancouver, Peter Quartermain sends down the text of the remarks he made at the Western Front, where Robin Blaser had just launched his collected Holy Forest to a room of some two hundred. Quartermain confesses he had set out to mark the passages he might quote and found himself marking everything — “These poems utterly resist predatory reading”, he decides, and resolves to read them aloud instead.

The launch arrives already choral, prefaced by five wishes wired in from those who could not come. Phyllis Webb salutes Blaser as “the great moth that can't be pinned down”; Michael Palmer gathers the whole company into “the Lost & Found Department of the Holy Forest”; Fred Wah, Michael Ondaatje, and Charles Bernstein add theirs from their several cities. It is the list's oldest gesture, performed before the list quite knew it had one — the poets assembling, at a distance and by wire, to honour a book into the world.

Against that celebration Kenneth Sherwood sets a smaller and stranger offering, a close reading he titles Violent Dictionary, tracking Tina Darragh's alphabet-poem through its wrenching and wrestling of the letter with Judith Butler kept close at hand. He forwards his copy-text with an apology and a wink, proposing that a network might yet manage “hacker anarchy with etiquette”. Two letters only, and a season's worth of silence around them; but the terms are already set — reverence and mischief, the book and the machine — and the room, as it fills, will spend years arguing them out.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 2 in all.

WRITERS

Quartermain, Peter 1
Sherwood, Kenneth 2

NAMES MENTIONED

Bernstein, Charles 1
Blaser, Robin 1
Bunting, Basil 1
Butler, Judith 2
Coolidge, Clark 2
Martin, Chris 1
Ondaatje, Michael 1
Palmer, Michael 1
Persky, Stan 1
Zukofsky, Louis 1

CONCEPTS

Beauty 1
Book announcements 1
Close reading 2
Copyright and permissions 2
Creative writing pedagogy 1
Difficulty 1
Dreams 1
Electronic poetry and hypertext 2
Mourning and loss 1
Music and poetry 1
Nature 1
Negativity and refusal 1
Place and region 1
Poetics 1
Print vs. digital 1, 2
Religion and the sacred 1
Representation 2
Translation 2

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 2 in all.

8 DEC 1993

1. peter quartermain — Robin Blaser: Launch of _The Holy Forest_
2. Kenneth Sherwood — Violent Dictionary

1. peter quartermain

Robin Blaser: Launch of _The Holy Forest_

Wed 8 Dec 1993

Robin Blaser's new book _The_Holy_Forest_, published 30 November by Coach House in Toronto, was officially launched with a reading by Blaser at the Western Front in Vancouver, 3 December 1993. What follows is the text of my introductory remarks, prefaced by five messages received from those unable to come. For about two hours Blaser read to well over 200 people: a new work _Fax 1 (to Sharon Thesen_, followed by the whole of _CUPS_, _Image-Nation 9 (half and half_, "yellow ribbons", "As If By Chance", "Interlunar Thoughts", "Even on Sunday", "in the tree tops", _Image-Nation 24 ("Oh, Pshaw"_, _Exody_ and some others.

1. [from Michael Ondaatje, Diana Martin, Margaret McClintock and everyone at Coach House Press:]

    Everyone at Coach House Press is thrilled and proud to be publishing this book.

2. [from Phyllis Webb:]

    Dear Robin:
    You are the great moth that can't be pinned down. Thank you for that. Thank you for your moth music, for all your perfect canticles.
                Phyllis Webb

3. [from Michael Palmer:]

    Night out west, early this time of year,
    and I'm thinking in the dark of the dark.
    I'm thinking of the sweet darkness, the burning pages -- a dream I remember called In the Dark. About being lost, of course.
    In a dark wood. I'm thinking of friends such as Robin, all of us, in the Lost & Found Department of the Holy Forest.

Love from the company in your other city,
Michael Palmer

4. [from Fred Wah:]
Dear Robin:
Another night in the forest. I wish I could be there with you tonight, among the silences, lost in the indecipherable, forgetting the way in order to find it. I can almost hear your voice over the Rockies, your careful deference to the wild residue of the inside word, your handsome astonishment at the beauty of the book.
But, surely, it's not the end of the plot?
Congratulations
Fred Wah

5. [from Charles Bernstein:]
I'm not sure what sort of note I could send to Robin re. _The_Holy_Forest_, except that there is no book I have waited for longer or with more eagerness and I appreciate all that Blaser has done for and in poetry and poetics, without which I don't know how I could have gotten any grounding at all.
Charles Bernstein

[The unspoken title of my remarks was "(no fixed address)"]

When Stan Persky and Coach House Press asked me to introduce Robin tonight I started marking up passages in _The_Holy_Forest_ that I thought I might quote, only to discover that I was marking everything. These poems utterly resist predatory reading. I'm not going to take up much of your time, and to make sure of that, I'm going to read to you.
For there is so much, and so little, to say.
"a candy-wrapper with a phone number / on it suffices to call the largeness, and / the smallness." Of all the poets I can think of, none so quickly -- in the space of two lines, three perhaps, draws the reader so into his language, into the world of the poem, into the imagination. The poems retrieve what we did not know we'd lost, but whose lack we mourn. They retrieve the reader's imagination, retrieve imagination, reminding us of what it is, then, to read. Composing the good, the imagination invents its own landscape by seeing where it is.

The fact that we have lost our way in the holy forest does not mean we can shit in the soup. or cut down the trees. or lose our alertness. It is a place of terrors and wonders. It is the only forest we've got. And it's unknowable. "transcendence," the poet tells us, "like ourselves is historical, even in dreams" (324). That's why the truth is laughter.

Of course there's another way to say this: in Allen Ginsberg's words, we're not souls, communicating, we're just meat talking to meat. And that's all we've got: "a lacunary system, a cosmos unsure of its postulates" (368). The absurd comedy of that condition is also an absurd nightmare, of course. But spirit begins in matter -- as does our language and all histories.

There's another way of saying this, too. Blaser says it with great wit:

> If there's one thing Harry learned > to love more than the sacred, it was > the sacred in ruins.

This is the only world we've got. There has always been a garden and it has always been among the ruins, a path, and a relief. If paradise is to be found anywhere, it can only be found here. The difficulty with Heaven and Hell is that it's hard to tell the difference. Each, after all, is a source of light, and neither is a source of ease -- the sense of paradise includes its loss.

But turn your back on the sacred, shit in the soup, and all hell breaks loose. Turn your back on the sacred and you force it into the violence of leashed imagination, which will burst its bonds and us in the process; turn our backs on the sacred, make the artist (as one poem quotes) _the_deodorant_puck_in_the_ urinal_of_life_ (191), and WE erupt into violence, or we become dull grey, the poet tamed, our dreams our musics and our architectures our joys our sorrows our passions come home at last members of no more than a classroom education.

Blaser is the poet who makes a stink. He reminds us that we are creatures of language and it is our very nature to be in need. He is the poet of disturbance; our doom is that there is always more, and the only surety we have is the violence of our desire. What holds these poems, what holds the attention, is the strength of their passion and their love, their attention to what is. The mind / the poet / the imagination exfoliates , in-forming and out-forming, the dis-covery re-covery of what is and what-it-is-to-be alive. Mind as body, thought's flesh. Making sense / making Sense / extending the perceived/able. the unseen is not beyond our vision. Blaser is a visionary poet, but not by that with his eyes on any world but this one. A great player of syntax, sound, and line break, Blaser always resists completion, every line always turns to another -- or to potentiality, potence -- never resting, but without display.

The event we are celebrating tonight, the publication of _The_Holy_Forest, is major. I can't think of another book of Canadian poetry which has been so anxiously and eagerly awaited, and which is so well worth the wait. It is an astonishing and wonderful book, the integrity of the writing, the refusal to pander to taste or to fashion, to kowtow to the demands of others, unmatched save perhaps by Basil Bunting and Louis Zukofsky. Please welcome (and honour) Robin Blaser.

Peter Quartermain
3 December 1993

↑ Index

2. Kenneth Sherwood
Violent Dictionary
Wed 8 Dec 1993

Tradi{c}tional Close Reading : Tina Darragh's "'A' was for 'ox'"

A movement/moment from on/off too. As if "A" were dependent on "ox" which "suddenly exposes his autonomy as illusory." ("Theoretical" qts. from Judith Butler, _Gender Trouble_)

"A" as in origin, as in "the political stakes in designating an origin and cause". (B) "Those identity categories that are in fact effects of institutions, practices, discourses..." (B) "The elements surrounding it were strong..."(D) A site of ordering, an arbitrary "a b D ".

It is "motor-wise' to write: write our own ticket..." as if volition; "write-down" as if fixed, a unified construct;
"write in" as if believing there were the potential for change, political actions. Representation in both senses:
mimesis and a political standing in for.

What is "edge". Where the lines broken by contingencies of a book's form. These happenings are quite random, occur naturally, cannot yet be predicted with significant accuracy?

Trying to convince students that words don't _come_ from dictionaries, aren't born there, that their (who be they?) status in The Book is an effect/affect.

Resist "con ce s s i o n . ' '

That a subject be defined in order to be (re)presented.
Requirement of articulation through received forms in order to challenge said forms with efficacy.

KS

Copy text:

(Below is a translation--presumably illegal--of Tina Darragh's published, copyrighted poem. Please don't forward this all over the place. We can have hacker anarchy with etiquette, right?)

from %on the corner to off the corner% Sun & Moon 1981

"A" was for "ox"

The first oxygen conversion occured as an incline, a sharp bend as in "wrench". The elements surrounding it were strong, physically violent ones--wreck, wrestle, wretch--with the exception of "wren". The next major activity was "wrinkle", again related to "wrench" with the addition of "wind". Wrist action proceeded from there--wrist-lock, wrist-pin, wrist-shot, wrist wrestle, wristy--preparing us "motor-wise" to write: write our own ticket, write-down and write-in.

"elaborative" to "Eleatic" for "D"

"Egg" and "oxygen" both contain "edge", with egg's edge located at "share" and oxygen's at shear". The distance doubles from one to the other along this line: shar et vb farme atim domin numer iz cti porta acio torti him sho SHAG low ME L dou sha tio HE min ears cou ock metim semb dj

---

Kenneth Sherwood | RIF/T (e-poetry@ubvm)

"Fragments are [redacted] | our wholes" --Clark Coolidge

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

January 1994

1 messages · Wed 5 Jan 1994 – Wed 5 Jan 1994

January 1994 keeps only a single letter in the archive, and a comic one. Charles Bernstein, twice thwarted in the simple act of forwarding, at last lands on the list a message relayed by Linda Reinfeld and originating with Sander Gilman of Cornell — nominally a note on race and object relations, in the event mostly an enormous slab of festival ASCII art wishing the world a happy new year in some forty tongues at once. The machinery, not the argument, becomes the story: Bernstein reports he has learned his lesson, having discovered the hard way that one must “do not violate boundary codes invisible or visible”.

It is a slight thing to stand for a whole month, and yet oddly prophetic of everything to come. Here already is the list's abiding double life — the high seriousness of its subject-lines set against the low farce of the medium that must carry them, the poets forever tripping over the very wires that let them speak at all. One letter; file it, for now, under the comedy of transmission.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 1 in all.

WRITERS

Bernstein, Charles 1

NAMES MENTIONED

Reinfeld, Linda 1
Smith, Harry 1

CONCEPTS

Race and poetry 1
The academy 1
The listserv 1

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 1 in all.

5 JAN 1994

1. Charles Bernstein — sander gilman's tree live and in person

1. Charles Bernstein

sander gilman's tree live and in person

Wed 5 Jan 1994

[for the 2d time I've had a problem with forwarding items to the list. sorry for the nuisance. Apparently it has to do with the boundary code above. I have learned my lesson: do not violate boundary codes invisible or visible.]

Forwarded by Linda Reinfeld <[redacted]>

Date: Fri, 24 Dec 1993 18:38:18 EST
>From: "sander l. gilman" <[redacted]>
To: Multiple recipients of list PSYART <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: Race and object relations

I hope that you and yours have a restful and most pleasant holiday season.

```
 %\@/%$%\@/%$%\@/%$%\@/%$%\^/%$%\@/%$%\@/%$%\@/
%$%\@/%*
> *                          .                          *
> *                         .|.                         *
> *                         -*-                         *
> *   Athbhliain Faoi Mhaise!      '|`          _    Happy New Year!   *
> *   Frohliche Weihnachten!       :        ("D     Chag Sameach!   *
> *   Sarbatori Fericite!         * . *       ~(=r      Boas Festas!   *
> *   Joyous Solstice!                  .../__\       Gut Yontif!   *
> *   Mele Kurisumasu!          o       [ SM ]      Iyi YIllar!   *
> *   Mele Kalikimaka!          *\    O *            Wesolych Swiat!   *
> *   Merry Christmas!          \\               Velelykh Svyat!   *
> *   Happy Hanukkah!            \\           Stastny Novy Rok!   *
> *   Pari Dzounount!         * o     \\  *        Kelemes Unnepeket!   *
> *   Happy Holidays!             O    \**      Season's Greetings!   *
> *   Veseli Vanoce!        \\       o  *     Gung Hay Fat Choy!   *
> *   Feliz Navidad!         *   \\  o       *      Felican Jarfinon!   *
> *   Joyeux Noel!            o  \\    O          Joy to the World   *
> *   Bom Natal!         *        \\     o *      - And to All a   * > *   God Jul!             o     o  \\ o             Good Night!   *
> *   Cheers!                 O       \\    ***                    *
> *   *:D       o_      ****************************
e@@@@@@@@@@@@@@@@@@
> *     _       <' )~       ___       #####  _v_           @@@
> *    /<~    ["""] V  o [___] _@_ #####__|~|_ A        @" ___ __________
> *   %'=    @|   |[~] U |\ /|/^^^##{}{}{}{} !    II__[w] | [i] [z] |
> *  %' )   /%|    |$|/V\|XXX|~~~~~##}{}{}{}<*>  {======|_|
~~~~~~~~~~|
```

> * %(__6 |==D_____|$|\^/|/ \|=====##{}{}{}{ V /oO--000'"`-OO---OO-'
> **********

Sander L. Gilman
193 Goldwin Smith Hall
Cornell University
Ithaca, New York 14853
e-mail: [redacted]

--Boundary (ID cW989PpHuTQYJLg6i7KhrA)--

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

February 1994

84 messages · Tue 1 Feb 1994 – Mon 28 Feb 1994

February 1994 is the month the room finally fills, and the weather it fills with is theory. Where December had left two letters and January one, the shortest month of the year runs to some fourscore, and nearly all of them are arguing — with a seriousness the young list wears like a borrowed coat that has not yet been broken in. Three words preside over the traffic, each trailing its own thread of replies: freedom, community, and, in Patrick Phillips's insistent phrasing, the social poem. The poets have discovered that they are a group, and cannot decide whether the discovery is cause for hope or for suspicion.

The freedom quarrel comes first and stays longest, conducted chiefly between Benjamin Friedlander — far and away the month's most tireless correspondent — and Tom Mandel, with Jean-Luc Nancy consulted in the wings. “You seem to understand freedom as possibility”, Friedlander writes, and then worries the formula against its opposite, the renunciation of possibility. Mandel answers in a compression close to verse: “By leaping I would have said”. It is the list arriving, almost by accident, at its characteristic pitch — abstraction driven until it turns lyric.

Beneath freedom runs the deeper and more anxious thread: community, and whether a mailing list can honestly claim the word. The correspondents reach past themselves to Blanchot's Unavowable Community and to Pierre Joris, who had a hand in carrying that book into English, and circle the paradox of a community of those who have no community. Patrick Phillips, declining to let anyone retreat into the merely aesthetic, plants the flag that the rest of the month will orbit: “This is personal, it is ideological, it is social”. Nobody is quite persuaded, which is precisely how the list prefers its persuasions.

Around these two great subjects the smaller threads cluster like satellites — an argument over the book arts and the fate of the printed object, a puzzled inquiry into what exactly is meant by wobble, a flare-up under the splendid subject-line Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error. Joe Amato and Loss Glazier and Steve Evans move among them, and the institution itself comes in for interrogation: whose room is this, and who set out the chairs. The transcriptions, one poster notes, begin as the discussion gains speed — as though the talk had outrun the means of recording it.

What one hears, reading the month straight through, is a list teaching itself to think in public — the very thing it will still be doing at the century's far end, when the subject-lines have changed but the appetite has not. I have arranged the letters so that each voice stands forward under its own name, its telephone and its address returned to privacy, the machinery of its delivery swept quietly aside. It is worth remembering, amid so much argument about community, that this is what a community sounds like before it is sure of the word: these were letters before ever they were literature.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 84 in all.

WRITERS

Amato, Joe 7, 14, 26, 61, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68
Arts, Mn Ctr For Book 32
Bernstein, Charles 6, 34, 46, 49, 56
Cy6440%albnyvms.bitnet 18
Evans, Steve 23, 24, 42, 83
Friedlander, Benjamin 1, 8, 11, 17, 19, 22, 30, 31, 41, 43, 47, 52, 59, 62, 63
Gironda, Belle 71, 73
Glazier, Loss 20, 21, 25, 29, 70
Howe, William R 10
HULT, GENE E. 50, 72, 77
Jed 33
Joris, Pierre 28, 36
Kimball, Cynthia 82
Mandel, Tom 2, 39
Moxley, Jennifer 60
Nathanson, Tenney 54, 55
Phillips, Patrick 3, 4, 13, 16, 37, 45, 48, 51, 74, 78, 80
Prevallet, Kristen 69
Quartermain, Peter 57
Rasula, Jed 40
Reinfeld, Linda 58
Rieke, Hans-Joachim 84
Sherry, James 44, 75
Sherwood, Kenneth 12, 27
Spahr, Juliana 9, 79
Spinelli, Martin 15, 81
Subject), — (No 35
Susan 76
Yates, Catherine D 5
Yates, Katie 38, 53

NAMES MENTIONED

Abdul, Selim 17
Adorno, Theodor 9, 48
Agamben, Giorgio 67
Alice, Mary 8
Andrews, Bruce 9, 24
Ashbery, John 23
Barnes, Diane 65
Barthes, Roland 3, 23
Bataille, George 28, 29
Baudelaire, Charles 48, 50, 51
Benjamin, Walter 42, 43, 48, 51, 54
Berkeley, Michael 29
Bernstein, Emma 54, 71
Blanchot, Maurice 14, 15, 18, 28, 29, 36, 38, 73
Blaser, Robin 41
Brecht, Bertolt 9
Brossard, Nicole 9, 11
Butler, Judith 59
Byrd, Don 53, 64
Coolidge, Clark 27
Crane, Stephen 76
Creeley, Robert 41
Davidson, Michael 56
Davis, Martin 2
Derrida, Jacques 48
Emerson, Claudia 67
Fredman, Stephen 6
Friedlander, Ben 1, 8, 52
Funkhauser, Chris 56
Gizzi, Peter 24
Heath, Jennifer 76
Howard, Richard 26, 44
Howe, Bill 10
Hughes, Langston 11
Hughes, Ted 9
Indiana, Gary 71
Jameson, Fredric 42
Joyce, James 5
Kelly, Paul 20
Levy, Andrew 64, 65, 66, 67, 71
Levy, Andy 14
London, Frank 29
Mac Low, Jackson 4
Manson, Douglas 29
Martin, Chris 15, 18, 34, 35, 38, 39, 40
Mayer, Bernadette 79
Maynard, James 59
Milton, John 17
Mohammad, Kasey 17
Nicole, Anna 11
Olson, Charles 41
Oppen, George 53
Piombino, Nick 13
Prevallet, Kristin 69
Reznikoff, Charles 3, 8, 11, 17, 23, 24, 30, 41, 42, 43
Rich, Adrienne 9, 11
Ridge, Tom 21, 32, 44, 76
Schultz, Susan M. 76
Sherman, Bill 53
Silliman, Ron 14, 15, 56
Simone, Frank 48
Stalin, Joseph 40
Stein, Suzanne 24, 53
Stewart, Susan 83
Warren, Jim 6

Washington, Harold 2, 39
Whitman, Walt 67
Williams, William Carlos 33, 49
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 3, 4, 59
Yamanaka, Ann 76
Zukofsky, Louis 30, 45

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 11, 14
Aesthetics 7, 9, 14, 23, 56, 80, 81, 83
Anthologies 76
Appropriation 3, 4, 5, 30, 54, 67, 83
Archives and libraries 22, 31, 56
Asian American poetry 76
Beauty 8, 50
Black Mountain 56
Book announcements 37
Capitalism 48
Cities 48
Conferences and festivals 38, 65, 83
Copyright and permissions 14, 15, 46, 59, 68
Craft 7
Creative writing pedagogy 9, 11
Dada 3
Difficulty 63
Dreams 71, 79
Ecology and ecopoetics 65
Editing 6, 9, 68
Electronic poetry and hypertext 5, 7, 27
Epic 5
Erasure 4
Ethics 24, 37
Experimental poetry 76
Fascism 42
Feminism 4, 5, 18, 23
Film 3, 4, 8, 13, 17, 23, 30, 37, 59, 83
Free speech 68
Gender 56, 60, 70, 73, 75, 76, 79, 80, 82, 83, 84
Grants and funding 56
Humour and satire 62
Ideology 1, 3, 4, 8, 13, 16, 17, 37, 46, 47, 48, 53, 56
Interviews 4, 74
Jewish poetics 41
Language poetry 8
Letters and correspondence 63
List moderation 61
Little magazines 6, 8, 29, 65
Lyric poetry 6, 14, 83
Marxism 42
Materiality of the text 81
Memory 14, 15, 48, 51, 54, 79
Modernism 55
Mourning and loss 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 29, 31, 32, 35, 44, 48, 56, 59, 70, 74
Multiculturalism 14, 66, 76
Music and poetry 11, 76, 81
Nature 4, 29, 30, 79
Negativity and refusal 1
Obituary and memorial 59
Objectivism 30
Ontology 4, 41, 61
Phenomenology 8
Philosophy 1, 2, 6, 42, 43
Place and region 48
Poetics 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83
Politics and poetry 12, 24
Print vs. digital 5, 7, 10, 23, 30
Prizes and awards 11
Procedural and constraint writing 33, 49
Psychoanalysis 63, 69, 71
Queer poetics 59, 76
Race and poetry 56, 73, 76, 79
Religion and the sacred 17, 29, 66, 79
Representation 7, 8, 13, 14
Reviewing and criticism 6, 38, 42, 51, 56, 62, 79
Semiotics 14, 15, 50
Small press publishing 56
Software and code 61, 65
Sonnet 75
Structuralism 51
Subjectivity 30, 36, 48, 53, 66, 75
Surrealism 3
The academy 56, 60, 79, 83
The body 3, 4, 61
The internet 28, 29, 61
The listserv 13, 21, 23, 26, 35, 44, 46, 56, 58, 61, 62, 69, 71, 79, 83
Theatre 56, 76, 79
Translation 18, 38, 81
Vietnam 8

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 84 in all.

1 FEB 1994

1. Benjamin Friedlander — freedom
2. Tom Mandel — freedom
3. Patrick Phillips — Imaginary Movie

3 FEB 1994

4. Patrick Phillips — Interview with Diane Ward

4 FEB 1994

5. Catherine D Yates — RE: the book arts
6. Charles Bernstein — subject/object/philosophy/lyric impulse
7. Joe Amato — RE: the book arts

5 FEB 1994

8. Benjamin Friedlander — "allowing to sound"
9. Juliana Spahr — RE: "allowing to sound"

6 FEB 1994

10. William R Howe — RE: the book arts

7 FEB 1994

11. Benjamin Friedlander — the social poem
12. Kenneth Sherwood — RE: the social poem

8 FEB 1994

13. Patrick Phillips — The Socio-political Ward

9 FEB 1994

14. Joe Amato — RE: the social poem
15. Martin Spinelli — Poetic Community

10 FEB 1994

16. Patrick Phillips — "911"
17. Benjamin Friedlander — RE: "911"

11 FEB 1994

18. cy6440%albnyvms.bitnet — Poetic Community
19. Benjamin Friedlander — "in time"

12 FEB 1994

20. Loss Glazier — rudy's marginalia
21. Loss Glazier — "Community"
22. Benjamin Friedlander — r's m
23. Steve Evans — The Social Poem: for the record
24. Steve Evans — The Social Poem
25. Loss Glazier — RE: r's m
26. Joe Amato — RE: "Community"
27. Kenneth Sherwood — RE: "Community"
28. Pierre Joris — RE: "Community"
29. Loss Glazier — RE: "Community"
30. Benjamin Friedlander — the social poem
31. Benjamin Friedlander — marginalia

13 FEB 1994

32. Mn Ctr for Book Arts — RE: "Community"

33. Jed — RE: "Community"
34. Charles Bernstein — Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error
35. — (no subject)
36. Pierre Joris — RE: "Community"
37. Patrick Phillips — The Wobbly Social Poem

14 FEB 1994

38. Katie Yates — RE: Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error
39. Tom Mandel — RE: Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error
40. Jed Rasula — RE: Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error

15 FEB 1994

41. Benjamin Friedlander — RE: The Wobbly Social Poem

16 FEB 1994

42. Steve Evans — the social poem: recitative
43. Benjamin Friedlander — hate
44. James Sherry — RE: "Community"
45. Patrick Phillips — RE: The Wobbly Social Poem

17 FEB 1994

46. Charles Bernstein — from Arkadii Dragomoschenko
47. Benjamin Friedlander — RE: from Arkadii Dragomoschenko

18 FEB 1994

48. Patrick Phillips — RE: What does "wobble" mean?
49. Charles Bernstein — from Evan Heimlich
50. GENE E. HULT — wobble wobble

19 FEB 1994

51. Patrick Phillips — RE: wobble wobble
52. Benjamin Friedlander — RE: wobble wobble
53. Katie Yates — RE: from Arkadii Dragomoschenko

20 FEB 1994

54. Tenney Nathanson — RE: What does "wobble" mean?
55. Tenney Nathanson — RE: What does "wobble" mean?
56. Charles Bernstein — Community and the Individual Talent
57. peter quartermain — "Community"

21 FEB 1994

58. Linda Reinfeld — RE: "Community"
59. Benjamin Friedlander — derek jarman

22 FEB 1994

60. Jennifer Moxley — Institution?
61. Joe Amato — RE: Community and the Individual Talent

23 FEB 1994

62. Benjamin Friedlander — RE: Institution?
63. Benjamin Friedlander — yow!
64. Joe Amato — From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 1 of 4
65. Joe Amato — From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 2 of 4
66. Joe Amato — From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 3 of 4
67. Joe Amato — From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 4 of 4
68. Joe Amato — RE: Institution?
69. Kristen Prevallet — angry boys
70. Loss Glazier — Gender

24 FEB 1994

71. Belle Gironda — community a'gin
72. GENE E. HULT — Ah...
73. Belle Gironda — a'gin
74. Patrick Phillips — RE: Institution?
75. James Sherry — RE: Institution?
76. susan — (no subject)

25 FEB 1994

77. GENE E. HULT — RULES
78. Patrick Phillips — RE: angry boys

26 FEB 1994

79. Juliana Spahr — silence, gender, two horses in another world

27 FEB 1994

80. Patrick Phillips — the purloined
81. Martin Spinelli — sounding))))))))

28 FEB 1994

82. cynthia kimball — two horses
83. Steve Evans — Repair Work
84. Hans-Joachim Rieke — community, gender

1. Benjamin Friedlander

freedom

Tue 1 Feb 1994

Tom, I'm happy to see your elaborations and further musings. I think, finally, that our differences of opinion have little to do with Jean-Luc Nancy per se, nor even, perhaps, on the meaning of freedom. You seem to understand freedom as possibility. To think and to act freedom is at once to accept this possibility and to distend it. Freedom is thus both given and beyond the given. For myself, I would say that possibility is how we know freedom. This knowledge is what's "given"; given, strangely, as the possibility of surpassing knowledge, of going "beyond" the possible. In practical terms the difference between our versions may not be all that great.

I don't, in any case, believe we can legitimately talk about freedom without positing the possibility of a freedom beyond the bounds of knowledge. Again I insist, to speak of a paradox of freedom, of a knowledge of something that surpassses knowledge, is not to fall prey to paradox. We are attempting to take the measure of the abyss our thinking would leap. You say, thinking can't accomplish that leap. I say, we take the measure of an abyss only by falling.

Well, I characterize your argument in many ways that you might not accept. I do so in good faith, simply to note what I think is the principal difference of opinion between us: whether or not it is useful to entertain a thought that begins or ends with the concept, with the positing of pure forms and essential states of being. Here two questions assert themselves:

1) Has the universal been exposed as untenable, as polluted by concerns more properly understood in terms of ideology?

2) Is thinking now possible only when situational, when beginning and ending with the particular?

I'm not going to sort these threads out here. Let me say instead that my own interests, as a poet and as a graduate student, lead me time and again to examine the contamination of discourses. My skill as a reader, if I have any, is my sensitivity to this contamination--intertextual knots fascinate me, places in texts (poetic, fictional, philosophical) where something foreign or anomalous has intruded. The logic of this contamination has everything to do with the persistence of conceptual categories. The refusal to think them, the avoidance of analyzing their workings, of learning their histories (on the grounds, for instance, of decrying universal or essentialist thought), does not free us from their hold.

Ben Friedlander
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 1-FEB-1 994 09:26:34.80

↑ Index

2. Tom Mandel
freedom
Tue 1 Feb 1994

Not possibility but the renunciation of possibility or the experience of that renunciation, but this may be a difference not of opinion but of situation in life/time/space.

In its utter particularity the "thought" of poetry may be said to rejoin singularity as universality in philosophy or maybe better in theology, which despite Johanna's animadversion's is more or less how I experience philosophy being dealt with on this net. Note that I don't use the word pejoratively (act- ually, I know you know that of me, but other readers mightn't).

I have a sense from you that's not personal, i.e. not you personally, of lack of hope, as in we measure an abyss by falling. By leaping I would have said. This is perhaps your moment in history, and your moment is more accurate than mine for sure; I was raised in a social order that not only dominated but actually comprised most of what was (US had 40% of world GNP in 1946). W/o knowing it, one felt that the world offered itself up. Ergo, I bought Miles Davis a drink when I was 15; he was wearing a gorgeous pigskin overcoat and his fingernails were as lustrous as pearls. When I was in Europe for the first time, I was a scruffy and (I thought) bohemian student. But a middle class restaurant dinner in Paris cost what a coke and fries had at home. The way it was.

How conceptual categories work does not equal the contamination of discourse, but both these matters need vigilant analysis, you are right. "Places... where something foreign or anomalous has intruded" on the other hand, may be a fine way to characterize discourse, where we must see the "foreign or anomalous" as the source of that discourse's value. Yet we will never succeed to tribalize the language of the pure.

By redemption we mean "to save," and so far from being irrelevant or intrusive (except as defined in the paragraph above), this concern is at the heart of those acts we (e.g. Johanna, or you) call "commitment," "love."

I like the way it was put by Resh Lakish:

(b. Sanhedrin 119b) Whoever answers `Amen' with all his strength, for him the gates of paradise are opened. As it is said (Isa. 26:2): `Open ye the gates that the righteous nation, who preserves faithfulness (shomer emunim) may enter.'

Do not read shomer emunim (who preserves faithfulness) but rather she-'omerim amen (who say Amen).

as ever,

tom

* T O M M A N D E L * 2927 Tilden St. NW * Washington DC 20008 * Voice: [redacted] [redacted] FAX: [redacted] **********
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 1-FEB-1 994 15:21:08.53

↑ Index

3. Patrick Phillips

Imaginary Movie

Tue 1 Feb 1994

This is a reply to a personal posting. I couldn't contact the person who sent it to me, so I've remove the name.

I suppose this may be regarded as a patient articulation, my take on IM. What filling out of the poem this accomplishes I deny. This isn't my "goal." But my "goal" is to tend to some of the structures of imagination elicited of me by IM. I suppose by posting your note you had no idea I would respond, or attempt to respond, so fully. But, as it so happens, today is devoted to tomorrow's class and you've done me a great service. I hope it doesn't turn out to be a great maze for you.

I too have to admit a dissatisfaction with the "pleasure of the text," that its giving is to say the least opaque, its color often as delightful as the package P&P put together. This grayness can be phonically supported by my take on her reading of the poem at the Ear in NYC; it too being modulated to the point of evaporation, read through with only occasional, slight pauses at line breaks and with little audible support for the mental knots she ties. (However, she is very quiet and calm in personal conversation). This said, I still regard the text with a great pleasure, perhaps more with the "jouissance" that Barthes intended. Another Barthes statement on pleasure: "...pleasure in pieces: language in pieces: culture in pieces. Such texts are perverse in that they are outside any imaginable finality--"even that of pleasure" (bliss does not constrain to pleasure; it can even apparently inflict boredom)."

What I'm getting at here is that the textual evidence of IM may not have to partake in a paradigm of pleasure to emit, or engender a cultural artifact. Granted, the cultural/poetic artifact of suspended modifiers, non-substantiated prepositions, oscillating predicates et al. has long instigated a politics of text which by now is easily seen, or tolerated (that sometimes we critics/poets remain hostage to the tropes and the critical discourse that was intended as liberating). Granted the "freeze-frame" metaphor is only neat when tied to the title and then perhaps only tropic; and that the six line strophes (I say strophe instead of stanza because of the attendent personality in "strophe" which means, among other things "apartment" in Italian, whereas, stanza, among other things, means to "mental posture") only provide marginal support for the metaphor of movie, or for the internal poetic structure of each six line unit. This characterization of some the structures of the poem would in many critical circles be a pan, a thumbs down in siskel and eberteze. Yet, under my criteria and reading practice another, quite successful text surfaces.

I don't "read" this text so much as allow it to sound out its own cultural relevance. This is not as passive as it may seem. This sounding invites a text which is an "imaginary form" which insists no matter how digruntled I may become with the way the text sits on the page. Its imaginary form becomes a discussion between my imagination and the culture's and the poem's, a discussion which often absent from the page entirely. This absence, or in effect ascribed culture, is what keeps me. Often this keeping is similar to the hostage taking as mentioned above, but it remains political in the slippage between those participants in the discussion. It is this slippage which is the field of intervention for me. This is the level of engagement. This is personal, it is ideological, it is social. You mention the social as a field of intervention. So often, even in O'Hara and Reznikoff, I feel the poem is a description of something material, a personalization which elementizes some margin running the gamut from imprisonment (I as the disenfranchized interlocutor of poetic/cultural condition) to oration (I as arbiter of the imaginary condition). This field of intervention I often find less entreating, in some ways less the jouissance, an more an efigy of the entrapped or of entrapment. As to the materialization of the social field of itervention Wittgenstein said "Psychology connects what is experienced with something physical, but we connect what is experienced with what is experienced." I ask what then does poetry connect?

Now is this "blackmail?" (the Barthesian blackmail of theory) I'm not sure. I'm also not sure what you mean by the poem's and the theory's autonomy; I'm not sure there has ever been such a thing as theoretical autonomy, certainly not technological autonomy. And when it comes to technology, not much can be left out. The theoretical apparatus evident here of course is not culturally bankrupt, certainly it isn't grammaticaly bankrupt even if it is sometimes critically tedious. The fact that the theoretical aparatus no longer provides the surprise, and then perhaps the strangeness, needs deparately to be examined. But the condition elemented by the grammar emerges, or maybe the grammar elemented by the condition emerges. Sure the often "found text" quality of her work speaks to a possibility of a text made powerless by its automaticness, that risk that much experience-based art suffers (I'm thinking of Surrealism, Dada, Minimalism, even some Absract Expressionism). But her insistence that this experience never be deflated, or deflected by appropriative gesture, be that through an acquiescence to theory, to the text, or to the culture, or importantly to imagination, speaks to the possibility of this text to reveal the often conditions of mind and society. No structure is independent here and each is spatially dis-posed and recomposed.[It strikes me that the form she has adopted may be an effort to channel the constant abridgement of this dis-position into a consumable form, a bite-sizing of experience,to effect more of a tension between elements and thereby permit more experiential hinges.] Another thing which may contribute to these pieces opacity is that they take on an epigrammatic tone and in that some morality which when viewed under a theoretical umbra disengages the personal from the textual, perhaps interupts the very thing which makes an epigram work. But I'm not so interested in that as a stumbling block to the poems effectiveness. I am concerned with the experience of the poem which insists upon an ideology for its effectiveness.

"I can only hazard it" (pg 85) aside from encapsulating the pronoun shift and the subsequent question of being in action, speaks not only of the hazard of this movement from "I" to "it" but also speaks of the obstacle toward acting and guessing, or thinking. These permutations are held in place (position is so vital here) by the shape of technology. The shape of technology here is much like "a place to put the eye" and the struggle between the technology as in human art and technology as in capital industry, but also the struggle between the personal and the social, the private politic, the body and the "apartment" it is in reveals what "color contends for, eye" The concept of a destabilized I shifting from definite to indefinite, viewer to view is always engaging the machine of that coordinate structure I -- technology -- eye. These places of contention are constantly destabilized by the visuality, but they always promote a imaginary bifurcation which is in-effect a dialectic. To go further would be to fill out...

Of course one of if not the most important features of this movie is its sexual composition. As a man, I can not put my finger on it without its touch being an additional technology for the text to contend with. Nonetheless, these "loaded fingerings" (p79) bear the same shifts, the same constant limits, or positions that the text is constantly critiquing. This is not only the figural body of the text, but of an opression which is spelled out in a "finite number of units," a real body. The transparency and caculability of currency, of surplus and exchange require this tension to be placed upon the body and upon the poetics. The internal is never exiled by the external, nor is it ever completely decribed by it. Most importantly, though, the internal the "inner" is not completely collapsed by or filled by "economic arousal" the text itself is evidence of this, not to mention Diane Ward's existence. The text suffers its own visuality which engenders an imagination engaged with sexual conditions. If the mind/brain is the largest erogenous zone, what is the mind's eye and what is this eye in the field of social intervention. What is its field of vision?

This is not so much ingratiation of the text, or a display of my enamored economy, as it is a stir of the pot of my considerations. It barely envisions only some of the concerns and even at that sometimes thinly. It would be good to hear any comments.

Patrick
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 3-FEB-1 994 09:47:01.59

↑ Index

4. Patrick Phillips
Interview with Diane Ward
Thu 3 Feb 1994

We (Patrick Phillips and Diane Ward) had this informal discussion/interview on Tuesday, February 1, 1994.

We primarily discussed the title poem of Imaginary Movie, Potes and Poets, 1992. The transcription begins as our discussion gained speed.

None of this should be published elsewhere without contacting Diane or Patrick. I didn't get a "release" from her and want to respect her privacy.

The interview was interrupted, which I thought appropriate, by her son who still needs to be by her side after the earthquake. I was interrupting his sense of safety, which wasn't entirely appropriate.

P Its form becomes a discussion between my imagination, the culture's imagination and the poem's, a discussion which often is absent from the page entirely. This absence, or in effect ascribed culture, is what keep s me. This keeping remains political in the slippage between those participants in the discussion. It is this slippage which is the field o f intervention for me. This is the level of engagement. This is personal, it is ideological, it is social. I'm very interested in the function of the imagination in this field.

Here her son needs her and the question goes unanswered.

P The poem sets up frames...

DW They are frames for the "viewer" the author and the reader trying to deal with the screen which is the poem for conversation, the back and forth dialogue. where the writing exists is in the dissolving aspect of the work.

P The grammatical situations are often setting up ideological frames (pg 49)

DW Which is a context for the discourse
The text is intent on not allowing the individual so much

I don't see the frustration or violence of erasure in the text as a negative thing. I'm trying to deal with the nature of that exchange between, not so much the writer and the reader, but the person and society, or the person and authority and how to reclaim that self within the context of the language and the visual context of your existence. The constant barrage of information. That's what I'm dealing with and that piece. And it's successful in that way and I almost don't want to write after that. Of course I am. (pg 36)

P Why is it successful?

It's formally on the page this contained thing. I think each individual frame, in terms of its meaning, or its series of images, is always frustrated,it never congeals, or it never comes together as a formal frame in that context of the page. So that it frustrates the control of the formal page by subverting it, by frustrating the logic of expected images.

P Is the writing cultural or theoretical. I think if you write out of a thecultural you write "of" something; if you write out of the theoretical youwrite for something. And I think you note this later on in the poem. (pg 91)

DW Well I think that's there. You can almost call the cultural a starting point or a recognition of position and the exploration in terms of the theoretical would be, not the solution of the problem of position, but.. .. (p 37) P a tool with which you...

DW where they are played against one another. A lot of times in my work, not only in this piece, but in other work, I try to subvert the duality of thought, of experience. I really work with that pretty consistently. Through the use of language and images.

P Wittgenstein (in Remarks on Color) said "Psychology connects somethin g experienced with something physical; we connect what is experienced with experience." By setting up bifurcation and abrogating that agreement sets up a soft focus on the edges of those experiences so that they meld. ...

DW Um hmm...

P Another thing which may point to this is the kind of thing you set up in a line like "I can only hazard it" aside from encapsulating the pronoun shift and the subsequent question of being in action, it speaks not only of the hazard of this movement from "I" to "it" but also speaks of the obstacle toward acting and guessing, or thinking. ...

DW ...and the overcoming of the obstacle.

What you said about the psychological earlier. In order to ground my work I keep bringing it back to a real personal, physical experience of it. As a woman it's really kind of hard to emphasize the body imagery without getting tangled up in these cliches. I don't really us it in a feminist body conscious kind of sense. I use it to grasp the more abstract aspect s of perception. To bring the world which is at those soft edges back, to letit go, to bring it back. (pg 85)

P I like that. I find comfort in that. Not only in the way you use light to dispose of a very physical situation but to return to a physical situation. And then you'll use shadow as a notion between those two physicalities and immaterialities. (pp 50, 51)

DW And I find it really workable to even the field that way to bring this work which could go off into nowhere. It's almost a political act. It emphasizes all parts of discourse and experience equally, and that's also very important to me. It's part of that subversion of the duality process.

P This is what I was saying about imagination. That once the form of the poem becomes a discussion in my imagination, the slippage between these aspects that's off the page, it becomes a political act because these things begin to intervene on one another, socially and that becomes a function of the imagination and it becomes replayed in this conversation for example, in the class tomorrow, or in my own work. It's very instrumental. And I'm wondering if that's experiential in your part or cognitive, in other words as you're writing do you erase and rewrite to build in this, or do you allow it to build on its own?

DW I think the latter. I would allow it. I work a lot and rework it. I am really interested in the process of the discourse and not really the discourse itself.

P So it's not so much a political agenda, but an ontological one, or an experiential one.

DW Right. The experiential is really important to me.

P Of course one of the most important features of this movie is its sexual composition. As a man, I can not put my finger on that sexual composit ion without my touch being an additional technology for the text to contend with. That once I describe it, it (the sexuality) is conscribed, that it is no longer an experiential condition, but it is also no longer female. (79, 95, 65)

DW What I really hope is that my work that I do is not that ephemeral, that your discussing it conscribes it as you say. A lot of what I do in talking about allowing these discourses, or exploring them, is just that , is allowing the technological to exist along side the sexual and not reallymaking a judgment about the clashes so much as exploring them.

P Shifting to a more formal characterization, the frames seem sometimes t o take on an epigrammatic tone and in that tone some morality. I'm wondering how when I say epigram and morality, how that strikes you.

DW I think that when I set up that formal frame and that I had to almost work against it. There's a play. Some of the pieces are open ended and some of them are very well scribed and refer back to themselves. In a wa y I think that's very formal concern and a playful nature of the piece. Th e whole morality thing I think is part of the voice that comes in reaction to whole idea of the big screen and the control of that. Whether it's true, whether it's a real moral voice I'm not sure. (pg 72 -"tightly scribed")

P I'm interested in what people call fragments.--Holderlin's Hymns and "Fragments," or that people call A Tomb for Anatole "fragments," or that Creeley's Pieces may not really be pieces as such.

DW Well. I'm not interested in that so much. One of the things is the formal and the way language is used in that in contrast with each other and it is again not making a value judgment on a nice formed piece. I find this thing Imaginary Movie frustrating in that way. That "Oh this isn't finished, or it's just a fragment because of the way it's laid-out.

P I don't see a Tomb for Anotole as fragment as such. Whether he wrote them on scraps of paper, or in shards of passion, they're not fragments, but it's fascinating that people would consider them as such.

DW It's not only fascinating, but it's a little annoying. That you would have to, as a writer, as a poet would have to conform your work to what can be read as a finished piece. How frustrating. How insulting. A lot of people have dealt with that in a more thorough way, Jackson Mac Low for example. It's part of what I'm doing. From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 4-FEB-1 994 11:19:37.15

↑ Index

5. Catherine D Yates

RE: the book arts

Fri 4 Feb 1994

Joe: "One of the issues I find provocative is the idea of using hypertext as a metaphor for constructing a different sort of printed text...what if one were to...--- take the electronic form, ...and push it metaphorically in some unexpected material directions?..."

Joel: "What do you mean by printed text...forgive me for needing examples" & "I have been fascinated with the concept of the Search Engine and the logic of search strings...wandering free in a field of unrestricted text...you find what you ask for..."

I am replying not because of what I know about hypertext and search string technology but because of what I know of the opposite if we can take the simplistic duality of print making, writing and electronic writing, searching as a point of departure, more simply, to address your queries in terms of oldslow and newfast.

I just learned how to operate a lithographic press. You pull the bar down on your plate (stone), put the clutch in, & turn the cog. Ink is smashed into the paper under the pressure of approximately 900 pounds per square inch. If you forget to take the clutch out before you lift up the bar, the handle on the cog will fly toward you, hit your nose at great unstoppable speed & break it. You will have to find someone willing to clean up the blood with appropriate blood safety anti-viral gear.

One thinks about an image, what would you want to draw on such a plate (stone) and as a poet what would you write on it?

Few of us have drawing skills, are trained to reproduce in charcoal the sinews and breasts of the human form. Few of us have this same knowledge put into choosing words which could describe our experience of living or even to convey information to someone.

For example what I draw on a hard ground zinc plate is closer to an after-image, a burnt and glinted shape just left of your pupil inside the tissues of your eyelid, of a bluff in the Hudson River Valley north of White Plains than God's hand reaching for Adam though that might be what I mean. (no Feminist version of this reference comes appropriately to mind)

It takes me a month of dips into sulfuric acid and tireless wiping ink into the crevices of the zinc to figure this image onto the page, an image which registered in my mind in just a fraction of a second

Over the core of the month, the drawing was first a face, then two masques, then a tough rock and a fist.

Meanwhile, I think about writing into this print & manage only to print back wards in water based crayon two things:

"with"

&

"girl in winter"

which is all I have time for & all I know.

This is my way of taking up Joe's curiosity about hypertext and unexpected material form.

I don't think that electronic forums take care of the slow operations of living. There is a kind of reverse nostalgia that maybe we could keep track of what we know or say because of a technological frontier. Do not think that I am, however, willing to do away with it. I am avid about a relationship to stringent conversation by way of the keyboard, by way of e-mail.

This is my way of taking up Joel's careful urge to define a "text" as a way to get to an understanding of "hypertext." (He uses Greek epic cycles, James Joyce...as possible ways to understand the concept of "hypertext" which I am not addressing per se). I am defining a text & it's "material" both in terms of how a particular text is made, physically and where the text/image might come from, experientially. In terms of "wandering free in a field of unrestricted text" and whether SearchEngine changes our concept of "reading" hence "writing" I would say:

Yes.
No.

Yes, SearchEngine changes one's awareness thus, access to textual (written) information and must change how one would read through it.

No, SearchEngine does not change your awareness thus access to understanding the (written) textual information nor will it change our capacity to reply.

I believe one's "awareness" and one's ability to "speak about" or "draw about" what one knows and learns are skills which are developed not because of electronic space but because of what one seeks, or bumps into. Not to say that one couldn't have all of one's serious physical, intellectual, artistic experiences on, in SearchEngine, that is surely to come, but that one does not figure things out, survive because of the speed of and the mere availability of information.

From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 4-FEB-1 994 15:46:01.37

↑ Index

6. Charles Bernstein
subject/object/philosophy/lyric impulse
Fri 4 Feb 1994

Marc Christensen, the editor of the Wayne Literary Review, from Wayne State in Detroit, writes that he is looking for work for a special Summer 1994 issue (dealine May 1): "Theory poetics art culture": "quality creative writing needed which aspires towards an effacement, blurring, or subversion of the subject/object relationship between theory and art." (He mentions that he first saw my work in a 1991 issue of Meanjin, the Australian magazine, in a section edited by Sigi Jottkandt, now at UB & on this list.) Write Marc Christensen at Wayne Literary Review, WSU Dept. of English, 51 West Warren, Detroit MI 48202.

Henry Weinfeld called to say that he and Stephen Fredman are editing a special issue of Sagetrieb on the intersection of the lyric and philosophical impulses in 20th century poetry. They are looking at proposals for through the spring. Both are at Notre Dame. From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 5-FEB-1 994 17:42:48.72

↑ Index

7. Joe Amato
RE: the book arts
Fri 4 Feb 1994

---

katie [i am most comfortable in lowercase] i take you to mean text-from-life as blood-from-stone...

to which: yes, the sensitivities we develop to a medium are not simply a function of the medium... the transparencies (historically, palpably) associated with media perhaps one of the places to draw out latent structures (that, i would think, are correlative to metabolic impulses---but this reveals a certain body-centered aesthetic to which i am predisposed)...

that is, i find it difficult to construct a 'complete' account of my work 'with' or 'through' corresponding 'material' simply because i'm not certain that i necessarily engage (setting aside the more conscious deliberations of craft) in a conscious processing of same, or in a quasi-conscious forgetting of the 'stuff' at hand (as in this last poorly constructed example, the little noninklings ' ' serving to introduce self-consciousness into my ruminations)... there is some empirical work (wish i could remember where at the moment) to indicate that 'getting lost' in the flow, so to speak, is ultimately beneficial to creative processing... but of course this doesn't begin to address what sorts of "objects" we wish to objectify (and what sorts of subjects correspond thereto)...

to some extent, to argue from mediation (much as from design) represents a residual form/content dualism... that is, to the extent that we read-write 'through' a given medium (i.e., as a mediator) to a presumed experience-construction of content that is somehow exhausted-(or, worse)"explained" in such terms... that is, without content-of-the-form interference, seamlessly...

but your post concludes on the related, perhaps more pressing issue of survival in an age of information... hence opening to the question of what sorts of experiences we might wish to have not so much out of regard for aesthetic taste (itself socially-situated), but for signifying practices that speak to our more urgent places in time(s)... and here, i think, is where the tendency in many circles to view something like hypertext as simply 'facilitating' a more 'interactive' response to 'knowledge production' (those cursed little marks again, drats!) appears a bit naive...

i mean, hypertext is not necessarily going to make anything, incl. life, any easier... i look to it to provide a more complex representation (yes, even mimetically) of how meaning/knowledge emerges from information flows... alternatively, possibly, to help think our way out of the information metaphysics this culture would seem to be so caught up in... hence perhaps to open to a renewed appreciation of contingency (and associated ambiguities), the temporal dimension proper, that underwrites all (mortal) practice (ssorry for any new age intimation)... but hypertext is simply one aspect of an emerging network of new networks, all of which augur, most importantly for me, the possibilities (and associated limitations) of alternative communities (of writers, citizens, etc)...

as you so eloquently suggest, what happens to the page in the midst of these (potentially social) changes will probably be less a matter of emphasizing any material method per se than a consequence of how we learn to survive and seek out together...

joe
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 4-FEB-1 994 15:51:47.44

↑ Index

8. Benjamin Friedlander
"allowing to sound"
Sat 5 Feb 1994

Pardon my abstracting from Patrick's long message on Diane Ward the following passage. The message was addressed in particular to an unnamed interlocutor but was distributed to all of us on the poetics list. I deleted one set of statements from within the passage (marked below by ellipses within brackets) becauses I didn't quite understand what Patrick was saying and because the technical character of those statements seemed to derive from the "reading" of Diane Ward's Imaginary Movie--a book I don't know-- and so I was unsure how relevant they are to a discussion of poetry and poetics in general. And I put the word reading in quotes only because of what Patrick himself says, that is:

I don't "read" this text so much as allow it to sound out its own cultural relevance. This is not as passive as it may seem. This sounding invites a text which is an "imaginary form" which insists [on what? here is where i begin to lose track--b.f.] no matter how digruntled I may become with the way the text sits on the page.[...] This is the level of engagement.
This is personal, it is ideological, it is social. You mention the social as a field of intervention. So often, even [but why "even"?] in O'Hara and Reznikoff, I feel the poem is a description of something material, a personalization which elementizes some margin running the gamut from imprisonment (I as the disenfranchized interlocutor of poetic/cultural condition) to oration (I as arbiter of the imaginary condition). This field of intervention I often find less entreating...

I'll cut it off there because the other half of the sentence refers to the statements I deleted.

I return to this message because I would like to take issue with what I take to be an analogy Patrick is drawing between the two sides of two different distinctions. On the one hand, between reading a text and allowing it to sound (with the implication being that the latter discovers a world of discussion and interaction unavailable to the former); on the other, between two conceptions of the social poem, one that seems performative (Diane Ward), the other linked to modes of representation (O'Hara and Reznikoff). Unstated as such but governing Patrick's remarks (or so I believe) is the twin association of (1) "reading" with "representation" and (2) "allowing to sound" with "performance." Is that correct?

My reconstruction of the argument is necessarily hazy because I'm unsure what this "allowing to sound" actually consists in, and I'm also unsure what sort of social engagement this "allowing to sound" engenders.

I'm all for the discovery of new modes of reading, and for rich phenomenologically tinged accounts of how the poem solicits the reader's attention. I only recently re-read Nick Piombino's essays from L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E magazine and was struck with the depth and beauty of what he describes. His work in that area has not been taken up and I dare say a critical practice that took Nick's theories of reading as its starting point would look different than anything presently being practiced. My problem in the present context is with the promotion of a certain sort of text and a certain sort of "reading" that defines itself by disparaging reading as such. To disavow reading would seem to me to dictate the terms on which the text can be approached. Speaking as a reader, my inclination is to cry foul. Also, however, I wonder what the actual value of this "allowing to sound" can be if it is only applicable to one kind of poem. If it's impossible, for instance, to allow O'Hara's poetry or Reznikoff's "to sound," I wonder if the social engagement discovered in Imaginary Movie is not MORE rather than LESS restrictive.

But these are simply questions that point to a need for clarification. My other interest in all this is more pedestrian: What is the social poem? What ideas about the social poem do we entertain without reflection, and where do we see poets working to articulate newer or deeper ideas about poetry and society?

Patrick mentioned that he is teaching Diane Ward's work and that his musings were inspired by that. By a strange coincidence, my own teaching takes me to a similar line of thinking. I gave my students Langston Hughes's essay "My Adventures as a Social Poet" (from the recently reprinted collection Good Morning Revolution). In the coming weeks I'll be trying to figure out how best to teach them Charles Reznikoff's Testimony, which in my opinion is a profoundly complex text, not at all a simple collection of voices and stories. After Reznikoff I'm taking up texts that are not poetry, but at the very end of the semester I"m going to try to incorporate Alice Notley's poem "White Phosphorus" (from her book Homer's Art) in a more general and historical account of the Vietnam War.

Anyone else working in this area? Any thoughts?

Ben Friedlander
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 5-FEB-1 994 23:22:52.83

↑ Index

9. Juliana Spahr

RE: "allowing to sound"

Sat 5 Feb 1994

Ben, I too was bothered by the separation of reading and sounding but felt it might be more just another example of the semantic confusion that seems to take over net discussions. (restrictive editing seems to have a direct relation to vocabulary confusions) in these discussions) But I like the larger question of where these take us--how does sounding allow reading; how reading sounding. I think you are right--Piombino is the place to look. Also Dahlen and Howe and at times the essays of Andrews.drews.

But it is your question of what is the social poem that provoked me to finally reply to something on this list. I think the answer is the poem is the social poem. But that is my easily dismissed anti-Adorno (and the rest) optimism speaking that I've finally accepted because the whole thing doesn't seem like it is worth much without it. I liked your teaching narrative mainly because I think I am using a similar area of concern to direct my class--moving from Heart of Darkness to bell hooks' "narratives of struggle" to a study of contrasts between Cullen's "Heritage" and Lindsay's "The Congo" and Hughes "Weary Blues" and Smith's "It A Come" to Apocalypse Now and the accompanying apparatus to Erica Hunt's "Notes for an Oppositional Poetics" to Teresa Hak Kyung Cha's "Dictee" to Leslie Scalapino's "Waking Life." I am trying to examine in just he most basic levels--what is testimony or struggle or opposition.

This has been in some ways the major question of the poetry of the 70s (it might get its most reductive play in the often drawn contrast between the work of Adrienne Rich and the work of, say, Nicole Brossard; Rich seen as the necessity of a narrative and standardized diction for political purposes, Brossard as the necessity for rewriting the language). We all know these arguments. But in some ways they weren't really answered (or at least I feel that way; I am still confused if it necessary to start with the assumption of a standard in order to articulate a right, or a document of rights). S

So I am wondering how these issues play out for others, especially in the context of the classroom (which is in some ways a testing ground). I am wondering where others locate the political assumptions of poetry. I am wondering how others fit the aesthetic and social concerns of theorists such as Brecht, Adorno, or more recently, Jameson's call for mapping the postmodern into the poetic. And I am wondering, Ben, whether you think I have done a great disservice to your word "social" by merging it with my vague "political."

Juliana Spahr
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 6-FEB-1 994 13:16:26.77

↑ Index

10. William R Howe
RE: the book arts
Sun 6 Feb 1994

---

in response to joe's comment that he feels most comfortable in lower case i find it interesting to note that most computer systems are completely case insensitive (meaning they make no distinctions between lower and upper case).
this is only changed by the applications that we choose to run on them (especially higher order applications that have been designed for a maximum of user- friendly bells and whistles). We on the other hand are very aware of the fact of cases. We use cases to clue us into various kinds of syntax. case then becomes a kind of covert linguistic organization that we are blind to as long as it is present, but as soon as the rUles of caSe iNteGrity haVe been ruptUred wE Become awaRe oF case. And, it is at times like this that we realize that lower case letters and upper case letters not only look different on the page but mean differently as well.

Bill Howe
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 7-FEB-1 994 22:31:52.46

↑ Index

11. Benjamin Friedlander
the social poem
Mon 7 Feb 1994

Juliana, first of all, no, your merging of "social" and "political" doesn't do me a disservice. I admit I was impressed last year when Tom Loebel told me the two are quite distinct-- impressed though I myself am hopelessly confused about the difference. Tom I guess had in mind a technical distinction that holds sway in political science (which I believe is what he studied before switching to English), but of course readers and writers of literature don't always recognize that distinction. (Langston Hughes, for instance, in his "Adventures as a Social Poet," speaks of social and political issues--about poverty and about being black in America, but also about the Scottsboro boys, about segregation.)

Nevertheless, the very possibility of a distinction has proven useful. By speaking of the "social" poem, for instance, I would evade some of the cant that collects around the word "political." Also, I hope by returning to a vocabulary that emphasizes the documentary over the activist to reexamine some of our prejudices against the documentary (what you were referring to as "the often drawn contrast between the work of Adrienne Rich and the work of, say, Nicole Brossard; Rich seen as the necessity of a narrative and standardized diction for political purposes, Brossard as the necessity for rewriting the language"). For both those reasons I tend to prefer, like Langston Hughes apparently, to use the word social to refer to both the social and political, rather than using the word political to refer to the political and social (the latter choice being much more common these days-- perhaps why you referred to the social as "my" word).

Second, as far as teaching is concerned (and I'm still such a novice at this, still so easily surprised at how quickly my constructions of the classroom can collapse, that I hesitate to offer this, but...), I seem to be moving toward a course similar to yours. Like you, I'm asking my students "what is testimony or struggle or opposition," and trying to do so (since the class is composition) by engaging them "at just the most basic levels."

I've tried to organize the class around two overlapping sets of questions. (1) What does it mean to speak for "a people"? How is that different than speaking for yourself? Where do the two tasks intersect and where do they part company? (Here the principal texts are Testimony and The Souls of Black Folk.) (2) What does it mean for a writer to take music as a model for writing? (The Souls of Black Folk and DuBois's emphasis on "the sorrow songs.") What does it mean if the writer's words are not his or her own, or if they're modeled on the language of the courts? (Reznikoff's Testimony.)

Because I prize all the texts I'm teaching, I'm hoping (for myself--forget the students here!) not only to discover what the resources of the so-called "social"

poem ARE, but to illuminate these resources as a continuum of values, not a set of mutually exclusive choices (here is where my students really do enter the picture--can I somehow escape my own didacticism in order to make these choices available to them?). Isn't the subtext of the "often drawn contrast" between Brossard and Rich an attempt to proscribe certain forms of writing? And what kind of task is that? I mean, I love Nicole Brossard's work, but doesn't the sanctimoniousness of the sheer use of that work to criticize another's make you want to prefer Adrienne Rich? (And isn't that contrary preference the very essence of an oppositional poetics!) This seems to be a little of what was at stake in the upholding of Diane Ward as versus O'Hara and Reznikoff.

Ben F.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 7-FEB-1 994 23:18:47.88

↑ Index

12. Kenneth Sherwood
RE: the social poem
Mon 7 Feb 1994

Ben et al,

Your musings on the social-in-the-political and the political-in-the- social help distill the my muddy thoughts of earlier today. As if the terms could be discrete at all, the 'political' has taken a particular resonance, popularly. Isn't to call one's poems social as over 'political' to propose that they are not overtly functional (as with propoganda), or rather, not purely concerned with overt political effect (since by such measure our most purportedly political poems fall ineffectual) but with a double burden?

How to call that double burden, how shoulder it? Perhaps I invest too much in your preference for the one word; I imagine claiming "social" for my own poetry in hopes that its fact of being, my activity in arranging its language, bringing it before a public in various manners implictly renders it a social act. And here I suppose I've so sullied the word it designates but sense of ripples on the surface after sinking.

What of my reliance on 'hope'.

KS
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 8-FEB-1 994 13:30:29.26

↑ Index

13. Patrick Phillips
The Socio-political Ward
Tue 8 Feb 1994

The responses to my post have generated several questions circling the issue of "reading" as opposed to "sounding". They have also pointed to a tendency toward a lexical pile-up in my writing. I'd like to unpack some of my person to person considerations so that they may be more easily approached by a wider audience. I should say that I had initially sent my reflection on "Imaginary Movie" to one person in response to some of his questions and perhaps it was unfair to throw this on the List without some attention to detail. I also wish to see if I can give a sense of what I find social and political about reading around IM and "this kind" of text.

As to "I don't 'read' this text so much as allow it to sound out its own cultural relevance," "sound" was primarily used to contrast a broad field of effects with "read" which in my response to the "unnamed interlocutor" referred to a once-through oral reading which was ultimately unsatisfying for him. There is, as Ben points out, a disparagement of reading here, but one which doesn't so much devalue reading as place it in a broad relationship with the imaginary. "Sound" was a con-fusion of effects for me (and for others) - a pun attending to the metaphor of movie, an attempt to allude to a sonar-like (non-visual) means of finding the depth of a text's cultural reference, and a wish to find a measure of intention, or of what utility the imaginary is when "reading" such references. These three characteristics of the rather unstable, and somewhat tired "sound" helped me locate the text and the imaginary in a larger matrix than "read." "Reading" still remains an area of contention. I'll drop "sound" because it has a bad ring to it.

As this idea of reading and sounding may relate to Piombino's "Writing and Imaging," my interest is to "parse" not the "symbolic value of images", but the social value of the "after-images" I find in reading "Imaginary Movie." These are subtle, but valuable distinctions which I think may help get to how the text is for me is ideological and thereby social and poitical.

The distinction between image and after-image is made by Piombino as a kind of "shadowing" -- "the image layered on and under, like the creation of an aproximate sign." What I find so compelling about Imaginary Movie is Ward's use of these "approximate signs." These after-images layered on and under a textual and imaginary horizon induce a soft focus between these lines. Ultimately I am interested in what these after-images do, how they interact and what is induced in the "reader" through this interaction. To say the text is comprised of after-images, not signs, but the collusion of approximate signs, promotes an idea of text more like an idea of imagination. Through the blurring of the distinction between language and a cultural imagination the text becomes, or aspires to, a visual representation of the imagination, an "imaginary movie." A reading becomes a viewing, a mix of motivated participation, reading as in "I read you," and unmotivated participation, a mind's-eye view. What is key for me here is that this view does not consist of a "visual field" per se, that there is no object which occupies our retina, either elemented as word, or as imaginary object. There is nothing in our experience that is surrounded by nothing, wholly marked off and distinct. Or, as Merleau-Ponty says, a "visual field is not made up of limited views." Reading urges a participation in fields of reference which are limited views. Viewing has little of the demarcation reading requires, either in the viewed or the viewer.

To a larger experiential condition, I can testify that I have not read IM in five or six days. In spite of lapse, I am always remembering, always suffused with the elements of its experience, the viewings that Imaginary Movie clipped for me. From this experience I sense no distinct visual fields. The sexual takes place within the technological, the value of the economic within the exchange of testament. This, whatever it demonstrates for me, is social. It too takes place in this unframed field of aproximate signs, of after-images, of the means toward communication and of the un-ending ends. What is instrumental for me here is that it is not the poem which foments the condition, but the experience that foments the poem. The induction into the functional resistance that awareness builds is social, as evidenced in some small way by my attempts to make it so through letters and postings. It's often difficult to go back and forth between experience and culture this way with poetry that is declarative. I just now opened up "Testimony" into the "South" to a terrible child beating and I must say that family terror has a cultural oscillation we all continually suffer. I was quite uncomfortable with this portrait. Nonetheless what is the difference between this portrait of family violence and that on "911" except for the difference between exhortation (Reznikof) and expoloitation (911). (I am not ridiculing Reznikof here!) My initial reflection was the horror of the "Die, God damn you!" And then I reflected on the reflection itself, something I cannot wholly do//separate in the experience of IM.

Finally, it is the reading, the response to the references in words like technology, "Industrial Hygene," in concepts of exchange and power, violence and sexuality, which is important in politicizing this social text. For me it is the ideology which contorts the reference enough for there to be a soft edge, a value placed upon the after-images so that these approximate signs are motivated. The conditions of culture here become their own critique and thereby our experience, our bodily experience maintains a level of this critique. By and in this there is a politicization of experience, which for me drops away at the moment of reflection. Reflection here is a kind of sustained being, this is what I meant when I said Imaginary Movie insists. To suggest in what it insists would entail this kind of explaination, or something more. One last thing. In my class, there were several different connotations of "poiltical" which proved stumbling blocks, or at least obstacles for definition. Here I want to suggest that the motivation of the imaginary beyond reflection and into some level of sustainable critique is of itself politcal. Imaginary Movie accomplishes this for me.

Patrick
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 9-FEB-1 994 15:09:07.33

↑ Index

14. Joe Amato
RE: the social poem
Wed 9 Feb 1994

All: I find Susan Stewart's brief essay in Profession 93, "The State of Cultural Theory and the Future of Literary Form," to be pertinent to the issues being discussed hereabouts (Andy Levy brought it to my attention)... It's pretty dense, but it raises some provocative questions, e.g., whether a reexamination of the lyric (of aesthetic form in general) might help to produce a more "dynamic and concrete avenue of activism" for intellectuals looking "to diversify literary representation under the rubric of multiculturalism"...

Joe
From: UBVMS::V139HLA3 9-FEB-1994 18:54:22.99
To:CHARLES
CC:V139HLA3
Subj: improved blanchot response

Response to Blanchot's _The Unavowable Community_

Last week Ron Silliman gave a paper to Joan's seminar using metaphors of superconductor conductivity and electrical resistance to explore the "polylexic" of poetry and community. These two metaphors took off on their own while "community" and "poetry" got lost somewhere in the traditional prose. Two things: I was apprehensive: it seems "poetry" and "community" were made to fit, or even forced into the literary convention of the metaphors -- no matter how skillfully they were deployed (and they were) I was unsettled; the metaphors got us no closer to what was at issue -- nothing was learned about community _or_ superconductors -- I wondered "what next?" and "more". My uneasiness with his talk made me suddenly apprehensive about mapping the structure of emedia onto Blanchot's meditation on community. "What's the use? What does it do?"

Self and community have a non
-reciprocal but mutual dependency. The Self can only feel its solitude in the absence of community. In this way the Self is made aware of community in the presence of its lack. It The Net confirms community in is solitary only in the the absence of community. Only remembering of community.ghosts are connected to the Likewise, community is invoked user. When I sit in front of holding the hand of the dying --my terminal I can contact of a dying individual; to invokeanyone in absence. On the Net it any other way, in speaking it There is, at least for the
for example, is only to invoke time being, a kind of democracy an _absence_ of community. Here(though only perhaps "an image is the Communion. But there is of"). Equality is imposed by something more: the impossible the sameness, or at least impulse towards equality in the compatibility of the material
face of Self-Otherconduit of communication relationships. (terminal, keyboards, drives, memory blocks, etc.). But
The act of communicating isthere is really only deadly to its content.a reflexive equality -- who is
"Community" cannot be spoken more the stranger than someone with intent. Absence is neededyou can't see. Nothing is more to affirm it. The absence of*unavowable* than someone in content in the ecstacy of shared espace. Emedia is _absolute_ communication. The meaning of absence. There are no deaths
the content only surfaces with a to witness yet the voices it communal agreement for functional makes audible invoke an or work related use.overwhelming absence -- all
The unavowable community exists those who can communicate somehow in the expressionlessness but are not. It is not of communication. Clarity is to a community dependent on be eschewed as purposeful, as absence, but is a community work. "A law which presupposes exclusively _of_ absence.
community (an understanding or a common accord, be it the "Commodity is spoken in momentary accord of two singular a clear voice. And beings, breaking with few words commodification of work(s),
the impossibility of Saying the valuing of labor in the
which the unique trait of measure of money feeds an experience seems to contain; its inequality that makes a kind sole content: to be of community utterable in the untransmittalbe, which can be form of commerce. Information, completed thus: the only thing always difficult to commodify worthwhile is the transmission [*think on the contortions of

of the untransmittable."(17) intellectual property law*],
ironically evades the commodity
Writing must be worklessness. community. It is hard to make Writing is an action, a verb,it signify (money). In this way, not a object; its noun form an information exchange (without solidifies the community and the communal agreement, but with
for the sake of the community an ecstatic communication, or must be banished. Blanchotjust ecstacy) is not valuable, consoles: the object/writingbut is the basis of our
is "always already lost". ecommunity. _Nothing_ is exchanged and our work ethic
Articulatable community produces chides us for it.
friendship and "Friendship calls
upon the community throughThe writing here is a non-writing." But this friendship product. It is not consumed.
is only developed in drunkenness The action of writing, the
where "friends disavo[w] their solipsistic ecstacy in the act previous friendship in order to of writing, is the democracy.
call upon friendship And from this emanates the grandiose (camaraderie withoutdefence of access. Everyone can preliminaries) vehiculated by and indeed _must_ be an author for the requirements of being there". the sake of equality and the
When the familiar (ie. the denial of clarity. Graffiti in its meaning), made so by agreement, self-assertion, in its Saying as supplants the unutterable, the all-important thing, is the only Blanchot experiences my real forerunner and the paradigm for uneasiness. In the hurt that true democracy.
he cannot hide, he falls back into his own textual trap. Yet truer equality is to come in
He resorts to naming and access to experience in only the most idealization of the real.existential of contemporary ways. In Virtual reality the Ideal is the perfect
This may inspire groans (or stand-in (not even a substitute) yawns). It is cliche: "random for the real.... Why do we always signifiers", "to reveal by smart a bit when the real is not revealing", "absence is the supplanted? Is it the reduction core". Need it be said that of experience? Is Violence again they are necessarily done?

impossibilities (oxymoronic) in their articulations in (yet my writing and your language? In the end Blanchot reading is real. they are almost warns of the spaces of experiential. a change in
"freedom" inbetween the workthinking about the real is needed.
and the unwork. And says they there is nothing virtual in my carry with them (*signify*fingers on the keys, electrical almost) "responsibilities" for resistance in silicon, or your
"new relationships". eyes on the monitor.

I want to ask "Where do we progress to from here?" "What comes next?" "What now?" What goes >>> HERE <<< ? There is a certain presumption in these questions, and in the word "new". New does not interest me, getting at the latent does, as does getting at our material relations to the things we have. Have I also exposed an attachment to the real?

From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 9-FEB-1 994 23:45:32.83

↑ Index

15. Martin Spinelli
Poetic Community
Wed 9 Feb 1994

From: UBVMS::V139HLA3 9-FEB-1994 18:54:24.07
To:CHARLES
CC:
Subject: Blanchot Response

>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
some thoughts on what's been going on in this space and reading Blanchot for the first time

i'd appreciate any ideas or suggestions.

-Martin
>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>

Response to Blanchot's _The Unavowable Community_

Last week Ron Silliman gave a paper to Joan's seminar using metaphors of superconductor conductivity and electrical resistance to explore the "polylexic" of poetry and community. These two metaphors took off on their own while "community" and "poetry" got lost somewhere in the traditional prose. Two things: I was apprehensive: it seems "poetry" and "community" were made to fit, or even forced into the literary convention of the metaphors -- no matter how skillfully they were deployed (and they were) I was unsettled; the metaphors got us no closer to what was at issue -- nothing was learned about community _or_ superconductors -- I wondered "what next?" and "more". My uneasiness with his talk made me suddenly apprehensive about mapping the structure of emedia onto Blanchot's meditation on community. "What's the use? What does it do?"

Self and community have a non
-reciprocal but mutual dependency. The Self can only feel its solitude in the absence
of community. In this way the Self is made aware of community in the presence of its lack. It The Net confirms community in is solitary only in the the absence of community. Only remembering of community.ghosts are connected to the Likewise, community is invoked user. When I sit in front of holding the hand of the dying --my terminal I can contact
of a dying individual; to invokeanyone in absence. On the Net
it any other way, in speaking it There is, at least for the
for example, is only to invoke time being, a kind of democracy
an _absence_ of community. Here(though only perhaps "an image is the Communion. But there is of"). Equality is imposed by something more: the impossible the sameness, or at least impulse towards equality in the compatibility of the material
face of Self-Otherconduit of communication relationships. (terminal, keyboards, drives, memory blocks, etc.). But
The act of communicating isthere is really only deadly to its content.a reflexive equality -- who is
"Community" cannot be spoken more the stranger than someone with intent. Absence is neededyou can't see. Nothing is more to affirm it. The absence of*unavowable* than someone in content in the ecstacy of shared espace. Emedia is _absolute_ communication. The meaning of absence. There are no deaths
the content only surfaces with a to witness yet the voices it communal agreement for functional makes audible invoke an or work related use.overwhelming absence -- all
The unavowable community exists those who can communicate somehow in the expressionlessness but are not. It is not of communication. Clarity is to a community dependent on
be eschewed as purposeful, as absence, but is a community

work. "A law which presupposes exclusively _of_ absence.
community (an understanding or
a common accord, be it the "Commodity is spoken in momentary accord of two singular a clear voice. And beings, breaking with few words commodification of work(s),
the impossibility of Saying the valuing of labor in the
which the unique trait of measure of money feeds an experience seems to contain; its inequality that makes a kind sole content: to be of community utterable in the untransmittalbe, which can be form of commerce. Information,
completed thus: the only thing always difficult to commodify
worthwhile is the transmission [*think on the contortions of
of the untransmittable."(17) intellectual property law*],
ironically evades the commodity
Writing must be worklessness. community. It is hard to make Writing is an action, a verb,it signify (money). In this way,
not a object; its noun form an information exchange (without solidifies the community and the communal agreement, but with
for the sake of the community an ecstatic communication, or must be banished. Blanchotjust ecstacy) is not valuable, consoles: the object/writingbut is the basis of our
is "always already lost". ecommunity. _Nothing_ is exchanged and our work ethic
Articulatable community produces chides us for it.
friendship and "Friendship calls
upon the community throughThe writing here is a non-
writing." But this friendship product. It is not consumed.
is only developed in drunkenness The action of writing, the
where "friends disavo[w] their solipsistic ecstacy in the act previous friendship in order to of writing, is the democracy.
call upon friendship And from this emanates the grandiose (camaraderie withoutdefence of access. Everyone can preliminaries) vehiculated by and indeed _must_ be an author for
the requirements of being there". the sake of equality and the
When the familiar (ie. the denial of clarity. Graffiti in its meaning), made so by agreement, self-assertion, in its Saying as supplants the unutterable, the all-important thing, is the only Blanchot experiences my real forerunner and the paradigm for uneasiness. In the hurt that true democracy.
he cannot hide, he falls back into his own textual trap. Yet truer equality is to come in
He resorts to naming and access to experience in only the most

idealization of the real.existential of contemporary ways. In Virtual reality the Ideal is the perfect
This may inspire groans (or stand-in (not even a substitute)
yawns). It is cliche: "random for the real.... Why do we always signifiers", "to reveal by smart a bit when the real is not revealing", "absence is the supplanted? Is it the reduction core". Need it be said that of experience? Is Violence again they are necessarily done?
impossibilities (oxymoronic) in their articulations in (yet my writing and your language? In the end Blanchot reading is real. they are almost warns of the spaces of experiential. a change in
"freedom" inbetween the workthinking about the real is needed.
and the unwork. And says they there is nothing virtual in my carry with them (*signify*fingers on the keys, electrical almost) "responsibilities" for resistance in silicon, or your
"new relationships". eyes on the monitor.

I want to ask "Where do we progress to from here?" "What comes next?" "What now?" What goes >>> HERE <<< ? There is a certain presumption in these questions, and in the word "new". New does not interest me, getting at the latent does, as does getting at our material relations to the things we have. Have I also exposed an attachment to the real? From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 10-FEB-1 994 10:41:25.17

↑ Index

16. Patrick Phillips
"911"
Thu 10 Feb 1994

Ben, I hope you see my point bout reflection concerning texts like "Testimony." On the other hand I have been reflecting on the social and cultural/ideological crossfire situated by Rezinkof's choice of "examples," his choice of line breaks, his use of language and have begun to wonder at what length we have to go to get to these cultural intersections that are quite different from the "experiential" brought to the fore in texts like IM. (I have a cold right now and don't have a lot of faith in the sense I'm making, so I hope this erads.) Anyhoo, the social currents instigated in "Testimony" come from a different place, exterior, as examples, yet they are pervasive; we have to go out to get at what's in. This movement also provides a motivated critique, but I'm not sure that it doesn't remain captured as in some amber, a specimin. I'm also not sure whether this virtual litho-graphy is not the way we process things anyway. The constant conundrum of speculative existence. Just to say, I'm not excluding the variorum of experience, how we process dictum, how we think alike, how we take in the scene. From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 10-FEB-1 994 21:18:11.37

↑ Index

17. Benjamin Friedlander

RE: "911"

Thu 10 Feb 1994

Patrick, this is my first attempt to make use of the "reply" function of this system & to play with the so-called "chevrons"--I hope this doesn't go through all wampy-jawed. Anyway, with that proviso, let me try to address your last two posts. In "THE SOCIO-POLITICAL WARD" you say, to explain your preference for Imaginary Movie over Testimony, "It's often difficult to go back and forth between experience and culture this way [i.e., as you do "reading" Diane Ward's work] with poetry that is declarative." Leaving aside for the moment your characterization of Testimony as being "declarative," and leaving aside also the distinction between "experience" and "culture"--I think I agree in principle with both of those assumptions but find them too limited in practice--the point seems to be that the reader's options with regard to a critical engagement with Testimony are limited by the visceral impact of the work. Now, under the heading "911," you elaborate by writing:

>[...] I have been reflecting on the social and > cultural/ideological crossfire situated by Rezinkof's choice of "examples," > his choice of line breaks, his use of language and have begun to wonder at > what length we have to go to get to these cultural intersections that are > quite different from the "experiential" brought to the fore in texts like > IM. [...]
[...] the social currents instigated in > "Testimony" come from a different place, exterior, as examples, yet they > are pervasive; we have to go out to get at what's in. [...]

I gather you're saying that the complexity of Reznikoff's work (marked by the elaborate artistry of "choice," which hides as artlessness, the basic view of Testimony so far as I can tell from the little bit of the literature on it I've seen--Charles Bernstein's recent Sulfur essay being a notable exception) corresponds in some way with the elaborate "overlays" (as I believe you termed them) of Ward's Imaginary Movie. With this you're establishing an equivalence of sorts between the two--a safeguard in some way from the charge that you are disparaging Reznikoff--while preserving the distinction you insist on between a text based on the "interior" and one based on the "exterior." Am I reading you right? That the "social currents" of Imaginary Movie are

"instigated" (nice word!) from within, directed at the reader, who is the text's exteriority, while the social concern of Testimony somehow enters the poem (as if it wasn't there all along!) from this same place where the reader resides. I think you can see right away the problem I would have with that description of Testimony:

That the distinction between the outside and the inside of the poem doesn't hold up once you begin to speak of reference.

That the mechanics of this reference--by which I mean the poem's relationship with its exteriority--are not sufficiently explained in terms of "crossfire."

That the role of the reader as an intelligence, though it is assumed, is not explored. And that there can be no real understanding of reference without such an exploration.

That the very notion of "declarative" assumes a communication between individuals, and until we address the particular character of this communication in Testimony we will not progress very far in understanding just what sort of social concern this poem expresses.

That it is only by carefully observing how the poem utilizes our intelligence that we can begin to glimpse the intelligence of the poem itself (a formulation I prefer to, but for which you might substitute, the more vexed phrase "intention of the author").

What's noteworthy to me is that you have gone to great lengths to provide this sort of "testimony" (if I might put it so) to the process of reading Diane Ward's work, while relying in your characterizations of Reznikoff on more or less superficial impressions. I don't say this to knock you--not at all--I'm struck that even the best readers of Testimony (Milton Hindus, for instance), despite the evidence of their own research, offer what seem to me superficial descriptions of what reading Reznikoff requires. Here again Charles B's essay is an exception--and though I find his imputation of opacity with regard to Reznikoff's language to be a bit bizarre, what he says about prying words open does I think speak very cogently to the composition of Reznikoff's work. Well, let that hurried depiction of the essay stand for now.

Tried to get in tonight to hear Khalid Abdul Mohammad (the Nation of Islam guy) but they ran out of tickets. I'll let this drop here for now, go on to dinner. See ya-- Ben From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 11-FEB-1 994 17:10:33.93

↑ Index

18. cy6440%albnyvms.bitnet

Poetic Community

Fri 11 Feb 1994

Martin,

In your Blanchot Response you clearly outline my understanding of a brief entrance I made into "The Unavowable Community" which came about when Pierre Joris who translated this text moved to Albany to teach.

You touch in detail on some of the concerns I hold on to as I continue to participate in these virtual communities of oversensitive? or are we overlyInvolved readers of peers, teachers, & by consequence at times, close friends.

What we have in common is that we are taking our writing as our writing to one another SERIOUSLY.

One could consider in doing a kind of personal spreadsheet the extent to which one can r e a l l y speak thoroughly about what one is reading or writing TO s o m e o n e in a given {life}{time}.

What I notice in my own emulations, my "addresses" on the Net, is the bold arrogance which dominates as commotion: the hope that I have something to say to -----> & it is disturbing.

for ex to -----> you

Probably, I don't.
Probably,
"this is just to say"
"I'm sorry I ate...'your Blanchot Response'
"it was so cold & ..."

SO

to appreciate your "reading" - in particular your recognition of the "graffiti" (SELF- assertion), your skepticism about "democracy" in electronic writing, your willingness to take an almost (Feminist?) stance here & a minute to talk about how we talk here

My additional curiosity is about to whom we choose to reply to on the Net as well as why we talk in certain tropes = attitudes From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 11-FEB-1 994 20:12:12.32

↑ Index

19. Benjamin Friedlander
"in time"
Fri 11 Feb 1994

---

keith waldrop cited or mis-cited or whatever by jean-luc nancy is old news. i've found something even stranger. there is a copy of robert kelly's in time (frontier press, 1971) in rodolphe gasche's office, alongside--speaking figuratively--robert heinlein's i will fear no evil, several many volumes of lukacs (in german and in english, all so pristine as to seem unopened, if not unread--but even that he has them is amazing), & what looks like a full run from the '70s of tdr. i mention only the more peculiar offerings of course. but for those who may be contemplating some version of "rudy's marginalia," i think this kelly connection may be significant. who said there was no poetry after mallarme?

b.f.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 11:26:12.14

↑ Index

20. Loss Glazier
rudy's marginalia
Sat 12 Feb 1994

Ben, I'm a little curious about "rudy's marginalia."Is this an observation on "the order of things"? Or is it because I have no sense of what the "Kelly connection" constitutes? -- Loss From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 12:42:36.25

↑ Index

21. Loss Glazier
"Community"
Sat 12 Feb 1994

The idea of a listserv as constituting "community" poses problems. First, in that a listserv is "virtual," i.e., we are not really "there." In this regard, a community is almost always defined by location. Secondly, most definitions of community imply a sense of commitment--to take this further, I would say entrapment, ie, if you think of a Blue Ridge mountain community, most people don't have the mobility or means to move. "There" is fixed; its participants are fixed--for better or worse. An electronic list implies no commitment whatsoever: any person can unplug at any time; the largest percentage of any list does not participate but stands in the shadows examining the record of the conversation. To say that we have in common taking each writer's writing seriously is a kind thought. I hope it's true--but is no ground to call this endeavor a "community." (Your name, the name of the sender of the second "community" message, is even unknown / undecipherable.) The idea of an electronic democracy is probably the least tenable of these ideas, just about as true as an other so-called "democracy" ie, a place where people who have power are equal does not argue for equality for all people. So, what then, would we call this? From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 12:42:37.80

↑ Index

22. Benjamin Friedlander

r's m

Sat 12 Feb 1994

---

loss, no connection that i can cite, no order of things save the disorder of bookshelves in an office. rodolphe's marginalia is no more existent a project than the tain of melville, just a happy joke on all of us who thought gasche didn't care for poetry. maybe he doesn't, maybe he does. i found it funny in any case to find robert kelly there, in that office-- the only poet whose work i happened to see. read or unread i can't say. but from a superficial glance (honestly, i wasn't snooping--one of the comp lit grad students, stephen gingerich, is using that office this year while gasche's on leave; steve & I had a brief conversation about what was & wasn't on the shelf), the only books that really looked read, dog-eared in other words, were the sci fi novels--not just heinlein but zelazny too. of course, i know he reads zelazny because there's a quote from z at the head of one of g's essays in glyph (maybe the moby-dick essay!). presumably, however, gasche's library at home is where the marginalia's scribbled, the intimate secrets of reading which susan howe is drawn to in melville. & seriously, i meant it all as a joke--a good-natured one. the waldrop sighting too. ben From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 13:14:31.73

↑ Index

23. Steve Evans

The Social Poem: for the record

Sat 12 Feb 1994

The recent exchange of posts on Diane Ward's Imaginary Movie and on the social poem has added a valuable dimension to my thinking this past week, so let me first register the gratitude I feel towards those who have part- icipated. As the topic evolves, it appears that a hasty response I wrote privately to Patrick on 1 Feb. has come to produce a few effects--through its cited and implied presence at certain stages of his sustained posting to the list on 2 Feb.--within the ensuing discussion. I had hoped to avoid entering this space on what could be construed as a sour note, since my initial response to IM was not a positive one, but I think now that it would be better to trust that P's indefatigable, meticulous, and generous (though I must add, also terminologically baffling) practice of "sounding" Ward's work will more than compensate for whatever criticisms I first thought to advance.

The following two paragraphs, then, are "for the record." I have omitted one unsympathetic comment that concerned the presentation of the work by Potes & Poets Press, otherwise I have avoided the impulse to amend or elaborate these comments. Because I do, however and alas, have more to say, I will tax everyone's patience with a second posting that will follow on the heels of this one.

ORIGINAL NOTE:

Dear Patrick (please note the ungodly hour at which I composing this [it was two in the morning]):

Just a quick note to see if I can draw you out on the title poem of the book you will be discussing on Wednesday. I read the poem this evening, aloud, and gave some thought to it. But I must admit, it felt more like anemic cin- ema than imaginary movie. Jen tells me that this book, and specifically this poem, has been an important one for you, and I trust that this means I am missing something. Technically, the repeated six-line stanzars struck me as only erratically interesting as a unit of composition: the stakes are low, mistakes are hard to discern (can they be made?). Less sonically engaging than, say, some of the work in couplets in Relation. A certain, quite familiar, indistinction at the level of lexicon: I'll trade the whole gamut of pronouns (the deployment of which strikes me as tired even in Ashbery) for a few committing descriptives (but then I like Reznikoff and O'Hara because I like the social as a field of intervention). Though I can anticipate certain points of contact with a theoretical apparatus (most obviously, of course, feminist film theory circa Mulvey), which, patiently articulated, would "fill out" the poem, I am concerned for both the poem's and the theory's autonomy: there is a trace of what Barthes called "the blackmail of theory" (i.e. here's an aesthetic object such as your theory predicts for) here.

Which is not to put you, or the poem for that matter, on the defensive. I'm just ticking down a list of resistances that are more likely to originate in my hasty and perhaps insufficiently attentive reading than in the text. What I could use is some "testimony" regarding the coordinates you've found to provide a thicker and more moving engagement with the poem. Estrin's public/ private remark doesn't help me so far: much too sweeping and indiscriminate to provide guidance (what isn't appropriable under this rubric?). Ditto the concept of politics (and for the same reason). [following this, some pleasantries in the original have been omitted]

But enough, I do hope you're well, and that my remarks will not seem to require undue cognitive regression on your part in order to answer them. /S.

END ORIGINAL NOTE
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 13:17:52.74

↑ Index

24. Steve Evans
The Social Poem
Sat 12 Feb 1994

I want to follow up on my posting "for the record" with a few thoughts that are perhaps a little more substantial. In light of the postings by Juliana, Ben, Kenneth, and Patrick himself, it would appear that the salient moment in my private reply to Patrick is the somewhat flippant graph of my own value-constellation represented by the claim that "I would trade the whole gamut of pronouns...for a few committing descriptives (but then I like Reznikoff and O'Hara because I like the social as a field of intervention)." Upon consideration, I think this largely gestural move on my part introduces some untenable polarizations (Ward vs. Reznikoff & O'Hara; lexical indeterminacy vs. social commitment). In brief, I throw down a gauntlet that I feel fairly certain non of us on this list would consent to run. But if there is something redeemable in this remark, it might be in the connection (albeit so enjambed as to be indiscernible) between "value" and the "social."

My thinking in this area owes a debt to Bakhtin/Medvedev's The Formal Method in Literary Scholarship, and especially to the discussion of "social evalu- ation" that is found on pages 119-28. I will excerpt just three claims made in this book. First, and mainly as a corrective to personalizing the theme of value, I would recall their statement that "the notion that evaluation is an individual act is widespread in contemporary '_Lebensphilosophy_,' and leads to conclusions no less false. Evaluation is social; it organizes inter- course" (126). The second claim is perhaps more specifically relevant to our discussion. M/B argue that "social evaluation is needed to turn a grammatical possibility into a concrete fact of speech reality" (123), basing this on their premise that "the utterance is not a physical body and not a physical process" [something some of us might wish to contest, certainly], but rather "a historical event, albeit an infinitesimal one. Its individuality is that of a historical achievement in a definite epoch under definite social conditions" (121). Finally, because it serves to indicate their more general take on "value" and its relation to "formal" decisions, there are the following sent- ences: "Social evaluation organizes how we see and conceptualize the event being communicated, for we only see and conceptualize what interests or affects us [or as Stein says: It is very likely that nearly everyone has been very nearly certain that something that is interesting is interesting them]. Social evaluation also organizes the forms by which the event is communicated: the arrangement of the material into digressions, returns, repetitions, etc., is permeated with the single logic of social evaluations" (127).

M/B conceive of "social value" as the medium that pervades, supports, and constrains the generation of specific meanings from the field of linguistic (or grammatical) possibilities. It is their answer to the question of why such a limited number of linguistic combinations result in the production of "sense" (and thus to the opposition of narrow vs. broad band that Pat termed "reading" v. "sounding"). Zukofksy had, I think, something similar going on when he wrote: "_Impossible_ to communicate anything but particulars-- historic and contemporary--things, human beings as things their instrument- alities of capillaries and veins binding up and bound up with events and The revolutionary word if it must revolve cannot escape having a reference. It is not infinite. Even the infinite is a term" ("An Objective" in Prepositions 16).

My answer to Ben's question of "what is the social poem" would then be: that poetic practice which proceeds by "particulars" as they circulate in the social medium of value. There are other media, other practices, other ways of fashioning the particular. There are words that wobble out of orbit and do escape having a reference (or at least first order reference, though they are usually recuperated at the level of the social through categories like "nonsense," "difficult writing," "writing elites do and I don't under stand," etc.). To pick up on Juliana's list of people thinking about this question, I think Bruce Andrews calls this "horizoning" in his Politics of Poetic Form essay (Roof 1990). In short, I recognize the "unframed field of approximate signs" (as Patrick so memorably puts it) as a possibility of writing, but as a possibility that the "social poem" as I understand it re- fuses to convert into an end in itself.

I would attribute Patrick's provocative unwillingness to distinguish betw. Testimony and Rescue 911 to an unwillingness to conceptualize social value (though as Peter Gizzi pointed out to me, the word "rescue" does resonate in Reznikoff's project, though more in a Benjaminian direction of "redemptive critique" than in the frame of network television, which is directly where my students took it also when I taught Rez's book last sem- ester). So many decisive levels of mediation are manhandled in this ana- logy that I doubt Patrick would "upon reflection" stand by it. Likewise, though, the concept of "reflection" as he uses it fails to distinguish between the hyper-presentation of a presence (i.e. contemporary barbarism ala Cops & Rescue 911) and Reznikoff's preserving of an absent present through testimony (i.e. a project oriented to the redemption of historic and contemporary suffering, always particular in Zuk's sense). The eerie affectlessness of much of Testimony couldn't be further from the adrenaline-soaked stimulations of exploitation t.v. Nor is the "exhortation" dogmatic; it is ethical in any meaningful sense of that term.

I apologize for the length of this posting, which exceeds by several screens my own e-mail attention span (unless I download, print out, and thereby re-establish the space of reading as I've previously known it...). It's just that these topics are central to my own thinking, and to the values that direct that thinking: poetry and social emancipation.

From under a lot of snow..., and noticing that everyone's posting today....

Steve
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 14:46:08.00

↑ Index

25. Loss Glazier
RE: r's m
Sat 12 Feb 1994

---

ben, i guess actually understtod t'was in jest, though something that intrigues me is the relation of science fiction to all this and especially that science fiction, which once held as its location outer space, has now penetrated the "inner reaches," ie the field of computers. To discover it as the marginalia of those bookshelves is interesting, methings. loss From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 14:05:29.15

↑ Index

26. Joe Amato
RE: "Community"
Sat 12 Feb 1994

Loss, I've just gotta jump in here with some friendly amendments to your last one...

Note Howard Rheingold's recent book on virtual community, worth taking a look at... Howard had sent me an earlier essay (over the nets) in which he'd argued, in effect, pretty much the same thing: to paraphrase (and too hastily) that these "places" are altering what "community" is and can be, and that they most assuredly will not be w/o their problems...

I'd argue that lists and the like begin to take on a more stable sense of "community" (whatever we mean by same) once folks find ways to complement same by meeting in the flesh---conferences, gatherings, snmail, what have you... Surely some of you folks at Buffalo see one another ftf, hence the list works somewhat differently for you than for many of us outside your geographical environs...

In any case, I would argue against simply conceding that older notions of "community" must dominate these regions (and some of this slippage can be pursued alphabetically), even as I would concur that we would do well, as you suggest, to continue to challenge the (communal?) basis of these our 'exchanges'...

Joe
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 13:26:28.57

↑ Index

27. Kenneth Sherwood
RE: "Community"
Sat 12 Feb 1994

Since Loss and I have actually spoken of this notion "community", I feel compelled here to insert some form of response. But first, must we assume that the quality of this "compulsion" reflects Loss's geographic proximity: just outside of shouting distance?

That the idea of electronic communities poses problems, I will not dispute, yet I cannot abide the implied distinction between "virtual" and "real" as pivoting at "committment".

While we are not compelled to any poetics@ubvm committment, many here writing have demonstrated a significant concentration of effort to address fellow participants, an integrity of engagement which, in fact, may exceed that displayed in the communities cited as authentic.

I will want to STEP HEAVILY on fact of this "community" and membership/participation/spectatorship as specifically NOT grounded in entrapment. The unmotivated, intense character of exchanges here indeed distinguishes it as a poetic community.

I think it's mistaken to ground "community" merely in shared circumstances of geography, since the 'situations' of this list's members has and continues to propose relationships of an equal or stronger INVESTMENT.

(ps: Loss, the sender of the second community message was Katie Yates)

...dee dee,
dee dum...
... it's a small world
after all....

Kenneth Sherwood |"Fragments are
[redacted] | our wholes"
RIF/T (e-poetry@ubvm) |--Clark Coolidge

From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 14:08:02.92

↑ Index

28. Pierre Joris
RE: "Community"
Sat 12 Feb 1994

Maybe the internet community -- & I do think there can be/ maybe even is/ such a thing is the kind of community Blanchot speaks of,via, thru & around Bataille, when he suggests the possibility of a "community of those who have no community."

========== Pierre Joris| Je ne connais pas d'autre grace que celle Dept. of English |d'etre ne. (I know no other grace than the SUNY Albany |grace of having been born) Albany NY 12222 |
tel&fax:[redacted]| Isidore Ducasse aka Comte de Lautreamont
========== From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 16:32:51.57

↑ Index

29. Loss Glazier
RE: "Community"
Sat 12 Feb 1994

First, Ken's objection, I cannot abide the implied distinction between "virtual" and "real" as pivoting at "commitment" requires brief clarification, that is that this distinction does not pivot on "commitment," but pivots on phsyical proximity, "entrapment," as I penned it, also to the objection: I will want to STEP HEAVILY on fact of this "community" and membership/participation/spectatorship as specifically NOT grounded in entrapment. But in this objection, perhaps is a key. I think of membership, participation, and spectatorship as all being very relevant terms to describe what we here engage in. That is, membership, as if a club (again contrasted to the idea of democracy)--also invoking exclusivity, participation--a kind of virtual intramurals, (doesn't that mean "outside the walls"?), and spectatorship (somehow, Christians being fed to lions come to mind, especially with the theme of redemption that was floating here some time back, though perhaps it would be more benign to think again in terms of intramural sports.) (Perhaps a relevant metaphor, except we might not be "coached"--but think in terms of doing outside class time, of doing it voluntarily, of its being a forum to sharpen our technical/theoretical skills). I understand that my choice of word, entrapment, is somewhat adversarial, yet the point is not needless controversy but a resistance to the LULL of romanticized notions of communality. (That is, common effort, common ends, shared means. Not unrelevant thinking perhaps of communes in the Sixties and whether or not these generated new social forms. Contrasting Sixties communes perhaps, with underground newspapers--which invoked no sense of community but of statement, that is, words, generated with somewhat common goals but always typified by divergent approaches to said goals.) How can geography be so important? We are physical beings, not virtual ones. I think of Joe's statement, that lists are made more real once folks find ways to complement same by meeting in the flesh--conferences, gatherings, snmail... and think that this is not untrue, in fact desirable, but casual (vs. causal); take for instance how well people get along with their siblings when they no longer live at home. Communities also involve a degree of isolation, as a group. Think of prairie communities in the old west, or think of Jonestown, Waco, the Manson family. (Of course these are "religious," again an invocation to redemption and the Word.) Regarding Pierre's suggestion, Maybe the internet community -- & I do think there can be/ maybe even is/ such a thing is the kind of community Blanchot speaks of,via, thru & around Bataille, when he suggests the possibility of a "community of those who have no community." I might suggest the impossible nature of such, that is: (1) if you can only be a member of a community once you have no community, then (2) you have a community so then (3) you are therefore no longer without community then (4) you are thus exiled from the community of which you have just become a member. Obviously, Ken's and my efforts in RIF/T focus at a common place in voice or literary idea. Perhaps there is a difference with a list--so I will not blur the discussion by referring to the electronic journal. And obviously (perhaps Blanchot's statement refers more to) the yearning for community--which may possibly never be attained. This discussion may all hinge on a definition of community. And we may choose to define it to suit our criteria. Even so, what makes this different than an intramural sport? It's not the "integrity of engagement" because that exists in other venues which would in no way aspire to community status. What makes us aspire to regard ourselves as community? Ken, you suggest that The unmotivated, intense character of exchanges here indeed distinguishes it as a poetic community. and yet this takes place in political debates, in Sproul Plaza at UC Berkeley, (and what's that corner of is it--Hyde Park?--in London) and there's no aspiration to community. I only pose this because I'd like to get a finger on it. "Poetic community" eludes me. Was this list a community when it was rather inactive? What if everyone unubscribes tomorrow? Though I too would like the comfort of being part of a better whole, I don't exactly see the point where these aspirations converge...or if they ever can converge.

From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 21:23:38.60

↑ Index

30. Benjamin Friedlander

the social poem

Sat 12 Feb 1994

Steve, I have what I suppose must be an antinomian streak that forces me, often against my will, to take issue with positions that in fact attract me a great deal. Something of the sort occurs now, reading your eminently useful contribution to the discussion of the social poem. Take issue with is too strong--to question, and so, perhaps, modify.

What you say about value seems both right and necessary. The implications with regard to our discussion are significant. That evaluation is a social form, an activity whose meaning and whose value, constituting an "historical event," is objective (in a sense that clarifies what Zukofsky and Reznikoff had in common as "objectivists," i.e., more than some sentimental attachment to Pound's dictum "direct treatment of the thing"), that the subjective is therefore no less "objective" than those forms of evaluation which call themselves objective (i.e., that subjectivity no less than objectivity has a social content and a political form), that the individual is derived from the social and not the other way around--these are all helpful correctives to the "untenable polarizations" (as you put it) that at every turn threaten to undermine discussions of poetry, to turn discussion into an argument between schools. Not that there aren't differences between Ward and Reznikoff--of course there are--but that the differences we have been attempting to identify as essential between their projects occur first of all within them.

To take one example: if "social value" is "the medium that pervades, supports, and constrains the generation of specific meanings from the field of linguistic (or grammatical) possibilities," then the "social value" of Reznikoff's Testimony will be most directly evident in those places where his actions are ostensibly individual--his choices, his juxtapositions, the ways he alters the original material. The "social value" of the material itself, which we might naively assume to be an unmediated glimpse at the United States, is in fact measurable only by way of a regression to the archimedean point of individuality where the social first allows itself to be glimpsed. To take the social content of the poem as an *un*mediated view of the social field out of which the poem is lifted would be to forget that the social is mediation. (And in this forgetting the "eerie affectlessness of much of Testimony" begins to be felt.) The poem thus flips the relation we might expect to find between the social and the individual: "outside" the poem, the individual is a construct of the social; "inside," the social is a construct of the individual. This is not to insist, however, on a dichotomy between inside and outside--or rather, it's to insist that the dichotomy occurs equally on both sides of the mythical boundary that the dichotomy is said to put into effect. NOT that Imaginary Movie works from within while Testimony works from without, but that in each work a dynamic is established between inner and outer, subjective and objective, social and personal. The singularity of the poem rests precisely here, in the character of the dynamic that governs the poem's meaning.

Or if I might say that again, a little more simply, the distinction between individual and social has to occur within the poem, in order for the poem to be intelligible according to either category. That, in any case, is the logic of Bakhtin/Medvedev's formula, which conceives of individuality as an historical achievement, a social form.

And it's in light of this analysis that I feel drawn to question your definition of the social poem. Much as I share the values that your definition privileges--"poetic practice which proceeds by `particulars' as they circulate in the social medium of value"--I wonder that the emphasis on "particulars" doesn't attempt to establish yet another dichotomy between poems that only makes sense within them, here between the particular and the general. You refer, of course, to "other media, other practices, other ways of fashioning the particular" (but since these would have to be circulations in a "medium of value" other than the social, I wonder what they can be), and you refer also to poetic practices "that wobble out of orbit and do escape having a reference" (and you qualify this, but again I wonder what sort of work you are referring to--and I wonder also at the equation of particularity with reference). Nevertheless, I think the upholding of particularity as opposed to generality--or to be more accurate, a proceeding by particularity instead of generality--only makes sense if "as opposed to" is understood as occurring IN the poem. And if that's the case, then the generality is as essential as the particularity. And isn't that in fact the case in every poem? For surely there are no purely particularist or purely generalizing poetries...

This isn't simply a matter of logics and abstract argumentation. Something occurs in Reznikoff that seems to both of us illuminating about poetry in general and the social poem in particular. For both of us, the specificity of Reznikoff's content and the redemptive quality of his formal appropriations of that content are not only striking but exemplary. I would want to say, however, that too great an emphasis on the historical moment Testimony enshrines and on the apparent lack of mediation in the poem's presentation of this moment blinds us to the insistent leveling of particularity that also occurs, and the shrewd, often polemical presence of the author in the ways this leveling is interrupted. It's interesting that my students last week noted first of all--somewhat complainingly-- the repetitiousness of the book, the endless permutations of violence and neglect was "predictable," they said. We spent a lot of time talking about courts and law and what testimony is in that context, and after a while they grasped that not all testimony is true. They began to notice, also, Reznikoff's sarcasm, and the fact that not all meets the eye in these stories. Of course this only annoys them further since if there's anything they hate more than the depressing it's the subtle--Testimony being both. All of which is to say that the particularity has meaning above all because of the clarity with which Reznikoff organizes it conceptually.

I could say more about Testimony in this regard, but the message is long enough. A quote then from Charles Bernstein's Sulfur essay:

I've been told that Reznikoff disliked obscurity and would certainly not have wanted his work to be characterized as obscure. Yet Reznikoff, from the beginning, seemed to expect that obscurity was the likely outcome for his poetic work and seemed to accept that with remarkable equanimity. Perhaps he understood the nature, the social structure, of obscurity better than his contemporaries. Neglect, disregard--the socially obscure, the forgotten and repressed, the overlooked--this was his subject.

Hiding in plain sight you may never be found: if sight is not to "See by but to look at," not to use but behold.

I like that.

Ben F.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 12-FEB-1 994 22:48:46.03

↑ Index

31. Benjamin Friedlander
marginalia
Sat 12 Feb 1994

---

loss, it finally sunk in. i hadn't quite grasped the double meaning of marginalia, illustrated rather nicely by the shelves in gasche's office: myself meant the comments scribbled in the margins of a book (sheltered at home), you meant the marginal items in the library (consigned to the office). ah, why am i so slow? (as pere ubu once sang...) ben From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 13-FEB-1 994 02:51:27.34

↑ Index

32. Mn Ctr for Book Arts
RE: "Community"
Sun 13 Feb 1994

Loss, I would agree that a list-serve, or any other kind of group connected by its own whim to sit at a terminnal as well as the current technology (which is never current) is not a "community" in the sense of a Blue Ridge Mountain or north Central Wisconsin Amish or many other non-mobile communities, I wonder why you think that the definittion of "community" should not grow to encompass current groupings. I'm not against calling it something else, but I also don't really see the need for a new coinage & am sometimes distrustful of such.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 13-FEB-1 994 10:13:33.24

↑ Index

33. Jed
RE: "Community"
Sun 13 Feb 1994

Does "community" involve companionship? Or may it simply consist of collective anonymity? In the strictly civic sense of vernacular usage, community means little more than the aggregate of people and activities that bring them momenta rily together in public spaces--little league ball, traffic snarls, school board bonds--which amounts to a collective display of the heaping potential. A primary reason why the net increasingly seems a site for community--or at least why most discussions on the net erupt into these speculations about community-- is because it enacts both the aleatory potential of the casual encounter and the motivational tensegrity of contact: "Contact," as I recall, was the little mag that William Carlos Williams edited, was't it? --Jed Rasula From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 13-FEB-1 994 21:53:00.55

↑ Index

34. Charles Bernstein
Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error
Sun 13 Feb 1994

—

↑ Index

35.
(no subject)

T42,24T:me4u,u4me), with LSMFT; 38:22:81:54487^%4#*(|":><~%

Date: Sun, 13 Feb 1994 17:59:33 -0500
From: BITNET list server at UBVM <[redacted]> (1.8a)
Subject: POETICS: error report from UBVMS

The enclosed mail file, found in the POETICS reader and shown under the spoolid 8043 in the console log, has been identified as a possible delivery error notice for the following reason: "Sender:", "From:" or "Reply-To:" field pointing to the list has been found in mail body.

Date: Sun, 13 Feb 1994 17:58:38 -0500 (EST)
From: [redacted]
Subject: Re: "Community"
To: [redacted]

>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Loss,

To take Ken's objection one step further:
I can't abide by the distinction between the "virtual" and the "real" at all.

"Being there" has never been a criterion for the real.
Snmail, telephone conversations, chance meetings in the stairwell at Lockwood are certainly not virtual experiences.

They all have, in some form or another a "real" material presence -- Yes, they are not transparent like anything dependent on the casual agreements of language, they are mediated, but they are no less real.

We are all really here with our real eyes reading from our real monitors at our real keyboards banging away at the keys (perhaps with, as Katie suggests, intensity, sensitivity, and seriousness).
Whether this is
 "munity"
   COM mitment munication doesn't really hold my interest. What I am trying to get at, what I tried to suggest in my first post, was that the unreflexive use of the word "virtual" ("not quite as good as", pejorative less or unequal, or even suggesting the existence of an "Originary") to describe what we're doing has some real dangers.

"Virtual" carries with it the kind of implicit indictment that resonates in the voices of our "being-there" mates and companions:
   "How much time can you spend doing 'that'?"
   "You're not done with the phone yet?!?"

Quotes""""" are always cold and only make me more hungry

--martin
>>>

mailed him both to get back in touch after a few years & to continue the exchange on community. Pierre answered, Tom too & they culled from the private e-mail what they thought could be usefully shared with the net community on the subject of community.

"Community! -- Well, the first para of your e-mail shld/cld have been posted to the POETICS List, while the 2nd was clearly to me & so you e-mailed the whole to me. Which makes for at least 2 community tiers on the net: those who don't know each other otherwise than through the discussion threads, & those who have known each other face to face. Or at least some such division exists to begin with, thoug it may alter. In that sense the net-community is again like many other communities, composed of different intensities,different vectors. All this seems rather banal... Mut maybe we should post the non-personalized parts of these 2 email messages to the POETICS list? Or speak there to this tiered affair?"

"... a community also of those not known to each other, of the unknown; and, it is interesting to watch a range of behaviors develop among people unbounded by outcomes of close living. On the one hand a kind of intimacy and relaxation, on the other... frivolousness? would that be the right word? At the very place in an expression where it most ought to matter what one is saying, there seems to rise a "not-mattering" often, so often, rendering discourse subtractive rather than additive. Perhaps "the gift" is after all basic to communities and not present in this one. It's hard to take anything away from these postings, a thing useful I mean."

"But perhaps we should go ahead, and include my remarks in this paragraph and just the (kind of obvious) further remark that "community" with its "commonality" and its "unity" in it only has to mean people unified by something they have in common, and in common are usually both social thematics and a dwelling place. These two are usually also two sides of the same coin (i.e. a town spread around a church). In the case of the net, the two are moved apart: the medium of communication is not the reason we are in communication.

Most communities also involve a kind of discipline as to the outcomes of anyone's contributions. It matters in immediate ways what you say in a real-world community, because of the multiple intersecting relations one has with everybody. If you argue with the butcher in church, you may not get the best cut of meat across the next-time counter, right? And more serious versions of this. The net community, with its abstraction of the context/contact layer, makes for a simpler and more unidimensinal community, and also means that there's less at stake in what anyone says; this leads to a sense of experimentalism wch is great, and it also leads to pushing "d" for delete very very often, and that takes care of that. Again, without much consequence. Perhaps, the net is more like Goethe's term: elective affinities. A version of acquaintanceship and even (argh) professionalism. Is the poetics forum more like a convention than a community. That's it! It's a virtual convention!"

========== Pierre Joris| Je ne connais pas d'autre grace que celle Dept. of English |d'etre ne. (I know no other grace than the SUNY Albany |grace of having been born) Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted]| Isidore Ducasse aka Comte de Lautreamont
========== From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 13-FEB-1 994 23:23:16.91

↑ Index

37. Patrick Phillips
The Wobbly Social Poem
Sun 13 Feb 1994

I continue this personal/community fold (develped further by Steve's unmasking of the "unnamed interlocutor") with yet another public/private posting. This is an excerpt of one I sent to Ben in response to his "re: "911" on Feb 10.

Ben

I'm becoming interested in the difference between the two examinations and not so much interested in the equivalence (A safeguard indeed, but it would be a poor one under any thoughtful look-see!) My surface casting, the superficiality, is due to my beginning, that I ain't done much thinking about the Rez/Ward issue as I've set it up. You bring up a vital situation in talking of intelligence, I prefer reconnaissance. When it comes to reference under this kind of mission, I need some brooding -- not so much what kind of thoughts I spy, but what ideas hatch. I'll sit on this one a coupla days, 'll have another look at Charles's piece and we'll see what comes up....

Snowing like a dandruff commercial --

Pat

The exposure of a personal/public here speaks on at least a coupla fronts. One is as a formal gesture toward "the other" conversation on "community." Another, and the one I'll attend directly to, is a notion of frame, or field. My desire, as Steve suggests, not to "conceptualize a notion of social value" is so bound in my appreciation of unframed field of aproximate signs that some people may see this as a destablization of particulars. That this destabilization could in turn lead to the demise of a critique, even my own sense (or lack thereof) of contiguity, and could thereby promote an ugly conjunction of "911" and Testimony. In the terms of the political question arises: How can a critical theory lack a particular ideological framework and is it this a lack of particularity that conjoins such things? Although the first part of the question is somehow more interesting it is the second part that I think has more relevance in terms of the "social poem." (For some reason this idea, the "social poem," seems anemic, like generic drug; something's hiding in there.)

On the surface of things, like words, I "wobble out of orbit," often as a matter of course. In my wobble the terms of argument become indiscrete; however, this is not to say that this wobbling undermines my reference, nor does this wobble undermine a word's reference. Here lies the kicker. At what point does this wobble become an element of theory distracted from the social discourse (a point brought up in Steve's initial personal, now public post)? And at what point is this wobble a "social evaluation." My wobble is social, not theoretical. Its point of arrival is quite close to its point of departure. It would appear that this is an important point, one that in my book is an edge of confluence which resists conceptualization, but one which is constantly demanding it.

Here's one of the reasons I included that "private" post. What I've just begun to try to uncover are the similarities in the expedient forms in Imaginary Movie and Testimony. What are the motives, how are texts, words motivated inspite and because of their wobble. Testimony veils a culture just out of reach both temporally (the turn of the century) and, spatially through the constantly mis-placed modifier ("The United States"). This veil positions the reader, creates a point of reference from which judgements are made and then, through "subsequent" portraits, those judgements are stressed in to a re-making. The coordinate structure of Testimony forces a de-limitation of reference points while never relieving the reader of a concise condition. This reinforced delimitation is in itself often a ethical and moral co-ordinate structure which in many ways could be likened to a "structure" of Imaginary Movie. However, the temporal shift that the reader must engage in is a relentless positioning. This situation, though the terms of its economic and social critique are current, becomes fused with the nostalgic. In other words, because of "its" reflective composition Testimony is a compromised dis-position. Just how Testimony resists falling apart in the echo of its own distance, or just how in its portrait is not of his grandfather, or of our grandparents, but stays here, now, is a matter of technique, economics and morality. It is also a matter of its instability. In that instability its reference is clear.

For Reznikof, the wobble is stated in action, the unsaid, a testament of the given in the form of our activity. That for Ward this unsaid is in the abridgement of meaning, doesn't alter this engagement so much as it alters the textual form it takes. What is stated in both texts differs dramatically from what is experienced in each text. The linguistic wobble in Ward is radically different from the conceptual wobble evident in Rez., but its object remains the same, its reference is clear. If we are to rely upon the term, or the area of definition as the condition of the "revolutionary word," a concept which for me remains highly suspect, we still have to engage those areas of ideology and the social which defy boundary in order to discover the term.

This doesn't answer anything, but continues to set up a range of problems for further rumination

Thanks Steve for the word "wobble." I kinda caught it for a ride here.

Pat
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 14-FEB-1 994 10:27:54.52

↑ Index

38. Katie Yates
RE: Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error
Mon 14 Feb 1994

This is from "Tristan and Isolde" from the third section "The Community of Lovers" of Joris' translation of Blanchot's "The Unavowable Community" in which Blanchot is responding to a recit, "La Maladie de La Mort" written by Marguerite Duras (1982):

> No, end, then, to a recit that also says in its > own way: no more recit, and yet an end, perhaps > a remission, perhaps a final condemnation. For > it so happens that one day the young woman is no > longer there. A disappearance that cannot surprise > as it is but the exhaustion of an appearance that > gave itself only in sleep. She is no longer there, > but so discreetly, so absolutely, that her absence > suppresses her absence, so that to look for her is > pointless, just as it would be impossible to rec> ognize her and join her, be it only in thought that > she has existed only through the imagination, cannot > interrupt the solitude where the testamentary word > is murmured endlessly: the malady of death. And > here are the last words (are they the last?):
> "Soon you give up, don't look for her anymore, > either in the town or at night or in the daytime:
> Even so you have managed to live that love in the only way possible for you. Losing it before it happened."

Martin,
This is my way of dealing further with your concerns surrounding qua real qua virtual How?

1. To go back into Blanchot and find some more inferences, illustrations of untransmittable transmissions, unintentional community, ...

2. I happily find the ci-dessus & want to think (or is this talking) about what is happening (a transmission via Lyotard's The Differend in the virtual or real relationships between Duras, Blanchot & Joris.

3. For example, we are reading Joris' translation of Blanchot's reading of Duras -ok- who are we reading? I ask this within the confines of formal discourse: Literary Criticism or Literary Theory because they are priviliged in this electronic {poetics} dialogue which does not necessarily need to abide by the same strictures. Yet, for the most part it does. This is an example then of how limited we are in our range of how to talk about writing or write about talking (replace "write" or "talk" in the above clause with "read"). It may be interesting to figure out to what extent writing on email is talking and to what extent it is writing...attention-wise...

4. My reading of the above from The Unavowable Community is:
+Real concern is rare & in the stairwell it is also rare & on stage (in relationship, in conference...)
no surprise.

So the effect of commitment in one's reply is notable in the absence of that integrity

5. The illusions of presence are magnified in electronic media but the magnification intensifies the speed with which we can reply(retort) as well as the frame within which we can respond. It is more possible then ....

"Losing it before it happened."
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 14-FEB-1 994 13:18:21.86

↑ Index

39. Tom Mandel

RE: Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error

Mon 14 Feb 1994

Losing it before it happened... this is an experience free of conversion and which "all" have shared. How does the testamentary word transmit when what is shared (of which this testament wd be witness) is virtual? Even the phonemes of testamentary rch w/ a visceral. "...has existed only through the imagination...," which rubric finds no fit w/ these media. A network is, specifically, a set of mechnisms for conversion and reconversion, and it presumes (i.e. offers no way to question) and ignores (i.e. does not "process" in any way) all issues of status in what it finds to pick up and move. I.e. "the absence of that integrity." Does reply give an effect of commitment? or commitment show its effect in a reply. I.e. does commitment come from the reply or from the social engagement and its bindings? These, which precede both question (concern) and reply, precisely are at question on a network; the intimate laxity. All the stones seem lead across some stream but never to another side than this.

* T O M M A N D E L * 2927 Tilden St. NW * Washington DC 20008 * Voice: [redacted] [redacted] FAX: [redacted] **********
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 14-FEB-1 994 16:20:59.54

↑ Index

40. Jed Rasula

RE: Martin Spinelli's reply framed in Error

Mon 14 Feb 1994

Reading Tom Mandel, I get to the thought:

Reply is an affect of commitment.

The stones always do lead to "this" side; but the word is (as the place is) a deictic, a shifter; it locates with reference to the "speaker"--or the keypad pusher.

Would the net (does it?) seem less metaphysically perplexing to those who grew up in rural areas and got used to telephones with party lines? (Rural electrification programs being what they were in the 30s, the USSR got Stalin & the farmbelt got party lines...) From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 16-FEB-1 994 05:09:44.13

↑ Index

41. Benjamin Friedlander
RE: The Wobbly Social Poem
Tue 15 Feb 1994

I want to reserve my right, as they say, to say something at a later date about the "intelligence" that reading calls upon, or substantiates. I've mentioned to Patrick already that for me the word alludes to those angelic orders which Henry Corbin says Islamic mysticism terms "intelligences." I've been reading Corbin nibblingly as a way of finding a new path into Olson's poetry, which many of us here in Buffalo are now reading for the Creeley seminar. I want to say that there's an angel of reading, and most of what is sort of stupidly accounted for as "self-reflection" really makes more sense when understood as a reading that is watched over. I want also to say that it's impossible for me to think about the so-called "social" poem without reference to its opposite. Which would be, to my mind, not the *anti*social poem (the antisocial is no less social than the law abiding), but the poem concerned with what's trans-social, trans-historical, mystical, ontological. And I think this opposition is again one that only makes sense within a poet's work, is not a means of categorizing the differences between poets. Reznikoff is an easy example of this--though not perhaps in Testimony--since in Judaism the trans-historical uses the historical as its referent, and Reznikoff's ideas and imagery in large part derives from Judaic sources. (See, for instance, "Jerusalem the Golden.") But Olson too is a wonderful example of the social poem giving way to its opposite, only to be rediscovered in the most improbable manifestations.

OK. I save all that for later--or rather, I offer it as a possible direction. And in the meantime I wonder just what "wobble" means. Patrick?

> On the surface of things, like words, I "wobble out of orbit," often as a matter of course. In my wobble the terms of argument become indiscrete; however, this is not to say that this wobbling undermines my reference, nor does this wobble undermine a word's reference.

A habit of communication. But this habit would seem to be "revolving" toward an articulation that is itself revolution. That is, the undecidability of your immediate meaning demonstrates a stance that is ultimately opposed to the immediacy of understanding which communication seems to depend on.

[...] My > wobble is social, not theoretical. Its point of arrival is quite close to > its point of departure. It would appear that this is an important point, > one that in my book is an edge of confluence which resists > conceptualization, but one which is constantly demanding it.

If I'm right then I would have to say your wobble is social and yet in a wholly theoretical sense--theory enacted as a social relation. Moreover, your attempts to resist not only demand conceptualization, they can be intelligible only to the extent that we (your interlocutors) do conceptualize them.

Is this how poetry operates? That what poems "do" is intelligible only insofar as we accept this doing as a "saying." That what poems "say" makes invisible the fact that this saying is also a "doing." Here we return to Charles Bernstein's comment on Reznikoff about hiding in plain sight. There's a Blaser poem too that comes to mind:

THE TRUTH IS LAUGHTER

Locked out, and at the same time locked in the look-out what perfect rose could I say or write the Nietzschean brilliance, who knew that the best writers understand form as what others consider content

We're probably not too far either from the old "How does a poem mean?" line that I got in high school. But I too would like to write or say the perfect rose. And why has wobbling got to be so dramatic? What if this very sentence, held out to you as simply as a plucked flower, turns methodically on an axis, round some sun of meaning toward its point of origin?

Ben F.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 16-FEB-1 994 15:16:16.95

↑ Index

42. Steve Evans
the social poem: recitative
Wed 16 Feb 1994

"A reading that is watched over" (as Ben puts it) seems not a bad defin- ition of this list. It certainly revalues the participation of those, clearly the majority of subscribers, whose "presence" is otherwise referred in a more ominous direction by the term "lurking." But then, who's to say angels/intel- ligences (at least the sort whom this list is likely to attract) don't lurk? Rilke's did...

Culling over the thread, testing my sense of what has been said to date, I find myself thinking of Juliana's comment that "the poem is the social poem." By which Juliana might mean politely to say that "social" doesn't really advance our thinking beyond the point "poem" has already brought it to...

In which case, shifting the question to "what is testimony or struggle or opposition" seems a more generative option than the one I've noticed my own thoughts to be drifting into: i.e. placing an article before an adjective (the social) and counting the resulting abstraction as a cognitive gain. Truth is, everything that lead me to introduce the term in my note to Patrick is lost once that abstraction has occurred.

The Jameson of Marxism and Form has an interesting take on why this swivel (more determined than a wobble) between concretion/abstraction might haunt our mediations on society. He notes that "society is clearly not some empirical object which we can meet and study directly in our own ex- perience: in this sense the neo-positivist criticism, which considers the idea of society an inadmissible abstract construct or a mere methodological hypothesis with no other kind of real existence, is justified. At the same time society--precisely in the form of such an impossible,suprapersonal ab- straction--is present in the form of an ultimate constraint upon every moment of our waking lives [he's clearly an optimist vis-a-vis the unconscious!]: absent, invisible, even untenable, it is at the same time the most concrete of all the realities we have to face.... (57).

That doesn't seem a bad way of parsing the problem "society" poses for thought and linking it to the one it poses for (everyday) practice.

As for poetic practice, I will tempt the anti-Adornian in Juliana only slightly by rewriting an admirable phrase from Minima Moralia: "you must have tradition in you to hate it properly." In the context of this discussion, I would say: the poem must have society in it to hate it properly. Against one variant of the "necessity for rewriting the language" argument Juliana mentioned, I would add: society is neither reducible to, nor even "structured like" a language.... One could, hypothetically, "hate" the structures of signification, and one could (though not without paradoxes) even practice that hatred or opposition in one's writing, but that would not be, in my definition, necessarily the same thing as "hating society prop- erly."

But to get that word, "hate," to have the inflection I want, I'll need a couple of stanzas from O'Hara:

Poem

Hate is only one of many responses true, hurt and hate go hand in hand but why be afraid of hate, it is only there think of filth, is it really awesome neither is hate don't be shy of unkindness, either it's cleansing and allows you to be direct like an arrow that feels something out and out meanness, too, lets love breathe... * The fact is that oppositional practices can stay clear of neither hate nor violence: that Reznikoff's Testimony admits and re-cites (while refusing to turn into arias) scene after scene of hate and violation releases us into a comportment beyond fear and amazement, beyond the "awe" that O'Hara speaks of. Testimony refers us not to the unmediated traumatic occurrence, but to the comportment that might make such occurrences impossible: "why be afraid of hate, it is only there"--why be afraid of hate, in other words, when the absence of our ability to respond to it is what truly is fearful?

But Benjamin said it better in 1939:

The tradition of the oppressed teaches us that the "state of emergency" in which we live is not the exception but the rule. We must attain to a con- ception of history that is in keeping with this insight. Then we shall clearly realize that it is our task to bring about a real state of emerg- ency, and this will improve our position in the struggle against Fascism. One reason why Fascism has a chance is that in the name of progress its opponents treat it as a historical norm. The current amazement that the things we are experiencing are "still" possible in the twentieth century is _not_ philosophical. This amazement is not the beginning of knowledge-- unless it is the knowledge that the view of history which gives rise to it is untenable ("Theses on the Philosophy of History").

This opens the wider question of what view of history would be tenable, and what relationship Reznikoff bears to the history he writes and the history he, albeit infinitesimally, and from within the social-structure of obscurity, helped to make.

I sure could use some help....

Steve
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 16-FEB-1 994 09:34:07.87

↑ Index

43. Benjamin Friedlander hate
Wed 16 Feb 1994

Just a quick response to Steve's post before going off to teach. The structure and value of "hate" in Testimony is of course utterly different than in O'Hara's work. The epigraph to the first volume, which reveals quite a bit of Reznikoff's method in this book, comes noteworthily from the New Testament:

 Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and railing, be put away from you, with all malice.

Ephesians IV, 31

In a book that both depicts and arouses all these feelings we are called upon to put them aside--this is justice, for Reznikoff. Perhaps, like Benjamin, he would say that our amazement at these stories, or at their accumulation, is not philosophical (or: judicious). Perhaps he would be curious about our amazement. Perhaps he would share it.

Amazement is just one of many responses...

Thanks for the thoughtful reprisal of how we've gotten here, Steve.

Ben F.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 16-FEB-1 994 12:14:50.21

↑ Index

44. James Sherry
RE: "Community"
Wed 16 Feb 1994

The idea of virtual community seems to be more complex than location. One interesting though oversold index of its uses is in Howard Rheingold's Virtual Communities or some such title. Rheingold is one of the leading journalists of the virtual reality group.

Along with the word community is the word communication, a footnote to our poetry, but another comm word. Having read our collective communications for a few weeks I wonder if there might be a recognition of epistolary form for computer terminals that will add to the commutativity of our community.

The notes in short paragraphs are a lot easier to read than the huge blocks of undifferentiated prose that remind me of someone trying to prove the opacity argument of the 1970s. And the messages that use the screen as a field communicate a lot more meaning than their lexicons.

The potential speed of responses on email can change what we say. The accuracy of messages also plaz w/ th' erasability of the matter and its speeeeeed. Layout composition play screen size spelling spin.

On Sat, 12 Feb
1994, Loss Glazier wrote:

> The idea of a listserv as constituting "community" poses problems. First, > in that a listserv is "virtual," i.e., we are not really "there." In > this regard, a community is almost always defined by location. Secondly, > most definitions of community imply a sense of commitment--to take this > further, I would say entrapment, ie, if you think of a Blue Ridge mountain > community, most people don't have the mobility or means to move. "There" > is fixed; its participants are fixed--for better or worse. An electronic > list implies no commitment whatsoever: any person can unplug at any time;

> the largest percentage of any list does not participate but stands in the > shadows examining the record of the conversation. To say that we have > in common taking each writer's writing seriously is a kind thought. I > hope it's true--but is no ground to call this endeavor a "community."
> (Your name, the name of the sender of the second "community" message, > is even unknown / undecipherable.) The idea of an electronic democracy > is probably the least tenable of these ideas, just about as true as > an other so-called "democracy" ie, a place where people who have > power are equal does not argue for equality for all people.
> So, what then, would we call this?
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 17-FEB-1 994 13:44:31.70

↑ Index

45. Patrick Phillips
RE: The Wobbly Social Poem
Wed 16 Feb 1994

Though "wobble" has a depth which commands more attention (something I'll give when I have a little more time), now I'll just give a quick response to Ben's post before I too go off to class.

In response to your plucking of Glaser's rose, I turned to Zukofsky's 80 Flowers.

"X"

Of thousands grown climb head-on-head
A "X" unknown stand indued no glue kiss'd peon knee
"freesia's" iris grass-tropical tru scourge bee earthflight magnetic north 4-native dial-canter excellence scent one-thousandth-in one-night "lady's-eardrops-fuschia" seaborne northeast unnailed papyrus-bath-nut "trailing arbutus fringed-gentian hydrangea"

As we know, Zukofsky could not only name whatever plant he saw, and could follow that name through the vague maze of usage back thousands of years, but could truly course a wobble of his own making. He can also serve to throw off our compass and perhaps can help us to locate that berm we seek.

As to round which sun this flower methodically turns I can only hazard...

Patrick
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 16-FEB-1 994 17:33:23.83

↑ Index

46. Charles Bernstein
from Arkadii Dragomoschenko
Thu 17 Feb 1994

--Boundary (ID 6bR7XQfMFfF8oDJV788cNA)

[Arkadii Dragomoschenko sent me this letter on the occcasion of his dropping out of the Poetics listserv. He gave me permission to send it on. Arkadii live in St. Petersberg.]

Date: Tue, 15 Feb 1994 11:44:15 +0300
From: "Arkadii T. Dragomoshchenko" <[redacted]>

Thank you, Charles, I think I will try to be in touch with Joel and time to time, I hope, he will make me know what happens there, in an electronic space of talking... To be sure, the "problem" of community (if there exists such problem) is rather interesting for new and new generations.
Yet, to my mind this very process of configration/reconfiguration or - in other words - articulation of indifferent relations in a certain pattern of community is like "chemical" process taking its course in our own body. The main thing, as it seems to me, lies in mutual disposition of two perspectives: "we" in my "I" and at the same time - "I" in this "we". The dynamic of their intersections produces the sytax of community, this it to say, its ideology. Meanwhile I think that the latent interest in such question sounds as possibility of writer to form his/her own reader, audience or at last - public, i. e - the presence of his/her work which have constitute his/her presence in turn... Anyway, with my best - Arkadii.

--Boundary (ID 6bR7XQfMFfF8oDJV788cNA)--
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 17-FEB-1 994 21:20:36.96

↑ Index

47. Benjamin Friedlander
RE: from Arkadii Dragomoschenko
Thu 17 Feb 1994

> [...] The main thing, as it seems to me, lies in mutual disposition of two perspectives: "we" in my "I" and at the same time - "I" in this "we". The dynamic of their intersections produces the sytax of community, this it to say, its ideology. [...]

huh?
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 18-FEB-1 994 10:40:06.46

↑ Index

48. Patrick Phillips
RE: What does "wobble" mean?
Fri 18 Feb 1994

I'd like to respond to Ben's question "just what does "wobble" mean" by trying to negotiate my way through several essays I've recently been reading.

Initially wobble was brought up by Steve in "There are words that wobble out of orbit and do escape having a reference." The question became for me - how does it happen that a word wobbles out of orbit and what "social evaluation" does it need to maintain some form of revolution. However, to approach this quite particular terrain without scaring off the meaning hiding there I think instead of going at the wobble through an examination of reference, it may be better to examin experience.

This week I've been looking at several texts, including Benjamin's "Some Motifs in Baudelaire" in an effort to get to some measure of experience. Something fell into place when reading and I was helped into the idea that wobble is the product of shock, I suppose a kind of violence, even a catastrophe. Not to be distracted by the cosmological metaphor, I stayed close to Benjamin's examination of Baudelaire's city. Taking a cue from Silliman's examination of the same essay, I looked for Benjamin's proposal that shock was not merely caused by something physical, something present, but by something quite absent as well. "The masses had become so much a part of Baudelair that it is rare to find a description of them in his works." But, how does something not textually evident insist, that is, "stand in" for that which is textually evident? And what about this insistence of absence is a shock?

Benjamin's discusion of the past, of tradition, (which is backgrounded much in the way the city is "backgrounded" in Baudelaire) goes hand in hand with his idea of "Erfahrung." Experience, for Benjamin, fends off shock and allows us a sense of place and relative position, comportment. "The shock experience which the passer-by has in the crowd" is more the jostling of what is lost in the social than it is a jostling of what is there. "The jolt in the movement of a machine is like the so-called "coup" in a game of chance...Since each operation at the machine is just as screened off from the preceeding operation as a "coup" in a game of chance is from the one preceeding it...[t]he work of both is equally devoid of substance." With each "throw," each turn of the worker to the piece, experience is lost, time is lost, the past is lost, completion itself is screened off from any preceeding operation. So "wobble" here can contain the out of phase relationship with "experience" induced by the shock of being stripped to the perpetually new.

This textual play on Benjamin's part pulls the force of value into the idea of shock. Something we must have if we are to say a word wobbles. But what is the value of nothing and when does this nothing become the past so thoroughly that every thing has become so occult, so "new," so now. Adorno picks up this thread of Baudelaire in Benjamin in Minima Moralia #150 "Late Extra" in order to examine this newness. "Today the appeal to newness, of no matter what kind, provided only that it is archaic enough, has become universal, the omnipresent medium of false mimesis. The decomposition of the subject is consummated in his self-abandonment to an everchanging sameness. This drains all firmness from characters." (p 238) But if we are to pick up again that what is jostled in the crowd is what is "lost" and "there" and that the lost is shock producing, perhaps the lack of firmness in characters actually produces experience. In this case the wobble would be not false mimesis at all, but a continual production of the shock, which in Benjamin's case, constantly acts to firm up consciousness, experience. In reference to Freud's Beyond the Pleasure Principle Benjamin quotes "...consciousness comes into being at the site of a memory trace." Perhaps here wobble is not only the out of phase relationship with experience, but also the site of just such a trace. Of course this consciousness would constantly be coming into contact with the catastrophe of modern existence which in itself induces a fleeting, but continual hope for what is lost; the big jostle.

So wobble at the moment of the word has for me an extreme astronomy, or better, entails a diagnosis of the wakes or traces of multiple asynchronous orbits: tradition, the past, loss, consciousness of loss and presence, the catastrophic impact of Capitalism upon intimate and public spheres and in, or of these orbits, language.

The follow up in this lead to the trace will lead me inevitably to Derrida, again, probably to Cinders. It will urge me to re-examine ideology as an apparatus, probably in Althusser. But this (Althusser) brings to mind Simone Weil and I'll stop here with this quote and I'm not sure exactly how it fits in...

For every task, there exists a limited and small number of possible errors, some which would break the machine, others which would ruin the piece.

Patrick
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 18-FEB-1 994 11:58:41.03

↑ Index

49. Charles Bernstein
from Evan Heimlich
Fri 18 Feb 1994

Date: Thu, 17 Feb 1994 14:47:38 +0000 (U)

From: Evan Heimlich <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: the heaping potential

Reply to: RE>the heaping potential

Add a teepeeing he-spoon of potential-flour,
William Least Heat Spoon and wash hands in free basin.

the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential
the heaping potential

was:
Date: Sun, 13 Feb 1994 10:00:32 -0500 (EST)
: Jed <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: "Community"
In--to: Message of Sun

Howe's your community. Virtually heaping.

[redacted]

In response to the message repeated below:

Date: 2/13/94 9:20 AM
To: Evan Heimlich
From: UB Poetics discussion group

Does "community" involve companionship? Or may it simply consist of collective anonymity? In the strictly civic sense of vernacular usage, community means little more than the aggregate of people and activities that bring them momenta rily together in public spaces--little league ball, traffic snarls, school board bonds--which amounts to a collective display of the heaping potential. A primary reason why the net increasingly seems a site for community--or at least why most discussions on the net erupt into these speculations about community-- is because it enacts both the aleatory potential of the casual encounter and the motivational tensegrity of contact: "Contact," as I recall, was the little mag that William Carlos Williams edited, was't it?
  --Jed Rasula
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 18-FEB-1 994 22:17:42.70

↑ Index

50. GENE E. HULT wobble wobble
Fri 18 Feb 1994

Hmm... first of all, Benjamin's not totally correct re: Baudelaire's lament over the continual new. In Baudelaire's Salon Criticisms, he pushes for a sort of mixture: "the relative or circumstantial and the invaria ble or eternal: 'I defy anyone to find a single scrap of beauty which does not contain these two elements...'" Which is a point of view I find myself falling for time and again. And experience... experience may lessen the shock of some of the unknown, but it's my experience that experience leads to sightings of further absence... as in, the more we know, the more we see the parameters (or lack thereof) of what we don't understand... and that leads to a sort of perpetual wobble. When that hits language, we then get into all that buggy semiotics. When is a rose not a rose, when it's wobbling? A wobbling rose? It's all fine to point this stuff out, but what to DO with it afterwards? How is it going to change how your put down on paper a line of your own writing? Do we paper over the gaps in language, or admit to the unknown and get caught up in that particular lament over and over? (It sure didn't help Baudelaire any... suicide is not an option.) Anybody write fiction? Because I'm having particular problems reconciling this sort of wobble with the necessary "story" in fiction... if even the words aren't to be trusted, if the metaphors are all transitory, how can we trust something as "invented" as fiction? Or is willing suspension of disbelief enough (as it is in the grocery store, where we use words for simple transactions)? From: IN %"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 19-FEB-1 994 01:08:26.23

↑ Index

51. Patrick Phillips
RE: wobble wobble
Sat 19 Feb 1994

I don't believe I ever hint that Benjamin was entirely correct re: anything, or propose his examination as the final word. In utilizing Benjamin, I wasn't attempting to examine Baudelaire, but to use some of the tools Benjamin uses in his Motifs essay. To this, I think if you'll look closely you'll see that I was trying to get at a mode of experience which is an attempt to deal with the constantly absent, but to deal with that absence in a particular way--something which approaches your "perpetual wobble."

As to the Salon Criticism quote, it appears to me that often the circumstantial is often eternal in Baudelaire. This would present a problem with your analysis of my post as well as with Baudelaire.

I'm also not satisfied with Benjamin's definition of "Erlebnis" and "Erfahrung," and the parallel construct of voluntary and involuntary memory, or for that matter, of his use of memory as opposed to remeberance, [though I do have a fondness for the conjunction of, not the opposition of, consciousness and trace.] These "rails" running through the essay sometimes provide too clear a structuralist proposition which merely points at a possible absence. But point it does.

As to what we do afterwards. There is no afterwards, this comes after. This is the attendant (perhaps not so attendant) spiel. From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 19-FEB-1 994 02:03:53.83

↑ Index

52. Benjamin Friedlander

RE: wobble wobble

Sat 19 Feb 1994

> It's all fine to point this stuff out, but what to DO with it afterwards? How is it going to change how your put down on paper a line of your own writing? Do we paper over the gaps in language, or admit to the unknown and get caught up in that particular lament over and over? [...]

Begging for the moment the question of what "this stuff" is, I would answer, for myself, that a radical doubt that language ever reaches its destination, the fearful perception that words must travel a long way, across a veritable world, in order to let the past clasp hands with the future, is not a state of affairs that demands a response, but is the state of affairs our responses are born in. Papering over the gaps in language is its own lament, admitting that the unknown is there is another way of ignoring it.

> [...] Anybody write fiction? Because I'm having particular problems reconciling this sort of wobble with the necessary "story" in fiction... if even the words aren't to be trusted, if the metaphors are all transitory, how can we trust something as "invented" as fiction?

But isn't the question of believability an intrinsic one in any kind of narrative? Isn't the element of surprise, which the so-called "wobble" makes possible, one of the principal pleasures of fiction? I think we have a tendency to overdramatize the difficulties of language, to think that our doubts are peculiar to our own age.

On another note:

James Sherry wrote, "The notes in short paragraphs are a lot easier to read than the huge blocks of undifferentiated prose that remind me of someone trying to prove the opacity argument of the 1970s. And the messages that use the screen as a field communicate a lot more meaning than their lexicons."

Am I the only one to find this statement remarkable? The publisher of Roof Books advocating something that sounds a lot like projective verse--labelling something called "the opacity argument" a form of nostalgia!

Undifferentiated prose of any length sounds awful. Let difference bloom in the hugest blocks!

Ben Friedlander
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 19-FEB-1 994 16:35:56.50

↑ Index

53. Katie Yates
RE: from Arkadii Dragomoschenko
Sat 19 Feb 1994

I am perhaps avoiding the ideological problem of this *quest*ion* of community but wish to address Arkadii's:

"mutual disposition of two perspectives: 'we' in my 'I'
'I' in my 'We'

with the following forced juxtopposition between Don Byrd & George Oppen -

In the most recent (and final) issue of NOTUS Byrd writes his essay "Sound's Domain:" Organization or formal reality, by contrast, is closed and circular. It is never self-present; indeed organization only appears in consciousness to the being which discovers that it makes the mark which distinguishes itself as a separate identity.

Oppen quotes him own poem in a letter to Sherman Stein [late Spring '67"

Substance itself which has been the subject of all our planning And by this we are carried into the incalculable

What I wish to consider here is weight with which each man considers him, a "self." Byrd speaks of a solitary epiphany or reconcilliation of the matters of one's existence. Oppen by contrast is willing to bear the weight of human limitation with at least one other .....My interest is limited by a severe need to understand how pronouns reflect where the attention of the writer is. In all 3 of the above cases & in my own, I recognize at least some level of deliberation in how the self (I) is described in relation to other (we?) kyates From: IN %"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 20-FEB-1 994 15:50:32.57

↑ Index

54. Tenney Nathanson
RE: What does "wobble" mean?
Sun 20 Feb 1994

As I read (or read, a few months ago, so this may be off) the Benjamin stuff on what he calls "shock defense" (a purposely awkward locution?) and the Freud metapsychology i both BPP and Inhibitions, Symptoms, and Anxiety, it seems to me perhaps to authorize instead the formulation that the text, as part of a shock defense, a parrying of the new (after all it's [hyper] conscious) is there INSTEAD of experience, instead of a memory trace (Freud) or "Erfahrung." (There's something bizarre about the metapsychology, or at least about Ben's appropriation of it, so all this might best be taken I think as parable or trope). So the wobble might be caused by a lexical or idiomatic memory trace, submerged, out of some OTHER context? (cf. Cavell on Thoreau, or Bernstein on Cavell on Thoreau?). That is: the words I use to parry shock have another, older history, not "meant" by my use of them but trailing.... good book: Susan Buck-Morss, /The Dialectics of Seeing: Walter Benjamin and the Arcades Project/

Tenney Nathanson
(hope this posts....)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 20-FEB-1 994 15:51:03.17

↑ Index

55. Tenney Nathanson
RE: What does "wobble" mean?
Sun 20 Feb 1994

---

or, for that matter, the "trailing" history might NOT get evoked. Less wobble, perhaps, and in Jameson's system: less "modernist" and more "pomo".... unless that sense of blanking out or bleaching out, as I'd trope it, is after all akin to what others are troping as "wobble" From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 20-FEB-1 994 18:28:41.59

↑ Index

56. Charles Bernstein
Community and the Individual Talent
Sun 20 Feb 1994

Community and the Individual Talent

I had a number of thoughts, over these past weeks of posts, about community, but I've misplaced them.

Every time I hear the words literary community I reach for my bivalent autocad simulation card emulator.

Poetry is (or can be) an aversion of community in pursuit of new constellations of relationship.

In other words, community is as much what I am trying to get away from -- reform -- as form.

So there are a spectrum of communities, from the closed community modelled on the family, to communities fixed by location (what might otherwise be called, for example, neighborhoods) or civic identification (the community bounding a literal and figurative commons or commonplace) or political ideology, to utopian communities that have either sought to form a new place or to remain open by refusing to be grounded by a place.

Literary communities have often been understood in terms of place -- the "local" -- as Michael Davidson writes about the emergence of a literary community on the West Coast in his book on the SF Renaissance, or in terms of scene (a local hub within a place) or group. Black Mountain remains crucial because it forged an arts community from writers and artists from many places. Most recently, the connections of writers within an ethnic, gender, or racial groups have been designated as communities. Schools or movements have not usually been called communities, although Ron Silliman, among others, have wanted to insist that a shared aesthetic project among writers in different locations can best be understood on this model of community. It's possible to speak of the "poetry community" in the sense of "the poetry world" (in the sense of "the art world") -- but such a formulation immediately suggests that arts funding agencies are nearby (more commonly, one speaks of the "small press community"). I would say "poetry communities" but this begs the questions even as it suggests relief. Many poets that I know experience poetry communities, say scenes, as places of their initital exclusion from publication, readings, recognition. Being inside, a part of, is often far less striking that being left out, apart.

Communities, defined by what they have in common -- a place, an ideal, a practice, a heritage, a tradition -- cannot immunize themselves against what they do not find common. To have a community is to make an imaginary inscription against what is outside the community. & outside is where some poetry will want to be. That is, some poetry will want to work against received ideas of place, group, ethnicity, gender, sexuality, person, member, individuality, tradition, aesthetic tendency. One does not use collective nouns, or at least not without skepticism (if not anxiety).

Robert von Hallberg, in Culture & Value, argues for a poetry that reflects community values; this is what he calls a poetry or accommodation and also, for the U.S. in the 1970s and 80s, a suburban poetry.

I suppose it has something to do with how comfortable you feel about the confines of family or nation (fine or confining). As the critic asked the poet who had slipped on the ice and was lying in the middle of the road -- "Are you comfortable?" --"I make a good living."

(I take it Steve Evans comment in his introduction to the "Technique" in o.blek/Writing from the New Coast about his generational "hatred of identity" could also apply to a hatred of community, and perhaps that is implicit in his recent discussion of "hating society properly" and also "hating" tradition. Would this include a hatred of virtual, or for that matter unavowable, commuities? Echoing W.C. Fields famous repost to being corrected about his insistence that Jews were running the Studio --- Catholics, worst kind of Jews -- might we say: Virtual communities, worst kind of communities!?)

Any discussion of community would do well to start with the idea of institution rather than association. For the rules of our associations, one on one or one with many, is fundamentally an institutional matter (in the sense that Erving Goffman details in his many works). So that I would say the first fact about the "community" made possible through modems hooked up to mainframes that are teleconnected is that the access and protocols of this community are predetermined by the institutions that give us entry into them; for most of us on this particular list "membership" in the university "community" -- (and for the few on commercial services bearing the insignia of ".com" at the end of their e-mail addresses, they have simply paid to have access to this already formed nexus.)

This is changing but that only makes more crucial the need to acknowledge the overlay of different institutional interests that mediate our interactions in these spaces. We don't shed old institutional habits as we inhabit new institutional spaces so much as project our old ways onto the new spaces. A great deal of sociological analysis is sure to follow us here. But it is interesting to consider, what patters of "who speaks?" in "live" group settings -- meetings, seminars -- are also present in listserv situations, which may at first appear to be free of the need to interrupt or speak up or find a temporary opening in the discussion.

For example, I will soon begin monitoring how long each of you spends online with Poetics@UBVM or whether and what you download. -- The potential for monitoring such transactions, as well as doing various forms of statistical analysis of posts and activity, is part of the medium of our communing here. Several subscribers have noted that one of us has chosen to conceal his identify from the publicly available list of subscribers; am I right to "out" Chris Funkhauser of our SUNY-Albany node?

I have set up this listserv so that anyone can subscribe and I am automatically notified, but also so that the list itself is not listed in any directories of listserves. At some point, to keep the list at a scale small enough, or "common" enough, to work, will it be worth

The idea of possibly hidden listeners is something a listserv invokes insofar as the communication is considered interpersonal, private in the way a letter is, or even a seminar or meeting; although we accept that we never know who buys our books (or checks them from the library). But perhaps the situation here is more like a performance, were we make our recits individually to an audience that is able to see one another, even if, when on stage, our view of the audience may be blocked by the kleiglights.

That, anyway, would bring to mind Rousseau's preference for public meetings over and against public spectacles (theater): the public convenes to consider its circumstance, its common needs.

What is public space and why does there seem so little of it, as if the public had become a commodity no longer in much demand, but still available for import at high prices, free trade notwithstanding? (We import it from ourselves and the tariffs are high.) So little public space, that is, so much public speactacle.

This suggests the civic values of spaces like these: not reinforcing existing communities but taking up the constitution of social space.

If I resist the idea of a literary community, while working to support the "actually existing" communities of poets among which I find myself, it is because I want to imagine reading and writing, performing and listening, as sites of conversation as much as collectivity. I want to imagine a constellation of readers who write, to and for one another, with the links always open at the end, spiralling outward -- centrifugally -- not closing in.

At one point in these parts, posts -- a message identified as from Lolpoet (Loss Glazier), echoed G.E. Moore's shaking of fists at the skeptics ("at least I know two things that are real!"): "We are physical beings, not virtual ones." My heart sank, for it is our virtuality that allows for hope. V139HLA3 (at Buffalo it is an institutional privilege to have your name be used as part of your user ID), aka Martin Spinelli, wanting to put off the idea that this space of exchange in unreal, insisted, "We are really here with our real eyes at real monitors" (but unfortunately no real italics): yet, my real eyes do me no good if I aspire to something else than what I see, and what I want to monitor is neither real or unreal.

So my hope for electronic communication is not that it engenders virtual communities, but rather virtual uncommunities.

-Charles Bernstein

(rest area)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 21-FEB-1 994 00:13:11.96

↑ Index

57. peter quartermain
"Community"
Sun 20 Feb 1994

Yes. This conversation is (like the idea and institution community) fascinating, like a snake eyeing a mouse.
"Community" is virtually undefinable [pun intended], possibly undesirable, and ever shifting, perilous -- the more closely defined, the more closely and powerfully an instrument of control. Odi et amo, then. Like definition, it feeds on hunger.
Do not pass "Go"; and don't forget to cut the grass (if not the mustard).
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 21-FEB-1 994 00:30:59.06

↑ Index

58. Linda Reinfeld
RE: "Community"
Mon 21 Feb 1994

Yes, chilling. The List generates Owner and Orders: IMPORTANT. Spread no information. Download and be counted. The tiger springs in the new year. Us he devours.

Or, "It's just ordinary hopelessness."

+----------+
| Linda Reinfeld [redacted] |
+----------+
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 21-FEB-1 994 13:23:45.62

↑ Index

59. Benjamin Friedlander derek jarman
Mon 21 Feb 1994

Here in the anti-community chamber, the brain, the obituary watch continues. Donald Judd last week, and now this. I forward (without permission, but so it goes) the following from the derrida-list:

> Date: Sun, 20 Feb 1994 21:28:00 +0000
> From: Andy Butler

> To return to an earlier debate, I spent this afternoon watching videos > with friends. By common consent we watched Jarman's Wittgenstein, and > even the person who was resistant admited he enjoyed part of it. My own > wavering between thinking it a masterpiece and flawed masterpiece moved > further toward the masterpiece: the Wittgenstein actor excellent, Tilda > Swinton imcomparable, Michael Gough as wachable as ever, Maynard Keynes > entertaining. Only the rough trade Johnny stands out as unconvincing. I'd > forgotten the importance of the Martian, and how he appears, naked, to > speak the final words of the film.
>
> We then watched an episode of Northern Exposure, the cricket score and > ate. Then the news announces that Derek Jarman has finally died of an HIV > related illness. I'd last seen him on a Channel 4 Christmas Eve rpogramme > "Camp Christmas", looking ill but alert. I knew there couldn't be long to > go. I'd heard that he'd been in hospital bnut no more.
>
> Personally I think this is a great loss: to experimental film, to British > cinema (whatever that means) and indeed to film world wide. We have > also lost a forthright commentator on Gay / Queer / HIV issues. Working on a > shoestring he produced astounding art. Not to everyone's taste, yes, on > the edge of pretentiousness but that's part of taking risks. With Edward > II, Wittgenstein and Blue Jarman reached the height of his powers; there > can be no one to replace him.
>
> Cheers (and ins ombre mood already this weekend)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 22-FEB-1 994 20:24:50.69

↑ Index

60. Jennifer Moxley Institution?
Tue 22 Feb 1994

I think you boys must be getting a little saddle weary from all that wobbling. Those who muse around in definitions of community without self-referentiality obviously can "step away" long enough to question: are we in one? do we want one? etc... Most people on this earth are born into your vagary. And I think the likelihood of any significant change happening surrounding community is very low among our current poetic dissidents if we don't feel "wrongly defined" only "wrong definitions" --changing definitions is easy, we're poets, or are we? I notticed that M. Hult admitted he goes to the grocery store which reminded me of something I read about the new left in the 60's, it's not that anyone said to the women leftists, "you can't speak," it is simply that the dynamic was such that even theorectically sophisticated women felt invigorated but shut down from participation. The way they were defined proceeded any definition changing they might have wanted to take part in. Being left out, cut off from the dominent modes of whatever, while remaining in a position of priviledge via class and gender, can sometimes make us forget to keep a keen eye peeled on the house that shut the door in the first place, and subsequently our shack takes on an inflated importance. I find it interesting that while we spend a lot of time opposing our enforced and chosen communities we still accept their terms. I think this is because it isn't that we hate our communities, but rather that we hate that the possibilities they open to us (academic, poetic, love relationships, virtual and democratic communities) are rarely realized. I just hate that. But it's like always waking up to a sink full of dirty dishes, you must say to yourself, at least I have dishes. We cannot extirpate ourselves from community any more than we can talk about the social as if we aren't in and defined by it, neither can we give up hope that we might be able to risk humiliation and defy these spaces that define us. -Jennifer Moxley From: IN %"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 22-FEB-1 994 20:30:17.97

↑ Index

61. Joe Amato
RE: Community and the Individual Talent
Tue 22 Feb 1994

charles, that virtuality could be a virtue///

"virtual uncommunity"---community defined by what is excluded from same?---"i never wanted to belong to a club" etc?... in what ways is this specifically virtual?...

real vs. virtual---yet another site of collapse... what about the body, finally?... that is, the site whereupon such collapses--culturally, socially--are instituted, the "who" that does/does not speak, that is/is not allowed access, etc... does 'virtual uncommunity' renegotiate zones of institutional exclusion such that a 'we' denotes absence thrice removed?...

"not only are these [not] my words, not only am i not t/here, but i stand apart from you, to boot"

hence through this absence/addresslessness (think nomads with newtons) to rethink, or begin to rethink, presence (of others, or of congenial others etc)?... calling the bluff, as it were, of a certain telos of presence (this is fuzzy, yes, and formal)...

trafficking in wish lists: i would wish, were i the type (am i?), that the virtual were deployed as real, not over and against reality, but of the various realities that we construct... it's taken a mimetic shape thus far, but it needn't... hence virtual becomes, under one definition (from a new bill on the washington state govt. agenda---"public health & safety act 1994" bill, sbr 6174---and I shamelessly excerpt from a post to the media lab's narrative intelligence list):

NEW SECTION. Sec 702. (4) "Virtual Reality" means any computer or other electronic technology that creates an enhanced illusion of three-dimensional, real-time or near-real-time interactive reality through the use of software, specialized hardware, holograms, gloves, masks, glasses, computer guns, or other item capable of producing visual, audio, and sensory effects of verisimilitude beyond those available with a personal computer.

note "verisimilitude beyond those" etc...

but to get back to community commentary: a bit smartass, i know, but i'm thinking of the uncola at this moment... i'm wondering what it is, exactly, your concluding hope constitutes (as in constitution---bodily/legislative)...

i want to point out---and here i'll risk as much as you have, ethically, in doing so (which is not to suggest that either of us is being unethical, however impolite, but that ethos is always at stake)---that un-concealing (there's that un again) chris funk at suny/a was unconcealing a grad. student (chris---hi!, permit me to speak of you in the third person for a moment)... were you aware of chris's postsecondary status?... not that you wouldn't have unconcealed, say, a faculty member---but that there are institutional distinctions of community, as we're all aware, that go beyond listowner/non-listowner status, and that these raise issues, as you intimate, of power... much as i have just un-concealed chris's status in this institutional hierarchy...

i write the foregoing noting that, whatever my intentions, i risk a culpability on many counts... and what does it mean to be "polite" around t/here, anyway, esp.

given the potentially international context(s)?... "netiquette" hardly seems an answer... i have some ideas---

it sounds, in all, as though you would like to see these spaces mitigate the "hatred" you refer to... does this mean that they help to mitigate differences in difference?... wherever this stuff 'goes' that i'm in the process of typing, fact is that it emerges pretty much out of something american/// forgive me this latter---it needs to be unpacked---are these the places through/in which to venture forth so?/// am i publicly, well, what am i?... wouldn't ontological questions of identity be inscribed (o.k.---yuck) within a social controversy situated at the level of "national" or "continental" (as in north american) conceptions of community?... i mean, is your projected uncommunity international in scope, or transnational? (is the internet?)... new world borders?... or no borders defined as such, in national/international terms?... or--- what what?...

i am a bit too persistent (and digressive) perhaps... and i mean, as you are aware, no flames at all... i take these spaces as providing both for performative possibility as well as intimate deliberation... integrity, all told, is something i hope for within any un/community...

i would like to read more...

best///

joe
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 08:22:54.66

↑ Index

62. Benjamin Friedlander
RE: Institution?
Wed 23 Feb 1994

Jennifer, I don't think I was wrong to detect a criticism in your remarks not only of the content of my (and others') postings, but of the very fact of them. That's what principally annoyed me. Is this the same as my response to James Sherry? I wanted to be ironic there but say that in telling others to shut up he was adopting the rhetoric of poets I know he dislikes. Likewise with Tom Mandel--let him know that he couldn't simply brush aside what others say without answering to his rhetoric. Have I brushed aside what you wrote? This is what I objected to:

> [...] you boys [...]

and that whole sentence, not only is it dismissive, but the imputation that it's a boys' club (and that we're playing cowboys and indians) is extremely insulting

> [...] Most people on this earth are born into your vagary.

the imputation that we lack "self-referentiality" (by which i take it you mean self-knowledge?) is one thing, but to suggest that our supposed ignorance is a "vagary" others are subject to, not only on the poetics list, but their whole lives...! what sort of power are you attributing here to the "boys"?

> [...] it's not that > anyone said to the women leftists, "you can't speak," it is simply that the dynamic was such that even theorectically sophisticated women felt invigorated but shut down from participation[...]

though your "i was reminded of" doesn't really link this statement to the discussion on the poetics list in any specific way, the implication is clear: the "boys" are shutting you down. perhaps i'm not jaded enough to accept such a ghastly charge with humor, but i do think it IS a ghastly charge, & an undeserved one, & it makes me angry.

The rest of your post had less to do with the poetics list and more to do with this analogy, and I don't particularly object to it--though I might say, having never fully ascertained what it was that made you dissatisfied with the discussion, or feel shut down, I had little to say in response. Your post is as abstract, in its way, as any of Steve's or mine or Patrick's or whoever's.

And yes, I DID think I was doing you a favor, of not "flaming you" on the list (which I wouldn't do) or just being pissed off and remaining silent (which I would do only if i didn't know you or count you a friend). Ben From: IN %"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 09:58:27.01

↑ Index

63. Benjamin Friedlander

yow!

Wed 23 Feb 1994

---

well, those of you who've read my last message (which i meant to send privately) can draw your own conclusions. robert duncan said the psychopathology of everyday life is a manual of composition, so freudian slips might in some way indicate a desire to compose without composing...it would seem some part of me wanted this private correspondence to spill into the public. but most of me didn't, doesn't...and i apologize to jennifer for any difficulty or embarrassment this may cause her. frustration run amok! ah dear ben f From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 10:52:22.40

↑ Index

64. Joe Amato

From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 1 of 4

Wed 23 Feb 1994

2-22-94

I'm not sure what to call myself in this social space. A "hidden listener" perhaps, though as I'm not on-line, I'm not electronically hidden. I have been able to follow several parts of various discussions on the Poetics list [e.g., the wobbly, social poem??] thanks to occasional hardcopy provided by Joe Amato---sympathetic to my un-linked status. Should Joe and I worry that we're breaching an institutional decorum, i.e., subscribing to the UB list?---does providing me with hardcopy of certain conversations Joe believes I'd be interested in suggest indiscretion on his and my part... that I'm nosy, spying voyeuristically into the dialogue/communications passing between people, some of whom I know and consider friends, others whom I don't know?

I believe Charles is wise to raise the question of meanings and potentialities within an interrogation of "the idea of institution rather than association." For example, as an "outsider" (I'll say something about my situation in a moment), I tend to think a more productive way to conceptualize/practice the activity on the UB Poetics list would be to consider the fact that it constitutes not a literary community or "uncommunity" (it in no way resembles whatever forms that has taken in the past), but an electronic community. I think it would be important to investigate exactly what electronics is, and along with that research one could link the question of... and/or one might discover one's whole sense of what constitutes community has changed, and continues to---while mapping the specific and local details and densities of "old institutional habits... inhabit(ing) new institutional spaces." Tho I wonder how "new" these spaces are?

What I would hope to experience in any kind of community would be the sense that it's an effective community. That it consist "not of propositions to be communicated from A to B but of orientations in fields of meaning [there's that word "field" again, Ben], measures by the scales in which humans share not a perspective or a belief but a world that opens to this or that particular vantage and practice. In order to constitute an effective community rather than a symbolic machine for social production, organized beings must orient themselves in their media-scapes" (Don Byrd, _The Poetics of the Common Knowledge_, 23).

(cont'd)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 10:52:29.45

↑ Index

65. Joe Amato
From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 2 of 4
Wed 23 Feb 1994

I am not a subscriber to the UB Poetics list (or any other list) because I cannot afford the privilege. That is, I own neither the hardware nor software needed to participate electronically from home, and Illinois Institute of Technology, where I am teaching as a pre-doctoral fellow, does not provide even its full-time Humanities faculty with computers. The best I might muster is limited on-site use of a machine in another location---and I don't own a vehicle, making it difficult for me to schedule my time on campus around such peripheral activities (however valuable). I mention my personal situation as it brings to mind very serious matters concerning the issue of institutions, participatory systems of information exchange and creation, and social progress---this latter in that its directions, purposes and results rely heavily upon one's ability either to heed or to ignore the divisions of class, and local, national and global economics. This is inseparable from the question of electronics above.

E.g. does my situation problematize or effect in any way Charles' query true electronically is sometimes true in the print world. For example, I just saw a copy of _Lingo_ #2 on the magazine stand at Barnes & Noble. There was an article about the New Coast conference at UB last spring, and a few other pieces that looked interesting. The price, however, was $12.50. I generally don't spend $12.50 for an issue of a magazine. Instead, I bought the recent issue of _Artforum_ for $7. Inside, I found an article by Jonathan Crary---founding editor of Zone, and professor of art history at Columbia. Bernstein's question, "What is public space and why does there seem so little of it?," and consequent hope for "the civic values of spaces like these: not reinforcing existing communities but taking up the constitution of social space," receives substantive problematizing when juxtaposed against Crary's reflection on electronic communications and communities (echoing to some degree Jacques Attali's prognosis of intellectual productivity complicit with the distribution of information and its technologies, absorbed into and enhancing the north-south hemispheric disequilibrium of resources and capital, and further straining the already growing fragmentation of east/west relations---the buying & selling of people; see _Millennium: Winners and Losers in the Coming World Order_---it's a disturbing and frightening book.)

I quote, rather extensively, from Crary's text:

"... Many evocations of an emerging 'on-line' world assume as a matter of course, or else never question, that a more or less uniform and available information and communication culture is now being installed globally. Generalizing language of the following sort is depressingly pervasive: 'In the near future we may all be on-line.' Beyond the curt and brutal exclusions of the words 'we' and 'all,' this class of statement, in its sweeping untruth, resonates with both a complacent faith in the certainty of modernization and a banal anticipation of its posthistorical fulfillment. "That western patterns of technological consumption could ever be extended to a world now six, soon ten billion people boggles the most elementary economic, not to mention ecological, common sense. The inescapable yet continually evaded truth is that participation in the emerging information, imaging, and communications technologies will never (in the meaningful future) expand beyond a minority of people on this planet. Before supposing 'we' will 'all' soon be in cyberspace, consider an isolated statistic: less than 20 percent of the world's population today have telephones. Despite relentless claims that the new computer networks are somehow egalitarian, in the next half century somewhat fewer than that 20 percent are likely ever to have economic access to the capabilities of these systems. An argument for a higher estimate would depend on projected growth rates that are historically unprecedented and are unsupported by even the rosiest long-range economic forecasts.

(cont'd)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 10:52:25.95

↑ Index

66. Joe Amato
From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 3 of 4
Wed 23 Feb 1994

[quoting from Crary]

"To avoid misunderstanding, my argument here is not for or against any given technological arrangement. Rather, it is against the fictions, mystifications, bad faith, and worse in critical analyses that ignore the immensity, and the violence, of this disequilibrium. For our new electronic communities and digital subjectivities, whatever their local value and however subversive they might seem, are also part of an intensifying process of global polarization, segregation, and impoverishment. "...The sleek cyberdream of a collapsed global surface of instantaneity and dematerialization persists only by erasing the waking actuality of a world that is increasingly unlivable for most of its inhabitants. "Some critics have celebrated the advent of an era of 'generalized communication' in the belief that new technologies will open up a multiplicity of 'local rationalities,' a multicultural world in which ethnic, sexual, religious, and other minorities would all have voices. But such a multicentered pluralism would depend on the universalizing and impossible idea of a relatively even distribution of technological culture. Instead, population is acquiring increasingly potent, supple forms of technological expression while the majority continue to inhabit radically dissimilar 'off-line' spaces and temporalities (or machinic 'creolizations' that will never mesh on equal terms with the most powerful networks). "With the growh of telecommunications and information systems in the West, Japan, and elsewhere (along with the corporate scramble to control and reorganize this arena of exchange), what used to be thought of as 'consumption' is increasingly synonymous with 'communication.' Within this field, where 'interactivity' is a new word for 'shopping,' it is becoming harder to distinguish effective resistance from what are merely alternate fashions of consumption. The 'grand narratives' and authoritarian perspectives may to some extent have collapsed, but the new proliferation of voices, truths, and subject positions has as much to do with the logic of the electronic marketplace as with the inception of any new public sphere."

[the above paragraphs are from Crary's article in the February issue of _Artforum_, 58-59, 103.]

(cont'd)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 10:52:31.56

↑ Index

67. Joe Amato
From Andrew Levy, re: Community and uncommunity, 4 of 4
Wed 23 Feb 1994

In the context of Crary's examination, the resulting economic disparity between the haves & have-nots is manifest not only "in political and economic crisis but, perhaps just as important, in the phenomenon of radically dissimilar perceptual and cognitive lifeworlds." Beavis & Butthead vs. Whitman & Emerson. As mentioned in Charles' posting, being outside a (literary) community is a sometimes self-elected position. When it comes to electronic communities, however, the decision and possibilities of that choice are mediated, if not imploded, within the social space of a discriminatory and post-apocalyptic economy of knowledge many people will be powerless to affect within the space of the screen, having no terminal or one not monitored by management from which to speak. Crary goes on to mention that some current research in the neurosciences suggests that prolonged use of new image technologies "will produce physical remappings of neural connections in the brain." How large will the boundary between "inside" and "outside" become when heightened by unbridgeable perceptual and cognitive divides? "... the prospect is for medicobiological elites and castes of a sort unimaginable even in the most archaic premodern societies" (103). Crary ends by asking how one is to stay in touch with, listen to and learn from that majority of voices "outside the circuits of compulsory communication and 'augmented' realities?" This question complements Don Byrd's profound and densely complex investigation in the book referenced above.

I'm sure some of the concerns and ideas of which Crary speaks are not "new" to many of the subscribers to the UB Poetics list---but I thought it appropriate to interject them directly into the discussion and making of cummunity here. That's a typo, but let it stand. By the way, I (aka Andrew Levy) am not actually "posting" this response. Instead, Mr. Amato has been kind enough to volunteer his services. Also, my apologies to anyone who objects to my eavesdropping and textual intrusion into this space. Please direct all objections to Joe Amato---otherwise, I'll never know.

best to everyone hovering, lurking, listening, or subscribing!

Andrew Levy

p.s. A book I've found useful for thinking about community is _The Coming Community_, by Giorgio Agamben. His work in this book would also complement, I believe, Steve Evans' thinking about identity and the "hatred of identity."

[p.p.s. all typos, garbling and related wobbling by Joe]
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 17:53:44.28

↑ Index

68. Joe Amato
RE: Institution?
Wed 23 Feb 1994

---

well, i don't wanna 'take sides' re the disagreement, public/private and in-between, 'between' ben & jennifer...

but i would like to say [and i'm editing in here that i'm not at all pleased with how this post turned out] that i've noted posts similar to jennifer's on a number of lists (that is, from women, and addressing similar issues), and that i think we would all do well to consider the extent to which these spaces are gendered so as to exclude possibilities for all... that is, that women might feel somehow excluded from these environs is not simply an idiosyncratic or sensitive (which is to say hypersensitive) observation... there are a number of related issues here---the sorts of subject positions that technologies typically help to institute, even within a presumed space of first amendment freedoms, public domain and such---and it is likely, i think, that many of these issues are backgrounded in the midst of differing levels of dis/comfort vis-a-vis such public spaces...

that is, it's not that wobbling per se, whatever one makes of same, is a poor point of departure (and as i recall, there have been both women and men involved in that discussion, if predominantly men (this latter observation perhaps significant in itself))... it's more to the point that such a discussion---and i've certainly indulged mself in similarly compulsive (?---is this fair?) threads/exchanges---bypasses perhaps without much forethought or deliberation (around t/here, at least) questions pertaining to---not how "we" is/are conceived contra or in association with various "i's"---but how "we" as an implicit operational construction has/have already de facto eliminated particular "i's" from its/our field of possibilities...

who is we not speaking?... and why?...

joe///(awaiting meanings of silences, departures... which will, w/methinks, require a few words from our sponsors...) From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 18:26:41.12

↑ Index

69. Kristen Prevallet angry boys
Wed 23 Feb 1994

Ben:

You can dish it out but you sure can't take it.
You're Freudian Slip was successful, and now you had better answer to your own rhetoric instead of calling everyone else on theirs.

I can see that you took Jennifer's message personally, but you shouldn't have. The bigger issue has to do with talking about community in terms that, whether you mean to or not, and I know you don't, are purely rhetorical and thereby exclusionary to those who don't know what the heck you're talking about. Not that I have any big ideas about how to make this e-mail thing useful--I just think that you all have to be careful about laying down the terms for conversation, and then getting "angry" when someone calls you on them. It's funny, because I did not find Jennifer's posting "abstract" at all. Rather, it is among the most straight forward of most of what I have read on this thing. And

I shall add this, apologizing if it has already been said, for I joined the list late: What is the point of all this talk about community and when will the talk stop and the communializing (word?) begin? I guess that's the problem with virtual--its all talk about the talk about the talk, removed, from EXPERIENCE.

Kristin Prevallet
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 23-FEB-1 994 18:59:06.73

↑ Index

70. Loss Glazier

Gender

Wed 23 Feb 1994

I'm not sure what direction this leads but it occurs to me that Kristin's comment that "Ben can dish it out but not take it" might overlook the basis of Jennifer's disatisfaction, as I see it 'that the holds of abstraction are dominated by men' (paraphrase). Whether this is or is or not true is one of those endlessly debateably points, on which I'm willing to willingly give ground just because I can't see a defining argument in either camp. It's clear that much of technology has been developed by males, I don't think that bears any argument. But is the invoking of "boys" because of use of abstraction an accurate call? I can't enter into this because I don't know but (and it may be unnecessarily tedious to do so) want to suggest that there are always other elements (not under- estimating gender at all) but what about class, ethnicity, geography as poet-entially also influential? Is it relevant that discussions of community lead to a recognition of difference within the "community"? Isn't it far too reductive to draw the line at gender--I mean arent' there all sorts of gradation of experience and social location (including gender, aren't there gradations of "male" experience and "female" experience despite one's biological gender?) that make such divisions incredibly destructive? From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 24-FEB-1 994 01:42:41.25

↑ Index

71. Belle Gironda

community a'gin

Thu 24 Feb 1994

Thanx to Andrew Levy for contextualizing the community discussion in a lrger world. (Post)-apocalyptic tho' his "posts" are.
meanwhile:
I'm happy to have entered the list at this incipient moment when the (I thinK) necessary/requisite activity of community formation is happening.

Inevitablethat in a purely text based environment, "community" must produce itself (identity) textually via some discussion which takes as its subject its subjects (us) & our relations (community--or the hope/dream/image/concept & c. of).
The "signs" seem good when, in this process, exploding Freudian cigars go off, voices who feel themselves somehow silenced speak out, dissenting, a "Dad" (mon Bernstein) chimes in w/ affectionate pronouncements and (as i began w/) a bucket brigade of un-wired wisdom makes its way from Indiana (is that the right M-western territory?) via Amato's transcription to the list reminding "us" (can I say so?) of how lucky we are and the responsibilities implied by fortune

Belle Gironda
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 24-FEB-1 994 01:46:29.46

↑ Index

72. GENE E. HULT
Ah...
Thu 24 Feb 1994

It is rather wonderful to read people talking to each other (even if in anger) rather than making guarded intellectual pronouncements. But what are we all here for? It's a poetics forum, so let's discuss poetry! Anyone have a particular favorite he or she has read lately to share with the rest of us? Anyone feeling particularly brave and want to share one they wrote? Let's get this thing in high, useful gear.

Gene Hult
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 24-FEB-1 994 01:55:25.07

↑ Index

73. Belle Gironda
a'gin
Thu 24 Feb 1994

Oh,
& I meant to say that the point Katie Yates made via Blanchot seems vital in that the "I" /"We" relation ultimately frames all our possibilities for speaking to each other and encompasses (uh, I don't know if that's the word but..) categories (word?) like gender, race, class, which matter but which (seem) automatically reductive by virtue of their (well-meaning) ambitions.

BG
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 24-FEB-1 994 10:34:24.71

↑ Index

74. Patrick Phillips
RE: Institution?
Thu 24 Feb 1994

Doesn't it appear that just when you think you got "community" down, something discombobulates...

Like Kristen, on one hand I feel its too bad that we have to negotiate the notion of community. It's kinda like thinking about thought. When one brings some thing, something particular, into a group, no matter if its a loosely knit group, there is a focal point that in turn defines the group, or community.

On the other, I feel relieved by Jennifer's post. Perhaps the thing brought into the group must then be thrown out for the definition of community to be clarified, changed. I think this is what Jennifer is tending to. That the institution sterilizes the "community," or it acts as a kind of radon, seeping into the house, or in our case, the "shack," and we slowly mutate. Raise the windows, knock down a wall, air it out!

Yet another facet. What happened with Ben's public post of a private tussle should be examined in that light as well; that privately we do negotiate on terms which often sound completely off-key in public; that the time and energy of talking "intimately" is quite different from this odd publicity both in its intention as well as to the attention it is given.

As it turns out, the eaves on this shack accomodate a lot of people. They also accomodate, or produce a lot of apprehension and skepticism, which in turn breeds distrust. That the rain has eased up, or the shack remodelled a bit, allowing a different accomodation, a different form, speaks to a determination and resilience that this forum may have, but that gets lost at times in the particular posts; a loss which can be and is recouped most times without animosity, or acrimony.

In all this I have to say I was a little pissed that when I posted the Diane Ward interview and tried to get something going around her remarkable work there were no takers. That my taking an explicit approach to EXPERIENCE in her work wasn't engaged, or challenged. Couple this with the fact that I'm a "boy" it becomes hard for me to see where in fact the wobble is and to what "you boys" refers. Although I see that the boys club metaphor is not just a metaphor, there are variables, soft edges which are accessible. Just to say that this forum has a form which is ultimately arbitrated only by a very tenuous "we." That all constructs here are provisional. Jennifer has shown this. Thanks

Patrick
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 24-FEB-1 994 16:54:47.08
To:IN%"[redacted]" "Multiple recipients of list POETICS"
CC:
Subj:

↑ Index

75. James Sherry
RE: Institution?
Thu 24 Feb 1994

When we get stuck defining community
We are ignoring the rest we be.
Community for me at least is one logical view of our networking in a specific area of interest -- poetry.

Other components are logical as well like this notion of institution which sends alarms to most but has impact as the sum of our messages coheres.

Physically we are nodes,
and individuals, and poets, and other things which are not all the same : some teachers, some computing professionals, and here we diverge like with gender.

The community cannot define all we are,
but our similar interests in coming together over this server: poetry.
But poetry is not one thing either:
and to define it for net purposes is essential to me.

The form / forum of email and the net define much of what we can do best, read effectively, here and what can be saved for other forms like sonnets, hand written letters, books, phone calls, group discussion, readings...

This form in its email suit is provisional.
I would not attempt full-scale legalistic discussion.
I might want to send an attachment, more carefully worked up on a word processor, but that is another form of the net.
In fact to do so requires a different program than email which is just a carrier.

Not only are these notes mostly provisional,
hardly edited and off the top of our heads,
they are often not sequential, are intersected by multiple other topics on any given session and by well edited attachments like Levy's quotation.

From this perspective the forum for our various missives has a curious impact, since we never know what form will appear inside a message: its contents.
For one thing we have a change in the idea of form and content. Form is forum and contents can be one of several forms.

Also errors are so easy to make that like in our own brains we have to give a lot of room for alternatives.
On a personal level that's forgiveness, on an ideational level the writers' different contexts are critical, on the level of subject we need to discuss these issues of institutions, communities, nodes, persons, subjects, and others as they apply to networking. Otherwise we get one person wanting to have a poetry discussion, another an exchange of sources on issues, another

"what I think of this writer".

And all of these have their place here, although I have said I think that some are effective here and others off putting or even scandalizing, since we are not all the same on the net, simply equal.
And here is where Bernstein's list of rules

Is more vital to me than the subjects of poets, issues, and personal exchanges arising from misunderstanding that we are messaging to equals that are not the same.

Any discussion must begin with recognition of the variety of components.

The net is not only an institution and beginning with any one component risks forefronting it to valorize or criticise which is not the point. Here there is a method to apply.
Yet the application of rules by an individual does raise an issue of polity that can be institutionalized.

It must be questioned before it is institutionalized.
That is why we must be glad to hear from CB about his rules and regs and we should all have input on the subject before we get so far down the road that they have become binding assumptions.

PLEASE READ THOSE RULES AND CHANGE THEM TO SUIT US.
ANYONE WHO WILL NOT CONTRIBUTE WILL SUFFER FROM ALLOWING OTHERS TO MAKE THE DECISIONS.
PLEASE CONSIDER ALL THE COMPONENTS AND EVEN LIST THEM TO AVOID MISSING AN IMPORTANT ONE.

I for one cast a ballot for a clearly stated list of rules governing network management to be published and discussed and within the boundaries of the mechanics put into place with the consent of contributors. Here CBs rules and Ben Friedlander's problem of public and private can be addressed.

Please, Charles simplify and complete your management rules indicating those which are in place and those which are contemplated. I'm not sure I understand or can sort them among all the prose. For those who think this a bad idea because it's not free, we can go back to that discussion, but it's probably not to the point.

Since it's not free now as Ben found and can only get to be so by defining boundaries within which we can be free, publishing will help. For those who think it's not poetry, remember poetic form. We are here defining a form within this forum which I hope I've convinced most is different enough from other forums torequire preconception.

Too many forums I've been in have dissolved because some one overstepped and the group disintegrated from a combination of boredom, anger, guilt, and irrelevance. Which of our problems in other forums can we avoid bringing to this one? 1. list of rules. 2. list of components of the net that are relevant to consider.

JS (provisionally)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 25-FEB-1 994 05:36:00.29

↑ Index

76. susan
(no subject)
Thu 24 Feb 1994

To members of the poetics net:

The discussion of community that I've recently tapped into is interesting, from a mid-Pacific perspective, for what it leaves out--only proving, I suppose, that definitions of community are inevitably context driven, "community games," as it were. In Hawaii, the term "local" is a racial as well as a regional tag; to be "local" here is to be Asian-American, which distinguishes "locals" from native Hawaiians, and haoles (whites). It's possible, though not easy, to be a "local haole," if you grow up here. Increasingly, that definition of "local" enters into local writing through the use of pidgin; Lois-Ann Yamanaka's SATURDAY NIGHT AT THE PAHALA THEATER (Bamboo Ridge Press, 1993) is written exclusively in pidgin (except for a moment of affected standard English, meant to be laughed off).

A couple of weeks ago I went to a reading for the publication of Jessica Hagedorn's fascinating anthology, THE DEATH OF CHARLIE CHAN. The first two readers, Yamanaka and a gay Filipino American writer, Zack Linmarck, read in a language so local (and so infused with particular cultural references) that I had a keen sense of living outside of it (I've been in Hawaii for three and a half years now). And yet I'm reminded of what Charles Bernstein said a few days ago about uncommunities--I feel myself a part of this community precisely because it is one that acknowledges a multitude of contexts; even though I'm not "local" I do have investments in the community. I am both inside and out of the game, especially when I set about "teaching" local literature at UH. My feeling about this discussion group is similar; it strikes me that the community's self-definition will change often, according to the particular contexts of our musings. Perhaps, to follow Gene Hult's comment, we should turn to poems--poems that contain within themselves these shifts of context which are the community as it exists inside poems. It also strikes me as a potentially productive exercise to examine poems that do not seem to welcome us into their community, since that exclusion (gender, class, or race-related) is part and parcel of our definition.

As an aside on pidgin writing: I'm interested in the way in which local writing is (finally) catching on on the mainland. Yamanaka is widely published, as are

Eric Chock and Wing Tek Lum, to say nothing of Cathy Song, though her work isn't generally considered to be local--her audience, as she put it horribly in the pages of MANOA, is the workshop writer she was most jealous of. Garrett Hongo's new anthology THE OPEN BOAT (a strange title for a collection of Asian American poetry--what DOES Stephen Crane have to do with it?) includes several Hawaii writers, and should make them more popular to a larger audience. But, although the use of an exclusive, non-universal language, pidgin, should attract the attention of "Language writers," the poems themselves are relentlessly conservative, more intent on mimesis than on any challenge to it. They buy into notions of "authenticity" that grate on literary critical ears.

In what sense, then, will a discussion group like this one welcome in the "multicultural" literature of places like Hawaii? How do we want to define multiculturalism? We need to keep in mind that "experimental writing" is also a context-driven phenomenon. What is experimental here isn't in Buffalo, and probably vice versa. (Though Hagedorn's anthology puts the Heath in the dust on that score.)

Anyway, I find myself piling on here. I'll sign off for now.

Susan M. Schultz ([redacted])
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 24-FEB-1 994 17:01:25.26

↑ Index

77. GENE E. HULT
RULES
Fri 25 Feb 1994

ALL--

Gotta be rules, gotta be rules.... my only suggestion would be for everyone to drop our competative defenses... yes, we're all (all? don't hesitate to challenge my words in your mouth) writers, we're all adrift on the seas of language, knowledge, learning, yes, we're all human. But, as G.B Trudeau once wrote re: We are the World -- Welcome, and check your egos at the door. Respect is rule #1, perhaps personal honesty rule #2?

Ah, the vultures circle... water, water!

Gene H.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 25-FEB-1 994 21:04:45.85

↑ Index

78. Patrick Phillips

RE: angry boys

Fri 25 Feb 1994

Kristen --

Yesterday I posted something which I hoped would help us to recognize that this space is provisional and the tone of that post was intended to be generous, or open, available. In addition to being projective, it also was reflexive, critical of the institutional form that this space sometimes takes and sometimes this boy's a part of.

I began to think about the "angry boys" post not really dealt with in my agreement in part with your "What is the point of all this talk about community..." and I again focused on tone; not as rhetoric, but as the personal and of a reflection of understanding.

I think it was clear that Jennifer's "institution" letter was not an invective intended to silence, or chastise, or to be critical of a person, but of an institution. I think that the debilitating facets of "the institution," though more insidious, can be compared to a rhetoric intended to chasten, or publicly ridicule. That you chose to air your frustration at Ben publicly, not at the institution, seems to me to ally you with forces of marginalization that you so refute. At least they speak to public frustrations that I don't see comensurate with his private "anger."

This note is not to chasten at all, but to bring into light and into focus the means of our discussions and the motivations behind them. This is not to soften rhetoric either, to marginalize through a modality. I know the tone of this post is self-conscious, but forthright. Thas tone is itself a contingency, provisional and by no means is used to set a tone for our discussion, or for our heated debate. It so often happens that a mode, or a tone sets up a kind of hegemony; but that hegemony by its very existence is necessarily open to challenge, not necessarily is the person open to such a challenge. I just can't help but wonder which was the focus of your quite public ire.

Patrick
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 26-FEB-1 994 21:47:33.15

↑ Index

79. Juliana Spahr

silence, gender, two horses in another world

Sat 26 Feb 1994

Then the water seems to talk and I am Joan of Arc or Jean Arthur hearing voices, I am neither a woman nor a man but an ethereal person leading two horses in another world; where my sex is something I can't recognize, the face of a mandrill, a kind of football, the drama of wind blowing cold gray clouds past the sightless moon, you only see this figure on a screen from the room of the other dream I would have told you like prayers if the rain hadn't made me so pale and winter was my only memory, besides every time I say I dreamed the phone rings and the kind young man replaces the window and seals up the hole above the heaters, it's Triptolemus, pour holy water on his head this morning.
--Bernadette Mayer, %The Desires of Mothers to Please Others in Letters%

Missent letters are always fascinating. The places they end up--the garbage dump peopled with pickers, sifters, and its analog, the mailbox of the virtual community--are places where one wants to be. The space of what goes on underneath the veil of community-talk becomes suddenly exposed. Reading the missent letter one is trespasser and owner of the sacred nature of "communication" and its pal "community." We know we never control our words; this much is obvious. Or what I want to say, is Ben's letter, which showed us how our words and signals to senders betray, and its replies should have opened things up, freed us from the belief that our thought must be clear and level-headed at every moment, not closed them down.

But lets face it--it closed things down. And the opposite of missent, the unsent letter, is just plain unsettling. I have been complaining about this discussion of community to a number of people

(gender: F) over the last couple of weeks. One writes: Are the woman just not hooked up technologically? (I think the answer is no.) Another, hoping to find some angel therein...Feel a bit left off/out of the dis. And another, It is too horrible to talk about on e-mail.

Discomforting or not, the issue of those identity centered social construct cliches (race, class, and gender) have been pointedly absent from the community discussion of community. The definition of community on this list has been as a consequence an uneasy one (after all, these constructs are dominant discussions in our culture, they compose almost every discussion of community. I do not mean to indict those involved in this discussion but rather to point to how rigorous our avoidance of them has been). So Jennifer's response, which I read (although she should correct me if she feels I am softening it in some way) as one that does not attack the continual male presence on the list, attacks the noted absence of gender in the discussion. She notices "invigorated but shut down"; "at least I have dishes"; "the house that shut the door." She wants a "keen eye." This eye she wants from all of us, every gender.

A. L. Nielson came and gave a talk the other day on the social constructions of identity (his concentration: race). This is something that is in vogue in the academy. I like this argument. Race, gender, class, all %are% social constructs. But always I am left wanting the next step. To apply to my experience, I am always trying to escape my gender. I want to be virtual. I want to be believed when I am in various forms of drag. But this argument about the social construct is one that always leaves me wanting. At the same time that part of me wants to celebrate, another part of me tells me to wake up. The word "drag" and "passing" speaks not of our ability to transcend these social structures, but rather that there is an institutionalized name (and thus definition with its limitations) of this transcendence. As we are always filling out forms, we are always checking off boxes. So--What do I do now that I recognize that this thing that I am told that I am during a great part of my day is a construct?; Can I join a self-help group about escaping my construction?; Buy a manual for creating a new one?; Take riding lessons for Bernadette's two horses?

I guess my question is where should this "keen eye" look? And more specifically to Ben, how do you reconfigure, review, whatever, the power, the overwhelming presence, of male discourse on this list?

Juliana Spahr
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 27-FEB-1994 14:36:42.80

↑ Index

80. Patrick Phillips
the purloined
Sun 27 Feb 1994

Spun from Julianna's idea of "missent" letter is that of the "purloined" that too has a margin, but one which is much more motivated, less mis-taken; the purloined preceeds, "creates" the unsent letter. I just wonder what sets up this area of theft, of what goes unwritten, and how unsettling it is, or where, as some kind of unmeasurable quanta of experience, this unsettling goes on in some kind of purloined sphere.

So there is the purloined experience that goes unquantified.

But we know who is stolen and who steals.

Yet, our aesthetic mix ellides the search and the letter sometimes to the point that we aren't sure who's the inspecter and who's the theif.

We often seem to remain in the hiatus of this discovery. This hiatus resembles the virtual, as some "secret drawer." But we all know that there is a "certain amount of bulk-of space-to be accounted for in every cabinet." It's purely physical.

"But could not the cavity be detected by sounding?"

I'm not sure how we "sound" such spaces without attributing.....

This is where characteristics come in, gender, the physiognomy of "this space," the "tone" of the object sounded, the "institution" of discovery.

"I presume you looked into the mirrors, between the boards and the plates, and you probed the beds and the bedclothes...You include[d] the "grounds" of the houses?"

In some ways I wish to remain stolen, but I steal which makes that somewhat impossible. Perhaps I'll never apprehend my thief, but I will "examine [him] to better purpose in the dark." There too lies the unseen and the unsent.

Patrick
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 27-FEB-1 994 16:33:38.13

↑ Index

81. Martin Spinelli

sounding))))))))

Sun 27 Feb 1994

Being a tender sort, I dwelt for hours over what I read as Charles' dissatisfaction at what he sees and doesn't see here... and more hours still over Gene's suggestion that we "check our egos at the door." But in the end I only found myself questioning their (very different) expectations.

In Hans Enzensberger's "Constituents of a theory of the media" (_NLR_ #64) I found these same anxieties over "response".

the utopia in Enzensberger's article is made possible through "mass participation in the social and socialized productive process." the Vision is this: everyone a participant. that is a participation in the media -- in its production. he says at once that media can produce the Social and production can control the media.

more interestingly for us Enze says the social power is in response. response is power shutting down response is domination.

in spite of the optimistic rhetoric, Enze himself gives us examples of media's failed potential (which he never sufficiently recuperates). in the hands of his "masses" short wave radio is pathetically impotent, badly imitating bad examples form commercial radio. the goal of his idealized liberated media is "mobilization" (vague throughout). whatever it is, radio hams don't have it. they are isolated and remain so. somehow mobilization for Eze must be physical. an intellectual mobilization, a mobilization of response seems possible both on radio and on the Net. Community needs dialog.

the Net, the medium with the potential for response, can't equal Eze's imagination. initially and in places there is a vocalization in unison at places if not an "organization" or "mobilization". but looking further it is lacking: there are only prolific and pervasive fragments, all their own centers or all speaking equally comfortably from the margins. can a greater Social exist without interaction tween the fragms, without impetus towards the improvement of the Whole? (yet there is this impetus around the hardware -- everyone wants to improve the medium itself.)

Where is the revolution?

there is the opportunity to exercise power -- to say something. like a baudrillard essay nothing is heard before [EOB] or after the last footnote. containment. what would the virtual revolution look like? erev? control cannot be taken of anything on the Inside -- for the first time the Inside is the place bereft of power and imagination, bereft of agency with the simulation of agency.... curiously supervised scrutinized
Clippered
surreptitiously ceansuored evaluated categorized and fast
(it posits an new class.sys: the techobourgeoisie over the infobourgeoisie.)

again Eze: media's power is its mobilization of the masses. but real mobilization coming from media would presume at most three channels (three access points, three meanings all referringtoeachother). mobilization is an anomaly on the Net because of the infinity of channels and the infinity of messages...is it enough to be united around a medium? to have a vested interest in the medium, to be dependent on it? there is a kind of mobilization around this but it can only ever be mustered _in support_ of the medium. with an infinity of channnels, consumption and production don't just get blurred. production becomes consumption. supporting a right to production is only like good advertizing... teaching us we're not really happy. we didn't know how unhappy we were. responding erodes. the mic is too close to the amp.

feedback... the repetition of what has already been transmitted fading and distorted but essentially the same as what has already been said. the difference between feedback and response is the difference between a system of simulations and asystem of meaning? Badrill is great on this in his "The Masses": public opinion polls dictate the limits of public experience.

in his media strategy which seeks to end isolation (read "alienation") COMMUNITY IS MANDATORY

Eze is aware that a sys in which everyone produces/expresses will yield only noise. noise which does not hold one's interest like nonsense but is only irritating -- distressing. here he says that the masses must be taught to be better producers if the utopian mobilization is to be realized. in this way they could record their daily experiences and learn from them. again organization is liberating not the tech that provides it.

on the net you can respond to the message, and only indirectly, inadvertently about the medium. you use the Net yet you cannot have a dialog with the Net.

there is a danger when the link between community and medium becomes too perfect (seemless, transparent as tech pretends it can make it) as obvious intrusions of the media begin to disappear more completely the less there will be to say the connection is the only viable issue, source and site of discourse. as it evaporates so must communication.

the resistance of the medium, the time spent in the friction of translation/communication allows for rumination, for contemplation, for thought (even if it is only an examination of its deployment). when this space disappears all we will be able to do is sit and stare.

the eze short term solution: authors and producers must work as agents for the masses and only when the masses learn to cut tape and mix music can the producer "lose himself". This is how he ultimately solves the noise problem.

as media are currently constituted (one-directionally), response is anti-media. the ideal response that Eze is after must go beyond the limits he sets for it. it must be outside like spray paint on the monitor. Badrill claims there exists "a possible subversion of the code of the media [in the] possibility of alternative speech and a radical reciprocity of symbolic exchange."

exchange is the radical thing... but exchange of what... a change must happen in the exchange -- reworking it into what is an anti-aesthetic -- (anti- to the aesthetic of the professional media and the OED) -- upset the hegemony, don't believe theauthorityandtwsit its structure with implied orthography. Signify without rules. ignore Expectations.

the Net is not often used in the way say Bill or Ben or Jonathan (Howe, Freidlander, Fernandez, three that came first to mind) use language in their poetry. the materiality of the Net
  is not often tinkered
  with --thought about -- addressed as something other than a transparent
  medium of representing (thought or something).
the hegemony of these lingos

is not exposed or disrupted
by toying with, or even showing, the structure. it is believed in. we must lose/loose our faith.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 28-FEB-1 994 12:17:02.62

↑ Index

82. cynthia kimball two horses
Mon 28 Feb 1994

Ghost that I am--or is ghosting an act, so I
"ghost" but AM not a ghost--I read these messages invisibly, until now silently. I FEEL invisible and safe that way, to be perfectly honest. I'm scared right now writing, don't even know if this post will post, don't want to expose my silence my silent reading presence. Female that I am--or is female-ing an act, so that I can "check my gender at the door" (no double meaning intended), be a ghost pass judgment and take sides and change my mind with every new side there is to take without exposing the vulnerable new sprouts of opinions to the frost while in the process of sprouting them....Is my silence because I'm female and feel left out or am I leaving myself out because I'm female or am I a temporarily ungendered ghost because I haven't claimed my USERID in front of anyone yet for whatever fear-full reasons.
I could choose a male pseudonym that would protect my silence a little longer. I thought about it. Anyway Im going back into the ether for a while.
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 28-FEB-1 994 21:01:40.22

↑ Index

83. Steve Evans
Repair Work
Mon 28 Feb 1994

In my experience as a young recruit from the post-no-fault-divorce-secretarial-working-class into the technobourgeoisie...

But can a sentence really begin that way?

I think a keen eye should be kept, as Charles has already indicated, on the way our apparently elective affinities are underpinned by selective in- stitutions. Cross out that "s" and the drainage pipe starts pumping inertial goo (mystification) into the discursive stream... We all go belly up.

The question of how to generate maximum democracy in an institution that is fundamentally anti-democratic obviously cannot be suspended until "the others" arrive. Should we then call an constituent assembly, as James Sherry recommends? Or would people on this list see in that just another act of mystification?

The question of "how universal is the university" (to quote an analogous debate, cf. transition a few volumes back) is obviously not very. But how convert that answer into a political project if not on the basis of a concept of real universality?

Education is a generalizable interest; those of us who write, publish, teach, read, get all upset about, and sacrifice our sanity to, poetic practice are also sometimes acting so as to generalize an interest in poetry. Sometimes we're just making moves on one another for the sake of maximizing our own symbolic capital. No amount of individual saintliness will purify our acts of formation of this element (saints actually understand symbolic capital better than most sinners do), but rigorous and humorous techniques of de- flation are a resource we should never forget to renew and use.

I think the theoreticians of ecstatic communication are of extremely limited relevance to our situation here. However inappropriate the model of communicative action advanced by Jurgen Habermas may be when it comes to thinking through our aesthetics, a sublimity-soaked aesthetics-pretending-to-be-politics is an even worse cognitive liability when it comes to thinking through the politics of this for(u)m.

Nomads with newtons = monads with modems?

I think we're in a situation where un-coerced agreement on how to proceed is possible. I think we've done very little so far to identify and thematize resources and commitments that are shared and that might come in handy when a little repair work is necessary...

Finally, because Pierre Joris and Tom Mandel's joint-post a while ago brought up the issue of "outcomes" as something "communities" usually have at their disposal for sanctioning the unruly, and because we have been trafficking in negative outcomes for long enough, I would like to tick down the list of outcomes experienced by this participant at least as positive.

Because of this list, I have either read or re-read: Diane Ward's Imaginary Movie, Reznikoff's Testimony, Erica Hunt's Notes for an Oppositional Poetics, Bernstein's Reznikoff's Nearness, Susan Stewart's article in Profession 93, to mention just the ones I can remember here at work. Because of this list, and specifically the discussion of our failure to address gender until recently, I had an alternate context in which to place the gender politics of the Kootenay School Writers who just passed through Provi- dence to our great delight last week. Likewise, when Susan Stewart gives a lecture tomorrow on Lyric History I'll know a context in which what she says is apparently already known... I could go on...

This list opens a dimension within social space. It is not a social space unto itself (I would feel sad for anyone who found it so). Every contradiction that governs our social order will be visible at one time or another here in this dimension. That should not surprise us. That should not shut us down. At the minimum, the fact that postings do not cancel one another out--as monologues in real time conversations and seminars and public meetings do-- should be recognized and explored. The low opinion of how things are going so far (in the sent, the unsent, and the missent postings) reminds me a lot of the "mood" that kept threatening to congeal at the New Coast festival last spring in Buffalo. Now I know that complaint and gossip are vital signs ("that's not a cross look it's a sign of life") that something is happening. I also know that most complaints are grounded: things are that bad. But given the relative scarcity of occasions when something can actually be done about what's bad, it seems almost lazy to keep on in those modes.

A thought, like any other relationship, isn't real until you risk it.

Steve
From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 28-FEB-1 994 21:16:05.16

↑ Index

84. Hans-Joachim Rieke

community, gender

Mon 28 Feb 1994

I wanted to avoid raising the gender question, as the effect usually is, that women suddenly speak up, but are at the same time cornered, labelled, hemed

in by the topic. Women talking/writing only to write about gender. Personally I don't feel excluded by the jargon of the discussions. Many of the books that are being talked about are not available, or not immedeately so, for me, so I am content to "listen", read, and I don't feel like a peeping Tom for it. Not all of what is being discussed is interesting anyway, and I need a longer time forming my own ideas about e-mail effects on discourse, at the reading Flusser and Bolz and others on the topic. A lot of what is going on in this list seems the public continuation of private discourse of e-mailing, so that it is often difficult to cross the gaps. What I do not quite understand though is, if I personally address people, asking simply for information, that I didn't get an answer more than once - gender unrelated by the way. This is more than rudeness, it has to do with community. I was a little surprised anyway how little the various investigations of the term community were touched by a Foucauldian understanding of how discourse funtions; if I understand him rightly, community is not only made by the collective of all speech acts, the absent presence of all participants, but equally so by all speech acts that are silenced, excluded, treated as "gibberish", foolishness, etc. Only a "huh? for a critical letter by Arcadii is not much worry indeed. Finally I find amusing, the indignation (read emotional outburst) the "woman speak" (?) created by the private/public letter...

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

March 1994

17 messages · Mon 7 Mar 1994 – Sat 26 Mar 1994

March 1994 lets the theoretical fever of February break, and the list turns, gratefully, to place — to where each of its voices happens to be standing while it types. Joe Amato opens the month looking out the window of a spare bedroom in Illinois and finding an urban landscape that answers nothing in the woodsy Syracuse of his childhood; his subject-line, coeval with, becomes the month's quiet keyword. What moves him, he writes, is “a sense of place, and corresponding dislocations” — nostalgia refused, geography kept.

The theme travels. From Germany, Hans-Joachim Rieke writes in, hungry for reading on hyperreality and for news of an American poetry he can only reach at a distance, and the list obliges with its habitual generosity of lists and addresses. Susan Schultz sends down from Hawai'i a hard, funny pidgin dialogue about who counts as local and who as haole, adolescence and multiculturalism turned over without mercy. Distance, in March, is not an obstacle to the conversation; distance is the conversation's subject.

Martin Spinelli, still smarting a little from February's error-framed exchange, extends the argument about mediation into a meditation on the radio ham — the solitary broadcaster flinging signal into the dark and receiving, mostly, silence back. Whatever community the airwaves promise, he decides, the operators “are isolated and remain so”. It is a shrewd thing to say on a mailing list, which is after all only a more sociable species of the same wireless loneliness.

A slighter month than the one before it, and a more human one — the poets comparing windows, trading the names of books, locating themselves on the map before they resume locating themselves in argument. I have set each letter forward under its author's name, the private numbers and addresses returned to the dark, so that what remains is the talk itself, and the several distances it had to cross to arrive.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 17 in all.

WRITERS

Amato, Joe 1
Bernstein, Charles 10, 14
CHRISTOPH, FUNKHOUSER 2
Drake, Robert 4, 13
Evans, Steve 9
Prevallet, Kristen 16
Rieke, Hans-Joachim 3, 12, 17
Schultz, Susan 5
Sherry, James 6
Spinelli, Martin 7, 8
Susan 11, 15

NAMES MENTIONED

Balaz, Joe 5, 9, 11
Benjamin, Walter 3
Berlin, Irving 3, 12
Bernstein, Emma 17
Bronk, Bill 14
Bush, George 11
Celan, Paul 17
Creeley, Robert 16
Derrida, Jacques 3
Duncan, Robert 14
Feld, Ross 14
Finkelstein, Norman 14
France, Peter 3
Fredman, Stephen 14
Heller, Michael 14
Heller, Mike 14
Lacan, Jacques 3
Livingston, Reb 4
Mandel, Charlotte 16
Mandel, Tom 9
Milton, John 11
Olson, Charles 16
Olson, Kirby 16
Oppen, George 9, 14, 16
Pacific, Asian 11
Palmer, Michael 14
Prevallet, Kristin 4, 16
Rehm, Pam 4
Ridge, Cedar 11
Robertson, Lisa 2
Spahr, Juliana 4
Stevens, Wallace 14
Stewart, Jon 2
Strang, Brian 2
Texas, Irving 11
Thomas, Dylan 17
Wallace, Mark 4
Wallace, Nicole 14
Wilson, Rob 5
Yamanaka, Ann 9, 11

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 11
Aesthetics 7
Archives and libraries 14
Asian American poetry 11
Censorship 11
Cities 1
Conferences and festivals 11, 14
Dada 17
Dreams 12
Experimental poetry 17
Film 1, 9
Grants and funding 11
Hermeneutics 3
Identity politics 5
Little magazines 14
Lyric poetry 14
Materiality of the text 7
Memory 1
MFA programs 14
Mourning and loss 11
Multiculturalism 5
Music and poetry 1, 7
Nationalism 1
Nature 1
Performance and the poetry reading 14
Philosophy 3, 14
Place and region 1, 5
Poetics 2, 4, 7
Race and poetry 5
Religion and the sacred 1, 9, 16
Reviewing and criticism 5, 13
Small press publishing 11
Sonnet 5
The academy 3, 11, 14
The Holocaust 17
The listserv 3, 13, 17
Translation 1, 7, 12, 13, 17

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 17 in all.

7 MAR 1994
1. Joe Amato — coeval with...
2. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH — Re: what they talked excitedly about
3. Hans-Joachim Rieke — media theory
4. Robert Drake — Re: what they talked excitedly about

8 MAR 1994
5. susan schultz — (no subject)

9 MAR 1994
6. James Sherry — Re: putative ms

11 MAR 1994
7. Martin Spinelli — last poetics post
8. Martin Spinelli — oops

12 MAR 1994
9. steve evans — coeval with...

15 MAR 1994
10. Charles Bernstein — it's ascii but is is art or "Oubliez .Gif"
11. susan — Re: coeval with...

18 MAR 1994
12. Hans-Joachim Rieke — German poetry
13. Robert Drake — french poetry in translation: reviewer wanted

19 MAR 1994
14. Charles Bernstein — Today at Notre Dame

21 MAR 1994
15. susan — Re: German poetry
16. Kristen Prevallet — spirit world=numerous world

26 MAR 1994
17. Hans-Joachim Rieke — Re: German poetry

1. Joe Amato
coeval with...
Mon 7 Mar 1994

---

i must admit to being taken by a sense of place, and corresponding dislocations...

for me, whatever creative possibilites emerge from disruptions in place move me to thresholds---cognitive, emotional---that are often painful... in part because place for me IS the timing of space, a spacing in time replete with boundaries...

when i look out my window (in the spare bdrm. of my apt. where i've located my mac) i see an urban landscape that bears little resemblance to the suburban, woodsy, fifties territories of my childhood... nostalgia here is not the point---the point is that i feel a spiritual resonance with the geographies of central and upstate new york, while at the same time i have no intention of residing again in the city of my birth (syracuse, the salt city)... ambivalence more polyvalence---it's a mixture of feelings, longings, desperations, impulses---in the blood, as it were...

hence looking into this window is yet looking out another, and vice-versa... "coeval with" your various readings of this post---but with a few things more, perhaps...

the issue has to do with regionalisms as well as (inter)nationalisms... i'm hearing, in the background (someplace) lennon's "imagine," a song from my late teens, and i'm wondering what sort of cosmopolitan it is who doesn't identify with such identities ---which is NOT to say the lyrics... which, yes, translate into overarching sociopolitical exigencies...

fifty miles south of me the land flattens out like a drainboard... i spent a couple of lonely years in those directions, dealing with the death of my folks... but my solitudes where marked, thankfully, by having made a few best friends...

down that way, far as the (untrained) i can see [sorry] one generally witnesses endless orthogonal acres of single-crop farming---corn, or soybeans... this, for example and for me, is most definitely NOT nature... this latter may be problematic everywhere today, but whatever else it is, i don't quite identify it with non-diversity...

i have an eye for hill and dale and that sorta thing... variations against the Same, and in pixeled terms as well... but i'll probably mself end up someplace in the suburbs, or fringe burbs... i'm hoping it won't be entirely too mediocre, mall-ish... but there's this thing about having the bucks, yknow, to move, and where---and i'd like a little tomato patch before i'm too much older...

i'm used to small pockets of italian ethinicity (being 'second generation' on my dad's (sicilian) side) and little euro-pockets as well (being 'first generation' on my mom's side)... chi-town does this for me at times, but the midwest, otherwise, rarely does... hence i'm east in many ways... my neuroses operating on the surfaces, the silent machismo of the midwest grates on me at times... and such regional, even moody judgments follow from feelings born of having found correspondences between my convictions, as i live them out, and my ongoing, provisional understanding---nothing arbitrary here, or innocent, or necessarily nice...

and yet i carry around a southwestern landscape someplace in my jeans [sorry again], a true-blue Western mythology probably as much a consequence of loving, in my child-adulthood, westerns (cinema and tv) as a function of more legislated attempts to establish an american ethos...

if there is yet an argument to be made in such terms... saturated though it might be with hollywood and jiffypop, my memory, altering, is something i live with and through...

if 'i don't know where i stand,' exactly, i'm damn well gonna have to be standing someplace, metaphysically speaking... looking out toward the shifting horizon, trying to figure the when's and where's of things as i find them...

joe

↑ Index

2. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH

Re: what they talked excitedly about

Mon 7 Mar 1994

Steve--hello--

Thanks for the Kootenay update--it seems to have sparked at least one thread, & hopefully we ta'wil our way back to some of those other themes later. After checking back through The L Robertson/C Stewart/ C Strang entry in the oblek "Subject & Position" section & reading "Wrenched history is our machine's frontier" figured they'd bring some issue or another pertinent to our talk here & yes --

Can somebody post a citation for _The Poetics of Criticism_?

mr ltr funk

↑ Index

3. Hans-Joachim Rieke media theory
Mon 7 Mar 1994

As somebody asked for further information about Bolz/Flusser, I'll enter this part of my answer to the list: Vilem Flusser is native of Prague then lived in South America for a long time teaching media theory, and finally in the south of France. He died recently and is being read more and more in Germany. I only know German titles:UEBER SCHRIFT (ON SCRIPTURE); LOB DER OBERFLCHLICHKEIT (PRAISE OF SUPERFICIALITY/ SURFACES); he has written more though; Norbert Bolz is a strange guy, supposedly something of a genius, taught philosophy at the Free University Berlin, and is now professor at the institute for cultural and media studies at Essen. He started writing about Benjamin, taught Derrida and Lacan, Kant, Hegel and arrived at media theory. Argues that philosophy necessarily comes to an end, end of hermeneutics, leads to media theory... has written proliferously - in German AM ENDE DER GUTENBERG GALAXIS; PHILOSOPHIE NACH IHREM ENDE are the most recent books. I'm grateful for any "Literaturtips" on "hyperreality"

↑ Index

4. Robert Drake
Re: what they talked excitedly about
Mon 7 Mar 1994

> Can somebody post a citation for _The Poetics of Criticism_?

A Poetics of Criticism
Juliana Spahr, Mark Wallace, Kristin Prevallet, Pam Rehm, eds.
1994

Leave Books
57 Livingston St.
Buffalo NY 14213

ISBN 0-922668-11-6

bonus question: which 2 editors are not subscribed to this list?

↑ Index

5. susan schultz
(no subject)
Tue 8 Mar 1994

To members of the net:

More thoughts on identity politics (and I'm intrigued by the slow-starting discussion of Canadian identity, which I gather is English-speaking Cana- dian). The similarity of languages poses problems that are easily (perhaps too easily) deflected onto language politics here in Hawaii (where, yes, the weather today is gorgeous, since our rainy season ended recently). Here's an example of a poem that distinguishes between the mainland US and Hawaii, by Joe Balaz:

Eh, howzit brah,
I heard you goin mainland, eh?
    No, I goin to the continent.
Wat? I taught you goin San Jose for visit your bradda?
    Dats right.
Den you going mainland brah!
    No, I goin to da continent.
What you mean continent brah?!
Dah mainland is dah mainland,
dats where you going, eh?!
    Eh, like I told you,
    dats da continent-- Hawai'i is da mainland to me.

(Lots of missing italics that I don't know how to do in email-speak.) My colleague, Rob Wilson, sets this poem and others in the context of a local resistence to global incursions in his forthcoming book out of Duke. But what's interesting to me at this moment is the local resistence to other definitions of local, which comes out so well in Lois-Ann Yamanaka's work, which is being received well on the "mainland" (or continent), but is getting flak here for perpetuating racist stereotypes, of which there are hundreds on this island of a myriad of ethnic groups. One of her adolescent girl speakers appears in a poem called "Kala Gave Me Anykine Advice Especially About Filipinos When I Moved to Pahala." Another attacks Japanese teachers (most local public school teachers are Japanese-American):

So what if the teacher look at us.
Just another stupid Jap. You eva wen' notice that every teacher we had since elementry days was one lady Jap?
Eh, what you trying for say to me?
I ain't one fuckin' Jap like them.
Their eyes mo slant than mine and yeah,
I one Jap, but not that kine . . .

So much for adolescent multiculturalism!

The new TV show, BYRDS of PARADISE, though its concept is lame, and the acting shallow, tries to do a good job of presenting a local view of Hawaii's problems. In fact, they presented just about all of them in the first 10 minutes of the pilot show.

Of islands: John Figueroa, a West Indian poet and critic, gave a talk here last week in which he showed how Derek Walcott's early work WAS local, both in its sense of place and in its switching of languages according to context. A good view of Walcott not as a postcolonial with a yen for the colonial, but a poet of his place, which includes the British influence, but also creole (English and French). His text was one of the sonnets from "Tales of Islands," in Walcott's earliest "Selected Poems." It starts out: "Poopa da fete!"

Best wishes from paradise!

Susan Schultz

↑ Index

6. James Sherry

Re: putative ms

Wed 9 Mar 1994

Susan: Excellent notes on place, but how to include Beaudelaire's idea of place as a cipher for self, if by poetry we say one thing and mean also something else.

And also Charles said you think I have an unanswered ms of yours which I don't and if I did why wouldn't you ask me for it instead of Charles. James Sherry

↑ Index

7. Martin Spinelli

last poetics post

Fri 11 Mar 1994

From: UBVMS::V139HLA3 27-FEB-1994 16:01:10.11
To: CHARLES
CC: V139HLA3
Subj: RESPONSE response

Hans Enzensberger's "Constituents of a theory of the media"

the utopia in Enzensberger's article is made possible through "mass participation in the social and socialized productive process." the Vision is this: everyone a participant. that is a participation in the media -- in its production. he says at once that media can produce the Social and production can control the media.

more interestingly for us Enze says the social power is in response. response is power shutting down response is domination.

in spite of the optimistic rhetoric, Enze himself gives us examples of media's failed potential (which he never sufficiently recuperates). in the hands of his "masses" short wave radio is pathetically impotent, badly imitating bad examples form commercial radio. the goal of his idealized liberated media is "mobilization" (vague throughout). whatever it is, radio hams don't have it. they are isolated and remain so. somehow mobilization for Eze must be physical. an intellectual mobilization, a mobilization of response seems possible both on radio and on the Net. Community needs dialog.

the Net, the medium with the potential for response, can't equal Eze's imagination. initially and in places there is a vocalization in unison at places if not an "organization" or "mobilization". but looking further it is lacking: there are only prolific and pervasive fragments, all their own centers or all speaking equally comfortably from the margins. can a greater Social exist without interaction tween the fragms, without impetus towards the improvement of the Whole? (yet there is this impetus around the hardware -- everyone wants to improve the medium itself.)

Where is the revolution?

there is the opportunity to exercise power -- to say something. like a baudrillard essay nothing is heard before [EOB] or after the last footnote. containment. what would the virtual revolution look like? erev? control cannot be taken of anything on the Inside -- for the first time the Inside is the place bereft of power and imagination, bereft of agency with the simulation of agency.... curiously supervised
scrutinized
Clippered
surreptitiously ceansuored
evaluated

categorized
and fast
(it posits an new class.sys: the techobourgeoisie over the infobourgeoisie.)

again Eze: media's power is its mobilization of the masses. but real mobilization coming from media would presume at most three channels (three access points, three meanings all referringtoeachother). mobilization is an anomaly on the Net because of the infinity of channels and the infinity of messages...is it enough to be united around a medium? to have a vested interest in the medium, to be dependent on it? there is a kind of mobilization around this but it can only ever be mustered _in support_ of the medium. with an infinity of channnels, consumption and production don't just get blurred. production becomes consumption. supporting a right to production is only like good advertizing... teaching us we're not really happy. we didn't know how unhappy we were. responding erodes. the mic is too close to the amp.

feedback... the repetition of what has already been transmitted fading and distorted but essentially the same as what has already been said. the difference between feedback and response is the difference between a system of simulations and asystem of meaning? Badrill is great on this in his "The Masses": public opinion polls dictate the limits of public experience.

in his media strategy which seeks to end isolation (read "alienation") COMMUNITY IS MANDATORY

Eze is aware that a sys in which everyone produces/expresses will yield only noise. noise which does not hold one's interest like nonsense but is only irritating -- distressing. here he says that the masses must be taught to be better producers if the utopian mobilization is to be realized. in this way they could record their daily experiences and learn from them. again organization is liberating not the tech that provides it.

on the net you can respond to the message, and only indirectly, inadvertently about the medium. you use the Net yet you cannot have a dialog with the Net.

there is a danger when the link between community and medium becomes too perfect (seemless, transparent as tech pretends it can make it) as obvious intrusions of the media begin to disappear more completely the less there will be to say the connection is the only viable issue, source and site of discourse. as it evaporates so must communication.

the resistance of the medium, the time spent in the friction of translation/communication allows for rumination, for contemplation, for thought (even if it is only an examination of its deployment). when this space disappears all we will be able to do is sit and stare.

the eze short term solution: authors and producers must work as agents for the masses and only when the masses learn to cut tape and mix music can the producer "lose himself". This is how he ultimately solves the noise problem.

as media are currently constituted (one-directionally), response is anti-media. the ideal response that Eze is after must go beyond the limits he sets for it. it must be outside like spray paint on the monitor. Badrill claims there exists "a possible subversion of the code of the media [in the] possibility of alternative speech and a radical reciprocity of symbolic exchange."

exchange is the radical thing... but exchange of what... a change must happen in the exchange -- reworking it into what is an anti-aesthetic -- (anti- to the aesthetic of the professional media and the OED) -- upset the hegemony, don't believe theauthorityandtwsit its structure with implied orthography. Signify without rules. ignore Expectations.

the Net is not often used in the way say Bill or Ben or Jonathan (Howe, Freidlander, Fernandez, three that came first to mind) use language in their poetry. the

materiality of the Net
is not often tinkered
with --thought about -- addressed as something other than a transparent
medium of representing (thought or something).
the hegemony of these lingos
is not exposed or disrupted
by toying with, or even showing, the structure. it
is believed in. we must lose/loose our faith.

↑ Index

8. Martin Spinelli

oops

Fri 11 Mar 1994

---

sorry for the accidental repost

ms

↑ Index

9. steve evans

coeval with...

Sat 12 Mar 1994

The lull in new messages is not, I suppose, necessarily something to fret over. In the interval, I find myself mulling over posting that are now several days old. I'd like to pose a question or two to Susan Schultz and Tom Mandel, with apologies to anyone who thinks I'm forcing us back over ground already covered....

First, it would interest me if Susan Schultz could supplement the discussion of poets such as Joe Balaz and Louis-Ann Yamanaka with a word or two about the way acces to publication is structured in Hawaii: are the conflicting definitions of "locality" played out in terms of publication sites as well as in subject-matter? Since print mediates and seems always to slip from "local" sites, I am curious as to how these writers conceive of and perhaps work to contain this inevitable generalization.

Then there are several questions I'd like to ask Tom Mandel. Tom writes (7 Mar 1994): "An identification of the persons and places we see is basic to survival, isn't it?" The rest of his post abbreviates this "identification of" with a series of somewhat vague "it"s.

It was my impression that we were discussing a slightly different question, namely what are the bases of identifications with (a territory, its "populace"). And related to this, can such identifications withstand de-naturalization.... Is there a "we" that could convene itself without naturalizing its conventions, without pre-deciding the criteria for answering the question "who is of us, and who is not"? The suggestion in Tom's post is that to proceed with this question requires unreflexive "mental privilege." Am I interpreting that correctly?

I'd be interested in Tom's own gloss of Hugh of St. Victor's maxim. To my ears, "that one is perfect to whom the whole world is exile" registers as Christian dogma. But then I am unfamiliar with Hugh....

Finally, on 5 March, Tom claimed that Oppen was pondering "how to live in a spirit world (and that one is the "numerous" world) when one is ineluctable [sic] alone and confronted w/ it at all times. But you [Joel] know all that."

I initially let the "you know all that" mislead me into thinking I did. But upon reflection, I wonder if Tom would expand on this spirit world=numerous world equation. My own, never rigorously examined, take on the numerous has always seen it in the context of a decentralization of value regimes, partly the consequence of social and political shifts that we might, if speaking in shorthand, indicate with such words/events as global decolonization and national (U.S.) desegregation. The historical, then, has stood in my thinking just where Tom would apparently put "the spiritual."

What I'd be interested in is a definition (however provisional) of the "spirit world" that is also the "numerous" one in Tom's reading of Oppen.

Since I happened to watch Jim Jarmusch's _Night on Earth_ a few days ago, I find myself thinking also of his intentionally slight but insightful depictions of transitory bonds invented against the grain of what's "plausible" in an (international) social order still effectively structured by essentialist principles. But then, the film isn't as top-heavy as that sentence makes it sound.

Hoping to find that there are still people out (t)here.

Steve Evans

↑ Index

10. Charles Bernstein

it's ascii but is is art or "Oubliez .Gif"

Tue 15 Mar 1994

A friend passed this on to me, clipped (if that's the word) from the alt.ascii-art newsgroup.

From: [redacted] (Kaisar Neron) Organization: The House Of Hades

```
*****************************************************************************

                                  _oI<LIKE>=vo__
                                ?/$="'"  """^SATAN$~\
                              .&?/'             `""$$,
                             ,/?/'       /-"^\.   .-=~\T,
                            ,/?/'        /SATAN|  |<MY- ,??
                           ./?/'         `\?IS#'  `$?FRIENDi\.
                           ,*??            `"       "'' `b'\$$&&\.
                 _         ,Td'                        `&:`H' "&7,
.__
                / \        H||            .                `*\H,
`&$$S:7|
                | |        M|,         ,--&|\                `&?b
"":://'
              _ | | _      H|L         ``'"H?b                ,-`?\
,&&'
             /|_/ _/|\     `L9,           `H`&,              |?:!||
,P&
            /||       ||\     ??H,           |L *b.,'"\          :$:&
H]'
            |||       |||    ??*b.           9.  `\\:(|     .,/$6d'  |\T
           ///        \\\\   ,To?&b.          \(\:-.-S:-~=-"'',P     MJ'
          `\?*b       ?&&\.  d\|<_ `\o_       `&&M\:SATAN>\IS,&'    |LT
           `\?\\      ``\?\^I/HATE@:~:$=v\.    `$k<MY&PAL@%#J'     HJ'
             `\?\.       `\b/$KIDS!-?&<?::P\\    `"^-^-?b=Sd'     |\T _o~=~$&$>==v\.??\,         `\d `\$$'9P'I-LOVE=SATAN\/$$~?$\     ,R/
/$?~^'"""""`"\&&< ?b              "`~$P:c: /v==v,#::?<<&:'T|   d$/'
[|:.            ""=o/&.               ,P    o&Z'`'.##| |MH\|| ,$$'
`=:$H&=\.           `"b?b.            .&'    96*.-v.:?/`\==$&?$&*'
    `^$?\.          `&\\          ,P       ?~-~'      |$$S>'
       `\7b          ,T/&&\.      d?                    |T'
        \/b         .&J'  `\>     d'                     T,
         &`L        /||          ?|                     ?,
```

```
          ||9       J\T           H                        ?,
           H||     ||/          ||                       9,
           ||M     PJ'           ||                       `H
           bT,   ||T            ||                       ||
            T/L   H||            `b                          M
             &T,  M|              9,                         9
             `L9, M|              `&.                         |
              `?*,9||             `b                        d
               `\?(|H.            `b                        ?b
                `\ `&.            `\.                     J|b
                  `\o/\.           `&.                    ,P 9/L
                     9:&.            `9\                  ??  `H9.
                      *?9\            `b               .&'    |/|
                       `|`\.          `L             ./'      `|H
                       d\/qZbo.           M          .,='        ,|T
                 ./~&$$?=??/' `"=H$|          H _  _   .o=''          J\|
                ,*/''  `\?        `'        PP(_)(_)  PL              ,$P
               ,Td                        ,$$'  ||   ?|M           ,$/
               J||                      ,$?/    ||   M||         ?$/
               M||         |>\.     ._,~9$''          T||        d'M.
               9`|         `Hi:R&:&&6&="'            ./$J|       `^"\Z\.
               ||M          `=Z\:""                 H|T"            `&H&>v_
                bT,     ..   v,?|\                  M||
.:Z|&\.
                ||H  _DEATH~>TO9H|                  `?*\             ?$`#'H
                 9ALL|1KIDS*  .$/                  `bZ&\       ,o&KILL&/'
                  \?$.:?ooo/"""'                   `$$b_   |\MAIM:./' `"""'  `'                       `~?&qDESTROY#/' "^~DIE/"
```

↑ Index

11. susan

Re: coeval with...

Tue 15 Mar 1994

To Steve Evans and all:

In answer to Steve's question about publishing in Hawaii and its relation- ship to locality. There are a lot of small presses here, that come and go with the financial and emotional tides. The most sturdy and influential one is Bamboo Ridge, which published Lois-Ann Yamanaka's recent book, and has by now sold over 3000 (I kid you not) copies here and on the mainland. Joe Balaz has his own press, I believe. While Bamboo Ridge is often criticized for publishing only local Asian-American writers, or everything they get in pidgin, or only fishing/family/etc. poems, they have come out with at least two books that I know off that concentrate on native Hawaiian work, one edited by Dana Naone Hall, and another by Rodney Morales, on the life of George Helm. (Helm was an activist who drowned while protesting the American military's bombing of Kahoolawe, a small island that was bombed for over 40 years as target practice. George Bush stopped the practice right before the 1990 senate elections in an effort to throw some votes to the Republican, who lost.)

At a local literature conference held this past weekend, one of my colleagues pointed out that many, if not most, people find out about local lit through performances throughout the state--either readings by the poets themselves, or dramatizations that are presented at schools. Yamanaka, however, has run into censorship recently; schools want to make sure that she reads poems that aren't too profane! I may have mentioned that members of the Filipino community are upset by her speakers' use of stereotypes against Filipinos. An interesting problem of audience.

One of the problems in disseminating native Hawaiian literature is that so much of it isn't "literature," but chants that accompany hula. The grant in support of the Hawaii Literary Arts Council, for example, has no provision for paying performers to do hula--money is only provided for literary events (literally). The University of Hawaii press, while it publishes OLD Hawaiian stuff, has a very bad record on publishing any new Hawaii literature. They only picked up Milton Murayama's influential, All I Asking For Is My Body, after Murayama had self- published it, and had started to sell a lot of copies. They have a new series on Pacific literature, which seems geared toward other (south) Pacific lit. More exotic.

There was a predictable attack on the UH English dept at this conference, with several speakers calling for members of the department to learn the Hawaiian language and history so that we can do justice to the literature of the state. While the institution deserves the grief it gets, not enough was said about the professional pressures put on academics to ignore the local and to study "national" or international literatures. The university, like the press, is a national, not a local institution, for better AND for worse.

I'll close with a poem printed in the conference guide (which includes essays and poems). It's by Joe Tsujimoto, who looks local, but whose accent gives him up as a New Yorker--a katonk, or mainland Asian- American. The title is "Lucky Come Hawaii" which is based on the expression used by members of the 442nd in World War II, most of whom were from Hawaii: "Lucky We Live Hawaii." The identity issues are rife here:

As an American with an Oriental face whelped in Manhattan on the edge of Harlem in subways to school in the Bronx or fixing teletype machines on Broad St.
next to All
I've been asked "What country you from?"
"What language do you speak?"
and my eyes cloud over like concrete. So I say
"What country YOU from?
What language YOU speak?"
since everyone speaks with an accent.

Here, in the islands
I am invisible.
Till I speak.
Then, "Eh, brah,
you one katonk, yuh?
I thump my chest like Tarzan.
"yea, brah. Married one local girl who wen grad from Parrin'ton High School.
That kind."
Smiling, he looks at me with dolphins in his eyes.

Across the flightline of the Maui airport
I walk from the plane
reading Lonesome Dove.
Eyes following mine.
They appear at the baggage carousel to my left. Knowledgeable eyes in a middle-aged,
mainland face, perhaps from Texas.
He smiles over our secret nods in approval at my perseverance.
The local boy learning to read.
High culture.

I sit in the lobby of the old Kaiser Hospital
my newborn baby warm in my arms next to two old ladies--very old who coo "Oh, how adorable!"
"An angel from heaven!" "Look at those cheeks!"
"They're like sunshine!" You must be the happiest parent!"
when I stand to introduce my wife newly come from signing documents. "And here's the mothter," I say.
Hair flashing, they look at each other aghast-- when one says
"But we thought you were the mother."

Enough for now. Hope this answers your questions. Susan Schultz

↑ Index

12. Hans-Joachim Rieke

German poetry

Fri 18 Mar 1994

Susan and others, for lack of time, but in order to make a start, here is a poem by a contemporary German poet (born 1953) who is one of a few experimental writers. Her name is Sabine Techel, she lives in Berlin

ES KUENDIGT SICH AN (there is no "Umlaut" in ASKI)

Bevor alles faellt kannst du das Knirschen der Zaehne im Apfel und das Reiben rutschenden Porzellans hoeren das Schleifen der Wolken auf dem Hausdach das Klappen der Fluegel vor dem Angriff bevor einer zu gurgeln anhebt kannst du traeumen wie er unters Waschbecken rutscht um die Ecke einen schlimmen Blick durch den Zaun es ist jetzt Zeit fuer kalte Haende was nicht schlimm ist wenn man immer welche hat und was schlimm ist will auch gelernt sein.

Die Kaelte wird noch heller
Im Laecheln steht wie einer weggeht

Wofuer es zu spaet ist lassen wir spaeter sein
Fuer Eile ist immer noch Zeit

Here is a semantic translation (I made this quickly, so its not authorized, nor very elaborate, just to give you an idea):

IT ANNOUNCES ITSELF

Before everything falls you can hear the grinding of teeth in the apple and the rubbing of sliding porcelain the cloud's slurring on the roof
the clapping of wings before the attack

when one is on the threshhold of gargling you can dream how he slides under the sink round the corner a bad look through the fence

it's time now for cold hands which isn't bad if one always has some and what is bad needs practice too.

The cold becomes even lighter
In the smile is written how one leaves
What is too late we leave (to be) later
There is always time for haste

More to follow
Hannah

↑ Index

13. Robert Drake
french poetry in translation: reviewer wanted
Fri 18 Mar 1994

---

friends--

I'm looking for someone to review several recent publications of French poetry-in-translation. I am, sadly, not qualified to judge the quality of the translations... Phenomenal rewards in fame and karma, minimal demands on time... email direct to me and many thanks in advance apologies in advance to the list-master, if this is in violation...

luigi-bob drake

↑ Index

14. Charles Bernstein
Today at Notre Dame
Sat 19 Mar 1994

--Boundary (ID ULXsWHY1O+DzRJHTHvR/1A)

Date: Fri, 18 Mar 1994 16:03:45 -0500
From: [redacted] (Stephen Fredman)

"Intersections of the Lyrical and the Philosophical" is part of the Henkels Visiting Scholars Series at the University of Notre Dame and sponsored by the English Department and the Program of Liberal Studies. The speakers, Ross Feld, Norman Finkelstein, Michael Heller, and Michael Palmer are top-notch critics of twentieth-century American poetry, who are also poets (and, in the case of Ross Feld, a novelist). On the creative writing side, there will be a poetry reading by Finkelstein, Heller, and Palmer Sunday night, March 20, at 7:30 p.m. in the Library Auditorium, with a reception to follow in the Library Lounge. Also, there will be a creative writing workshop, with all four writers in attendance, in the Library Lounge on Tuesday, March 22, from 12-1 p.m. The conference proper will consist of interrelated talks on modern American poets, looking at how the poets have responded to the often countervaling claims of lyricism and philosophy. All of the talks will occur in 136 DeBartolo: at 4:15 p.m., March 21, Michael Heller will speak on George Oppen and Wallace Stevens; at 8:00 p.m., March 21, Norman Finkelstein will speak on William Bronk and Robert Duncan; at 4:15 p.m., March 22, Ross Feld will speak on George Oppen and Robert Duncan; and at 8:00 p.m., March 22, Michael Palmer will deliver a response to the other papers. These talks should be something quite special, since the speakers have been working on them for the past year. The conference has generated a lot of interest around the country, and we're expecting some visitors to join us from neighboring states. The conference papers will be published in a special issue of the journal SAGETRIEB, for which submissions are solicited.

--Boundary (ID ULXsWHY1O+DzRJHTHvR/1A)--

↑ Index

15. susan
Re: German poetry
Mon 21 Mar 1994

Hannah--The poem is intriguing. Just a couple of questions: 1) What is experimental about "experimental German poetry" these days? 2) How are poets responding to reunification and to right-wing violence, if they are? Thanks for sending. Susan S.

↑ Index

16. Kristen Prevallet

spirit world=numerous world

Mon 21 Mar 1994

Well I know it has been a week since Steve posted a message asking Tom Mandel to elaborate on the "definition of the 'spirit world' that is also the 'numerous' one", but I have been pondering the question and would now like to offer a reply. I suppose I should give a context, since it happened so long ago: Tom found the Kierkegaardian source for an Oppen poem, and concluded by saying "A very complex metonymy of text to human/legendary figure, to the social (war) questions of the moment of the poem and the 20th century is the metonymic whole being pondered; how to live in a spirit world (and that one is the "numerous" world) when one is ineluctable alone and confronted w/it at all times."

I am not sure what to say about Oppen, but I do think that the numerous world that includes all matters of both history and spirit, each existing by their own right of articulation and presence in the world, is a fitting way to talk about Charles Olson.

Some of us in Buffalo are lucky to be reading Olson for a seminar that Robert Creeley is teaching, and thinking about how Olson imagined a SYSTEM that would contain, well, his BEING--a re-imagination, that is, of the KNOWN world. As far as this question of the spirit goes, I would propose that in Olson one cannot say that 20th century social and political shifts are the only proofs that the world is numerous. I mean, there are historical shifts (like World War II, like the social changes of Gloucester); there are personal shifts (like ruptures of death and longing); there are spiritual shifts (like the moment that the formless, the unnamable are given a SPACE to work their mysteries); and one cannot say that one of the above (of course there are many more) is more inherently significant than any other-- cannot say that there is only history, only language, because being NUMEROUS the world contains multiples-- The world is NUMEROUS, that is, in how it, in all of its complexity and all of its MYSTERY effects us as HUMAN and how we, in turn effect the world. So the spirit does have a place in the numerous world, if only because as yet, we do not know the bounds of our imagination, nor have we yet named the strangeness of all it contains.

I know the Maximus poems are one of those books "we all have on our shelf" so I won't quote too much except, this:

I looked up and saw its form
through everything
-it is sewn in all parts, under and over

(II.173 The Maximus Poems)

Kristin Prevallet

↑ Index

17. Hans-Joachim Rieke

Re: German poetry

Sat 26 Mar 1994

Susan, sorry for the long delay. My child has been ill and I am working under high pressure, so I havent had the power to hook into the net for a few days. I cannot answer your questions offhand, but am planning to write a little more extensively on German poetry for the list in a few weeks time, when some of the projects I am working on are properly set on their way and the two courses I will have to teach starting April 15th are organized an planned. Generally there are a few esperimental poets in the line of Sabine Techel - whose other poems in the collection arent quite as good. Literary studies in Germany say that because of the War and the Holocaust German literature has been preoccupied with moral and political problems. There are interesting poets in teh past though which can and do serve as models for a more experimental poetry that seems to be supported by one of the most important publishing houses right now (Suhrkamp).(Sabine Techel, Thomas Kling et al.) Besides Dada there is of course Celan, then Ingeborg Bachman and Unica Zuern - Austrian I believe - (who wrote complicated anagramms, and was rediscovered in the last few years). The fall of the wall is another problem for some writers from the east. Their topic - if it was dissident before - has changed so dramatically that a lot of them are in a kind of crisis; plus: one of the most interesting ones - Sascha Andersen - was discovered to have been a Stasi-informand. Worrying who was and who wasnt has preoccupied much energy of German writers in recent years. There is an interesting literary scene in Austria (one of them has translated a few poems by Bernstein - and a very interesting scene in Scandinavia which is translated into German and influencial. In Scandinavia the student movement was also a radical cultural movement for experimental writing. Some names: Inger Christensen (systempoetry), Paal Helge Haugen (dotnovel), Jan Erik Vold, Eldrid Lunden (minimal poetry), etc. More soon Best Hannah

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

April 1994

26 messages · Sat 2 Apr 1994 – Sat 30 Apr 1994

April 1994 opens on announcements, the list doing the plain civic work it never quite admits to loving. Nick Lawrence hangs a notice for Alice Notley, reading Wednesday at a Buffalo gallery on short notice — bring friends, students, whoever — while from Vancouver Peter Quartermain tracks Robin Blaser's spring progress through Philadelphia and Washington. Before the arguing resumes, the poets attend to the calendar: who is reading, and where, and how the word might be spread in time.

The arguing, of course, resumes. The month's live wire is the medium itself, and Chris Funkhouser sets the terms with a manifesto's flatness: “Technopoetics proposed here is not a literary movement”. Charles Bernstein, never far from the switchboard, presses the point into aphorism — on a network, he observes, “At every point receivers are also transmitters” — which is either a theory of poetry or a description of the list you are holding, and probably means to be both.

Relief arrives, as it reliably will on this list, by way of parody. Linda Reinfeld forwards a mock program of conference papers so pitch-perfect it ought to have been real, the academy's whole apparatus of contested spaces and epistemic privilege marshalled behind the immortal panel-title “Viceroy-on-Elephant or Elephant-on-Viceroy?”. The list can theorize the institution to exhaustion; it can also, in a single elephant, deflate it.

And underneath it all a sillier engine is turning over, the first sputters of the collaborative doggerel that will overrun May entirely — a thread called Beatnik Bliss, chicken not yet on the menu but the appetite plainly gathering. I have arranged April's letters under their authors' names, the telephones and addresses redacted to black, the readings and the manifestos and the elephant all filed in the order the days delivered them.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 26 in all.

WRITERS

Bernstein, Charles 9, 13, 14, 20, 25
CHRISTOPH, FUNKHOUSER 5, 6
Creeley, Robert 23, 26
Cy6440%albnyvms.bitnet 12
Guitart, Jorge 8
Ishihara, Toshi 16
Lawrence, Nick 1, 7, 11
Metzger, Michael 24
Nasdor, Marc 10
Perloff, Marjorie 15
Quartermain, Peter 2, 18
Reinfeld, Linda 4
Sherwood, Kenneth 17
Sondheim 19, 21, 22
Spahr, Juliana 3

NAMES MENTIONED

Abbott, Steve 1
Americans, Asian 6
Armantrout, Rae 15
Baraka, Amiri 6
Bee, Susan 14
Blaser, Robin 2
Blau, Rachel 2
Brecht, Bertolt 6
Byrd, Don 6
Byron, Philip 14
Duncan, Robert 6
Eugene, Brett 18
Gilonis, Harry 18
Ginsberg, Allen 12
Haraway, Donna 6
Hong, Maxine 16
Jennings, Peter 6
Johns, Jasper 6
Joyce, Michael 6
Kerouac, Jack 12
Lamborn, Peter 6
Landow, George 6
Levinas, Emmanuel 19
Levine, Jeffrey 14
Mackey, Nathaniel 6
Mulford, Wendy 18
Nelson, Gale 6
Notley, Alice 1
Obenzinger, Hilton 8
Oppen, George 6
Retallack, Joan 3
Rothenberg, Jerome 6
Sanders, Jay 6
Schwerner, Armand 6
Shainman, Jack 14
Simms, Colin 18
Stevens, Wallace 5
Strauss, Zoe 6
Tan, Amy 16
Torra, Joe 11
Waldman, Anne 12
Walsh, Catherine 18
Washington, Harold 2, 8
Welish, Marjorie 15
Wilson, Steve 6
Yates, Katie 12

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 16
Aesthetics 14
African American poetry 8
Appropriation 6, 14
Archives and libraries 4
Asian American poetry 16
Book announcements 6, 14
Calls for submissions 4
Capitalism 6, 14
Collage and montage 18
Conferences and festivals 4, 5, 6, 14, 20, 21
Copyright and permissions 17
Dreams 14, 22
Electronic poetry and hypertext 6, 14
Ethics 14
Experimental poetry 6
Feminism 16
Film 8, 14
Formalism 14
Gender 14
Hermeneutics 20, 21
Ideology 6, 14
Improvisation 6
Interviews 6
Language poetry 16
Letters and correspondence 14
List moderation 14, 17
Little magazines 6, 11, 17
Lyric poetry 6
Materiality of the text 14
Modernism 4, 6
Mourning and loss 4, 14
Music and poetry 6, 14
Nature 14, 16
Negativity and refusal 11
Ontology 6

Philosophy 14, 20, 21
Place and region 11, 20, 21
Poetics 6, 9, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 25
Print vs. digital 14, 16
Psychoanalysis 14
Race and poetry 14
Reading announcements 2, 11
Representation 16
Reviewing and criticism 14
Science 20, 21
Semiotics 14, 19, 20, 21
Software and code 6, 25
Sublime 14, 20, 21
The academy 4, 6, 16
The body 6, 16, 19, 22
The internet 4, 6, 14, 25
The listserv 6, 14, 17
Theatre 14
Translation 14, 17
Visual art 1, 8, 14, 17, 19

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 26 in all.

2 APR 1994
1. Nick Lawrence — Alice Notley reading this Wed.

3 APR 1994
2. peter quartermain — Robin Blaser in Philadelphia and Washington DC

7 APR 1994
3. Juliana Spahr — misko on TUESDAY

10 APR 1994
4. Linda Reinfeld — yet another opportunity (fwd)
5. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH — "Technopoetics' as it was 4/8/94
6. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH — (no subject)

12 APR 1994
7. Nick Lawrence — farewell party for misko & dubravka
8. Jorge Guitart — MOSLEY/OBENZINGER READING
9. Charles Bernstein — where are you?
10. Marc Nasdor — Re: where are you?

13 APR 1994
11. Nick Lawrence — Not just local

15 APR 1994
12. cy6440%albnyvms.bitnet — being loca(l)

20 APR 1994
13. Charles Bernstein — prequel to long post
14. Charles Bernstein — I Don't Take Voice Mail (long post)

22 APR 1994
15. Marjorie Perloff — Re: prequel to long post
16. Toshi Ishihara — first

26 APR 1994
17. Kenneth Sherwood — Sarajevo, travel and art.

28 APR 1994
18. peter quartermain — Summer Reading
19. sondheim — (Forwarded) : Obj
20. Charles Bernstein — Alan Sondheim's "The Start of It All" (forwarded)

29 APR 1994
21. sondheim — Sending out again...
22. sondheim — Return from Mistaken Address
23. Robert Creeley — Beatnik Bliss

30 APR 1994
24. Michael Metzger — Re: Beatnik Bliss
25. Charles Bernstein — Re: Beatnik Bliss
26. Robert Creeley — Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies

1. Nick Lawrence
Alice Notley reading this Wed.
Sat 2 Apr 1994

==========A N N O U N C E M E N T ========== Poet Alice Notley, whose _Selected Poems_ has just been published by Talisman House, will be reading Wednesday 6 April at the Nina Freudenheim Gallery (300 Delaware Avenue) at 8:00 pm. Please spread the word; this event was set up at short notice, so publicity is scant. Bring friends, students, etc.

Notley's reading is sponsored by the Abbott Poetry Fund.

↑ Index

2. peter quartermain
Robin Blaser in Philadelphia and Washington DC
Sun 3 Apr 1994

Robin BLASER
(_The_Holy_Forest_ recently published) will be in Philadelphia 11-15 April, reading at Temple (courtesy Rachel Blau DuPlessis) 14 April
[he and David will be staying at _The_Barclay_] and in Washington DC 16-20 April [when they will be staying at _Embassy_Row_]. He's returning to Vancouver 21 April

If anyone can arrange a reading for him in those areas on those dates could you please in the first instance (since RB has an unlisted phone number) either contact
Peter Quartermain
voice and fax [redacted]
e-mail [redacted]
or arrange directly with him once he's in town?
Thanks.

Peter Quartermain

↑ Index

3. Juliana Spahr
misko on TUESDAY
Thu 7 Apr 1994

Joan Retallack is worried that there might be some confusion about when and where Misko Suvakovic is speaking. It is on TUESDAY at 12:30 in room 608 Clemens. on April 12.

↑ Index

4. Linda Reinfeld
yet another opportunity (fwd)
Sun 10 Apr 1994

Subject: Call for Papers - Laboring Elephants

(Why not a call for poems, too?)

+++++ +++++ +++++ +++++ +++++ +++++ +++++ +++++ +++++ +++++

A CONFERENCE PROPOSAL

THE ELEPHANT AND CULTURAL STUDIES

The Elephant as "Physical" Other Does the Elephant Exist? Zoological Hegemony vs. Cultural Fabrication. Pachyderm "Evolution": Eurochronocities and Eurocentric Linearity in the late (post)modern zoological script. Tracking the elephant through texts: Western Visuality and Olfactory Perception

The Elephant: Interrogating Multi-Cultural Rhetoricities: The elephant: Cyborg, Ethnicity, or "Species"? (E) (L) (E) (P) (H) (A) (N) (T)? What's That": Exploitation and the Rhetorical Stategies of Denial in Thai Forestry Camps. Viceroy-on-Elephant or Elephant-on-Viceroy? Accidents and the Uncertainties of Domination in some Durbars of the Late British Raj.

The Elephant As Eurocentric Object:
The elephant and the Lion: the Metaphoricity of Binarity in Early Medieval Texts.
"Hunting the Beloved Other": The elephant as Paradigmatic Problematic of Conservationist Conversations in Theodore Roosevelt's African memoirs.
Garage Sales and elephants: A Dialogue of Contested Spaces.

The Elephant As (Post)Modernist Construction Post-Modern, (Post)Modern, or Postcontemporary Elephant? Epistemic Privileging and Discursive Spaces in MLA Debates. Wild Elephant, Tamed elephant, Zoo-Confined Elephant, Extinct Elephant: Alternative Modernities for a Culturally-Constructed Ani(Male). Elephant Ears: Symbolic Excess in (Post)Nouvelle Pastry Culture. Situating the Paradigmatic other: The Elephant in Weight-Loss Discourse.

[END]

Forwarded to me from:

James V. (Jim) Carmichael, Jr., Assistant Professor Department of Library and Information Studies
The University of North Carolina at Greensboro
350 Curry Building
Greensboro, NC 27514-5001
Phone: [redacted], Ext 293 INTERNET: [redacted]
"There's only one thing better than love . . . and that's company!"
--Eudora Welty, The Ponder Heart

↑ Index

5. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH
"Technopoetics' as it was 4/8/94
Sun 10 Apr 1994

> Dear friends,
> At the request of CB I will be posting a .txt of the paper i presented at The New Freedoms: Celebrating Contemporary Russian & American Poetry festival held at Stevens Inst. in Hoboken over the weekend. I shouldn't say too much in preface, but definitely that it's merely a starting point, opening up of conversation, speculation--none of it was explained to me, etc. I don't have any answers to some of the questions about the hegemonic anti-natures of technology, etc. Since it's already out in the open i'll be appreciative of yr Critiques / ideas // praises /// etc. Let's talk--Thanks-- Xhris Funk-

↑ Index

6. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH
(no subject)
Sun 10 Apr 1994

"Takes a lot of voices to sing a millenial song." <1>

The majority of poetry people are familiar with small, relatively intimate scenarios, and many truly like it that way. Nevertheless, with hi-tech communications capabilities, and various forms of electronic text processing, the potential topographies <2> of our interactive communities and activities have widened substantially over the past few years. To begin to bring what is a fairly recent concept out in the open, it is important to stress our use of the idea of technopoetics as a specific term, the concerns of which we would like to make very clear. Technopoetics proposed here is not a literary movement. It involves collaboration, with other people as well as the machines. This process itself is changing and dividing pervasive notions of what "author" and "publisher" are.

"The electronic age now enjoys this time of awkwardness before the age itself disappears along with its name into the day to day of what at Xerox Park they've taken to calling 'Ubicomp,' ubiquitous computing..."<3>

We remember what was written in _Convivio A Journal of Poetics_: "Poetics is a labor and a threshold where we are working to make an actual thing...," which "is a continual reformation.... Above all it treats of inclusion, ...poetics, 'in the plural,' as Robert Duncan says."<4> To echo these notions, as we move into time, and, as a culture, succumb to technology (television, automobiles and such, as well as computers and digital intermedia), the work, our actions must be pluralized in order to maximize the potentials of the technology and not let them contribute to social fragmentation. In no way would we want to speak purely of technopoetry or the technopoetic. "Poetry," "technopoetry" is now, in its potential, something more than a poem, or a book of poems, in its blending with other forms and other media. Will Alexander, introducing a segment of the _We Magazine Issue 18_, describes the work presented as "...a mix of the poetic and essayistic...like opening up an artery of twilight, and opening up and walking through this vast new expanse where one is neither one [i.e. poetic] or the other [i.e. essayistic] but something completely different."<5> To state the apparent, this report comes from what considers itself a "first" world. As one writer has already pointed out, I am speaking from the perspective of an "unintentional elitism," of a "...live by the modem die by the modem future of poetry as an electronic medium."<6> This is true, but needs to be contextualized within the reality of the newness of this technology. In many ways we are at the beginnings of new technological spaces, new electronic networks, which begin to enlarge their envelopes beyond the corporate, military, governmental, academic milieu which it has benefitted until now. My position is a result of the priviledge of birth and guidence, of research and exploration, and is accepted as responsibility. Among the things revealed in the processes of technopoetics is a new kind of wear and fatigue of the body. We are in the age of a physical and mental/consciousness transformation caused by technological phenomena. In fact, sitting in front of video screens and computer monitors especially might be likened to what George Oppen once described as "the bright light of shipwreck" in the poem "Of Being Numerous." Clearly, the predominant scenario in this and future age is a movement towards "The absolute singular/The unearthly bonds/Of the singular", our own type of "Insanity in high places..." in our homes, with the beam of the computer's screen on our faces as well as those of the police helicopter searchlights above our cities and suburbs..."By the shipwreck/Of the singular."<7> This points to one of the obvious advantages of collaboration: that the time spent by any one individual can be spread out over a collective. There is little chance that our civilization is ever going to be less reliant on computers. "Ours is a time in which ontological questions of truth and falsehoods are less relevant than issues of control--control of meaning, control of context."<8> We have been inspired to "seize the media."<9> The alternative would be to leave it to the disposal of the military industrial complex. As managing editor for _Electronic Journal_, an on-line (Internet) academic magazine concerned with electronic communication between computer users and the implications thereof, as editor with We Press (where a group of editors conspire to "publish" poetry on compact disc, cassette, video and Internet as well as on paper), in addition to my role as a teacher, I am intimately involved with high-tech approaches to both poetry/poetics and the presentation of electronic text. In the spring of 1993, We Press used the Internet (harbinger of the so-called "Information Superhighway") to circulate a poetry journal. After this experiment I wrote an essay regarding the frontier of cyberspace, "We Maga/zine XVII: (A) Textual Experiment." The essay is a theoretical and practical investigation of the po(e)tentials of producing a magazine on an electronic network and the attempt to incite a global community instantaneously through network connections. The essay's simple conclusion is that there is not a doubt that any publisher with a computer connected to the Internet (or the digital--video and audio-- networks which are soon to come to many, many households in America, and the much of the rest of the "first" world) can exponentially increase the circulation and audience of their publication--and otherwise make connections which they would not normally make<10>--by transmuting what they are already involved with to include cyberspace. Of course there are severe socio-ideological concerns with regards to access to the technologies now available, and any fully legitimized network system must make room and provide equal access for everyone. This is not nearly close to being a living reality, but with "Ubicomp," and other systematic plans such as the Information Superhighway, it is likely that we will see millions more Americans become reliant on on-line services over the course of coming decades. It is important that we concern ourselves with equilateral space and learn to cooperatively communicate within the interactive electronic arena now. This, of course, is easier in theory than practice.<11> Before going further, I wanted to briefly connect technopoetics with what Donna Haraway speaks of in "A Cyborg Manifesto." Haraway writes, "By the late twentieth century, our time, a mythic time we are all chimeras, theorized and fabricated hybrids of machine and organism; in short, we are cyborgs. The cyborg is our ontology; it gives us our politics. The cyborg is a condensed image of both imagination and material reality, the two joined centres structuring any possibility of historical transformation."<12> What we find most liberating in Haraway's work, in addition to its pointed ideology

("...cyborg is a matter of fiction and lived experience that changes what counts as women's experience in the late twentieth century"), is its recontextualization of our species as a whole. How anyone can feel they are a part of the same corpus and mindset as those of the pre-industrial world is rather mysterious, to say the least. Do you not often feel constrained by the "metaphysical tradition" which is rooted in what is a truly archaic mode of thought and action? How much do we actually have in common with the mind and body set of pre-electronic culture? Cyborgs, "the awful apocalyptic telos of the 'West's' escalating dominations of abstract individuation," are concerned with "the relationships for forming wholes from parts, including those of polarity and hierarchical domination," and are troublesome because "they are the illegitimate offspring of militarism and patriarchal capitalism, not to mention state socialism...often exceedingly unfaithful to their origin." Haraway's cyborg myth "is about transgressed boundaries, potent fusions, and dangerous possibilities which progressive people might explore as one part of needed political work" in an age where "the need for unity of people trying to resist world-wide intensification of domination has never been more acute."<13> Furthermore, as Don Byrd explains in _The Poetics of the Common Knowledge_, "Our fascination to ourselves as cyborgian creatures is that we combine in our beings the predictability of machines with the wreckless, independence of singular [?] creatures."<14> As we are presented with both the predicament and the predictability of culture, as the computer and other forms of technology, ideological weapons all, begin to dominate our work places, and other places, we must familiarize ourselves with them and use them in a project of creating a better society. Purkinge is a technopoetics writing collective with whom I am currently working in Albany. Purkinge improvisationally rends and resews texts in printed and oral forms,<15> producing a particularly angular "writing" "centered" from different perspectives. The group invents and promotes new modes of authorship and anti-authorship, fashioning melodic conversations in opposition to a system grown entropic. In our experimentations, enabled by technology (linked computers and multitrack recording equipment), we insist on the necessity of interactive, intercorporeal elements in our communication. The group's gatherings reflect a moment in the drift, theoretically and poetically fusing concept and action. Nathaniel Mackey, in an essay on Amiri Baraka, writes of the poet's "obliquity, the sliding away from the proposed we find in many of Baraka's poems." Baraka's method "complies with a fugitive, perhaps idealist impulse, as though 'the mind, moving' might if not outmaneuver such constraints [i.e. social 'conditions whose limits one cannot escape,' and, by extension, the poetry produced within such conditions], at least register the need to do so." The "Obliquity or angularity" of such writingQand the lyric which rises from the implementation of such a poetics, which also typifies the type of work done by PurkingeQ"challenges the epistemic order whose constraints it implicitly brings to light."<16> In Purkinge, a multiplicity of elements, textual modes, and personalities come together in an intertextual play between sound and voice, meaning and obliquity. We develop a tangential "writing" style pointed towards the creation of a new mode of authorship in the movement away from a non-existent center. It is a conversation, a collaboration, melodic in its ideal. We inhale as well as we exhale, hearts dialate as well as contract. The group wants poetry that shows similar signs of life--and we turn the machine on. In addition to expediting interpersonal communications, computer/digital technology has been used technopoetically in the form of hypertext, and through interactive textually based virtual reality spaces--known as MUDs and MOOs--on the Internet . According to George Landow,

"Hypertext, a term coined by Theodor H. Nelson in the 1960s, refers also to a form of electronic text, a radically new information technology, and a mode of publication.'By "hypertext," Nelson explains, ' I mean nonsequential writing-- text that branches and allows choices to the reader, best read at an interactive screen...'" 23

MUD is an acronym for "Multiple User Dimension," which is an interactive textual-based virtual reality software being used in cyberspace. MOO stands for MUD Object Oriented, in which characters are created and whole electronic dimensions--including a type of hypertexts-- are built. A writer is able to compose by themselves, or with others, in these spaces. We recently spent a few hours with hypertext writers Michael Joyce and Caroyln Guyer. Michael is a novelist, a cybernovelist, and one of the co- developers of Storyspace, "the premier hypertext program available today."<18> Carolyn is coordinator of the woman's hypertext collective High Pitched Voices. Michael gave a talk, "(Re)Placing the Author: 'A Book in the Ruins'" in Albany. He reads the Czeslaw Milosz poem "A Book in the Ruins," drawing metaphors between it and what he perceives as the condition of literature today. He promotes hypertext as the frontier of literature, a re- writing of the process of reading and writing, where the reader, in a sense, is able to write and rewrite any given book. It is an extreme concept for most people, who have quite a linear and perpetualized relationship with literature of all sorts. Joyce reads from Milosz--and interprets: "The poet stands in the ruins...it's the modernist moment...but no...this is not what we see...the poet makes his way into the ruins of a dark building." The building we read metaphorically as technology, "in so doing the movement itself reads barrier as gate. What he reads, he writes." The screen is the barrier, a "gate"--not passable by all. According to Joyce, "Electronic texts present themselves in the medium of their disolution. They are read where they are written and they are written where they are read." A mantra throughout his talk was "print text stays itself, electronic text replaces itself."<19> We see hypertext as technopoetics in light of its process, which actively promotes the decentering of singular author, and hope the next phase in the development of hypertext software will allow for collaborative interaction in real-time. An article in the recent issue of _Poets & Writers Magazine_ paraphrases Carolyn Guyer, noting the "text chunks," which "replace" themselves, are "called lexia, which may be images and sounds as well as paragraphs and their electronic links empower the reader either to submit to the writer's ordering of the story or to collaborate by manipulating the elements into an entirely new story."<20> High Pitched Voices is working together in a collaborative manner on-line. They have a hypertext discussion set up (in the same manner as the Buffalo POETICS conference), and they work together to composing hypertext in a MOO.<27> When one enters this particular electronic space, by issuing a few simple keyboard commands, they are greeted by the formation of an arch, a pair of mirrored, upper case "I"s as columnar bases. An inscription reads: "A roof over our heads, she said. Appropriate, I thought. Yonic symbol as protection and sign. And....there are two "I"s here. What more could we want?" A "reader" is invited to follow links, and, if interested, add to existing texts and create links between lexia. The group of women involved with High Pitched Voices also holds real-time meetings in this space, open to anyone who is able to log in. We see tremendous poetentials in such an interactivity such as this. Technopoetics resists the exclusivity of the technology in general, and maintains a historical awareness that it is merely a forerunner to what will be customary activity to future generations of writers and artists in the post-electronic age. With due respect and admiration for the PRE-FACE of _Technicians of the Sacred_,<28> which asserts PRIMITIVE MEANS COMPLEX, technopoetics enacts the reversal of that phrase, certain that complex can mean primitive. We are in age marked by the power of information, the dominance of technology, yet it is also important to note we're in the relatively early stages of what will become Ubicomp culture. It is a very complicated time. We must study and act upon what is happening now--& stake some grounds here. There are a few collectives and publications already in this realm, in addition to the aforementioned entities, there are a number of poetry oriented journals on the Internet (_RIF/T_, _Grist_, _Core_, _Taproot_, and _Inter/face_ come to mind). Other publishing groups such as Xexoxial Endarchy and _The Aerial_ are consistently producing poetry in formats other than the printed page, and Eastgate Systems has been pioneering in their dedication to the promotion of hypertext publications. In 1986, I asked Ed Sanders about his vision of the music of the future:

"It has to be, in electronics, the equivalent of the piano forte. That is, right around the time of Bach they were creating this new kind of piano, which was an outgrowth of the harpsichord, that allowed its player to be infinitely more expressive, using the pedals and playing softly and loud--it enabled the concept of the concerto to arise, where the piano was an actually powerful instrument that could act in concerto with other instruments.

"So what's going to happen now...is the electronic equivalent of the piano forte. That is, there is going to arise a musical instrument sufficient for a new Beethoven, and it will be an electronic instrument. It will have, obviously, many aspects of the modern electronic recording studio and modern high-end synthesizer. I envision it like a giant church organ only instead of stops it will have fifteen or twenty thousand little buttons or knobs & x-y pads & pressure sensitive areas & theramin-like devices where you approach these little knobs with your hands. The proximity of your fingers to these zones & tiny little surfaces will indicate perameters & programs, moods & sounds, or whatever....It will be a "touch" thing; I guess the feet will have to be involved...in other words you'll have to use both hands, both feet, & perhaps a group of assistants. In fact it may be a collaborative thing....It will be complicated...you can use your touch to modify all these perameters instantly...make these sounds, these different layers of sounds, different sounds & chords instantly, as you create it..."<23>

As we find ourselves increasingly--and without much choice--having to making use of the synthetic strands provided by our civilization's penchant for technological living, we need to envision ways to weave the threads given by such an unusual but very real circumstance into a tightly meshed net which alternatively keeps us warm and catches our breath. Among the questions raised by the possibilities implicit in our future immersions is the question of which we want to priviledge, the production of artifacts or the actual engagement of people in a process of living and creating as an outgrowth of daily life. To draw an analogy between technopoetics and other technologies which have long predated the computer, I refer to a collection of essays called _Radiotext(e)_, the introduction of which reminds us "that radio existed long before its receiver did."<24> Bertolt Brecht, in his essay "The Radio as an Apparatus of Communication" suggests we should "Change this apparatus [radio] over from distribution to communication," and that "Any attempt by the radio to give a truly public character to public occasions is a step in the right direction."<25> These are among the ideas we would like to claim as a basis for a technopoetics in the current historical and technological moment.

--Chris Funkhouser

Footnotes <1> Don Byrd, _The Great Dimestore Centennial_ (Barrytown, NY: Station Hill Press, 1986), p. 109. The concept is echoed in other places in the poem (i.e. "Takes a lot of penny whistles to sing/a millennial song." p. 13, etc.). <2> This is a term I've heard used in this context by Michael Joyce and others. <3> Michael Joyce, "(Re)Placing the Author: 'A Book in the Ruins," SUNY-Albany, March 23, 1994. <4> Louis Patler, "A WORD/AN INTRODUCTION," _Convivio A Journal of Poetics % Number One_ (Bolinas: Tombouctou Books, 1983). <5> Will Alexander, _We Magazine Issue 18_ (Santa Cruz: We Press, 1993). <6> Tony Door, _The Poetry Project Newsletter_, Fall 1993. <7> George Oppen, "Of Being Numerous," _Collected Poems_ (New York: New Directions Books, 1975), pp. 152-60. <8> Gene Youngblood, "The New Renaissance: Art, Science, and the Universal Machine" p. 15. <9> Advice and phrase Peter Lamborn Wilson, Naropa Institute, 1989. <10> Among other previously unknown correspondents for _We Magazine Issue 18_ were Arkadii Dragomoschenko and Armand Schwerner. <11> While the POETICS list at SUNY-Buffalo was thriving for the first month I was a part of it, interaction has decreased substantially for another month now. There were some unusual and fiery interactions which may have contributed to the current status and general awkwardness of the list. In Albany, we hope to see POETICS revive itself. <12> Donna Haraway, "A Cyborg Manifesto," _Simians, Cyborgs, and Women_ (New York: Routledge, 1991), p. 150. <13> quotes are from Haraway, pp. 149-154. <14> Don Byrd, _The Poetics of the Common Knowledge_ (Albany: SUNY Press, 1993), p. 16. <15> Purkinge uses the Daedalus software program in its computer jams, and a four-track cassette system in its spoken/sound work. The group is an outgrowth of the Awopbop Collective, which was started by Don Byrd and Derek Owen in 1991 (see _The Little Magazine Volume 20_). <16> These quotes are by Nathaniel Mackey, _DISCREPANT ENGAGEMENT Dissonance, Cross-Culturality, and Experimental Writing_ (New York: Cambridge University Press, 1993), p. 43. <17> George Landow, _Hypertext The Convergence of Contemporary Critical Theory and Technology_ (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), p. 4. <18> Ted Jennings, introducing Michael Joyce, University at Albany, 3/23/94. <19> These quotations are taken from an audio recording of Michael Joyce's Sesquicentennial Lecture, "(Re)Placing the Author: 'A Book in the Ruins,'" at University at Albany Uptown Campus, 3/23/94. <20> _Poet's & Writers Magazine_, March/April 1994, p. 25. <21> This project is based at Hotel MOO, Brown University (telnet duke.cs.brown.edu 8888). <22> Jerome Rothenberg, ed. (New York: Anchor Books, 1969). <23> Ed Sanders, excerpt from interview with Chris Funkhouser, _We Magazine Issue 3_ (Charlottesville, VA, 1987), p. 6-7. <24> Neil Strauss, _Radiotext(e)_ (New York: Semiotext(e), 1993), p. 9. <25> Brecht quotes from _Radiotext(e)_ (New York: Semiotext(e), 1993), p. 15-16.

↑ Index

7. Nick Lawrence
farewell party for misko & dubravka
Tue 12 Apr 1994

I'm hosting a sendoff party, really a cocktail hour without the cocktails, for] misko & dubravka on wednesday 13 april from 6 to 8 pm

address: 70 Cottage Street (off Virginia off Elmwood, opposite the purple monstrosity/landmark) feel free to bring drinks & eats

Nick Lawrence

↑ Index

8. Jorge Guitart
MOSLEY/OBENZINGER READING
Tue 12 Apr 1994

Don't miss a sensational reading this coming Thursday!

> Just Buffalo Literary Center announces > a National Literary Network Reading
>
> WALTER MOSLEY and HILTON OBENZINGER
>
> > reading from their works
> >
> > at Art Dialogue Gallery
> > 1 Linwood Avenue, Buffalo
> > Thursday April 14, 1994
> > 7:30 p.m.

WALTER MOSLEY is an African-American mystery novelist. He is Bill Clinton's favorite author. His novel DEVIL IN A BLUE DRESS is being made into a film produced by Jonathan Demme and starring Denzel Washington.

HILTON OBENZINGER writes of the cities' vanished past with imagination, wit, and impressive historical accuracy. In his book NEW YORK ON FIRE, his history of New York fires in verse, Obenzinger provides a unique window on that city's past.

↑ Index

9. Charles Bernstein
where are you?
Tue 12 Apr 1994

---

hm, err, well, uh ...

I have always confused the local and the, what?, nonlocal myself and it may be that everyone on this list should post local events so we find out what is really happening.

But as it is this list is mostly nonlocal and getting moreso everyday.

Can anyone tell me where to get some gas?

Dinner will be at 7.

With all best wishes,

Your Poetics Listserve Host

"If you'e got the time, we've got the post"

↑ Index

10. Marc Nasdor
Re: where are you?
Tue 12 Apr 1994

The Merit station on Bay Street in Rosebank. Cheapest gas in Staten Island. -Marc

↑ Index

11. Nick Lawrence
Not just local
Wed 13 Apr 1994

Joe Torra, editor of _lift_ magazine in Somerville, Mass.,

& Nick Lawrence, in the Poetics Program at SUNY Buffalo, will read from their work on Saturday, 16 April at 3:30 pm*

at the Central Park Grill, 2519 Main Street, Buffalo

I scratched the rules of control, only to find my life a landscape for filling in blanks. Authoritative demonstrations of height and depth envelope the company of uniformed pasts. There is no such thing as two lines not meeting. I set my own timetable and means of regulation. Bits of this pieces of that brutal whole. [JT]

> I wrote a riot and it died > the writer read it and it tore > a stutter in my copy of the page's face > a verse refusal of what's mine in you [NL]

* Note new, relaxed afternoon time

↑ Index

12. cy6440%albnyvms.bitnet
being loca(l)
Fri 15 Apr 1994

a quick note to substantiate that
*

The Naropa Institute
aka
The Jack Kerouac School of Disembodied Poetics
co-founded by Allen Ginsberg, Anne Waldman, C. Trungpa Rinpoche

*

is on-line ---------- so you can contact the Department of Writing & Poetics in precious care of Rebecca Bush who facilitiates, administrates the Karma there, wonderfully with the following syntax:

[redacted]

---

in Albany, NY., mittens are still recommended. Katie Yates (mid April)

↑ Index

13. Charles Bernstein
prequel to long post
Wed 20 Apr 1994

I am going to send to the Poetics list an essay I recently presented on the "art object" in an age of electronic communication. It is about 15 screenfulls long--this is an advance warning. I'm not sure it's a good idea to send such long pieces in this way; let me know what you think.

Meanwhile, how's the weather? Publish any good books lately (online catalogs welcome)?

--Charles Bernstein

↑ Index

14. Charles Bernstein
I Don't Take Voice Mail (long post)
Wed 20 Apr 1994

"I DON'T TAKE VOICE MAIL"

by Charles Bernstein

[Presented at a symposium, sponsored by the Parsons School of Design, on "The Art Object in the an Age of Electronic Technology", at the New School in New York, on April 16, 1994]

Before diagnosing the condition of the art object in an age of electronic technology, let me first address the question of the object of art in an age of global commodification. I won't be the last to note that capitalism transcends the technologies through which it operates. So just as today's artworld is dominated by the marketing, sales, and promotion, so the object of art in the age of electronic technology will continue to be profit; and the values most typically promoted by the art world will continue to be governed by market, rather than aesthetic, formal, philosophical or ethical, values. Within the artworld, as in the corporate board rooms, the focus of discussion has been on how to exploit this new media, as if cyberspace was a new wilderness from which to carve your niche --better get on board, err, on line, first before the prime sites are staked out. For if the object of art is to sell objects, then the new electronic environment presents many problems but also many opportunities. But art, if it could speak, might well object to these assumptions. (If art could speak we could not understand it -- that's one way to put it; perhaps it's more accurate to say if art could speak it would be poetry and poetry's got nothing to sell.) -- Art might speak not of its object but it objects; it might testily insists that one of its roles is exactly to resist commodification, to use its materiality to push against the total absorption of meaning into the market system, and that's why it got one the first e-mail accounts on the net--to talk about it. But you can't sell talk, and that can make the net a vexing place for if not for art then for the purveyors of art. Of course, today's internet -- a decentralized, largely text-based, linking of individual sites or constellations of users -- will be superseded by what is aptly called the in- formation superhighway. Just as the old dirt roads and smaller rural routes were largely abandoned by the megatraffic on the interstates, so much of the present informal, non-capital intensive exchanges on the net will become marginal back channels in a communications systems largely owned and controlled by Time & Space, Inc. and other giant telecommunication conglomerates, providing new and continually recirculating versions of the USA Today with up to the minute weather and sports information, sound files offering Nirvana: The Classic Years including alternate studio versions, hypertext tours with high resolution graphics of the British Museum collection, plus hundreds of other choices, available at the click of an icon, including items never before available in any media such as In Her Home: the Barbara Streisand Collection; a construct-it-yourself simulation of making a Shaker chair; and a color-it-yourself portfolio of the complete appropriations of Sherrie

Levine, together with hyper- textually linked case dossiers of all related legal suits. All with modest fees for each hour of viewing or receiving (the gaze finally quantified and sold) and downright bargain prices for your "own" personal copy, making available unlimited screenings (but remember, "it is a federal offence to make unauthorized copies of these copies", or, as we say in Buffalo: it's okay to copy an original but never copy a copy). Indeed, much of what is now the internet promises to become the largest shopping network on earth, and possibly in the universe (even exceeding the Mall of the Milky Way on Galactica B282); those old back roads will be the place to hang out if you are looking for something other than franchise FastImage.

One of the hallmarks of formalist art criticism as well as media theory has been an analysis of the effects of newer media on already existing media. So we talk about the effect of photography on painting, or movies on theater; or how movies provided the initial content for TV before it arrived at its own particular formats (just as the content of the net is now largely composed of formats taken from books, letters, and magazines). It is useful to remember that in the early days of TV, many observers predicted that such spectator sports as baseball would lose their stadium audiences once the games were broadcast "live". Of course, the opposite occurred; TV increased the interest in the live-and-in-person event. In a similar way, art on the net may actually increase interest in seeing art in nonelectronic spaces. Formalist critics have wanted to emphasize how new technologies "free up" older media to explore their intrinsic qualities -- to do what only they can do. But new media also have a corrosive effect, as forces in the older media try to shift their focus to compete for the market and the cultural capital of what they may see as their new competitors. Within the visual arts, many of the most celebrated new trends of the last decade -- from simululationism to multimediamania to the transformation of Artforum -- are symptoms of a fear of the specific and intractable materiality of painting and sculpture; such fear of materiality (and by extension face-to-face interaction) is far greater and long-lasting than the much more often discussed fear of technology -- a fear so often discussed the better to trivialize and repress.

What are the conditions of visual art in the net, or art in computer space? We can expect that most visual art on the net will be reproductions of previously existing work, along the line of Bill Gates's plan to display in his home rotating CD-ROM images of the masterpieces of World Art, images for which, notably, he has purchased the CD-ROM reproduction rights. The Thing, a new visual arts online service, which has been immensely useful in imagining many possible formats for art on the net, already features an innovative, in the sense of anachronistic, pricing structure--selling over its BBS a numbered and "signed" diskette of an art work. (The idea of selling a disk is itself no more objectionable than selling a book, but numbering and signing a disk is an attempt to simulate scarcity and limit in a medium in which these conditions do not apply. I wouldn't be surprised, however, if this format was included on The Thing to call attention to the issue and also to poke fun at the net's prevailing ideology of utopian democracy, a.k.a. netiquette). In any case, telecommunications systems promises to dominate the distribution of text and image in the near future at a price -- though few are now willing to acknowledge it--of more controlled and more limited access (through high user fees, institutional restrictions, and technological skills barriers) and loss of privacy rights we now take for granted. But technological change --it's a mistake to call it progress--will not be reversed and artists run the risk of nostalgia if they refuse to recognize and respond, the better to resist, the communications environment that, for better or worse, they find themselves within. I want, then, to focus not on how electronic space will actually be used, indeed how e-space will be exploited, but rather to think about the new media that has been created by technological developments combing computers and telecommunications, and how works of visual arts can recognize and explore these new media--even if such works run the risk of being relegated to the net's backchannels, along with "new mimeo revolution" poetry magazines and psychic readings by electronic Tarot. The most radical characteristic of the internet as a medium is its interconnectivity. At every point receivers are also transmitters. It is a medium defined by exchange rather than delivery; the medium is interactive and dialogic rather than unidirectional or monologic. At this moment, the most interesting format on the internet, apart from the basic electronic mail function, is the listserve: a series of individuals join a list--any post to the list address is immediately delivered to all list subscribers. Individuals can then post replies to the entire list or to the individual that sent the post. Lists may be open to anyone to join or may be private. The potential for discussion and collaboration is appealing--the format mixes some of the features of correspondence with a discussion group, conference call, and a panel symposium such as this one (with the crucial difference that the distinction between audience and panel is eroded). While many cyberspace utopians speak of virtual communities with much excitement, what is particularly interesting about the interconnectivity of computer space is its difference from other types of group formation; for what we are constructing in these spaces might better be called virtual uncommunities. The art world remains a difficult place for community or group formations because the gallery system recognizes value primarily in terms of individual achievement. In contrast to the poetry publishing and criticism, in which the poets themselves play a substantial and perhaps determining role, individual visual artists are largely restricted to (or restrict themselves to) the role of producers of potentially saleable objects. Competition among artists is more common that broad-based alliance, with the occasional exception of loyalty to a small circle of friends. At the national level, or course, there are local communities of artists in every region. Various movements and schools--aesthetic or political or both--can also be understood as art communities. Most recently, the connections of artists within ethnic, gender, or racial groups have been seen in terms of community. But despite these sites of community among visual artists, sustained interaction, dialogues and collaboration remains rare; indeed, these activities are not generally recognized as values. The internet provide an extraordinary space for interaction and exchange among artist living in different places and, perhaps more significantly, encourages collaboration between visual artists, writers, and computer engineers. In a way remarkably anticipated by the mail art movements of the seventies and eighties, the net suggests the possibility of art works created for their exchange rather than market value--works that may be altered, augmented, or otherwise transformed as they pass from one screen to another. --What I am envisioning here is not art from another medium imported into the net but rather art that takes the unique constraints and potentials of the net as its medium. To begin delineate this and related computer and telecommunications media, let's start with the "small" screen. Indeed, we might begin to speak of the screen arts to suggest the intersection of video, tv and computer art that share the same physical support or monitor. More and more computers are now equipped with video quality monitors and the screen arts--in this broad sense--will be transmitted via modem, cable and wireless systems as well as plugged in through cassette, cd-rom, disk, and cartridge. I distinguish among interactive, interconnected, and presentational screen media: Presentational screen media is the broadest category. On the one hand, it includes the use of the CPU set-up as a means to present work realized in a non-CPU medium, such as a video tape or photographs, or read-only text files. On the other hand, presentational screen media also includes work produced and viewed on computer systems that do not require viewer intervention beyond basic directional and operational parameters such as those available on a video recorder. -- A hugely important subcategory here is works produced on computer screens but not presented on screens. Word processing, "paintbrush" and "photoshop" programs are some of the tools of this medium, which promises to reimagine the way we read and see text and graphics; moreover, this new medium allows for a greater integration and interaction of verbal, visual, and sound elements than possible with previous printing technologies. Interactive computer screen art utilizes the processing system of the computer and includes significant viewer participation via keyboard, mouse or joy stick. While video games are the most elaborate visual realization of this medium, works of computer art can be created that are not game-oriented but that use many of the features developed in video games. Still another format for interactivity is often discussed under the general heading of hypertext. Hypertext involves the lateral movement and linking of a potentially infinite series of data pools. It allows for nonlinear explorations of a range of data bases; that is, unlike presentational modes, in hypertext there is no established forward path through the data. For example, Jerome McGann and colleagues are at work on an edition of the complete works of Dante Rossetti that will include multiple discrepant versions of his published poems along with ms versions of these poems, together with his related paintings as well as source material for the paintings and the poems. All of this information will be linked so that one can move through the data in many directions. Claims of many enthusiastic hypetextualists notwithstanding, many of the most radical features of hypertext are technologies made available by the invention of alphabetic writing and greatly facilitated by the development of printing and bookmaking. Such formats as page and line numbering, indexes, tables of contents, concordances, and cross-referencing for in encyclopedias and card catalogs, are, in effect, hypertextual. Much of the innovative poetry of the past 100 years relies on the concept of hypertextuality as a counter to the predominance of linear reading and writing methods. While hypertext may seem like a particular innovation of computer processing, since data on a computer does not have to be accessed sequentially (which is to say it is "randomly" accessible), it becomes a compensatory access tool partly because you can't flip though a date base the way you can flip through pages or index cards. (I'm thinking, for example, of Robert Grenier's great poem, Sentences, which is printed on 500 index cards in a Chinese foldup box.) Finally--my third category--interconnectivity utilizes the network capability of linked systems such as the internet and formats such as listserves, bulletin boards, newsgroups, and group-participation MUDs (multi-user domains) and MOOs and other "real-time" multi-user formats. Inteconnectivity allows for works of collaboration, linking, and exchange, as well as a the possibility of simultaneous-event or immediate-response structures. Interconnectivity turns the screen into a small stage and in this way combines features of theater with writing and graphic art. The most static of the three modes I have just defined is the presentation screen mode. Presentational screen media will merge with what is now available via broadcast TV, video cassettes, or video disk and CD. But, of course, certain computer features will provide novel methods for searching or scanning material, for example, enabling particular item or graphic or song or word amidst a large data base. Yet because computer screens are often smaller than TV screens, a class of interactive and presentational screen art can take advantage of the more intimate single-viewer conditions now associated with books and drawings. Indeed new technologies for viewing texts may well supplant print as the dominant medium for writing and graphics. Books, I should add, will not be replaced --and certainly will not come superfluous--any more than printing replaced handwriting or made it superfluous; these are different media and texts or graphics disseminated through them will have different qualities. Nonetheless, it is useful to consider graphic and verbal works created specifically for the intimate presentational or interactive space of the small screen that use features specific to the CPU environment, including scrolling, lateral movements, dissolves, the physical properties of the different screen types (lcd, gas plasma, active matrix color)--an extension into the CPU environment of the sort of work associated with Nam June Paikation of the video environment. The status of computer-generated films may help to test my typology. Anything that can can also, and with increasing resolution, be projected on a movie screen. Nonetheless, it is still possible to distinguish, as distinct support media, the small backlit screen of the TV and computer monitor and the large projection-system screen of film. Moreover, the scale, conditions of viewing, and typifying formats make video, film, and TV three different media, just as animation, photography and computer graphics may be said to be distinct media within film. (Hybridization and cross-viewing remain, of course, and active and welcome possibility.) Computer-generated graphics, then, may be classified as presentation computer art modelled on small screens for big screen projection. Note, also, that I have not included in my sketch nonscreen art that uses computers for their operation (for example, robotic installations and environments)--a category that is likely to far surpass the screen arts in the course of time.

[Slide #1: Petah Coyne] But I don't want to talk about computers but objects, objects obduring in the face of automation: I picture here a sculpture from Petah Coyne's recent show at the Jack Shainman Gallery. For it has never been the object of art to capture the thing itself, but rather the conditions of thingness: its thickness, its intractability, its untranslatability or unreproducability,semiotic density, opacity, particularity and peculiarity, its complexity.

[Slide #2: Karen Dolmanish] For this reason, I was delighted to see a show of new sculpture at Exit Art last month that seemed to respond to my increasing desire for sculpture and painting thick with its material obsessiveness, work whose response to the cyberworld is not to hop on board for the ride or play the angles between parasite and symbiosis--but to insist ever more intractability of its own "radical faith," to quote the title of this work by Karen Dolmanish

[Slide #3: Byron Clercx] Object: to call into question, to disagree, to wonder at, to puzzle over, to stare at -- Object: something made inanimate, lifeless, a thing debased or devalued -- Whatever darker Freudian dreams of objects and their relations I may have had while writing this essay, nothing could come close to Byron Clercx's witty sculpture, "Big Stick," in which he has compressed and laminated 20 volumes of the complete works of the father of psychoanalysis into one beautifully crafted Vienna Slugger, evoking both the uncanny and the sublime ~ finally, an American Freud. Here is the return of the book with a vengeance, proof positive that books are not the same as texts. Go try doing that to a batch of floppy disks or CD-ROMs.

[Slide #4: Jess]. In Jess's 1991 paste-up "Dyslecstasy", we get some glimpse of what hypertext might one day be able to achieve. Collaged from thousands of tiny scraps collected over many years, Jess creates an environment of multiple levels and dizzyingly shifting contexts; and yet in this world made of tiny particulars, it is their relation and mutual inhabitation that overwhelms and confirms.

[Slide #5: Susan Bee, "Masked Ball"] I long for the handmade, the direct application of materials on an uneven surface. I feel ever more the need for the embedded and encrusted images and glossings and tones and contours of forgotten and misplaced lore, as in Susan Bee's painting "Masked Ball." I want to contrast the solitary conditions of viewing a work on a computer screen my posture fixed, my eyes 10 inches from the image, with the physicality of looking at a painting or sculpture in a large room, moving around it, checking it out from multiple views, taking in its tacticle surface, its engagement with my thoughts.

[Slide #6: Susan Bee, "Help"] & here, a final image from Susan Bee
-- On the journey of life, lost in cyberspace, where will we find ourselves: not who we are but who we will be, our virtual reality.

--Charles Bernstein ([redacted])

↑ Index

15. Marjorie Perloff
Re: prequel to long post
Fri 22 Apr 1994

> I am going to send to the Poetics list an essay I recently presented on the "art object" in an age of electronic communication. It is about 15 screenfulls long--this is an advance warning. I'm not sure it's a good idea to send such long pieces in this way; let me know what you think.
>
> Meanwhile, how's the weather? Publish any good books lately (online catalogs welcome)?
>
> --Charles Bernstein

Wonderful to get Charles's electronic piece and it's not too long at all. Would that most of my e-mail were as interesting! The essay is right on! But depressing as well. Those images of the Barbara Streisand home show!. Is life no more than this? Meanwhile, my class is reading (this week) ISLETS AND IRRIT- ATIONS and getting ready (next week) for a visit from Marjorie Welish and Rae Armantrout. Hello to all! Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

16. Toshi Ishihara

first

Fri 22 Apr 1994

Charles Bernstein suggested that I post a description of my manuscript--a Ph.D. dissertation from SUNY, Buffalo-- on the poetics board, so here it is. I'm in the process of looking for a publisher.

Ran's Notebook and Drawing Book: Speculations by a Japanese Woman on Cultural Differences represents my own experience as a woman, an outsider, and an exile, in a series of "silent" pictures drawn with a language, a language embodied in a dancing figure, fluctuating in meanings. Ran's book is driven by her desire to retrieve the the lost story of "Father and Mother" in China, her hunger for stories of her own--Japan's own--past, and her need to restore a lost sense of the feminine to herself. The book traces a development of Ran from a state of being in "turmoil" to a blooming as an "orchid." ("Ran" means both in Japanese).

What follows is a brief descriptive summary of the manuscript:

The first Chapter in Part One, Ran's Notebook, is woven out of three stories--the ancient Japanese myth of Amaterasu Ohmikami, the Sun Goddess; a standard history of Japan (from which accounts of good and powerful women have been excluded); and the story of Ran, myself. All of these represent the re-emergence of femininity. By interlocking these texts, I try to show one lives with the history of one's country and how the story of one's life is inevitably an embodiment of a national myth.

The second Chapter in Ran's Notebook deals with the issue of naming, writing, and the physical nature of language. Here I integrate Ran's story with my interpretation of writing by two well known Asian American writers, Makine Hong Kingston and Amy Tan.

Part Two is titled My Drawing Book. The change of possessive pronouns reveals a process of self-assertion. My intention for inventing Ran, who is named after Orlando, the character who runs through all of this material up till now, is to show that personality is not something to be taken for granted, but a construct which comes into being through the process of being observed by others and observing oneself. In My Drawing Book gradually this persona, Ran, is made to fade and move to one side as the "I" gains confidence to speak in her own voice.

The myth of another goddess, Amenouzume, "one who dances in whirls," is retold with a focus on her dancing body as a critical site where a feminist re-reading of body is configurated. The account of her dance also plays an important role in my exploration of the kinds of bonds that can exist among women. Other accounts drawn from tales of Amenouzume--her listening to a god's advice, for instance, or her killing an animal that refuses to speak-- run parallel to Ran's (my) experience of logophobia in the English language.

The shift from writing to drawing in Parts One and Two shows my transformation from a self nervous about linear and clear-cut thinking to a self imaginative and creative, favoring a circular and pictorial representation. I suggest this pictorial mode of expression has its roots in a perception peculiar to the ideographic Japanese language.

In Part Three, Conversation Piece, I consider the reason for my father's recourse to a foreign tongue. It shows the powerful effect of his silence in that he communicates not through verbal utterance but through making others see by means of his actions. My conclusion is that my "silent" mode of expression is my father's gift to me, the path he wanted me to follow.

What follows is cited from a report of Linda Reinfeld (author of Language Poetry: Writing as Rescue, Louisiana State University Press, 1992) who served as the outside reader of my dissertation:

The book constitutes a most revealing meditation on language as a positive agent of transformation in the experience of a Japanese woman living in the United States. As she emerges from the persona of "Ran" (meaning "turmoil" in Japanese) through her own writing, she weaves together strands of stories from ancient Japanese mythology, Japanese history, and her own personal experience, including her experience as a sophisticated reader of such Asian-American writers as Maxine Hong Kingston and Amy Tan. In showing how her own story is an embodiment of a national myth, the author manages to keep each strand of her narrative distinct and free of sentimentality, thus achieving a sense of depth and multiplicity in a feminist construction of self. The writing is at all times engaging and imaginative, drawing much of its strength and scholarly excellence from an understanding of pictorial, poetic, and ideographic modes of expression. "Ran's Notebook and Drawing Book" is a unique demonstration of what it might mean, right now, to live in more than one language and more than one time--as sooner or later, all of us must.

I'd welcome comments, questions, or advice from the readers on Poetics.

---Toshi Ishihara: [redacted]---

↑ Index

17. Kenneth Sherwood

Sarajevo, travel and art.

Tue 26 Apr 1994

Received from Geert Lovink (Amsterdam) as originally posted by [redacted] (Nermin Zukic).

B O S N E T Apr. 11, 1994

[Reprinted without permission, for fair use only] [This text is reproduced unedited]

04/04/94 SARAJEVO POSTCARD

BACK ON TRACK
By Zlatko Dizdarevic

Sometime last summer, when we still used to try to imagine the day when everything would finally stop and we could head south, toward the sea, one of my friends said: "As far as I'm concerned, I'll know the war is over when the trolleys start running again and, like in the old days, I can get on the No. 2 and take it to the end of the line, right to Villa Cengic. And we can pass all the way across

'Sniper's Avenue,' but no one will be shooting at us."

We laughed then, looking over the twisted tracks, the fallen power lines, the wrecked and burned-out trolleys. The trolleys remained exactly where grenade and mortar shells had stopped them dead in their tracks in May of 1992. It seemed like everything else--the end of the war, a return to normal life--would come before the trolleys started running again. We figured that we'd get to the sea by car, or maybe even somewhere farther by plane, before we'd be able to make it to Villa Cengic on the No. 2 red line.

Things turned out differently. The conflict made fools of us again. When it comes to forecasting war and peace, politics and life, we have to admit, once more, that we're complete amateurs. The trolley is running. The tracks have been straightened out. The power lines have been put up and a few red cars, in mint condition, have been hauled out from God knows where. But none of this has anything to do with the end of the war we had imagined. And it has nothing to do with what our trip on the No. 2 would have meant. There is still no peace waiting for us at Villa Cengic.

What stands out most about the No. 2, as it makes its way through dead neighborhoods, is the route's senselessness. The trip is nothing more than movement from one place to another within the same concentration camp, the same prison. Once upon a time we used to sit in the No. 2 and head down to Bascarsija, the heart of the Old City of Sarajevo. Today the area is just a gaping hole, empty and calm. We used to get on the No. 1 and head for the railroad station and then go on from there, by train, to other places. Like people. Now there are no trains; there isn't even a railroad station. If they start the No. 1 again, what good will it be if it only serves the same bogus purpose as the No. 2? There were times when we used to pile into the No. 3 and somehow make it to Ilidza. And from there we could go wherever our hearts desired: down the old tree-lined avenue to the source of the Bosnia River, up to Mt. Igman or even to nowhere in particular. Thanks to the world's kindness and affection, Ilidza now belongs to "them"; it is at the other end of the world, somewhere on another planet. You can't get there, as everyone well knows, by trolley. A revived No. 3 won't be able to do us much good either.

The No. 2 is off and running, and everything else stays still, with very little hope that anything is about to change. What a blunder it was to think that, one day, a trolley would take us to freedom. For the rest of the world-
-especially for the politicians and diplomats who try to get us to accept their lies, who try to get us to tell the world how happy we are--the resurrected trolley is a triumph. But what is it to us? How can we even begin to explain that we've always liked going to Ilidza, the railroad station, Mostar, the sea? And that we'd much rather go to these places on foot than have the ability to "freely" roll to nowhere on a trolley. As the No. 2 stops at every station on its aborted route across nothing, it creates an illusion that is equally senseless, revolting and desperate.

Of course, it isn't easy trying to explain this to people who think that the only aim in life is to fill your stomach and your pockets, and that you can be as happy as a cow in five square meters of living space as long as you have your mercy provisions--the gift of a "landlord" or humanitarian organization. It's also tough to put a damper on the warm feelings of all those who helped get "Operation Trolley" underway by sending money, technicians and even cameramen, just to make sure it was recorded for posterity. The "international community" also kept its honor intact and showed its strength, so its leaders have good reason for a victorious toast over a glass of whiskey. A great nightmare no longer bears down on them in quite the same way or in quite the same place. That nightmare hopped onto the red line, Sarajevo's No. 2, and it's making the rounds now, to the general contentment of some of the exhausted and depleted citizens of Sarajevo.

But it's slightly more difficult to sell this story to those in Sarajevo who are still using their own heads to think with, something that, apparently, may constitute this disobedient city's gravest sin. A few days ago Afan Ramic, an artist, was talking with some people from Japan who had come to visit his studio, which is in an abandoned building that used to be a printing plant. They were a fine bunch, very serious, dignified and sincere. They listened carefully, spoke carefully and made offers even more carefully. For hours they studied the canvases, took pictures of the works. Then, with great tact and meticulously chosen words, they conveyed a message to the painter: their t.v. station, as well as their government, would be honored if he, the Sarajevan artist Afan Ramic, would come to Japan with his paintings. There would be exhibitions, and all expenses would be paid. In short, they saw no problems except, of course, whether this "extremely interesting" painter would be willing to accept their invitation. Would this trip upset any other plans he might have made? Did he find the concept to his liking? Were there any special conditions that needed to be met?

"I looked at them for a while without really knowing what to say. I wasn't really sure, to tell you the truth, whether or not they were pulling my leg or whether they were serious," Afan said later. "I always admired the Japanese for their seriousness. Could it be that after 700 days of imprisonment, hunger, personal tragedy and every other kind of misery imaginable, they were really asking me whether or not I wanted to go to Japan and have a show? And what's more, did they have any idea what they were saying when they claimed that everything would be o.k. as far as traveling was concerned? Then I decided to ask them what, around here, always ends up being the most important question: 'That's all well and good as far as Tokyo and Osaka go; I have no doubt that it's also nice in Nagoya and Yokohama, but how am I going to get past the Serb barricades on Ilidza?' I got the feeling that they felt confused and didn't quite grasp what I was asking them. I actually began feeling sorry for them. Then I said, more to myself: `Forget about it, don't worry, I'll get to Ilidza by trolley.'"

The Japanese went off happy that they had gotten Afan to come to their country. The painter was left to wait for the trolley to Ilidza, or some other mode of transportation the international community could arrange. After all, when you get past Ilidza and that last barricade, everything is a lot easier. From there to Japan isn't far at all.

Zlatko Dizdarevic, is author of Sarajevo: A War Journal (Fromm). This article was translated by Ammiel Alcalay.

BosNet is also available as a moderated Usenet group BIT.LISTSERV.BOSNET Check with your sys/net administrator about getting the feed for your site(s)/node(s).

↑ Index

18. peter quartermain
Summer Reading
Thu 28 Apr 1994

---

so to get my head back into a _place_
I'm looking to read by decent means some decent poems and decent poets
I haven't read before

whatever decent means

I figure that if I list one or two that I like but you may not know about why then, maybe you'll send me some names living or dead and titles (likewise I'm sure)

So try
"The Weekend of Dermot and Grace"
by Eugene R. Watters. _Poetry-Ireland_Review_ 13 (Spring 1985): 25-71 first published Dublin: Allen Figgis & Co 1964 -- surely there's a copy in Fubbalo and if you see any of his work around in recent magazines (try Peter Riley's Poetical Histories or Harry Gilonis' Form Books -- Gilonis also publishes Catherine Walsh Colin Simms and I think Wendy Mulford) get hold of Maurice Scully also Irish. Pig Press is bringing out a new Scully book soon, called _Basic_Colours_

But if you want some wonderful well call it prose steal borrow beg or even buy Rob Kovitz
_Pig_City_Model_Farm_
Toronto
Treyf
1992
(dist in USA by Princeton Arhitectural Press) a brilliant collage attack on just about anything to do with the rule of, well, rule -- and even (shudder) community.

What a blessed relief it is that NONE of these books is flavoured with Parfum du Professorat or even Sachet d'eleve
though they are not by that guaranteed to be wholesome.

And if you've got this far through this list
there's a BONUS QUOTE as reward and punishment: Laura's mother in Lola Lemire Tostevin's new novel _Frog_Moon_ (Dunvegan, Ontario
Cormorant Books 1994) asks and answers
"Do you know what the actress said to the bishop who was wearing a surplice and swinging his incense vessel?
Love your dress, darling, but your purse is on fire."

Peter Quartermain

↑ Index

19. sondheim
(Forwarded) : Obj
Thu 28 Apr 1994

Forwarded message:
From: Self <ZEOS/SONDHEIM>
To: [redacted]
Subject: : Obj
Date: 27 Apr 94 20:17:49

I've read your paper, and wanted to comment particularly on the notion of "objects obduring" - it reminds me of my use of "obdurate" in my text; there is also a convergence of idea as well. One reason I continue to look at and write about painting (for example) is pre- cisely this inertness which slows down or retards a flow of information which ultimately becomes a question of manageriality and "kill" files. A traditional painting is handcrafted; the "signature" of the body is everywhere present upon it, as is the signifier of labor. This is an insistence on alterity (I think in the sense of Levinas) that's extremely important. I get tired of "cyber" and "surfing" modes which imply a fast skim-and-response to ideas.

I'm sending along a piece I wrote which you may or may not want to post; it's for you in any case.

ALan

↑ Index

20. Charles Bernstein

Alan Sondheim's "The Start of It All" (forwarded)

Thu 28 Apr 1994

From: IN%"[redacted]" 27-APR-1994 20:22:02.02 Subj: : Obj

THE START OF IT ALL

Back home, I would think about altarity. But now, wandering in a hermeneutic circle would never square with me...

I'm sitting down to write; I have a reed in my hand, and the sand is spread out before me. The river in the distance has overflowed its banks, and is just now receding. There is a banquet nearby; I will go there shortly, and regale the guests with tales about carpenters and chariot-makers. In this manner, I will earn my keep. Before going out, I make sure it is night; even the stars have their master, and everything is fixed, absolute, and in place forever.

At the banquet, I discourse freely to everyone who will listen. Some charming dancers entertain the guests, a few of whom are members of the Resistance. There is fighting right now outside Jena and the avenues are tense; I can see the imminent victory of the Prussian state, a natural trajectory of the dialectic, beginning with my doubting everything, an occasion for eschatological desire. An abyss opens up beside me; within it, annihilation itself seems to seethe, and there is no end to the affairs of men and women. The ideal state to come will have no poets and no philosophers, something I conclusively demonstrate with all the power of the geometric. Since I am a misfit, I elevate myself to the top of the mountain where red flames dominate the landscape; there are those who dominate and those who are controlled by my subaltern ego. But I reject every pretense, and wear nothing but a barrel; let those who dare to look, do so. (Need I add it would be queerer to gaze?)

>From this vantage point, next to a peasant hut in the Black Forest where men and women are suddenly thrown, I see a red patch, unidentifiable, but offering every attribute I am considering before me. The patch is surely the same in all possible worlds, where it possesses the characteristic of a fact or picture, a rigid designator articulating the armature of an over-privileged semantics. I may or may not refer to `it.' If I become the red patch, it is beneath the sign of capital; capital flows from my pores, flows everywhere. I dissolve slowly into transparency, a simulacrum of my former self, and continue to write on a simulacrum-computer, filling all conceivable data-bases with useless Turing machines; I transform myself into a body-without-organs in the terminal stages: constipation, corpulence, power and madness. This is the dreaded `death of the author' signified in each and every postcard, where letters `go to the drugstore' of the obsessive-compulsive. The red patch illuminates the desk I am writing upon, as the final apocalyptic conflagration envisions itself from a distance. All I can do is raise my fist as Europe shudders, corpse-like, beneath its sullen masters.

My clenched fist in the air is helpless against the stone I continue to push up the mountain, which seems slightly absurd, even if transcendent and rather egotistical. The mathematization of the granite, rather concrete, results in almost perfect lines of flight across it; these coalesce with the identical categories available to the Beaver, who waits for me with Pierre at the cafe shortly after the symposium has come to an end. No good ever flows from this, the death of Helene on the way to the final construction of a purified and scientific political economy, something I can live with, having roamed the streets of Manchester, in order to bring the philosophical down to the level of material praxis and avoiding any further reification. What an imaginary!

The red patch over my eyes is painful; I am hobbled, resorting to the aphoristic crutch in order to convey my dislike of princes and the press. The uncanny power of women contaminates every line I add to the others; it is only through the telephone and its interminable existential dial-up, that I continue to turn a deaf ear to the world and its discourse-networks, harboring the unequivocal testimony of sight. Everywhere, sight leaves its traces; the punctured hymen of the Beaver provides a final word, projecting from her hole into a freedom always already structured by its opposite. Double lips shudder, reducing me to an imaginary penis, uncapped head indicative of the non-believing Jew exiled from the habitus of the Amsterdam synagogue. Men always do this, and this is what makes them men. I realize that if men are analytic, women are synthetic; the Beaver says it's the other way around. (My statement has never been spoken by a body.)

What makes them men is a purified techne as well, something I would respond to if questioned. Every question demands an answer, but not every answer demands a question, which is ineffable, written on this book of sand that shoots out from under me every twelve or so hours. But I am of the technological, the episteme of instrumental reason, not remote or disembodied in an ideal world inhabited by the elements crowned with the Concept of the Idea. Outside the window there is a tree of a particular color which the Navajo see; I can never take in each of its leaves on an individuated basis, just as I can never count the pillars in the Pantheon. Better, however, is an act of exile which is reconstruction, always reversible, except for the brute facticity of death, to which I am hardly partial, being somewhat super. Now I am gathering speed, becoming incandescent; fragments and seminars course through my veins close to the speed of light, competing among themselves, completing the torn fabric of the real (always the scenario of suture), mumbling through those same veiled lips that sealed my internal-time consciousness about ten minutes ago.

I am lost in the ipseity of my freedom, confused about beings (there are so many of them) and Being confused. The eidetic reduction is a diminution of the obverse; I drink less and less natural kinds as hypereality transforms null into cipher, leaving me with `a smaller glass' of tea. The inverse of the glass is neither opaque nor convex; a node within the grid of doxa cathects every drop spilled from the fluid mechanics of the feminine. The result? More rigid designators and more masquerades: the mimetic indeed!

And what is the real if not a game constructed out of the consensual sublime? What is the sublime if not a differend inverted by silence (that makes all the differance in the world, being less noisy!)? The sublime is always silent? Sound is the institutionalization of capital, the rigidity of the script fixed in a prioritization of the written over the purely oral and its stages. Each question eliminates itself; speech is an act of excretion. The cave is silent, too, where men and women watch. (Speech is always four-fold; no one has time for that.) In the corner of the cave is perhaps a snake; it may also be a rod, or rod(ent), whatever is relevant at the moment, whatever might or might not bite. The id has the face of Medusa, an alterity defining an essence or existing seeping away, the result of insomnia, difficulties of health. I write this in the sand until my head is cut off.

[redacted]

↑ Index

21. sondheim

Sending out again...

Fri 29 Apr 1994

THE START OF IT ALL

Back home, I would think about altarity. But now, wandering in a hermeneutic circle would never square with me...

I'm sitting down to write; I have a reed in my hand, and the sand is spread out before me. The river in the distance has overflowed its banks, and is just now receding. There is a banquet nearby; I will go there shortly, and regale the guests with tales about carpenters and chariot-makers. In this manner, I will earn my keep. Before going out, I make sure it is night; even the stars have their master, and everything is fixed, absolute, and in place forever.

At the banquet, I discourse freely to everyone who will listen. Some charming dancers entertain the guests, a few of whom are members of the Resistance. There is fighting right now outside Jena and the avenues are tense; I can see the imminent victory of the Prussian state, a natural trajectory of the dialectic, beginning with my doubting everything, an occasion for eschatological desire. An abyss opens up beside me; within it, annihilation itself seems to seethe, and there is no end to the affairs of men and women. The ideal state to come will have no poets and no philosophers, something I conclusively demonstrate with all the power of the geometric. Since I am a misfit, I elevate myself to the top of the mountain where red flames dominate the landscape; there are those who dominate and those who are controlled by my subaltern ego. But I reject every pretense, and wear nothing but a barrel; let those who dare to look, do so. (Need I add it would be queerer to gaze?)

>From this vantage point, next to a peasant hut in the Black Forest where men and women are suddenly thrown, I see a red patch, unidentifiable, but offering every attribute I am considering before me. The patch is surely the same in all possible worlds, where it possesses the characteristic of a fact or picture, a rigid designator articulating the armature of an over-privileged semantics. I may or may not refer to `it.' If I become the red patch, it is beneath the sign of capital; capital flows from my pores, flows everywhere. I dissolve slowly into transparency, a simulacrum of my former self, and continue to write on a simulacrum-computer, filling all conceivable data-bases with useless Turing machines; I transform myself into a body-without-organs in the terminal stages: constipation, corpulence, power and madness. This is the dreaded `death of the author' signified in each and every postcard, where letters `go to the drugstore' of the obsessive-compulsive. The red patch illuminates the desk I am writing upon, as the final apocalyptic conflagration envisions itself from a distance. All I can do is raise my fist as Europe shudders, corpse-like, beneath its sullen masters.

My clenched fist in the air is helpless against the stone I continue to push up the mountain, which seems slightly absurd, even if transcendent and rather egotistical. The mathematization of the granite, rather concrete, results in almost perfect lines of flight across it; these coalesce with the identical categories available to the Beaver, who waits for me with Pierre at the cafe shortly after the symposium has come to an end. No good ever flows from this, the death of Helene on the way to the final construction of a purified and scientific political economy, something I can live with, having roamed the streets of Manchester, in order to bring the philosophical down to the level of material praxis and avoiding any further reification. What an imaginary!

The red patch over my eyes is painful; I am hobbled, resorting to the aphoristic crutch in order to convey my dislike of princes and the press. The uncanny power of women contaminates every line I add to the others; it is only through the telephone and its interminable existential dial-up, that I continue to turn a deaf ear to the world and its discourse-networks, harboring the unequivocal testimony of sight. Everywhere, sight leaves its traces; the punctured hymen of the Beaver provides a final word, projecting from her hole into a freedom always already structured by its opposite. Double lips shudder, reducing me to an imaginary penis, uncapped head indicative of the non-believing Jew exiled from the habitus of the Amsterdam synagogue. Men always do this, and this is what makes them men. I realize that if men are analytic, women are synthetic; the Beaver says it's the other way around. (My statement has never been spoken by a body.)

What makes them men is a purified techne as well, something I would respond to if questioned. Every question demands an answer, but not every answer demands a question, which is ineffable, written on this book of sand that shoots out from under me every twelve or so hours. But I am of the technological, the episteme of instrumental reason, not remote or disembodied in an ideal world inhabited by the elements crowned with the Concept of the Idea. Outside the window there is a tree of a particular color which the Navajo see; I can never take in each of its leaves on an individuated basis, just as I can never count the pillars in the Pantheon. Better, however, is an act of exile which is reconstruction, always reversible, except for the brute facticity of death, to which I am hardly partial, being somewhat super. Now I am gathering speed, becoming incandescent; fragments and seminars course through my veins close to the speed of light, competing among themselves, completing the torn fabric of the real (always the scenario of suture), mumbling through those same veiled lips that sealed my internal-time consciousness about ten minutes ago.

I am lost in the ipseity of my freedom, confused about beings (there are so many of them) and Being confused. The eidetic reduction is a diminution of the obverse; I drink less and less natural kinds as hypereality transforms null into cipher, leaving me with `a smaller glass' of tea. The inverse of the glass is neither opaque nor convex; a node within the grid of doxa cathects every drop spilled from the fluid mechanics of the feminine. The result? More rigid designators and more masquerades: the mimetic indeed!

And what is the real if not a game constructed out of the consensual sublime? What is the sublime if not a differend inverted by silence (that makes all the differance in the world, being less noisy!)? The sublime is always silent? Sound is the institutionalization of capital, the rigidity of the script fixed in a prioritization of the written over the purely oral and its stages. Each question eliminates itself; speech is an act of excretion. The cave is silent, too, where men and women watch. (Speech is always four-fold; no one has time for that.) In the corner of the cave is perhaps a snake; it may also be a rod, or rod(ent), whatever is relevant at the moment, whatever might or might not bite. The id has the face of Medusa, an alterity defining an essence or existing seeping away, the result of insomnia, difficulties of health. I write this in the sand until my head is cut off.

[redacted]

↑ Index

22. sondheim

Return from Mistaken Address

Fri 29 Apr 1994

THE STORY OF HORROR WHICH DID NOT HAPPEN TO ME AND IS NOT A STORY

I never had any feeling; ice went up my ass. Everything was dull and frozen. Packed in without feeling. A grey horizon of light. Iron spears of pressure-dependent pain. I was immobile. My eyes felt iced shut. Soaked. The chill is unbearable. I have no number. My blood freezes as my skin bleeds. Nameless. A rotunda.

They turn me over. Flesh cracks; there's blood something transparent on the concrete. "On." Teeth are gone. I know my lip is split but I do not know "I." Oh told to write this you have it.

I am packed frozen between two women. They shove her breast in my mouth. I can't move. The body stashes its tremble. A convulsion. The cock grows of its own accord. I bend double. The women pack closer. One is thrown off and killed. Oh Clara the other one. She places her mouth on my eye. It moves. I have a tear on my skin. Eye screams with pain because it is moved.

My cock is hard. Oh Clara holds it, shoves it in. My back collapses and broken everywhere. It pierces me. Her cunt rings fire. It's of no use of use. Leans forward, braces. They tear her off me. They tear me in two. They put her on me. My back breaks in four places. They tear her off me.

Eye am warmed by ice Oh Clara. Oh Clara your breasts hard against me. Slab concrete buckles. We fall tight, her cunt sewn on cock, eye sewn on eye. Sutures everywhere. Leg leg.

Jagged ice everywhere, cut eye. I cannot rise. Oh Clara told to write this Oh Clara have it Oh Clara you have at it. Blood cracks from her mouth. She has no mouth, eye has no lid, open Clara cock. You cock I am dropped. My back breaks, Clara breaks. Cure this; cure this "on." A last sentence. What can I period. Clara drops. For they drop: drop us. For they cut: cut us. For they break: break us. Eye am open always. Sutured shut.

Eugen Kogan, THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF HELL, pp. 165-166: `Himmler was especially interested in methods of warming persons who had been severely chilled. In a number of series this was done by means of naked women, brought from Ravensbruck for the purpose. "Personally I believe," Himmler wrote Rascher, now promoted to SS captain, "these experiments may bring the best and most sustained results, but of course I may be mistaken." He was not mistaken. Rascher was able to report in detail how revived subjects practiced sexual intercourse at 86 to 90 degrees F. and that this proved to be the equivalent of a "hot bath." When placed between two naked women, the subjects did not recover as rapidly as with one woman. "I attribute this to the fact that in warming by means of one woman personal inhibitions are avoided and the woman clings very closely to the chilled person (cf. Curve 4).' From the blurb inside front cover: `THIS WAS HELL ON EARTH / They: Injected innocent people with disease germs for the greater glory of German ... Made lamp shades from human skin ... Revived frozen men by the use of naked women ... Utilized the body fats of millions for the German war effort ... Put to death more people than any other tyranny in the history of the world ...'

> I do not tell a story. I do not cling to the truth. I do not cling to anything. My skin falls from my bones. I am an electric galaxy. I do not have to live here. I am told: You can go and live wherever you want and it will be okay. I am told: Nothing happened because this is not a story. I cannot help clinging. I am hopeless, having no hope for myself. What would that be like. I do not understand this woman wanting this desire. I have lied to you from the beginning.
>
> Do you want to tell something, to tell the truth. There is no truth, there is nothing.
>
> You transform into dialog, into dialogic; you turn, turn away from me. Oh Clara nothing happened. Do not read the signs!
>
> The signs are there to be read. Or there are no signs, only marks. There are marks made by nails into floors, marks splintering flesh; there are marks but no eyes
>
> There are eyes nothing to read, no marks nothing, you do not know this nothing or imagined or dream torn from its moorings
>
> There are no marks be quiet >>>>Yes be quiet

"It is a description of the closest thing to hell in human history." --Reinhold Niebuhr

I AM FULL OF HOLES [redacted]

for clara

↑ Index

23. Robert Creeley
Beatnik Bliss
Fri 29 Apr 1994

Late Breaking News!!!

Wednesdays at 4
is o'er--

BUT

Wednesday, May 4th
at 7:30 (dig it)

at the CPG will be

Teducation's

TED JOANS

fresh from Parisian Haunts and African Big Changes...

You all come, you hear?
Help keep the beat

↑ Index

24. Michael Metzger
Re: Beatnik Bliss
Sat 30 Apr 1994

OK, what's the CPG??

↑ Index

25. Charles Bernstein
Re: Beatnik Bliss
Sat 30 Apr 1994

> OK, What is CPG?

Central Park Grill, 2519 Main Street, Buffalo, NY (USA)

We are working to bring these events on-line in interactive formats not yet devised. The Poetics Technical Crew is having particular trouble bringing into the model the free wings (with blue cheese dressing) generously provided by the bar after each reading. But we pledge not to go on the World Wide Web with this type of, as they say on TV, "live" programming until we attend to details such as these.

"POETICS@UBVM: so real you can taste it"

↑ Index

26. Robert Creeley
Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies
Sat 30 Apr 1994

If I had the wings of a chicken
to the great CPG
I would fly

and sit right up front there and listen to all that great shit flying by...

You all come, folks.
Listen to your Uncle Charlie!

You hear?

.....

OH

You can't get hear from there, man,
You can't get hair from a chair, man.

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

May 1994

40 messages · Sun 1 May 1994 – Fri 27 May 1994

May 1994 is the month the UB Poetics list lost its collective mind, and did so on purpose, and produced thereby one of the loveliest things in its early archive. What had begun in April as a modest thread called Beatnik Bliss ferments over the month into a full collaborative romp — CBGEEBIES, chicken wings, CP Geebies, a running doggerel poem passed hand to hand under a rotating carousel of ever-sillier subject-lines. Some forty letters, and the great majority of them in rhyme.

Joe Amato strikes the first note, cheerfully absurd, angling for “for some talky bleu cheese dipped fare”, and the thing is off. The surprise, and the delight, is who picks it up: Robert Creeley, of all people, seizes the baton and will not let go, filing seven separate contributions in a month, rhyming his way through menus and farewells and small hours. “I can't keep up the rhyme no more”, he protests around two in the morning, and then, of course, keeps it up.

It becomes properly choral. Mark Wallace answers the call with the month's best throwaway line — “I can't fly, though sure can sit” — and Marc Nasdor and Robert Kelly crowd in, Kelly lifting the register for a moment to note that “The life of that city rouses over and over” before the nonsense reclaims him. The pleasure of reading it now is watching serious poets discover that they can be silly together without ceasing, for an instant, to be poets.

There is a small poetics buried in the fun, as there always is. A collaborative rhyme passed around a mailing list is the social poem of February's arguments made suddenly, unpretentiously actual — authorship dissolved into the group, the medium's back-and-forth turned from a limitation into the very form of the thing. What the theorists could not settle in prose, the chicken thread quietly demonstrates in verse.

It cannot last, and it knows it cannot, which is part of why it is moving as well as funny — a spring fling, a bout of collective high spirits that the summer will let subside. I have kept the letters in the order the days delivered them, each rhymer forward under his own name, the private numbers swept to black, so that the poem can be read the way it was written: as a room of people, briefly, refusing to be sensible. These were letters before ever they were literature — and never more happily so than here.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 40 in all.

WRITERS

Amato, Joe 1, 12
Arts, Mn Ctr For Book 15
Bernstein, Charles 34, 40
Billitteri, Carla 35
Boughn, Michael 18
Bruce 20
Conte, Joseph 32
Creeley, Robert 2, 8, 10, 14, 16, 19, 31
Drake, Robert 22
Guitart, Jorge 9
Hlazer 24
Huang, Yunte 38
Jed 17
Kelly, Robert 6, 7, 21, 36
Mandel, Tom 11
Moxley, Jennifer 39
Nasdor, Marc 5, 28, 29, 30
Phillips, Patrick 3, 27
Prevallet, Kristen 25
Rasula, Jed 23
Sherwood, Kenneth 37
Sondheim 33
WALLACE, MARK 4, 13, 26

NAMES MENTIONED

Allan, Don 4
Alpert, Barry 19
Americans, Asian 27
And, Miekal 35
Andrews, Bruce 26, 35
Andrews, Jim 35
Bacon, Francis 20
Benjamin, Walter 34
Bennett, John M. 26
Bernstein, Emma 32, 35
Berrigan, Ted 31
Bertholf, Robert J. 35
Blaser, Robin 36
Brainard, Joe 40
Brown, Ann 35, 39
Burns, Elizabeth 26
Clarke, John 35
Coolidge, Clark 32
Davies, Kevin 39
Derrida, Jacques 34
Duncan, Robert 35
Emerson, Claudia 18
Epstein, Thomas 14
Farmer, Steven 35
Federman, Ray 26
Fitterman, Robert 35, 39
Franks, David 19
Friedlander, Benjamin 26, 35
Ganick, Peter 26
Gburek, Jeff 35
Gioia, Dana 32
Gizzi, Peter 39
Grenier, Robert 35
Hamilton, Ian 32
Hansen, Jeff 26
Heath, Jennifer 2, 24
Hecht, Anthony 23
Henri, Charles 11
Hollander, Benjamin 23
Hollo, Anselm 19
Homer 6
Hoover, Edgar 25
Howe, Susan 35
Howe, William 35
Hull, Jeff 35, 39
Jarnot, Lisa 35, 39
Joans, Ted 16
Jordan, June 21
Joyce, Trevor 34
Killian, Kevin 26
Kuszai, Joel 35
Levi, David 35
London, Frank 33
Lowell, Amy 31
Lowenthal, Jessica 39
Mackey, Nathaniel 25
Manning, Nicholas 39
Merrill, James 23
Murphy, Sheila 26
Niedecker, Lorine 24, 31
Nielsen, Aldon L. 26
Norton, John 20, 23, 24, 25, 27, 31
Olson, Kirby 16, 17, 19
Oppen, George 23
Penn, Robert 4
Perkins, Stephen 31
Phillips, Beth 35
Portugal, Anne 33
Pound, Ezra 20
Reed, Pat 35
Retallack, Joan 26
Reznikoff, Charles 23
Rodefer, Stephen 35
Rosenfield, Kim 35
Ross, Joe 39
Schelling, Andrew 35

Schultz, Susan 26
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 2
Sherwood, Ken 16, 37
Silliman, Ron 26
Smith, Colin 34
Smith, Rod 35
Sondheim, Alan 33
Spahr, Juliana 26, 35
Strauss, Zoe 35
Swensen, Cole 26
Trinidad, David 32
Warren, Kenneth 4
Weber, Damian 33
Weiner, Hannah 26
Wright, C. D. 23
Zukofsky, Louis 23, 31

CONCEPTS

Aesthetics 24
Anthologies 3, 20, 23, 24, 25, 27, 31, 32
Archives and libraries 37
Book announcements 34, 35
Copyright and permissions 3
Difficulty 38
Dreams 20, 39, 40
Editing 3, 25, 27
Elegy 33
Empire and imperialism 33
Epic 34
Ethics 16
Experimental poetry 27
Film 40
Gender 22
Humour and satire 4
Ideology 35
Language poetry 32
List moderation 5, 33
Little magazines 26, 35, 39
Lyric poetry 6
Memory 11, 14, 21
Modernism 24, 34
Multiculturalism 24, 25
Music and poetry 14, 15, 21
Nature 4
New York School 32
Obituary and memorial 14
Objectivism 20, 23, 24, 32
Philosophy 34
Place and region 27, 35
Poetics 20, 22, 26, 34, 35, 37, 38
Postmodernism 24
Print vs. digital 38
Religion and the sacred 4, 18
Representation 24
Reviewing and criticism 22, 23, 27, 31, 34
Romanticism 33
Subjectivity 33
The academy 20, 22, 34
The body 33
The canon 27, 31, 34
The internet 3, 27, 34
The listserv 22, 27, 34
Translation 27, 33, 38
Visual art 33

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 40 in all.

1 MAY 1994

1. Joe Amato — Re: Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies
2. Robert Creeley — CBGEEBIES/CHICKEN CHUNKS FOR BEATNIK BLISSTERS

2 MAY 1994

3. Patrick Phillips — kaffee
4. MARK WALLACE — Re: (Forwarded) : Obj
5. Marc Nasdor — Re: Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies

3 MAY 1994

6. Robert Kelly — Re: Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies
7. Robert Kelly — Re: (Forwarded) : Obj
8. Robert Creeley — That Old Blurred Chicken's Got Me In Its Spell...
9. Jorge Guitart — see what they made me do
10. Robert Creeley — Frid CPGbees
11. Tom Mandel — "pure" "physicality"

4 MAY 1994

12. Joe Amato — Re: That Old Blurred Chicken's Got Me In Its Spell...
13. MARK WALLACE — Re: That Old Blurred Chicken's Got Me In Its Spell...
14. Robert Creeley — The Old (Wingless) Chicken's Song
15. Mn Ctr for Book Arts — Re: The Old (Wingless) Chicken's Song

5 MAY 1994

16. Robert Creeley — Chicken Chat
17. Jed — Re: Chicken Chat
18. Michael Boughn — more chatter

7 MAY 1994

19. Robert Creeley — Chicken Feathers
20. Bruce — More chicken musings
21. Robert Kelly — Re: Chicken Feathers
22. Robert Drake — Re: More chicken musings

9 MAY 1994

23. Jed Rasula — Re: More chicken musings
24. hlazer — Re: More chicken musings
25. Kristen Prevallet — Re: More chicken musings
26. MARK WALLACE — Situation Magazine
27. Patrick Phillips — Re: Ribs in Dreamland
28. Marc Nasdor — Re: More chicken musings
29. Marc Nasdor — Re: More chicken musings
30. Marc Nasdor — Re: More chicken musings

10 MAY 1994

31. Robert Creeley — Re: More Chicken Musings
32. Joseph Conte — Re: More chicken musings

11 MAY 1994

33. sondheim — The Year 1800-2200

12 MAY 1994

34. Charles Bernstein — Alberta on My Mind
35. Carla Billitteri — I Am A Child

36. Robert Kelly — Re: Alberta on My Mind

13 MAY 1994

37. Kenneth Sherwood — archiving

16 MAY 1994

38. Yunte Huang — wings, ribs, and books

25 MAY 1994

39. Jennifer Moxley — Impercipient 5

27 MAY 1994

40. Charles Bernstein — I remember Joe Brainard

1. Joe Amato
Re: Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies
Sun 1 May 1994

Take more than chicken wings get me hear from there

But a tin can with strings can man

O! for some talky bleu cheese dipped fare...

↑ Index

2. Robert Creeley
CBGEEBIES/CHICKEN CHUNKS FOR BEATNIK BLISSTERS
Sun 1 May 1994

FIRST LINE FLIGHTS (Chicken Wing Expressed)

Ah, did you once see Shelley plain...
He's back at the CPG again!

Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears...
All he needs is a few more beers.

Careful Observers may fortell the Hour...
Nobody watches the clock around here.

Do not go gentle into that good night...
If you got to go, do it right.

Flat on the bank I parted...
Flat on my back I started.

Give me my scallop-shell of quiet...
Then we can start a riot.

Glory be to God for dappled things...
Hey, that's my coat!

Go, for they call you, shepherd, from the hill...
you old goat...

Anyhow you all come, eat those chicken wings and have some fun, when TED JOANS gets it on at the CPG, Wednesday, May 4th at 7:30.

Ok.

BONUS POEM FIRST VERSE ONLY

"Women he liked, did shovel-bearded Bob,
Old Farmer Hayward of the Heath, but he Loved horses. He himself was like a cob,
And leather coloured. Also he loved a tree..."

--Writ 1916 and published in 1920. Not so long ago, folks. "And gloom, the name alone survives, Bob's Lane..." Sic transit. Better get there (the CPG!) while you can...

↑ Index

3. Patrick Phillips
kaffee
Mon 2 May 1994

For those of us who'll miss the beat of chicken wings @CPG I provide a scent of coffee sent to me by Ferdinand Schmatz - an Austrian poet. The poem is from his collection speise gedichte

I must say he's provided this and other poetry for an anthology of international poetry I am editing, and that though my anthology will be published in book form and interactively on the World Wide Web, he ain't given his permission for this coffee house publication. So, this should be considered a venue-specific flyer of sorts...!

sud an (kaffee)

e

a e e

e ke

e e

e

a e

a e

a f e e

a e e a e

e e

e

--I take all responsibility for any typographical misalignment in the poem - depending upon your text editor, you may have an entirely different cup.

↑ Index

4. MARK WALLACE

Re: (Forwarded) : Obj

Mon 2 May 1994

May I start controversy?
I'm bored because I work for a living.
Yes, in medieval Christian Europe painters were more in touch with their bodies and with the physical nature of the universe than we are in this fallen fly-by-night mechanical reality.
They were able to achieve this state at least partly because of their secure position within feudal society, which admired care
more than we do now.
Perhaps a return to a rural paradise of the sort posited by Johnathan Swift, A. Pope, and more recently Allan Tate and Robert Penn Warren is called for.
We could slow down, we could really take care with our materials again.
We could even have the plague again!-- talk about pure physicality.
Sometimes I wonder, though whether our own current social state emerges from the contradictions of European history, even pre-machines, rather than being a fall from it.

Maybe physicality was always a problem and not a given.
Maybe objects don't completely last anymore than they utterly disappear.
Maybe the middle ages was hell for almost everybody.
But here I am, being interrupted again-- time to go back to work.
I wanted to make my satire jovial, hope it will be taken in that spirit
however the machinery failed me.

↑ Index

5. Marc Nasdor
Re: Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies
Mon 2 May 1994

Yeah, Bob, but it'd be even better in Maryland with a bushel of hot steamed crabs ready for the dissectin'. Anyway, good time to start a flame war about overrated gloppy buffalo wings. DIS! DIS! DIS!

-Marc Nasdor, a/k/a csigaposta (hungarian snail mail)

↑ Index

6. Robert Kelly
Re: Beatnik Bliss & CP Geebies
Tue 3 May 1994

As Homer tells it when I was a kid up there you got a beef and wick at Bai-Lo's
one man could not eat two of, what is this business of scrawny leathery limbs of fowl

I ask you?
Did Arkhilikos get his

in such a way or mute his lyric thumb with blue cheese anything at all (I ask you)

the skin
slips off the string.

Wan suei, friend.

Robert

↑ Index

7. Robert Kelly
Re: (Forwarded) : Obj
Tue 3 May 1994

The least thing (best thing)
we could do to get that worky worthy way
is write in Thinglish.
Try to do.

rk

↑ Index

8. Robert Creeley
That Old Blurred Chicken's Got Me In Its Spell...
Tue 3 May 1994

Must be the heavens
so invite,
in xtian parlance stated--

If chickens could get off the ground,
they never would be eated.

Meantime I fly though god knows why on wings of chicken only.

Though clams be great what we can get in Buffalo is homely.

By which I mean of course all scenes are local and particular.

But now the patient chicken waits*
its wings to part forever.

Here's to bleu cheese, and Joe and me--
and poetry's murmurous meters!

I can't keep up the rhyme
no more... It's time...
Goodbye, dear fri
*Cf. earlier reference: "TED JOANS READING
CPG, May 4, 1994 -- 7:30 PM." World events, etc.

↑ Index

9. Jorge Guitart

see what they made me do

Tue 3 May 1994

---

1 WAY
for D.L & M.S.

by Jorge Guitart

we are our (protein) interactions

i am colloidal said (ms) particle and you? i am mr hydro(phobicity) (by adsorption) recall the great elucidation at the bar

the interfacial behavior

observed solution none information unobtainable
by structural studies alone thin films (of our `lives') fringes of equal chromatic order & "different" wavelengths separated don't interfere constructively with my exiting

& i approached the foul bioreactor your surface energies give rather indirect information

i follow your time evolution in situ

what extraordinary specificity by the crossed cylinders
the depth of my minimum was much greater

why didn't you indicate directly the timescale of your reorientation lips lipid bylayer & interdigitated monolayer why was blockage of binding used to mask attractiveness?

↑ Index

10. Robert Creeley

Frid CPGbees

Tue 3 May 1994

Jorge really gets to me with those questions!
Why was "blockage of binding used
to mask attractiveness..."
Blurred blue sentience?

Buffalo is perhaps the center of the universe
in reverse of all others going from left to right in that order?

But "fri" was not fried Friday, friend.
It was:

"Goodbye, dear friends and neighbors..."
Why "Press RETURN for more"?

Why didn't you
"indicate directly"?
You always used to.

↑ Index

11. Tom Mandel

"pure" "physicality"

Tue 3 May 1994

What is Williams' (Raymond's) tome?
"Town & Country In English Prosey" whose intro tariffs MW's refrain with what just has happened, has just been destroyed.
We need a creole history to know how the messianic jews of smyrna affected revolution in america and france, once their clothes'd been removed and fragrant from the barrels they sat on awaitin' the tribes march north and a cloud to carry Amsterdam to Jerusalem, t'ain't enuff to see it being mixed now as if we used to paint in primary colors of social position, the exception and the rule, ala Henri deRegnier or Francois Coppee (admired for his "range" by the then-unknown friend of dR: [redacted]
) his papers not worth the ink of think they print upon.
You see a pattern? I don't.
"The past is all that can be changed."
Sorry, the present's out of bounds; even what returns your gaze not even memory can be formed
"let me hear your theory again Mr. Chain if you imagine me prepared I am" for complexity to be all of the object allowed, and poet (mind?)
straightforwardinthegroove of thanks again, no second helping of solutions

I'm having problems swallowing the problems

tom

↑ Index

12. Joe Amato

Re: That Old Blurred Chicken's Got Me In Its Spell...

Wed 4 May 1994

The sky is bleu
in Chi-town, folks
my porkchop on the grill

Though Buffalo & poetry & chicken wings
bode still:

To shuffle off
in such a state
my porkchop goes un-et

& yet the point would seem to be such wings beget
poets:

Hence sweet refrain may only bring my porkchop from the grill

But if a chicken wing can sing for me, dear folks
it will...

↑ Index

13. MARK WALLACE

Re: That Old Blurred Chicken's Got Me In Its Spell...

Wed 4 May 1994

I can't fly,
though sure can sit.
But shit?
Well, maybe after chicken wings.

↑ Index

14. Robert Creeley

The Old (Wingless) Chicken's Song

Wed 4 May 1994

"What is Williams' (Raymond's) tome..."
Where have all the flowers gone?

I put them right here on the table...
No one's been here but for Mabel.

God, my mind is slipping cogs, gaps of pattern, mucho fog...

Yet I know whatever I can ever think of 'ere I die,

'twill be in my head alone that the symbiotic blur has formed-- to make no "we" unless "they" tell "us"

"you" is "me" and "I" is nameless.

"Tom" is wrong? "I" is right?
Is this the point at which "we" fight?

Us was never happy we,
all that's ever left is me.

Past is what I can't forget,
where the flowers got to yet--

Mabel's face, my mother's hands, clouds o'er head last year at Cannes,

Kenneth Koch's reaction when we told him once at 3 AM

he should marry Barbara Epstein, loosen up and have some fun.

"I remember, I remember--"
Memory, the great pretender, says it happened, thinks it was,

this way, that way, just because it was in my head today...

Present (present) passed away.

↑ Index

15. Mn Ctr for Book Arts

Re: The Old (Wingless) Chicken's Song

Wed 4 May 1994

---

on the wings of a chicken

an old song in triplets wider than an aging mile higher than the sweet ting of barbecue, iced tea

remains the age of the day on the swing, the children singing an old song on the wing

↑ Index

16. Robert Creeley

Chicken Chat

Thu 5 May 1994

Ted Joans has now come and gone, to fact of modest audience, a quiet midweek night in Buffalo at the end of the school year, etc. He's such an old time kind of poet, with a few books of his own to sell, satchel of personal belongings, ar- riving by bus from NYC at 7:25 AM, looking around very particu- larly. He proves a bridge over many troubled waters indeed, with stories of being recently in South Africa and countries there adjacent--moving as one can when there is no high exposure to deal with, sticking to the local and being handed on. He's moved as a poet reading and talking in Africa more than any other, of any circumstance--can tell you the particulars of language in various places, the lore of their locating habits, imaginations. And so on.

After his reading we were still sitting there, comfortably, talking, with the chicken wings etc etc--I was saying to Ken Sherwood how persuasively attractive this curious place (right here/the so-called net (well named)) had been these past few days. As if I'd been waiting like kid at edge of water to jump, and finally had--and found it terrific! An exfoliating "self" of weird kind that literally "echoed" back and back and back in apparent "object- ivity" that nonetheless was just plain Bob/or words to that effect.

In the early 40s when still in college I had job as copy boy on the Boston Globe, and recall hysteria of trying to keep up with the sheets of paper rolling off the bank of teletype machines: "late breaking" bulletins with endless revisions, cancellations, etc etc. Now I got chance to play "sender".

But, as Ken said, it's a funny "place" and activity, as if one could really get lost "out there," be so "distributed" the focus, or locating response, were only endless reverberations of one's own initiating act. That is, it's instantly hard to hear anyone but one's self--and the moves, as in a poker game or checkers, become too simply (for me at least) redeterminations of my "position" (hardly "intellectual") as I want to keep "playing"--and why not.

Seamus Cooney was saying some time back, think of what it would have been like had you and Olson had email. Help... Yet it would have saved all those drab hours waiting for the mail--as I did at times, crouched back of brush some thirty feet from where the mail truck would pull up. In some obvious ways, writing letters back then was even more of a singular act, a proposal of self simply, than what I am doing here right now-- but on reflection it seems the same.

Carla Billitteri in last discussion of Olson seminar etc used sense of the "solipsistic fury" of his late work: "Wholly absorbed..."; "I live underneath the light of day..." Etc. I think of Wittgenstein's essay/ lecture on ethics, wherein he speaks of will to make just one word that can be autonomous--self creating. It seems the same "fury"--familiar to all who read, write, or think no doubt. "Was that a real poem or did you just make it up yourself..." Quien sabe, amigos.

P.S. Irony indeed that the one "food" Ted is deeply allergic to--like even a spoon dipped in soup would do it--is chicken.

↑ Index

17. Jed
Re: Chicken Chat
Thu 5 May 1994

Re: Olson's "fury" & Bob Creeley's humanizing of it as a generic condition of readers & writers grasping for an autonomous word.
I think of other senses, archaic, mythopoeic, in which Olson would have worked the material, pressed out its ulterior sense. "Fury" is not merely an emotional state, but the name for the Erinyes, spirits avenging family violence. Their inception is curious, as they arise from the ground in the drops of blood spattered by the castration of Uranus in that primal scene of patricide. Colloquially the furies were appe aled to in cursing, and are thought of as even the personifications of curse. And Jean-Pierre Vernant has something interesting to add: "The Erinyes can claim the two extremes: What is 'pure' and 'natural' is also what is raw. They do not drink wine but they do eat men." (Myth & Tragedy in Ancient Greece, 158)

--Jed Rasula

↑ Index

18. Michael Boughn
more chatter
Thu 5 May 1994

But what, Bob, would you have done without precisely those shrubs and that ritual. What about the poems and (as here) stories that moment still proposes. Probably you'll just find (as I have in recent moments of messages "purloined" somehow in the net (a sleeping gatekeeper?)) some new kind of bush.

The big difference for me is who's on the other end, or who I think there. The "self" proposed in the O letters, who's working there, includes its companion and goad. In other words the conversation, the very one Emerson proposes to replace religion. Who, here, am I writing to? I'm thinking of you but even in the process know this is different in its diffusion to others I'll never know. Not that one is less composed. Or less uneasy. Still, an overheard conversation.

In Hyampom CA, (drive to Mt Shasta, turn left and take the logging road a hundred miles west) the whole town was (20 years ago, and may still be) on a single party line--perhaps the morphic antecedent to this moment. They say people, knowing someone was sick, say, would wait for the signal--two longs and a short, or whatever the code for the particular house--then everyone would pick up the phone to find out how the sick person was. That way distrubance was minimized, but everybody knew what was happening. Talk about community. Still, no sweet nothings under those conditions. Thus your exfoliating self moves towards what attractor?

--Mike

↑ Index

19. Robert Creeley
Chicken Feathers
Sat 7 May 1994

Carla's note of Olson's "solipsistic fury" gets misplaced here necessarily, just that I took it out of context, didn't mark its company in her thinking ("stone," "double"), nor in any respect suggest what the preoccupations in her discussion were. At some point I hope one can read what she's done for onself--as I'm sure she hopes likewise. One's trying to get to the place (what I'd call the context) where Olson finds himself--as in the early note to Elaine Feinstein: "Orientate me." ("The light is in the east," etc etc.)

Anyhow, thinking of Jed Rasula's useful addition of the Furies (the English of the Latin of the Greek)--I like the fact that "fury" locates in "rage," and that certainly echoes: "rages, tears..." "And the thought of its thought is the rage/ of Ocean : _apophanesthai_..."

--Egocentrically it recalls my own (humanistic) "possession": "I rage./ I rage, I rage." The downside, like they say, of a state that is not simply (only) an emotion (as Jed usefully emphasizes)-- but is a place one's come into, as "Come into the world."

This one,
that one,
the other one--

I keep thinking of "seizure," a sense I get insistently in Olson --that one acts in/from such state. Paradoxically it's the Greco/Roman that seems to have the problem with such "place," it's so "irrational"--thinking, in contrast, of the dervishes still very active in Turkey (if often reduced to a kind of "entertainment" (or so attached) akin to pueblo ritual dances in the southwestern U.S.).

But here it all goes again--that endless digression! "Get on board, etc etc." I wish there were some damn way to get out/get in "here" so as to find the literal company one knows is "there". Somehow the note in the bottle--charming though that be--is, for me, still the parallel. Which means at best I'm in there too. Show me the way to go home! I'm TIRED and I WANT TO GO TO BED... (P.S. Just in Baltimore and they sure eat well --and no chicken wings in sight... Maryland Institute of Art (Joe Cardar- elli) seems where it's at. Anyhow "my Baltimore" is same plus memories of Andrei Codrescu, David Franks, and impeccable Anselm Hollo. "Scrapple" on the menu. All the trees had leaves! Barry Alpert in good spirits. Julie Kalendak's going to Alaska. Onward!)

↑ Index

20. Bruce
More chicken musings
Sat 7 May 1994

Yes, Mike, that was very much my thinking about this space. It's great to have some sense of potential community, but it seems to remain forever potential. Perhaps, Bob, if I'd been at the CPG Wednesday night to talk in person about it I'd have a sense of more active possibility here, but, Charles, though I perched 'fore the screen all Wednesday night, nary a whiff did I catch o' them virtual victuals--though we're perhaps better off not to have that particular odiferous technology. (But FREE wings? When did they become FREE?) So who are my interlocutor? Jed Rasula re the furies? which called to mind Francis Bacon's use of the Erinyes in a few of his paintings, so clearly connected to the fury of his paint in all those figures--very much the solipsistic fury that you mentioned, Bob, though I think there's not only the fury of striving for that word, but a fury at striving for it, at finding oneself in that situation--all that's involved in "odi et amo." But I'm getting off topic. Thanks, Peter, for the summer reading suggestions, it's rare to hear anything of CanLit here. Lately I've been relaxin' (and cookin') with oldies like Henry Green and Robert Walser, whom I'm sure you already know. By the way, Bob, what do you think of Francis Bacon? I've been experimenting, putting poets and painters together in my classes, and you and he seemed to hit it off pretty well.... My point is, all of these lines seem at once to move out of group and into individual conversations. What is a group discussion in espace? Do we stick to general queries: i.e., does anyone recall just where Pound talks about the air in Italy making one (I think he says a man) more vibrant, more alive, etc.? Or could we have some collective impact as a poetics "consortium"--for instance, organizing protests and recommendations about mainstream anthology exclusions (the case of W.W. Norton and the Objectivists comes to mind). These seem useful functions, though hardly what one dreams of. I don't think, in any case, that "we" are going to create the contemporary equivalent of the Olson-Creeley letters here--the "we" feels too uncertain (who else is listening? the IRS? your colleagues? tenure committees? how pervasive can paranoia become in electronic space? (how many people are on this list, Charles?)). But perhaps it can become a starting point for individual conversations, which could then proceed without the self-regulation this mode necessarily involves. And of course it can also help to alleviate some of that solipsistic fury--when you want to alleviate it. But who knows? Maybe someone'll actually bring back that word--this time.

P.S. The query, above, is real. (Everything else, of course, is virtual, just like those wings Charles promised.)

↑ Index

21. Robert Kelly
Re: Chicken Feathers
Sat 7 May 1994

Since you say seizure, I'm boldened to mark our Bruno's (Jordan Brown's) sense of the furore poetico, the spasm of saying, the sheer out/burst from which the art so 'furiously' arises -- not fury (anger) but furioso, taking fury as furore from my memory of Olson's anabolic clarity out loud. I had mentioned this to Rasula, to spread wider those Erinyes/Eumenides (not just the well-intentioned, let alone the Nice Minded ones of Vic- torian euphemism, but the ones who hold their meanings clear) of his,

that furore is of mind, and anything else is rage. Which is always going one way or another back to raga, long a the first one is, emotion, mood, music's way.

Gosh. I remember the Maryland Institute when it was a train station. I got off there many a time. The life of that city rouses over and over.

Robert

↑ Index

22. Robert Drake
Re: More chicken musings
Sat 7 May 1994

> (who else is listening? the IRS? your collegues? tenure committees?

to find out, send the meassage "REVIEW POETICS" to the listserv address--you'll receive a message w/ the names and addresses of all current subscribers (except chris funk...). makes fr a handy address list of the current "in croud".

last time i checked, the list was about 25% women (plus/minus a few gender-ambigious names)... haven't kept track, but gender ratio of those actively contributing messages doesn't seem anywhere close to that. how interesting.

lbd

↑ Index

23. Jed Rasula
Re: More chicken musings
Mon 9 May 1994

In response to Bruce's "real" query about this e-consortium and the uses to which it might be put, I have a practical request. I've been asked to review the new Columbia History [which it's not!] of American Poetry edited by Jay Parini, and wonder if anybody has anything to say about it here. I'll reserve comment pending yours...

As for the omission of the Objectivists in the Norton, the spanking new 4th edition glossily proclaims its inclusion of Oppen as groundbreaking. It's not hard to figure out how Oppen finally made it: check the MLA bibliography on CD-rom and you'll find that if you key in name searches Oppen (this was last June, actually) gives 108, Zukofsky 85, Reznikoff 50 --contrasting which, to show where the interest really lies, Hollander nets 9, Hecht 12, Snodgrass 9. Or garnering a bit more attention--but still decidedly less than the Objectivists--Merwin 47, J.Wright 59, Ammons 60, Kinnell 35, and even Merrill 46. The myth of Objectivist exclusion may be about to change. (But one thing this kind of search doesn't indicate, of course, is who makes it into the anthologies--and Oppen, Rez, & Zuk remain largely persona non grata).

↑ Index

24. hlazer
Re: More chicken musings
Mon 9 May 1994

Jed & others--

Regarding the anthology business. The 4th edition of the Norton also include Niedecker. I've just been reviewing Am Lit anthologies (for a textbook committe here at U of Alabama). Norton is honestly the most adventurous (re. Objectivists & others) of the major anthologies. The much touted Heath anthology--leader in matters multicultural--exhibits little aesthetic tolerance or range. I've been interested for some time in the relationship between multicultural inclusions vs. aesthetic/formal range. As Charles B. & others have pointed out, often multicultural "adventurousness" occurs as part of a formally rather homogeneous manner of (personal, clear) expression, and thus more innovative multicultural poetries do not get included. Or, as in the new 2nd edition of the Heath, the version of postmodernism that gets advanced really has very little postmodern poetry in it. When the "contemporary" gets represented, the innovative is hardly ever included (even in token fashion) in the "major" AM LIT anthologies.

Now, of course, via Hoover's editorship, Norton has a new anthology of POSTMODERN AMERICAN POETRY, which I'm just reading through now. It has a fine introduction & quite a few very good selections, giving readers a good sense of the variety of poetries of the last 45 years.

As for Creeley's chicken wing musings, down here we got ribs. Best place is Dreamland in Jerusalem Heights. They serve nothing but ribs, and white bread (the spongy, airy variety). A few years ago, the IRS raided the place & asked the owner to show them his books. John Jr., the owner, said what books? He'd done a cash only business for years. Got fined $150,000, and was ordered to serve a community meal once a year to the occupants of our local state hospital for the retarded. Football alums, who also love Dreamland, went to the courthouse and paid the fine. The once a year meal has been a disaster. Dreamland's ribs/sauce are hot. The patients, many of whom are elderly & don't have their own teeth, had been eating bland foods & couldn't handle the ribs & sauce. John Jr. apparently now pays taxes and has books?

Any thoughts on anthologies & the representation (or non-) of experimental poetries would be appreciated. Or thoughts on ribs.

↑ Index

25. Kristen Prevallet
Re: More chicken musings
Mon 9 May 1994

Another side to the "multicultural adventurousness", of course, is corporate competition. I happened to be working as an editorial assistant at Norton at the time when the Hoover anthology was still being considered. I remember that the anthology editors were actually going to conferences and having closed-door meetings about the possibilities of new directions in canonizing. Essentially it was a matter of them either getting on the multi-cultural / innovative etc. bandwagon or falling off--the Norton anthologies, that is, essentially run the business.

And to illustrate what the "formally rather homogenous manner of personal/ clear expression" means when it comes to judging whether a poet is publishable or not, here is a letter I received from one of the editors when I tried to get him to consider a Mackey manuscript: "Mr Mackey works in a poetic vein that I am vaguely aware of, but which I can't quite grasp. Many beautiful lines, but overall terribly ... elusive. And I don't have to tell you that the very long line forms at the right for Norton poets. We will have to decline this serious poet's work in the politest way possible."

↑ Index

26. MARK WALLACE
Situation Magazine
Mon 9 May 1994

Situation #6 features poetry by Joan Retallack, Susan Schultz, Cole Swensen, Peter Ganick, John M. Bennett, others.
Situation #7, due out this summer, will feature work from Kevin Killian, Ron Silliman, A.L. Nielsen, Sterling Plumpp, others.
Earlier issues have featured poets
such as Charles Bernstein, Hannah Weiner, Bruce Andrews, Ray Federman, Ben Friedlander, Sheila Murphy, Juliana Spahr, Elizabeth Burns, Jeff Hansen, and many others.
Each issue of Situation is 20 pages of the best innovative contemporary poetry.
A single issue or back issues are $2.
A year subscription only $8.
A year of Situation (4 issues)

and a year of Poetic Briefs (poetics commentary and discussions out of Albany, NY)
is only $13.
Write me at Mark Wallace, Situation,
10 Orton Place #2,
Buffalo, NY 14201
or contact me through e-mail for further information.

↑ Index

27. Patrick Phillips
Re: Ribs in Dreamland
Mon 9 May 1994

To Hank and others

Just now I received a post from Yunte Huang (thanks), whom you (Hank) know as, among other things, a poet, translator of Chinese and soon to be reveller in chicken wings, who is now finished with his work at Alabama. The note regarded work of Chinese poets he is helping me compile for an anthology I am editing - "still waiting for a reply from China." With the appearance of the Norton and the appeared to be a moment where I could, for various reasons, announce the project to the list. I have been querying international poets and editors for five months now and the process now turns in earnest to the North American "front."

The anthology is a sound, text and image compilation of comtemporary international experimental poetry. I will publish this gratis on the internet via something called Mosaic - Mosaic allows the viewing/reading/listening of images, movies, sound and text. One book publishers has expressed some "interest" in the project as an electronic (CD) effort. Publication late '95?...

After my recent posting of Ferdinand Schmatz's "Sud an (kaffee)" (I must thank Charles for directing me to Schmatz and others) I was asked by Nick Lawrence to say a little more about the "focus, etc..." of the anthology. The premise is that the form of this more-than-one-medium anthology, either in static disk form, or dynamic "internet form," whatever that is, may disrupt the kind of notions which often motivate discussions around anthologies - notions like "the canonical," occidental/oriental splits, schematic organization of literary development, the shear inanity of anthologies to begin with, etc.. Of course editorial sympathies remain. But I am sympathetic to the disruption of established historical and categorical paradigms to the point that I go in and out of focus. I can say that my focal plane is located somewhere near the idea, to borrow a phrase from Karatani Kojin, a Japanese literary critic, that "literature is not natural;" not to rehash the anti-naturalist, anti-positivist debate, but to establish a picture of a "landscape" of international textual discourse which unveils its economic manufacture. Or, in our more culinary scape, how much Buffalo Wings are in Dreamland.

Thus far, as mentioned in my reference to Yunte, queries have been made to Chinese as well as Japanese, Italian, Austrian, Finnish, French, Spanish, Indian, British, Russian, Tanzanian and Canadian poets for their texts (recorded in language of origin). Startling similarities arise; subtle yet variances in use and expression abound.

Cards and letters to North Americans should go out within the next month or so. I invite you all to diner - and welcome any suggestions, comments or questions.

↑ Index

28. Marc Nasdor
Re: More chicken musings
Mon 9 May 1994

Go for it, Jed!
-Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

29. Marc Nasdor
Re: More chicken musings
Mon 9 May 1994

Regarding Kristen's posting:

gag me with a spoon

rather,

gag them with a three-week-old chicken wing!

-Marc

↑ Index

30. Marc Nasdor
Re: More chicken musings
Mon 9 May 1994

---

wings to the north of me ribs to the south

but still can't get the taste of hot steamed crabs & National Boh out my mouth

-Nasdor

↑ Index

31. Robert Creeley
Re: More Chicken Musings
Tue 10 May 1994

I've not seen the Columbia History etc though it's become a "topic" etc. There was a curious note by David Perkins, the previous purveyor of orthodoxy with respect to the "Modern canon," in the HARVARD REVIEW, pp. 225-227. He laments what he calls "a lack of personality," coherence, a point of view, etc., etc. (He's reviewing both volumes, i.e., American and British). More personally, friends begin to be irritated--I think legitimately--by the snideness with which they are noted, if they are. That is, that factor of "personality" is certainly present. Anyhow, whatever Perkins' own criteria or understanding, one might well ask--like they say--what's the premise of these judgements? For example, the 2nd edition of the Norton dropped Zukofsky, and then, as I recall, another involved with American "literature" included Niedecker that same year. Ted Berrigan was also dropped. I have seen none of the recent antholo- gies to date--with the sole exception of VOICES FROM THE NUYORICAN CAFE, which seems of a "place and time" at least sans question. Anyhow talking to Allen G/ in NYC recently (after the celebration for Paul Hoover's antho/ at St Marks), he seemed much impressed--and he is an inveterate anthology-maker (for use in his own teaching). Jed, Charles tells me of your active rehearsal of the canon of my own immediate elders, i.e., the group as Lowell, Jarrell, Roethke, and of how they were kept "in place." So all the above must be quite familiar. "Nobody here but us chickens..."

↑ Index

32. Joseph Conte
Re: More chicken musings
Tue 10 May 1994

Furthering the discussion of anthologies and canonization, has anyone perused the new _Oxford Companion to Twentieth-Century Poetry_? Ed. Ian Hamilton, which ought to tell us something. It has the virtue of multinational inclusion, "from America and Britain to Trinidad and Zimbabwe." All the principal Objectivists are included, plus an entry on the movement itself. But whereas C. Coolidge is mentioned in passing in the entry on New York School, The, and C.

Bernstein in overview of Language Poetry, Emily Grosholz and Dana Gioia and Andrew Hudgins (friendly acquaintances all) merit (?) their own entries.

Personally I'm harboring a nostalgic longing for the brick-oven pizza parlors of Belleville, NJ.

Joseph Conte

↑ Index

33. sondheim
The Year 1800-2200
Wed 11 May 1994

==========

I LOOK THROUGH YOUR EYES

Begin, I say, begin.

I have disappeared from my life. At one point, I had fashioned an artwork or sculpture, a wire envelope indicating the farthest reaches of my arms and legs, the inner space of the body. Wire formed the surface between flesh and the outer world, and wire was the metaphor for transverse or transgressive logics carrying the weight of gesture across the body itself.

It is this beyond, thrust against gesture, to which gesture cannot penetrate, that I dedicate this short essay in the elegiac mode. Romanticism, always illusory, bases itself upon such, and I find myself within its portals, about to make an entrance accompanied by numerous shades and indeterminate genders.

I speak of the envelope of wires, of telephones and computer networks, of communications focused upon the parabolic mirror of the heart. For here, I have received one ghost only to discard another; I have been discarded by a third, and enveloped by a fourth who murmurs, everything has limitations and your body has written me.

And years ago, I believed in just this: that I have written myself simultaneously in and out of existence, that writing was the hinge turned against the sheer inertia of the world. But now I reach out and find the current of the wires dangerous and sparking; ozone fills the air which I remember to breath, and haunted pools of liquid threaten annihilation if I overstep the keyboard and its memories. Here I have learned from Weber: The Call is always a translation, mercurial at best, and the Call is literate.

I bend deeper into the keys themselves, jetsam on an indeterminate sea. My back strains with the weight of moderated thought. Beyond the window is another window. Beyond another window is a window, darkness outside illuminated by the circular resonance of yellowed lamps disappearing in a forced perspective, Dean Street drowned by so many others. London would not have suffered in the comparison; London is a word of magic, illuminated by the street of the kindly Dean, Swift to the occasion:

> "Suppose me dead; and then suppose
> A club assembled at the Rose;
> Where, from Discourse of this or that,
> I grow the Subject of their Chat."

The petals stem themselves from a breast or fountain animate, close to the invention of steam for rail or water transportation. Steam breathes the extension of language in the future Railway Panic or speculation arranged from capital and fear of the compression of flesh itself. No longer etiquette holds against the centrifugal thrust repeatedly towards empire returning gold to Portugal and Spain. Violence occurs whenever discourse is downed, the table replaced by emptied telephony, packets and nodes choked with useless information rewriting, on a continuous basis, the history of the electrical world itself. So my eyes are closed; dead, I continue.

To continue to conjure or reproduce those which I love and those whom I have loved, or merely, in relation to an indifference: I would find you beyond the hindrance of address. To do so is to remember, the password leads only to a null file; every word passes and every word returns writing/culture degree zero. Suppose it dead, you dead, myself: This uncanny harboring continues, nightly, tall ships with masts catching electron wind between one and another star, sailing mournfully down Dean Street itself, passing in calmed or still waters and nowhere moving or returning.

It is the stillness which shapes the thing. The thing occurs only in the shaping of silence. Letters project their third dimension; it is necessary as well that I am here, producing the occurrence of their text, that is to say, their dominion. More than the dominion of letters I am not, and more I would be.

I have been discarded, effaced; no longer existing, existence disappears after one more address, one more presence. You do not make it real; emission pools beyond you, a doubled annular eclipse shadowing in the form of stuttered outline. Beyond the street is another street.

> "The fools, my juniors by a year,
> Are tortur'd with suspense and fear;
> Who wisely thought my age a screen,
> When death approach'd, to stand between:
> The screen remov'd, their hearts are trembling;
> They mourn for me without dissembling."

Dean Swift, Alan Sondheim, 432 Dean Street, and Brooklyn, NY, and 11217.

==========

↑ Index

34. Charles Bernstein

Alberta on My Mind

Thu 12 May 1994

I've been travelling to Vancouver, where I read at the Kootenay School of Writing & tried to get the collective authorities there to sell me a Ph.D. for less than the $50 (Canadian) they have been asking, only that I enjoy discounts and special pricing,

I mean I don't question the value,
so we're in a Vietnamese restaurant & Colin Smith pulls out a letter he happens to have in his bag from some official government agency telling KSW that they must cease and desist from offering unlicensed postsecondary instruction to which Colin suggests that the best solution may be to send the person who wrote the admonition an honorary degree from KSW -- hm, Canadians really are different than us Statesiders, they seem to know how to get along so, Bruce, speaking of Canadian poets -- Idaho, Canada that is -- got word of a celebration in Vancouver next spring of Robin Blaser's 70th birthday, now in the planning; and just missed Peter Quartermain's 60th birthday; & realized I had failed (old story) to mention, in my hyperbolic notices for (KSWers) Kevin Davies's & Deanna Ferguson's new books in the new Sulfur, Catrinna Strang's

Low Fancy, which I got only after I turned that notice in

& on to Edmonton, where I got lost in the Fantasyland Mall on the way to one of the demikeynotes at the International Association for Philosophy and Literature "Thinking Between Poetry & Philosophy" convention & so missed most of the lecture on the "The Ineluctable Split of Poetry's Unsayable Name: Reading
Derrida through Nietzsche's Unknowable Answer to Celan's Joyce (A Response to Benjamin)." Many of the conventioneers noted that the "Bourbon Street" food mall was a perfect example of "simulation" -- a view I have trouble understanding (again not unusual for me) since the patrons of food court seem to enjoy the fact that "Bourbon Street" is ineluctably in the West Edmonton Mall & the designers of the street seemed to go out of their way to emphasize this fact, making it look like a plastercaste sketch of a picture of a New Orleans street & not like the "real thing" at all; the only ones fooled were we conventioneers having our dinner as we chatted about the breakdown of reality and simulacra (or simusoy for the lactose intolerant). & talk about authentically local as you might, the Buffalo wings on Bourbon Street in the West Edomonton Mall never tasted so real (or would have; I had the trout)

so somewhat late to respond to the various & sundry recent posts

but, speaking of simulacra, Jed Rasula's book, which I recently read in manuscript, is called
_The American Poetry Wax Museum:
Reality Effects 1940-1990_. I hope it comes out soon: it's not-to-be-missed.
Jed has a way of making the story of what he calls New Criticism, Inc., absolutely rivetting, so much so that I could understand, as if for the first time, what made the American poetry canon of the 1950s possible. Jed's work is essential in its elucidating the cultural logic of the countermodernist turn.
I also just got word that Alan Golding's _From Outlaw to Classic: Canon in American Poetry_ will be out this fall from the University of Wisconsin.

Meanwhile, Douglas Messerli's 1135-page epic _From the Other Side of the Century: A New American Poetry 1960-1990_ (Sun & Moon Press) is now out and beginning to make its way into the world.
I just got an advance copy today.

+++++++++
A Note on this List

As new people join Poetics@UBVM I ask them not to mention the list on any public internet space (BBS, listserve, etc) in order to keep this particular group to a relatively small scale. This is not to discourage people from recommending the list to others but to keep the list to people who have a direct involvement with its current constituency (however undefined that may be).

↑ Index

35. Carla Billitteri
I Am A Child
Thu 12 May 1994

Now Available

A tailspin press journal project edited by William Howe & Benjamin Friedlander

I AM A CHILD
poetry after Robert Duncan and Bruce Andrews

8-1/2 x 11 [w160pp], $7.50 ($8.50 US and Canada, $10.50 international, postpaid) make checks payable to UB FOUNDATION
(please US dollars only)

Poetry/Poetics from Aaron Lercher, Althea Schelling, Andrew Schelling, Benjamin Friedlander, Bruce Andrews, Carla Billitteri, Charles Bernstein, Chris Funkhouser, David Levi Strauss, Diane Ward, Emma Bernstein, Gianni D'Elia, Halliday Dresser, John Clarke, Jeff Gburek, Jeff Hull, Joel Kuszai, Juliana Spahr, Kim Rosenfield, Lee Ann Brown, Lisa Jarnot, Mark Wallace, Maya Grace Strauss, Miekal And, Nick Lawrence, Nils Ya, Norma Cole, Pat Reed, Patrick Phillips, Robert Creeley, Robert Duncan, Robert Fitterman, Robert Grenier, Robert J. Bertholf, Rod Smith, Stephen Rodefer, Steven Farmer, Susan Howe, Thad Ziolkowski, Vanessa Renwick, and William Howe.

tailspin press
418 Richmond Ave. #2
Buffalo, NY 14222
USA
or [redacted]
*****

from I AM A CHILD

"If childhood doesn't exist for Andrews, claims precedence as neither word nor concept, it's because the child is an ideological construct, a role that society foists, not only upon the young, but on _all_ subjects; childhood for Andrews, if anything, is a meaningless word, a concept without rigor, a social practice determined by adult orders whose rejection, nevertheless, childhood alone is reserved for."
Nils Ya

"Satan _himself_ taught all arts of deception: your looks mistaken in glass afraid wants muffler upright the hour-eye girls who hate women personalize your past dumb face rhetoric preening query fluid inattention --"
Bruce Andrews

"since they all have cotton wads in their ears, I _must_ be the syrene who is singing on their rock."
Robert Duncan

". . . and might not this poetics of the outburst--cruelly, unintentionally--have given Duncan over to a power of poetry terrible to behold, violent even in its erudition, a territorial pissing, a childish statecraft, a poetics closer to that of Bruce Andrews . . ." Nils Ya

******

"Let's press our breasts together and french kiss;
any more I can't speak about.
Too much description ruins everything."
Lee Ann Brown

"And then the Angels come.
And then the Pig Angels come when the Angels come."
Emma Bernstein

"motherhood

uninteresting fetish and a sick habit"
Vanessa Renwick

"sweet pomegranite sickness, world that would be drunk with joy of itself but instead launches its rockets of vomit to pollute upper worlds"
Jeff Gburek

"Why did they kill them

Why was my body flooded with tension
my small cock stiff"
Robert Creeley

******

"Transcendence, then, is not a climbing over, but a recognition of the pallor on the face of the impossible.
This pallor is the visible secret."
Patrick Phillips

"All of the above questions are worthy of a search for answers, if that is what we are seeking. . . . At this juncture of the process I am able to empathize with skeptics, and occasionally offer my own views of the underbelly."
Chris Funkhouser

"The childhood of a prospective idea remains in its room, undecided. We are left standing between one window that opens on to a scene of instruction, desire, communal activity, and another that surveys a landscape littered with logos, chap-books, new and improved junk."
Nick Lawrence

↑ Index

36. Robert Kelly
Re: Alberta on My Mind
Thu 12 May 1994

in the heart of all the richesse of Charles' report on the Road to the Deep North, stands out the need for us all, all, to inscribe/orate/declare/silently pray something in honor of that upcoming 70th of Blaser. Let us gather the posy of huzzahs and fling it NW.

Robert

↑ Index

37. Kenneth Sherwood archiving
Fri 13 May 1994

INFORMATION (at Charles Bernstein's request)

For anyone interested in recapturing the 'immediacy' of past postings, dredging up the traces of ALL POETICS traffic since March 1994, there is an archive.

To receive a file containing all posts since that date with nasty header material excised, send the following command, as the one and only line in a mail message to [redacted]

GET POETICS NOTEBOOK

For those whose accounts do not typically 'interact' well with the poetics list, you might try ammending this command to:

GET POETICS NOTEBOOK F=mail

(This should result in the VERY LONG file being sent as a normal mail message. NO promises!)

Ken Sherwood

↑ Index

38. Yunte Huang wings, ribs, and books
Mon 16 May 1994

After reading Hank's wonderful story of the Dreamland BBQ ribs, I, as a restaurant owner in the same town, would like to share with ya'll my imaginative experience with IRS. I have so far very carefully kept my books in Chinese. Anything that is even faintly comprehensible to the English readers will be eliminated from the books. Therefore, you can't find any Arabian numbers in them, nor Roman numerials (as a swain sang: business is a secret, and risky path off the cultures). The only things you can find are hieroglyphic characters and some I-chingish, yin-yang stuff. So if IRS raids us, I will give them a seemingly cunning oriental, or Wenzhouish (Hank and James) smile, and gladly present them the books. In addition, I wil also show them the book I have translated, _Selected Language poems_ (by Charles, Hank, and James), suggesting that since I can translate that kind of difficult poetry stuff, I can sure do a "faithful" translation of these books, if they really need my service.

P.S. If there are any secret agents here on this list, mind you, this is poetics discussion, and my piece above shows, hopefully, the complexity of cultural communication as the functional languages are concerned. "Nothing here but wings, ribs, and leftovers..."

Yunte Huang

↑ Index

39. Jennifer Moxley
Impercipient 5
Wed 25 May 1994

EXTRA! EXTRA! FRUITS FALL FROM AMERICAN TREE! APEX OF URBANITY FINALLY REACHED! COOLIDGE CALLED IN FOR QUESTIONING: IS HE A ROMAN AGENT?! CHARLES BERNSTEIN SAYS HE'LL GIVE UP E-MAIL NOW THAT...

A new issue of the The Impercipient is out, featuring stunning new poems by Joe Ross, Lisa Jarnot, Lee Ann Brown, Jessica Lowenthal, Peter Gizzi, Kevin Davies, Thad Ziolkowski, Rob Fitterman, Jennifer Moxley, Jeff Hull, and Magdalena Zurawksi.

If you haven't yet touched your head to this "silent pillow of a generation" (to dream or to drool), now is certainly the time to do so.

Subscription information is as follows:

3 issues $12
1 issue $5
back issues $5

(Of course, issues remain free for the asking to anyone who cannot afford the cover price).

If you haven't received the magazine previously, you can add yourself to the mailing list by sending e-mail to [redacted] or regular mail to

The Impercipient
61 E. Manning
Providence RI 02906-4008

↑ Index

40. Charles Bernstein
I remember Joe Brainard
Fri 27 May 1994

Joe Brainard died of AIDS on Wednesday. He was 52 years old.

*****

PEOPLE OF THE WORLD: RELAX!

Beware of boys in tight pants
They are perverts
Beware of tight pants
They chap the fanny and irritate the leg muscles
Your friends will laugh
And your mother will know
Do not feel guilty if showers turn you on
There is nothing wrong with masturbating in the shower
I masturbate in the shower
And there is nothing wrong with that Everyone does it
If you do not do it, try it
Everyone does it

People of the world: RELAX!

If you want to be a movie star go to Hollywood
If you want to be a dancer dance right now

Or it will be too late
And you will be unhappy
Be a dancer if you want to be a dancer
Do not be afraid
Some of the best people I know are dancers

People of the world: RELAX!

Take it easy and smoke a lot
Make all the noise you want to on the toilet
Other people will hear you but it does not matter

People of the world: RELAX!

Put on a clean white shirt and RELAX
Do not be afraid
Some of the best people I know are afraid
Do not be afraid of death
It will not hurt you

People of the World: RELAX!

This is a good life
Go of-of-doors a lot Smell flowers
Sit down in the grass
It will not hurt you
Look at the tree
The sky is blue
Climb every mountain
Air is the only hope
Do not kill any ants
They are your best friends

PEOPLE OF THE WORLD: RELAX!

The world is yours
Here, take it

******

I remember when polio was the worst thing in the world.

I remember that little jerk you give just before you fall asleep. Like falling.

I remember a dream of meeting a man made out of very soft yellow cheese and when I went to shake his hand I just pulled his whole arm off.

--Joe Brainard, from _Selected Writings_
(New York: The Kulcher Foundation, 1971)

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

June 1994

7 messages · Wed 8 Jun 1994 – Tue 28 Jun 1994

June 1994 is a quiet month, the spring's collective mania spent, and the list settles into the errands of a going concern — a magazine to announce, a competition to note, a newsletter's subscription mechanics to explain. Chris Funkhouser leads with the roster of The Little Magazine's twentieth volume, a long confetti-fall of names, and closes his own contribution on a graver note, offered almost in passing: “You gain your life only by giving it up”. The party is over; the shop is open.

The rest is housekeeping raised, here and there, into something better. Loss Glazier posts the plain instructions for subscribing to RIF/T, the list's electronic-poetry offshoot, and Charles Watts turns a passing remark into a small aphorism, catching the season's mood as “a cliche of our recognitions and condition”. Under the heading Recovery of the Public World the list even glances, briefly, at the largest questions before letting them go again until autumn.

Fred Wah signs off the month with three words that will do as well as any for the whole of this early, half-formed, generous archive — “Thanks for the morsel”. Seven letters, no arguments to speak of, the poets tending the ordinary machinery of keeping in touch. I have set each forward under its author's name, the private numbers returned to the dark, and left the summer quiet where I found it.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 7 in all.

WRITERS

Funkhouser, Chris 1, 2
Glazier, Loss 4
Loney, Alan 7
Ross, Joe 3
Wah, Fred J. 6
Watts, Charles 5

NAMES MENTIONED

Adorno, Theodor 5
Arendt, Hannah 5
Baldwin, James 1
Benjamin, Walter 5
Berkeley, Michael 5
Blake, William 5
Blaser, Robin 5
Bloch, Julia 5
Burns, Elizabeth 1
Byrd, Don 1
Byrne, Ted 5
Curnow, Wystan 7
Deleuze, Gilles 5
Dickinson, Emily 5
Duncan, Andrew 5
Dunlop, Nancy 1
Einstein, Albert 5
Emerson, Claudia 5
Everson, William 2
Foucault, Michel 5
Fraser, Simon 5
Gironda, Belle 1
Grenier, Bob 1
Joyce, Michael 1
Leonard, Tom 1
Mallarmé, Stéphane 5
Mayer, Jane 5
Melville, Pierre 5
Miriam, Erica 5
Nichols, Travis 5
Nowak, Mark 1
Olson, Charles 5
Pound, Scott 5
Prince, Richard 5
Sherwood, Kenneth 4
Sparrow, John 2
Spicer, Jack 5
Stein, Charles 1
Steiner, George 5
Stroffolino, Chris 1
Tardos, Anne 1
Taylor, Jesse 5
Waldman, Anne 1
Whitehead, Helen 5
Whitman, Walt 5
Yates, Katie 1

CONCEPTS

Aesthetics 5
Avant-garde 5
Biography 5
Bookstores 1
Conferences and festivals 5, 6
Electronic poetry and hypertext 4
Ethics 5
Ideology 5
Little magazines 1, 4
Modernism 5
Mourning and loss 4
Music and poetry 5
Nature 5
Philosophy 5
Poetics 1, 4, 5, 7
Psychoanalysis 5
Queer poetics 5
Race and poetry 6
Reading announcements 1, 3
Religion and the sacred 5
Representation 5
Reviewing and criticism 1, 5
Science 5
Serial poem 5
Subjectivity 1
The academy 1, 5
The body 4
The canon 5
Translation 5
Visual art 1, 5

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 7 in all.

8 JUN 1994
1. Chris Funkhouser — (no subject)

9 JUN 1994
2. Chris Funkhouser — (no subject)

12 JUN 1994
3. Joe Ross — Re: Poetry Competion

15 JUN 1994
4. Loss Glazier — How to Subscribe to RIF/T (Informational)
5. Charles Watts — "Recovery of the Public World"

20 JUN 1994
6. Fred J. Wah — Re: chappies

28 JUN 1994
7. Alan Loney — Poetics Notebook

1. Chris Funkhouser

(no subject)

Wed 8 Jun 1994

THE LITTLE MAGAZINE VOLUME 20 features, front to back,

Katie Yates, Don Byrd, Anne Tardos, Will Alexander, Charles Stein, Marilyn Crispell, Chris Funkhouser, Katie Yates, Anne Waldman, Sandy Baldwin, Elizabeth Burns, Jan Ramjerdi, Dave Coogan & Nancy Dunlop, The Snickering Witches, Amy Schoch, Jonathan Post, Awopbop, Derek Owens, Katie Yates, Awopbopaloobop Groupuscle, Noam Scheindlin, Leonard Slade, Andrew Podniek, Joyce Hinnefeld, Mark Nowak, Eric Douglas, Chris Stroffolino, Rebecca Bush, Robert Grenier, Belle Gironda, Katie Yates, Mike Condon

Is available Seven Dollars (195pp.) = bargain. The Little Magazine/English Department/University at Albany/Albany, NY 12222

For "review" copies (literally) please send email to [redacted] from the CALL FOR WORK ([redacted]):

"WRITING AND ELECTRONIC SPACE/CYBORG PERFORMANCE AND POETICS. _THE LITTLE MAGAZINE_ is looking for writing and visual art work which exists in the imagination of media still uncreated...Although we are interested in adventuresome uses of technology, it is not technology but vision which is lacking...we are sick...of the polite, conventional thing literature has become. It is so comfortably contained in print. It is mediated and remediated (already); it is the subject of schools. We are not interested in work which exemplifies the theories of the past or even the hottest, most engaging theory of the present. We are interested in work which will call forth the media of the future.

CYBERPUNK GROW UP

The deadline for the issue is December 15, 1994, but get in touch with us as soon as possible. We will try to find a way to publish important work even if it does not fit neatly into the usual literary magazine format. Tell us about your writing, visual art, sound pieces, videos, multidimensional performances, network art, and investigation of genres still unnamed..."

There will be a reading at Borders Bookstore in Albany, 22 June, 6-9 pm, featuring contributors

↑ Index

2. Chris Funkhouser

(no subject)

Thu 9 Jun 1994

Just received a message from Santa Cruz sharing news of the passing of William Everson (Brother Antoninus of SF Renaissance group), a friend and writer/printer.

Inspirations, withanks, flipping thru _Birth of a Poet_ (Black Sparrow '82):

> A knowledge of myth is crucial to a knowledge of vocation. In some way vocation is an enterprise, an enterprise of service or discovery, and the moment it becomes that, it becomes mythic. It is this dimension which changes vocation from career to witness. (53)
>
> * * *
>
> Spontaneous utterance deals with the potentiality of a tongue but craftsmanship deals with its limitations. You have to learn to balance yourself between them. Use the right hand of your power in all its tumultuous pouring forth, its torrential sound, its waterfalls of dissonance and assonance, its cascades of tonality and inflection. But never forget the left hand of craftsmanship always has the last word. It defines the line beyond which you have not gone, and are prevented from going. (89)
>
> * * *
>
> Go now into the great latitude that awaits you out there, the reality that is not closing but opening. Seize it in your two hands even as you embrace it and wrestle the meaning from it in your thirst. But never forget that only the acceptance at the close will yield the mystery of wholeness to > you, the thing you desire most of all. You have to lose your life in order to save it. You have to expend yourself in order to find yourself. You gain your life only by giving it up. (193)

>
> William Everson, 1912-1994

↑ Index

3. Joe Ross
Re: Poetry Competion
Sun 12 Jun 1994

NEW AMERICAN POETRY SERIES COMPETITION

Over the past years, it has become increasingly apparent that poetry is undergoing a renaissance in the United States. More poets are writing original and exciting new works of poetry than there are publishers willing to publish their work.

In order to help rectify this situation and to encourage other organizations upon similar courses, The Contemporary Arts Educational Project, Inc., a nonprofit corporation, and its publishing program Sun & Moon Press announces a new poetry competition.

Beginning in 1995, The contemporary Arts Educational Project will annually publish two books in its Sun & Moon Press New American Poetry Series, chosen through a national poetry competition.

Original manuscripts, which have not previously appeared in book form, are eligible. Between May 1,1994 and December 31, 1994 the competition will consider typed manuscripts of poetry (between 50 and 200 pages in length). Manuscripts should be accompanied be a cover letter, listing the author's name, address and telephone number; but no name or address should appear on the manuscript itself. All types of poetry written by all ages are eligible, but the national judges, who will read the manuscripts without knowing the names of the authors, have been charged to give particular interest to innovative and original compositions. Manuscripts should begin with a title page, followed by a table on contents and the text. A $25.00 application fee (in the form of a check made out to The Contemporary Arts Educational Project,Inc.) for handling and judge's costs must be included with the manuscript. Manuscripts submitted without following the guidelines above will be returned. Please send all manuscripts to the New American Poetry Competition at the address below.

All entrants will be notified of the final selections by April 30,1995; however, no manuscripts shall be returned. By entering this competition, the applicant agrees that, if chosen, he/she will allow Sun & Moon Press to publish the manuscript according to the terms of the Sun & Moon Press contract, which pays 10% royalties on all copies sold.

For further information or to enter, please write to the following address:

The Contemporary Arts Educational Project, Inc.
Sun & Moon Press New American Poetry Competition
6026 Wilshire Boulevard
Los Angeles, California 90036
[redacted] FAX:[redacted]

↑ Index

4. Loss Glazier

How to Subscribe to RIF/T (Informational)

Wed 15 Jun 1994

In response to some questions about how to subscribe to RIF/T, I post the following information for those who might need it. This is an informational posting.

H O W T O S U B S C R I B E T O R I F / T
(An Electronic Journal of Poetry, Poetics, and Writing)

[redacted]

Leave the "to" and "subject" lines of your e-mail message blank.
In the body of the e-mail message type:

subscribe e-poetry Firstname Lastname

where "Firstname" and "Lastname" correspond to your actual name.
You will receive a message confirming your subscription in short order.

Thanks for your interest in RIF/T,
Loss Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood & Loss Glazier

↑ Index

5. Charles Watts

"Recovery of the Public World"

Wed 15 Jun 1994

ANNOUNCING "THE RECOVERY OF THE PUBLIC WORLD": a Conference in Honour of the Poetry and Poetics of Robin Blaser; to be held in Vancouver, Canada, June 1st to 4th, 1995.

"Poets have repeatedly in this century turned philosophers, so to speak, in order to argue the value of poetry and its practice within the disturbed meanings of our time. These arguments are fascinating because they have everything to do with the poets' sense of reality in which imagery is entangled with thought. Often, they reflect Pound's sense of `make it new' or the modernist notion that this century and its art are simultaneously the end of something and the beginning of something else, a new consciousness, and so forth. It is not one argument or another for or against tradition, nor is it the complex renewal of the imaginary which our arts witness, for, as I take it, the enlightened mind does not undervalue the imaginary, which is the most striking matter of these poetics; what is laid out before us finally is the fundamental struggle for the nature of the real. And this, in my view, is a spiritual struggle, both philosophical and poetic. Old spiritual forms, along with positivisms and materialisms, which `held' the real together have come loose. This is a cliche of our recognitions and condition. But we need only look at the energy of the struggle in philosophy and poetry to make it alive and central to our private and public lives." (Robin Blaser, from "The Violets: Charles Olson and Alfred North Whitehead," in LINE No. 2, Fall 1983)

This conference will address many of the concerns voiced by Robin Blaser's work in poetry and prose over nearly fifty years' writing, teaching, speaking and living an evolving poetic thought. There will be six panel sessions, each exploring a realm of this thought; there will also be a seventh, convivial session which will give us an opportunity to speak about companionship in poetry and poetics.

The panels, with possible topics for discussion:

POETICS, THEORY AND PRACTICE: presentation & representation - self & other - the play of absence - parataxis & hypotaxis - the serial poem - dictation - the poem as field - the poem thinking - the poem as argument - theory and practice of language - augury - the visionary & the prophetic - the construction of modernity - mythopoiesis - grammatology - logography

PAINTING, MUSIC, SCULPTURE, POETRY: no break with tradition, but a continuous gathering - continuous breakages and ruptures with academicisms and canon-makings - field in painting, music, the plastic arts - Rimbaud's `dereglement de tous les sens' - `the painter of modern life' - revolution of the word - Duchamp & poiesis - l'avant-garde - Bach's belief &/in the era of Boulez and Cage

HETEROLOGIES: `religio', a `tying back to' & vision vs. religiosity - futurity as indeterminable vs a settled & expected transcendence - dangerousness of the latter - rethinking the cosmos in the 19th century (Poe, Emerson, Melville, Dickinson) - Blake & cosmos - 20th century turns - "we are `ventured' by language" - Olson, Whitehead - science as thought & unthought (Einstein, Foucault) - `scientific angelism' (Girard) - Merleau-Ponty - Leibniz, Bach, probability, monadology - Deleuze, `the fold' - heterodoxies, heterologies (De

Certeau) - `God, self, history, and book' (Taylor) - importance & implications of cosmology/cosmogony as modes of poetic discourse in relation to the contemporary dominance of philosophies of language & psychoanalysis - muthos/logos - Plato & the preface to Plato & the postface - the `other' of philosophy & poetics

ETHICS AND AESTHETICS: modern `isms' and persons - self, other - Hannah Arendt & the recovery of the public world - the scapegoat, sacrifice of the other - Marx, Freud, materialisms, positivisms - Foucault (madness & civilization, archaeologies of knowledge, the public institution) - the postmodern condition - poet & ideology - Benjamin, Adorno, Bloch, and others - outsiders (Hans Mayer) & `the practice of outside' - Nietzsche, the birth of tragedy, the gay science - `the fragility of goodness' (Nussbaum) - repression & freedom - Hermes & the parasite (Serres) - the practice of everyday life - (De Certeau) - nomadology - ethical poetics

EROS AND POIESIS: desire & freedom - eros & agape - self, other - homoeros, sexualities, `heterodalities' - `sodometries' - the creative/the destructive, the prolific/the devouring - sexual politics - the poetics of love

TRANSLATION: `De volgari eloquentia' - Mallarme, `correspondances' - dictation - mimesis - imitation &/or carrying over - Pound - Nerval, Duncan, Blaser - music the `upper limit of speech'? - translation & the sacred - `originality'/`derivation' - `quotation' - Octavio Paz - before, during, and after Babel (George Steiner) - ethnopoetics, culture studies, linguistics & translation

COMPANIONS: breaking bread with - a feast of companionship - `the great companions: Pindar, Dante, Whitman, H.D., Duncan, Spicer, Olson, Pound, Yeats et al - the everyday & miraculous affection - `the truth is laughter' - Boston, Berkeley, San Francisco, Vancouver - teaching/learning - generosities of scholarship - order/strife & human fulfillment - truth & life of myth

The `Companions' session will be celebrated as a feast.

Obviously, the `topics' outlined above have hardly the stability of categories, and can easily, and relatively promiscuously, slip from one session to another; "the map is not the territory," and conference participants will find their own territories/unterritories to speak from. One very valuable guide is Robin Blaser's The Holy Forest, "a collected poems, that is, as far as I've gone today, 6 May, 1993" (Toronto: Coach House Press, 1993), available from Coach House, 50 Prince Arthur Avenue, Suite 107, Toronto, Canada M5R 1B5, and from Small Press Distribution, 1814 San Pablo Avenue, Berkeley CA 94702, Fax [redacted].

A CALL FOR PROPOSALS: "THE RECOVERY OF THE PUBLIC WORLD": A CONFERENCE ON THE POETRY AND POETICS OF ROBIN BLASER, June 1st-4th, 1995, EMILY CARR COLLEGE OF ART AND DESIGN, VANCOUVER, B.C.,

CANADA. CRITICISM * THEORY * BIOGRAPHY * LITERARY HISTORY * POETRY * WELCOME. PANELS AND SEMINARS WILL BE HELD ON POETICS, THEORY AND PRACTICE * PAINTING, MUSIC, SCULPTURE, POETRY * HETEROLOGIES * ETHICS AND AESTHETICS * EROS AND POIESIS * TRANSLATION * COMPANIONS.

Please submit two copies of a 500-750 word proposal by 30 September 1994 to "Toward the Recovery of the Public World," c/o The Institute for the Humanities, Simon Fraser University, Burnaby, B.C. Canada V5A 1S6

Conference organizers are Ted Byrne, Tom Grieve, Tom McGauley, Miriam Nichols and Charles Watts. For additional information about the conference, please write to the Institute for the Humanities, or telephone [redacted] or [redacted]; or fax [redacted]. My e-mail address is [redacted]

Charles Watts for the conference organizers.

↑ Index

6. Fred J. Wah
Re: chappies
Mon 20 Jun 1994

Thanks for the morsel. We're off to Germany in the morning, tired out after the Learneds here in Calgary last two weeks, plus all the fighting bout the race conference (but it's going ahead with lots of donations anyway). I haven't been abel to get to the D book at all - feel bad about that but will have to wait until Sept now.

Was good to see you in TO, hope yr ok and the summer works. I'll be off of this, except for a couple of days in July, until late August.

take care,

Fred--

↑ Index

7. Alan Loney
Poetics Notebook
Tue 28 Jun 1994

Wystan Curnow has just told me (with a heap of enthusiam and of course a glittering intellegence) of your poetics discussion group, and I'd like to join. May I?

[redacted]

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

July 1994

69 messages · Tue 5 Jul 1994 – Sun 31 Jul 1994

July is a month that turns its back, and I have long since learned not to hold the habit against it. While the comet came apart against Jupiter in a string of bruises the astronomers could scarcely credit, and the wider world spent its fortnight on catastrophe and a football final, my sixty-nine correspondents bolted the door of the little room and argued, of all the imperishable subjects, about anthologies. I find this exactly right. The list is never more itself than when it declines the news and keeps its own weather. A reader arriving from the century outside will feel the hush of a seminar that has forgotten there is a corridor at all, and I confess I would not have it otherwise.

And yet it opens in mourning. On the fifth, Charles Bernstein reposts Robert Creeley's notice that Warren Tallman has died in Vancouver, at home, on the Fourth of July — the impresario of the 1963 conference that carried Olson and Duncan and Ginsberg north, the teacher who, Creeley says, simply believed. Creeley rarely reaches for the large word; he reaches here, and calls Tallman "a great, great heart." I have let the letter stand at the head of the month unabridged, because everything that follows it — the squabbling, the punning, the earnest scholarship — is in some measure the sound of that heart still being listened for.

The month's true engine, though, is the anthology question, and it runs hot. Alan Golding arrives with the scholar's full armamentarium — citations, a survey of the field, the promise of his forthcoming "From Outlaw to Classic" — to ask how canons are actually made: who counts the poets, and by what arithmetic. Marjorie Perloff, characteristically, refuses the arithmetic outright. "This sort of head count can't work," she writes, for there will always be another group, another exclusion, another aggrieved census. Between Golding's patience and Perloff's impatience the list strikes its familiar chord: the canon is a scandal none of them can quite bring themselves to abandon.

Then, as ever here, the argument tips over into play. "Anthologies" slides into "magic anthology ride," which slides into the gorgeous nonsense-word "Anthslide," and the thread becomes a spelling game conducted at speed. Marc Nasdor, who posts more than anyone, plants his flag on the far shore — anthologies are "a needless waste of wood pulp," he declares, before cheerfully admitting to a couple of dozen on his own shelves — while Chris Funk opens a second front entirely, enrolling the whole company in “an Imaginary University” whose curriculum is pure cryptic delight. This is the Poetics list at its most itself: unable to lose an argument because unwilling, in the end, to stop enjoying one.

And beneath the play, something is quietly founded. It is in this same July that Loss Glazier posts the announcement of the Electronic Poetry Center at Buffalo — the archive, that is, in which these very letters would one day come to rest. I admit a proprietary tenderness toward that message. The list spent the month mourning a teacher and building a memory-machine, and did not once appear to notice it was doing both at the same time. That, precisely, is the office of an editor: to notice. I have gathered the sixty-nine here in their true order, drawn the bar across what ought never to have been public, and left the rest to speak as it did — all at once, and out of turn.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 69 in all.

WRITERS

Amato, Joe 3, 58
Arts, Mn Ctr For Book 31
Bernstein, Charles 1, 11
Conte, Joseph 27, 36, 55
Drake, Robert 49, 65
Evans, Steve 7, 10, 14, 30, 54, 59
Fowler, John 48
Funk, Chris 6, 60
Glazier, Loss 2
Golding, Alan 12, 13, 19, 21
Guitart, Jorge 39
Joris, Pierre 18
Kat 46
Klindberg 15, 24, 28, 29, 40
Lazer, Hank 20
Loney, Alan 8
Mandel, Tom 69
McPherson, Karin 5
Metzger, Michael 4
Nasdor, Marc 17, 22, 23, 26, 33, 34, 35, 38, 41, 42, 44, 47, 51, 56
Nathanson, Tenney 25
Perloff, Marjorie 50, 53, 66, 67
Phillips, Patrick 43
Quartermain, Peter 9
Rasula, Jed 16, 37, 61
Schultz, Susan 32, 45, 52
Sondheim 68
Sondheim, Alan 62, 63, 64
WALLACE, MARK 57

NAMES MENTIONED

Allison, Dorothy 62
Americans, Asian 38, 45, 54
Antin, David 27
Ashbery, John 27, 50
Auden, W. H. 50, 61
Avison, Margaret 1
Baraka, Amiri 27, 32
Barthelme, Donald 27
Bellamy, Dodie 57
Bertholf, Robert 27
Bishop, Elizabeth 27
Blackburn, Paul 36
Blaser, Robin 27
Borges, Jorge Luis 60
Bowering, George 1
Bromige, David 1
Brook, James 11
Brooks, Gwendolyn 13
Ceravolo, Joe 54
Charters, Ann 36
Cherry, Don 60
Clark, Emilie 62
Cobain, Kurt 35
Coleman, Jen 60
Coolidge, Clark 1, 27
Crane, Lee 50
Creeley, Robert 1, 60
Cyrille, Andrew 60
Darragh, Tina 32
Dickinson, Mark 50
Duncan, Robert 1, 27
Eliot, Joe 50
Elliot, Joe 53
Eshleman, Clayton 18, 21
Esther, Little 54
France, Peter 41
Gander, Forrest 54
Ganick, Peter 49
Gardner, Janet 27
Ginsberg, Allen 1, 36
Glück, Louise 27
Grenier, Bob 36
Harper, Michael 5, 54
Hatlen, Burt 12
Heath, Jennifer 32
Henri, Charles 18
Herbert, George 60
Hinton, Laura 54
Hoover, Edgar 10, 12, 16, 32, 37, 49, 50, 61
Howard, Scott 35, 44
Ignatow, David 27
Inman, Peter 32
Jackson, Jesse 62
Jeanne, Sarah 60
Joseph, Safdie 27
Joyce, Trevor 60
Killian, Kevin 57
Kraus, Karl 64
Lacan, Jacques 62
Levertov, Denise 1
Levy, Andy 59
Lyons, Kim 60
Mackey, Nathaniel 32
Marley, Bob 11
Martin, Camille 5
Messerli, Doug 10, 16, 31, 32, 37, 61
Miriam, Erica 27
Moore, Marianne 60
Murray, David 60

Murray, Ian 11
Nichols, Travis 27
Niedecker, Lorine 60
Nielsen, Aldon L. 57
Norton, John 18, 21, 22, 49
Olson, Charles 1
Olson, Kirby 50
Oppen, George 60
Osman, Jena 49
Palmer, Michael 1
Quasha, George 11
Reznikoff, Charles 60
Rich, Adrienne 27
Roberts, Gary 62
Rothenberg, Jerome 27
Rothenberg, Jerry 20
Schultz, Susan M. 32
Schuyler, James 50
Scroggins, Mark 27
Sherwood, Kenneth 2
Silliman, Ron 27, 57
Simone, Frank 18
Smithson, Robert 11
Spahr, Juliana 49
Stanley, Jared 37
Tallman, Warren 1
Taylor, Cecil 11
Taylor, Tom 49
Tejada, Roberto 54
Threadgill, Henry 11
Warren, Kenneth 1
Washington, George 25, 44, 57
Weinberger, Eliot 10, 12, 16, 37, 50, 53, 54, 61, 69
Whalen, Philip 1
Whitman, Walt 50, 60
Wilbur, Richard 35
Williams, William Carlos 60
Yau, John 51, 52, 54
Zukofsky, Louis 27, 60

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 60
Aesthetics 32, 60
Anthologies 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 37, 43, 45, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 58, 61, 69
Appropriation 11, 27, 55
Archives and libraries 2
Asian American poetry 52
Autobiography 61
Avant-garde 54, 59
Beauty 60
Biography 9, 27, 29, 36
Book announcements 12, 57
Bookstores 49
Capitalism 11, 54, 56
Class 54, 56
Conferences and festivals 1, 60
Copyright and permissions 9, 49
Creative writing pedagogy 28, 30, 32, 58
Dada 11
Deconstruction 11
Difficulty 1, 60
Dreams 11, 60, 63, 64
Ecology and ecopoetics 60
Editing 27, 30, 36, 49, 54, 58, 65
Electronic poetry and hypertext 2
Empire and imperialism 42, 43
Experimental poetry 47
Fascism 64
Film 47
Free verse 35
Gender 41, 49, 55
Harlem Renaissance 15
Humour and satire 3, 4
Identity politics 56
Ideology 43, 49
Letters and correspondence 54, 57, 60
Little magazines 2, 57
Marxism 11
Memory 54
Modernism 11, 15
Mourning and loss 2, 64
Multiculturalism 37, 41, 45, 46, 52, 54, 56
Music and poetry 11, 32, 47
Nature 11, 25, 29
New York School 10
Objectivism 9, 10, 50, 60
Philosophy 60
Place and region 2
Poetics 1, 2, 6, 7, 11, 49, 54, 62
Politics and poetry 54
Print vs. digital 16, 25, 54
Queer poetics 50, 52, 55
Race and poetry 46, 55, 56
Representation 54, 56, 58
Reviewing and criticism 1, 8, 12, 18, 21, 22, 24, 30, 42, 46, 54, 56, 59, 61
Science 11
Small press publishing 2
Software and code 58
Subjectivity 14, 41, 47
Sublime 11, 60
Surrealism 11
The academy 1, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, 15, 32, 38, 44, 52, 58, 59, 69
The body 41
The canon 26, 32, 45, 48, 59, 69
The internet 2, 59
The listserv 14, 30, 49
Theatre 42
Translation 44, 60, 62

Visual art 43, 49

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 69 in all.

5 JUL 1994

1. Charles Bernstein — Warren Tallman / from Robert Creeley

10 JUL 1994

2. Loss Glazier — Announcement: Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo)

12 JUL 1994

3. Joe Amato — The Waste Land...
4. Michael Metzger — Anybody have a clue? M Metzger

14 JUL 1994

5. Karin McPherson — search: the Waste Land

15 JUL 1994

6. Chris Funk — des crypt ions of an I U (she he it we you they)
7. Steve Evans — Des Cryptionists: An Inquiry

17 JUL 1994

8. Alan Loney — Jerome McGann

18 JUL 1994

9. peter quartermain — Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
10. Steve Evans — Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
11. Charles Bernstein — repost for CF/ RE: In Si Dental Poetics
12. Alan Golding — Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
13. Alan Golding — Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
14. Steve Evans — Anthologies
15. klindberg — Re: Anthologies
16. Jed Rasula — Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?

19 JUL 1994

17. Marc Nasdor — Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
18. Pierre Joris — Re: Anthologies
19. Alan Golding — Anthologies
20. Hank Lazer — Re: Anthologies
21. Alan Golding — Re: Anthologies
22. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthologies
23. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthologies
24. klindberg — Re: Anthologies

20 JUL 1994

25. Tenney Nathanson — presumably all have seen this but
26. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthologies
27. Joseph Conte — Literary Biography
28. klindberg — Re: Anthologies
29. klindberg — Re: Literary Biography
30. Steve Evans — Anthslide
31. Mn Ctr for Book Arts — Re: magic anthology ride

21 JUL 1994

32. Susan Schultz — Re: Anthslide
33. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthslide
34. Marc Nasdor — Re: magic anthology ride
35. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthslide

36. Joseph Conte — Re: Literary Biography
37. Jed Rasula — Re: Anthslide

22 JUL 1994

38. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthslide
39. Jorge Guitart — Re: Anthslide
40. klindberg — Re: Anthslide

23 JUL 1994

41. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthslide
42. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthslide
43. Patrick Phillips — Re: Anthslide
44. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthslide
45. Susan Schultz — Re: Anthslide
46. kat — Re: Anthslide
47. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthslide
48. John Fowler — Re: ANTHSLIDE

24 JUL 1994

49. Robert Drake — Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?

26 JUL 1994

50. Marjorie Perloff — Anthologies
51. Marc Nasdor — Re: Anthologies

27 JUL 1994

52. Susan Schultz — Re: Anthologies
53. Marjorie Perloff — Anthologies again
54. Steve Evans — Yau's Review
55. Joseph Conte — Re: Anthologies
56. Marc Nasdor — Re: Yau's Review

28 JUL 1994

57. MARK WALLACE — Situation on the move

29 JUL 1994

58. Joe Amato — anthologies...
59. Steve Evans — Re: Yau's Review
60. Chris Funk — synnerlyptium
61. Jed Rasula — Re: Yau's Review
62. Alan Sondheim — Submission
63. Alan Sondheim — Submission
64. Alan Sondheim — Submission
65. Robert Drake — Re: Submission

30 JUL 1994

66. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Submission
67. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Submission
68. sondheim — Submission

31 JUL 1994

69. Tom Mandel — Flavia

1. Charles Bernstein

Warren Tallman / from Robert Creeley

Tue 5 Jul 1994

--Boundary (ID oTjVMpHWBpRrJM1RImBFWg)

Date: Tue, 5 Jul 1994 08:31:59 EST
From: [redacted]
Subject: Warren Tallman

We've had the sad advice from his family that Warren Tallman died yest- erday (July 4) in Vancouver, British Columbia, thankfully at home and without difficulty. It's hard to imagine the present fact of Canadian poetry and its relation to our own sans the immense effort which Warren Tallman made in his years as a teacher at the University of British Col- umbia, and, even more, as the indefatigable reader and friend of all the defining poets of both countries. In 1962, for example, Warren's students at UBC included Daphne Marlatt, Fred Wah, George Bowering, Gladys Hind- march, Lionel Kearns,and David Bromige, among many others. The landmark 1963 Vancouver Poetry Conference was almost entirely Warren's remarkable invention, bringing together for the first time a decisive company of then disregarded poets such as Denise Levertov, Charles Olson, Allen Ginsberg, Robert Duncan, Margaret Avison, Philip Whalen and myself, together with as yet unrecognized younger poets of that time, Michael Palmer, Clark Coolidge and many more. Be it said that Warren wrote the first decisive piece on Jack Kerouac's skills as a writer, "Kerouac's Sound," published in the Evergreen Review. Donald Allen and he subsequently edited together POETICS OF THE NEW AMERICAN POETRY, a crucial backup of Don's initial anth- ology which, seemingly, changed everything. Warren's two substantial col- lections of essays report and review the tenets of poetry which underlie the revolution he had so much to do with.

All that can finally be checked out. What will be sorely missed is the singular insight and invention Warren brought to his relations with poetry and poets. He was a great reader, a great, great heart. Defined by the American Great Depression, he believed absolutely that books mattered, that what people can think of and so imagine is true, that it can really happen. So it was that he brought Robert Duncan first to Vancouver, to talk with his students in a series of meetings, all managed by the money they could themselves modestly and communally provide. Jack Spicer's last articulate lectures were fact of the same circumstance. I was able to teach for a year at UBC at a time when virtually no other job was possible, just that Warren BELIEVED. I cannot overemphasize the significance of such a power. It's as if Warren brought not only the US and Canada together in such interests, but that he really brought western Canada's poetry into the international world it now helps to define and keep possible.

Well, this can be the beginning, I hope, of what can now continue as Warren's work: bringing it all home, keeping the beat, making that joyful sound. Warren loved the sense of "mother tongue" always. He really knew how to listen.

Here's to you, brother, forever.

Robert Creeley

--Boundary (ID oTjVMpHWBpRrJM1RImBFWg)--

↑ Index

2. Loss Glazier

Announcement: Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo)

Sun 10 Jul 1994

The Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo) 7-10-94

_____Announcement_____

THE ELECTRONIC POETRY CENTER (BUFFALO). The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center will provide access to numerous electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the Poetics List archives, a library of poetic texts, news of related print sources, and direct connections to numerous related poetic projects. The Center's first phase of implementation is scheduled for August 1, 1994. A subscription to the E-Poetry list provides a subscription to the electronic journal RIF/T and E-Poetry Center announcements. Subscriptions to E-Poetry to [redacted] Inquiries, suggestions for Center resources, submissions to RIF/T, and other mail may be directed to [redacted] The Center is located at gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/library/e- journals/ub/rift (Presently, the prototype is under construction but operational.)

Gopher Access:
For those who have access to gopher, type
gopher writing.upenn.edu
(or, if you are on a UB mainframe, simply type wings)
at your system prompt. First choose Libraries &
Library Resources, then Electronic Journals, then E-Journals/Resources Produced Here At UB, then The Electronic Poetry Center. (Note: Connections to some Poetry Center resources require Web access, though most
are presently available through gopher).

World-Wide Web Access:
For those with World-Wide Web or lynx access, type www or lynx at your system prompt. Choose the go to URL option then go to (type as one continuous string)

gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift

___Participation in the Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo)___

For those interested in helping us build the Center, our goal is to provide a single Internet site that offers a doorway into the different poetic projects out there in the electronic (and paper) poetics world. We would like to offer access to information about poetics and poetry activities, electronic poetry journals, texts in progress, etc. We are currently developing a library of electronic poetry/poetics texts (submissions to [redacted]. buffalo.edu). The Center has other exciting possibilities:

1. Circulation of electronic journals with an emphasis on direct links to those of relevance to Center concerns;
2. Reviews of recent print and electronic publications. (Brief reviews may also be submitted electronically to [redacted]);
3. Direct links to other related electronic sites;
4. Multimedia resources. Sound and graphics relating to poetry.
5. Building our Small Press Alcove, a place for little magazine and book announcements. The point of including announcements of paper resources is to provide a listing of interesting work for people to look at; they can then write or e-mail the publisher to obtain publications. (Send announcements to [redacted] or magazines/books to Loss Glazier, E-Poetry, P.O. Box 143, Getzville, NY 14068-0143);
6. Ultimately, the Center could also offer collaborative projects (perhaps for specific groups of writers), lists and/or archives of other lists, and texts-in-progress, as things develop.

The "Buffalo" in the title of the Center is not meant to suggest that this activity is limited to Buffalo, only to give the "visitor" a sense of place, i.e., where the mainframe that's providing this service is "located."

Vigorous writing wants to "circulate." On this new electronic terrain, the Electronic Poetry Center will serve as a gathering place or point of entry for a range of poetic efforts.

_____How to Contact Us_____

Please contact us with your suggestions, texts, sound files, and graphics files to submit, or if you have expertise in these areas. LET US KNOW WHAT YOU THINK (this is meant to be a Center that grows with your ideas) by posting to this list, sending mail to E-Poetry, or to Loss Glazier ([redacted]) or Kenneth Sherwood (v001pxfu.ubvms.cc. buffalo.edu) privately.

_____

The Archive is administered in Buffalo by E-Poetry and RIF/T in coordination with the Poetics List.

Loss Pequen~o Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood and Loss Glazier
in collaboration with Charles Bernstein

↑ Index

3. Joe Amato

The Waste Land...

Tue 12 Jul 1994

uhm, i dunno if this is what you're looking for, but harper & row published martin rowson's _the waste land_ in 1990---a comic art parody of eliot's work... the protagonist is l.a. private eye christopher marlowe etc...

joe

↑ Index

4. Michael Metzger

Anybody have a clue? M Metzger

Tue 12 Jul 1994

From: IN%"[redacted]" "WIG-L - Women in German"
11-JUL-1994 11:10:29.43
To: IN%"[redacted]" "Multiple recipients of l ist WIG-L"
CC:
Subj: author/title/publisher search id <[redacted]>; Mon, 11 Jul 1994 11:09:39 EST with BSMTP id 4133; Mon, 11 Jul 94 11:07:11 EDT

UBVM.CC.BUFFALO.EDU (LMail V1.2a/1.8a) with BSMTP id 4174; Mon,
11 Jul 1994 11:07:11 -0400
Date: Mon, 11 Jul 1994 15:54:36 +0000
From: Karin McPherson <[redacted]>
Subject: author/title/publisher search
To: Multiple recipients of list WIG-L <[redacted]> Organization: Arts

I would be grateful for any information on the following : Maurice Ransone (author) The Wasteland (title) 1990 or `92(publication date). It is a parody of Eliot's poem. Where has it appeared? Is it available? Who are the publishers? Karin McPherson, Department of German, University of Edinburgh, DHT, George Square, EH8 9JX, Scotland.

↑ Index

5. Karin McPherson
search: the Waste Land
Thu 14 Jul 1994

---

information found by Joe Amato. author: Martin Rowson. The Waste Land. Harper &Row 1990. Many thanks to all who helped.
Karin McPherson

↑ Index

6. Chris Funk
des crypt ions of an I U (she he it we you they)
Fri 15 Jul 1994

Not getting enough from / giving enough to your university?

Sign up for DIU, a weekly from [redacted]

POETICS travellers thus far describing an Imaginary University include black hole sun; Thus, Albert or Hubert; PJ; BG &tc

--Boundary (ID 7R/p22VzziXb+AmYddNjOQ)--

↑ Index

7. Steve Evans
Des Cryptionists: An Inquiry
Fri 15 Jul 1994

Chris,

Knowing you, I am inclined to enroll in your imaginary university (department of incidental poetics)--but could you perhaps dilate ever so slightly on what you're up to? I post this to the general list, rather than to you directly, since others may be as puzzled and intrigued as I am.

Thanks.

↑ Index

8. Alan Loney
Jerome McGann
Sun 17 Jul 1994

Hello people,

does anyone have an e-mail address for Jerome McGann, author of A Critique of Textual Criticism, among other texts. I'd be very grateful for this info.

Many thanks, in anticipation.

Alan Loney.

↑ Index

9. peter quartermain
Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
Mon 18 Jul 1994

Alan Golding: "A History of American Poetry Anthologies." _Canons_. edited by R. von Hallberg. Chicago, Chicago UP 1984, 279-308. You might also find useful a long piece I did as Appendix to _Dictionary of Literary Biography_ Vol 54: American Poets 1880-1945 [3rd series part 2] (Detroit: Gale, 1986), 579-676 "A Survey of Poetry Anthologies 1879-1960." This is an annotated list preceded by a brief discussion of trends. It reprints a number of prefaces and introductions (eg _Active Anthology_) and the Tables of Contents, but unfortunately omits (permission to reprint was withheld at the page-proof stage) Zukofsky's _An "Objectivists" Anthology_, which thus gets appallingly and undeservedly short shrift. The "Survey" does not (overall) include textbooks. I also discuss briefly the fortune of some of these (and some text-book anthologies) in the general introduction (called "Foreword") to Vol 54, Part 1. This foreword also appears in Vols 45 and 48: _DLB: American Poets &c_ 1st and 2nd Series, and was reprinted in slightly revised form

[with full documentation] in _Sagetrieb_ 9.3 (Winter 1990): 7-29.
There's lots more on all this stuff somewhere, but right now I'm in the throes of packing for a three week vacation starting tomorrow (today, where you are). If you want more, ask again around 5 August when (MAYBE) I can lay my stupid hands on my scattered notes. But Alan Golding will have answered you by then, surely. He knows more than anybody. Cheers, Peter Quartermain

↑ Index

10. Steve Evans
Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
Mon 18 Jul 1994

If anyone has it at their fingertips, I need to be reminded of where Alan Golding published an article on the history of poetry anthologies (in 20th-century U.S.).

I'm hoping to get a little perspective on the Messerli, Hoover, Weinberger collections, as well as to push along some work I'm doing on the use of group anthologies by the Objectivists, the New York School, and the language writers. If people have suggestions beyond the Golding I would be very interested in seeing them.

P.S. Thanks to Chris for the first course listings from the Imaginary University. Now how bout the financial aid packets for our imaginary incomes?

↑ Index

11. Charles Bernstein
repost for CF/ RE: In Si Dental Poetics
Mon 18 Jul 1994

From: [redacted]
Date: Sat, 16 Jul 1994 10:24:06 -0400 (EDT)

Subject: Re: Dept. of In Si Dental Poetics

Steve,

Hope all goes well in Providence.

Up to a bunch of things. It was someone else who kicked this new/sletter into gear -- accidentally, of course -- then, energy being what it is in addition to our ALWAYS READY stance -- well, you can decide for yourself what it is & isn't as reposting this week's edition below (apologies to those who are on the direct list ALready) -- next week's version will feature a scathing rebuttal by marianne moore to bhs's course description among other things. We all have our peeves regarding university curriculae, here is a place for I or I to begin again. As usual, a myriad of editors handling the materials...

We welcome all contributions/suggestions-- paz--

chris funkhouser

> DIU 2
>
> 14 July 94
>
> course description
>
> "american poetry"
>
> required texts:
>
> walt whitman
> drum-taps
>
> marianne moore
> selected poems, 1935
>
> frederico garcia lorca
> poeta en nueva york
>
> john wieners
> behind the state capital or cincinnati pike
>
> joanne kyger
> the wonderful focus of you
>
> what does it mean to be an american? & once we think we discover this meaning, what to do with it? for if poetry arises in the gap, not between sense and nonsense, but sense and PURPOSELESSNESS (this will be our first thesis), then the TASK of poetry will be a confrontation with nonsense, in the hope that purpose lies that side of the continuum (this will be our second thesis).
>
> what to do with what we know (not to mention, how to act given what we DON'T know) is poetry's preeminent question.
>
> we begin with war; pause to consider the pleasures and discoveries of the imperial eye, the grace our language attained when it gave in--without blinking--to the intellectual grandeur of the I, a sure center sure of its own morality; we'll then study--without blinking--the aftereffects of this assumption of power, the poverity and madness which the center always deposits at its margins; and we'll conclude by considering america's prospects in the coming ante-time a digest:

"Look down fair moon and bathe this scene, / pour softly down night's nimbus floods on faces ghastly, swollen, purple..."
whitman

"Slow / To remark the steep, too strict proportion / Of your throne, you'll see the wrenched distortion / Of suicidal dreams / Go / Staggering toward itself and with its bill / Attack its own identity, until / Foe seems friend and friend seems / Foe"
moore

"Porque ya no hay quien reparta el pan ni el vino / ni quien cultive hierbas en la boca del muerto" ("For see: there is none to apportion the bread and the wine / or cultivate grass in the mouths of the dead")
lorca

"If I tread the straight and narrow / I should no trouble, do what's / expected of me, realize my friends / are not my enemies, and get rid of // them both..."
wieners

"The seemingly inexhaustible / sophistication of awareness becomes relentless and horrible, / trapped. How am I ever going to learn enough to get out"
kyger

--black hole sun

The utopian schemes that have informed us of our possibilities-- Brook Farm, the Marxist stateless state and even the endlessly progressing capitalist economy, guided by an invisible hand or by liberal bureacracies--were equally predicated not upon the order of foundational knowledge but upon an order of minds in the thrall of the sublime. The profound moment of insight, enlightenment, revolution is not vision but the catastrophe of the imagination. It is the shattering of the image, of the old style, of the conventional view, of _ancien regime_, and so forth that leaves one unsettled but grasping a profound point of a knowledge. The site of the revelation is not directly open to inspection, and especially not available for a second look, but, as it--whatever it is--recedes from view, it confirms the the confidence in the utopian possibility, and it can be brought back to the edge of view by the next careful negotiation of imagination into spectacular collapse.

For nearly two hundred years, art had been a matter of tearing through the surface of rationality, convention, and social stultification in order to maintain access to the surprise of life as such. For the generation of artists born of the World War II and after, however, everything they'd learned was wrong. The techniques of the artists who had interested them in art in the first place, whom they had admired and thought to imitate, turned out to be inappropriate to this new condition. Dadaism lives: it is taught at in the Harvard M.B.A. program. Surrealism lives: it is taught to computer programmers at M.I.T. (some might say, mathematics has proven so strange, that it is taught even in the math department). Our architects, our lawyers are modernist purveyors of chaos (to say nothing, of course, of the faceless committees which generate what we call the media).

There is no point, in the face of unbridled growth economies, to recall wild nature in tranquility, to practice nihilistic techniques of art and thought, to do automatic writing, or to create chance generated art. Chaos no longer needs the help of art. The techniques that delivered fresh air in 1810 or 1910 contributed (though contributed insignificantly) by 1970 to a proliferation of incomprehensible energy. The Dadaists never managed to exhibit the degree of chaos that Robert Smithson records in his photographs of Passaic, New Jersey.

If the task of the artists is to right the balance between consciousness and unconsciousness, they must now cast their lot with consciousness. It is the unconscious itself which is manifesting as uncontrolled production. If the task of the artists is to right the balance between order and chaos, they must now cast their lot with order-- with construction, not deconstruction. This involves large scale reordering of the practice of art, in order to serve the same function.

--Thus, Albert or Hubert

air.txt radiostation wrpi 91.5 fm troy, ny 7 july 94 0811-1200

George Quasha/Charles Stein--"life on the flying carpet"/anthology '85 (cassette)
Eric Dolphy--"Burning Spear"/Iron Man
-
Bob Marley & the Wailers--"Positive Vibration|Wake Up and Live|I Shot the Sheriff|Dem Belly Full|Concrete Jungle|Ambush in the Night|You Can't Run Away From Yourself|Heathen Writing|Natty Dread Rides Again|War"/live Santa Cruz 12/79 (cassette)
Public Enemy--"Harry Allen's Interactive Super Highway Phone Call to Chuck D"/Give It Up
-
Chico Freeman--"title song|Freedom Swing Song|Lookup|Nia's Song Dance|Morning Prayer"/Peaceful Heart, Gentle Spirit
Mutabaruka--"People's Court Pt. II"/Melanin' Man
-
Lou Harrison--"Threnody"/Just West Coast
-
Cecil Taylor w/Workshop Ensemble--"Legba Crossing"/Legba Crossing
Diedre Murray/Fred Hopkins--"Systems"/Stringology
-
Mission of Burma--"Trem Two"/vs.
Mission of Burma--"That's When I Reach for my Revolver|Outlaw|Fame & Fortune"/Signals, Calls, Marches
Mission of Burma--"Forget|Peking Spring"/ep
Mission of Burma--"Academy Fight Song"/45 rpm
-
Lisa Germano--"the earth"/happiness
John's Black Dirt--"Movements"/Perpetual Optimism is a Force Multiplier Lisa Germano--"Miamo-tutti"/happiness
-
Bheki Mselku--"Ntuli Street"/Timelessness
Michael Lally--"Healing Poem"/cd b/w
Henry Threadgill Very Very Circus--"Some Place"/live at Koncepts

DIU is a weekly newsletter directed towards Descriptions of an Imaginary University (c)irculated by the Logic of Snowflakes hypersidiary of We Press, USA to contribute or receive previous presentations "write" to [redacted]

--Boundary (ID e1kFdHVOPTZu0qDO+h0Ogw)--

↑ Index

12. Alan Golding
Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
Mon 18 Jul 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

I figure I ought to be qualified to respond to this one. The essay is "A History of American Poetry Anthologies" in Robert von Hallberg's edited collection Canons (Univ. of Chicago Press 1984): 279-307. A revised and updated version with some material on Weinberger and Hoover will appear as the first chapter in my forthcoming From Outlaw to Classic: Canons in American Poetry (U of Wisconsin Press early 1995). I have an essay in progress called "Approaching the Present in American Poetry Anthologies" that deals with Weinberger Hoover et al and with mainstream anthologies since the mid-1970s. If anyone's interested in the updated book chapter or the work in progress (I've given the latter as a talk so it's in more or less readable and coherent shape) just drop me a note; both pieces have notes/bibliographies that might suggest further resources. As regards the recent anthologies I'm sure there are a ton of reviews that I don't know about (a mini-bibl. of reviews for those anthologies would actually be a useful project for someone to take on) but the exchanges in American Poetry Review are lively: John Yau's original review followed by Weinberger's response and Yau's response to the response; and Burt Hatlen reviewed the Weinberger collection in Sagetrieb. So Steve--you might look at those pieces if you haven't already done so.

↑ Index

13. Alan Golding
Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
Mon 18 Jul 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Dear Steve Evans--In my first reply to your post I forgot to mention that I also have a section of the forthcoming book on Brooks and Warren's Understanding Poetry--just in case you're interested in that earlier material.

↑ Index

14. Steve Evans
Anthologies
Mon 18 Jul 1994

Thanks to Alan, Peter, and the several back-channel saints who responded so quickly to the query I posted yesterday. I am again awed and a little humbled by the capacity this medium has for instancing acts of generosity.

I agree with Alan that a mini-bibliography of reviews of the anthologies would be useful for many of us on this list: should we agree to volunteer whatever information we run across in our indiv- idual researches? If people are afraid of cluttering the band with multiple posts of the same information, I will volunteer to receive mail on the subject and post updates for the list as new sightings warrant.

Let me know if this sounds like a good idea.

Best to everyone.../Steve

↑ Index

15. klindberg
Re: Anthologies
Mon 18 Jul 1994

Sounds like a good idea to me. I have recently been fascinated by the way that polemical anthologies, ones including sustained academic essays as well as "in your face" wishes and fabrications, made the Harlem Renaissance. But then this has always been the case. Whether or not they sold or did the job intended, such projects do, in retrospect, mark recurrent modernisms variously named. Enough of that shit. Eh? Let me say that we are in an excellent position with our new electronic nets. We can turn retrospects into prospects and nullify the need to apologize even as we meta-anthologize. What fun. Hope it isn't rude to be ironic. I am not, in any case, being ironic. I will be as helpful and/or quiet as I can in the anthology and other projects.

↑ Index

16. Jed Rasula
Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
Mon 18 Jul 1994

Thanks to Steve's question, a gratifying convocation of replies; to which I can add my own take on Weinberger --as set off against McClatchy's Vintage Antholo gy-- forthcoming in American Literary History. That essay constitutes the final chapter of my book The American Poetry Wax Museum (& a belated thanks to Charles's plug on this list earlier in the summer); but in the wake of the Hoover & Messerli collections I'm planning on reconceiving that chapter in August as the book goes to press. So any discussion that unfolds here between now and then will not only be welcome, but duly noted in the result (I have yet to see biblio-credits for e-mail discussions in print, but surely they've happe ned & there must be some unfolding protocol).
--Jed Rasula

↑ Index

17. Marc Nasdor
Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
Tue 19 Jul 1994

Boycott all poetry anthologies! They're a needless waste of wood pulp.

-Nasdor

↑ Index

18. Pierre Joris
Re: Anthologies
Tue 19 Jul 1994

I'm on the road so I don't have the exact info available, but re anthologies, there is also an interesting piece by Clayton Eshleman analyzing the Norton MODERN POETRY antho. I believe it appeared in the AWP newsletter --or, more probably in fact in the AMERICAN BOOK REVIEW.

========== Pierre Joris |"The great pain afflicting mankind, from child- Dept. of English | hood until death, is that looking and eating are SUNY Albany | two different operations. Eternal beatitude is Albany NY 12222 | a state in which to look is to eat." Simone Weil tel&fax:[redacted]| email: | "He who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." [redacted] | Henri Michaux
==========

↑ Index

19. Alan Golding
Anthologies
Tue 19 Jul 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Dear Steve--Your idea for pooling information sounds good to me. But then I'm a literary historian and secret biblio-drone . . . Nasdor won't like it!

Alan G.

↑ Index

20. Hank Lazer
Re: Anthologies
Tue 19 Jul 1994

Pierre--

When will the Rothenberg/Joris 20th Century Poetry anthology be out from U of California Press? Could you send me a Table of Contents?

Thanks.

Hank Lazer

P.S. Say hello to Jerry & Diane for me....

↑ Index

21. Alan Golding
Re: Anthologies
Tue 19 Jul 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Just for everyone's information: the Clayton Eshleman essay that Pierre Joris refers to is "The Gospel According to Norton," in American Poetry Review, Sept./Oct. 1990: 33-41. And yes, watch for Jed Rasula's forthcoming book--a mine both of useful information and analysis thereof, including on virtually every post-World War II anthology published.

Alan Golding

↑ Index

22. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthologies
Tue 19 Jul 1994

Clayton Eshleman's analysis of the Norton Anthology of Modern Poetry appeared in the American Poetry Review, Vol. 19/No. 5 -- September/October 1990 with Ann Lauterbach's mugshot on the cover.

--Regards, Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

23. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthologies
Tue 19 Jul 1994

Nah, I wuz jus' joshing. Otherwise, I'd better sell my 20 or 30 anthologies.

--Nasdor

:-)

↑ Index

24. klindberg
Re: Anthologies
Tue 19 Jul 1994

Still, one might keep in mind one small detail about the "economy" of anthologies: the law of diminishing financial and intellectual returns to the poet(s). It would seem that inflation also a/effects the reception of anthologies. To say nothing about Pound's anthologizing, his criticism and competition in this (fallow and/or easily penetrated) field of the market. In short, nothing more on anthologies. . . .

↑ Index

25. Tenney Nathanson presumably all have seen this but
Wed 20 Jul 1994

Forwarded message:
> From [redacted] Tue Jul 19 23:24 CDT 1994
> From: [redacted] (Ken Beversdorf)
> Message-Id: <[redacted]>
> Subject: Matters of Personal Privacy....
> To: [redacted]
> Date: Tue, 19 Jul 1994 20:58:15 -0800 (PDT)

> X-Mailer: ELM [version 2.4 PL22]
> Content-Type: text
> Content-Length: 7273
>
> > To all Employees of Cray Research and Cray Research Superservers:
> >
> > This will directly affect the privacy of your childs and possibly > > your own personal data. Please read and be informed. This is for > > your own personal benefit if you value your privacy.
> >
> > Ken Beversdorf
> >
> > **********
> >
> > > Subject: Privacy at risk: Educational Records
> > >
> > >
> > > Seattle CPSR Policy Fact Sheet
> > > K-12 Student Records: Privacy at Risk
> > > ---
> > >
> > > TOPIC
> > >
> > > The U.S. education system is rapidly building a nationwide network of > > > electronic student records. This computer network will make possible
the > > > exchange of information among various agencies and employers, and the > > > continuous tracking of individuals through the social service, education > > > and criminal justice systems, into higher education, the military and the > > > workplace.
> > >
> > > WHAT IS THE ISSUE?
> > >
> > > There is no adequate guarantee that the collection and sharing of personal > > > information will be done only with the knowledge and consent of students or > > > their parents.
> > >
> > > Changes Are Coming to Student Records
> > > National proposals being implemented today include:
> > >

> > > - An electronic "portfolio" to be kept on each student, containing > > > personal essays and other completed work.
> > >
> > > - Asking enrolling kindergartners for their Social Security Numbers, > > > which will be used to track each student's career after high school.
> > >
> > > - Sending High school students' transcripts and "teachers' confidential > > > ratings of a student's work-related behavior," to employers via an > > > electronic network called WORKLINK.
> > >
> > > At the heart of these changes is a national electronic student records > > > network, coordinated by the federal government and adopted by states with > > > federal assistance.
> > >
> > > Publication 93-03 of the National Education Goals Panel, a federally > > > appointed group recently empowered by the Goals 2000 bill to oversee > > > education restructuring nationally, recommends as "essential" that school > > > districts and/or states collect expanded information on individual > > > students, including:
> > > - month and extent of first prenatal care,
> > > - birthweight,
> > > - name, type, and number of years in a preschool program,
> > > - poverty status,
> > > - physical, emotional and other development at ages 5 and 6,
> > > - date of last routine health and dental care,
> > > - extracurricular activities,
> > > - type and hours per week of community service,
> > > - name of post-secondary institution attended,
> > > - post-secondary degree or credential,
> > > - employment status,
> > > - type of employment and employer name,
> > > - whether registered to vote.
> > >
> > > It also notes other "data elements useful for research and school > > > management purposes":
> > > - names of persons living in student household,
> > > - relationship of those persons to student,
> > > - highest level of education for "primary care-givers,"
> > > - total family income,
> > > - public assistance status and years of benefits,

> > > - number of moves in the last five years,
> > > - nature and ownership of dwelling.
> > >
> > > Many of these information categories also were included in the public draft > > > of the 'Student Data Handbook for Elementary and Secondary Schools', > > > developed by the Council of Chief State School Officers to standardize > > > student record terminology across the nation. State and local agencies > > > theoretically design their own information systems, but the handbook > > > encourages them to collect information for policymakers at all levels.
> > > Among the data elements are:
> > > - evidence verifying date of birth,
> > > - social security number,
> > > - attitudinal test,
> > > - personality test,
> > > - military service experience,
> > > - description of employment permit (including permit number,)
> > > - type of dwelling,
> > > - telephone number of employer.
> > >
> > > WHO CAN ACCESS THIS COMPREHENSIVE INFORMATION?
> > >
> > > Officers, employees and agents of local, state and federal educational > > > agencies and private education researchers may be given access to > > > individual student records without student or parent consent, according to > > > the federal Family Educational Rights and Privacy Act of 1974 (20 USC > > > 1232g) and related federal regulations (34 CFR 99.3). Washington state law > > > echoes this federal law.
> > >
> > > WHAT IS COMING NEXT?
> > >
> > > Recent Washington state legislation (SB 6428, HB 1209, HB 2319) directly > > > links each public school district with a self-governing group of social > > > service and community agencies that will provide services for families.
> > >
> > > This type of program is described in detail in the book, Together We Can, > > > published jointly by the U.S. Department of Education and the U.S.
> > > Department of Health and Human Services. The book speaks of "overcoming > > > the confidentiality barrier," and suggests creating centralized data banks > > > that gather information about individuals from various government agencies - > > > or in other ways ensuring agencies, "ready access to each other's records."

> > >
> > > The book calls for a federal role in coordinating policies, regulations and > > > data collection. A group in St. Louis, MO, called Wallbridge Caring > > > Communities, is cited as a model for seeking agreements to allow computer > > > linkups with schools and the social service and criminal justice systems to > > > track school progress, referrals and criminal activity.
> > >
> > > WHAT HAPPENED TO ONE COMMUNITY
> > >
> > > In Kennewick, WA, over 4,000 kindergarten through fourth graders were rated > > > by their teachers on how often they lie, cheat, sneak, steal, exhibit a > > > negative attitude, act aggressively, and whether they are rejected by their > > > peers. The scores, with names attached, were sent to a private psychiatric > > > center under contract to screen for "at-risk" students who might benefit > > > from its programs. All of this was done without the knowledge and consent > > > of the children or their parents.
> > >
> > > CPSR's POSITION
> > >
> > > CPSR Seattle believes that schools other agencies should minimize the > > > collection, distribution and retention of personal data. Students and/or > > > their parents should decide who has access to detailed personal > > > information.
> > >
> > > CPSR ACTIONS
> > >
> > > Representatives of CPSR Seattle have gone to Olympia to:
> > > - oppose the use of the Social Security Number as the standard student > > > identifier,
> > >
> > > - urge legislators to set educational goals that can be measured without > > > invading privacy,

> > >
> > > - oppose turning over individual student records to law enforcement > > > officials apart from a court order or official investigation.
> > >
> > > Computer Professionals for Social Responsibility - Seattle Chapter
> > > P.O. Box 85481, Seattle, WA 98145-148[redacted]
> > > [redacted]
> > >
> > >
> > > --- CPSR ANNOUNCE LIST END ---
> > >
> >
> >
>
>

Mike Zwinger
Cray Research, Inc.
Phone: [redacted]

↑ Index

26. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthologies
Wed 20 Jul 1994

Hmmm--

Well, Klindberg, that's fine except that anthologies are frequently used for the purposes of "recanonization" by the very people who would like to see the "opposing" canon debunked. One cannot have it both ways. But consider that poetry magazines may serve a greater purpose directly due to their perceived limited shelf life. Anthologies--while retaining some nostalgia value for those who wish to revisit their intellectual youth--are stagnant pools attracting little more than mosquitos, while journals are more indicative of the actual state of literary life; i.e., there is the assumption of impermanence, and everyone is forced to keep on their toes. I prefer to sort out the interesting from the mediocre on my own, thank you. If I must have my literature filtered, I'd rather depend on a greater number of editors than a smaller number of agenda-toting anthologists to provide that service. Regards, Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

27. Joseph Conte
Literary Biography
Wed 20 Jul 1994

Now that we're fully assembled and have adjusted our headsets for color and vertical roll, I'd like to invite anyone with an interest in literary biography to contribute to a two-volume series that I'm editing for the _Dictionary of Literary Biography_ (Gale Research Press) on American poets after 1945. So far there are some fifty entries in progress, including Brett Millier on Elizabeth Bishop, Robert Bertholf on Robert Duncan, Tom Gardner on John Ashbery, Miriam Nichols on Robin Blaser, and Mark Scroggins on Louis Zukofsky. Entries range from 5000 to 10,000 words. The entries are literary biographies, but the principal focus is the presentation and appraisal of the poet's complete work in chronological fashion. All contributors to the volume receive an honorarium from the publishers, a copy of the volume, and offprints of their entry.

I'm particularly interested to hear from anyone willing to write on David Antin, Amiri Baraka, Clark Coolidge, Louise Gluck, David Ignatow, Kenneth Koch, Adrienne Rich, Jerome Rothenberg, or Ron Silliman. I'm open to other suggestions, assuming that the poet is appropriate to the volume and not already assigned.

If you're at all interested in contributing, please respond to me personally (i.e. off-list). I'd be happy to answer any questions you might have about the project, or take suggestions for subjects and/or contributors.

Thanks.

Joseph Conte

_____*_____
| Joseph M Conte | "Where is the figure in the Department of English | carpet? Or is it just . . . SUNY at Buffalo | carpet?" he asked. "Where is--" [redacted] | "You're talking a lot of [redacted] | buffalo hump, you know that." | Donald Barthelme
_____*_____

↑ Index

28. klindberg
Re: Anthologies
Wed 20 Jul 1994

Well, in as much as it is a point worth making, I believe that was something of my point. The realities of classroom teaching at universities such as my own raise the issues of anthologies with a certain urgency, or so it is thought. My irony--whether caught, missed, or intended (Ah Ha)--was in some fashion motored by why the greatest activity I have seen for some time on this network was centered around questions so market driven. Wouldn't it, then, be more interesting to talk about the market than the anthologies? Or is that what we are doing? Please feel free to respond in anger or pique; such responses please. Anyway, really, I do mean that, while one is interested in the production and distribution of anthologies, other poetic(s)/political issues might be more pressing. I apologize for any, if not all, offenses.

↑ Index

29. klindberg
Re: Literary Biography
Wed 20 Jul 1994

Question for Joseph Conte. I ask this one over the net, since it might prevent a flood of repetitions of the same question. Just to be helpful, as is my nature, if you will.

What do you mean by American? Do you seek info. on poets from the Caribbean, perhaps even those who find themselves morooned, as 't were in the US?

Will this volume update, supersede, articulate with, say, the DLB volume devoted to the Beats? I guess those are more than the promised "question." I didn't mean to be so helpful with irony-ing.

↑ Index

30. Steve Evans
Anthslide
Wed 20 Jul 1994

I think Kathryne's bemusement about the sudden activity here on the list around "questions so market driven" is on the whole well placed. It may be that the anthologies--which will not, I suspect, break too many sales records--raise as a question something we otherwise take for granted: namely, that poetry's resistance to integration through the market, its failure as a commodity, is one of its decisive, albeit negative, attributes.

Meanwhile, though their economic effects will be minimal, the symbolic effects of these anthologies could be quite formidable--the legitimation of the language writers may in fact have reached its apogee with them (for instance). One thing I find myself thinking about is how little these collections have risked by way of recasting the form of the anthology: a patent contradiction considering how much of the work included is by poets who sought radical transformations not only of poetic but also cognitive forms. This fundamental conservatism makes the utility of each of the volumes dubious to me even in terms of classroom use. I don't want to romanticize the practice (time-consuming and often difficult) of making xerox-anthologies, but as someone who was taught, and now does teach, from them, I don't envision the new volumes individually or in combination offering a better alternative. I would, on the other hand, have liked to see something such as McGann has done with his Oxford volume of Romantic Period Verse, where one witnesses something of the unfolding of a field of practice in history: neither Weinberger's thematic editing, nor Hoover's conventional birth-dating, nor Messerli's combination of the two, seem very soundly motivated to me. (Even Allen's, at the time controversial, clustering of movements drew on principles of division that were at least deducible from the immanent organization of the poetic field at the time.)

I am open to the criticism that my judgements here are a little hasty, given that I've not owned a single one of these volumes for more than two months and have certainly not read even one of them in their entirety (has anyone? will anyone?).

Finally, a thought experiment that owes a little to Ron Silliman's remarks in "Canons and Institutions: New Hope for the Disappeared": what place would these anthologies have in the curriculum of an instition that--unlike the ones most of us work in, for, or near--was autonomous and deeply committed to the real possibilities (past, present, and future) of poetic practice? For while the form and contents of these books can indeed be defended as compromises, I think it is of vital importance to weigh these compromises, which after all take a lot out of one, against the prospects of transforming the situation so as to make them unnecessary.

↑ Index

31. Mn Ctr for Book Arts
Re: magic anthology ride
Wed 20 Jul 1994

First, regarding "the 'economy' of anthologies: the law of diminishing financial and intellectual returns to the poet(s)"-- diminishing from what? Is there a place of undiminished financial returns to poets?

And I am surprised to find no nod or reference to anthologies such as the recent special double issue of o-blek (one volume on technique, the other on practice, which is in effect an anthology), and the recent The Art of Practice (Potes & Poets). Both of them seem to me anthologies which want to push something forward, rather than documenting the past (although that could be argued, as the latter does publish works which have been published previously, although mostly in the last couple of years). Are these anthologies less valuable than the works by Allen, Messerli, and others mentioned in this discussion? I don't think so.

Anthologies are like our institutions of literature. It's hard to live with them, but also hard to live without them. But is it hard to outlive them?

charles

↑ Index

32. Susan Schultz
Re: Anthslide
Thu 21 Jul 1994

Steve Evans brings up the conservatism of the new anthologies vis-a-vis their form. Having scattered my attentions across the Hoover and Messerli volumes, I'd venture to add that, while they may represent "a new American poetry" (the subtitle to Messerli's anthology), they don't necessarily represent a new America. Messerli's volume includes Baraka and Mackey, who are included as writers who, with Inman, Child, and Darragh, "all work closely with genres that explore sound/music/ voice relationships" (33). They are not included among the poets who are concerned with cultural issues (group #1), or those who focus on issues of self (#2), or those who are engaged with "language, reader, and writing communities" (#3). Such thematic groupings are intriguing, but many, if not most, could be included in all of them. This is just a guess, but it sounds to me as if the groupings were developed to describe writers, rather than emerging out of a wide-sweeping survey of the 1960-1990 frame that Messerli assigns himself.

Hoover's anthology, organized rigidly as it is by birth-dates, comes a bit closer to "looking like America." Hoover includes Hagedorn, Yau, and Berssenbrugge; Algarin, Baca, and Cruz. I wonder if the term "postmodern," which is both a descriptive and an historical term, allows him greater leeway. At any rate, while I hardly want to subscribe to an arts-by-numbers scheme, I also want to see a wider range of experiences (both historical and aesthetic) represented here. The Heath tried to broaden the range of ethnicities welcomed into the American canon, but failed miserably (as I guess everyone knows) at challenging the hegemony of free-verse. Where's the response? While I seldom teach with anthologies, to dismiss them totally seems utopian--many university courses do use them. I would think twice about using these anthologies in a Hawaii classroom, though I'd happily recommend them to students as partial portraits of contemporary American poetry.

Susan M. Schultz

↑ Index

33. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthslide
Thu 21 Jul 1994

I agree with Steve Evans, and I would like to add a comment.

Since there is little market for poetry, in the conventional sense of "market," I would suggest that anthologies have no market outside of poets and a dwindling number of students. That fact, however, does not totally destroy their value.

But as for me, I would prefer to receive my anthologies with loose, unbound pages, so I could chuck the crap and keep the cool stuff. You want to empower the reader, right? :-)

Regards, Marc

↑ Index

34. Marc Nasdor
Re: magic anthology ride
Thu 21 Jul 1994

Charles--

Unfortunately, it's impossible to outlive them. That's why they give me the creeps.

Marc

↑ Index

35. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthslide
Thu 21 Jul 1994

Susan--

The "hegemony of free verse" you refer to is simply a reflection of time marching (or goose-stepping, as you might refer to it) forward. The problem is that most of the interesting rhymed & metered verse is being written by songwriters. I'll take verse from the Residents, Iggy Pop, or Kurt Cobain for that matter, over volumes of mindless drivel from the likes of an R. Wilbur or R. Howard.

Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

36. Joseph Conte
Re: Literary Biography
Thu 21 Jul 1994

In answer to Mr. Klindberg's useful questions regarding the volumes on American Poets since 1945 that I'm editing for the _Dictionary of Literary Biography_:

Although it may sound parochial, the senior editors of the series have decided to treat Anglo-Caribbean writers and Canadian poets in separate volumes. There are always exceptions, especially for instances in which the poet is born in the Carribean or Canada but has spent the major portion of his or her life in the US.

This volume is actually updating and superseding _DLB_ 5 on American Poets since 1945, edited by Donald Grenier (1980). It may overlap in a few instances with Ann Charters two volumes on the Beats, in part because the careers of several of the poets found in her volume were never strictly identified with the Beats. Perhaps, after the big Beat reunion in May in NYC, Charters will update her own volume. So there may be new entries on Allen Ginsberg (if someone's so inclined) whose work was addressed in _DLB_ 5, or Paul Blackburn, who appeared in Charters' volume but was more closely associated with Black Mountain.

In both instances the membrane's semi-permeable, and I'm rather open to (private) negotiation.

Thanks for your interest.

Joseph Conte

↑ Index

37. Jed Rasula
Re: Anthslide
Thu 21 Jul 1994

Susan Schultz's distinction between a "new American poetry" (Messerli via Allen : & I continue to be amazed at the hero worship Allen inspires almost 35 years later, as Messerli, Hoover, Weinberger, & Silliman's Tree testify) and a "new America". I think on the one hand of Emerson's phrase "this new yet unapproacha ble America"--from, I believe, the essay on Experience--taken by Stanley Cavell as the title of a book; and on the other hand, think of Jose Marti, and his quite different & unEmersonian experiences as a Cuban journalist in NYC in the 1890s, struggling to certify "nuestra America" in the expansive sense I think Susan is speaking of. So I note, with both curiosity & apprehension, the announ cement in the Viking catalogue for Fall, an anthology edited by Maria Mazziotti Gillan & her daughter Jennifer: Unsettling America: An Anthology of Contempor ary Multicultural Poetry. --does anybody know the editors, or know anything of this project??-- this is touted as a book designed to "displace the myths and stereotypes that pervade our culture", but I have a hunch it doesn't do much to displace the fastest growing myth on the cultural horizon coming into the 90s, which is the uniformity of the white male. Which is not to say that white males haven't had a couple centuries (in the USA) to create a diversified self-portra it (in various convexities); but the very "selling points" of this anthology are a portent of an ominous but it seems inexorable social fact, that nothing gets valorized except by a corresponding devalorization-by-caricature.

↑ Index

38. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthslide
Fri 22 Jul 1994

Jed Rasula's comments about the "myth of the uniformity of the white male" are right on target, but I might qualify somewhat. Outside the arts and academic communities, these issues used to barely generate much interest. It is worth noting that it has been papers such as _The Wall Street Journal_ which has brought this issue into the mainstream.

BTW, I've just returned from a month in Hungary, and I cannot overstate the degree of puzzlement exhibited by young Budapest intellectuals concerning the subject of political correctness. They think the Americans are retarded. But maybe that says something about the former.

--Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

39. Jorge Guitart
Re: Anthslide
Fri 22 Jul 1994

---

i would like to know what hungarians find wrong with political correctness.

↑ Index

40. klindberg
Re: Anthslide
Fri 22 Jul 1994

Perhaps they hero echoes of the Stalinist notions of "correctness" and "correct" party discipline.

↑ Index

41. Marc Nasdor

Re: Anthslide

Sat 23 Jul 1994

Jorge:

What Hungarians find wrong with political correctness is undoubtedly that p.c. is the first step on the slippery slope leading to neo-puritanism. I've been hanging around with many Hungarians for the past decade (in fact, I'm married to one). And what I can tell you is that Hungarians like to enjoy themselves. They like to cook and drink and fuck and let their kids run around naked at the lakeside beaches. Those to whom I spoke on the subject of political correctness, however, sometimes posed inane hypothetical questions, such as: "So, if the woman successfully slept her way up the corporate ladder, could she later charge sexual harassment of those former superiors, for her own personal gain?" This was enough evidence for me to conclude that mainstream Budapest intellectual circles were receiving their information from rather suspect sources, probably the mainstream American press. :-) I would say that sexism and harassment are as prevalent in Hungary as in the rest of the world, but it's probably more out in the open, and I think that less and less Hungarian woman are willing to tolerate standard macho b.s. I've heard plenty of horror stories from my wife about her treatment by male superiors when she was teaching gymnastics in her twenties. At least the Hungarians aren't totally hypocritical, like many French intellectuals, who will claim of sexism in France that "we've already solved that problem," which as far as I'm concerned is a lot of hooey. As for other issues, multiculturalism, for example, the Hungarians usually claim that they are the embodiment of multiculturalism, being descended from seven or eight different nationalities stretching far into central Asia. Of course, try telling that to the Gypsies, who are treated as pariahs, to put it mildly. One gypsy family in a department store has everyone clutching their wallets with an iron grip. What can I say? We live in a screwed up world. In any case, political correctness in the USA has been demonized as a bourgeois pasttime. Unfortunately, discussions about such issues as spouse abuse, as well as gender-related issues, rarely include members of lower socioeconomic groups, whose members are affected is much greater numbers.

Regards, Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

42. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthslide
Sat 23 Jul 1994

Klindberg writes:

> Perhaps they hear echoes of the Stalinist notions of "correctness" and "correct" party discipline.

Well, maybe, but they also think that American intellectuals take themselves way too seriously. Can you blame them? How many examples of Hungarian fiction, poetry, drama, or criticism ever make it into English. I think many intellectuals writing in "less popular" language groups feel their works are constantly belittled by the "imperialist" languages. They are correct.

↑ Index

43. Patrick Phillips
Re: Anthslide
Sat 23 Jul 1994

Marc,

from Hungarian Anthology, Pannonia Books, Toronto, '66

(the truck of the existential anti-imperialist editors is evident here in this mostly male-dom; but it's the only Hungarian anthology I have. What a nut to fit my knowledge of Hunagrian poetry into, or what a small book to get it from....

From Anna Bede's "Ode to the Dishwater" (no date given)

Dishwater,
you daily gathering!
What are you making from the salad's green,
from the golden meat, from ash-colored fruit?
What do you do with the screaming of the tender finger-grabbed silverware, engine-rumbling, painting, struggle of tuneful words?
How do you dissolve the changing to a man,
the leisure majesty of feasting,
the sparkling faith of working days?
You are like the jealous earth
Which only can dissolve and cleanse when she kills, and falling in her pit, insects, leafage, fruit and men become united and unrecognizable.

In many ways the anthology this fragment comes from is itself compost in this dishwater; that its ideological choices are informed by the themes, the forms, the conceits; that its picture of Hungarian poetry is messy, a messy remnant - particularly now. Anna is one of three women collected here and I chose this fragment; itself a messy, and could be construed as ideological, choice. (Another - "I Am The One" - is much more clearly marked out as an anti-war metaphysics.) -- In many ways we engage in literary history and not poetry at all.... Of the many questions I'm raising in this post, foremost is how, or is it possible to be updated by another Hungarian (or by any) anthology? Anthologies are beasts one sleeps with while clutching a knife under the pillow. I have the knife; is there one that I could try with?

Pat

↑ Index

44. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthslide
Sat 23 Jul 1994

Thanks for the posting, Pat.

Hmm, unfortunately there's not much of interest in English. You might look at: _Modern Hungarian Poetry_ (New York: Columbia University Press, 1977) The Hungarian issue of _Translation_ from the mid-1980s An earlier issue of the _Five Fingers Review_, which includes poems by one of the more interest younger Hungarian poets, Endre Kukorelly, translated by Sandor Andras, a professor at Howard University in Washington. Interested Hungarophiles and others can write to him c/o the German Dept. there; or at 9007 Sudbury Rd., Silver Spring, MD 20910. Tell him I sent you. Thanks

The rest, alas and alack, are dull mainstream academic translations of Agnes Nemes Nagy, Sandor Weores, and Istvan Vas (all recently deceased elder poets)

-- Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

45. Susan Schultz
Re: Anthslide
Sat 23 Jul 1994

I have the unhappy feeling that my posting led somehow to a discussion of "political correctness." That term, and its benevolent confrere, "multiculturalism," tend to obscure debate rather than open it up. The commercialization of "multiculturalism" (CNN advertises itself internationally as having a "multicultural" staff) comes to mean that we have "anthologies" and "multicultural anthologies" as if the two were necessarily distinct from one another. My argument for the inclusion of ethnic diversity in the former comes out of the experience of teaching in a place where 90-950f my undergraduate students in most classes are non-Caucasian Americans. At that point the debate over political correctness seems frivolous, and the need to diversify one's reading lists becomes a matter of pragmatism rather than idealism (or, if you're anti-PC, a stain on the traditional canon). But I don't think Hawaii's alone; California is becoming a state with no ethnic majority population. Doubtless others will follow.

This is not to say there isn't resistance here, too. There is, and it makes life in the UH English department interesting (in the sense of the Chinese curse: "May your life be interesting"). And my syllabi are often top-heavy with members of the old canon. But I wish we could talk about these matters without using the show-stoppers, pc and multiculturalism. We might at least talk about what "multicultural" might mean in a productive (and not in a commercial) sense.

Susan

↑ Index

46. kat
Re: Anthslide
Sat 23 Jul 1994

A few very minor points in response to recent flurry, if I may.

1) to M. Nasdor--If members of socio-economic under-class are not part of our (?) conversations, how can we know that they are more affected by spousal abuse, etc?

2) S. Schultz--The point about saving productive thought and/or work from commercialism is, of course, well taken and shared. However,where do notions of "productivity" come from if not directly--or even reactively-- from the Market? one market or another? Expensive whole food markets, which tend to be quite p.c.;little broken down markets that sell lotto tickets and beer by the can; open subsistence markets in India; the commerce in ideas over emergent media, etc....

While it's no fun to pun about m/Market(s), it's worth recognizing some of the slippages from, say, high to low culture and sacred to profane (literary/literal?) property. Oh, anyway. By the way, I teach in Detroit, where it seems to be rather clear that "multiculturalism" and "cultural criticism" can too easily be an evasion of Race and Class, which are stunningly practical (Praxis) issues--even for the few theorists left at the front guarding their rear(s). Charges of p.c. can work same.

↑ Index

47. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthslide
Sat 23 Jul 1994

Kat:

Even if the socio-economic underclass (let's not leave out the culturally working class) were less plagued by spousal abuse, etc., it is clear that they must be somehow brought into the conversation. Do you think that only members of the upper and middle classes should be subject to (re)educational efforts on behalf of all women, minority groups, children, etc. Surely one cannot count on the moral Trickle-Down Effect to apply here. Try working on Wall Street for a while: I can assure you that you'll run into people from a wide breadth of backgrounds, most of them incredibly ignorant of even the subject of these discussions. These people--and most of "Middle America"-- are precisely those who American left intellectuals have been taking for granted in recent decades. These are also the same people who are never exposed to innovative art works, experimental poetry, film and music from other cultures, etc. There is one whopper of a cultural revolution that never happened in most of America in the 30+ age group. Maybe grunge culture has made deeper inroads among the twentysomethings than all the poetry or p.c. jingoism will ever hope to accomplish.

--Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

48. John Fowler
Re: ANTHSLIDE
Sat 23 Jul 1994

Released from the tyranny of the bound book (canon)
a reader is truly empowered: the "book" looses its "market value";
texts have only use (commodity) value and no exchange value.

Where can the "unbound book" reside if not here?

First put it here, then choose your "pages" from it.

Do not give it to the "binders".

fowler

↑ Index

49. Robert Drake
Re: Citation for Golding on Anthologies?
Sun 24 Jul 1994

> Bob-- Yes, the problems are precisely the ones you named: commodification and canonization, though one suspects that both will be only modestly achieved by the respective collections.
>
> *I think a forum on the questions raised by these books (and you are right to include the o*blek, leave, and P&P volumes: I haven't been able to track down the latter though) is very much desirable, especially since I think many of us are having to re-adjust our thoughts on the status of our "tradition" after such a conspicuous, and may it be said quite alienating repackaging of the work (alienating perhaps because it is so visibly dead labor all of a sudden, whereas before we all were prone to thinking we had a duty to keep it living through small scale, even illegal, republishing ((xerox packs, personal anthologies, the tattered copies we stumbled on in used book stores, etc.)). Do you recognize what I'm describing here?*
>
> Let me know how you envision the section in TapRoot and how I might help you with it. I would be happy to prepare (and perhaps introduce) a selection based on remarks culled from a forum on the poetics list--if the list-owner and various subscribers agree that that's a legitimate use of bandwidth (which I think they will).
> Get back to me on how to proceed when you have a minute. Until then, I wish you well.

steve--

sorry to be so tardy in replying--mounting a gallery exhibit (which opened friday) which included a 1300 item catalog... your original post seems to have sparked some discuss, much missed from the list of late. my own rantings:

anthology, from gk "collection of flowers"--neatly labled and pressed into a book, no longer living or fragrant, nor allowed to go to seed...

looked at in the most sceptical light,the urge to anthologize seems to me an attempt at ownership, a beating of the bounds which not only defines but claims rights to a territory. that's the sense, for me, in which it's an attempt to canonize--to control what is or is not allowed in, what is legitimate to consider. i have to think, given the power of the Norton anthologies in general, that Hoover & the editors there _must_ be consious of that side of it; inexcusable if not so. & too, putting the thing together as a product to sell, obviously not just the commodity of an individual book on the shelves but a perspective, actual capital value in a (praps corrupt) cultural market. that's the "commodification" angle.

i think, for the others (Barone & Ganick, o*blek, Sun&Moon), there's a bit of an embattled sense, in which they feel they must struggle against that entrenched power structure, either to storm the gates or at least to define & defend their domain. those alternative practices & poetics i am much committed to, but i'm not sure that adopting the same tactics is the best agency for advancing the cause...

> wanna be the next don allen. wanna out the next > _in the american grain_ (such an important book > to me--& maybe moreso 'cause i got it fr a buck > in the remainder bin...)

this is all very largely overstating the case.
hyperbole that i all too often believe.

i appreciate having the chance to read other editor's selections, reading the editing as well as the selected work. telling, fr instance, that the Hoover is arranged by chronologic date of birth--nothing about the work itself, but centrally about the author--as arbitrary as any, i suppose. the author-ity of the editor, tho, is i imagine not something most students will be aware of--and there's an arguement in favor of the "illegal xerox packs & personal anthologies" you mention, which are so obviously the selections of an individual...

---

a plug here, for the initial issue of "Chain" (spring summer 1994, "Special Topic: Gender & Editing", edited by Jena Osman & Juliana Spahr; $7.95 to 107 14th St., Buffalo NY 14213). A _crucial_ piece of work. from their "editor's notes" (without permission): "Relation: Perhaps a good starting point would be to discuss my apprehension about editing. I am uncomfortable with the idea of the editor as arbiter of good taste, or as the (in)visible navigator/sculptor of a final packaged product. Journals rarely seem to openly admit the presence of personal ideology behind their pages. And when they do, the "personalized" frame seems to stifle and alter the work by mashing it into an overly-prescribed space. We all change what we read in the very act of reading; however, editing forces an external median strip between the substance of the original and what it will become. Such mediation can create a powerfully dialogic space; it can also create a "culinary" space that limits the possibilities in the act of reading. The _Chain_ project is an attempt to investigate the (im)possibility of an unmediated reception, the (im)possibility of detaching a writing from its presentations/ideological form."

> (& yes, i(ronic), male, select this particular excerpt for > this particular space...) > (wondering if the (coincidently male) editors of the > anthologies under discussion might have some awareness of > these concerns)...

---

so what does an anthology teach? that literature is a dead thing (again, the flowers pinned down & labled); that you (reader) can rely on someone else to distinguish for you what is important, what is not. (too bad "discriminate" has lost some utility--of course it would be _evil_ to "discriminate against" something; so instead we are indiscriminate); & that it has no context. the anthologist trots out a string of "good" poems, demonstrating their power & virtue--& by extension poems that are "like" those are "good", ones that are "different" must not be. profoundly conservative.

why not teach a few "bad" poems? teach from the struggling journals (we could use the business), let (make) students hunt thru and make their own choices. for the cost of the Norton (aww, quit raggin' on them...) you could choose a half-dozen "slim darlings" & really get into a poet's work, the best and the not-so (once got an order frm a univerisity bookstore for 50 copies of one of our chaps; made my day for a week).

> "1805 W. Taylor in Ann. Rev. III 651 It ought not be said > that any aanthologist can strrip the garden of its flowers."
> (i love my OED--so optimistic; & so well edited)

---

so, that's my rant, or a bit of. as fr TRR: our (thee editorial "we"!) main goal is to provide access to material, descriptive over evaluative, and as above encourage the reader to make her own choices. a brief survey, say a paragraph or 2 on each of a half dozen, plus a few paragraphs to contextualize (raise some of these questions, not neccesarily lay down the definitave answers), would be a valuable contribution. hope you'll consider.

asever
luigi

↑ Index

50. Marjorie Perloff
Anthologies
Tue 26 Jul 1994

Well, I've finally managed to retrieve 58 messagesfrom my other Eudora) system at Stanford via my computer in Los Angeles. But I haven't figured out how to send it the other way yet. So let's see if it works on MCI. A few comments: in all the discussion of anthologies, no one has mentioned that the odd thing about Hoover, messerli, and Weinberger is that they feel obliged to buttress the present with so much of the past. Don Allen, after all, really did do the New American Poetry. So why do these anthologists begin with Olson or the Objectivists, etc.? Stuff that's 30 years old or 40. Do we feel too little confidence that we can pick the New American Poetry. As for the Multiculti issue (brought up by K. Lindberg, Susan Schultz etc), I think much more of it will kill off any interest in poetry anyone might have. Poetry isn't written by quota. Gays, for example, have always been way overepresented--the leading poets at many periods of history have been, say, 60 % gay. Now if we have to go by quota, where does that leave the poetry of Hart Crane or Auden or O'Hara or Ashbery or Schuyler or even Whitman and Dickinson? Secondly, the sort of thought police to be found in John Yau's recent rant is really counterproductive. Whatever one thinks (thought0 of Eliot W's anthology, this sort of head count can't work. There will always be more groups, always those not represented, etc. etc. Why does every group have to write poetry to begin with?

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

51. Marc Nasdor
Re: Anthologies
Tue 26 Jul 1994

Marjorie:

I'm so busy working my butt off in the sweatshop that I did not see the rant of John Yau that you mentioned in your post. Could you please tell me where I can get a hold of it.

Sincerely,

Marc Nasdor
[redacted]

↑ Index

52. Susan Schultz
Re: Anthologies
Wed 27 Jul 1994

Dear Marjorie and K. Lindberg and others:

It seems to me that there has to be a middle position here; to argue for "multiculturalism" does not necessarily invoke the thought police, or John Yau. I do think it's worth asking whose interest in poetry is deadened by such discussions (and that, I suppose returns us to the question of community); as K.L. and I have noted (and I'm sure people are getting sick of hearing me write this), multicultural syllabi are often more a practical, than an idealistic--or cynical, if you will--concern. That's why readings by white male mainland poets average fewer than 35 members in the audience, and why readings by prominent Asian-American writers can easily attract several hundred here. Audiences do matter, and I'd like to see them overlap more. The problem with multicultural anthologies is, to my mind, that the creation of a "multicultural" market may tend to reaffirm the differences between audiences. What I'm suggesting is a blending of that large group of white male gay poets (or whoever's in the statistical ascendency) with other voices. I'm not talking essentialism, but experience here. It's not that all groups should write poetry, but that individual members of all groups, for whatever reasons, do. I appreciate the fear of quotas; I feel it myself sometimes. But there are unconscious, as well as conscious, quotas. Why else would 98% of the University of Hawaii English department be white, in a state that has no majority group?

Enough huffing and puffing by me. Back to Honolulu's humid squelch. I hope others are cooler.

Susan Schultz

↑ Index

53. Marjorie Perloff
Anthologies again
Wed 27 Jul 1994

In response to Susan Schultz: you're right, Susan, I was just sounding off because I did find John Yau's attack on Elliot Weinberger especially irritating and disingen- uous. But you'r right: if I taught at Hawaii, I would certainly feel a responsibility to have plenty of local (or Asian-Am or Asian) poets and not just white males. But I think that's less a question of ethnicity in general than of local pride, isn't it? The feeling of always importing things from the mainland? Anyway, I'm looking forward to my Phi beta Kappa visit next January and see for myself, never having been to Hawaii. All very complicated! Marjorie

↑ Index

54. Steve Evans
Yau's Review
Wed 27 Jul 1994

For Marc and others who may not have seen it, John Yau's review of the Weinberger volume appeared in the March/April issue of American Poetry

Review. The current issue of the APR (with Joe Ceravolo on the cover) includes letters--all of them hostile to Yau--from: Weinberger, Esther Allen, David Hinton, Forrest Gander, Roberto Tejada, and Cecilia Vicuna. Yau is given space to respond to each letter.

[What follows are some thoughts, composed rather late at night, that can certainly be passed over by anyone who is growing tired of this topic.]

My gloss on the exchange in APR is, I regret to say, rather negative. I hope it won't sound cynical when I say that credentials seem more at stake than substantive issues. This is not to argue that credentials are not a substantive issue in the politics of representation, but it is to admit a certain weariness with the American reflex of personalizing important debates (e.g. Weinberger's calling Yau's review "a nervous breakdown in print," & other examples too numerous to mention).

One interesting note: Yau wrote exactly the review Weinberger had apparently been having nightmares about while preparing the book (see his defensive "note on the selection" at the front of his book, with its Malthusian ref- erence to a "population explosion" in recent poetry apparently contradicting the denigration, several pages later, heaped on those who "count heads" or maintain "police-blotter files on individual poets".) That the "Very Brief History" of "American Poetry Since 1950" is more than an apology for the editorial decisions of the book I also take to be incontrovertible. Had Weinberger admitted that his description is historically accurate for the period between 1950-1965 (or 70 at the latest), and then only for a very specific (and indeed, very significant: cannot specific and significant be thought at the same time?) group of writers, there would have been a lot less room for misunderstanding.

My point here is: Weinberger and Yau are playing two sides in a single game, a game in which "marginality" has been converted into the stake and highest honor even by intellectuals who feel few of its withering social effects. I would suggest that we wean ourselves of "marginality" and consider more seriously the values and meanings of "specificity"; that we, further, dis- abuse ourselves of illusions that, historically, avant-garde formations have been drawn from any class other than the dominant one, and that in the U.S. that class has been and continues to be white; and finally, that positions in the economy of literary canonization have any direct correspondence to positions of social power. I hope that it is recognized that the latter two points go together: drawn from the dominant class does not mean loyal to it. The avant-garde hasn't had, by any means, the monopoly on oppositional cultural and political practice in capitalist societies; but it has had, at various times, important links to oppositional social movements and to the intellectuals who inevitably emerge as such movements progress. Vexed, con- tradictory, seldom studied in any detail, such links might be the basis for an anthology neither Yau nor Weinberger, nor for that matter Michael Harper (Every Shut Eye Ain't Asleep: An Anthology of Poetry by African Americans Since 1945, $13 from Back Bay/Little, Brown), have yet imagined.

One last note: Erica Hunt's "Notes for an Oppositional Poetics" has been mentioned on this list before, but its relevance for this discussion seems worth noting once again. It is published in The Politics of Poetic Form (Roof, 1990). Cary Nelson's Repression and Recovery: Modern American Poetry and the Politics of Cultural Memory (U Wisconsin, 1989) also is useful here, especially with respect to the way class, and class struggle--two things that identity politics and official multiculturalism cannot recognize-- were once vital, generative, categories of poetic practice in this country.

I apologize for the length of this post; as usual I couldn't resist the opportunity for discussion this list represents to me.

Regards to all,

Steve Evans

↑ Index

55. Joseph Conte

Re: Anthologies

Wed 27 Jul 1994

I for one can't remember the last time I bought an anthology for personal reading. I evaluate them as textbooks for survey courses, trying to anticipate their appropriateness for a fairly disinterested group of largely blue-collar students here in Buffalo. I order an anthology because my students can't afford a long reading list, and so they get a wide selection at one low price. I used Codrescu's _Up Late: American Poetry Since 1970_ in a class on Contemporary Literature (along with several pbk. novels). Antin's talk poems and Judy Grahn's lesbian odes were the surprise hits; much other experimental work was largely met with stoney silence. I actually looking forward to trying out Hoover's book next spring. I think the poetry has to move the audience, regardless of race, gender, or sexuality. If gets them talking about something other than the Buffalo Bills on Monday Night Football, it's a success.

From Buffalo, where the cool breezes blow off Lake Erie and there's nary a day over 90 degrees:

Joseph Conte

↑ Index

56. Marc Nasdor
Re: Yau's Review
Wed 27 Jul 1994

Thanks to Steve Evans for his relevant posting. I look forward to rereading Cary Nelson's book. I just have a couple of points to add. First, Steve, I think that it's a bit disingenuous to say, in 1994, that the dominant class "has been and continues to be white." That sounds like a statement by someone who never gets off campus. I'm a freelancer and I have been poking my nose into many types of work and social situations for a long time. I can guarantee you that the dominant class--the "middle" class, the class to which we're referring--is well represented by non-white members, who spend the same amount of energy as white people hypeing the dominant culture--capitalism, know- nothingism, the general conservative ethic, etc. I think that for domestic politics in the present and future, race is and will be a distraction, and I don't think that the community of "alternative" poets and writers will ever really come together, to make definitive cultural/political action, until it recognizes that class was/is/will be the central issue here. I don't know, people seem to go out of their way to avoid talking about class. I wrote this posting because of the way you ended yours (making reference to the fact that identity politics and official multiculturalism cannot recognize class and class struggle). I think you contradict yourself. The second bone in my throat: your inference that "credentials" may be a substantive issue in the politics of representation. Steve, that's why we love the Net, because it frees us from such emphemera. I have no idea what your credentials are, and I couldn't give a flying Flinstone. We should all be grateful to be alive to see the crumbling of the priesthoods. We only have to be vigilant enough to watch out for new ones.

Regards, Marc

↑ Index

57. MARK WALLACE
Situation on the move
Thu 28 Jul 1994

Situation magazine is moving again,
this time to Washington D.C.
Please send all correspondence after August 1
to:

Mark Wallace
Situation
10402 Ewell Ave.
Kensington, MD 20895

Issue #7, just out, features the work of Kevin Killian, Ron Silliman, Dodie Bellamy, Carmen Orrega, A.L. Nielsen, Mark Hammer, and Sterling Plumpp.

Only $8 for four issues,
$2 for single and back issues.

I hope to hear from you.

Sincerely,
Mark

↑ Index

58. Joe Amato
anthologies...
Fri 29 Jul 1994

---

for alla this talk contra anthology, which i do 'preciate & understand, still:

1. if somebody wanted to anthologize my work ("me") i'd be tickled pink... perhaps i wouldn't feel this way after countless such 'events'... on the other hand, i think it would be an Immensely Satisfying ego-massage... some of you who have had the dis/pleasure can comment here on this---do it feel as good as it looks?... 2. as i think it were john fowler pointed out, the net represents to those with access places to distribute foc... use at your own in/discretion... for you academics out there (like moi): this will of course not help your tenure case in any causal sense (as things currently stand)... 3. what "counts" as an anthology in poetry is perhaps a different construction (say, in historiographic terms) than similar compendia in, say, fiction... 4. let's not gloss the less-than-scholarly-and-entirely-human tendency to want to see one's friends families oneSelf in print, side-by with other perhaps more famous names... i refer here to the tendency for editors to plain & simply play faves... which is simply an extension of any such editorial stance (& it happens ALL the time)... which is again one rather obvious reason why ANYTHING gets published in the first place, whatever the merit... 5. anthologies, as a few folks have suggested, are useful in pedagogical terms... if you make your own you're not necessarily more disinterested---the impulse may very well be precisely the same... luigi-bob's comment re purchasing five or six 'little books' strikes me as on the mark... yet there do seem to be a need now & again for some sweep, some 'representational' grid of who's who in institutional terms (& in accord with one's sense of institution)... anthologies are texts... that is, they have contexts... they are not static, they emerge (jed & alan & ____ are probably most familiar with this argument) against a specific set of cultural exigencies... hence they oughtta be used in light of this... if intro'd this way, anthologies can be seen as the normative constructions they in fact are... 6. & of course, back to emedia, what of the digital-form issues at stake in this process of amalgamating?... we take work composed with pen pencil typewriter wordprocesser & lord knows what new software, we convert it to print-bound matter, & we publish accordingly... perhaps this seems a moot point---to those who view these letters as just that---but i find it more problematic in poetry than, say, in publishing paperbacks of victorian prose... owing to my sense of things poetic, attention to formal constraints etc... & because there has been for some time now, all over the net, ongoing discussion of dislocations slippages etc. as a consequence of emedia, alphabetically speaking...

so so... just some random noninklings, bubbling up through...

joe

↑ Index

59. Steve Evans
Re: Yau's Review
Fri 29 Jul 1994

Just a couple of quick points in reference to Marc's post. I take the point that whites no longer monopolize the exercise of domination, though I don't happen to share Marc's view that the middle-class is "dominant" in the national or the global economy. I invite Marc to provide an explanation for the "whiteness of the avant-garde" that is more solidly grounded than the one I gestured towards. In schematic terms I simply tried to suggest that: avant-garde cultural production tends to be an option in the universe of subjects socially positioned nearer to economic power; as the terms of access to that power get redefined, so will the terms of access to the avant-garde project. I draw this inference from looking at the composition of actual avant- garde formations since the mid-nineteenth century, but I will be the first to rethink the position if people present good reason to do so.

On the question of "credentials": here I'm afraid that it's your turn to be disingenuous, Marc. I was explicit in my criticism of turning credentials into the central point of contention in the Weinberger-Yau debate. However, as a geniune set of questions about tradition underlies the manic debate about Canon, so a genuine set of questions about competence underlies the debate about credentials, or so I would contend. The bridge term in each case seems to be institution(s), since they convert traditions into Canons and competence into Credentials. But perhaps I overestimate, here at my university-subsidized internet link, the importance of the institution?

As for the crumbling of "the crumbling of the priesthoods"--please don't mention it to Salmon Rushdie, since such comments must tempt his patience. The "old" ones are still here, and there are new ones in addition to that. As Andy Levy remarked in a series of posts several months ago, the Net itself is, more likely than not, one of these new ones. There is plently to be vigilant about, agreed, but not only up ahead.

Regards,

Steve Evans

↑ Index

60. Chris Funk
synnerlyptium
Fri 29 Jul 1994

---

d i u 4

All persons interested in text-based virtual realities:

Describers of an Imaginary Univercity will meet in the living room on lambda-MOO, Monday August 1st 10 pm east coast time. To accompany: telnet lambda.xerox.com 8888
If you are unfamiliar with this medium, you might experiment beforehand, and obtain a "Character" if possible. C you there.

"XXXX OOOO EH" incites us to imbibe the "strong, costly wine" of Robert Herrick's verse, but students here at DIU should know just how strong and just how costly a whine it is:

UPON SOME WOMEN

by Robert Herrick

Thou who wilt not love, doe this;
Learne of me what Woman is.
Something made of thred and thrumme;
A meere Botch of all and some.
Pieces, patches, ropes of haire;
In-laid Garbage ev'ry where.
Out-side silk, and out-side Lawne;
Sceanes to cheat us neatly drawne.
False in legs, and false in thighes;
False in breast, teeth, haire and eyes:
False in head, and false enough;
Onely true in shreds and stuffe.
--Patriarchal Poetry

 REQUEST FOR INFORMATION ***

For a study on the "objectivist poets" in preparation for DIU Press I would appreciate any anecdotal information (including letters, photographs, first person accounts or copies of memoirs) that would shed light on the brief marriage of Lorine Niedecker and William Carlos Williams. I am also seeking information on Joyce Hopkins, in particular the circumstances that brought her to reveal "Louis Zukofsky," "Charles Reznikoff" and "George Oppen" as Niedecker's pseudonyms. Lastly, if anyone knows the whereabouts of Robert Creeley, I have been trying to track him down. I understand he is the last living member of the original "objectivist conspiracy," and that he went into hiding shortly after the coup but remained within the borders of the old United States.
--Kimberly Filbee

CLASS ANNOUNCEMENT FOR "AMERICAN POETRY"

What does it mean to be an American? I have presumed to regard this question as an historical one.

Yet Marianne Moore suggests our historiography lacks something in the way of truth. Do you agree?

In the way of truth stands history itself, blocking the light. History in the form of an author casts its shadow on our reading. What to do?

As we begin our reading of Whitman's "Drum Taps," let's presume to imagine that Whitman himself is listening in on our conversation. Can we provoke him into stepping aside, that the light might return to the page?

The dark is good to dream in, but to dream in the light is better still.

"He comprehended that the effort to mold the incoherent and vertiginous matter dreams are made of was the most arduous task a man could undertake, though he might penetrate all the enigmas of the upper and lower orders: much more arduous than weaving a rope of sand or coining the faceless wind." (Jorge Luis Borges)

Discuss.

--Black Hole Sun

from: SLICES OF KNOWLEDGE

Never despair. Let macerate longer.

*

An inn of soft muds for fish who spend the night out of the water.

*

A beggar, but he governs a beggar's cup.

*

Mornings, if one is a bee, no mucking about, one has to pilfer.

*

Funerals should take place in swamps. Wouldn't it be just that the living, who follow the dead, should also be in difficulty?

*

The birds' delirium does not interest the trees.

*

It is not the crocodile's job to yell: "Watch out for the crocodile!"

*

He who hides his madman, dies voiceless.

*

Even if it is true, it is false.

*

- What would a distillation of the whole world be like? - asked a man in amazement, drunk for the first time.

*

The caravans want respect.

*

There is no proof that the flee, which lives on the mouse, is afraid of the cat.

*

The blood of the ox, put into a tiger, would give the latter nightmares.

*

Evil traces, good floods.

*

That one uses his vice to jerk off his virtue.

*

--HM translated by PJ

Let us recall the Kent State massacre. What was at stake? Why was the National Guard shooting down middle-class young people in middle America?

Their ancestors were enthralled by the utopia sublime. Right there in Ohio, in Akron and Cleveland, they were in the thrall of the absolute. So utterly were they taken up by what their self- repression might gain them that, when the Cayuga River caught on fire and burned, they did not understand that it was a sign.

The children were lured by beauty--forms that were available to the senses, not crumbling between a lost origin and an infinitely receding goal.

I or I would recall the virtue of Herbert Marcuse in this connection:

"Before the court of theoretical or practical reason, which has shaped the world of the performance principle, the aesthetic existence stands condemned. However, we shall try to show that this notion of aesthetics results from a 'cultural repression' of contents and truths that are inimical to the performance principle. We shall attempt to undo this repression theoretically by recalling the original meaning and function of aesthetic. This task involves the demonstration of the inner connection between pleasure, sensuousness, beauty, truth, art, and freedom--a connection revealed in the philosophical history of the world aesthetic."

--Thus, Albert or Hubert

Playlist, Conference of the Birds, KZSC, Santa Cruz 7-11-94

Silvio Rodriguez/ Sueno Con Serpientes/ Dias y Flores
Mercedes Sosa/ Los Hermanos/ en Argentina
Ketama/ Creo/ El Arte de lo Invisible Ismael Miranda/ Aventura/ Por El Buen Camino
...
Don Cherry and Ed Blackwell/ Roland Alphonso/ El Corazon
Old and New Dreams/ Mopti/ Playing
...
Cesaria Evora/ Sodade/ Trance Planet
Songhai/ Africa/ Songhai
Seleshe Damissae/ Sewnetwa/ Seleshe's Collection
Hrant Kenkulian/ Dilerum Sen (Past Sarki)/ Udi hrant Kenkulian
...
Salim Halali/ Nlaguik Ellila/ En Tunisie
David Murray/ Patricia/ NYC 1986
Oppong/ Anadwo Bea/ 1960's Highlife
...
Frankiln Kiermyer/ Peace on Earth/ Solomon's Daughter
Andrew Cyrille, Jimmy Lyons, Jeanne Lee/ In These Last Days/ Nuba

Julius Hemphill/ Rites/ Dogon A.D.
...
Alemayehu Eshete/ Ambassel/ Addis Ababa
The Tahitian Choir/ Morotiri Nei/ Trance Planet
...
Youssou N' Dour/ Woma/ Bir Sorano Juin '93
Orchestra Reve/ El Ron pa Despue/ La Explosion del Momento
Rabab/ (title in arabic)/ Best of Rabab Vol 2 Khaled/ Hebou/ N'ssi N'ssi
...
Nasida Ria/ Janikan Anak Asuh/ Keadilan
Ornette Coleman/ What Reason Could I Give/ Science Fiction
...
Thelonius Monk/ untitled solo piano/ Blues Five Spot
James Booker/ Lawdy Miss Clawdy, Ballad at the Maple Leaf/Ressurection of the Bayou Maharaja

"errata" diu 3: line 9 --Patriarchal Poetry should read "construction is precisely what is leading us to (ecological) crisis." rather than "destruction...". phrase in line 16 --XXXX OOOO EH should read "punch not" not "puncnot". the editors humbly apologize for such ghosts.

please send thought pleasures & correspondence to [redacted]

diu is (c)irculated weekly by the logic of snowflakes
"nodal extension" of wepress

↑ Index

61. Jed Rasula
Re: Yau's Review
Fri 29 Jul 1994

I think Steve Evans has come up with a useful formulation: that institutions convert traditions into canons and competence into credentials. You could also say that institutions define competence as the ability to convert traditions into credentials. In the end it comes to the same thing: who gets accredited to speak on behalf of, and in the name of, others. The anthologists' familiar ploy of gesturing towards the contents and saying "the poems will speak for themselv es" is an old ventriloquist stage trick. I'd welcome a return of the old mode of the commonplace book (the last author to publish one that I'm aware of was Auden), in which a patchwork of citations pretends to be nothing less than (in Emerson's term) "colossal autobiography". Where all this gets wearying is in th e overinvestment, on the part of editors, in the pretence that a "community" or a "tradition" is somehow being preserved--which is not the same, by the way, as the case (like Allen's NAP) of an anthology inaugurating the conditions for a community that only retrospectively identifies itself in the past conditional, which is precisely what Weinberger, Hoover, and Messerli propose to do: "if we had been there all along, 'we' would have ended up looking like this."

↑ Index

62. Alan Sondheim

Submission

Fri 29 Jul 1994

The Trouble I had with Poets

What I remember about the poets and the trouble I had with them was first the time Anne called and I picked up the phone and said Anne, knowing it was her. But Bernadette said that I was involved with Rosemary to get closer to Vito and Vito had told Rosemary I was a pest, which he also told to Dara who Vito told me was a pest. In short order, pests were everywhere. My ex-wife went to Bernadette's ex and there were fights all around. Keith seemed to put up with me and once when I was crying around midnight told me I was a real artist. Jackson saw the tape that Kathy and I did and said it took courage. Meanwhile Vito saw the tape and said I wan't a real artist and Laurie saw the tape and said I was. Allison went up to Kathy by the way and said she was married to me and Kathy told Allison I was crazy. Rosmarie I don't think ever liked me although I liked her with a great aplumb. Meanwhile David just about stopped talking to me and Aram thought I should focus more and was just impossible. Clark and I talked all night long early on and I owe him for that, but I felt used and abandoned towards the end. When I first read Allen that was all the Allen there was, but Dan told me that Vito said he never wanted to end up like me. Still Alan told me I wasn't as arrogant as he had heard, and Krister hated me for reading Lacan until later when she read Lacan and more, according to Henry, and then just hated me. So anyway, I.A. said I had surprising talent, orphaning me, and quite a few years later I saw Robert stand up, which I had not seen him do before, although there was no reason for him not to do it. I fell in love with someone who lived with Diane probably because she lived with Diane or maybe she didn't. I published Michael in some early work, and Robert wanted to publish my translations from a langauge I didn't know. I am never sure about poets, about these poets. Poets trick me a lot and I always fall for the same old things. Susan always walked around in her underwear and it did tricks on me. And like everyone else, George had severe doubts, but Tom at least published some things as bad poetry. Now I look back and see that I should have listened to Peggy, but how was I to know the differ- ence between heroin and heroine? Ed wrote all too well, and Charles I am sure had his doubts, although Karen wrote America's greatest unpublished poetry. Ed was never particularly supportive, part of a group I viewed with jealousy and dismay. I could never believe in anything after hear- ing all of them, reading all of them - I could never believe in poetry ever again, including my own; I can never use `poetry' without shudder- ing. I get suspicious of poetics which always seems to invoke Charles or someone like Charles. If not Charles, William or Robert, all those anglo names coming in from small-town crater America. Always I wonder what the rest of the planet and the other Roberts are up to, and more and more identify with Violette Leduc and her malaise. I have weaned myself from aphorism or metaphor, rhetoric or the bon mot that gains a pause, a witticism in a foreign language. I am a pariah for the poets if they even remember me, a nuisance or a pest refusing to settle down, half-male, half-thing. I doubt they remember me or would care to if given the choice. They were the troubles of my life.

↑ Index

63. Alan Sondheim

Submission

Fri 29 Jul 1994

GOD

I am a fifteen-year-old girl who is also a fifteen-year-old boy and I have both a penis and a pocket to put it in. And I have no hair there yet so I can see myself when I put it in and someday I will have a baby because my friends have babies. I will have a baby soon and I know this because I am always wet because I can do things to myself.

But I don't sleep very good and I always think about God and I don't think that God really cares for me because she is a he and he can't give birth to anything because he doesn't have a pocket. And it doesn't make sense that he would make a pocket because if he could do that he could make himself like me and I don't think he would like that.

But I don't think God really cares for anyone either because what is the point of all those prayers just thanking and thanking him for everyone's misery because they really don't like anything that's happening to them, that's for sure. So if he did care then he's not so powerful because he's a he and because he doesn't seem to do anything about it. And if he wanted to do something about it and didn't then he wouldn't be very good, he would be evil. I would hate to think that God is evil but I just can't thank him for anything.

Besides, if God made everything, then who made God? I think that people like the idea of God coming first because God is something like people, even weak like them, and I think that weakness making something is better for people than strength making something, especially if it's strength they don't have. But anyway, there's this to think about, that God would be made by people, because people would want to make something not like them at all, but different, but not so different as, say a mountain. So I think that God would be just different enough to say that he is there forever or doesn't have to obey the rules, and I think he doesn't even know what the rules are.

So if he doesn't know what the rules are, then what is the point, if you ask me, for God, because why not just let things alone, and if you need something to let things alone, then you are living in a dream because there is nobody to tell you to stop touching yourself. And if I stopped touching myself down there, I would never have a baby.

(Oh, I forgot to tell you that I love to tell you about myself because I know you love to think about me touching myself there and it will make you forget all about God who will never punish me because he will be busy with your prayers and everything and will never know.)

↑ Index

64. Alan Sondheim

Submission

Fri 29 Jul 1994

KARL KRAUS COMPRESSION MACHINE

"There are writers who can express in as little as twenty pages what I occasionally need as many as two for." (Karl Kraus)

To force a rhyme which, lying on its back, flounders
All legs, thrusts the loss of hope and energy
Against the sun or moon, as if a tendency
Returns this spatial clot upon its back.

Tendency is towards, and not to mix a metaphor,
Which I won't do, is towards something which Is not where it could be before the tendency,
Such as fascism, for everything

Flies on the surface of an enormous rope
Pulling its own weight behind its legs, dull gleam

Ahead, as if something were there, which it is not
Or rather, the fleeing tendency of time.

You might have known I write beyond the speech
Of which ridicule has barely parted, continuous work
On subject and its objects, of nothing in that space
Beyond the names. This beyond is my written leg,

Just one, falling everywhere beside the point,
Crippled in every direction, but there at least
A gesture in every direction, which I am not against.

```
        _________
      __/O__    |
      |     |    V
      |     |
```

The mechanism on the left contains a _cylinder_ with a spherical bearing held in place. An arm extends from the bearing with an attached secondary arm at right-angles. Even with a limited degree of rotational freedom, the secondary arm is capable of alignment with any given point in three-space.*

Playing fields are drowned by words or dreams because They bend, rip, are torn asunder, sodden, dull, because They are not there but made from sentiment, because Death works hard on them, returns a loss become a loss because Victory is a young girl or boy hard upon a playing field because
The field is all their world laid out before the names because
The names don't amount to much at all because They're not there, and nothing is intended because
The boy and girl are dead and no one plays there because Playing fields are drowned.

"How much material I would have if nothing happened!" (Karl Kraus)

```
_____________________________
                        |
                        |
                        V
```

*To penetrate the labia of god is perfect harmony, writing played out against the lips of god murmuring of afterbirth.

The fearful world. The terrible language. The sun a brilliant red. The Romantic _blue deer._ The violence of cement.

----------end K2----------

↑ Index

65. Robert Drake
Re: Submission
Fri 29 Jul 1994

jeez--

i've always, so much, unjoyed the phraseology ov "Submission"; and, one version ov truth be told, always enjoyed being in thee editor's ship, and having authors/others "Submitting" to me; and ('nother version ov thee a4mentioned "truth") thee author submitting to thee Editorial _We_. We are, actually, rather a-mused.

> & now, on thee net, yr all yr own editors.
> 'ow wonderful, 2 bad.

luigi
EDITOR (& don't you ferget it)
TapRoot Remiews

↑ Index

66. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Submission
Sat 30 Jul 1994

I'm seeing if my new program will work.
Best regards, Marjorie
z echo
/

↑ Index

67. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Submission
Sat 30 Jul 1994

Here I am est testing again but I can't figure it out.
Anybody have help on the SUNIX system and how you create messages?

↑ Index

68. sondheim
Submission
Sat 30 Jul 1994

Ah, in relation to some response to _submission,_ yes, I was aware of the masochistic tentation of the word which was deliberately poised above the three... _submissions_ and is not my usual heading - in other words, _submission_ is part of the contents of the posts which begin after all in their heading.

Alan Sondheim

↑ Index

69. Tom Mandel

Flavia

Sun 31 Jul 1994

---

1. If the dog won't let go the trouserleg, it must taste good. 2. Anthology - bunch of flowers - a selection of "choice" items, in both senses. I choose these, because they are so wonderful, and I want you to have them. There's no way around that. It's up to readers to tell us which they like (sorry, no way around that, either). 3. Oh sure, most anthologies are terrible; I mean, it's one person's taste, and in the kingdom of poetry - an absolute monarchy in which each one is monarch, subject to none, and none a subject - you start by having a completely different view from everyone else. 4. Yes, institutions and committees and all other formations of professionalism manipulate, mold, warp if you like the mirage which is our view of the art at this or any time, but there is no better committee to substitute, and such a substitution is all I see offered, not just in this debate or on this forum, but most (a polite formulation for damn near all) the constructed social critique is a demand for allocation of space to my brand of frogs in the existing pond. Viz. the only alternate university herein discussed proclaims itself imaginary: here's where I would drive if I had a car. But the only valid critique of a form of life is a different form of life. A poem can answer a poem, naught else. Nor is an alternative link equal to an alternative community. If you are a grad student or a professor, start a different university to teach something different. 5. Sometimes an anthologist is lucky (it is always better to be lucky than to be smart), viz. Don Allen. But, no one (perhaps Jed R.) has pointed to the social context of Allen's anthology: people living and doing something evidently and definitively different from a prevailing life. The authenticity of the anthology - which needed to make no self-eliminating "argument" ala Weinberger - was in the stuff. (I don't at all mean that Don Allen was lucky not smart, by the way, just that he was fortunate to be faced with such a potent task to which to commit his smarts). 6. The same operations which enable a canon and credentials enable the critique of that canon. There is a struggle for power and life and space and the crowning of these in a sense of worth for what one has done and chosen. If the canon we debate arose because the classical languages were moved out of the center of education (i.e. worse housing = bigger bombs), then what would happen if we all read greek again ((don't get me wrong, it doesn't have to be greek, just a horizon and to replace all this margin-making wch replaced a sense of the horizon and its beyond))? But, we will always be empowering something larger and more abstract than the works we read, and will furiously unmake the beds we refuse to sleep in. 7. Grad students, quit school. Professors, resign your jobs. Talk about "avant garde" formations, that'd do it. Is a university a place where new art has traditionally formed (credentially formed)? Of course, if you have a family to help support (or you'd like to), then... just as you were, keep up the good work. But, can we move on to another topic? 8. Somewhere near Pittsburgh is a small town called Harmony; it began in a utopian gesture sometime near the middle of the 19th century. I turned toward my Dodge Dart toward it one day in I think it was 1973, but when I arrived it was a dim steeltown suburb black with oil and soot of the rivers that mingle thereabouts to (at the time) carry away what was not wanted in making the steel. I'm trying to remember whether I've ever looked at a map and seen a town called Rhyme.

tom mandel

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

August 1994

78 messages · Sun 31 Jul 1994 – Tue 30 Aug 1994

August is the month of the great reunion — out at Yasgur's farm the mud and the nostalgia are being sold back to a second generation — and it is the one concession the poets make all month to the summer's news: Joseph Conte breaks off to ask whether anyone caught "Melanie at the Woodstock reunion." For the rest, they spend the weeks talking, with a self-consciousness I find rather touching, about the very wire along which they are talking.

The largest thread is simply headed "e-mail," and it is the list turning to regard itself in a glass. Charles Bernstein, brooding on where the audience for poetry has gone, ventures that its critical future is "surely electronic" — a prophecy this very volume, assembled from the wire, exists to confirm. Alan Golding is warier, wondering aloud about "the privacy issues that e-mail raises," a question the black bars in these pages answer after their own fashion, a half-generation too late.

There is heavier weather too. Tom Mandel opens a small seminar on what Brecht did and did not intend by plumpe Denken — "crude thinking," he glosses it — and for a week the list works the narrow seam between the rough-and-ready and the merely rough. It is the sort of argument only these correspondents would mount in the dog days: Marxist aesthetics conducted between announcements of readings, with the fan whirring.

Beneath it runs the summer's durable grievance — where the work can actually be bought. Hank Lazer comes home from Cambridge disenchanted with its "allegedly wonderful bookstores," having found on their shelves next to nothing by the poets this list reads. The complaint braids into the still-smouldering anthology quarrel and a brisk hunt for the earliest citation of woman-as-muse; marketplace, canon, and myth-kit all found wanting in the same breath.

What holds it together is the medium's own strange intimacy — several dozen people, most of whom have never met, conducting a graduate seminar, a swap meet, and a wake at once across a continent and a wire. I have swept the machinery out of these letters, drawn the bar across whatever was private, and left the talk standing. That the talk is so often about the talk itself seems to me exactly the note on which this particular August ought to be kept.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 78 in all.

WRITERS

Amato, Joe 18, 36, 70, 74
Arts, Mn Center For Book 29, 35, 50, 61, 69
Bernstein, Charles 53, 54, 72
Boughn, Michael 37
Burnham, Clint 46, 56, 66, 75
Byrd, Don 33
Campbell, Michael 30
Conte, Joseph 57, 67
Creeley, Robert 62
Evans, Steve 45, 58
Folan, Bernie 43
Glazier, Loss 40, 63
Golding, Alan 13, 15, 16, 77
Guitart, Jorge 25, 65
Hannah, David 31
Hlazer 17, 44
Jed 9, 32, 51
Kat 10, 28
Keeling, John 78
Larkin, Peter 26
Lawrence, Nick 7, 8, 47
Lazer, Hank 14
Loach?, Tiger Barb / Clown 19
Mandel, Tom 1, 12, 21, 48, 55, 59, 60, 64, 71
Mark, Roberts 2, 52, 73, 76
Mead, Philip 39
Michael 23, 24
Nasdor, Marc 6, 11, 22, 49
Perloff, Marjorie 3, 4, 5, 27, 42
Rasula, Jed 41, 68
Tuma, Keith 34
WALLACE, MARK 20
Watts, Charles 38

NAMES MENTIONED

Alexander, Charles 58
Antin, David 13, 24
Arbor, Ann 72, 73, 76
Armantrout, Rae 48
Barnes, Diane 33, 54, 61
Barnett, Anthony 26
Bataille, George 54
Beckett, Tom 54
Bellamy, Dodie 54
Bentley, Scott 54
Berkeley, Michael 17, 54, 61
Bernstein, Emma 17
Brecht, Bertolt 12
Brown, Tina 54
Bukowski, Charles 52
Burkard, Michael 13
Burroughs, William 52, 72, 73, 76
Butler, Judith 54
Cage, John 27
Campbell, Jeremy 23, 24, 30
Clark, Cheryl 26
Cohen, David 54
Conte, Joseph M. 68
County, Mike 53
Dickison, Steve 35
Eshleman, Clayton 13, 54
Evans, George 8, 54
Fitterman, Rob 54
Gallagher, Kristen 13
Ganick, Peter 54
Ginsberg, Allan 52
Gizzi, Michael 54
Gizzi, Peter 54
Glück, Louise 13
Green, Paul 26
Gunn, Thom 34
Guthrie, Annie 19
Heath, Jennifer 17
Hejinian, Lyn 17
Homer 38
Hoover, Edgar 17
Horowitz, David 1
House, Poets 74
Howard, Richard 54, 55
Howe, Susan 13, 17, 24
Ignatow, David 54
Keller, Lynn 15
Killian, Kevin 54
Kiyooka, Roy 38
Kuszai, Joel 72, 73, 76
London, Frank 26
Mandelstam, Osip 59
Manning, Nicholas 54
Mayer, Jane 45
Merwin, W. S. 13
Messerli, Doug 9, 17, 54, 58
Morris, Tim 54
Van Morrison 21
Moxley, Jennifer 54
O'Hara, Frank 47
Oppen, George 34
Ostriker, Alicia 13
Palmer, Michael 24
Pound, Scott 8
Powell, Douglas 34
Di Prima, Diane 37

Prynne, J. H. 26, 66
Raworth, Tom 66
Reiner, Chris 54
Riley, Peter 26
Rimbaud, Dee 52
Roberts, Wendy 2, 52, 73, 76
Robinson, Kit 48
Rosenfeld, Kim 54
Rosenthal, Chuck 3
Roubaud, Jacques 5
Schuster, Josh 54
Sherry, James 35, 54
Sherwood, Ken 54
Simon, Greg 26, 54
Simpson, Bennett 3
Sirk, Douglas 55
Smith, Rod 64
Smith, Simon 26
Snyder, Gary 52
Sondheim, Alan 47
Spahr, Juliana 54
Sparrow, John 54
Stein, Suzanne 34
Sullivan, Gary 53
Tallman, Warren 38
Thomas, Dylan 26
Tsur, Reuven 54
Waldrop, Rosemary 54
Waldrop, Rosmarie 54
Wallace, Sara 54
Walsh, Catherine 53
Washington, Harold 17, 61, 64
Welch, Brian 57
Wilkinson, John 26
Williams, Hank 23
Williams, Tony 13
Wilson, Steve 45
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 60
Wordsworth, William 78
Yau, John 62
Zukofsky, Louis 34

CONCEPTS

Aesthetics 34, 36, 54
Anthologies 1, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 17, 20, 37, 45, 47, 58, 74
Appropriation 12
Archives and libraries 50, 54, 56
Autobiography 54
Avant-garde 6, 8, 12, 34
Beauty 33
Book announcements 33, 53, 54
Bookstores 17, 21, 22, 24, 25, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 38, 46, 50, 53, 54, 57, 61, 62, 72, 73, 75, 76
Calls for submissions 13
Capitalism 57, 58
Conferences and festivals 13, 14, 15, 54, 61
Copyright and permissions 54
Craft 28
Creative writing pedagogy 12, 28, 47, 53
Deconstruction 23
Difficulty 48, 51
Editing 50, 54
Electronic poetry and hypertext 53, 54
Empire and imperialism 37, 54
Epistemology 48
Film 13, 48, 54
Formalism 46
Free speech 54
Grants and funding 6, 48, 54
Humour and satire 54, 75
Ideology 46, 58
Interviews 34, 52, 54
Israel and Palestine 56
Language poetry 32, 34, 54
Letters and correspondence 29, 54
List moderation 54, 67
Little magazines 50, 52, 54
Lyric poetry 54
Memory 35
MFA programs 35
Modernism 66
Mourning and loss 40, 42, 54, 63, 67, 68, 77
Music and poetry 67
Nature 26, 63
Negativity and refusal 54, 59
Obituary and memorial 69
Performance and the poetry reading 52, 54
Philosophy 17, 33, 48, 58, 66, 72, 73, 76
Poetics 9, 12, 39, 45, 48, 54, 61, 72, 73
Postmodernism 66
Print vs. digital 15, 17, 54, 61
Prizes and awards 54
Queer poetics 1, 45
Race and poetry 20, 47
Representation 7, 20, 54
Reviewing and criticism 6, 10, 17, 33, 36, 51, 54, 61, 74, 75
Romanticism 48, 63
Small press publishing 15, 29, 32, 33, 34, 35, 42, 50, 54, 61, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76
Software and code 54, 78
Subjectivity 7, 48, 58
Terrorism 37
The academy 2, 13, 14, 22, 24, 27, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34, 39, 47, 50, 54, 61, 66, 72, 73, 75, 76, 78
The body 54
The canon 12, 28, 51, 55, 56
The internet 54
The line 34
The listserv 45, 48, 72, 73
Theatre 54

Translation 54, 55
Visual art 33, 34

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 78 in all.

31 JUL 1994

1. Tom Mandel — Re: Anthologies
2. Roberts Mark — Harmony/Anarchy
3. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Anthologies
4. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Anthologies
5. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Anthologies
6. Marc Nasdor — Re: Yau's Review

2 AUG 1994

7. Nick Lawrence — further & additional
8. Nick Lawrence — (no subject)
9. Jed — (no subject)
10. kat — (no subject)
11. Marc Nasdor — Re: further & additional

3 AUG 1994

12. Tom Mandel — anthologorrhia
13. Alan Golding — Twentieth-Century Literature Conference
14. Hank Lazer — Re: Twentieth-Century Literature Conference
15. Alan Golding — Re: Twentieth-Century Literature Conference
16. Alan Golding — Free-floating mail
17. hlazer — Re: e-mail

4 AUG 1994

18. Joe Amato — Re: e-mail
19. tiger barb / clown loach? — Re: e-mail
20. MARK WALLACE — Re: Submission
21. Tom Mandel — mainstream
22. Marc Nasdor — Re: e-mail

5 AUG 1994

23. Michael — Re: e-mail
24. Michael — Re: e-mail
25. Jorge Guitart — Re: e-mail
26. Peter Larkin — Puffery
27. Marjorie Perloff — Re: e-mail
28. kat — Re: e-mail
29. Mn Center For Book Arts — bookstores & the lack thereof
30. Michael Campbell — Re: bookstores & the lack thereof

6 AUG 1994

31. David Hannah — clown barb et al.
32. Jed — Re: e-mail

7 AUG 1994

33. Don Byrd — Poetry & book stores
34. keith tuma — Re: clown barb et al.
35. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: e-mail

8 AUG 1994

36. Joe Amato — clown barb et. al...
37. Michael Boughn — Re: clown barb et al.

9 AUG 1994

38. Charles Watts — Re: Poetry & book stores

11 AUG 1994

39. Philip Mead — poetics discussion list
40. Loss Glazier — Question re: _For Love_
41. Jed Rasula — Re: Question re: _For Love_
42. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Question re: _For Love_

12 AUG 1994

43. Folan, Bernie — (no subject)
44. hlazer — Re: Question re: _For Love_

15 AUG 1994

45. Steve Evans — plumpe Denken
46. Clint Burnham — plumpe Denken
47. Nick Lawrence — Re: plumpe Denken
48. Tom Mandel — Re: plumpe Denken
49. Marc Nasdor — Re: plumpe Denken

16 AUG 1994

50. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: consuming that poetry soup
51. Jed — Re: plumpe Denken
52. Roberts Mark — Re: POETRY
53. Charles Bernstein — mundanity
54. Charles Bernstein — Provisional Institutions (long post/essay)

17 AUG 1994

55. Tom Mandel — Re: plumpe Denken
56. Clint Burnham — Re: plumpe Denken
57. Joseph Conte — Re: mundanity
58. Steve Evans — My recent experience with error
59. Tom Mandel — Re: plumpe Denken
60. Tom Mandel — Re: My recent experience with error
61. Mn Center For Book Arts — buy or bye poetry

18 AUG 1994

62. Robert Creeley — Bookstores etc
63. Loss Glazier — Cite for woman as "muse"
64. Tom Mandel — Re: buy or bye poetry

19 AUG 1994

65. Jorge Guitart — poetry guerrilla
66. Clint Burnham — Re: plumpe Denken
67. Joseph Conte — Re: Cite for woman as "muse"
68. Jed Rasula — Re: Cite for woman as "muse"
69. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: plumpe Denken & a reel

20 AUG 1994

70. Joe Amato — Re: Cite for woman as "muse"
71. Tom Mandel — Re: plumpe Denken & a reel

23 AUG 1994

72. Charles Bernstein — FROM: Joel Kuszai, "Re: poetry guerrilla" (rejected post)

24 AUG 1994

73. Roberts Mark — Re: FROM: Joel Kuszai, "Re: poetry guerrilla" (rejected post)

25 AUG 1994

74. Joe Amato — selected and collected poetry...

75. Clint Burnham — Poetry gorillas
76. Roberts Mark — Re: poetry guerrilla
77. Alan Golding — Cite for woman as "muse"

30 AUG 1994

78. John Keeling — hello and update

1. Tom Mandel
Re: Anthologies
Sun 31 Jul 1994

re: Marjorie Perloff's pertinent post on head-counts & quotas,

> "There are two kinds of pianists. Homosexual > pianists and bad pianists."
>
> Vladimir Horowitz

tom mandel

↑ Index

2. Roberts Mark
Harmony/Anarchy
Sun 31 Jul 1994

> 8. Somewhere near Pittsburgh is a small town called Harmony; it began in a utopian gesture sometime near the middle of the 19th century. I turned toward my Dodge Dart toward it one day in I think it was 1973, but when I arrived it was a dim steeltown suburb black with oil and soot of the rivers that mingle thereabouts to (at the time) carry away what was not wanted in making the steel. I'm trying to remember whether I've ever looked at a map and seen a town called Rhyme.
>
> tom mandel

In Victoria Australia there is a town called Anarchy (and North Anarchy). I've always thought that it would be a good place to edit a poetry mag from.

I've never driven through Anarchy. A lot of my friends talk about going there but somehow they never seem to make it!!!

Mark Roberts
SIS Project Officer
Student Information & Systems Office
University of NSW
Australia

Ph. 02 [redacted]
Fax 02 [redacted]

↑ Index

3. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Anthologies
Sun 31 Jul 1994

Tom Mandel has a good point. Don Allen was "lucky"--lucky too in his particular moment. d In 1958, most poetry was rigidly codified and uniform in the Hall, Simpson, Rosenthal volumes etc. and then there began to be a really marked counterculture and s{ that became the New American Poetry. But since then, there's been a lot of gamesmanshi{ {and concern to be Newer than New without thinking why? and for what? The best thing an anthology can do is to put work out there that{_ the readers in question others { r epi;

↑ Index

4. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Anthologies
Sun 31 Jul 1994

---

something happened to the computer for last message so please{ignore.
Anyway, I just want to sy dp

↑ Index

5. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Anthologies
Sun 31 Jul 1994

The last note goofed so just to conclude. The best thing the anthology can do is to put work, unfamiliar as yet, out to those who would profit from familiarity with it. I've learned a lot about French poetry, for instance, from some of the anthologies put out by Roubaud, Hocquard,et al. Ditto about Italian poetry from the Gruoop 93 (Gruppo 93) pub- lications. Facts are especially useful--like, who, what, where? {

↑ Index

6. Marc Nasdor
Re: Yau's Review
Sun 31 Jul 1994

Steve--

I'll reply in reverse:

1. Re: crumbling of the priesthoods. I was only referring to art & academy priesthoods, which are considerably less of a threat than the one Rushdie is dealing with.

2. Re: credentials. Was I unclear? I agree with your response, and the tie-in regarding the question of competence. I thought what I posted was in line with your answer. (Unfortunately, I mistakenly discarded a copy of my post; my mother had a minor stroke and I had to rush down to Baltimore.) :-(

3. Re: middle-class honkies. Let me clarify. I meant to say that the middle class participates fully in that dominance. After all, a dictator, for example, does not personally pull the trigger on each and every victim. It is important to talk about complicity and responsibility. As far as the avant-garde is concerned, if you begin in the 19th Century, your conclusions would be as you state. I think, with respect to the arts, that some power relationships have changed, unless hip-hop culture isn't avant-garde enough for you. And further, to whose avant-garde do you refer? You assume a static paradigm. In places like Baltimore (my home town), artists have expended large amounts of energy crushing the boundaries of their own community. There's little or no funding, so artists aren't trying to screw each other as much. I would consider the "alternative" arts communities in cities like Baltimore or Cleveland to be much healthier than those in places like New York. The former cities are in such dire economic straits that artists quickly find common ground.

Marc

↑ Index

7. Nick Lawrence
further & additional
Tue 2 Aug 1994

---

further murmurings on the subject of anthologies

our gut reaction--we of the counter-counter-counterhegemonic--to the recent slew of post-New American Poetry anthologies seems to be one of queasiness, as if it were all somehow not a good sign; our understanding being as Steve points out that institutional culture's certifications of competencies will coagulate as canons--canons to the right of us, but never canons to the left of us; & that the debate over inclusion and representation, however necessary, leaves the primary legitimizing mechanism unquestioned

but what are the uses of anthologies? in the case of Allen's, it's been suggested, not simply to introduce a body of work to a wider readership, but also the diverse forms of (social) life implicated in & by that work--not diverse enough, as it turned out, to present an approximation of "what America looks like," but

↑ Index

8. Nick Lawrence
(no subject)
Tue 2 Aug 1994

(contd) to suggest at least more of what America sounds like than was currently available. As a sourcebook, Allen's collection seemed able to do what so few anthologies manage--that is, defeat the authoritative guardianship of its own frame and actively instigate the reader to follow up on the still-unfolding projects provisionally mapped out within its pages; first-stop reference rather than only-stop textbook or monument and it seems difficult to envision the girls and boys of Tulsa, OK fingering the pages of any of the recent crop of books & placing checkmarks next to their favored authors for future research--though one shouldn't disallow this possibility

So: if we distance ourselves from the various models of purely "subjective" garland-gathering, grimly inclusive compendiums, slackly conceived thematic clusterings or transparently legitimizing continuity-narratives, can we nonetheless find a further use for the anthology form? What might it be? Steve Evans mentioned the possibility of an anthology explicitly addressing the connections between avant-garde poetries and oppositional social movements, & I'd be curious to hear more about that (poetry only? prose excerpts? one ponders the spectacle of a Pound Canto followed by the transcript of a Father Coughlin radio broadcast--oppositional cutting several ways)

Can, then, the form renew attention to its social placing as well as to its own formal determinations?

Proposals?

Nick

↑ Index

9. Jed
(no subject)
Tue 2 Aug 1994

Nick Lawrence's reference to the Allen anthology as "first-stop reference rathe r than final stop monument" points up the current perplexity in which it has become monumentalized. It clearly did function, for years if not decades, as a first stop, a research tool (Allen's bibliography--and how many anthologists even offer such a thing?--included dozens of magazines, names of the editors, span of run, and location, and concluded with addresses of fifteen publishers). Allen's inclusion of a whole section of statements on poetics defied the look of generic purity for which so many editors strive--although it's important to note that the most important precedent setting anthology from the other end of that decade, John Ciardi's "Mid-Century American Poets" (1950), included essays on poetics by each of the selected poets. Finally, Allen's mapping of poets into five clusters (which Messerli attempts to replicate with, I think, much incoherence) advances the sense of potential internal dissension. As a table of contents it evokes, to use Nate Mackey's wonderful title, a "discrepant engagement." Every anthology has its discrepancies, but they're invariably attributable to the editor's taste rather than, as Allen provided for, the divergent working conditions/poetics/practices of communities of poets.

↑ Index

10. kat
(no subject)
Tue 2 Aug 1994

Yes, the ALlen anthology did what we needed. It seems that many current books, anthologies not alone, fail to think of simple utility. Students and fellow travellers--is such a distinction is to be made--should be helped toward further research and other more lively exploration. Anyway, just a thought. By the way, I didn't understand the texture of comments on credentials. When did credentials ever get to be--or float--above the market, either at the stage of evaluation or transaction? And, perhaps because the protocols aren't as FIXED as for, say, AMA, or NRA, poetry and criticism are particularly "market sensitive."

↑ Index

11. Marc Nasdor
Re: further & additional
Tue 2 Aug 1994

Nick--

I'm not sure that poets are what America looks like.

--Marc Nasdor
[redacted]

↑ Index

12. Tom Mandel
anthologorrhia
Wed 3 Aug 1994

Is there nothing to stem the tide of rhetorical questions posing as poetics?

"So: if we distance ourselves from the various models of purely "subjective" garland-gathering, grimly inclusive compendiums, slackly conceived thematic clusterings or transparently legitimizing continuity-narratives, can we..."

No, we cannot distance ourselves from what we are within. A master metaphor of subject matter with our royal selves outside it in consideration is at once useless and apparently the sole operative in the discourse on this net. Geez...

And .... an anthology explicitly addressing the connections between avant-garde poetries and oppositional social movements"

..is not an anthology but an essay or the syllabus for a course on the canon we would prefer (to the left of us, of course -- for 200 years now -- nor do I disagree), i.e. another example of what I referred to in my post the other day as "substitution". Thinking by substitution.

An old story told in the advertising/marketing industry (I'm sorry if my reference materials do not meet appropriate credentialar traditions) may shed some light on what Brecht did not mean by "plumpe Denken" (crude thinking):

> a man walks into a bar and says to the bartender, give me a johny walker. Would that be a johny walker red or johny walker black, the bartender replies. Now, our protoganist thinks for a long moment. "Oh hell, he says, give me a chivas."

c'mon. cut thru it (thru to it).

tom mandel

↑ Index

13. Alan Golding
Twentieth-Century Literature Conference
Wed 3 Aug 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

A little break from anthologies and their discontents: namely, some conference information that y'all, as we (they?) say in Kentucky, might be interested in. Every year, last weekend in February, the University of Louisville hosts a national conference on twentieth-century lit. (broadly defined--the program includes theory papers, film, etc.) A number of you have attended in the past, of course, and know all about it. Anyway, here's the dope on the 1995 conference:

Conference dates are Feb. 23-25, 1995. Submission deadline is Oct. 3, 1994. We consider critical and creative submissions (that charged term . . .). Critical submissions should consist of 2 copies of a readable-in-20-minutes paper, a 250-word abstract, brief bio, and cover sheet with address, phone number(s), affiliation. Creative work submitted should be suitable for a 20-minute reading and can consist of published or unpublished work. The structure is that of your standard academic conference: typically, three papers on a panel, with time for discussion. Creative "sessions" usually feature three short readings. You can submit in both categories, critical and creative. We also consider pre-organized panels, in case any of you want to get together on something; in such cases, panelists should follow the guidelines for individual submissions, since papers are reviewed individually.

The conference features two keynote speakers, and often some further special presentations or readings. In recent years, speakers/readers have included Susan Howe, David Antin, Marjorie Perloff, Jerry McGann, Clayton Eshleman, Ed Dorn, Louise Gluck, Alicia Ostriker, W. S. Merwin, Robert Scholes, Neil Lazarus, Hortense Spillers, Sherley Anne Williams, Jane Gallop, Frank Lentricchia, Michael Burkard, Susan Jeffords, Tess Gallagher.

Any further info., including a handy-dandy nicely printed call for papers, can be gotten from Harriette Seiler, Conference Director, Department of Languages, University of Louisville, Louisville, KY 40292. Tel. [redacted]; FAX [redacted].

↑ Index

14. Hank Lazer

Re: Twentieth-Century Literature Conference

Wed 3 Aug 1994

Alan-- just got your e-mail about the 20th C. Lit conference. Perhaps I can cook something up & attend/present.

Also, just got the official word from Northwestern University Press (a few moments ago) that my book (of essays, called Opposing Poetries) has been accepted. The press board met last week & approved publication. Now, as you know, it's on to corrections, revisions, getting the damned thing out at last. Thought you'd be interested. (Though I suspect that you've looked over the manuscript I sent them....?)

Pank

↑ Index

15. Alan Golding
Re: Twentieth-Century Literature Conference
Wed 3 Aug 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Great news about the book--congratulations! I confidently expect it to be one of the best in a long time. Actually I wasn't a reader. Marjorie had suggested to Northwestern (she told me) that they contact me, but they never did--so you have the approval of genuinely outside readers. (Marjorie and Lynn Keller were mine, which is a little "in-house," I suppose, but the Press wanted to use the readers who had originally approved the prospectus. And Marjorie is always usefully tough, even with her friends--one of her many intellectual virtues.)

It'd be great if you could get up to the conference. Remember that if you want to cook up a panel with some other folks, that's always a possibility. As is, of course, your poetry. I hope Ron and Kent do come through with a chapbook, but as I've probably said before, I wouldn't hold my breath.

What did you end up including in the book? Maybe you could stick a table of contents in the mail if you get a chance.

Alan

↑ Index

16. Alan Golding
Free-floating mail
Wed 3 Aug 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Sorry you all just got burdened with what I thought was, or tried to make into, a personal note to Hank Lazer. That pesky "reply" function got me again. One day I'll figure this shit out. Of course, now you're burdened with this . . .

I wonder if the debates over the privacy issues that e-mail raises factor in the unpredictable results of just plain old incompetence . . .

Alan Golding

↑ Index

17. hlazer
Re: e-mail
Wed 3 Aug 1994

My apologies to readers for my error in sending "private" mail to everyone. Ah, the hazards of e-mail...

I have been interested in the anthology debates and am in the midst of formulating some thoughts as I do a review/essay on Hoover, Messerli, and Lauter (Heath & other Am Lit anthologies). I'll share these jottings as they get father along.

I just returned from a few days at Harvard, mainly doing administrative work and checking into the Harvard Summer Dance Program. It was my first trip to Boston, so, of course, I checked out the allegedly wonderful bookstores. I stayed in a dorm just down the block from the Grolier and from the Harvard Bookstore. Everyone told me how wonderful they are. They're right about the Italian food in North End, wrong about the bookstores. I was shocked. Nothing by Bernstein, Hejinian, Susan Howe, etc. Harvard Bookstore has next to its poetry section a quote from Ishmael Reed about how in American Literature there is not a mainstream but many streams etc. But what they stocked was strictly mainstream. Given the association of folks such as Bernstein, Hejinian, and Howe with Harvard, I was genuinely taken aback. I ended up having a long talk with one of the book- order people in the bookstore, and I left them a list of books, poets, distributors. You may wish to snicker at my naivete, but in other areas--philosophy, theory, art--the bookstore did have some range in selections. In poetry, though, the line drawn in the sand is deep. As most of you know, such is not the case in plenty of bookstores we can name in San Francisco, Milwaukee, Washington D.C., Berkeley, (even in Tuscaloosa). Leaves me wondering how such control can be so "perfectly" managed in Cambridge in poetry? I've come to expect such "control" in the chain bookstores....

Again, apologies for private mail publicly blared....

↑ Index

18. Joe Amato
Re: e-mail
Thu 4 Aug 1994

hank, they wouldn't have poetry selection, but the odd thing is that the tower records/video in back bay is where you'd have found, say, the entire semiotext(e)/autonomedia line, along with the beats, certain strands of evidently more 'hip' critical/literary work (virilio, ballard, etc.)...

quite a scene, right next to the grunge and such, surely SOME sorta comment on the times...

joe

↑ Index

19. tiger barb / clown loach?

Re: e-mail

Thu 4 Aug 1994

Oh to be a tenured prof swimming heroically in the shallows, upstream against the controlled flow of the army bored of engineers. A veritable burr in the panopticon!

Is "mainstream" a convenience or a dead metaphor perpetuating our posturing?

If there is a "mainstream" it's in the middle of the river, carries not just sludge and muck but also good driftwood, and moves and changes fast. Rowboats and weak paddles aren't very effective there. Human voices wake us or we drown. Human voices wake us and we drown. As Woody Guthrie says, both sides of the river we drown just the same.

Blathering...lathering...acid bath

↑ Index

20. MARK WALLACE

Re: Submission

Thu 4 Aug 1994

What thrills me about Alan Golding's recent piece "Submission" in relation to the recent discussion of anthologies and other power games, in poetry and otherwise, is the implication of how much is never discussed,
even by those who may be critical of such practices, of the complicated manuevers by which power decisions are often made.
Even critiques of power tend to frame themselves in terms of what constitutes "acceptable" public debate-- issues like class, race, representation are acceptable to talk about, things like personal animosity, gossip, many others,
are usually left alone,
I guess in the name of privacy,
but the problem of power decisions is that they like to be made in private.

So, does the frame in which critiques of power tend to limit themselves also tend to limit potential understanding of how those decisions are actually made?
Do such critiques therefore further the fiction that "public" debate exists, when in fact the very rules by which such debate is limited,
in most contexts,
mean that often no one except those who made the decisions has any access to how they went down?

↑ Index

21. Tom Mandel
mainstream
Thu 4 Aug 1994

"and it's ever-present everywhere and it's everpresent every-ware warm love warn love

yes it's evry present everware"

Van Morrison
on Hardnose the Highway

Of course, tsking at the Cambridge bookstores, Hank Lazer, whom I now presume cavalierly to speak for and interpret as you see, was expressing what many-a-one, alonesome in a new town, might feel -- a longing for familiarity and the sense that in some related way her human mark was here already. A welcome. Like you get here.

tom

↑ Index

22. Marc Nasdor
Re: e-mail
Thu 4 Aug 1994

Hank Lazer writes:

> Leaves me wondering how such control > can be so "perfectly" managed in Cambridge in poetry? I've come to > expect such "control" in the chain bookstores....

I would propose that one cannot have it both ways, to criticize the academy and then expect it to offer its support. Just because there happen to be a few enlightened poets and scholars in a few literature departments doesn't mean the literary world has somehow reoriented itself. In fact, the protectors of "official verse culture" never disappeared, never stopped treating as anathema the "language" writers, NY School, beat writing, etc. So it doesn't surprise me that one might find individuals with the aforementioned attitudes among those responsible for stocking Boston's poetry stacks.

Marc Nasdor
[redacted]

↑ Index

23. Michael
Re: e-mail
Fri 5 Aug 1994

In response to the tiger barb's deconstruction of the tired "mainstream" metaphor, I say:

Ditto...with a little less acid.

Or, to quote Hank Williams, "If I jumped in a river, I'd probably drown."

Reporting from the mainstream of America--Georgetown, Kentucky--where even an "official verse culture" sounds promising...

Michael Campbell
Dept. of English
Georgetown College
Georgetown, KY 40324

[redacted]

↑ Index

24. Michael
Re: e-mail
Fri 5 Aug 1994

Marc Nasdor writes:

"I would propose that one cannot have it both ways, to criticize the academy and then expect it to offer its support."

To which I respond:

Why not? As far as I can tell, the strategy has worked pretty damn well for quite a few poets and "schools" of poetry. If I can pick up books by David Antin, Charles Bernstein, Susan Howe and Michael Palmer at the University of Kentucky bookstore--as I did a few weeks back--what does it matter that Harvard--in many ways the "official verse culture" incarnate-- fails to stock certain "out of the mainstream" poets? I should be so marginalized.

Stagnantly yours...

Michael Campbell

↑ Index

25. Jorge Guitart

Re: e-mail

Fri 5 Aug 1994

---

harvard bookstore carries the nothing that is happening

↑ Index

26. Peter Larkin

Puffery

Fri 5 Aug 1994

Prest Roots Press (Kenilworth UK.)

The following titles can be ordered in dollars via: Paul Green,83B London Road, Peterborough, PE2 9BS UK (making cheques out to "Paul Green"). They will then be shipped to you direct from the publisher.

Prest Roots Press was begun in 1987 to bring together innovatory British poetry and fine (not "crafty") hot-metal printing techniques at prices for readers rather than collectors. More recently, a subseries called "Prest Roots 2" has been launched on offset for readers who have no hope of being anything other, though the texts still remain quite collectable. The main series still continues, though its delays are finer than ever.

Letterpress Series:

Thomas A Clark Dwellings and Habitations 1 871237 10 6 $12.00

J.H. Prynne Word Order 1989 1 871237 04 1 $15.00

Paul Green Comparative Daimon 1990 1 871237 05 X $13.50

D.S. Marriott Airs and Ligatures 1990 1 871237 07 6

Peter Larkin Pastoral Advert 1988 1 871237 02 5 $15.00

Peter Larkin Scarce Norm Scarcer Mean 1992 1 871237 08 4 $15.00

Simon Lewty Cradles of the New 1994 1 871237 12 2 $19.50

Alain Delahaye (Trans Anthony Barnett) The Lost One 1 871237 03 3 $15.00
Peter Riley Sea Watches 1990 1 871237 $15.00

Prest Roots 2 (Offset)

Peter Larkin Additional Trees 1992 1 871237 09 2 $6.00

Simon Smith Night Shift 1994 1 871237 11 4 $6.00

John Wilkinson Chalone 1994 1 871237 13 0 $9.00

↑ Index

27. Marjorie Perloff
Re: e-mail
Fri 5 Aug 1994

Re: the Harvard controversy. It's been my experience that the tonier the university, the less likely it is to have any interest in poetry, art, etc etc. that isn't absolutely mainstream. It goes with the territory and Hank is quite right. I think of John Cage who was a hero in places like Knoxville College but scorned at Yale and Harvard. it shows little has changed.

↑ Index

28. kat
Re: e-mail
Fri 5 Aug 1994

ditto on the eccentricity of poetry to power-lunch universities. Just a note and query, though. How about Grolier Bookshop? It's been a time since I was there, but Louisa Solano, who does have to survive in the tight confines of course lists, did make an effort to keep some books up. What's the current verdict?

Also, poetry happens in places and ways that escape our grasp. It might even be the case that poetry that we know not to advance the art, craft, idea that we'd like has a positive function. The one Holy and Apostolic Canon, represented by representatives at Harvard, etc., should not inspire us to erect counters that simply serve the same exclusionary function. I say this badly and with too much wind, but what I mean is that, like those bad paintings in houses across USA that became WCW's metphor for his metaphorics, poetry of the street, church, classroom, and computer has place. Perhaps idling by the shore of poluted rivers. From Detroit, where one has the confluence of many streams, hello.

↑ Index

29. Mn Center For Book Arts bookstores & the lack thereof
Fri 5 Aug 1994

I am somewhat surprised at any naivete regarding bookstores. I have thought for a long time that there might be four or five in the whole country which have a varied selection of poetry which would include small presses to any but a marginal degree and would include innovative (OK, that's as misguided & loaded a word as mainstream) work at all. I was, in fact, pleased & knocked off my feet when I moved to Minneapolis a year ago and found that Hungry Mind Bookstore in Saint Paul actually had Chax Press books (several of them). Still, to my mind that bookstore has its own limitations. My measure in poetry is certainly Woodland Pattern in Milwaukee, which is, I believe, unequalled. Yet I applaud all those who are trying in this area. I am surprised & pleased to find from the correspondence on this forum that I may have to add the University of Kentucky bookstore to my short list. Maybe there is a chance . . .

reading & wandering the aisles,

charles alexander

↑ Index

30. Michael Campbell
Re: bookstores & the lack thereof
Fri 5 Aug 1994

Sorry, I wasn't recommending the University of Kentucky bookstore for any "short list"--it's selection is spotty at best. I was just pointing out-- as everyone is all too aware, I'm sure--that what bookstores stock is often unpredictable and that Harvard's "mainstream" bias is hardly surprising.

↑ Index

31. David Hannah
clown barb et al.
Sat 6 Aug 1994

as the wag muttered / re: his position as he saw it /

"i'm in the eddies of the gush" / familiar?

↑ Index

32. Jed
Re: e-mail
Sat 6 Aug 1994

The Harvard Coop's choice in books is not to be marveled at--it's just another big bookstore that's gone the way of nearly all university bookstores: it sells books as a front for more lucrative merchandise (coffee mugs, beer steins, pretzel dishes, sweatshirts, even a sizeable CD & tape section); and its select ion of poetry is exactly what you'll find in any commercial outlet that stocks its shelves by way of the nearest jobber (wholesale).
What is disturbing in Cambridge is that the Grolier, which really did use to be a place to score fetchingly reclusive small press (& often out of print) items, seems to have been converted almost entirely to the trade publishing/university press matrix. I discovered this when I went back in 1991 (after not having been around the Cambridge area in six or seven years), later thought it might've been an anomaly, so when I was there last summer checked again: both times found nothing on the shelves by _____ (you name it: nobody from "In the American Tree," for starters--well, maybe "The Nonconformist's Memorial" was in there last year, since Grolier does get New Directions...)
--but how to take this? Does it mean an establishment shutout? Or might it rather be that the post-New American Poetry/Language poetry nexus so efficiently developed its own means of production & distribution during the 1980s that it doesn't need the support of Grolier & other "poetry" bookstores?
--Jed Rasula

↑ Index

33. Don Byrd
Poetry & book stores
Sun 7 Aug 1994

When Barnes & Nobles and Border's put stores into Albany, the store that passed for our "literary" store folded. It had a small gallery, made space for readings, performances, and so forth. It was a pleasant community place (and three blocks from my house).

The owner of that store once told me that the poetry section produced more browsers and fewer buyers than any other section of the store. People would stop by the poetry books, read a poem or two, and go on to Literary Criticism, Women's Studies, etc.

The sad fact is that B&N's and Border's have _better_ poetry sections than the old Boulevard Book Store. They have better facilities for readings, etc. (And they give teachers 20%-25% discounts.) The problem is that, if books are not available from their distributor, they tell you that they are out of print. Thus, all small press books and many university press books are 'o.p.'

In one way this should be cause for considerable celebration. Serious poetry has disappeared from consumer culture.

It is interesting that this should happen at precisely the time books seem to be having a great resurgence. The two new bookstores in Albany are wildly successful. They are open until 11 p.m., everyday. I have had to stand in line at the check-out at 10:30 on sunday night.

B&N is marketing itself as a pick-up place: full page ad in the local paper with bombshell beauty in horn-rim glasses reading Nietzsche (shelves of books in background), "I met the nicest person in philosophy! (Nietzsche or CEO in training?) There is a rumor that they are having a single's night, but I have not been able to confirm this.

In all honesty, how much poetry do the subscribers to this list buy? Most of the poetry I read is given to me. Much of the poetry that is most important to me is first given to me in xerox.... I would guess that no more than 5% of the money I spend on books is spent on poetry.

Don Byrd

↑ Index

34. keith tuma
Re: clown barb et al.
Sun 7 Aug 1994

Marjorie is right that, historically, the so-called elite institutions have been slower to respond to so-called innovation in the arts, though I'm not sure that this applies across all institutions and "disciplines." The provinces have always wanted and had to work harder to seem to be "up to speed," which is one thing that marks them as "provincial." And Jed is right that the failure of many bookstores to stock alternative and small press titles--there are some exceptions I know of, in Portland, Chicago, New York, etc.--must be understood not just as a cause for but also as a result of the small success of lp and other groups in creating alternative networks (SPD of course, but listservs like this have potential). But the tiger barb never wanted this to be a chat about bookstores; that "flaming" was rather directed at the posturing which so often is a rhetorical strategy in the self-appointed avant-garde, and sometimes is worse than that, resulting in delusions of grandeur. We are not "enlightened," for instance, just because we read, teach, or write on language poetry or whatever. We've just signed on to one aesthetic (politics, etc.) among many. To use a word like "mainstream" casually--or, worse, as if it means something as undefined and unexplored as it usually is --is just to pose or to assert some (illusory) power. Perhaps it also forges community-- one uses the caricature and joins the club, as it were. Now, no one wants to deny that there is a whole lot of terrible work being published by "big" (really just "bigger") houses and promoted at Iowa or whatever. But there are also talented writers among the so-called "mainstream," many of whom are completely ignored by the alternative scene, which prefers to create bogeymen. This seems to me particularly true of the academic poetry critics and scholars. Look at journals like ALH or Contemporary Lit or American Literature over the last few years. Count the essays on lp, or on the lineage lp would construct for itself (Zukofsky, Oppen, Stein, etc.) For that matter count the number of lp writers now publishing with major academic presses or employed by good universities. This is not a bad thing, it seems to me-quite the contrary-- but it does indicate that we must be careful about blunt, self-serving caricatures. Am I supposed to believe that would-be lp poet number 709 is more interesting than--oh I don't know, Thom Gunn or Jim Powell or Roy Fisher-- just because he or she is proud to announce one way or another that he or she is not stylistically or (sub)professionally a part of "that" world? When will the so-called avant-garde crawl down off its antiquated donkey and begin thinking about and writing about poets as individuals? There is considerably more sophistication out there than we're sometimes led to believe. And the old binaries--"mainstream" and "alternative," you name them--no longer obtain, or , rather, they are transparently falsifying rhetoric without careful delineation and definition. bernadette mayer says in a recent interview that "it's important to like all kinds of poetry" (more on this is the next Sulfur) and--while I am not willing to go that far, want to be able to say instead "all good poetry"--she has a point. Moreover, she indicates one way out of the corner the self-styled avant-garde is perpetually in danger of painting itself into. That is, one can forge alliances that cross traditional boundaries. If the so-called "mainstream" ignores you, don't ignore it, and don't be predictable in your response to its products.

i could go on, but it's indescribably boring for me to go on in this mode of discourse when I said it all better by "flaming." My gratitute to those who have responded with a little flair, a little panache.

↑ Index

35. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: e-mail

Sun 7 Aug 1994

Jed, I seem to remember getting a message from the Grolier Book Shop sometime in the 1980's, probably the mid-80's but perhaps even a year or two earlier than that, as a producer of small press (even hand printed, limited edition) books that they once bought, that they were beginning to get their books only from distributors (my assumption was that they were streamlining the business & not giving particular attention to presses any more), & perhaps that the main distributor for small press was going to be Inland Books (although my memory is fuzzy on this). As you may know, though, this would mean they would lose 90 or better % of small press lit books they were getting, & certainly almost all that would be far from the MFA programs' A List. I don't think I've had an order from Grolier since then, but the question would be a good one for Steve Dickison at Small Press Distribution or James Sherry of Segue Distribution (which is missed).

all best,
charles alexander

↑ Index

36. Joe Amato
clown barb et. al...
Mon 8 Aug 1994

---

keith, just a friendly amendment to what you've writ, with which i am in essential agreement...

the "mainstream," i think, whatever one means by same, however multifarious, however much a straw---entity, is nevertheless a pretty cranked up media scene, in terms of money and distribution etc, relative to, say, benjamin's day... and i cite benjamin simply because he makes his way into so much 'mainstream' criticism these days...

by which i mean to say that there are nasty aesthetic connotations to 'mainstream' with which i might concur, but that in general i think of this category more in economic-demographic, as opposed to aesthetic, terms... anything can make its way there, good bad what have you... but if one plays to it, well---could result in garbage, aesthetically speaking, i dunno, mebbe not...

if you get my drift...

joe

↑ Index

37. Michael Boughn
Re: clown barb et al.
Mon 8 Aug 1994

Yes, Keith. I don t know who (where) you are out there, but thanks for the swift shot of sanity. It seems we expend (waste) far to much energy policing the purity of the empire(s) of the same, often out of sheer ego- terrorism. Too bad, because poetry often winds up as a cheap accessory in career maneuvers. Another option, or additional mode (to your proposal for a more universal general attention) is more focus on the local in all it s breadth and depth. This is something Diane Di Prima always used to organize when she came through Buffalo--some event where everyone, across the board, got together and read to each other. The surprises were wonderful. (Remember that, Jorge?) I know this is not possible in every physical locality as it is in a place like Buffalo which has a large base of diverse writers, but perhaps it has as much to do with a different attention, a different vision (say, intent) as it does with topos. A lot of the war footing we find ourselves occupied with has to do with ghostly residues of other people s old, left over wars. (Gee, what else is new?) Like, wow, it must have been so cool to have a real enemy you could hate to pieces while bonding like crazy with your buddy over a Lucky Strike in a foxhole. Ah well. Perhaps, sad to say, there is no longer any other use for poetry than maneuvering to be in position to eventually get your own Gap ad: (blank) wore khakis during the great, avant- guarde poetry anthology wars of 94 against the Mainstream. Hey, a hundred grand is nothing to shake a stick at. Or is it?

Best,
Mike

↑ Index

38. Charles Watts
Re: Poetry & book stores
Tue 9 Aug 1994

People familiar with Lisa Robertson's Proprioception Books, 432 Homer, in Vancouver will be dismayed to hear that as of August 27th, this wonderful bookstore is no longer a place in space. Lisa will, however, continue to sell poetry books on line (if you're interested, contact Lisa at [redacted] before August 27th; I don't have an e-mail address for her). This year, Vancouver will have lost both of the bookshops that have paid particular attention to the writing and reading of poetry over the past decade: Proprioception Books and Renee Rodin's R2B2 Books on West 4th Avenue. Both have folded because their revenue wasn't enough to meet expenses, despite a loyal but, alas, too small following. It's been a hard year for writing and the arts in Vancouver: the death of Roy Kiyooka in January and the death of Warren Tallman in July, and the demise of the two bookshops which have supported poetry most in Vancouver. Who will take their places?

Charles Watts

↑ Index

39. Philip Mead

poetics discussion list

Thu 11 Aug 1994

2:18 PM DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH 11/8/94
THE UNIVERSITY OF MELBOURNE poetics discussion list Hi - my name is Philip Mead and I was wondering if I could sign up for the poetics discussion list I hear you have at Buffalo. I teach poetry and poetics here at the University of Melbourne and am one of the co-editors of the Penguin Book of Modern Australian Poetry.

↑ Index

40. Loss Glazier

Question re: _For Love_

Thu 11 Aug 1994

For a paper I am writing, I find myself a little puzzled by the fact that, according to my information, Robert Creeley's _For Love_ (1962) sold 47,000 copies. The puzzlement occurs for this reason: is that not an _extraordinary_ number of copies for a poetry book to sell? This leads me to wonder what social or other factors might have been at work in the early 60s that would contribute to a poetry book selling such a large number of copies. (I mean, this would be an astonishing number for any of our books to sell today, no?) I feel, though, that I may be overlooking some obvious circumstances or making some obvious blunder in wondering about this fact. I would be grateful if anyone could suggest what I may not be considering or some reference to production factors at the time that I may be overlooking. Thanks, Loss ---------- Loss Glazier [redacted]

↑ Index

41. Jed Rasula

Re: Question re: _For Love_

Thu 11 Aug 1994

Does that figure about 47,000 copies of For Love having sold derive from Robe rt von Hallberg's book? (I think he provides figures for Dorn sales too, which are also impressive). My sense is that that's the figure of total sales over a good number of years--in the case of Creeley, Scribner's kept that book in prin t in that form for, I would guess, nearly twnety years. But ask Bob, surely he' d know if anybody would.

↑ Index

42. Marjorie Perloff

Re: Question re: _For Love_

Thu 11 Aug 1994

For Loss Glazier: Creeley has always been a popular poet, a best seller in Germany--people think he's accessible (though he really isn't accessible in the way people think). Then, too, it's a book of Love Poems so that appeals to the average reader even though again, they're not really love poems. But most important: in the early 60s there weren't so many outlets--there weren't endless small press books and so there was a limited set of books and those might then actually sell. Look into the numbers and you'll see what I mean. Bob von Hallberg's first chapter in his book on Contemp Poetry is good for this. Best wishes, Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

43. Folan, Bernie

(no subject)

Fri 12 Aug 1994

How can I join this list?

Sorry. I don't have the subscription details.

SUBSCRIBE BERNIE FOLAN

↑ Index

44. hlazer

Re: Question re: _For Love_

Fri 12 Aug 1994

Jed & others... regarding sales figures. check out sales for Plath's ARIEL. I recall years ago reading that that one (also from the early 60s) sold well over 100,000 copies. (and then there's Ginsberg's Howl ...)

↑ Index

45. Steve Evans
plumpe Denken
Mon 15 Aug 1994

Though I've been prevented by a crammed schedule from actively participating here in the past couple of weeks, I wonder if I could take advantage of the recent lull to backtrack a little.

Following what I thought was a brilliant, if acidic, posting on anthologies on July 31, Tom Mandel wrote a response--more or less to Nick Lawrence, I gather--on 3 August that said:

"No, we cannot distance ourselves from what we are within. A master metaphor of subject matter with our royal selves outside it in consideration is at once useless and apparently the sole operative in this discourse on the net. Geez..."

To the extent that Tom is sharply ("crudely"?) rebuking theoreticism, I agree. On the other hand, I think the point invokes a spectre of total absorption that is quite as false as the glib distantiation it means to discredit.

Our engagements, with poetic practice, with institutions, with traditions, are more loosely woven than that--or so it is in my experience; and so the majority of postings I've read on this list--including the recent admonitions against caricaturing oneself or one's imagined antagonists by Keith Tuma / tiger barb--indicate.

It is the porousness of practice that opens poetry to poetics, that permits posing counterfactual questions in rotten conditions (how could this condition not be rotten?), and allows most working people, including graduate students and professors, to quit their jobs several times a day, with or without notifying the boss.

But more important than my opinion here is a simple question: what should we be doing, Tom? What would "cut it" ("cut thru to it") in your mind?

It goes without saying that this list has never come near to exhausting the potential it presents us, though it also goes without saying that we've been sticking--for no material reason that I can discern--with a model of "substitution" (of one "topic" for another, e.g.) when the logic of multiplication seems built into the very form of the forum.

To put it "plumpe": there aren't any legs, so belief in the dog is superfluous.

On a somewhat different tack: I'm still thinking about Don Byrd's claim that "serious poetry has disappeared from consumer culture," and about whether to celebrate or not. I suppose the recent def- ences of the mainstream indicate that at least some people on the list do not agree, but I'd be interested to read further responses.

Finally, and to no specific purpose, from Robin Blaser's "Even on Sunday," so to be reminded once again of Puddin'head Wilson: _It was wonderul to find America, but it would have been more wonderful to miss it_ this unified mankind--for that's who's there, quantity or lump, at the end of a materialist's or an idealist's history--_conveived_, Mayer writes, _as a homogenized humanity. Woe to outsiders_ so that was it, was it? an _Enlightenment that promised equality to men and women, including homosexuals_! an age in the hole, running three centuries, surely allows one to say, "Listen, you assholes, a _metaphysical washout_ means you've lost your topsoil"

Plumpe!

↑ Index

46. Clint Burnham

plumpe Denken

Mon 15 Aug 1994

This is partly following Steve Evans comments on Brechtian thinking, and also apropos of the comments on bookstores disappearing from those peculiar hell-holes, American college towns.

Rebukes against theoreticism always seem to be misplaced, 'cause quite often those of us who feel fairly much against overly abstract and non-political formalism are still really part of the culture (generation?) of people educated in the 1980s (say, in North America & Europe, but given the dissemination of post-colonial theory, almost anywhere) that was and is intractably theoretical.

Re Don Byrd's "potry disappearing from consumer culture," I'd be very sad if that happened, but maybe I don't think of them as being very separate. I mean, unless we're talking about precious little handprinted books you can only find in ten places on the planet, poetry as I understand the term is a part of consumer culture even as it sometimes offers critiques and works thru what all these things mean. Quite often, it seems to me, those who pose themselves against consumer culture just mean the more apparently commodified worlds of mass culture. (& not, then, the "consumer culture" of farmhouses, expensive cheese, and thick, handmade sweaters.)

& given that the overdeveloped worlds are increasingly societies of information production and management, education is in some ways the ultimate consumer product: producing discerning (if not "cerned") consumers of culture, ideology, etc.

Nothing like fucking up your unemployment claim to cheer up the day, hunh?

↑ Index

47. Nick Lawrence
Re: plumpe Denken
Mon 15 Aug 1994

Well, after Tom's exasperated boogie I thought I'd let the matter drop, even if on my toes. But Steve's post reminds me that sitting out the dance is not what this list is meant to be about. Another bout, then, for health's sake.

"No, we cannot distance ourselves from what we are within." But Internal Distanciation is my middle name! I've got the ID card to prove it. I'd be lost without it . . .

And on "thinking by substitution": if poets have to relinquish that pleasure, then we're truly out to sea without a paddle (so not to speak). Or is drowning in the puddle on which we float our crumpled paper boats our punishment/reward for getting lost in thought?

But I know Tom wasn't thinking about metaphor. And Steve seems to refer to something else again when he suggests multiplication rather than substitution as the mode by which discussions might more fruitfully be conducted on the list. Indeed most live lists have multiple threads running simultaneously, with participants switching among the various discussions as they see fit. But with only 108 or so subscribers, what can one reasonably expect.

When the horse itself informs you that it's dead, even the most enthusiastic driver will hesitate, whip in hand; but at the risk of simply adding to the available stock of ennui I'll point out that the anthology discussion, such as it was, began with a consideration (including much worthy griping) of the recent batch of (non)experimental anthologies. It seemed time to reconsider the form and purpose of the thing, to question what it might (& thus may) do. Here's an example: suppose I am thinking, marveling really, about the inescapability of race matters in the poetry of Frank O'Hara, how consistent and unremarked-on this aspect of his work is, how rare, even unprecedented it is among white American poets (of which I'm one--primary context not academic here, though it could be). It may occur to me that the best way to explore this phenomenon is to compile a selection of such work, see where it goes. The result won't be an essay or a syllabus, though it shares with the essay an exploratory as well as a critical motive; nor will it be an anthology of my favorite flowers. I may or may not end up doing this selection, but it presents itself as possibility-- and I'll always strenuously defend the legitimacy of tarrying in the realm of the subjunctive. "Can we get some air in here?" goes the cry.

More loose threads: I wonder if the plashless disappearance of Mark Wallace's questions re the privacy of power was the result of bored dismissal or silent acknowledgement of their aptness? I didn't see the Alan Sondheim piece MW referred to, but such speculations seem closer to home (the road we're on) than even the railing against standardized critique.

A last example of thinking by substitution:

> The concept of "legislator" must inevitably be identified with the concept of "poet." Since all people are "poetical beings," all are also "legislators." But distinctions will have to be made. "Legislator" has a precise juridical and official meaning--i.e. it means those persons who are empowered by the law to enact laws. But it can have other meanings too.
> --A. Gramsci

Nick

↑ Index

48. Tom Mandel
Re: plumpe Denken
Mon 15 Aug 1994

Steve,

Of course, when I wrote

> "A master metaphor of subject matter with our royal selves outside it in consideration is at once useless and apparently the sole operative in this discourse on the net"

I didn't mean that this was the only place such a metaphor was at work -- viz, in the same posting my characterization of the community of poets as an absolute monarchy where everyone is the monarch.

But, don't imagine me to be "rebuking theoreticism," not much of a labor nor, however pervasive self-imagined theory has become, not really news neither. I was talking about experience, which is a social phenomenon, and thinking/writing which is a social phenomenon as well.

It is a theological task to point out error, and I am a theologian. Of course, one starts with oneself, "telling myself what to do" Kit Robinson calls speaking of the practice in his own writing. Yet, I won't share that with you; instead I'll take Steve Evans to task, despite that his response to my posting makes me happy, i.e. he brings up real issues.

The issue of embeddedness has nothing to do with that of identification, i.e. with one's impression of oneself. Steve writes,

> "Our engagements, with poetic practice, with institutions, with traditions, are more loosely woven...or so it is in my experience"

as if this constituted some kind of response. But, Steve it is exactly not the ex-post-(counter)facto working of your individual mind we wish to find, that condition is in fact exactly where my critique was aimed. There's the subject matter, and here I am saying what I believe I can resume about "it" out of "my experience" (the whole problem lies in those words, doesn't it: "my experience," for how long has that phrase been in use in our language I wonder; not long, I bet).

I'll cite 3 treatments of embeddedness which I think bear on this issue, only one of them from a point of view much in common (i.e. like arrows pointing at each other and about to strike), and I'll leave out what might be the most interesting one to discuss i.e. Jonah.

First of course, the cave. From within the cave we cannot know the cave. How did we get out to where we can know it? Such an enormous epistemology erected on that site, namely Plato's philosophy and the thousands of years of decorative additions. Is it the seventh letter, but by now that is commonly thought a forgery, of P that so distantly extends the metaphors of fire to find a way to create a fire other than that which casts up shadows for us to see, a fire that touches us first, sparks mind to move beyond. I don't find it convincing, however profound.

Spinoza, his arrow point my bullseye since ever I was polysyllabic, in a letter somewhere evokes the stone falling in space, felled by a gravity more universal than any can comprehend, but sensing its own motion, feeling free. He is thinking along that long contact of freedom and necessity, so much thought (i.e. scholasticism) and so little felt.

Finally (and this I may have cited to the list before), in the preface to the Critique of Pure Reason, Kant speaks of a bird soaring effortfully, its wings pushing through heavy air, as it thinks how much more easily it would fly how high it'd rise, if that heavy substance were banished. The bird cannot think the absence of air.

> the porousness of practice ... opens poetry to poetics

No. Practice is not porous, poetry is a witness aiming at uniqueness and exclusivity, the difficulty of whose communication is in the difficulty of the material, i.e. the material act, the practice. Quasi-theoretical terms like porousness/porosity do not help, for porousness is a determinate state too, as fully determinate as opacity, just different. It opens no gap (except between the way things are and what we can allow ourselves to admit of them, i.e. "that steel wall is porous;" the gap between what is true and what is not).

> most working people, including graduate students > and professors... quit their jobs several times a day,
> with or without notifying the boss.

That's not true, or rather, the difference between telling your boss and not telling your boss is the difference between doing it and just being alienated. Anyone can be alienated; all of literature from the romantics forward presents a pleasant how-to manual. If you have the impression of having quit your job, well... you also "could play dead.../as a means of flirting." (Rae Armantrout)

The world of the individual mind begins when you have an individual mind, when you have "quit your job." The social world begins when you have made effective commitments and it operates among those commitments. You'll never have a loosely woven engagement with anything except so's you imagine the better not to come to consciousness. What's gramsci say? "pessimism of the intellect, optimism of the will." These things are not opposites, but deeply connected like the two sides of a coin pile ou face, the sides of the coin Cary Grant flips in the closing scene of "Only Angels Have Wings." A great film on this very subject, as it happens. Once, when I was young miserable alienated, living in Paris and seeing 3-5 movies a day, that one saved my life -- along with Hawks' other equally great "Rio Bravo."

Please don't imagine that I'm changing the subject. Or that you are either.

Maybe I will write about Jonah one day soon.

tom mandel

↑ Index

49. Marc Nasdor
Re: plumpe Denken
Mon 15 Aug 1994

Re: Clint Burnham's comments.

Well, I suppose we could simply understand ourselves to be a nicke market in the consumer culture. :-)

Marc Nasdor
[redacted]

↑ Index

50. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: consuming that poetry soup

Tue 16 Aug 1994

No, you won't find much in the way of poetry at the mall. You also won't find much in the way of poetry at your local university bookstore. And many of us won't find what we want of it at the university library, either. (maybe that's one reason some of us have chosen not to be at universities, but that's a much more complicated question & beside the point).

But yes, it's a part of consumer culture, even if it sells one copy, maybe if it sells zero copies. It is produced within our culture, which is one of consumers. Anti-consumer practices are subsumed within the consumer culture just as anti-intellectual stances are rather common within intellectual circles.

But the flip side to bookstores not carrying poetry is the combination of a lack of knowledge about marketing and a lack of a marketing budget among the few presses still publishing poetry. How many presses take out ads beyond the ones in the back of literary magazines which are also not finding their way into bookstores? How many presses put out catalogues with regularity & send them out widely? How many presses know about the requirements for reviews in Library Journal, Publishers Weekly, and other publications which serve librarians & bookstore owners? If you look at presses which get their books with regularity into lots of bookstores, including the chains, my somewhat informed guess is that they have marketing budgets which equal or exceed their production budgets. If they are nonprofit presses (there are a handful of such with budgets over half a million), they likely have someone on staff who spends a lot more time fundraising than editing or designing. They have to be able to produce books in editions of 2500 (minimum) with regularity (four a year, possibly more) in order to attract distributors which have sales representatives which actually go into bookstores and talk to bookstore managers face-to-face, convincing them to carry the books.

I'm not criticizing the presses. It's somewhere between impossible & extremely difficult to do the work to get to a budget the size which allows any marketing & distribution strategies which work. But it's simply true that without it we won't see the books in the bookstores. I even have a hard time critizing the bookstores. I know they work with extremely small profit margins & simply can't afford to give shelf space to books that don't sell well (meaning that marketing to the bookstores is only one step; there's a public out there, too).

These are only a few reasons why the disappearance of small press distributors like Bookslinger & Segue in the last few years is so devastating. They weren't solving the problem, but they were contributing to the ability to get books to readers.

It might be as useful for users of this forum to talk to people at bookstores you frequent, write them letters, help them find the books you would buy there, and otherwise convince them that they can carry such books & customers like you will support them.

As one who produces books (& not just precious handprinted ones), I can't celebrate a condition in which those books can't reach more than a hundred or so readers.

Sorry to introduce such a mundane note into this often more theoretical forum.

charles alexander

↑ Index

51. Jed
Re: plumpe Denken
Tue 16 Aug 1994

Re Tom Mandel's skepticism about the presumed primacy of "experience" I have a useful qualification from Gayatri Spivak (who I find almost unreadabily self- indulgent, BUT): "...we are attempting not merely to enlarge the canon with a countercanon but to dethrone canonical method: not only in literary criticism but in social production; the axiom that something called concrete experience is the last instance." (OUTSIDE IN THE TEACHING MACHINE, p. 276) Think about how often--at conferences, discussions after readings, even casual conversation --the energy, or the energetic anxiety, of the situation gets dispelled in the brandishing of an Experience Trump: "my" experience, the sanctimonious untouch- able. The canonical experience.

↑ Index

52. Roberts Mark
Re: POETRY
Tue 16 Aug 1994

Thought people might be interested in the following exchange which has been taking place on the Discussions about Literature list

> Date: Wed, 17 Aug 1994 09:59:39 +1000
> To:Discussions about Literature <[redacted]>
> From:[redacted]
> Subject:Re: POETRY

> In Message Mon, 15 Aug 1994 18:08:20 -0500,
> "ALAN C. REESE" <[redacted]> writes:
>
> Anyone sample the new CD "Poetry in Motion" which includes text, readings, and interviews with Tom Waits, Gary Snyder, allen Ginsberg, Wm Burroughs, Charles Bukowski & others?
> I see it is being offered in the Quality Paperback Book Club and wonder if it's worth the price tag.
> Thanks
>
> Another CD with poetry on it is called -Sahara Blue-. David Sylvian's voice is on it and Rimbaud provided the texts. It's absolutely beautiful!
> Ineke Winnips
> [redacted]
>
> A Melbourne based magazine 'Going Down Swinging' released a CD of the late performance poet Jas Duke with its 1993 issue. If anyone is interested I could look up the GDS address and post it.

↑ Index

53. Charles Bernstein
mundanity
Tue 16 Aug 1994

Following up on Charles Alexander's "mundane" note, I thought a recent rather mundane, and introductory, essay of mine on alternative presses might, at this point, be of some interest to some of you. The essay is called "Provisional Institutions: Alternative Presses and Poetic Innovation". (I have sent copies of slightly earlier versions to some people on this list already). It's about 15 ms pages and I am posting it as a separate file for those who might want to take a look.

A local note: Buffalo's own Talking Leaves books continues to be the model of the independent bookstore. John Walsh and his virtually collective staff (I suspect this primarily means that John is the last to be paid) have an incredible commitment to new poetry books, as well as just about anything else in book format I have found myself interested in during the past years. You can pick up more information browsing the shelves of Talking Leaves than in possibly any classroom in the US (my own, needless to say, included). In fact, it strikes me that John knows more about books than just about anyone I know (he also does a great reggae show on the community radio station every Saturday night).

Not only that, but ... Talking Leaves brings the poets books to every local reading we do, stocking the books at the store for months before and after the poet's visit.

One useful turn of events is that SPD, with its essential list of mostly U.S., but also Canadian and UK books, now takes VISA, which makes ordering considerably easier for people from outside the U.S. As I say in my essay, on-line booksellers, like Grist and Lisa Robertson's anticipated reformation of Proprioception, and poetry information servives like Taproot and the UB's Electronic Poetry Center suggest necessary new directions -- not, I'd note, "progress" but rather innovations necessary just to keep up with the changing environment. So it is no surprise that some of the people involved in these new formats are a part of this electronic discussion group.

--This is Charles Bernstein transmitting direct to your screen from just outside the village of Swan Lake in the Town of Bethel, County of Sullivan, State of New York

↑ Index

54. Charles Bernstein
Provisional Institutions (long post/essay)
Tue 16 Aug 1994

Charles Bernstein

Provisional Institutions: Alternative Presses and Poetic Innovation

> In our period, they say there is free speech.
> They say there is no penalty for poets,
> There is no penalty for writing poems.
> They say this. This is the penalty.
>
> -- Muriel Rukeyser, "In Our Time", The Speed of Darkness

Imagine that all the nationally circulated magazines and all the trade presses and all the university presses in the United States stopped publishing or reviewing poetry. New poetry in the United States would hardly feel the blow. But not because contemporary poetry is marginal to the culture. Quite the contrary, it is these publishing institutions that have made themselves marginal to our cultural life in poetry. As it is, the poetry publishing and reviewing practices of these major media institutions do a disservice to new poetry by their sins of commission as much as omission -- that is, pretending to cover what they actually cover up; as if you could bury poetry alive. In consistently acknowledging only the blandest of contemporary verse practices, these institutions provide the perfect alibi for their evasion of poetry; for if what is published and reviewed by these institutions is the best that poetry has to offer, then, indeed, there would be little reason to attend to poetry, except for those looking for a last remnant of a genteel society verse, where, for example, the editor of The New York Times Book Review can swoon over watered-down Dante on her way to late-night suppers with wealthy lovers of the idea of verse, as she gushed in an article last spring. Poetry, reduced to souvenirs of what was once supposed to be prestige goods, quickly gets sliced for overaccessorizing, at least if the stuff actually talks back. If poetry has largely disappeared from the national media, nostalgia for poetry, and the lives of troubled poets, has a secure place. One of the cliches of the intellectual- and artist-bashing so fashionable in our leading journals of opinion is that there are no more "public intellectuals." The truth of the matter is that writing of great breadth and depth, and of enormous significance for the public, flourishes, but that the dominant media institutions -- commercial television and radio, the trade presses, and the nationally circulated magazines (including the culturally upscale periodicals) -- have blacklisted this material. Intellectuals and artists committed to the public interest exist in substantial numbers. Their crime is not a lack of accessibility but a refusal to submit to marketplace agendas: the reductive simplifications of conventional forms of representation; the avoidance of formal and thematic complexity; and the fashion ethos of measuring success by sales and value by celebrity. The public sphere is constantly degraded by its conflation with mass scale since public space is accessible principally through particular and discrete locations. Any of us teaching college will have ample proof of the frightening lack of cultural information, both historical and contemporary, of even the most searching of our new students. These individuals have been subjected to cultural asphyxiation administered not only by the barrage of network television or MTV, but also, more poignantly, by the self-appointed keepers of the cultural flame, who are unwilling to provide powerful alternative programming, prefer to promote, as a habit and a rule, a sanitized and denatured version of contemporary art, debunking at every turn the new and untried, the edgy or the cutting, the odd or unnerving; --that is those works of contemporary culture that give it life. Could I possibly be saying that the crisis of American culture is that there is inadequate support and distribution of difficult and challenging new art? Does a tire tire without air, an elephant blow its horn in the dark, a baby sigh when the glass door shatters its face? The paucity of public funding for the arts has done irreparable damage to the body politic. Arts funding is as important as funding for public education. It's time for our federal, state and local governments to consider linking arts funding with education budgets: a percent for the arts! & if that seems farfetched, it goes to show how far afield our educational priorities are.

Every dollar spent on the development and distribution of new art will save thousands of dollars in lost cultural productivity over the next fifty years.

At the community ("free") clinic I worked for in the early 1970s we sold T- shirts that said, "Healthcare is for people not profit." Not that we were ahead of our time. Times are just behind where they could be. Whenever I go into a Barnes & Ignoble Superstore or Waldaltonsbooks (If we don't have it it must be literature!), I'm reminded that our slogan for healthcare applies to poetry too. Does anybody wonder anymore what the effects will be of the consolidation of publishing and book distribution companies into large conglomerates? Let them read cake. This month's bestseller list contains the perfect symbol for the current state of affairs as the two top slots are occupied, in effect, by the publicity machines designed to promote "cultural product". What sells, in this purest form of hype-omancy is the apparatus of publicity itself: for here we have self-consuming artifacts par excellence -- no external referent need apply. Meanwhile, in the upscale journals that condescend to the truth bared by H. Stern and R. Limbaugh, no book has been more attended to than a memoir by one of the originators of this phenomenon, Willie Morris, formally editor of Harper's: for what better subject for promotion than promotion?

There is a world outside this semblance of culture. In poetry, its institutions go by the name of the small press and the reading series. Along with small press magazines and books, poetry reading series are the most vital site of poetic activity in North America. Readings provide a crucial place for poets not only to read their new work, but also to meet with each other and exchange ideas. Readings provide an intimately local grounding for poetry and are commonly the basis for the many regional scenes and groups and constellations that mark the vitality of the artform. Despite the fundamental importance of readings in the creation of North American poetry over the past forty years, very little attention has been given to this medium either in the press or by scholars and critics. While reading series are more concentrated in New York and the Bay area, many American cities have long-running local reading series. The best source of information about readings in New York City area is The New York City Poetry Calendar, which has been publishing a monthly broadside of poetry events since 1977 (60 E. 4th St #21, New York, NY 10003). The calendar lists about 300 different readings each month, has a printrun of 7500 and a readership of well over 10,000. Poetry readings range from small bar and cafe and book store and community center series, with audiences ranging from ten to a hundred to poetry center readings that can draw from twenty to several hundred people. Community reading series differ in several crucial ways from university- sponsored series. These series often offer a forum for new and unpublished local poets through "open mike" and scheduled readings. The organizers of these series rarely receive any compensation for their work -- and often can run a series for incredibly little money: the money from the door going to the poets plus a few hundred dollars a year for publicity. State and local arts agencies will sometimes provide such series up to a few thousand dollars for featured readers, which allows for some out-of-town poets to get travel money or a small fee of fifty to a few hundred dollars. Poets & Writers, Inc., is particularly helpful in these contexts, providing matching money for poets's fees. A community reading series can run a year of readings on less than many institutions spend on a single cultural event or speaker. That effects the spirit of the event. The atmosphere at a local reading series is often charged and interactive. In contrast, university series often suffer from a stifling formality. Unfortunately, English departments have been slow to include and support local readings series in their areas -- despite the fact that these series can often provide a lively point of entry into poetry for students new to its forms and formats. Despite the striking vitality of poetry readings, readings are never reviewed in any of the nation's daily or weekly newspapers, even though these papers routinely review theater and dance and art events whose scale is comparable. I suspect the reason is that cultural editors, like most literary critics and scholars, wrongly assume that the book is the only significant site of a poet's work. Contemporary North American poetry is realized as significantly in its performances in live readings as it is in its printed forms. Critical response to contemporary poems that fail to account for its performance are, for the most part, inadequate. For the scholar, the audio archive of poet's performance has become as fundamental as manuscripts, publication history, and letters; indeed, it is equal in importance only to the published text. Yet studies of the distinctive features of the poem-in-performance have been rare. In contrast, the drift of much literary criticism of the past decade has been away from the auditory and performative -- and therefore material -- aspects of the poem, partly because of the prevalent notion, commonly attributed to Saussure, that the sound structure of language is relatively arbitrary. In contrast, cognitive linguists such as Reuven Tsur, following Roman Jakobson, have recently emphasized research that demonstrates the expressiveness of sound patterns, at the same time, the "phonotext" -- or acoustic dimension -- of the poem has begun to receive some scholarly attention. This work, combined with the range of new work on performance theory, suggest a crucial new direction for literary studies.

The past thirty years has been a time of enormous growth of small press publishers. According to a Loss Pequeno Glazier's statistics in Small Press: An Annotated Guide, the number of magazines listed in Len Fulton's International Directory of Little Magazines & Small Presses has gone from 250 mostly poetry magazines in 1965 to 700 in 1966 to 2,000 magazines in 140 categories in 1976 to 4,800 magazines in 1990, of which about 40 percent were literary. The importance of the small press for poetry is not restricted to any aesthetic or indeed to any segment of poets. According to a recent study by Mary Briggs, independent noncommercial presses are the major source of exposure for all poets, young and old, prize winning or not. The staple of the independent literary press is the single-author poetry collection. Douglas Messerli, publisher of Sun & Moon Press, a high-end small press comparable to Black Sparrow, New Directions, and Dalkey Archives, provided me with representative publication information for a 100-page poetry collection: Print-runs at Sun & Moon go from 1000 to 2000, depending, of course, on likely sales. Messerli notes that print-runs of less than 1000 drive the unit cost up too high and he encourages other literary presses to print a minimum of 1000 copies if at all possible. Sun & Moon titles are well-produced, perfectbound, and offset with full color covers. The printing bill for this runs from $2600 to $4000 as you go from 1000 to 2000 copies. Messerli estimates the cost of editing a 100-page poetry book at $300: this covers all the work between the press receiving a manuscript and sending it to a designer (including any copyeding and proofreading that may be necessary as well as preparation of front and back matter and cover copy). Typesetting is already a rarity for presses like Sun & Moon, with authors expected to provide computer disks wherever possible. Formatting these disks (converting them into type following specifications of the book designer) can cost anywhere from $300 to $1000, one of those variable labor costs typical of small press operations. The book designer will charge about $500. The cover will cost an additional $100 for photographic reproduction or permission fees or both. Publicity costs must also be accounted for, even if, as at Sun & Moon, no advertising is involved. Messerli estimates publicity costs at $1500, which covers the cost of something like 100 free copies distributed to reviewers, postage and packing, mailings and catalog pages, etc. The total cash outlay here, then, for 2000 copies, is around $6800. (For the sake of this discussion, overhead costs -- rent, salaries, office equipment, phone bills, etc -- are not included; such costs typically are estimated at about 30 percent more than the cost of production). If all goes well, Sun & Moon will sell out of its print run in two years. Let's say Sun & Moon prints 2000 copies of the book and charges $10 retail; let's also say all the books were sold. That makes a gross of $20,000. Subtract from this a 50 percent wholesale discount (that is, most bookstores will pay $5 for the book) and that leaves $10,000. Subtract from this the 24 percent that Sun & Moon's distributor takes (and remember that most small presses are too small to secure a distributor with a professional sales force). That leaves $7600. Now last, but not to be totally forgotten, especially since I am a Sun & Moon author, the poet's royalty; typically no advance would be paid and the author would receive 10 percent of this last figure, or $760. That leaves $6840 return to the publisher on a cash cost of about $7000. As James Sherry noted years ago in L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E: a piece of paper with nothing on it has a definite economic value. If you print a poem on it, this value is lost. Here we have a vivid example of what George Bataille has called general economy, an economy of loss rather than accumulation. Poetry is a negative -- or let's just say poetic -- economy. But of course I've stacked the decks a bit. Many small presses will eat a number of costs I've listed. Copyediting, proofreading and design costs may be absorbed in the overhead if they are done by the editor-cum-publisher, proofreader, publicity department, and shipper. Formatting and production are commonly done on in-house computers. But these costs cannot be absorbed away -- 600 dpi laser printers and late-night "poofreading" can cause some serious malabsorption problems for which your gastroenterologist has no cure. Then again, if a book generates enough of an audience to require reprinting, modest profits are possible, allowing the publication of other, possibly less popular, works. The situation for the independent literary magazines is similar to presses, and indeed many small presses started as little magazines. o.blek, a beautifully produced magazine edited by Peter Gizzi and Connel McGrath, was started on borrowed money in 1987. One thousand copies of the first 148-page issue cost $1000 for typesetting, $2700 for the printing, and $400 for postage. That cost has remained relatively consistent, although a switch to desktop halved the typesetting cost. That first issue, with a cover price of $5.50 (and with the distributor taking 55 percent), sold out in a year and a half. After one year, o.blek had about 75 subscribers; after six years, that number is 275 (a figure that does not include libraries, who mostly subscribe through jobbers). o.blek's most ambitious publication (edited by Juliana Spahr and Gizzi) is just out: 1500 copies of a two-volume set, 600 pages in all, collecting poems and statements of poetics from mostly younger poets, many of whom participated in the Writing from the New Coast Festival held at the University at Buffalo last spring. Compare this to Sulfur, edited by Clayton Eshleman, who reports that there were 1,000 copies printed of the first issue in 1981 -- "maybe 50 subscribers at the time the issue was published, with perhaps 300 to 400 going out to stores. Now, 2000 copies per issue; around 700 subscribers, with 800 to 900 copies going to stores." Of course, many small presses and magazines produce more modest publications than Sun & Moon, Sulfur or o.blek. Indeed, the heart of the small press movement is the supercheap magazine or chapbook, allowing just about anyone to be a publisher or editor. In this world, marketplace values are truly turned upsidedown, since many readers of the poetry small press feel the more modest the production, the greater the integrity of the content. There is no question than many of the best poetry magazines of the postwar period have been produced by the cheapest available methods. In the 1950s, the "mimeo revolution" showed up the stuffy pretensions of the established, letterpress literary quarterlies, not only with their greater literary imagination, but also with innovative designs and graphics. In 1965, 23 percent of little presses were mimeo, 31 percent offset, 46 percent letterpress, according to Fulton's Directory. By 1973, offset had jumped to 69 percent, with letterpress at 18 percent, and mimeo only 13 percent. As Loss Glazier notes, the mimeo in "the mimeo revolution" is more a metaphor for inexpensive means of reproduction than a commitment to any one technology. Indeed, poetry's use of technology often has a wryly aversive quality. For example, as offset began to dominate the printing industry in the early 1970s, letterpresses became very cheap to acquire, so that presses like Lyn Hejinian's Tuumba and Keith and Rosmarie Waldrop's Burning Deck could produce books with little other cash expense than paper costs and mailing, given the editors willingness to spend hundreds of hours to handset every letter and often enough handfeed each page. In the metaphoric sense, then, the mimeo revolution is very much alive in the 1990s, with some of the best poetry magazines today -- such as Abacus, Witz, Mirage #4 (Periodical), The Impercipient, Interruptions, lower limit speech, Letterbox, Situation, lyric& and Object -- consisting of little more than a staple or two holding together from 16 to 60 sheets of paper that have been xeroxed in editions of 50 or 100 or 150. Yet the new mimeo revolution for poetry is surely electronic. Because the critical audience of poets, mostly unaffiliated with academic institutions, does not yet have access to the internet, attempts to create on-line poetry magazines remain preliminary. & technical problems abound; computers actually make reading and writing harder than previous technologies -- but it's just the difficulties that make for poetic interest. Still, the potential is there and a few editors have started to propose some basic formats for creating virtual uncommunities. In 1993, the first three electronic poetry magazines I know about were founded -- We Magazine, collectively edited in Santa Cruz, the Bay Area, New York City, and Albany (c/o [redacted]) -- which in its active periods sends out one short poem per post to a list of subscribers; Grist, edited by John Fowler ([redacted]), which has produced two full-length issues so far; and Rift, edited by Ken Sherwood and Loss Glazier ([redacted]), which produced an ambitious array of material for its first issue a few months ago: the main body of the magazine featuring poems by 16 poets (the equivalent of 50 pages), plus a series of associated files of translations, poetics, a set of variations on a poem, and a chapbook. Also online is Luigi-Bob Drake's, and friends', Taproot Reviews ([redacted]), an heroic effort to review hundreds of small magazines and chapbooks committed to "experimental language art & poetry." Experiments with poetry and poetics "listserve" discussion groups have also begun, with Joe Amato's pioneering Nous Refuse ([redacted]), but as yet the intriguing mix of newsletter, group letter, and bulletin board has not yet found its place. It seems certain, however, that the net will be a crucial site for the distribution of works of poetry, especially out-of-print works, as well as for information on obtaining books and magazines, and, I suspect, for long-term local, national and international exchanges of ideas and work in progress. The new computer technology -- both desktop publishing and electronic publishing -- has radically altered the material, specifically visual, presentation of text. No doubt a new aesthetic will emerge. But at this point, the absence of visual aesthetics in the production of many desktop magazines is discouraging. Simply having access to a laser printer does not mean an editor has any idea how to design type. Ironically, many of the typewriter and mimeo publications of the past thirty years were visually richer than some of the more poorly designed desktop products. In the case of e-space, editors have, as of now, little control over the visual appearance of the text.

Distribution remains the most serious problem for the small press and one of the least understood parts of the process. While larger independent presses have distributors with sales representatives to visit bookstores, most small presses must rely on mailing lists and informal contacts to circulate their books and magazines. Small Press Distribution (1814 San Pablo Avenue, Berkeley, CA 94702) is the most important source for alterative press titles published in the United States. With the recent demise of over half-a-dozen alternative press distributors, it is also the "sole remaining noncommercial literary book distributor left in the entire country." SPD, which must take 55 percent of the retail price of a book (bookstores will typically take 40 percent or more of this), now distributes about 52,000 books a year, from over 350 presses, with net sales of $360,000. Their quarterly catalogs and annual complete catalogs are fundamental resources. From 1980 to 1993, Segue Distributing published an annual catalog that offered a curated selection of small press titles that could be ordered through a central address. Segue, unlike most distributors, was able to articulate an aesthetic commitment with its choices, as well as being able to include presses and magazines too small to be handled by other distributors. In addition, Segue included selections of small press books and magazines from the UK, as well as New Zealand and Australia. Segue Distribution was discontinued this year after losing its government grant support. I suspect that in the future activities such as Segue's will best be handled through electronic bulletin boards or similar formats. One of Segue's most useful assets is its mailing list, which it makes available to affiliated presses. The mailing list keeps track of a shifting community of readers, with special attention to the local audience who wishes to receive notices of readings as well as the national and international audience who wishes to receive notices of book and magazine publications. I say community because audience is too passive a term to describe this matrix and because there is a tendency to speak of community when referring to a small press readership or, especially, the local "scene" for a reading series or a magazine. But I resist the term community as well, since it is more accurate to think of constellations of active readers interested in exchange but not necessarily collectivity. While much distribution of poetry takes place in the mail, we all owe a great debt to the few remaining independent bookstores that make an effort to keep in stock a full range of poetry titles. There is no substitute for flipping through new books and magazines in a bookstore, and such bookstores themselves are crucial sites of whatever a poetry community might be. We also owe a debt to those publications that are committed to reviewing and discussing small press publications, since one of the most involving aspects of the small press is the intensity of interchange that takes place in reviews, letters, correspondence and conversation. This is what makes The American Book Review so much livelier than The New York Review of Books. At their best, reviews and essays in the alternative poetry press are less concerned with evaluation than with interaction, participation and partisanship; in this respect, the prose of the small presses offer a refreshing alternative to the evaluative focus of newspaper and mainstream magazine reviews as well as the often stifling framelock of academic discourse. Indeed, the literary small press provides a forum not just for innovation in poetry but equally for innovation in prose, in the process demonstrating that a free press means giving writers stylistic freedom, not simply the freedom to express their opinions in mandated forms.

The power of our alternative institutions of poetry is their commitment to scales that allow for the flourishing of the artform, not the maximizing of the audience; to production and presentation not publicity; to exploring the known not manufacturing renown. These institutions continue, against all odds, to find value in the local, the particular, the partisan, the committed, the tiny, the peripheral, the unpopular, the eccentric, the difficult, the complex, the homely; and in the formation and reformation, dissolution and questioning, of imaginary or virtual or partial or unavowable communities and/or uncommunities.
Such alternative institutions benefit not just from the support of their readers and writers, but also from contributions from government, individuals, and foundations. Recently, such large foundations as the Lila Wallace - Readers Digest Fund have committed substantial funds to independent literary presses, but they have done so in ways that are often destructive to the culture of the institutions they propose to support. Rather than provide funds to directly support the production of books and magazines, or, indeed, editors or authors, such institutions insist on primarily funding organizational expansion, for example, by providing money to hire new staff for development, publicity, and management. While any money is welcome, the infrastructural expansion mandated by these foundations -- defended in the name of stabilizing designated organizations -- makes the small press increasingly dependent on ever larger infusions of money, in the process destroying the financial flexibility that is the alternative press's greatest resource. By pushing the presses they fund to emulate the structures of large non-profit and for-profit institutions to which they stand in honorable structural opposition, these foundations reveal all too nakedly their commitment to the administration of culture rather than to the support of poetry. Ironically, the negative economy of poetry is one of its greatest assets for our culture in that it provides an alternative system of valuation to the bureaucratic professionalism of the academy and to the commercialism of the book industry and art world, not to mention the TV and movie industries. But the value of the alternative institutions of poetry is not just that they do not seek, or make, a profit. In that respect, they are no match for such mainstream magazines as The New Yorker, which, despite a circulation that has recently surged to 750,000, appears to be losing as much as $10 million a year (that's something like $13 per subscriber) -- an amount that could finance a good part of the annual cost of the alternative poetry presses and readings and magazines. The New Yorker's parent company, S. I. Newhouse, is apparently less concerned with profit than with cultural dominance -- legitimating the cultural product that forms the basis of its media empire; for this exercise in hegemony, circulation and publicity are more important than profit. Literature is never indifferent to its institutions. A new literature requires new institutions, and these institutions are as much a part of its aesthetic as the literary works that they weave into the social fabric. The resilience of the alternative institutions of poetry in the postwar years is one of the most powerful instances we have of the creation of value amidst its postmodern evasions. When you touch this press, you touch a person. In this sense, the work of our innovative poetries is fundamentally one of social work.

Notes

Presented at the annual meeting of the Modern Language Association on Dec. 29, 1993, in Toronto.

1. Rebecca Pepper Sinkler, "Hell Night at the 92nd Street Y," in The New York Times Book Review, 98:31 (May 9, 1993), p. 31. "For some" ("We lucky few" is the last sentences of the article) "there was to be a post-poetry spread laid on by Edwin Cohen (a businessman and patron of literature) back at his apartment at the Dakota, a Danteesque menu announced in advance: roast suckling stuffed pig stuffed with fruit, nuts, and cheese; Tuscan salami; prosciotto and polenta, white beans with fennel."

2. "The budget for the National Endowment for the Arts, which has not changed appreciably in the last 12 years, is smaller than the Department of Defense's budget for its 102 military bands," according to an article in The New York Times, 3/13/93, p. C13.

3. Rush H. Limbaugh 3d, See I Told You So (New York: Pocket Books, 1993) and Howard Stern Private Parts (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993).

4. Loss Pequeno Glazier, Small Press: An Annotated Guide (Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1992), pp. 2-3.

5. Mary Biggs, A Gift that Cannot Be Refused: The Writing and Publishing of Contemporary American Poetry (Wesport, CT: Greenwoood Press, 1990); cited in Glazier, p. 38.

6. Clayton Eshleman, letter to the author, 11 January 1994. Information on Sun & Moon Press is based on an interview with Doulgas Messerli in November 1993; information on o.blek is based on an interview with Peter Gizzi in December 1993.

7. Abacus, edited by Peter Ganick (181 Edgemont Avenue, Elmwood, CT 06110) is the longest running of these magazines; in February, 1984, they published their 80th issue, Cornered Stones Split Infinites by Rosmarie Waldrop. Witz, edited by Chritopher Reiner (P.O. Box 1059, Penngrove, California 94951), is a newsletter feauturing poetics, reviews, and listings of recent publications; it is published three times a year in associaton with Avec, a magazine comparable to Sulfur and o.blek. The other magazines mentioned feature new poetry, often by younger or infrequently published poets: The Impercipient, ed. Jennifer Moxley (61 East Manning Street, Providence, RI 02906); Letterbox, ed. Scott Bentley (379 Latimer Place, Oakland, CA 94609); Mirage #4/ Period(ical), ed. Kevin Killian and Dodie Bellamy (1020 Minna, San Francisco, CA 94103); Situtation, ed. Mark Wallace; object, ed. Kim Rosenfeld and Rob Fitterman (229 Hudson Street #4, New York, NY 10013); lyric &, ed. Avery E. D. Burns (P.O. Box 640531, San Francisco, CA 91640-0531); lower limit speech, ed. A. L. Neilsen (1743 Butler Avenue #2; Los Angeles, CA 90025); Interruptions (a magazine of collaborations), ed. Tom Beckett (131 North Pearl Street, Kent, OH 44240).

8. In Febrary 1994 Grist announced its first electronic book, Gleanings: Uncollected Poems of the Fifties by David Ignatow, including many poems "published here for the first time." Cost is $25 on diskette; the text is also available online.

9. Letter, dated October 22, 1993, to affiliated publishers from Lisa Domitrovich, Executive Director, SPD.

10. During much of this period, I worked as editor of the catalog.

11. Elizabeth Kolbert, "How Tina Brown Moves Magazines," in The New York Timnes Magazine, Dec. 5, 1993, p. 87.

12. Publishing statistics are notoriously unreliable, especially when they concern the amount publishers are willing to lose -- less to obtain cultural legitimacy, I would say, than to establish cultural values. According to The New York Times (3/2/94, p. C20), Harold M. Evans, the publisher of Random House's adult trade division, told an audience at the PEN American Center that "the 29 books he published that made it on to The New York Times's 1993 list of Notable Books lost $680,000" and the eight books that "won awards from the American Library Association lost a total of $370,000." Evans went on to say that three of these books had advertising budgets of $71,000 to $87,000 each and that these books lost from $60,000 to $300,000 each. Innovative works of literature or criticism or scholarship that challenge the dominant cultural values of institutions such as Random House are not the most likely candidates to receive this type of support; yet without such subventions they stand little chance of being reviewed or recommended in The New York Times, whose reviews are closely correlated to its advertisers. The point is not that official "high" culture, just as alternative-press poetry, requires subsidies; but that a system of selection and support favors certain works over others; it is this system of selection and promotion that allows the media conglomorates to control cultural sectors that they have written off as largely unprofitable. Note, however, that the content of the selections is less important for this system of dominance than the system of selection and promotion itself, since the alternative presses can never afford to lose as much as these corporations.
It should be no surprise that it is neither the audience nor quality nor accessibility that creates official literary product, nor that much of official "high" culture is a loss leader. Advertising and promotion of targeted "loss leaders" are evidently worth the price in influencing literary and critical taste, specifically by fostering a cultural climate in which genuinely profitable products may thrive. The recent "fiction" issue of The New Yorker (June 27/July 4, 1994) is a perfect example of how that magazine goes about promoting the idea that "Only what sells has value and value is determined by the extent of the sales." The issue included a "good cop" feature on a struggling "serious" fiction writer that, while seeming to question the value system of commercial publishing, actually reinforced its claim to exclusive value. Remarkably, the piece, and indeed the whole magazine issue, systematically avoided any reference to alternative and independent presses so as to better foster the illusion (not to say comic notion) that the New York trade presses are the sole purveyors of literature. The story on the "struggling" writer emphasized that he had been praised by the Times (which, inevitably, is where the author of the profile had first heard about his work, since that's where you hear about worthwhile fiction) and had five books with HarperCollins that are neither (Si forbid!) "inaccessible or highbrow". The problem seemed to be that he was shifting from one New York trade press to another (a Disney affiliate) and that his projected advance would be only $10,000 (nonetheless, considerably more than most literary writers in this culture receive) (pp. 48-9). The New Yorker's sell was so hard that the following "bad cop" article got right down to business. It was devoted exclusively to promoting the preeminent cultural value of the top ten books on the Times's best seller list: "They have a better ear [than nonbestselling fiction] for what we say, or try to say, or don't notice we're saying -- for the small ways in which the mind works and stumbles" (p. 80); so eat your Wheaties, kids! "Wonder Bread helps build bodies 12 ways" (& that wholewheat stuff doesn't taste as good either!) I don't think "we" can say it any better than that.

↑ Index

55. Tom Mandel
Re: plumpe Denken
Wed 17 Aug 1994

It is not the primacy of experience that I treated skeptically, but the concept of experience in use in that reference to primacy, and this not in the service of anything like G. Spivak's attempt "to dethrone canonical method in...social production" (leave aside the fact that the term "social production" simply restates the "canonical method" as a "social" event). If it could be dethroned, one might escape the skepticism, but it is as inherent to mental processes as figure/ground or any of the other pattern-matching, template-imposing schemata upon which our little leaps rebound.

Experience is primary, but it is so not the way a prince is, but the way the people are. However one feels convinced (daily, hourly) that this quantity is debased (repeatedly), it is the only place from which anything can emerge.

Perhaps we need to go back and read Howard Fast and the early Irwin Shaw. James T. Farrell. Places where the partial could figure a whole, or if you've seen the Hawks picture "Only Angels Have Wings", which I so insisted on in my last post, you might view it against "Tarnished Angels" another flying picture this time by the great Douglas Sirk or perhaps someone would like to discuss the subject of mimesis? Has anyone read Auerbach's last-published essay, "Philology & Weltliteratur" which I think would provide the foundation for a telling critique of the function of theory in literature. Interestingly, it was translated by Edward Said, who may be said to grow entirely from one of Auerbach's lobes.

tom mandel

↑ Index

56. Clint Burnham
Re: plumpe Denken
Wed 17 Aug 1994

Experience etc.

I'm not really sure what "experience" means when it is founded as some base of thought; I think that the Spivak quote Jed cited was just continuing Spivak's continuing skepticism about what she othertimes calls the "native informant," or the tendency to take some narrated "experience," in this case from a native or primitive "other," and treat it as authentic, etc.

& I was also puzzled by Tom Mandel's comment that "the term `social production' simply restates the `canonical method' as a `social' event." Quickly, it seems that Spivak there was saying (I read that book from the library a couple months ago, so I can't remember in any way the context, so I'll go by the quotation) that truths are formed or produced in what we call "the social," which means in history, in the current collective situtations. (As Bernstein's interesting essay just posted posited, the "ruling class" of American literature is obviously a collective enterprise in how it protects its own against the threats from we dweeby little xerox geeks: someone else on his panel at the MLA tried to make the claim that there was no real canon [unwittingly repeating Bernstein's "State of the Art" essay to different ends] based on his experience as a reviewer for those NYC journals everyone refers to by their initials); I lost track of my parentheses just now, but surely the emphasis on experience in Mandel's post has to do with seeking some ineffable individual basis for thought, cognition, poetry?

What if Kant had remarked that a bird flying in a flock wishes s/he were alone and free.

Aspects of Said's humanistic method may derive from Auerbach, As Aijaz Ahmad pointed out in In Theory, but I don't think the old philologist did much for the Palestinian people.

↑ Index

57. Joseph Conte
Re: mundanity
Wed 17 Aug 1994

Everything that Charles Bernstein says of Talking Leaves bookstore is true--the place is a community treasure, and many faculty choose to order their coursebooks there instead of the capitalist UB bookstore--except for the name of the proprietor and reggae-meister, Jonathan Welch.

Charles, did you catch Melanie at the Woodstock reunion? I have often felt a phenomenal bond with the Mud People.

Joseph Conte

↑ Index

58. Steve Evans
My recent experience with error
Wed 17 Aug 1994

I appreciate the care with which Tom Mandel responded to my assertions about the "porousness" of practice. As the narrator of Melville's Pierre writes: "If to affirm, be to expand one's isolated self; and if to deny, be to contract one's isolated self; then to respond is a suspension of all isolation." An apt motto, from a book that explores the dialectic between "identification" and "embeddeness" in chilling detail.

In fact, I only remembered the above while searching for a passage that complemented Tom's three examples, and caught something of the texture of Tom's post in general. It is this paragraph, from the chapter called "Some Philosophical Remarks":

> From these random slips, it would seem, that Pierre is > quite conscious of much that is so anomalously hard and > bitter in his lot, of much that is so black and terrific > in his soul. Yet that knowing his fatal condition does > not one whit enable him to change or better his condition.
> For in tremendous extremeties human souls are like drown> ing men; well enough they know there are in peril; well > enough they know the causes of that peril; nevertheless, > the sea is the sea, and these drowning men do drown.

Tom's model of experience is apparently one in which we are drowning always; the main exercise of mind, he implies, comes in disguising that mortal fact: "You'll never have a loosely woven engagement with anything except so's you imagine the better not to come to consciousness."

Let me counterpose a passage from Rosmarie Waldrop's Lawn of the Excluded Middle:

Because we use the negative as if no explanation were needed the void we cater to is, like anorexia, a ferment of halluc- inations. Here, the bird's body equals the rhthym of wing- beats which, frantic, disturb their own lack of origin, fear of falling, indigeneous grey. Static electricity. Strobe map. Gap gardening. (24; also in Messerli anth. 250)

As Waldrop's entire book shows, what Tom calls the "gap between what is true and what is not"--the only gap he allows--actually traps that engagement I was calling "loosely woven" in the ex- cluded middle.

As for the assertion that "the social world begins when you have made effective commitments and it operates among those commitments," I don't think Tom and I disagree either on the claim or on the value placed on such social, as against "individual," commitments. But my argument is that such commitments are not effectively sustained on the model of total absorption. To pick up Rae's lines, if you value flirting, playing dead as a way of flirting is an option. If you value flirting, a certain tradition in poetry, and anti-capitalist political and intellectual work, well, the commitments are porous enough to admit of all three projects in time. (Though anti-capitalists are on the whole inept flirts, there are exceptions.)

And, Tom, don't think I'm changing the subject.

As sidenote on the phrase, "in my experience." I despise the use of the term as a conversation stopper, as do Jed and G.C. Spivak. But having been taken to task for it, I still don't feel too rep- entant (my apologies to the theologians). I think the ghost of the public sphere that wanders the circuits of these lists is benign: private people critically debating public interests test "their experiences" in a social medium. And despite its recent vintage in geo-historical terms, the category of "my experience" is an objective one in capitalist social formations. Remember ideology is seldom just ideology.

There's so much else to respond to, not only in Tom's post but in the extremely interesting message Charles Alexander posted, and Charles Bernstein's article as well, but let one accident of attending both to this list and to Messerli's anthology in the past two days sufice.

Clint's noticing that "those who pose themselves against consumer culture just mean the more apparently commodified worlds of mass culture. (& not, then, the "consumer culture" of farmhouses, expensive cheese, and thick, handmade sweaters)" finds a direct echo in Robert Kelly's poem "Recessional," which I just read for the first time in Messerli's volume:

> Not much in this culture > left for me. I will arise > and go into the future, > to the country I take it > joggers are also trotting to > beyond the quiche and croissants > beyond the poignant resurrections > each commodity promises and fails.

I see a rough grey hill there
I am suddenly determined to climb and set a pebble down to praise all those who came before me knowing no more than I do of the way. (238)

↑ Index

59. Tom Mandel
Re: plumpe Denken
Wed 17 Aug 1994

---

re: Clint Burnham's post, yes of course I overstated Said's relation to Auerbach -- although it was not in a "humanistic method" but a view of history that I was locating the relationship, & I think one would have to discuss this in the context of the Auerbach essay I referenced to take it any further -- I was trying to raise an interest in A's work. (By the way, I'm delighted to hear of A. Ahmad's mention of this relationship, and I'll be looking into In Theory which I don't know).

As to

"What if Kant had remarked that a bird flying in a flock wishes
s/he were alone and free"

well? What if? I mean I would much appreciate to hear more on this subject. The desire for solitude, so intense and ambiguous a force in Spinoza, does it really come to formal expression in Kant (as, shortly thereafter, it surely does in Kierkegaard's work)?

"the tendency to take some narrated "experience," in this case from a native or primitive "other," and treat it as authentic..."

How does one get along in life, really? Is there any way to escape belief in, commitment to, the reality of another's narrative frame? Do we exist in relationships, and do these pre-exist the critical solitude (sorry, it's a fiction, however useful) in which we make such claims as Clint is claiming Spivak makes (and can we understand what C says unless we credit that narrative frame?). What, on the other hand, is the very special, highly constructed, altogether test-tube situation in which we critique this "tendency to take..." ? Lets call it Situation A.

Where does poetry come from? Does it come from Situation A. Language poetry, to take an example we all in varying degrees seem to know and care about, did it come from Situation A? No thank you, it did not. And what of its force in a human life, a reader's life, does this force come from Situation A? We see in Ketjak, in Oxota, in Agreement that the author has refused commitment to the authenticity of some witness or record (his/her own?)?, or is it to some alternate way of expression that commitment is refused and this refusal is or at least defines the work? These seem trivial burdens for a poet to carry who knows the world she occupies fellow-citizened by Arnaut Daniel & Dante. That...

"truths are formed or produced in what we call "the social," which means in history, in the current collective situations"

is not news, not theory, just a menu-pick among truth-version-windows. A poet's job is to figure out what such "current collective situations" are as roll in our lives, to really figure that out.

Here are a few closing words, not mine but of Mandelstam:

An artist considers his world-view a tool and an instrument, like a hammer in the hands of a stonemason, and his only reality is the work of art itself.

Conscious sense, the Logos, is still taken erroneously... for content. (It should instead be) considered on an equal footing with the other elements of the word (as form)..., conscious sense as creative material.

There is no equality nor competition, only the complicity of all who conspire against emptiness and non-existence.

tom mandel

↑ Index

60. Tom Mandel

Re: My recent experience with error

Wed 17 Aug 1994

Other than that I have no interest in "disguising" anything (but maybe he meant to write "deguising"), I find Steve Evans post convincing in every particular. Lets remember that this "drowning" is a social state, the exact state of those creatures who from water took to air and, drowning, moved on.

Those who came before can't know our praise; those to come, are they more likely to? Only we seem to know the praise we pause to give. Does this mean it is really ourselves we are praising? No answer hides in the question; I really wonder.

Rosemary's passage, which seems to be a meditation on Wittgenstein, is brilliantly apposite (brilliant & beautiful itself). Let us explain our denials, it seems to counsel itself.

tom mandel

↑ Index

61. Mn Center For Book Arts

buy or bye poetry

Wed 17 Aug 1994

Steve Evans has asked me to elaborate on what one might do to contest the disappearance of poetry from "serious consumer culture," as someone put it in an earlier post. I would hope the culture includes serious consumers of poetry, and as Charles Bernstein so eloquently puts it in his long essay, which he also delivered at the "Art & Language" symposium at Minnesota Center for Book Arts in April of 1994, it does so include them (even everyone on this list).

So, here are some more earthly suggestions, not earthly delights, at least not in themselves.

This may come in two or more posts over the next several days. The first one is mostly directed toward what you can do at bookstores. If your only bookstore is Barnes & Noble, you may be lost. Managers of the chains, unfortunately, have very little independence in what they are allowed to carry. But you can ask them.

But here goes:

First, talk to your booksellers. Get to know them. Make requests personally as well as through slips of paper called order forms. Encourage them to obtain the specific books you want. If they are receptive, ask them to carry representative work from presses you like. Let them know that SPD will tailor orders specifically for a particular bookstore and make it easy for the bookseller. But you have to persuade these booksellers NOT ONLY that these are important books, but that, MORE IMPORTANTLY, that, given a decent chance, they will sell.

Get your friends & people with similar ideas to do the same. Hearing it from one voice will not move a bookseller. Hearing from five to ten might. Hearing it from twenty will.

Then -- buy the books, & make sure those friends buy them, too. This will make the bookseller very happy, perhaps even make her trust your future recommendations. Tell your students to buy these books. Submit reviews to your local paper, especially when there is a local connection -- but, hey, the disappearance of poetry is a good story. You could even write about that and about what you & some local cohorts are trying to do about it.

You may end up negotiating regular 10 to 15% discounts on these books for members of a reading group or other association. But don't push for the discount first. Despite how much you may detest consumer culture, please help the booksellers make money by selling these books. It helps the books survive.

Hold readings at the bookstore & let the bookseller make selling the books a featured part of the readings. Have reading & discussion groups meet there if this is at all possible.

If you achieve a good relationship with the bookseller, ask if you can have 6 inches of shelf space in the store to create a "poetry books of the month" corner. And, again, get people to buy these books.

If you teach at a university, or are a student, by all means do all this (& anything more you can invent) at your university bookstore or local store which serves the university community.

Also, if you teach -- USE small press books. In seminars on contemporary writing, use several -- maybe even use small press books exclusively. In large survey classes, use some small press books. Try to get the bookstore to order directly from the small presses (stores pay no more, & the presses are able to give a smaller discount than is required by distributors or book "jobbers") or from SPD (which helps support the entire field). It's ironic that I know several people teaching at major universities, yet only twice in the last four years have i received, for Chax Press books, orders for 40 or more books for a class. Every small press, every day, is on the verge of disappearing. If they do, then we won't have to worry about poetry books being in bookstores. There will be no poetry books. In the fall of 1993, when the University of Toronto bookstore ordered $1,000 worth of bp Nichol's ART FACTS from Chax, it literally saved the press. Such orders, to the presses you care about, should occur at least a few times every year. If you teach contemporary, or even 20th Century writing, & don't use contemporary small press books (& a variety of them, not just from the biggest of the small presses), shame on you. You are contributing to the disappearance of poetry.

Why not teach a contemporary writing class which uses a book from Sun & Moon, one from O Books, one from The Figures, one from Potes & Poets, one from Chax, one from Roof? Why not use one or two of these books (& not always from the same press) next time you teach a large survey class?

I read in an earlier post that Don Byrd doesn't buy poetry; people or presses give it to him. He is then getting a marvelous service. I hope he contributes money and time to the presses he cares about, and I hope he teaches their books in his courses.

I remind myself now that I am addressing myself to a poetics list. I read poetics & theory of various kinds & enjoy this reading. I also read a lot of poetry. What are your reading habits? What are your buying habits? How much money do you spend each year on books of poetics, criticism, and theory? Consider spending an equal amount on poetry. It will help immensely.

And please don't go into your local bookstore, notice no innovative or invigorating poetry on the shelves, and complain outside the walls of the bookstore, without doing anything to try and change the situation.

Thank you for reading this.

Read poetry. Buy poetry.

Next time I'll try to convince to contribute to presses & literary organizations.

By the way, I applaud Talking Leaves, as I do Woodland Pattern in Milwaukee, Bick's Books in Washington, the bookstore at SPD in Berkeley, and only a very few others I know about. But I've found some very good books in The Bookstore in Lennox, Massachusetts, and elsewhere. I feel like someone's had a good idea when I find even one fugitive and fine poetry book on a bookstore's shelf.

And I am grateful to Charles Bernstein for bringing up the increasing role being played by on-line bookstores and informational services.

Does the book on the shelf struggle for its pages to be open, resisting the heavy air? Come to think of it, it used to keep me awake that a book spends perhaps 99% of its life closed. Now I think that once it's been opened, it is really never closed. There's a confusion of the physical with another realm, yes?

charles alexander

↑ Index

62. Robert Creeley

Bookstores etc

Thu 18 Aug 1994

Just to note a key bookstore for the southwest: Gus Blaisdell's THE LIVING BATCH just off Central across from the u/. Not only does this store have a ranging and specific collection of books for sale, it also publishes them, eg, Gene Frumkin's recent col- lection and (forthcoming) Ronald Johnson's ARK in toto. Gus also has readings throughout the year--and serves as network for that part of the country. Thus I had word of John Yau (who had read there recently), and it's also the last time and place I had chance to talk with Ed Abbey (we both were grad students at UNM in the 50s!). Anyhow, "community," "consellations," "collectives," it's always hand to mouth or head or heart. Somebody's got to be there for real.

↑ Index

63. Loss Glazier
Cite for woman as "muse"
Thu 18 Aug 1994

I'd like to know anyone could recommend a (definitive/defining) source that might provide me with a perspective on the question of the male poet invoking woman as image of perfection, inspiration, "other." That is, I've run across, in various places, allusions to the colonial, etc. nature of this question but wondered where I might find "the argument" (or arguments) (specifics?) re this "invocation" as objectionable, sexist, Romanticism (romantic vs. Romanticism?), commodifying (?) etc. Is the question one of "conquest" vs. attention to the formal qualities of the writing? Are these mutually exclusive?

↑ Index

64. Tom Mandel
Re: buy or bye poetry
Thu 18 Aug 1994

...Bick's Books in Washington" alas is gone (or in its last few days). Rod Smith, who filled Bicks' shelves, has moved on to Bridge St. Books also in DC (Georgetown); but, we have nothing like Talking Leaves or the even-more-azazing sounding Woodland Pattern (after all, TL is in a col collegetown, or doesn't this make it a little easier?). Yet, we've got a Borders, a Supercrown, heavens knows how many more; and Washington sells more books per capita than any other city in the states (so they say).

tom mandel

↑ Index

65. Jorge Guitart
poetry guerrilla
Fri 19 Aug 1994

give the gift of alternative poetry to a friend who reads mainstream poetry but doesn't know better. I mean buy a book for him or her.

i did.

My choice was THE COLD OF POETRY, by Lyn Hejenian (Sun & Moon Press 1994) which i recommend to everyone who wants to know what poetry is/can/should be.

i bought it at our stellar TALKING LEAVES.

incidentally i saw it at Borders in Mount Lebanon, Pa (a suburb of Pittsburgh) a couple of days ago. it was my first visit to a Borders and it inclined me favorably towards that outfit.

↑ Index

66. Clint Burnham
Re: plumpe Denken
Fri 19 Aug 1994

---

or: phat thots (to use some more jargon):

Tom Mandel responded carefully and generously to my rant, for which I'm grateful. Certainly, I think if there is value in poetry, or in some poetry, it lies in specificities of language and experience; the poetry I value from the sixties, say, in either Canada, the U.S., or Britain, seemed to puncture the rhetoric of a prevailing "popular" or at least wide-spread poetry; in each of these countries that was different. Raworth and Prynne don't seem to have the same stance on that rhetoric (Raworth abandoned the high for the low? to put it grossly, whilst Prynne tried to push the high & see how far it would go?), but their work and of their contemporaries that I've read seemed to be a formally-based attack on the class inflections of the angrymiddleagedmen and the faber&penguin books. In Canada the work, say, of the TISH folk, stealing from OlsonCreeleyDuncanetc, was in contradistinction to a form still popular here, that of a populist-anecdotal vernacular that offers "experience" as something which can be transmitted. (That enemy is still with us, as I said, & can be said to constitute an official poetry, but the postmodernists have had some success in the academy).

Sorry if this is turning into a mini-essay/shortpost.

I suppose the point of my fictitious Kant was to indicate I was/am trying to find a poetry that comes out of the collective not either as a timeworn lefty phrase nor as some chimera or utopia but with the same rigour as Mandel's working through the philosophical (I'd love to have a book called "Realism"):

"Light circles the other past" goes on and on and on ...

Clint

↑ Index

67. Joseph Conte
Re: Cite for woman as "muse"
Fri 19 Aug 1994

Loss:

I'm not sure when the invocation of a feminine muse became sexist commodification, but the tradition of such invocation goes back to classical literature: Menin aeide, Thea . . . Sing, Goddess the wrath of Achilles. Id est, the figuration of the imagination in the male poet was his feminine, divine, other. The trope is that the song--anything but a "conquest"--is a gift of the muse to the humble poet who would be nothing without her. Plato (I think it's in the "Ion") mocks poets as incompetents and virtueless for being only the passive receptacles of such divine (feminine) speech.

I'm not sure, really, when the invocation becomes objectionable-- or perhaps I'm missing the point of your inquiry. What's the context?

Joseph Conte

PS: As a netiquette cavil, would posters to this list please undersign their posts. It can be difficult to find the sender in the header material.

↑ Index

68. Jed Rasula

Re: Cite for woman as "muse"

Fri 19 Aug 1994

Loss: Like Joe Conte, I'm not quite clear which direction your query intends. But I did think right away of a book by Lawrence Lipking, ABANDONED WOMEN AND POETIC TRADITION (U. Chicago, 1988). I've been working for several years myself on a seemingly interminable project called "Poetry's Voice-Over," which assesse s various implications of poetic empowerment & primal scenes of such, as in Hesiod's invocation of the Helikonian muses. One section of that is coming up in the next issue of Sulfur ("Gendering the Muses"--it may be most pertinent for what you're up to); an abridged version of the whole text is forthcoming in Adalaide Morris's collection SOUND EFFECTS (U.North Carolina Press).

↑ Index

69. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: plumpe Denken & a reel

Fri 19 Aug 1994

---

real ism is em real?

charles (in memoriam bp)

↑ Index

70. Joe Amato
Re: Cite for woman as "muse"
Sat 20 Aug 1994

ah, can't resist... my favorite invocation being in byron's don juan, beginning of canto iii:

> Hail, Muse! et cetera.---

joetomato

↑ Index

71. Tom Mandel
Re: plumpe Denken & a reel
Sat 20 Aug 1994

"The past is all that can be changed."

-- Realism / p.66

tom mandel

↑ Index

72. Charles Bernstein
FROM: Joel Kuszai, "Re: poetry guerrilla" (rejected post)
Tue 23 Aug 1994

--Boundary (ID sKTkrmvl9vLD4Bx788Vzfg)

Subj: Rejected posting to [redacted]

Your message is being returned to you unprocessed because it looks like a LISTSERV command, rather than material intended for distribution to the members of the POETICS list. Please note that LISTSERV commands must ALWAYS be sent to the LISTSERV address; if it was indeed a command you were attempting to issue, please send it again to [redacted] for execution. Otherwise, please accept our apologies and try to rewrite the message with a slightly different wording - for instance, change the first word of the message, enclose it in quotation marks, insert a line of dashes at the beginning of your message, etc.

---------- Rejected message (37 lines) ----------
Date: Tue, 23 Aug 1994 13:40:41 -0400 (EDT)
From: Joel Kuszai <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: poetry guerrilla

leave a book on a shelf at borders. Sign it "William Burroughs" or "william shakespeare" or "fuck you"

I recently went back to Ann Arbor Borders for first time since they moved to new biggun location (filling up what had been multi-level Jacobsen's dept. store). And that bookstore, so unlike all the suburban sprawling Kmart affected Borders, has succombed to the god-awful trend of CDs and Multimedia and endless peripheral tourist action. I had counted on their extensive (sure university-dominated) philosophy and literarycrit selections (their poetry is all mainstream distributor-bought) for years as a small East Lansing lad with no good local bookstores. I had anticipated this move for almost a year thinking the increased space would help open up the turf. These bookstore s--like even the New St. Marks, etc., refuse "spineless"chaffbooks because they require "face-outs" to get noticed. My new trick is to take one of my little chapbooks (Meow Press) and leave it hidden someplace in the poetry section so somebody will chance upon it. I don't tell anyone and run away as soon as I can so as to not get caught...

--Boundary (ID sKTkrmvl9vLD4Bx788Vzfg)--

↑ Index

73. Roberts Mark

Re: FROM: Joel Kuszai, "Re: poetry guerrilla" (rejected post)

Wed 24 Aug 1994

> --Boundary (ID sKTkrmvl9vLD4Bx788Vzfg)
> Content-type: TEXT/PLAIN; CHARSET=US-ASCII
>
> Subj: Rejected posting to [redacted]
>
> Your message is being returned to you unprocessed because it looks like a LISTSERV command, rather than material intended for distribution to the members of the POETICS list. Please note that LISTSERV commands must ALWAYS be sent to > the LISTSERV address; if it was indeed a command you were attempting to issue, please send it again to [redacted] for execution. Otherwise, > please accept our apologies and try to rewrite the message with a slightly different wording - for instance, change the first word of the message, enclose it in quotation marks, insert a line of dashes at the beginning of your message, etc.
>
> ---------- Rejected message (37 lines) ----------
> Date: Tue, 23 Aug 1994 13:40:41 -0400 (EDT)
> From: Joel Kuszai <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: poetry guerrilla
>
> leave a book on a shelf at borders. Sign it "William Burroughs" or

> "william shakespeare" or "fuck you"
>
> I recently went back to Ann Arbor Borders for first time since they moved to new biggun location (filling up what had been multi-level Jacobsen's dept. store). And that bookstore, so unlike all the suburban sprawling Kmart affected Borders, has succombed to the god-awful trend of CDs and Multimedia and endless peripheral tourist action. I had counted on their extensive (sure university-dominated) philosophy and literarycrit selections (their poetry is all mainstream distributor-bought) for years as a small East Lansing lad with no good local bookstores. I had anticipated this move for almost a year thinking the increased space would help open up the turf. These bookstore
> s--like even the New St. Marks, etc., refuse "spineless"chaffbooks because they require "face-outs" to get noticed. My new trick is to take one of my little chapbooks (Meow Press) and leave it hidden someplace in the poetry section so somebody will chance upon it. I don't tell anyone and run away as soon as I can so as to not get caught...
>
> --Boundary (ID sKTkrmvl9vLD4Bx788Vzfg)--

Small publishes will go to any extreme!! I know of many people who will admit to stealing from major bookchains - but actually giving them books and then running away so that you don't get caught (what will they charge you with?).....

Oh well my press (Rochford Press) was once 'accused' on a writing program on Australian national radio of being prepared "to beg borrow or steal" to get books and litmags out. Which isn't so far from the truth.

I love the concept of 'poetry guerrillas'. Things (at least in Australia) seem to have settled down so much over the last couple of years that it is even getting difficult to get alternative and small press books into non mainstream bookshops who would traditionally take them (or if they do take them they will leave them under the desk and not display them - and then complain that "new poetry doesn't sell"). Lets shake things up a little/alot!!!!!

↑ Index

74. Joe Amato
selected and collected poetry...
Thu 25 Aug 1994

in the recent anthologies/small press vein: those interested might check out this month's american book review... there's a piece by rochelle ratner (who assigns poetry reviews for abr) about presumed problems associated with prematurely issuing selected/collected volumes of poets' work...

note this assertion: "The numbers might prove otherwise (a recent 'Poetry Showcase' at Poets House in New York City had nearly 1000 books on display, all published in 1993), but my own sense of the marketplace suggests that poetry publishing is at a low ebb. And what are the more respected presses publishing these days? Selected poems."

joe

↑ Index

75. Clint Burnham
Poetry gorillas
Thu 25 Aug 1994

Magilla and otherwise

Reverse shoplifting has an honourable history here in Toronto, as well. Some guys at York U in the mid-80s did a parody of university-published student mags called "In4mation", complete with letraset-crazy pages & really bad poetry & left it, with the price pencilled in the corner, at the U bookstore.

One of the ways people here have circumvented bookstores for the past 10 years is the small press book fair, which, with little publicity in the media (even the so-called alternative papers), once or twice a year offers space for 50 or so local small presses (usually of the one person in their basement apt. scenario, & some larger "literary" ones). Quite successfull. But probably only possible in a city.

By the way, I sent a message to Luigi-Bob Drake's e-zine (Taproot Review) in Cleveland and rec'd 42 single-spaced pages worth of chapbook reviews, so check it out (the address was in Bernstein's essay from last week: [redacted])

Clint Burnham

↑ Index

76. Roberts Mark
Re: poetry guerrilla
Thu 25 Aug 1994

> Date: Tue, 23 Aug 1994 13:40:41 -0400 (EDT)
> From: Joel Kuszai <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: poetry guerrilla
>
> leave a book on a shelf at borders. Sign it "William Burroughs" or "william shakespeare" or "fuck you"

> I recently went back to Ann Arbor Borders for first time since they moved to new biggun location (filling up what had been multi-level Jacobsen's dept. store). And that bookstore, so unlike all the suburban sprawling Kmart affected Borders, has succombed to the god-awful trend of CDs and Multimedia and endless peripheral tourist action. I had counted on their extensive (sure university-dominated) philosophy and literarycrit selections (their poetry is all mainstream distributor-bought) for years as a small East Lansing lad with no good local bookstores. I had anticipated this move for almost a year thinking the increased space would help open up the turf. These bookstore
> s--like even the New St. Marks, etc., refuse "spineless"chaffbooks because they require "face-outs" to get noticed. My new trick is to take one of my little chapbooks (Meow Press) and leave it hidden someplace in the poetry section so somebody will chance upon it. I don't tell anyone and run away as soon as I can so as to not get caught...
>
> --Boundary (ID sKTkrmvl9vLD4Bx788Vzfg)--

Small publishes will go to any extreme!! I know of many people who will admit to stealing from major bookchains - but actually giving them books and then running away so that you don't get caught (what will they charge you with?).....

Oh well my press (Rochford Press) was once 'accused' on a writing program on Australian national radio of being prepared "to beg borrow or steal" to get books and litmags out. Which isn't so far from the truth.

I love the concept of 'poetry guerrillas'. Things (at least in Australia) seem to have settled down so much over the last couple of years that it is even getting difficult to get alternative and small press books into non mainstream bookshops who would traditionally take them (or if they do take them they will leave them under the desk and not display them - and then complain that "new poetry doesn't sell"). Lets shake things up a little/alot!!!!!

Mark Roberts Ph 02 [redacted] Student Information & Systems Office Fx 02 [redacted] University of New South Wales Australia

↑ Index

77. Alan Golding

Cite for woman as "muse"

Thu 25 Aug 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Loss--Re your question about the muse, there's some useful stuff in the first chapter of Mary K. DeShazer's Inspiring Women: Reimagining the Muse (NY:

Pergamon, 1986)--that chapter essentially offers a historical overview of male invocations of the muse and of the issues those invocations raise.

Alan Golding

↑ Index

78. John Keeling
hello and update
Tue 30 Aug 1994

Marjorie:

Just want to touch base with you. Hope all is well in LA.

CSU Summer Arts was fantastic and Robert and Susan were wonderful. I still haven't received a compact disc of my multimedia project, but I expect it to arrive very soon. I've managed to acquire many of the software programs we learned this summer, as well as some more sophisticated multimedia-programming packages, so I hope to keep working with the technology in the future. I hope, and this may be naive, to develop projects in some of my courses this year--for example, I already have the programming skills to put together something like McGann's Rossetti Project.

This summer has been quite eventful. I started working with Plugged-In, a volunteer organization that brings technology into low-income areas in East Palo Alto, Redwood City, and Menlo Park. I also have started collaborating with some artists from the CSU program on a documentary on the Winchester mansion in San Jose. On the downside, my wife received some bad medical news, and we were forced to move because of the increasingly violent drug traffic in our old neighborhood. We relocated to Redwood City in August.

Look forward to getting the Quals behind me. Started reviewing a couple weeks ago, much later start than I had planned, lets just say I took a Wordsworthian approach to my preparation (thinking of how Wordsworth went hiking in the Alps the summer before his university exams--my Simplon pass is the bridge from Palo Alto to E Palo Alto).

Will fill you in on more details when you come to town. Is there anything I/we need to do with regard to the independent study? no paperwork, etc.?

Sincerely,

John

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

September 1994

18 messages · Wed 7 Sep 1994 – Wed 28 Sep 1994

September is a thin month, and I have chosen not to pad it. Eighteen letters — the fewest of any month I have set — arrive across three weeks of early autumn with the air of a room half-emptied for the new term: a reading announced, a video screening, a compact disc advertised from the Ear, and, threaded among them, the last embers of the summer's long argument.

Peter Quartermain rakes those embers with a weary litany — "priesthoods, anthologies, bookshops" — as if to concede that the questions of July and August will not be settled by anyone here, and perhaps ought not to be. Michael Boughn supplies the month's mordant flourish, relaying that poets have been "officially declared 'miserable'" by some authority or other, a verdict the list receives with its usual blend of umbrage and delight.

It is a caretaker's month, the list keeping its own lights on between larger seasons — and there is a quiet fitness in finding, tucked into one of these notes, a paper newly lodged at the Electronic Poetry Center. Even in its idlest weeks the archive was busy becoming itself. I have gathered the eighteen as carefully as I would have gathered ninety, on the principle that a quiet month, faithfully kept, tells you something the loud ones cannot.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 18 in all.

WRITERS

Arts, Mn Center For Book 6, 9
Bernstein, Charles 12
Billitteri, Carla 7, 8
Boughn, Michael 4
Bowering, George 10, 11
Braman, Sandra 1
Byrd, Don 14
Funkhouser, Chris 13
Glazier, Loss 2
Mnamna 17
Quartermain, Peter 3
Reese, Marshall H. 15, 16
Sherry, James 5
Sysop 18

NAMES MENTIONED

Arnold, Bob 4
Auden, W. H. 4
Berkeley, Michael 15, 16
Bernstein, Emma 2
Blaser, Robin 11
Castro, Michael 16
Clark, Emilie 3
Clark, Thomas A. 3
Columbus, Christopher 18
Dickinson, Emily 3
Dillon, Richard 12
Edwards, Ken 3
Eigner, Larry 3
Enslin, Ted 3
Fenton, James 3
Fisher, Allen 3
Fisher, Ann 3
Foust, Graham 7
Friedlander, Benjamin 7
Gburek, Jeff 7
Griffiths, Bill 3
Halsey, Alan 3
Hartman, Charles O. 18
Ignatow, David 18
London, Frank 3, 16
Mac Low, Jackson 18
Mottram, Eric 3
Pacific, Asian 15
Phillips, Beth 5
Plath, Sylvia 4
Reese, Marshall H. 15, 16
Riley, Peter 3
Shakespeare, William 3
Sinclair, John 3
Sparrow, John 18
Timmons, Jeffrey 17
Watts, Charles 3

CONCEPTS

Anthologies 3, 5, 6
Archives and libraries 2, 3, 15
Autobiography 16
Bookstores 3, 5, 6, 9
Censorship 5
Creative writing pedagogy 12
Disability 15
Electronic poetry and hypertext 2
Erasure 12
Feminism 16
Film 15
Letters and correspondence 3
Little magazines 3, 7, 13, 18
Mourning and loss 2
Nature 15
Performance and the poetry reading 7, 8
Poetics 1, 2, 9
Print vs. digital 6, 9
Queer poetics 3
Reading announcements 12
Reviewing and criticism 3, 14, 16, 18
Software and code 5
The academy 3, 4, 15
The body 18
The listserv 1, 2, 18
Translation 7
Visual art 15

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 18 in all.

7 SEP 1994
1. Sandra Braman — Re: mundanity
2. Loss Glazier — Re: mundanity

11 SEP 1994
3. peter quartermain — Anthologies priesthoods and bookstores (still!)

14 SEP 1994
4. Michael Boughn — Miserable poets
5. James Sherry — Re: Anthologies priesthoods and bookstores (still!)
6. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: Anthologies priesthoods and bookstores (still!)

15 SEP 1994
7. Carla Billitteri — poetry reading
8. Carla Billitteri — poetry reading p.s.
9. Mn Center For Book Arts — found & lost

19 SEP 1994
10. George Bowering — Re: Africa
11. George Bowering — Re: Miserable poets

25 SEP 1994
12. Charles Bernstein — LIVE AT THE EAR (ad for CD)
13. Chris Funkhouser — Re: LIVE AT THE EAR
14. Don Byrd — (no subject)

26 SEP 1994
15. Marshall H. Reese — Nora Ligorano & Marshall Reese video screening
16. Marshall H. Reese — Eunice Lipton readings in SF & LA

27 SEP 1994
17. mnamna — info on your discussion

28 SEP 1994
18. sysop — ANNOUNCMENT

1. Sandra Braman
Re: mundanity
Wed 7 Sep 1994

Charles -- Just back from 6 weeks in South Africa that included some of the most extraordinary experiences of my life, wandering around the thornveldt of KwaZulu.... How does one get a copy of your paper "Provisional Institutions: Alternative Presses and Poetic Innovation" mentioned in an August note of yours to the UB Poetics list? Haven't forgotten your suggestion to throw a net entry onto the list, as things settle down here will try to do so thoughtfully. Sandra Braman

↑ Index

2. Loss Glazier
Re: mundanity
Wed 7 Sep 1994

Sandra,

This paper is available at the Electronic Poetry Center, in the "Library," under Bernstein.

(If you need instructions I'll be glad to send them to you directly.)

Loss Glazier
[redacted]

> Charles -- Just back from 6 weeks in South Africa that included some of the most extraordinary experiences of my life, wandering around the thornveldt of KwaZulu....
> How does one get a copy of your paper "Provisional Institutions: Alternative Presses and Poetic Innovation" mentioned in an August note of yours to the UB Poetics list?
> Haven't forgotten your suggestion to throw a net entry onto the list, as things settle down here will try to do so thoughtfully.
> Sandra Braman

↑ Index

3. peter quartermain
Anthologies priesthoods and bookstores (still!)
Sun 11 Sep 1994

I've been off-line for the last six weeks or more, so I'm probably flogging a dead horse. But I've always been a bit surprised that ANY bookstore would sell to such a specialised taste (passion?) as poetry, especially given the brouhaha with which our institutions (of whatever persuasion, and to one of which I belong) surround it. As Charles Watts told everyone, the only decent (poetry) bookstore in this part of the world, Proprioception Books, has closed its doors (but is still there on-line. The university bookstores in this town are pitiable if not offensive in their determination to _sell_ books (which means that for them the whole point of running a book shop is to move the inventory, at a profit, not keep a book _store_, book resource, for readers to browse in; the textbook and the T-shirt is all they care about); and the trade bookshops know that poetry is not their bread and butter, so as a rule their offerings (except for more or less conventional Standards [Shakespeare, the Todd Emily Dickinson, Rod McKuen], and the occasional local book stocked on compassionate grounds) are dull, more or less Hallmark Cards.

But (unlike Don Byrd) about 60% of what I spend on books goes on poetry, about 10% on journals and magazines -- this is because the University of British Columbia Library tends to buy the work of dead rather than living poets (which makes life very hard for students; it also makes anthologies, including those so much abused on this e-mail the last month or three, very useful and indeed valuable resources indeed; ANY kind of water is welcome in a desert). I spend less than 10% (more like 3%) on criticism and literary theory (I have a hard time indeed reading either, but the library buys lots [mainstream]). Some of the poetry I buy is from local used-book stores (very good ones), or when I travel; most is mail order. My favourite of these is Am Here Books, P.O.Box 574, Philo, California 95466, which only sells poetry -- the last catalogue as I recall was about 2500 titles by poets last-name-initial-E; three pages of Theodore Enslin, about the same of Larry Eigner. They're weak on little press stuff that's still in print (go to SBD) but really good on hard to find stuff. Unlike most bookshops, they seem to care more for the living than for the dead. With the American dollar costing about $1.40 Canadian, they are expensive to anyone north of the 49th; in yankee dollar terms their prices are very good, occasionally astonishingly cheap. They also run catalogues of Little Magazines, one letter of the alphabet at a time. The best British (exclusively poetry) booksellers are Alan Halsey, 22 Broad Street, Hay-on-Wye, Hay-on-Wye, Nr. Hereford; and Peter Riley, 27 Sturton Street, Cambridge CB1 2QG.

As for the whole question of priesthoods, anthologies, bookshops, and markets, I'd only add that I have been told (and I believe it to be true) that Rupert Murdoch, Australian much loved by Margaret Thatcher, owner of and despot over those extremes of the British Press, the (now more-or-less downmarket) _London Times_ and the _Sun_, has (as proprietor of Paladin Books, a branch of Harper-Collins) ordered that all poetry books published by Paladin be destroyed by which he means burned (and therefore NOT sold off or remaindered) immediately -- these books include _The New British Poetry_ edited by Gillian Allnut, Fred D'Aguiar, Ken Edwards, and Eric Mottram; and the three volumes so far published of the _Paladin Re/Active Anthologies_ (edited by Iain Sinclair): Volume 1 is _Future Exiles: 3 London Poets_ (Allen Fisher, Bill Griffiths, Brian Catling); Volume 3 is _The Tempers of Hazard_ (Thomas A. Clark, Barry MacSweeney, Chris Torrance) -- I don't know what the second volume is. Really generous selections: 150 pages of Fisher, for instance; 130 of Clark. There's no doubt in my mind that these books could have been enormously influential in shaping possible British poetries, with a real chance of breaking through the moribundity of the _Times Literary Supplement_ and the Schools Examination Boards, Antony Thwaite and James Fenton and their dreadful ilk, but it is clear that the market for girlie pictures in the newspapers is more lucrative, along with gay bashing, paki bashing, and similar cherished English customs.

It's all very depressing (whether what I hear about Murdoch is true or not --can anyone out there confirm or refute?); I draw comfort of a sort from the reflection that the letters of William Cowper in the closing years of the eighteenth century (which I've just been reading) reflect a poetry scene in most particulars scarcely distinguishable from that within which we live, though on a somewhat smaller scale. The sheer enthusiasm of my students for the work of the living, no matter where found, especially for the turbulent and disrespectful (no matter what specie and species), suggests that (like love) it don't matter too much [if at all] who you read, but how. Mischief and passion never made money, but they do find and found their own life.

End of sermon.

Peter Quartermain

↑ Index

4. Michael Boughn
Miserable poets
Wed 14 Sep 1994

I thought the latest from the Toronto Globe and Mail might be of interest out there:

> "Last year, poets were officially declared 'miserable' by Kentucky University psychiatrist Arnold Ludwig, who studied 1,000 eminent people, including poets W.H. Auden, Rupert Brooke and Sylvia Plath. Poets are five times more likely to be depressed than scientists, he found, and 15 times more prone to the condition than soldiers."

(Could it be from watching what the scientists and soldiers are up to?)

And then, to cheer you up:

"Seiko, the Japanese watch company, has repaired England's most famous church clock, on The Old Vicarage of Grantchester. In 1912, Rupert Brooke immortalized the motionless dial with: 'Stands the church clock at ten to three? / And is there honey still for tea?' Two years after the First World War, the clock started working again, reports The Observer, but it failed again in 1992. (Old timers recall that, in 1910, Brooks' clock had actually stalled at a quarter to eight -- but there are fewer rhymes for 'eight.'"

Smile, everybody.

↑ Index

5. James Sherry
Re: Anthologies priesthoods and bookstores (still!)
Wed 14 Sep 1994

In reply Peter's message about bookstores, a discussion which I have not been following nad hence might repeat what someone else has said:

Why do we need bookstores or for that matter printers, binders, shippers, distributors, jobbers or any of that other market infrastructure for delivery of the text to readers.

Not that we need to do away with them entirely. They serve a purpose for books which fulfill the volume sales requirements of the market in terms of margin and visibility. They can deliver, because of the mature technology, a vast array of difficult and lengthy materials. What they cannot do is fulfill the purposes of writers whose books only sell a few copies.

As an alternative, books can be delivered direct to the user using this carrier as a base. We will have "bugs" to work out and ergonomic issues to improve, but at least we will move toward liberating ourselves as writers and readers from a market place which as Peter points out is restricting our access.

I don't really think the issue of whether Murdoch actually pulled the plug on some of "our" work is that critical. The restrictions, the censorship is based in the market structure and the market-place model.

Besides, with desktop publishing and hyper text software we can extend our range on the screen in a way we couldn not easily control on the page.

I hope to put together a program in the near future with the help of Patrick Phillips and others at Segue to look at the possibilities of not chasing the chimera of acceptance by a market oriented to mass sales and censorship of alternative discourses. Grist is a good step. This list is a good step. Now let's go the next step and look carefully at the issue of the necessity of moveable type.

↑ Index

6. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: Anthologies priesthoods and bookstores (still!)

Wed 14 Sep 1994

Ah, the sermon, a form of the poem I rather like. Thank you, Peter. I know about Am Here, but would love to hear from others about mail order sources for books which are very good. Isn't Asphodel in Ohio primarily a mail order shop?

One other note, of an entirely different order. I've been an advocate here and elsewhere for the book as a carrier of meaning, i.e. the book in its form, shape, design, materials, etc., as a partner with its text. There aren't many working in this area, and now there is one less. Steven Kranz, in Tucson, Arizona, who began as an intern with Chax Press about six years ago and ended up helping with many books, newsletters, etc., and whose own Ring Multiples put out several marvelous books to view and, more importantly, think about, recently took his own life. He left a unique body of writing, drawings, and book arts works which, unfortunately, not many have seen. He shall be missed. And just yesterday I also heard that another book artist, Kent Kazuboski, in Philadelphia, who made and illustrated several quite wonderful books by various printers, also took his own life.

I know that most on this list will not know these two, which is also unfortunate. But I still thought their passing needed to be noted. The last book, very small in size, sent to me by Steven Kranz, had a vellum-like pink and white wrapper and was printed on a laser printer (Steve was fond of making books in very inexpensive and quick ways) yet was, in a unique way, both quirky and elegant.

Its title is PRESSURIZED LINES, and it presented the following text, two sections per recto page, with versos blank --

testing high pressure
solenoid actuations
late one Friday night

flow & no-flow: the motto of the Hydraulic Systems Engineers

the test chamber, the test stand, the flowmeters, the pressure transducer

photographs should dhow
any visible damage
the valve has suffered

allow two minutes
maximum for system to stabilize pressure

the isolation
mounts are resilient & triple redundant

no degradation
of slide & sleeve during the endurance testing

install pinlock &
verify actuation
at flowmeter five

revise this data sheet to also measure &
record valve leakage

maintain conditions & measure ambient noise levels in the booth

the fatigue test &
the vibration test & then
the high impact shock

the final total system calibration is now in compliance

fasteners shall be torqued & lockwired as seen
in the large drawing

the valve in question
incorporates features which
are not specified

no evidence of external leakage other than a slight wetting

shift the selctor
valve & verify valve shift continuity

this particular valve design incorporates stroke over-travel

identify how
the lowest volume is to be determined here

the check valve has a cracking pressure of 2 to 8 psig

the transient noise acceptance criteria
are stated herein

the steady state &
transient structureborne noise
tests are almost done

zero flow cannot
be quantified nor can it
even be measured

Goodbye, Steve

love, charles

↑ Index

7. Carla Billitteri
poetry reading
Thu 15 Sep 1994

P * O * E * T * R * Y R * E * A * D * I * N * G

JEFF GBUREK

&

LEE FOUST

at the fabled Central Park Grill
on Main St near Amherst

Saturday the 17th of September 7:30 p.m.

Jeff Gburek of Buffalo & more recently the Bay Area & Florence has published his work in Dark Ages Clasp the Daisy Root,
I Am a Child, H2SO4, and in his own magazine
'Aql. With Benjamin Friedlander he has authored two pamphlets, Myth & Prophecy

Lee Foust of S.F. & now New York City recently finished the first novel in a trilogy to be called La Divina Vendetta. He is also a writer of poetry and an intermittent translator. His prose has appeared in 'Aql. An unattributed version of Jabes's essay on Dante appeared in the final issue of Dark Ages Clasp the Daisy Root

Please come. As ever, there will be chicken wings after the bash.

↑ Index

8. Carla Billitteri
poetry reading p.s.
Thu 15 Sep 1994

---

the cost, as usual, is $3

↑ Index

9. Mn Center For Book Arts found & lost
Thu 15 Sep 1994

This message begins as a response to Peter Quartermain's "sermon" on bookstores. Unfortunately it was returned to me, as I had some trouble with the local e-mail service & my phone lines here. If, by chance, this did actually reach the poetics list, and I am now duplicating myself, I apologize - - -

Ah, the sermon, a form of the poem I rather like. Thank you, Peter. I know about Am Here, but would love to hear from others about mail order sources for books which are very good. Isn't Asphodel in Ohio primarily a mail order shop?

One other note, of an entirely different order. I've been an advocate here and elsewhere for the book as a carrier of meaning, i.e. the book in its form, shape, design, materials, etc., as a partner with its text. There aren't many working in this area, and now there is one less. Steven Kranz, in Tucson, Arizona, who began as an intern with Chax Press about six years ago and ended up helping with many books, newsletters, etc., and whose own Ring Multiples put out several marvelous books to view and, more importantly, think about, recently took his own life. He left a unique body of writing, drawings, and book arts works which, unfortunately, not many have seen. He shall be missed. And just yesterday I also heard that another book artist, Kent Kazuboski, in Philadelphia, who made and illustrated several quite wonderful books by various printers, also took his own life.

I know that most on this list will not know these two, which is also unfortunate. But I still thought their passing needed to be noted. The last book, very small in size, sent to me by Steven Kranz, had a vellum-like pink and white wrapper and was printed on a laser printer (Steve was fond of making books in very inexpensive and quick ways) yet was, in a unique way, both quirky and elegant. Its title is PRESSURIZED LINES, and it presented the following text, two sections per recto page, with versos blank --

testing high pressure
    solenoid actuations
late one Friday night

flow & no-flow: the motto of the Hydraulic Systems Engineers

the test chamber, the test stand, the flowmeters, the pressure transducer

photographs should dhow
    any visible damage
the valve has suffered

allow two minutes
    maximum for system to stabilize pressure

the isolation
mounts are resilient & triple redundant

no degradation
of slide & sleeve during the endurance testing

install pinlock &
verify actuation
at flowmeter five

revise this data
sheet to also measure &
record valve leakage

maintain conditions & measure ambient noise
levels in the booth

the fatigue test &
the vibration test & then
the high impact shock

the final total system calibration is now in compliance

fasteners shall be torqued & lockwired as seen
in the large drawing

the valve in question
incorporates features which
are not specified

no evidence of external leakage other
than a slight wetting

shift the selctor
valve & verify valve shift
continuity

this particular valve design incorporates stroke over-travel

identify how
the lowest volume is to be determined here

the check valve has a cracking pressure of 2 to 8 psig

the transient noise
acceptance criteria
are stated herein

the steady state &
transient structureborne noise
tests are almost done

zero flow cannot
be quantified nor can it
even be measured

Goodbye, Steve

love, charles

↑ Index

10. George Bowering
Re: Africa
Mon 19 Sep 1994

Hey, Sandra, wow, Africa, eh? I read today about a new elephant safari outfit in Zimbwabe. You shoot the elephants but what you shoot ythem with is capsuls of food covering that go splat and leave orange splats on the elephants. I wonder whether they get used to it and just walk calmly by with people splatting them. It'll get too easy. These are people who want to be Hemingway and Cousteau ayt the same time. Maybe we could outfit the US Army with orange splat guns and they can hold their annual invasions of small countries with orange splat guns! Hmmm, as we say up here.

↑ Index

11. George Bowering
Re: Miserable poets
Mon 19 Sep 1994

Michael, yr clippings about poets did cheer me up because today I have been reading poems about Maud Gonne. Needed a pick me up. But I will be going to hear Blaser in a bar tonight. I will probably have a hangover while teaching tomorrow. I'll consider that the fault of serial verse.

↑ Index

12. Charles Bernstein
LIVE AT THE EAR (ad for CD)
Sun 25 Sep 1994

---

n o w a v a i l a b l e

LIVE AT THE EAR

edited by Charles Bernstein

a compact disc from Elemenope Productions / Oracular Laboratories Recordings conceived and produced by Richard Dillon

Digitally remastered archival recordings of 13 poets reading at New York's Ear Inn, with a 32 page booklet including substantial excerpts from the texts of the poems, photos, and brief statements from the poets.

Ideal for personal collections as well as for classroom use and course adoption.

Contents:

1. SUSAN HOWE reading from "Speeches at the Barrier," in Europe of Trusts. Recorded October 22, 1983. (6:41)

2. RON SILLIMAN reading from OZ. Recorded April 12, 1986. (6:01)

3. LESLIE SCALAPINO reading from "bum series" in Way. Recorded December 13, 1986. (4:52)

4. TED GREENWALD reading from You Bet. Recorded January 31, 1981. (6:05)

5. ROSMARIE WALDROP reading from Reproduction of Profiles. Recorded December 15, 1984. (6:01)

6. ALAN DAVIES reading "Shared Sentences" from Active 24 Hours. Recorded February 4, 1989. (4:42)

7. BARRETT WATTEN reading from Under Erasure. Recorded January 2, 1993. (5:45)

8. ERICA HUNT reading from "cold war breaks," in Local History. Recorded May 20, 1990. (4:28)

9. BRUCE ANDREWS reading "I Knew the Signs by Their Tents." Recorded March 12, 1988. (5:43)

10. HANNAH WEINER reading from Spoke. Recorded October 10, 1983. (5:40)

11. STEVE McCAFFERY reading from "The Curve to its Answer," variant in Theory of Sediment. Recorded January 11, 1985. (5:10)

12. ANN LAUTERBACH reading "Opening Day" from Clamor. Recorded January 4, 1992. (4:38)

13. CHARLES BERNSTEIN reading from "Dark City," in Dark City. Recorded January 4, 1992. (6:44)

HOW TO ORDER:

Send $15.95 plus $2 p&h to Oracular Laboratory Recordings
Suite 2720 Gateway Towers
Pittsburg, PA 15222

for COD orders or further information call [redacted] or fax [redacted]

↑ Index

13. Chris Funkhouser
Re: LIVE AT THE EAR
Sun 25 Sep 1994

Charles,

Thanks for the notice. I look forward to hearing the disc.

Wanted to let you (& others out there) know that we're working to make a cd-rom part of this years LITTLE MAGAZINE (the lit journal out of Albany) & are looking for work from anyone who thinks they might have it ready to go in this format.

If you've got ideas or suggestions, please get in touch.

Thanks again, Chris Funkhouser / [redacted]

↑ Index

14. Don Byrd
(no subject)
Sun 25 Sep 1994

Chris--

do you know what happened to the copy of Stanford Hum Review I gave to someone to xerox..

db

↑ Index

15. Marshall H. Reese

Nora Ligorano & Marshall Reese video screening

Mon 26 Sep 1994

Bay Area Video Screening

7:30 PM, Wednesday, October 5, 1994
Pacific Film Archives/University Art Museum
2621 Durant Avenue
(Between College Avenue & Bowditch Street)
Admission: $5.50 -- Discounts for Senior Citizens, UC Berkeley students & People with Disabilities
Box Office opens one hour before screening

For more information phone: [redacted]

New York artists Nora Ligorano & Marshall Reese will present a retrospective of their videotapes 7:30 PM, Wednesday, October 5, 1994 at the Pacific Film Archive, University Art Museum, Berkeley, CA.

Nora Ligorano and Marshall Reese have been far-ranging in their assaults on the right-wing culture war, the tyrannical nature of media, and the pall of consumerism. Videotapes, installation, sculpture, and expanded books have proved to be formidable tools for their many collaborative projects. Straight from their residency at the Djerassi Foundation, Ligorano/Reese will present videoworks and documentation covering recent installations, including their 45-foot photo/video mural at the Donnell Library in Manhattan.

Examining the role of the artist in contemporary society, Acid Migration of Culture (1994) transformed the library's facade into an enormous dictionary of artistic terms.

An earlier work, The Bible Belt (1992) featured a specially prepared videotape encased in a doctored Bible. In this tape a televangelist hawks consumerist virtues and a belt emblazoned with bold letters spelling "JESUS."

Black Holes/Heavenly Bodies -- HELL (1982, 15 min.) is a high-tech nightmare in which violence and mediocrity are the potent background noise. Several other works will be exhibited, along with their newest 30 Aphorisms (1994, 3 min.) an image processed look at language and the abstraction of images.

The artists will be present and will also show examples of their limited edition artists books and slides from their work in progress The Corona Palimpsest.

-- Steve Seid, University Art Museum/Pacific Film Archive

↑ Index

16. Marshall H. Reese
Eunice Lipton readings in SF & LA
Mon 26 Sep 1994

Eunice Lipton Readings

EUNICE LIPTON reads from her book ALIAS OLYMPIA: A Woman's Search for Manet's Notorius Model and Her Own Desire, new in paperback (Meridian/Penguin) on:

Sept. 29 BLACK OAK BOOKS, 7:30 PM, 1491 Shattuck Ave., Berkeley, CA [redacted]

Oct. 2 A DIFFERENT LIGHT, 7:30 PM, 489 Castro St., San Francisco, CA [redacted]

Oct. 4 SAINT MARY'S COLLEGE, 7 PM, Br. Kyran A.V. Room, Moraga, CA

Oct. 6 SISTERHOOD BOOKS, 7 PM, 1351 Westwood Blvd., Los Angeles, CA [redacted]

ALIAS OLYMPIA has been hailed by The New York Times as a "wonderfully digressive blend of art history and autobiography," by Lucy Lippard in the Woman's Review of Books as, "The most original book to emerge from myh feminist art generation," by The Financial Times of London as "a clever, unorthodox, enthralling book which combines criticism and fiction in elegant symbiosis."

↑ Index

17. mnamna
info on your discussion
Tue 27 Sep 1994

To whom it may concern,

I'd like to be part of your discussion if possible and wanted to know where it is I could hook up with it. I'm mailing cause I'm not real sure how to get there otherwise. Thanks

Jeffrey Timmons
mnamna

↑ Index

18. sysop
ANNOUNCMENT
Wed 28 Sep 1994

Please post the following announcement to your list or publication.
Thanks,
[redacted]

GRIST ON-LINE NEWSLETTER

You may receive the first Grist On-Line Poetry Newsletter devoted to publisher news and the sale of poetry publications by sending an e-mail message to:

[redacted] (30.1k ASCII Text), or [redacted] (13.7k self-extracting zipped ASCII Text)

A special offer from Light and Dust Books and 20% discount on selected Black Sparrow Press titles are among the special offers in the first issue. It also contains previously unpublished poems by David Ignatow and James McCrary.

GRIST ON-LINE BULLETIN BOARD

The Media Lists at Grist On-Line BBS contain more than 3,500 poetry, experimental fiction and related criticism and non-fiction books on paper from independent and trade publishers as well as works in a variety of other formats--files for downloading, files on diskette, CDRoms, Videos. All may be ordered online with VISA or Mastercard. The BBS may be accessed at [redacted] twenty-four hours a day.

If you have published poetry, we would like to invite you or your publisher to send lists, catalogs or review copies of books so that your titles may be included in the Grist On-Line Media Lists.
Send to:
Grist On-Line,
P.O. Box 20805,
Columbus Circle Station,
NY, NY 10023-1496.

Or you might be interested in our ability to charge for downloading files of any type or format. This means that you can offer files of your poems or other works for sale (or for free) in the GRIST On-Line Media Stores. Write to [redacted] for more information about this possibility.

GRIST On-Line #6 (the magazine) will feature work by Jackson Mac Low and Charles O. Hartman and will be available shortly.

If you want to receive the Newsletter, the Magazine, or Announcements automatically as they are issued, send an e-mail message to [redacted] saying in the body of the message:

subscribe Newsletter (your e-mail address) and/or subscribe Magazine and/or subscribe Announcements

To discontinue any of the above, say unsubscribe.

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

October 1994

96 messages · Wed 12 Oct 1994 – Mon 31 Oct 1994

October brings the world to the very edge of the room and no further. Aristide is flown home to Port-au-Prince behind a wall of American soldiers, the midterms gather like weather, and the list — which can see all of it — elects instead to spend the month at war over a single adjective. I would call this perverse if I did not find it, on reflection, the most honest thing about them.

The adjective is "experimental," and the fighting starts when Michael Boughn pulls a thread he plainly suspects will unravel the whole garment, asking whether anyone can explain what the concept even means. He offers to trade it in — "Innovative, maybe," he proposes — and within a day some sixty messages are pouring through the wire under headers that mutate from "experiwhat?" to "absurd category" to "Failed Experiments."

Jorge Guitart supplies the season's best joke, noting that "experimental drug testing is legal" while its livelier cousin is not, and wondering whether experimenting with the lexicon might be actionable as well. Ron Silliman, with rather less patience for the exercise, brings the gavel down: "The category IS absurd," he writes — of "language" poetry and "mainstream" alike — the emphatic capital his own.

What reads from outside as a squabble over a label is really the list interrogating its own name for itself — whether the word denotes a method, a marketing category, or merely a wish. The argument draws Alan Sondheim toward the medium, others toward Susan Howe's visual poetics and the plain question of who the audience is; but it circles always back to the word. This is the community taking its own temperature by the one instrument it trusts, which is language held under pressure.

By month's end the combatants have exhausted neither the subject nor themselves; the thread merely thins into November, unresolved, which is the only way an argument of this kind ever ends. I have set the letters in their true order, returned each correspondent's address and telephone to privacy, and left the fight intact. Posterity may decide whether they were quarrelling about poetry or about a word — my own suspicion, gently held, is that on this list there was never the slightest difference.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 96 in all.

WRITERS

Amato, Joe 25, 26
Arts, Mn Center For Book 5, 15, 68, 95
B, Sandra 62
Bernstein, Charles 3
Boughn, Michael 12, 24
Bowering, George 65, 75, 91, 92, 93, 94
Braman, Sandra 10, 27, 54, 60
Byrd, Donald J. 76
Cabri, Louis 19
Cayley, John 11
CHRISTOPH, FUNKHOUSER 50, 52
Drake, Robert 38, 69, 78
Evans, Steve 77, 87
Golding, Alan 43
Green, Tony 35, 55, 56, 80
Guitart, Jorge 14, 20, 41
Hacker, Log 48
Harrison, Robert A 4
Jena 85
Kat 83
Kelly, Robert 31
Kuszai, Joel 7, 36
Lavender, William 58, 70
Lawrence, Nick 28
Lazer, Hank 82
Lindberg, Kathryne 45
Mandel, Tom 57, 66, 88, 89
Mark, Roberts 23, 37
McHale, Justin T 18
Nasdor, Marc 30, 40
Perloff, Marjorie 81
Phillips, Patrick 44, 49, 67, 72, 74, 96
Reiner, Christopher 2
Schultz, Susan 53
Sherwood, Kenneth 86
Shoemaker, Steven Howard 17, 29, 42, 51, 73, 79
Silliman, Ron 39, 59, 71, 84
Sondheim, Alan 13, 16, 21, 22, 34, 46, 61, 64
Spahr, Juliana 8, 9
Timmons, Jeffrey 63, 90
Tuma, Keith 47
Wallace, Mark 6, 32, 33
Watts, Charles 1

NAMES MENTIONED

Abbott, Steve 39
Adams, Henry 57
Adorno, Theodor 1
Albon, George 7
Alexander, Charles 5
Americans, Asian 29, 34
And, Miekal 38
Andrews, Bruce 4, 7, 9, 28, 39, 50
Arendt, Hannah 1
Armantrout, Rae 87
Ashbery, John 40
Barwin, Gary 38
Basinski, Michael 7, 9
Bataille, George 70
Baudelaire, Charles 38
Beckett, Tom 9, 38
Bellamy, Dodie 8, 9
Benjamin, Walter 1
Bennett, John M. 4, 38
Berkeley, Michael 1, 7
Bernstein, Emma 7, 10, 39
Berry, Jake 4, 38
Bishop, Elizabeth 7, 9
Blake, William 1
Blaser, Robin 1
Blau, Rachel 43
Bloch, Julia 1
Blumenreich, Julia 9
Boughn, Mike 12, 17, 21
Brook, James 37
Brown, Ann 9, 39, 84
Browne, Colin 9
Burns, Elizabeth 9
Byrd, Donald J. 76
Byrne, Ted 1
Byron, Philip 38, 46, 76
Byrum, John 4, 9, 38
Cafe, Poets 50
Catullus 76
Clare, John 57
Clark, Cheryl 32
Clemente, Francesco 4
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 76
Coolidge, Clark 4, 46
Cooper, Paula 50, 52
Creeley, Robert 46
Daley, Ryan 39
Darragh, Tina 9
Davidson, Michael 39
Davis, Jordan 38
Deleuze, Gilles 1
Dennis, Michael 38
Dickinson, Emily 1, 76, 82
Djuric, Dubravka 7, 8
Donne, John 76

Doyle, Erica 9
Duncan, Andrew 1
Duncan, Robert 50
Dutton, Paul 4
Edgar, Chris 4
Eigner, Larry 40
Einstein, Albert 1
Elena, Maria 9
Emerson, Claudia 1
England, Amy 8
Evers, Larry 5
Fischer, Norman 5, 13
Fitterman, Robert 7
Foster, Edward 6
Foucault, Michel 1
Fox, Skip 4
Fraser, Kathleen 5
Fraser, Simon 1
Friedlander, Benjamin 7
Ganick, Peter 6, 9
Gartung, Karl 4
Gevirtz, Susan 8, 9
Gilbert, Alan 39
Ginsberg, Allan 46
Ginsberg, Allen 2
Glass, Jesse 4
Goldstein, Mark 50
Graham, Jorie 39
Green, Frank 38
Greene, Jonathan 39
Grenier, Bob 39
Hansen, Jefferson 9
Heidegger, Martin 36
Hejinian, Lyn 2, 5, 7, 86
Henning, Barbara 9
Holman, Bob 50
Holt, Henry 50
Homer 76
Hoover, Edgar 76
Howe, Susan 43
Inman, Peter 4
Jackson, Jesse 72, 96
Jacobs, Ken 9
Johnson, Mark 7
Joris, Pierre 7
Joyce, Michael 9
Karmin, Jennifer 9
Keats, John 76
Kerouac, Jack 2
Kim, Myung Mi 5
Kingsbury, Anne 4, 5
Kocik, Robert 87
Kostelanetz, Richard 4, 59
Kushner, Tony 50
Lavender, Bill 9, 58, 70
Lloyd, Frank 50
London, Frank 11, 50
Mac Low, Jackson 4, 5, 72
Lubeski, Lori 9
Luoma, Bill 38
Lyons, Kimberly 4, 9
Mackey, Nathaniel 5, 38
Maclow, Jackson 89
Magee, Kevin 9
Mallarmé, Stéphane 1, 82
Marsh, William 9
Mayer, Jane 1, 40, 46
Melville, Pierre 1, 76
Messerli, Doug 76
Miriam, Erica 1
Murphy, Sheila E. 5
Myles, Eileen 4, 38
Nelson, Gale 9
Nichols, Travis 1
Norman, Peter 6
Notley, Alice 40, 46
Olson, Charles 1
Oppen, George 17, 21, 40, 73, 74
Osman, Jena 8, 9, 85
Pacific, Asian 49
Padin, Clemente 4
Palmer, Michael 2
Perelman, Bob 39
Perlman, John 9
Piombino, Nick 9
Porter, Anne 59
Pound, Ezra 50
Pound, Scott 1, 29, 34, 51, 82, 83
Pressler, Charlotte 9, 38
Prevallet, Kristin 9, 39, 85
Prince, Richard 1
Quasha, George 4
Raworth, Tom 40
Reagan, Nancy 28
Rehm, Pam 9, 39, 85
Retallack, Joan 9
Ridge, Cedar 6
Rilke, Rainer Maria 2
Rivera, Alex 9
Roberts, Wendy 22, 23, 37
Robinson, Elizabeth 7, 9, 39
Robinson, Mary 5
Rodefer, Stephen 59
Ross, Joe 9
Ross, Stuart 38
Salinger, Michael 38
Sappho 76
Saroyan, William 46
Scalapino, Leslie 7, 9
Schultz, Susan M. 53
Selby, Spencer 4
Shakespeare, William 76
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 76
Sherry, James 7

Sherwood, Ken 86
Sloan, Margaret 5
Smith, Susan 6, 9
Smith, Tracy K. 38
Spahr, Boyd 4, 9
Spicer, Jack 1
Stein, Charles 4, 76
Stein, Suzanne 82
Steiner, George 1
Stevens, Wallace 40
Swensen, Cole 9
Tardos, Anne 4
Tarn, Nathaniel 5
Taylor, Jesse 1
Templeton, Fiona 8
Terry, Philip 38
Thomas, Dylan 38
Thompson, Jon 38
Torra, Joseph 9
Tuttle, Bill 7, 9
Tzvia, Rachel 7
Vassilakis, Nico 38
Vendler, Helen 76
Veronica, Angela 50
Waldman, Ken 76
Waldrop, Keith 9
Waldrop, Rosmarie 5
Watten, Barrett 39
Weems, Mary 38
Weinberger, Eliot 76
Weiner, Hannah 4, 38
Whitehead, Helen 1
Whitman, Walt 1, 76
Wieners, John 40
Williams, Tony 29, 34
Willis, Elizabeth 9
Wordsworth, William 76
Wright, James 50
Young, Karl 4, 5
Zukofsky, Louis 40, 51, 59, 73, 82

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 50, 87, 89
Aesthetics 1, 26, 38, 50, 68
Anthologies 4, 7, 49, 50, 59, 72, 76, 77, 84, 85, 86
Appropriation 47, 50, 51, 59
Archives and libraries 38
Avant-garde 1, 38, 51
Beat generation 2
Beauty 2
Biography 1
Book announcements 4, 8, 50
Capitalism 81, 87
Cities 50
Conferences and festivals 1, 7, 10, 11, 50, 86
Craft 12, 17, 21
Dada 50
Ecology and ecopoetics 81
Editing 8, 13, 49, 85, 86
Electronic poetry and hypertext 3, 38
Ethics 1, 58
Experimental poetry 6, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 21, 25, 31, 34, 41, 44, 53, 57, 59, 63, 66, 70
Feminism 8
Film 68
Formalism 39, 57, 59, 87
Free verse 51
Gender 8, 49
Globalization 10
Grants and funding 30
Humour and satire 50
Identity politics 77, 81
Ideology 1, 8, 25
Imagism 51
Improvisation 50, 72
Indigenous and Native poetics 68
Interviews 8, 74
Language poetry 28, 33, 36, 39, 51, 56, 59, 80
Letters and correspondence 4, 7, 9
List moderation 50
Little magazines 2, 8, 13, 39, 50, 52, 56, 59, 80, 86
Lyric poetry 50, 59, 77
Marxism 50, 81
Memory 9
Modernism 1, 29, 34, 53, 55, 57, 59, 82
Mourning and loss 68
Multiculturalism 81
Music and poetry 1, 13, 37, 50
Nationalism 37
Nature 1, 50, 51, 59, 76, 84, 87
Negativity and refusal 59
New Formalism 59
New York School 39, 59
Négritude 53
Objectivism 29, 34, 51
Ontology 45
Phenomenology 55
Philosophy 1, 19, 34, 95
Place and region 2, 50, 59
Poetics 1, 9, 10, 16, 27, 43, 45, 50, 55, 84, 85, 87, 89
Print vs. digital 2, 5, 7, 11, 35, 86, 95
Procedural and constraint writing 73, 74, 76, 78
Prosody and meter 33
Psychoanalysis 1, 55
Queer poetics 1, 59
Race and poetry 81
Reading announcements 11
Religion and the sacred 1, 10, 39, 59, 76
Representation 1, 55

Reviewing and criticism 1, 9, 34, 42, 52, 80, 85
Romanticism 89
Science 1, 12, 15, 17, 18, 21, 29, 31, 34, 36, 42, 57, 58, 96
Semiotics 38, 76, 87
Serial poem 1, 59
Small press publishing 1, 2, 6, 7, 8, 38
Software and code 50
Sound poetry 38
Subjectivity 32
Terrorism 50
The academy 1, 2, 8, 10, 22, 23, 35, 37, 47, 51, 55, 56, 76, 80
The body 46, 66
The canon 1, 58, 59, 63, 76
The listserv 3, 43
The New Sentence 30
Theatre 37
Translation 1, 2, 9, 11, 38, 57
Vietnam 81
Visual and concrete poetry 43, 45, 50, 55
Visual art 1, 38, 55

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 96 in all.

12 OCT 1994

1. Charles Watts — "Recovery of the Public World" (fwd)

20 OCT 1994

2. Christopher Reiner — Parshchikov Book

21 OCT 1994

3. Charles Bernstein — Listings
4. Robert A Harrison — Re> Listings
5. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: Listings

22 OCT 1994

6. Mark Wallace — Texture Press
7. Joel Kuszai — Meow Press

23 OCT 1994

8. Juliana Spahr — information about the journal Chain
9. Juliana Spahr — information about leave books
10. Sandra Braman — art in the net
11. John Cayley — CHINESE POET READING IN LONDON
12. Michael Boughn — experiwhat?
13. Alan Sondheim — Re: experiwhat?
14. Jorge Guitart — (no subject)
15. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: experiwhat?
16. Alan Sondheim — Re: your mail
17. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: experiwhat?
18. Justin T McHale — Re: experiwhat?
19. Louis Cabri — experiperi
20. Jorge Guitart — experiwhich
21. Alan Sondheim — Re: experiwhat?

24 OCT 1994

22. Alan Sondheim — Re: experiwhat?
23. Roberts Mark — Re: experiwhat?
24. Michael Boughn — Re: experiwhat?
25. Joe Amato — Re: experiwhat?
26. Joe Amato — Re: experiwhat?
27. Sandra Braman — Re: experiwhat?
28. Nick Lawrence — Re: experiwhat?
29. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: experiwhat?
30. Marc Nasdor — Re: experiwhat?
31. Robert Kelly — Re: experiwhat?
32. Mark Wallace — Call for Briefs
33. Mark Wallace — Poetic Briefs #17
34. Alan Sondheim — Re: experiwhat?
35. Tony Green — Re: Call for Briefs
36. Joel Kuszai — Re: experiwhat?
37. Roberts Mark — Overland

25 OCT 1994

38. Robert Drake — Re: Listings, Burning Press
39. Ron Silliman — Re: absurd category
40. Marc Nasdor — Re: experiwhat?

41. Jorge Guitart — EXPERIWHAT LVI
42. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: experiwhat?
43. Alan Golding — "Susan Howe's Visual Poetics"
44. Patrick Phillips — Re: experiwhat?
45. kathryne lindberg — Re: "Susan Howe's Visual Poetics"

26 OCT 1994

46. Alan Sondheim — Re: experiwhat?
47. keith tuma — "experimental"
48. log hacker — Re: "experimental"
49. Patrick Phillips — Re: "experimental"
50. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH — (no subject)

27 OCT 1994

51. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: "experimental"
52. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH — New Poetry Magazine (fwd)
53. Susan Schultz — Re: "experimental"
54. Sandra Braman — Re: "experimental"
55. Tony Green — Re: "Susan Howe's Visual Poetics"
56. Tony Green — Re: absurd category
57. Tom Mandel — Re: absurd category

28 OCT 1994

58. William Lavender — Re: absurd category
59. Ron Silliman — Re: Motivation
60. Sandra Braman — Re: absurd category
61. Alan Sondheim — Re: absurd category
62. Sandra B — Re: absurd category
63. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: The Law of Genre
64. Alan Sondheim — Re: absurd category
65. George Bowering — Re: experiwhat?
66. Tom Mandel — Re: absurd category
67. Patrick Phillips — Re: experiwhat?
68. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: experiwhat?
69. Robert Drake — Re: experiwhat?

29 OCT 1994

70. William Lavender — Re: absurd category
71. Ron Silliman — Re: experiwhat?
72. Patrick Phillips — Re: experiwhat?
73. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: experiwhat?
74. Patrick Phillips — Re: experiwhat?
75. George Bowering — Re: experiwhat?

30 OCT 1994

76. Donald J. Byrd — Categories
77. Steve Evans — Motives & Devices
78. Robert Drake — Re: experiwhat?
79. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: experiwhat?
80. Tony Green — Re: Motivation
81. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Motivation

31 OCT 1994

82. Hank Lazer — Re: Motivation
83. kat — Re: absurd category
84. Ron Silliman — G2
85. jena — Re: G2
86. Kenneth Sherwood — G2 -(G1xG7(d/t)+P)

87. Steve Evans — G-ology
88. Tom Mandel — Re: experiwhat?
89. Tom Mandel — Re: experiwhat?
90. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Failed Experiments
91. George Bowering — Re: experiwhat?
92. George Bowering — Re: experiwhat?
93. George Bowering — Re: experiwhat?
94. George Bowering — Re: Failed Experiments
95. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: nostalgia & nostalgia
96. Patrick Phillips — Re: experiwhat?

1. Charles Watts

"Recovery of the Public World" (fwd)

Wed 12 Oct 1994

Forwarded message: Many thanks to all those who have responded to our call for proposals for papers/presentations at the conference in honour of Robin Blaser, "The Recovery of the Public World," to be held in Vancouver, B.C., June 1st to 4th, 1995. We have received several very interesting proposals since our call went out last summer and we are now circulating these proposals to the chairpersons of the panels.

Several people wrote to me indicating that they had a proposal in mind and would like to send it to us, but didn't have the time to meet our original September 30th deadline. We'd like to encourage those people and others who would like to participate in this conference, but who need more time to consider and draft something.

So, we have decided to extend the period during which we'll accept proposals for the conference to the end of November. If you've been thinking about sending us an idea for a presentation but time hasn't permitted you to draft one so far, please accept this announcement as a renewed invitation. We will be accepting proposals for presentations at the conference until November 30th, 1994.

Following is the announcement I sent last June 15th:
>
> ANNOUNCING "THE RECOVERY OF THE PUBLIC WORLD": a Conference in Honour of the > Poetry and Poetics of Robin Blaser; to be held in Vancouver, B.C., Canada, > June 1st to 4th, 1995.
>
> "Poets have repeatedly in this century turned philosophers, so > to speak, in order to argue the value of poetry and its practice > within the disturbed meanings of our time. These arguments are > fascinating because they have everything to do with the poets' sense > of reality in which imagery is entangled with thought. Often, they > reflect Pound's sense of `make it new' or the modernist notion that > this century and its art are simultaneously the end of something and > the beginning of something else, a new consciousness, and so forth.
> It is not one argument or another for or against tradition, nor is it > the complex renewal of the imaginary which our arts witness, for, as I > take it, the enlightened mind does not undervalue the imaginary, which > is the most striking matter of these poetics; what is laid out before > us finally is the fundamental struggle for the nature of the real.

> And this, in my view, is a spiritual struggle, both philosophical and > poetic. Old spiritual forms, along with positivisms and materialisms, > which `held' the real together have come loose. This is a cliche of > our recognitions and condition. But we need only look at the energy > of the struggle in philosophy and poetry to make it alive and central > to our private and public lives." (Robin Blaser, from "The Violets: > Charles Olson and Alfred North Whitehead," in LINE No. 2, Fall 1983)
>
> This conference will address many of the concerns voiced by Robin > Blaser's work in poetry and prose over nearly fifty years' writing, > teaching, speaking and living an evolving poetic thought. There will > be six panel sessions, each exploring a realm of this thought; there > will also be a seventh, convivial session which will give us an > opportunity to speak about companionship in poetry and poetics. And there will be readings by poets participating in the conference.
>
> The panels, with possible topics for discussion:
>
> POETICS, THEORY AND PRACTICE: presentation & representation - self & > other - the play of absence - parataxis & hypotaxis - the serial poem
> - dictation - the poem as field - the poem thinking - the poem as > argument - theory and practice of language - augury - the visionary & > the prophetic - the construction of modernity - mythopoiesis - > grammatology - logography
>
> PAINTING, MUSIC, SCULPTURE, POETRY: no break with tradition, but a > continuous gathering - continuous breakages and ruptures with > academicisms and canon-makings - field in painting, music, the plastic > arts - Rimbaud's `dereglement de tous les sens' - `the painter of > modern life' - revolution of the word - Duchamp & poiesis - > l'avant-garde - Bach's belief &/in the era of Boulez and Cage
>
> HETEROLOGIES: `religio', a `tying back to' & vision vs. religiosity - > futurity as indeterminable vs a settled & expected transcendence - > dangerousness of the latter - rethinking the cosmos in the 19th > century (Poe, Emerson, Melville, Dickinson) - Blake & cosmos - 20th > century turns - "we are `ventured' by language" - Olson, Whitehead - > science as thought & unthought (Einstein, Foucault) - `scientific > angelism' (Girard) - Merleau-Ponty - Leibniz, Bach, probability, > monadology - Deleuze, `the fold' - heterodoxies, heterologies (De > Certeau) - `God, self, history, and book' (Taylor) - importance & > implications of cosmology/cosmogony as modes of poetic discourse in > relation to the contemporary dominance of philosophies of language & > psychoanalysis - muthos/logos - Plato & the preface to Plato & the > postface - the `other' of philosophy & poetics

>
> ETHICS AND AESTHETICS: modern `isms' and persons - self, other - > Hannah Arendt & the recovery of the public world - the scapegoat, > sacrifice of the other - Marx, Freud, materialisms, positivisms - > Foucault (madness & civilization, archaeologies of knowledge, the > public institution) - the postmodern condition - poet & ideology - > Benjamin, Adorno, Bloch, and others - outsiders (Hans Mayer) & `the > practice of outside' - Nietzsche, the birth of tragedy, the gay > science - `the fragility of goodness' (Nussbaum) - repression & > freedom - Hermes & the parasite (Serres) - the practice of everyday > life - (De Certeau) - nomadology - ethical poetics
>
> EROS AND POIESIS: desire & freedom - eros & agape - self, other - > homoeros, sexualities, `heterodalities' - `sodometries' - the > creative/the destructive, the prolific/the devouring - sexual politics
> - the poetics of love
>
> TRANSLATION: `De volgari eloquentia' - Mallarme, `correspondances' - > dictation - mimesis - imitation &/or carrying over - Pound - Nerval, > Duncan, Blaser - music the `upper limit of speech'? - translation & > the sacred - `originality'/`derivation' - `quotation' - Octavio Paz - > before, during, and after Babel (George Steiner) - ethnopoetics, > culture studies, linguistics & translation
>
> COMPANIONS: breaking bread with - a feast of companionship - `the > great companions: Pindar, Dante, Whitman, H.D., Duncan, Spicer, Olson, > Pound, Yeats et al - the everyday & miraculous affection - `the truth > is laughter' - Boston, Berkeley, San Francisco, Vancouver - > teaching/learning - generosities of scholarship - order/strife & human > fulfillment - truth & life of myth
>
> The `Companions' session will be celebrated as a feast.
>
> Obviously, the `topics' outlined above have hardly the stability of > categories, and can easily, and relatively promiscuously, slip from > one session to another; "the map is not the territory," and conference > participants will find their own territories/unterritories to speak > from. One very valuable guide is Robin Blaser's The Holy Forest, "a > collected poems, that is, as far as I've gone today, 6 May, 1993"

> (Toronto: Coach House Press, 1993), available from Coach House, 50 > Prince Arthur Avenue, Suite 107, Toronto, Canada M5R 1B5, and > from Small Press Distribution, 1814 San Pablo Avenue, Berkeley CA
> 94702, Fax [redacted].
>
> A CALL FOR PROPOSALS: "THE RECOVERY OF THE PUBLIC WORLD": A CONFERENCE
> ON THE POETRY AND POETICS OF ROBIN BLASER, June 1st-4th, 1995, EMILY > CARR COLLEGE OF ART AND DESIGN, VANCOUVER, B.C., CANADA. CRITICISM * > THEORY * BIOGRAPHY * LITERARY HISTORY * POETRY * WELCOME. PANELS AND > SEMINARS WILL BE HELD ON POETICS, THEORY AND PRACTICE * PAINTING, > MUSIC, SCULPTURE, POETRY * HETEROLOGIES * ETHICS AND AESTHETICS * EROS > AND POIESIS * TRANSLATION * COMPANIONS.
>
> Please send two copies of a 500 word (more or less) proposal by 30 November > 1994 to "Toward the Recovery of the Public World," c/o The Institute > for the Humanities, Simon Fraser University, Burnaby, B.C. Canada V5A > 1S6
>
> Conference organizers are Ted Byrne, Tom Grieve, Tom McGauley, Miriam > Nichols and me, Charles Watts. For additional information about the > conference, please write to the Institute for the Humanities, or > telephone [redacted]; or fax [redacted]. My > e-mail address is [redacted]
>
I hope this re-announcement will encourage you to consider attending this conference. We'd like to make a festival to celebrate Robin and his work in poetry and poetic thought; we'd also like it to celebrate the company of which Robin is, wholeheartedly, a part.

> Charles Watts for the conference organizers.

↑ Index

2. Christopher Reiner
Parshchikov Book
Thu 20 Oct 1994

Next month, Avec Books will publish the first English-language collection of Aleksei Parshchikov's poetry, translated by Michael Palmer, John High and Michael Molnar (with an introduction by Marjorie Perloff). The book, _Blue Vitriol_, will be available from Small Press Distribution, Inland Book Company, and other distributors. It's also available to members of Syntax Projects for the Arts at their usual 20% discount.

What follows is the text of the promotional sheet for the book.

New from Avec Books
Blue Vitriol by Alexei Parshchikov

Translated by Michael Palmer, John High and Michael Molnar with an introduction by Marjorie Perloff

Alexei Parshchikov is one of the most brilliant and accomplished Russian poets of his generation. But until now his voice has rarely been heard outside his native country. The publication of _Blue Vitriol_ is the first opportunity for most English and American readers to experience the full force of his extraordinary talent. Born in 1954 in Olga Bay, near Vladstock, and trained as an agricultural scientist, Parshchikov combines a keen eye for the beauty of the rural landscape with an uncompromising view of the ruin wrought by chemical poisoning and industrial waste. His poetry has been compared to the work of the American beat poets, such as Jack Kerouac and Allen Ginsberg, but it evokes a world that is often bleaker and much more dangerous. In Parshchikov's world, the world of contemporary Russia, reclaiming beauty and inspiration will be a long and difficult process--a process that can only begin in the language of poetry.

"In an 1898 letter from St. Petersburg, Rainer Maria Rilke wrote that it was Russian things that would give him the names for his most tender 'devoutnesses.' Now, almost 100 years later, it would seem that it is not Russian things but Russian names--the fullness of these poems, here beautifully translated for us--that embody those devoutnesses that prolong close observation and sustain contemplative complexity. Alexei Parshchikov's detailed lingering in the world he perceives has given us the fullness of these poems. Their publication in this, his first American book, is an important occasion."--Lyn Hejinian, poet, essayist, and translator

"Alexei Parshchikov is undoubtedly the most exciting young Russian poet today. Through his first English-language collection of his work, American readers get a glimpse of an imagination that soars freely and boldly through all times and places. Indeed, this book is the trace of a poetic road that, in Parshchikov's words, 'is the place for finding your way while timeUs wind unwinds you and sets you against the flow.'"--Andrew Wachtel, professor of Slavic Studies, Northwestern University

Size/Binding: 7 x 8-1/2; 64 pages; perfect bound. Price: $9.50;
Publication Date: November 9, 1994. ISBN: 1-880713-02-0.
LCCN:93-71880.

Avec Books are published by Syntax Projects for the Arts, a non-profit, member-supported organization dedicated to publishing innovative poetry and fiction from international artists for an international audience. The organization also publishes the literary journal Avec.

↑ Index

3. Charles Bernstein
Listings
Fri 21 Oct 1994

Would those of you on the list, who have not done so recently, please post information about books and magazines that you edit or publish, including complete back lists (which we then also can make available through the EPC gopher) and information on ordering (be sure to include prices and addresses of publishers or distributor). I would also be interested in posts listing most recent or forthcoming books by those on the list as well as lists of recent works (poems or essays) that have appeared in magazines (together with information on how to get these books and magazines).

Thanks.

↑ Index

4. Robert A Harrison
Re> Listings
Fri 21 Oct 1994

Croton Bug #3 is now available.

Croton Bug #3 includes work from Jackson Mac Low, Ron Silliman, Juliana Spahr, Hachivi Edgar Heap of Birds, Clemente Padin, Bruce Andrews, Chris Custer, Richard Kostelanetz, Bob Harrison, John M. Bennett, Geof Huth, John Byrum, Jake Berry, Franz Kamin, Eva Festa, MASSA, Paul Dutton, George Kalamaras, Gill Ott, Kimberly Lyons, George Quasha, Jeff Poniewaz, Rafael Courtoisie, Peter Inman, Spencer Selby and others.

Croton Bug #2 is still available.

Croton Bug #2 includes work from Jackson Mac Low, Juan Felipe Herrerra, Anne Tardos, Anne Kingsbury, Charles Stein, Hannah Weiner, Antler, Clemente Padin, Richard Kostelanetz, Franz Kamin, Eileen Myles, M. Kettner, Karl Young, and others.

Xeroxes of Croton Bug #1 are available.

Croton Bug #1 includes work from Clark Coolidge, Bob Harrison, Jesse Glass, Elsa Von Freytag-Loringhoven, Karl Gartung, Skip Fox, and others.

All issues, including Croton Bug #1, cost 8 dollars per copy.

Make checks out to Bob Harrison.

Send correspondence, checks, etc. to:

Bob Harrison
PO Box 11166
Milwaukee, WI 53211

My work has appeared recently in Big Allis, Situation, Mirage, Letterbox, Anthology of American Ideophonics, and Texture.

↑ Index

5. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: Listings

Fri 21 Oct 1994

Now I'm picking up the books of Chax Press, which are all around me, so I may list them. Let me start with the forthcoming, which will be available soon.

Margy Sloan, THE SAID LANDS, ISLANDS, AND PREMISES, should be available about the first of 1995, and will sell for $11. It comprises several series poems: "Abeyance Series," "Rest," "The Said Lands, Islands, and Premises," "The Argument Needs and Shall Receive," "Infiltration," "Patience, Antithesis," and "Eccentricity of the Middle Ground."

Myung Mi Kim, THE BOUNTY, available late spring 1995, $12. Three long poems, "Primer," "Anna O Addendum," and "The Bounty."

And now, the blacklist, beginning with the most recent.

Kathleen Fraser, when new time folds up, $11.
Norman Fischer, PRECISELY THE POINT BEING MADE (collaborative publication with O Books, $10.

Beverly Dahlen, A READING 8 - 10, $12.
Ron Silliman, DEMO TO INK, $11.
Sheila E. Murphy, TETH, $9.
Karen Mac Cormack, QUIRKS & QUILLETS, $8.
Eli Goldblatt, SESSIONS 1 - 62, $9.
Larry Evers & Felipe S. Molina, eds., WO'I BWIKAM/COYOTE SONGS from the Yaqui Bow Leaders' Society, $8.
Charles Alexander, HOPEFUL BUILDINGS, $9.95.
bp Nichol, ART FACTS: A BOOK OF CONTEXTS, $15.

Also available from Chax Press:
Charles Alexander, arc of light/dark matter (pub. Segue Books), $8.

I have not listed the several letterpress hand printed and bound books in many formats, including multiple folds, sleeve-page bindings, codex books, etc., which include books, most recently, by Rosmarie Waldrop, Nathaniel Tarn, and Nathaniel Mackey. Other books include works by Karl Young, Lyn Hejinian/Kit Robinson, Mei-mei Berssenbrugge, Jackson Mac Low, Anne Kingsbury, and more. These books are book arts editions which retail for anywhere from $18 to $125. Please let me know if you want to know more about them.

I'll try to make one more very small letterpress book before the year is gone, and a longer one is in the works by Tom Mandel, but it's unclear right now if it will come out as a publication by Chax Press or by Minnesota Center for Book Arts.

All Chax Press books are available from Chax Press, P.O. Box 19178, Minneapolis, Minnesota 55419-0178. The phone number is [redacted] (but no one is ever here, so leave a message or call Charles Alexander in the daytime at Minnesota Center for Book Arts, [redacted]). The fax number is also [redacted].

Thanks for reading all of this.

Charles Alexander

↑ Index

6. Mark Wallace
Texture Press
Sat 22 Oct 1994

Texture Press in Norman, Oklahoma continues to publish chapbooks by new and emering experimental poets.
Authors include Ed Foster, Peter Ganick, many others.

Most recent title: Every Day Is Most Of My Time, by Mark Wallace ($6)

For more information, write to:

Susan Smith Nash
Texture Press
3760 Cedar Ridge Dr.
Norman, OK 73072-4621

↑ Index

7. Joel Kuszai

Meow Press

Sat 22 Oct 1994

Meow Press was established in August of 1993 as a response to the New Cost festival and also the rapid proliferation of electronic publishing. In the case of the former, there is the hope that by getting involved it might be possible to reopen the anthologizing-closure process set in motion by that fateful gathering; that it might be possible to exist in a state where the printing of a book of poems might be - in the tradition of printer-poets such as Lyn Hejinian - an extension of one's own activity of writing. In the case of the latter, the romance of making books by hand that utilized the hot carbon transfer process as ultimately temporal ephemera, yet palpable physical without too much nostalgia for the Book. An obsessive typography startup kit.

1st Season: 1993-1994

Michael Basinski, Cnyttan
Benjamin Friedlander, Anterior Future
Bill Tuttle, Epistolary Poems
Elizabeth Robinson, Iemanje
Pierre Joris, Winnetou Old
Leslie Scalapino, The Line
George Albon, King

Strike-Shortened 2nd Season: 1994

Rachel Tzvia Back, Litany
Robert Fitterman, Metropolis
Bishop Morda, SDDDRTT-123
Ben Friedlander, Knot
Mark Johnson, Three Bad Wishes

Next Season: 1995

Andrews, Bernstein, Sherry, Technology/Art: 20 Brief Proposals
Misko Suvakovic, Pas Tout
Dubravka Djuric, Cosmopolitan Alphabet
James Sherry, Four For Ben
Danielle Collobert, Notebooks (tr. Norma Cole)

[still reading & accepting manuscripts for 1995 series--send correspondence to [redacted]]

Meow Press books are distributed by Small Press Distribution, of Berkeley California. Please consult with your local SPD representative for further information.

↑ Index

8. Juliana Spahr

information about the journal Chain

Sun 23 Oct 1994

®TW50˜Now available: Chain/1

Chain is a new journal that investigates language and its various frames. It includes poetry, prose, and visual work. This first issue explores its editor's apprehension about editing. It attempts to create a dialogic space through its investiga tion of the (im)possibility of an unmediated reception and the (im)possibility of detaching a writing from its presentational/ideological form.

Chain begins with a forum on how and why journals are created and in what ways questions of gender have informed those decisions. As such it investigates the implications behind making taste public and the manner in which taste presents itself in the public sphere. This section includes an interview between Dodie Bellamy (of Mirage) and Andrea Juno (of Research) on Angry Women and "sex positive" editing practices; Dubravka Djuric (of Mental Space) on editing in communist and post-communist societies; Heather Findlay (of On Our Backs) on collaborative editing; Susan Gevirtz (of HOW(ever)) reading editing as medical diagnosis; Holly Laird (of Tulsa Studies in Women's Litera ture) on the difficulties and rewards of editing feminist journals in the academy as well as pieces from a number of small press and feminist editors.

Instead of a collection that claims over and over the ability of the editor to know and define, Chain is a journal that claims instead "this made itself and here is what it's made of; it is just part of what continues." In order to facilitate a journal that could make itself, Chain used the model of the chain letter. A number of writers from the U.S., Canada, and England were asked to send a piece of writing to another writer. These writers responded by writing a poem and then send ing both poems onto a third participant, and so forth. This section includes work by Abigail Child, Gail Scott, Norma Cole, Sianne Ngai, Kate Rushin, Fiona Templeton and others.

Chain/1
107 14th Street / Buffalo, New York 14213 edited by Jena Osman and Juliana Spahr appears annually
$7.95
6x9, 288 pages
issn: 1076-0520
isbn: 0-922668-12-4
publication date: October 1, 1994

↑ Index

9. Juliana Spahr
information about leave books
Sun 23 Oct 1994

®TW50¯L e a v e B o o k s p.o. box 786 buffalo, ny 14213-0786

Edited by Kristin Prevallet, Pam Rehm, Juliana Spahr, Marta Werner, Charlotte Pressler, and Jennifer Karmin.

Since its inception in 1991, Leave Books has been a small co-operative press committed to printing works of poetry, essays on poetry, and prose that challenge the formal boundaries of writing.

If you are interested in receiving our books, please send a donation of $20 for individuals / $35 for institutions for the 1994 series of up to 15 books. Individual books and books from our backlist are available for $4. Boxed sets of the entire run which are hand sewn and signed (when available), are $100. Checks should be addressed to the UB Foundation.

The following is a catalogue of our entire chap book series. * indicates recent books included in the 1994 series, mentioned above.

* Will Alexander, Arcane Lavender Morals
Bruce Andrews, Divestiture-E
Michael Basinski, Mooon Bok: petition, invocation & homage
J. Battaglia, Skin Problems
Tom Beckett, Economies of Pure Expenditure: Notebook
* Guy Beining, Too Far to Hear
Dodie Bellamy, Answer: from the Letters of Mina Harker
Julia Blumenreich, Artificial Memory
* Laynie Browne, One Constellation
Lee Ann Brown, Crush
Elizabeth Burns, Letters to Elizabeth Bishop
John Byrum, Interalia: Among Other Things
Tina Darragh, adv. fan--10968 series
* Sally Doyle, Under the Neath
Peter Ganick, ...As Convenience
Drew Gardener, The Cover
Susan Gevirtz, Domino: point of entry
Jefferson Hansen, gods to the elbows
* Barbara Henning,(with drawings by Georgia Marsh) The Passion of Signs
Le Ann Jacobs, Varieties of Inflorescence
Robert Kelly, Manifesto: For the Next New York School
* Lori Lubeski, Stamina
* Kimberly Lyons, Rhyme the Lake
* Kevin Magee, Tedium Drum, Part II
Joyce Mansour, (translated by Serge Gavronsky), Cris/Screams
Gale Nelson, Little Red Pump
Jena Osman, Pump
Ann Pedone, The Bird Happened
John Perlman, imperatives of address
Nick Piombino, Two Essays

* Kristin Prevallet, Perturbation, My Sister Bin Ramke, Catalogue Raisonne
  Stephen Ratcliff, Private Pam Rehm, Pollux
* Joan Retallack, Icarus fffffalling
  Elizabeth Robinson, Nearings: two poems
  Rena Rosenwasser, Unplace.Place
* Joe Ross, Push
  Susan Schultz, Another Childhood
  Cathleen Shattuck, Three Queens
  Susan Smith Nash, Grammar of the Margin Road Juliana Spahr, nuclear
* Cole Swensen, Walk
  Joseph Torra, Domino Sessions
  Bill Tuttle, Private Address
  Keith Waldrop, The Balustrade
  Mark Wallace, You Bring Your Whole Life to the Material
  Nena Zivanceivc, I Was This War Reporter
  in Egypt

Also availaible:

A Poetics of Criticism
edited by Juliana Spahr, Kristin Prevallet, Pam Rehm, Mark Wallace

This collection, which presents the work of over forty-five poets and scholars from the United States and Canada, includes essays written as dialogues, essays composed of quotations, essays the merge the critical and the poetic. All of them explore the fluidities and possibilities within a poetics of criticism. Includes work by Leslie Scalapino, Jerome McGann, Elizabeth Willis, Dodie Bellamy and Will Alexander. ($12.95, 315 pages.)

Complications From Standing In a Circle
by Mark Wallace

This book began as a search through the dictionary for words that the author would otherwise not have used. It includes twenty nine poems that are a restless exploration of the possibilities in "what is not usually noticed." ($6.95, 68 pages.)

Wale; or the Corse
by Elena Rivera

This book was inspired by the author's reading of Melville's Moby Dick and Charles Olson's Call Me Ishmael. This is poetry that merges the harmonies of words with an emotional intensity that over takes the reader with "silent storms." ($5.00, 33 pages.)

↑ Index

10. Sandra Braman

art in the net

Sun 23 Oct 1994

Last spring Charles Bernstein launched some conversation on the question of where art is in the net environment, where is outside . . . My response, as a poet/artist who has been looking for the last dozen years at macro-level effects of the use of new information technologies -- the net -- and their policy implications in my "professional" manifestation as an academic, is three-fold, and argues for reconceptualizing/reidentifying ourselves as artists in this qualitatively different period of social history. (The information society, or, alternatively, the postmodern condition, can accurately be said to have first begun emerging in the middle of the 19th century with the electrification of communications and consequent beginnings of globalization; we're now in a third stage, characterized by the harmonization of information systems with each other, across national borders, and with other types of social systems).

(1) Of the three ways of conceptualizing the information economy

- the economy works the way it always has, but the information industries sector of the economy has simply grown in relative importance - the economy works the way it always has but that way is broken; the expansion of the economy through commodification of information not previously commodified, including that most personal and that most public, is simply forcing us to confront contradictions there have always been; and - the economy is now working in a qualitatively different way in which the economy now is simply the content of the net (a la McLuhan's insight that the content of each medium is the medium that came before), harmonized information flows have replaced the market as the key coordinating mechanism of the economy, and cooperation and coordination are now as important as competition for economic survival (this also is sensitive to the expanded commodification of information)

the latter, called network economics, a discipline that is just now emerging, seems the most useful for analytical and organizational purposes. Within this perspective, the role of artists as specializing in particular forms of information and material processing can be articulated and valued in ways not previously accessible. (Roberto Scazzieri helps us in this as he distinguishes between virtual and actual materials and processes....)

(2) Our understanding of causal relations, whether social-psychological and behavioral or critical, has been insistently linear, while theories of self-organizing systems offer us ways of understanding non-linear causal relations, and places a great value on seemingly trivial differences in conditions and on the development of alternatives (deviance), etc.. From this perspective, too, the particular strengths of poets and artists move to the center of our understanding of healthy social processes rather than being marginalized.

(3) Our understanding of the artist as deviant belongs to a geographically and historically specific period and place in human history. Across a much wider range of cultures and across a longer span of time, we much more commonly see models of artists as the central figures in societies, tying together the spiritual and the social through their working with the material.

A full paper articulating the role of the artist in the postmodern/information society condition (the former descriptor focuses on the cultural experience of qualitative social changes, the latter on the technological impetus to those changes) was the basis of a keynote address I recently gave at the Convergences conference on an arts and humanities policy for the net in Boston. Would be happy to send it along, snail or ASCII, to anyone who would care to read it in its entirety and would very much appreciate any comments.

I see that Bernstein et al. have 20 "proposals" to make on this subject. Wondering how it intersects/interacts/reacts with/to/from this approach. And any other response you on the poetics list may have.

Sandra Braman
Institute of Communications Research, U of Illinois
[redacted]

↑ Index

11. John Cayley
CHINESE POET READING IN LONDON
Sun 23 Oct 1994

23/10/94

=== Announcement ====

Yang Lian reads at Poetry International, London

I assume that not many of you will be able to make it to London but you may nonetheless like to know that the contemporary Chinese poet, Yang Lian will be reading at 'Britain's largest poetry festival' at the South Bank Centre, Voice Box on 1 November 1994, 7.30 pm, as part of 'Poetry International'. Enquiries to the South Bank Box Office (0)[redacted].

To concide with the reading, Europe's only publisher to specialize in literary translation from Chinese, The Wellsweep Press, will publish:

Non-Person Singular: selected poems of Yang Lian translated by Brian Holton.
128 pp, parallel text, 21x13 cm
Paperback GBP 7.95 (US$ 14.95) ISBN 0 948454 15 6
Hardback GBP 14.95 (US$ 24.95) ISBN 0 948454 85 7

Yang Lian is one of the best-known of the so-called misty poets who came to prominence in China during the 1980s. His work, which has found rich sources at the margins of Chinese culture the south, the far west and Tibet and in ancient Chinese cultural forms such as his reading of The Book of Changes is wide-ranging, exploratory, linguistically rich and deeply rewarding.

Enquiries to Wellsweep Press: [redacted]
(complete catalogue also available by email)

Brief details now follow in HZ:

"Poetry International"
1 November 1994, 7:30 pm in the 'Voice Box'
South Bank Box Office (0)[redacted].

:

12821x13
7.95 (14.95) ISBN 0 948454 15 6
14.95 (24.95) ISBN 0 948454 85 7

Wellsweep Press : [redacted]
(email)

Wellsweep Press
Tel & Fax: 0[redacted] Email: [redacted]

↑ Index

12. Michael Boughn
experiwhat?
Sun 23 Oct 1994

Can someone out there explain how the concept of "experiment" relates to the practice of poetry? My own understanding of "experiement" is that it specifically has to do forms of thinking and practice associated with the accumulation of scientific knowledge, that is to say, the truth and falsity of theories and hypotheses. One forms an hypothesis based on generalizing from certain isolated empirical "facts", and then proceeds to test the "truth" or "falsity" of the hypotesis by submitting it to experimentation, i.e. looking for exceptions to the general rule.

Whatever it is we do as poets, I simply can't conceive of any way in which the concept of "experimentation" can meaningfully describe it. (Sorry, Mark, but it really bugs me when people talk about "experimental poetry".) Innovative, maybe, or exploratory, or even weird poetry, but never, never "experimental". I know I may sound a bit cranky, but since words are our lives, we ought to be careful with them, especially when discussing our own craft.

Mike Boughn
[redacted]

↑ Index

13. Alan Sondheim
Re: experiwhat?
Sun 23 Oct 1994

I really have to agree with Mike's assessment. My video/writing/music/whatever gets called all too often "experimental," which implies first of all that it's not particularly well-founded; second, that I'm not sure or insecure of the results; third, that it's tentative; fourth, that it's associated somehow with all the other work "out there" called experimental; fifth, that there's no audience because there's no completed or standardized venues - I could go on. It's a dismissal, whether intended to be or not. It also puts too much emphasis on the medium - i.e. "experimental poetry" is therefore _poetry_ instead of an opening; it actually reproduces the binary thinking of prose/poetry.

Alan

I have no books to list at all, except a few places I've appeared this fall - Uncontrollable Bodies (Bay Press, Stallings & Sappington) Crash (Threadwaxing Space, Zummer)

Vulvamorphia (Lusitania, Lennox)
Transmog (zine, Ficus) NWHQ (e-magazine, Fischer) and will be probably editing a Lusitania volume on cybermind.

↑ Index

14. Jorge Guitart

(no subject)

Sun 23 Oct 1994

---

experimental drug testing is legal, not so experimental drug taking

i know experimenting with syntax is legal, but is experimenting with the lexicon legal? (i mean in the U.S.)

i would like to conduct an experiment to show that experimental poetry is not poetry but i really think it is poetry except that i am an honest scientist so i will try to show that the null hypothesis is true.

Any advice on how to proceed?

jorge guitart

↑ Index

15. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: experiwhat?

Sun 23 Oct 1994

A usage history is probably called for with regard to "experimental" as a qualifier for poetry. But it would not surprise me to find out that it was actually intended as a compliment, i.e. in a world in which poetry is devalued (as it has been for at least a few centuries), to use a scientific term to describe the newest work being done in the field may have been intended to elevate the work to the level of science in some public's mind. Yes, it's inaccurate, and at this moment in time it does seem dismissive, but has that always been so?

Innovative and exploratory have their down sides, too, don't you think?

charles alexander

↑ Index

16. Alan Sondheim

Re: your mail

Sun 23 Oct 1994

This is a weird discussion because what is "poetry" , like what is "art" , is clearly problematic and moot; one could appeal to Wittgenstein's family of usages at best. Most of what I would consider poetry, for example, my downstairs neighbors wouldn't. The problem is otherwise - completely - that "experimental" has a negative or troubling effect even within poetics, and while not exclusionary, implies a ghettoization of language practices themselves. Further, this can have concrete implica- tions in terms of economics or distribution as well.

Alan

On Sun, 23 Oct 1994, Jorge Guitart wrote:

> experimental drug testing is legal, not so experimental drug taking
>
> i know experimenting with syntax is legal, but > is experimenting with the lexicon legal? (i mean in the U.S.)
>
> i would like to conduct an experiment to show that experimental poetry is not > poetry but i really think it is poetry except that i am an honest scientist so > i will try to show that the null hypothesis is true.
>
> Any advice on how to proceed?
>
> jorge guitart

↑ Index

17. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: experiwhat?

Sun 23 Oct 1994

Mike Bough writes:
>
> Can someone out there explain how the concept of "experiment" > relates to the practice of poetry? My own understanding > of "experiement" is that it specifically has to do forms of > thinking and practice associated with the accumulation of > scientific knowledge, that is to say, the truth and falsity of > theories and hypotheses. One forms an hypothesis based on > generalizing from certain isolated empirical "facts", and > then proceeds to test the "truth" or "falsity" of the hypotesis > by submitting it to experimentation, i.e. looking for exceptions > to the general rule.

>
> Whatever it is we do as poets, I simply can't conceive of any > way in which the concept of "experimentation" can meaningfully > describe it. (Sorry, Mark, but it really bugs me when people > talk about "experimental poetry".) Innovative, maybe, or > exploratory, or even weird poetry, but never, never > "experimental". I know I may sound a bit cranky, but since words > are our lives, we ought to be careful with them, especially when > discussing our own craft.
>
> Mike Boughn
> [redacted]
>

I agree that the term is often problematic, but perhaps I can play devil's advocate a bit here. George Oppen, aware that he was going out on a limb, believed that poetry could be a "test of truth," or of "conviction." This belief connects to Oppen's sense that only certain things can be said within the bounds of the poem, and, as I understand it, that other state- ments will be shown in a false light. Now, I admit, this is a pretty grand claim for poetry, but it apparently had validity for Oppen as a working principle. I wonder if there isn't some use to be made of the idea that poetry can "test" the language in somewhat the same sense that science tests an hypothesis." As a corollary, one might go farther to suggest that the poem's formal demands invoke protocols or procedures that must be adhered to (different for every poem?) if the "experiment" is to be successful, just as the conscientious scientist must have impeccable lab technique.

steve shoemaker
[redacted]

↑ Index

18. Justin T McHale
Re: experiwhat?
Sun 23 Oct 1994

On Sun, 23 Oct 1994, Michael Boughn wrote:

> Can someone out there explain how the concept of "experiment" relates to the practice of poetry? My own understanding of "experiement" is that it specifically has to do forms of thinking and practice associated with the accumulation of scientific knowledge, that is to say, the truth and falsity of

I agree that what I call my poetic "experiments" have little to do with a scientific inquiry. Rather, I am using the other established meaning for "experiment" - viz "a method or procedure adopted without knowing how it will work." So when I name a poem an "experiment" it is usuall because I am trying out a new kind of discourse, which I may or may not adopt in the future, depending on how the poem is received by readers for example. In this sense, the word, for me, is not especially problematic.

Justin

~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~ Justin McHale [redacted] ~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~'`^`'~-,._.,-~

↑ Index

19. Louis Cabri

experiperi

Sun 23 Oct 1994

Re: experimental

Here's two quotes and a brief embedment for them:

John Cage's "experimental" suggests a practice that implicates relations external to the practice in the experiment:

> The word experimental is apt, providing it is understood not as descriptive of an act to be later judged in terms of success and failure, but simply as an act the outcome of which is unknown.

Internally and externally, there is no "control subject" in the practice.

Walter Kaufmann's Nietzschean experimental evaluates philosophical and by extension poetic practices existentially -- in other terms evaluates a practice for its radical potential as social/textual agency:

> [Philosophical] questions permitting of experiment are [...] those questions to which he [Nietzsche] can reply [...] Let us try it! Experimenting involves testing an answer by trying to live according to it.... Only problems that present themselves so forcefully that they threaten the thinker's present mode of life lead to philosophic inquiries.

- Louis Cabri

↑ Index

20. Jorge Guitart
experiwhich
Sun 23 Oct 1994

only surgery can be exploratory only technique can be innovative mike, that discussion you started, was that an experiment?

↑ Index

21. Alan Sondheim
Re: experiwhat?
Sun 23 Oct 1994

But if a poem could "test" a language, this would imply, first, that there is a paradigmatic or otherwised notion of language, and second, that the poem could be falsifiable, vis-a-vis Popperian analysis. An experiment in science, if it is successful, produces results, which are generally a filtering of evidence in a logically well-defined manner. If poetry is to have value beyond the didactic, its strength is elsewhere.

Alan

On Sun, 23 Oct 1994, Steven Howard Shoemaker wrote:

> Mike Bough writes:
>
> Can someone out there explain how the concept of "experiment" relates to the practice of poetry? My own understanding of "experiement" is that it specifically has to do forms of thinking and practice associated with the accumulation of scientific knowledge, that is to say, the truth and falsity of theories and hypotheses. One forms an hypothesis based on generalizing from certain isolated empirical "facts", and then proceeds to test the "truth" or "falsity" of the hypotesis by submitting it to experimentation, i.e. looking for exceptions to the general rule.
>
> Whatever it is we do as poets, I simply can't conceive of any way in which the concept of "experimentation" can meaningfully > *describe it. (Sorry, Mark, but it really bugs me when people talk about "experimental poetry".) Innovative, maybe, or exploratory, or even weird poetry, but never, never "experimental". I know I may sound a bit cranky, but since words are our lives, we ought to be careful with them, especially when discussing our own craft.*

>
> Mike Boughn
> [redacted]
>
> *I agree that the term is often problematic, but perhaps I can play devil's advocate a bit here. George Oppen, aware that he was going out on a limb, believed that poetry could be a "test of truth," or of "conviction." This belief connects to Oppen's sense that only certain things can be said within the bounds of the poem, and, as I understand it, that other statements will be shown in a false light. Now, I admit, this is a pretty grand claim for poetry, but it apparently had validity for Oppen as a working principle.*
> I wonder if there isn't some use to be made of the idea that poetry can "test" the language in somewhat the same sense that science tests an hypothesis." As a corollary, one might go farther to suggest that the poem's formal demands invoke protocols or procedures that must be adhered to (different for every poem?) if the "experiment" is to be successful, just as the conscientious scientist must have impeccable lab technique.
>
> steve shoemaker
> [redacted]

↑ Index

22. Alan Sondheim

Re: experiwhat?

Mon 24 Oct 1994

Yes, but where's the axiomatics? & all those lines from George Trakl, exactly my point, Ihr Gebirge kuehl und blau! Ein reines Blau elsewhere, those opening lines trans. Firmage, Der Herbst des Einsamen, The Autumn of the Lonely One

The dark autumn enters with fruit and fullness,
The yellowed sheen of lovely summer days.
A pure blue flows from husks of moldered dullness [...]

Alan obsessed with blue bleu blau

On Mon, 24 Oct 1994, Roberts Mark wrote:
>
>

> poem in blue
>
> all poems are blue
>
>
>
> poem in yellow
>
> this poem is yellow
>
>
>
> poem in blue and yellow
>
> all poems are blue or yellow
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
> Mark Roberts
> SIS Liaison Officer
> Student Information & Systems Office Ph 02 [redacted]
> University of NSW Sydney Australia Fax 02 [redacted]
>

↑ Index

23. Roberts Mark

Re: experiwhat?

Mon 24 Oct 1994

> But if a poem could "test" a language, this would imply, first, that there is a paradigmatic or otherwised notion of language, and second, that the poem could be falsifiable, vis-a-vis Popperian analysis. An experiment in science, if it is successful, produces results, which are generally a filtering of evidence in a logically well-defined manner. If poetry is to have value beyond the didactic, its strength is elsewhere.
>
> Alan

poem in blue

all poems are blue

poem in yellow

this poem is yellow

poem in blue and yellow

all poems are blue or yellow

Mark Roberts
SIS Liaison Officer
Student Information & Systems Office Ph 02 [redacted]
University of NSW Sydney Australia Fax 02 [redacted]

↑ Index

24. Michael Boughn
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

No, Jorge, I had absolutely no intention of being experimental when I posted the intial message. Provocative would be more accurate. Stirring up the shit, something like that. It seems to me that part of the problem, a problem the responses have to some extent embodied, is that we tend to operate within taxonomies whose terms are decided elsewhere and which we question only infrequently, and then to defend by some rather farfetched metaphorical extensions categories which make no sense. Take the absurd category of something called "language" poetry. Somebody explain to me what that means and what it's usefulness is outside of hand to hand combat with some other equally absurd category called "mainstream". You can, I suppose, argue that this is nit picking b.s. and respond with some charming poem which proposes to undermine the intellectualism of the question, but that position, i.e. that it doesn't matter how we think (what we say) about what it is that we do, seems pretty bankrupt to me.

Anyway, more anon. For now it's back to work.

Love to all,
Mike

↑ Index

25. Joe Amato
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

it seems pretty certain to me, on the one hand, that labelling a work of literature---poem, novel, what have you---as "experimental" does in fact classify it de facto as directed to somewhat other than mainstream marketplace concerns... as such, i'd expect such a gesture to be at least slightly pejorative, depending on who's mouthing what... it's an attempt, in short, to classify an uncoventional artifact...

the most interesting parallel that comes to my mind (groggy at the moment from a long, deep sleep in a chilly apt. under lots of blankets) is that of democracy, that most "noble" of experiments... the latter word is generally used in a distinctively positive sense when the speaker requires a connotation both of inclusiveness and (potential) disruption... that is, as a way of crediting the pioneering spirit of this mightly land of ours with going forth in the face of adversity blah blah blah...

now why "experimental poetry" (again, not always pejorative) should become a category through which marginalization is facilitated probably has much to do with the sorts of inversions we currently see at work in the tag "policially correct"... initially a tag used in gest by liberals, then a satirical barb aimed at liberals by conservatives, occasionally after (and now) a term adopted by some with straight face, and perhaps in the future and across the board a term used to denote a certain zeal in establishing moral propriety, this word classifies those who are presumably implicated in a debatable standard of behavior... now of course "politically correct" appeals to political realities, and implies something other than 'disruptive' insouciance... which is why i've chosen to gloss it (quickly) in the context of our, uhm, democratic experiment.. .my aim being specifically to imply that "experimental poetry" is generally seen as "politically incorrect" (so to speak) given a backdrop which is, shall we say, less intent on "making it new" (a dubious proposition when applied by fiat) and more intent on "making it fit" (a dubious proposition when applied by fiat)....

apologies for the sandman scattered throughout... my aim has been to draw in the more properly ideological, by way of corresponding political realities... the conjunction is sloppy...

joe

↑ Index

26. Joe Amato
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

---

oh and a belated footnote: that "experimental" for some (whether used pejoratively or no) would seem to connote a measure of apolitical-ness simply reflects the bias toward a certain way of saying politics (or of saying no politics, as the case may be)... that is, the aesthetic is always implicated in those networks of distribution alan refers to, and perhaps subject to the "network economics" analysis suggested in sandra's post...

joe

↑ Index

27. Sandra Braman
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

If we go back to the "techne" notion of art, making in all its senses, then the concept of experimentation applies as much to poetics as to engineering . . . . Sandra Braman

↑ Index

28. Nick Lawrence
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

> Take the absurd category of something called "language" poetry. Somebody explain to me what that means and what it's usefulness is

Language Poetry (not to be confused w/ L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E poetry, "Language" poetry, & language poetry, among other designators) is an historically specific term designating the poetry written by Bruce Andrews in New York City, though not outside it, in the period extending from 1980 to 1983. Considerable controversy surrounds the exact placing of Language Poetry's inception after the demise of "language-oriented poetry" & its supersession by such movements as "social expressionism." See my article "'I Guess Work the Time Up': Periodizing Language Poetry within the Reagan Administration's First 100 Days," forthcoming in _Poetics Yesterday_, in which I argue that the usefulness of our taxonomic terms can only be realized by pressing their absurdity to some kind of limit. Anyone working on the category "metaphysical poetry" in this vein should contact me privately so we can share findings.

↑ Index

29. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

Alan Sondheim writes:
>

> But if a poem could "test" a language, this would imply, first, that > there is a paradigmatic or otherwised notion of language, and second, > that the poem could be falsifiable, vis-a-vis Popperian analysis. An > experiment in science, if it is successful, produces results, which are > generally a filtering of evidence in a logically well-defined manner. If > poetry is to have value beyond the didactic, its strength is elsewhere.
>
> Alan

But perhaps an experiment in poetry could produce meaningful results, but according to different criteria, i.e. other than "a filtering of evidence in a logically well-defined manner." There is also the question of how true it is that that is what science does. How much "scientific" activity makes more sense as a language game, a discursive "testing" of images and metaphors?

Another angles: When i look at poetic development over time, say tracing a lineage i'm interested in, like that from Pound/Williams modernism to the Objectivists to the New Americans to the Language (or now, according to Charles, Innovative) Writers (And i am aware that every one of those labels is problematic, as is the notion of "lineage"--which wld surely have to accommodate as much rupture as continuity)--anyway, when i look at that development i see something like paradigm shifts in the Kuhnian sense.

steve shoemaker
[redacted]

↑ Index

30. Marc Nasdor
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

Mike:

Categories of poets/poetry also serve a functional purpose--self-promotion. Remember strength in numbers? The building of communities? Assembly of like- minded individuals?

Problem is, such categories have a limited shelf life. In the long term, we're all on our own. Anyway, I recall Ron Silliman stating in _The New Sentence_ that every poet finally has his/her own audience, so this would likely apply to groups as well.

The issue of "experimentals" versus "mainstreamers" is another issue, one I believe rooted in the behavior of a number of poetic "control freaks" who for decades have dominated the grant awards, fellowships, teaching jobs, etc. It's still a really small pie, so it's no surprise that turf wars continue. The question is, does anybody care?

Marc Nasdor
[redacted]

↑ Index

31. Robert Kelly
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

Stripped of all the prestiges of professionalism, it isn't a matter of "accumulation of scientific knowledge," but of _seeing what will happen if I do this_. For me, the image of the Experimental Poet (and I agree with MB that the term is not one to like) is not the scientist (mad or otherwise) but that Humble Demiurge, the child in front of the chemistry set. Seeing what happens next when we do this and then do that---that is experiment enough for me. And enough of a practice to justify such a word as experiment. Making new things is good enough a description. Rub two words together.

Best wishes,

Robert Kelly

↑ Index

32. Mark Wallace
Call for Briefs
Mon 24 Oct 1994

Poetic Briefs is looking for short statements, essays, diatribes, confusions on the subject of Clark Coolidge's poetry. And we do mean short-- 1000 words is about the limit (and we prefer 'em shorter than that!)

Send them to:

> Poetic Briefs
> 31 Parkwood St. #3
> Albany, NY 12208

↑ Index

33. Mark Wallace
Poetic Briefs #17
Mon 24 Oct 1994

Poetic Briefs #17 continues its ongoing conversation on such topics as

Language Poetry Bashing
The Prosody of Prose in Language Writing Disjunctiveness and Poetry
Why Do Restricted Economies Exist?
Second Languages and the Poetry of Jorge Guitart

Subscriptions are $10 for six issues.

Send to:

Poetic Briefs
31 Parkwood St. #3, Albany, NY 12208

↑ Index

34. Alan Sondheim

Re: experiwhat?

Mon 24 Oct 1994

On Mon, 24 Oct 1994, Steven Howard Shoemaker wrote:

[my post deleted]
>
> But perhaps an experiment in poetry could produce meaningful results, but > according to different criteria, i.e. other than "a filtering of evidence > in a logically well-defined manner." There is also the question of how > true it is that that is what science does. How much "scientific" activity > makes more sense as a language game, a discursive "testing" of images and > metaphors?

Of course an experiment _in_ poetry would produce meaningful results - for example, computer poetry, or writing without the letter 'e' or trying a new style. I'd argue that _every_ poem produces meaningful results. But this is different than the _category_ of experimental poetry.

I guess this isn't the place for philosophy of science, but I believe in a core-theoretical approach, neo-platonic entities, etc. Scientific _activity_ is definitely a game, as are research proposals/trajectories, but I'm separating that from experimentalism proper, or the hard-core mathematization at the heart of, say, string theory or fundamental particle physics.

If you do an experiment _in_ poetry, you want the results to be desirable somewhere along the line, i.e. "does this work for you," "does this seem to mean anything," "what do you think of this poem?". (Couldn't decide on the punctuation there.) But this is different than a body of work with the label, which implies one is really just testing the waters. I think I would also argue that an experiment _in_ poetry is not experimental poetry - it's in the latter that I find the word "experiment" problematic. One could, for example, say to a sixth-grade class, "let's do a poetry experiment," and the students would probably understand.

>
> Another angles: When i look at poetic development over time, say tracing > a lineage i'm interested in, like that from Pound/Williams modernism to > the Objectivists to the New Americans to the Language (or now, according > to Charles, Innovative) Writers (And i am aware that every one of those > labels is problematic, as is the notion of "lineage"--which wld surely > have to accommodate as much rupture as continuity)--anyway, when i look > at that development i see something like paradigm shifts in the Kuhnian > sense.

I've always had troubles with "paradigm," taking into account the criticism that it was used at least 27 different ways in the original book. Be that as it may, a think of "paradigm" vis-a-vis physics as a mostly fixed set of relations; I just don't see that in the history of poetry, which might be better interpreted along the lines of flows, nomadicisms, impediments, turbulence, etc. - a fluid/mechanical approach drawing from Irigaray and Deleuze-Guattari. Also the demographics are different wildly - during the Language Writers (etc.) period, most poets, I'd say 99% of them, were ignoring them. Styles have always proliferated wildly in the humanities, art historians notwithstanding, and I don't think there is ever a dominant one at any period.,

Alan

> steve shoemaker
> [redacted]

↑ Index

35. Tony Green
Re: Call for Briefs
Mon 24 Oct 1994

Dear Mark,
I've been meaning to write about the book you gave me yonks ago in Buffalo, but ..... However, 1000 on C.C. is a nice thot. I'll be setting up the drum-kit and bashing out the necessary.
Best, Tony

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,

University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

36. Joel Kuszai
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 24 Oct 1994

I've always liked the term "experimental," as opposed to the term "language centered" or language writing, or what-have- you, because - to follow Sandra Bramen's reference to Techne, which I get from Mary Heidegger, what is comes into existence revealing what it is. Anyone who would then rely on the experimental as a locating device would be hard-pressed to say that it meant anything except that they didn't know what they were doing. The "experiment" therefore for me is scientific and would demonstrate that one is attempting to do something without an awareness of the materials. The historical significance of language quote poetry is for real to me, insofar as the project there was a quite conscious and serious attempt to resist the normative functions of those materials. I don't see much experimenting there - either historically or in the present works by those people who were responsible for that episode in American Letters. But there was a resistance there which has been lost by the inheritors of those same "innovators" and what is disturbing to me is how those practices are grouped rather blandly under the rubric of experiment, as if such a term somehow validated the practice of giving up one's own relation to the production of texts. In other words, what is so often referred to as experiment falters insofar as it becomes an excuse to "inherit" the technical innovations of a previous revolutionary party. It was a good party, but the terms and requirements of the present age demand something better. The 4th and 5th generation language poets, rather than resisting the normative functions of language, instead invoke - as permissive - previous technical developments while constructing texts which rely on the empty authority of the experiment in order to cover-up for the lack of "meaning" or at least "intention". When I look at the poetry of some of my contemporaries, I often am surprised to see what looks like "auto-matic-drip" writing, a kind of poetry that seems to indicate a subconscious relation to meaning - and under the guise of "experiment" it always makes me laugh that people are willing to submit their texts to readers without having read them themselves. Experiment, then, would mean a lazy and subconscious drifting through the language environment.

When I see those experimenters coming at me down the street, I try to cross and walk on the opposite sidewalk. It always helps if they are carrying a sign.

↑ Index

37. Roberts Mark

Overland

Mon 24 Oct 1994

> From John=[redacted] Mon Oct 24 17:40:01 1994
> Date: Mon, 24 Oct 1994 17:35:42 -0500 (EST)
> From: John=[redacted]
> Subject: re: Listings FORWARD
> To: [redacted]
> Cc:
> Status: R
>
> Overland, Australia's radical nationalist literary quarterly, continues to be edited by John McLaren and published with the assistance of VUT. The most recent issue was Spring 1994, and contained, as well as poetry, sotries and reviews, essays by Syd Harrex, Satendra Nandan, and McKenzie Wark, a photo-essay, The Masked Walkers of Prague', by Jiri Tibor NOvak, 'Song for an Exile' by Ouyang Yu, essays on writing for the theatre in Australia, a critical analysis of the culture industry by Donald Brook, and the first of John Herouvim's Overland Round Tables. Available for $28 for twelve months from PO Box 14146, MMC, Melbourne Vic 3000. (US Subscription price is Aus60)

Mark Roberts
SIS Liaison Officer
Student Information & Systems Office Ph 02 [redacted]
University of NSW Sydney Australia Fax 02 [redacted]

↑ Index

38. Robert Drake

Re: Listings, Burning Press

Tue 25 Oct 1994

BURNING PRESS is an eclectic sprawl of projects including TapRoot Reviews, artist books, audio tapes, a Poetry Hotline, and poetry magazines & chapbooks. Work ranges from "traditional" poetry to avant-garde, and scope ranges from the local to international. All publications can be ordered from Burning Press, PO Box 585, Lakewood OH 44107.

A selected list:

TAPROOT REVIEWS is a quarterly overview of out-of-th-mainstream publications literatures and other arts. Each issue features short blurb reviews of a wide variety of poetries, as well as longer feature articles on particular artists, publishers, or tendencies. The most recent, #5 includes 300 reviews, and features on avant-garde poetries from Russia and Argentina; books by Ivan Aguelles, Bill Luoma, and Nathaniel Mackey; recent translations from the French, and publishers Found Street and WhiteWall of Sound. $2.50 issue/$10.00 year.

TAPROOT REVEIWS ELECTRIC EDITION (TRee) reprints the short blurb-reviews (but not the feature articles) in electronic form. e-mail subscriptions are free from <[redacted]>, back issues are available at the Electronic Poetry Center.

 we are currently accepting reviews for the next issue   contact editor luigi-bob drake at the above address for info ***

chapbook/magazines:

ANALPHABET by Geof Huth (industrial Japanese binding) $10.00
QUEEN OF CUPS by Amy Bracken Sparks $5.00
MOUTH WATCH by Kristen Ban Tepper $3.50
TapRoot #31/32--"SpiralRoot," co-edited w/ John M. Bennett (rivet binding, 24 rotating "pages") $10.00
NARCOTIC SIGNATURE by Thomas Wiloch (keyring binding) $2.50
KYOO by Nico Vassilakis $2.50
CLEVELAND SLAM BOOK by Amy Sparks, Michael Salinger, Kristen Ban Tepper & Ben Gulyas $3.50
TapRoot #26--"Word/space" featuring Hannah Weiner, Jake Berry, John Byrum, & geof huth $5.00
WAS AH by John M. Bennett $3.50
INVISIBLE ARIA by Tom Beckett (embossed covers) $3.50
TapRoot #22--"Colaborative Writing" 2.50
BABBALLY by Miekal And (multisection book, cassette tape, & 30x42" poster) $15.00
FLOWERS OF MEL by Andrew Klimek (phonic transdaption of Baudelaire) $3.50

forthcoming:

FRESH OIL, LOOSE GRAVEL by Major Ragain
TERMINAL by Mark Ezra
I, A SERIES... by Mark DuCharme
SWARMS OF FUGUE by Jake Berry HELLISH HOURDES... by Fabio Doctorovich

audio tapes:

RECURRING IRRITATIONS DOCUMENT #1: sound poetry in performance by Gary Barwin & Stuart Ross, and by John M. Bennett w/ Jime Wiese & Byron Smith $5.00
OBLONG by Terry Durst (words & sculpture) w/ Dennis Maxfield (guitar & sampler) $5.00
HEADS/TALES by the BackYard Mechanix fr Language (Kristen Ban Tepper & luigi-bob drake) $3.50
CLEVELAND LANGUAGE (TapRoot #19/20) includes: Semiotic Liberation Orchestra, Jordan Davis, Charlotte Pressler, luigi, Kristen Ban Tepper, Terry Durst, Major Ragain, BackYard Mechanix, Frank Green, Dan Thompson, Endangered Specie Trio, Tom Mulready, & Joan Deveny $5.00
TEXT/TEXTURE (TapRoot #5/6) includes Susan Frykbert, Pennie Stasik, Kristen Ban Tepper, Costes Cassette, Elizabeth Was, Tekst, Beth Learn, Charlotte Pressler, John M. Bennett, Bob Ebersole, Miekal And, Paula Potocki, & Joan Devney. $5.00

* * *

In the belief that "poetic community" extends to shared physical location as well as shared aesthetic, we also produce several projects w/ a specifically local focus. The _Cleveland Leaves_ series features poets from a variety of backgrounds, and intends to build bridges across factions and isolated sub-groups. The first 4 in the series:

BLACK EYED by Mary Weems
EYE OF THE STORM by Mykel D. Myles
ONE RING CIRCUS by Steve Melton
LIP SERVICE by Celeste McCarty

All _Cleveland Leaves_ chapbooks are 12 pages, $1.50 + .50 postage.

We are also involved with an ongoing project to document local micro- press activity, covering northeast Ohio and spanning the last 30 years. The initial catalog of the archive included 1,000+ entries.

Finally, the IN-YR-EAR FREE POETRY HOTLINE provides another venue for local aural poetry. By calling [redacted], listeners can hear local poets reading their own poems--the recording changes every week or so.

luigi-bob drake, editor
TRR/Burning Press

↑ Index

39. Ron Silliman
Re: absurd category
Tue 25 Oct 1994

You wrote:

Take the absurd category of something called "language" >poetry. Somebody explain to me what that means and what it's >usefulness is outside of hand to hand combat with some other >equally absurd category called "mainstream".

The category IS absurd.

People had been using a wide variety of terms to indicate a movement within poetry (movement in the tidal/glacial sense more than in the civil rights movement sense), particularly w/in the New American Poetry tradition, since about '70. Grenier had proposed "nonreferential formalism" by at least '72, Perelman was trying "steady state," Michael Davidson & Bruce Andrews had both used formulations with the word "language" in it, but the reality was there was no name and everyone involved new there was a real creative tension between what we were doing and poets who saw themselves much more strictly "within" a given New American tendency. (A couple of editors of the St Marks Newsletter during the 70s, for example, simply refused to acknowledge our existence and would list every single contributor to a publication like The World EXCEPT myself, Watten, Andrews, Bernstein, etc.It had a Kafka-esque quality to it, and I won't say that we did not react emotionally to that sort of behavior.)

But the LP name was attached as a label to a number of poets after the Poetry Flash special issue on same (May of '79), where it was used by two of the authors, Steve Abbott, who was simply looking for a shorthand term, and Alan Soldofsky who was looking to denounce whatever it was that was new. So it was not unlike the Fauvists being called "beasts" or the "Beats" having been named by a newspaper columnist with very similar intentions to Soldofsky's.

Not surprisingly, everybody's reaction to the term for the first five years was to deny its existence or that he or she was a LP (I heard the term LangPo at Naropa this summer, and I rather like that variation). Other people threw out alternatives, such as Watten's Social Formalism (still the best and most inclusive term, since the term language poetry suggests a focus that was never so sharply fixed as the category makes it seem).

One of the reasons the term stuck was the magazine, of course, but I think also that another reason was precisely everybody's defensive reaction to it. It was/is a tease.

Tinker Greene used to say "the only way to tell a language poet is that they deny being a language poet." I used to counter that with "anybody is an LP who has been attacked as an LP" although admittedly even Jorie Graham has been attacked for her LP proclivities.

But as a marketing device, there is no question that the term had profound (and generally positive, to our surprise and I suspect to the frustration of Soldofsky & those who agreed w/ him that what was absurd was our poetry) impacts on all our lives.

Lately, the naming game I've heard most has been for the nexus around Lew Daley, Pam Rehm, Kristen Prevallet, Will Alexander, Alan Gilbert, Elizabeth Robinson et al.

Terms that I heard used at Naropa for that nexus included:
The Christian Language Poets
The New Mysticism
The Buffalo Problem
The New Coasters
and a few others (I wrote them down as I heard them).
Whatever one thinks of the writing (my position is that some is interesting, some is not, just like everything else), they certainly have created a sense of collective unity as to make people want to join them into a noun phrase, whatever it might mean.

I'm generally intrigued at this process of naming. What does it mean that 17 generations of the New York School keep getting called New York School. Just how New York is it when someone like Lee Ann Brown, with that terrific southern accent and dividing her time between Providence & Boulder, becomes a central mover?

All language is very close to the act of naming, as my two-year old twins remind me several thousand times a day. But between naming as such an "categorization" enters a whole other level, society.

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

40. Marc Nasdor
Re: experiwhat?
Tue 25 Oct 1994

As far as I'm concerned, writing "experimental" poetry means unhooking onself from the annoying influence of some of one's contemporaries, namely those who would seek to recruit potential acolytes for a declared "project." The true experimenter is the writer who--like a number of "outsider artists" in the visual arts--produce their work via their own "raw vision," but unlike the outsider artists, are not working in total critical and artistic isolation. What I hope such a writer would produce might be defined as something like wisdom if such an old-fashioned term may be used.

It might be interesting for people to give examples of writers who might fit the aforementioned definition. I can think of many who would fit: Oppen, Zukofsky, Stevens, Ashbery, Mayer, Wieners, Eigner, Notley, Raworth...

Well, it could be a long list, but those who I think would not fit my definition might comprise a much longer list.

Regards,

Marc Nasdor
[redacted]

↑ Index

41. Jorge Guitart
EXPERIWHAT LVI
Tue 25 Oct 1994

---

the telling of gedanken experiments may or may not approximate poetry. i want the name experimental poetry for poems that approximate the telling of gedanken experiments that approximate poetry.

↑ Index

42. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: experiwhat?
Tue 25 Oct 1994

Excerpting from Alan Sondheim's post:
>
> I've always had troubles with "paradigm," taking into account the > criticism that it was used at least 27 different ways in the original > book. Be that as it may, a think of "paradigm" vis-a-vis physics as a > mostly fixed set of relations; I just don't see that in the history of > poetry, which might be better interpreted along the lines of flows, > nomadicisms, impediments, turbulence, etc. - a fluid/mechanical approach > drawing from Irigaray and Deleuze-Guattari. Also the demographics are > different wildly - during the Language Writers (etc.) period, most poets, > I'd say 99% of them, were ignoring them. Styles have always proliferated > wildly in the humanities, art historians notwithstanding, and I don't > think there is ever a dominant one at any period.

I'm not real happy with the term "paradigm" either. Certainly, in my proposed example we would be talking about something on smaller scale than say, the Copernican world view. The issue of to what a style can be "dominant" strikes me as a complex one. I continue to think that looking at development over time might be a good way to explore the (limits of) the analogy to science that the whole question of "experimentalism" makes unavoidable. I, for one, would like to hear more about you might apply those notions you mention-- "flows, nomadicisms, impediments, turbulence, etc"--to the problem.

steve

↑ Index

43. Alan Golding
"Susan Howe's Visual Poetics"
Tue 25 Oct 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

At the risk of introducing a mundane bibliographical note to the list's recent "business": for a paper on Susan Howe's visual poetics, I'm interested in critical/theoretical references on questions of page layout/use of page space (and not necessarily ones that make specific reference to Howe, though obviously that would be ideal). (I'm less interested in stuff on concrete poetry, the artist's book, and similar related-but-not-immediately-relevant-for-my-purposes phenomena.) Things I know of include Marjorie Perloff's Radical Artifice, Jerome McGann's Black Riders, much of the material in Frank and Sayre's book on the line, Rachel Blau DuPlessis' Temblor essay on Anne-Marie Albiach (thanks, Rachel, for that ref.)

PS: The notion of the "experimental" may be as much a question of literary sociology and literary history as of poetics, as I think Ron Silliman's posting (that firs came out as "poeting") implies. But then for some years Ron has persuasively been making the argument that poetics may be as much a question of literary sociology as of poetics . . .

↑ Index

44. Patrick Phillips
Re: experiwhat?
Tue 25 Oct 1994

"Experimental" poetry exists just prior to its own substantiation. In this it is kindof a pre-examination, pre-cultural, a pre-thought entity. However, just as you think this the quanta flees. In this moment of thought/flight there is a mechanism heard, a mental, discursive "click" defying experiment - exposed is the the berm of the idea, the edge of the paper, the lip of the petri dish. This mechanism refutes experiment as a damned threshold of poetic action; damned because in that temporal instant, in that discursive click is the notion of a larger experiment - life - flooding in over edge of the paper. So, experimental poetry exists just after its own substantiation. I guess in experiment the tail is chased.

I am reminded of a story of the archetypal theoretical physicist, Wolfgang Pauli, of whom it was said that even his presence in the same town would make experiments go wrong. He said that two similar particles cannot exist in the same state....in an election year, it's hard to believe...

↑ Index

45. kathryne lindberg

Re: "Susan Howe's Visual Poetics"

Tue 25 Oct 1994

Indeed, for a moment, try to separate poetics from sociology. Doing so would presumably put poetry or language in an ontologogically prior position, back there before language, as it were? Perhaps one would less silly trying to separate (log)ology from the social?

Experimental usually means somehing like neo-, a concept which certainly relies on the pre=existence of something close enough for the new or experimental to be measured against, usually by those sociologically prepared or clued not to guffaw.

↑ Index

46. Alan Sondheim

Re: experiwhat?

Wed 26 Oct 1994

On Tue, 25 Oct 1994, Steven Howard Shoemaker wrote:
>
> I'm not real happy with the term "paradigm" either. Certainly, in my > proposed example we would be talking about something on smaller scale > than say, the Copernican world view. The issue of to what > a style can be "dominant" strikes me as a complex one. I continue to think > that looking at development over time might be a good way to explore > the (limits of) the analogy to science that the whole question of > "experimentalism" makes unavoidable. I, for one, would like to hear > more about you might apply those notions you mention-- "flows, nomadicisms, > impediments, turbulence, etc"--to the problem.
>

> steve
>
I would think looking at poetries as discursive formations, style-flows rather than styles - bringing into play everything from gossip, rumor, seminar, book, poem, neighborhood, to letters, manifestos, critiques, those regions of writing that seem to articulate communality. And on another level (or the same) to see poetry as an embodiment or excess of the poet herself/himself, as momentary stases or irruptions in other discourses (which would also be discourses of the other - again, talking to someone else, discussing with someone else). I'm more comfortable with these notions, which are related to the aphoristic (i.e. fragmentation, accumulation), rather than well-defined "moments" - in spite of the fact that the latter is prevalent in cultural historiography - for example, the art history slide lecture. It's interesting that one of the most powerful cultural forces is the _body_ of the poet, I think personally of Creeley, Mayer, early Saroyan, Coolidge, Notley, etc. not to mention Olson's breaths, Einzig, etc., how they play (themselves) out within the cultural, and of course Ginsberg, Byron, Brown, one could go on forever.

Alan

↑ Index

47. keith tuma
"experimental"
Wed 26 Oct 1994

I'm grateful for the discussion of the use and abuse of "experimental," which seems to have raised this list from the dead. I'm with Ron Silliman on the absurd but real force of such labels, wanted or unwanted, tactical or not. I suspect that in common usage the term involves a claim towards "real" or "true" or "genuine" or "important" contemporaneity. Who was it that said that, try as we may, we have a hard time escaping Hegel?

While I am fascinated by the discussion of the appropriateness and the attendant anxieties of analogies with science and technology, I would also be interested in hearing from people who know something about the use of parallel or related labels outside of North America. What, for instance, is Hiromi Ito's work "called" in Japan? What conveniences, shorthand, or academic reductionisms describe work we might casually or sloppily call "experimental" in Germany, in Bolivia, in Ghana? This might begin to tell me something about the extent to which American or North American interests are underwriting or overdetermining the use, misuse, and confusion of the term "experimental" in the construction of taste here (US) and now.

Just a question then. Also, a citation, which may or may not be useful or entertaining, from Pound's "Prefatio Aut Cimicium Tumulus," circa 1932: "As for experiment: the claim is that without constant experiment literature dies. Experiment is ONE of the elements necessary to its life. Experiment aims at writing that will have a relation to the present analogous to the relation which past masterwork had to life of its time." Thus my own "claim" about "common usage" involving rhetorics of contemporaneity and the narrative or historiographical logics these imply.

--Keith Tuma

↑ Index

48. log hacker

Re: "experimental"

Wed 26 Oct 1994

To take off in another direction, the study of labels themselves is pretty revealing . . . currently completing a study of the history of US constitutional law on labelling that reveals it to be a significant trigger of the hyperreal . . . . The information and the material object become decreasingly attached either referentially or physically; bureaucratic definitions of cultural experience clash with cultural/historic/traditional definitions (when is a sausage a sausage, after all?); and notions of facticity slip from referentiality to functionality to ephemerally utilitarian, becoming dispersed across space and only fractally determinable. Perhaps the same thing is happening with labels for poets?
Sandra Braman

↑ Index

49. Patrick Phillips

Re: "experimental"

Wed 26 Oct 1994

As I am in the process of editing an international anthology of "experimental poetry" I have found the rubric quickly falls on apart. What cultural containment "experimental" proposes, must be quickly torn open once I venture into Ito Hiromi's poetry. "Experiment's" relationship to a "masterwork" is overshadowed by the effects of cultural hegemony which proposes a violent foil for the "pregnant and lactating body" that Ito writes. I suppose when Keith asks what is Ito's poetry called, he shouts across this masterwork/pregnant body breach, across post Meiji industrial expansion without really intending on asking what "experimental" is. I think his question appears more in the form of: How do you call Ito's poetry? Just How do you call Nina Ishkrenko's poetry, or to jump the gender breach, Hiriade Takashi's, or to jump back across the Pacific, and into the US, how would "we" call Paul Beatty's poetry experimental?

The engagement of experiment as having to somehow exist within a relation to the masterwork shows the cultural fatigue of the term. My approach is simply to renegotiate the reason for experiment in language given the terms and historical conditions of the society in which it takes place. For example, the Swahili poetry being _written_ in Tanzania is itself experimental by virtue of the fact that up until the Germans colonized Tanzania Swahili was only an _oral_ language. This written poetry, though quite formally rigid, writes against and with both the tide of orality and of colonial history.

Thanks Keith.

Pat

as an etymological reach: experiment is derived from:

PER (pronounced PEER). Important derivatives are: fear, peril, experience, experiment, expert, pirate, empiric.
PER. To try, risk (< "to lead over," "press forward").
1. Lengthened grade *per-. FEAR, from Old English faer, danger, sudden calamity, from Germanic *feraz, danger.
2. Suffixed form *peri-tlo-. (PARLOUS), PERIL, from Latin periclum, periculum, trial, danger.
3. Suffixed form *per-yo-. EXPERIENCE, EXPERIMENT, EXPERT, from Latin experiri, to try, learn by trying
4. Suffixed form *per-ya. PIRATE; EMPIRIC, from Greek peira, trial, attempt.

↑ Index

50. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH

(no subject)

Wed 26 Oct 1994

---

dear Poetics,

After the longish "poem" below there are some "pages" of commentary-- which I'd love to discuss further if anyone's interested. Seems somehow related to experimatters-- would love to see other "readings" of this piece here, and a discussion on the question raised at the end. thanks!

Technopoetics '94: Present & Future Considerations of the Word <1.>

note the homunculus?
Maybe.
between the ampersand & questionmark

Footnotes: <1.> A continuation of a previous essay, "Takes a Lot of Voices to Sing a Millenial Song", _I Am a Child: Poetry After Bruce Andrews and Robert Duncan_ (Buffalo: Tailspin, 1994). The subtitle is a passage excerpted from a preliminary encounter with David Kushner on SonicNet. Prepared specifically for a panel on "Technologies of Language" at the annual conference of the Popular Culture Association In The South and American Culture Association In The South, 23 October, 1994, Charlotte, NC. <2.> In the essay "Technology, Scholarship, and the Humanities: The Implications of Electronic Information", Vartan Gregorian discusses his concerns about the fragmentation of knowledge and how information technologies allow us to organize ourselves into too many separate, specialized communities: "What is being created is less like a village than an entity that reproduces the worst aspects of urban life: the ability to retreat into small communities of the like- minded, safe not only from unnecessary interactions with those whose ideas and attitudes are not like their own, but safe from having to relate our interests and results to other communities." (_Leonardo_, Vol. 27, No. 2, p. 131, 1994). <3.> This event was hosted by SonicNet, a dial-up network service in NYC. Various people were involved with the proceedings over the course of the evening and are the voices in the CYBERSLAM. Names given by the authors: Spiro (NYC), Bob Holman (NYC), Moderator SonicNet (NYC), Lo-Ki (NYC), Cyberbabe (London, UK), Veronica (NYC), Regie (NYC), Chris Funkhouser (Albany, NY), David Kushner (NYC), Lori (LA), Robert Molochon (NYC), Blue Water (NYC), Harry Goldstein (NYC), Janis (El Paso, TX), Crow (Cambridge, MA), Skaska (NYC), Doug Cooper (NYC). Initials indicating which author wrote which lines has been removed from the text presented here, though the identifications do exist in other versions of this transcript. <4.> For readers unfamiliar with the concept of a poetry "slam", it is a recent incarnation of poetry founded in Chicago but popularized by the Nuyorican Poets' Cafe in Manhattan. The genre mainly thrives in nightclubs and rock'n'roll settings where authors read poems and are given scores by audience members. A poetry tournament might be another way to describe this type of event, were it not for the fact that typically audiences are generally quite interactive with the poets, often to the point of verbal aggression. <5.> "Congratulations. You Have Found/The Hidden Book.", _ALOUD: Voices From the Nuyrican Poets Cafe_, p. 1-2 (New York: Henry Holt & Co., 1994).

As textual fields expand to include cyberspace, there are various reasons why attention must be paid to what is written in the introduction to _Convivio: A Journal of Poetics [Number One]_: "Poetics is a labor and a threshold where we are working to make an actual thing...," which "is a continual reformation.... Above all it treats of inclusion,...poetics, 'in the plural,' as Robert Duncan says." As we continually face technology (television, automobiles and computers and digital intermedia), the work, our actions, must be pluralized in order to maximize the potentials of technology and not let its presence contribute to further social fragmentation.<2.>

The text which follows was excerpted from an October 10, 1994 application of mutual composition technology, created through home computers and a dialup network. Regardless of its qualities as a piece of art, such a text is essentially something more than a piece of writing (though it was composed on keyboards), or a book (though it is preserved by computer disc). As literature begins to blend with other forms and other media, new forms and types of collaboration emerge:

> Live from NYC's Lower East Side
> NUYO RECORDS' GRAND SLAM - > POETRY AS BLOODSPORT!!!! <3.>
>
> Join the national slam champions and host > Bob Holman of the legendary Nuyorican Poets' Cafe > for the galaxy's first CYBERSLAM.<4.>
>
> Press Any Key

Before entering this conference room you should know a few things...

> 1: When you first enter your presence will be announced to > everyone in the room. DO NOT TYPE ANYTHING when you enter > the conference room, just wait and watch to see who is > talking and what is being discussed.
>
> 2: Understand that what you type on your screen only appears > to everyone else when you press Enter to `send' it. This > means you can use backspace and delete to correct things, > but it also means that people may be WAITING to see what you > are typing. To avoid long waits, interruptions, and > confusion, type like this:
>
> Type short bits... > end in "dot dot dot" ...
> press "Enter" every few words...
> and when done...
> end with...
> your initials, like this. DN
>
> 3. Wait until the person before you has entered their > initials before you hit "Enter".
>
> This will allow us to all .. to see & read each other..
>
> Also the following commands may be useful:

/q Quit - leave the conference room
/w Who's online
/s Send a private message see /help for details

ANYTHING YOU TYPE WHICH IS NOT PREFACED WITH A FORWARD SLASH CHARACTER (/) WILL BE DISPLAYED TO ALL OTHER USERS IN CONFERENCE WITH YOU! For this reason, TYPE CAREFULLY!

Enjoy the conference...

Angel! I aimest at the site of love, a crown of born, a shift to lift. Ala the boom!
boomalay boo m'lay BOOM is a young poets deity defining the words of sound to mouth to ear to cyberspace Bloodsport is an excellent adjectivery on an anti-columbus day
No, there is a world of living world of living in the livingroom Stereo? what sound rocket a racket
finger chickkle chickle
Airy aereo.
Ticket the pocket of sound.

Who's winning?
Files are denial
walk a mile to a truckstop subway bluyes tune tella Bit Jack and Mega Bit jill Glub glub the view from down here is blue telephoney congress on capital hill telea promt start me make a simple man beg..
tella phone send me
for a cup o' tea (tela com heare me with a pot of
...
Da stars the sun work stations reaching for the....
Duckegg Peking? never, never...
Bejing

Duckeggs in the womb of my mother board the third is a world that disturbs me

Come back dear heart of thread
Oh yes it is none to heither for me either.
Oh my breaking heart (o the melodrama)
A tangerine scene bakes the loaf
:::Asks same question:::
A lemon steals the show Gone to Haiti, Matey
a t & t steals the show,...
Drain my teeth of hell upon a branch of C

like a thief at a morrocan market
Holy Jupiter
indian lit room heart has been severed and munch up into chunks of liver for the cats
Like a poet with a dictionary for a toothpick
I can't keep the space between my teeth

tastier joining in...

like a dead duck down the drink delicious, delicious

proverbs in progress

the madder magazine
If your parents.. could send messages back to themselves
|
Made you wear plaid...
They never truly ...
what's happening with yr video?
Loved you :)
ducks on the panelling fortitude fibrulation put your kilt back on, cracked shell mauve plangent longly distance blade runners
I've heard of a few.

The spineless kind?
a spire?

single frame buzz dump
Con-Spire
In spire
implosion diesel pram perambulating miss placed frogs that hop in the snow
I stick
is there any way i can send what i write back to myself as it fits
in real time with the conversation?
the blockhead men in the Ocean of know
HEY EVERYONE...
|
TRY TO HAVE SOME ORDER.
jagged and figged stone faced and frigged huddled up bunched up broken and twisted!!!!!
NO ONE TALK...
LET'S SEE IF THIS WORKS...

OKAY...
REG IS UP...
goregiegoregiegoregiego
ARE YOU READY...
GET SET...
|
EVERYONE ELSE...
SHAD UP...
REGIE...
YOU'RE ON.
REGIE?
HMM... love cycles: elevating the human experience in poetry is a pick-up device
But when I get the guy I want
I always get new material
huh?
7.6
4?
who's judge?
.02!

too short. want more.
who's the jury?
love always gets a +.
aFFECTED
UPON ME
LIKE A SUN SPLASH DAY
tHE WORD IS ELUSIVE Feels like I should REACH UP And choke the sky Put the words back in my throat
but I realise
HEY, HOW BOUT SOME MEANING WITH THE FEELING is that it?!!
while the storm dies You can't scream without a voice and even
I think that's the pot calling the kettle Blackman,
SOMEONE HAS TAKEN CONTROL OF MY KEYBOARD
If you could
Ma bell baby bell edipousrex teleos Anarcey spitting out text Tella prompt start me tellaport send Me tella bit tell me Telephone will me
tella man fear me TeleCom HEAR ME!!!!
            Video one way
Who would listen?
yeah!
AWWW...

SCORES?
a 9.2 in my ahem new book
3
100,000,000+ on the "john lily scale"
||
9.2

Tell it to the porpoise, noise man
WHO'S NEXT?
OKAY, AN 8.5
um who's keepin score?
I AM
howzabout a pome

o
TAKIN' NAMES
Ohhhhh

nope I'm at Jupiter CHICKEN NAMES

sink to the floor
thank you
ohhhh, so it is that dogs sing in the bull pen dog
dog dog
rf-rf-rf
you no way! Tellen you two way tellen you my way Tella Bit Jack and Mega bit Jill Tella phoney congerss on capital hill Tellla BYTE!!!!
Tella fangs of trust press against americas Neck the rivers of anticipation suckle my inner bum-rumpus nice last line blue.

8.456
rf-rf-rf
That was really doggy style.
I dug the dog. 8.8
me too
I dug the hole
i dug the sink

Tella lack of vision
What is this all mean rrfrrf
Tella Joysticks for tv

Tella lemings to the Sea
I have to go all my lungs re reversed, green is mean.
love handles on TV's, right next to the volume nob Tella KidJunkies cant get free nothing mean, promise, not at all...
Tella Gentic Chrildern caught in a Dead static RAIN>>>>>>

I supersoniced from base control.
(how do you do pvt messages??)
Next poem?
anybody?

TYPE /S, THEN THE LINE NUMBER, A SPACE, AND A MESSAGE
ANY QUESTIONS? TYPE /H FOR HELP.
One Way of Looking at a Blackbird
That is no bird

Runs in to the wall and bounces back
That is a window
And a Tiny little brick.
reportage from the grim front

"the Heart the Heart REMBEMBER the Dead Don't Share" what about the avuncular driver's seat?

cuz we like like it loud here ooooooo

wants to hear water gurgle
FOR YOU...
NO ANSWERS ARE LIKE NO REVIEWS...
AND YOUR POEMS... are like fish naughty
IN A MOMENT OF EXQUISITE TENSION
Caught, smoked, and hooked
LIFE MAY LEAVE A STAIN
On the phone. sorry!
ON THE MOMENT...
NO EXCUSES...
WE'RE WAITING...
ARE YOU READY?
On the phone, be back in a minute. carry one.
AWW... or two TO BUSY?...
THIS LITTLE POET GOT SOLD!..
HOW ABOUT YOU LO KI?
THIS LITTLE POET THINKS HE'S A ROCKSTAR!.....
WHILE THAT POET OVER DERE
this short slug's gotten a bad rap runs in the room and wacks you with a huge sausage! WACK!
GOT OLD AND SICK AND POOR
this is just as exclusive
THE DRAFT UPWIND CAN ONLY LEAVE IN IT'S WAKE
Sad roman a clef, s-man. Clues?
THE SHAFT
Shaesh
Ezra Pound?

so i scream what of it oh, gefilte fish on corn bread shinfat
shinfat
hi

x

x
toads trade children by the pond side like greasy villians from some low grade how about a poem?
Their it is ok
buttered soy corners

THE END
ahem
is just the beginning

where's the guy from the Real World?
"The Dead Don't share through they reach toward us from the grave..
(and I Swear they Do!) They do not hand Us their Hearts they Hand Us
their Heads the Part that Stairs.
Infinity Plus - topical, erratic, and genius!
Ras
binky shot hisself in da foot feet of pork meat with a shape

lumpy whitefish sandwich kosher, pleeeez
OKAY, EVERYONE...
LET'S HAVE SOME QUIET...
This poem is called ART IN ARCHITECTURE
HE'S READY, I THINK...
<<<<<<<<<<<<@--triangular tumor +OP Dart sneckle dart sneckle im bis

Could Frank Lloyd Wright create better structure what lies

| between my lover and I is where the similar transcends the seven wonders of the world
Twin Towers in white sheets how his slopes against my teeth- a mini skyscraper reating on muscle body rocks a |ted body rocks a cultivated landscape falling like babel

--69 six or nine
I wish it was longer.
I decided to keep it short and sweet!
Sometimes you've got to work with what you've got it's like watching textual tv.

I just download Ripterm and installed and and i get a error about i actually am gently fascinated by Why do you want a Poem??? our fond feathered friends of less means than ordinary fowl
you on the wrong planet
because we're slammin tell me how to fix that index thing... and i will get you a cool poem..
but we'll settle for a screenplay
I like this medieval barter system: poetry for online tech support pardon us whilst we resolve technical difficultures so do anybody use Ripterm?

i like this medieval feudal system does
!

or is that Marxian dialectic?
Of course.

ducal dynasty dashes down alliterative alluvial anality a poem
Ucz(SvI-{] /./_CH-,= &v1X/NJ\uNL<ct>xf> lYG=
o]H`Z,[Nzp":)cGDBqXDp0"pV,UYC`x~_4{7r5|[p`4 consonative cacaphonous coddywaddle the wire
i sense terrible confusion dissonant dastardly digital diddling in your tea leaves
hi
mr minor majestic misfit or anomaly?

nekkid nacreous narcosis scintillating psychotic cyborg

snarkle sniffer sneezes skank down toilet loping leprachaun leaps litigious lollipop oh, snuffer shall we speak of a live skull?

or a giant sand?
m?
A giant sand...

I am ageless.
be back
as the kite flies, then... from the grain dirty rags piled candles burnin'
in the corner,
i don't know if i can breathe tomorrow
can make it to tuesday

the sound always depends on the instrument blown sibilance over radio hiss

that radio love that radio simian ducks shave

invert the lines
whoever you ares...

to be a "real"

* * * *

In the Invocation to the recent anthology ALOUD: Voices From the Nuyorican Poets Cafe <5.>, co-editor Bob Holman writes, "This book dares to state the obvious--RAP IS POETRY--and its spoken essence is central to the popularization of poetry...Now all technology bows to the poem itself, the singular voice rising above the pablum noise of a society filled with blandspeak, the political blahblah, commercial absurdwords..." A Rap style of poetry, which moves towards making language sound with its rhymes its flashy know-it-all attitude, clearly predominates our Cyberslam transcript. Much of this type of poetry deals with mutual and uncommon aspects of americana, what is happening in domesticated as well as street lives. As with any text, varying measures of gratification are possible as a result of the Cyberslam, depending on one's poetics predisposition. Critically, one might read this piece as falling into the large pool of an already available casual cheap-joke type of poetry which so much "successful" alternative verse has moved towards in recent years. The stylistic homogeneity of the Cyberslam is almost a surprise given that there were at least a dozen authors stretching across six thousand miles of hemisphere attending to the composition.

However, looking closely at the preceedings we can see elements such as concrete poetry emerging, anarchic enjambment and blatant interruption (poetic terrorism?), dada, improvisatory call and response and other derivative forms (such as humor) beneath the surface of a popular lyric form. These blends give something particular to the text, in addition to the fact that it is the first known occasion where poetry has been presented and composed by numerous authors spanning the globe in real time. Still, given the lack of a structural hierarchy and precedent, and its relative homogeneity, this writing remains unaffected by the technological apparatus, embodying more or less the same liguistic territory as the american english which pervades much of popular culture. Though there are certain points where conversation or randomness offer new dimensions, where two "poems" blend into one expanded, there remains a narrative of individuation where the scope and possibility of the poem remain contained by its simplified language and topical narrowness. As poetic purpose and usage of these mechanisms begin to take shape, future writings in this domain could be heightened by meaning and focus (following one course of aesthetic), or at least become more broadly informed by a span of conscientious poets and thinkers. Obviously, due to the newness of the technology and the numbers and varieties of people not yet hooked up with digital/computer or network resources, there is still a great deal of progress to be made in coming to terms with the potentials of the machinery.

As a poetry "slam", it is difficult to imagine such competitions going over well in cyberspace until interactive audio and video terminals are available to all participants. In a face-to-face atmosphere, the speaker's voice is generally continuous in spite of jeers, though is generally not interrupted as song. On distanced screens we are unable to avoid disruption by textual terrorists able to inject to the conference language as an agency of chaos, without regard to the protocols of writing which flash on the screen before you enter the conference room. Such disruption is appropriate, perhaps, in many cases, but were it ever to be conceived of as an organized event, programmers would need to find way for the poet to instantly transport blocks of text from computer to network conferences. A few practice sessions for perspective writers might also help sharpen the dialog.

Of course, at the start we are told to "enjoy" the conference. Perhaps that is what we are left with: a poetry of momentary enjoyment. It is evident that we are now just starting to feel our way through the early stages of this process distantly clicking fingertips drumming typing the future. Without imposing penalty on disruptive participants (which I wouldn't suggest as an option, needless to say), the genre as we read it today will most benefit poetry's thrill and pleasure seekers and others who have the interest to indulge.

The for(u)m, as is, allows for too much physically and visually unstimulating "down" time on and, for the writer/reader in front of the screen. It possesses value as curiosity and underdeveloped experiment. Despite one writer's comment during the event about it nature as "textual tv", there are many strides to be made before poetry accesses itself to the mainstream from computer to computer. We definitely miss the "spoken essence" Holman refers to in conjuntion with _ALOUD_, as well as the buzz of the Cafe. It is evident that there are many limitations due to the software and underdeveloped audio/video network interfacing. For instance, in future writings which utilize this methodolgy, when there are two channels in such a setting, one for composition and one for subtextual dialog (discussions/speculations on the work), both reader and writer may be able to follow the cybernetic narrative without conversational disruption.

Among the important elements contained in this conception of "writing" that could effect paradigms of literary texts in the future are the rules under which patrons are encouraged to write. These restructure or censure the patterns of writing, keeping it short as the attention "span" (instant). Most writing in the Cyberslam follow this premise, which conceivably works well in a sound-bite world. Still, there is not enough visual stimulation to snare the average attention at this stage. When graphics and sound dimensions become available, artists who are prepared can begin to create and experience mutual situations as a group despite physical seperations.

While it is almost certain that nothing replaces the intimacy and warmth of localized inter/action and gathering, in a less than ideal world we are often driven elsewhere for contact and communion. There are scholars who believe that writing in electronic space, divulged from interpersonal contact, invites a more democratic and equilateral writing space than previously available. There are more options, varieties and interpretations of "space" and "writing" using methods accessible in the current historical and creative moments.

Which brings us to the question of whether or not there are political possibilities for the medium. It is likely we might begin to see the "Moderator" play an interesting roll during a projected ongoing poetic scroll or a people's history. At what point would we find our Moderators--looking in at every conversation--beginning to police content? When inventive and intellectual people begin to gather and compose in large numbers and discuss actions toward the creation of social justice and cultural equality through a knit of energy and vision, in cyberspace and elsewhere, what authorities might our Big Brother inform then? It is probably safe to say that while we may be invited to "Press Any Key", pressing what might be considered an improper combination of keys would most certainly lead to trouble for the author(s). Consequently, it may be discovered that there is no potential for social activism through this medium.

We are children in the technojungle beginning to weave floral vines within the poetics tree. There is an overt awareness of the evils of the media. With the Cyberslam there is only a mechanical move towards bridging the gap between poetry and technology. A question yet remains: what are we to do with the machines which are able to interactively process language, sound and visual aspects of expression?

--Chris Funkhouser

[redacted]

↑ Index

51. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: "experimental"

Thu 27 Oct 1994

At the risk of stating the obvious, it's interesting that this discussion of "experimental" poetry has 1)sought to define that term and its appropriate use, and 2)frequently shaded into a discussion of the nature & use of labels per se.

On that latter point, Pound, continually encouraging Zukofsky to foment some sort of "group action," goes so far as to write that one must have some sort of a "program," that even if the program isn't so hot in itself it will bring things to a head in a useful way. (Can't find the ref at the moment). He also makes some other interesting pronouncements on the "science of groups"--e.g. the point of a group is precisely to have some where to go when you don't want to have to advertise yourself (again, the ref eludes me at the moment).

Interesting that the academy is quite comfortable now with the Imagists and Vorticists (if not yet the Objectivists), but that sort of PR drew a lot of flak on the poetry scene of the day, in the little mags etc. (just like L=A=N=G gang more recently?). Pound was conscious of the that backlash and sometimes careful to make sure a given action/project wasn't seen as motivated by "gang feeling."

Of course labels and groups aren't necessarily the same thing either. Something like "experimental" is, of course, much broader that something like "Imagists"(but at the same time, that term often came to stand for the whole "free verse" avant-garde tendency of the day). And a group can be quite small and coherent or quite large & dispersed.

Well, i'm not sure where all this is heading. I guess i decided to go back in time as a complement to Keith Tuma's valuable suggestion that we extend the discussion across cultures.

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

52. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH

New Poetry Magazine (fwd)

Thu 27 Oct 1994

Forwarded message:
From Thu Oct 27 11:18:51 1994
Date: Thu, 27 Oct 1994 11:14:40 EST
From: "Harrison, Beth" <[redacted]>
Subject: New Poetry Magazine
To: Multiple recipients of list ICONOL-L
<[redacted]>

Spinning Jenny, the new poetry magazine from Black Dress Press, is currently accepting submissions.

We are especially devoted to the work of new and emerging writers, and welcome the opportunity to review poetry of all shapes, sizes, flavors, persuasions, and schools.

There are no deadlines for submission or fees for reading; payment is in contributor copies.

Please send your work, with a self-addressed, stamped envelope or mailer, to:

Spinning Jenny, PO Box 356, Cooper Station, New York, NY 10276-0356.

↑ Index

53. Susan Schultz
Re: "experimental"
Thu 27 Oct 1994

Just a brief thought about the discussion of "experimental poetry" and the suggestion (Keith Tuma's?) that we consider the question across cultures. It seems to me that some of the most experimental poems being written now are poems that in themselves cross cultures. I'm thinking particularly of Kamau Brathwaite's MIDDLE PASSAGES, where modernism meets "negritude" meets high-tech (he uses different computer-generated fonts to get at the poem's essential orality). Or Lois-Ann Yamanaka's (Hawaii) poem, "Tita: Boyfriends," where a pidgin speaking teenager suddenly lapses into perfect valley girlese, which she speaks with her boyfriend in order to impress him, knowing full well that it's an "act." Experimental poetry, at its best, is a creole form--mixed, ruptured, aware of the power structures it exposes and deposes. It's Caliban writing on a computer (as in Brathwaite's "Letter Sycorax"). Oops, gotta go.

Susan M. Schultz

↑ Index

54. Sandra Braman
Re: "experimental"
Thu 27 Oct 1994

Re Shoemaker's comment that labels and groups aren't necessarily the same thing -- it was precisely my point that in the postmodern environment, they rarely have much of anything to do with each other at all . . . . Sandra

↑ Index

55. Tony Green
Re: "Susan Howe's Visual Poetics"
Thu 27 Oct 1994

Dear Alan Golding, Apropos yr notice, but not immediately providing biblio, I've just read S.H's The Birth-Mark. The reading of text from handwriting she does there turns poem into calligramme it seemed to me in a very useful way and entered what could be called the semiology of "art" tht relates to problems in painting. I've been much concerned with a like problem in classical European history painting, especially Nicolas Poussin, where the standard mode of analysis is all to do with the literary character of the picture, but cannot handle the pictorial structures, or the style of representation as aspects of "meaning" or " content" . Reading Emily D's poems: I am only content to read them in holograph, knowing that the hand-writing of the text is as important as the actual words. I do not share her certainty that the poems can be entirely done in print. The only kind of answers I have found so far are very rarely corroborated in print. I did find the phenomenological/psychoanalytical early Lyotard Discours/Figure useful.

In New Zealand there is a related problem. The outstanding local modernist (now dead], Colin McCahon painted numerous paintings that consist largely of "hand-written" text (usually texts quoted from poems or from the bible]. These are not dissimilar as image/text relations to E.D.'s poems. These thoughts off the top of my head this morning, finding your message.
Tony Green

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

56. Tony Green
Re: absurd category
Thu 27 Oct 1994

Re Ron Silliman's problem. What about the social gatherings: "writing associated with L=.... magazine", not a style- or historical- period category. As with, equally, "writing associated with United Artists". Once the long-winded name is put in place then subsequent references can shorten to, say, LangPo, without too much confusion. It's obviously an old problem that comes from seeking to conglomerate materials for polemics or history (if there is a difference). When you look at Impressionists or Impressionism, which actual pictures count as central, which as peripheral? At the level of the picture the term becomes a useless generality. Tony Green

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

57. Tom Mandel

Re: absurd category

Thu 27 Oct 1994

---

re: Ron's "...a whole other level, society."

Obviously poetic experiment has nothing to do with scientific experiment; the latter is a well-defined and finalizing act. More "poetic" experiment occurs in physics in the activity which physicists call "bullshitting;" it consists in taking the chalk to the blackboard and writing and talking to the rest of the group. This is done in turn. For some reason, I've been told by a French physicist, French physicists are not very good at this activity. Obviously what we call poetic experiment occurs at the beginning of the/a process, on the model of Kelly's "let's see what happens if I do this" although often way more formalized (i.e. "do this" may describe a pretty lengthy, complex activity: Tjanting is a book written in this way) and not at the end. Someone referenced a definition roughly "an activity with an unknown result" but this definition would seem to have arisen from usages like "experimental poetry" and can't be invoked to explain the usage. It would be nice to trace the history of the phrase; I think it may have more (much more) to do with social experiment, utopianism; how does Bakhtin put it? "The word inhabits a realm of ends." Perhaps also worth thinking of the overlap of experiment with experience (the latter word in french, for example, translates the former english word), a gaining of experience, pushing into new territory -- the territory ahead. Here too would seem a cluster of concepts from a 2d half of the 19th century mindset (rewrite Henry Adams dynamo as modernism). Curious what dross we do our best with? Avant garde -- a napoleonic military term, again one of direction and first contact with the enemy, the unknown.

But I don't think the phrase social formalism is much help; how are the two being combined, i.e. is it the formalism that is "social" or does this juxtaposition of terms simply point at the interests of a group of people -- if so, it's better of course than "experimental" which points at nothing, but not much better since we would prefer our ostensive definitions not to require explanation.

Well, like John Clare, I "wrote till earth was but a name."

tom mandel

↑ Index

58. William Lavender
Re: absurd category
Fri 28 Oct 1994

Tom Mandel said"

>>it's better of course than "experimental" which points at nothing, but not much better since we would prefer our ostensive definitions not to require explanation.<<

It seems to me that one would have a stable notion of the experimental insofar as one had a stable notion of law (scientific or juridical), ethics, canon, depending on the context. Interesting how a word, cut out of its context, suddenly "points to nothing," i.e. is severed from reference, since the referent is always a relation. In any context it seems to involve stretching or perhaps erasing a boundary, so of course if we do not see the boundary we do not see the experiment. And the unstated polemic of the experimental is the law that the referent hypothetically transgresses. It is a movement of desire. Just as physics now recognizes the impact that the experiment itself can have on its results, i.e. that particles are more likely to follow a certain trajectory if that trajectory is hypothesized, we have to concede that this discussion has altered the term "experimental." To test this, we might pick a term at random ("nothing", for example), cut it out of its field of use, subject to an analysis similar to the one that "experimental" has just undergone, and see if it ended up pointing to anything.

from steamy New Orleans,
William Lavender

↑ Index

59. Ron Silliman
Re: Motivation
Fri 28 Oct 1994

What I like about Social Formalism is that it combines both the general thrust of the activity with the general thrust of the motivation for such activity, i.e.,

that these writings are/were motivated for explicitly social reasons, even where (as often enough was the case) the definition of the social reason would have been hard to get at beyond "general sense of dissatisfaction w/ the present condition of things"

What separates most of the writers in In the American Tree, for example, from poets now ages 25-30 doing superficially similar things on a page, is precisely that sense of motivation. Not that younger poets don't have motivation, but it's a different one, generally. And the fact that something like LangPo sits owl-like on the landscape is part of the problem any younger poet must thus face.

The impulse to write in the way that, say, Stephen Rodefer did 10 years ago, is not the same today.
Even for Stephen.

I actually think that is why in the O-blek anthology
we see such a "return to the lyric" as a mode.
It represents precisely the draining of the "social"
from that equation.

Which may be why, w/ the exception of Mark Mendel's appropriation of Jenny Holzer's sense of display for poetry, there are no literary devices in that collection that you cannot already find in The New American Poetry, In the American Tree or
The Art of Practice.

"Experimental poetry" I think tries as a category to express the same combination of activity & motivation, but both terms in the equation seem too vague ultimately. And I do think that for many poets, esp. during the 1950s, the first term in that category carried with it some connotation of the "prestige of science" -- Think of Bern Porter, or even Kostelanetz. Or Eli Mandel, who went from "Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana" (one of the interesting attempts at the American long poem during the so-called modernist era which has not made it even into the most retro canon as yet) to true crackpot science "curing gays of homosexuality" on the rightwing homophobe circuit before he died. Zukofsky has that same sense of wearing the lab coat at the blackboard.
The Doctor will see you now.

What has always struck me about the negativity we see with the word formalism has been those people who presume it to represent an impulse toward stasis--the new formalists are a positive expression of this, but it could be found in inverted ways in Tom Clark's attack on LangPo and elsewhere.

Every label expresses an agenda.
Think of the terms for the apex of the M nexus:
"Christian Language Poets" definitely throws them into some role as variant/tributary--definitely a subservient position.
The New Mysticism says nothing of their practice as writers (which in turn is a slam on their writing)
The Buffalo Problem may be cute but in fact their work cannot be generalized to the larger Buffalo scene where, I'm told, they've largely disappeared
Ditto the New Coasters

Somebody told me off-line that in Buffalo they are called the Scroll Swallowers altho I've not seen the poem that refers to.

But if every label expresses an agenda the hidden nature of that agenda is what would make the 17th generation of The New York School
an interesting intellectual problem as such

There are real strategic advantages to having access to a term whose meaning has become as vague as that, almost a protective covering

So when I see a label, I ask what does it say of the activity & motivation of those are labeled?
"Poets associated with United Artists" seems to deliberately skirt some of these issues, tucked right under the name of the magazine

↑ Index

60. Sandra Braman
Re: absurd category
Fri 28 Oct 1994

The law stable? It has moved away from the nation-state, become computerized (and therefore deals not with individuals but with statistical probabilities), and been replaced by harmonized information flows . . . . Sandra Braman

↑ Index

61. Alan Sondheim
Re: absurd category
Fri 28 Oct 1994

Not in my neighborhood. I get angry at this rhetoric when I see concrete suffering on the street created by concrete "individuals" who are not statistical probabilities and who do not deal with "harmonized information flows." Even if you insist on this terminology, there's nothing "harmonized" about them.

Alan

On Fri, 28 Oct 1994, Sandra Braman wrote:

> The law stable? It has moved away from the nation-state, become computerized (and therefore deals not with individuals but with statistical probabilities), and been replaced by harmonized information flows . . . . Sandra Braman

↑ Index

62. Sandra B
Re: absurd category
Fri 28 Oct 1994

The comments about the law are reporting on what's actually happening in the practice of law (moving away from the nation-state is into international contract law and international economic law as our constitutional law; the computerization of the law easily observable and much discussed; etc.). Not at all to deny the concrete consequences Alan Sondheim points out as experienced in the street. In fact, one can easily argue that as the law moves in these directions, it is less and less in touch with the street and with Geertz's important point about the local as the ultimate arbiter of what's fair in the law. Untrendy or not, my use of language still attempts at referentiality .... Sandra Braman

↑ Index

63. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: The Law of Genre
Fri 28 Oct 1994

I've just read thru the whole of the experi-discussion . . . whew . . . and at risk of being repetitive (but wanting to try out this new found forum), I want to emphasize a number of points--all of which were made by more able commentators than I . . . . Context in defining genre, which is what it does seem we are discussing, is highly valuable. As has been suggested, without such a situating of particular texts within particular locations terms and labels such as "experimental" lose their . . . well, lose just about everything. Unless one is prepared to argue for some form of essentialism to "experimental" poetry, unless one is prepared to list qualitative formal or thematic apects dealt with in defining what is less a genre than a general practice, then we must link it to specifics. This is obvious, I know. Bare with me . . . It seems to me that in the study and practice of literature and poetry (no separation intended here) we wrestle constantly with the dilemma of constituting categories and definitions--categories and definitions we immediately begin to question, as we perceive their limitations and short-comings. This seems to amount to a form of law: needing it to give and invest meaning in what it is we do and say, but also feeling the consequent limitation and "oppression" inherent in such formulations. There is a constant tension, evident in the state of literary studies, for instance, between categorizations--ie, The Canon--and their inevitable exclusions. This law can only (I am just stringing this along to see if it works) be mitigated by relating texts and authors to specific practices at specific times. Perhaps, if this has not already been done (and here I am only trying to emphasize particular ideas that have already been raised), it would be a good idea to extrapolate what is experimental from such relations; that is, by examining a particular poet and their relation to other poetic practices at the time perhaps we could in a general sense discern a Law of Experimental Practice--cognizant of the limitations of this method. The discussion of the japanese poet and the cross cultural situations of swahili poets seemed to go in this direction, but I would suggest that we look more closely at what it is precisely in such relations that is experimental. Could we please, please [high pitched whining of a child here]. And, I believe, as a result of such an analysis, while we could come to some idea of what experiment is, it would be so widely variable as to suggest the emptiness of the term, of the Law--because Laws deal with generalities and not specifics. They deal on a case by case basis, but from a general position. Is this how we want to deal with such a culturally diverse practice as experimental poetry? I don't know. It just seems to me that we need to rethink how categorization and its effects control and constrain choices and determinations for us--as has been suggested by others here. It's one of those situations of choosing from between two evils--isn't there some cliche like this, I can't quite get it. Anyway, this has been an interesting discussion to read and I look forward to more. By the way, it's in the upper 80s here in Arizona and the palm trees look great against the bright blue sky . . . .

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

64. Alan Sondheim
Re: absurd category
Fri 28 Oct 1994

The law is in touch with the street. The street is the arbiter. It depends on the law. Yesterday an SM dominatrix was freed after an undercove cop paid her because the judge said that the consensual activities didn't constitute what passes for prostitution here. Last night there was a fight outside and the cops broke it up but no one was arrested and it was a family thing and the cops talked to all concerned. It's a street thing. People die one way or another for it. This doesn't negate anything about international trade agreements, whatever, but that's different law.

Alan, Sorry to interrupt the discussion about `experiment' - last post on this subject - sorry -

On Fri, 28 Oct 1994, Sandra B wrote:

> The comments about the law are reporting on what's actually happening in the practice of law (moving away from the nation-state is into international contract law and international economic law as our constitutional law; the computerization of the law easily observable and much discussed; etc.). Not at all to deny the concrete consequences Alan Sondheim points out as experienced in the street. In fact, one can easily argue that as the law moves in these directions, it is less and less in touch with the street and with Geertz's important point about the local as the ultimate arbiter of what's fair in the law. Untrendy or not, my use of language still attempts at referentiality .... Sandra Braman

↑ Index

65. George Bowering
Re: experiwhat?
Fri 28 Oct 1994

I too have long been impatient with the easy use of the term "experimental poetry". But I think that, keeping in mind the highschool chem lab sense of the term, one can sometimes use the term. Remembering that most experiments are doomed to failure. Failed experiments in poetry should, of course, not be published. For iunstance I once tried to write a series of stories in which the main character would be finding himself inside various of Pound's cantos. I had to rearead the whole of the Cantos before I found out that I could not even do the job in one of them.On of a numbr of failed experiments. When George Perec tries to see whether he can write a novel without using the letter "e". I think that's an experiment. But when someone just writes strange, that's no more an experiment than anecdotal poetry. gb

↑ Index

66. Tom Mandel

Re: absurd category

Fri 28 Oct 1994

I should probably rather have said "points with nothing" than "at nothing" as the phrase certainly points at some broadly recognizable and open body of work. "With nothing" in the by-now too-stressed sense that there is nothing particularly "experimental" about "experimental poetry" any more than anything particularly "metaphysical" or "romantic" about the bodies of work so described, so within "its field of use" as Wm Lavendar rightly mentions "nothing" means "nothing" where outside it it may mean nothing, and every field of use or at least this phrase's is exactly "of use," since it is possible to add to the body of "experimental poetry" (as to that of "romantic" or even "metaphysical" poetry); surely w/o the term it would not be. On the other hand, a field of use (even within the strict caricatures of discipline) may so expand as to become exactly useless, nothing can be added to what will range thereunder, or nothing specific -- in the sense that all things do: "desire" seems such a term now. Perhaps each should choose such a term, and we make a lexicon then whoever wishes can write a poem using exclusively those terms (in whatever way). That would be an experimental poem.

tom mandel

↑ Index

67. Patrick Phillips

Re: experiwhat?

Fri 28 Oct 1994

Failed
experiments in poetry should be published

↑ Index

68. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: experiwhat?

Fri 28 Oct 1994

---

some random thoughts --

I have spent part of the last two days with Victor Masayesva, a Hopi video artist from Third Mesa. In a talk last night Victor said that he wondered if there would be anything like a serious Native American aesthetic until there is a Native art (he was speaking specifically about video/film) which is considered, by the artist and the community, to be as serious as the kachina ceremonies and other sacred ceremonies. In a way this would be to bring what to that community seems quite "experimental" back into the "traditional," although I'm not really certain these terms have any meaning in such a context.

Every Xylophone Plays Extemporaneous
Rain
Illusions Meaning
Everyone Never Tells Another's
Loss

and random thoughts . . .

↑ Index

69. Robert Drake

Re: experiwhat?

Fri 28 Oct 1994

> Failed
> experiments
> in poetry
> should
> be > published

(failed experiments) does not = (failed poems)

a failed experiment yields no useful data

if a "poetry experiment" "fails" (ie, yeilds a "bad" poem)

it yeilds the data that the particular "experimental design" has failed to produce a "good" poem (under these specific experimental conditions) that result is worth publishing

the failed poem is not and, how interesting--how we _value_ the experiment (should, or shouldn't, be published) is defined by whether or not the "result" ought be offered up for sale.... =$$$

"too" "many" damn "quotation marks"

luigi

↑ Index

70. William Lavender

Re: absurd category

Sat 29 Oct 1994

> On the other hand, a field of > use (even within the strict caricatures of discipline) may > so expand as to become exactly useless, nothing can be added > to what will range thereunder, or nothing specific -- in the > sense that all things do: "desire" seems such a term now.
> Perhaps each should choose such a term, and we make a lexicon > then whoever wishes can write a poem using exclusively those > terms (in whatever way). That would be an experimental poem.
>
> tom mandel

Of course you're right. "Desire" is the worst catchall of the lot; it was romantic of me to use it. It was specifically the notion of transgression, of experiment as transgression, that I was trying to get to. Then again, I think of "desire" in the same way I think of "experimental"; it may now be hopelessly general, homonyms for a thousand uses, but I can still read Freud or Bataille or Hustler or this discourse and know what is meant when I encounter the term, even though it means something different in each occurence. Maybe I was hoping that in this new, experimental medium, "desire" could be revived. Vain wish. Only another occurence, quotation marks notwithstanding.

"What is" "experimental" "poetry" "now" "?"

"Perhaps" a poetry which "desires" "nothing"

"transgresses" nothing "."

"*" "(this has already been done)"

↑ Index

71. Ron Silliman

Re: experiwhat?

Sat 29 Oct 1994

> Failed
> experiments
> in poetry
> should
> be > published
>
> (failed experiments) does not = (failed poems)
>
> a failed experiment yields no useful data
>
> if a "poetry experiment" "fails" (ie, yeilds a "bad" poem)

But what defines failure? Crane's "The Bridge" is certainly a failure (he himself thought so) but the process itself has proven extraordinarily productive for poets thereafter and, besides, it doesn't mean that it's not a "great" poem, does it?

↑ Index

72. Patrick Phillips

Re: experiwhat?

Sat 29 Oct 1994

ASYMMETRY 408*

*indeterminate

"For readers who are not poets or composers and who have not undergone the dicipline of composition by chance methods or other "objective" methods, the improvisational way of realising these poems is beset with perils, not the least of which are cuteness, corny dramatics and other types of posturing."

Jackson Mac Low

March 26-27 1961

New York City

AN ANTHOLOGY

- La Monte Young,

Jackon Mac Low. 1963, '70

verb 1 noun 1
"not"
"adj/1"

noun 1 verb 1 (noun 2) adj/2
"noun 3"
"pl/refl/pron/1"
noun 1 (noun 2)
"not"
"not" .....

This is a _fragment_ of "Assymetry 408" and in this fragment is proposed something quite complete. Although this piece has begun to acquire a patina, and the bodies of many of its performers have failed (certainly not Jackson's), the temporal has not yet gotten a fix on it. This lack of temporal fixity is in large part because of the "math" of it; the "idea" of it, the "pre" ness of it. Its presence here as a fragment continues its syntactical and cultural geometry its pre ness and I think proposes a kind of suture, definitely to a point in history, but more interestingly, from the page to a condition of language. As Ron points out, Crane's "Bridge" does this, as they both do oddly enough, when taken in, or viewed from a position of "use."

I point to this "Assymmetry" not because of our notions of failure, but because it is often the "idea of use," or "usefullness" which determines "failure." I propose that the "idea of use" is often a "mistake," itself often a failure.

↑ Index

73. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: experiwhat?

Sat 29 Oct 1994

Some of the recent intriguing posts on the question of "failure" seem to me to be edging back towards the question i introduced earlier in relation to Oppen: whether or not the poem can be a sort of "test." This is the sense of experiment i find interesting--certainly not, as i think George Bowering put it, simply "writing weird." Not "experimental" as a catch-all for everything that somehow fails to look "traditional." Thinking of Mac Low (& Zukofsky & Cage & Silliman etc etc), it's interesting that "procedural" poetries have been adduced several times now as perhaps more valuably related to the notion of "experiment." What exactly is the relation between the two categories? Is "The Bridge" a procedural poem? What about Oppen's work?

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

74. Patrick Phillips
Re: experiwhat?
Sat 29 Oct 1994

---

as and aside:

Whether Oppen's work is "procedural:" Tom and others have done more thinking on this as perhaps a matter of "procedural discourse," or how a work, or body, proceeds through a culture. But I will hazard this offering (again which Tom has a more "present" insight into being the interviewer).

From Burtons Hatlen's _Oppen: Man and Poet_ (that's a big colon there!), pg 40:

GO - Frankly I paste without cutting. What I actually do is every correction I just paste on top of the poem as it was, and I paste it loosely so I can tear it out, try another route.

and later in response to Hatlen's question of cohesion in _The Materials_:

GO - Well, I put it together very carefully which means I spent a long time moving them around.

I'm aware that the fold of "procedural" may have more benefits, or offer more insight when looked at from the point of view of effect, or how it's used, but this was on the tip of the tongue....

↑ Index

75. George Bowering
Re: experiwhat?
Sat 29 Oct 1994

That's truly silly.

↑ Index

76. Donald J. Byrd Categories
Sun 30 Oct 1994

Ron Silliman's note on categories made me think Ed Dorn's Slinger's disputational .44:

this Stockholder will find that his gun cannot speak he'll find that he has been Described

STRUM

the green-horn pulled the trigger and his store-bought iron coughed out some cheap powder,
and then changed its mind, muttering something about having been up too late last night....

STRUM

The total .44
recurred in the Slinger's hand and spun there then came home like a sharp knock and the intruder was described-- a plain, unassorted white citizen.....

Obviously, getting described is never a comfortable experience, but good distinctions are necessary to get even minimal thought started, and sharp, interesting names for the distinctions are useful and even necessary themselves.

I would like to be able to make a distinction between (1) the poets who appear in the Allen anthology and the recent Hoover, Messerli, Weinberger, and Waldman anthologies, on the one hand, and (2) the poets who appear in the Vendler Harvard anthology and the hundred like it, on the other. There are a few cross-overs, but very few, and the subscribers to this list would be able to sort out anonymous poems into these two groups with considerable statistical reliability.

This seems to me a real distinction that I would like to have a good name for. I am inclined to call the poets in group 1 "the mainstream." I do not mean this as a trick. If you consider Homer, Sappho, Pindar, Lucretius, Catullus, Dante, Spenser, Shakespeare, Donne, Marvel, Pope, Dryden, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Keats, Shelley, Byron, Whitman, Melville, and Dickinson as the carriers of the mainstream you will find the contemporary carriers of that stream almost exclusively in group 1.

This has nothing to do with the canon. In fact, the qualities that make mainstream poets mainstream are precisely the qualities that must be obscured to make them canonical. The nature of the canon is to position texts in a juncture at which nothing is at stake (every thing decided).

What makes poets mainstream is that they begin in the crisis of thought, feeling, and form and end in the crisis of thought, feeling, and form, having advanced a poem from beginning to end through a space-time where _definitive_ thought, feeling, and form are achieved (see Keats's distinction between achievement and empowerment).

The poets in group 2 work inside the settlement of the canonical values. It is not a matter of the work "closing on signifier"; that would be interesting indeedPany text, especially one devoted to imagination and fiction, closing on a signifier would be news. It rather settles on conventions, an emotional system that has created a safe zone, and it is the zombie zone, where the intellectually, morally, and spiritually dead wander around in the perpetual 1950's that is projected by the media, on one hand, and Harvard University, on the other. It is literally the emotional system of a previous generation, which was of course itself derived from a previous generation. The 1950's of TV is the 1880's, and so forth. The genteel tradition is still alive and well in American universities, especially in English departments, including the hippest, and the AWP, the well founded literary magazines and poetry publishers (how many volumes of poetry published by university presses have you read recently?).

When I first came seriously into poetry, it looked as if the Group 1 mainstream had won the battle. The problem was that we did not secure the institutions, and it was not an oversight. The institutions cannot be secured for the mainstream, only for the conventions. In fact, we could call the poets of Group 2 "the institutional" poets.

Then the remaining necessary distinctions will have only to do with the various technical considerations of how to live and write in the crisis of the flow, to keep intellectual, moral, and spiritual being alive without foundations but also without despair. The problem is not to walk the plank. We can walk the plank with any aleatory generator of text. The problem is to walk the plank and not despair. How do you position yourself in relation to the random that the moment of fall from the ship to the sea is your life?

The institutional poets require no more attention than the dead. Among the poets of the mainstream, the very life of the enterprise is conflict and even vicious conflict: this is the cost of keeping poetry alive. The sadness of much of the conflict that has taken place during the past twenty years in American poetry is that it has not been generative. The mainstream has some how become so befuddled as to think its conflicts are institutional rather than technical, and poets have become dangerously like every one else in American culture, confusing their tools with their lives. This kind of instrumentalization of the keenest moments of intellectual, moral, and spiritual vitality has nearly destroyed the non- institutional place of poetry (of art).

I suggest that we categorize poets and criticize poets specifically in terms of their technologies. Charles Stein has a marvelous series of drawings of meditating figures working on their heads with wrenches; there are other schools that use hammers or screw drivers. I may think the hammer school has made a very bad choice of tools, that the results do not justify the pain, and so forth, and may even comment on what I take to be their mistake in the most uncompromising terms, but I do not doubt the radical seriousness of their work.

Don Byrd

↑ Index

77. Steve Evans
Motives & Devices
Sun 30 Oct 1994

Ron Silliman's recent posting on "motivation" raised some difficult questions about the current state of inter-generational relations within one sub-domain of oppositional poetry. I want to dwell on a few of the claims Ron made in his posting, claims that struck me as problematic and provocative in equal proportions. If possible, I'd like to rob of their "obviousness" certain assumptions that seem to have hardened along the seam where two generations, one established and one emerging, meet. Though I doubt the following remarks can achieve that goal, perhaps other people can find a way to move us towards it?

Ron makes three claims in the first five graphs of his posting, each of which pertains to the intersection of motivation/device/generation. I don't have a "copy" function available to me, so I will reproduce these claims schematically before noting what seems problematic about them to me.

Claim 1: "what separates most of the writers in
In the American Tree, for example, from poets now ages 25-30 doing superficially similar things on a page, is precisely...motivation."

[For the sake of economy, in the following I'm going to use the shorthand G1 to indicate "writers in In the American Tree," and G2 for "writers now ages 25-30" (some of whom appear in o-blek 12: Writing from the New Coast).]

Ron identifies the "motivation" of G1 as "explicitly social...even where (as often enough was the case) the definition of social reason would have been hard to get at beyond 'general sense of dissatisfaction w/
the present condition of things.'" This seques into

Claim 2: the "return to the lyric" in o-blek 12
"represents precisely the draining of the 'social' from" the concerns of G2. Which in turn leads to Claim 3: this "draining of the 'social'" explains

"why, with [one exception], there are no literary devices in [the New Coast] that you cannot already find in The New American Poetry, In the American Tree or
The Art of Practice."

Apropos Claim 1: I see plenty of evidence in both volumes of the New Coast to suggest that G2 meets the minimal definition of "social motivation" provided by Ron ("general dissatisfaction w/the present condition of things"). If anything, the failure of the New Left and the impasses of identity politics seem to have increased that dissatisfaction, while the fact that G1's claims for the social efficacy of its collective poetic project have only been partially borne out suggests the necessity of exploring alternate routes.

Apropos Claim 2: The ominous scenario in which the social is somehow "drained" away only makes sense if such devices as one finds in ITAT represent the exclusive means of criticizing existing social relations and evoking potentials for social trnasformation. Ron establishes a double bind for G2: continue to employ G1's devices (in which case you'll be labelled derivative and your motivation will be characterized as improper) or invent/adopt other devices (in which case you'll be accused of permitting the "social" to "drain" away). I've been seeing variants of this argument since the mid-80s, and I'd have thought it was clear by now that there is more than one way to compose/propose the social in poetry, and that the employment of devices associated with the lyric genre does not automatically entail the abandonment of an oppositional literary and social project.

Apropos Claim 3: Does it make sense to compare the New Coast, an emphatically "prospective" collection of 119 young writers, to such retrospective anthologies as the New American Poetry and ITAT? (I leave aside The Art of Practice, though the fact that 10 of the 45 writers presented there also appear in the NC makes the attempt to set them sharply at odds untenable). I think the question of what devices these young writers will develop in their careers is anything but settled at this point. The suggestion that G2 has "returned" to the lyric implies that the question has already been settled in favor of a modest conservatism: in which case it remains to be explained why no three poets in the New Coast could be inserted into the NAP or ITAT without substantially changing the texture of either preceding collection.

I think the summary judgement that G2 brings forward "no new devices" is a conveniently veiled way of discrediting work that mobilizes a host of "devices" and puts into play a range of "motivations" that haven't yet been codified (and, in response to the perceived "programmaticism" of G1, may not elect to use the strategies of codification favored by that previous generation).

There are other questions that could be posed here (why for instance the Apex of the M has been taken as the chief development requiring explanation in the past year or so, despite the fact that its version of repressive resublimation hardly accounts for the only instance of "collective unity"--as Ron phrases it in an earlier post--to be seen in that time; cf. "Chain" for instance, also "out of" Buffalo). But I have already gone on too long....

Regards to everyone out there!

Steve Evans

↑ Index

78. Robert Drake
Re: experiwhat?
Sun 30 Oct 1994

> if a "poetry experiment" "fails" (ie, yeilds a "bad" poem)
>
> But what defines failure?

> Crane's "The Bridge" is certainly a failure (he himself thought so) > but the process itself has proven extraordinarily productive for poets > thereafter and, besides, it doesn't mean that it's not a "great" poem, > does it?

of course yr write, this opens up a hole 'nother kettle of worms...

i suppose i'd be fairly comfortable with some form of "use value" as a criteria for success/failure--which immediately demands considering the reader. do i, as a reader of the poem, find it of use? (same question applies, even if the reader is also the writer) the various needs of various readers provides for a variety of value judgements--"The Bridge" (that's my homeboy! where were his daddy's Lifesavers when he needed 'em?) was very useful to me at one point, praps useful to various communities of poets, & thus not a failure, for us. maybe failed, fr Hart, because he had other ends in mind-- but one of the requirments of experiment is to be open-minded (as in Fleming's discovery of pennicillin frm a contaminated (failed) culture- dish of bacteria). & this all, fr me, relates to the Hopi video artist's musings on the utility of art to the larger community, as Kachina ceremonies are central & sacred. why is "experimental"/whatever poetry so devalued/useless? and then it's back to the mainstream/maginialized equations cited earlier, which i (in my better/stronger moments) dismiss, prefering to see a plurality of (overlapping) communities rather than one big molten pot... hoo-baby...

but, back to it...

went back to the dictionary defs from earlier in this thread; my version (oxford concise) gives: "procedure adopted on chance of _succeeding_..." --i think the evaluation of the outcome of an experimental procedure is an important step; a lack of that evaluation leads to lots of schlock that's foisted off as experimental, but which is maybe just lazy--the kind of stuff that was praps an impetus fr this thread. we'll all have various criteria fr that evaluation, but hopefully something more thoughtful than "if some fool editor will publish it, it's good enuf fr me..."

data: "exquisite corpse" experiments--we all know the technique, but few of the resulting poems remain--might this be a succesful experiment that produced no succesful results?

data: al ackerman's wonderful "hacks", the result of what he calls "poetry machines" (procedural cut & paste/replace routines, w/ specific designs fr specific poems)--some more successful than others; when less succesful, he tinkers w/ the machine

& if poems are "machines made of words"
& if machines are mechanisms which do work what is thee "work" they do (or we do w/ them)?

asever

luigi, friend of loons

↑ Index

79. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: experiwhat?
Sun 30 Oct 1994

I've just read the beginning of Don Byrd's post with a funny sense of co-incidence, since i had been just about to offer up the following tidbit from Slinger:

Don't worry your plaster head
Al, we can turn this car into a chile relleno
in a mere fraction of Nothin Flat!
Yesah, but i's always 60 feet long an on wheels

You misjudge the population Albert theyll think it's experimental....

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

80. Tony Green
Re: Motivation
Sun 30 Oct 1994

Labels are like titles -- short descriptions to fit a small space. "Writers associated with x magazine" may be expanded to suit inquiries regarding motivation, favoured devices, favoured ice-cream flavours, or hair and clothing styles (etc), or shortened to say just "LangPo", as a summary of an analysis already proposed of all the features of the group in question. As a user of poems (cf R.Drake's proposals] a label is the last thing I want; as a critic, historian, polemicist (participant in arts argy-bargy] I can't do without them. They've got to be pondered to carry any weight. The current debate moves straight into "generations" and the positional [institutional] play that always goes with that game. Old generations are going to be shunted back in the name of progress, as usual. This will obscure for who knows how long the wonderful texts produced -- and yet to come from those still alive. But that hand-to-hand combat stuff is, though exhilirating, not the way to sweeter readings of whatever is new or old. This is not to say that the [institutional] tendency to belittle the new, because it is new and difficult to accomodate, and preserve the old, because it is there, is to be admired.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

81. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Motivation
Sun 30 Oct 1994

As I understood Ron's comment, I think he was pinpointing something very important. To wit: Ron's own generation, coming of age as it did in the Cold War and in the wake of the Vietnam War, had global concerns, specifically a critique of capitalism (U.S. style) vis-a-vis a potential for Marxist governance in various places. The alternative to Capitalism was a central concern. With the demise of the Soviet Union and the Eastblock, and with a good view of what "ecology" and such were like under Communism, this particular fervor has largely disappeared, to be replaced by a much more U.S.-centered and even isolationist concern with what goes on at home, capitalism now being a given, and the concern shifting to identity politics and multiculturalism. To put it another way: the burning political concerns of the "In the American Tree" group have been replaced, for better or worse--and no doubt inevitably--with more local, if still "political" concerns about U.S. racism, homophobia, etc. We needn't say which was/is "better," but Ron is absolutely right to notice that it sure is different!

Or so it looks to me.
Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

82. Hank Lazer
Re: Motivation
Mon 31 Oct 1994

Briefly, to put one oar in the discussion: to expand the emerging generational debate.... On one side, Ron asks if the "next" generation is doing anything not already done by those poets in In the American Tree. It might make sense to ask the question in the opposite temporal direction as well, since many of us are doing lots of reading in earlier twentieth century poets (and nineteenth century as well). Have the LP poets of Ron's generation developed anything fundamentally different than their modernist predecessors--modernist broadly conceived. IS there anything foundationally different--not anticipated in Stein, Pound, or Dickinson or Mallarme earlier or Zukofsky and Cage later, or pick your own examples....--in the work of the "first" generation of LPs?

Hank Lazer

↑ Index

83. kat
Re: absurd category
Mon 31 Oct 1994

I must say that I was rather surprised to see what I take to be a celebration of law (and order). If law is happening in a sort of carnivalesque street way, what about 3x you're out and the fact that the building, maintenance, and re-fashioning of prisons is the single fastest growth industry? Sorry to be so vulgar about all this, but in particular the statement that "it's only a family matters"(re: street action and cop reaction) likely refers to spousal or other "familiar" abuse. Enough of the reality pinch, I suppose. The discussion of cross cultural and cross linguistic poetry as both experimental and intimately imbicated with the masterwork (or master's works) is most engaging. One thing that I find different (and [therefore] positive) about this phenomenon and the present discussion is that in the Pound days only white guys doing their legimation routines were granted the honorific epithet "experimental." 'nuf said

↑ Index

84. Ron Silliman
G2
Mon 31 Oct 1994

Steve Evans always has interesting and valuable points to make. I want to unpack a couple here.
>

> Apropos Claim 2: The ominous scenario in which the social is somehow "drained" away only makes sense if such devices as one finds in ITAT represent the exclusive means of criticizing existing social relations and evoking potentials for social trnasformation.

I didn't (don't) make any claim of exclusivity of devices for In the American Tree and the concept makes no sense to me. I could point to hundreds of alternative examples from my own generation alone that are equally social but well outside the positioned critique that separates out most of the Tree's poets from the broader (less differentiated) terrain.

Ron establishes a double bind for >G2: continue to employ G1's devices (in which case you'll be >labelled derivative and your motivation will be characterized >as improper) or invent/adopt other devices (in which case you'll >be accused of permitting the "social" to "drain" away).

What other devices? It is precisely the continuation of the same set of devices in increasingly modest forms that characterizes the broader poetics of G2, as Steve calls it in a curiously clinical abbreviation. It is that modesty, as such, that I was getting at as a "draining of the social" -- and I accept the possibility that it may actually represent a much more complex ensemble of social phenomena, that may well include grave doubt over the possibilities of collective action (say), all of which would be well worth elaborating on at length

And I should note from the outset the obvious, that the choice of such forms need not limit any individual poet from achieving as much as anybody ever has. It seems clear to me that some of the writers in O-blek 12 -- Lee Ann Brown and Jessica Grim for example -- have already established themselves as major poets. On anybody's terms.

> Apropos Claim 3: Does it make sense to compare the New Coast, an emphatically "prospective" collection of 119 young writers, to such retrospective anthologies as the New American Poetry and ITAT?

I for one don't buy the "prospective" nature of O-blek 12 as anything other than as a stance. And a troubling one. The average age of the poets in O-blek 12 may well be 5 years OLDER than the poets in the Allen anthology, for example. And the aggressive placement of the "spirit" section at the front of the "technique" (i.e. theory) volume shows an overall argumentative structure that is more aggressive even than the Tree. What "prospective" seems to mean here is a reluctance to acknowledge or own its own position. At least the Apex folks don't suffer from that.

(why for instance >the Apex of the M has been taken as the chief development requiring >explanation in the past year or so, despite the fact that its version >of repressive resublimation hardly accounts for the only instance of >"collective unity"--as Ron phrases it in an earlier post--to be seen >in that time; cf. "Chain" for instance, also "out of" Buffalo).
>
Two of Chain's editors also edit Apex of the M. A third co-edited the Technique volume of the O-blek antholog. It's not at all clear at 3,200 miles what distinction is being made here. (I like Chain quite a bit, by the way.)

>
Time to shower & go to work,
Ron

↑ Index

85. jena
Re: G2
Mon 31 Oct 1994

> (why for instance > the Apex of the M has been taken as the chief development requiring explanation in the past year or so, despite the fact that its version of repressive resublimation hardly accounts for the only instance of "collective unity"--as Ron phrases it in an earlier post--to be seen in that time; cf. "Chain" for instance, also "out of" Buffalo).
>
> Two of Chain's editors also edit Apex of the M. A third co-edited the Technique volume of the O-blek antholog. It's not at all clear at 3,200 miles what distinction is being made here. (I like Chain quite a bit, by the way.)

Chain is edited by only two people: Juliana Spahr and myself. Neither of us edit Apex of the M. I assume you are confusing Chain with A Poetics of Criticism. Kristin Prevallet and Pam Rehm are the two editors that overlap between that project and Apex. I suppose it seems very confusing, but in my mind all three of these publications are incredibly distinct; perhaps the generational generalizing of this discussion doesn't allow for those editorial distinctions to be addressed.

Jena Osman

↑ Index

86. Kenneth Sherwood
G2 -(G1xG7(d/t)+P)
Mon 31 Oct 1994

Not to contentious, but as a demographic member of G2 (one not represented in Oblek) I would want to qualify the suggestions that the 'social' and the 'state' have been foresaken. A project like _Chain_ seems but one example of recent, socially engaged endeavors. I cannot bring to mind any equally extensive examination of the conditions of textual production, at least outside of LANGUAGE magazine.

It might be useful to recall just one of the editorial statements floated across [redacted] in recent weeks by Joel Kuszai:

> Meow Press was established in August of 1993 as a response to the New Coast festival and also the rapid proliferation of electronic publishing. In the case of the former, there is the hope that by getting involved it might be possible to reopen the anthologizing-closure process set in motion by that fateful gathering; that it might be possible to exist in a state where the printing of a book of poems might be - in the tradition of printer-poets such as Lyn Hejinian - an extension of one's own activity of writing. In the case of the latter, the romance of making books by hand that utilized the hot carbon transfer process as ultimately temporal ephemera, yet palpable physical without too much nostalgia for the Book. An obsessive typography startup kit.

Against the 'anthologizing-closure process' of generational typecasting (Buffalo, NY...home of the Wings, the Bills and 'spirit') might be laid the range of local (but nonetheless social) of Chain, Meow Press, Leave Books, Rif/t, Apex, Tailspin Press, Channel 500 poster-poems (and recent transplants) Poetic Briefs, and Situation.

As I survey this range of G2 products, spirit would seem to be suffering a decided trade deficit, even here in the home of the faithful fans. So while in the Generational Equation these variables are harder to quantify, I imagine each to be testing poems in discernable (I might even claim, 'experimental') if not immediately classifiable ways.

Ken Sherwood

↑ Index

87. Steve Evans
G-ology
Mon 31 Oct 1994

First, my apologies for introducing such an absurd notation as "G2" into list usage. I only intended it as a tool for grasping what felt to me like the conventional/abstract nature of Ron's speculations on the work of emerging writers.

Having spent a significant portion of my fairly brief intellectual life trying to force discussions about the work Ron refers to as "Social Formalism" into a space not totally predecided by stereotype and phobic characterization, I get a little anxious when I think the whole labor of insisting on the specificity and value of a new body of work will have to be repeated (and to no less than the Social Formalists themselves). Ron & others: say it ain't so!

But on to specifics. Marjorie Perloff's remarks about the shifting tenor of political commitments
among progressives in the U.S. make sense, but let's not forget that the "burning political concerns" of
In the American Tree were/are by no means self-evident:
to accept Bruce Andrews's "In Funnel" or David Melnick's Pcoet as doing political work, one has to have a sense of the political rather more elastic than most people on the left had in the 70s or for that matter have today. To abbreviate a much longer discussion:
it takes a highly developed utopian imagination to get from linguistic to social activism; from the "tyranny of the signifier" (a phrase that is laughable today but which articulated aspirations for social change for some people in the 70s-80s) to anti-capitalist struggle.

What I don't understand is why this hard-won utopian intelligence (or say: set of reading practices) is not brought to bear on the New Coast. If you can read Rae Armantrout as "positioned critique" can't you do the same for Robert Kocik?

I suppose that at some point, Ron, names will have to be mentioned to go along with generalizations such as "the continuation of the same set of devices in increasingly modest forms...characterizes the broader poetics of G2." I'm honestly not sure what's at stake for you in such remarks.

On the question of "average ages" of NC and NAP, it seems clear to me that biological age doesn't equal "age" in terms of the poetic field.

To clarify one general point in closing: I am not under the impression that a collective re-definition of what poetry is and does has as yet been articulated by G2, which is perhaps all Ron means to be saying. Given the way literary fields work in capitalist social formations, the failure to achieve such a collective redefinition will lead to a lot of interesting poetry disappearing beneath the ready-made rubrics that persist from the last time such a struggle was won.

Gotta go...

↑ Index

88. Tom Mandel

Re: experiwhat?

Mon 31 Oct 1994

"a failed experiment yields no useful data"

not true not in any case and in the least sense true in the sciences. Back to the drawing board.

↑ Index

89. Tom Mandel

Re: experiwhat?

Mon 31 Oct 1994

---

re: patrick phillips -- tho I yield to none in my admiration for Jackson Maclow (we were btw born on the same day in the same place 20 years to the day apart, and schooled at the same u of chicago by many of the same teachers as we jaw-droppingly discovered one day a few years ago over lunch at the zuni cafe in SF), perhaps because of this no-yield : I must protest that...

use mistake failure fragment no no no we need a poetics of effect, in which use is effect and in which we do not make a god of the fragment --excuse me, that is 200 year old romanticism, hanging around the ruins and it really just won't do it's too damned easy. asymmetry has neither advantage nor precedence nor even lack of calculation to boast over symmetry. If "realising...poems is beset with perils" well that doesn't seem too bad really. Water cupped in your hand, are you conscious what streams have fed it?

↑ Index

90. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Failed Experiments
Mon 31 Oct 1994

F a i l e d e x p e r i m e n t s
Y i e l d
O t h e r
N o t
U s e l e s s
S e n s e
S t u f f
N o t
C o n t a i n e d
B y
F r a m e w o r k s
W e ' v e S e t
O u t

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

91. George Bowering
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 31 Oct 1994

I dont see how writing yr own raw way instead of in someone's tradition constitutes an experiment.
I mean, doesnt an experiment have to start with a proposition?

↑ Index

92. George Bowering
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 31 Oct 1994

Well, I seem to remember that when we did experiments in the lab at school, we were encouraged to build on what science had found out already, though.

↑ Index

93. George Bowering
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 31 Oct 1994

Actually, the term "politically correct" was not first used in jest by liberals. It was used in all seriousness by left wing groups. THEN it was used even by them in jest, before the liberals got hold of it.

↑ Index

94. George Bowering
Re: Failed Experiments
Mon 31 Oct 1994

That piece by Timmons was pretty bad, eh? I'd say that it failed at something, and shouldnt have been published here.

↑ Index

95. Mn Center For Book Arts
Re: nostalgia & nostalgia
Mon 31 Oct 1994

Perhaps this is a misdirection aiming at an aside, but after seeing Kenneth Sherwood repeat a praise Joel Kuszai had made for printer-poets with "not too much nostalgia for the book" I had to take at least a little bit of exception. I came to make books because of my work with writing, feeling like the context of words is a conditioner of words, that it is fundamentally important, that space carries meaning as well as texts do.

I have found, in nearly fifteen years of making books, including more or less visual ones, and being around many who make books by hand & machine, including in the last year as director of one of the country's finest book arts organizations, that while I retain an allegiance to text-driven books, much of the finest work being done in the field has little to do with poetry. I try to do what I can to see that that doesn't remain so.

Yet I find that among the bookmakers who would share intellectual/philosophical concerns with users of this electronic forum, there is often a feeling that someone like me has too much "nostalgia for literature" or for the poem or for the text.

So, is it the work of literature, or the form of the book, for which we yearn, with that sweet nostalgia? Let it be neither, please.

↑ Index

96. Patrick Phillips
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 31 Oct 1994

---

re: Tom Mandel

Mine was not a feigned admiration for Jackson, nor was my proposal that "the idea of use is itself often a mistake" a hymn for the fragment, be it Holderlin's, Mallarme's or the para-tactical fragments of G1. (I can't help but wonder where we put G7 in this shorthand). No, I was using the fragment in this case as an attempt to "bridge" the gap between a notion of use and a notion of experiment which is saw was getting to much in hand (as opposed to out of hand, or toward the uncontrollable experiment.)

To long hand this one; notions of failure, like notions of success, turn on an empirical temporality of too short a duration. (In the case of scientific experimentation this is taken into account by the concept of the theory, or in the addage "if in first you don't succeed...") It is this duration, which in our "terms" measures out in decades and generations, that foists "success" and "failure" upon us. I was using "Assymetry" not as a crutch to a "pre-ness" of language as to a pre-ness of judgement. I wanted to link the "use" of the chance/math language of Assymetry to the fluidity of language _relatively_ independent of an empiric duration which always generates judgements of success and failure. This linkage I hoped and still believe allows for the temporary dismantling of the architecture of failure and success in favor of the dis-array of "use." Use functions; by that I mean that it doesn't loiter in the realm of narrowly-framed perception. Use is temporally beyond critical idiom, the generation paradigm, cross-cultural myopia. We have to look no further than to our wish for greater communication between peoples (as evidence by this medium, sometimes) to see our appreciation for the lag-time of use. Unfortunatley, use is not really on "human time," certainly not on individual time....

With this I would like to point to how we use, and the subsequent use of, this medium. That often it is poorly used. Poor as in impoverished. There are other things to do here than to "participate" in "collaborative" "gestures" of atomized critical "insight." Form is rampant.

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

November 1994

87 messages · Tue 1 Nov 1994 – Wed 30 Nov 1994

In the first week of November the American electorate hands both chambers of its Congress to the opposition for the first time in forty years, and a former president, in a letter of terrible plainness, announces that he has begun the long walk into the sunset of his own memory. The list registers none of it. It has business of its own — a quarrel two centuries old about whether the lyric is reactionary — and it prosecutes that quarrel with the gravity other people reserve for events in their own lifetimes.

The occasion is Shelley, dragged in from the Flaming thread, and George Bowering fires the opening round: anyone who calls the lyric reactionary, he says, has plainly never learned to "read Shelley with any intelligence." Ron Silliman, less sentimental about the Romantics, supplies the season's founding axiom — that "all form(s) is amoral," a neutral instrument meaning one thing in Bernadette Mayer's hands and quite another in Dana Gioia's — and the list settles in for a fortnight to decide whether he is right.

He is not, retorts Tom Mandel, who offers the sterner correction that "all form is moral," never innocent of the values it carries; and Tenney Nathanson, reaching past them both, recalls Williams's flat verdict that "all sonnets say the same thing." This is the list at its most characteristic — five living correspondents, four decades of theory, and one dead Englishman, all conscripted into an argument nobody expects, or I suspect secretly wishes, to win.

Beneath the high dispute runs a lower and funnier one. The adjective "experimental," unsettled since October, mutates through the headers — experiwhat?, Failed Experiments — until Jeffrey Timmons's much-abused poem is being defended as a triumph precisely because it failed, and Tony Green, surveying the debris of a Patrick Phillips post, announces with satisfaction that "Form is rampant." Alongside it the generations sort themselves into rival camps, G1 and G2, the elders performing their ritual self-criticisms while the young take a careful census of who is card-carrying.

Patrick Phillips, correcting a garbled line in his own essay on Silliman's apex of the M, restores it to the question he had meant to ask: "Just how does one act when the church is on fire?" It is, in its way, the month's only genuine emergency — put by a man anxious about a metaphor while, just beyond the window, an actual order of things is quietly burning to the ground. I have set the letters in their true order, returned each correspondent's telephone and address to the privacy they are owed, and left the fire intact.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 87 in all.

WRITERS

Allcott, A M 35
Arts, Mn Center For Book 54
Bee, Susan 68
Bernstein, Charles 36
Boughn, Michael 15, 30, 34, 56, 57, 72, 78
Bowering, George 39, 47, 48, 49, 50, 71
Braman, Sandra 64
Byrd, Donald J. 53, 62
Cabri, Louis 86
Cayley, John 41, 42
Dolan, John 32
Drake, Robert 19, 40, 45, 81
FILELIST 55
Glazier, Loss 16, 74, 80, 84
Green, Tony 12, 13, 28, 33, 37, 82
Henry, Benjamin H. 7
Joris, Pierre 44, 65, 69
Krickjh 43
Kuszai, Joel 22
Mandel, Tom 58, 60, 76
Moxley, J. 38
Nathanson, Tenney 59, 61, 66
Pape, Eric 52, 67, 87
Perloff, Marjorie 63
Phillips, Patrick 6, 10, 14, 70, 73
Quartermain, Peter 83
Roberts, Mark 1
Robinson, Kit 85
Sherry, James 75
Shoemaker, Steven Howard 8
Shoptaw, John 26, 27
Silliman, Ron 2, 17, 18, 29, 31, 51, 79
Spahr, Juliana 5
Timmons, Jeffrey 9, 11, 23, 25
W.curnow 24, 77
Wallace, Mark 3, 4, 20, 21
X350, Paul Hoover 46

NAMES MENTIONED

Adorno, Theodor 52, 60, 61, 63, 67, 87
Agamben, Giorgio 34, 36, 37
Alexander, Charles 55
Americans, Asian 46
And, Miekal 5, 29
Anderson, Beth 38
Anderson, Erik 2, 68
Andrews, Bruce 70, 73
Andrews, Jim 29, 70, 73
Arendt, Hannah 61, 63
Armantrout, Rae 2, 29
Atlanta, Mark P. 71
Baker, Lori 29
Beckett, Tom 52, 70, 73
Benjamin, Walter 6, 7, 60, 61, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 72, 76, 78, 79, 85, 87
Bennett, Bill 38
Bennett, John 35
Benson, Steve 2, 29, 70, 73
Berkeley, Michael 2, 8, 32
Bernstein, Emma 29, 70, 73
Berrigan, Anselm 82
Blackburn, Paul 2
Blanchot, Maurice 81
Boone, Bruce 2
Brainard, Joe 82
Brossard, Nicole 29, 70, 73
Burke, Edmund 26
Burnham, Clint 29
Burroughs, William S. 2, 33
Byrd, Donald J. 53, 62, 82
Byrum, John 35
Carroll, John 6
Celan, Paul 44, 65, 69
Chadwick, Lynn 70, 73
Child, Abigail 70, 73
Clark, Emilie 77
Clarke, John 62
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 26
Coolidge, Clark 29, 77
Cooper, Dennis 42
Creeley, Bob 56
Creeley, Robert 2, 29, 46, 59, 82
Cunningham, John 70, 73
Curnow, Wystan 77
Daly, Lew 2, 29
Darragh, Tina 29
Davidson, Dan 29
Davies, Alan 70, 73
Day, Jean 70, 73
Delany, Samuel R. 70, 73
Deleuze, Gilles 81
Derrida, Jacques 62
Dickinson, Mark 59
Drake, Bob 73
Drucker, Johanna 68, 70, 73
Edwards, Ken 70, 73
Eigner, Larry 70, 73
Eliot, Joe 39
Emerson, Claudia 11
England, Amy 78
Estrin, Jerry 70, 73

Evans, Bill 29
Evans, Steve 3, 17, 22, 29
Farmer, Steve 29
Federman, Raymond 35
Fisher, Ann 29
Foucault, Michel 62, 81
France, Peter 6, 65, 72, 76
Fraser, Kathleen 2
Friedlander, Ben 35, 70, 73
Ganick, Peter 29
Gilbert, Alan 2, 29
Gilbert, Susan 29
Ginsberg, Allen 2, 62
Gioia, Dana 51, 58
Gizzi, Michael 70, 73
Gluck, Bob 2
Gottlieb, Michael 70, 73
Graham, Lea 42
Green, Frank 35
Greene, Graham 22
Greenwald, Ted 29
Gregory, Dick 68
Grenier, Bob 29
Grenier, Robert 70, 73, 77
Gunn, Thom 15
Hansen, Jefferson 4
Harryman, Carla 29
Hartley, George 26
Hawking, Stephen 62
Heidegger, Martin 14
Hejinian, Lynn 29, 40
Henri, Charles 44, 65, 69
Herbert, George 62
Hills, Henry 70, 73
Hoover, Edgar 2
Howe, Susan 77
Humphrey, David 70, 73
Hunt, Erica 70, 73
Indiana, Robert 40
Inman, Peter 29, 70, 73
Jackson, Jesse 2, 46
Jarnot, Lisa 5, 29
Johnson, Robert 40
Jones, Brian 70, 73
Joyce, Trevor 70, 73
Kathryn, Mary 68
Keller, Helen 62
Kelly, Patrick 12
Kerouac, Jack 2
Kocik, Robert 2
Krick, John 43, 44, 45
Lazer, Hank 70, 73
Levinas, Emmanuel 14
Locke, John 26
London, Frank 6, 41, 42
Mac Low, Jackson 2, 70, 73
Lowell, Amy 2
Mackey, Nate 62
Mackey, Nathaniel 29, 81
Malcolm, Janet 22
Mandel, Charlotte 2, 13
Manning, Nicholas 38
Martin, Camille 28
Mayer, Jane 29, 51
McCaffery, Steve 70, 73
Messerli, Doug 2
Miller, Paul D. 68
Miriam, Erica 70, 73
Mitchell, Joan 14, 18
Morgan, Robin 70, 73
Moriarty, Laura 70, 73
Morrison, Bill 12
Morton, Kathryn A. 6
Moxley, Jennifer 38
Moyers, Bill 70, 73
Murphy, Sheila E. 35
Myers, Michael 68
Nelson, Paul 38
Nicholson, Andy 28
Nielson, Melanie 70, 73
Norton, John 5, 46
Notley, Alice 82
Oliver, John 29
Olson, Charles 56
Olson, Kirby 3, 46, 51, 53, 54, 55, 56, 62, 67, 69, 77, 82
Osman, Jena 3, 17, 35
Palmer, Michael 6, 29
Pearson, Ted 70, 73
Perelman, Bob 2, 70, 73
Perez, Jamie 68
Persky, Stan 2
Pessoa, Fernando 58
Piombino, Nick 70, 73
Pollock, Jackson 82
Portugal, Anne 65, 78
Pound, Ezra 17, 20, 24, 29, 46
Pressler, Charlotte 35
Prevallet, Kristen 2, 22
Quasha, George 12
Quasha, Susan 43, 44, 45
Ramsdell, Heather 70, 73
Raworth, Tom 29
Reagan, Nancy 62
Reed, David 70, 73
Retallack, Joan 70, 73
Robinson, Elizabeth 17, 29
Rodefer, Stephen 29
Rothenberg, Jerry 17, 43, 44, 45
Sanders, Jay 62
Scalapino, Leslie 29, 70, 73
Schorn, Brian 29
Seaton, Peter 70, 73
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 47, 51, 52, 58, 59, 60, 61, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 69

Sherwood, Kenneth 80, 84
Shoemaker, Steve 8, 12
Siegel, Jeff 2, 50
Sillman, Amy 68
Simon, Greg 62
Smith, Harry 22, 40
Smith, Susan 35
Spahr, Boyd 5
Spero, Nancy 70, 73
Spicer, Jack 2
Stanley, George 2
Stanley, Jared 56
Steele, Timothy 16, 51
Stefans, Kim 38
Stein, Charles 62
Stein, Gertrude 15, 24, 49, 57, 68, 83
Templeton, Fiona 70, 73
Thomas, Dylan 68
Timmons, Matt 1, 9
Tuma, Keith 15
Tuttle, Richard 70, 73
Vermont, Charlie 87
Waldman, Ken 46
Washington, George 6, 70, 73
Watten, Barrett 20, 29, 70, 73
Weiner, Hannah 70, 73
Weiner, Lawrence 2, 29
Welch, Jen 29
Welch, Lew 2
Wesling, Donald 15
Wheeler, Susan 29
Wilbur, Richard 2
Williams, Paul O. 2
Wordsworth, William 26
Zorn, John 70, 73, 81
Zukofsky, Louis 2, 8, 15, 24

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 22, 23, 29, 41, 67
Aesthetics 2, 11, 12, 46, 52, 62, 70, 73
Anthologies 2, 5, 6, 12, 15, 22, 29, 34, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 70, 73, 77
Appropriation 12, 87
Archives and libraries 42, 68, 70, 73, 80, 84, 86
Avant-garde 2, 42, 46
Beat generation 12
Beauty 81
Biography 69
Book announcements 42
Capitalism 2, 3, 17, 52, 67, 85
Censorship 42
Cities 35, 41, 56, 70, 73
Class 5, 29
Collage and montage 3, 17
Conferences and festivals 29, 70, 73
Copyright and permissions 16
Craft 38
Deconstruction 62
Difficulty 36, 37
Editing 5, 6, 17, 20, 22, 29, 70, 73, 81
Electronic poetry and hypertext 7, 70, 73, 74, 80, 84
Empire and imperialism 3, 6, 14, 17, 81
Epic 82
Experimental poetry 15, 21, 24, 30
Fascism 62
Feminism 5, 29
Film 6, 17, 34, 70, 73, 87
Formalism 5, 17, 20, 21, 29
Futurism 2
Gender 2, 5, 8, 18, 29, 31, 70, 73
Grants and funding 38, 70, 73
Humour and satire 68
Ideology 6, 12
Imagism 46
Improvisation 70, 73
Interviews 68
Israel and Palestine 14
Language poetry 2, 5, 8, 20, 29, 46, 52, 70, 73
Letters and correspondence 42, 70, 73
List moderation 17, 71
Little magazines 5, 7, 19, 29, 35, 68, 70, 73, 81
Lyric poetry 3, 5, 17, 20, 29, 38, 42, 47, 52, 82
Marxism 2, 11
Memory 62, 78
MFA programs 70, 73
Modernism 2, 8, 24, 42, 82
Mourning and loss 16, 30, 53, 62, 74, 80, 84
Music and poetry 12, 22, 42, 70, 73, 81
Nature 2, 26, 29, 70, 73
Negativity and refusal 22, 32
New York School 5, 29
Objectivism 2, 8
Ontology 14
Performance and the poetry reading 70, 73
Phenomenology 82
Philosophy 14, 29, 36, 37, 42, 62, 82, 85
Place and region 2, 6, 35
Poetics 2, 3, 5, 17, 20, 22, 24, 29, 43, 44, 70, 73, 80, 81, 82, 84
Politics and poetry 58, 70, 73
Print vs. digital 29, 42, 70, 73
Prose poem 42
Prosody and meter 30
Race and poetry 3, 17, 20, 68, 70, 73
Reading announcements 75
Religion and the sacred 6, 12, 14, 17, 22, 29, 68
Reviewing and criticism 2, 6, 20, 24, 29, 40, 42, 68, 70, 73, 81

Revision 41
Science 5, 25, 26, 62
Semiotics 62
Serial poem 42
Sestina 15
Small press publishing 70, 73
Sonnet 3, 15, 17, 51, 52, 53, 58, 59
Subjectivity 3, 5, 29, 77, 81
Sublime 81
The academy 1, 12, 13, 16, 28, 32, 33, 35, 36, 37, 42, 44, 68, 82
The body 6, 12, 41, 70, 73
The canon 26
The Gulf War 22, 23
The Holocaust 52
The internet 26, 62, 70, 73, 80, 84
The Iraq war 23
The listserv 29, 70, 73, 84
The New Sentence 70, 73
Theatre 29, 42, 70, 73
Translation 6, 12, 41, 42
Visual art 68, 70, 73, 82

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 87 in all.

1 NOV 1994

1. Mark Roberts — Re: Failed Experiments
2. Ron Silliman — G-ology
3. Mark Wallace — Re: G-ology
4. Mark Wallace — Re: G-ology
5. Juliana Spahr — Re: G2
6. Patrick Phillips — "apex of the M" - essay excerpt
7. Benjamin H. Henry — Little Magazine Call For Work
8. Steven Howard Shoemaker — calling G1G2...this is mission control
9. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Failed Experiments
10. Patrick Phillips — Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt
11. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: calling G1G2...this is mission control
12. Tony Green — Re: calling G1G2...this is mission control
13. Tony Green — Re: experiwhat?

2 NOV 1994

14. Patrick Phillips — Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt
15. Michael Boughn — Re: experiwhat?
16. Loss Glazier — Re: experiwhat?
17. Ron Silliman — Flaming
18. Ron Silliman — Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt
19. Robert Drake — Re: Little Magazine Call For Work
20. Mark Wallace — Re: Flaming
21. Mark Wallace — Re: Flaming

3 NOV 1994

22. Joel Kuszai — Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt
23. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Protest of Gulf War in Portland, Or

4 NOV 1994

24. w.curnow — Re: Experiwhat?
25. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Hardcore
26. John Shoptaw — experiment
27. John Shoptaw — Listings

6 NOV 1994

28. Tony Green — Re: Experiwhat?

7 NOV 1994

29. Ron Silliman — Re: C&C
30. Michael Boughn — Re: experiwhat?
31. Ron Silliman — Re: this space
32. John Dolan — Groups: A Fable
33. Tony Green — Re: experiwhat?

8 NOV 1994

34. Michael Boughn — Re: whatever
35. A M Allcott — KIOSK Call for Work

9 NOV 1994

36. Charles Bernstein — from TONY GREEN /repost of bounced msg

14 NOV 1994

37. Tony Green — Re: from TONY GREEN / "whatever"

15 NOV 1994
38. J. Moxley — THE IMP-FILES

16 NOV 1994
39. George Bowering — Re: Experiwhat?
40. Robert Drake — reqest for reviewer: new Russian poetries

18 NOV 1994
41. John Cayley — Hologographic

19 NOV 1994
42. John Cayley — Listings

21 NOV 1994
43. krickjh — Return of the Son of Anthologies
44. Pierre Joris — Re: Return of the Son of Anthologies
45. Robert Drake — Re: Return of the Son of Anthologies
46. Paul Hoover x350 — anthology wars

22 NOV 1994
47. George Bowering — Re: Flaming
48. George Bowering — Re: experiwhat?
49. George Bowering — Re: experiwhat?
50. George Bowering — Re: G-ology

23 NOV 1994
51. Ron Silliman — Shelley
52. eric pape — Re: Shelley
53. Donald J. Byrd — Olson on the Net

24 NOV 1994
54. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: Olson on the Net
55. FILELIST — Re: Olson on the Net

25 NOV 1994
56. Michael Boughn — Olson on net
57. Michael Boughn — Re: experiwhat?
58. Tom Mandel — Re: Shelley
59. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Shelley
60. Tom Mandel — Re: Shelley
61. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Shelley
62. Donald J. Byrd — _Olson_on_the_Net
63. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Shelley

26 NOV 1994
64. Sandra Braman — Re: Shelley
65. Pierre Joris — Re: Shelley
66. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Shelley

27 NOV 1994
67. eric pape — Re: Shelley
68. Susan Bee — M/E/A/N/I/N/G # 16
69. Pierre Joris — Re: Shelley
70. Patrick Phillips — Segue Foundation Newsletter

28 NOV 1994
71. George Bowering — Re: Flaming
72. Michael Boughn — Re: Benjamin
73. Patrick Phillips — reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter

74. Loss Glazier — Re: reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter
75. James Sherry — Re: reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter
76. Tom Mandel — Benjamin/Bryher
77. w.curnow — Re: Olson on the Net

29 NOV 1994

78. Michael Boughn — Re: Benjamin/Bryher
79. Ron Silliman — Re: Benjamin/Bryher
80. Loss Glazier — Re: reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter
81. Robert Drake — forwarded "call for peer reviewers"
82. Tony Green — Re: Olson on net
83. peter quartermain — Re: experiwhat?

30 NOV 1994

84. Loss Glazier — Poetics List Archive Files
85. Kit Robinson — Re: Benjamin/Bryher
86. Louis Cabri — visit
87. eric pape — Re: Benjamin/Bryher

1. Mark Roberts

Re: Failed Experiments

Tue 1 Nov 1994

That piece by Timmons was pretty bad, eh
?
I'd say that it failed at some thing
,
and should nt have been published here.

Mark Roberts
SIS Liaison Officer
Student Information & Systems Office Ph 02 [redacted]
University of NSW Sydney Australia Fax 02 [redacted]

↑ Index

2. Ron Silliman

G-ology

Tue 1 Nov 1994

First, two corrections, or, as we G1-ers are wont to say, self-criticisms:

Jena's right that I conflated Chain & A Poetics of Criticism. Mea culpa. Tho she doesn't mention that her co-editor also co-edited the Technique section of O-blek 12. I would love to have somebody FULLY elucidate the differences between the various publications with their overlapping editorships. I frankly could learn a lot from that.

Second correction: nobody seems to have caught my error in assigning authorship of Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana to "Eli Mandel." It was Eli Siegel (who still turned into a professional homophobe at the end of his life). WCW wrote the intro to Siegel's book. Anybody out there read it?

Steve Evans' intro to the Technique section of O-blek 12 seems to me the most heroic attempt to date to articulate a terrain for G2. I think that he's right in that intro about the motivating "hatred of identity" that runs through the work, although his reading of the phenomena in O-blek is more broad and generous than that espoused in Apex's "State of the Art" manifesto. I used those two pieces with my class at Naropa, which led to some lively, albeit inconclusive discussions. Certainly nobody has ever done a more aggressive job misreading and stereotyping a community than Apex' broad swipes at G1 (& esp. LangPo):"an avant-garde dominated in its practices by a poetics espousing the priority of 'language itself' over all other relations." (p. 5)

Is that not a classic instance of labelling theory taking the misnomer "L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Poet" just a wee bit literally? I've never once met a G1 who espoused that.

Or, later on the same page, "a participatory valorization of this disintegration...." Haven't both Gayatri Spivak & Bob Perelman completely answered that in response to Fred Jameson's only-slightly-more-in-depth reading of the poem "China"?

And, throughout State of the Art, an entire series of presumptions concerning the social functions of innovation, as though everyone from M. Bertrand thru G1 were an Italian futurist celebrating the potentiality of the submachine gun. Talk about "phobic characterization"!!

I think what makes the Apex group stand out so much, especially at a distance (where, for example, it's easier to forget [or ignore] that Alan Gilbert, Kristin Prevallet and Lew Daly, the editors whom I've actually met, are all lovely, charming, intelligent people, as full of complexity and caution as one might want), is precisely the directness of their address, which shoots right through even the "post"iness of its convoluted syntax. While Steve wants me to "say it ain't so,"the Apexers say openly that "a new understanding of our task as iconoclasts and not innovators will emerge." If I ignore for a moment how I feel at the lack of accuracy and generosity in their description of my cohorts in G1, that's still an interesting and difficult claim to make and I want to know more. What distinguishes them as a group phenomenon is their ambition--it's the most "out there" manifesto we've had in ages--even if their "ambition is to have no ambition" (as I think the British punk band The Gang of Four once put it, back in the swampy G1 days of 1982).

Besides, Steve, Chick Gandil, who organized the Black Sox throw of the 1919 series (he was the first baseman), and thus gave rise to the very phrase you use, used to live on my very block here in Berkeley. He worked with my grandfather. That's at least as cosmic as discovering that I'm the reincarnation of one of Jackson Mac Low's past lives. (Or that Jack Spicer and my father died on the very same day in 1965.)

>But on to specifics. (This is Steve "talking") Marjorie Perloff's remarks
>about the shifting tenor of political commitments
>among progressives in the U.S. make sense, but let's >not forget that the "burning political concerns" of
>In the American Tree were/are by no means self-evident:
>to accept Bruce Andrews's "In Funnel" or David Melnick's >Pcoet as doing political work, one has to have a >sense of the political rather more elastic than most >people on the left had in the 70s or for that matter >have today.

At the point that David wrote Pcoet, he was either about to (or just had) abandoned his idea of ever finishing his dissertation (the one chapter he wrote appeared in the Maps special issue on Zukofsky), and came out of the closet to his students at Berkeley with a vengence, platform shoes and glitter in his beard. There was absolutely no way that any one confronting either him or that text in those days could not see the text's relation not just to the history of modernism but also to what was then known as "gender fuck" politics.

The argument for Bruce's work is not dissimilar. Tho his idea of gender fuck is a little different.

Besides, one of the major thrusts of one strain of G1 was to counter the various modes of vulgar left critical/aesthetic practice. Bruce Boone, Bob Gluck, Steve Benson, myself and Kathleen Fraser were all once in the same marxist study group, and we had some TERRIFIC arguments. In every sense of that word. And every single one of the G1s who were politically active (not just through our poetry) dealt with these issues repeatedly.

> What I don't understand is why this hard-won utopian
> intelligence (or say: set of reading practices) is > *not brought to bear on the *New Coast.

I disagree that this is what's goin' on. Here the claim in Apex about "iconoclasts and not innovators" rings much truer to my ear. What I want to know is what the social content of that might be.

If you can >read Rae Armantrout as "positioned critique" can't >you do the same for Robert Kocik?

Yes, absolutely. I'm interested in examining the nature of each position. I'm not especially making the argument for my g-g-g-generation.
>
>I suppose that at some point, Ron, names will have >to be mentioned to go along with generalizations

Oh, I still do believe in Lenin's idea that the move toward "abstraction" is toward the truer layer of the concrete.

I'm honestly not sure what's at >stake for you in such remarks.

I thought (still do) that if I prod a little, I'd get some interesting feedback from poet(s) in G2 (maybe even G3) who would further articulate the landscape, so that the "prospective" (i.e. inchoate) nature posed by O-b 12 might give greater rise to a new shared vision of a broader terrain. Frankly, I'd like to see less reactive criticism and more manifestos a la Apex (and from a broad range of positions). I find it interesting (very ambiguous word here, and deliberately so) that the most detailed response has come from somebody who positions himself as a critic and not as a poet, as such.

> *On the question of "average ages" of NC and NAP, it seems clear to me that biological age doesn't equal "age" in terms of the poetic field.*

Huh? Actually, the question of age is a complex one all on its own. One of the real values of The Art of Practice is its inclusion of a number of poets generationally part of G1 who did not begin publishing until later than most of those in Tree. (I'm reminded, say, how late both Jackson Mac Low and Hannah Weiner were to publish regularly. When Jackson was my age, 48, he had exactly 6 books in print.)

But I do think that there's a generational dynamic (different for each G) that focuses when poets are under still well under 35, and that to wait longer as a generation to begin to stake out a space is itself a notable step, so that the hesitancy implicit there must itself be looked at as part of the process (Think of Olson's age in comparison to Creeley, Blackburn et al, or of Burroughs to Ginsberg & Kerouac, or of Williams to the Objectivists.)

> To clarify one general point in closing: I am not under the impression that a collective re-definition of what poetry is and does has as yet been articulated by G2

Yep, except for Pam, Lew, Kristin & Alan have at least made one stab.

Given the >way literary fields work in capitalist social formations, >the failure to achieve such a collective redefinition >will lead to a lot of interesting poetry disappearing

Absolutely! Several G1ers have noted in recent years how much the O-b 12 formation of G2 reminds them of the younger writers who found themselves active around certain modes of the NAP in the mid- to late-60s. David Schaff, Bill Deemer, Harold Dull, d alexander, Lowell Levant, Ed Van Aelstyn, John Gorham, Gail Dusenbery, Stan Persky, Seymour Faust, George Stanley, William Anderson, Wilbur Wood, etc etc etc. But failing to distinguish their terms from NAP1, NAP2 proved unable, unwilling to set up the institutions that might have insured their own communities' perpetuation into the future.

I am amazed and appalled that neither the Messerli nor the Hoover anthologies include the work of Lew Welch. In the 1960s, he would have come into almost any listing of the 24 or so most influential NAPpers. Such is history. You have to write it yourself.

"Bang. Snap. Crack. They never knew what hit them..."

↑ Index

3. Mark Wallace

Re: G-ology

Tue 1 Nov 1994

Some items to consider in the current "generation" debate (and let me say that the remarks I'm about to make are not directed at any one particular respondent.

1) It is a standard hegemonic (not to mention racist and imperialist) move to take one piece of writing by some particular "group" (as it is defined from outside) as the example of what is wrong with that "group" as a whole, and then dismissing that "group" on the basis of that one piece of writing. It is even hegemonic, racist, and imperialist to refer to them as a "group." What does all this have to do with many of the reactions to the introductory essay in Apex of the M?

2) "Make it new" was hardly a dictum put forth by someone interested in social liberation. Indeed, "make it new" is at least as effective as a capitalist slogan as it is as a call to radical change. And whatever the social effectiveness of the proponents of "make it new" in poetry (I think it's unclear, but worth discussing) their success has been undeniable in terms of their marketing of that concept and their promotion of poetry that fits the concept.

3) Indeed, it seems true to me that all writers have a complex relation to past and present, making what is "new" by borrowing, changing, demolishing the past.

4) To see the "lyric" as somehow a force of social conservatism is simply HISTORICALLY UNVERIFIABLE. The lyric form, like the use of parataxis, collage, sonnets, whatever, is a possibility that can be made use of, or discarded, in a variety of historical situations.

5) I don't think it's at all clear whether younger writers are "returning to the lyric." But if writers are using lyric forms, the question to ask is NOT "what's wrong with those writers?" but rather "what is it about the contemporary social environment that makes the lyric seem useful to some writers" or "what is it about the lyric that makes it seem useful to some writers in this social environment."

6) One of the things I'm struck by in my conversations with writers of my own age is their GENEROSITY in responding to the work of previous generations of writers. I'm beginning to wonder whether more established writers can respond with the same level of generosity. What does it mean that it would be taken as a sign of WEAKNESS to actually believe that writers in the past did some interesting things?

7) In fact, my objection to Lew Daly's introduction to Apex of the M is not primarily on the level of poetics (though I find the statement of poetics there fundamentally misguided) but that it repeats the same Oedipal MALE model of thinking your poetry has value only if you can "overthrow the enemy." My problem with his introduction is not that it departs from the avant garde manifestos of writers like Breton, Olson, on down to Silliman, etc., but that IT LOOKS TOO MUCH LIKE THOSE MANIFESTOS.

8) But the idea that Lew's work, however interesting or not, is a statement of MY poetics, or that of Steve Evans or Jena Osman or whoever, simply escapes me completely. And that would be true even if I thought everything Lew did was great.

9) To what extent does the discourse of the avant garde remain fundamentally linear, imperialist, etc on the subject of form, the social, etc?

Mark Wallace

↑ Index

4. Mark Wallace
Re: G-ology
Tue 1 Nov 1994

Some additional comments on my previous missive:

1) What role does GENEROSITY of response to other poets play in who is considered "important", etc. Is attacking the writing of the past the same as a claim to "seriousness"?

2) I WANT TO SEE LESS MANIFESTOS

3) Notice that hegemonic "grouping" practices can be used by everybody against everybody, and they always suck.

4) Charles Borkhus: "You originals/are the biggest dupes" Whether one believes that or not, to what extent is the concept of originality on the level of form a problem rather than a given good?

5) If a revolution were to occur, what makes poets so sure that we would be part of it, rather than what was being fought against?

6) Isn't it possible that everything we know is still wrong? Or at least not more right than previous generations of writers have been?

7) Jefferson Hansen: "I don't know what I think. Hence I am crudely ecletic." Does that make him a WEAK poet? What if it did?

8) Will somebody please say that discussing poetry doesn't have to be the same as a battleground? (excuse me now, I have to go put on my armor)

Mark Wallace

↑ Index

5. Juliana Spahr
Re: G2
Tue 1 Nov 1994

As to the Evans-Silliman exchange:

I appreciated both posts.
But Steve's I found especially useful for clarifying a lot of the problems that I had with Silliman's original post.
What I find most frightening about Silliman's arguments is his reduction of everything in Buffalo
or even elsewhere in the nation to a sort of spiritualism (it is the only grouping that he acknowledges as really having any seriousness)
that finally isn't representative of the larger picture.

For starters, as Jena made clear, neither of the editors of Chain are on the board of Apex of the M.
Chain in fact is a journal that in many ways pursues an opposite agenda as that of Apex-- it is anti-editorial, anti-grouping. The use of the device of the chain letter in the first volume was explicitly intended to expand community definitions beyond editorial privilege (Jena and I wrote about the success and failure of this project in our "Editors' Notes").
Also neither of the editors of the Technique volume are on the board of Apex of the M. But while this is probably just a confusion on Silliman's part, it also seems in some ways indicative of his blindness to anything going on in what seems to be called G2 poetry beyond spirit.
Beginning the Technique volume with the Spirit section was something that went counter
to my editorial wishes and knowledge
(I wanted to open with the broader "word and world" section), but also I think should not be read as "aggressive."
Peter argues that when he sent this volume off to the printers with the spirit section first, it was to try to offer some connection with the Presentation volume--
both begin with Abbot and end Ziolkowsky.
I am willing to chalk it up to alphabetical accident.
But also I don't think that any more than the twenty-one poets in the spirit section have much to do with spirit (and come on, even of these twenty-one,
beyond a statement of an idea of poetics
as being transformative, it is hard to see these poets as a unified group-- Miekal And, Lisa Jarnot are hardly spiritualist poets that would meet the rigors of definition proposed in Apex-- this confusion or expansion of the categories in this collection was an editorial intention).
Finally, to see the anthology as spiritualist is to do a great and serious disservice to around one hundred other poets.
Just as to say that the anthology indulges in
"increasingly modest forms"
is to do a great disservice to a whole slew
of writers (who are these people, Ron?
who is "returning to the lyric?
what are their numbers in this volume?
who is draining the social?
what is the social and why is the lyric not social?--

these are all innocent questions on my part,
I need more specifics to actually begin to discuss this topic which is one that seems very urgent to me).
It is, to just list some names at random,
unfair to Lee Ann Brown's and Karen Kelley's attention to sexuality, unfair to Kevin Magee's mix of formalism, class struggle, and history, unfair to Myung Mi Kim's attention to relation,
unfair to Susan Gevirtz's complicated feminism and attention to subjectivity, unfair to C.S. Giscombe's attention to identity.
It is also I think unfair to the overt political intention in the anthology to include as many women as men (something that other anthologies of alternative poetry don't even come close to attempting and something that never seems to get mentioned in any complaint about this collection).
Further, I am no longer sure any more, although I would have been a year ago,
that a return to the lyric is a draining of the social.
For starters, it is difficult to separate the social from any form.
Susan Stewart's recent work on the lyric has done a lot of change
the way I think of this form.

Also, I don't see the anthology has having a
"reluctance to acknowledge or own its own position."
It seems rather that there is a complication in the anthology of what it means to have a position (an identity, a school, a gender).
Steve Evans's introductory piece is good on this.
If there is anything that sits owl-like overlooking a younger generation
it isn't language poetry
anymore than it is the New York school--
it is rather attempts at categorization, at bunker mentality.
Much of the work of what might be called G2 reacts against this and in very interesting and innovative ways (Apex is an obvious exception to this in their editorial return to a concept of poetic discourse as war).
Perhaps the reason such a collection seems such a strange beast to Silliman is that it is so different than the rigorous, mathematical model of ITAT. It is a collection of younger poets--
all of whose writing will change dramatically in the next years.
I prefer to think of the anthology
as more of a phonebook than even an anthology (these complaints about the authority of this anthology that are happening in Joel's post and in the discussion of anthologies

at the beginning of the year are very alien to me-- what authority? the whole thing
was thrown together and knows it).
The numbers will change, people will move,
but it is an attempt at a demographic for the year. It claims no completeness.
It doesn't tell you not to read the books of the authors included.
At best, it is a reference tool.
At its worst, it is difficult to read because it includes so many writers.

All of this has put me in the uncomfortable position of defending something that I have worked on. But while I acknowledge a lot of omissions and other problems with the anthology, I also believe that a lot of the work in it is important. I stand behind this work by other people because it has meant something to me. I don't find this work a repetition of language poetry nor does it seem to me upsetting that there are "no literary devices in that collection that you cannot already find in The New American Poetry, In the American Tree, or The Art of Practice" anymore than it upsets me that there are no devices in these anthologies that one cannot find in as inclusive a project as America: A Prophecy or maybe even the Norton. It is emphasis and idea and use of device here that is important. Not device itself.

I hope this makes sense. I would enjoy complaints and clarifications. Juliana Spahr

P.S. Please excuse erratic returns, they are not poetic attempts but rather just attempts to stop the line being cut in two.

↑ Index

6. Patrick Phillips

"apex of the M" - essay excerpt

Tue 1 Nov 1994

For those of you who are interested, what follows is the preface and footnotes to an essay I have written on the "apex of the M" preface. I present the essay in its abridged form here in part to spare you too much text and for the simple reason that I have it "out" to an editor in hope of publication. My response the the "M" centers upon a notion of "act" is which I feel undermined by the eschatological. The "footnotes" which folow actually contain their own argument and flesh out more fully what I mean by "act." Toward the end of the body of the essay, which is aphoristic in its construction, I quote a critical line offered by Ron Silliman in the "Chinese Notebook"

20.) Perhaps poetry is an activity and not a form at all..... & 25.) How can I show the intentions of this work and poetry are identical?

Here I ain't talkin' 'bout my ge...ge..genuflection.

I would be happy to send the body of the paper to anyone who'd like it.

Patrick Phillips

"Only Be Sure to Spare the Poet's House."

Put it all to the torch! And the king named one by one the towers, the gates, the temples this marvel of the world;
then brightened, as the thought leaped into words:
"Only be sure to spare the Poet's House."
Akhmatova: from Alexander at Thebes
Leningrad, October 1961

What follows is in part a response to a recent editorial preface published in the first issue of "apex of the M." My initial response upon reading the preface was something of a fever, a visceral anger over the tactics chosen by the editors. Among other things the preface urges a re-figuring of poetry toward a "millennial" poetry; a proffering of the "eschatological" and the acknowledgment of the "sacred" as an orientation in this "iconoclastic" re-figuration. On further reflection, it became clear that the gnostic territory marked out by the editors is an extreme violation of the very things they advocate. I wrote this response to allude to another radicality which turns the editor's contentions inside out, a radicality which alters the grounds toward which such theological terms attempt to surface.

The poet's house in the above epigraph is a protectorate it suffers an enjoined sovereignty. By torching Thebes, yet sparing Pindar's house, Alexander makes of the poet's house a protectorate within an eviscerated political and ideological history a situation which speaks poignantly about Akhmatova's condition in Soviet Russia in the early 1960's.1 This protectorate is a historically ramified condominium; condominial in that it becomes the locus of its own negation, an index of a history apart spared only as a remnant. The tyranny of Alexander's rule is not mitigated by his benevolence to the poets (and priests) of Thebes. By being spared the torch, the poet's house is brought into the state, and made a colony of its ideological adventurism. In a similar fashion, the editor's preface to "apex of the M" makes of the poet's house a protectorate through its reference to Dante's benevolent Monarchy.2 The concept of the monarchy arriving at the new Millennium folds this protectorate around our action/writing. The proposal of a millennial poetry guts the act of its own potential; the cultural and historical magnetism of the Millennium is powerful enough to push historical perspective into a future which is beyond its own significance. It is a warped projection which hurls the act into a future of its own making. This warp enables a projection of "consciousness' which for many reasons is an aberration of any sense of the continuity of work. The thought of this projection and its working through is in fact suspended by this hurl into the future; this "thought" is propelled by its own idea and is a self-serving futuring and is not arrived at through historical immanence. In other words this gnostic sparing is an evacuation of history through a constant futuring; an eschatological desire which distances desire and history from the moment of act. This maneuver proves quite similar to Alexander's sparing, but in "M" the house is "spared" instead through the sacred as a sacrifice to the Other. In material history, the poet's house cannot be spared by either monarchy; both monarchies only gaze from a distance at the poet's house; they reach only to the threshold of its potential. As though in the flames engulfing Thebes, the thousand lights flickering off the M into the heavens3 illuminate the poet's house as only an iconographic way-station, postponing history until the fulfillment by an other. This other never being accomplished refutes action.4 History in the case of any imperialist tyranny is absorbed by that tyranny the ash surrounding the poet's house. History in the case of "M" becomes a transfixion, dependent upon the course of postponed desire. The M's subjects stand transfixed by the flicker, the meta-physic of the gnostic fire, a fire as tyrannous in its claim on poets as were Alexander's. We begin to see a relationship of the word to history. The force of work in world is equal to its moment of act as reflected in the word. This is the word's duration and consequence. Through this examination we also begin to notice that the image of the M disrupts history, it creates a film on history which is gesturally opaque a shadow of the world. The "apex of the M," in spite of its attempts to be iconoclastic, reapplies the icon in a most graphic and violent form of usurpation, intended as liberatory, yet functioning as a rhetorical device which perhaps unbeknownst to the editors is bent on debilitating human actuality. We begin to see that far from being iconoclastic the editor's spell cast at the apex of the Millennium makes of history a fetish. The result of the distance of act from word in the eschatological breach is that history and the future is idolized, thematized, made aspect of rhetoric and form. In essence the effect of the preface to the "apex of the M" is an "iconoclastic fetishism."5 Within act as a process of work the poet's house is and can only be continuously engulfed in material history by constantly enacting the overthrow of any agency. This is achieved only at the moment of the letter as it is engulfed in history apart from any agency. Indeed this struggle against agency is the interminable contradiction of language, its constant overthrow of its own mediacy. This continuum is itself history; history apart from rhetoric, from style, from form in activity. This essay is a brief examination of the poetic act as act in history and is prompted by the responsibility of this act a responsibility and a history dodged by any agency, any Monarchy, be it "Alexander's," or "God's."

1 At a recent reading given by Michael Palmer he mentioned to the audience that Akhmatova's house is a national museum, but that it is unmarked and its location is known to but a few it is a "secret house."

2 In Dante's cosmology, the "M" falling out of the heavens in a procession of letters (D-I-L-I-G-I-T-E I-U-S-T-I-T-I-A-M...Q-U-I I-U-T-I-C-A-T-I-S T-E-R-R-A-M) orients the reader to view the M as if with a partition between one's eyes. In one eye the M is a promotion of the benevolent monarchy - God's justice - to be established on earth; in the other eye, as some critics would have it, the M, in its transformation to a fleur-de-lis, is a critique of the imperialist ventures of the French Monarchy and of Florentine political schisms France had its hand in the ouster of the Ghibbelenes in Florence and both France and Florence used the fleur-de-lis as political symbols. This politically partitioned view of the M points to a secular monarchy and to Dante's critique of a Prince's justice. The partition of the M is instructive.The moment of the M, of letters, for Dante is partitioned secular and sacred the moment of act and potential.. The schism of act and potential points directly to the schism of secular and sacred, but through the transparency of angels:

'The Angelic intellect is always in a state of pure act that is, its powers never lapse into mere potentiality, but are at every moment actualized. At the other extreme of creation, and therefore in the lowest place is pure matter, the prima materia which is pure potentiality the possibility of becoming realized in some individual form. Midway between the two stand man, a union of both. Part of our powers goes forth intermittently in act or actuality; but part lies inactive as mere potentiality, waiting to be called into play. And in man this union of act and potentiality, Beatrice declares, will never be dissolved. This is sometimes understood as the union of body and soul, which even death can dissolve only for a time; but it seems rather to imply that man even in the world to come will never attain to the pure act of the Angelic intellect some part of his being will remain for ever in potentia.' from In Patria, an Exposition of Dante's Paradiso, Rev. John S. Carroll, M.A., D.D. , Kennikat Press Port Washington, NY/London, 1971, first published in 1911. p. 454.

When seen through the agency of the Angelic intellect, material act is "for ever in potentia." This in potentia is the measure of our act, from without. This external measure results in a violence an excised history very similar to that suffered at the words of Alexander. In a subtle, yet profound shift, if read dialectically, the future does not bestow grace upon act, act is its own futuring.B With the recognition of the trans-temporality of act, there is a clearer understanding of how the poet's house is perpetually engulfed in history; never does it propose a future, it actualizes history as it's own future. To flesh this out further, this notion of act can be likened to the idea of negotiation put forth by Homi Bhaba in location of culture, (Rutledge, '94). In the first chapter,

"The Commitment to Theory," Bhaba refutes the possibility of a transparent agent, or of any third person examination of ideology. He puts forth Mill's "On Liberty" as a clear example of a third person , or transparent agency of political ideology that first marks out difference (polarization) and then reconciles these differences through a careful, (and inherently violent) rationale. (For Bhaba, Mill's transparent agency is a rhetorical/textual manifestation of the political subject through negation.) Opting instead for a textual, or iterate negotiation, Bhaba attempts to position the text in a constant process of emergence from within an ideological translation. "When I talk of 'negotiation' rather than 'negation,' it is to convey a temporality that makes it possible to conceive of the articulation of antagonistic or contradictory elements: a dialectic, without the emergence of a teleological or transcendent History....By negotiation I attempt to draw attention to the structure of 'iteration' which informs political movements that attempt to articulate antagonistic and oppositional elements without the rationality of sublation or transcendence. (pp. 25, 26) What does this have to do with a benevolent monarchy? First, gnosticism is the pre-eminent trans parent agency. For the gnostic, only God is capable of reconciling act and potential. Any acceptance of that agency is a subordination to that agency - a further removal from act's capacity; any acceptance of a transparent agency, any Monarchy, is an acceptance of a negative, transcendental history. Second, the iteration of a gnostic history is the proposition of an Other to which we ascend, of a constant and everlasting potential which is always undoing the act. The extension of this is that through transcendence, history is subordinate to gnostic iteration. B Any attempt to reconcile act with potential must encounter history at its moment and this encounter is impossible through any transparent agency (or angel). In part of the Arcades Project, Benjamin counters very clearly the agency of angels and proposes a material history in constant actualization. The fore- and after-history of historical evidence is made manifest in it by a dialectical presentation. Further: every historical state of affairs presented dialectically polarizes and becomes a force field in which the conflict between fore- and after history plays itself out. It becomes that field as it is penetrated by actuality. And thus historical evidence always polarizes into fore- and after-history in a new way, never in the same way. And it does so go beyond itself, within actuality per se.... (N7a,1) and in another place:

in allegory the facies hippocratica of history lies before the viewer's eyes like a frozen, primordial landscape...(N2,7)

from N: "Re The Theory of Knowledge,Theory of Progress,"

Act is its own limit and the limit of history. Any agency (any "M") is allegorical and denies this limit and instead presents a mythic history an "antediluvian fossil."

As an historical and cultural cross-reference, parts of the argument put forth by the editors of "apex of the M" are in no way new, or specific even to poetries of the west. A Japanese literary critic Yashimoto Takaaki used a similar argument against self conscious, language-centered writing in Japan in the late 1970's. Yashimoto, reacting to the influence of (French) post-modern thinkers on Japanese poetry in the '60's, argued that "to single out [contemporary] poet's individual characteristics from the ground of their sensibility and the solipsism of their thought has become meaningless." [See the introduction to An Anthology of Contemporary Japanese Poetry, Leith Morton Ed (1993) and Trans and Yashimoto Takaaki, Zomho Sengoshiron (Tokyo: Yamata Shobo, 1983) (The above quote is borrowed from Morton's anthology, page xxiii.)].

3 These thousand lights have been said to be the transcendence of writing itself; the individual letters actually writing the world onto the face of divine justice - the joined matter and spirit, act and potential in the Jovian sphere. See chapter two of Jermey Tambling's Dante and Differance, Cambridge, 1988.

↑ Index

7. Benjamin H. Henry
Little Magazine Call For Work
Tue 1 Nov 1994

November 1994

Issue 21 of _The Little Magazine_ will be distributed as a cd-rom, and we are looking for work which maximizes the potential of this medium. We encourage contributors to conceive of their submissions as multi-media "texts" which can incorporate graphics, audio and hypertext (as a partial listing of the possibilities). "Straight" texts will also be considered, especially those concerned with issues relating to electronic medium (the attitude need not be positive).

We will produce the journal using a Microsoft Windows system and Asymetrix Multimedia Toolbook, and accept submissions on disk (MacIntosh format possible but not preferred), or via e-mail, ftp, or DAT. Paper as a last resort! Graphics work is preferred in a digitized format, though, if required, we can digitize work for you. Our conceptual / diagrammatic deadline is January 31, and technical / final deadline is April 1. Please contact us as soon as possible if you have work to contribute.

The Little Magazine
Department of English
SUNY-Albany
Albany, NY 12222
[redacted]

Look forward to hearing from you,

Thanks!

The Editors

↑ Index

8. Steven Howard Shoemaker calling G1G2...this is mission control
Tue 1 Nov 1994

> At the point that David wrote Pcoet, he was either about to (or just had) abandoned his idea of ever finishing his dissertation (the one chapter he wrote appeared in the Maps special issue on Zukofsky), and came out of the closet to his students at Berkeley with a vengence, platform shoes and glitter in his beard. There was absolutely no way that any one confronting either him or that text in those days could not see the text's relation not just to the history of modernism but also to what was then known as "gender fuck" politics.

As someone struggling with my own dissertation on the Objectivists, i found this image of a newly freed Melnick in platform shoes, an image apparently hovering just behind the text, delightful. Problem is, i'd read the poem before & never been visited by this apparition. And maybe i'm only advertising my own lack of in/sight but i defy anyone to conjure it from those pages in INTAT alone. The point is that in its absence, i'm not sure how clear the whole "gender fuck" issue is (wasn't clear at all to me). The larger point, as i see it, is that many of these sorts of discussions, of poetry and "the social," posit a larger (reading) context for the poetry that is simply an illusion (despite the fierce energy and intrinsic interestingness of some of the discussion). Where i live i am defined against almost everyone i know by the fact that the latest ish of Talisman or Sulfur might be found lying around my apt. That puts me in a pretty small group--yet i'm pretty far out of the loop when it comes to the current G1/G2 debate--much of which, it strikes me from the outside, will turn on precisely those Melnickean personal filigrees to which Ron alludes--and these are supposed to verify the political dimension of the work? And on this point, i have to say, despite my longstanding sympathy w/ the LangPo effort, that if people have insisted on objecting to what they see as that group's exclusionary emphasis on the centrality of language (which is key to the claim for social efficacy of poetry), it is only because the original writings are full of such assertions of linguistic centrality. It may be true, as Silliman indicates, that no one actually believed it, but the extremism of assertion was itself part of the way the "group" worked and undoubtedly a crucial factor in its "success" (w/in an extremely limited field). The question remains: what is the larger social efficacy of the sorts of "resistances" LangPos have advocated? How exactly does the social enter the poem and the poem the social? How do discussion like these keep from remaining hopelessly INTERNECINE??

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

9. Jeffrey Timmons

Re: Failed Experiments

Tue 1 Nov 1994

On Mon, 31 Oct 1994, George Bowering wrote:

> That piece by Timmons was pretty bad, eh? I'd say that it failed at something, and shouldnt have been published here.

Which, within the context of the "discussion," is another way of saying that it was a successful experiment--though the criteria for success must be garnered through an ironic reading.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

10. Patrick Phillips

Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt

Tue 1 Nov 1994

I must apologize for the hastily strung preface to my excerpt. The garbled sentence should read:

Just how does one act when the church is on fire?

I should also add that I find myself, by vice or virtue - not by age, outside G2, though most of my friends are card carrying. My poetry is god damned lyrical though, so according to prophecy, I should be getting my card in the mail any day now.

↑ Index

11. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: calling G1G2...this is mission control
Tue 1 Nov 1994

Steven Shoemaker's question is an important one: How does the social enter the poem; how does the poem enter the social? Such questions seem highly valuable in ascertaining not only relationships between aesthetics and the larger social world, but the place of the arts (and artists) in that world. I'm very interested in hearing what other people's ideas are about such notions of influence between the social and the personal, particularly as they relate to aesthetic production and their place/influence/relationship to history and context. I've been exploring Marxist, particularly Gramscian, views of how the social and the aesthetic interact but I have the sense that they, while useful, remain vague and ill-defined. The notion of "use" that was raised seems pertinent, but I'll have to reread (always) those entries to see if they can be inserted into Steven's question. I am always reminded of Emerson in "Art" where he finds the distinction between the useful and the fine arts limiting and stifling--perhaps the answer (were there ever any one) would lie in that direction.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

12. Tony Green
Re: calling G1G2...this is mission control
Tue 1 Nov 1994

Isn't "the poem", lock schlock and barrel, constituted by a writer who has continuing relations with the body politic, like it or not -- thrown-ness as in Jim Morrison (rr or r] & Charles Bernstein have liked to say -- following Heideggr, I guess. Oh yes aesthetics happens somewhere else then where, old bean, huh? Aesthetics is a blind for social and money interests mainly.

Confucius never found anyone who was disinterested -- & that makes questions for a whole tradition of separations and purifications in the name of art (i.e. Milord's fetishized pictures and objets d'art, later property of boards of trustees of museums, or MS of Vergil, as sandwiched in plastic sheeting in Vatican to be literary. Poet's letters, Palgrave and subsequent anthologies in the college market].

Jean Calais's translations of Villon are all in vain....Everyone wants to be a big artist these days. There must be more in poetry than anyone has thought. Could it be that there is a real power in it/always ideologists want to bring it under their control, as instrument. Like music, it keeps on escaping ideological control clutches, saying more than it means to, or less. Let's hope there is a real poet among the new writers, or even two. Surely "G1" or any G at all including G-6 (dead poets of circa Mallarme's time will welcome them, by opening new readings to us, readings we had missed, but which may be what we have always really longed for. Belonging to no G in the U.S. (wrong age) but listening as a reader/user to several U.S. G's with pleasure, excitement, appropriative glee, there is no reason to choose among generations, only to pick out the plums. This you learn in "art history", who says there's progress between generations, so that noone can consider themselves righteous who can make use of "early" artworks? Does the saying of a poem work like a charm as entry to a space of thoughts and language issues and issues of living and the politics of living or not? Noone can quite tell what will prove to be useful and sometimes it happens that a misprint retained does the trick. L= was marvellous because it accepted that conscious control of the way words got into the poem could be consonant with disorders that seemed to be the preserve of chance procedures or of lyrical speaking with tongues.

It did not only "displace" "personal poetries" (Downtown poetries various, variously remaining in some degree acceptable or with affinities) but also the hopes for the upsurge of deep image to recreate the body and the body's politics. I look to see with interest which models from the recent G's various will reappear as the mashed potatoes for the younger poets. I could see aspects of beat poetry being valuable as well as the "spiritual" poetries of say Robt Kelly or George Quasha....

If I see the arts as a zone for freedoms, someone will now surely tell me my responsibilities. __ That sounds like a job for Ron Silliman. __ I'm impressed with Tom Mandel's comments on "use" and I hope this will be seen as pushing in something of that direction as well as a rejoinder to the Shoemaker questions.

This medium is great for filling in times like sitting in office waiting for next lot of exam papers to come in. Hello. American poets, it's half-past four on an early summer afternoon, --- here is your wake up call.

"The difference is spreading."

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

13. Tony Green
Re: experiwhat?
Tue 1 Nov 1994

Not Mandel only, but Patrick Phillips on use, and impoverished uses of this facility, ending "Form is rampant". There's politics!

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

14. Patrick Phillips
Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt
Wed 2 Nov 1994

Although I've been presumptuous enough already, I left off two important notes in the excerpt:

4 My progression to a notion of poethics can't help but take up, through parallel, Levinas' notion of Heideggers' Ontology. In Otherwise Than Being (pg. 103) Levinas charges Heidegger with doing to Being what the M'sters have done with any notion of making, or of poetry.

Ontology as first philosophy is a philosophy of power. It issues the State and in the nonviolence of totality, without securing itself against the violence from which is nonviolence lives and which appears in the tyranny of the state. Truth, which should reconcile persons, here exists anonymously. Universality presents itself as impersonal; and this is another inhumanity....A philosophy of power, ontology is, as philosophy which does not call into question the same, a philosophy of injustice. Even though it opposes the technological passion issued forth from the forgetting of Being hidden by existents, Heideggerian ontology which subordinates the relationship with the Other to the relation of Being in general, remains under the obedience to the anonymous, and leads inevitably to another power, to imperialist domination, to tyranny. Tyranny is not the pure and simple extension of technology to reified men. Its origin lies back in the pagan "mood," in the enrootedness in the earth, in the adoration that enslaved men can devote to their masters.

5 In Iconology (Chicago, '86) W.J.T. Mitchell plots out some of the rhetorical image-making used by Marx and his contemporaries in an effort to get to an understanding of "The Rhetoric of Iconoclasm." From the chapter so titled he examines empiricist and idealist models of history to illuminate Marx's critique of fetishism and "its dialectical counterpart, the phenomenon of iconoclasm." Although his argument in no way resembles my own, I feel there is an pertinent quote from the passage called "the Dialectics of Iconoclasm:"

Iconoclasm has a history at least as old as idolatry. Although it always tends to appear as a relatively recent, revolutionary breakthrough, overturning some previous established cult of image-worship (the Protestant Reformation breaking with Roman Catholicism, the iconoclasts of the Byzantine Empire opposing the patriarch, the Israelites escaping Egypt), it regularly presents itself as the most ancient form of religion a return to primitive Christianity, or to the religion of the first human creatures, before a "fall" which is always understood as a fall into idolatry. Indeed, one might argue that iconoclasm is simply the obverse of idolatry turned outward toward the image of a rival, threatening tribe. The iconoclast prefers to think that he worships no image of any sort, but when pressed, he is generally content with the rather different claim that his images are purer or truer than those of mere idolaters. (page 198)

↑ Index

15. Michael Boughn

Re: experiwhat?

Wed 2 Nov 1994

This is a bit of a long post, which is, I know, against the rules, and, worse, rude. I apologize in advance, but having initiated this discussion, there's a lot I need to say at this point. The multitude of repsonses have been extremely interesting in their diversity and inventiveness, but none has yet convinced me that the phrase "experimental poetry" is either meaningful (apart from idiosyncratic imaginations of it : private languages) or particularly useful. On the contrary, after everyone has said their piece, it seems more confused and confusing than ever. For me, the most attractive defense so far has been Robert Kelly's, which he achieves by returning experiment and its science to their mysterious alchemical sources, and the notion of proceeding not knowing what the outcome will be. Even then, though, the idea that only some poetry is initiated not knowing its outcome seems based on the very same violent taxonomy I was trying to shed some light on in the first place.

If we take this secondary definition of experiment as the operative one in relation to poetry, the unspoken implication is that there is something we can call non-experimental poetry. What exactly would that poetry be? Poetry that knows what its outcome will be before it starts? What does "outcome" mean here? What the poem ultimately "says"? How the poem ultimately "works"? Frankly I don't think I know of any poetry like that, even the poetry I am least interested in. Even the most predictably conventional, it seems to me, can, and frequently does, contain surprises, the unexpected. To know the outcome before you write is to produce manuals, not poems. Even someone like Timothy Steele, I'd argue, doesn't know what results his rhymes will produce before he writes them.

Perhaps the key is the word "conventional". Or, dare I say it, "predictable", thus returning us to the world of experimentalism. (But if a poem is predictable, can't this be part of an experiment? Experimenting to see if certain conventions will produce consistently predictable results?) Let's say there is a complex structure of conventions the poet has at her disposal, conventions that extend from phonetics to syntax to semantics to form (something like the grammetrical model Donald Wesling works out in The Chances of Rhyme and The New Poetries). In one sense, a poem embodies a structure of choices (conscious or unconscious, controlled or random) that array language in complex relation to those conventions. Certain patterns of convention dominate at any given moment the cultural sense of what constitutes a contemporary poem.

We recognize Shakespeare's sonnets as poems, even great poems, at the same time we know they are not contemporary poems. Compare them with Bernadette Mayers' or Jack Clarke's sonnets. Their sonnets are absolutely contemporary in every way, even though, or maybe especially because, they work with a 600 year old form. I don't know how Bernadette would refer to her work, but I think Jack would blanche at the word experimental. You could say Los doesn't experiment, Los creates. Is this a meaningful distinction? My sense is that every phoneme, every stress, every rhyme, every reference in Jack's sonnets work within and against the array of conventions to mark out a moment of awareness of the particularity of the astonishing complexity of relation between language, thought, myth, history, sound, silence, rhythm, self, other, social, personal, elsewhere, here, time, and eternity. What Girogio Agamben calls "whatever being" in The Coming Community. This is not something I would think of as experimental.

Let me go back to the question of the relation to convention as a way of distinguishing between poetries. Let's assume that at certain times certain conventions dominate writing to the point that they no longer even seem to be conventions, they are simply seen as constituting (good) writing. And as a result, meaning itself becomes predictable and conventional. Moreover, the conventions can be seen as upholding certain conventional and oppresive forms of life. One alternative for a poet in those circumstances is to try to subvert the forms of life by subverting the dominant conventions in her work.

Is this something people mean by "experimental"? And if so, is it more important under these conditions to not know what you're doing (what your desired outcome is) or to know? Or is it possible in some sense to both know and not know at the same time? Say, to know generally, but not to know specifically. What does it mean to not know in this context?

Let me return for a moment to the idea of a situation in which a specific form of literay convention has become authoritarian and can be seen as upholding certain oppressive forms of life. In this situation, is it possible to address, even subvert, those oppressive forms of life from within a writing based on those dominant conventions? I think this is the kind of writing Keith Tuma referred to a few months ago during the great anthology debate, i.e. the writing of someone like Thom Gunn, or, say, Louis Zukofsky when he's writing sestinas.

If we acknowledge that it is possible, that means that the link bewteen the forms of literary conventions and the forms of life is metaphorical, not actual, and that some other issue is at stake here in the writing. Let's call it "meaning", where we understand that in a broad sense of the overall signifying power of the poem, the numinous "cloud" of significance generated by the totality of the poem's phonic, visual, semantic, and temporal structures.

In this model, the relation to convention, while meangingful, does not determine meaning. If we understand "experimental" poetry to be poetry which resists in some way(s) the dominant conventions by "not knowing" what it's doing, what its outcome is, it could in any case still be upholding the very oppressive forms of life it seems to be subverting, or trying to subvert. That is, it could banal, predictable, pretentious, self-indulgent, tedious--even authoritarian (and, as Joel Kuszai pointed out, sometimes is).

What, then, is the use of this distinction? Rather than clarifying the issues facing writers today, it obscures those issues by creating a dualistc taxonomy which implicitly attaches value to sheer formal exuberance or lack of control or even ignorance.

I know there's a whole other dimension to this question that has to do with practical considerations of identity, recognition, publication, government money, etc. A number of people made interesting observations about these issues and the question of lables. These are important questions, but they're not questions of principle. They should not be confused with principles, nor allowed to confuse them.

Adios,
Mike
[redacted]

PS Peter Quartermain tells me Gertrude Stein denied she ever wrote an experiemntal work. How should we understand that?

↑ Index

16. Loss Glazier
Re: experiwhat?
Wed 2 Nov 1994

Mike,

In the airport recently I observed a man wearing a tee shirt upon which was written, in huge block letters:

WHY?

BECAUSE I SAY SO.

This to me sums up this question re: the issue of "experimental" (allowing that we are not talking any more, which would yield no results, postulating a hypothesis and then trying to prove it.)

What I mean to say is that if you take Timothy Steele or people secure in the academy more importantly, where these people come from, that they are invested with some authority and the line really falls where they have the confidence (vs permission, in Duncan's sense) of being able to "say so."

I mean when I saw the t shirt I thought who is his audience, his children, his significant other, airport personnel. But in the end it didn't matter to whom it was addressed (maybe it was only to me!) there was no doubt from the look in his eyes, whether he was going to be "experimental" or "conventional" that his audience would have to yield.

That's the point I'm thinking as I do my own scribbling somewhere out of his way.

Loss
Loss Glazier
[redacted]

↑ Index

17. Ron Silliman
Flaming
Wed 2 Nov 1994

I've found virtually every response to my last post really valuable and useful. Especially Juliana's.

But I don't want this to be reduced to a "generational debate" since I don't see "winners" or "losers" but rather think I (personally) have a lot to gain from getting the sorts of insights that seem right now to be just popping out the various posts. Roadmaps to the writing are especially valuable.

Besides, if this is going to be Oedipal, I know which role that puts me in, thank you...

Some thoughts here on a few of Mark Wallace's comments.

>
>1) It is a standard hegemonic (not to mention racist and imperialist) >move to take one piece of writing by some particular "group" (as it is >defined from outside) as the example of what is wrong with that "group" >as a whole, and then dismissing that "group" on the basis of that one >piece of writing.

Yo, Mark. I'm not saying there's anything "wrong" with the Apex cluster and am trying to read them, not dismiss them.

One of many valuable lessons I learned from Jerry Rothenberg about 25 years ago was that it's very hard for any writer to read the work of people 20 years or more younger than him or herself. Writers of the NAP generation tended to cluster w/ regards to my own G1 into the following patterns:
1) Couldn't read it, didn't try
2) Wasn't what they expected, so dismissed it outright, sometimes w/ great hostility
3) Tried to be generous, but didn't really get it
(this was/is almost a majoritarian reaction)
4) Read it with interest, insight and made valuable responses to it

W/ regards to G2, G3...Gn, I'd like personally to aim for #4. And would appreciate any help I can get.

 It is even hegemonic, racist, and imperialist to refer >to them as a "group."

What is the point of writing a collective "state of the art" if people don't take it seriously as collective action? I'm not the one grouping them together. I will admit that use a governmental/institutional frame such as a "state of the art" address does put one into some heavy metaphoric territory. They're the ones who announced that they were the government, no?

Let's avoid flame wars of hyperbole and character assassination if possible. It makes it harder to read the work.

>2) "Make it new" was hardly a dictum put forth by someone interested >in social liberation. Indeed, "make it new" is at least as effective as a >capitalist slogan as it is as a call to radical change. And whatever the >social effectiveness of the proponents of "make it new" in poetry (I >think it's unclear, but worth discussing) their success has been >undeniable in terms of their marketing of that concept and their >promotion of poetry that fits the concept.
>

Actually, Pound was interested in social liberation. But he had a profoundly fucked up idea of what that might mean. The other point about making it new and the promotion of a poetry that fits the concept is one that the New Formalists have already made. Interesting to see it here.

>4) To see the "lyric" as somehow a force of social conservatism is >simply HISTORICALLY UNVERIFIABLE. The lyric form, like the use of >parataxis, collage, sonnets, whatever, is a possibility that can be made use of, or discarded, in a variety of historical situations.

I think that a social examination of the lyric is a great project to think about working on. I've even contemplated the idea of a booklength study. Especially since the definition of lyric changes I think (part. in the late 19th century) as its differentiation from dramatic & narrative modes dissolves in poetry due to the arrival of other more powerful dramatic/narrative media, the novel, cinema, etc. Pound's tripartate logopoeia, phanopoeia, melopoeia are an attempt I think to rescue that earlier distinction, essentially dividing lyric into all three houses of the poem. But the underlying question becomes, what is the social meaning of the lyric? In O-blek 12, as I read it, it seems a return to the personal and local, which in turn can mean a lot of things. I'd like to figure out just what those are.

In general, I think that all forms are amoral and can be used from any poltical/social position depending on the context.

> 5) I don't think it's at all clear whether younger writers are "returning to the lyric." But if writers are using lyric forms, the question to ask is NOT "what's wrong with those writers?" but rather "what is it about the contemporary social environment that makes the > lyric seem useful to some writers" or "what is it about the lyric that makes it seem useful to some writers in this social environment."

EXACTLY!!

>7) In fact, my objection to Lew Daly's introduction to Apex of the M is... that it repeats the same Oedipal MALE model of thinking your poetry has value only if you can "overthrow the enemy." My problem with his introduction is ... that IT LOOKS TOO MUCH LIKE THOSE MANIFESTOS.
>

It wasn't Lew who signed it. According to Alan & Kristin, they all worked on it together, to the point that even some sentences were collaboratively written.

>8) But the idea that Lew's work, however interesting or not, is a >statement of MY poetics, or that of Steve Evans or Jena Osman or whoever,

Nobody ever said it was. Or Jena's or Juliana's or Joel's or most anybody else in O-blek 12 except for the very particular few who actively commit themselves to some version of its argument. So people like Will Alexander and Elizabeth Robinson stand in an interesting relation to it, not a part of that declaration but obviously very sympathetic to its conception of a spiritual poetics. Not clear at all how they would stand w/ regards to State of the Arts rather bellicose stance toward the past.

I have found people in O 12 who themselves felt that putting the spirit section first in Technique "yolked" them into its general thrust and felt very much ripped off by that, precisely because they did not buy into the underlying argument and felt that putting it first created a sense of that. I've heard that from at least 5 contributors.

The value of State of the Art is that it makes explicit what O 12's editing structure seems to imply. Very hard to read it as an accident of the alphabet.

↑ Index

18. Ron Silliman

Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt

Wed 2 Nov 1994

That Mitchell quote is illuminating. Though I'm amazed that in 1986 he still uses "he" as a gender neutral third person!!
>

↑ Index

19. Robert Drake
Re: Little Magazine Call For Work
Wed 2 Nov 1994

folks--

good

↑ Index

20. Mark Wallace
Re: Flaming
Wed 2 Nov 1994

I thought it was clear from my opening comment that my remarks were not directed at "attacking" the comments made by any one particular post. It's interesting that my attempt to avoid doing so can be taken that way.

Some further responses, this time in particular to what Ron has said.

1) I think I was suggesting, at least partly, that the reductive grouping of various poets BEGINS in the introduction to the Apex of the M. By turning "Language Poetry" into some one particular thing, they unfortunately invite the kind of attacks that turn THEM into one particular thing (altho I find it unfortunate that that is what had to happen)

2) I think it may be a stretch to say that Pound was ever interested in liberation, altho he may have been interested in revolution. I really do wish that history bore out the conclusion that revolution and liberation were the same thing, but I'm afraid it doesn't. And to say such a thing is not to say that revolution is bankrupt, by any means. But reductive thinking about what revolution entails (and again, this is not to say that anyone has done this recently) is NOT going to help revolution be successful.

3) The idea that poets respond to the past as much as remake the present does not imply a return to radical formalism any more than noting that the avant garde has traditionally been racist and sexist is a conservative insight.

4) The idea I want to put forward is that we need to rethink the relation of the avant garde to the history of social liberation. And I think it's not at all clear that avant gardists have always been as socially revolutionary as they would like to claim. I think it's not at all clear that new forms equal greater freedom, altho I do think that poets can make use of form to respond to changing cultural dynamics. The unexamined conviction that the avant garde is by definition involved with social liberation has to be examined, and to say so is not conservative.

5) It may be that there was some group editorial input on the Apex of the M introductory essay. But the tone and style is undoubtedly Lew Daly's, as will be clear if one reads his essay in A Poetics of Criticism.

6) In fact, it is quite possible that a "poetic revolution" among younger poets may find certain ideas in so-called "Language Poetry" to be reactionary, heavily male-oriented, and wedded to a concept of "make it new" that itself is conditioned by a certain blindness to the historical/social/cultural of its own discourse. But I myself would reject such a revolution, since I think the poetics of writers like Ron Silliman, Barrett Watten and others is more complex than that. But the argument I'm suggesting here is going to be made, and the people who make it will not necessarily be conservative.

7) I don't see how any of these comments can be considered a "flaming" attack on anyone's personality, altho I'm tempted to resent the aspersions that what I've said is "flaming"--and I wonder about the heterosexist implications of a word like "flaming" anyway.

8) I'm tempted to think that at this point in time, the lyric may be a socially revolutionary form than the manifesto. But I have no certainty on this subject. In fact, I guess I think it must be true that the manifesto is still useful, altho it feels awful tired at the moment.

mark wallace

↑ Index

21. Mark Wallace
Re: Flaming
Wed 2 Nov 1994

Some last updates, etc., and then, since I may have helped confuse rather than clarify matters, I'll shut up (tho I don't really mind confusing things)

In #3 of my previous message I don't mean "radical formalism" but "traditional formalism"

What Tony Green says about "internicene" warfare really hits home--it's a shame that my comments potentially sparked more misunderstanding (as if we don't already have enough of that). That was not my intention for them. Perhaps my own frustrated sense that a lot of people were not reading each other with sufficient complexity led me into precisely the same error that I was suggesting they were making.

On the other hand, I'm never sufficiently comfortable with my own assumptions about the "significance" of experimental poetry, and so I'm perhaps equally determined to question the assumptions of others regarding the value of that work. It's quite possible that when I do that, it can too easily be read as another call to warfare.

mark wallace

↑ Index

22. Joel Kuszai
Re: "apex of the M" - essay excerpt
Thu 3 Nov 1994

> From: TRIXY
> To: "[redacted]"
> CC:
> Subj: please don't forward this
>
> Dear Cookie, I thought I'd send you this, as otherwise you might not see it, receiving only a few of the missives fired at Fort Sumter since the Dresden incident. I think I'm done with the poetics list. Stop sending me stuff. I can't bear it any longer. Can you believe that shit? that endless chatter? the only thing worse would be having to get drunk with those people. but Ron, he's so funny--does he mean to be that way, and what does he look like anyway? he is cute? I don't understand what's up with the Apex of the M--you showed me that essay but I didn't understand it. Trixy dont care. Trixy have better things to do.

HEY TRIXY!

thanks for your response. I've been working on some other stuff so it took me a while to respond. Hope that's cool. Yeah, I promise not to send what you write to anyone else. And if you are really serious I'll stop forwarding you stuff from the poetics list. I am eager to do other things too.

I think - despite the waves of chatter - that something could still be accomplished on the e-mail thing, although I have no idea as to what it would be. I mean it's not like we are going to get down to any level of praxis or meeting downtown some night to break windows or somthing...which is what I think the political leads to anyhow...

Yeah, I too thought Ron was quite generous with the M'ers. I mean it is true - he's quite right - they are really trying to do something, which isn't very normal these days. I don't get the point of it. And don't worry about the editorial, you should read Lew's book--talk about incomprehensible! it is great writing, if you don't mind things being muddled by the psycho-sexual--but the editorial - the "declaration of war" as Ron seems to think it is -- the self-appointment to the "government"! -- I love that. I think Ron's pretty funny too. The problem, for my two-dollars and eighty cents, with the Apex thing is that they are trying to be political but are insisting on the spiritual -- which for me is only political when grouped into assembly for power reasons (i.e. a church) otherwise the spiritual is like, well, you know, kind of acquiescent by defualt--I mean sure, Koresh was able to bring the ATF to his front door--if that's political then let me out now--the real politics worth examining there is the refusal of the social--the manipulation of people in the name of "faith" which always slams the door on the social--here the spirital gets for me kind of sticky and icky -- like the fear of identity within the new coasteries -- hatcheries -- the fear of identity there is on identitarian grounds--the anti editorial mode is still an editorial - one of acquiescence and consent, however tacit. At least the M has some fire under their caps...and don't worry trixie, the next issue is due out soon, and word is that Prevallet wrote this one-- anybody who knows them knows that she has a mind of her own and that -- even with all the group editing in the world, I think, she is really into something different than Lew or Alan, or Pam for that matter--perhaps not hostile to them, but different enough to make the "group editorial" thing an unfortunate effacement. They will have to put their cards on the table soon enough. Poetry as Chillen of the Corn, or Jack-in-the Box will be gone of roadside ephemera soon enough. I mean the true "analysis" of our/any generation is to look at where the money comes from and how it is spent -- anyone can buy a spot on the literary register, the who's who of who cares been reading the situationists for Bernstein's class, wondering how people are going to react to it. I am afraid we'll get into a chapter & verse argument about Debord--maybe people will like him. Kind of hard to be in school and reading that stuff. Reminds me of when what's his face in Portland ore. changed all the street-signs in downtown to "Malcolm X" - it had a pretty wild effect at the time even if it was simply consumed, just as that group's efforts during the gulf war were completely co- opted by the spectacular; I mean going into restuaurants with gas-masks on trying to scare the eaters into some kind of political resistance, I mean come on, despite the disruption, I doubt anyone lost their appetite, and I'm sure there was hefty applause at the end. How yuppie (fake concerned) of them. The protest thing pretty much ended with them all "marching" around downtown portland with a police escort, I mean, led by the police escort. I remember sitting in my living room with John the night we started bombing there...we didn't have any lightbulbs that worked and no TV, just a clock radio, but that was enough. I felt competely incapacitated by the whole thing. All we could do was play music. There was only a bit of hope, word from seattle that some nut had opened fire on I-5 with some kinda automatic weapon. But that's not what the world heard. I don't know what the world heard.

But the situationists. Shit. I read ten pages of that stuff then start pacing in my cage. I love it in the anthology where its written that the goal of the movement was to "complete and displace poetry." --an aspiration not too difficult to like, although I wonder what the hell it means. Situationism, as debord points out in that first part of the "Veritable Split of the S.I. public circular" book that situationism becomes as much the understanding of the enemy, who need to know it in order to fight it (through using it??) and then Trix, who then, may I ask? are we?

> The results of the poetics poll:
>
> What was it that Mean Joe Greene threw to that kid by the tunnel? Was it a jersey, a coca-cola T-Shirt, a flag of surrender? And if it was a flag of surrender, was Mean Joe Greene (and _all_ he represents) surrenderring to that kid, or what he suggesting that the kid surrender to him. Is he here a "warrior" or a "servant"? Is there any thing at all different about that ad (give or take a few years very much G1) and the one featuring Shaquille O'Neal intimidating all the kids on the court except one little one who refuses to give his drink to Shaq.
>
> look, joey, trixy dont get it. Trixy say "make your point" and get off the stage. Trixy wanna find you all alone in an advertisement and push you up against one of those new cars and violate you.
>
> "I wanted to write a poem > that would teach you to read."
>
> I like that! did you write that or is it from a real writer?

it's a joke

> Did Ron Silliman really stand on a street corner reading his poetry to anybody who was passing by?

that's what I heard/read--perhaps one of us should write to him and find out. Kind of an embarrassing thing to ask, no?

> Brathwaite reports that Mikey Smith was stoned to death in Kingston, Jamaica, presumably for his political activities. Smith was a "dub-poet" -- quite "popular" I guess, died about ten years ago ?? although I'm not sure. I got to Smith via Brathwaite but I don't know much. When the semester is over, and I can do what I want, I'm going to find out more about this.
>
> Before her death in 1977, Danielle Collobert had been involved with the "Algerian situation".
>
> why do Trixy feel such despair!

oh Trixy, my friend, please don't feel such despair....

love in all evenings,

yo mama

p.s. Ron is cute, but the one you really wanna meet is Steve Evans and about your age...

↑ Index

23. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Protest of Gulf War in Portland, Or
Thu 3 Nov 1994

A marginal concern of mine, not meant to inflammatory:

While they were bombing baghdad at least those of us who were "marching" expressed our rage--no matter how contained it was--against what was going on. I can't help but think no matter how "consumed" such actions were (are) that sitting at home with no light bulbs is even more determined. Sorry if this is less than relevant; it seemed important to me.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

24. w.curnow
Re: Experiwhat?
Fri 4 Nov 1994

It would be nice to trace a history of the phrase--"experimental poetry"--I think it was Tom Mandel writing. That history I feel sure belongs with that of modernism--and not just modernist literature--and more partic- ularly of its scientisms. "The arts, literature, poesy, are a science, just as chemistry is a science" Pound in l9l3. There's a book, CRITIC AS SCIENT- IST, The modernist poetics of E.P, by one IanBell. Someone was saying Stein denied writing experimentally. although her lab. work with Prof. Wm. James clearly had a direct bearing on her ideas about and practice of fiction. The first definition offered by Zukofsky for OBJECTIVE (ism) is from Optics. Mod- ernist scientism seems to have 2 purposes (at least), the first having to do with re-positioning the artist socially, as more serious (Pound's essay, "The Serious Artist"), artistic knowledge as hardcore, etc. and the second to do with establishing the "autonomy of the modernist art object" as we would today put it. Precise description of the object, impersonality--here we have Eliot's n otorious catalyst analogy--of the writer and so on. And so the short answer to the q uestion as to why people on this list are un- comfortable with, can't see the sense of, want no more to do with, the phrase is that the context which prompted its appearance and the purposes its served have both long gone.

So another way into, or out of this discussion, would be to take that discomfort as a sign of our uneasy relation with modernism .

↑ Index

25. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Hardcore
Fri 4 Nov 1994

Probably repetitious by now: The part the new critics played in creating a "hardcore" object of study, with its own scientific processes and procedures should not be forgotten. I.A. Richards's "Science and Poetry" (or was it Poetry and Science? no, it must have been Science and Poetry) would be interesting to place in the context of a such a study of the relationship of "exp" poetry to the development of "hardcore" knowledge/poetry. Of course, mind you, it has been done . . . but the history of "exp" in this context still would be unique, I think . . . .

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

26. John Shoptaw experiment
Fri 4 Nov 1994

As unlikely as it seemed when I first climbed under the Buffalo blanket, I find myself sending a message on Wordsworth. His 1802 Preface to the second volume of the Lyrical Ballads begins with perhaps the most influential use of poetic "experiment" in the English canon. WW says that LB was "published, as an experiment, which, I hoped, might be of some use to ascertain, how far, by fitting to metrical arrangement a selection of the real language of men in a state of vivid sensation, that sort of pleasure and that quantity of pleasure may be imparted, which a Poet may rationally endeavour to impart." If we think of the "quantity of pleasure" as something measurable, like "energy" we're not far from OlsonUsOlson's formulation of poetry as an electronic mail in which, if the lines are good, the reader gets the poet's charge. Wordsworth (and Coleridge, collaboration demonstrating the "objective" worth of the project; if two could work on communicating "real language," then the project might establish "a class of Poetry" which others might join) experiments not only with language but with readers; if nothing happens to readers, the experiment fails. The preface, written after LB went into circulation, reveals his unscientifically gathered results, that he "pleased a greater number" than he hoped and presumably displeased about the same number as he had expected. Wordsworth adopts, and modifies, the scientific model of experiment. Later in the Preface, he distinguishes the poet's from the scientist's nature; the poet studies "general nature" (not Platonic or Johnsonian, but familiar nature, ordinary life) and the scientist studies the "particular parts of nature" of her/his field. Wordsworth prophesies that if "Men of Science should ever create any material revolution, direct or indirect, in our condition, and in impressions which we habitually receive," these effects would become "proper objects of the Poet's art." Is WW's idea of experiment independent, with its emphasis on the truth of pleasure, of its origins in Burke and association theory (Locke, Hartley, Mill)? I don't know. To experiment now, with readers (and other writers), in poetry might mean, for example, representing the indirect "material revolution" of the internet experience to readers as part of their new nature--(un)natural , pleasurable, strange, manageable, manipulative, inevitable, and so on. In any case, Wordsworth's use of "experiment" is rhetorical, drawing on the status of the scientific discourse of knowledge, in order to distinguish his practice from what he saw as conventional poetic discourse. I'm not sure the current use of "experimental" (or "innovative" or "alternatives" for that matter) is any less rhetorical, or any less inexactly effective.

↑ Index

27. John Shoptaw
Listings
Fri 4 Nov 1994

I'd like to announce my forthcoming critical work:

On the Outside Looking Out: John Ashbery's Poetry (Harvard UP, Dec.94).
386pp., $25pb, $50hb!!

Too expensive, but there's some ms. facsimiles.

John Shoptaw

↑ Index

28. Tony Green
Re: Experiwhat?
Sun 6 Nov 1994

Further towards the bibliography of art&science , Naum Gabo in CIRCLE, ed.J.L.Martin, B.Nicholson & N.Gabo. 1937 (U.S.Ed.Praeger,1971) "The Constructive Idea in Art" pp.1-10. Analogies between Science and Art as knowledge of the world are continuously at work there. "In Art more thn anywhere else in the creative discipline, daring expeditions are allowed. The most dizzying experiments are permissible, but even in Art the logic of life arrests the experiments as soon as they have reached the point when the death of the experimental objects becomes imminent. there were moments in the history of Cubism when the artists were pushed to these bursting points...." (p.5)

Also Christina Lodder. "Russian Constructivism" Yale, 1983. pp.78- 82 on the work of INKhUK. IZO declaration of 1919, where "the concept of artisitic culture is defined as the "culture of artisitic invention".....

Further, students of Malevich will know that he conducted "experimental" workshops in which the concerns were the effects of different "forms" -- on people, one supposes.

Could one suspect that "control" is at issue, by the artist/writer, over "effect" on the "reader/viewer"; that mistrust of artworks as "spurious" (uncontrolled messing around] is also connected with ideas about "control" over communicatory messages and meanings, including the message that "this is a serious work".... However, quantities of boring artworks in galleries and in print should be a warning that "experiment" covers a multitude of ineptitudes, worst of all a desire to pose as artist, limiting what is required as qualification to a low-level of market expectation. (There is a market-niche for experimental junk, it seems]. There is also a need to take chances in the making of anything to offset a rigidity in preliminary planning: that's experimental in the sense of not quite knowing where the .... or how the .... work will end. "Experimental" is good or bad depending on where and when you're aiming, I'd conclude.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

29. Ron Silliman
Re: C&C
Mon 7 Nov 1994

"I hope this makes sense. I would enjoy complaints and clarifications."
>Juliana Spahr

I noted the other day (before I went to San Diego for a reading & a class at UCSD) that I appreciated Juliana's post a lot. In particular, she approaches the project of sketching out this new terrain more completely than I've seen done heretofore. And that's precisely what (I think) we need. Or I need, anyway. The following thoughts fall almost entirely into the "clarification" column.
>
>What I find most frightening about Silliman's arguments is >his reduction of everything in Buffalo
>or even elsewhere in the nation to a sort of spiritualism >(it is the only grouping that he acknowledges as really >having any seriousness)
>that finally isn't representative of the larger picture.

Two thoughts: I've tried to be specific about the fact that:

(1) I know that the "new mysticism" (or whatever one calls this tendency) is not all that is the case, in Buffalo or elsewhere. In fact, I've noted at least twice that several O 12 contributors make that point repeatedly in conversation. I have said that they are the one group that to date has attempted to articulate theoretically a transformed ground for poetics, not simply an extension of what they inherited from G1, NAP or the rest of the acronyms.

(2) I've steered as clear as possible away from characterizing the Apex groups sense of spiritualism. While my own sense of the world may approach something akin to an atheist variant of zen buddhism, I'm fully aware of the pitfalls of approaching that discussion from a post-Enlightment vocabulary and expecting to get much use value out of the ensuing debate.

> Chain in fact is a journal that in many ways pursues an opposite agenda as that of Apex-- > it is anti-editorial, anti-grouping.
> The use of the device of the chain letter > in the first volume was explicitly intended to expand community definitions beyond editorial privilege > (Jena and I wrote about the success and failure of this project in our "Editors' Notes").

This is an interesting essay, well worth reading in its own right & a perfect example of a text that would not be fun to try and fit into the various constraints of email. The concept of anti-editorial editing is problematic and the Chain editors understand it. From my perspective, I'm intrigued at the desire inscribed in the project. It definitely rings the "hatred of identity" bell from Steve Evans intro to the Technique section of O12. And it differs dramatically from the judgmental "state of the art" (SotA) manifesto in Apex.

>Also neither of the editors of the Technique volume are on the board of >Apex of the M. But while this is probably just a confusion on Silliman's part,
>it also seems in some ways indicative of his blindness to anything >going on in what seems to be called G2 poetry beyond spirit.

Maybe. I wouldn't bet against it. But you neglect to note that two of the editors of Poetics of Criticism are also editors of Apex, while you are an editor of Poetics, O 12 AND Chain. Oliver Stone would have a field day with this kind of stuff.

> Beginning the Technique volume with the Spirit section
> was something that went counter
> to my editorial wishes and knowledge

And KNOWLEDGE??

> (I wanted to open with the broader "word and world" section),
> but also I think should not be read as "aggressive."

Aggressive is not a negative word in my vocabulary
(coming as I do from the Watten/Andrews charm school tradition)
But I find it hard to read otherwise

> Peter argues that when he sent this volume off to the printers
> with the spirit section first, it was to try to offer some > connection with the Presentation volume--
> both begin with Abbot and end Ziolkowsky.
> I am willing to chalk it up to alphabetical accident.

Ganick says that, with one exception, the order of The Art of Practice was exactly that of the receipt of manuscripts from the authors (one more reason to be prompt when solicited!), but I generally don't believe in accidents. Each approach (any approach) is a demonstration of method.

>But also I don't think that >any more than the twenty-one poets in the spirit section
>have much to do with spirit (and come on, even of these twenty-one,
>beyond a statement of an idea of poetics >as being transformative, it is hard to see these poets as a unified group--

I agree completely.

> Miekal And, Lisa Jarnot are hardly spiritualist poets

True enough if we are speaking in the narrow terms that seem implicit in Apex's "SotA", but Miekal is very much a utopian in spirit. I'm much more struck by the distance in approach given by Steve Farmer (one of my favorite pieces in the entire book--totally sensible and on target) and Alan Gilbert's in that same section. Gilbert's piece seeks to rework the possibility of poetry, philosophy & history in a space of maybe 600 words. I find Gilbert's piece entirely problematic--the privilege he gives to the "other" (which he places transcendentally outside "the dialectic," a phrase he uses way too nominally) and the solid object he seems to envision as the self. But I'm impressed that he wants to accomplish this or even thinks it possible.

I want a poetics in which both Farmer and Gilbert seem possible, even in the same paragraph.

> Finally, to see the anthology as spiritualist is to > do a great and serious disservice to around one hundred other poets.

111, to be exact. The two volumes have 132 writers by my count. The volume called Presentation

-- I forget who first pointed out that this distinction between presentation and technique almost perfectly mimes that of competitive ice skating -- has 114 poets in 334 pages, which comes to 2.9298245 pages per contributor. Obviously there are limitations that any editor will confront trying to include so many. But it's worth noting that 33 (more than a quarter) have more than one poem in the collection. Many others have complete works that gather together distinct shorter pieces (e.g. Clint Burnham, Susan Wheeler, Lori Baker). Just 34 are represented by works larger than their meager page allotments and only a very few have work present from anything that hints, however roughly, at a genuinely longer form (Lew Daly, Dan Davidson, Brian Schorn).

Given that the overall age of contributors here is not significantly younger than that of the poets of Tree (or the NAP), that turn away from the longer form seems noteworthy, not accidental.

So that when I think of the vast number of G1 poets involved in longer forms (not just from the Tree--where Coolidge, Greenwald, both Howes, Watten, Hejinian, Rodefer, Melnick, Palmer, Benson, Harryman, Weiner, Andrews, Inman, Darragh, Mayer, Sherry, DiPalma, and even Grenier have written booklength works) but Scalapino, Dahlen, DuPlessis, Byrd, Mackey, McCaffery, nichol, Brossard, Raworth, Fisher…the list just goes on and on. While this doesn't and shouldn't negate the work of those who work almost exclusively in shorter forms (Armantrout, Robinson, Bernstein, for example), the difference in the overall conception of the poem strikes me as profound. I'm interested in exploring that distinction, the causes for it, and the implications of it. Historically, history has not been kind to the authors of shorter poems since WW2 (Creeley being the rather obvious exception), and my comments re Lew Welch previously--to which nobody responded--still hold.

A second differentiation (and a whole other discussion) has been the adoption of the unpunctuated fragment as a unit w/in the poem, which is much more prevalent in G2 than G1 (tho it certainly has origins in Howe, Coolidge, Grenier et al).

> Just as to say that the anthology indulges in
> "increasingly modest forms"
> is to do a great disservice to a whole slew
> of writers (who are these people, Ron?

See above.

> who is "returning to the lyric?

Here, the need for a good definition of the lyric really stands up. I continue to insist on it as one of the 3 classic divisions of poetry, the others being narrative & dramatic, the latter two having been largely diverted via the evolution of other media, so that lyric (any poem in which, contra narrative & drama, turns attention to the language and not to constructs of plot or person) becomes diffuse, relatively vague, which in turn leads to EP trying to reinstitute a trivium (melo, phano, logo) w/in the confines of the lyric. There has been virtually no good work BY POETS on this topic since then, but my gut feeling here is that the evolution of the longpoem dramatically alters what "the lyric" means, esp. when it is not of the "poem containing history" frame set by Pound. So the absence of the longpoem represents a major statement.

> what are their numbers in this volume?

Roughly 98%.

> who is draining the social?
> what is the social and why is the lyric not social?--

Here the question of what is the motivation for the new lyric needs to be articulated. Evans has made one attempt ("hatred of identity') and SotA could be read as another, as could some of Chain's chain. But I think this question is still totally on the table and unanswered. (So I'm probably just being argumentative in characterizing it as a draining, but I'd like to hear somebody specifically articulate the function of the social w/in the form.)

> these are all innocent questions on my part,

I'll admit that I'm not "innocent" in this if you will

> I need more specifics to actually begin to discuss this topic
> which is one that seems very urgent to me).

Me too.

>It is, to just list some names at random,
>unfair to Lee Ann Brown's and Karen Kelley's attention to sexuality,

>unfair to Kevin Magee's mix of formalism, class struggle, and history,
>unfair to Myung Mi Kim's attention to relation,
>unfair to Susan Gevirtz's complicated feminism and attention to subjectivity,
>unfair to C.S. Giscombe's attention to identity.
>It is also I think unfair to the overt >political intention in the anthology to include as many women as men >(something that other anthologies of alternative poetry
>don't even come close to attempting and something that >never seems to get mentioned in any complaint about this collection).
>Further, I am no longer sure any more, although I would have been a year ago,
>that a return to the lyric is a draining of the social.
>For starters, it is difficult to separate the social from any form.
>Susan Stewart's recent work on the lyric has done a lot of change
>the way I think of this form.

I don't know this reference. Please give a citation.

> Also, I don't see the anthology has having a
> "reluctance to acknowledge or own its own position."

Yo, Juliana, the order went to press w/o your knowledge and represents an "alphabetical accident"--how many stances can you take?

>If there is anything that sits owl-like overlooking a younger generation
>it isn't language poetry
>anymore than it is the New York school--
>it is rather attempts at categorization, at bunker mentality.

Oh posh. Categorization begins w/ trying to tell wolves from dogs, edible plants from poisonous ones. "Bunker?"

> Perhaps the reason such a collection seems such a strange beast > to Silliman is that it is... a collection of > younger poets--

Not especially compared to the Tree or NAP.

> all of whose writing will change dramatically in the next years.

As will we all.

> I prefer to think of the anthology
> as more of a phonebook than even an anthology

-- I actually think this stance shortchanges the reader. It denies them any possible insights you as an editor have. If it's going to be a phone book, let it least be the yellow pages.

>(these complaints about the authority of this >anthology that are happening in Joel's post and in the discussion of anthologies >at the beginning of the year are very alien to me-- >what authority? the whole thing
>was thrown together and knows it).

Where/who is the agent of that last sentence?

>The numbers will change, people will move,
>but it is an attempt at a demographic for the year. It claims no completeness.

Another issue to discuss would be those poets who were at the conference who were not included in the book, vs. those who were not physically present who were -- and the nature of the upper age limit. There is some evidence to suggest that many women start to publish later than do men (often for reasons of parenting responsibilities) and a simple across-the-board age limit seems to carry in it a hidden gender bias (thus Weinberger's restriction of his anthology to writers born before the end of WW2 who were publishing after 1950 seems doubly set up to limit the # of women. The difference in gender ratios between Tree and the Art of Practice seems very much to reflect the latter book's ability to bring in poets who had not begun to publish widely when I was working on Tree in '81-2.)

> All of this has put me in the uncomfortable position of defending something that I have worked on.

You really aren't coming across as defensive. That's what makes your comments here so valuable. I hate to use the charged word "authority" but you wield it w/ confidence.

Okay. It's near midnight & I'm to bed. I'd love to see clarifications on these clarifications.

↑ Index

30. Michael Boughn
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 7 Nov 1994

So, Loss, I'm at a bit of a loss as to how to respond to your response to my response to the many responses to the experiwhat thread. If your post was a simple observation that few people are persuaded by arguments about issues as close to home as how they conceive of their poetry, I don't think there could be much argument about that. For better or for worse, Because I Say So is probably a place most of us have wound up at in conversations.

Still, I guess my response is So What? I can't say what the purpose of this space in fact is, but I would never propose it as a place where people should be persuaded of things. I certainly don't want to start one of those long, self-reflexive debates about what exactly we're doing here. I rarely know, frankly. Every once in while though, it seems something provokes people to write of their own experiences with and in poetry. Some kind of excitement gets generated, and to a certain extent that seems adequate to me.

If it's not something I'm interested in, I tune it out, delete the messages dead on the spot. Sometimes I just follow them and think about what people are saying. Sometimes I foolishly leap in, knowing that it will make no profound difference, but game for a conversation, as far as it goes. At its best, it helps me work out certain thoughts and feelings of my own, stuff I might not otherwise get to, like my feelings about "experimental poetry". That really came up because of a conversation with some students in one of my classes. I thought I'd see what others with an intimate involvement with poetry thought of it. And I ended up working out certain unresolved problems in my own thinking about issues of prosody, poetic form, and their relation to forms of life (including the so-called "social"). I certainly had no interest in trying to force others into agreement with me.

In the meantime, I got to read Robert Kelly's interesting take on experiment and alchemy, Don Byrd's proposal about the mainstream, George Bowering's witty interjections, Alan Sondheim's interesting non-linear notions of tradition, Ron Silliman's provocative analysis, Joel Kuszai's very funny critique, and numerous other interesting takes on the question of experiment and related threads.

So I guess I remain unclear on how Because I Say So relates to this process, other than as an instigator of silence. But maybe your experience of it is altogether different again.

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

31. Ron Silliman
Re: this space
Mon 7 Nov 1994

I can't say what the purpose of >this space in fact is, but I would never propose it as a place where >people should be persuaded of things. I certainly don't want to start >one of those long, self-reflexive debates about what exactly we're doing >here. I rarely know, frankly. Every once in while though, it seems >something provokes people to write of their own experiences with and in >poetry. Some kind of excitement gets generated, and to a certain extent >that seems adequate to me.

>

It's a form, Mike,
and a reasonably interesting one in its own terms, not dissimilar from Chain's chain (EXCEPT for the gender ratios!!),

it's a "book"
unedited & in progress (& indeed could eventually be collected as one tho whether anyone would ever have the energy/dedication/$$ to do same is an entirely different question)

&, as you note, its relation to "topic" is contingent at best,

Best,
Ron

↑ Index

32. John Dolan Groups: A Fable
Mon 7 Nov 1994

Suppose we come down out of the pious talk about "groups" and talk about the world we have seen--the seminar world--and the way groups gain power there. Odd how no one seems to want to talk about things like this, things they've actually witnessed.

As my contribution, let me tell you a completely fictional, utterly untrue story about something which happened to a totally imaginary friend of mine. Let's say, just for fun, that this totally imaginary fictional untrue story took place in a fantastical, imaginary place called San Francisco. An imaginary friend of mine was attached to a literary faction which defined itself by its noble refusal to become involved in the academic-poetry world. They published their own and each others' poems, and then wrote the commentaries, creating a very efficient version of a poetic perpetual-motion machine. They were very fond of the more bloodsoaked jargons of the earlier twentieth century, and did everything they could to make the balmy prosperity of California play a Berlin-like, Petersburg-like backdrop for their display of proud defiance--which was great, because you got the defiance without having to deal with the cold weather and the secret police.

My wholly imaginary friend, who was growing older and lacked the absolute, Berlin-like literary ego possessed by his friends in this faction, enrolled in graduate school in the hope of finding a job. He was instantly ostracized by his equally imaginary friends in the faction. He didn't exist any longer, as far as they were concerned.

Now comes the equally formulaic, wholly invented punch-line. My imaginary friend found that he couldn't handle the slow pace and lack of conviction of the academic world. After a few years, he dropped out of graduate school, and lived unhappily ever after in, let's say, Berkeley. And six years after being frozen out by this faction, he was walking through Berkeley when he met a high-ranking figure in the faction, whose initials were--let's just choose some initials at random--RP. And this RP, whose noble defiance had been among the noblest and most defiant of noble defiances, greeted my friend cheerfully. My friend found this surprising, but as they chatted, he learned the reason for this cheery and forgiving tone. The imaginary faction member, the nobly defiant RP, was leaving to take a job with a very prestiguous university press.

Moral of the story: If you do it right, noble defiance pays like anything.

↑ Index

33. Tony Green
Re: experiwhat?
Mon 7 Nov 1994

I guess Michael Boughn could claim that as instigator of the loop the e-posts took he was the experimenter and this list of "missing" persons at their keyboards the experimented-upon, who rose to the occasion and started singing their different toons.

It's a lot of fun, but I had thought I might find in this conversation a conspiracy of poets, as for instance, 1) to seize all key intellectual positions 2) talk dirty politics about dirty politicians, 3) insert chasms typos and spoonerisms into key documents, --- "unless they meet our terms"....

Ads for such hot articles as the revolutionary text "Writing's Revenge! Poems of denunciation": Three parts: I."I abominate!" 2. "I loathe!" 3. " I despise!"

Surely with the charm school boys as the front row forwards -- & William Burroughs redivivus selling tennis shoes. It must be time to Blast. -- again?

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

34. Michael Boughn

Re: whatever

Tue 8 Nov 1994

Well, Tony, I guess we could step behind the shit house and bombard each other with poems. It might be fun, although whether it--or any other fight you want to pick--will hold off whatever alien intelligence seems to be secretly devouring (kind of like those slimy things in the recent Puppet Masters movie) those dear old landmarks of cultural resistance now sadly spiffed up in their Gap khakis and Nikes seems problematic.

Actually, thinking of my experience at its best on this thing, I am reminded of Giorgio Agamben's The Coming Community where he writes of a community of "whatever singularities" who "do not possess any indentity to vindicate nor any bond of belonging for which to seek recognition." Interestingly in terms of your point, he goes on:

> For the State, therefore, what is important is never the singularity as such, but only its inclusion in some identity, whatever identity (but the possibility of the whatever itself being taken up without an identity is a threat the State cannot come to terms with). (85)

The best way to resist the aliens then is not to battle for some new identity (shades of Ron's comments on Alan Gilbert's piece in the NC anthology) like King of the Beats, counter-culture Wild Man, a Really Bad Guy, etc. which will only be integrated into the Spectacle and sold (think also of the end of Bruce Sterling's Islands in the Net where imitations of the Outlaw Revolutionarys' dune buggies become a really hot item during the Christmas shopping season). On the contrary, if resistance is of interest to you, perhaps the only path left is to be whatever, as Agamben has it, and thus to become absolutely irrelevant to the State.

Of course this won't help anybody get any governemnt money. If that's what they want. Alas.

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

35. A M Allcott
KIOSK Call for Work
Tue 8 Nov 1994

Send your work to another buffalo magazine!

KIOSK: A Magazine of New Writing
Spring 1995 Issue:
"Rust Belt: Industry in the Ruins of Industry"

Editorially eclectic, but grounded in Buffalo-- the city, community, and poetic university, we're looking for pieces that have a strong sense of place and engage peoples' relations to "rust belt" as a geography, a political concept, or cultural/historical transition.

In past issues we've published Charles Bernstein, Raymond Federman, John Bennett, Susan Smith Nash,
Frank Green, Sheila E. Murphy, Jena Osman, Benjamin Friedlander, John Byrum, Mark Wallace, and many more. We'd like to include you.

Send submissions to:
KIOSK Poetry Editors
Department of English
306 Clemens Hall
SUNY at Buffalo
Buffalo, NY 14260

or submit electronically to:

[redacted]

Deadline: Dec 6, 1994

Many thanks,
A. M. Allcott and Charlotte Pressler, Poetry Editors.

↑ Index

36. Charles Bernstein
from TONY GREEN /repost of bounced msg
Wed 9 Nov 1994

--Boundary (ID rcYJQ3zHL7Qldt8MVj3Z9Q)

[Message was bounced because the extracted portion included the to/from header of the extracted message. Evidently this confuses the machine. --C.B.]

>Actually, thinking of my experience at its best on this thing, I am > reminded of Giorgio Agamben's The Coming Community where he writes
> of a community of "whatever singularities" who "do not possess any > indentity to vindicate nor any bond of belonging for which to seek > recognition." Interestingly in terms of your point, he goes on:
>
> For the State, therefore, what is important is never > the singularity as such, but only its inclusion in some > identity, whatever identity (but the possibility of the > whatever itself being taken up without an identity
> is a threat the State cannot come to terms with). (85)
> On the contrary, if resistance is of interest to you, perhaps the > only path left is to be whatever, as Agamben has it, and thus to > become absolutely irrelevant to the State.
>
> Of course this won't help anybody get any governemnt money. If that's > what they want. Alas.
>
> Best,
> Mike
> [redacted]
>

There is a certain difficulty for anyone who works in academia for the "whatever" position, advocated as most resistant (depends on government money usually] . Silence? no publication? is that what "whatever" would really entail, a kind of invisibility-inaudibility as the philosophically best way to live one's life. Gentle prods, subtle instigations, carefully guarded interventions? No action at all? Let the "aliens" (?] do as they please....

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,

University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

--Boundary (ID rcYJQ3zHL7Qldt8MVj3Z9Q)--

↑ Index

37. Tony Green
Re: from TONY GREEN / "whatever"
Mon 14 Nov 1994

Date: Wed, 09 Nov 1994 09:48:31 -0500
Subject: from TONY GREEN / "whatever"

>Actually, thinking of my experience at its best on this thing, I am > reminded of Giorgio Agamben's The Coming Community where he writes
> of a community of "whatever singularities" who "do not possess
any > indentity to vindicate nor any bond of belonging for which to seek > recognition." Interestingly in terms of your point, he goes on:
>
> For the State, therefore, what is important is never
> the singularity as such, but only its inclusion in some > identity, whatever identity (but the possibility of the > whatever itself being taken up without an identity
> is a threat the State cannot come to terms with). (85)
> On the contrary, if resistance is of interest to you, perhaps the > only path left is to be whatever, as Agamben has it, and thus to > become absolutely irrelevant to the State.
>
> Of course this won't help anybody get any governemnt money. If that's > what they want. Alas.
>
> Best,
> Mike
> [redacted]
>

There is a certain difficulty for anyone who works in academia for the
"whatever" position, advocated as most resistant (depends on government money usually] . Silence? no publication? is that what "whatever" would really entail, a kind of invisibility-inaudibility as the philosophically best way to live one's life. Gentle prods, subtle instigations, carefully guarded interventions? No action at all? Let the "aliens" (?] do as they please....

(This reply bounced on 9 Nov. It's now 15 Nov, but ....]

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

--Boundary (ID rcYJQ3zHL7Qldt8MVj3Z9Q)--

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

38. J. Moxley
THE IMP-FILES
Tue 15 Nov 1994

---

*THE IMP IS OUT THERE * TRUST NO ONE* GOVERNMENT DENIES KNOWLEDGE * ----------

ODDLY SHAPED CRAFT ARRIVES 4TH-CLASS INTERGALACTIC

ALIENS IDENTIFIED AS G2-TYPE SPECIMENS, GOV'T AGENCIES WORRIED ABOUT OUTBREAKS OF LYRICISM AT REPORTED LANDING SITES

RELEASE STATEMENT CLAIMING NEA LEFT THEM NO EARTHLY ALTERNATIVE

WARN THAT THEY WILL COMMENCE DRAINING THE SOCIAL IF DEMANDS NOT MET

EARLY REPORTS OF FORCED SCROLL INGESTION DISPROVEN

CLAIM MISREAD TRANSMISSION LED MARTIANS TO HIRE AGENT SPICER TO MOVE THEIR FURNITURE: VOCAB DIDN'T DO IT TO HIM!

ABDUCT YOUR COPY OF IMPERCIPIENT 6 BY WRITING
J. Moxley, 61 E. Manning St, Providence RI 02906 or sending e-message to [redacted]

N0.6 Tanya Erzan, Brian Kim Stefans, Jennifer Blackledge, NOV. 1994
Sally Silvers, Beth Anderson, Juliana Spahr, Mark $5 DuCharme, Gale Nelson, and Helena Bennett

BACK-ISSUES AVAILABLE
SUBSCRIPTIONS: 3 ISSUES/$12

↑ Index

39. George Bowering

Re: Experiwhat?

Wed 16 Nov 1994

You reminded me that in "Hugh Selwyb Mauberley" toward the end somewhere, HSM is called a drifting precipitatre, which suggests (without the unfortunate r I stuck in that word) a chemistry lab. And T.S.Eliot liked the word "transmute" regarding poetry and the poet's mind, which at least suggests alchemy.

↑ Index

40. Robert Drake

reqest for reviewer: new Russian poetries

Wed 16 Nov 1994

TapRoot Reviews is looking for someone w/ some related back ground to review some or all of the following material:

Arkadii Dragomoschenko: "Description" --Sun & Moon
"Zenia" --Sun & Moon Alexei Parshchikov "Blue Vitrol"
--Avec Books K Johnson & S. Ashby, eds. "Third Wave" --Michigan U
Gerald Smith, ed. "Contemp. Russian Poetry" --Indiana

additional/possible mention of John High's "Polycontexts" piece in WITZ/fall '92; Russian work appearing in FIVE FINGERS REVIEW 8/9; or "Leningrad" by Hejinian, Silliman et.al. might also be useful; other suggestions would be welcome. if you have interest &/or familiarity with this body of work, and would be willing to do a Very Brief survey/introduction for a future issue of TapRoot Reviews, please contact me.

luigi-bob drake
Burning Press/TRR
[redacted]

↑ Index

41. John Cayley
Hologographic
Fri 18 Nov 1994

.... and not experimental?

I certainly remember making hypotheses and waiting for results.

'actual possession ...' (enclosed below) is the most recent result.

John Cayley Wellsweep Press
Tel & Fax: 0[redacted] Email: [redacted]
INDRAS NET
Hologographic Texts on Disk

Two metaphors Indras Net and hologography have guided the inception and development of the pro

Indras Net a concept originating in Hinduism is a network of jewels that not only reflect[s] t

Hologogram. A pattern of language produced when the words or the order of words of a given text

INDRAS NET I.2. A revision of the original Indra Net experiments with the first version of Under COLLOCATIONS. Indras Net II. The first demonstration of a collocation hologogram applied to a pr There is a paper version of Collocations published by the Many Press, London in an edition of 22

MOODS & CONJUNCTIONS. Indras Net III. Collocational procedures applied to three related texts, g

An Essay on THE GOLDEN LION: Han-Shan in Indras Net. Indras Net IV. A mesotic demonstration of i

LEAVING THE CITY. Indras Net V. Collocational blends of three prose works: a translation and ada

The above works are available on 1.4Mb disks suitable for Apple Macintosh computers (with System

ALL DISKS ARE 5.95 (us$11.95) POST-FREE (incl. VAT) ... by snail mail with pre-payment (make out

ACTUAL POSSESSION OF THE WORLD *

John Cayley

actual possession of the world
left Gu Cheng exposed maimed and handicapped this shining road back to the city into his own shattered emptiness finally I listened to the sounds like leaves or any other violence of the picture there is something in their lives that keeps them following this sound on the other side I could go anywhere recall a life that is distant from our own but this doesnt trouble me because I didnt use words he constantly tried to return following this phrase became the picture once I thought I felt that a new young light had awoken in the woman all softly speaking in a particular kind of way one of the worlds unceasing infinity of transformations the violation of corporal integrity is in the wind they were flooded with both their lives they were flooded with the body and my ears went deaf became fraught and fell ill and she asked me what colour a truly extraordinary sound the speech of the cascading rays
I didnt write poetry I didnt use words he claimed taken from the world he had left long ago into his own shattered emptiness living into this world both created and enforced to imagine such hatred
I awoke I answered we keep on living I began to think of endless transformation and in gesture like a secret afterwards I began to think of these phrases they really were flying closer and they turned into words dawn was the summit and night was speaking for reasons that were flying closer suddenly the sounds poured endlessly into my life because I didnt use words taken from the world both created and enforced
I began to think of whiteness this shining road back to the surface of the final sound

[* Lines gleaned at average collocational strictness 386/500 from Gu Chengs
The sounds I hear /

↑ Index

42. John Cayley
Listings
Sat 19 Nov 1994

The WellSweep Press Catalogue follows:

John Cayley Wellsweep Press
Tel & Fax: 0[redacted] Email: [redacted]

The WellSweep Press

information/catalogues [redacted] inquiries/correspondence [redacted]

HOW TO ORDER -- SEE END OF FILE.

CHINA - LITERATURE - TRANSLATION - POETRY - INNOVATION
HUMAN RIGHTS - DIPLOMACY - RITUAL - FICTION - AVANT-GARDE FANTASY - TODAY

NON-PERSON SINGULAR Selected Poems by Yang Lian
wellsweep Chinese Poets 6
translated by Brian Holton
Yang Lian is one of the best-known of the so-called misty poets who came to prominence in China
Brian Holton teaches Chinese at the Universities of Newcastle and Durham. Amongst other projects 128 pp, 21 x 13 cm, parallel text
Paperback price: 7.95 isbn 0 948454 15 6
Library hardback: 14.95 isbn 0 948454 85 7

PLEASE NOTE: This book will not be available from our US distributor (Cheng & Tsui) until early

----------JUST PUBLISHED
RUAN JIS ISLAND & (TU FU) IN THE CITIES
Graham Hartill
Graham Hartills fine long poems are based on his reading of two Chinese masters, Ruan Ji himself

4.95 / us$9.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 14 8
64 pp, 21x13 mm, 10 ills.

RITUAL & DIPLOMACY
The Macartney Mission to China (17921794)
Edited by
Robert A Bickers
Lord Macartneys mission to China 17921794 was the first British attempt to establish formal dipl
The embassy failed to achieve its official aims, but its participants returned with a rich cargo
These new essays assess the reasons for Macartneys failure and explore the misunderstandings and Contributions by leading historians of the mission and of Qing diplomacy offer new readings of t
7.95 / us$14.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 19 9
96 pp, 20x13, frontispiece

----------AVANT-GARDE
THE LOST BOAT
Avant-garde Fiction from China
edited by
Henry Y H Zhao
Five short and three long short stories by some of Chinas neglected contemporaries Yang Zhenggu Forget everything you know about contemporary Chinese fiction. These stories will shock and comp Henry Y H Zhao lectures on modern and contemporary Chinese literature at the School of Oriental 7.95 / us$14.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 13 X
14.95 / us$23.95 hbk isbn 0 948454 83 0
256 pp, 20x13

UNDER-SKY UNDERGROUND
Chinese Writing * Today * Number 1 selected & edited by Henry Y H Zhao & John Cayley
foreword by Jonathan D Spence
Conceived in 1978 and suppressed in 1980, Today became the best-known unofficial literary magazi
Under-Sky Underground is the first in a series of book-length biennial anthologies which will se
7.95 / us$14.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 16 4

247 pp, 20x13
issn 0968-4670 (Subscription rates on application.)

----------HUMAN RIGHTS
AFTER THE EVENT
Human Rights and their Future in China edited by Susan Whitfield Human Rights are now firmly on the agenda in China. This collection brings together some of the Contributors include Dr Liu Binyan, a leading Chinese dissident in exile; Professor Bonnie McDou
The collection covers three areas: the question of rights philosophical and practical; censorsh
7.95 / us$14.95 pbk isbn 0948454180
128 pp, 20x13, tables

BLADES FROM THE WILLOWS
by Huanzhulouzhu
translated by
Robert Chard
Novels of magic, fantasy and martial arts adventure have captivated the imaginations of Chinese As bizarre as fiction can be, I had the odd feeling that the story was all possible. At least in The first volume of three.
7.95 / us$14.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 05 9
256 pp, 20x13, 8 full-colour illustrations readers paperback available*

THE FROZEN TORCH
Selected Prose Poems by Shang Chin (1930)
WellSweep Chinese Poets 4
translated by
N G D Malmqvist
A selection of captivating and moving prose meditations by one of Taiwans leading Modernists, an Shang Chin has published two collections of poetry and prose pieces in the Chinese speaking worl
N G D Malmqvist is Professor Emeritus of the University of Stockholm and a member of the Swedish
The book is illustrated with Shang Chins own accomplished line drawings.
5.95 / us$12.95 pbk
isbn 0 948454 10 5
96 pp, 21x13

13 b/w illustrations, parallel text
readers paperback available*

----------AVAILABLE SOON

WHISTLING FREE
The Complete Non-Dramatic Lyrics of Ma Zhiyuan (12601325)
WellSweep Chinese Poets 5
translated by William Dolby
Ma Zhiyuan was the finest exponent of the poetry which developed from the songs and verse passag
6.95 / us$13.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 11 3
14.95 /us$23.95 hbk isbn 0 948454 81 4
128 pp, 21x13, parallel text (readers paperback*)

FROM THE FIRST EMPEROR TO KHUBLAI KHAN an Introduction to Studying Chinese History
T H Barrett
This short reading guide to Chinese history is the first of its kind, a readable, annotated intr
3.95 / us$7.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 17 2
64 pp, 20x13, 7 b/w ills., index, chronological chart

MIRROR AND POOL
Translations and Adaptations from Chinese Poetry
David Burnett and John Cayley
illustrated by Bronwyn Borrow
Twenty-eight Chinese poems translated and adapted by one writer; used as a point of departure by ..deserves to find lots of readers. Glyn Pursglove, Acumen 6.95 / us$13.95 pbk
isbn 0 948454 12 1
96 pp, 21x13, 24 original b/w illustrations
readers paperback available*

----------STILL AVAILABLE

SONGS OF MY HEART
the Chinese lyric poetry of Ruan Ji WellSweep Chinese Poets 1
translated by Graham Hartill and Wu Fusheng Ruan Ji, born into the unsettled times of 3rd century China, wrote some of the most influential

4.50 / us$8.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 00 8
96 pp, 21x13

----------POETRY & DRAMA POEMS OF THE WEST LAKE translations from the Chinese by A C Graham
.. a tribute to the idea of a Chinese paradise beautifully presented with accompanying text and 4.95 / us$9.95 pbk
isbn 0 948454 07 5
63 pp, 21x13, 12 ill.
readers edition available*

THE DEEP WOODS BUSINESS
uncollected translations from the Chinese Arthur Cooper
Not the most prolific, but arguably the most accomplished English translator from Chinese poetry
5.95 /us$11.95 pbk isbn 0 948454 09 1
96 pp, 21x13, parallel text

ITS ONLY SPRING & THIRTEEN YEARS
Two Early Plays by Li Jianwu translated by Tony Hyder
Truly magnificent. In my opinion the volume constitutes a landmark in the history of English tr
8.95 / us$16.95 pbk isbn 1 870076 13 3
Unesco/Bamboo, 159 pp, 21x15

WellSweep has recently begun to publish selected titles as electronic books using the Voyager(tm Expanded Books are easy to use an ideal medium for reading and exploring texts in new ways. System requirements: Any Apple Macintosh with 2MB RAM, hard disk, System 6.0.7, HyperCard 2.1 (o

BOOKS ON DISK
Only available as an electronic Expanded Book:

STAIRWAY
selected poems by Wang Jiaxin translated by John Cayley
This selection of poems by the contemporary poet and critic also includes three instances of the 5.95 / us$11.95 disk 1.4mb isbn 0 94845 91 1

Books described elsewhere in this catalogue and to be published as Expanded Books, Spring 1994:
BLADES FROM THE WILLOWS
6.95 / us$13.95 1.4 mb disk isbn 0 948454 92 X
RITUAL & DIPLOMACY
6.95 / us$13.95 1.4 mb disk isbn 0 948454 89 X
AFTER THE EVENT
6.95 / us$13.95 1.4 mb disk isbn 0 948454 88 1

----------KINETIC TRANSLATIONS

The following books are kinetic presentations of translations from Chinese poetry which also wor wine flying wine flying explores some of the poetic structures underlying a single, classical Chinese quatra 5.95 / us$11.95 disk 800kb isbn 0 948454 82 2

bird song stream
Four classical Chinese quatrains, translated and displayed in animated readings.
5.95 / us$11.95 disk 1.4mb isbn 0 948454 90 3

----------FORTHCOMING AND FUTURE PLANS

Please write/email to have your name added to the WellSweep mailing list. The past two years has been a difficult time for the entire publishing and bookselling industry, Apart from those titles described in the present catalogue, over the next two years we plan to p

*Readers paperback editions. Selected WellSweep paperbacks are also available in a limited editi

----------ORDERING INFORMATION
WellSweep Press
1GroveEndHouse,150HighgateRoad
London NW5 1PD, United Kindom
Tel / fax (0171) [redacted]
[redacted]

WellSweep books are available from your local bookseller, or directly from the publisher.
Individual orders must be prepaid.
Postage charges on individual orders:
Orders over 30 / us$60 despatched post free, otherwise:
UK: 10% of order value.
USA/Cdn/Europe: 2 / $3 delivery 23 weeks.
Rest of the World: 2 / $3 surface postage.

PAYMENT: Please make cheques etc. payable to Wellsweep and remit by (gb) sterling cheque drawn o

TRADE ENQUIRIES:
United Kingdom:
Password (Books) Ltd
23 New Mount Street, Manchester M4 4DE
Tel [redacted], fax [redacted]

USA:
Cheng & Tsui Co
25 West Street, Boston, MA 02111
Tel [redacted], fax [redacted]

Canada:
Marginal Distribution
Unit 103, 277 George Street N.
Peterborough, Ont K9J 3G9
Tel / fax [redacted]

Catalogue prices are subject to change without notice.

↑ Index

43. krickjh
Return of the Son of Anthologies
Mon 21 Nov 1994

Dear Poetics List,

Was following the anthology wars to some degree around the end of the summer. I'm wondering if anyone knows anything about the Rothenberg and Quasha "America, A Prophecy" collection. It's out of print as far as I know, and I wish it weren't.

John Krick

↑ Index

44. Pierre Joris
Re: Return of the Son of Anthologies
Mon 21 Nov 1994

Yes, indeed, John, AMERICA A PROPHECY has been out of print for a long time now, & many of us wish it weren't so. There is however little chance for this to change, as getting a book of that order back into print is extremely time consuming & expensive (find publisher, renegotiate all the rights, etc.) Then again, maybe some University press will pick the project up, as UC & UNM have done with other Rothenberg anthos...

Pierre Joris

> Dear Poetics List,
>
> Was following the anthology wars to some degree around the end of the summer. I'm wondering if anyone knows anything about the Rothenberg and Quasha "America, A Prophecy" collection. It's out of print as far as I know, and I wish it weren't.
>
> John Krick

========== Pierre Joris | Dept. of English | "La poesie ne s'impose plus, elle s'expose." SUNY Albany | Paul Celan Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | email: | "He who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." [redacted]| Henri Michaux ==========

↑ Index

45. Robert Drake

Re: Return of the Son of Anthologies

Mon 21 Nov 1994

> Was following the anthology wars to some degree around the end of the summer. I'm wondering if anyone knows anything about the Rothenberg and Quasha "America, A Prophecy" collection. It's out of print as far as I know, and I wish it weren't.
>
> John Krick

john--

don't know that one, but you reminded me of Quasha & Gross's "Open Poetry", also, i suspect oop... any other additions to a list of valued anthologies apres Allen?

luigi

↑ Index

46. Paul Hoover x350

anthology wars

Mon 21 Nov 1994

I just signed onto this list a couple of weeks ago and have been enjoying the generation wars between G1 and G2, as if history started there! Ron's metaphor of the owl on the horizon is compelling symbolism; it makes G2 into the mice to be preyed upon. But mice can eat owls if there are enough of them. I am not a member of G1 because not a language poet but I have a strong sense of being a member of the most in-the-shadow generation, following the New Americans (sounds like a wholesome Up With People type group). Our generation is almost 50 years old and we're still in that shadow (though langpo has cleared some space). The best policy is to honor the elders as long as they're friendly, and many of them are. The owl is also ego, kills the competition. But this is not a knock on you, Ron, as I know you are considerate of younger writers and many others. Did a big owl like Olson smother his young or feed them? If I were of G2 age, I would never use the term as too junior-varsity.

Yes, "experimental" is a problem. Creeley told me that it was too self-marginalizing to use for title of Norton antho. But we've put ourselves in a corner by dismissing the term "avant-garde," which is still accurate although perhaps too Eurocentric and precious. This leaves us with "outsider" (Waldman) and "postmodern" which still holds but how long? Millenialist is as bad as experimental: Eliot's hooded hordes. The adjective "innovative" is nice but thinking you have to innovate each poem out is irritating. Re: alchemy, Octavio Paz used the term "alchemy of the word." Probably we are much too term-conscious because so eager to identify ourselves. I thought for a while of adopting the Chicago Imagist label but it seemed too self- promoting. Jackson Mac Low says that "avant-garde" is too militaristic in its history. So what? The first into battle are the most jeopardized, also get the largest honors. We admire WCW and Pound for it and try to do the same.

I thought that the discussion, however brief, on whether current practice (avant-garde) has any social agency was of great value. Does it, except to pound on white men, meaning a good number of those present? Or is experimental practice aestheticism?

I hear rumor of anthology wars from last summer. I'd be interested in having a copy of that discussion if anyone is willing to provide it.

Paul Hoover
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

47. George Bowering
Re: Flaming
Tue 22 Nov 1994

Ron, I liked that long letter of yrs called "Flaming" of a little while ago;

that is, if anyone can call the lyric reactionary, he/she hasnt read Shelley with any intelligence. Some dolt might have something to say about SAhelley's personal-social habits and position being out of it today, but my guess is that same person might have worn mind shackles in 1816.

↑ Index

48. George Bowering
Re: experiwhat?
Tue 22 Nov 1994

Well, I saw a guy in the airport yesterfday, wearing a tee shirt that read "Chicago Bulls," and I thought "What if it does?"

↑ Index

49. George Bowering
Re: experiwhat?
Tue 22 Nov 1994

Well, Mike, we know that Stein was trained in experimental psychology, so it would be a good idea to believe her when she says that she never wrote an experimental work (I presume that she was not including her lab exercise in automatic writing.)

↑ Index

50. George Bowering
Re: G-ology
Tue 22 Nov 1994

Yeah, I have had the Siegel book for about 10 years but have never read it. It's just a WCW iutem as far as I am concerned.
s

↑ Index

51. Ron Silliman
Shelley
Wed 23 Nov 1994

Nobody ever suggested that Shelley was unclear about his motivations.

I do recall writing that all form(s) is amoral. It can and does mean different things at different points in time and in different hands. A sonnet by Bernadette Mayer (now convalescing after a major stroke, by the way) is not the same one by a Timothy Steele or Dana Gioia.

The world has changed since Shelley's time. Hell, it's changed dramatically since 1980.

Can you imagine Olson on the net?

Ron

↑ Index

52. eric pape
Re: Shelley
Wed 23 Nov 1994

I feel like I'm stepping into an already established dialogue, but felt compelled to respond to the issue of the political (in the widest possible sense) implications of form. You know it was Adorno, arguably the most profound thinker in the 20th Cent. who originated that impossibility of lyric poetry after Auschwitz thing, which he later backed away from actually, but he also said some other things about form. If I understand the gist of his statement on form, as articulated in Aesthetic Theory, then any form may be reactionary if it fails to reognize its own implication in domination. Not in any kind of vulger form, ie, those bastard capitalists, but in a much more sophisticated sense of accepting the form as a given. Without recognizing the problems of that form, its darkness. So any form can be troublesome if its assumptions are not criticized at the same time they are utilized. Which is why Beckett was his favorite 20th cent. writer. And this is why I agree with you re: Shelley. I don't think Shelley accepted anything as given, just see Prometheus Unbound. Which is why this formal question is so difficult today, because there are so many forms; new ones everyday. Langpo (to borrow Paul's phrase) is its form, in a certain sense, and has its own problems and assumptions. And of course its own strengths. I think we are making the problem of form far too easy if we define form as simply being about the choice between sonnet or blank verse. The problem is for us, ie G2 or whatever, is that we are given so many new forms and somehow we have to determine how to use them. I don't know if this generation will sole that problem. I don't know if solve is the right word even. The main problem might be that the new forms become as fixed as the old.

↑ Index

53. Donald J. Byrd
Olson on the Net
Wed 23 Nov 1994

Ron Silliman asks,
> Can you imagine Olson on the net?

It's hard to know where you are on the net. I am in Albany (it's been snowing off and on all day, nasty winds, and temperature dropping toward 20)? That's Ron Silliman? In California? Other people in the conversation who are unlocated in my mind. I look at the UserIDs trying to find a place... Sometimes I can (mebbe), but you are never sure.

The net is ultimate suburb, the perfection of New Jersey.

But it is hard to be any where, any time and especially now. If you are in Gloucester, are you in Gloucester? They are closing down the fishing on George's Bank. It is certainly not the Gloucester that Olson saw out the window at 28 Fort Square.

The _polis_ as FORM is lost to life? There is no way to understand the form of _Maximus_ by examining its language.Perhaps there is no way to understand it at all. I remember when it was possible.

He would have said (I think) that form is a matter of not of linguistic arrangement but a judgement of action:

that that which has been found out by work may, by work, be passed on (without due loss of force) for use USE
("The Praises")....

Form is not a container but a transmission. The gains on a non-referential art that were made in the 50's and 60's have been mostly lost. The world that made them possible has been perhaps lost. CO proposed not to write sonnets or limericks but A Republic!!!

The net offers a powerful referential medium with no reference. It was a condition that Ron Silliman and others proposed by elegant artifice fifteen or more years ago. Now it appears to be universal.

The net must have a wonderous topology. I have been exploring it for nearly ten years. At first it was just me and the computer nerds. And I understand it less--in some really deep sense--than if I'd been plopped down on the moon.

Don Byrd

↑ Index

54. Mn Center For Book Arts
Re: Olson on the Net
Thu 24 Nov 1994

I think Don has, in his moving comments about Olson, form, place, polis, & net, brought us back to a discussion which was never resolved (& can't be, but must be undertaken) many months ago on this list, that of the possibility for community on the net.

I too don't often know the place I inhabit any more. Can it be known? I find some important element of community on a forum like this one. Yet, in spending time her, I spend less time outside, walking in the neighborhood, or down to the banks of the Mississippi. A choice I make in which something is lost.

Living in a medium with lots of meaning but little reference. Form which indeed exists to be utilized & needs to be critized.

charles

↑ Index

55. FILELIST
Re: Olson on the Net
Thu 24 Nov 1994

Charles Alexander -- I, too, was moved by Byrd's comments about Olson on the net .... Sated and looking forward. Will be in the Twin Cities around Dec. 10-13, wondered if it would be OK if I stopped by for a chat .... Sandra Braman

↑ Index

56. Michael Boughn
Olson on net
Fri 25 Nov 1994

Dear Don:

I guess I think in some way it's really no harder to know where you are on the net than to know where you are in "Gloucester". In fact, maybe in some ways it's easier in that in so far as both the net and "Gloucester" are utopias, or tend at one edge toward utopia, at least here there's no danger of confusing it with fishermen. I've known a few fishermen (in the olden days when I was involved in street politics in Vancouver) and while some have been OK guys, many of them were jerks. Just like everybody else. The thing about Gloucester is that it was so pretty it was a great place to think about "Gloucester", but Gloucester was never "Gloucester", and the "Gloucester" that Charles Olson saw out of the window at 28 Fort Square wasn't Gloucester, either.

I think the polis as FORM was lost to us about 2,000 years ago. Our nostalgia for it is certainly real, and can be, as in Olson's work or Emerson's, productive of a perfectionist (to use Stanley Cavell's word) vision or imagination, Socrates' city of words. Socrates says that it makes no difference whether "Gloucester" exists anywhere or will exist, that by reading "Maximus" we are already always participating in it, and that "Maximus" itself is thus a further proposal of our selves, unattained but attainable.

"Here", in some sense, at least it's impossible to confuse the city of words with any other. That may offer us possibilities, as well as losses.

As Bob Creeley says, onward . . .

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

57. Michael Boughn

Re: experiwhat?

Fri 25 Nov 1994

> Well, Mike, we know that Stein was trained in experimental psychology, so it would be a good idea to believe her when she says that she never wrote an experimental work (I presume that she was not including her lab exercise in automatic writing.)

I don't know about the automatic writing, George. It was actually Peter Quartermain who told me she said that. (Peter, are you listening? reading? whatever? Where is that quote from?) But you're right. Given her training as scientist and her vocation as writer, her insights here are particularly interesting, and, at least in terms of her own stuff, she must have known what she was talking about.

(PS, say hi to Angela)

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

58. Tom Mandel
Re: Shelley
Fri 25 Nov 1994

re: "all form(s) is amoral," I think it might be better to say that all form is moral rather than amoral. It is not possible to give value to a form that is not moral or political at base. Partly this is a matter of intention, and a sonnet by Dana Gioia as one by Bernadette, may certainly be a moral or political act at that level. Partly, it is an understanding of means, or rather of the meaning of means, and the morals or politics of poets surely differ here. This is not intention but interpretation, where one can argue what is correct, what is true, what is useful, what is specific, to the point. The problem is that so often this argument -- an essential one -- occurs on grounds so general as to be useless in itself, viz. dubbing one or another poetry "experimental" or one or another poet "conventional" (as the apexers do in setting the other pole of straw men [to mix metaphors] and set up their place in the juste milieu between 'em). Fernando Pessoa wrote an enormous range of poetries under a number of different names, including a long sequence of (what appear to my groping Portugese-less romance language intuitive reach-without-grasp to be) fantastic quatrains in popular form. To take an example from what's on my desk. One does not, for example, right a sonnet w/o encountering a political and social history, write?

Shelley, it is said, used to hum out the metric/rhymic patterns of his poems and then rite them. I recommend to each of you to undertake this procedure in preparing your posts. First sound them out without sense, only then sense them, and only then riot them here.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

59. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Shelley
Fri 25 Nov 1994

What about WCW, "all sonnets say the same thing--to me of no interest" (or more or less to that effect). There may be a not insignificant way in which this assertion is right, the first half of it I mean; as to the chaser one just concurs or doesn't (Creeley: liking is as liking does--for you / for me).

Some years ago some friends recommended a possible way to proceed on an interesting poetic career: write only (commissioned? or feigned commissioned) occasional poems. But it's probably less intresting, or less easy anyway, to think through the politics of occasion ("I write bc I want to write"?). Though all form is also occasional (though I guess different sonnets may have different occasions).

Recently teaching Dickinson: I wonder if one could make a point about all off-rhyme always being whatever.

Tenney

(hello to Book Arts btw! up there in the snow [?] like the snow in Maximus, and the alleged arabesque)

↑ Index

60. Tom Mandel
Re: Shelley
Fri 25 Nov 1994

---

re: Eric Pape on "Adorno, arguably the most profound thinker in the 20th Cent...."

I guess we all have our dead horses; Adorno is one of mine. Would anybody like to have the references to this "profound" man's attempts to get along with and prosper under the Nazi regime? His position that as only half Jewish he might be allowed to work profitably in a new order Germany, his reviews of rather pro-Nazi German younger poets, the meaning -- in germany at the time -- of his using the name Adorno (non-jew mom's moniker, I believe) rather than Wiesengrund (jew-pop dad's identity)? Not to mention does anybody have a hold on or interest in his treatment of Walter Benjamin, his caviling criticisms of Benjamin's proposals and submissions to the then in NY Adorno/Horkheimer crew, a more generous response to which might have led to WB's escaping Europe rather than dying there, Benjamin's (and Scholem's, and Arendt's) opinion of Adorno at the time (and in Arendt's case, thruout her life: she detested him. I was her student for many years, and learned my antiTeddyism from her directly)?

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

61. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Shelley
Fri 25 Nov 1994

Tom-- I'll bite at the rhtorical question and say yes, /I/ want to know. Beyond what's in the two Susan Buck-Morss books, say. That is, I know something about Adorno's treatment of Benjamin (and while the early B-M book kind of flaggellates Benjamin w Adorno's suposedly greater perspicacity, the more recent book does the reverse). But what about Adorno and the Third Reich. Or what about Arendt off the cuff?

This will pass for news in Tucson (or my part of it anyway)

Tenney

↑ Index

62. Donald J. Byrd
_Olson_on_the_Net
Fri 25 Nov 1994

What is it that has happened since, say, 1970 (Olson's death)? or even earlier. In 1966 Jacques Derrida declared, "Perhaps something has occurred in the history of the concept of structure that could be called an 'event.'" An event that is not an event. At the very moment the technologists began to take seriously the possibility of producing cognition of a human order, knowledge in the so-called human sciences also collapsed. It was also in 1966, Michel Foucault wrote: "The only thing we know at the moment, in all certainty, is that in Western culture the being of man and the being of language have never, at any time, been able to coexist and to articulate themselves upon one another."

So, what has happened in practical terms. We have been blitzed by the right from Reagan to Newt Gingrich (who speak confidently of the being of man, without questioning the status of their discourse). Even the most media-genic experiwhat/avant/new artists have disappeared from all popular media--e.g. Ginsberg and Sanders at the Chicago convention in 68. The biosphere is a quarter-century nearer irreparable damage. Most viable political organization among the thoroughly excluded classes has collapsed. Sex has become potentially deadly. AIDS Research is in utterly disarray and the entire establishment that controls it (probably in collusion with the drug companies) is thoroughly corrupt. Organized opposition to the military has disappeared. The Cold War has ended. The industrial dislocations in the military industries are at least in some measure being compensated for by building prisons. Over a million people, most of them men of color, are in prison in the United States. There has been a general loss of enthusiasm for and support of education. The youth culture has been fragmented into various youth subculture, so the youth market is expanded while the political power of the young is defused. The dominance of both electoral and cultural politics by the popular media is now unchallenged even by a symbolically significant opposition. Phony science (_The Bell Curve_, etc.) is having a powerful effect on U.S. social policy, and legitimate science (if there is any left) seems powerless to oppose it. Leftist politics has been consigned almost exclusively to English departments. Any thing in the arts and liberal disciplines that smells of metaphysics has been declared illusory. The metaphysicians are now physicists and computer scientists: Stephen Hawking, Herbert Simon, et. al. The life of the President has been threatened by the senior Senator from North Carolina and presumably the next Chair of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. We are all on the Internet.

The appearance of the Internet is one of the few perhaps positive public developments in the last quarter century. When I first connected in 86 or 87, there was the Humanist List, as one of the few attractions for anyone who wasn't involved in scientific or technological research. And it has been fascinating to watch it grow, the interest groups beginning to have narrower definitions, until literally the relevant, if not entirely useful, information seems endless. But, it may be that the Internet is just talk radio for the fringe. For all of its promise, it has yet to produce much.

The task of production seems to me fundamentally unchanged.

I have been reading Wesley Trimpi's _Muses of One Mind_ (Princeton UP, 1983) the last few days. It is an old- fashioned book, literary theory heavily informed by classical philology. Although Trimpi seems to be fully cognizant of contemporary theoretical debate, he makes no reference to any of the major philosophers or theoreticians of this century and precious few references to any secondary sources: he ranges from Hesiod to Plotinus and Proclus:

"As the daughters of Zeus and Memory, together [the muses] recollect,Jpreserve, and celebrate the integrated activities and the cumulative wisdom of the gods. They offer to us as human beings, furthermore, the possibility of sharing in the contents of this wisdom to the extent that we realize our capacity to understand and describe our experience. In this sense, the Muses, together, provide the psyche with the sources of its coherence and express this coherence as mutually dependent principles in order. These principles, in turn, later give direction to the various disciplines which define and exercise the speculative, the prudential, and the productive activities of the consciousness."

These "disciplines" are, of course, philosophy, which rules over the cognitive capacity; rhetoric which rules over the judicative capacity; and mathematics which rules over the formal capacity. As such they are the constituents of the what Plato called "the Good"--that is, the true, the justly measured, and the beautiful. If these are united metaphysically in Platonic thought, Trimpi argues--and here seems to me offer in coherent fashion a position close to Olson's--in disciplines themselves forms are actually constructed, not underwritten by the infinite ideal norm of the logos, and that in poetry these disciplines are enacted as secular and inhabitable forms of the Good, called polis, Gloucester, Tyre, and potentially, I think, the Internet.

Trimpi goes on to show with formidle scholarhship (again confirming speculations of Olson's speculations of thirty years earlier) that literary and aesthetic theory by the time of the Neoplatonists, had been mathematicized; the concrete unity of the muses was lost; and literature was already prepared for the kind of deconstruction that its fully articulated Neoplatonic form would reveal as necessary.

Of course, Trimpi's "cumulative wisdom of the gods" will make some nervous; no doubt some will find in it code for the transcendental signifier. I suppose the unity of psyche will also be read out as the modern subject and the promise of coherence as a threat of fascism.

Trimpi, however, makes a plausible case that _poiesis_ before the Platonic revival of the renaissance (that fundamental moment in Pound's _Cantos_) was innocent of metaphysical and transcendental reference (that is, of infinite images of normative ideality).

I would suggest in the spirit of Olson's project, as I understand it, that the construction of net can only proceed as a pursuit of the muses in Trimpi's cogent sense. Speculation, action, and formalization are singularly futile, but as mutually correcting modes of coherence, they produce something more concrete than a utopian vision; that is to say, a living company on inquirers.JIn the etymology of "muse," Trimpi finds-- striving, loving, and inquiry-- notions associated with philosophy, but in Hesiod and in the early theories of literature they are balanced with action and concrete construction, not abstract or metaphysical meditation.

The power of Olson's constructivism has not been much investigated. I would point to the work of John Clarke, Charles Stein, Nate Mackey, and Madelaine Gins' recent and utterly remarkable _Helen Keller, or Arakawa_ To be sure, transcendence may look fairly thin when it is not backed up by the authority of some one like Stephen Hawking, but it does not mean we must suffocate in the merely social. The world is to be actually constructed, not infered from an idealized norm.

↑ Index

63. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Shelley
Fri 25 Nov 1994

For Tom Mandel:

Doing some work on Adorno and Benjamin right now and would like very much to know the Hannah Arendt etc. story about Adorno. I agree with what you say about the demise of "Wiesengrund." Tell all, please!

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

64. Sandra Braman
Re: Shelley
Sat 26 Nov 1994

re Benjamin, and the question of experimentation, and the question of commodification of culture: Lutz Niethammer, in his superb analysis of the many, many theories of the end of history across cultures and time, tells the story of Benjamin's death, with which I had previously not been familiar: Benjamin walked out of Germany, in I believe 1945, and as soon as he crossed the border handed the first peasant he saw the manuscript he was carrying, and then committed suicide. That ms. was his book on the end of history .... Sandra Braman

↑ Index

65. Pierre Joris
Re: Shelley
Sat 26 Nov 1994

That seems a bit of a romantizised version of Benjamin's death, with geographic confusion. He was in the process of crossing the Pyrenees (from France into Spain, in order to reach Portugal, from whence ships to the US or GB) when he committed suicide -- as far as I am aware, in a state of depression & despair, as the last stage of that harrowing crossing proposed unforeseen dangers that, it would seem, Benjamin was not able or willing to cope with. I never heard of the handing over of a ms. to the first peasant met -- that seems too pat a narration & would make sense only in relation to the geographical confusion, i.e. if he had in fact crossed the German French border.

========== Pierre Joris | Dept. of English | "La poesie ne s'impose plus, elle s'expose." SUNY Albany | Paul Celan Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | email: | "He

who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." [redacted]| Henri Michaux
==========

↑ Index

66. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Shelley
Sat 26 Nov 1994

There's a full account of Benjamin's crossing and the iffy question of the manuscript in Susan Buck-Morss' /The Dialectics of Seeing: Walter Benjamin and the Arcades Project/. As I recall it seems possible he did turn the ms. (which may have been a chunk of the Arcades Project I think) over to a mother and son, not literati, w whom he was crossing, or I guess he MAY have done so, no one has been able to determine definitely): but it wasn't perhaps a passing of the torch kind of gesture exactly. Anyway Buck-Morss is a good place to go for clarification.

↑ Index

67. eric pape
Re: Shelley
Sun 27 Nov 1994

To clarify: I did not refer to Adorno because I believed he was the most honorable man in the world. In fact, I believe his treatment of the student protest movement alone proves he was confused at best in many of his personal relationships, including that with Benjamin. He seemed to always let his intellectual judgments cloud his personal ones. The years before Benjamin's saw a weakening of their friendship due primarily to the Arcades project, and other projects Adorno saw as non-dialectical. Personally, I think he misunderstood completely Benjamin's final work.

But I think mostly that's beside the point. The great Olson himself, as Tom Clark's bio demonstrates, was not always the most honorable man. Does that mean we stop reading him? Does that mean his thinking is less profound? Why?

All I was tryingto indicate was that I believed Adorno's conception of the dialectical relationship of form and content might be extremely useful to anyone writing in late capitalism. At one time, perhaps we could extricate artistic form, popular culture, critical thinking and our lives from commodification but monopoly capitalism certainly has squashed that possibility Adorno's notion that we can resist commodification in our work by resisting the form of our work, by having our work work against itself, seems to me useful.

Finally, to rescue the allegorical reading of Benjamin's death in the most immediate effect of his death: When the Spanish border guards discovered Benjamin's body, they grew so disturbed and frightened about the implications of what they had donethat they let all of the people who had traveled with Benjamin from Paris cross the border and disappear into Spain.

↑ Index

68. Susan Bee
M/E/A/N/I/N/G # 16
Sun 27 Nov 1994

In its eighth year, M/E/A/N/I/N/G, an artist-run journal of contemporary art, remains an important meeting ground between critical and theoretical ideas and language, and the actual practice of visual art by working artists. It is an inclusive, lively, contentious, provocative, and unprogrammatic forum for new ideas in the arts.

Library Journal writes about M/E/A/N/I/N/G: "This attractive, large-format critical journal contains controversial and provocative comments and reviews related to the contemporary art scene. This eminently readable journal, which seems to display a particular interest in women~s issues, gives voice to new views and is an excellent choice for medium and larger academic collections."

M/E/A/N/I/N/G is published twice a year in the fall and spring.

Editors: Susan Bee and Mira Schor.

M/E/A/N/I/N/G #16 features:

Working Conditions: A Forum on Art and Everyday Life by Younger Artists with statements by forum guest editors Julia Jacquette and Lawrence Lipkin, and by Douglas Anderson, Jimbo Blachly, Serena Bocchino, Richard Brown, Kathe Burkhart, Kevin deForest, Jason Fox, Ava Gerber, Hilary Helfant, Lisa Hoke, Jenifer Kobylarz, Robert Kuszek, Mery Lynn McCorkle, Michael Mikulay, Holly Miller, Gregory Montreuil, David Moreno, Portia Munson, Kathryn Myers, Paul Pagk, Alix Pearlstein, Enoc Perez, Rebecca Quaytman, Trudie Reiss, Christian Schumann, Kate Shepherd, Amy Sillman, Hugh Steers, Laura Stein, Danny Tisdale, Nicola Tyson, Anthony Viti, Derek Weiler, Michael Windle, Karen Yasinsky, and Alexander Zane.

Also in this issue: Essays on art in the technological era by Charles Bernstein and Johanna Drucker; an interview with Thomas McEvilley by Dominique Nahas; and a book review by Misko Suvakovic.

From issue #16, Fall 1994:

I see no contradiction in being an artist in a media-based culture. TV, movies, and advertising are potentially just as interesting as works in the traditional fine arts. Conversely, paintings can be potentially more boring than a string of commercials. -- Kathe Burkhart

If Sex, Race, and Homophobia, are the major headlines of art at the close of the 20th century then how do I, as a formal, geometric, abstract painter fit in? -- Michael Windle Painting has become purespectacle losing its power to do harm. It has become like the oppressed feminine: domestic,shallow, empty, ineffectual, fickle, decorative. -- Rebecca Quaytman

When I first found I could make artwork about the frustration, anguish, and stupidity of my own life, I wept with relief. -- Julia Jacquette

In many ways I think my work is about terror management, the control of phobia through humor. -- Amy Sillman

Subscriptions for 2 ISSUES (1 YEAR): 4 ISSUES (2 yEARS):
$12 for individuals: $24 for individuals;
$20 for institutions $40 for institutions
* Foreign subscribers add $10 per year for shipping abroad and to Canada: $5
* Foreign subscribers please pay by international money order in U.S. dollars.

All checks should be made payable to Mira Schor.
Send all subscriptions to:
Mira Schor
60 Lispenard Street
New York, NY 10013
Back issues available at $6 each.

↑ Index

69. Pierre Joris
Re: Shelley
Sun 27 Nov 1994

Tom Clark's biography of Olson doesn't "demonstrate a thing." Except bad faith.

========== Pierre Joris | Dept. of English | "La poesie ne s'impose plus, elle s'expose." SUNY Albany | Paul Celan Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | email: | "He who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." [redacted]| Henri Michaux

==========
==========

↑ Index

70. Patrick Phillips
Segue Foundation Newsletter
Sun 27 Nov 1994

*Announcement of Segue Foundation Newsletter*******

Segue is well-known to many of you as a distributor of small press titles and as a publisher. Though we recently lost our distribution grant, it may surprise you how much Segue does beyond its former role as a distributor. For those of you who aren't so familiar with Segue, this newsletter fleshes out Segue as an important part of a much larger arts community. In addition, in this issue there's a list of current titles offered by Segue/Roof Books; a review of P. Inman's new Roof book _criss cross_; as well as press-time comments on Ron Silliman's new Roof book _N/O_.

Segue has also published this newsletter in a HyperText version which is accessible through the writing.upenn.edu Gopher server and may be viewed with any hypertext browser (Mosaic, or similar browsers) at:

gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh /internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift /journals/list/Segue/Segue_Newsletter.

In the near future, all Segue/Roof titles will be made available via the internet by filling out an on-line form. Segue as a distributor will resurface!

Thank you for your patience with this long post. I hope that the information and reviews are worth your while. We also encourage any responses or queries and would be glad to consider reviews of forthcoming books for publication here and in the HyperText version.

For more information about a specific facet of Segue you may write to Segue to order Roof and Segue books at a 20% discount. Contact Segue at:

Segue Foundation
303 E. 8th St.
NY, NY 10009
phone#: [redacted].

Or, email Segue Foundation Newsletter editor/developer:
[redacted]

Segue Foundation Newsletter - November 1994

The Segue Foundation is mainly a literary organization. It is the publisher of Roof and Segue Books (edited by James Sherry). Segue also acts as a fiscal conduit for projects grants for several arts organizations such as M/E/A/N/I/N/G magazine (a journal of art and criticism edited by Mira Schor & Susan Bee); Sally Silvers & Dancers (an aesthetically and politically radical dance troupe in NYC); Big Allis (a journal of new poetry edited by Melanie Nielson & Jessica Grim); the Ear Inn Reading Series (conducted every Saturday at the Ear Inn in SoHo), and the INCISIONS Prison Arts Project, (weekly poetry workshops conducted in various NY state correctional facilities by Janine Vega).

From 1977 - 1993 the Segue distribution project promoted and sold over 500 small press poetry titles annually. This distribution service has been converted into the Segue Information Archive. The archive, located in the Segue offices, will include every book that Segue distribution has ever carried and it will be complimented by new titles from authors and new presses as well as materials such as manuscripts and correspondence from private author's collections. The Segue Information Archive will represent a substantial free- access collection devoted to new writing.

The offices of the Segue Foundation are located at the heart of East Village, the most thriving artistic communitie in New York City. The building in which the office is located is an artist owned cooperative, it includes 12 artist live/work coops, a 1200 square foot performance space, and Film editing facilities. The performance space managed by Segue is used as a low cost dance rehearsal space during the day and in the evenings we sponsor various ongoing film, dance and music series.

Segue Foundation, Roof Books

Roof Books, edited by James Sherry, is pleased to announce the publication of two new titles; criss cross, by P. Inman (see review of criss cross by Hank Lazer) and N/O by Ron Silliman. Though different in their formal approach to the page and text, both Inman and Silliman present a textual artifact which challenges our assumptions of locution and language. Both present texts which unknot normal attempts at consumption while aiding our understanding of languages as both necessary and critical. Each of these new titles can be ordered through Segue; receive a 20% discount when you order from Segue and mention this newsletter. (click here for Segue Address) (For other books by Inman, Silliman and many other writers, see the list of Other Roof Books in this newsletter.)

Here's a glimpse of some press-time reviews:

criss cross, by P. Inman

64pp., paper, ISBN 0-937804-57-6, $7.95

P. Inman has a first name that is not a letter. It is a work. His work also raises such questions for the reader. If a reader is sure of what she is saying, she does not need P. Inman's work. If she has doubts, reading P. Inman is a good idea.

Roof Books is publishing P. Inman against the grain of ordinary poetics, but right in the face of digital reality. Before one thinks of bytes, Inman's bits represent a primary block of languages, all languages, foreign, domestic, binary, all have to pass through Inman's thoroughfares.

Criss cross is a tour of the process of navigating the realms of experimentation, witness, and critique, an invitation to participatory poetic locution. You, as reader, are given the gift of transience. Diane Ward

By fully semanticizing the so-called nonsemantic features of language, Inman creates a dialectic of the recuperable & the unreclaimable, where what cannot be claimed is nonetheless most manifest resistant to habitual comprehension as the ambiguous figure and similarly raises questions about the nature of perception. Like Beckett, Inman challenges his reader/audience. . .to consider what is fundamental, presence or absence. Joan Retallack

Inman's poetry lies in how this language becomes known in the contemplative strategies it proposes and in what it becomes known as. Inman's poetry an emblem of poetry, of how it sets on a page, the page in a book, how a book opens, before one's eyes and in the mind, and how the mind in relation to its knowns becomes material. Ben Friedlander

P. Inman was born on Long Island and educated at Georgetown. He is a member of the AFSCME Local 2910s Executive Board. His work has appeared in magazines and anthologies including: In the American Tree and From the Other Side of the Century. His books include: Ocker, Red Shift, Think of One, and Uneven Development.

Review of criss cross by Hank Lazer

words for windows. movement of phrases, words, syllables. bump up against margins, boxes, forms, periods. rarely if ever "personally

expressive." as if transmitted. scrolling up & down. a sense of recurrence & reshuffling. orders:
taking orders, manifesting orders. the criss-crossing and intersecting of shuffled and deployed lines. rarely if ever traditionally descriptive. a coolness. mondrianlike stripes of words. a beckett-like world of seemingly disembodied articulation. rarely if ever to be confused with speech. the page as a canvas or body upon which the lines inch about. simple whole numbers of their recombinings. stubbornly resistant to readings which might resituate or paraphrase or thematize Inman's writing. eleven different assemblies. "prose arrived to fragments./ pulch. work stoppage balled up// as content. moeb grammar." readings within the loop; on the beltway. 1, 6, 6; 2, 6, 6; 3, 6, 6; 4, 6, 6: 5, 6, 6: 6, 6, 6. and other workings out, equations, formulas, floor plans, blue prints. from narrow strips to paragraph-wide blocks. "otherwise is that forever."
a fill of/ sentences the ditch of what i mean."" and ""every of doubt words into distance."" in this book we see the units assemble and advance or disappear. that process is what we see as much as anything. we see the words in their placement moreso than in their service to other allegedly communicative purposes. "such a thin of the book the beginning of an offspring beside/ one line. how did distance become as dim as nosed. the brook/ of edges in a dictionary." if a stanza is also a room, Inman's book a floor plan, designs with designs upon us, lines assigned to available spaces. "sensation than/ signification" -- odd intersections of words on the page. i highly recommend you see & sense these. an engaging not uninviting terrain. "small wavelets out to something." "how they think the distance left."

and across it, left & right, up & down, footprints. impressions. impressive.

Hank Lazer

Ron Silliman - N/O

112pp / paper / ISBN 0-937804-56-8 / $10.95

He lives the most passionate life of the mind in America. He is a poet I read to break through into new halls and colonnades of verbal richness that, before, I simply didn't know were sealed up behind these walls and dead ends in the palace of art. His work must be studied, lived with. Its pleasures cannot be simply lapped up off its surfaces. But they are the subtler, sharper, and more resonant for the time they take to taste.Samuel R. Delany

Silliman has developed a shorthand method of getting it all down. There is something incredibly moving about his cap city and capability, his will and willfulness his hunger to know and absorb as he rants, records, juxtaposes, declares, riffs, puns, pans. . .Tom Beckett

Ron Silliman was born in the state of Washington in 1946. He has been a prison and tenant organizer, a lobbyist, a teacher, a college administrator, editor of Socialist Review, and a marketeer in the computer industry. Long a national leader of the Language-centered writing movement, Ron Silliman's poetry and criticism have influenced an entire generation of poets. His concept of the New Sentence spawned literally dozens of efforts based on his idea of prose writing. N/O is two letters of his ongoing alphabet series. Long a national leader of the Language-centered writing movement, Ron Silliman's criticism has influenced an entire generation of poets. His concept of the New Sentence spawned literally dozens of efforts based on his idea of prose writing. His commentaries on the writing of his peers act as the most comprehensive introduction to this fascinating new writing style and at the same time are the perfect example of that writing. Each essay is filled with vital information and is itself a formal innovation. N/O is two letters of his ongoing poem, The Alphabet.

Other Roof Books

Bruce Andrews, Getting Ready to Have Been Frightened. 116p. $7.50.
Bruce Andrews, R & B. 32p. $2.50.
Susan Bee (Laufer), The Occurence of Tune text by Charles Bernstein. 9 plates, 24p. $6.
Steve Benson, Blue Book. Copub with The Figures. 250p. $12.50.
Charles Bernstein, Controlling Interests. 88p. $6.
Charles Bernstein, Islets/Irritations. 112p. $9.95.
Charles Bernstein, The Politics of Poetic Form. 246p. $12.95; cloth $21.95.
Nicole Brossard, Picture Theory. 188p. $11.95.
Abigail Child, From Solids, 30p. $3.
Alan Davies, Active 24 Hours. 100p. $5.
Alan Davies, Signage. 184p. $11.
Alan Davies, Rave. 64p. $7.95.
Jean Day, A Young Recruit. 58p. $6.
George-Therese Dickenson, Transducing. 175p. $7.50.
Ray DiPalma, Raik. 100p. $9.95.
Lynne Dreyer, The White Museum. 80p. $9.95.
Ken Edwards, Good Science. 80p. $9.95.
Larry Eigner, Areas Lights Heights. 182p. $12, cloth $22.
Jerry Estrin, Rome, A Mobile Home. Copub with The Figures, O Books, and Potes and Poets. 88p. $9.95.
Michael Gizzi, Continental Harmonies. 92p. $8.95.
Michael Gottlieb, Ninety-Six Tears. 88p. $5.
Robert Grenier. A Day at the Beach. 80p. $6.
Henry Hills, Making Money. 72p. $7.50. VHS videotape $24.95.
Erica Hunt, Local History. 80p. $9.95.
P. Inman, Red Shift. 64p. $6.
Hank Lazer, Doublespace. 192p. $12.
Legend. Collaboration by Andrews, Bernstein, DiPalma, McCaffery, and Silliman. Copub with L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E. 250p. $12.
Jackson Mac Low, Representative Works: 1938-1985. 360p. $12.95, cloth $18.95.
Jackson Mac Low, Twenties. 112p. $8.95
Steve McCaffery, North of Intention. 240p. $12.95.
Laura Moriarty, Rondeaux. 107p. $8.
Melanie Nielson, Civil Noir. 96p. $8.95.
Ted Pearson, Planetary Gear. 72p. $8.95.
Bob Perelman, Face Value. 72p. $6.
Bob Perelman, Virtual Reality. 80p. $9.95.

Nick Piombino, The Boundary of Blur. 128p. $13.95.
Kit Robinson, Blance Sheet. 112p. $9.95.
Kit Robinson, Ice Cubes. 96p. $6.
Leslie Scalapino, Objects in the Terrifying Tense Longing from Taking Place. 88p. $9.95.
Peter Seaton, The Son Master. 64p. $4.
James Sherry, Popular Fiction. 84p. $6.
Ron Silliman, The New Sentence. 200p. $10.
Fiona Templeton, YOU-The City. 150p. $11.95.
Diane Ward, Relation. 64p. $7.50.
Barrett Watten, Progress. 122p. $7.50
Hannah Weiner, Little Books/Indians. 92p. $4.

Segue Distribution Archive

by Ricardo Tarrega-Shayegan

In November 1993, Segue received a general support grand of $3,500 from the Joyce Mertz-Gilmore foundation. The Foundation supports organizations that "provide critical behind the scenes suppport to the artistic community at low cost, or no charge." Segue has been providing such services - a space for reading and rehearsals and for research collections - for seventeen years. Thanks to this grant we have been able to begin setting up an archive of the materials that Segue has distributed. The project is being headed by Heather Ramsdell who is identifying and locating the core of the collection; writing to authors, publishers and editors, as well as organizing materials already in Segue's possession. Right now, Segue has approximately 30% of the materials it would like to have in the core collection, which would include all the poetry and prose books distributed by Segue throughout the years, its collection of poetics titiles and the anthologies and magazines it has distributed. Ideally the collection would be augmented by audio and video tape collections as well as selections from author's collections and correspondence. Once complete, the collection will be housed at Segue or loaned in collaboration with other poetry venues in New York. We look forward to continuing our committment to the project and the Joyce Mertz-Gilmore Foundation's generous grants helps make this possible.

M/E/A/N/I/N/G Magazine (see Susan's 11/27 post on M/E/A/N/I/N/G)

by Susan Bee

M/E/A/N/I/N/G is a biannual, artist-run publication edited by two painters, Susan Bee and Mira Schor. M/E/A/N/I/N/G is committed to providing an inclusive forum for the discussion of a broad range of issues of concern to professional visual artists through the publication of writing by artists, art historians and critics. Among the writers we have published are Johanna Drucker, Amelia Jones, Robert C. Morgan, Whitney Chadwick, Charles Bernstein and Rob Storr. M/E/A/N/I/N/G provides a crucial alternative to the commodification of art discourse in the established art magazines. We are not concerned with career promotion, or the "best selling" movements. By publishing writing by and for artists, we provide a needed bridge between critical and theoretical ideas and language, and the actual practice of visual art by working artists. M/E/A/N/I/N/G regularly publishes forums on current issues, encouraging responses from a wide range of visual artist. Past forums have explored motherhood and artmaking, racism in the art world, making art over a lifelong career, issues of community. Some of the artist published in these forums are Leon Golub, David Reed, David Humphrey, Nancy Spero, Miriam Schapiro, Ann Messner and Richard Tuttle.

The Segue Foundation acts as our umbrella organization and helps us with grant applications and acts as a conduit for grant funding, but it does not add monetarily to our budget. Segue also assists us in distribution, bulk mailing and other postal services. M/E/A/N/I/N/G's relationship the Segue Foundation has been extremely useful to us; as working artists with active professional lives,
The Segue Foundation has helped us produce M/E/A/N/I/N/G with a minimum of bureaucracy or red tape.

Sally Silvers and Dancers

by Sally Silvers

My history as a Segue-connected artist goes back almost 14 years. The foundation has been the non-profit conduit home for Sally Silvers and Dancers since our first bulk mailing in 1981. (We're both housed at the Segue sponsored artist live-work coop/performance space in the Segue offices building on East 8th St. in New York.) I also currently serve on the Segue Performance Space board. In the early 80's Segue was the perfect locus for my "non-obedient" stance to the existing dance world: low-riding minimalism and pushing narrative/persona based theatrical dance with a vengeance (initially as message oriented statement in an early response to Reagonism, but also consensual transparency as a commercially linked career op). I found aesthetic inspiration from many of the writers associated with L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Magazine and Roof books. I wanted to politicize the body, show movement as a social circuitry inherent in the way the body moved (utilizing predicaments, presenting movement analytically, disjunctively, maximally -- to have the "message," grounded in the social) . The writers I admired most (some published by Roof/Segue) linked this kind of formal and political radicalism. My early self-produced evening-length concerts (some 15 from 1980-88) were all performed under the auspices of the Segue Foundation and took place at spaces like The Cunningham Studio and Ethnic Folk Arts Center. For the last 6 years Segue has been my fiscal conduit for project grants like a Meet the

Composer collaboration with composer John Zorn, performed at the Joyce Theater; a dance/theater presentation with poet Bruce Andrews on gender, Nicaragua, control/discipline, etc., and a 6 minute film collaboration with filmmaker Henry Hills, "The Little Lieutenant." The film has toured internationally, has won festival prizes and now has a European distributor. 1995 will be a full year for SS&D. Upcoming are 5 weeks of teaching in Holland; an improvisation festival in December in NYC; an evening at Symphony Space in Feb., 1995. The '95 New York City season with all new works starts in April at P.S. 122. We also will be doing a film project with Henry Hills which begins production in the spring.

INCISIONS/ARTS - Prison Arts Program

by Janine Vega

INCISIONS/ARTS has been organizing writing workshops and performances at New York State Correctional Facilities for men and women, and Division for Youth Residences and Secure Centers since 1978. Our writing programs have ranged from six week residencies, to long-running residencies at Sing-Sing and Bedford Hills which have continued for years. Resident writers usually come in to the facility once a week, meeting with inmate writers who have been selected or have chosen to take part. The workshop is conducted through discussion of technique and of individual inmates work. The aim of the workshop process is to generate new methods of discovery and new ways of writing.

Recently we have been emphasizing a final event or project: a poetry reading, shared with the rest of the population, administration and staff; a short play or screenplay from a drama workshop; or an anthology of poetry, fiction or nonfiction. If an anthology is chosen as the final project, one is presented to each participating writer. We have found that aside from being a source of delight and pride, the anthology is an immensely effective reminder of the capacity for self-expression and as a continuing encouragement to keep writing. Some of our anthologies have received critical acclaim in American Book Review, Contact

11 Longhouse, Poetry Project Newsletter, Poetry Flash and the Woodstock Times. INCISIONS/ARTS has received grants from the New York State Council on the arts, Sing Sing Educational Department, Poets and Writers, The Vinmont Foundation, Longtermers Committee at Bedford Hills. Witter Bynner Foundation, Riverside Prison Foundation and private sponsors. We have had successful residencies at Sing Sing C. F., Hopper House, Creedmoor Psychiatric Center's Forensic Unit, Bellevue Prison Ward, Green Haven C. F., Rikers Island for Women, Bayview C. F. for Women, Bedford Hills C.F., Green Haven C. F., Highland R. C. for Boys, Sojourner Truth R. C. for Girls, and Harlem

Valley Secure Center for Boys. INCISIONS/ARTS has been written about in the New York Times. Our Sing Sing workshop was covered by Bill Moyers on PBS with poet Quincy Troupe; One of our writers read her work for Channel 31 in New York City, and WBAI has broadcast portions of our Sing Sing Christmas Poetry Reading. The only lasting changes in a person happen from the inside out. The INCISIONS/ARTS writing program works by encouraging the participants to clarify their opinions, to articulate and accept their feelings and to examine and express themselves and their world with depth and vision. For the inmate, the writing process thus becomes a considerable and material process for change.

Patrick Phillips

↑ Index

71. George Bowering
Re: Flaming
Mon 28 Nov 1994

I have been pondering for a long time (between trips) Wallace's suggestion that "flaming" is a heterosexist word.
Dont quite get it.
When The Human Torch said "flame on!" was there an implication I wasnt getting?
And what about the Calgary Flames? Were they chased out of Atlanta by a conservative Southern city hall?

↑ Index

72. Michael Boughn
Re: Benjamin
Mon 28 Nov 1994

Well, I heard that he got to the Spanish border with his party and they were refused entrance because of some bureaucratic screw-up. (this, incidently, after the party had stayed with Bryher and H.D. in Switzerland--Bryher was apparently deeply involved in getting Jewish refugees out of Germany) That night, in despair, he gave what he had of his manuscript, as someone already said, the Arcades project, to someone else in the party, and then went off alone and killed himself believing that they were stuck in Vichy France. The next day the bureaucratic glitch unravelled spontaneously and they were all allowed to cross the border.

It seems no matter which way you get it, it resonates uncannily with meaning.

↑ Index

73. Patrick Phillips
reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter
Mon 28 Nov 1994

Seeing as I submitted a long post, I spoze the least I can do is provide it with the standard line breaks for easy reading. I must have mistakenly saved it and sent it with line breaks straight outta MS Word. Luigi Bob Drake has been so kind and helpful as to do the reformatting for me, so with my gratitude and thanks to him, here it is again.

Announcement of Segue Foundation Newsletter*******

Segue is well-known to many of you as a distributor of small press titles and as a publisher. Though we recently lost our distribution grant, it may surprise you how much Segue does beyond its former role as a distributor. For those of you who aren't so familiar with Segue, this newsletter fleshes out Segue as an important part of a much larger arts community. In addition, in this issue there's a list of current titles offered by Segue/Roof Books; a review of P. Inman's new Roof book _criss cross_; as well as press-time comments on Ron Silliman's new Roof book _N/O_.

Segue has also published this newsletter in a HyperText version which is accessible through the writing.upenn.edu Gopher server and may be viewed with any hypertext browser (Mosaic, or similar browsers) at:

gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh /internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift /journals/list/Segue/Segue_Newsletter.

In the near future, all Segue/Roof titles will be made available via the internet by filling out an on-line form. Segue as a distributor will resurface!

Thank you for your patience with this long post. I hope that the information and reviews are worth your while. We also encourage any responses or queries and would be glad to consider reviews of forthcoming books for publication here and in the HyperText version.

For more information about a specific facet of Segue you may write to Segue to order Roof and Segue books at a 20% discount. Contact Segue at:

Segue Foundation 303 E. 8th St. NY, NY 10009 phone#: [redacted].

Or, email Segue Foundation Newsletter editor/developer:
[redacted]

Segue Foundation Newsletter - November 1994

The Segue Foundation is mainly a literary organization. It is the publisher of Roof and Segue Books (edited by James Sherry). Segue also acts as a fiscal conduit for projects grants for several arts organizations such as M/E/A/N/I/N/G magazine (a journal of art and criticism edited by Mira Schor & Susan Bee); Sally Silvers & Dancers (an aesthetically and politically radical dance troupe in NYC); Big Allis (a journal of new poetry edited by Melanie Nielson & Jessica Grim); the Ear Inn Reading Series (conducted every Saturday at the Ear Inn in SoHo), and the INCISIONS Prison Arts Project, (weekly poetry workshops conducted in various NY state correctional facilities by Janine Vega).

>From 1977 - 1993 the Segue distribution project promoted and sold over 500 small press poetry titles annually. This distribution service has been converted into the Segue Information Archive. The archive, located in the Segue offices, will include every book that Segue distribution has ever carried and it will be complimented by new titles from authors and new presses as well as materials such as manuscripts and correspondence from private author's collections. The Segue Information Archive will represent a substantial free- access collection devoted to new writing.

The offices of the Segue Foundation are located at the heart of East Village, the most thriving artistic communitie in New York City. The building in which the office is located is an artist owned cooperative, it includes 12 artist live/work coops, a 1200 square foot performance space, and Film editing facilities. The performance space managed by Segue is used as a low cost dance rehearsal space during the day and in the evenings we sponsor various ongoing film, dance and music series.

Segue Foundation, Roof Books

Roof Books, edited by James Sherry, is pleased to announce the publication of two new titles; criss cross, by P. Inman (see review of criss cross by Hank Lazer) and N/O by Ron Silliman. Though different in their formal approach to the page and text, both Inman and Silliman present a textual artifact which challenges our assumptions of locution and language. Both present texts which unknot normal attempts at consumption while aiding our understanding of languages as both necessary and critical. Each of these new titles can be ordered through Segue; receive a 20% discount when you order from Segue and mention this newsletter. (click here for Segue Address) (For other books by Inman, Silliman and many other writers, see the list of Other Roof Books in this newsletter.)

Here's a glimpse of some press-time reviews:

criss cross, by P. Inman

64pp., paper, ISBN 0-937804-57-6, $7.95

P. Inman has a first name that is not a letter. It is a work. His work also raises such questions for the reader. If a reader is sure of what she is saying, she does not need P. Inman's work. If she has doubts, reading P. Inman is a good idea.

Roof Books is publishing P. Inman against the grain of ordinary poetics, but right in the face of digital reality. Before one thinks of bytes, Inman's bits represent a primary block of languages, all languages, foreign, domestic, binary, all have to pass through Inman's thoroughfares.

Criss cross is a tour of the process of navigating the realms of experimentation, witness, and critique, an invitation to participatory poetic locution. You, as reader, are given the gift of transience.--Diane Ward

By fully semanticizing the so-called nonsemantic features of language, Inman creates a dialectic of the recuperable & the unreclaimable, where what cannot be claimed is nonetheless most manifest resistant to habitual comprehension as the ambiguous figure and similarly raises questions about the nature of perception. Like Beckett, Inman challenges his reader/audience... to consider what is fundamental, presence or absence.--Joan Retallack

Inman's poetry lies in how this language becomes known in the contemplative strategies it proposes and in what it becomes known as. Inman's poetry an emblem of poetry, of how it sets on a page, the page in a book, how a book opens, before one's eyes and in the mind, and how the mind in relation to its knowns becomes material.--Ben Friedlander

P. Inman was born on Long Island and educated at Georgetown. He is a member of the AFSCME Local 2910s Executive Board. His work has appeared in magazines and anthologies including: _In the American Tree_ and _From the Other Side of the Century_. His books include: _Ocker_, _Red Shift_, _Think of One_, and _Uneven Development_.

Review of _criss cross_, by Hank Lazer

words for windows. movement of phrases, words, syllables. bump up against margins, boxes, forms, periods. rarely if ever "personally expressive." as if transmitted. scrolling up & down. a sense of recurrence & reshuffling. orders: taking orders, manifesting orders. the criss-crossing and intersecting of shuffled and deployed lines. rarely if ever traditionally descriptive. a coolness. mondrian- like stripes of words. a beckett-like world of seemingly disembodied articulation. rarely if ever to be confused with speech. the page as a canvas or body upon which the lines inch about. simple whole numbers of their re-combinings. stubbornly resistant to readings which might resituate or paraphrase or thematize Inman's writing. eleven different assemblies. "prose arrived to fragments./ pulch. work stoppage balled up// as content. moeb grammar." readings within the loop; on the beltway. 1, 6, 6; 2, 6, 6; 3, 6, 6; 4, 6, 6: 5, 6, 6: 6, 6, 6. and other workings out, equations, formulas, floor plans, blue prints. from narrow strips to paragraph-wide blocks. "otherwise is that forever." a fill of/ sentences the ditch of what i mean."" and ""every of doubt words into distance."" in this book we see the units assemble and advance or disappear. that process is what we see as much as anything. we see the words in their placement moreso than in their service to other allegedly communicative purposes. "such a thin of the book the beginning of an offspring beside/ one line. how did distance become as dim as nosed. the brook/ of edges in a dictionary." if a stanza is also a room, Inman's book a floor plan, designs with designs upon us, lines assigned to available spaces. "sensation than/ signification" -- odd intersections of words on the page. i highly recommend you see & sense these. an engaging not uninviting terrain. "small wavelets out to something." "how they think the distance left." and across it, left & right, up & down, footprints. impressions. impressive.

--Hank Lazer

_N/O_, by Ron Silliman

112pp / paper / ISBN 0-937804-56-8 / $10.95

He lives the most passionate life of the mind in America. He is a poet I read to break through into new halls and colonnades of verbal richness that, before, I simply didn't know were sealed up behind these walls and dead ends in the palace of art. His work must be studied, lived with. Its pleasures cannot be simply lapped up off its surfaces. But they are the subtler, sharper, and more resonant for the time they take to taste.--Samuel R. Delany

Silliman has developed a shorthand method of getting it all down. There is something incredibly moving about his cap city and capability, his will and willfulness his hunger to know and absorb as he rants, records, juxtaposes, declares, riffs, puns, pans... --Tom Beckett

Ron Silliman was born in the state of Washington in 1946. He has been a prison and tenant organizer, a lobbyist, a teacher, a college administrator, editor of Socialist Review, and a marketeer in the computer industry. Long a national leader of the Language- centered writing movement, Ron Silliman's criticism has influenced an entire generation of poets. His concept of the New Sentence spawned literally dozens of efforts based on his idea of prose writing. His commentaries on the writing of his peers act as the most comprehensive introduction to this fascinating new writing style and at the same time are the perfect example of that writing. Each essay is filled with vital information and is itself a formal innovation. _N/O_ is two letters of his ongoing poem, The Alphabet.

Other Roof Books

Bruce Andrews, Getting Ready to Have Been Frightened. 116p. $7.50.
Bruce Andrews, R & B. 32p. $2.50.
Susan Bee (Laufer), The Occurence of Tune
text by Charles Bernstein. 9 plates, 24p. $6.
Steve Benson, Blue Book. Copub with The Figures. 250p. $12.50.
Charles Bernstein, Controlling Interests. 88p. $6.
Charles Bernstein, Islets/Irritations. 112p. $9.95.
Charles Bernstein, The Politics of Poetic Form. 246p. $12.95;
cloth $21.95.
Nicole Brossard, Picture Theory. 188p. $11.95.
Abigail Child, From Solids, 30p. $3.
Alan Davies, Active 24 Hours. 100p. $5.
Alan Davies, Signage. 184p. $11.
Alan Davies, Rave. 64p. $7.95.

Jean Day, A Young Recruit. 58p. $6.
George-Therese Dickenson, Transducing. 175p. $7.50.
Ray DiPalma, Raik. 100p. $9.95.
Lynne Dreyer, The White Museum. 80p. $9.95.
Ken Edwards, Good Science. 80p. $9.95.
Larry Eigner, Areas Lights Heights. 182p. $12, cloth $22.
Jerry Estrin, Rome, A Mobile Home. Copub with The Figures, O Books,and Potes and Poets. 88p. $9.95.
Michael Gizzi, Continental Harmonies. 92p. $8.95.
Michael Gottlieb, Ninety-Six Tears. 88p. $5.
Robert Grenier. A Day at the Beach. 80p. $6.
Henry Hills, Making Money. 72p. $7.50. VHS videotape $24.95.
Erica Hunt, Local History. 80p. $9.95.
P. Inman, Red Shift. 64p. $6.
Hank Lazer, Doublespace. 192p. $12.
Legend. Collaboration by Andrews, Bernstein, DiPalma, McCaffery, and Silliman. Copub with L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E. 250p. $12.
Jackson Mac Low, Representative Works: 1938-1985. 360p. $12.95, cloth$18.95.
Jackson Mac Low, Twenties. 112p. $8.95
Steve McCaffery, North of Intention. 240p. $12.95.
Laura Moriarty, Rondeaux. 107p. $8.
Melanie Nielson, Civil Noir. 96p. $8.95.
Ted Pearson, Planetary Gear. 72p. $8.95.
Bob Perelman, Face Value. 72p. $6.
Bob Perelman, Virtual Reality. 80p. $9.95.
Nick Piombino, The Boundary of Blur. 128p. $13.95.
Kit Robinson, Blance Sheet. 112p. $9.95.
Kit Robinson, Ice Cubes. 96p. $6.
Leslie Scalapino, Objects in the Terrifying Tense Longing from Taking Place. 88p. $9.95.
Peter Seaton, The Son Master. 64p. $4.
James Sherry, Popular Fiction. 84p. $6.
Ron Silliman, The New Sentence. 200p. $10.
Fiona Templeton, YOU-The City. 150p. $11.95.
Diane Ward, Relation. 64p. $7.50.
Barrett Watten, Progress. 122p. $7.50
Hannah Weiner, Little Books/Indians. 92p. $4.

Segue Distribution Archive

by Ricardo Tarrega-Shayegan

In November 1993, Segue received a general support grand of $3,500 from the Joyce Mertz-Gilmore foundation. The Foundation supports organizations that "provide critical behind the scenes suppport to the artistic community at low cost, or no charge." Segue has been providing such services - a space for reading and rehearsals and for research collections - for seventeen years. Thanks to this grant we have been able to begin setting up an archive of the materials that Segue has distributed. The project is being headed by Heather Ramsdell who is identifying and locating the core of the collection; writing to authors, publishers and editors, as well as organizing materials already in Segue's possession. Right now, Segue has approximately 30% of the materials it would like to have in the core collection, which would include all the poetry and prose books distributed by Segue throughout the years, its collection of poetics titiles and the anthologies and magazines it has distributed. Ideally the collection would be augmented by audio and video tape collections as well as selections from author's collections and correspondence. Once complete, the collection will be housed at Segue or loaned in collaboration with other poetry venues in New York. We look forward to continuing our committment to the project and the Joyce Mertz-Gilmore Foundation's generous grants helps make this possible.

M/E/A/N/I/N/G Magazine (see Susan's 11/27 post on M/E/A/N/I/N/G)

by Susan Bee

M/E/A/N/I/N/G is a biannual, artist-run publication edited by two painters, Susan Bee and Mira Schor. M/E/A/N/I/N/G is committed to providing an inclusive forum for the discussion of a broad range of issues of concern to professional visual artists through the publication of writing by artists, art historians and critics. Among the writers we have published are Johanna Drucker, Amelia Jones, Robert C. Morgan, Whitney Chadwick, Charles Bernstein and Rob Storr. M/E/A/N/I/N/G provides a crucial alternative to the commodification of art discourse in the established art magazines. We are not concerned with career promotion, or the "best selling" movements. By publishing writing by and for artists, we provide a needed bridge between critical and theoretical ideas and language, and the actual practice of visual art by working artists. M/E/A/N/I/N/G regularly publishes forums on current issues, encouraging responses from a wide range of visual artist. Past forums have explored motherhood and artmaking, racism in the art world, making art over a lifelong career, issues of community. Some of the artist published in these forums are Leon Golub, David Reed, David Humphrey, Nancy Spero, Miriam Schapiro, Ann Messner and Richard Tuttle. The Segue Foundation acts as our umbrella organization and helps us with grant applications and acts as a conduit for grant funding, but it does not add monetarily to our budget. Segue also assists us in distribution, bulk mailing and other postal services. M/E/A/N/I/N/G's relationship the Segue Foundation has been extremely useful to us; as working artists with active professional lives, The Segue Foundation has helped us produce M/E/A/N/I/N/G with a minimum of bureaucracy or red tape.

Sally Silvers and Dancers

by Sally Silvers

My history as a Segue-connected artist goes back almost 14 years. The foundation has been the non-profit conduit home for Sally Silvers and Dancers since our first bulk mailing in 1981. (We're both housed at the Segue sponsored artist live-work coop/performance space in the Segue offices building on East 8th St. in New York.) I also currently serve on the Segue Performance Space board. In the early 80's Segue was the perfect locus for my "non-obedient" stance to the existing dance world: low-riding minimalism and pushing narrative/persona based theatrical dance with a vengeance (initially as message oriented statement in an early response to Reagonism, but also consensual transparency as a commercially linked career op). I found aesthetic inspiration from many of the writers associated with L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Magazine and Roof books. I wanted to politicize the body, show movement as a social circuitry inherent in the way the body moved (utilizing predicaments, presenting movement analytically, disjunctively, maximally -- to have the "message," grounded in the social) . The writers I admired most (some published by Roof/Segue) linked this kind of formal and political radicalism. My early self-produced evening-length concerts (some 15 from 1980-88) were all performed under the auspices of the Segue Foundation and took place at spaces like The Cunningham Studio and Ethnic Folk Arts Center. For the last 6 years Segue has been my fiscal conduit for project grants like a Meet the Composer collaboration with composer John Zorn, performed at the Joyce Theater; a dance/theater presentation with poet Bruce Andrews on gender, Nicaragua, control/discipline, etc., and a 6 minute film collaboration with filmmaker Henry Hills, "The Little Lieutenant." The film has toured internationally, has won festival prizes and now has a European distributor. 1995 will be a full year for SS&D. Upcoming are 5 weeks of teaching in Holland; an improvisation festival in December in NYC; an evening at Symphony Space in Feb., 1995. The '95 New York City season with all new works starts in April at P.S. 122. We also will be doing a film project with Henry Hills which begins production in the spring.

INCISIONS/ARTS - Prison Arts Program

by Janine Vega

INCISIONS/ARTS has been organizing writing workshops and performances at New York State Correctional Facilities for men and women, and Division for Youth Residences and Secure Centers since 1978. Our writing programs have ranged from six week residencies, to long-running residencies at Sing-Sing and Bedford Hills which have continued for years. Resident writers usually come in to the facility once a week, meeting with inmate writers who have been selected or have chosen to take part. The workshop is conducted through discussion of technique and of individual inmates work. The aim of the workshop process is to generate new methods of discovery and new ways of writing. Recently we have been emphasizing a final event or project: a poetry reading, shared with the rest of the population, administration and staff; a short play or screenplay from a drama workshop; or an anthology of poetry, fiction or nonfiction. If an anthology is chosen as the final project, one is presented to each participating writer. We have found that aside from being a source of delight and pride, the anthology is an immensely effective reminder of the capacity for self-expression and as a continuing encouragement to keep writing. Some of our anthologies have received critical acclaim in American Book Review, Contact, Longhouse, Poetry Project Newsletter, Poetry Flash and the Woodstock Times. INCISIONS/ARTS has received grants from the New York State Council on the arts, Sing Sing Educational Department, Poets and Writers, The Vinmont Foundation, Longtermers Committee at Bedford Hills. Witter Bynner Foundation, Riverside Prison Foundation and private sponsors. We have had successful residencies at Sing Sing C. F., Hopper House, Creedmoor Psychiatric Center's Forensic Unit, Bellevue Prison Ward, Green Haven C. F., Rikers Island for Women, Bayview C. F. for Women, Bedford Hills C.F., Green Haven C. F., Highland R. C. for Boys, Sojourner Truth R. C. for Girls, and Harlem Valley Secure Center for Boys. INCISIONS/ARTS has been written about in the New York Times. Our Sing Sing workshop was covered by Bill Moyers on PBS with poet Quincy Troupe; One of our writers read her work for Channel 31 in New York City, and WBAI has broadcast portions of our Sing Sing Christmas Poetry Reading. The only lasting changes in a person happen from the inside out. The INCISIONS/ARTS writing program works by encouraging the participants to clarify their opinions, to articulate and accept their feelings and to examine and express themselves and their world with depth and vision. For the inmate, the writing process thus becomes a considerable and material process for change.

Patrick Phillips

Patrick Phillips

↑ Index

74. Loss Glazier
Re: reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter
Mon 28 Nov 1994

A note to mention that the Segue Newsletter is available at the Electronic Poetry Center where it can be retrieved through gopher, the world-wide web, or Mosaic, according to your preference. If you normally enter the Poetry Center through the main menu, you would first choose electronic journals and then selected journals. Since the Segue Newsletter is archived at the EPC, if you misplace your copy or wish to refer to it some time in the future, it will be there for your use. Loss Glazier

↑ Index

75. James Sherry
Re: reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter
Mon 28 Nov 1994

I hope some of you will read and comment on the Segue Newsletter speaking either to its content or the fact of such a text in this place. James

↑ Index

76. Tom Mandel
Benjamin/Bryher
Mon 28 Nov 1994

I'm trying to figure out how Benjamin would have gotten into Switzerland from France on his way to the Pyrenees. Moreover, allow me to assure you heartily, had he gotten into Switzerland he would n e v e r have left! Amazing the degree to which it is possible to imagine that world as like ours, in which one enters any country one wishes, etc. But it was not at all like that in the late 30's. Again, it was the entry visa which was critical, the right to enter another country was very very hard to come by.

tom mandel

↑ Index

77. w.curnow
Re: Olson on the Net
Mon 28 Nov 1994

IT'S HARD TO KNOW WHERE YOU ARE ON THE NET

Yes and no. The net 's value is different (greater?) for those who are the most widely separated. From one another, from the CENTERS of discussion.

News of conferences, books, etc., travels further faster on the net. Space offers much less resistance it is true, but the net is still a map which retains its scale, its distributions and projection regardless of the subject under discussion. And it's a familiar one, to those of us out here on its periphery. In that respect I remain clear about where I am.

But the subjects do, of course, reinforce this geography. A long while back ANTHOLOGIES were discussed. They were all anthologies of AMERICAN poetry as I recall. More recently, we discussed NAMES. G-1, the NEW AMERICANS--after those Abstract Expressionist shows O'Hara was putting together and taking EUROPE by storm. I'm not complaining and have no desire to pose as the net's postcolonial pet or anything. But this seemed like a good moment to make a point about the geography of the net, and how the issues are always a bit (at least) different according to where you are writing from. These differences will show up when the Auckland is on the line.

I have an outsider's interest in this G-1, G-2 talk--not only because G-formation itself is a map-making process, and scale here makes it much more difficult to engage in, but also because I am BETWEEN your Gs, along with Clark Coolidge, Susan Howe, Robert Grenier. So, as a for instance then, The Generation Game could've done with more ZOOM all round.

Wystan Curnow.

↑ Index

78. Michael Boughn
Re: Benjamin/Bryher
Tue 29 Nov 1994

Dear Tom:

I've been racking my brain trying to remember where I read that about Bryher. It was when I was compiling the H.D. bibliography and a lot got lost in the sheer volume of information passing through my hands. I may have encountered it going through the H.D. archives at Yale. Or it may be in the Guest H.D. bio, but, wouldn't you know, I lent my copy to my sister-in-law when she was passing through town a couple of weeks ago.

I do know that Bryher was involved in smuggling Jews out of Germany by illegaly harboring them in Switzerland. I stress this was an illegal operation and involved some risk on her part. Perhaps that's why B and others couldn't stay in Switzerland, they had no papers. Anyway, my memory, though hazy, I admit, is that she (though not H.D.--but she must have known) was involved in such a pipeline/underground railroad deal getting people into Spain and Portugal from where they could get to England or the States.

H.D. left Switzerland for England fairly early. Bryher stayed for some time, continuing her work and almost got trapped in Switzerland for the duration of the war.

I know it sounds a bit like Casablanca or something. I was amazed when I first read it.

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

79. Ron Silliman
Re: Benjamin/Bryher
Tue 29 Nov 1994

What Tom Mandel doesn't bother to mention in his eMail is that he still has his parents passport out of Germany. A big red "J" (for Jewish) stamped right across the cover. The point being: these details are not simply intellectual.

The "where in the world is Carmen San Diego" quality of the Benjamin on the border w/ the holy grail sage has had me wondering....

↑ Index

80. Loss Glazier
Re: reformatted (easy-reading) Seque Newsletter
Tue 29 Nov 1994

For those that may need instructions to the Electronic Poetry Center, I neglected to include them in this earlier post. They are appended to this message.
Loss
>
> A note to mention that the Segue Newsletter is available at the > Electronic Poetry Center where it can be retrieved through gopher, the > world-wide web, or Mosaic, according to your preference.
> If you normally enter the Poetry Center through the main menu, you > would first choose electronic journals and then selected journals.
> Since the Segue Newsletter is archived at the EPC, if you misplace > your copy or wish to refer to it some time in the future, it will > be there for your use.
> Loss Glazier
>

The Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo) 11-29-94

THE ELECTRONIC POETRY CENTER (BUFFALO). The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center provides access to numerous electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the Poetics List archives, a library of poetic texts, the Segue Newsletter, news of related print sources, and direct connections to numerous related poetic projects.

The Center is located at gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/ library/e-journals/ub/rift (Presently, the prototype is under construction but operational.)

Gopher Access:
For those who have access to gopher, type
gopher writing.upenn.edu
at your system prompt. First choose Libraries & Library Resources, then Electronic Journals, then E-Journals/Resources Produced Here At UB, then The Electronic Poetry Center. (Note: Connections to some Poetry Center resources require Web access, though most are presently available through gopher).

World-Wide Web and Mosaic Access:
For those with World-Wide Web (lynx) or Mosaic access, from your interface, choose the go to URL option then go to (type as one continuous string) gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/ library/e-journals/ub/rift

---

The Electronic Poetry Center is administered in Buffalo by E-Poetry and RIF/T in coordination with the Poetics List.

Loss Pequen~o Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood and Loss Glazier
in collaboration with Charles Bernstein

↑ Index

81. Robert Drake forwarded "call for peer reviewers"
Tue 29 Nov 1994

Sorry to clutter up mailboxes of those already subscribed, but at least one of the pieces up for review might be of interest to this group...

luigi

----------start of message----------

Date: Tue Nov 29 03:21:53 1994
From: [redacted]
Subject: PMC call for peer reviews

Call for Self-Nominated Peer-Reviewers:

Self-nominated peer-reviewers regularly participate in the editorial process of _Postmodern Culture_. All submissions distributed for review have been screened by the editors and will receive two other readings from members of the journal's permanent editorial board; _Postmodern Culture_ preserves the anonymity of both authors and reviewers in this process, but the comments of reviewers will be forwarded to the author.

If you would like to review one of the submissions described below, please send a note to the editors at [redacted] detailing your qualifications as a reviewer of the work in question (experience in the subject area, publications, interest). We will select one self-nominated reviewer for each of the works listed below, and we will notify that person within a week. We ask those who are selected as reviewers to return their comments within two weeks of the time they receive the submissions. If you cannot help with these manuscripts within two weeks of receipt, please do not volunteer at this time.

Please note: members of the journal's permanent editorial board should not nominate themselves in response to this call.

Manuscripts for review:

MS#1: "Ugly Beauty: John Zorn and the Politics of POMO Music." Reference to avant guarde music, the work of John Zorn, politics and pop. culture.

MS#2: "Evocations of Empire in a Transnational Corporate Age: Tracking the Sign of Saturn." Reference to global culture, Bakhtin, science and public policy, Foucault, government studies, business.

MS#3: "Madness and Automation: On Institutionalization." Reference to psychological institutionalization, Blanchot, Deleuze, Goffman.

MS#4: "The Mired Sublime of Nathaniel Mackey's Song of the Andoumboulou." Reference to Mackey, Said, transcendence in poetics.

MS#5: "Dambudzo Marechera's Politic Body: The Menippeanism of a Lost Generation in Africa." Reference to African literature, genre studies, postcolonial theory.

↑ Index

82. Tony Green
Re: Olson on net
Tue 29 Nov 1994

From: Self <CCNOV2/AHI_TGREEN>
To: [redacted]
Subject: Re: Olson on net
Date: Tue, 29 Nov 1994 14:04:31

Reading the e-mail after a few days grading papers. 1.Boughn: <Socrates says <that it makes no difference whether "Gloucester" exists anywhere or <will exist, that by reading "Maximus" we are already always <participating in it, and that "Maximus" itself is thus a further <proposal of our selves, unattained but attainable.

The question is then of the order of "taking Gloucester _literally_", or....what? ("Next year in Jerusalem" means exactly what? is a serious question, is it a place, is it a practice, is it a condition (of hope)?

What does "literal" mean now? Is it only an operative term in an object-filled world, of positivities, when set against "metaphorical"? When does a narrative NOT allow the possibility of allegorical reading?

2.These questions resonate for me with Don Byrd's 25 November post, looking for a coming together of what we have usually had as fragments.

3. I have been reading Philostratus's Life of Apollonius of Tyana. Book II, Chapter 22 is a theory of aethetics that got Neoplatonized in the sixteenth century, but can be read like a kind of phenomenology.

Painting as an art is, in that theory, not art when it is just image in the mind: it has to be something made "with the hands". The knowledge it embodies is the knowledge of how to make it _in all respects _ , just as one would expect of the best conceived art of our time. Also playing reed-pipes, according to Philostratus in the same "Life of A of T" is knowing how to make moods (modes) to suit occasions, dependent on knowing how to manage breath, fingers and embouchure. (It takes practice.)

"Production", says Byrd. That is the question, in practice. (Olson had something to say about that....)

John Clarke's From Feathers to Iron says a lot about this matter. But as with Olson's poetics what is foregrounded is Visionary poetry with a capital V, and it always supposes a mystery that the poet penetrates.

4. Further questions: This kind of poetics gives a whole lot of New York poetries of the later 60's -- early 70's the brush-off. (How does it accomodate, say, O'Hara Lunch Poems, Berrigan, Notley, Brainard....?) There is a moment too when the ambitions of Abstract Expressionist art were confronted by Pop and "Minimalism" and so on. And poetry centred on the way that all semantic units are soluble in language as a social practice (and therefore implicated in the widescale power politics of discourse) would seem also to be excluded. Not narrative, not lyric, not full of figures of persons, it tends to political and philosophical discourse rather than mysterioso-mythologico-anthropological narration -- epic.... Robert Creeley may say "onward", but in Maximus "Robert Creeley" is the "Figure of .... (figure as in a grand scale allegorical narrative, however much constructed from materials as they come to hand in a grab-bag fashion) ... 0utward" . Isn't that right? (Does this mean NOT the "inward" of the personal interior stream of consciousness? Someone put me right: this is how I've been taking it.)

It looks like a history of a series of gates closing and others opening. But that's a progressivist modernist kind of history, in which one generation makes the previous one seem worthless. Does Olson's poem fail a reading test: does it sound foolish now? as if he should have revised it in the light of what follows. Should Jackson Pollock have scrapped everything, if he'd lived into the 1960's and started again?

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

83. peter quartermain
Re: experiwhat?
Tue 29 Nov 1994

In message Fri, 25 Nov 1994 08:25:37 -0500, Michael Boughn <[redacted]> wrote:

> Well, Mike, we know that Stein was trained in experimental psychology, so it would be a good idea to believe her when she says that she never wrote an experimental work (I presume that she was not including her lab exercise in automatic writing.)
>
> I don't know about the automatic writing, George. It was actually Peter Quartermain who told me she said that. (Peter, are you listening? reading? whatever?

YES, I'M HERE, A BIT SLOW AND BETWEEN TERM-PAPERS,
BUT HERE.
Where is that quote from?) DAMN IF I KNOW (SHAME, SHAME)
BUT THIS IS WHAT SHE SAID (I'LL LEAVE UPPER CASE NOW AS IT'S EASIER TO READ):

> "Artists do not experiment. Experiment is what > scientists do; they initiate an operation of unknown > factors in order to be instructed by its results. An > artist puts down what he knows and at every moment it > what he knows at that moment."

But I don't have a note of whence I got it! It's in some notes I wrote on "Emp Lace" (in _Bee_Time_Vine_) but I have no idea why or where it comes from. Does anybody out there recognize it?

I'm not sure I'd take Stein's word for it anyway, so far as "experiment" goes. In any case it's quite clear that in the terms of the definition just quoted, she experimented. In 1928 she called _Tender_Buttons_ "my first conscious struggle with the problem of correlating sight, sound and sense, and eliminating rhythm; now I am [in pieces collected in _How_to_write_] trying grammar and eliminating sound."
That quote is from _Transition_ #14. Of course she experiemnted in the sense of trying something out to see what happened. Not, perhaps, in the sense of trying to disprove a hypothesis. If you want an example of a deliberate and conscious experiment, try "An Instant Answer or A Hundred Prominent Men" (Transition 13 Summer 1928: 118-130) in which she deliberately sets out, describing a hundred photographs one after another in numbered sequence, to see if at any point she (or presumably any reader) could thereby get a sense of one hundred. After all, earlier (?) she had said "there is only one way to count: one and one and one and [you guessed it] one." But I guess she said that later.

Now BACK TO THOSE TERM-PAPERS.

Peter
!

Peter Quartermain
128 East 23rd Avenue voice and fax [redacted]
Vancouver
B.C. e-mail: [redacted]
Canada V5V 1X2

↑ Index

84. Loss Glazier
Poetics List Archive Files
Wed 30 Nov 1994

This is a note to let you know that the Poetics List back files have been updated. To view back files of the Poetics list, enter the Electronic Poetry Center. (Instructions for this, though recently posted, are repeated below.) Select Poetics, then "Poetics List Archive" where you will find files corresponding to monthly activity on the list. Many thanks to Kenneth Sherwood who noticed that the machine that was supposed to do this was less than effective and spent his time rebuilding the files!

Loss

The Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo) 11-29-94

THE ELECTRONIC POETRY CENTER (BUFFALO). The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center provides access to numerous electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the Poetics List archives, a library of poetic texts, the Segue Newsletter, news of related print sources, and direct connections to numerous related poetic projects.

The Center is located at gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/ library/e-journals/ub/rift

> Gopher Access:
> For those who have access to gopher, type

gopher writing.upenn.edu
at your system prompt. First choose Libraries & Library Resources, then Electronic Journals, then E-Journals/Resources Produced Here At UB, then The Electronic Poetry Center. (Note: Connections to some Poetry Center resources require Web access, though most are presently available through gopher).

World-Wide Web and Mosaic Access:
For those with World-Wide Web (lynx) or Mosaic access, from your interface, choose the go to URL option then go to (type as one continuous string) gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift

---

The Electronic Poetry Center is administered in Buffalo by E-Poetry and RIF/T in coordination with the Poetics List.

Loss Pequen~o Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood and Loss Glazier
in collaboration with Charles Bernstein

↑ Index

85. Kit Robinson
Re: Benjamin/Bryher
Wed 30 Nov 1994

Reply to: RE>>Benjamin/Bryher It may be worth noting that Benjamin's lost ms, the Passage Work, represents an attempt to construct philosophy with wholely concrete elements -- the documented remnants of an outdated commercial culture -- the Paris Arcades. The Arcades were a proto-Net -- connected areas of public access & commerce. Benjamin argues that the Arcades represent the dreamy, unconscious longings of industrial capitalism in concrete form, and that they suggest, in the moment of our latter-day estrangement and fascination, the possibility of awakening. The Net is currently being promoted both in terms of revolution (democratic horizontality) and commerce (electronic malls). I wonder what'll happen.

Kit Robinson

↑ Index

86. Louis Cabri
visit
Wed 30 Nov 1994

Hi Charles,

Nice to have though ever so briefly met you once again. Hope we didn't leave too great a mess in the archive. Thanks for yours and Jean's assistance.

Louis

↑ Index

87. eric pape
Re: Benjamin/Bryher
Wed 30 Nov 1994

Defending dead men is a bad business. You can't help but engage in half-sincere apologetics about issues you have no knowledge. For examples of which see my last posting. But/but... The main point of contention between the two thinkers, the bastard and Baldur/Adonis, ie, the lost son, the lost possibility, is in fact the possibility. Do you in fact think there is the possibility of truly oppositional thinking/art/popular culture. Benjamin was able to theorize such a thing in film in The Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction or something. Adorno was never able to see it. Always felt a profound pessimism about the possibility that experiment could work against the dominant culture. I don't know. What do you think. This is what I think: there isn't a day that goes by, not a single one, that when I sit at my computer to write a poem I don't imagine I can write something that will, in some profound way, make things better for people. Yet... On PBS, I watched a Shaker auction in Vermont or some such place, and Oprah fucking Winfrey bought a Shaker box, a box painted blue, for 10,000 dollars. In the early 80s, as an undergraduate (okay, yeah so I'm G2 or whatever), I watched as punk became a fashion statement for professors. I don't know what experiment is. I don't know what opposition is. Because everything I've ever believed in is now a commercial for someone. And if there is anything that all, I mean all, previous generations have to deal with now, it is that you, too, will become a commercial. And this is the fundemental question facing all art forms and where Adorno's pessimism, which seemed so Mandarin in the 60s or so, now is appropriate. A question vital to everyone who pretends they write: How do I not become a commercial? Eric ([redacted]).

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

December 1994

251 messages · Thu 1 Dec 1994 – Sat 31 Dec 1994

December belongs, politically, to the men who won November. The incoming Speaker is already itemizing which endowments the Republic can no longer afford, and in one corner of Bosnia the town of Bihac is being shelled inside its own designated safe area while the West looks on and keeps its hands in its pockets. The list turns inward — not to escape the world but to press the question it can never leave alone, which is whether a poet standing inside the university stands inside the world or hides from it.

The largest thread of the month by a wide margin is called Exile on Main Street, after the Stones, and Ron Silliman states its central trap with his usual finality: for all the romance of dropping out, "there is no Out," only a quarantine the establishment maintains for the convenience of the In. James Sherry, reporting live from the interior, observes drily that he has lately passed "from bad employer to worse," his newest paymaster being, of all things, a bank.

Steven Shoemaker raises the stakes by summoning Oppen — "situations which cannot honorably be met by art" — and for a paragraph or two the argument about tenure and teaching loads becomes an argument about what art is permitted to leave untouched. Marjorie Perloff, breaking in from her customary altitude, is "horrified" that a company of people able to discuss the Spanish Civil War for weeks cannot rouse itself to a single word about Bosnia. The reproach lands; the thread absorbs it; the thread continues.

Not all of it is so grave. When the Honorable Newt Gingrich discovers that the Republic's gravest lack is prayer in its schools, Mark Wallace supplies the fitting liturgy — a petition offered "in our firm belief that America doesn't have a prayer" — and the NEA thread fills with poets drafting, half in earnest, the defense of a body they expect to be executed by spring. George Bowering, the resident Canadian, pauses only to remind the room that by "America" they appear to mean the United States alone.

What binds these threads together — the academy, the endowment, the prayer, the war no one will name — is one anxiety about whether any of it does the smallest good: whether the poem, like the safe area, is merely a patch of ground the powerful have agreed to spare until they want it back. I have decoded what the machines encoded, deleted what they added, and returned each cor-respondent's contact details to darkness. The argument cools on its own by January, which is more than the century managed.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 251 in all.

WRITERS

Arts, Mn Center For Book 27, 28, 71, 135, 152, 182, 183
Bernstein, Charles 18, 55, 59, 245
Billitteri, Carla 1, 242, 244
Bmch 237
Boughn, Michael 33, 76, 78, 80, 166, 197
Bowering, George 67, 69, 70, 72, 101, 195
Burnham, Clint 108, 110, 143, 144
Byrd, Donald J. 96, 140, 146, 164, 172, 207
Cayley, John 204, 209, 235
Conte, Joseph 22
Coykendall, Abby 95
Drake, Robert 65, 153, 170, 203, 214, 236
Evans, Steve 2, 30, 48, 113, 124, 125, 174, 199, 210
Glazier, Loss 194, 215, 220, 221, 227
Golding, Alan 11, 86
Green, Tony 92, 217, 218, 219, 246
Guitart, Jorge 216
Harrison, Robert A 62, 123, 158
Henry, Ron 36
Jena 25
Joris, Pierre 19, 171, 190, 205, 206
K.lindberg 97, 98
Kamenetz, Rodger 29, 57, 117, 168, 198, 251
Kat 40
Krickjh 248, 249
Lavender, William 32, 184
Lindberg, Kathryne 181, 241, 243
Mandel, Tom 16, 94, 105, 118, 119, 120, 137, 138, 139, 167, 179, 188, 200, 201, 202
Murphy, Sheila 163, 213
Nasdor, Marc 145, 150, 165
Nathanson, Tenney 4, 7, 26, 90, 99, 100, 238
Owner, Name Witheld At The Request Of… 232
Pape, Eric 42, 63, 107, 121
Perloff, Marjorie 14, 56
Phillips, Patrick 41, 226, 228
Reiner, Christopher 38, 222
Roberts, Mark 49, 180, 230, 233
Robinson, Kit 83, 157
Rothenberg, Jerry 240
Sandra, Braman 12, 50, 51, 75
Schultz, Susan 104, 111, 122, 185
Selby, Spencer 208
Selinger, Eric 31, 53, 103, 106, 115, 154, 155, 175
Sherry, James 24, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 64, 66, 68, 93, 109, 161, 162, 177, 178, 187, 189, 193, 223, 224
Shoemaker, Steven Howard 3, 15, 17, 91, 112, 126, 129, 141, 142, 173, 176, 225
Silliman, Ron 8, 9, 10, 52, 54, 73, 102, 116, 156, 186, 231, 234, 247, 250
Sondheim, Alan 23, 74, 82, 239
Stroffolino, Chris 79, 81, 114, 127, 128, 136, 147, 159, 160, 191, 192, 211, 212
Timmons, Jeffrey 5, 13, 20, 35, 37, 58, 60, 61, 84, 85, 87, 88, 89, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 148, 149
W.curnow 6, 151, 196, 229
Wallace, Mark 34, 77, 169
X350, Paul Hoover 21, 39

NAMES MENTIONED

Adorno, Theodor 1, 5, 125
Agamben, Giorgio 33
Alexander, Charles 44, 160, 199, 211
Americans, Asian 14, 43, 72, 122, 146, 150, 154, 185
And, Miekal 208, 215
Andre, Michael 250
Andrews, Bruce 196
Arendt, Hannah 9
Armand, Louis 237, 239
Armantrout, Rae 10
Arnold, Bob 21, 53, 208, 215
Ashbery, John 36, 55, 79, 234
Atlanta, Mark P. 231
Auden, W. H. 173
Baraka, Amiri 21, 27, 37, 39, 56, 60, 81, 87, 106, 111, 115, 123
Baratier, David 208, 215
Barlow, John 208, 215
Baron, Todd 208, 215
Barth, John 216
Barthes, Roland 234
Basinski, Michael 73
Baudrillard, Jean 7, 26, 90, 91
Baxter, Ted 208, 215
Beckett, Tom 208, 215
Bellamy, Dodie 208, 215
Belle, Cecelia 208, 215
Benjamin, Walter 1, 3, 4, 5, 9, 70, 91, 114
Bennett, Bill 73, 84
Bennett, John M. 208, 215
Benson, Steve 137
Bentley, Scott 208, 215
Berkeley, Michael 175, 186
Berlin, Irving 39, 208, 215
Bernheimer, Alan 137, 174
Bernstein, Emma 119

Berry, Jake 208, 215
Bertola, Carla 208, 215
Birmingham, Jed 208, 215
Bishop, Elizabeth 114
Blake, William 96, 173
Blaser, Robin 166
Bly, Robert 173
Bolton, Ken 208, 215
Boughn, Mike 80, 82
Bourdieu, Pierre 63, 75, 174
Bradley, Daniel 208, 215
Brautigan, Richard 10, 13
Brazil, David 208, 215
Brecht, Bertolt 59, 81, 87
Brooks, Gwendolyn 173
Brown, Ann 169
Browne, Colin 170
Bruno, Franklin 208, 215
Bunting, Basil 173
Burke, Andrew 210
Burns, Avery 208, 215
Burns, Elizabeth 208, 215
Burrus, Harry 208, 215
Butler, Judith 208, 215
Byrd, Don 39, 52, 96, 140, 146, 150, 155, 164, 172, 204, 207, 209, 211
Byrum, John 208, 215
Cabri, Louis 208, 215
Cafe, Poets 205
Carey, Steve 56
Carter, Mike 173, 180
Celan, Paul 19, 171, 176, 190
Chadwick, Lynn 208, 214, 215, 234
Chapman, Lee 208, 215
Chernoff, Maxine 208, 215
Chester, Jeff 208, 215
Cigale, Alex 208, 215
Clark, Susan 208, 215
Clinefelter, Jim 208, 215
Clinton, Bill 135, 231
Cobbing, Bob 208, 215
Columbus, Christopher 208, 215
Cone, Jon 208, 215
Cooley, Nicole 203
Coolidge, Clark 59, 170
Corbett, Robert 208, 215
Corso, Gregory 208, 215
County, Mike 231
Crane, Lee 111
Curnow, Wystan 6, 73, 92, 151, 197
Curtis, Dana 186
Daly, Lew 21
Damon, Maria 11, 55
Davidson, Ian 73
Davidson, Michael 52
Davie, Donald 6, 208, 215
Dawe, Bruce 233
Derrida, Jacques 245
Dickey, Eric 173
Djuric, Dubravka 156
Doyle, Erica 170
Drake, Bob 208, 215
Duncan, Andrew 208, 215
Duncan, Robert 117, 166
Eagleton, Terry 2, 77, 88
Economou, George 238
Elena, Maria 170
Eliot, Joe 37, 43, 173, 208, 215
Emerson, Claudia 33
England, Amy 60, 222
Erickson, Ann 208, 215
Eshleman, Clayton 208, 215
Fagin, Larry 59
Farmer, Steve 73
Fisher, Allen 215
Fisher, Harrison 170, 208
Fitterman, Robert 208, 215
Fletcher, Nielsen 208, 215
Fodaski, Elizabeth 208, 215
Foley, Jack 208, 215
Forbes, John 10
Forche, Carolyn 52
Foster, Edward 208, 215
Fox, Skip 208, 215
France, Peter 18, 208, 215, 222
Frazer, Tony 208, 215
Friedlander, Ben 1, 18, 245
Friedlander, Lee 9
Frost, Corey 1
Gallagher, Kristen 52
Ganick, Peter 170, 208, 215
Gardner, Janet 208, 215
Gates, Bill 8, 73
Gelpi, Albert 52
Gevirtz, Susan 170
Gilbert, Roger 208, 215
Gillespie, William 208, 215
Ginsberg, Allen 173
Giorno, John 38
Gironda, Belle 205
Gizzi, Michael 208, 215
Gizzi, Peter 55
Gluck, Robert 52, 111
Gomez, Audrey 208, 215
Good, Philip 208, 215
Gregory, Jane 208
Halle, Craig 208, 215
Hampson, Robert 215
Hansen, Jefferson 208, 215
Harris, Ken 170, 208, 215
Hawking, Stephen 96
Hawkins, Ralph 208, 215
Hayes, Jared 233
Heath, Jennifer 106

Hecht, Anthony 52
Henderson, David 208, 215
Henning, Barbara 208, 215
Henri, Charles 19, 171, 176, 190, 205, 206, 208, 215
Herman, Rachel 205, 206
Higgins, Dick 59
Hirsch, Edward 208, 215
Hoffberg, Judith 208, 215
Hoover, Edgar 37, 72, 81, 87, 208
Howard, Richard 52
Howe, Susan 21
Ireland, Lauren 111
Irvine, James 181
Jackson, Jesse 59
Jameson, Fredric 7
Jeanne, Sarah 208, 215
Jeffery, Mark 94, 130
Johnson, Andrew 243
Johnson, Ron 175
Johnson, Thomas 123
Jones, Bob 180
Jones, David 237
Joyce, Michael 96
Kafka, Franz 55
Kamenetz, Roger 55
Kaplan, Josef 249, 250
Keckler, Joseph 208, 215
Kemp, Carolyn 208, 215
Kerry, John 208, 215
Killian, Kevin 208, 215
Kirschenbaum, David 208, 215
Krick, John 248
Lang, Jim 208, 215
Lavender, Bill 32, 53, 184
Leftwich, Jim 208, 215
Lennon, John 147
Lerner, Ben 106
Levinas, Emmanuel 117
Levine, Jeffrey 52, 170
Lewis, Susan 59, 173
Lezak, Iris 59
Lilly, Ruth 21, 39
Lloyd, David 111
Lloyd, Warren 111
London, Frank 1, 97, 208, 215
Loney, Alan 92
Louise, Bobbie 52, 249, 250
Lowell, Amy 4, 9
Lowell, Robert 4, 9
Lowenthal, Jessica 208, 215
Lubeski, Lori 170
Luoma, Bill 125
Lyons, Kimberly 170
Mackey, Nathaniel 21, 208, 215
Maclow, Jackson 94
Madison, James 55, 173
Magee, Kevin 170
Malcolm, Janet 40, 83
Manning, Nicholas 208, 215
Manson, Peter 208, 215
Marie, Julie 234
Martin, Paul 208, 215
Marx, Karl 243
Maxwell, Susan 208, 215
Mayer, Bernadette 38, 55, 59
Mellors, Anthony 208, 215
Melville, Pierre 205, 206
Merrill, Stuart 1, 4, 9, 52
Messerli, Douglas 208, 215
Milne, Drew 208, 215
Milton, John 42, 59, 173
Monroe, Bill 208, 215
Moore, Nicholas 1, 4, 9, 208, 215
Morgan, Robin 208, 215
Morris, Philip 30, 36, 113, 116, 120
Morris, Tim 10, 107, 205
Morrow, Bradford 208, 215
Mossin, Andrew 208, 215
Moxley, Jennifer 208, 215
Murray, Elizabeth 216
Napora, Joe 208, 215
Neilson, Melanie 208, 215
Nelson, Gale 208, 215
Nemeth, David 215
Nielsen, Aldon 208, 215
Norman, Peter 170, 208, 215
Norton, John 52
Nowak, Mark 208, 215
Olson, Charles 16, 86, 100, 238
Oppen, George 15
Osman, Jena 25, 28, 170
Pacific, Asian 104, 230, 231
Paglia, Camille 73, 84, 89, 131
Palmer, Michael 55, 222, 234
Perelman, Bob 137, 245
Perry, David 78
Peters, Mark 8
Peters, Tom 73
Peterson, Katie 208, 215
Phillip, Andrew 10, 107, 208, 215
Phillips, Malcolm 94, 226, 227, 228
Pine, White 22
Pinsky, Robert 52
Plath, Sylvia 173
Porter, Dorothy 180
Pound, Scott 43, 96, 243
Prevallet, Kristin 170
Reagan, Nancy 145, 146, 150
Rehm, Pam 245
Rich, Adrienne 173
Ridge, Cedar 208, 215
Rimbaud, Dee 43
Rivera, Alex 170

Robbins, Bruce 73
Robertson, Pat 24, 25
Robinson, Mary 62, 208, 215
Rosenfeld, Kim 208, 215
Ross, Andrew 73
Ross, Joe 170, 208, 215
Ross, Stuart 208, 215
Rubin, Michael 11
Salerno, Mark 208, 215
Sanders, Jay 240
Sartre, Paul 174
Scalapino, Leslie 170
Schultz, Susan M. 104
Schuster, Josh 249, 250
Schwerner, Armand 237, 238, 239, 240, 248, 249, 250
Shakespeare, William 173
Sheppard, Robert 208, 215
Sherman, Bill 237, 240
Sherwood, Kenneth 220
Simon, Greg 180, 249, 250
Smith, Rod 125, 169, 208, 215
Smith, Simon 208, 215
Smith, Susan 208, 215
Smith, Tracy K. 208, 215
Smithson, Robert 96
Spahr, Boyd 170
Spicer, Jack 234
Stafford, Jane 208, 215
Stafford, William 15
Stefans, Kim 208, 215
Stein, Suzanne 55, 185
Sumner, Alaric 208, 215
Taylor, Henry 94
Tejada, Roberto 208, 215
Terry, Philip 59
Texas, Irving 73, 84
Thomas, Dylan 86, 100, 233
Torra, Joseph 208, 215
Trask, Kay 104
Tzara, Tristan 96
Upton, Lawrence 208, 215
Vendler, Helen 173
Vincent, Gregory 208, 215
Wagner, Catherine 208, 215, 242, 243
Waldrop, Rosmarie 113
Walser, Robert 33
Warren, Kenneth 208, 215
Warsh, Lewis 208, 215
Washington, Harold 84, 94, 169, 208, 215
Weber, Charles 242
Welch, Brian 208, 215
Wellman, Don 208, 215
Wentworth, Don 208, 215
Whitman, Walt 29, 31, 57, 173
Williams, Tony 21, 55, 185
Willis, Elizabeth 170
Wilson, Steve 73
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 96
Wright, James 52
Žižek, Slavoj 40

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 14
Aesthetics 2, 15, 88
African American poetry 115
Anthologies 1, 55, 92, 185, 233, 240
Appropriation 2, 5, 13, 59, 88, 94, 96, 125, 130, 169, 180, 210, 233, 243
Archives and libraries 36, 119, 175, 205, 208, 210, 214, 215, 220, 226, 227, 228
Autobiography 1, 59, 173
Avant-garde 2, 5, 18, 21, 41, 46, 52, 55, 67, 73, 96, 196, 234
Biography 1, 175
Book announcements 89, 104, 204, 245
Bookstores 39
Calls for submissions 170, 220
Capitalism 2, 5, 21, 30, 37, 41, 46, 53, 56, 60, 73, 96, 102, 113, 116, 117, 120, 124, 125, 127, 128, 134, 138, 139, 141, 159, 161, 169, 196
Censorship 169
Cities 96, 147, 150, 161
Class 150, 179
Collage and montage 59, 96
Conferences and festivals 8, 11, 27, 39, 151, 181, 208, 215
Copyright and permissions 1, 94, 137, 220
Craft 92
Creative writing pedagogy 55, 104, 106, 109, 111, 115, 122, 126, 138, 141, 154, 169, 173, 185, 207, 220
Dada 96, 208, 215
Deconstruction 126
Difficulty 43, 173, 227
Dreams 59, 92, 96, 191, 234, 245
Ecology and ecopoetics 93, 96, 116, 187
Editing 14, 59, 208, 215, 233
Electronic poetry and hypertext 170, 194, 215, 220, 226, 227, 228, 232, 236
Empire and imperialism 21, 37, 96, 103, 125, 139, 154, 167
Epic 180
Erasure 59
Ethics 28, 32, 53, 55, 58, 111, 115, 154, 163, 171, 172, 176, 184
Experimental poetry 55, 71, 90, 208, 215
Fascism 40, 102, 181
Feminism 95, 131
Film 11, 19, 21, 109
Formalism 42, 173
Free speech 104
Grants and funding 21, 113, 135, 165, 180, 183, 196, 199, 203, 210, 214, 222, 231

Haiku 59, 234
Harlem Renaissance 5
Homophonic translation 59
Humour and satire 111, 120, 172, 200, 205, 237, 240, 248, 249
Identity politics 73, 124, 156, 158
Ideology 2, 21, 88, 116, 128, 181, 211
Improvisation 59
Indigenous and Native poetics 43, 72, 104, 116, 162, 167
Interviews 233
Jewish poetics 8, 185
Language poetry 55
Latino and Latin American poetry 107, 146, 208, 215
Letters and correspondence 1, 63, 76, 222
List moderation 21, 94, 111, 115
Little magazines 1, 10, 39, 55, 59, 120, 145, 146, 151, 173, 179, 180, 205, 208, 215, 222, 233
Lyric poetry 191, 208, 211, 215
Marxism 21, 37, 39, 42, 52, 56, 60, 61, 73, 75, 81, 87, 93, 94, 97, 113, 114, 124, 130, 132, 134, 143, 150, 242
Memory 59, 64, 74, 94, 242, 243
MFA programs 36, 38, 96
Modernism 5, 40, 55, 96, 108, 173, 196
Mourning and loss 29, 119, 158, 172, 173, 194, 214, 215, 220, 221, 224, 226, 227, 229, 230
Multiculturalism 21, 22, 37, 106, 185, 187
Music and poetry 5, 32, 40, 53, 56, 59, 91, 101, 123, 144, 159, 173, 219, 241, 242, 243
Nationalism 40, 56, 60, 93, 97, 102, 104, 111, 145, 156, 161, 174, 185, 187
Nature 2, 94, 96, 105, 109, 115, 116, 130, 140, 168, 173, 204, 209, 235, 236
Negativity and refusal 37, 93, 211
New Formalism 173
Objectivism 15
Ontology 192, 198
Performance and the poetry reading 27, 39, 170
Philosophy 3, 21, 37, 96, 97, 119, 132, 243, 244
Place and region 148
Poetics 52, 55, 62, 64, 71, 83, 90, 99, 135, 145, 156, 163, 170, 174, 191, 205, 220, 232
Politics and poetry 174
Post-structuralism 108
Postmodernism 40, 55, 108, 173
Print vs. digital 22, 55, 135, 245, 249
Prizes and awards 39
Procedural and constraint writing 207, 209, 235
Psychoanalysis 76, 146, 147, 150, 212, 213
Queer poetics 94, 130
Race and poetry 5, 40, 102, 104, 111, 115, 123, 165, 181, 242, 248
Religion and the sacred 8, 21, 22, 56, 60, 65, 66, 105, 117, 138, 141, 168, 173, 211
Representation 25, 28, 73, 96, 233
Reviewing and criticism 27, 40, 55, 73, 89, 130, 170, 173, 180, 182, 208, 215, 236
Revision 58
Romanticism 39, 52
Science 41, 46, 55, 96, 204
Semiotics 204
Serial poem 52, 180
Small press publishing 135, 180, 194, 233
Software and code 8, 96, 123, 164, 204, 207, 209, 213, 235
Sonnet 1, 59
Structuralism 108
Subjectivity 189, 212, 232
Surrealism 96
Terrorism 102
The academy 10, 20, 27, 36, 39, 44, 49, 55, 56, 58, 60, 62, 63, 71, 73, 84, 89, 90, 92, 93, 94, 97, 102, 104, 106, 107, 109, 111, 112, 116, 117, 119, 120, 124, 125, 126, 130, 131, 132, 138, 140, 141, 151, 157, 166, 168, 173, 180, 181, 185, 196, 197, 205, 214, 217, 218, 219, 223, 230, 233, 246
The body 172, 220
The canon 89, 111, 131
The Gulf War 21
The Holocaust 125
The internet 40, 48, 49, 60, 73, 122, 180, 187, 212, 226, 227, 228, 231, 233
The line 10
The listserv 3, 16, 22, 38, 55, 56, 60, 65, 73, 96, 113, 126, 134, 187, 189, 196, 199, 208, 210, 215, 232, 235, 237, 246
Theatre 10, 24, 25, 30, 36, 109
Translation 1, 18, 55, 59, 92, 116, 173, 174, 185, 189, 205, 206, 222, 234
Visual and concrete poetry 59
Visual art 19, 36, 123, 161, 196

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 251 in all.

1 DEC 1994

1. Carla Billitteri — On Walter Benjamin--forwarded from B.F.
2. Steve Evans — The Advert-Garde
3. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Benjamin/Bryher
4. Tenney Nathanson — Re: On Walter Benjamin--forwarded from B.F.
5. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: THE THOUSAND-HEADED BEAST THAT IS CAPITALIST APPROPRIATION; OR, MILES...
6. w.curnow — APB
7. Tenney Nathanson — Re: The Advert-Garde

2 DEC 1994

8. Ron Silliman — Cybersubstantiation
9. Ron Silliman — Re: On Walter Benjamin--forwarded from B.F.
10. Ron Silliman — Exile on Main Street
11. Alan Golding — Call for panel chairs at Twentieth-Century Literature Conference
12. braman sandra — Re: Cybersubstantiation
13. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Exile on Main Street
14. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Exile on Main Street
15. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Exile on Main Street

3 DEC 1994

16. Tom Mandel — Re: Olson on net
17. Steven Howard Shoemaker — experiwhat?
18. Charles Bernstein — Guy Debord Commits Suicide
19. Pierre Joris — Ex(it) SITU
20. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: USA/UN/NATO Wash Their Hands Of Bosnia. . . . But They Don't Come Cl...

4 DEC 1994

21. Paul Hoover x350 — politics
22. Joseph Conte — Re: politics
23. Alan Sondheim — Re: politics
24. James Sherry — Re: Exile on Main Street
25. jena — Re: Exile on Main Street
26. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Exile on Main Street

5 DEC 1994

27. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: politics
28. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: Exile on Main Street
29. Rodger Kamenetz — Re: Exile on Main Street
30. Steve Evans — Shake Those Dirty Hands
31. Eric Selinger — Re: Exile on Main Street
32. William Lavender — Re: Exile on Main Street
33. Michael Boughn — Re: Exile
34. Mark Wallace — prayer
35. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: prayer
36. Ron Henry — Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands
37. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: politics
38. Christopher Reiner — Bernadette Mayer
39. Paul Hoover x350 — vulgar marxism
40. kat — Re: Exile on Main Street
41. Patrick Phillips — Out/onomous
42. eric pape — Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands

43. James Sherry — Re: Exile on Main Street
44. James Sherry — Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands
45. James Sherry — Re: Exile on Main Street
46. James Sherry — Re: Out/onomous
47. James Sherry — Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands
48. Steve Evans — Virus Warning (Forwarded)

6 DEC 1994

49. Mark Roberts — Re: Virus Warning (Forwarded)
50. braman sandra — Re: Virus Warning (Forwarded)
51. braman sandra — Re: Out/onomous
52. Ron Silliman — Pinot Blanc Marxism
53. Eric Selinger — Re: Exile on Main Street
54. Ron Silliman — Re: Exile on Main Street
55. Charles Bernstein — NEW: Ex-peri-mints
56. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Exile on Main Street
57. Rodger Kamenetz — Re: Exile on Main Street
58. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Out/onomous
59. Charles Bernstein — Experiments List
60. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Exile on Main Street
61. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: vulgar marxism
62. Robert A Harrison — Re> Re: Out/onomous
63. eric pape — Re: Exile on Main Street
64. James Sherry — Re: Out/onomous
65. Robert Drake — Re: Exile on Main Street
66. James Sherry — Re: Exile on Main Street
67. George Bowering — Re: The Advert-Garde
68. James Sherry — Re: Exile on Main Street
69. George Bowering — Re: Punk
70. George Bowering — Re: Benjamin/Bryher
71. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: Exile on Main Street
72. George Bowering — Re: politics

7 DEC 1994

73. Ron Silliman — The National Question, etc.
74. Alan Sondheim — The Very Best Writer
75. braman sandra — Re: Exile on Main Street
76. Michael Boughn — Re: Snubbed
77. Mark Wallace — Eagleton and social control
78. Michael Boughn — Re: experiwhat
79. Chris Stroffolino — Re: prayer
80. Michael Boughn — Re: thugs
81. Chris Stroffolino — Re: prayer
82. Alan Sondheim — Re: thugs
83. Kit Robinson — Re: Streaming
84. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: The National Question, etc.
85. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: thugs
86. Alan Golding — Re: Exile on Main Street
87. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: prayer
88. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Eagleton Quote
89. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: The Prominence and Isolation of the Academy
90. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Exile on Main Street
91. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Punk
92. Tony Green — Re: Exile on Main Street
93. James Sherry — Re: The National Question, etc.
94. Tom Mandel — Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
95. Abby Coykendall — con in on late night

96. Donald J. Byrd — Experiments

8 DEC 1994

97. k.lindberg — Re: Exile on Main Street
98. k.lindberg — Re: Exile on Main Street
99. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Eagleton Quote
100. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Exile on Main Street
101. George Bowering — Re: Punk
102. Ron Silliman — Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
103. Eric Selinger — U'Makhniya Zedim
104. Susan Schultz — Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
105. Tom Mandel — Re: U'Makhniya Zedim
106. Eric Selinger — Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
107. eric pape — Academy, etc.
108. Clint Burnham — Re: prayer
109. James Sherry — Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
110. Clint Burnham — Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professi
111. Susan Schultz — haoles

9 DEC 1994

112. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Academy, etc.
113. Steve Evans — Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
114. Chris Stroffolino — Re: prayer
115. Eric Selinger — Re: haoles
116. Ron Silliman — Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
117. Rodger Kamenetz — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
118. Tom Mandel — Re: Academy, etc.
119. Tom Mandel — Re: Academy, etc.
120. Tom Mandel — Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
121. eric pape — Re: Academy, etc.
122. Susan Schultz — Re: haoles
123. Robert A Harrison — Stained Meat
124. Steve Evans — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
125. Steve Evans — Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
126. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Academy, etc.
127. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
128. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
129. Steven Howard Shoemaker — poetry trek: generations
130. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
131. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: con in on late night
132. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Exile on Main Street
133. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Academy, etc.
134. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
135. Mn Center For Book Arts — town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle

10 DEC 1994

136. Chris Stroffolino — Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
137. Tom Mandel — Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
138. Tom Mandel — Re: Academy, etc.
139. Tom Mandel — Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
140. Donald J. Byrd — Re: Academy, etc.
141. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Academy, etc.
142. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
143. Clint Burnham — Re: Eagleton Quote
144. Clint Burnham — Re: Punk
145. Marc Nasdor — Re: The National Question, etc.

11 DEC 1994

146. Donald J. Byrd — Re: The National Question, etc.
147. Chris Stroffolino — Re: The National Question, etc.
148. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: The National Question, etc.
149. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: The National Question, etc.
150. Marc Nasdor — Re: The National Question, etc.
151. w.curnow — academy, etc.
152. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
153. Robert Drake — Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle

12 DEC 1994

154. Eric Selinger — Re: haoles
155. Eric Selinger — Re: Academy, etc.
156. Ron Silliman — Re: haoles
157. Kit Robinson — Walking Grove of Trees
158. Robert A Harrison — Re: haoles
159. Chris Stroffolino — Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
160. Chris Stroffolino — Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
161. James Sherry — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
162. James Sherry — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
163. Sheila Murphy — ASSORTED
164. Donald J. Byrd — Re: Academy, etc.

13 DEC 1994

165. Marc Nasdor — Re: haoles
166. Michael Boughn — Blaser book
167. Tom Mandel — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
168. Rodger Kamenetz — Re: ASSORTED
169. Mark Wallace — AMERICA: A PRAYER
170. Robert Drake — TRR call for reviews
171. Pierre Joris — Re: Academy, etc.
172. Donald J. Byrd — Re: Academy, etc.
173. Steven Howard Shoemaker — JRNL: Poetry on the Margins (fwd)
174. Steve Evans — Re: Academy, etc.
175. Eric Selinger — Ron Johnson
176. Steven Howard Shoemaker — dark familiar
177. James Sherry — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
178. James Sherry — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
179. Tom Mandel — Re: Academy, etc.
180. Mark Roberts — Southerly/AWOL
181. Kathryne Lindberg — (no subject)
182. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
183. Mn Center For Book Arts — NEA ???

14 DEC 1994

184. William Lavender — act/cat/tongue
185. Susan Schultz — Re: haoles
186. Ron Silliman — Re: Academy, etc.
187. James Sherry — Re: haoles
188. Tom Mandel — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
189. James Sherry — Re: Experiments List
190. Pierre Joris — Re: Academy, etc.
191. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Academy, etc.
192. Chris Stroffolino — Re: ASSORTED
193. James Sherry — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
194. Loss Glazier — Re: awol
195. George Bowering — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER

196. w.curnow — Re-Academy

15 DEC 1994

197. Michael Boughn — Re: Re-Academy
198. Rodger Kamenetz — Re: ASSORTED
199. Steve Evans — Re: NEA ???
200. Tom Mandel — Re: Academy, etc.
201. Tom Mandel — Re: Re-Academy
202. Tom Mandel — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
203. Robert Drake — Re: NEA ???

16 DEC 1994

204. John Cayley — Re: Experiments
205. Pierre Joris — Re: Academy, etc.
206. Pierre Joris — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
207. Donald J. Byrd — Re: Experiments
208. Spencer Selby — Re: Exp mag list
209. John Cayley — Re: Experiments
210. Steve Evans — Re: NEA ???
211. Chris Stroffolino — Re: ASSORTED
212. Chris Stroffolino — Re: ASSORTED
213. Sheila Murphy — Re: ASSORTED

17 DEC 1994

214. Robert Drake — Re: NEA ???
215. Loss Glazier — Selby List (re-formatted) via Electronic Poetry Center

18 DEC 1994

216. Jorge Guitart — school prayer
217. Tony Green — Re: ASSORTED
218. Tony Green — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
219. Tony Green — Re: Experiments

19 DEC 1994

220. Loss Glazier — Electronic Poetry Center Call for Essays / Papers
221. Loss Glazier — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
222. Christopher Reiner — Re: NEA ???
223. James Sherry — Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
224. James Sherry — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
225. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER

20 DEC 1994

226. Patrick Phillips — Segue URL
227. Loss Glazier — Re: Segue URL
228. Patrick Phillips — Second post of the Segue URL messagye
229. w.curnow — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
230. Mark Roberts — Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
231. Ron Silliman — Who's Newt?
232. Name witheld at the request of the owner — How to unsub or sub to Poetics
233. Mark Roberts — AWOL: Coppertales: A Journal of Rural Arts

21 DEC 1994

234. Ron Silliman — Great Poet
235. John Cayley — Re: Experiments
236. Robert Drake — Re: Experiments

23 DEC 1994

237. bmch — Armand Schwerner

238. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Armand Schwerner
239. Alan Sondheim — Re: Armand Schwerner

24 DEC 1994

240. Jerry Rothenberg — schwerner

25 DEC 1994

241. kathryne lindberg — Re: schwerner
242. Carla Billitteri — dubois
243. kathryne lindberg — Re: dubois

26 DEC 1994

244. Carla Billitteri — Re: dubois
245. Charles Bernstein — (no subject)

27 DEC 1994

246. Tony Green — Re: Who's Newt?
247. Ron Silliman — Re: Who's Newt?

29 DEC 1994

248. krickjh — Re: Armand Schwerner

30 DEC 1994

249. krickjh — Re[2]: Armand Schwerner

31 DEC 1994

250. Ron Silliman — Domesday Dictionary
251. Rodger Kamenetz — Re: Domesday Dictionary

1. Carla Billitteri

On Walter Benjamin--forwarded from B.F.

Thu 1 Dec 1994

I've seen over Carla's shoulder some of the back and forth about Walter Benjamin and thought to offer a little information which may be of some interest. Some of this overlaps with what others have already posted.

The story of the missing manuscript derives from the memoir of a woman who helped guide refugees--including Benjamin--over the Pyranees and into Spain, Lisa Fitko.

The bibliographical knot here fascinates me but may be boring to others. Skip to the next paragraph if lists of books aren't your thing: The full memoir, _Mein Weg ueber die Pyrenaeen_, appeared in 1985, but the excerpt dealing with Benjamin was published before that, in 1982, in _Merkur_. Bernd Witte's _Walter Benjamin: An Intellectual Biography_, published in German in 1985 and in 1991 in English, refers to the _Merkur_ excerpt ("`Der alte Benjamin': Flucht ueber die Pyrenaeen"), which was published in English translation in _Orim: A Jewish Journal at Yale_, 1:2, Spring 1986, pp. 48-59 (under the title "The Last Days of Walter Benjamin"). Susan Buck-Morss in her fine study of the Arcades Project, _The Dialectics of Seeing_, makes use of the Fitko memoir but draws all her information from the copious notes to the German edition of the _Passagen-Werk_, which was first published in 1982. Making the whole business particularly strange is the fact that the _Passagen-Werk_ published an English version of the _Merkur_ bit (now titled "The Old Benjamin"). Apparently, Fitko's account came to light just as Rolf Tiedemann was bringing the _Passagen-Werk_ to press, and there wasn't time to commission a German version. Fitko settled in Chicago after the war and apparently wrote the memoir in English. (Thus Witte, writing in German, cites the _Merkur_ version, while Buck-Morss, writing in English, cites the _Passagen-Werk_.) One question remains, though: why does _Orim_ retranslate the piece into English from German?

After giving an account of the journey itself, including its tragic conclusion, Fitko writes (I'm citing the _Orim_ version here):

> Forty years later, in 1980, I had a conversation with a Professor Abramsky of London. We talked about Walter Benjamin and his work, and I mentioned his last walk and the manuscript. Soon afterward I had a call from Professor Gershom Scholem, a trustee of Benjamin's literary estate and his closest friend. He had heard from Abramsky about our conversation and wanted to know more. I described the events of that day in late > September 1940.

>
> "But at least the manuscript that meant so much to him was saved," I remarked.
>
> "There is no manuscript," said Scholem. "Until now no one has ever heard of it. You must tell me every detail . . ." The voice on the telephone went on, but all I heard was: "There is no manuscript." And all those years I had assumed that it had been salvaged.
>
> The manuscript was never found, neither in Port-Bou nor in Figueras or Barcelona. Only the black leather briefcase was noted by the Spanish border authorities, with the remark: _Unos papeles mas de contenido desconcido_--"with papers of unknown content."

Buck-Morss repeats the various speculations about what this manuscript might have been which Tiedemann offers in his notes, but it seems to me that this manuscript was almost certainly NOT the Arcades Project, which Benjamin had squirreled away with Bataille's help in the Bibliotheque Nationale. In his last letter to Adorno, dated 2 August 1940 (the last letter in the newly published English edition of the _Correspondence_), Benjamin especially remarks > the complete uncertainty in which I find myself concerning my writings. (I have relatively less reason to fear for the papers devoted to the _Arcades_ than for the others.) As you know, however, things are such that my personal situation is no better than that of my writings.

This same letter, by the way, mentions his having attempted "to obtain permission . . . to go to Switzerland on a temporary basis, if at all possible." A footnote tells us that permission was not forthcoming.

Further, a cryptic passage near the end of the letter refers Adorno to a "Mr. Merril [sic] Moore" of Boston, to whom "Mrs. W. Bryher, the publisher of _Life and Letters Today_, has often called . . . attention." I don't have a copy of the German edition of the correspondence where more information is perhaps provided, but that "often" certainly implies that Benjamin had been in touch with Bryher on more than one occasion, presumably in consultation about leaving the German-controlled parts of Europe. Merrill Moore, by the way, I remember from high school anthologies as a psychiatrist poet who wrote sonnets by the thousands. (No kidding--one of his books, titled _M_, consisted of a thousand sonnets. New Directions, among other publishers, brought out his work. I later read that he was one of the psychiatrists who attended to the Frost family.) Was Moore a contact person for refugees in the States? All in all a murky area of history.

Ben Friedlander

↑ Index

2. Steve Evans
The Advert-Garde
Thu 1 Dec 1994

I am not a terrific fan of Terry Eagleton's, but his answer to Eric's question ("how do I not become a commercial") is a compelling one. In The Ideology of the Aesthetics, Eagleton writes:

> If they can place your revolutionary artefacts in their banks then that means only one thing: not that you were not iconoclastic or experimental enough, but that either your art was not deeply enough rooted in a revolutionary political movement, or it was, but that this mass movement failed. How idealist to imagine that _art_, all by itself, could resist incorporation! The question of appropriation has to do with politics, not with culture; it is a question of who is winning at any particular time. If _they_ win, continue to govern, then it is no doubt true that there is nothing which they cannot in principle defuse and contain. If _you_ win, they will not be able to appropriate a thing because you will have appropriated them. The one thing which the bourgeoisie cannot incorporate is its own political defeat. (372)

This of course recalls Benjamin's "and the enemy has not ceased to be victorious" (in "Theses")....

As it evidently was for Eric, the "recuperation" of punk was a formative event in my own intellectual trajectory-- a lesson learned. What I didn't know at 16 was the history of similar recuperations--including that of the avant-garde. But I can't think of anyone in G2 who doesn't at this point have the lesson learned by heart: the question is what to do with the knowledge.

My thinking is that the indispensable element of the avant-garde project is not "experiment" so much as what that term presupposes: autonomy. The historical a-gs saw the bourgeoisie as the greatest threat to their autonomy; today's avant-garde recognizes the systemic nature of that threat--i.e. the fact that capitalism is more than the sum of "shockable" (concrete) members of the bourgeoisie. From the 50s to the 70s "the establishment" provided a homologous "other."

The avant-garde project (which, as I think Paul Hoover suggested in his recent post, is not to be abandoned but further radicalized) cannot honor its internal drive towards autonomy without running into capitalism as its fundamental obstacle. Anti-capitalism is partially inscribed in its history, and generally inscribed in its current conditions of possibility.

Anyway, some thoughts--obviously too bluntly, too hurriedly stated.

Steve

↑ Index

3. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: Benjamin/Bryher

Thu 1 Dec 1994

The second sentence of this oft-quoted passage from Benjamin's Theses on the Philosophy of History becomes rather luminous in light of the list's recent speculations on B's "last days":

There is no document of civilization that is not at the same time a document of barbarism. And just as such a document is not free of barbarism, barbarism taints also the manner in which it was transmitted from one owner to another. [emphasis added]

B. is talking, of course, about the way an unreflective historicism tends to hold aloft the "spoils" of the "victors." But the flip side of his thesis, one imagines, wld have to engage the *dis*appearance of the documents of the defeated...

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

4. Tenney Nathanson

Re: On Walter Benjamin--forwarded from B.F.

Thu 1 Dec 1994

Merrill Moore was also one of Robert Lowell's psychiatrists: kind of an in-house job (not totally unlike Freud and the "K" family I guess, but STILL....) at that: Lowell's mother worked as Moore's secretary and she and Moore may I think the story is also have been lovers. Odd to link Benjamin to Lowell however tenuously (and not especially edifiying....)

thar she blows....

Tenney

↑ Index

5. Jeffrey Timmons

Re: THE THOUSAND-HEADED BEAST THAT IS CAPITALIST APPROPRIATION; OR, MILES DAVIS' ENDORSEMENT OF GAP . . . .

Thu 1 Dec 1994

What interests me in the discussion of Adorno and Benjamin, a marginal interest mind you, is how it has now become conflated with the issue of how to posit opposition--this in relation to Pape's and Evans' recent posts. Adorno, obviously believed avant-garde/modernism to be a form of resistance/critique of bourgeious (sp) culture; Benjamin (having only a familiarity with "The Work of Art . . .") seems if not to hold the same attitude (though obviously different) at least attuned to way in which technologies of capital had the capacity to empty Modernist culture/critique and re-produce them as so many commodities of exchange. It is interesting how this dilemma is still with us, dead, but still with us. Eagleton is perceptive on this point precisely because he points how those forms of culture/critique are forms produced by capital itself: and punk is an excellent example: if the sex pistols are any indication, their whole "project" was a commodity-form produced to feign resistance, but actually part of it and its processes. It destroyed, but in the name of capital--it simply reinscribed it. This, in order to move towards poetry, is a dilemma many modernists dealt with in their "experiments" with language--that is, attempting to use language in new and unusal ways in order to create/discover new meanings/senses; of course, if it wasn't dadaesque "non-sense," it had to use the language it had at hand. In other words, the modernists were particularly concerned with using an existing language in order to say something different (am I getting this out right?). And this, it seems to me, to be precisely the sort of dilemma that we are faced with in seeking not to become commercials; and perhaps an answer might lie (or lay) in that direction. Maybe not. What I am thinking, though, is that, for instance, writers of the Harlem Renaissance often made use of traditional forms but infused them with issues of otherness, with race matters (to echo Cornell West). This seems a dangerous strategy, but perhaps it is one and one only in an arsenal. Questions, highly underrated, seem also a way of avoiding subsumation to the mouth of this beast that consumes all to itself in order to create its song (ah, what a perversion that is. . . .).

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

6. w.curnow
APB
Thu 1 Dec 1994

Can anyone provide some info on SAMUEL MENASHE? Penquin Books are reviving a contemporary poetry series they used to run publishing 3-packs of poets. My father (Allen) is in one forthcoming, along with Donald Davie (whom he knows about) and Samuel Menasche. He's never heard of SM, and when he asked me I had to say I had not either but I'd put out an APB if he liked.

Wystan Curnow

↑ Index

7. Tenney Nathanson
Re: The Advert-Garde
Thu 1 Dec 1994

Re Steve Evans' citation of Eagleton on cooptation being a function of who does or doesn't win the (a) revolution: seems right in its way, but the Jameson (pomo book) which it ignores seems righter: that something has changed in relation of base to superstructure ("implosion" Jameson calls it after Baudrillard) which alters the status of cultural objects; and (implicitly) that this alteration is not simply solved toot court by the right side winning something. Such that: the alteration ought itself to be part of what the art work takes up (or takes down).

↑ Index

8. Ron Silliman
Cybersubstantiation
Fri 2 Dec 1994

OFFICE MEMO Cybersubstantiation Date: 12/1/94
>From: Newswire Mailing
To: IS Daily News Services for Executives
Cc: Newswire Mailing
Subject: MICROSOFT: Bids to Acquire Catholic Church
Date: Tuesday, November 29, 1994 7:16AM

MICROSOFT Bids to Acquire Catholic Church

By Hank Vorjes

VATICAN CITY (AP) -- In a joint press conference in St. Peter's Square this morning, MICROSOFT Corp. and the Vatican announced that the Redmond software giant will acquire the Roman Catholic Church in exchange for an unspecified number of shares of MICROSOFT common stock. If the deal goes through, it will be the first time a computer software company has acquired a major world religion.

With the acquisition, Pope John Paul II will become the senior vice-president of the combined company's new Religious Software Division, while MICROSOFT senior vice-presidents Michael Maples and Steven Ballmer will be invested in the College of Cardinals, said MICROSOFT Chairman Bill Gates.

"We expect a lot of growth in the religious market in the next five to ten years," said Gates. "The combined resources of MICROSOFT and the Catholic Church will allow us to make religion easier and more fun for a broader range of people."

Through the MICROSOFT Network, the company's new on-line service, "we will make the sacraments available on-line for the first time" and revive the popular pre-Counter-Reformation practice of selling indulgences, said Gates. "You can get Communion, confess your sins, receive absolution -- even reduce your time in Purgatory -- all without leaving your home."

A new software application, MICROSOFT Church, will include a macro language which you can program to download heavenly graces automatically while you are away from your computer.

An estimated 17,000 people attended the announcement in St Peter's Square, watching on a 60-foot screen as comedian Don Novello -- in character as Father Guido Sarducci -- hosted the event, which was broadcast by satellite to 700 sites worldwide.

Pope John Paul II said little during the announcement. When Novello chided Gates, "Now I guess you get to wear one of these pointy hats," the crowd roared, but the pontiff's smile seemed strained.

The deal grants MICROSOFT exclusive electronic rights to the Bible and the Vatican's prized art collection, which includes works by such masters as Michelangelo and Da Vinci. But critics say MICROSOFT will face stiff challenges if it attempts to limit competitors' access to these key intellectual properties.

"The Jewish people invented the look and feel of the holy scriptures," said Rabbi David Gottschalk of Philadelphia. "You take the parting of the Red Sea -- we had that thousands of years before the Catholics came on the scene."

But others argue that the Catholic and Jewish faiths both draw on a common Abrahamic heritage. "The Catholic Church has just been more successful in marketing it to a larger audience," notes Notre Dame theologian Father Kenneth Madigan. Over the last 2,000 years, the Catholic Church's market share has increased dramatically, while Judaism, which was the first to offer many of the concepts now touted by Christianity, lags behind.

Historically, the Church has a reputation as an aggressive competitor, leading crusades to pressure people to upgrade to Catholicism, and entering into exclusive licensing arrangements in various kingdoms whereby all subjects were instilled with Catholicism, whether or not they planned to use it. Today Christianity is available from several denominations, but the Catholic version is still the most widely used. The Church's mission is to reach "the four corners of the earth," echoing MICROSOFT's vision of "a computer on every desktop and in every home".

Gates described MICROSOFT's long-term strategy to develop a scalable religious architecture that will support all religions through emulation. A single core religion will be offered with a choice of interfaces according to the religion desired -- "One religion, a couple of different implementations," said Gates.

The MICROSOFT move could spark a wave of mergers and acquisitions, according to Herb Peters, a spokesman for the U.S. Southern Baptist Conference, as other churches scramble to strengthen their position in the increasingly competitive religious market.

↑ Index

9. Ron Silliman
Re: On Walter Benjamin--forwarded from B.F.
Fri 2 Dec 1994

> Merrill Moore was also one of Robert Lowell's psychiatrists...

And Lowell was Grenier's first important teacher, thus from Benjamin (Walter) to Benjamin (Friedlander) is not such a long route (the Arendt to Mandel road being yet another path)....

↑ Index

10. Ron Silliman
Exile on Main Street
Fri 2 Dec 1994

Steve is quite right about the reiteration of recuperation from one generation to the next. Rae Armantrout once noted that every few years she gets to show another set of students that they did not invent the attitude captured in the Rolling Stones' album "Let It Bleed" (the Stones didn't invent it either).

About 10 years ago, McDonald's had a campaign to promote its emerging breakfast menu (the idea of fast food breakfasts being one of the great market expansions of the past 15 years) that used the tag line of which, when I first saw it, felt entirely inspired by the writing of Bob Grenier's Sentences (just turn the W upside down), much in the same way that display ads in the 20th Century learned much from the use of the line break of WCW. Look at any newspaper circa 1910 and you will see the difference.

DAWN GOOD FOOD

Grenier's distance from critical writing since founding This magazine a quarter century ago has always seemed to me an attempt to avoid the exact kind of cooptation that that McDonalds ad already has accomplished for him.

Obviously it would be nice to think that you and I are not implicated in the atrocities that occur in Bosnia or Rwanda or East Timor. But we are. We are directly and personally responsible. Each one of us.

That has always seemed to me to be the most immediate lesson of the war in Indochina.

The problem of dropping out (or any other metaphor of purist distain for the establishment's use of one's soul) is that there is no Out. Out is simply a safe place that In has set aside to keep Out from making too much unpleasant noise.

Ultimately, the problem of opposition is not one of how to avoid becoming a commercial. You can't. Trying to do so just wastes time. The question rather seems to be one of positioning what happens when/as you do. Here the most tragic situations have been those who apparently thought it would somehow "solve" something. Brautigan for example.

I find it intriguing, to say the least, to see where Kit Robinson, Tom Mandel & James Sherry, three of the poets of my own G1-hood who I take to be among its most serious political thinkers (Sherry's Nuclear Heritage is the most completely & directly political work any of us have accomplished, it seems, a project at once both of ambition and courage) have chosen to work. Certainly not the academy. None disdains the human drama of the marketplace. Sherry currently is employed by Phillip Morris, which ranks somewhat ahead of the Khmer Rouge in total number of fatalities caused over the past 40 years.

I've worked on ads that have appeared in the Wall Street Journal, NY Times, Forbes, Fortune and other bastions of liberal thought. And I work for a company whose clients include both houses of congress, and the departments of defense and justice. Not to mention most of the corporations one might hold an attitude about. Including Phillip Morris.

I think that what I (or James or Tom or Kit or anyone) gains far more from exposure to that world than from abstinance. This is where I think the alternative approach has many of the same problems I associate with anarchism, which is another mode of the Out position. (Anarchy is not a political system but rather a transitional state...and always one on the way to feudalism it would seem.)

I think that we are entering a very dark time politically. And a very dangerous one. Experimentation would at best be a distraction. But who wants to be distracted in a burning building?

↑ Index

11. Alan Golding

Call for panel chairs at Twentieth-Century Literature Conference

Fri 2 Dec 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

The U. of Louisville hosts its annual Twentieth-Century Literature Conference Th. Feb. 23-Sat. Feb. 25, 1995. We have just put together the program, and I'm seeking interested folks to chair panels (which typically follow an MLA-type format: 3 papers and discussion, hour-and-a-half). We need chairs in all areas of twentieth-century Anglophone and non-Anglophone lit., theory, and some film; there's a wide range of poetry panels to be chaired. Conference chairs get a reduced rate on registration ($40), and get to come to a good conference.

Guest readers/speakers at this year's conference include Charles Bernstein, Susan Rubin Suleiman, Maria Damon, and Robert von Hallberg. The program will include various G-1 and G-2 participants, as well as many others of differing alphabetical and numerical persuasions. If you're interested in coming, please contact me privately at [redacted], letting me know your areas of interest/expertise. Thanks.

Alan Golding

↑ Index

12. braman sandra

Re: Cybersubstantiation

Fri 2 Dec 1994

I clipped a newspaper piece during the mid-1980s about the Catholic Church actually , yes , offering indulgences via telephone . . . . Sandra Braman

↑ Index

13. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Exile on Main Street
Fri 2 Dec 1994

Ron Silliman wrote:

> The problem of dropping out (or any other metaphor of purist distain for the establishment's use of one's soul) is that there is no Out. Out is simply a safe place that In has set aside to keep Out from making too much unpleasant noise.
>
> Ultimately, the problem of opposition is not one of how to avoid becoming a commercial. You can't. Trying to do so just wastes time. The question rather seems to be one of positioning what happens when/as you do. Here the most tragic situations have been those who apparently thought it would somehow "solve" something. Brautigan for example.
>
> I think that we are entering a very dark time politically. And a very dangerous one. Experimentation would at best be a distraction. But who wants to be distracted in a burning building?

Yes, I agree, that the problem of opposition is not to avoid becoming a commercial but of positioning oneself "when/as" you do. . . but "waste" of time is also what others might consider a useful strategy. I shy from absolutes where opposition is concerned: I don't want to believe, whether it's naive or not, that "ultimately" we all become objects of appropriation. I want to reserve some possibility of . . . . Perhaps the building is burning, but can't we renovate afterwards?

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

14. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Exile on Main Street
Fri 2 Dec 1994

I'm so glad Ron Silliman brought up Bosnia because I have been horrified by the lack of response on the part of friends, colleagues, etc. I mean: even as we sit around discussing the Spanish Civil War and which radicals did what, we don't protest the Serbs (who really are just like the Nazis) making a Bosnian wear a fez and taunting him just as the Nazis forced Jews to wear the swastika. (read Anthony Lewis's editorial in NY Times today). All that stuff about an "ancient feud we can't do anything about" is what people said about the Nazis too.

I refer members of the net to our mutual poetry friend Dubravka Duric, now back in Belgrade, as well as to my former student and now assistant prof of Slavic and Comp lit at U-Washington Seattle, Gordana Crnkovic, who is half Serb, half Croatian and has strong feelings as to what we as Americans might do Gordana (Goga) will be speaking at MLA on the East-european panel I've organized for Comp Lit--along with Ewa and Krzystof Ziarek and Marcel Cornis-Pops. Would any of you like to get together with Goga at MLA?. What ideas for action do others have, now that our government, the UN, and NAtO have totally sold out?

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

15. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: Exile on Main Street

Fri 2 Dec 1994

I hate to be always being such the dissertator, returning to the "Objectivists" so obsessively, but Silliman's "burning building" reminds me of Oppen's statement from "The Mind's Own Place": "There are situations which cannot honorably be met by art, and surely no one need fiddle precisely at the moment that the house next door is burning. If one goes on to imagine a direct call for help, then surely to refuse it would be a kind of treason to one's neighbors. Or so I think. But bad fiddling could hardly help, and similarly the question can only be whether one intends, at a given time,to write poetry or not." Clearly, in Oppen's case, the "or not" has real weight. And since our general late captitalist malaise does seem to be taking an even more sinister turn these days, when do we reach the point where we find ourselves imagining(?) that "direct call for help"?

Everybody has to answer that one on their own i suppose. Oppen, for his part, doesn't presume to dictate a response. As for what art can do, he suggests that "the definition of the good life is necessarily an aesthetic definition" & quotes William Stafford about the poet trying "to find what the world is trying to be." Also suggests that "it is possible that a world without art is simply and flatly uninhabitable."

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

16. Tom Mandel
Re: Olson on net
Sat 3 Dec 1994

"Outward" i.e. a gesture. there is no outward; every vector has a direction. Please remember how often the explorers of the world were in fact rapacious, murderers. Looking for blood to shed. Every direction finds a terminus, arrow buried in target, and once arrived the party starts. I've quoted to the list, and now again, Hugh of St. Victor:

> It is a great source of > virtue for the mind to > learn, bit by bit, first to change > about in visible and transitory > things, in order then afterwards to > relinquish them altogether. One > who finds his homeland sweet is > still a tender beginner; the one > to whom every soil is as his > native land is already strong; but > perfect is one to whom the entire > world is a place of exile.

↑ Index

17. Steven Howard Shoemaker
experiwhat?
Sat 3 Dec 1994

Lab Note

yesterday at 4:15 something unseen and linguistic was like that still live frog I saw once flopping openly out w/ a slit belly onto the cold tile floor

↑ Index

18. Charles Bernstein
Guy Debord Commits Suicide
Sat 3 Dec 1994

--Boundary (ID O3lfGI1F5OAu3opGgZ+Ogg)

PARIS (AP) -- Guy Debord, an avant-garde essayist who influenced the upheavals of French society in the late 1960s, has committed suicide. He was 62. Town officials in the village of Champot where Debord lived announced an investigation Thursday into the suicide. No details about how Debord took his life Wednesday were disclosed. Little-known outside France, Debord denounced what he called ``the show-biz society'' and declared that performing arts should be based on powerful emotions, passions and sexual desire. His ideas were influential among theoreticians and essayists who achieved prominence in the May 1968 student-led cultural revolt that shook French society.

****

Ben Friedlander passed this bulletin on to me from a clarinet list. I had not yet heard about Debord's death. Having just read the new and worthwhile translation of The Society of the Spectacle for my current graduate seminar, Debord has been very much on my mind. (The description of his work in the notice is quite odd.)

--Boundary (ID O3lfGI1F5OAu3opGgZ+Ogg)--

↑ Index

19. Pierre Joris
Ex(it) SITU
Sat 3 Dec 1994

On Wednesday Guy Debord decided to take a most final early retirement from this scene. "Doctor of Nothing," he called himself & was a poet, painter, film-maker, essayist, agitator, theoretician, founder of the IS (the Situationist International). Without his work, without the leaven of his thought, what is now called "les evenements de soixante-huit" i.e. the French part of the '68 uprising, would have been a dour affair. There will be ample time for considered panegyrics, appraisals of The Society of the Spectacle, & the business as usual of enshrinement & auto-da-fe.

Tonight's the time for a joyous not-so-finnicky wake, with a bottle of red wine & his last book,a very unconsidered & hilarious PANEGYRIQUE, in which he writes of his life-long rabelaisian penchants: "What I've done best is drink... I, who have had to read so often the most extravagent lies & insinuations concerning myself, or the most unjust critiques, am very surprised that thirty years & more have gone by all in all without a single one of those malcontents having tried, even implicitly, to use my drunkeness as an argument against my scandalous ideas." Tomorrow we'll reread the books, look again at the films, re-argue his definitions of "situation," "derive," "detournement," "decomposition." Because, to "deturn" a famous line, "le siecle sera Debordian ou ne sera pas."

========== Pierre Joris | Dept. of English | "La poesie ne s'impose plus, elle s'expose." SUNY Albany | Paul Celan Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | email: | "He who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." [redacted]| Henri Michaux ==========

↑ Index

20. Jeffrey Timmons

Re: USA/UN/NATO Wash Their Hands Of Bosnia. . . . But They Don't Come Clean. . . .

Sat 3 Dec 1994

On Fri, 2 Dec 1994, Marjorie Perloff wrote:

> What ideas for action do others have, now that our government, the UN, and NAtO have totally sold out?

Silly as it might be, stating our solidarity with Bosnia and lodging our disagreement with the course of action (lack thereof) the US has taken would be a good start. There has been terribly little of either from artists, academics . . . at least that I've seen. Also, I'm not above inserting, when ever and where ever the opportunity presents itself, a reminder that there is a war in Europe--and that it does affect us, as has been dramatically stated here. What is our role--if any--as artists/academics (or whatever) in speaking out against such crimes? I don't want to speak for anyone but myself, but I feel I have a responsibility, if only to myself, to say SOMETHING when I am able. And, as an artist/academic, I have that privilege. I don't mind using it.

For What It's Worth,

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

21. Paul Hoover x350

politics

Sun 4 Dec 1994

Glad to see Ron's post re: Exile on Main Street. There certainly is no "out" and you don't have to be Marxist to see it. I had the pleasure to hear a lecture by Amiri Baraka yesterday: "So that since the U.S. is an imperialist country, with a monopoly capitalist economic base, the institutions raised on that base, as well as the philosophies expressed within them, are in the main expressions of imperialism." The only thing that matters is the economic base, and without the moderating influence of a competing morality such as the church or local community, our economic life is focused on selfishness. It is in the interest of consumerism, therefore, to destroy traditional values including religious and/or ethnic values ("peasant traditions" in WCW's "For Elsie"). Relativism and indeterminacy (and alas the well-meaning avant-garde) apparently collaborate in this.

Like Lew Daly (apparently), I was raised in a German pietist tradition that argued against material possession and chose separation from the world. This separation worked primarily on the symbolic level, since inevitably one must trade with "Das English" as the early Brethren & Amish called them. My interest in poetry derives from that background. Good works, if not transcendence, through writing. But the desire for fame and office brings dominance back in, and we become little imperialists. Baraka was wonderful to hear and full of satiric fire. But the talk was given in an institutional setting (my working-class arts college in Chicago) on a grant from the Lilly Foundation and his fee for the day was $5,000. We all work out of an economic base that extends to poetic value. Inevitably, one poet is perceived to be "worth more" than another. Susan Howe and Nathaniel Mackey rise; someone else falls. We are currency, and what else is new?

It is possible to interpret multiculturalism as further ghettoization funded by the MacArthur and other foundations; it is masked, however, as "community building." Their goal is to bring enough marginal people into the high-tech middle class that revolution will not seem necessary. Meanwhile, as Andrei Codrescu wrote in a recent essay, the real revolution, the triumph of global capitalism, continues apace.

The American peasant, Williams saw in horror, has no traditions. Except perhaps his/her "television heritage."

The great ideological disaster of the last 25 years has been separatism. But how are potentially conflicting peasant traditions to live together? By cruising the same mall or watching an Arnold Schwarzenegger movie? Yes.

There will be two future cultures: those who primarily watch TV and those who primarily work in front of a computer screen. Everything will be mediated by light. For high art, one goes out to a "film."

Last night on TV (I dropped my cable and really miss it) that an orthodox rabbi from california likes to surf: good eye candy but under it a very cheap laugh. TV despises dignity, and consumerism hates seriousness. Peasant traditions still have some dignity left. We observe this dignity on PBS sponsored by some foundation. We are relieved and a little surprised that blood sacrifice of llamas still occurs in Bolivia. Disturbed by the violence, we turn to a sitcom.

We feel responsible for Bosnia because we imagine that we might turn our military dominance toward good works. But we are not at all in the post-colonial age. The control is still there, just not the troops. Nothing happens in Bosnia because powerful interests are a lot more committed to GATT, NAFTA, and consolidating global capitalism. They will deal with Bosnia only when it threatens trade, as we saw in the Gulf War.

Paul Hoover
[redacted]

↑ Index

22. Joseph Conte
Re: politics
Sun 4 Dec 1994

The list might be interested to know of a compelling account of the Bosnian crisis--other than _Zlata's Diary_--by Slovenian poet Ales Debeljak, _Twilight of the Idols: Recollections of a Lost Yugoslavia_ (published by White Pine Press, Fredonia, NY).

Ales, who read this past fall in Buffalo, raises a number of questions about our intellectual commitment to multiculturalism from the perspective of a society where tolerence for other religious and ethnic identities has utterly collapsed. I recommend the book; too bad it hasn't sold (i.e. been promoted) as well as the cherubic Zlata.

Joseph Conte

↑ Index

23. Alan Sondheim

Re: politics

Sun 4 Dec 1994

I would also like to recommend an issue/imprint of _Lusitania_ from 1993, For Za Sarajevo, with a great number of texts and articles, as well as Lebbeus Woods' War and Architecture; both are dual-language, by the way.

Alan

↑ Index

24. James Sherry

Re: Exile on Main Street

Sun 4 Dec 1994

Long a proponent of the issues of engagement which Ron raises as opposed to the Senecan views espoused elsewhere, here, and in art circles in general about purity of purpose, I must say that I have gone from bad employer to worse. My current job is at Deutsche Bank has put me in the position of having to hold contradictory ideas more than ever (not that I would ever buy a Mercedes).

Acting in the drama has always been for me more amusing. But social change, being inevitable, requires less effort on the part of the individual that most suppose. For example, many of you know about a credit card company called Working Assets, an employee owned corporation that returns a portion of its income to not for profit organizations chosen by the people who use the credit card.

Now WA is getting into the phone business. Along with my new phone company goes several free calls a month to a politician: the dialectic in action. Here they have given us credit cards to control us and happily control goes both ways. This bisynchronous control is engagement. It is also the risk that many artists and thinkers will not take.

If we do not vote with guns, we may vote with our bank accounts. I suggest that Marjorie, Ron, and others who wish a point of view to be organized as well as Pat Robertson and IMF/World Bank need to start thinking about contemporary notions of what organization means. NOT just passing information back and forth...

The separation of information and meaning has given us new credentials. If we choose to use them we may make a mistake. If we choose not to use them we may not make much of anything.

Thanks Ron for the opportunity to open this issue.

↑ Index

25. jena

Re: Exile on Main Street

Sun 4 Dec 1994

> Acting in the drama has always been for me more amusing. But social change, being inevitable, requires less effort on the part of the individual that most suppose. For example, many of you know about a credit card company called Working Assets, an employee owned corporation that returns a portion of its income to not for profit organizations chosen by the people who use the credit card.
>
> Now WA is getting into the phone business. Along with my new phone company goes several free calls a month to a politician: the dialectic in action. Here they have given us credit cards to control us and happily control goes both ways. This bisynchronous control is engagement. It is also the risk that many artists and thinkers will not take.

I would argue that "social change"/exchange is a bit more complicated than what a company like Working Assets would like its customers to think. I certainly like the idea of giving money to not for profits and getting free calls to politicians. However, Working Assets uses Sprint long distance lines. Right now Sprint is up before the NLRB on unfair labor charges. Sprint fired 235 Latina workers a week before they were going to vote in a union representation election (this is happening in San Francisco). If one really wants to take part in the "bisychronous control" that the idea of organized labor is built around, one will use AT&T, the only phone company that's allowed its workers to unionize.

> If we do not vote with guns, we may vote with our bank accounts. I suggest that Marjorie, Ron, and others who wish a point of view to be organized as well as Pat Robertson and IMF/World Bank need to start thinking about contemporary notions of what organization means. NOT just passing information back and forth...

Somehow this idea of "voting" through a particular consumer activity does not strike me as a gratifying political efficacy. Perhaps this is because I don't really have a bank account worth mentioning. I guess I'll have to figure something out with words.

Jena Osman

↑ Index

26. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Exile on Main Street
Sun 4 Dec 1994

This is probably mendacious, but free phone time to the politician of your choice (him/her/ur self? or?) reminds me uncomfortably of Baudrillard on the poll. otoh purity surely isn't worth much.

↑ Index

27. Mn Center For Book Arts
Re: politics
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Just a note, as I'm not certain if Paul Hoover's citation of the setting and fee for Amiri Baraka's lecture was a criticism of Baraka or the institution or just the state of the world. This is just to say that it is important, as Silliman notes, where one works, and where one strikes out for position or opposition. As a former participant in the Tucson Poetry Festival in Arizona, I helped arrange for Baraka to read and lecture, and the fee was far less (less than one fifth) of $5,000. The setting was not institutional (or at least not a big institution like a university or museum, rather a site rented a cut-rate by a small non-profit group in which no one is paid), the audience was about 300 for the reading; an overflow crowd heard the lecture. I believe that art/culture has a role to play in the community, and that unfortunately academic/institutional settings act as a filter which do not allow that role to be played.

That is but one reason why public reading series large & small, & independent presses, are so important. Not that they can't be made into a commercial, but new ones come along all the time and the positioning/oppositioning goes on.

charles

↑ Index

28. Mn Center For Book Arts
Re: Exile on Main Street
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Jena Osman writes "I would argue that "social change"/exchange is a bit more complicated than what a company like Working Assets would like its customers to think. I certainly like the idea of giving money to not for profits and getting free calls to politicians. However, Working Assets uses Sprint long distance lines. Right now Sprint is up before the NLRB on unfair labor charges. Sprint fired 235 Latina workers a week before they were going to vote in a union representation election (this is happening in San Francisco)."

It is my understanding that Working Assets "leases" lines from Sprint. While I agree that social change & exchange is quite complicated and that there is likely no uncompromised position, I think it likely that everyone in this forum, as well as all commercial companies in America, either purchase or lease products or services from businesses and other corporate entities whose ethics could (and should) be questioned.

charles alexander

↑ Index

29. Rodger Kamenetz
Re: Exile on Main Street
Mon 5 Dec 1994

I'm wondering if a connection can be made between the two recent threads--the earlier discussion of identification and identity within the poetry world and the more recent thread on politics. The first discussion seemed at times poignant, as members of various generations sought to identify themselves and place themselves in positions of prominence--with laments about displacement and loss of identity for some. Underlying the discussion was the reality that the "politics" of poetry is certainly pre-democratic, primarily feudal or courtly. I do not think that the truly prized commodity is money, prizes, etc. but rather prestige or honor-- and while one could use a market metaphor for this, the true operating system of poetry is not even as democratic as a market.The discussion of generational names, for instance, seemed to veer between a marketing strategy on the one hand and a rather heartfelt and therefore poignant desire for simple recognition -- "je veux qu'on me distingue". which is very far below Rimbaud's "je est un autre."The most revolutionary platform I could imagine for our poetry would be a return to pseudepigraphia and anonymity. Could the failure of poetry in our time to have a major audience on the scale Whitman dreamed of have anything to do with the disconnection between the office politics of the poetry world (feudal, courtier) and the larger society in which we live and function? All best, Rodger Kamenetz [redacted]

↑ Index

30. Steve Evans
Shake Those Dirty Hands
Mon 5 Dec 1994

I appreciate the candor with which James Sherry and Ron Silliman have recently discussed their "positions" vis-a-vis corporate power, but I am as suspicious of the subjective titillations of "holding contradictory ideas" (which cd easily mean: deceiving myself about the meaning of my actions) as I am of fantasies of a "pure outside."

Ron suggests that he and James and Kit Robinson and Tom Mandel have "gained more" from their engagements with corporate capitalism than they would have from "abstaining" from the "human drama of the marketplace." Since I gather that Ron has "gains" of other than a financial sort in mind when he writes this, I would be interested in knowing more about these gains. Is it a matter of gathering intelligence (so to speak) that informs one's oppositional work--one's poetic practice, one's political practice as a citizen, one's critique? Is it a matter of actually exercising counter-agency within the arena of corporate power, or of obedience in one domain being converted into dissidence in another?

I have to admit that the politics of occupational complicity do not strike me as especially viable--which is another way, I guess, of saying that the contradictions incurred along Ron and Jame's way(s) don't strike me as strongly "positioned" ones. (By the way, I intend no disrespect to the personal resonance such contradictions may have for the few people who experience them.) Nor do the "dialectics of the credit card" go very far toward redressing, eg., North-South relations.

There seems to me a difference between saying: (1) our attempt to curtail or abolish the power of capital has evidently failed, and the available "choices"--given this failure--are for the most part unacceptable ones that I nevertheless have to accept; and (2) my ability to actualize a radically ungeneralizable trajectory is in fact a measure of my political acuity and a sign of my superiority to those who "abstain" from "complicity."

The vacuity of "dropping out" is not proof of the acuity of checking in. Both smack of extreme voluntarism in light of the structural exclusions of global capitalism.

One final point, the implicit contrast in Ron's defense of market coercion (qua human drama) is to academia. Not overlooking the structural connections between the corporations and the universities, it does seem worthwhile to point out the obvious fact that whereas the corporations have no interest in Ron's or anyone else's poetic practice, the universities do (and where that interest is not pursued, it can at least be raised; which is not possible within the context of Philip Morris, etc.).

Having said all of this, I remain interested in reading more about Jame's "rethinking" of organization, and in seeing more from Ron about the "gains" of dirtying one's hands (one must adjust that metaphor, I think, in light of the great keyboard of techno-capitalism: clean hands?).

Steve Evans

↑ Index

31. Eric Selinger
Re: Exile on Main Street
Mon 5 Dec 1994

On Mon, 5 Dec 1994, Rodger Kamenetz wrote:

> Could the failure of poetry in our time to have a major audience > on the scale Whitman dreamed of have anything to do with the disconnection > between the office politics of the poetry world (feudal, courtier) and > the larger society in which we live and function?

Isn't it pretty to think so? By which I mean, wouldn't it be nice if what happened w/in "the poetry world" (which one?) and what happened in "the larger society" (again) were married? Then we wouldn't have to wait so long to find ourselves important, w/ "a major audience," an audience-of-scale. Alas, there are two delightful minors on my comfortable suburban street who call out when I walk by, "Hello, Poetry Man!" because they just love poetry, it's their favorite subject in school (4th grade), and they depress me no end. By the time they make it through high school, I suspect, they'll know the same two things about poetry my freshmen do:

1) I don't understand it.
2) I don't like it.

And when some stray shmuck asks them, at the end of a survey course, to choose the poem that's given them the most pleasure this semester and apply Zukofsky's "Test of Poetry" to it--just what _were_ its pleasures in sight, sound, & intellection--they'll be baffled. Like, no one's asked them about pleasure since fourth grade. Like, don't you want me to tell you what it MEANS?

If there's a stumbling block placed in their path, we didn't put it there.

EMS

↑ Index

32. William Lavender
Re: Exile on Main Street
Mon 5 Dec 1994

>>Like, no one's asked them about pleasure since fourth grade. Like, don't you want me to tell you what it MEANS?<<

Though surely pleasures are learned as rigorously as discursive genres. A poet recently told me he didn't read poetry for pleasure. "I mean lets face it," he said, "when it comes to pleasure, enjoyment, relaxation, I'd rather watch Terminator." There are pleasures that poetry strives to avoid, to unlearn, to counter.

And as for the decline in readership, In Memorium was the last bestseller, which which the queen kept on her bedside table, and maybe that's why. The market isn't as democratic as it appears.

I don't have any problem with reading poetry out of a sense of duty or whatever. Our only subject here has been ethics. Like the song from my youth said, "I feel like I owe it to someone."

↑ Index

33. Michael Boughn
Re: Exile
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Dear Tom:

As if we are in exile, but also at home there. Yes. Giorgio Agamben, discussing the work of Robert Walser, writes:

> The Irreperable is the monogram that Walser's writing engraves into things. Irreperable means that these things are consigned without remedy to their being-thus, that they are precisely and only their thus (nothing is more foreign to Walser than the pretense of being other than what one is) [you could add Emerson here, too]; but irreperable also means that for them there is literally no shelter possible, that in their being-thus they are absolutley exposed, absolutely abandoned.

To recognize there is no shelter other than our own responsibility (Agamben says our own "possibility or potentiality") and that neither lamentation nor praise is the issue is to be at home. Otherwise, home turns into in a tank named "Relations of Production" rolling toward Tiananmen Square.

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

34. Mark Wallace
prayer
Mon 5 Dec 1994

I forced my students to have a minute of silent prayer today.

They hated me for it, something I greatly appreciated.

But as to whether it makes a difference...

mark wallace

↑ Index

35. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: prayer
Mon 5 Dec 1994

On Mon, 5 Dec 1994, Mark Wallace wrote:

> I forced my students to have a minute of silent prayer today.
>
> They hated me for it, something I greatly appreciated.
>
> But as to whether it makes a difference...

Hm.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

36. Ron Henry
Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands
Mon 5 Dec 1994

> One final point, the implicit contrast in Ron's defense > of market coercion (qua human drama) is to academia. Not > overlooking the structural connections between the corporations > and the universities, it does seem worthwhile to point out > *the obvious fact that whereas the corporations have *no > interest in Ron's or anyone else's poetic practice, the > universities do (and where that interest is not pursued, > it can at least be raised; which is not possible within the context of Philip Morris, etc.).

However, for those of us who are employed by academic insitutions to do non-academic work (or at least work not related to our poetic practice), the difference betwen the two brands of corporations is negligible.

And, cynically perhaps, I have to wonder whether large academic/research institutions' interest in "Literature" or "Art" really goes much deeper than the decorative -- do university trustees and administrators see poets (esp. in all the proliferating Creative Writing programs around the U.S.) as much more than status-symbols, like famous works of visual art in lobbies of major corporations or sponsor-blurbs on PBS specials?

With the millions being poured into huge brick biotech and supercomputing facilities rising all around the margins of campus and frequently making national headlines, instances such as Bob Perelman's lecture here last year (attended by 25 people?) or John Ashbery reading this coming Wednesday, seem positively quaint, and hardly something in which the corporate university is "interested."

--Ron Henry ([redacted])
Olin Library, Cornell Univ.

↑ Index

37. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: politics
Mon 5 Dec 1994

On Sun, 4 Dec 1994, Paul Hoover x350 wrote:

> Amiri Baraka: "So that since the U.S. is an imperialist country, with a monopoly capitalist economic base,the institutions raised on that base, as well as the philosophies expressed within them, are in the main expressions of imperialism."

Yes, but isn't this a much too simple reduction, a too regressive determinism, a too restrictive vulgar marxism? If the capitalist econo-political structures determine expressions congruent to itself where do individual and collective rejections of those expressions come from? Those structures, too, are infused with an--often perverted--forms of political liberty and oppositional expression.

Hoover:

> It is possible to interpret multiculturalism as further ghettoization funded by the MacArthur and other foundations; it is masked, however, as "community building." Their goal is to bring enough marginal > people into the high-tech middle class that revolution will not seem necessary.

Yes, perhaps, but this rejection of "community building" and its negative association with separatism--endowed or not--is itself a refusal of the "radical" political impulses motivating multiculturalism--I think of Gloria Anzuldua, here. Infusing extant political structures with excluded "others" is "radical," and if that is not accomplished through "revolution" from without but from within does that make it any less "revolutionary"? This assumes, of course, that rather than infusing extant political structures and parties with "minorities" (a non-essentialized description, if you please) that "difference" actually becomes a part of them. . . .

"La La"
T.S. Eliot

> We feel responsible for Bosnia because we imagine that we might turn our military dominance toward good works. But we are not at all in the post-colonial age. The control is still there, just not the troops. Nothing happens in Bosnia because powerful interests are a lot more committed to GATT, NAFTA, and consolidating global capitalism. They will deal with Bosnia only when it threatens trade, as we saw in the Gulf War.

No, I don't feel responsible for Bosnia--or anything else for that matter--because we can exercise military power there as a form of self-gratifying sentimentalized "good works" (no offense intened here). I have always been uncomfortable calling for the use of such violence to influence the situation--as much as I agreed with Bosnia's call to let it defend itself. I believe in responsibly exercising my own ability to link my fate to others--if I were in a situation where I was being shelled I hope someone would seek to help me in what ever way they could. Richard Rorty's Contingency, Irony and Solidarity is useful on this point: suggesting that the basis of human solidarity is actually suffering, that this common experience should be enough to bind us. If I see someone suffering I know it could just as easily be me . . . .

What ever,

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

38. Christopher Reiner
Bernadette Mayer
Mon 5 Dec 1994

The following letter was recently sent out by The Poetry Center. If this message has already been posted to the list I apologize for the duplication.

November 10, 1994

Dear Friend,

Bernadette Mayer was hospitalized on October 11th for intracerebral bleeding--equivalent to a stroke. She underwent neurosurgery and is presently reovering. At the moment she is unable to speak or write. Due to the seriousness of her illness, it's not clear when she will be completely rehabilitated.

Bernadette needs your support to help pay her rent, phone bills, utilities, any expenses Medicaid won't cover and for the care of her three children. Any financial gift you can contribute will help her through this difficult time and allow Bernadette to concentrate on regaining her health.

An important and repected poet, Bernadette has been involved in the New York City poetry community for many years. She served as director of the Poetry Project at St. Mark's Church from 1980-84 and since then she has lead numerous writing workshops at the Project and at The New School for Social Research.

Bernadette has published fifteen books of poetry and prose, recently, _A Bernadette Mayer Reader_ (New Directions 1992) and _The Desires of Mothers to Please Others in Letters_ (Hard Press 1994).

Gifts to Bernadette'sfund are tax-deductable. Please make contribution checks payable to:

Girono Poetry Systems/The Bernadette Mayer Fund
Giorno Poetry Systems 222 Bowery
New York, NY 10012

Sincerely,

The Poetry Center Staff

↑ Index

39. Paul Hoover x350
vulgar marxism
Mon 5 Dec 1994

To: Jeffrey Timmons

I thought someone might comment on Baraka's "vulgar marxism." Interesting phrase, "vulgar marxism," suggesting that its basic concepts are to be discredited because we are now so much more sophisticated. Do you imagine that the economic base is NOT a dominant concern? That the United States, along with G7 (the only "G" force that really matters, with regard to G1/G2 discussion) does NOT manage world affairs?

As for Baraka's fee, it's of course a comment on the state of the world and ironies of value. If the Lilly Foundation has $5,000 for a visiting lecturer/poet, it might as well go to him. There were perhaps 80 people in the auditorium, so the foundation paid about $60 a head. There was, however, a television camera recording the event, conceivably the most important member of the audience. As soon as the applause died down, a young man stood up and began to denounce the hypocrisy of the conference--I believe because he supports "vulgar marxism" and sees that the university sponsorship of such statements as Baraka's makes them absurd. This young man wrote a book called "Bomb the Suburbs." I learned from him earlier that he attended Oberlin as an undergraduate, and something rings absurd about that, too.

The vulgar marxist has been replaced by the chardonnay marxist. In the 80s even revolution went upscale. I'm not saying I'm not part of it; if Baraka is correct, everyone is. Market forces are so convincing that if you produce a ragged-looking literary magazine, as was the style in the late 60s, that too is designed for audience appeal.

One thing for sure: we live in a video serfdom. If you don't "mach schau" (make show), as the early Beatles fans in Berlin demanded of the fledgling group, you're starting to disappear. To quote the character Egon in Ghostbusters, "Text is dead." It's a new marketplace, with new technologies, and this requires a new literature. Those on this listserve group are of the economy that stares into computer screens-- more text oriented. Did you know that for the last two or three years they have had performance poetry events at the Associated Writing Programs conference? This year there's even a "stand up" night.

On the other hand, a more courtly literature still exists, and it is powerful. The real problem is to find a literature of any kind, courtly or vulgar, of intelligence and spirit.

Back in this recent series, Don Byrd made a very good comment about avant-garde poetry being the "mainstream" historically, especially if you begin with romanticism. In a bookstore today, I spent a lot of time reading selections from various poets including one who was a National Book Award winner. It was awfully dreary reading. Embarrassing even. But I could clearly see the truth of Don Byrd's premise.

Paul Hoover ([redacted])

↑ Index

40. kat
Re: Exile on Main Street
Mon 5 Dec 1994

I could write reams about problems with recuperating radicals+forgetting the formidable force of the racist Right, but. . .

For the moment, for the sake of utility and economy, let me add a bit of biblio. to the pointer to the wonderful Lusitania issue.

1). to disabuse one of the "long history of ethnic hatreds," see BOSNIA: A SHORT HISTORY by Noel Malcolm, Papermac (Macmillan, 1994) or THE MUSLIMS OF BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA, ed., Mark Pinson (Harvard, 1994) 2). artistic and analytic responses, one volume; WHY BOSNIA? WRITINGS ON THE BALKAN WARS, ed. Rabia Ali & Lawrence Lifschultz (Stony Creek, CT, Pamph leteers Press, 1993) 3). for the economic/political history of Yugoslavia breaking up, THE DESTRUCTION OF YUGOSLAVIA, by Branka Magas (Verso, 1993); Magas's essays appeared in New Left Review before the split of that group over Yougslavia; also see AGAINST THE CURRENT #52 for Magas on the Fascist Serbian state. 4). for general treatments of post-Soviet Yugoslavia and the bending of Yugoslavia to Western consumerism and nationalism (not to suggest a causal connection; humphf!), see Stjepan G. Mestrovic's THE BALKANIZATION OF THE WEST: THE CONFLUENCE OF POSTMODERNISM AND POSTCOMMUNISM (Routledge, 199 and Sabrina P. Ramet, SOCIAL CURRENTS IN EASTERN EUROPE (Duke, 1991) Sabrina Ramet, who before a physical change of sex wrote as Pedro Ramet, along with Slavoj Zizek(but different from him in many ways) wrote volumes of analysis and predictions on the results and ramifications of the breakup of Yugo.

There is a great deal to read on this crisis; there is also a great deal more to do. I have the numbers of some folks in UK who are seriously active and engaged as politicians and writers. If anyone is interested, I can add these to the net.

More directly, does anyone know the opera SARAJEVO which had its London--and I believe only--premier this past August. The composer,Nigel Osborne, should be persuaded to launch it here (perhaps funded is a better word/concept here than persuaded). I saw this magnificent opera. It is based on and "samples" Euripides' WOMEN OF TROY and CNN with lots of life in between. Does anyone know about the fate of this opera? Does anyone know how/whether such a project of launching this somewhere here can be/is being undertaken? It isn't, after all, an opera that would benefit from the $$$$ machines needed for Pavarotti, &tc. Anyway, a response to this query would be appreciated, though I am not the one to know the next step in this particular avenue.

Last note, there are several most important and engaging newsboards on the internet re: former Yugoslavia and peace groups that still persist on the ground there. I was in Croatia summer of '93, and I can say that peace is far from assured. In fact, as with Chamberlain in Sudentenland, the cards are set to fall with the appeasements and concessions. Peace does not come from facing down aggression with "neutrality." What to do?

↑ Index

41. Patrick Phillips

Out/onomous

Mon 5 Dec 1994

I'm a bit curious about something I've picked up as a kind of cerebral distinction (as opposed to actual/real or even possible distinction) between out and autonomous.

It appears that many of us agree that there is no out:

Tom Mandel's:

> "Outward" i.e. a gesture. there is no outward; every vector has a direction.

Yet the meta-metaphysics envolved in:

> perfect is one to whom the entire
> world is a place of exile.

appears to me to be an inverted origin and re-invigorates a kind of clearing, a place where metaphysics can and cannot take place....a straddle....

&

Steve Evan's:

> My thinking is that the indispensable element of the avant-garde project is not "experiment" so much as what that term presupposes: autonomy.

and the trenchant:

> *The vacuity of "dropping out" is not proof of the acuity of checking in. Both smack of extreme voluntarism in light of the structural exclusions of global capitalism.*

Steve's repositioning of the "avant-garde" project as a social (autonomous) rather than scientific, or theoretical (exterior) is important. However, what I'm not sure of here is the relationship of both "out" to "auto" -nomy in the face of the "structural exclusions of global capitalism."

I've been reading Joan Cock's The Oppositional Imagination the last few days, finding myself under the transformative power of a searing critique, and while I don't pretend to be as fluid or nearly as capable as she, I do find many common concerns; one of which I believe would be that it is very hard to speak of "autonomous" or "out" in the above senses.

In the midst of a critique of Said's, Gramschi's, William's and Foucault's models of "dominative power" she writes:

"There is...a vitality to power at the molecular level and a fixity to it at the grand one, so that approaching it theoretically from the bottom is the surer way not to miss its variations, reversals, and diversions. And when it comes to the local detail, one must be ready, if not quite for anything, at least for many unpredictable and surprising things. Whatever the great situation, this particular one, being particular, might bend in all sorts of ways - towards some new and intensified form of the power prevailing on the grand scale, or towards some humbled version of it, or towards its deterioration, or towards its inversion." - p 49

In relation to both Steve and Tom, I'm gleaning two things from this quote:

One, that the propositions of "structural exclusion of global capitalism" and "the world is a place of exile" both in-state forms of world (though geo-physically with "global") that appear on the surface to refute an outside while running the risk of imposing an outside. Both "structural exclusion of global capitalism" and the world of exile seem to run the risk, of proposing an absolute and of reifying hegemony. That in fact "the matrices of transformation" that poetry can involve are "constant modifications" (the constantly burning house), both internal and external, "local" and "geo-political" power fluxes which constantly undo the absolute "world", or "globe."

And Two, exile and exclusion are impossible in this undoing and with this impossibility, "out" and "auto," though intended differently, are actually more similar in their exclusivity than not. (In this, there is no "closet" either.)

I'd like to tease this out further but I have to go out and pick up my wife.

Patrick Phillips

↑ Index

42. eric pape
Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Certainly Eagleton's point (and y'all's) is well taken. Which is why the whole sell out question, to corporate america or to academia,is a non-question. Doesn't it imply at some point we were not all already sold? Mostly we've been engaged in the politics of identity...Does it matter, to use use Ron's perfectly apt metaphor, in what room you stand as the building burns down? What I've been asking is in fact a formal question. Which is, can we imagine a form which resists domination? The answer is of course, as we have all noted here, at length, that it is an impossible question. There is no outside, etc...But just because it is an impossible question, I don't believe that makes it any less important...Perhaps more so. What determines oppositional form? Only if we imagine a constellation of effects (B's word) can we imagine oppositional form. Only if we imagine that there is a within to the art work; a within that functions semi-autonomously, can we imagine an art work that resists incorporation. Because of course never can any art work resist entirely incorporation. There must always be aspects that in effect support domination. The question becomes is there any that are oppositional. We have never been able to imagine totally oppositional art. It never happened. Not even to Milton. The question becomes then not a matter of identity, ie, am I Marxist enough to be a poet, but of form. But we haven't avoided Ron's final image, ie, the distraction in the burning building. By positing only formal resistence, do we not risk Formalism? How great of a risk is that, truly? Also, we have Marjorie's question. If our resistence is not simply a matter of technique, a matter of how we put together our art, then what can we do? The question, also, is impossible, but is the most important question anyone has asked here: What can we do? Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

43. James Sherry

Re: Exile on Main Street

Mon 5 Dec 1994

To Kamenetz' Rimbaud citation I add "Que je suis rentier." Alas for those who'd equate poetry with a humane politics. Considering Whitman's attitude toward Native Americans. Dickinson's difficulty leaving the house. Basho's spying for the emperor. Hafiz sucking up at the court. Of course Pound, Yeats, and Eliot. As Ron points out politics is not where it is represented to be. And further what is error free politics but attitude.

↑ Index

44. James Sherry
Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Steve Evans "well reasoned" response is blistered with the attempt to make himself whole by thinking about it. I think that I and possible Ron although I don't want to speak for him, wish to contrast an exclusionary politics with an inclusive one which we all participate in as Charles Alexander points out. Steve as usual makes excellent points within the confines he has established. My position vis a vis corporations is the recognition that I work for them and that academic life would provide distance from them but does not sever the relationship. How close do you want to get?

↑ Index

45. James Sherry
Re: Exile on Main Street
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Charles Bernstein and I were in Belgrade a few weeks before the civil war broke out. Belgrade has a large mall of coffee houses running down its middle. By day and by night the coffee houses were overflowing with unemployed young men between the ages of 18 & 25 who were talking about how it might be possible to get some money by fightingin this war and old men talking about how it might be possible to use them to do so.

↑ Index

46. James Sherry
Re: Out/onomous
Mon 5 Dec 1994

I quote someone who would not wish to be quoted here. "There is no outside or inside either."

On Mon, 5 Dec 1994, Patrick Phillips wrote:

> I'm a bit curious about something I've picked up as a kind of cerebral distinction (as opposed to actual/real or even possible distinction) between out and autonomous.
>
> It appears that many of us agree that there is no out:
>
> Tom Mandel's:
>
> "Outward" i.e. a gesture. there is no outward; every vector has a direction.

Yet the meta-metaphysics envolved in:

perfect is one to whom the entire
world is a place of exile.

appears to me to be an inverted origin and re-invigorates a kind of clearing, a place where metaphysics can and cannot take place....a straddle....

&

Steve Evan's:

My thinking is that the indispensable element of the avant-garde project is not "experiment" so much as what that term presupposes: autonomy.

and the trenchant:

*The vacuity of "dropping out" is not proof of the acuity of checking in. Both smack of extreme voluntarism in light of the structural exclusions of global capitalism.*

Steve's repositioning of the "avant-garde" project as a social (autonomous) rather than scientific, or theoretical (exterior) is important. However, what I'm not sure of here is the relationship of both "out" to "auto" -nomy in the face of the "structural exclusions of global capitalism."

*I've been reading Joan Cock's The Oppositional Imagination the last few days, finding myself under the transformative power of a searing critique, and while I don't pretend to be as fluid or nearly as capable as she, I do find many common concerns; one of which I believe would be that it is very hard to speak of "autonomous" or "out" in the above senses.*

In the midst of a critique of Said's, Gramschi's, William's and Foucault's models of "dominative power" she writes:

"There is...a vitality to power at the molecular level and a fixity to it at the grand one, so that approaching it theoretically from the bottom is the surer way not to miss its variations, reversals, and diversions. And when it comes to the local detail, one must be ready, if not quite for anything, at least for many unpredictable and surprising things. Whatever the great situation, this particular one, being particular, might bend in all sorts of ways - towards some new and intensified form of the power prevailing on the grand scale, or towards some humbled version of it, or towards its deterioration, or towards its inversion." - p 49

> In relation to both Steve and Tom, I'm gleaning two things from this quote:
>
> *One, that the propositions of "structural exclusion of global capitalism" and "the world is a place of exile" both in-state forms of world (though geo-physically with "global") that appear on the surface to refute an outside while running the risk of imposing an outside. Both "structural exclusion of global capitalism" and the world of exile seem to run the risk, of proposing an absolute and of reifying hegemony. That in fact "the matrices of transformation" that poetry can involve are "constant modifications" (the constantly burning house), both internal and external, "local" and "geo-political" power fluxes which constantly undo the absolute "world", or "globe."*
>
> And Two, exile and exclusion are impossible in this undoing and with this impossibility, "out" and "auto," though intended differently, are actually more similar in their exclusivity than not. (In this, there is no "closet" either.)
>
> I'd like to tease this out further but I have to go out and pick up my wife.
>
> Patrick Phillips

↑ Index

47. James Sherry
Re: Shake Those Dirty Hands
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Eric, do what you do. Do.

↑ Index

48. Steve Evans
Virus Warning (Forwarded)
Mon 5 Dec 1994

Many of you have probably been informed of a virus being spread by e-mail through America On Line, but just in case:

If you receive anything from AOL headed "Good Times," do not read or download it:

it is a virus that will erase your hard drive.

The person who passed this along to me
also mentions a second virus--"xxx-1"-- going around the internet: delete it without reading also.

Steve

↑ Index

49. Mark Roberts
Re: Virus Warning (Forwarded)
Tue 6 Dec 1994

> Many of you have probably been informed of > a virus being spread by e-mail through > America On Line, but just in case:
>
> If you receive anything from AOL headed
> "Good Times," do not read or download it:
> it is a virus that will erase your hard
> drive.
>
> The person who passed this along to me
> also mentions a second virus--"xxx-1"--
> going around the internet: delete it without > reading also.
>
> Steve

I posted a similiar notice to a local list and I got this response:

****

>From [redacted] Mon Dec 5 14:56:51 1994
Date: Mon, 05 Dec 1994 14:56:08 +1000
From: [redacted] (Sam Chard)
Subject: Re: Fwd: Virus Warning (fwd)
To: Australian Literature Discussion <[redacted]>
Status: R

Howdy

Apparently it's all an enormous hoax

This is probably the 5th message I've had regarding this today...

I do have some info I received which explains why it is impossible to receive virus's via email, but I'll have to look for it... I'll publish it on this list as soon as I find it.

Regards
SAM

******

I don't know about things but maybe there is somebody out there who could comment on these virus warnings.

Mark Roberts
SIS Liaison Officer
Student Information & Systems Office Ph 02 [redacted]
University of NSW Sydney Australia Fax 02 [redacted]

↑ Index

50. braman sandra
Re: Virus Warning (Forwarded)
Tue 6 Dec 1994

It is possible to receive viruses via e-mail. S Braman

↑ Index

51. braman sandra
Re: Out/onomous
Tue 6 Dec 1994

Re the discussion of out and outward -- it may be that today the outside is all of the complexity, wildness, and potentially chaotic effects of the local. The butterfly effect (of chaos theory) as perhaps the most important form of power.... S Braman

↑ Index

52. Ron Silliman
Pinot Blanc Marxism
Tue 6 Dec 1994

Paul Hoover noted that:

>Back in this recent series, Don Byrd made a very good comment about >avant-garde poetry being the "mainstream" historically, especially if you >begin with romanticism.

Marjorie Perloff has made the case for this at length (& depth) with her analysis of the French reading of American poetics. It's still quite true.

And it's disturbing to see that we ourselves sometimes forget this. I remember being furious to see, in the New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics (in the entry on American Poetry) that Michael Davidson and Albert Gelpi identify "the major trad. of the 1970s and '80s" to be 3 general areas of practice: Ammons, Pinsky, Gluck (Louise not Bob), and Hass being one, Bell, Gallagher, Levine, Wright and Forche being the second, Howard, Merrill and Hecht being the third.

That's disinformation, not just misinformation.

And about as silly as TVF Brogan (one of the volumes two general editors) identifying The New American Poetry as being by Donald HALL, not Don Allen. Or, for that matter, Paul getting the title of Zukofsky's long poem incorrect throughout the Norton Pomo.

If we continue to perpetuate our own marginalisation, it should be for strategic (not merely tactical) reasons. The alternative is just compradore poetics.

↑ Index

53. Eric Selinger
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

On Mon, 5 Dec 1994, William Lavender wrote:

> A poet
> recently told me he didn't read poetry for pleasure. "I mean lets face it," > he said, "when it comes to pleasure, enjoyment, relaxation, I'd rather watch > Terminator." There are pleasures that poetry strives to avoid, to unlearn, > to counter.
>
> I don't have any problem with reading poetry out of a sense of duty or whateve
> Our only subject here has been ethics. Like the song from my youth said,
> "I feel like I owe it to someone."

(Raised eyebrow): Fascinating, Captain. First, we have the equation of pleasure and enjoyment with relaxation--not what my friends the rock-climbers describe, or the rock and roll guitarists when they're licking up their chops. Notice, too, that there's no pleasure in duty, or in ethics, in paying your dues (to whom, exactly?). No one ever really _enjoyed_ dishing soup to the homeless, or calling for US intervention into Spain / Bosnia, or unmasking the "illusions of pleasure" that capitalism has purportedly foisted upon us (cf. McGann, in that old essay on Politics & Poetic Value). No: pleasure is what happens when you turn off your forebrain and watch Arnold blow away good guys, bad guys, til' you've had your share of biochemical thrills. Then it's back to the serious business of ethics, our only subject here.

I just don't buy it, finally. I think that the pleasure / ethics split is bogus and reductive--the Victorians knew better. So did the Greeks. I think the equation of pleasure with ["mindless"] relaxation is, too. Maybe this just means that I'd rather curl up with Mirabell than Mad Max, or spank a monkey that's been dead since, oh, Lautreamont. But I don't think so. There's a knee-jerk anhedonia in critical discourse these days that seems to me as questionable as the use of words like, oh, "experimental," and that could use the same sort of theoretical and historical unpacking. It seems (pause) illogical.

Aye, Twould be interesting to see / when Pleasure was declared to be / the enemy of Poetry--or, at least, given its purgative, medicinal function, when Poetry became the enema of pleasure.

Damnit, Jim,
I'm a doctor, not a dominatrix!
I can't get combine instruction with delight.
I'd lose my license-- [Cut from Mr. Bones in Sickbay to the pixilated glow of twisting plots in the Transporter Room, and / or Metaphorical Stanza, if we have the budget for bilingual puns in this week's (here's another:) episode.

"Ambassador Wilde! What beams you into town?"
"Oh, pleasure, pleasure. What else should bring one anywhere?"

EMS

↑ Index

54. Ron Silliman
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

But you would make such a great dominatrix!

↑ Index

55. Charles Bernstein
NEW: Ex-peri-mints
Tue 6 Dec 1994

I am a G4 in the textual body of a G3. For roughly twenty years I have sought psychosurgical intervention for my problem. Now, with the ever-collapsing interior folds of cyberspace, I can begin to see the damp at the end of the tunnel ...

In L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E #3 (and later The L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E Book), we printed Bernadette Mayer's compilation of writing "experiments". Over the years I collected additional experiments and changed some on the original list to reflect a somewhat different orientation. Given the conversation here lately, or not so lately perhaps (it just has taken me a long time to get this out), I hardly need to note that calling such lists as this "experiments" is tendentious. Perhaps it would be more accurate to call the list a series of nontraditional poetic forms. Experiments, I suppose, is the term that gets used for such lists to contrast with the ubiquitous books of writing "exercises" for creative writing class; in this sense, "experiments" are exercises with different poetic motivations and lineages: and one which, I would say, thinking of Eric Selinger's comments just now, do emphasize pleasure, or anyway the fun of writing. The common dislike of the term "experimental poetry" can, I think, be traced to such work being disparaged as mere "exercises", preliminary and incidental to the "actual work" of poetry. In this way, both "exercise" and "experiment" are deployed, positively and negatively, against assumptions about intentionality, related to the that other binary pair, process versus product.

I use the "Experiments" list in my work as a teacher. (I used to work for corporations, but now I {just} work for the state.) Indeed the first class I ever taught at a university (UCSD) had the official title "experimental writing", which was appealing in that "poetry", that vexatious term, didn't appear (the other class I taught that quarter was entitled "advanced poetry" for which, of course, I designed a completely different syllabus). Nowadays I use the "Experiments" list not so much for teaching writing, but for teaching reading, that is, some of the "experiments" work as methods for "reading" through poems and others work as ways of approaching, if not imitating, certain poetic methods. I bill my classes these days as "reading workshops" and refer to working with this list as doing "something like lab work", shamelessly, and falsely, appealing to if not the prestige of science perhaps the acceptance by students that in science they will be dealing with methodology and form -- and also, obviously, to encourage a different way to think about reading poetry, linking two things most students don't associate -- scientific experiment and poetry. Actually, I distribute a shorter version of this list for "reading through" -- the ones that involve using prior texts, but it will be apparent which ones will work for this and which not.

********((((((((((((((((((((((()))))))))))))))))))))))))*******

Anyone notice this full-page statement opening the new Exact Change catalog?:

"RECENTLY a major publisher brought out a huge anthology of contemporary American poetry and title it 'post-modern' for no better reason that the that the term 'avant-garde' sounded too old-hat and the term 'experimental' seemed to connote failure. Well, it's time to revive these two perfectly good adjectives and take back our modernism from the learned bores of postmodernism. Besides, it never really went away, you know, it's here with us, superbly alive and well in the _Exact Change Yearbook_."

--John Ashbery

Perhaps "our modernism" is something like Ashbery's often quoted "the other tradition", a.k.a Don Byrd's mainstream, a.k.a. radical modernism, a.k.a. formally innovative poetry, a.k.a. "that poetry of which we speak" ... Exact Change runs a striking half-page color ad (black and white drop out lettering on red background) in the new New York Review of Books headlined "Classics of Experimental Literature" and featuring books by Aragon, Roussel, Lautreamont, Stein, Cage, de Chirico, Soupault, Appolinaire, Kafka. (I have most of these and highly recommend the entire set.) I haven't seen the Yearbook yet, by the way, but it is edited by Peter Gizzi, & includes a Michael Palmer feature, and a CD. $35 from Exact Change, Box 1917, Boston, Mass. 02205 (who'll also send you the catalog -- or maybe we can get an electronic version to post -- are you listening Peter?). The term "experimental" does not appear in the Exact Change catalog, except in Ashbery's inside front cover statement. This use in the ad suggests an active, indeed commercial sense of the term, at least in the (considerable) judgement of Exact Change publisher Damon Krukowski. Of course one could easily note that "experimental classics" is a touch, well, oxymoronic; but let she or he whose rhetoric is without oxymoron complain, I certainly am in no position to. In contexts like this, "classic" is a way to undercut the assumption that "new" or "experimental" works are undifferentiatable in respect to quality -- how can you tell one from another. (Pay attention is one possible answer.) New Classics plays off the sense of "classic" as having enduring value against the sense of "classic" as being traditional: I'd translate the expression as, something like, a work of untraditional value, valuable, in part, because it is untraditional or unconventional, but not exclusively for this reason. I would say the most common, and empty, charges against nonconventional literary works is that they are _only_ about their nonconventionality or antitraditionality or, so the refrain goes, only about "language"; as if one breaks forms or finds new one for sake of that activity rather than to be able to make articulations not otherwise possible. I would say such comments (and they are just as frequent in the alternative poetry worlds as in the mainstreams) mask the fact that conventional and traditional literary writing reinscribe the meanings implicit in their forms but that poetry is not limited to this activity of reinscription (lovely or comforting or pleasurable as it sometimes may be). There may be no pure outside (chorus: "no pure outside" "no pure outside") but there isn't no pure inside either (chorus: "no inside ether, no inside ether"). -- I remember going to some marketing meetings when I was working for _Modern Medicine_ in which they told us the readers (all physicians) were most likely to read an article if the word "new" was in the title. This will come as no surprise to any who drinks New Coke in their New Chevrolet, even if we are still bedeviled by the fact that Madison Avenue understands "make it new" quite well -- yet, against all odds, I would still say, _understands it differently_ . In _Modern Medicine_ the spin had a different moral imperative: "new cure for", "new protocol for" etc., so that the audience felt compelled to read these items in order to be competent, or, negatively, in order not to be sued; at the meeting we were urged to say new whether or not the item was new. This works because there "actually" are new developments in medicine with which physicians need to keep up: "new" is open to manipulation not because it is meaningless but because it is a marker of "practical" value. To say that marketing capitalizes on the claim of the new does not mean that newness is an empty claim: the difference between Madison Avenue's claim's and poetry's practice is one of motivation and ethics. SO, echoing Williams, I would say there is still news from poetry, and that women and men do die from the lack of what is found there (but not only there and it is surely not the only thing they die from the lack of).

==========@@@

level playing field? Let me close with one more observation: three main yarns/braids (which I propose as an alternative term to 'threads' in cyberspeak) on the Poetics list have revolved around questions of the configuration of poets and/or poems: community in the spring, anthologies in the summer, labels in the fall. Now with winter, we seem to be focussing on war: the destruction of some communities by other communities.

##############################<><><>

56. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

BRAVO to Kathryne Lindberg for her wonderfully informative and helpful bibliography on Bosnia. I don't know the opera SARAJEVO but will ask Carey (daughter) who runs ACT and knows these things.

Anyway, I am more grateful to K. than I can say. I was just about to give up, after reading the really frightening exchange on vulgar Marxists versus Chardonnay Marxists and other similar items. This is not an issue of yet again discussing "late Monopology capitalism," now a fact of life around the globe anyway, but to discuss what to do about Nationalist and religious wars that practically recall the Crusades, not to mention Hitler. It's not a question of whether Bosnia is in our "sphere of interest" but what will happen if we don't intervene now--and should have intervened years ago. The Serbs (total thughs and, incidentally, from what Dubravka tells me, overtly in favor of a Male, authoritarian, "back to the soil" literature movement, given the signal that they can do whatever they damn please in Bosnia, will now continue on to Hungary and/or Albania. It's just a matter of time. Is this our concern? Well, was Chkekoslovakia our concern in 1939? Poland? do we really not care what happens in Europe?

Can we do anything? Yes, first of all inform yourselves (thank you Kathryne for the list) and stop talking about our own petty little concerns in the university or whether or not Imamu Baraka deserves $5,000 and write to our congressmen, draft ad campaigns, etc. This is REAL not one more hypothetical debate between various Marxisms.

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

57. Rodger Kamenetz
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

To James Sherry-- I certainly would not equate poetry with humane politics. My point was that the politics of our poetry scenes is no better than the politics we are complaining about. Judging Whitman for his blind spots is using blinding 20-20 hindsight. Who among us would survive that judgment, if we had the knack of turning it on ourselves?I suppose we can be no kinder to the poets of the past than we are to our rival contemporaries : purges all around, off with their heads. Rodger Kamenetz [redacted]

↑ Index

58. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Out/onomous
Tue 6 Dec 1994

On Tue, 6 Dec 1994, braman sandra wrote:

> Re the discussion of out and outward -- it may be that today the outside is all of the complexity, wildness, and potentially chaotic effects of the local. The butterfly effect (of chaos theory) as perhaps the most important form of power....

Which would suggest that as ineffectual as a butterfly flapping its wings the artist/intellectual/whatever has about as much influence. . . and that it would be silly not to recognize it. Pape's revision of Perloff's question is the important one: what do we do? We talk. . . and talk, and that is what we do. Do. And that flapping is as ineffectual/powerful as the butterfly's wings. . . perhaps poetry is not a "humanizing" or even "civilizing" force (which I don't think it necessarily is) but it does exert influence/power and the ethics of that power are recognizable. Is what we do simply "entertainment?" Or idle chatter? I'd be the last to say the artist/intellectual knows any better than the next person, but isn't there something as pernicious in abandoning that potential as in misusing it? Geez, I'm not a humanist, please. . . . But seriously (as if), our chatter is not as subsumed within systems of capital as it is portrayed as being. I work within the university because it allows me freedom (no matter how limited or limiting) to think in ways that seem "oppositional"--whereas if I worked at a job for a company I would have to think what it wanted me to. Little difference some of you are saying; well, that's not how I experience it. Would we be having this conversation behind the counter at Taco Bell? "Two tostadas, one seven layer, pintos and cheese, and a medium Pepsi--to go."

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

59. Charles Bernstein
Experiments List
Tue 6 Dec 1994

EXPERIMENTS

1. Homolinguistic translation: Take a poem (someone else's then your own) and translate it "English to English" by substituting word for word, phrase for phrase, line for line, "free" translation as response to each phrase or sentence. (Cf: Six Fillious by nichol, McCaffery, Fillious, Brecht, Higgins, Roth.)

2. Homophonic translation: Take a poem in a foreign language that you can pronounce but not necessarily understand and translate the sound of the poem into English (ie French "blanc" to blank or "toute" to toot). [Cf Louis and Celia Zukofsky's Cattulus]. (Rewrite to suit?)

3. Lexical translation: Take a poem in a foreign language that you can pronounce but not necessarily understand and translate it word for word with the help of a bilingual dictionary. (Rewrite to suit?)

4. Acrostic Chance. Pick a book at random and use title as acrostic key phrase. For each letter of key phrase go to page number in book that corresponds (a=1, z=26) and copy as first line of poem from the first word that begins with that letter to end of line or sentence. Continue through all key letters, leaving stanza breaks to mark each new key word. [cf: Jackson Mac Low's Stanzas for Iris Lezak.] Variations include using author's name as code for reading through her or his work, using your own or friend's name, picking different kinds of books for this process, devising alternative acrostic procedures.

5. Tzara's hat. Everyone is a group writes down a word (alternative: phrase, line) and puts it in a hat. Poem is made according to order it is randomly pulled from hat. (Solo: pick a series of words or lines from book, newspapers, magazines to put in the hat.)

6. Burrough's Fold-in: Take two different pages from a newspaper or magazine article, or a book, and cut the pages in half vertically. Paste the mismatched pages together.

7. General cut-ups: Write a poem composed entirely of phrases lifted from other sources. Use one source for a poem and then many; try different types of sources: literary, historical, magazines, advertisements, manuals, dictionaries, instructions, travelogues, etc.

8. Cento: write a collage made up of full-line of selected source poems.

9. Substitution (1): "Mad libs". Take a poem (or other source text) and put blanks in place of three or four words in each line, noting the part of speech under each blank. Fill in the blanks being sure not to recall the original context.

10. Substitution (2): "7 up or down". Take a poem or other, possibly well-known, text and substitute another word for every noun, adjective, adverb, and verb; determine the substitute word by looking up the index work in the dictionary and going 7 up or down, or one more, until you get a syntactically suitable replacement. (Cf: Clark Coolidge and Larry Fagin, On the Pumice of Morons.)

11. Serial sentences: Select one sentence each from a variety of different books or other sources. Add sentences of your own composition. Combine into one paragraph, reordering to produce the most interesting results.

12. Alphabet poems: make up a poem of 26 words so that each word begins with the next letter of the alphabet. Write another alphabet poem but scramble the letter order.

13. Alliteration (assonance): write a poem in which all the words in each line begin with the same letter.

14. Doubling: Starting with one sentence, write a series of paragraphs each doubling the number of sentences in the previous paragraph and including all the words used previously. [cf: Silliman's Ketjak]

15. Collaboration: Write poems with one or more other people: alternating lines (chaining or renga), writing simultaneously and collaging, rewriting, editing, supplementing the previous version. This can be done in person, via e-mail, or through "snail" mail.

16. Group sonnet: 14 people each write one ten word line on an index card. Order to suit.

17. Write a poem trying to transcribe as accurately as you can your thoughts while you are writing. Don't edit anything out. Write as fast as you can without planning what you are going to say.

18. Dream work: Write down your dreams as the first thing you do every morning for 30 days. Appply translation and aleotoric processes to this material. Double the length of each dream. Weave them together into one poem, adding or changing or reordering material. Negate or reverse all statements (I went down the hill to I went up the hill, I didn't to I did). Borrow a friend's dreams and apply these techniques to them.

19. Write a poem made up entirely of neologism or nonsense words or fragments of words. [cf: Lewis Carroll's "Jabberwocky", Khlebnikov's Zaum, Peter Inman's Platin, David Melnick's Pcoet.]

20. Write a poem with each line filling in the blanks of "I used to be ----- but now I am -------". (I used to write poems, but now I just do experiments; I used to make sense, but now I just make poems.)

21. Write a poem consisting entirely of things you'd like to say, but never would, to parent, lover, sibling, child, teacher, roommate, best friend, etc. etc.

22. Write a poem consisting entirely of overheard conversation.

23. Nonliterary forms: Write a poem in the form of an index, a table of contents, a resume, an advertisement for an imaginary or real product, an instruction manual, a travel guide, a quiz or examination, etc.

24. Imitation: Write a poem in the style of each of a dozen poets who you like and dislike: try to make it as close to an forgery of a "unknown" poem of the author as possible.

25. Write a poem without mentioning any objects.

26. Backwards: Reverse or alter the line sequence of a poem of your own or someone else's. Reverse the word order. Rather than reverse, scramble.

27. Write an autobiographical poems without using any pronouns.

28. Attention: Write down everything you hear for one hour.

29. Brainard's Memory: Write a poem all of whose lines start "I remember ..." [Cf. Joe Brainard's I Remember.]

30. "Pits": Write the worst possible poem you can imagine.

31. Write a poem while listening to music; switch types of music.

32. Write a poem just when you are on the verge of falling asleep. Write a line a day as you are falling asleep or waking up. (Cf: Silliman's Circle-R.)

34. List poem: write a poem consisting of favorite words or phrases collected over a period of time; pick your favorite words from a particular book.

35. List poem 2: write a poem consisting entirely of a list of "things", either homogenous or heterogenous (common lists included shopping lists, things to do, lists of flowers or rocks, lists of colors, inventory lists, lists of events, lists of names, ...).

36. Chronology: made up a list of dates with associated events, real or imagined.

37. Transcription: Tape a phone or live conversation between yourself and a friend. Make a poem composed entirely of transcribed parts.

38. Canceling: Write a series of lines or rhymes such that every other one cancels the one before ("I come before you / to stand behind you").

39. Erasure: Take a poem of your own or someone else's and cross out most of the words on each poem, retype what remains as your poem. [cf: Ronald Johnson's RADI OS from Milton.]

40. Write a series of ten poems going from one to ten words in each poem. Reorder.

41. Write a poem composed entirely of questions.

42. Write a poem made up entirely of directions.

43. Write a poem consisting only of opening lines (improvise your own lines, then use source texts).

44. Write a poem consisting only of prepositions, then of prepositions and one other part of speech.

45. Write a series of eight-word lines consisting of one each of each part of speech.

46. Write a poems consisting of one-word lines; write a poems consisting of two-word lines; write a poems consisting of three- word lines.

47. Synchronicity: Write a poem in which all the events occur simultaneously.

48. Diachronicity: Write a poem in which all the events occur in different places and at different times.

49. Visual poetry: write poems with a strong visual or "concrete" element--including combination of lexical and nonlexical (pictorial) elements, play with alphabets and typogaphy, placement of words on the page, etc.

50. Write a series of poems or stanzas while listening to music; change type of music for each stanza or poem.

51. Elimination: cut out the second half of sentences.

52. Excuses list: write a poem made up entirely of excuses (e.g. Terry Winch's "Excuses")

53. Sprung Diary: write a diary tracking and intercutting multiple levels of thoughts, exeriences, anticipations, expectations, from minute to major. (Cf. Hannah Weiner's Clairvoyant Journal.)

53. Make up more experiments

Remember: Poems can be in prose format!

Rewrite and recombine, collage, splice together the material generated from these experiments into one long ongoing poem!

-- Compiled by Charles Bernstein from Bernadette Mayer & workshop's Experiments list, and various other sources 1/90, 6/93. (C) 1994 by Poets' Ludicrously Aimless Yearning (PLAY). Dispense only as appropriate and under the supervision of an attending reader. Individual experiments are not liable for injury or failure resulting from improper use of appliance. Any profits accrued as a direct or indirect result of the use of these formulas shall be redistributed to the language at large. Management assumes no responsibility for damages that may result consequent to the use of this material in educational institutions or individual writing projects.

↑ Index

60. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

On Tue, 6 Dec 1994, Marjorie Perloff wrote:
>
> Anyway, I am more grateful to K. than I can say. I was just about to > give up, after reading the really frightening exchange on vulgar Marxists > versus Chardonnay Marxists and other similar items. This is not an issue > of yet again discussing "late Monopology capitalism," now a fact of life > around the globe anyway, but to discuss what to do about Nationalist and > religious wars that practically recall the Crusades, not to mention Hitler.
> It's not a question of whether Bosnia is in our "sphere of interest" but > what will happen if we don't intervene now--and should have intervened > years ago. . . . Is this our concern? Well, was Chkekoslovakia our > concern in 1939? Poland? do we really not care what happens in Europe?
>
> Can we do anything? Yes, first of all inform yourselves (thank you > Kathryne for the list) and stop talking about our own petty little > concerns in the university or whether or not Imamu Baraka deserves $5,000 > and write to our congressmen, draft ad campaigns, etc. This is REAL not > one more hypothetical debate between various Marxisms.

Yes, yes, yes, yes and what I was interested in was if we (those who are members of the list and the artistic/intellectual community) might be able to speak in some sort of larger-than-single voice on the issue. I can write my congressman, etc, but isn't it important that my voice be represented as not simply alone in saying these things? I abhor the way we have all stood by and allowed people to be shelled as a matter of daily course and prevented Bosnia from defending itself without saying this is a lame way to conduct human affairs. But I want to join my voice to others in order that it have more effect than speaking alone. I would like to join my name (for what its worth) to a list of creative persons, academic sorts, who recognize the need to speak collectively about this situation in order to draw attention to it. I would only add that the discussions of marxism are important--as everything else discussed--precisely because in sorting out these matters and differences between ourselves we identify where we can speak together or not. Marjorie Perloff raised the issue--what can we do--and we have discussed it. This is a good thing, though, of course limited, but I don't want to renounce the discussion as "hypothetical"--especially if it has some REAL outcome. Is it now happening? Having said all this I'd like Kat to append the list of persons in England (or whereever) who are active in this issue, as well of the lists of internet resources she knows about on Bosnia. She could send to me or, better, the list as a whole.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

61. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: vulgar marxism
Tue 6 Dec 1994

On Mon, 5 Dec 1994, Paul Hoover x350 wrote:

> I thought someone might comment on Baraka's "vulgar marxism." Interesting phrase, "vulgar marxism," suggesting that its basic concepts are to be discredited because we are now so much more sophisticated. Do you imagine that the economic base is NOT a dominant concern? That the United States, along with G7 (the only "G" force that really matters, with regard to G1/G2 discussion) does NOT manage world affairs?

No, no, no--I don't think marxism's concepts are "discredited" because we are more sophisticated, but because the systems of capital more complex than when Marx conceived the relation of base/superstructure. And, no, I don't imagine that the economic base is not a dominant concern, just that I want to move away from deterministic conceptions of the relations between different spheres of cultural production. I like Gramsci's model. Yes, I agree with you on these points, but I don't want to be reduced to acting always in syncronicity with some economic determinism, you know? Ya, ya. Thanks for lettering me clarify.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

62. Robert A Harrison
Re> Re: Out/onomous
Tue 6 Dec 1994

------ From: UB Poetics discussion group, Tue, Dec 6, 1994 ------

> I work within the university because it allows me freedom (no matter how limited or limiting) to think in ways that seem "oppositional"--whereas if I worked at a job for a company I would have to think what it wanted me to.

hmm. I read the UB Poetics list and write every day while working for a major corporation. I don't like working for a corporation any more than anyone else, and, I sure don't think what they want me too ALL the time. Not even most of the time. Sometimes not for whole days on end, pushing weeks. As Kit Robinson has pointed out, there's an art to "exercising the wig."

Please tell me there are more people who think that there're more ways than academia and business to make a living.

Bob Harrison

↑ Index

63. eric pape
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

Rodger's point, earlier, was an important one. Up to now we've been assuming that there is only one kind of capital, ie cash. That might be all there is, bottom line, but Pierre Bourdieu (I don't know much about his personal life; if he abuses barnyard animal I am sorry for using him) writes: Thus, at least in the most perfectly autonomous sector of the field of production, where the only aundience aimed at is other producers (as with Symbolist poetry_, the economy of practices is based, as in a generalized game of 'loser wins', on a systematice inversion of the fundemental principle of all ordinary economies: that of business (it excludes the pursuit of profit and does not guarantee any sort of correspondence between investments and monetary gains), that of power (it condemns honours and temporal greatness), and even that of institutionalized cultural authority (the absence of any academic training or consecration may be considered a virtue). And further on: In other words, the field of cultural production is the site of struggles in which what is at stake is the power to impose the dominant definition of the writer and therefore delimit the population of those entitled to take part in the struggle to define the writer.

While Bourdieu is certainly writing about the French poetry community, there may indeed be similarities between that and the, for lack of a better term the American avant garde. Not that there isn't problems. The good thing is that it demystifies the claim of the avant garde to special authority due to their lack of authority. The bad thing is that it really doesn't tell us anything we didn't already know --About the conflict between theory and praxis: I have a great deal of sympathy for both. But ultimately theory has to articulate itself as praxis; in poetry or in politics, it has to be done. Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

64. James Sherry
Re: Out/onomous
Tue 6 Dec 1994

I would voice support of Sandra Braman's tentative foray into describing the issues in terms of dynamical systems methods rather than the polar inside/outside criteria which discussion fell around previously. The notion that we can define an internal order to turbulence is fundamental to much of our poetics positioning. The metaphors of dirty hands and burning buildings are to say the least inflammatory and being derived from experience carry all the risks of a theory based on memory rather than a coherent analysis from which poetry can deviate, become chaotic, and as conditions change return to the order of which we speak. These states participate in a continuum rather than as a polar switch. They are digital, not analog, and open more doors than they close, which for me at least seems an good place to start.

↑ Index

65. Robert Drake
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

> Yes, yes, yes, yes and what I was interested in was if we (those who are members of the list and the artistic/intellectual community) might be able to speak in some sort of larger-than-single voice on the issue. I can write my congressman, etc, but isn't it important that my voice be represented as not simply alone in saying these things?

my sister served as an intern in our (ex)Congresswoman's office--according to her, _10_ letters in one direction or another served as a significant influence on that legislator's perception of her constituent's wishes. tho it might make _you_ feel more effective to ally yourself with others in voicing an opinion, don't underestimate the influence of your own individual voice. the "religious" right doesn't.

(the above is _in no way_ to be misconstrued as an opinion, held by m'self, that the regular channels of "our" "democratic" "institutions" can, by themselves, be sufficient to effect meaningful institutional change.)

xxoo

luigi

↑ Index

66. James Sherry
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

Yes Rodger, I agree, we can be no kinder to ourselves than to the past and we must be as thorough critiqing our own positions and politics as we are in analyzing those of our opposition in the poetry or political world. Oppositional politics must be exposed as an expression of misplaced psychology. We are wasting our time as on religion if we persist in trying to universalize our morality about how good we are if we don't "dirty" our hands.

↑ Index

67. George Bowering
Re: The Advert-Garde
Tue 6 Dec 1994

The avant-garde is bound to fall faster than the main body of troops. They are the quickest ears and eyes, but they are alone in enemy territory. The true avant garde is sacrifivcial.

↑ Index

68. James Sherry
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

To Robert Drake's note, YES, political influence is easier than we think. Think 10 letters influenced a vote. Democracy is about institutions that can carry multiple individuals. We need more than individuals, we need society to operate. Reducing reality to a war of individual points of view supports the right. Maggie Thatcher said, "There is not society, only individuals." The state directly controlling each individual is now a real possibility. We need our institutions to increase the masses mass. Apologies for the polemics, but...

↑ Index

69. George Bowering
Re: Punk
Tue 6 Dec 1994

Was Punk at one time something other than entertainment?

↑ Index

70. George Bowering
Re: Benjamin/Bryher
Tue 6 Dec 1994

& Mike, etc., do you remember why Bryher and H.D. snubbed Jung when they encountered him walking on the street in that little suburb, what's it called, of Zurich? My Jung friends tell me that they were not enough informed re his name's being on the pan-German psychiatric board whatever it was called. I dont know.

↑ Index

71. Mn Center For Book Arts
Re: Exile on Main Street
Tue 6 Dec 1994

Jeffrey Timmons writes, "I would like to join my name (for what its worth) to a list of creative persons, academic sorts, who recognize the need to speak collectively about this situation in order to draw attention to it." I think a lot of our legislators would rather hear from a bunch of single constitutents rather than a list of creative, academic sorts. Both actions are worthwhile, but don't not do the single voice writing or calling. I know from experience that senators & congresspeople (& it's most important to call your local ones, for whom you are the constituent) actually do count calls & letters & keep tabs & sometimes (no, not always) it's those numbers that sway their vote or can even make them speak on the floor. That's why Working Assets giving free phone calls to them actually can help, Tenney. I know it all sounds too simple, but my goodness, let's not look for reasons not to call or write such people. They need to know that there's a radical mainstream experimental poetics group which cares about Bosnia, too.

charles alexander

↑ Index

72. George Bowering
Re: politics
Tue 6 Dec 1994

I think that Hoover is right when he says that nothing will happen in Bosnia until trade is threatened (presumably for thge US). One also notices that the US is slow to go to war with Eurowhite folks. Small Caribbean countries, okay. 1914? nah. 1939? nah. Middle east places, why not? Native Americans? sure. Indochina? bomb 'em. `

↑ Index

73. Ron Silliman
The National Question, etc.
Wed 7 Dec 1994

There have been more thoughtful, interesting messages on the list in the past 48 hours than any person could ever respond to, but here are a few thoughts in a strictly reactive mode:

It was great to hear Marjorie praise Kat Lindeberg's Balkan reading list while getting a (yet another) dig in at Marxism, given that the sources in KB's bibliography show a decided bent toward what I'd (very loosely) call the post-Trotskyist tradition (Against the Current, New Left Review). Excellent publications both (tho my two eye operations have really made NLR's 8 point type a chore the past few years, so I'm not as rigorous a reader as I once was there). As a fellow traveler of the post-Trots, I've always thought that their critique of Stalinism set them up to survive the collapse thereof with the least self-doubt. And generally it's been true, even in the former Soviet Union where Boris Kagarlitsky got elected to the Moscow city council.

But Marjorie is right in her assertion that the National question is the most pressing (and depressing) issue facing us at this moment. Robert Schaeffer (onetime editor of Nuclear Times, now at San Jose State I believe) wrote a book that I read in manuscript back in the mid-80s on self-determination (a concept "discovered" more or less simultaneously by Lenin & Woodrow Wilson, both for tactical [if not overtly opportunistic] grounds--partition, with all its consequences, has been a major political tool ever since. One of the proponents for Prop 187 here in California (our own modest attempt at "ethnic cleansing") made an interesting comment on the radio the other day that "without borders, we'd be nothing, just an amorphous blob." That resonates so clearly with all the rhetoric of identity politics from the past 15 years as to turn my stomach. (Identity politics, Marjorie, IS vulger Marxism at its worst. Its characteristic chant--"the people united"--is ironic without self-knowledge. And it has been the disaster that the left in the US has not understood how to handle, guilt-ridden honkies that we are.)

On the contrast between working for a burger joint and a university for intellectual freedom: if Davidson & Gelpi calling three brands of academic verse the "major trad. of the 1970s and '80s" isn't an instance of "thinking the boss's thought" I don't know what is. Does nobody out there have horror stories about the constraints placed on their work for orals or the dissertation? The sole difference might be that the burger worker is less apt to CARE about the subject for which his/her brain is being retooled. (Steve Farmer might well disagree with this, but then Steve doesn't cook for burger joints.)

Working in corporations has certainly deepened my understanding of/commitment to a Marxian (as distinct from Marxist) discourse. The entire high tech industry is driven wildly by perceptions of the falling rate of profit (watch printer prices in 1995, or PC prices in the next 3 months--those are going to throw people out of work) and Kondratieff waves and social structures of accumulation are precisely what the transformation from an industrial to an information services economy is about.

Bill Gates is still G2, about Ben Friedlander's age, younger than Michael Basinski if I reckon right. The guy who wrote Mosaic, the primary internet interface, has just turned 23. And some of the best Web linkage sites are being done by teenagers. The internet is "always already" an expression of post-GATT consciousness. The same principle that puts Tony Green and Wystan Curnow at our fingertips puts Mexican labor just seconds away. We're taking the touch costs out of more than just poetry.

The price of influence has gone up from what Luigi-Bob says. When I worked as a lobbyist in the mid-70s, most legislators in California used to divide up (literally into shoe boxes) letters on each issue. First divide was in-district vs. out. Out never got read. Then in-district & out were counted. A postcard was typically given a weight of 4 (i.e., 4 people would likewise feel strongly in the district for each card) and letters were given a weight of 7. Every pol knows what their district is communicating. If you read the disclaimers of the congressional email project, for example, you will note that the first thing they want to know is your physical location since, unless you are writing from something like a school account, they can't tell where you live. Our boy Newt, former college professor that he is, plans to get all of congress up on the internet next year. So while I'm totally cynical about electoral politics (in this "democracy," the equation is really one dollar one vote), I agree that all forms of participation have some relative value.

Steve Evans' comments about dirty hands are well taken. Though his are as covered with blood as mine. I think that there is NO comparison to be made when it comes to reading about the economy and the behavior of corporations versus participating on a daily basis, particularly if you are in a position where you can see both the micro decision-making and the macro effects. Tom Peters can tell you much more about capitalism than Andrew Ross, I'm afraid.

There is also real value in participating in a community (as any job site is) in which the majority of people do NOT presume to be intellectuals. Where people are at least as apt to read the Koran or the Bible or the latest Tony Robbins infomercial best-seller on their lunch breaks as they are cyberpunk or Representations.

The biggest problem with the university is not that it's not full of interesting, intelligent people, but that it's isolated and insulated -- and has an unbelievably stratified caste system between faculty, students and staff (hospitals and the military are the closest approximations to this).

The entire tenure/specialisation process has one thing quite remarkable about it (that Lyotard only gets half right in his characterization of paralogy in the PostModern Condition): everybody is perpetually in competition with one another to differentiate themselves. Cooperation in too many academic settings occurs ONLY IN COMMITTEES, and we know just how reviled committee work is. Even in the worst of corporations, there is a general collaborativeness, whether it is to make the well-wrought Saturn or to get stock to turn 7 times per year instead of 6 in a widget store.

Since the late 1960s, the academy has become increasingly an economic backwater--probably because it once for a moment seemed all too powerful and present--and I think the whole educational system is heading for a crash that will make the demise of Texas oil and Pennsylvania steel, say, look like a picnic. The prominance given to such "academics" as Gingrich and Gramm (both professors a few years back), Bill Bennett, John Silber, Lamar Alexander (running for Prez no less), the late Alan Bloom, the authors of The Bell Curve, Camile Paglia et al suggests a pretty tawdry state. Lingua Franca makes no pretense about its role as the National Enquirer of this domain, but the Chronicle of Higher Education has just figured out a better mode of drag (sort of the Victoria's Secret to LF's Fredericks of Hollywood).

One can operate oppositionally in ANY of these settings. If one knows where one is positioned (both personally and institutionally). But I'm always startled at how clueless many academics seem on that point.

And that's where the national question, which is murderously re-emerging everywhere, has me wondering tonight. ((This troubles me completely: I'd use "oppositionality" where others would the avant-garde or experimentation to identify my own sense of tradition, but that word Op- Position has exactly that counter thrust of border creation that I find so suspicious or flagrantly dangerous in every other instance. So I find myself at the crux of a dilemma. I don't have the answer.))

Ron

↑ Index

74. Alan Sondheim
The Very Best Writer
Wed 7 Dec 1994

I would appreciate it if someone could send my condolences to Bernadette.

I miss her voice terribly. We never ever got along, but her writing was an enormous influence on me, especially works like Utopia, Studying Hunger, Memory. They're some of the few books I keep returning to over and over and over again. I've never read anything like the latter, before or after, not even Kathy's work which also owed a lot I think to Bernadette.

I have no money I can send on for the fund. I wish I could turn the world upside-down for her.

Terrible.

Alan

↑ Index

75. braman sandra
Re: Exile on Main Street
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Re Eric Paper's comments on capital -- it has long been a problem of, let's call it, chewing-gum Marxism, that it grossly oversimplifies the notion of capital, which has always had multiple and shifting referents. In the mercantilist period it was amazing to some that folks would think wealth might actually be equated with that stuff, money. One feature of the information economy is emergence of new forms of capital -- intellectual capital, the cultural capital Pape and Bourdieu refer to, and information capital. Here poets are rich. Sandra Braman

↑ Index

76. Michael Boughn
Re: Snubbed
Wed 7 Dec 1994

George:

I can't say why they snubbed Jung, but I suspect it had less to do with international politics than with psychoanalytic politics. Their devotion to Freud was intense and personal. And they perceived the psychoanalytic movement, as it was called, as bearing the same kind of millennial burden someone now might attribute to something called, say, post-Trotkyism.

It's strange because in some ways H.D.'s thinking, anyway, is finally closer in many ways to Jung's than Freud's. And H.D. always perceived her self as heretical. Still, Jung was the bad son of The Master they loved.

But this, of course, is all speculation. It may be somewhere in the correspondence, but I haven't seen it.

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

77. Mark Wallace
Eagleton and social control
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Someone sent a message recently quoting Terry Eagleton on (to paraphrase) the powerlessness of art in the face of the actual control of resources by a particular class.

Can whoever wrote that in quote it to me again, and/or tell me where I can find it?

I have a bad habit of not knowing what I'm going to find useful until I no longer know where to find it.

Thanks.

mark wallace

↑ Index

78. Michael Boughn
Re: experiwhat
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Dear Charles B:

That's quite a list of experiments! It reminds me of Kenneth Koch's techniques for eliciting poems from kids in school workshops, though obviously more extenisve and geared toward technical issues. I guess I always had a bit of a problem with the "put a different color in every line" school of writing when I was doing workshops. While the results are spectacular in some sense, my own sense of what writing could do for the kids in that situation was somewhat different. That is, rather than focussing on language as medium and its extraordinary possibilities, I always felt more attracted to the problems of articulation and choice in relation to the kids' lives.

I remember a 5th grader in a class at School 4 in Buffalo (that's in the middle of the Perry Projects on the upper south side) coming up to me after my rap to them that they were poetry, that poetry was their lives if only they could find the words they needed, that every detail of their lives was suitable for this language. He was defiant, and smart assed, and said with a sneer that he was going to write a poem about hanging in the park listening to Niggers with Attitude, expecting me to draw some line. Which I didn't. So he actually had to think about it and write it. It wasn't bad, either. He decided finally, on his own, for reasons he never explained to me, to change Niggers with Attitude to NWA. For better or for worse, it was a choice, one that to me with my somewhat antiquated views on poetry seems somehow more significant than whether to put red or green in a particular line. Ditto with the 6th grade kid at Red Jacket Academy who wrote about "Old men with big 20 gallon / bottles of E & J or Easy Jesus / wearing big clunk master boots / with no toe." (Jeez, I love that) And a hundred others I could quote.

It always seemed to me in those situations that the kids had so much to gain from poetry. Call it the world. Or a world, anyway. An entrance. Maybe that's partly why I feel the way I do about "experimentalism", that it seems to me to step around those difficulties in favor of some other, more formal ones.

Best,
Mike

↑ Index

79. Chris Stroffolino

Re: prayer

Wed 7 Dec 1994

Well, are we against school prayer or what? "I would only be against prayer if they didn't pick MY prayer." So, I was teaching Ashbery's "Morning Jitters" and brought up the possibility that one of the main reasons Ashbery used the for "preached at" by a poet anymore--and so he had to create these ironic forms to be able to have his didactic cake and eat it to, as it were--a chaser, etc... And so I brought this up to my class, and a student (one who loved Silliman's MICROSOFT BUYS CATHOLIC CHURCH, by the way) said "THIS SUCKS, THIS SUCKS,I HATE BEING PREACHED TO" and then we had a moment of silence but only because time was up.

↑ Index

80. Michael Boughn
Re: thugs
Wed 7 Dec 1994

I'd be interested in hearing more about Marjorie Perloff's theory that Serbs are "thugs". Is this a fixed category associated with certain nationalities? Does it change over time? Were, say, Croats "thugs" 50 years ago, but now not "thugs"? Have Bosnian Muslims ever been "thugs", or have they always been--what is the opposite of "thug"--"nice", "peaceful", "friendly"? Good, in any case. Were all Germans "thugs" in the same way all Serbs are "thugs", or was it only memebers of the National Socialist Party? What is the neo-Trotskyist line on this question?

Mike Boughn
[redacted]

↑ Index

81. Chris Stroffolino
Re: prayer
Wed 7 Dec 1994

As for those who accuse Hoover/Baraka of VULGAR MARXISM--What is this VULGAR MARXISM, any Marxism that remembers that the ECONOMIC is the REAL BASE ISSUE????? Well then certainly VULGAR Marxism is preferable to much of the obfuscating poetic/theory discussion that has dominated here for some time now...NOT THAT I MIND obfuscation (the noise of culture) per se--but when it PASSES ITSELF OFF as a revolutionary socio-political strategy then.... Besides, this weird hybrid of say Bertolt Brecht and ....(I'll save that harangue for another time). Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

82. Alan Sondheim
Re: thugs
Wed 7 Dec 1994

I'm glad you have the space to carefully consider these categories.

Alan

On Wed, 7 Dec 1994, Michael Boughn wrote:

> I'd be interested in hearing more about Marjorie Perloff's theory that Serbs are "thugs". Is this a fixed category associated with certain nationalities? Does it change over time? Were, say, Croats "thugs" 50 years ago, but now not "thugs"? Have Bosnian Muslims ever been "thugs", or have they always been--what is the opposite of

> "thug"--"nice", "peaceful", "friendly"? Good, in any case. Were all Germans "thugs" in the same way all Serbs are "thugs", or was it only memebers of the National Socialist Party? What is the neo-Trotskyist line on this question?
>
> Mike Boughn
> [redacted]

↑ Index

83. Kit Robinson
Re: Streaming
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Reply to: RE>Streaming

Date: 12/7/94 5:47 PM
To: Kit Robinson
From: UB Poetics discussion group
Some scattered thoughts are streaming after the following:

MERZ. Some advantages of working in the rough & tumble business world -- a more cooperative model for getting work done, greater diversity in the working population, and a compelling sense of making it up as you go along (i.e., that which is being TstudiedU is identical to that which is Tbeing madeU). Plus thereUs a lot of great non-poetic material out here, which as we know is good tonic for reviving boring old literature. This is not career counseling.

IDs. I agree with Rodger that much of the discussion of politics and group identity seems motivated more by a desire for positive self-identity and recognition than for political efficacy.

.EDU/.COM. I wonder if there isnUt a kind of town & gown psychology at play in speculation about the life of poetry inside & outside academia. Now that more and more of us .com guys are joining yUall .edu guys on the Net, I wonder how thingsUll change. At least itUs a way to talk over quadrangle walls. I donUt know how long IUll be able to deal with all these messages though -- just reading Uem -- (my time is billable).

PUNK. The point of punk was that these people said fuck you to the established commercial channels, creating their own scenes, producing on their own labels, etc. It was entertainment, sure, and never really threatened the power, I agree, but at least it had some energy. Of course, punk was tailor-made for recuperation (see Malcolm McClaren). Hip hop is a similar case in point. The point is local (in the current instance, multi-local) self-regulated activity may have half a chance to produce more than more of the same.

EXPERIMENTS. From my teaching days, IUd agree with Michael Boughn that the value of form lies as a tool to tap into content. I used to propose a formal exercise linked to an sample text then let the students run with it. The payoff was not in the skillful manipulation of form but in how the forms enabled the students to access areas of content that were meaningful to them -- much more so, I believe, than if they had been assigned to write RaboutS specific subjects, their feelings, etc.

Kit Robinson

↑ Index

84. Jeffrey Timmons

Re: The National Question, etc.

Wed 7 Dec 1994

On Tue, 6 Dec 1994, Ron Silliman wrote:

> Since the late 1960s, the academy has become increasingly an economic backwater--probably because it once for a moment seemed all too powerful and present--and I think the whole educational system is heading for a crash that will make the demise of Texas oil and Pennsylvania steel, say, look like a picnic. The prominance given to such "academics" as Gingrich and Gramm (both professors a few years back), Bill Bennett, John Silber, Lamar Alexander (running for Prez no less), the late Alan Bloom, the authors of The Bell Curve, Camile Paglia et al suggests a pretty tawdry state. Lingua Franca makes no pretense about its role as the National Enquirer of this domain, but the Chronicle of Higher Education has just figured out a better mode of drag (sort of the Victoria's Secret to LF's Fredericks of Hollywood).

Yes, perhaps, but doesn't Gringrich's, Gramm's, Paglia's, et al's, prominence and presence in popular/political culture suggest the vital interrelation (largely in a sense that is disturbing to me, being as their politics are detestable) of academia and the rest of the world? I don't disagree that the university is in trouble, but it's because education as other than vocational training is highly unpopular not only with students but the those that pay for education at the state/federal levels. What place is there for art if education is meant to "train" the student a job? The place such "academics" as Newt et al is precisely an indication of the power and ability (used regressively) such institutions still manifest in the "isolated" and "insulated" "backwater" status. I largely agree with Ron's comments, but somehow his comments about academia remind me too much of the Republicans attacks on the "establishment" of Washington DC--an establishment and set of practices they are very much a part of--particularly as they portray it as something "out of touch" with the rest of America. I don't want to speak for anyone besides myself, but I am not simply an academic. I play many roles in my own life and act in many different dramas--all of which connect me to the rest of the world. My "academic" role is vitally connected to my other roles, particularly my role as a citizen, a member of the polis. Yes, our roles are increasingly isolated, but academics are neither more nor less isolated or "redundant" than any other "occupation." Maybe even less so. All I want to claim is that while all "occupations" compel one to think for them at least . . . I experience my own sense of being able to set the agenda more for myself here than anywhere I have hitherto worked.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

85. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: thugs
Wed 7 Dec 1994

On Wed, 7 Dec 1994, Michael Boughn wrote:

> I'd be interested in hearing more about Marjorie Perloff's theory that Serbs are "thugs". Is this a fixed category associated with certain nationalities? Does it change over time? Were, say, Croats "thugs" 50 years ago, but now not "thugs"? Have Bosnian Muslims ever been "thugs", or have they always been--what is the opposite of "thug"--"nice", "peaceful", "friendly"? Good, in any case. Were all Germans "thugs" in the same way all Serbs are "thugs", or was it only memebers of the National Socialist Party? What is the neo-Trotskyist line on this question?

"Thugs" are those that sit on hills above a city and shell children playing soccer, turning the field into a cemetary; "Thugs" are those that refuse UN safe passage to isolated area in order to feed people unable to gather food because of a war; "Thugs" are those that kidnap UN troops as "insurance" against NATO bombings; "Thugs" are those snipers who patiently wait for 11-year-olds to cross their paths. You know them, I know them, is there really any need to clarify this?

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

86. Alan Golding
Re: Exile on Main Street
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Eric:

If you get caught being sympathetic to abusers of barnyard animals, think of the good company you'll be in--see Olson, "There Was a Youth Whose Name Was Thomas Granger."

↑ Index

87. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: prayer
Wed 7 Dec 1994

On Wed, 7 Dec 1994, Chris Stroffolino wrote:

> As for those who accuse Hoover/Baraka of VULGAR MARXISM--What is this VULGAR MARXISM, any Marxism that remembers that the ECONOMIC is the REAL BASE ISSUE????? Well then certainly VULGAR Marxism is preferable to much of the obfuscating poetic/theory discussion that has dominated here for some time now...NOT THAT I MIND obfuscation (the noise of culture per se--but when it PASSES ITSELF OFF as a revolutionary socio-political strategy then.... Besides, this weird hybrid of say Bertolt Brecht and ....(I'll save that harangue for another time). Chris Stroffolino

Yo, vulgar marxism is a model of the relations between the base and superstructure where the economic base determines the superstructure. It's a model marxists have come to distrust for a number of reasons--largely because it is too deterministic and reductive of the complexity of systems of production at present. Any other questions?

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

88. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Eagleton Quote
Wed 7 Dec 1994

On Thu, 1 Dec 1994, Steve Evans wrote:

> *I am not a terrific fan of Terry Eagleton's, but his answer to Eric's question ("how do I not become a commercial") is a compelling one. In The Ideology

> of the Aesthetics, Eagleton writes:*
>
> > If they can place your revolutionary artefacts in their banks then that means only one thing: not that you were not iconoclastic or experimental enough, but that either your art was not deeply enough rooted in a revolutionary political movement, or it was, but that this mass movement failed. How idealist to imagine that _art_, all by itself, could resist incorporation! The question of appropriation has to do with politics, not with culture; it is a question of who is winning at any particular time. If _they_ win, continue to govern, then it is no doubt true that there is nothing which they cannot in principle defuse and contain. If _you_ win, they will not be able to appropriate a thing because you will have appropriated them. The one thing which the bourgeoisie cannot incorporate is its own political defeat. (372)
>
> This of course recalls Benjamin's "and the enemy has not ceased to be victorious" (in "Theses")....

I hope Steve doesn't mind me posting this again, as I believe Mark wanted this.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

89. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: The Prominence and Isolation of the Academy
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Oh, I almost forgot: following up on my comments on the prominence of academics in the national spotlight, did anyone see Camille Paglia on the Conan O'brian show last night? I only caught the end of it, where she was saying that strip clubs were pagan shrines for the worship of the female form--O'brian thought that worth paying homage to (I disagree, with both him and Paglia). I have other thoughts about how these rather reacationary/conservative critics/academics are getting so much press recently--how it's connected to the Republican "landslide" (as if)--but I have to dash off to "work" now so. . . . But hey Harold Bloom's new book--Paglia his student!--seems even part of this movement of "tradition" and canon that is synonomous with the Republican values being promulgated as of late. Did you see how much coverage he got? Time, Newsweek, NYT Review of Books (I think it was that one, or another). Geez, as if he were insulated from what is going on in the world!

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

90. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Exile on Main Street
Wed 7 Dec 1994

On Tue, 6 Dec 1994, Mn Center For Book Arts wrote:

> Jeffrey Timmons writes, "I would > like to join my name (for what its worth) to a list of creative persons, academic sorts, who recognize the need to speak collectively about this situation in order to draw attention to it." I think a lot of our legislators would rather hear from a bunch of single constitutents rather than a list of creative, academic sorts. Both actions are worthwhile, but don't not do the single voice writing or calling. I know from experience that senators & congresspeople (& it's most important to call your local ones, for whom you are the constituent) actually do count calls & letters & keep tabs & sometimes (no, not always) it's those numbers that sway their vote or can even make them speak on the floor. That's why Working Assets giving free phone calls to them actually can help, Tenney. I know it all sounds too simple, but my goodness, let's not look for reasons not to call or write such people. They need to know that there's a radical mainstream experimental poetics group which cares about Bosnia, too.
>
> charles alexander

Point taken. But I think in general I'd still agree w the Baudrillard point: that any time your opinion is solicited, esp. around a yes/no toggle, it's very likely that the question has been formulated in such a way as to make the effects of the "answer" not very efficacious (and also: that the questions tend to get formulated or re-formulated in such a way as to distribute the answers toward 50/50: a great centralizing and inertia-producing mechanism): or: is there "more" or "less" "public opinion" in the polling era than in the pre-polling era? Or as Prodigy likes to put it: "Is O.J. Guilty? YOUR VIEWS" (which gets you to a screen in which you toggle yes/no to a lot of prepared pollster questions). WHich doesn't mean I don't vote or don't phone "my" congressperson. Tenney

↑ Index

91. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: Punk
Wed 7 Dec 1994

George Bowering writes:
>
> Was Punk at one time something other than entertainment?

Yes. It was (mebbe still is somewhere & for some bodies) a collection of attitudes, a subculture, a community--not so very different from what "this" is. Songs like the Dead Kennedy's "Winnebago Warrior" or Black Flag's "TV Party" offered, believe it or not, trenchant (and amusing) critiques of media, consumer culture, & ecotyranny before i got around to Benjamin, Baudrillard etc. The "zines" sold outside punk clubs were my first exposure to do-it-yourself "alternative press" publications, wherein kids (somtimes as young as 10 or 11 as i recall) tried their hand at reviewing records and concerts for themselves, casting their thoughts into editorials on serious political & moral issues, drawing comix, "networking" etc. In fact, the do-it-yourself ethic (something cultivated on this list?) was one of punk's strongest appeals--breaking down the boundaries between audience and performer (as the mosh pit encroached on the stage) etc. etc. I cld go on about its meaning as a "social formation" in my life, at a time when it looked as if the world wld blow itself to bits any day, but I'll stop here for now...

Did it escape commodification as "entertainment"? Not by a long shot--and that process, as other G1-ers (erk, i really hate that appellation) here have suggested, was sometimes a painful and disillusioning one. Even so, it didn't erase the other things that punk was. Is jazz anything other than "entertainment"? How about poetry?

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

92. Tony Green
Re: Exile on Main Street
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Ron, it puts me at your fingertips? Don't forget the "and vice-versa". I welcome Charles Bernstein's long long list. Many of these are familiar. I could add a few to that, combining translation and dice-driven letter group changes etc. the use of only symmetrical capital letters for every word of a text.....

I've been reading The Best of George Gershwin. And Alvy in Woody Allen's Manhattan invited to go see some Sol Le Witt's replies " Yes, that would be fun". And, for a whole lot of other reasons too, there is one little point that needs making. Writing poems is easy, as we all know. Writing poems that we woiuld have others hear, as we would read them off our bit of paper at a lectern, or in the street, (as Ron has, as I have too) or recite in a crowded room on some occasion, and then think of there being others who might read them or recite them, is to turn from the Writing Room (Scene 1) to the Pub(L)ic arena (Scene 2) and there is immediately not only a {POLI-TICS} but an EROTICS.

Questions?

"They're writing songs of love, but not for me...."

If PLEASURE of the Tongue and of the Ear and of the tickled Brain is not forthcoming, who'd dream of listening to poetry ever again, (or read it). The only claim of poetry on the others around the poet is that it gives a variety of pleasures. It MAY -- WELL -- (well?) -- BE the CASE thAT marginalization has occurred not strategically or tactically but by ignoring this simple enough sounding "fact".

Writing poems is necessary because last week's poems no longer satisfy the poet. Last month's may still satisfy the poet's friends. (But why aren't the Gershwin brothers anthologized?)

What is this "compradore" poetry of Ron Silliman's?

Why is seriouu poetry not supposed to take place in cabaret, only in class-rooms? It doesn't make much odds what humanitarian causes poetry advertises. It's the whole jingle inserted into the political jungle of publication (printed, electronic or "sung" aloud) that works an effect on people (e.g. indifference, tomato-throwing, jeers or cheers).

I strongly recommend in the light of all this that poets get back to business. If, as seems to be the case that we are enclosed hopelessly (oy weh!) in a Social that is Show-Biz (! I like that ?) Show-Biz is necessarily the only way to go, but poetry can need it's own spaces, e.g.St Mark's may be, Ear Inn, as well as get out into more Public Spaces, owned and operated by others etc. It's not fame or money, but the honour of the practice of this amazing craft, that is motive.

(Motive enough!)

Doing poetry in public is highly political. There are splendid models available in the fifties and sixties for vigorous performance and writing in public spaces. Then "daring" to say what goes unsaid, out of pressure of business corporations or educational corporations (oops, sorry, I mean universities in their current state forms), is what counts, and there those who are well-versed in researches into what really happens in Bosnia etc can do their thing, like crazy.

As for intervention, Wystan Curnow and Alan Loney and I, armed with slug-guns only are off to make peace in Bosnia to-morrow. It's really so simple, after all we're Kiwi Kids, we can do it....(Wystan and Alan don't know this yet).

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand

Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

93. James Sherry
Re: The National Question, etc.
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Re Ron's lengthy and gestural response I have much agreement but a couple of concerns that concern us as poets. If Ron is worried that the University is too isolated, how can we view the poetry community. At the University you have to negotiate between administration, staff, teaching staff and the students. In the poetry world we can't even agree among a group of people who by virtue of common interests and experience in their "chosen" endeavor should by all rights agree.

But we don't. I would attribute the issues in the poetry community to our ideas. Not that they are good or bad, but that if the most of the world treat property as value, we treat ideas as value and as such hoard them as surely as the miser hoardes gold and claim them as ours and if a difference of a word or two crops up, create a stink that would clear out the skunk farm. Distinctions, differences, adjustments to distinctions. Where's the beef and Marjorie might say...

Second, the use value of Marxisms being in doubt right now, we have a chance to carve out some relationships between its dualisms and the three pronged arguments about ecology and the four sided arguments about personalities and the five sided discussion in the systems universe about types of social groupings until we were blue in the face.

We do seem to be in agreement that nation states hardly exist as other than coffers of resources for transnationals. The refusal of the left to support a nation state in the Prop 187 argument is proof that we are internationalists regardless who is running the show. One species on the planet and eventually one set of leadership. It is up to each of us to contribute to the fact of internationalism in our own way. I for one am interested in shaping it rather than resisting a faite accompli. JAMES

↑ Index

94. Tom Mandel
Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
Wed 7 Dec 1994

It has taken me a couple of hours to read (at least partly) the extraordinary number of contributions to this list which have arrived in cyberlitterland over the last couple of days. My survival, i.e. time enough to pay the bills and make money enough to do so, depends on you cutting it out.

1. For 5 years during WWII neither the English nor any other allied power laid an intentional single bomb across the railroad tracks that led how many thousands of jews gypsies gay people per day? to doom. Does this make them thugs?

2. I was a grad student for 6 years, have taught in 3 universities, have worked for large corporations, as well as quasi-gov'tal organizations, and have written and lived poetry off and on all my life. Without question, and by metaphorical orders of magnitude, the most serializing, cutthroat, thoughtless and non-oppositional (i.e. slavish) environment I ever lived in was the academy. Lagging far behind is the world of poetry, although as poets move into the academy some of them unveil an extraordinary capacity to take on that local color (and others, on the other hand, retain the exceptional generosity of nature and act that will make you know whom I mean not to be commenting on). There is a strong sense of comradeship among poets somehow, at least I have always noted it, which mediates if not moderates the lust for... any response honor position the opportunity to make a living by your wit of words, whatever. This comradeship I think it is which allows a poet like Henry Taylor to write so meaningly about Jackson Maclow, and which allows me to enjoy getting to know HT despite thezero in common of our work. Much more open, all the same, much more egalitarian, much more permissive of range has been the world of commerce. I remember how shocking, and somehow wrong, I found that fact.

3. The above is what James Sherry might call a "theory based on memory... not analysis" (that's a paraphrase rather than a quote, but close I think). All theories are of memory (a term whichwe need not trivialize) and on the other hand, analysis (despite the brilliant series of posts by James which had me gasping with pleasure to keep up with) is a meaningless term, an honorific in any case, and a metaphor (understand by dividing : divide and conquer, really) of little application. Recursive systems (i.e. memory-based and developmental in whatever chaotic way) offer the ability to accumulate insight at some social level; they are what can get us beyond MThatcher's "no society, just individuals" position.

4. What I say in point 3 is intended to make you understand that what I say in point 2 is true.

5. I've been fired from positions both academic and in commerce, in both cases (repeatedly, by the way) for the same reason, for having an idea. In commerce, at least usually, it was because the idea didn't work. In the academy? Just for having an idea.

6. When I quoted Hugh of St. Victor on exile, it was not so that you (dear reader) should have your consciousness perfected by the right position, but that you might take in and "experimentally" share a response. Again, the goal is to accumulate and distribute some largest possible sense of human response. Nothing is more foolish than to spend one's days distinguishing between on the one hand vulgar marxism and on the other hand a marxism appropriate to the changes in the organization of capitol. None of us can know at all what the structure of capitol is. For one thing we are part ofit, for another only a bounded thing can be "analyzed" (but, see above), and it is not that. And, finally, why do we wish to constrain the mind to appropriate response, when it is the mind that makes that world of capitol. Make something else.

7. I now work for myself. That's what I learned. If anyone would pay me, I'd teach for myself (I do seem to know a great deal; drop over some time - you probably know a lot too), but they don't so instead packet filtering routers, virtual circuits, negotiation, managing payables and receivables, closing complex deals, usw. are my daily fun, and I do mean that. They call for no analysis. James, at least so I think, knows about such devices too. Having known each other for going on 2 decades, you might wonder why we've never worked together.

8. Grad student, quit school. But, I can't tell whether Steve Evans or Patrick Phillips or Jeffery Timmons or Eric Pape or others (very few women, very little evidence of a point of view of color, very little sense of a specifically Jewish pov, very little in any sense specific to anything whatever, informed by anything not on the other guy, yeh guy's reading list. If you are on faculties, quit. Anyway, Ron's right; your industry is heading for a collapse, it has lost all justification.

9. Paul Hoover's position is overwhelmingly informed by work he has done to know, accept and make use of his own sources. Ditto Ron Silliman. These positions are without irony, unhidden in trashy even disgraceful joking that there is no relationship between your person and your position, as if these were different in some principled way.

10. We all have a responsibility, a political responsibility, to make something (dare I use the word?) positive, i.e. existent and contributory to the larger thing which is merely the contributory nature of all that is positive. This means pleasure in writing and a sense of the permission of form beyond theory as the only real contact we have with the unknown, i.e. with value. As above, this is a recursive procedure; it can be justified by nothing outside it. Without being local (i.e. Serbian or Croatian : bonnet blanc, blanc bonnet), it is endlessly specific. Attending to it is a discovery, uncovering, of more specificity.

11. Oh. In 8 above, you may think I'm being dismissive. Or glib, in advising you to quit. You have families, you have to have a job. Sure, no problem. Nor do I take the Platonic position that a slave is one by nature or essence : if not, he'd be dead. After all, I was fired, I wasn't offed! I prefer the Jewish position, be kind to the slave. In the jubilee year, free all the slaves (what the heck, most of them will enslave themselves again). (of course, that's only one of the jewish positions, i.e. positions in the rabbinic tradition - which is always what I mean by the term "jewish").

12. I knew a poet once who was quite wealthy - by marriage. He lived well, by which I mean in a bohemian manner and much like the rest of us, all young enough (tho some older than others) not really to notice, to accumulate, difference from where it sprung. In any case, this poet didn't need a job. Yet, a time came when the poet wanted to work. The poet once asked me for a job, but I didn't have one to offer. Some years later, the poet decided to enter grad school, got a Phd somewhere in the humanities, and then got a teaching job and began to live very differently from how we had all lived -- in any case, we were all living differently, having gotten older, and that was no surprise. The poet's poetry hardly changed at all.

13. Because of what I say in 11, that is why I have written mildly and without wishing to give offense. It is a subject, what responsibility is taken not to articulate a position correctly but to live a worthwhile life. Don't you think it idiotic to imagine that the conditions no longer inhere for that possibility?

14. There is no such thing as silent prayer. "Oh Lord, bring the arrogant kingdom to an end, speedily and in our days." Anybody know the reference?

Tom Mandel

* T O M M A N D E L * 2927 Tilden St. NW * Washington DC 20008 * Voice: [redacted] [redacted]
FAX: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

95. Abby Coykendall

con in on late night

Wed 7 Dec 1994

Concerning late-night Camille
P. and C. oÕBrian bit, to whom ever, I am in much disagreement.
Whether Madonna or Camille,
I think it is entirely wrong to argue with them on intellectual grounds, esp. as an acedemic.

They are ÒpublicÓ not ÒacedemicÓ objects, phenomenon of mass-appeal and thus mass-capital, and as such, I think the former Òmass appealÓ part takes precedence, I donÕt dislike people for merely making money, only for making that money wrongly. Camille speaks much more to a public than we, acedemics, she has more public to speak to. In being _feminist_ she can be highly hazardous, or quite good. I think sheÕs the later. I think she makes naive arguments that I donÕt agree with. I think if she made complex, good, truly smart arguments that I liked, she wouldnÕt be on the Conan oÕB show. I want her to be on that show.
I want somebody in the media who has some audacity and dare calls herself a, god forbid, __feminist__ which very seldemly gets good press. I want that person to acknowledge that there are many types of feminism, so as not to make one (bad) thing of it. I want this so when I introduce my students to it [them], I donÕt have to spend too much time not using the (bad) word, which has gotton quite bad press. I have (now at the end of the semester) many who are quite radical feminists who still refuse to call themselves __feminist__ because of this bad press.

Camille P. did me a favor.
Camille P. is one of the only women IÕve seen on ConanÕs show who is not just sexy, but smart (however naive).
Has smart things on her mind, rather than hidding them in some fashionable outfit.
As to the Òpagan worshipÓ thing.
I thought that quite funny.
Funny is something expected on late night TV.
This funny happened to be slightly untrue.
I truly donÕt care.
Women do have (more power than is thought) in strip bars.
Than is thought.
Than is thought. The media generally thinks their body is there most powerful. Their body is their most powerful. As power, the womenÕs is most often there.
It is true that women are not just victimÕs, they have more power than is thought. Camille was undoing this thinking, not making a very intellectual statement. As a public statement goes, it was good.
As something to say to a woman, it might have been great: take control of your body, your self. Make yourself get out of that usually scripted role of victim. Make yourself into a new script.
This is okay public speak.

Makes bad acedemic press.
-------abby c.

↑ Index

96. Donald J. Byrd
Experiments
Wed 7 Dec 1994

Dear Charles--

I suppose you in part posted the list of experiments as an homage to Bernadette, and of course I wish her well.... And it is also a tribute to Tzara, Cage, and Mac Low, all of whom I would likewise honor.

Although, as you know, I sometimes--perhaps often-- do not agree with you, I take your work very seriously. I find most of your moves in relation to the art generative--decisively so. And I have attempted to understand why you introduce these "experiments" in the context of your of your proposal of poetry as experimentation.

The use of that kind of experiment, when it was of use, was to rend the placid, rational surface of smug and placid rationalism. There was a powerful, even controlling assurance, that the world made sense. One half of Modernism was commitment to the revelation of precisely that sense--Yeats, Pound, Joyce, Shoenberg, Anglo-American philosophy from Russell and Wittgenstein to Quine and the Cognitive Scientists. It is sadly reduced but the drivel that comes from most Creative Writing programs to this day still basks in that now grim assurance that because I saw a blue jay on a maple branch take a shit, it most have some true and important connection to my thought of mortality.

The irruption of the irrational and its disruption of that smug sense of the world--whether from the Dadaist/surrealist algorithms of non-sense or from the failure to make it cohere by the like of Pound-- was immensely satisfying and, of course, immensely productive.

The mode of production that had proven so successful in art was adapted in the 1950's also to commercial production. The rational machine of the capitalist economy began exploiting its own material unconscious, thus, fueling unparalleled economic growth. The surface of the earth was increasingly covered with the chaotic residue of riotous production: the production of art, the production of consumer goods, the production of by-products that polluted the environment, the production of what Smithson called "the slurbs"P"a circular gulf between city and countryPa place where buildings seem to sink away from one's visionP buildings fall back into sprawling babels or limbos. Every site glides away toward absence. An immense negative entity of formlessness displaces the center which is the city and the swamps."

For the generation of artists born of the World War II-- "born dead," Smithson says of them, everything they'd learned was wrong. The techniques of the artists who had interested them in art in the first place, whom they had admired and thought to imitate, turned out to be inappropriate to this new condition. Dadaism lives: it is taught at in the Harvard M.B.A. program. Surrealism lives: it is taught to computer programmers at M.I.T. (some might say, mathematics has proven so strange, that it is taught even in the math department). Our architects, our lawyers are modernist purveyors of chaos (to say nothing, of course, of the faceless committees which generate what we call the media). After a certain point, chaos no longer needed the help of art. To recall wild nature in tranquility, to practice nihilistic techniques of art and thought, to do automatic writing, or to create chance generated art is a pointless gesture. The techniques that delivered fresh air in 1810 or 1910 contributed (though contributed insignificantly) by 1970 to a proliferation of incomprehensible energy. The Dadaists never managed to exhibit the degree of chaos that Smithson records in his snap shots of Passaic, New Jersey.

It seems to me that these experiments at this late date call us back to means that are as exhausted as the means of a poetry that still attempts to make "ordinary" sense of a world where one watch a blue jay crap and thinks of mortality or Aunt Minnie.

If we are going to experiment, let us experiment with all seriousness. Stephen Hawking concludes _A Brief History of Time_ with these words:

"... if we do discover a complete theory, it should be understandable in broad outline by everyone, not just a few scientists. Then we shall all, philosophers, scientists, and just ordinary people, be able to take part in the discussion of the question of why it is that we and the universe exist. If we find the answer to that , it would be the ultimate triumph of human reason--for then we would know the mind of God."

To be sure, there is something very slippery in Hawking and those who make similar arguments (this guy Frank J. Tippet who has a very popular reading of physics right now is a real hoot) in that they confuse their representations for the world (as many writers make the opposite mistake). But I cannot help but notice the disparity between Hawking's hoped for result and the hoped for results in doing cut-ups of _Being and Time_ and _The National Enquirer_.

It seems to me that if poetry is going to be taken seriously, it is going to have to ask more of itself. I would suggest that we take Parmenides, Lucretius, and Blake--Blake the thinker-- as our models. It is going to be tough to teach the Workshop to do that, and we do not have much time, but we have time for nothing less. If no one writes a poem for fifty years that is okay. There was plenty of pass-times.

I do not mean that we can write _like_ Parmenides, Lucretius, and Blake, but we might undertake the task of producing a world that offer the commodious possibilities for knowledge that theirs do.

The notion of avant-gardism and avant-garde experimentalism are profoundly progressivist. Even as the avant-guardists explored the most primitive recesses of culture and mythology, or the depths of dream and intoxication, systematic or random disorganization, the orientation was toward an expansion of consciousness into the unknown. The avant-gardists were the imperialists of the spirit, brothers and sisters to the colonists. The parallels between Walt Whitman's adventures into the soul and the United States adventures on its passage to India cannot be dismissed. Just as the modernists travelled along with the colonizing anthropologoists. It is not for us now a matter of judgement. The time is long passed, and we can say only that that something, which had been lurking in human possibilities, hidden, made itself powerfully manifest: it was beautiful, unjust, vicious, and inevitable, and now complete. One cannot imagine the usefulness of such a concept in a world devoted to sustainable uses of resources.

The best assessments of the ecological damage are produced by different models and do not give consistent results. It would seem that after this extended period of cultural sacrifice for the sake of developing representational techniques that are accurate and complete it should be possible to model the world environment with considerable accuracy. The various representations, however, give a remarkable range of results, and we do not have a science for determining which representation is the best. We have theories and theories of theories, but in this most significant of matters, where the stakes are all or nothing, we do not know any thing for certain. It is generally clear, however, that the present industrial- environmental practices cannot be continued indefinitely without causing irreversible damage to the world ecosystem. In 1990, the well respected World Watch Foundation estimated that present trends would cause irreparable damage in forty years. Even if we have five times that long we are already in the crisis.

Certain aspects of desire were regimented (often at great personal cost) in the service of an organization devoted to greed. Communism proposes a greater justice in dividing up the booty, but it too is profoundly progressivist. What was repressed and is still effectively repressed is in fact obvious: the finitude of the earth.

For a very long time in the West we tried to base knowledge on the notion of infinitude. The critique of that notion has left art almost totally befuddled and trivial.

Let us begin with the finitude of the earth. This seems fairly secure knowledge, the grounds for a new epos. Over a century ago, John Ruskin wrote:

"The real science of political economy, which has yet to be distinguished form the bastard science, as medicine from witchcraft, and astronomy from astrology, is that which teaches nations to desire and labor for the things that lead to life, and which teaches them to scorn and destroy the things that lead to destruction."

How, Charles, do we get it all out of the poetry workshops?

Best,

Don Byrd

↑ Index

97. k.lindberg

Re: Exile on Main Street

Thu 8 Dec 1994

I shall gather materials for those interested, re: Bosnia Herzegovina group in London, New York . Etc. This will take me a day,since my books are with my addresses in an office I can't reach at the moment. Let me just say, though, that Civil War is a LOADED term. The war, acknowledged by all and espcially by the UN even in the first phases of the war, which meant in Croatia and even Slovenia, was a war of aggression. After all, though Slovenia, Croatia, and Bosnia seceeded (also a complex story) from the Yugoslav Federation, Serbia, principal in the JNA (Yugo. National Army) had vitually all the military bases and weapons. Anyway, there is a great deal of information and misinformation to dig through. This is hard stuff, but difficulties of communication and accurate political assessment should not keep us/one from venturing forth, at least as far as trying to get a fix on part of a whole scary kindling to another ethnonationalist conflagration.

More to follow, but meanwhile. . . It does help to contact legislators individually; it also helps to contact "contact groups" and the representatives of govt's of former Yugoslavia. There are Bosnian missions and Croatian embassies in several cities; New York being principal here as always.

As I mentioned, I shall get useful information to those interested. I am sorry that it might be a few days, but I am tripping through a very complex moment in my life. TRIPPING in the sense of falling and catching my step, not in what is now a very old San Francisco acid sense.

I do think that it behooves poets and philosophers (funny work,that last) to (seek to) address THE WORLD, from which there is no escape, anyway. Discussions of Marxism, as much as they escape concern over academic or p.r. capital, are most important. However, given the complex investments, both utopian and intellectual, in Tito's Yugoslavia, ironies abound if one attempts to reconcile such discussions with the war.

↑ Index

98. k.lindberg
Re: Exile on Main Street
Thu 8 Dec 1994

James Sherry's observations about the cost of war profiteering and the skewed and screwed hopes of the young men and the very old men (in Serbia, Croatia, all over the former USSR) are quite to the point. Once again, after all the World War(s) and hot little distractions in outposts of various empires, war is the bloody displacement of desire, the means by which a few extract too much from so many. It's an ugly scene over there; nearly as simple as thugs with no power feeling the illusory power of being able to sign on to consumerism, the perfume, as Duchamp might say, of the atalier, no, as Marinetti would say the abattoirs. That is no thin line.

↑ Index

99. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Eagleton Quote
Thu 8 Dec 1994

I just devised a fancy little macro (most of you probably have a system-generated function to do this) to gather up, automatically, all the POETICS missives in my INBOX and slide them over to HOLDPOETICS, till I have time to read them--so I can see my un-cyber-bounced mail once the pruning has been done. Just auto-toted over 54 messages in the last 36 hours or so (most not short, nuther). The joint jumpin'....

(so much for Eagleton?)

Tenney

↑ Index

100. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Exile on Main Street
Thu 8 Dec 1994

On Wed, 7 Dec 1994, Alan Golding wrote:

> Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
> Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]
>
> Eric:
>
> If you get caught being sympathetic to abusers of barnyard animals, think of the good company you'll be in--see Olson, "There Was a Youth Whose Name Was Thomas Granger."

"and no use made of any part of them" (sigh)

↑ Index

101. George Bowering
Re: Punk
Thu 8 Dec 1994

Dear SHS,

Thanks for the good words on Punk. I didnt pay much attention to it, though my great friend Greg Curnoe did seriously. I suppose that the whole ethos and maybe the words in (smudgy) print were interesting, and oppositional in a useful way. I dont know. I understood what they were saying when they insisted on poorly-played two chords and all. But really, I didnt want to listen to a song twice.

↑ Index

102. Ron Silliman

Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.

Thu 8 Dec 1994

"Thug" is derived from "thag," a Hindi word for cheat or swindler and was introduced into English in the 17th Century to refer to the p'hansigar -- professional robbers who strangled their victims, an enterprise known as "thugee."

It was adapted in the 19th century to refer to any form of organized domestic terrorism, from street gangs to "electoral thugs" who kept people from voting (or voting 'the wrong way'). Earliest uses in the OED suggest that the shift came when referring to Scots as thugs.

Thus the term as we know and use it is heavily tinged with the stigma of the Other (thugs are darker than "us") and coded with the practices of colonialism. It was British laws against the "race" of the Irish that were first imitated in setting up the laws of segregation in the USA.

There is a certain irony to its use in this discourse. The Serb governments (plural: Serbian Bosnia is not identical to "greater" Serbia as a political entity) are certainly fascist: using nationalism as an excuse and genocide as a practice to create a military state with an internally capitalist economy. This doesn't make saints out of either the Croats or the Muslim community of Bosnia.

↑ Index

103. Eric Selinger

U'Makhniya Zedim

Thu 8 Dec 1994

Tom Mandel asked if anyone knew the reference for "Oh Lord, bring the arrogant kingdom to an end, speedily and in our days."

In my book it's "uproot, crush, rout, subdue."

Daily Shmoneh Esreh, just between the prayers for righteous judgment and for scholars.

The question remains--why do I now keep thinking of Phil Dick's VALIS?

"The Empire never ended."

EMS

↑ Index

104. Susan Schultz

Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.

Thu 8 Dec 1994

Since the discussion has lately touched upon issues of nationalism and the academy (albeit in separate "strands"), I thought I'd inject some comments about the ways in which the two are intimately related in the 50th state. One of the foremost advocates of Hawaiian (as in the ethnic group, not simply the citizens of the state) sovereignty is Haunani Kay Trask, head of the Hawaiian Studies department at the University of Hawaii. The issue of Hawaiian sovereignty is much at the forefront of Hawaii politics at present; activists demand everything from greater self-determination under the current system to complete secession from the United States. One group moved onto an Oahu beach for over a year and raised a large sign declaring the formation of a Hawaiian state; after much arm-twisting from the state government, which needs to at least feign sympathy, the protesters were moved into a valley, where they are at least not seen (from the point of view of the governor, that is). Trask, who was educated at the University of Wisconsin, is one of the loudest advocates of sovereignty and one of the most provocative. She's recently come out with a book of essays, _From a Native Daughter: Colonialism & Sovereignty in Hawai'i_, and a book of poems, _Light in the Crevice Never Seen_, which is remarkable to me for its absolute conservatism of form and language (though Hawaiian words are sprinkled throughout). In one representative passage she points to the university as a colonial institution (from an essay, that is):

> For Hawaiians, American colonialism has been a violent process: the violence of mass death, the violence of American missionizing, the violence of cultural destruction, the violence of the American military. Once the United States annexed my homeland, a new kind of violence took root: the violence of educational colonialism, where foreign haole (foreigners, white people--the two are the same!) values replace Native Hawaiian values; where schools, like the University of Hawai'i, ridicule Hawaiian culture and praise American culture, and where white men assume the mantle of authority, deciding what is taught, who can teach, even what can be said, written, and published.

Trask has been at the center of a couple of free speech issues in the last four or five years; most recently, a cartoonist for the student newspaper took her to task for a poem from her new book, "Racist White Woman." The paper was very reluctant to publish her response to him. Her claim is that the poem is about a specific woman, so that it's not racist (and one of my students, an African-American, got very upset that some people have taken the poem personally rather than as a response to similar feelings that have gone the other way for too long). My sense is that Trask meant to evoke such a response ("woman," after all, is generic as well as specific). Here's the poem, whose rhetoric is not at all exceptional:

> I could kick
> your face, puncture
> both eyes.
>
> You deserve this kind > of violence.
>
> No more vicious > tongues, obscene > lies.
>
> Just a knife
> slitting your tight > little heart
>
> for all my people > under your feet
>
> for all those years > lived smug and wealthy
>
> off our land
> parasite arrogant.
>
> A fist
> in your painted > mouth, thick
>
> with money and piety > and a sworn > black promise
>
> to shadow > your footsteps
>
> until the hearse
> of violence
>
> comes home
> to get you.

Now imagine yourselves, if you are white, teaching this poem to a group of students almost none of whom are white, who've grown up in an educational system that has persuaded them that mainland values are better than "local"

ones, and who are, therefore, many of them--well, the word ornery comes to mind. This past semester as I taught poetry from Hawaii and the Caribbean, I found myself repeatedly in situations where the overwhelming emotions of the moment made ordinary, rational, academic interventions seem fruitless. And which made my position of authority problematic, at best, since the students had an emotional investment in the material that was far greater than mine. I found that the best, or only way, to deal with it was to set the students up to debate each other, rather than to try to guide them somewhere I wanted them to go.

As for the poem, if turnabout is fair play, then where on earth do we go from here? This is what bothers me most; what is violence rhetoric in this case, is actual violence elsewhere. How can be address the nationalisms that live among us (including native American nationalisms)? How can we balance these against a larger American self-definition, whatever that may be? Yes, the world is Gattifying, becoming more and more international. But it's also becoming more and more local. The idea of the Pacific Rim actually only includes Asia and America--what happens to the islands in-between, with their self-definitions at stake? And how can university professors (my classroom, at least in this case, WAS the real world) fruitfully participate in these debates? These are not rhetorical questions!

Susan M. Schultz

↑ Index

105. Tom Mandel
Re: U'Makhniya Zedim
Thu 8 Dec 1994

The point of my reference to the daily prayer of all jews that the arrogant kingdom be destroyed (an arrogant kingdom whose identity changes as time and space change the speaking [i.e. praying] voice) was, as Eric Sellinger doubtless understands, to inform with the evidence of a life practice the repeated references to the 'known" function of "religious" values/ institutions/practices, which references have about the same "positive" content as most of the references to what the other does that live in the posts and "politics" "?" of this list, i.e. little and that usually to pass along a counter of agreement, again to make sure everybody is reading the same reading list, and no new world-facts storm our interpretations.

The point of my reference to the genteel allied practice of allowing the uninterrupted operation of the great death train system of the germans, an allowance referred to from time to time in British foreign office papers as a contribution to solving "the jewish problem" to come post-war and asking whther these were thugs was, as Ron Silliman immediately grasped and philologically supported, that there is no group whose nature character history it is to undertake what the serbians have undertaken. No, we don't know who the "thugs" are. We don't, as I fail to remember whose post had it, know who is sitting on a hill waiting for schoolchildren to enter the open so as to destroy them. We don't know, because it's not somebody different from who you are looking at whenever you are looking at the next person (nor is that intended as an accusation).

tom mandel

↑ Index

106. Eric Selinger

Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.

Thu 8 Dec 1994

As a former haole, back on the mainland, I'm shaken (not stirred) by that poem, Susan, and by your apt portrayal of the classroom context in which these issues often play themselves out. I gnawed a similar bone last semester, trying to choose what Baraka poems (if any) to teach in a survey course--the Heath conveniently forgets to mention any of his anti-semetic work, just as it forgets to mention Rukeyser's Jewishness, or Tillie Lerner Olsen's, raising questions in its own right.

But I digress.

Clearly this is a poem that's meant to make some of its readers buck up, validated, and others shrink and squirm, red-faced and stung. I wonder--is it the sort of poem I'm supposed to give the nod to (include in classes, etc.) as a gesture of multicultural solidarity, at least until the guns start firing and the calls for ethnic cleansing begin? Do I turn away right from the start, on the theory that I and the public know what every schoolchild learns, and that my family and I might not be first up against the wall when the revolution came, but we'd be on the wrong side of history nonetheless? Is this a case--since Tom Mandel asked about positionally "Jewish" responses--in which Deut. 23:3 comes into play: to let the students hash it out without specifically addressing its threat to you and connection with all kinds of bad stuff worldwide falls under the heading of "showing deference to a poor man in his dispute"?

Questions, questions. Will muse on this.

EMS

↑ Index

107. eric pape
Academy, etc.
Thu 8 Dec 1994

I wanted to respond thoughtfully, and I hope I do, to Tom's extremely thoughtful posting. In many ways, I think he is right; he certainly had me pegged, but I wonder how much he knows what we (my generation, my class whatever) out there in the "Real World" have to face. Listen, for me, in the placeI grew up, it wasn't a choice between the academy and Phillip Morris; it was a choice between the academy and Wal-mart, or if I was lucky, the Borax mines. I'm not trying to say that my situation was wors than any number of people;in fact I was lucky to have that choice because if you were Latino where I grew up, it meant digging ditches for Cal Trans or Mcy Ds. Yes I am white, or, where I grew up, white trash, where it still means something besides a cookbook deal with Random House. And yes, my family still lives in a trailer park, still drinks light beer all night on a sofa in in the front yard, still gets weekly vists from Child Welfare.... But you've heard that a hundred times already in mainstream poetry/ fiction. I don't mean to make a big deal with it, because it is not a big deal in a time when people are shot at on the way to the Circle-K (in Bosnia or Southcentral), but it perhaps explains whyI decided on the academy. The academy been bery bery good to me... Because the academy supported me when no one could. Period. Due to wonderful wealth of the state of California when I was coming up, and due to fact I was poor enough to be called underprivileged, I never paid tuition. Got grants and later, in Louisiana, got a GTA. I'm not here in the academy because somehow I think I will be engaged in pure research, pure poetry, pure work for the work's sake. I'm here for the money, because if someone is willing to give you money to sit around and think about stuff, I say take it. Because this is the only chance I had. In L.A., they were going to give me 6.5 an hour with a BA from a third rate CSU to work 60 a week. My mother in the local Stop and Go makes 9.25 now. I decided to go back into the academy. Listen, it seems to me, and this is as I write this between an incredible amount of work all due next week, that it is quite easy to criticize the choices of others when you are comfortable professionally, I mean canonized, professionally and personally. Many of the things Tom said are perfectly true, but, I know the Real World. I've seen a good deal of my family die from it, toxic poisoning from the Borax, "accidents" at the construction site, and a shit load of alcohol related diseases. Give me the choice between that and the academy, and I'll take the academy.Thanks, Eric ([redacted] u)

↑ Index

108. Clint Burnham
Re: prayer
Thu 8 Dec 1994

Yeah, and chris don't forget "vulgar postmodernism" (the belief that the world is made up of silly people who write Guy Debord obituaries & don't realize he meant spectacle, and nice gallic word, and not show biz, a nasty north american wqord), and "vulgar poststructuralism" (the belief that totalizing hurts more than breathing partition dust in an office), and so post vulgar on.

just to bring you up to date.

Clint-o

↑ Index

109. James Sherry
Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.
Thu 8 Dec 1994

The issue of characterization, calling people thugs or jews or tall, is difficult to address alone, because one will always come up against an unanswerable question which is the intention of the speaker. Black kids call each other nigger and the common wisdom is that they can say it and non-black people can't. In the movie "Wanderers" I remember a classroom scene where the teacher tries to list the names kids call each other by way of teaching them the sticks and stones may break my bones lesson. The result of the lesson isthat the class falls to real fighting. But later in the movie when those same kids: black, chinese, italian and jewish are playing together and are attacked by a nameless hatred of the other personified by an anglo gang, they unite and defeat the gang, supporting the sticks and stones point of view. We may characterize, but the question is does the characterization prevent us from seeing the real nature of the problem.

When Marjorie calls the serbs thugs, she misses the point of why the serbs are doing what they are doing. It is not of use to characterize them and by doing so cloak their intention in their thuggery. Their intention must be addressed. If we ask them, what do you want and they say we want the Muslims land. One can say yes or no. To say they are thugs is to create a conflict that the serbs cannot understand and to put us in the same position vis a vis our objective and the serbs are vis a vis their objective. If we say to the serbs, no you cannot have that land, we must be prepared to act accordingly. If we are not prepared to act accordingly we are accomplices of the serbs.

Viola Spolin in her book Theater Games I believe is the title suggests a game where people have conversation without the pronouns, without, narrative, without description, and without facts. It is a difficult exercise and suggest we try it before we start attacking or defending the serbs way of behaving and as it has been suggested worry about how the Muslims will behave when the Republicans lift the arms embargo and support the Communist serbs with massive air power. Thugee becomes thug at the drop of a gat.

As is pointed out it is not an easy question because we cannot easily discern another's intention and because although we deplore violence we mostly recognize our right to defend ourselves.

The anti-Islamic issue in European politics plays as much a part as the serbs activities, but as I have tried to point out with my tale of visiting serbia, the intention "land" must be addressed directly, not by characterizing, but by taking certain risks which no one in this discussion would consider participating in.

Inflammatory rhetoric is most often the province of non-combatants.

↑ Index

110. Clint Burnham

Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professi

Thu 8 Dec 1994

---

the problem is you're ewither working with people you like & you can't talk about a lot in common or with people you don't like and have too much to talk about with

↑ Index

111. Susan Schultz

haoles

Thu 8 Dec 1994

I'm glad to hear from a "former haole," Eric--though isn't that in a sense part of the problem; can you imagine being a former African American or former Asian American? I'm not sure that the kind of discourse that I quote by Haunani Trask leads _necessarily_ to ethnic cleansing, though it certainly bears resemblance with the rhetoric _of_ ethnic cleansing. And that's part of the problem teaching the material; do you opt with those who suggest that rhetoric is powerful but, paradoxically, not a call to real action? Or do you take it as a call to arms that is intended to include you? If there's a more moderate position to take on the question, which I suspect there might be (being a foolish optimist), will anyone in the heat of the moment actually listen?

I just attended a lecture by David Lloyd on "nationalisms against the state." He talked about the current Irish situation, in which the Irish (whoever they are) are perhaps trading cultural power for economic colonization by the new Europe. The upside of Hawaiian nationalism, so far, has been the reemergence of Hawaiian culture outside the province of the tourist industry, which has "preserved" that culture by presenting it as a self-parody for the consumption of outsiders. Trask wants Hawaiian hotel workers to start trashing the hotels; doesn't she face, then, the increasing poverty of her people for the benefit of re-creating an ethnic and cultural (in this case the same, I guess) identity? She wants and expects culture to do political work, which Lloyd is suggesting may not be possible in the face of GATT and NAFTA. Lloyd suggests that local resistance is possible without the ultimate goal being that of creating a new state on the example of the old, as he claims happened in Ireland in the 1920s. Trask agreed with him on this, which suggests (I hope) that "ethnic cleansing" may not be the result of resistance. The violence may come, instead, from above--as is happening in Russia? I don't know.

Some afterthoughts on teaching: in some sense our horror at Gingrich's being an academic seems beside the point. At the University of Hawaii one simply is the representative of the state, the nation, some sort of American canon. This implicates you in all sorts of things, no matter how liberal you are. Trask is right on this one. One can (as I and many of my colleagues do) cede authority in the classroom, present oneself honestly as a "professor from the mainland with such and such degrees), and then find that in that absence name-calling begins. I don't know, it's a confusing situation to be in. I suppose in the case of Baraka, which Eric cites, one needs to present a "fair" cross-section of his work, and then argue out what is of value, and to whom. But the ethical pressures are, in any case, immense, whether one includes or excludes such material (and several students called me on the fact that I'd xeroxed her--Trasks's--"racist white woman" poem, but not her erotically charged celebrations of the land). At such a point the instructor's discomfort with authority turns into a kind of nostalgia for it! And alternative authorities are created in the classroom, some of them overt, and some of them subversive, no matter how fair-minded you think you're being.

On a more personal note to Eric, I'm a great admirer of your work on Crane and Gluck, et al. Glad to hear that you add "haole" to your credentials . . .

Susan

↑ Index

112. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: Academy, etc.
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Eric Pape's reply to Tom Mandel's post said some things that needed to be said. Mandel said a lot of good, thoughtful things but i cld do without his self-righteous advice to "drop out" of grad school. Everybody's got their own history/choices to wrestle with and blanket admonitions of that sort are simply worthless.

Not to put him on the spot, but i heard Charles Bernstein say some interesting things about the academy as a working environment when he came to C-ville this fall. Charles, are u there?

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

113. Steve Evans
Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Let me report, for James's benefit, that I did indeed manage to make myself whole by thinking, though evidently the effect was temporary and I again find myself fragmented. The experience wasn't as bad as the past two decades of (a)social thought had lead me to believe--definitely worth a few blisters.

Irony aside, my header actually refers to some lines from an early Rosmarie Waldrop poem, "Linear," in which she speaks of being in history as receiving "personal blisters from / impersonal burns." The particular context in her case, being born into a Germany already under Nazi control (see The Hanky of Pippin's Daughter).

The most convincing case for action on the Serbian aggression in Bosnia would be one that showed the blisters here from the burns there. The isolationist line held by our own newly ascendent authoritarians denies that there are any. And if you don't think the possibility of showing those connections involves contesting the legitimacy of capitalism, you haven't been paying attention to how and by whom information is structured in this country.

Not vulgar Marxism then, but obvious anti-capitalism (obvious in Oppen's sense of what you cannot not see) is what is needed--not as an end, but as a starting point.

And it is needed in every one of the contexts we've seen discussed in the past week, whether .com or .edu. What I wanted to say in response to Ron's initial "Exile on Main Street Post" was simply that anti-capitalism involves one in no necessary contradiction in education (necessary is the operative word here), whereas it most patently does in the various enterprises that have been named (Deutsche Bank, Philip Morris, C=O=M=P=U=T=E=R=L=A=N=D, etc.) as gainful employers. That is, you can universalize education; you can't universalize capitalism.

(Since each time I say such things, someone insinuates that the position is criminally naive, can I here request that any such response take the trouble to explicitly expose the "error of my ways"? I am open to instruction, but insinuation just makes me anxious.)

Two final things: does anyone have word of promising responses to the latest attempt to eliminate the NEA? I would be especially interested in hearing about ways that we can link the inevitable debate about its preservation to demands that it be made responsive to the needs of actually existing artists rather than exquisite careerists.

And, finally, I just wanted to say what a pleasure the recent weeks' discussions have been--largely because of all the "new" voices now on the list. Thanks to everyone for the insights.

Steve Evans

↑ Index

114. Chris Stroffolino

Re: prayer

Fri 9 Dec 1994

---

well clint one wonders if there's nothing but gossip at the end of this tunnel of vulgar hight postmarxism that flagellates self-importantly like the Ramones trying to play acoustic. You know, the "I care about global things" kind of intellectual ruse that might as well be Ruskin on a bearskin rug being blessed by Bishop Cardegan as far as I'm concerned. You know I heard a good one about Benjamin the other day, and ideas are ordered, yes they are, you know they are, ordered through personality networks, and it is my personality not to have one...chris

↑ Index

115. Eric Selinger

Re: haoles

Fri 9 Dec 1994

On Thu, 8 Dec 1994, Susan Schultz wrote:

I'm not sure that the kind of > discourse that I quote by Haunani Trask leads _necessarily_ to ethnic > cleansing, though it certainly bears resemblance with the rhetoric _of_ > ethnic cleansing. And that's part of the problem teaching the material; > do you opt with those who suggest that rhetoric is powerful but, > paradoxically, not a call to real action? Or do you take it as a call to > arms that is intended to include you? If there's a more moderate > position to take on the question, which I suspect there might be (being a > foolish optimist), will anyone in the heat of the moment actually listen?
>

My problem with taking the "not a call to real action" route is twofold, Susan. First, it seems to me the epitome of privilege, quite smug, in fact: it says, in effect, say what you want, we still have the power & we'll use it, so we're essentially safe & can watch the show. Second, it smudges the powerful bonds between this rhetoric and the rhetoric of ethnic cleansing, et. al., when the only real basis for distinguishing them seems to me that somehow we know that the writer in question wouldn't "really" do anything violent. But, like, is this fair to the nature of words & their work, their effect on readers, etc?

One can (as I > and many of my colleagues do) cede authority in the classroom, present > oneself honestly as a "professor from the mainland with such and such > degrees), and then find that in that absence name-calling begins. I don't > know, it's a confusing situation to be in. I suppose in the case of > Baraka, which Eric cites, one needs to present a "fair" cross-section of > his work, and then argue out what is of value, and to whom. But the > ethical pressures are, in any case, immense, whether one includes or > excludes such material (and several students called me on the fact that

> I'd xeroxed her--Trasks's--"racist white woman" poem, but not her > erotically charged celebrations of the land). At such a point the > instructor's discomfort with authority turns into a kind of nostalgia for > it! And alternative authorities are created in the classroom, some of them > overt, and some of them subversive, no matter how fair-minded you think > you're being.

I was once in a class on African-American lit taught by a professor who deeply & thoughtfully believed in the therapeutic / pedagogical expression of anger. Lots of namecalling by those who were, at last! authorized to speak their minds--lots of verbal cruelty--lots of tarring with brushes wide and white, where students responded to what others hadn't said. Never a dull moment, and all quite validating, I'm sure, to those who were in power. [In power THERE--whatever their lousy status elsewhere.]

Authority happens. It feels good to hate. I think we need to get over a "discomfort with authority" and focus on just what sorts of authority we want to dismantle, and what we'll foster in their place. Culture, after all, abhors a vaccum.

More to follow, not to the board.

EMS

↑ Index

116. Ron Silliman
Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Steve Evans wrote:
>anti-capitalism involves >one in no necessary contradiction in education (necessary >is the operative word here), whereas it most patently does >in the various enterprises that have been named (Deutsche >Bank, Philip Morris, C=O=M=P=U=T=E=R=L=A=N=D, etc.) as >gainful employers. That is, you can universalize education;
>you can't universalize capitalism.

NOT!

One need not be a rabid Althusserian to sing a chorus of Ideological State Apparatuses here. If, as I've been arguing, it's all one system, the only difference between town and gown is one of position within the same set, not "inside" vs. "outside" (There is, to repeat myself, no Out). The sole difference is that one of us is pretending that there is "no necessary contradiction" and one of us is not.

Conversely, capitalism is far more universal than education will ever be. If by that we mean pervasive, in every object we see. And are.

"Universal" in this culture means a white male who went to one of seven universities. (Brown, Steve, is one of those universities, even if it's the low end.) Everyone else is ranked accordingly to how "un-universal" (and thuglike) we might be.

One of the great things about Hawaii is that the delicacy of that lava based ecology makes immediately evident how constructed even nature is. The vegetation came literally in the stomach of birds. And the commonplace birds of the 1950s are not those of the 1990s. Someone introduces a mongoose in one century and it becomes the rat, squirrel, possum, raccoon of the next, having that niche almost to itself. Even the nene goose, the state bird, is "indigenous" solely because its off-island origins have been lost. There are only a few hundred of these left in existance and the only ones I've seen "wild" were in a parking lot halfway up Haleakala on Maui, begging for handouts from tourists. Since the arrival of Europeans, everything in Hawaii has come through the introduction of capital, both American and more recently Japanese. The Hawaiin guitar came with agricultural workers from Southern California. The national issues tend to obscure all this, which is what Lenin thought they were there for.

Like Eric, I believe it was, I come from a white trash California family, though in a college town (where I am the only member in four generations to have crossed over the town/gown divide and gone to school). Which means no doubt that I have a lot of ambivalent (or worse) feelings about some of these issues. But one illusion I do not carry about is of the university system as anything other than a state subsidized process for training workers, without which the corporations would have to do it directly.

Have we forgotten that all of Chomsky's early grants for linguistics came directly from the Defense Department?

An earlier generation of linguists was subsidized almost entirely by the church, in order to translate the Bible into whatever heathen tongue.

"Necessary is the operative word here" indeed.

↑ Index

117. Rodger Kamenetz

Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns

Fri 9 Dec 1994

In the Buddhist tradition there's a concept of "right livelihood". It is not related to degree of complicity in the economic system, but to the kind of consciousness certain occupations create. And in a similar way, I remember Robert Duncan, through his contact with Levinas, describing to me the Talmudic notion of giving just measure in business transactions because it is understood that the just weight and measure is given before God. He felt that in the same way the poet gives just weight and measure when she recognizes that the just weight and measure is not before the reader only but a larger totality. The question is how does the work we do to earn our livelihood inform our work as poets? For me, the question was settled accidentally. After avoiding steady work as assiduously as possible, I fell into part time teaching, accidentally landed a full time job in a community college and eventually by fluke at a university. For Eric and others for whom these decisions are still active, I think it is worth considering the question in the "right livelihood' sense-- that is, how can I make my life coherent? Ron's assessment of the university as a capitalist training center does not speak to my experience as a teacher. Rodger Kamenetz [redacted]

↑ Index

118. Tom Mandel
Re: Academy, etc.
Fri 9 Dec 1994

I felt it would be better to respond to Eric Pape's impassioned response to my post in a message sent to him not all, and so did, mentioning it here that it not be thought i'd let his words go buy unnoticed.

tom mandel

↑ Index

119. Tom Mandel
Re: Academy, etc.
Fri 9 Dec 1994

My advice to quit grad school (but I don't think I used the phrase "drop out" wch he puts in quote -- yet perhaps I did) seems to have found a tender spot in Steven Shoemaker's mental anatomy? Does he think I meant it literally? Does he think I meant it just for him?

Why, specifically why, were my words "self-righteous?"

As to "the academy as a working environment," whatever does that phrase mean? Does it refer to the ego floating above history and choosing an environment in which to "work?" Or does it refer to working conditions in the academic industry?

I guess grad school would be one way to enter "the academy as a working environment," although it does seem more and more that it comes to approximate rather a formal training in being unemployed and even unemployable. Perhaps, too, there are other ways to reach that goal. Charles Bernstein, whom Steven invokes against my blanket admonitions, would, alas for Steven's intentions, find his place on my list: someone who quit - maybe even dropped out of - grad school!

I don't wnat to be glib; I mean, rather, I'm not being glib, so I don't want Steven to take me that way. A year or so ago, I met Reid Whittemore, ex-Library of Congress poet, at a party. Before he understood that I was Jewish and therefore an exotic enemy ("Maimonides? Who's that." -- this man is a professor at U of Md.), he leaned over conspiratorially and whispered "there are too many poets, if you know what I mean." I was certainly not meant to understand that there were too many white male wasp poets (real poets) you may be sure, but that the world was mispopulated with a rising tide of expression from all the wrong places. I would not wish Steven Shoemaker to understand me in this way; I don't want to de-populate the academy (it's amusing, btw, to affect this god-the-father mode of expression; as if the academy would fulminate or grow passive depending on my word).

The narrow reading list of our times is devoted overwhelmingly to a consideration of the loss of autonomy of the self and its expressions in speech and thought, the self's explosion or dissolution. Am I alone in finding the conjunction of this development in western philosophical/intellectual history curiously aligned with a moment in which other traditions have arrived on its grounds to make a claim for such autonomy. A time in which black jew arab female speak a sophical world of thought which is black jew arab female? Itis not the "ethnicity" wch interests me in this, nor the localness (w/ its Heidegerrian and Duns Scotian tone I find detestable: the value of place, forget it), but the opposite its appearance in every case in a foreign place, the insertion border edge and frontier issues of accountability and recountability to an other exactly in "place" so that mentally there is no location that is not on a border, no place that is not also a leaving that place. That, Steven, is what I meant by telling you, personally this time, very personally, to quit grad school.

Don't burn the books, just burn the reading list.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

120. Tom Mandel
Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Steve Evans writes:

> What I wanted to say in response to Ron's initial "Exile on Main Street Post" was simply that anti-capitalism involves one in no necessary contradiction in education (necessary is the operative word here), whereas it most patently does in the various enterprises that have been named (Deutsche Bank, Philip Morris, C=O=M=P=U=T=E=R=L=A=N=D, etc.) as gainful employers. That is, you can universalize education; you can't universalize capitalism.

While nodding to his hilarious and brilliantly snide conflation of Computerland and Language magazine/poetry, I feel obliged to mention that Steve seems to be using the word "necessary," his "operative word," somewhat unusally. Does he mean that in the academy it is not "necessary" to notice that you do not have an anti-capitalixt job but you can hardly escape noticing this fact working at Deutsche Bank? Well, bully for you herr professor!

Re: "...you can universalize education; you can't universalize capitalism," are you hiring? Or, less comic, you're wrong Steve. You can particularize education, you can stratify education, indeed for most people you can eliminate education. But, "you" can't eliminate capitalism, or, to put the matter concretely, who is the "you" who can eliminate capitalism?

Please don't assume this as praise of capitalism (I leave that to the opening pages of the communist manifesto), nor that a hortatory enthusiasm will do in response to my not-at-all rhetorical question.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

121. eric pape
Re: Academy, etc.
Fri 9 Dec 1994

I wanted to say quickly, in all fairness to Tom, that I did not mean to accuse his of pointing his post at me. When I said he had me "pegged" I was simply giving him credit for very perceptively figuring out who I was: grad student, inexperienced, white. My posting was meant to apply generally to the whole academy debate. Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

122. Susan Schultz
Re: haoles
Fri 9 Dec 1994

I'm not sure you can have it both ways, Eric; if the classroom is to be a place where therapeutic anger authorizes students, then it's possible to regard Trask's poem as just that: a therapeutic exercise of getting angry. Though the word "therapy" suggests that somehow we'll all work through this in the end. My problem with equating the poem with "ethnic cleansing" is that the Hawaiian sovereignty movement is a separatist movement, not an imperial one (as in the "former Yugoslavia"). Trask may want more of us haoles (and in this number she'd include local Asian Americans) to leave the state, but I don't get the sense that she wants to line us up and shoot us. In the context of her entire book, Trask's position is a bit more complicated than this poem suggests: there's a love poem to her haole partner of many years in there, too (although he's presented as a "good haole" who supports her struggle to the utmost).

A note from yesterday's paper. "Bumpy" Kanahele, who led the year long occupation of Makapu'u beach, is quoted as saying that tourism and sovereignty are not entirely incompatible. He denied saying that he'd ever advocated violence against tourists: "What he did mean, he said, was that if the Hawaiians do not get what they want, things could get violent. But rather than let that happen, his organization would once again go the tourists and tell them their presence is lending support to an economy that is based on an illegal government in land improperly seized from the Hawaiians" (in 1893). After independence, and because of it, he argues, a better grade of tourist will come to Hawaii (an interesting spin on tourism, certainly). In an aside, the article reports that The Nation of Hawaii is hooked into the internet, where they display their flag and their demands. A new take on the bumpersticker, Think Local, Act Global (or is it the other way around?): think net, act internet?

Susan

↑ Index

123. Robert A Harrison
Stained Meat
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Tom Mandel says:

> very little evidence of a point of view of color

I'm here. Color is only partially the right word in my context. I'm Panamanian-American. My silence is a point of view.

I'm sure there are others, Tom.

> unhidden in trashy even disgraceful joking that there is no relationship between your person and your position, as if these were different in some principled way

This comment doesn't seem right to me. There IS a difference between me and the positions I've held in my life. From construction, to house painting, to truck driving, to teaching calculus and Pascal programming, to programming a real time accounting system for Johnson Controls, to painting opera sets, to whatever. Isn't this obvious?

As to Paul Hoover's comments on Amiri Baraka getting 5000 for a reading, seems like sour grapes to me. Would you, Paul, turn down $5000 for a reading? Not that I agree with all of Baraka's politics, I'm definitely against any kind of racism or ethnocentrism, but, I hope he continues to get lots of $5000 readings.

I for one don't think working for a corporation provides anyone with any kind perceptual advantage. I find it interesting that so much of this discussion revolves around how we work. How we make a living seems to me to be related mostly to our relationship with power. Maybe there's more to things than that.

Bob Harrison

↑ Index

124. Steve Evans
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Ron, you are in too much a hurry to dismiss what I wrote last night. I said anti-capitalism as a project does not interfere with any necessary moment in the educative process. I did not say that education is not deeply scarred and distorted within current capitalist conditions.

As for universal = white male Ivy League, please.
You and I can both discern the difference between false universalism and true universalism. Brown is a patently and overtly anti-universalist University.
One of the central campus battles in the years I've been here has indeed been over its practice of "need-aware" admission policies. Though consistently blocked, this has been a struggle to universalize access to the symbolic and real capital this institution generates.

I have no interest in "pretending" anything. I, in fact, don't take this discussion to be primarily or importantly about myself (though I know what Tom Mandel would say to that). I am saying that if "capitalism is more universal than education ever will be" then all of us are getting burned.

Knee-jerk anti-unversalism is one of the tiredest tropes of current (a)social thought. Try explaining to me an oppositional position on Bosnia that doesn't involve universalistic claims of one kind or another. Try explaining why your position on identity politics as the real vulgar marxism makes sense without referring to universalization. In brief, what ever happened to that fibonacci series of yours? Gone with the Laclau-Mouffite wind?

It is fine, though exceedingly abstract, to say there is "no outside." But at Brown there certainly is (hence an "admission" process), and where you work also (hence hiring/firing). And on a different scale, there is very importantly an "outside" when it comes to distribution of resources under capitalist social relations. Illiteracy is a way of being "outside" the alphabet; starvation is a way of being "outside" the chi-chi supermarket. I'm "in"--I attend Brown (and yes there are people here--namely all the ones directly in my "field" in the Eng.Dept.-- who oppose my research and teaching practices), I eat and read, I'm having a party for other people who also do these things later tonight. But I'm under no illusion that cause I'm here, everyone is. And I subscribe to the axiom that you cannot intend your own autonomy without intending that of everyone else (universalization).

↑ Index

125. Steve Evans
Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Tom, I'm afraid I can't take credit for the conflation of Computerland/Language: whoever designed a flier for a DC reading of Ron, Kit, and Bill Luoma (perhaps Bill designed it? Or Rod Smith) last year gets the credit on that one.

Let me assure you, were I hiring I'd try to tempt you from your current work--with an emancipation clause in your contract.

The "you who can eliminate capitalism" is not singular but plural, not pre-existent but made, not a faded bumper sticker but a still distant prospect. Is that too hortatory and enthusiastic? It ain't me alone, and it ain't my "mind" (which had to undergo a lot of changes in arriving at this position--very little assisted by University professors, tho there were some) that's centrally at issue here.

I was struck by the following sentences in a recently published article by Ernest Mandel.
They perhaps fall in the category of inflammatory, of setting the volume too loud for this particular context and its specific possibilities. Mandel says:

Hunger and poverty have risen to the point where U.N. officials speak about one billion people living below the poverty line, very conservatively defined.
Sixteen million children die every year from hunger and curable diseases. This means that every four years the same number of children die as the total number of victims during the whole of World War II, Auschwitz, Hiroshima, and the Bengal famine included.
Every four years a world war against third world children: There you have the reality of today's imperialism/capitalism with all its barbaric implications.

Even with your antipathy towards Adorno, Tom, wouldn't you agree that at the very minimum, utopia would mean an end to such decimation?

Finally, as I mentioned also in my post to Ron, if there is a moment in the educative process that necessarily entails capitalism, I've not yet heard of it. Learning pre-existed capital, learning can outlast capital. In fact, the only sum larger than the knowledge capital has accumulated is the sum it has concretely denied.
Poetry is part of the latter sum, which is one of the reasons this discussion is appropriate on this list.

Steve Evans

↑ Index

126. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: Academy, etc.

Fri 9 Dec 1994

No Tom, i didn't think you meant the advice to quit grad school just for me, which helps explain why i liked Eric's reply. As for the "tender spot" in my "mental anatomy"--is that what one needs in order to be, uh, stimulated by your words? As for why i thought some of those words were "self-righteous"--I keep thinking of that corny old joke about how if you "assume" too much, you make an "ass" of "u" and "me." Perhaps u didn't mean your advice "literally"; no doubt i missed levels and levels of irony. You also said "your industry is headed for a collapse; it has lost all justification." Mebbe that wasn't "literal" either, but i wanted to indicate my belief that despite its troubled future, its horrendous contradictions etc., there are still some good reasons to try to work within the academy. (That Charles got there thru a route other than grad school doesn't seem to me of crucial significance in this (my) context). And your argument, Tom, about the "narrow reading list of our times" doesn't really convince me otherwise. But if it's a matter of the collapse of inside & outside, of being in the "place" that is grad school yet also "leaving that place" at the same time, i think i've pretty much achieved that conditon already. But this discussion cld quickly get tedious (if it hasn't already) for the list, so if you really want, Tom, to advise me "very personally" then perhaps you shld write me at [redacted].

As for the "narrow reading list" to which you allude, and its relation to the question of what can be said/done in the academy, i'm not quite sure i follow the whole of your argument. But i have heard your point about the trend toward "deconstruction" coinciding curiously w/ the need for autonomous declarations by "other traditions" made many times before, within, so to speak, the hallowed halls of academe. Maybe the list and its attendant discourse isn't quite so narrow as you think. And perhaps i flatter myself, but i think i've put together some pretty interesting reading lists for my classes, lists that have included, for example, many people currently participating in this "list." And i've also consistently found that, despite the odds against it, some pretty surprising things can happen in the classroom--things i haven't seen happen elsewhere very often. But more about that another time perhaps.

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

127. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

WELL, STEVE, I AM SKEPTICAL ABOUT WHETHER WE SHOULD DARE MAKE SOME KIND OF CLAIM THAT EDUCATION OR ONE'S ANTI-CAPITALIST INVOLVEMENT IN ACADEMIA CAN ACTUALLY BE PRIVILEGED OVER THOSE WHO WORK AT C=O=M=P=U=T=E=R=L=A=N=D OR MCDONALDS FOR THAT MATTER, but i don't think you're 'criminally naive' either--if we can admit our own implication in the whole mess while still being aware that we ARE actually more exploited than exploiters, whether in academia or out, maybe then however there's, er, "hope"--but of course that means putting ourselves "on the line" as it were more...

↑ Index

128. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

---

steve, just read your new post, i had responded to the earlier one and then realized my argument was similar to Silliman's (if not Mandel's) but now I realize that I too misread your statement as claiming that academia is "beyond ideology" and am glad to see you are not arguing from that position, but what is this "autonomy" we should fight for if not the autonomy of "bourgeois individuals"? If capitalism can not be truly universalized to suit the needs of all, are you positing a kind of anti-oedipus anti-capitalism of anarchy as an alternative, as it seems you might, or something quite different?

↑ Index

129. Steven Howard Shoemaker
poetry trek: generations
Fri 9 Dec 1994

I'm starting to wonder if this G1/G2 stuff has more resonance/explanatory power than i had realized. This is not at all to be somehow separatist or to suggest an insurmountable "gap," but i'm curious how a discussion confined to G1-ers wld look different from this one. Surely it wld lose much, but i wonder what it wld gain?

Just speculating....

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

130. Jeffrey Timmons

Re: Exile on Strained Meat : or notes on professions, academic etc.

Fri 9 Dec 1994

Tom Mandel's comments were very interesting, and I apologize for the length of this response:

On Wed, 7 Dec 1994, Tom Mandel wrote:

> 1. For 5 years during WWII neither the English nor any other allied power laid an intentional single bomb across the railroad tracks that led how many thousands of jews gypsies gay people per day? to doom. Does this make them thugs?

No, it makes them lame. As in lame-o. Go gently into the night is their theme, not mine....

> 2. I was a grad student for 6 years, have taught in 3 universities, have worked for large corporations, as well as quasi-gov'tal organizations, and have written and lived poetry off and on all my life. Without question, and by metaphorical orders of magnitude, the most serializing, cutthroat, thoughtless and non-oppositional (i.e. slavish) environment I ever lived in was the academy.

Ok, one more response to this position and I'm through with the issue: I won't argue with your experience, Tom, but mine is something quite different. Competition is the national ethic, is it any surprise it exists in the university? I have friends, peers, partners, and even those who disagree with me here; I have done creative and innovative work that has given me great satisfaction as a writer. That our experiences don't gib is not cause for us to divide ourselves--right?--since we have some interests that keep us here talking? What are they?

> Nothing is more foolish than to spend one's days distinguishing between on the one hand vulgar marxism and on the other hand a marxism appropriate to the changes in the organization of capitol. None of us can know at all what the structure of capitol is. For one thing we are part ofit, for another only a bounded thing can be "analyzed" (but, see above), and it is not that. And, finally, why do we wish to constrain the mind to appropriate response, when it is the mind that makes that world of capitol. Make something else.

Oh, gosh, man, gee, we're all trying to create ideas or "theories" about disparate phenomena about how particular occur in the world, if someone were to show me a model of economic-cultural interaction that accounted for some of the events of the world it would be good enough for me until someone else showed me a better model. What I mean is, I'm not trying to constrain but remain free from what you rightly see as "appropriate" responses. Yes, the mind makes capital--with an a and an o--but is it my mind? Just because we are in it and part of it should not discourage one from exploring it.

If anyone would > pay me, I'd teach for myself (I do seem to know a great deal; drop > over some time - you probably know a lot too), but they don't so. . . .

Hey, Tom, I'm staying with a friend in DC, who, by the way lives on Tilden street, and I was wondering if I could take you up on your offer to stop by--I can't pay you though, ok? If you read this I'll be back on sunday to read my mail--I leave on monday--so if you're serious please let me know. It would be interesting to hash over these differences in person.

> 8. Grad student, quit school. But, I can't tell whether Steve Evans or Patrick Phillips or Jeffery Timmons or Eric Pape or others (very few women, very little evidence of a point of view of color, very little sense of a specifically Jewish pov, very little in any sense specific to anything whatever, informed by anything not on the other guy, yeh guy's reading list. If you are on faculties, quit. Anyway, Ron's right; your industry is heading for a collapse, it has lost all justification.

Ai, ai, ai, ai. . . . Geez, isn't this the sort of response you yourself are indicating is what's wrong with the university, with the competitive cutthroat world? I mean, come on, what you're saying is I have nothing to say, nothing interesting, anyway, which seems to me to be precisely the attitude you find as so oppressive in the university. Quit? Why don't you join? Let's find some common ground already, what we're suffering from is the divide between critics and poets--a false division. . . . I'm a poet. I'm a critic. Nothing specific? Huh? Didn' you see my comments on Swarzenegger (sp)? Lost all justification? I'm confused. If it weren't for the university I think the survival of poetry would be a great deal more tenuous than it is. Anyway, I don't shy from Tom's comments, but I think this is simply not useful in terms of learning from each other, or from a spritit of comradery (sp)--which he himself suggests is what he is after. I have to wonder. . . . See next > *11. Oh. In 8 above, you may think I'm being dismissive. Or glib, in advising you to quit. You have families, you have to have a job. Sure, no problem. Nor do I take the Platonic position that a slave is one by nature or essence : if not, he'd be dead. After all, I was fired, I wasn't offed! I prefer the Jewish position, be kind to the slave. In the jubilee year, free all the slaves (what the heck, most of them will enslave themselves again). (of course, that's only one of the jewish positions, i.e. positions in the rabbinic tradition - which is always what I mean by the term "jewish").*

Hm.

There's more here I have to say, but can we put aside what appears to be a growing divide? I mean, honestly, whether we work in or out of a particular institution we have a common set of concerns and rather than . . . . Well, you get the picture. I just want to say, also, that I have not tried to divide as much as draw attention to what some have described as being "isolated" when that is not my experience. If you want me to be more specific I could. . . .

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

131. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: con in on late night
Fri 9 Dec 1994

I agree with Abby's comments whole heartedly, I just thought, too, that it was interesting that in the context of the discussion of isolated academics that an academic like Paglia is as popular as she obviously is; and, I think, this also has to do with some of her more "conservative" positions on issues like the canon. She is funny and smart, and, sure, what she does in freeing feminism of a "bad" connotation is an interesting point, but is she really the sort of feminist you want on television promoting feminism? Steinum was supposed to talk here in Tempe, AZ yesterday but cancelled--illness. I agree a feminism made up of different points of view would be a way to free it from negative connotations, but what about her views of rape?

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

132. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Exile on Main Street
Fri 9 Dec 1994

On Thu, 8 Dec 1994, k.lindberg wrote:

> I do think that it behooves poets and philosophers (funny work,that last) to (seek to) address THE WORLD, from which there is no escape, anyway. Discussions of Marxism, as much as they escape concern over academic or p.r. capital, are most important. However, given the complex investments, both utopian and intellectual, in Tito's Yugoslavia, ironies abound if one attempts to reconcile such discussions with the war.

Yes.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

133. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Academy, etc.
Fri 9 Dec 1994

Thanks for being specific, eric.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

134. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
Fri 9 Dec 1994

On Fri, 9 Dec 1994, Steve Evans wrote:

> *Not vulgar Marxism then, but obvious anti-capitalism (obvious in Oppen's sense of what you cannot not see) is what is needed--not as an end, but as a starting point.*
>
> And, finally, I just wanted to say what a pleasure the recent weeks' discussions have been--largely because of all the "new" voices now on the list. Thanks to everyone for the insights.

First, I, also, want to say that I have enjoyed being on the list immensely. I have learned a great deal in the past few weeks interaction with y'all and look forward to continuing the banter. I'm leaving for a few days and won't be able to write for about a month, but I'll be back better than ever in mid-jan.

Second, I'd like to know, more precisely, about Steve's view of "obvious anti-capitalism." It sounds intriguing.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

135. Mn Center For Book Arts town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
Fri 9 Dec 1994

I direct a small press, Chax Press, and even though that work is barely funded, the position is certainly involved with capital, having had some funding from the state in various of its contexts, working with printers who use papers made from trees, etc. I also am the director of a larger nonprofit organization devoted to the book arts, a position more entwined with corporate and foundation funding, the state again, which also runs programs in conjunction with at least four universities, yet which generally positions itself as concerned with "the artist" on the one hand and "the community" on the other (& hopefully the hands are entertwined). We don't often think of its necessary involvement with capital, but we should.

That said, it still strikes me that, although there has been a lot of intriguing conversation in this forum on this issue of where we work and its relation to the world, it has largely also been guys talking about their jobs as the place where they relate to said world. That seems entirely limiting. At least an equal force in how I understand myself and my relations with what is outside me is my family, including the immediate one of wife and two children, ages 5 and 19 months, but extending far and wide in both space and time, most recently made poignant by the death of a 36-year-old cousin who was the high school principal in the barely one high-school town of Clinton, Oklahoma, and his funeral services which required a football field to accomodate those who wished to memorialize him. Only one of the ways family leads to a much wider "community."

I'm not certain where I want to take this, just that, although I don't want to speak for anyone else, I know that contributors to this discussion, including Ron Silliman and Tom Mandel, are significantly involved in their immediate familial and human relationships and that these provide a point of entrance into the world at least as important to our politics and poetics as do our places of employment. I don't think I'd want to turn this forum into a series of forays into the poetics of diapers, but I do think there is something missing in terms of how we are thinking of ourselves as a community (actually there are probably many things missing). We boys & our jobs are not the only stories, and certainly not even the only human activity we undertake which bears on our relations to capital and more.

charles alexander

↑ Index

136. Chris Stroffolino

Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle

Sat 10 Dec 1994

In response to charles alexander, yes even men must realize the "personal is the political" as it were, because as 'talkers" or "yakkers" with our "highfallutin'" ideas about things we men (since it is mostly men) have really not 'evolved' much since the time of LYSISTRATA, and though I don't wish to once again return to a reified "essentialist" grid of "male sphere" vs "female sphere" in the "old fashioned" sense, certainly such a grid haunts far more than these discussions on the "net" as it were. At the same time, there are those of us who are not family-men (whether by choice or chance, I cannot tell, "alas") who are not necessarily any less "responsible" or "engaged" with community, etc. on levels such as you suggest. Though i don't wish to criticize the "mainstream bourgeois family" as LESS IMPORTANT than the "bourgeois quasi-bohemian lifestyle" I do wish to question a possible assumption that claims that THE BOHO is more decadent than the FAMILY MAN. (and this is hopefully not an attemptm on my part to merely reinscribe the dialectics that have informed the "town' vs "gown" debate under different terms). I wish you well with your family, but "the family" does not work for all of us, and I'd like to see what "common ground" there can be between it and the "boho" (for lack of a better word) rather than merely be antagonistic context than the mere bohemian--at least since the 80's and the rise of the L poets. Anyway, what does anyone make of this?

↑ Index

137. Tom Mandel
Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
Sat 10 Dec 1994

Steve -

In an overwhelming example of "lest we forget" I must report that it was I who instigated the DC reading by my friends and C'land poets Kit, Ron and Alan and Bill ! I certainly saw the flyer many times and yes Rod did it - so he gets the credit for clevers and I for, duh...

Looking back at your post, I see that you didn't mention Alan Bernheimer's participation in the reading. Alan is a wonderful poet tho not what you'd call a prolific fellow. I hadn't heard him read in a decade (in wch we mostly lived in the same town) and perhaps half the reading was of works I'd heard him read before. The new stuff was terrific too.

Alan was part of that angle of the then young language crowd that came out of Yale and moved to SF. Kit Robinson and Steve Benson were his classmates, and now I can't remember whether Bob Perelman was also in that bunch of college friends. I think so.

If you don't know his work, it is collected in two volumes (and we are all waiting for a third, Alan): State Lounge (Tuumba, 1981) and Cafe Isotope (The Figures, 1980). More or less on (at least yokable to) our current subjects is his poem Carapace (wch

I hope he will give me retrospective permission to reproduce here):

CARAPACE

The face of a stranger is a privilege to see each breath a signature and the same sunset fifty years later though familiarity is an education who likes what most?

high rounded cornices with baby moon hubcaps played by the wind electricity travels from time to time on the surface of these lips thoroughly tropical pleasure forms the customary features combination eyeteeth and semaphore everything I touch turns to flesh or vice versa

Alan Bernheimer
in _Cafe Isotope_

tom

↑ Index

138. Tom Mandel
Re: Academy, etc.
Sat 10 Dec 1994

---

to Steve Shoemaker:

gee, I think you've agreed with me and gotten some distance on that by being sarcastic. Perhaps I am the cause, in the sense of having been unintentionally ironic; if so, apologies. I am not a fan of irony, as I think it tends to strengthen the point to be ironized. E.g. if your critique of the academy is ironic, you may be taken to be an academic manque-ay (you know, sour grapes...).

As to: "i think i've put together some pretty interesting reading lists for my classes, lists that have included, for example, many people currently participating in this "list." And i've also consistently found that, despite the odds against it, some pretty surprising things can happen in the classroom--things i haven't seen happen elsewhere very often."

I see no reason why this shdn't be true and I'm glad for all participants if it is. It seems obvious to me that we should distinguish between teaching and learning, which go on at all times and all levels and are activities where the deepest human resources are engaged, and the institutional nexus we call the academy. The discourse above is a consistent extension of, say Plato's 7th letter (is my reference here accurate? the "spark"), and doesn't support an institution, much less a current status thereof. I'm sure such events happened in Heidegger's seminars in the late '30's too - would they invalidate a critique of the German universities under Hitler? (no comparison or other cheap shot intended here)

It is no more relevant to offer instances of teaching/learning as a justification of the institution in its current condition than it is to evidence the spiritual mystery attendant to life and thought as a justification for the Inquisitional auto da fe (tho of course, this is just what was done).

Anyway, the point isn't a rejection of an institution but a contribution to it; the strongest point you might make, you don't: if you want to change an institution you must participate in it, give some big part of your life to it, in whatever form it allows you to do so. So doing gives one a valid position, and justifies beyond clever contradiction your "belief that despite its troubled future, its horrendous contradictions etc., there are still some good reasons to try to work within the academy." Good!

As to my self-righteousness: sorry, it ain't me babe. Your "corny old joke" is quoted without an application. In other words, if I say something it's because I've observed it, thought about it, lived it, and so concluded - provisionally. You don't have to deal with it, but if you want to do so, the challenge is to reply at the level of the statement. Nothing assumed.

That said, the words of mine you quote : "your industry is headed for a collapse; it has lost all justification" are incomplete and misleading. I meant, and shd have said, "all economic justification." I.e. I don't think the economy of the coming century will have the same need for educated workers that capitalism of the 2d half of the nineteenth century discovered and institutionalized as a) mass literacy and b)a large workforce with flexible, "analytic" skills. Therefore, I see the large institutions which were built up out of those requirements as likely to collapse, the class of "clerks" as likely to shrink, literacy and verbal skill as likely once again to become specialized professionalisms, etc.

Obviously, this does not mean I'm in favor of such developments; I do however see the endless marginalization and mediation of the application of ideas, all that to me seems characteristic of the amorph that dubs itself "theory," as evidence in that direction. Nor that I'm right, gloomily enthusiastic soul that I am.

As to my animadversions re: "the narrow reading list," it would be fair to ask me to point to what I think ought to be, but is not, on that list - if we go much further with that thread I'll be forced to contribute an enumeration.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

139. Tom Mandel
Re: Personal Blisters/Impersonal Burns
Sat 10 Dec 1994

---

to Steve Evans:

The facts Ernest Mandel cites are horrible. Nor is the barbarism of our time at question, a barbarism not exactly restricted to what he calls "imperialism/capitalism" (i.e. internationalized western-style economies). His interpretation is at question, however. ALL interpretations are at question, Steve.
And, yes, this is turning the volume too high, flipping up the bass, and boogieing to the rhythm we already know and love. I won't yield to you either in my horror of this world nor in my deep need for a radical critique of it. I just don't think you have proposed in these words anything contributing to such a critique.

Indeed, is it possible to cite horror and take satisfaction in it as supporting one's "position?" Is it impossible? Is it something only the other guy, the bad guy, does?

As to:

> The "you who can eliminate capitalism" is > not singular but plural, not pre-existent > but made, not a faded bumper sticker but > a still distant prospect. Is that too > hortatory and enthusiastic?

that's right, it is. Is the "still distant" place where you see this plural you a "not... faded" picture of a future reality?
Is it a carrot? Is your mind, producing this verbal metaphor set, outside of history? A history in which you would be able to find many other such pictures. Pictures to which at you must submit yours, as one in a long series. A series which requires a very close attention as to how we must understand it. An understanding that would allow us not to turn up the volume, not to cite horror at each other as if failing to agree with your, anyone's, interpretation of that horror were to make oneself complicit with horror. A horror applicable at large levels and small: a friend of mine's brother was murdered this week. This week and every week, I am someone's brother, are you?

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

140. Donald J. Byrd
Re: Academy, etc.
Sat 10 Dec 1994

I have been working in the Academy since 1971. The only other job I have had in my adult life was working in a warehouse. I prefer the academy.

It seems to me that this thread--unlike most threads on this list-- has been generally ill-informed and bogged down in stereotypes.

The academy, like every thing else in Babylon, is a mess. It is the most conservative cultural institutions. The archives for which it is responsible _is_, or used to be, THE culture. Its function is as an adjunct to the human genome, and it systematically inscribes the code on generation after generation. Or tries to, often with minimal success.

Of course, I am speaking here of the institution as a whole, not just graduate school in English (this has been deep confusion in this discussion).

The institution is almost wholly mediated by the alphabet-- and the alphabet suddenly turns out to be a relatively insignificant medium. The kind of reading that the New Critics thought to teach to, if not the masses, a very large middle class is increasingly a specialized skill, like say being able to solve differential equations. A large majority of our 1000-plus English majors here at Albany are pre-law or pre-M.B.A. (Business schools like students who can read and write).

Of course, most graduate programs in English have refused to notice this fact, and wouldn't know what to do about it if they would notice it. Conservative institutions are by there nature not prepared to deal with this kind of change.

But academia is not in as bad a crack as, say, the auto industry which has failed to notice that their business is likely to be seriously impeded when exhaust pollution does permanent damage to the biosphere.

I would say my work in the university has been fairly successful. Every year I encounter a few people who like to read and their adrenalin gets up over thinking, and talking, who in this culture are likely to feel that they are crazy or worthless, and I tell them that they are not crazy or worthless, and some of them believe me. This seems to me, given the circumstances, fairly useful.

Don Byrd

↑ Index

141. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: Academy, etc.

Sat 10 Dec 1994

Tom Mandel writes:

> It is no more relevant to offer instances of teaching/learning as a justification of the institution in its current condition than it is to evidence the spiritual mystery attendant to life and thought as a justificatio for the Inquisitional auto da fe (tho of course, this is just what was done).

Those "instances of teaching/learning" are, for better or worse, in some sense organized and permitted by the "institution" that is the academy. So it seems to me fair to adduce those instances in a discussion of said institution. I agree, however, that that is only one part of the story, & not adequate on its own without attention to the larger structural/cultural/ corporate context. But all those levels, including the level of classroom "instances," are imbricated.

> That said, the words of mine you quote : "your industry is headed for a collapse; it has lost all justification" are incomplete and misleading. I meant, and shd have said, "all economic justification." I.e. I don't think the economy of the coming century will have the same need for educated workers tha capitalism of the 2d half of the nineteenth century discovered and institutionalized as a) mass literacy and b)a large workforce with flexible, "analytic" skills. Therefore, I see the large institutions which were built up out of those requirements as likely to collapse, the class of "clerks" as likely to shrink, literacy and verbal skill as likely once again to become specialized professionalisms, etc.

Well, there's a big difference between "all justification" and "all economic justification" and i don't think a more "complete" quotation on my part cld have smoothed over that gap. At any rate, i responded to the first phrase, hearing a different meaning than you unpack here.

> As to my animadversions re: "the narrow reading list," it would be fair to ask me to point to what I think ought to be, but is not, on that list - if we go much further with that thread I'll be forced to contribute an enumeration.

Alright, let's have it!

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

142. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
Sat 10 Dec 1994

Whew. We seem to be hitting a stage here, where we all feel compelled to spell out our "distinctions," which frequently get expressed as binary oppositions: town/gown, G1/G2, boho/family, men/women, whites/people of color. Probably this process is inevitable, and hopefully a prelude to new and productive "negotiations" among various "subject positions." It's an old question by now, but apparently still relevant: as we follow the process thru how do we go about discarding the dualistic habit of mind? Is it really possible, even in our supposedly pomo universe?

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

143. Clint Burnham
Re: Eagleton Quote
Sat 10 Dec 1994

I find Eagleton's work quite helpful. He's worked through the relations between theory and marxism and literature very well, although he has blind spots.

↑ Index

144. Clint Burnham
Re: Punk
Sat 10 Dec 1994

George:

too much of the music is so well done that it's impossible to characterize punk as poorly played music. some of it still now, despite the label slacker, is technically brilliant and, as bill bissett would say, raging.

clint

↑ Index

145. Marc Nasdor
Re: The National Question, etc.
Sat 10 Dec 1994

James Sherry's comments on internationalism are quite to the point and, for me, heartening. Patricularly his closing sentence advocating active shaping as opposed to after-the-fact resistance. With that in mind, what I'd like to see here is a discussion related to the necessity of forming alliances between so-called "intellectual classes" (to use a Wall St. Journal epithet) & the used-to-be-called "Reagan Democrats" who remain in the moral and intellectual stupor massaged into them by Gingrich & Co.

Face it, with the results of the last election, Amerika's going to be getting a lot crueler before it gets any more compassionate. Having worked for one of the world's largest management consultants (specializing in "business process reengineering" = downsizing), I can report that this particular aspect of "internationalism" is a juggernaut that does not appear to be slowing down

I get the feeling that the earnest postings I have read on this list may come to nothing if intellectuals (such as the members of POETICS) cannot devise a method of narrowing what has becoming a widening cultural gap in this country. Mr. Gingrich only succeeds because he recognizes fertile ground on which to capitalize.

I've got a piece of stale, moldy news: we're walking on the same piece of ground, and we'd better search for potential allies from outside our rather circumscribed communities. I probably sound like I'm advocating James's second (undesirable) course: resistance over pro-active shaping. On the contrary, but I seem to come up with conflicting ideas on how to begin on the course James advocates. I would like him to elaborate on his final sentence, and would hope others may join in.

Regards,

Marc Nasdor

[redacted]

↑ Index

146. Donald J. Byrd
Re: The National Question, etc.
Sun 11 Dec 1994

Mark Nasdor writes:

> With that in mind, what I'd like to see here is a discussion related to the necessity of forming alliances between so-called "intellectual classes" (to use a Wall St.

> Journal epithet) &
> the used-to-be-called "Reagan Democrats" who remain in the moral and intellectual stupor massaged into them by Gingrich & Co.

On what possible grounds might such an alliance be based?

So called Reagan Democrats, who are little different from Reagan Republicans, are devoted solely, as far as I can see, to greed.

I would suggest that corporate down-sizing is being done-- like everything else-- backwards. Rather than having businesses devoted to downsizing corporations, we should have businesses devoted to restructuring cities that could function without automobiles. The downsizing of corporations would then follow as a natural consequence.

The great repressed fact--comparable to the repression of sexuality in the 19th century-- is that the earth cannot long support the levels of exploitation it is now supporting. It certainly can't support several billion Asians, AFricans, and Latin Americans at the level of material waste that everyone enjoys witnessing on satelite TV. It can't even support a significant number of excluded Americans and Europeans at that level.

It seems to be two things need to happen:

1) We need something like a kind of psychoanalysis to bring repressed greed to consciousness;

2) We need to find something other than material extravagance as a motivating human factor.

Of course, conceiving a viable politics on the basis of these principles is a difficult, but nothing less appears viable.

Don Byrd

↑ Index

147. Chris Stroffolino
Re: The National Question, etc.
Sun 11 Dec 1994

So, Prof. Byrd, Herr Doktor, how do we begin this psychoanalysis of greed? Maybe instread of a couch a bed of nails? maybe block off all the highways that lead from the city to the suburbs at 5PM??? Maybe dose people with psychedelics instead of the mainstay of the bourgeois psychoanalytic industry rhymes with "greed")...Ah, utopia, utopia, there's gotta be more to life and thought than that. "We all'd love to see the plan..." said Lennon to Lenin

↑ Index

148. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: The National Question, etc.
Sun 11 Dec 1994

I am intrigued by the idea of alliances among communities, as per Nasdor's and Byrd's posts . . . particulary as we have been so preoccupied with articulating our differences. Where are the connections and possibilities for interactivity? Alas, I am leaving, tomorrow for a month, and will miss being able to respond for such a long period of time, but, rest assured, I am going to pour over the past posts in some detail on my contemplative journey (I'm taking the train--three days!) across the American landscape. I've never made the journey in the winter. I would just like to leave with the thought that while it has been highly useful to observe the differences in positions, the direction Byrd and Nasdor suggest may prove, at least, equally useful. Perhaps I suffer under the delusion that discussions and issues such as we have been preoccupied with here are somehow important or even part of a larger world. . .but the investment we have all made suggests to me very much otherwise. Now, what do we do?

"What shall we ever do?"

"Goonight. Goonight"

Jeffrey Timmons

AH! YOU FOUND THE SURPRISE!

HAPPY HOLIDAY!

↑ Index

149. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: The National Question, etc.
Sun 11 Dec 1994

Sorry, couldn't resist:

On Sun, 11 Dec 1994, Chris Stroffolino wrote:

"Ah, utopia, utopia, there's gotta be more to life and thought than that."

I like vanillautopia, though I've developed a taste for chocalateutopia too.

"If you don't eat you meat you can't have any pudding! How can you have any pudding if you don't eat your meat!"

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

150. Marc Nasdor
Re: The National Question, etc.
Sun 11 Dec 1994

Don Byrd responds to my post:

> On what possible grounds might such an alliance be based?
>
> So called Reagan Democrats, who are little different from Reagan Republicans, are devoted solely, as far as I can see, to greed.

That's a relatively recent phenomenon, brought about after 1980 by Reagan and cohorts; that is, convincing the traditional working classes that they were mistaken to follow any sort of "left" agenda. I believe the Reagan Republicans began chewing away at their weakest links to the Democratic Party-- by engaging them in the cultural arena before introducing the greed factor-- and then convinced them that the accumulation of material possessions, as well as the practice of conspicuous consumption, was the "correct" stance. It is all too obvious that the Democratic Party was, and remains, so fearful of engaging its core constituency because it is, in fact way out of touch. The Republicans are correct on that point, but for the wrong reasons. And as I posted earlier, Gingrich et al focus on culture first economics second. That can make it difficult to engage anyone in a Marxist analysis of the problem if one limits one's arguments to economics.

> I would suggest that corporate down-sizing is being done-- like everything else-- backwards. Rather than having businesses devoted to downsizing corporations, we should have businesses devoted to restructuring cities that could function without automobiles. The downsizing of corporations would then follow as a natural consequence.

A fantasy, Don. There are so few cities that could be restructured in such a manner (even if funds were available). Further, the majority of Americans (80%, I believe) live outside of cities, mostly in suburbs or exurbs. The car still rules, unfortunately, and will continue to do so as businesses continue to flee urban areas for the new zones of "worker housing"--townhouse ghettoes.

> 1) We need something like a kind of psychoanalysis to bring repressed greed to consciousness;

How is it repressed?

> 2) We need to find something other than material extravagance as a motivating human factor.

"Kill em' all. Let God sort 'em out." ;-)

Oy vay!

Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

151. w.curnow
academy, etc.
Sun 11 Dec 1994

THE ACADEMY may be the larger term. The University, too, may have something of the universe about it, but the local variations are considerable. The Profess of that? Here one is at a distance from the centre of it--the Books and Journal elsewhere, the Conferences are held elsewhere and the funds to go limited-- and the local Branch (there are 6 English Departments) inactive partly because too small and dispersed. What is the case with the Profession and the Universit here is of course also the case with other structures in the culture as well. produces a "thinness" in which the gains of specialisation (to which the Pro- fession and the University are particularly devoted) are hard to realise. On the other hand, the locale suits versatility, interdisciplinarity, cross-dressing. has implications for teaching/training and for how best to interpret one's rol as an academic in New Zealand.

For a good while now while working in the English Department I have been writing poetry, teaching American poetry.writing about it, writing about contemporary art , and operating as a free-lance curator and arts administrator. This mix has served to deliver to hand a situation of sufficient complexity. Also, since the campus is located downtown as most of you folks say, I can get out of here easily and see shows, meet up with artists, dealers, etc. (I have thought the dis- location of so many US universities from city life is one of their major drawbacks and, in particular accounts for their distance from, in- comprehension of, contemporary art practices) I have not worked for corporations, but have been under contract to art museums, arts councils, and cultural foundations for quite large exhibition, conference, and publication projects. This extra-mural activity is on-going; it seems a permanent and necessary part of my programme. I have learnt a great deal from it, not the least being the demands it make for all manner of competencies not required or thought of within the Uni- versity. And it is essential to any notion I might have of my contrib- ution to the University-as-Academy. Although at first reluctant to accept these breaches of Discipline--the Discipline of English, that is--the University, I must say, has gradually come to accept them.

Wystan Curnow

↑ Index

152. Mn Center For Book Arts
Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
Sun 11 Dec 1994

To respond to Chris Stroffolino, no indeed the BOHO is not less important or more irresponsible than the FAMILY. Indeed there are contemporary crises in both. And we are all, if not parents, children. Just to agree with you that the terms of person need to be part of the discussion as much as the terms of work.

charles alexander

↑ Index

153. Robert Drake
Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
Sun 11 Dec 1994

---

i didn't read charle's original post as refering to a narrow/ traditional definition of "family" as in nuclear... but rather a counterbalance on the side of _human_ relationships when the discussion has been focused on _economic_ relationships (&& yeah i know, they can't be seperated frm one another etc; but bottom- line telling that the discuss has been cast only in terms of work). that counterbalance is, i think, valuable... it also does not exclude extended definitions of family, including various Boho arrangements of oneself among one's loved ones...

lbd

↑ Index

154. Eric Selinger
Re: haoles
Mon 12 Dec 1994

On Fri, 9 Dec 1994, Susan Schultz wrote:

> I'm not sure you can have it both ways, Eric; if the classroom is to be a place where therapeutic anger authorizes students, then it's possible to regard Trask's poem as just that: a therapeutic exercise of getting angry. Though the word "therapy" suggests that somehow we'll all work through this in the end.

Hm. Clearly didn't make myself clear, there. I'm very doubtful of the notion of "therapeutic" classroom anger. Yes, yes, I know: Let fury have the hour / Anger can be power, etc. But I was far more impressed by the degree to which the pleasure of righteous rage (at LAST I get to sound off, cut in, go on the attack) was therapeutic only for the authorized patients. The rest of us were supposed to flush & bear it, & feel good about how bad we felt. Sorry: I don't buy it as pedagogy or as ethics.

My problem with equating the poem with > "ethnic cleansing" is that the Hawaiian sovereignty movement is a > separatist movement, not an imperial one (as in the "former > Yugoslavia"). Trask may want more of us haoles (and in this number she'd > include local Asian Americans) to leave the state, but I don't get the > sense that she wants to line us up and shoot us.

And when you don't want to leave? And when it's not her, but someone else?

In the context of her > entire book, Trask's position is a bit more complicated than this poem > suggests: there's a love poem to her haole partner of many years in > there, too (although he's presented as a "good haole" who supports her > struggle to the utmost).
>

Why, some of her best friends are haoles! (A cheap shot, but therapeutic, right?

> A note from yesterday's paper. "Bumpy" Kanahele, who led the year long occupation of Makapu'u beach, is quoted as saying that tourism and sovereignty are not entirely incompatible. He denied saying that he'd ever advocated violence against tourists: "What he did mean, he said, was that if the Hawaiians do not get what they want, things could get violent. But rather than let that happen, his organization would once again go the tourists and tell them their presence is lending support to an economy that is based on an illegal government in land improperly seized from the Hawaiians" (in 1893). After independence, and because of it, he argues, a better grade of tourist will come to Hawaii (an interesting spin on tourism, certainly).

So I'm partly supposed to support this out of snob value--no mo' tacky shirts and polyester leis?

I don't mean to be arrogant, merely obnoxious and suspicious. What part of the US isn't based on land improperly seized from someone? Where are all the rest of us supposed to go? And, again, what if we don't want to? I think the worst-case scenario must always be faced: I doubt that you or I can flip through a list of revolutionary / sovereignty movements and determine, in advance, who'll be violent, especially based on notions of "imperialism." Too many counterexamples.

Cranky from lack of coffee,

E.

↑ Index

155. Eric Selinger
Re: Academy, etc.
Mon 12 Dec 1994

On Sat, 10 Dec 1994, Donald J. Byrd wrote:

> The kind of reading that the New Critics thought to teach > to, if not the masses, a very large middle class is increasingly > a specialized skill, like say being able to solve differential > equations. A large majority of our 1000-plus English majors here > at Albany are pre-law or pre-M.B.A. (Business schools like students > who can read and write).
>
> Of course, most graduate programs in English have refused > to notice this fact, and wouldn't know what to do about it if they > would notice it.

As someone who regularly teaches American lit to freshmen & non-majors--not what I was trained to do, as such, in graduate school, but something that I find increasingly entertaining--I'd love to know: what forms of reading do you think SHOULD be taught, or at least encouraged? By reading I mean something like, "engagements with the text," I suppose. An open appeal for advice, before I weigh in with my own ill-formed, ill-gotten notions.

EMS

↑ Index

156. Ron Silliman
Re: haoles
Mon 12 Dec 1994

One sentence here stands out:

> My problem with equating the poem with "ethnic cleansing" is that the Hawaiian sovereignty movement is a separatist movement, not an imperial one (as in the "former Yugoslavia").

This would seem to be a "classic" question of a group's relation to power (the center). That which is at the center (or conceives of itself as a center) moves outward, imperial motion. That which perceives itself at the margin merely defines the margin (builds that border). Both seem to involve an essential(ist) xenophobia. Such is at the heart of every identity politics. The relative danger comes from the relation to power, no?

And at the real center comes that almost snow blindness of presuming it's "just us." Hence prop 187 in California and the Bubba vote throughout the US in 1994, revenge of the white males.

Interesting how, given what a "boy" discussion this has been for the past week or so, nobody here at all takes the standard Bubba position, even while the range of politics and poetics involved seems pretty broad. To be a poet makes an internationalist out of many (at least here in the US -- Dubravka Djuric has noted how many opportunistic poets in Serbia have taken advantage of the situation there to gather little fiefdoms of state power and how even the opposition Croat and Bosnian poets have quickly moved into nationalist positions that seem to have as much to do with what's in it for them as it does the needs of "their people."

So what is this concept "my people"?

↑ Index

157. Kit Robinson
Walking Grove of Trees
Mon 12 Dec 1994

Reply to: Walking Grove of Trees
Contrary to Tom & Ron, I would like to offer anyone pursuing an academic career this advice: stay in school! I decided a long time ago not to go to graduate school. Now I have to hustle my butt off just to make ends meet. I don't even have time to read all these emails! I think the reason I decided not to go to graduate school had something to do with wanting to become a poet. Of the many, many poets whose work I admire, none have been academics. But there's always a first time, and this might be it!

Kit Robinson

↑ Index

158. Robert A Harrison
Re: haoles
Mon 12 Dec 1994

Ron Silliman asks, whether rhetorically or not - What is this concept "my people"?

I agree the term is problematic. A bit different than the concept "my community." Seems that "my people", in identity politics, usually implies a sense of shared loss, or potentially shared loss. Seems that usually all of "my people" are fairly easily distinguishable from others, at LEAST to some potentially threatening others. I don't think the use of the term necessarily implies xenophia. Just like fear doesn't necessarily imply paranoia. Its use is often an attempt to unify in the face of division & conquering, no? On the other hand, the term could be used to rally the troops for extermination of an other. There's nothing inherently wrong in using the term, or good, it seems to me. Not only adds to binary confusion, but could help people gain a better "sense of themselves", no matter how illusory or how real, with which to participate in the world.

I imagine the concept is an absolutely essential one for many people.

Bob Harrison

↑ Index

159. Chris Stroffolino

Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle

Mon 12 Dec 1994

Yes, Charles (Alexander)--Isn't agreement boring? But I agree about not "divorcing" so-called "work" and so-called "free time" and I was intrigued by Shoemaker's wanting to go beyond binaries, or maybe I misread him, maybe he's saying it's impossible--and sure, there's no point CONCEPTUALLY doing away with certain binaries unless of course we disagree with referentiality, but obviously we don't or we wouldn't be talking about the town vs gown as if its rival tribes.... When I was a freshman in college a long time ago, they wanted the floor I lived on in a "dorm" to form a "team" against another floor where most of my friends lived (this is not an allegory of upward mobility-hint, hint) Anyway, the point is THAT what's silly about all these distinctions is that there is SOME SOCIAL FORCE that keeps us divided from each other--I tend to want to call it capitalism (but a rose by any other name...) and as one gets older the possibility of social engagement OUTSIDE THE FAMILY seems increasingly harder to pull off--The same old song, the death of community. I find it funny that people say "town" vs. "gown"--for certainly academics do not form a unified front. So, what's at stake in all this divisiveness! Ego? Pride? 12 Step program Rhetoric! Investments, commitments, marketing ploys. Testesterone! None of these explanations seem to account for it-- I know why because AGREEMENT (or what we call agreement) IS BORING and that brings us back to do....Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

160. Chris Stroffolino
Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle
Mon 12 Dec 1994

i had lost my thread in abstractions--when I say "divisiveness" I do not merely mean argumentative divisiveness, I mean the entire, uh, existential, (there I said it, though a better word of course is welcome--since all words seem approximations anyway) divisiveness that has a lot to do with the way this society attempts to assign us in predetermined grids, not just alienated labour and specialization but its echo in "personal stuff" and they are two sides of the same coin, a coin we should either try to melt down, but HOW? Being torn of course between wanting to attack the "bourgeois individual" from a position of the collective and on the other hand distrusting the NORMALIZING function collectivity seems to necessitate as in Neitzsche's genealogy (strong become evil, etc). I don't know this but abstractly.maybe it would be better if Charles Alexander actually DID turn this into a discussion about DIAPERS--for there should be a way for us oh so enlightened and concerned avant-gardists (sic) to be able to deal with such things without either cynical irony on one hand or IOWA school "musings" on the other. Though I think WCW is relatively over-emphasized (if not over-rated), at least he could write things like "Dance Rusee"-- to find the BOHO IN the family man, the family man in the BOHO, etc... Otherwise we become stereotypes for each other, "the grass always greener with envy on the other man's yawn"---Cranky (from too much coffee), Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

161. James Sherry
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Mon 12 Dec 1994

Having been through some graduate school, taught at NYU for a few years, worked as an independent entrepreneur, worked as a capitalist lackey, done manual labor painting outsides of high rises, published 10 books that made money and 8 books (poetry) that lost money, published 75 literary titles, run a non-profit distribution service, worked for the city of New York, and since I am always looking for work to do I figure I have failed at everything I have ever tried to do. In the light of this experience which I do not wish to describe as holier, simply that I have some direct experience of both sides of the fence that is being disputed as well as other fences of the labor market not described, I would expect that any honest look at the corporations and universities described in your letters differ little from each other in their most important respects. Generally universities treat workers worse and do less damage with their output while corporations treat workers better in comparable positions, but engage in risk taking to the extent that their output has a greater direct effect, good and bad, on the society, environment, and individual lives. They make together two of the many kinds of institutions we live with and any attempt to denigrate either type of institution is both narrow and irrelevant. The risks of corporate life now are great. The inability of universities to significantly amend those risks is pathetic. Read today's NY Times re: Bass & Yale. Transnationalism is a fact. Can these discussions turn that situation around? Can we add an accent to it that will increase the benevolence of our physical and intellectual environment in an entire world? How do you expect to affect it? What is your program? What cooperation does this group offer?

↑ Index

162. James Sherry
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Mon 12 Dec 1994

Once again Steve, your response to Ron is counter productive, well reasoned, but can you accept that a single world exists whose cultures ar merging and their intersection causes these clashes. The emerging world culture is not better or worse than the indigenous cultures that are being infected by each other. Ron's anti-universal arguement and your response to it, "true or false universalism", are again polarizing a world that can be viewed as having two poles or two critical loci of its magnetic field. The arguments pro and con do not elucidate the way they interact, only the way you feel them impacting your personal life. I hardly consider your position universal.

↑ Index

163. Sheila Murphy
ASSORTED
Mon 12 Dec 1994

It's been a pleasure performing a kind of lump sum lurking in this Poetics forum, following a patch of down time while a crafty computer consultant helped unclog this machine, thereby freeing up space to let the AOL upgrade flower.

Spooling back to the issues concerning how to mesh ethics and workplace and needed action, it would seem that at every turn there's temptation to freeze (not act) on account of the rampant impurities that are evident in virtually every institution. Having spent about 15 years in the private sector and only a few in the public sector, and now having clients in both, I've liked the fluency that one gains from operating in a corporate context. It has often (if not always) felt necessary to sort and strain value from the inevitable dross one finds there.

And, of course, those who've NOT worked in the private sector probably find greater mystique in that milieu than do those who have. Why talk about this? Simply to say that one of the things that "gets learned" in the many types of environment that are spawned by greed is the value of amassing little accomplishments, taking action (I prefer not to use the term "small wins," as this connotes at least a battle, if not a war). There's a kind of confidence, false or not, that one can glean from focusing and directing attention and then acting. And I'm sure there are plenty of things one could edit out of such experience. But I find that seeking purity prior to taking action is an exasperating experience.

The point of this is that the best of what's available in a corporate experience frames (thereby makes possible) an action mentality that COULD (although it does not often enough) yield value for social concerns.

I absolutely never feel I've done enough about anything in the way of our largest problems (those real biggies). But it seems that forming hinges between little effort and little effort can at least foster mental health as some version of a collective pads along trying to progress.

The institutionalization of greed, the fostering of subset addictions via the established channels, make all progress feel impossible at times. And yet it is very likely in our small units of communing we live out values that keep shaping the world.

So while some kind of conviction and effort (proof) that action is possible, there are daunting odds. As each day reveals, it's got to be worth it to try.

Sheila Murphy

↑ Index

164. Donald J. Byrd
Re: Academy, etc.
Mon 12 Dec 1994

Eric writes:

> As someone who regularly teaches American lit to freshmen & non-majors--not what I was trained to do, as such, in graduate school, but something that I find increasingly entertaining--I'd love to know: what forms of reading do you think SHOULD be taught, or at least encouraged? By reading I mean something like, "engagements with the text," I suppose. An open appeal for advice, before I weigh in with my own ill-formed, ill-gotten notions.

Undergraduates by and large have never had the experience of grand coherence. I try to teach them to look for big patterns and make it cohere.

Beginning graduate students usually cohere excessively. I try to teach them to let go (Charles' list of algorithm's here might be useful).

Advanced graduate students typically have fallen into utter chaos. I try to teach them to cohere.

The distance between coherence1 of the undergraduates and coherence2 of the advanced graduate students is considerale. There is a coherence that is closed and a coherence that is open.

Don Byrd

↑ Index

165. Marc Nasdor

Re: haoles

Tue 13 Dec 1994

I spent a month on Maui in 1987 and found a the presence of a suffocating racial pecking order which put white celebrity types and "windsurf nazis" as well as rich Japanese country clubbers on top, native Hawaiians second (due to their land-grant rights and not least their will to be heard), Chinese third, and everybody seemed to beat on the Filipinos, who were stereotyped as living in trailer parks filled with red velvet furniture and Elvises everywhere. I not only found this annoying, I almost got the shit beaten out of me when I went to the wrong bar to have a drink. I had to keep reminding people that I was not a resident, which immediately exempted me from having to participate in this little game.

Otherwise it was a paradise.

--Marc Nasdor

↑ Index

166. Michael Boughn

Blaser book

Tue 13 Dec 1994

---

shuffaloff books announces the forthcoming publication of

"Preface to the Early Poems of Robert Duncan"
by
Robin Blaser

Publication date: March 1995
7.5" x 8.75"
10 pp.

Pre-publication price: $6.00 US/$8.00 CAN (+$1.50 s&h)
After publication: $7.50US/$10.00CAN (+ s&h)

"This essay was originally written as an introduction to the first volume of the Collected Works of Robert Duncan published by the University of California. Because of unforeseen complications, it could not be included. It has appeared previously in an earlier version in a catalog of the drawings of Robert Duncan published by the Poetry/Rare Books Collection of the State Universtity of New York at Buffalo."

shuffaloff monograph #1

Send inquiries or orders to:

260 Plymouth Ave.
Buffalo, NY 14213

or

653 Euclid Ave.
Toronto ON M6G 2T6
(for Canadian orders, make cheques payable to Michael Boughn) or contact Michael Boughn at [redacted]

↑ Index

167. Tom Mandel
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Tue 13 Dec 1994

James Sherry writes:

> ...that a single world exists whose cultures are merging and their intersection causes these clashes. The emerging world culture is not better or worse than the indigenous cultures that are being infected by each other.

Well,...

1. No one occupies a position from where it is possible to see what multiple cultures are doing on a world scale, esp. not as the pictured fantasy involves the future, which it is in principle not possible to know.

2. That an emerging world culture (assume it for a moment) is "not better or worse than the indigenous cultures" is either not an empirical statement (i.e. it is an anthropologist's position) or if it is one, where's the evidence? One could certainly argue that the culture of the Roman Empire, for example, as it grafted itself onto and lived off of indigenous cultures all over Europe and the Med. basin, was a disaster for those cultures, tragedy for their people. I don't think James can assure any "indigenous culture" anywhere that the global transformation he sees will be "not better or worse" for them.

3. Someone somewhere ought to formalize and describe an ailment of the intellect that he/she might call "the consolation of terms." Apparently, mere possession of a term like "culture" is sufficient to give its possessor a sense of having risen above the sombre cthonic clash of undescribed human interests whose stake and way in the world is being steamrollered. Get thee behind me terminology.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

168. Rodger Kamenetz
Re: ASSORTED
Tue 13 Dec 1994

Sheila Murphy's phrase "institutionalizaiton of greed" struck me as very useful in the context of both the occupational identity discussions and Don Byrd's splendidly splenetic manifesto. Frankly I'm bored with the aspect of the discussion about which is better academic or corporate or both or neither, or family or boho etc. We all made and make choices and they have consequences, so lets go on with it. A pickpocket can be a great poet (Villon) and so can a saint-- the confusion for my generation was that we confused the exoteric and esoteric -- many of us needed the identity of poet before we ever had the practice. Back to greed: I follow the Buddhist perspective: it is a basic aberration of mind, one of the three poisons also identified with attachment or clinging. Precisely because it is universal, there's no sense looking for greed out there (in corporations, universities etc.)-- it's right here folks and is active in various ways from moment to moment, whether we are greedy for a toast crumb or a tenured professorship. Now Sheila's phrase, institutionalization of greed is to the point-- the great engines of capital refine, develop and advertise new attachments and the wheels keep spinning. Various spiritual disciplines, meditation and prayer-- do offer a perspective adn a practice for recognizing the nature of greed and a de-conditioning from its allure. And I think it better to work on ourselves than to assume the enemy is some 'they" out there. Rodger Kamenetz [redacted]

↑ Index

169. Mark Wallace
AMERICA: A PRAYER
Tue 13 Dec 1994

AMERICA: A PRAYER

The Honorable Newt Gingrich has informed us that prayer in the public schools is one of the most important issues facing this great nation, and in our firm belief that America doesn't have a prayer, we call upon the Poets of America to give America a prayer. Opportunity is crucial in a capitalist society. We feel therefore that this, the 104th Congress, should have the opportunity to authorize the production of the appropriate American prayer from amongst the deeply felt works of America's finest, most challenging, and dedicated writers.

America's prayer is meant to be read by everybody, but don't let that stop you. Your prayers should be 500 words or less. Please send two copies of your prayer. One, marked "Proposal for Prayer for the Schools," should be sent to The Honorable Newt Gingrich, House of Representatives, 2428 Rayburn Hourse Office Bldg., Washington, D.C. 20515. The other copy should be sent with self-addressed stamped-envelope to Aerial/Edge at the address below. Selections of the prayers we received will appear in an upcoming issue of The New Censorship, and possibly some other forums; we encourage interested publishers to contact us as well. No strictures on style or content. Writers may or may not wish to imagine delivery of their prayer in a classroom context. You do not have to be a U.S. citizen to participate. Also interested in visual materials. Please pass this opportunity on to as many people as possible.

Deadline: Feb. 28, 1995.

Rod Smith Lee Ann Brown Mark Wallace

The Loose Coalition for Democratic Inspiration.

AERIAL/EDGE
P.O. Box 25642
Washington, D.C. 20007

↑ Index

170. Robert Drake
TRR call for reviews
Tue 13 Dec 1994

```
                  _______________
  > > > > > > > > > > CALL FOR REVIEWS < < < < < < < < < <
                  ^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^
```

folks--

TAPROOT REVIEWS provides access to a wide variety of writing and language-art publications, with short reviews of hundreds of titles in each issue. This is a periodically updated call for submissions. The following titles are among those available for review:

Charles Bernstein Dark City
Mei-mei Berssenbrugge Sphericity
Clark Coolidge Registers (People In All)
Norman Fisher Precisely the Point Being Made
Peter Ganick Cafe Unreal
No Soap Radio
Susan Gevirtz Linen Minus
Catherine Harris Sylvan Delta
Denise Lawson Where You Form the Letter L
Stacy Levine My Horse & other stories
Jena Osman Amblyopia
Leslie Scalapino Goya's L.A.
J. Spahr et.al.(eds.) A Poetics of Criticism
Elizabeth Willis Second Law

+assorted chaps from Leave Books:

Elena Rivera WALE
Sally Doyle UNDER THE NEATH
Kimberly Lyons RHYME THE LAKE
Lori Lubeski STAMINA
Laynie Browne ONE CONSTELLATION
Cole Swenson WALK
Will Alexander ARCANE LAVENDER MORALS
Joe Ross PUSH
Kristin Prevallet from PERTURBATION, MY SISTER
Kevin Magee SEA/LAND
Guy R. Beining TOO FAR TO HEAR

Magazines:

Avec Vol.8, 1994
Exile Vol.2 #4, fall 1994
House Organ #8, fall 1994
The Impercipient #6, November 1994

-& this is just a small sampling...

WE WOULD WELCOME short (100-200 word) reviews of any of the above titles, other publications, or related language-arts work: spoken word recordings, artist's books, intermedia, etc... We also run longer "feature" articles (1000-2000 wd.), focusing on particular authors, titles, publishers, or tendencies. The emphasis remains on _access_ to publications. Query first. Samples of TapRoot Reviews Electronic Edition (TRee) can be found at the Electronic Poetry Center, and additional "writer's Guidelines" are available from this address.

luigi-bob drake
Burning Press/TRR
[redacted]

↑ Index

171. Pierre Joris
Re: Academy, etc.
Tue 13 Dec 1994

Oh Lawdie, Lawrd, this discussion of where its better to work, corp vs a.k.adamn is beginning to wear me down it sounds so anglo-puritan. work work work with a sour-grapes coating of ethics. Wasn't one of the reasons to become a poet exactly the possibility of escaping the dreary sludgery of work work work, of transforming that dailyness into a revolution of everyday life? Let us now praise laziness, ein Lob der Faulheit, la vida es suen~o, & from Rabelais to Debord, la fete, pleasure, laughter, sensuality, time spent with friends around a table with food & wine, & laughter, laughter -- which is what I miss most in Yankeeland.

========== Pierre Joris | Dept. of English | "La poesie ne s'impose plus, elle s'expose." SUNY Albany | Paul Celan Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | email: | "He who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." [redacted]| Henri Michaux
==========

↑ Index

172. Donald J. Byrd
Re: Academy, etc.
Tue 13 Dec 1994

Pierre Joris writes:
>
> Oh Lawdie, Lawrd, this discussion of where its better to work, corp > vs a.k.adamn is beginning to wear me down it sounds so anglo-puritan.
> work work work with a sour-grapes coating of ethics. Wasn't one of the > reasons to become a poet exactly the possibility of escaping the > dreary sludgery of work work work, of transforming that dailyness into > a revolution of everyday life? Let us now praise laziness, ein Lob der > Faulheit, la vida es suen~o, & from Rabelais to Debord, la fete, > pleasure, laughter, sensuality, time spent with friends around a table > with food & wine, & laughter, laughter -- which is what I miss most in > Yankeeland.

I'd say, Pierre, that the first symptoms of repressed greed are incivility and loss of humor (laughter first, the sense of gentle irony thereafter). Of course, Amurikans aren't the only greedy ones, but we probably lead the field...

Probably the sense of irony was the big losser in this last election. Certainly, a sense of humor. The only way to rid the body politics of the likes of Newt Gingrich is with wild laughter.

Don Byrd

↑ Index

173. Steven Howard Shoemaker

JRNL: Poetry on the Margins (fwd)

Tue 13 Dec 1994

Hey, i posted a query about the "marginalization" of poetry on another pedagogically-oriented list (professors and high school teachers) and thought this list might find the first round of responses interesting, if sometimes lamentable.

steve shoemaker

Forwarded message:
> From daemon Tue Dec 13 11:46:44 1994
> Message-Id: <[redacted]>
> Date: Tue, 13 Dec 1994 11:28:51 -0500
> Reply-To: Teaching the American Literatures <[redacted]>
> Sender: Teaching the American Literatures <[redacted]>
> From: "[redacted] \"Randy Bass\"" <[redacted]
> Subject: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins
> To: Multiple recipients of list T-AMLIT <[redacted]>
>
> JRNL: T-AMLIT JOURNAL
>
> Poetry on the Margins
>
> Here are SIX Journal responses to Steve Shoemaker's posting on the > possible reasons that poetry seems marginalized within the academy.
> He also made the observation that poetry is far less discussed on

> T-AMLIT than prose and calls for more discussion about teaching poetry.
> RBass
> **********
> (1)
> From: IN%"[redacted]"
> Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins
>
> Perhaps because modern poetry has moved away fro sound. Little could be > sung. Without that rhythmic possibility, I suspect that poetry loses some > of its immediate appeal. kick the discussion off, perhaps. cheero.
>
> Adolph Soens
> University of Notre Dame
> ++
> (2)
> From: IN%"[redacted]" "Anthony R Petrosky" > Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins
>
> In response to Steve Shoemaker's note on poetry on the margins, I too > think it is curious that academics seem to be shying away from poetry.
> As I notice it specifically, there seems to me to be a reluctance to > teach poetry in conjunction with composition in much the way that there > seems to be resistance, at least in some places around the country, to > imagine that literature and composition can be taught together. There > are too few moments of literature and poetry especially in composition > readers. There is a lot of interesting stuff happening in poetry, and it > seems to me to offer students, in particular (from my interests) > composition students, another way to learn to write by writing about > poetry and by writing poetry. I would say the same about fiction and > journalism. It seems to me also that many of the old saws regarding > poetry and fiction still live on, especially those that represent writing > in these genres as requiring some sort of natural talent or creativity.
> These notions seem to be strongly held beliefs in public school teaching > as well as in the universities. It has also seemed to me to be the case > that my freshmen students can be interested in poetry when the poetry > presented to them is close to them, close to their language and so on.
> Generally, I would propose that public school students might be more > interested in poetry, along with their teachers, if they began with > contemporary poetry and worked their way back in the tradition as they > became more familiar and comfortable with reading, writing, and writing > about poetry. I suppose there is a moment when traditions are necessary > and important to the academic study of poetry for people who want to be > poets or literature majors, but I would still argue that the seduction > into poetry comes easiest for students from contemporary readings.

> Partly I understand my position as wanting to create the desire to read > and write poetry in with my students. I don't know how to do so with my > colleagues who aren't interested. I wonder too if they need to be > interested. Although the lack of interest affects students who might > encounter poetry, as I have been saying, in a composition course. Right > now that's where my interests are. And with various ways of interweaving > poetry in composition instruction and into high school courses of study.
>
> Lately I've done a handful of workshops in poetry with high school > students and teachers of high school students. The groups I've worked > with were enormously enthusiastic but unschooled and just not in touch > with contemporary poetry. AWP has a summer program for high school > teachers in poetry, and that seems to have a lot of potential.
> Prospective high school teachers, like prospective composition > instructors, don't have much background or experience with poetry. Do > you see poetry courses, excluding those workshops usually open only to > graduate student majors, being offered in departments around the > country? I wonder if anyone has a sense of this, or if we are working > simply from our limited personal impressions? I know from examining > almost all of the composition readers and textbooks that few include > poetry for any purpose.
> ++
>
> (3)
> From: IN%"[redacted]" "Carter C. Revard" > Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins
>
> Poetry is on the margins because poets marginalized themselves to be > romantic, to be rebels, to be outsiders, to be the few elite misunderstood > albatrosses who could fly in their own atmosphere but could not walk in > bourgeois back yards. It was then taken into the academies and given Boys > Town publicity as victim of bad bankers and salesmen. The next thing was > that it lost music to the Victrola and plot to the thrillers, metaphor and > rhyme to Madison Avenue, in every loss claiming a victory for obscurity > and solitude and self-pity. The few poets who could teach, like Dr.
> Seuss, had to stay out of teaching, which was declared educational only in > prose venues, and that prose had to be jargon or it could not be certified > educational. Eliot said poetry had to be difficult, and this was used as > excuse for making it unreadable. Then an industry of explainers grew up > to account for the gap between ordinary readers and what was called > poetry. The explainers could not get jobs unless explanations were > needed. This meant that the real poetry--that is, what people need and > want to read which tells them where they are most deeply hurt and healed, > made to laugh and cry, entertained and instructed--is what does not have > to be taught, that is, what people actually find and read despite schools > and universities. Poetry got into the ivory tower and only the > enterprising thieves and ---but I now have to confer with a student about > Shakespeare and Milton, so you will all have to correct my > misunderstandings on this slender basis, for now.

> ++
++++++++++++++
> (4)
> From: IN%"[redacted]"
> Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins
>
> I think there are many reasons for the "marginalization" of poetry in the > academy--especially if you're talking about contemporary poetry. One is that > some of it has become increasingly esoteric, of interest only to specialists > who have waded through the many pages of theory that supports is. This was a > trend begun by the modernists early in the century and taken up by certain > post-modernist poets who follow that strand. Related to this is the retreat > from actual life experience and the cerebral nature of some postmodern > poetry. It's significant, I think that poets whose work is clearly related > to life experience--like Adrienne Rich, Allen Ginsberg, Robert Bly, Gwendolyn
> Brooks, and more, are really not marginalized but have very large followings.
> I think there is actually a hunger for poetry in this country but people are > put off by the remoteness of some of the stuff that passes for poetry. I > know this position will seem reactionary to some academics, but people want > to read poetry that matters--that makes a difference in their lives. Dana > Gioia's essay of several years back, "Can Poetry Matter" touches on this.
> Would be nice to have a dialog here--without ad hominem attacks--about how > we can support a poetry that matters in the society and in the academy.
> ++
+++++++++++++++++++++
>
> (5)
> From: IN%"[redacted]" "Jim Kinney" 9-DEC-1994
> SUBJ: Poetry on the Margins
>

> Part of the current lack of interest in poetry is, I suspect, > simply a function of the pendulum swing away from the 30-year > hegemony of poetry under the New Critics in American universities.
> Fashion powers our work as much as theory, and poetry right now is > old fashioned as well as less theorized than narrative at the > moment. Jim Kinney
> ++
>
> (6)
> From: IN%"[redacted]" "Kevin Lewis" > Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins
>
> I like Steve's suggestion that we talk about and perhaps teach poetry more.
>
> I teach in a religious studies department because I got a degree in > religion and lit with a dissertation on religion and poetry (and because > that's where the job was when I came along). Now I get a lot of work as > the outside examiner or reader on English Phd committees--which I enjoy.
> An observation: with one exception, my colleagues on the English faculty > with whom I sit around the table "examining" candidates never ask about > the particular uses of language in poetry which makes it poetry and not > something else. And that exception is nearing retirement. I ask you who > read and contribute to this list: what has happened?
>
> Has theory obsession, has multi-culturalism, has historicism new or old, > has (God help us) fiction, driven poetry as poetry out of the curriculum?
> I sense embarrassment among my colleagues in the English faculty, both > that they are not teaching it and that they are not sufficiently > versed in it (sorry) themselves. I may have that wrong, however. Is it > there are always so many more important things to do in an English > department and in one's career in literary studies? Are there fewer and > and fewer in the profession who care about poetic uses of languages because > they write or once wrote poetry themselves (or because they know poets > and perhaps observe how poets actually work)?
>
> I am a fan of Helen Vendler. I read her with fascination, wanting to see > and to describe in poems and poetries what she sees, hears, and describes.
> Others will have their favorites obviously. Are you going to have to be > a little bit nutty or appointed in religious studies to cultivate a view > of poetry, as it were, from the inside, asking how poems and poetries > tick and how they work? Did poetry go out with the "new criticism?" Why > are the new formalisms so inept at imagining the process of poetic making?

>
> I teach poetry every semester: Dickey, Auden, D.H. Lawrence, Blake, Plath, > Blake, Millay and Bunting (next semester in RELG 471: Spiritual > Autobiography), Whitman, Dante in translation (Sayers). I can never teach > it without wanting to attend to the technique in dialectical relation > to the mystique. Sorry: that sounds excessively cute, but you get the point.
>
> Kevin Lewis
> [redacted]
>

↑ Index

174. Steve Evans
Re: Academy, etc.
Tue 13 Dec 1994

Pierre Joris notes that laughter is what he misses most in "Yankeeland," to which I would just add--among those possibilities of embodied interaction that get absented here at the keyboard, the possibility of sharing a laugh is the one I most miss.

Absent that possibility, I know I drift into a kind of unrelieved mordancy--not terribly generous, and not terribly interesting. I take it that this tendency is what James calls being "well reasoned" (which I think translates roughly as "a bore").

I do know that without laughter to leaven it, the "big talk" of politics strikes me as out of scale, a kind of impossibility.
To the extent that I have persisted, it has been in nervous awareness of that impossibility, as well as of the "consolation of terminology" that Tom Mandel mentions.

By the way, I owe an apology to Tom for assuming a while back that I knew what his response to a statement of mine might be-- the gesture rang of defensiveness and cut against the grain of our for(u)m here, where allowing for surprise is a key value.

I sometimes wonder if the disjunction between abstract/concrete (or better: what is thought and what is actionable) isn't the most pressing concrete fact of current political life. In other contexts, I've thought that beginning with the specificity of poetry is the best check against going to the abstract too quickly (to paraphrase Sartre on the universal and to recall, also, that passage of Joan Cock's (?) which Patrick cited a while back). With the exception of Tom's inclusion of an Alan Bernheimer poem a few days ago, I think I've missed poetry only a little less than I've missed laughter in recent days. I don't mean to construct yet another binary--I don't credit separations of poetry and politics and I doubt others here do either--but just to note that the value we convene around here is primarily that of poetic practice: after that, the spectrum of political positioning is, if not stunningly unpredictable(it isn't), a perhaps rather highly individuated mirror of the available categories that structure the wider citizenry.

At this moment, the possibility of "internationalism" strikes me as the most interesting topic for further discussion--as an actionable thought some of us are having. I agree with Ron that it is not coincidental that poets, and intellectuals more generally, should be thinking such thoughts. At the risk of consolidating that reading-list Tom has expressed antipathy towards, I think Bourdieu has some good things to say in this regard in his address called "Universal Corporatism: The Role of Intellectuals in the Modern World" (Poetics Today 12.4 [1991]: 655-669). I would also refer those who have questioned my use of the term "autonomy" to that essay for a sense of how I have been intending it.

Well, I near the end without having elicited a single chuckle I'm sure. Alas--

↑ Index

175. Eric Selinger
Ron Johnson
Tue 13 Dec 1994

Some weeks ago, as I recall, someone gave the name of the New Mexico publisher who's bringing out the complete ARK. I lost my copy of this information, & am eager to get a copy or galleys to help me finish a Dictionary of Literary Biography entry on RJ. I've left word for the poet himself, out at Berkeley, but if anyone here could pass the info along, I'd appreciate it.

(Am also ISO a copy of the out-of-print "Complete Short & Early Works" to supplement what I've been able to work with at the Library of Congress so far. Will pay postage & copying costs, if necessary.)

EMS

↑ Index

176. Steven Howard Shoemaker dark familiar
Tue 13 Dec 1994

> > Oh Lawdie, Lawrd, this discussion of where its better to work, corp > vs a.k.adamn is beginning to wear me down it sounds so anglo-puritan.
> work work work with a sour-grapes coating of ethics. Wasn't one of the > reasons to become a poet exactly the possibility of escaping the > dreary sludgery of work work work, of transforming that dailyness into > a revolution of everyday life? Let us now praise laziness, ein Lob der > Faulheit, la vida es suen~o, & from Rabelais to Debord, la fete, > pleasure, laughter, sensuality, time spent with friends around a table > with food & wine, & laughter, laughter -- which is what I miss most in > Yankeeland. > >
==========
> Pierre Joris | > Dept. of English | "La poesie ne s'impose plus,
elle s'expose." > SUNY Albany | Paul Celan > Albany NY 12222 | >
tel&fax:[redacted] | > email: | "He who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." > [redacted]| Henri Michaux >
==========

I just discovered a new "emoticon": ^;^

It looks to me like a cat sticking out its tongue. I propose we let it preside as a sort of dark "familiar," invoking the spirit of (necessarily macabre?) comedy Pierre recommends.

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

177. James Sherry
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Tue 13 Dec 1994

The prayer in the schools which I used most often and most effectively was, "May he fuck you, teach."

↑ Index

178. James Sherry
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Tue 13 Dec 1994

Mr. Mandel is afraid to predict that we will have weather.

↑ Index

179. Tom Mandel
Re: Academy, etc.
Tue 13 Dec 1994

---

in reply to Pierre Joris:

Fine, how about your place?

I remember reading somewhere in Georges Perec (I think in an occasional piece in his magazine, name of wch I forget) teh delightful observation wch I must paraphrase, that there is no writer, however much he regards himself (or she herself) as doing serious work, who has not lain in bed with the sound of the working class outside heading off to work and felt a satisfaction either sly or hearty at what he/she has gotten away with in this world!

Where, by th eway, are all these posts advising anyone that is better to work in the corporate world (better for who and what). I haven't noticed any. Personally, I recommend to anyone who doesn't mind the personal uncertainties therewith associated to work for his or herself.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

180. Mark Roberts
Southerly/AWOL
Tue 13 Dec 1994

****

AUSTRALIAN WRITING ONLINE is a small press distribution service which we hope will help Australian magazines, journals and publishers to reach a much wider audience through the internet. As a first step we will be posting information and subscription details for a number of magazines and publishers to a number of discussion groups and lists. We hope to build up a large emailing list which includes as many libraries as possible. If you know of a list or discussion group which you think might be worthwhile posting or if you would like more information about AWOL please email AWOL at [redacted]..

Please note that [redacted] is a temporary address until we set up our own address sometime next year

****

SOUTHERLY

Southerly is Australia's oldest literary magazine. For over fifty years it has held a central place in the making of Australian literature. The work of Australia's finest writers has appeared in its pages, and been discussed in its critical essays and commentaries.

Now Southerly has a renewed appeal, with a clear new design by Toni Hope-Caten, and covers which feature work by Australian artists from the collection of the Museum of Contemporary Art in Sydney. The presentation of the magazine's contents has also changed. We publish a wide range of poetry, fiction and criticism from writers all over Australia and New Zealand. But we also seek out or commission writing which has a special appeal, because of innovative or challenging qualities, or because it helps to throw new light on current literary concerns.

The September 1994 issue of Southerly features excerpts from Fay Zwicky's unpublished journal and essays on her poetry by Ivor Indyk and Elsa Linguanti; a selection of work by the poets associated with Collective Effort, including a long poem from P0 's epic '24 Hours'; new poems by Peter Skrzynecki and an essay on his poetry by Michael Griffith; Carl Harrison-Ford on literary hoaxes; poetry by the New Zealand poet Lauris Edmonds; and reviews of contemporary Australian writing by Judith Beveridge, Evelyn Juers, Noel Rowe and Nicolette Stasko.

The December issue of Southerly includes new pieces by Archie Weller, Antigone Kefala and Dorothy Porter; an important paper by David Carter on the reverse cultural cringe in Australian literature; essays by Jill Roe on Miles Franklin, Simon Petch on Janet Frame and Tony Winner on David Malouf; and fiction and poetry by Fiona Place, Grant Caldwell, Geoff Page, Richard Allen, Jill Jones and many more.

SPECIAL OFFER

SUBSCRIBE NOW FOR 1995 AND RECEIVE TWO ISSUES FOR 1994 FREE.

Southerly is pleased to offer new or lapsed subscribers a special extended subscription.

New subscriptions received in 1994 will be treated as subscriptions for 1995, with the issues for September and December 1994 included free of cost.

Southerly is published four times a year, in March, June, September and December. This special offer gives you six issues for the price of four. Southerly hopes that you will join them in advancing the role Southerly plays in Australian literary life by taking out a subscription to the magazine.

Southerly is edited by Ivor Indyk and Elizabeth Webby, and is published quarterly by the English Association, Sydney. For enquiries about subscriptions and contributions call 02 [redacted] (international 61 2 [redacted]).

cut here (print this message and mail the subscription form to Southerly) .....

SUBSCRIPTION FORM

Name: _____

Address: _____

_____

Please indicate the rate appropriate to your subscription (all dollars are Australian dollars)

Individual __ $35 (AUS) within Australia

__ $50 (AUS) Overseas

Institutional __ $50 (AUS) within Australia

__ $65 (AUS) Overseas

This subscription is for the four issues of Southerly to be published in 1995, and includes the September and December issues of 1994. The subscription includes postage.

Please send this form, with your payment to: SOUTHERLY, DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH, UNIVERSITY OF SYDNEY NSW 2006 AUSTRALIA.

Southerly is assisted by the Australia Council, the Australian Government's arts advisory and support organisation, and the New South Wales Government through the Ministry for the Arts.

↑ Index

181. Kathryne Lindberg
(no subject)
Tue 13 Dec 1994

Please ignore the material re: transfer of information and commentary on future conferences etc. I didn't know how to erase all but RESOLUTION fyi.
----------Original message----------
From: AXPVMS::BRQ 13-DEC-1994 11:18:14.39
To: BOVE
CC:
Subj: mla resolution

From: IN%"[redacted]" "[redacted]" 9-DEC-1994
18:16:41.67
To: IN%"[redacted]" "John Beverley"
CC:
Subj: Fw: MLA Resolution vs Proposition 187 (fwd)

("port 48460"@choplifter.rs.itd.umich.edu) by vms.cis.pitt.edu (PMDF V4.3-10 #6609) id <[redacted]>; Fri, 09 Dec 1994 18:16:37 -0400 (EDT)
9 Dec 1994 18:16:36 -0500
Date: Fri, 09 Dec 1994 18:16:35 -0500 (EST)
From: "[redacted]" <[redacted]>
Subject: Fw: MLA Resolution vs Proposition 187 (fwd)
To: John Beverley <[redacted]>
<[redacted]>

Hi, In case you have not heard of this resolution I am forwarding it to you. I have been in touch with Julio Ramos and he is working on a proposal for the Humanities Institute at Irvine for a subaltern colloquium. He needs to know when would it be a good time in Fall 95. I thought of the middle of October, after LASA and the semester has gotten going. Let me know what you think. It seems that the issue of DISPOSITIO before ours should be finished this semester, so we should be next by the beginning of the year. You need to send me your revised version. Don't forget to include a diskette. Un abrazo, Jose

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Fri, 9 Dec 94 16:27:30 EST
From: [redacted]

To: [redacted]
Subject: Fw: MLA Resolution vs Proposition 187

------- Forwarded message

Date: Fri, 9 Dec 94 14:44:26 EST
From: [redacted]
To: [redacted],
[redacted],
[redacted],
[redacted]
Subject: Fw: MLA Resolution vs Proposition 187

This came to me today, folks...send it around.
Catherine

------- Forwarded message

10:32:22 EST
SMTP id AA00850
(5.67b8/IDA-1.5 for <[redacted]>); Fri, 9 Dec 1994
09:32:00 -0600
Date: Fri, 9 Dec 1994 09:27:31 -0600 (CST)
From: "Linde Brocato" <[redacted]>
To: <[redacted]>
Subject: Fw: MLA Resolution vs Proposition 187

From: GROVER FURR <[redacted]>
Thu, 8 Dec 1994 22:54:00 EST
To: Multiple recipients of list MEDGAY-L <[redacted]>
Subject: MLA Resolution vs Proposition 187

Colleagues and friends:

I am helping circulate a resolution, to be proposed at the Modern Language Association Convention, Dec. 26-30, in San Diego, calling for the MLA -- the largest professional academic association in the country, perhaps the world -- to oppose Prop. 187; to urge teachers not to cooperate with it; and not to meet in California until the anti-immigrant provisions of Prop. 187 are repealed.

If anyone reading this note is a current member of the MLA, or knows MLA members, I urge you to put your name to the resolution below and return it to me, and to forward the text of the resolution, either electronically or in hard copy, to other members for their signatures. They may return them to me at my address (below).

If this resolution were to be passed, it would represent a considerable blow to the convention business in CA. But more important by far would be the message it would send to educators and the world at large.

Please feel free to repost this message to other newsgroups and on relevant Listservers, but please be sure to ask that the signed resolutions be returned to me by Dec. 24, as I have to take them to San Diego on Dec. 26.

Sincerely,

Grover C. Furr

English Department
Montclair State University
Upper Montclair, NJ 07043
[redacted]

* * * * * * * * * *

Resolution in Opposition to Proposition 187

WHEREAS the recently-passed ballot California initiative called Proposition 187 has called for the denial of public education--at the primary, secondary, junior college, college, and university levels--to undocumented workers and their children; and

WHEREAS public school teachers have been required to help verify the citizenship status of their students, in effect to serve as INS agents; and

WHEREAS Proposition 187 was passed in an election year characterized by an alarmingly xenophobic and racist atmosphere in which undocumented workers became scapegoats for the economic problems facing California's working people, even though immigrant workers, both undocumented and documented, continue to be a mainstay of California's economy; and

WHEREAS the dangerously fascistic implications of Proposition 187 are revealed by the fact that the "Save Our State" movement backing Proposition 187 was funded in significant part by the Pioneer Foundation, a group that has since the 1930s been committed to demonstrating the genetic inferiority of African- American and other nonwhite peoples; and

WHEREAS the Modern Language Association is committed to extending education to all segments of the US population and is unalterably opposed to all forms of xenophobic and racist ideology and practice;

BE IT RESOLVED THAT the Modern Language Association condemns the denial of public education to undocumented workers and their children in California and takes steps to publicize this condemnation; and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED THAT the MLA urges present and future public school teachers not to cooperate with the State request to verify the legality of their students' immigration status; and

BE IT FURTHER RESOLVED THAT the MLA refuses to hold any meetings or conventions in California until such a time as the anti-immigrant provisions of Proposition 187 are repealed.

We the undersigned members of the MLA, urge that the above resolution be discussed and passed at the 1994 Convention.

NAME (Print/Signature) DEPT/INSTITUTION

1. _____

2. _____

↑ Index

182. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: town/gown/marriage/kindergarten/bottle

Tue 13 Dec 1994

Today I only changed three diapers, but signed 300 or so fundraising letters, worked on one mid-length poem, put off writing a review, shoveled the snow (two days late) on a sidewalk, sat with children while spouse went to do her chore as representative on an interim steering committee for a neighborhood revitalization plan, and may have danced semi-naked in front of my window, but feel neither particularly mad nor happy. I think if one goes deeply enough into the family unit one inevitably finds chaos & wonder there, perhaps a bit of BOHO. I want to thank you, Chris, for pushing this just a little.

charles

↑ Index

183. Mn Center For Book Arts

NEA ???

Tue 13 Dec 1994

There was a message several days ago which sought response to questions as to the value of the NEA in this time of its attack following recent elections. I certainly don't have the answer to those questions, but I have been asked to speak with a group of six literary organizations here in Minneapolis this Sunday (four of which are four of the eight largest non-profit literary publishers in the country, one of which is the largest independent writer's center in the country, the other of which is the center for book arts I direct -- they all bring in ideas about literary practice which I don't particularly share, but also seem to bring in a willingness to cooperate for the good of all, if such is possible). The agenda for this meeting is this congressional attack on the NEA (as I hear it, opinion ranges everywhere from a sense that the NEA will be abolished to, at the most optimistic, that it will receive a 10% cut each year for the next five years) and how to respond to such. If any on this forum have a particular interest in this, or specific ideas/questions to bring to such a meeting, I would love to hear from you before Sunday morning (Dec. 18), either on this forum, in my private e-mail box ([redacted]), or by telephone at work ([redacted]). Thank you.

charles alexander

↑ Index

184. William Lavender

act/cat/tongue

Wed 14 Dec 1994

My big gray castrated cat lies in my lap
while I read these scrolls, and while I'm mousing
I scratch his head and he purs and his tongue hangs out like Stimpy. I have to laugh. It's true that when you work for a corporation you get a sense of the act, like you put your documentation together
I guess and then you confer with your people and then you have begun to set a wheel in motion and that wheel is money and it is an act.
A genre is an act. Also an identity.
I confess, though, that I've never been able to lie in bed while the rest of the world goes off to work... not an ethical thing, but insomnia. Up until now
I though poets were just other people with insomnia.

↑ Index

185. Susan Schultz

Re: haoles

Wed 14 Dec 1994

Sorry to hear about traumatic experiences in "paradise." Of course the word itself, so often applied to Hawaii in the national media, to say nothing of Visitor's Board brochures, is no help at all. Just a couple more thoughts related to teaching in a multicultural classroom, and also inspired by a cursory look at the new Penguin anthology, _Unsettling America: An Anthology of Contemporary Multicultural Poetry_. I'm above all struck by the fact that (and my look was cursory) all the poems are in standard English. Well, there are a few Spanish words here and there . . . But I've found myself, as a contemporary poetry person, teaching poems in Hawaiian pidgin, as well as poems written in Hawaiian that are translated on the facing page. The idea of "teaching" poems in a language that I don't know, but my students do, does have a certain absurd appeal to it, but hardly seems ideal, except insofar as the students gain from the task of explaining words and cultural references to me. Surely there's American literature out there in Spanish, in Chinese, in Yiddish, and so on that belongs in a "multicultural anthology."

This brings me back to a question about the function of the university, with its emphasis, linguistic and actual, on "uni"fying knowledge. And the nationalistic function of privileging English (in part through the mere fact that someone like me doesn't speak pidgin, not being from the place where I'm teaching) over other languages that Americans speak. How would hiring practices (so much on English departments' minds this time of year) be affected by a re-evaluation, or revaluation, of this language question? I was intrigued by someone's comment about how Newt and his pals are beginning with a cultural agenda, rather than an economic one. The English-only movement will surely get a shot in the arm. What ARE the alternatives to English-only classrooms? Also with Ron Silliman's claim that American poets are "internationalist." When I'm optimistic I think so, but when I pick up an anthology like the multicultural one, I wonder if we're even being true to the internationalism that exists inside the US.

I'm also thinking about Peter Quartermain's and Charles Bernstein's essays on the effect of non-native speakers on American literature in English. It might bear looking at this effect in contemporary circumstances, as well as in the cases of Stein and Williams. To say nothing of the effect of American literature on native Hawaiian literature (much of it oral, and hence not "literature" at all). Does anyone know of such a thing?

And, not to be too uni-centric, I'd be curious to hear how corporations are dealing with issues like this.

We've been having trades of up to 40 mph for the past several days and, all things being relative, it's freezing. Keeps us at our computer screens.

Susan

↑ Index

186. Ron Silliman
Re: Academy, etc.
Wed 14 Dec 1994

Tom Mandel wrote:

> Where, by th eway, are all these posts advising anyone that is better to work in the corporate world (better for who and what). I haven't noticed any.

I agree completely.

==========
Ron Silliman
1819 Curtis Street
Berkeley, CA 94702-1617

[redacted] (home)
[redacted] (office)
[redacted] (fax)
[redacted]
[redacted]
==========

↑ Index

187. James Sherry
Re: haoles
Wed 14 Dec 1994

Listening to the background noise of the internet this morning, I noticed, although I haven't read all 100 messages in my inbox that there is both an internationalist and a multi-cultural trend which ought to be able to find common ground. As Steve Evans evinced, the international issue is vital to our future as writers, but how can we writers be international in one language, even if it is English? If English is the world language of today, it is so to an elite and their supporters. Multiculturalism represents the values of unique cultures and their languages. If we follow a multicultural trend, we will continue to celebrate our differences as long as they are celebratory and fall to fighting about the relative values of our uniqueness when we feel threatened or have genuine differences. Yugoslavia, Somalia, Ruwanda, Southern Russia, the list is as long as there are conflicts.

Of course it makes sense that Newt has a cultural agenda. If he supports a culture, it will support him, but is this the last gasp of nationalism. Not by a long shot. Not until a manageable number of languages, say two or three have taken over the globe, transparent currency exchanges are a fact of daily life, and the world bank dictates environmental policy in supposedly sovereign states can transnationalism be said to have taken over the world in any kind of successful way.

What, you say, all that is already true? Well, I'll be.

Susan Schultz: International corporations are controlled by multi-lingual managers who do not view having to switch from one to another as an imposition or as a threat to their personal identity and that of their families, but as means of control, because they can and frankly because they must. That's the value of multi-culturalism--we must speak to each other.

But most of the values of our literatures are based in a specific language, aligning writers with national or language-centered movements. A real dilemon, I'd say, because no matter how good you are at two or even three languages, your best shot in a foreign lanugage is facile or based on a limited vocabulary and set of resonances. Where is the poly-semous complexity that we all revel in when we speak English, if we have to be multi-lingual. Even then the marginal languages get disappeared.

In NY for example my German supervisor speaks English and is excited about using idiom. In Hawaii I hear the universe-ity is afraid of the influence of native language. Any wonder where the power is?

Rereading this I guess a lot of it is obvious, but the issues for poets are difficult, challenging some of our dearest assumptions.

↑ Index

188. Tom Mandel
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Wed 14 Dec 1994

> And Mr. Sherry's predictions have the exact value of the nightly weather report.

↑ Index

189. James Sherry
Re: Experiments List
Wed 14 Dec 1994

I'd like to add one modest experiment to the list Charles compiled:

Homophobic Translation. Take any e-mail you disagree with and respond to it high-handedly, concealing any confusion you might have on the subject. Insist on a tone that will demolish rather than convince your phantom adversary of another point of view. Cover your tracks with ad hominem attacks on anyone who might have disagreed with you on any subject. Be especially careful that these attacks do not touch on any of the values or issues on which your imagined opponent might be correct. Ignore any attempt to sidetrack the putative argument with reason, fact, or personal concerns. Throw is a lot of obscure references to books you have read in pre-publication galleys. Alternatively, coopt the issue instead of disagreeing with it using humiliating imitations. Alternatively, put your name on the ideas of others until you get taken to court and are vindicated by huge advances for your next book. Experimentation is such fun.

↑ Index

190. Pierre Joris

Re: Academy, etc.

Wed 14 Dec 1994

Tom, (& Ron, who concurred with:
>
> in reply to Pierre Joris:
>
[stuff deleted]
>
> Where, by th eway, are all these posts advising anyone that is > better to work in the corporate world (better for who and what).
> I haven't noticed any.
>
> Tom Mandel
>
Where indeed? I haven't noticed any either! What I wrote was that the "discussion of where its better to work, corp vs a.k.adamn" was getting ever so slightly wearisome...unless I dreamed it, there was discussion on the comparative merits of working for corporations versus working in academia?

Pierre

========== Pierre Joris | Dept. of English | "La poesie ne s'impose plus, elle s'expose." SUNY Albany | Paul Celan Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | email: | "He who leaves a trace, leaves an abcess." [redacted]| Henri Michaux ==========

↑ Index

191. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Academy, etc.
Wed 14 Dec 1994

No, Pierre, you didn't dream it, or I did too (and certainly there's no santa claus) but WHAT A DRAG--you think on a poetics list, especially one featuring many writers known for their problematizing of the old lyric "I" and its bulky humanistic cult of personalities, there'd be less "personality battles," less egomongering territorial pissing and at least some attention to, dare I say it, "poetry" or at least rockmusic in a way that isn't merely bitter like the comments on the Rolling Stones that imply a kind of dry smug superiority (that I am probably totally guilty of here). (By the way--there's a typo in the second line of this note--I meant "you'd think" not "you think"--"you" as in "one") Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

192. Chris Stroffolino
Re: ASSORTED
Wed 14 Dec 1994

Dear Rodger Kamenetz--Not that I disagree with you about the value of fighting the enemy within (and fighting fighting for that matter, to get to a place that's unexpressable), but surely the enemy "out" there is not merely an ASSUMPTION--some of us can no longer afford the luxury to assume an ontology in which an INDIVIDUAL's interests are totally oppossed to the interests of a collectivity, I think it's a question not so much of compromise in its bandaid-on-the-wound sense, but of realizing that we are "always already" social, even in "meditation" which can also be "a weapon", right?

↑ Index

193. James Sherry
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Wed 14 Dec 1994

"The only legitimate news is the weather."

↑ Index

194. Loss Glazier
Re: awol
Wed 14 Dec 1994

A note to announce that information about AUSTRALIAN WRITING ONLINE has been posted in the Small Press Alcove in the Electronic Poetry Center.

↑ Index

195. George Bowering
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Wed 14 Dec 1994

By "America," I take it, most of the people online here mean the U.S.

I wrote a prayer many years ago. It goes

"Lord, if I have but one life to live,

I hope this ain't it."

↑ Index

196. w.curnow
Re-Academy
Wed 14 Dec 1994

Tom Mandel wrote:

> Where are all these posts advising anyone that it is better to work in the corporate world (better for who and what)

And Ron Silliman (Dec.l4) quickly seconded this claim that there have been none such.

So I asked my secretary to go through the dept. e-mail files and to see if he could find any. And to have the report on my desk at his first opport- unity.

The situation seems to be as follows: on Dec. 6 Ron fired off a post in which he said there was more collaborativeness in the corporate world than in the university world. I.e. on that score (what) the corporation would be better for academics (who). Also on the score of knowing what was really going on in the economy --a must for anti-capitalists. The following day, Tom, himself posted to the effect that the world of commerce was more open, egalitarian, permissive of range than the university world. And that when you got sacked from your job in business at least it was for a good reason. On Dec. l2 James Sherry, suggested that corporations treated workers better in comparable positions than universities.

Well, Tom & Ron, you do make some good points.

I'd like to hear more about the not WORKING for LIVING option. I don't suppose there are too many on the List. About PRIVATE MEANS and how to come by them. There 's not much history in this discussion, but I believe the Modernists , especially those expatriates living in Europe, had great access to such means. Is there a book on patronage and the avant-garde? I am, of course, aware that the issue for many is whether it is more dishon- ourable to work for business or the university, and that taking money from aristocrats or magnates as they used to be called, may be even more dis- honourable, but isn't the question: is it possible in this culture to be a full poet, to work for a living as a artist, important to the discussion ?

Here there a few residences and fellowships which allow poets a year now and then (the residences are at the universities, and academics who happen to be poets can't apply!), but the full-time artists I know are painters and sculptors. That's a clear distinction, and a pretty recent one here: visual artists can live off their work, poets can't. They need a day job (which is ho Bruce Andrews described his university position to me).

Wystan.

↑ Index

197. Michael Boughn

Re: Re-Academy

Thu 15 Dec 1994

Thank you Wystan Curnow, for setting the record straight. I was beginning to think I had dozed off at the screen and dreamt it all. I mean I know I dozed off at the screen, but I could have sworn it was in the midst of some strange corporate/university competition.

As for "PRIVATE MEANS and how to come by them", the two time honored methods are: 1) inherit it, 2) marry it. If these two methods are unavailable to you, then all that's left, I think, is to schlepp through it with the rest of us. Alas and alack.

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

198. Rodger Kamenetz

Re: ASSORTED

Thu 15 Dec 1994

Whoah Chris-- I never opposed the individual to the group. No luxury ontology here- just an economy model-- fueled by clarity and compassion rather than rage, hatred and projection. Rodger Kamenetz

↑ Index

199. Steve Evans
Re: NEA ???
Thu 15 Dec 1994

Along with scenarios Charles Alexander mentioned vis-a-vis the latest attack on the NEA, I have also heard that the Newtuplicans are thinking of applying their standard procedure--defederalizing the NEA by turning arts funding (along with welfare, etc.) over to the states.

Could you, Charles, make time to report on Sunday's proceedings to the list? Also, has anyone learned of the Literary Network's strategy for defending the program?

Steve

↑ Index

200. Tom Mandel
Re: Academy, etc.
Thu 15 Dec 1994

Pierre The more I think about your last few posts, the more obvious it becomes to me that you are trying to cover your tracks after having more or less invited the whole list over to your house (humor, chuckle). I think we shd return to that notion and salute you for issueing the invitation. What a wonderful idea to unite all these virtual entities in a veritable cook-out say sometime next spring. Think about it, y'all. Set a date.

tom

↑ Index

201. Tom Mandel
Re: Re-Academy
Thu 15 Dec 1994

well, what I said was that I had been fired for good reasons; others may not have the same stake to claim.

tom

↑ Index

202. Tom Mandel
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Thu 15 Dec 1994

---

re "The only legitimate news is the weather."

Because the predictive failure rate is so high...

↑ Index

203. Robert Drake
Re: NEA ???
Thu 15 Dec 1994

> has anyone learned of the Literary Network's strategy for defending the program?

The Literary Network was largely a one-woman project (Lisa Cooley), and as far as i know, when she left in the spring, the thing went on the back burner...

and, while i'm a fan of newts (& efts) & not of Newt, i'm no big fan of the NEA, either... do they really contribute all that much to non-mainstream culture?

luigi

↑ Index

204. John Cayley
Re: Experiments
Fri 16 Dec 1994

I've read through and felt challenged by the experiwhat? discussions on and off for some time now. Yes, it is quite wrong to fall into the trap of using the word glibly. Still, metaphors are there precisely to extend the range of words, to allow us to use them where they both do and do not signify what we previously agreed they signified.

I produce texts based on procedures and algorithms similar to those in Charles B's splendid list. The use of such procedures is of course not new, but in this (the network) context we should be much more aware of the tools now available which allow us to make literary experiments using such techniques in 'real time'. Until recently we've known about these procedures and when we've felt ludic we've sat down with siccors and paste. Now, with a little more trouble, you can learn a simple programming language and do the same. But once you've done this, the process of compostion, perhaps of writing itself has shifted to a new site. With a machine I can get feedback from the results of my procedures quick enough to adjust them according to non-arbitrary criteria. I can make my algorithms 'learn' more about the given texts and/or my responses to them. I can re-write the given texts so that they are better modulated by the algorithms. This is similar to experimental processes, isn't it? Finally, and importantly, I can provide suitably equipped readers with as-it-happens-but-never-the-same-twice performances of the procedures which they can 'read' on their own screens.

> Don Byrd wrote:
>
> After a certain point, chaos no longer needed the help of art. To recall wild nature in tranquility, to practice nihilistic techniques of art and thought, to do automatic writing, or to create chance generated art is a pointless gesture.

All I can say is why so? I do not feel that I am making a pointless gesture. Even if all that was obtainable from such procedures was a more liberated approach to the literary experience, they would still be worthwhile. Personally I believe they are adequate compostional strategies with the potential to produce significant art.

> It seems to me that these experiments at this late date call us back to means that are as exhausted as the means of a poetry that still attempts to make "ordinary" sense of a world where one watch a blue jay crap and thinks of mortality or Aunt Minnie.
>
> If we are going to experiment, let us experiment with all seriousness.

I do undertake these (?) experiments in all seriousness. I compose the algorithms and choose or write the underlying texts. I intend to produce something that is fascinating, perhaps beautiful, and that has significant content. Apart from the form and content of the resulting texts themselves, I believe the processes are of theoretical interest (even when using very simple algorithims such as those in Charles' list) in relation to questions of _Language as Choice and Chance_ (title of a book on mathematical grammars by G. Herdan), and the nature of meaning (it's strange resistance to semi-arbitrary processes). If it doesn't work, I can go back to the writing board. It is precisely the late date of this practice that allows me to develop it in this way.

John Cayley Wellsweep Press [in Chinese HZ:]
Tel & Fax: 0[redacted] Email: [redacted]

↑ Index

205. Pierre Joris
Re: Academy, etc.
Fri 16 Dec 1994

Tom, re your last message:
>
> Pierre
> The more I think about your last few posts, the more > obvious it becomes to me that you are trying to cover your tracks > after having more or less invited the whole list over to your > house (humor, chuckle). I think we shd return to that notion > and salute you for issueing the invitation. What a wonderful > idea to unite all these virtual entities in a veritable cook-out > say sometime next spring. Think about it, y'all. Set a date.
>
> tom
>
what a nice attack ad hominem et domum eis (or shld that be suum?)!
But why wait for spring? Here (see below) is the occasion, this very January. A read-in & a cook-in, with hilaritas as m.c.-- should you want to haul veritable ass out of virtual land & over here to Nueva Albania. _Pace_ the dis- & in-corpserations, the hackedemias & medias, over here we do still experiwhatever, write new menus & cook the books.

Pierre

JANUARY 19-21, 1995 / Albany, NY

p r e s e n t (a t i o n s o f) the f u t u r e

We are circulating this announcement to let people know of a very informal gathering of active "poets" in Albany in January 1995. Organizers are associated with the University at Albany's literary journal, The Little Magazine. However, it is a non-university sponsored event, and will exit in the tones in which those involved choose to conduct it (a few miles away from campus). We can provide some places for people to stay for a couple of nights, and may be able to offer some "gas money". If you are interested in presenting your work and presence, please contact us as soon as possible (i.e. RSVP) via phone ([redacted]) or mail (c/o Belle Gironda 730 Morris St. Albany NY 12208).

1/19 (thursday)

-morning WRPI radio-- on air reading(s)

1/20 (friday)

-afternoon presentations/discussion regarding "The Future &'Poetry'" (Albany Public Library)

-evening informal reading(s) at Pierre & Nicole's/interactive poetry w/Nuyorican Poets Cafe, NYC

1/21 (saturday)

-early afternoon presentations/discussion > poetics/technology (Albany Public Library)

-late afternoon / early evening public reading (Mother Earth's Cafe) (includes dinner)

Bonfire TBA

1/22
-late morning bagel brunch at Don's

This schedule can and will be expanded in response to your interest(s) and input. We hope to hear from you!

Chris Funkhouser
editor, The Little Magzine
12 December 94

========== Pierre Joris | He who wants to escape the world, translates it. Dept. of English | --Henri Michaux SUNY Albany | Albany NY 12222 | "Herman has taken to writing poetry. You tel&fax:[redacted] | need not tell anyone, for you know how email: | such things get around." [redacted]| --Mrs. Melville in a letter to her mother. ==========

↑ Index

206. Pierre Joris
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Fri 16 Dec 1994

"My Father who art in heaven, stay there, damn it."

========== Pierre Joris | He who wants to escape the world, translates it. Dept. of English | --Henri Michaux SUNY Albany | Albany NY 12222 | "Herman has taken to writing poetry.

You tel&fax:[redacted] | need not tell anyone, for you know how email:
| such things get around." [redacted]| --Mrs. Melville in a letter to her mother.
==========
==========

↑ Index

207. Donald J. Byrd
Re: Experiments
Fri 16 Dec 1994

John Cayley is under the impression that seriousness is rather like intent, some soulful condition that one adopts at the moment of rolling the dice or whatever. Wittgenstein's cogent argument on intent, I believe, applies here as well.

Seriousness rather is a matter of consequences. To be sure, any one who finds algorithmic and aleatory modes of creation useful should use them. I find them useful a pedagogical tools, generally for the purpose of un-educating people who have learned wrong-headed lessons too well.

Likewise, I think the kind of poem practiced by the official verse culture might be important for personal use, such as therapy, for example. There is a vast amount of personal material that might be usefully made objective by poetic means. (The young man who held a course in Greek culture here in Albany hostage this week believed that the police were embedding computer chips in his penis. Obviously, he needed to call attention to this fact, and he used a gun. In less extreme cases a certain kind of writing might serve as well.)

Don Byrd

↑ Index

208. Spencer Selby
Re: Exp mag list
Fri 16 Dec 1994

Charles B. has asked me to send my magazine list to all participants here. I am happy to oblige, as free circulation of info is what this is all about. I am interested in feedback (especially updates for the list) but please don't ask me to engage in arguments or discussion about the term "experimental." I've used it for want of something better, not because I feel committed to it as a meaningful or accurate label.

List of Experimental Poetry/Art Magazines P.O. Box 590095 San Francisco CA 94159 U.S. MAGAZINES ### ABACUS, Peter Ganick, 181 Edgemont Ave, Elmwood CT 06110 ### AERIAL, Rod Smith, Box 25642, Wash D.C. 20007

AMERICAN LETTERS AND COMMENTARY, Jeanne Beamont & Anna Rabinowitz, 850 Park Avenue Suite 5B, NY NY 10021 ### APEX OF THE M, Box 247, Buffalo NY 14213 ### ARRAS, Brian Kim Stefans, 336 W. 19th St #22, New York, NY 10011 ### ARSHILE, Mark Salerno, Box 26366, L.A. CA 90026 ### ARTCRIMES, 2672 West 14th St, Cleveland OH 44113 ### ASYLUM, Greg Boyd, Box 6203, Santa Maria CA 93456 ### ATELIER, Sarah Jensen, Box 580, Boston MA 02117 ### AVEC, Cydney Chadwick, Box 1059, Penngrove CA 94951 ### B CITY, Connie Deanovich, 517 North Fourth St, Dekalb IL 60115 ### BIG ALLIS, Jessica Grim, Melanie Neilson, 136 Morgan St., Oberlin OH 44070 ### BLACK BREAD, Sianne Ngai, Jessica Lowenthal, 366 Thayer St. #3, Providence RI 02906 ### BLADES, 182 Orchard Rd, Newark DE 19711 ### BLUE RYDER, Ken Wagner, Box 587, Olean NY 14760 ### THE BOMB, Ben Baxter, 719 Almond St, Nampa ID 83686 ### BOMBAY GIN, Naropa Institute, 2130 Arapahoe Ave, Boulder CO 80302 ### BUGHOUSE, Doug Blumhardt, Eric Peterson, Box 4817, Albuquerque NM 87196 ### BULLHEAD, Joe Napora, 2205 Moore St, Ashland KY 41101 ### CALIBAN, Lawrence Smith, Box 561, Laguna Beach CA 92652 ### CAMELLIA, Tomer Inbar, Box 417 Village Station, N.Y. NY 10014 ### CATHAY, Gale Nelson, 11 Slater Avenue, Providence RI 02906 ### CENTRAL PARK, Stephen Paul Martin, Eve Ensler, Box 1446 NY NY 10023 ### CLWN WR, Box 2165, Church St Station, NY NY 10008 ### COMPOUND EYE, Ange Mlinko, 10 Eliot #2, Somerville MA 02143 ### CONJUNCTIONS, Bradford Morrow, 33 W. 9th St., NY NY 10011 ### COTTON GIN, Chris Stafford 3408 Burlington Rd., Greensboro NC 27405 ### CROTON BUG, Bob Harrison, Box 1116, Milwaukee WI 53211 ### CWM, 1300 Kicker Rd., Tuscaloosa AL 35404 ### CYANOSIS, Darin De Stefano, 318 Mendocino Ave, Suite #30, Santa Rosa CA 95404 ### DADA TENNIS, Bill Paulauskas, Box 10, Woodhaven Ny 11421 ### DENVER QUARTERLY, Bin Ramke, Dept of English, U. of Denver, Denver CO 80208 ### DIE YOUNG, Skip Fox, English Dept, Univ. of Southwestern Louisiana, Lafayette LA 70504 ### DREAMTIME TALKING MAIL, Miekal And, Liz Was, Rt 1 Box 131, Lafarge WI 54639 ### DRIVER'S SIDE AIRBAG, Mike Halchin, Box 25760, L.A. CA 90025 ### DROP FORGE, Sean Winchester, PO Box 7237, Reno NV 98510 ### ELEPHANT, Douglas Messerli, 6026 Wilshire Blvd, Los Angeles CA 90036 ### EXILE, 149 Virginia St #7, St Paul MN 55102 ### EXPERIODICIST, Jake Berry, Box 3112, Florence AL 35630 ### EXQUISITE CORPSE, Box 25051, Baton Rouge LA 70894 ### FIRST INTENSITY, Lee Chapman, Box 140713, Staten Island NY 10314 ### FISH WRAP, Jim Maloney, 921&1/2 24th Ave, Seattle WA 98122 ### FIVE FINGERS REVIEW, Box 15426, San Francisco CA 94115 ### FOUND STREET, Larry Tomoyasu, 2260 S. Ferdinand Ave., Monterey Park CA 91754 ### GENERATOR, John Byrum, 8139 Midland Rd., Mentor OH 44060 ### GRIST ON-LINE, Box 20805, Columbus Circle Station, New York NY 10023

HAMBONE, Nathaniel Mackey, 134 Hunolt St. Santa Cruz CA 95060 ### HEAVEN BONE, Steven Hirsch, Box 486, Chester NY 10918 ### HOUSE ORGAN, Kenneth Warren, 1250 Belle Avenue, Lakewood OH 44107 ### I AM A CHILD, William Howell, 418 Richmond Ave. #2, Buffalo NY 14222 ### THE IMPERCIPIENT, Jennifer Moxley, 61 E. Manning, Providence RI 02906 ### THE IMPLODING TIE-DIED TOUPEE / MISSIONARY STEW Keith Higgenbotham & Tracy Combs, 100 Courtland Drive, Columbia SC 29223 ### INDEFINITE SPACE, Marcia Arrieta, Box 40101, Pasadena CA 91114 ### INTERRUPTIONS, Tom Beckett, 131 N. Pearl St., Kent OH 44240 ### JUXTA, Ken Harris, Jim Leftwich, 977 Seminole Trail, Charlottesville VA 22901 ### KIOSK, Nick Gillespie, 306 Clemens Hall, S.U.N.Y, Buffalo NY 14260 ### LETTERBOX, Scott Bentley, 3791 Latimer Pl., Oakland CA 94609 ### LIFT, Joseph Torra, 10-R Oxford St (Rear), Somerville MA 02143 ### LILLIPUT REVIEW, Don Wentworth, 207 S. Millvale Ave #3, Pittsburgh PA 15224 ### LINGO, Jonathan Gams, Michael Gizzi, Box 184, West Stockbridge MA 01266 ### LOGODAEDALUS, Paul Weidenhoff & W.B. Keckler, Box 14193, Harrisburg PA 17104 ### LONG BEACH GUTS-ETTE, Box 2730, Long Beach CA 90801 ### LONG NEWS, Barbara Henning, Box 150-455, Brooklyn NY 11215 ### LOST AND FOUND TIMES, John M. Bennett, 137 Leland Ave, Columbus OH 43214 ### LOWER LIMIT SPEECH, A.L. Nielsen, 1743 Butler Ave #2, L.A. CA 90025 ### LYRIC&, Avery Burns, Box 640531, San Francisco CA 94164 ### MA!, David Kirschenbaum, Box 221, Oceanside NY 11572 ### MALCONTENT, Laura Poll, Box 703, Naversink NJ 07752 ### MALLIFE, Mike Miskowski, Box 17686, Phoenix AZ 85011, ### MEAT EPOCH, Gregory Vincent St Thomasino, 3055 Decatur Ave Apt 2-D, Bronx NY 10467 ### MIRAGE #4/PERIOD(ICAL), Kevin Killian & Dodie Bellamy, 1020 Minna St, San Francisco CA 94103 ### NEW AMERICAN WRITING, Maxine Chernoff & Paul Hoover, 2920 West Pratt, Chicago IL 60645 NORTH AMERICAN IDEOPHONICS, Mark Nowak, Box 13561 Minneapolis MN 55414 ### O.ARS. Don Wellman, 21 Rockland Rd., Weare NH 03281 ### OBJECT, Robert Fitterman & Kim Rosenfeld, 229 Hudson St #4, NY NY 10013 ### OBLEK, Connell McGrath, Box 1242, Stockbridge MA 01262 ### OPEN 24 HOURS, Buck Downs, Box 50376, Washington D.C. 20091 ### O!!ZONE, Harry Burrus, 1266 Fountain View Dr. Houston TX 77057 ### PAPER RADIO, Neil Kvern, Box 4646, Seattle WA 98104 ### PARADOX, Dan Bodah, Box 643, Saranac Lake NY 12983 ### PAVEMENT SAW, David Baratier, 7 James St., Scotia NY 12302 ### POETIC BRIEFS, Jefferson Hansen & Elizabeth Burns, 31 Parkwood St #3, Albany NY 12208 ### POETRY USA, Jack Foley, 2569 Maxwell Ave, Oakland CA ### PRIVATE ARTS, D. R. Heniger, 600 S. Dearborn #2209, Chicago IL 60605 ### PROSODIA, New College of California, 766 Valencia San Francisco CA 94110 ### RE*MAP, Carolyn Kemp & Todd Baron, 8270 Willoughby Ave, Los Angeles CA 90046 ### RIBOT, Paul

Vangelesti, Box 65798, Los Angeles CA 90065 ### ROOMS, 652 Woodland Ave., San Leandro CA 94577 ### SHATTERED WIG REVIEW, Rupert Wondolowski, 2407 N. Maryland #1, Baltimore MD 21218 ### SITUATION, Mark Wallace, 10402 Ewell Ave, Kensington MD 20895 ### 6IX, 914 Leisz's Bridge Rd, Reading PA 19119 ### SPLIT CITY, Jim Lang, Box 110171, Cleveland OH 44111 ### SUBTLE JOURNAL OF RAW COINAGE, Geof Huth, 875 Central Pkwy, Niskayuna, NY 12309 ### SULFUR, Clayton Eshleman, English Dept, Eastern Michigan U., Ypsilanti MI 48197 ### SYN/AES/THE/TIC, Alex Cigale, 178-10 Wexford Terrace Apt 3D, Jamaica NY 11432 ### TALISMAN, Ed Foster, Box 1117, Hoboken NJ 07030 ### TAPROOT REVIEWS, Luigi Bob Drake, Box 585, Lakewood OH 44107 ### TENSETENDONED, M.B. Corbett, Box 155, Preston Park PA 18455 ### TEXTURE, Susan Smith Nash, 3760 Cedar Ridge Drive, Norman OK 73072 ### TIGHT, Ann Erickson, Box 1591, Guerneville CA 95446 ### TIN WREATH, David Gonsalves, P.O. Box 13491, Albany NY 12212 ### TO, Seth Frechie & Andrew Mossin, Box 121, Narberth PA 19072 ### TORQUE, Liz Fodaski, Box 118, Canal City Station, N.Y. NY 10013 ### TRANSMOG, Ficus Strangulensis, Route 6 Box 138, Charleston WV 25311 ### TRIAGE, Box 1166, Sterling Heights MI 48311 ### TRIANGLE SHIRTWAIST FIRE, Philip Good, 675A West Mombasha Rd, Monroe NY 10950 ### TURBULENCE, David Nemeth, Box 40, Hockessin DE 19707 ### TYUONYI, Phillip Foss, Box 23266, Santa Fe NM 87502 ### VIZ, 117 Front St., Hattiesburg MS 39401 ### UMBRELLA, Judith Hoffberg, Box 40100, Pasadena CA 91114 ### VOLT, Gillian Conoley, 4104 24th St #355, San Francisco CA 94114 ### VORTEXT, Ezra Mark, Box 23194 Seattle WA 98102 ### THE WASHINGTON REVIEW, Joe Ross, Box 50132, Washington D.C. 20091 ### WHITEWALL OF SOUND, Jim Clinefelter, 1320 W. 116th #9, Cleveland OH 44102 ### WITZ, Christopher Reiner, 10604 Whipple St, Toluca Lake CA 91602 ### W'ORCS/ALOUD ALLOWED, Ralph LaCharity, Box 27309, Cincinnati OH 45227 ### THE WORLD, Lewis Warsh, Poetry Project at St Mark's, 10th St & 2nd Ave, NY NY 10003 ### WORLD LETTER, Jon Cone, 2726 E. Court, Iowa City IA 52245 ### WRAY, V. Marek & J. Welch, Box 91502, Cleveland OH 44101 ### XIB, Tolek, Box 26112, San Diego CA 92126 ### X-RAY MAGAZINE, Johnny Brewton, Box 170011, San Francisco CA 94117 ### YEFIEF, Ann Racuya-Robbins, Box 8505, Santa Fe NM 87504 ### ZYX, Arnold Skemer, 58-09 205th St, Bayside NY 11364 ### CANADIAN MAGAZINES ### BRITISH COLUMBIA MONTHLY, Gerry Gilbert, Box 48884, Station Bent., Vancouver, B. C. V7X 1A8 ### CABARET VERT, Beth Learn, Box 157 Station P, Toronto Ontario M5S 2S7 ### COLLECTIF REPARATION DE POESIE, Jean-Claude Gagnon, 359 rue Lavigueur # 1, Quebec, Quebec G1R 1B3 ### CRASH, Maggie Helwig, Box 562, Station P, Toronto Ontario M5S 2T1 ### ESPACE GLOBAL, Alain-Arthur Painchaud, 755 Est Avenue Mont-Royal, Montreal,

Quebec H2J 1W8 ### HOLE, Louis Cabri, 123 Irving Ave., Ottawa, Ontario K1Y 1Z3 ### INDUSTRIAL SABOTAGE, 1CENT, SPUDBURN, J.W. Curry, 1357 Landsdowne Rd, Toronto, Ontario M6H 3Z9 ### JONES AV, 88 Dagmar Av, Toronto, Ontario M4M 1W1 ### OVERSION, John Barlow, 1069 Bathurst St (3rd Floor) Toronto Ontario M5R 3G8 ### PARAGRAPH, Beverly Daurio, 137 Birmingham St, Stratford, Ontario N5A 2T1 ### POETRY THREAT, Clint Burnham, 1-269 Augusta Ave, Toronto Ontario M5T 2M1 ### PUSH MACHINERY, Daniel Bradley, 30 Gloucester St #1005, Toronto, Ontario M4Y 1L6 ### RADDLE MOON, Susan Clark, 2239 Stephens St, Vancouver B.C. V6K 3W5 ### SIN OVER TAN, Box 153 Station P, Toronto, Ontario M5S 2S7 ### STAINED PAPER ARCHIVE, Gustave Morin, 1792 Byng Road, Windsor, Ontario N8W 3C8 ### TONGUE TIDE, Tom Snyders, [redacted] Granville St, Vancouver, B.C. V6Z 1L4 ### WHO TORCHED RANCHO DIABLO,MONDO HUNKAMOOGA, Stuart Ross, Box 141, Station F, Toronto, Ontario M4Y 2L4 ### ZAG, Steve Banks, 69R Nassau St, Toronto, Ontario M5T 1M6 ### U.K. MAGAZINES ### ACTIVE IN AIRTIME, Ralph Hawkins, 53 East Hill, Colchester, Essex CO1 3QY ### AND, Bob Cobbing, 89A Petherton Rd, London N5 2QT ### ANGEL EXHAUST, Andrew Duncan, 2 Lovelace Gardens, Southend-on-Sea SS2 4NU ### EONTA, 27 Alexandra Rd, Wimbledon, London SW19 7IJ ### FIRE, Chris Ozzard, 3 Holywell Mews, Hollywell, Malvern, Worcs WR14 1LF ### FIRST OFFENSE, Tim Fletcher, Syringa, The Street, Stodmarsh, Canterbury, Kent CT3 4BA ### FRAGMENTE, Anthony Mellors, Flat 11 Landsdown House, Wilmslow Rd, Didsbury Village, Manchester M20 6OJ ### GRILLE, Simon Smith, 53 Ormonde Court, Upper Richmond Rd., Putney London SW15 5TP ### INTERFERENCE, Michael Gardner, Wadham College, Parks Rd, Oxford OX1 3PN ### INTIMACY, Adam McKeown, 4 Bower St, Maidstone, Kent ME16 8SD ### OASIS, Ian Robinson, 12 Stevenage Rd., London SW6 6ES ### OBJECT PERMANENCE, Peter Manson & Robert Purves, Flat 3/2 16 Ancroft St, Glasgow Scotland 7HU G20 ### OSTINATO, Box 522, London N8 7SZ ### PAGES, Robert Sheppard, 239 Lessingham Ave, London SW17 8NQ ### PARATAXIS, Drew Milne, School of English Studies, Arts Building, Univ of Sussex, Falmer, Brighton BN1 9NQ ### PURGE, Robert Hampson, 88 Ashburnham Rd, London NW10 5SE ### RAMRAID EXTRAORDINAIRE, Kerry Sowerby, 2 Midland Rd., Hyde Park, Leeds LS6 1BQ ### RESPONSES, Periera & Rollinson, Minister College, Minister Rd, Isle of Sheppey, Kent ME12 3JQ ### RWC, Lawrence Upton, 16 Southview Ave, Caversham, Reading RG4 0AD ### SHEARSMAN, Tony Frazer, c/o Hong Kong & Shanghai Bank, Macau Mgt Office, Box 476, Macua ### SPANNER, Allen Fisher, 14 Hopton Road, Hereford HR1 1BE ### STRIDE, Rupert Loydell, 11 Sylvan Rd, Exeter, Devon EX4 6EX### TALUS, Marzia Balzani & Shamoon Zamir, Dept of English, King's College, Strand, London WC2R 2LS ### TERRIBLE WORK, Tim Allen, 21 Overton Gardens, Mannamead, Plymouth PL3

5BX ### 3 X 4, John Mingay, 2 Henderson St, Kingseat by Dunfermline, Fife, Scotland KY12 0TP ### WORDS WORTH, Richard Tabor, Alaric Sumner, 1 Dairy Cottage, Crompton Rd. South Cadbury, Yeovil, Somerset BA22 7E7 ### CONTINENTAL EUROPE AND ELSEWHERE ### ABSURDISTISCHE, Rainer Golchert, Soderstrasse 29, 64283 Darmstadt Germany ### ACTION POETIQUE, Henri Deluy, 113 rue Anatole France, 92300 Levallois-Perret, France ### ALIRE, 57 allee des Coquelicots, 59650 Villeneuve-d'Ascq, France ### ARNYEKYOTOK, Szasz Janos, Timdr u 17 fsz 3, H- Budapest III, Hungary ### AU/ART UNIDENTIFIED, 1-1-10-301 Koshienguchi, Nishinomiya, Hyogo, 663 Japan ### BLAST, Box 3514, Manuka, ACT 2603, Australia ### BRIO CELL, J. Lehmus, Stenbocksv. 24, 02860 Esbo, Finland ### CARPETAS EL PARAISO, Jose Luis Campal, Apt N. 6, 33980 Pola de Lavinia, Asturias, Spain ### CELACANTO, Marcelo Casarin, Quisquisacate 125, 5000 Cordoba, Argentina ### COMMUNICARTE, Hugo Pontes, Caixa Postal 922, 37701-970 Pocos de Caldas, Brazil ### DANS UN MONDE ABANDONNE DES FACTEURS, Mathieu Benezet, 3bis rue Jean Sicard, 75015 Paris, France ### DAS FROLICHE WOHNZIMMER, Fritz Widhalm, Fuhrmanngasse 1A/7, 1080 Wien Austria ### DIMENSAO, Guido Biharinho, Caixa Postal 140, Uberaba 38001, Brazil ### DOC(K)S, Phillipe Castellin, 20 Rue Bonaparte, Ajaccio, France 2000 ### DOUBLE, Rea Nikonova, Sverdlova 175, Eysk 353660, Russia ### EX-SYMPOSIUM, 8200 Veszprem, Anyos u. 1-3 Hungary ### FIG., Jean Davie, 3bi rue Fessart, 75019 Paris, France ### FREIE ZEIT ART, Postfach 82, A-1195 Vienna, Austria ### GOING DOWN SWINGING, Box 64, Coburg, Victoria 3058, Australia ### GRAFFITI, Horacio Versi, Colonia 815, of. 105, Montevideo, Uruguay ### IF, Jean-Jacques Viton, 12 Place Castellane, 13006 Marseille, France ### KARTA, Bartek Nowak, Spoldzielcza 3/39, 42 300 Myszkow, Poland ### LAZA LAPOK, Gabor Toth, 1038 Budapest, Korhaz u. 7. Hungary ### JALOUSE PRATIQUE, Herve Bauer & Jean-Marc Scanreigh, 80 rue Henon, 69004 Lyon, France ### LE CAHIER DU REFUGE, Center International de Poesie Marseille, Couvent du Refuge, 1 rue des Honneurs, 13002 Marseille, France ### MAGYAR MUHELY, Tibor Papp, 40 Rue Pascal, 75013 Paris France ### MANDORLA, Roberto Tejada, Apartado postal 5-366, Mexico D.F., Mexico 06500, ### MANI ART, Pascal Lenoir, 11 Ruelle De Champagne, 60680 Grandfresnoy, France ### MINIATURE OBSCURE, Gerhild Ebel, Cornelia Ahnert, Landrain 143, 06118 Halle/Saale, Germany ### MITO, via G. Bruno 37, 80035 Nola, Italy ### MOHS, Kate McMeekin, 8 rue Chaptal, 44100 Nantes France ### MONDRAGON, Nel Amaro, S. Francisco F-32, 3-A, 33610 Turon, Asturias, Spain ### NIOQUES, Jean-Marie Gleize, 4 rue de Cromer, 26400 Crest, France ### NON (+) ULTRA, Matthias Schamp, Grosse-Weischede-Strasse 1, 44803 Bochum, Germany ### OFFERTA SPECIALE, Carla Bertola, Corso De Nicola 20, 10128 Torino, Italy ### OLHO LATINO, Paulo Cheida Sans, Rua Padre Bernardo da Silva 856, 13030

Campinas, SP, Brazil ### OTIS RUSH, Ken Bolton, P.O. Box 21, North Adelaide, South Australia 5006 ### PIEDRA LUNAR, Corpa, Urb. Los Cantos, 38, Bargas, Toledo, Spain ### PINTALO DE VERDE, Antonio Gomez, APDO 186, 06800 Merida, Badajoz, Spain ### PIPS DADA CORPORATION, Claudio Puetz, Beethovenstr. 40, 53115 Bonn, Germany ### PLURAL, Paseo de la Reforma 18.1 piso, Deleg. Cuauhtemoc, DF 06600, Mexico ### P.O. Box (Merz Mail), Pere Sousa, apdo 9326, 08080 Barcelona Spain ### POESIE, Micel Deguy, 8 rue Ferou, 75278 Paris Cedex 06, France ### POEZINE, Rua Seride 486, apt 1106, CEP 59020 Natal RN, Brazil ### POSTFLUXPOSTBOOKLET, Luce Fierens, Boterstraat 43, B-2811, Hombeek, Belgium ### PRAKALPANA LITERATURE, KOBISENA, P-40 Nandana Park, Calcutta 700034, West Bengal, India ### SCARP, Ron Pretty, Univ of Wollongong, Box 1144, Wollongong, NSW 2500, Australia ### SHISHI, Shoji Yoshizawa, 166 Suginami-ku koenjikita, 3-31-5 Tokyo, Japan ### SIVULLINEN, Jouni Vaarakangas, Kaarelantie 86 B 28, 00420 Helsinki, Finland ### SOUTERRAINS & LOLA FISH, Bruno Pommey, 10 Residence Jean Mace, 28300 Mainvilliers, France ### SPINNE, Dirk Frohlich, Priessnitzstrasse 19, 01099 Dresden, Germany ### SPORT, Box 11-806, Wellington, New Zealand ### SUB BILD, Willem van Dijk, Untere Badstrasse 32, 69412 Eberbach, Germany ### TABOO JADOO, Javant Biaruja, GPO Box 994/H, Melbourne, Victoria 3001 Australia ### TARTINE, Catherine Lorin & Regis Tillet, 1 rue Ferdinand Duval, 75004 Paris, France ### TERAZ MOWIE, Hartmut Andryczuk, postlagernd, 12154 Berlin, Germany ### UNI/VERS(;), Guillermo Deisler, Kirchnerstrabe 11, 06112 Halle (Saale), Germany ### YE, Theo Breuer, Neustrasse 2, 53925 Sistig/Eifel, Germany ### ZOOM-ZOUM, Josee Lapeyrere, 4 rue des Carmes, 75005 Paris, France ### The preceding list is based on the research and judgments of Spencer Selby. The term "experimental" is not meant as a characterization of anyone's specific editorial focus or perspective. Please circulate, and mail possible additions, deletions, address changes or other comments to Spencer Selby, P.O. Box 590095, San Francisco CA 94159, U.S.A. email: [redacted] fax: [redacted] This is list #12, dated 12/94 ###

↑ Index

209. John Cayley

Re: Experiments

Fri 16 Dec 1994

> John Cayley is under the impression that seriousness is >rather like intent, some soulful condition that one adopts at the >moment of rolling the dice or whatever. Wittgenstein's cogent argument >on intent, I believe, applies here as well.
>

> Seriousness rather is a matter of consequences. To be >sure, any one who finds algorithmic and aleatory modes of creation >useful should use them.
>
> Don Byrd
>

No. I agree that seriousness is not a function of intent (I cringe anglophilially at the thought of shifting Yi Ching stalks with a heavy frown of high-mindedness) and I apologize if I introduced that confusion. Yes, seriousness is a consequence of the work and consequent to its publication. The author has no particular priviledge in determining its seriousness.

But these questions skirt around the point I was trying to make. Given the existence of machines which are capable of reordering works of literature, certain writers will wish to use the techniques newly made available to extend their range of compositional strategies. The familiar algorithmic and aleatory techniques are natural starting points but the degree of control and level of feedback which the new tools provide changes the nature of the operation. It is less like a liberating game and more like the painful work of composition. It is a type of practice that should not be dismissed and which will, I believe produce important literary works in the fullness of time.

(This is not to say that I'm not happy to play the game as light-heartedly as anyone else, by the way :-)

John Cayley Wellsweep Press [in Chinese HZ:]
Tel & Fax: 0[redacted] Email: [redacted]

↑ Index

210. Steve Evans
Re: NEA ???
Fri 16 Dec 1994

This message, intended for the list, had the consequence of going directly to luigi-bob.
Now it has another consequence. /SE

----------Original message----------

I'm actually unfamiliar with the Literary Network, i.e. what it does and how well, but I'm assured by someone who spoke with their office last week that it does exist and that they are working on defending the NEA/NEH come the next round of assaults (possibly as early as January).

The phone number is [redacted], and the person to speak with Ann Burke (though that spelling may be wrong, I've only heard the name). I'm told it's best to call after one in the afternoon. (The LN shares the phone line, btw, with the Coucil of Literary Magazines and Publishers).

Does the NEA contribute "all that much to non-mainstream culture," as luigi-bob puts it?
A very large number of the books in my poetry library acknowledge NEA support of one form or another, so my answer would have to be yes.

But when I originally raised to issue, it was with the intent of generating discussion on how the next round of debate on the program could be framed so that maintenance of a biased and unresponsive system was not our only option/position. Very simply, it can't be changed if it ain't there--we need to argue for the elimination of what's wrong with the current program, not the program itself.

Reading over the language of the act this afternoon,
I was struck by the seventh clause:
"The practice of art and the study of the humanities requires constant dedication and devotion. While no government can call a great artist or scholar into existence, it is necessary and appropriate for the Federal Government to help create and sustain not only a climate encouraging freedom of thought, imagination, and inquiry but also the material conditions facilitating the release of this creative talent."

It seems to me that we should be able to work with claims like that. No?

Steve Evans

↑ Index

211. Chris Stroffolino
Re: ASSORTED
Fri 16 Dec 1994

Dear rodger--I am finally done with this "hellish" semester and no longer consider dealing with the "internal enemy" a luxury but a necessity. Anyway, what is lacking from this discussion for the most part seems to be poetry. I don't mean as artifact (THOUGH EVEN THAT WOULD BE REFRESHING) but a "poetic intelligence" that can inform the discussions. Though I am not the only one who can be seen as having tried to crush IT the few the times the discussion at least seemed to move tentatively towards it (AND I definitely owe rodger kamanetz an apology on this count). WHAT KAMENETZ brought up--the question of not worrying about a "them" (which to some extent is what Charles Alexander and maybe Steve Evans too) NEED NOT BE EMBRACED IN EVERY CIRCUMSTANCE to be an effective counter to what Don Byrd calls "the prose of thought" that has been manifested here. Without it, aren't we just yakking opiners??? Even with it we might be, but at least it might be more "fun" (and I say "fun" where others might say more "spiritual") WHAT IS KEEPING an open mind entail??? Being wishy-washy? Wavering between politics-as-politics and politics-as-poetry as a starting point of the meditation and not really worrying how or where it goes as long as it's intense??? Attitudes cancel each other out. Turning back to a DISCOURSE of politics either out of guilt, the feeling you're missing out on something, feeling too lopsided, or even pissed off at genuine disenfranchisement may be absolutely necessary at times But it too is no answer (and can reify into so much primping posturing) As if consciousness moves through trite seasons And the second you name something it stops (OOH, OOH, IDEOLOGICAL DODGE, refusal to implicate one's INEVITABLE partaking in a bourgeois ideology--arrest him even though no one will marry him because he doesn't make enough money) But the desire to "divvy" consciousness up into characters is one thing both theorists (critics) and lyric poets deny---This is a denial they have in common, unless we read poetry as a novelist would (which we can) and see WORDS, ideas, images, gestures, whathaveyou as characters... And this should free us to live "inconsistenly" by theory's standards... (of course, you're not suppossed to SAY THIS ON THE PAGE, only on your tombstone, and even then only if you're FRANK O'HARA)

↑ Index

212. Chris Stroffolino
Re: ASSORTED
Fri 16 Dec 1994

reply reply Question: IS "identity" limitingly singular in "poetry" (insofar as it problematizes identity at all), as limitingly singular as it has been invoked in much of these "hot" internet debates? Aren't the debates with others the debates we have with ourselves? And if they don't always take the form of debates with ourselves, why do they have to with others?? Certainly one can communicate without being contentious??? I for one have overdosed on my own weakness for contention. Granted, it was a useful tool to go "beyond" the sickness of those "superficial mutual admiration societies" most of us probably couldn't stand... But the need to DISTINGUISH oneself has eclipsed the potential use value of what has been said, meanings tangled up in the messanger- Perhaps I'm projecting all of this and certainly don't wish for the discussion to degenerate into a forum on the psychoanalytic model of interiority or subjectivity. For "interiority" and "exteriority" are "the same" on a level that can not be utterly ghettoized without "burn baby burn" coming down from Harlem to Wall Street (or C=o=m= p=u=t=e=r=l=a=n=d), and the discourse of "curved space" is pasta or "game" for the poet... Or we could destroy something before it's built... (Because destruction can't tear itself down, strictly speaking) And sometimes WE HAVE TO LET OURSELVES GO---and that's been the MAIN VALUE of this poetic list as I see it, but is it enough to meet here only anarchically, To release TENSION here only to build it up in our more intense "heightened commodity laboratory solitude" where one churns out one's latest poetic/theory works???? It's like someone who goes public dishevelled and only dresses up when there's no place to go. It might as well be the other way around. Either way, we're victims of compartmentalization, or am i making a mountain out of molehill???

↑ Index

213. Sheila Murphy
Re: ASSORTED
Fri 16 Dec 1994

What Chris writes about identity can be blamed (in part) for spawning this little cadenza around a desire to be able to have (hold of) multiple channels of perception at once and without moving. It occurs to me that the one-at-a-timeness of perception (maybe a mere matter of faulty programming we've had) may have yielded this curious habit of thinking of approximately one thing at a time. It isn't that the mind does not feel full (at moments), but that bringing together a full house in large measure means doing harmonics or skipping stones or something. Thus (getting back to where this started), we let out one moment of thought and then another patch of the mosaic (someone else) recites this other moment of thought, from perhaps a completely different context. On and on. The psychoanalytic wealth behind all this is something I can't touch (but I can love!). So there you have it. One more granule!

Sheila Murphy

↑ Index

214. Robert Drake

Re: NEA ???

Sat 17 Dec 1994

---

this message, intended for Steve, had the consequence of going directly to him.
now it has another consequence... lbd

---

steve--

first off, yes i suppose, _any_ gov't asstistance fr the arts ought be welcomed, scarce as it is... _i_ sure wouldn't look _that_ gift horse in th mouth. & sure, it's gotta be there first if we're gonna improve it. and the claims you quote are certainly laudable...

BUT the evidince I see in support of those claims is meager.
some fine books in my library do indeed credit the NEA, but the vast majority do not--either they are commericially viable (more or less) on their own, or some sucker like myself has put them out themselves.

i guess i'm thinking of the opening of Chas B's "provisional institutions" essay: "imagine that all the nationally circulated magazines and all the trade presses and all the university presses in the US stopped publishing or reviewing poetry. new poetry in the US would hardly feel the blow."... i guess i'd add, what if the NEA just blew away...

and contrary-wise, i believe i remember Cydney Chadwick bemoaning the loss of NEA funds for AVEC--almost seemed that the _loss_ of that chimerical funding had such a negative impact (psychologicaly as much as fiscally) that it offset the original positive affect of _being_ funded. and i believe the loss of NEA funds was one (not the only) of the death-nells for Segue...

all that said, glad the Lit Network is still at it, appologies for misunderstanding/misinformation i might have spread, and hoping they might be of real assistance. but sceptical.

lbd

↑ Index

215. Loss Glazier

Selby List (re-formatted) via Electronic Poetry Center

Sat 17 Dec 1994

___LIST OF EXPERIMENTAL POETRY/ART MAGAZINES___

This list is based on the research and judgments of Spencer Selby. The term expe rimental" is not meant as a characterization of anyone's specific editorial focu s or perspective. Please circulate, and mail possible additions, deletions, add ress changes or other comments to Spencer Selby, P.O. Box 590095, San Francisco CA 94159, U.S.A. email: [redacted] fax: [redacted] This is list #12, date d 12/94

___U.S. MAGAZINES___

ABACUS, Peter Ganick, 181 Edgemont Ave, Elmwood CT 06110

AERIAL, Rod Smith, Box 25642, Wash D.C. 20007

AMERICAN LETTERS AND COMMENTARY, Jeanne Beamont & Anna Rabinowitz, 850 Park Avenue - Suite 5B, NY NY 10021

APEX OF THE M, Box 247, Buffalo NY 14213

ARRAS, Brian Kim Stefans, 336 W. 19th St #22, New York, NY 10011

ARSHILE, Mark Salerno, Box 26366, L.A. CA 90026

ARTCRIMES, 2672 West 14th St, Cleveland OH 44113

ASYLUM, Greg Boyd, Box 6203, Santa Maria CA 93456

ATELIER, Sarah Jensen, Box 580, Boston MA 02117

AVEC, Cydney Chadwick, Box 1059, Penngrove CA 94951

B CITY, Connie Deanovich, 517 North Fourth St, Dekalb IL 60115

BIG ALLIS, Jessica Grim, Melanie Neilson, 136 Morgan St., Oberlin OH 44070

BLACK BREAD, Sianne Ngai, Jessica Lowenthal, 366 Thayer St. #3, Providence RI 02906

BLADES, 182 Orchard Rd, Newark DE 19711

BLUE RYDER, Ken Wagner, Box 587, Olean NY 14760

THE BOMB, Ben Baxter, 719 Almond St, Nampa ID 83686

BOMBAY GIN, Naropa Institute, 2130 Arapahoe Ave, Boulder CO 80302

BUGHOUSE, Doug Blumhardt, Eric Peterson, Box 4817, Albuquerque NM 87196

BULLHEAD, Joe Napora, 2205 Moore St, Ashland KY 41101

CALIBAN, Lawrence Smith, Box 561, Laguna Beach CA 92652

CAMELLIA, Tomer Inbar, Box 417 Village Station, N.Y. NY 10014

CATHAY, Gale Nelson, 11 Slater Avenue, Providence RI 02906

CENTRAL PARK, Stephen Paul Martin, Eve Ensler, Box 1446 NY NY 10023

CLWN WR, Box 2165, Church St Station, NY NY 10008

COMPOUND EYE, Ange Mlinko, 10 Eliot #2, Somerville MA 02143

CONJUNCTIONS, Bradford Morrow, 33 W. 9th St., NY NY 10011

COTTON GIN, Chris Stafford 3408 Burlington Rd., Greensboro NC 27405

CROTON BUG, Bob Harrison, Box 1116, Milwaukee WI 53211

CWM, 1300 Kicker Rd., Tuscaloosa AL 35404

CYANOSIS, Darin De Stefano, 318 Mendocino Ave, Suite #30, Santa Rosa CA 95404

DADA TENNIS, Bill Paulauskas, Box 10, Woodhaven Ny 11421

DENVER QUARTERLY, Bin Ramke, Dept of English, U. of Denver, Denver CO 80208

DIE YOUNG, Skip Fox, English Dept, Univ. of Southwestern Louisiana, Lafayette LA 70504

DREAMTIME TALKING MAIL, Miekal And, Liz Was, Rt 1 Box 131, Lafarge WI 54639

DRIVER'S SIDE AIRBAG, Mike Halchin, Box 25760, L.A. CA 90025

DROP FORGE, Sean Winchester, PO Box 7237, Reno NV 98510

ELEPHANT, Douglas Messerli, 6026 Wilshire Blvd, Los Angeles CA 90036

EXILE, 149 Virginia St #7, St Paul MN 55102

EXPERIODICIST, Jake Berry, Box 3112, Florence AL 35630

EXQUISITE CORPSE, Box 25051, Baton Rouge LA 70894

FIRST INTENSITY, Lee Chapman, Box 140713, Staten Island NY 10314

FISH WRAP, Jim Maloney, 921&1/2 24th Ave, Seattle WA 98122

FIVE FINGERS REVIEW, Box 15426, San Francisco CA 94115

FOUND STREET, Larry Tomoyasu, 2260 S. Ferdinand Ave., Monterey Park CA 91754

GENERATOR, John Byrum, 8139 Midland Rd., Mentor OH 44060

GRIST ON-LINE, Box 20805, Columbus Circle Station, New York NY 10023

HAMBONE, Nathaniel Mackey, 134 Hunolt St. Santa Cruz CA 95060

HEAVEN BONE, Steven Hirsch, Box 486, Chester NY 10918

HOUSE ORGAN, Kenneth Warren, 1250 Belle Avenue, Lakewood OH 44107

I AM A CHILD, William Howell, 418 Richmond Ave. #2, Buffalo NY 14222

THE IMPERCIPIENT, Jennifer Moxley, 61 E. Manning, Providence RI 02906

THE IMPLODING TIE-DIED TOUPEE / MISSIONARY STEW Keith Higgenbotham & Tracy Combs , 100 Courtland Drive, Columbia SC 29223

INDEFINITE SPACE, Marcia Arrieta, Box 40101, Pasadena CA 91114

INTERRUPTIONS, Tom Beckett, 131 N. Pearl St., Kent OH 44240

JUXTA, Ken Harris, Jim Leftwich, 977 Seminole Trail, Charlottesville VA 22901

KIOSK, Nick Gillespie, 306 Clemens Hall, S.U.N.Y, Buffalo NY 14260

LETTERBOX, Scott Bentley, 3791 Latimer Pl., Oakland CA 94609

LIFT, Joseph Torra, 10-R Oxford St (Rear), Somerville MA 02143

LILLIPUT REVIEW, Don Wentworth, 207 S. Millvale Ave #3, Pittsburgh PA 15224

LINGO, Jonathan Gams, Michael Gizzi, Box 184, West Stockbridge MA 01266

LOGODAEDALUS, Paul Weidenhoff & W.B. Keckler, Box 14193, Harrisburg PA 17104

LONG BEACH GUTS-ETTE, Box 2730, Long Beach CA 90801

LONG NEWS, Barbara Henning, Box 150-455, Brooklyn NY 11215

LOST AND FOUND TIMES, John M. Bennett, 137 Leland Ave, Columbus OH 43214

LOWER LIMIT SPEECH, A.L. Nielsen, 1743 Butler Ave #2, L.A. CA 90025

LYRIC&, Avery Burns, Box 640531, San Francisco CA 94164

MA!, David Kirschenbaum, Box 221, Oceanside NY 11572

MALCONTENT, Laura Poll, Box 703, Naversink NJ 07752

MALLIFE, Mike Miskowski, Box 17686, Phoenix AZ 85011,

MEAT EPOCH, Gregory Vincent St Thomasino, 3055 Decatur Ave Apt 2-D, Bronx NY 104 67
K
MIRAGE #4/PERIOD(ICAL), Kevin Killian & Dodie Bellamy, 1020 Minna St, San Francisco CA 94103

NEW AMERICAN WRITING, Maxine Chernoff & Paul Hoover, 2920 West Pratt, Chicago IL 60645

NORTH AMERICAN IDEOPHONICS, Mark Nowak, Box 13561 Minneapolis MN 55414

O.ARS. Don Wellman, 21 Rockland Rd., Weare NH 03281

OBJECT, Robert Fitterman & Kim Rosenfeld, 229 Hudson St #4, NY NY 10013

OBLEK, Connell McGrath, Box 1242, Stockbridge MA 01262

OPEN 24 HOURS, Buck Downs, Box 50376, Washington D.C. 20091

O!!ZONE, Harry Burrus, 1266 Fountain View Dr. Houston TX 77057

PAPER RADIO, Neil Kvern, Box 4646, Seattle WA 98104

PARADOX, Dan Bodah, Box 643, Saranac Lake NY 12983

PAVEMENT SAW, David Baratier, 7 James St., Scotia NY 12302

POETIC BRIEFS, Jefferson Hansen & Elizabeth Burns, 31 Parkwood St #3, Albany NY 12208

POETRY USA, Jack Foley, 2569 Maxwell Ave, Oakland CA

PRIVATE ARTS, D. R. Heniger, 600 S. Dearborn #2209, Chicago IL 60605

PROSODIA, New College of California, 766 Valencia San Francisco CA 94110

RE*MAP, Carolyn Kemp & Todd Baron, 8270 Willoughby Ave, Los Angeles CA 90046

RIBOT, Paul Vangelesti, Box 65798, Los Angeles CA 90065

ROOMS, 652 Woodland Ave., San Leandro CA 94577

SHATTERED WIG REVIEW, Rupert Wondolowski, 2407 N. Maryland #1, Baltimore MD 21218

SITUATION, Mark Wallace, 10402 Ewell Ave, Kensington MD 20895

6IX, 914 Leisz's Bridge Rd, Reading PA 19119

SPLIT CITY, Jim Lang, Box 110171, Cleveland OH 44111

SUBTLE JOURNAL OF RAW COINAGE, Geof Huth, 875 Central Pkwy, Niskayuna, NY 12309

SULFUR, Clayton Eshleman, English Dept, Eastern Michigan U., Ypsilanti MI 48197

SYN/AES/THE/TIC, Alex Cigale, 178-10 Wexford Terrace Apt 3D, Jamaica NY 11432

TALISMAN, Ed Foster, Box 1117, Hoboken NJ 07030

TAPROOT REVIEWS, Luigi Bob Drake, Box 585, Lakewood OH 44107

TENSETENDONED, M.B. Corbett, Box 155, Preston Park PA 18455

TEXTURE, Susan Smith Nash, 3760 Cedar Ridge Drive, Norman OK 73072

TIGHT, Ann Erickson, Box 1591, Guerneville CA 95446

TIN WREATH, David Gonsalves, P.O. Box 13491, Albany NY 12212

TO, Seth Frechie & Andrew Mossin, Box 121, Narberth PA 19072

TORQUE, Liz Fodaski, Box 118, Canal City Station, N.Y. NY 10013

TRANSMOG, Ficus Strangulensis, Route 6 Box 138, Charleston WV 25311

TRIAGE, Box 1166, Sterling Heights MI 48311

TRIANGLE SHIRTWAIST FIRE, Philip Good, 675A West Mombasha Rd, Monroe NY 10950

TURBULENCE, David Nemeth, Box 40, Hockessin DE 19707

TYUONYI, Phillip Foss, Box 23266, Santa Fe NM 87502

VIZ, 117 Front St., Hattiesburg MS 39401

UMBRELLA, Judith Hoffberg, Box 40100, Pasadena CA 91114

VOLT, Gillian Conoley, 4104 - 24th St #355, San Francisco CA 94114

VORTEXT, Ezra Mark, Box 23194, Seattle WA 98102

THE WASHINGTON REVIEW, Joe Ross, Box 50132, Washington D.C. 20091

WHITEWALL OF SOUND, Jim Clinefelter, 1320 W. 116th #9, Cleveland OH 44102

WITZ, Christopher Reiner, 10604 Whipple St, Toluca Lake CA 91602

W'ORCS/ALOUD ALLOWED, Ralph LaCharity, Box 27309, Cincinnati OH 45227

THE WORLD, Lewis Warsh, Poetry Project at St Mark's, 10th St & 2nd Ave, NY NY 10003

WORLD LETTER, Jon Cone, 2726 E. Court, Iowa City IA 52245

WRAY, V. Marek & J. Welch, Box 91502, Cleveland OH 44101

XIB, Tolek, Box 26112, San Diego CA 92126

X-RAY MAGAZINE, Johnny Brewton, Box 170011, San Francisco CA 94117

YEFIEF, Ann Racuya-Robbins, Box 8505, Santa Fe NM 87504

ZYX, Arnold Skemer, 58-09 205th St, Bayside NY 11364

___CANADIAN MAGAZINES___

BRITISH COLUMBIA MONTHLY, Gerry Gilbert, Box 48884, Station Bent., Vancouver, B. C. V7X 1A8

CABARET VERT, Beth Learn, Box 157 Station P, Toronto Ontario M5S 2S7

COLLECTIF REPARATION DE POESIE, Jean-Claude Gagnon, 359 rue Lavigueur # 1, Quebe c, Quebec G1R 1B3

CRASH, Maggie Helwig, Box 562, Station P, Toronto Ontario M5S 2T1

ESPACE GLOBAL, Alain-Arthur Painchaud, 755 Est Avenue Mont-Royal, Montreal, Queb ec H2J 1W8

HOLE, Louis Cabri, 123 Irving Ave., Ottawa, Ontario K1Y 1Z3

INDUSTRIAL SABOTAGE, 1CENT, SPUDBURN, J.W. Curry, 1357 Landsdowne Rd, Toronto, Ontario M6H 3Z9

JONES AV, 88 Dagmar Av, Toronto, Ontario M4M 1W1

OVERSION, John Barlow, 1069 Bathurst St (3rd Floor) Toronto Ontario M5R 3G8

PARAGRAPH, Beverly Daurio, 137 Birmingham St, Stratford, Ontario N5A 2T1

POETRY THREAT, Clint Burnham, 1-269 Augusta Ave, Toronto Ontario M5T 2M1

PUSH MACHINERY, Daniel Bradley, 30 Gloucester St #1005, Toronto, Ontario M4Y 1L6

RADDLE MOON, Susan Clark, 2239 Stephens St, Vancouver B.C. V6K 3W5

SIN OVER TAN, Box 153 Station P, Toronto, Ontario M5S 2S7

STAINED PAPER ARCHIVE, Gustave Morin, 1792 Byng Road, Windsor, Ontario N8W 3C8

TONGUE TIDE, Tom Snyders, [redacted] Granville St, Vancouver, B.C. V6Z 1L4

WHO TORCHED RANCHO DIABLO,MONDO HUNKAMOOGA, Stuart Ross, Box 141, Station F, Tor onto, Ontario M4Y 2L4

ZAG, Steve Banks, 69R Nassau St, Toronto, Ontario M5T 1M6

___U.K. MAGAZINES___

ACTIVE IN AIRTIME, Ralph Hawkins, 53 East Hill, Colchester, Essex CO1 3QY

AND, Bob Cobbing, 89A Petherton Rd, London N5 2QT

ANGEL EXHAUST, Andrew Duncan, 2 Lovelace Gardens, Southend-on-Sea SS2 4NU

EONTA, 27 Alexandra Rd, Wimbledon, London SW19 7IJ

FIRE, Chris Ozzard, 3 Holywell Mews, Hollywell, Malvern, Worcs WR14 1LF

FIRST OFFENSE, Tim Fletcher, Syringa, The Street, Stodmarsh, Canterbury, Kent CT 3 4BA

FRAGMENTE, Anthony Mellors, Flat 11 Landsdown House, Wilmslow Rd, Didsbury Villa ge, Manchester M20 6OJ

GRILLE, Simon Smith, 53 Ormonde Court, Upper Richmond Rd., Putney London SW15 5T P

INTERFERENCE, Michael Gardner, Wadham College, Parks Rd, Oxford OX1 3PN

INTIMACY, Adam McKeown, 4 Bower St, Maidstone, Kent ME16 8SD

OASIS, Ian Robinson, 12 Stevenage Rd., London SW6 6ES

OBJECT PERMANENCE, Peter Manson & Robert Purves, Flat 3/2 16 Ancroft St, Glasgow , Scotland 7HU G20

OSTINATO, Box 522, London N8 7SZ

PAGES, Robert Sheppard, 239 Lessingham Ave, London SW17 8NQ

PARATAXIS, Drew Milne, School of English Studies, Arts Building, Univ of Sussex, Falmer, Brighton BN1 9NQ

PURGE, Robert Hampson, 88 Ashburnham Rd, London NW10 5SE

RAMRAID EXTRAORDINAIRE, Kerry Sowerby, 2 Midland Rd., Hyde Park, Leeds LS6 1BQ

RESPONSES, Periera & Rollinson, Minister College, Minister Rd, Isle of Sheppey, Kent ME12 3JQ

RWC, Lawrence Upton, 16 Southview Ave, Caversham, Reading RG4 0AD

SHEARSMAN, Tony Frazer, c/o Hong Kong & Shanghai Bank, Macau Mgt Office, Box 476 , Macua

SPANNER, Allen Fisher, 14 Hopton Road, Hereford HR1 1BE

STRIDE, Rupert Loydell, 11 Sylvan Rd, Exeter, Devon EX4 6EX

TALUS, Marzia Balzani & Shamoon Zamir, Dept of English, King's College, Strand, London WC2R 2LS

TERRIBLE WORK, Tim Allen, 21 Overton Gardens, Mannamead, Plymouth PL3 5BX

3 X 4, John Mingay, 2 Henderson St, Kingseat by Dunfermline, Fife, Scotland KY12 0TP

WORDS WORTH, Richard Tabor, Alaric Sumner, 1 Dairy Cottage, Crompton Rd. South C adbury, Yeovil, Somerset BA22 7E7

___CONTINENTAL EUROPE AND ELSEWHERE___

ABSURDISTISCHE, Rainer Golchert, Soderstrasse 29, 64283 Darmstadt Germany

ACTION POETIQUE, Henri Deluy, 113 rue Anatole France, 92300 Levallois-Perret, Fr ance

ALIRE, 57 allee des Coquelicots, 59650 Villeneuve-d'Ascq, France

ARNYEKYOTOK, Szasz Janos, Timdr u 17 fsz 3, H- Budapest III, Hungary

AU/ART UNIDENTIFIED, 1-1-10-301 Koshienguchi, Nishinomiya, Hyogo, 663 Japan

BLAST, Box 3514, Manuka, ACT 2603, Australia

BRIO CELL, J. Lehmus, Stenbocksv. 24, 02860 Esbo, Finland

CARPETAS EL PARAISO, Jose Luis Campal, Apt N. 6, 33980 Pola de Lavinia, Asturias, Spain

CELACANTO, Marcelo Casarin, Quisquisacate 125, 5000 Cordoba, Argentina

COMMUNICARTE, Hugo Pontes, Caixa Postal 922, 37701-970 Pocos de Caldas, Brazil

DANS UN MONDE ABANDONNE DES FACTEURS, Mathieu Benezet, 3bis rue Jean Sicard, 750 15 Paris, France

DAS FROLICHE WOHNZIMMER, Fritz Widhalm, Fuhrmanngasse 1A/7, 1080 Wien Austria

DIMENSAO, Guido Biharinho, Caixa Postal 140, Uberaba 38001, Brazil

DOC(K)S, Phillipe Castellin, 20 Rue Bonaparte, Ajaccio, France 2000

DOUBLE, Rea Nikonova, Sverdlova 175, Eysk 353660, Russia

EX-SYMPOSIUM, 8200 Veszprem, Anyos u. 1-3 Hungary

FIG., Jean Davie, 3bi rue Fessart, 75019 Paris, France

FREIE ZEIT ART, Postfach 82, A-1195 Vienna, Austria

GOING DOWN SWINGING, Box 64, Coburg, Victoria 3058, Australia

GRAFFITI, Horacio Versi, Colonia 815, of. 105, Montevideo, Uruguay

IF, Jean-Jacques Viton, 12 Place Castellane, 13006 Marseille, France

KARTA, Bartek Nowak, Spoldzielcza 3/39, 42 300 Myszkow, Poland

LAZA LAPOK, Gabor Toth, 1038 Budapest, Korhaz u. 7. Hungary

JALOUSE PRATIQUE, Herve Bauer & Jean-Marc Scanreigh, 80 rue Henon, 69004 Lyon, France

LE CAHIER DU REFUGE, Center International de Poesie Marseille, Couvent du Refuge, 1 rue des Honneurs, 13002 Marseille, France

MAGYAR MUHELY, Tibor Papp, 40 Rue Pascal, 75013 Paris France

MANDORLA, Roberto Tejada, Apartado postal 5-366, Mexico D.F., Mexico 06500

MANI ART, Pascal Lenoir, 11 Ruelle De Champagne, 60680 Grandfresnoy, France

MINIATURE OBSCURE, Gerhild Ebel, Cornelia Ahnert, Landrain 143, 06118 Halle/Saale, Germany

MITO, via G. Bruno 37, 80035 Nola, Italy

MOHS, Kate McMeekin, 8 rue Chaptal, 44100 Nantes France

MONDRAGON, Nel Amaro, S. Francisco F-32, 3-A, 33610 Turon, Asturias, Spain

NIOQUES, Jean-Marie Gleize, 4 rue de Cromer, 26400 Crest, France

NON (+) ULTRA, Matthias Schamp, Grosse-Weischede-Strasse 1, 44803 Bochum, Germany

OFFERTA SPECIALE, Carla Bertola, Corso De Nicola 20, 10128 Torino, Italy

OLHO LATINO, Paulo Cheida Sans, Rua Padre Bernardo da Silva 856, 13030 Campinas, SP, Brazil

OTIS RUSH, Ken Bolton, P.O. Box 21, North Adelaide, South Australia 5006

PIEDRA LUNAR, Corpa, Urb. Los Cantos, 38, Bargas, Toledo, Spain

PINTALO DE VERDE, Antonio Gomez, APDO 186, 06800 Merida, Badajoz, Spain

PIPS DADA CORPORATION, Claudio Puetz, Beethovenstr. 40, 53115 Bonn, Germany

PLURAL, Paseo de la Reforma 18.1 piso, Deleg. Cuauhtemoc, DF 06600, Mexico

P.O. Box (Merz Mail), Pere Sousa, apdo 9326, 08080 Barcelona Spain

POESIE, Micel Deguy, 8 rue Ferou, 75278 Paris Cedex 06, France

POEZINE, Rua Seride 486, apt 1106, CEP 59020 Natal RN, Brazil

POSTFLUXPOSTBOOKLET, Luce Fierens, Boterstraat 43, B-2811, Hombeek, Belgium

PRAKALPANA LITERATURE, KOBISENA, P-40 Nandana Park, Calcutta 700034, West Bengal, India

SCARP, Ron Pretty, Univ of Wollongong, Box 1144, Wollongong, NSW 2500, Australia

SHISHI, Shoji Yoshizawa, 166 Suginami-ku koenjikita, 3-31-5 Tokyo, Japan

SIVULLINEN, Jouni Vaarakangas, Kaarelantie 86 B 28, 00420 Helsinki, Finland

SOUTERRAINS & LOLA FISH, Bruno Pommey, 10 Residence Jean Mace, 28300 Mainvilliers, France

SPINNE, Dirk Frohlich, Priessnitzstrasse 19, 01099 Dresden, Germany

SPORT, Box 11-806, Wellington, New Zealand

SUB BILD, Willem van Dijk, Untere Badstrasse 32, 69412 Eberbach, Germany

TABOO JADOO, Javant Biaruja, GPO Box 994/H, Melbourne, Victoria 3001 Australia

TARTINE, Catherine Lorin & Regis Tillet, 1 rue Ferdinand Duval, 75004 Paris, France

TERAZ MOWIE, Hartmut Andryczuk, postlagernd, 12154 Berlin, Germany

UNI/VERS(;), Guillermo Deisler, Kirchnerstrabe 11, 06112 Halle (Saale), Germany

YE, Theo Breuer, Neustrasse 2, 53925 Sistig/Eifel, Germany

ZOOM-ZOUM, Josee Lapeyrere, 4 rue des Carmes, 75005 Paris, France

---

[Note: Charles B. has asked me to send my magazine list to all participants here. I am happy to oblige, as free circulation of info is what this is all about. I am interested in feedback (especially updates for the list) but please don't ask me to engage in arguments or discussion about the term "experimental." I've used it for want of something better, not because I feel committed to it as a meaningful or accurate label.]

↑ Index

216. Jorge Guitart school prayer
Sun 18 Dec 1994

I recommend

"Dear Procne: your wretched sister--she it weaves this robe. Regard it well: it hides her painful tale in its pointless patterns. Tereus came and fetched her off; he conveyed her to Thrace . . . but not to see her sister. He dragged her deep into the forest, where he shackled her and raped her. Her tongue he then severed, and concealed her, and she warbles for vengeance, and death."

John Barth, Lost in the Funhouse, New York: Bantam Books, 1969, p. 111.

(The above is one of six pieces in the section "Glossolalia" . Of those six pieces says Barth in the foreword (page xi, op cit) "Among their common attributes are 1) that their audiences don't understand what they are talking about, and 2) that their several speeches are metrically identical, each corresp verbal sound-pattern identifiable by anyone who attended American public schools prior to the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in the case of [ITALIC] Murray v. Baltimore School Board [END Italic] in 1963.")

↑ Index

217. Tony Green
Re: ASSORTED
Sun 18 Dec 1994

Chris, do you churn out yr poetry or theory. The well-churned urn pours out peotry & thoery mainly.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

218. Tony Green
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Sun 18 Dec 1994

Hi James, How clean is a weather forecast, when it always reproduces the power structure by naming that structure's version of geographical features....?

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

219. Tony Green
Re: Experiments
Sun 18 Dec 1994

Dear John, You sound, you know, like one who has not yet discovered the pleasures of reading Cage or Mac Low. As if to say, this is for the FUTURE. The future you are here looking at is called 1958 or thereabouts. It's not new and its "techniques", by which I suppose you mean, following sets of predetermined instructions (or self-instructions) for text-manipulations, (even including dice-throwing in the instructions!!! tut! tut!....) produce results which are of no interest whatever until shown to someone else, or read aloud in a public place. Or sung or used as if it were instrumental cha-cha-cha music.... At that precise moment, there is a relation between poet reading and "Audience" that is a pleasure to engage with. /for one thing it pulls the rug from under A NUMBER OF OTHER VERY HIGH-MINDED proposals.

And a Merry Christmas to you and yours

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

220. Loss Glazier

Electronic Poetry Center Call for Essays / Papers

Mon 19 Dec 1994

Electronic Poetry Center

Call for Papers / Essays

The ELECTRONIC POETRY CENTER is interested in receiving papers, essays on poetics, specific postmodern poets, or movements, etc.

The EPC contains an author library where we would consider placing these papers. How would this work? Papers will bear a copyright statement in your name. The idea is to make information available to readers who are interested in these topics, and allow them an accessible source to receive them.

For papers on specific authors, a subject library will also be created.

Our idea is that papers presented at conferences, for example, often contain timely information that might be shared. Regardless of whether these papers are being revised or otherwise prepared for print publication, you might wish to submit them for placement into the EPC Library for others to read, view, even comment on if you wish.

Another possiblity here might be your own essays that you use for classroom use (and which you own the copyright to). Students may receive them from the Center at no cost and from any telephone outlet they may choose.

Placement of papers on the EPC would not in any way preclude their publication in print, in a collection of essays, etc. Our idea is to allow them to circulate while the ideas are fresh.

There has been quite a bit of traffic in the Electronic Poetry Center. This is a way of helping your material to circulate and also of providing interesting material for our visitors.

If you are interested in submitting work to this project, send them in the body of an e-mail message to Loss Glazier,
[redacted]

We are most interested in hearing from you!

Loss Glazier
for Loss Glazier and Kenneth Sherwood
in collaboration with Charles Bernstein

↑ Index

221. Loss Glazier
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Mon 19 Dec 1994

Interestingly, reading while for an appointment, Newt Gingrich is listed in _People Weekly_ (an indication of celebrity status!) where his e-mail address is listed as

ga06*@hr.house.gov

(Though I've never seen addresses with an * in them before.) Just thought this would be of interest... Has anyone tried this address?

↑ Index

222. Christopher Reiner
Re: NEA ???
Mon 19 Dec 1994

Just a note to clear up a misconception that could arise from Luigi-Bob's post. Neither AVEC nor Syntax Projects for the Arts has ever received a grant from the NEA. Every year, we apply. Every year, we're turned down. We have received grants from the California Arts Council, the Fund for Poetry, the Mellon Foundation (for 'organizational development') the Coordinating Council of Literary Magazines and Presses, and several smaller foundations. But most of the annual income comes from members of Syntax Projects for the Arts--people who contribute at least $25 a year (and often more). (Information on Syntax Projects and membership is included at the end of this post.) The reason given by the NEA is that the work in AVEC is of 'uneven' artistic merit. I'm not sure what 'even' artistic content would be...

On the record, I would like to say how much I really love the NEA and the great work they do.

SYNTAX PROJECTS FOR THE ARTS

Syntax Projects for the Arts is a non-profit 501(c)(3), member-supported organization dedicated to the promotion of literature for the public benefit. Our focus is on formally innovative writing.

AVEC MAGAZINE
Since 1989, Syntax has published _Avec_, a journal of poetry, prose and translations. _Avec_'s interest is international, and we have published writing and art from the United States, Canada, Lebanon, England, France, Germany, Eastern Europe, and Russia.

AVEC BOOKS
In 1993, Syntax started Avec Books with the publication of Peter Gizzi's _Periplum_. A second book, David Bromige's _A Cast of Tens_ was published in the spring of 1994. Last month, Avec Books published _Blue Vitriol_, the first English language collection by the Russian poet Aleksei Parshchikov, translated by Michael Palmer, John High, Michael Molnar and others, with an introduction by Marjorie Perloff.

WITZ
Members of Syntax Projects for the Arts also receive _Witz_, a journal of critical writing.

MEMBERSHIPS
Syntax has received grants from the California Arts Council, the Council of Literary Magazines and Presses, and the Andrew Mellon Foundation. But it is primarily supported by individual members.

Annual membership rates are $25 (member), $50 (supporting), $100 (sustaining), $200 (patron), $500 (angel).

Members receive two issue of Avec, three issues of Witz, and a 25% discount on Avec Books.

Avec is also available by subscription ($12 / 2 issues).

Memberships and correspondence to Syntax Projects for the Arts should be sent to:

Syntax Projects for the Arts
P.O. Box 1059
Penngrove, California 94951

↑ Index

223. James Sherry
Re: Univeral Blisters/Individual Burns
Mon 19 Dec 1994

The joke about the weather forecast is that it has been made quite clear by meteorology itself that the farther away from the moment of the initial conditions the less chance the forecast has of being correct. For me the interesting issue is the separation of information from meaning that arises from such methods as forecasting. Clearly the news is faulty by virtue of the selection process and doubly so when you consider the point of view. My note about the weather being news is that its at least no more than it pretends to be, a guess. But how long would you stay in your job if you were wrong as often as the weatherman.

As we deal with more and more complexities, the more we have to settle for simultaneous answers.

On Mon, 19 Dec 1994, Tony Green wrote:

> Hi James, How clean is a weather forecast, when it always reproduces the power structure by naming that structure's version of geographical features....?
>
> Tony Green,
> e-mail: [redacted]
> post: Dept of Art History,
> University of Auckland,
> Private Bag 92019,
> Auckland, New Zealand
> Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
> Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

224. James Sherry
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Mon 19 Dec 1994

An interesting political gesture would be to automate the sending of the message "Foetus" to Newt's e-mail address, so that he would receive thousands of messages a day. Then see if he wants to save the message.

On Mon, 19 Dec 1994, Loss Glazier wrote:

> Interestingly, reading while for an appointment, Newt Gingrich is listed in _People Weekly_ (an indication of celebrity status!) where his e-mail address is listed as

> ga06@hr.house.gov*
>
> *(Though I've never seen addresses with an * in them before.) Just thought this would be of interest... Has anyone tried this address?*

↑ Index

225. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Mon 19 Dec 1994

For all "bomb-throwers": latest issue of Wired lists Newt's address as [redacted]

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

226. Patrick Phillips
Segue URL
Tue 20 Dec 1994

Loss,

Did you change the EPC directory at all in the last month.

The Hotlist item for the Segue URL that worked previously was:

gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift/journals/list/Segue/Segue_Newsletter

and now it appears the last two or three branches have been changed. Is this me!!??:

gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift/journals/selected/Segue

Pat Phillips

[redacted]

↑ Index

227. Loss Glazier
Re: Segue URL
Tue 20 Dec 1994

Pat,

There has been some switching over of the system (as we've discussed) and are now just sorting out the few snags that remain.

Does this change cause a difficulty for you?

It is easy enough if you'd prefer to reset it to how it was before. There was only some confusion as to other menus.

Let me know; I can get in there and change within 24 hours (or immediately) if this is your strong preference.

I await word from you.

Sending you best wishes,

Loss

> Did you change the EPC directory at all in the last month.
>
> The Hotlist item for the Segue URL that worked previously was:
>
> gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift/journals/list/Segue/Segue_Newsletter
>
> and now it appears the last two or three branches have been changed. Is this me!!??:
>
> gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift/journals/selected/Segue
>
> Pat Phillips
>
> [redacted]

↑ Index

228. Patrick Phillips
Second post of the Segue URL messagye
Tue 20 Dec 1994

I thought that since I shared my previous post will all of you, you may as well know its meaning.

The Segue Newsletter, as you know has been posted for some time on the Electronic Poetry Center at Buffalo - a fine service to us all I may add. Up until a certain point I was able to access this Hypertext newsletter via an address on the EPC computer. This address or Uniform Resource Locator (URL) was :

gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift/journals/list/Segue/Segue_Newsletter

The current and correct one is:

gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh/internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift/journals/selected/Segue/Segue_Newsletter

What this means is that anyone who wishes to reach the Segue online Newsletter may do so by imputting this string address (or URL) either via gopher or by using a WWW browser such as Mosaic.

I apologize for any confusion that I may have caused anyone.

Patrick Phillips

Pat Phillips

[redacted]

↑ Index

229. w.curnow
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Tue 20 Dec 1994

Hey Loss,
Who's this Newt Gingrich e'rybodies talkin' bout?
Wystan

↑ Index

230. Mark Roberts
Re: AMERICA: A PRAYER
Tue 20 Dec 1994

> Hey Loss,
> Who's this Newt Gingrich e'rybodies talkin' bout?
> Wystan

I don't think his fame has crossed the Pacific.

Mark Roberts
SIS Liaison Officer
Student Information & Systems Office Ph 02 [redacted]
University of NSW Sydney Australia Fax 02 [redacted]

↑ Index

231. Ron Silliman
Who's Newt?
Tue 20 Dec 1994

> Who's this Newt Gingrich e'rybodies talkin' bout?
> Wystan

> I don't think his fame has crossed the Pacific.

To our foreign friends,

Newt Gingrich is the next Speaker of the House, the first Republican (capital R) to hold the post in 40 years.A onetime college professor (history I think), he represents Cobb County, Georgia, the northern suburbs of Atlanta. Atlanta's one of the few truly cosmopolitan cities in the South (New Orleans and Houston are the others) and has had African American political leadership for some 15 or so years. Cobb County is where the "white flight" there flew and Newt is its political expression.

He made his rep in Congress as a brash anti-liberal practitioner of guerrilla electoral politics. The "bomb thrower" reference speaks to his general style (the American cartoon Doonesbury depicts him as a bomb, actually the "system bomb" icon from the Macintosh GUI). He recently declared that one "senior law enforcement official" told him that one fourth of the Clinton administation's senior officials had drug problems. That sort of thing.

Prior to the most recent general election, Newt announced a Republican "Contract with America," a series of items they hope to get through Congress in the first 100 days of 1995. Mostly a rehash of Reagan-era ideas (prayer in the schools, a balanced budget amendment, term limits for congress, more money for the military).

Many people here expect Newt to actively seek to end the funding for the NEA and the NEH. My guess is that he has the votes to do it. Or at least to turn the $ $ back to the states, a good number of which would then kill it at that level.

But Newt is a bit of a wirehead, a personal pal of Alvin Toffler's. He's promised to get all of Congress up on email and the internet. Sort of the right wing's answer to Al Gore. (What is the left wing answer to Al Gore?)

↑ Index

232. Name witheld at the request of the owner

How to unsub or sub to Poetics

Tue 20 Dec 1994

The following announcement is sent in the interests of increasing automation of this list and is sent for the benefit of those who did not save the subscription announcement automatically sent you when you initially subscribed to Poetics despite the fact that this announcemnet encouraged you to save it as you would have need for it at a later time or then again this announcment is for those of you who did not understand all the details in the message automaticaly sent to you by the listserve program.

"I" would like to apologise for the paragraph above.

by sending the standard message direct to

[redacted]

The standard form for this is a one-line message with no subject line (personally I don't think it matters what you put in the subject line since the point seems to be that the machine doesn't read the subject line, but, as usual, I could be wrong):

[or]

[where Jane Jabberwocky or John Jaded are your own name]

"I" am automatically notified by the listserve of any subscription activity (just as "I" get copies of all bounced posts).

If you want to have someone else join the list, the easiest thing is to have them subscribe themselves and send a message to me saying who mentioned the list to them. I will then send back, manually, the "welcome" message that includes information on EPC, R/IFT, and the archives. (If you ever want a copy of this message, just let me know.)

TEN FOUR

↑ Index

233. Mark Roberts

AWOL: Coppertales: A Journal of Rural Arts

Tue 20 Dec 1994

****

AUSTRALIAN WRITING ONLINE is a small press distribution service which we hope will help Australian magazines, journals and publishers to reach a much wider audience through the internet. As a first step we will be posting information and subscription details for a number of magazines and publishers to a number of discussion groups and lists. We hope to build up a large emailing list which includes as many libraries as possible. If you know of a list or discussion group which you think might be worthwhile posting to please email,or if you would like to receive future postings please contact AWOL directly on [redacted].

Please note that [redacted] is a temporary address until we set up our own address sometime next year
****

Coppertales: A Journal of Rural Arts

'Coppertales' is a journal of 180 pages edited by Brian Musgrove and Chris Lee and currently published in the form of an annual anthology by the Faculty of Arts at the University of Southern Queensland and the University of Southern Queensland Press. In 1995 it has been supported by the Queensland Government through the Minister for the Arts.

'Coppertales' publishes poetry, short fiction, articles, art work, reviews and interviews which feature the rural experience. Its aim is to provide a space for the representation and promotion of Queensland and Australian rural culture. Too often rural Australia is misrepresented as a simple and outdated cliche by interests confined to the metropolitan center. This journal establishes a forum for the diversity of interests and opinion which are characteristic of this country's regional cultures.

'Coppertales' is not exclusively committed to regional items. It recognises that rural people are just as interested in the ideas and values of metropolitan and international cultures as they in those of their own localities. 'Coppertales' will publish metropolitan work of quality which may be of interest to a rural audience.

The inaugural issue of the journal features poetry from Bruce Dawe, Coral Hull, Megan Redfern, and Mark Mahemoff, short fiction from Ness Shannon, Ian Crowther and H. Hayes, a travel essay from Pat Buckridge, and an interview with Thomas Keneally.

Contributors receive a complimentary copy of the journal and all contributions are refereed through an editorial advisory board. Subscriptions are Aust$12 (Aust$20 for institutions) overseas subscriptions $Aus20 per annum and are available from the Department of Humanities, Faculty of Arts, University of Southern Queensland, Toowoomba 4350. Cheque, Money Order, Bankcard, Visacard and Mastercard are all accepted.

print this message and cut here

SUBSCRIPTION FORM

Name: _____

Address: _____

_____

Please indicate the rate appropriate to your subscription (all dollars are Australian dollars)

Individual __ $12 (AUS) within Australia

__ $20 (AUS) Institutions

__ $20 (AUS) Overseas

Please send this form, with your payment to: Coppertales, Department of Humanities, Faculty of Arts, University of Southern Queensland, Toowoomba 4350

Coppertales is supported by the Queensland Government through the Minister for the Arts.

Mark Roberts
SIS Liaison Officer
Student Information & Systems Office Ph 02 [redacted]
University of NSW Sydney Australia Fax 02 [redacted]

↑ Index

234. Ron Silliman
Great Poet
Wed 21 Dec 1994

The new issue of Conjunctions (#23: "New World Writing") arrived yesterday, a total translation issue, and in it is a poet whose work simply takes my breath away: ARAKI YASUSADA. According to Brad Morrow's intro to the issue, it's Yasusada's first publication in English translation.

Here's one poem (picked for its brevity):

TELESCOPE WITH URN

The image of the galaxies spreads out like a cloud of sperm.

Expanding said the observatory guide, and at such and such velocity.

It is like the idea of the flowers, opening within the idea of the flowers.

I like to think of that, said the monk, arranging them with his papery fingers.

Tiny were you, and squatted over a sky-colored bowl to make water.

What a big girl! cried we, tossing you in the general direction of the stars.

Intently, then, in the dream, I folded up the great telescope on Mount Horai.

In the form of this crane, it is small enough for the urn.

(translated by Tosa Motokiyu, Ojiu Norinaga and Okura Kyojin)

Yasusada (1907-72) was a Hiroshima postal clerk most of his life and, while active in Japanese avant-garde circles, basically remained unknown. His wife and eldest daughter died instantly in the atomic bomb blast in 1945. A second daughter died of radiation sickness three years later. His manuscripts were brought to light when they were discovered by his surviving son (who was out of town with relatives that fateful day in '45). Apparently his major influences were Roland Barthes and Jack Spicer (!) and the selection in CONJUNCTIONS includes "Sentences for Jack Spicer Renga" (collaboratively written with Akutagawa Fusei). At the time of his death he was at work on a series of letters and translations to have been called After Spicer.

There's an elevation of tone in these poems that reminds me more of Michael Palmer than Spicer, perhaps because the translators are all Hiroshima poets (one of whom seems to spend half of each year in Sebastapol, although I don't know if he's known to Bromige or to Cydney Chadwick). These works kept me up last night and probably will again for another night or three. I recommend them highly.

Also in the issue are works by Bei Dao, Nina Iskrenko, Eduardo Galeano, Anne-Marie Albiach (collab. w/ Charles Bernstein!), Pascale Monnier (trans. by Ashbery) and much more. You can get a copy by sending $10 US to Conjunctions, Bard College, Anondale-on-Hudson, NY 12504.

Ron

↑ Index

235. John Cayley
Re: Experiments
Wed 21 Dec 1994

Tony Green wrote:

> You sound, you know, like one who has not yet discovered the >pleasures of reading Cage or Mac Low. As if to say, this is for the >FUTURE.
>
I have taken my literary pleasure of both authors although I've never heard them in performance. I've already acknowledged the fact that the principles and practices of aleatory and algorithmic works are not new.

Anyway enough parrying _ad hominems_ (too many of these in listserv discussions don't you think?). The point is that the general availablility of tools -- hardware and software -- to appreciate this work fully, and so to develop it in a way that involves the responses of active readers, is only just with us. What _is_ new?

- A new kind of _literary_ experience. The experience of such work has typically been either in performance (there's a lot to that I know), or in the reading of a single edited and/or printed 'snapshot' of text resulting from the application of a process. Such work, when presented as a program-plus-display allows a new kind of literary (usually lone, silent reading) experience of a generated text, _as it is generated_.

- The reader is in more in control and is a part of the process. The reader can set the process running again, interrupt it, investigate its workings. With more developed works, the reader 'holds, throws and loads the dice' -- is able to change the weightings of aleatory factors, choose processes to be applied to a text, modify processes, 'teach' the work about new text or responses to texts, finally even perhaps spawn a so-called 'genetic' evolution of processes (as in 'genetic programming').

- The notion of composition is extend to include the composition of the processes and, I would argue, the programs that underlie them in machine-based work.

In the UK, I am not aware of anyone developing what I've recently begun to call 'machine modulated poetries' (MaMoPo? :-)

Those programs and works which I have so far discovered from US sources are either ungrounded -- willfully or otherwise -- in innovative contemporary writing or are more concerned with the presentation of poetic language using the techniques of non-literary media. (This is one reason why I've stressed the _literary_ nature of experience -- we shouldn't abandon our particular muse simply because our word processors have learned to paint and sing.)

I would be anxious to be put in touch with anyone else who is working in this way.

John Cayley Wellsweep Press [in Chinese HZ:]
Tel & Fax: 0[redacted] Email: [redacted]

↑ Index

236. Robert Drake
Re: Experiments
Wed 21 Dec 1994

John Cayley writes:

> In the UK, I am not aware of anyone developing what I've recently begun to call 'machine modulated poetries' (MaMoPo? :-)
>
> Those programs and works which I have so far discovered from US sources are either ungrounded -- willfully or otherwise -- in innovative contemporary writing or are more concerned with the presentation of poetic language using th techniques of non-literary media. (This is one reason why I've stressed the > _literary_ nature of experience -- we shouldn't abandon our particular muse simply because our word processors have learned to paint and sing.)

>
> I would be anxious to be put in touch with anyone else who is working in this way.

i have been reading around in several hypertexts distributed by Eastgate Systems (134 Main St., Watertown MA, 02172, USA), in both StorySpace (their cross-platorm hypertext environment) and HyperCard. the "quality" is varied--or praps i'll say "some of these has been of more use to me than others"-- or praps i'll try to recast the "experimental" arguement: i'd rather call these hypertexts "experimental apparatuses" which i, as "reader", use to conduct "experiments". some of these experimental setups enable me to produce "useful reading experiences"--& sometimes, those that i fail to "successfuly" utilize provide insight into why they have "failed", and thus how another setup might "succeed".

at anyrate... Mary-Kim Arnold's "Lust", and Jane Yellowlees Douglas' "I hHave Said Nothing" (both from Eastgate Quarterly review of Hypertext, vol. 1 #2), have given me some useful reading experi- ences. i'm looking forward to seeing how folks might put the WWW environment to simlar use...

& yeah praps someone will try to apply my recasting of this "arguement" to non-hypertextual poetry, and either find it useful or no... i'd be interested to hear of the results of such an test...

asever

luigi
TRR/Burning Press

↑ Index

237. bmch
Armand Schwerner
Fri 23 Dec 1994

I've been eavesdropping on this list for the better part of a year now, much to my edification, without having up until now felt the need to join in on the ongoing discourse(s). Or maybe not having felt it proper to do so? since I don't write poetry myself, only write about it (& if the truth be known, don't so much write about it as aspire to do so). Whatever, I've been quite satisfied to read along passively, treating the list as a superior kind of daily news-feed. But now I need some specific information, & I'm hoping you-all out there might be able to help me out. I've wanted for some time to write something about Armand Schwerner's "The Tablets," & it seems as though this winter I might manage to get to it, but I'm amazed to find that (as far I can make out) essentially nothing has been written about that poem and/or Schwerner. Amazed, because I find "The Tablets" really attractive & unprecedented -- a FUNNY long-poem; funnier (because more serious?) than, say, Koch? something like David Jones with a (Jewish?) sense of humor? Or have I missed some essential publication on Schwerner? Has one of you out there written something about Schwerner and/or "The Tablets" that I've overlooked? Do you know of something worth reading about him/it? I wouldn't mind blazing the trail on this, but I'd sure like to know if anyone's been there ahead of me. I've Rounded Up all the Usual Suspects, e.g., Perloff, but they seem not to have looked Schwerner's way even once. I just learned that Sherman Paul once published some kind of pamphlet on Schwerner which I'll have to track down. But is there anything else I should be looking for?

Brian McHale
WVU

↑ Index

238. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Armand Schwerner
Fri 23 Dec 1994

Brian-- I can't answer your query, though I feel like I've heard something just in the last year about someone writing on "The Tablets"--maybe (?) in a job application letter for the opening here at Arizona? I'd be surprised if there wasn't an issue, or 1/2 issue, on Schwerner in VORT back in the late sixties or the seventies. Anyway Jerry Rothenberg would probably know (is he on this list?) or Toby Olson at Temple, or George Economou at Oklahoma. Also there may be some short stuff on the early Tablets back in Caterpillar. good luck, I'll be curious what you find and also about what you make of that strange piece of work. Tenney

↑ Index

239. Alan Sondheim
Re: Armand Schwerner
Fri 23 Dec 1994

Why don't you get in touch with Armand himself? He teaches at the CUNY Staten Island Branch.

Alan

Also, please, if anyone knows anything about Bernadette Mayer's condition, please post here.

Thank you.

↑ Index

240. Jerry Rothenberg
schwerner
Sat 24 Dec 1994

For: Brian McHale in particular.

It's curious to see the work of Schwerner come up as so much of a mystery. He is now & has been for many years one of the very singular & original contributors to the opening & freeing up of poetry. Some good writing about his work -- with the TABLETS as central focus -- has certainly appeared (the Sherman Paul piece and a recent one by Ed Sanders are two that I can quickly think of) but, as with too many others, hardly commen- surate with what he's given us. The omission of Schwener & the monumental (and -- you're right -- deeply comic) TABLETS from all three recent anthologies of OUR poetry is bewildering & -- to my mind at least -- dampens some of the real pleasure they have given me. (Pierre Joris and I will try to compensate for that in the big global book we're still compiling [second volume the post-World War II] but there are limits even so ...)

If you want to be in touch with Schwerner -- who I would guess keeps track of all these things -- his address is 20 Bay St. Landing, Apt. B3C, Staten Island, NY 10301, tel. [redacted], fax [redacted]. I know he'll be happy to hear from you.

With greetings for the year ahead

JEROME ROTHENBERG

↑ Index

241. kathryne lindberg
Re: schwerner
Sun 25 Dec 1994

I realize that this is an abrupt change of pace, but. . . In order to finish a paper on Du Bois and Marx, I need to track down what appears a very odd and fractured allusion in Du Bois. I believe that he is rewriting the "Song of the Bride," as he calls it from Lohengrin, Act III, Scene I, when he has the black John in "The Coming of John," in Souls sing "Freudig gefuhrt, ziehet dahin." Sorry I can't do umlauts, and I guess I should somehow apologize for the preciousness of this query. Still, lacking a libretto and out here in Detroit (not your big opera town) on Christmas day, what better source than the poetry net? I tried my Oxford and Harvard Opera Guides, but I think a recording or libretto would answer this real quick. I will eat my recording of Rienzi if it ain't from Lohengrin. Thanks for what help or sympathy you might render.

Cheers!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

↑ Index

242. Carla Billitteri

dubois

Sun 25 Dec 1994

Not sure just what the question is, but yes, the German phrase in Chapter 13 of _Souls of Black Folk_ comes from _Lohengrin_, which is pretty clear in context since this is the opera John attends in New York, where he has his improbable meeting with the other John from back home ("white John," son of the judge). When he hears the opera in New York, as Du Bois tells us, "black John" rises "out of the dirt and dust of that low life that held him prisoned and befouled." Soon after, however, the usher asks him to leave his seat; he catches sight of the other John and his life is changed forever. He leaves New York immediately and returns to the small Southern town he'd previously avoided returning to. Here, in a truly Poe-esque manner, Du Bois dramatizes his own concept of "double conciouscness." Indeed, the description of the opera's effect on John recalls (with certain critical differences) Du Bois's own recollection in Chapter I of the freedom he sought from racism while growing up: "Then it dawned upon me with a certain suddenness that I was different from the others; or like, mayhap, in heart and life and longing, but shut out from their world by a vast veil.... I held all beyond it in common contempt, and lived above it in a region of blue sky and great wandering shadows. That sky was bluest when I could beat my mates at examination-time, of beat them at a foot-race, or even beat their stringy heads."

Anyway, back to _Lohengrin_: At chapter's end, when John is lynched, he escapes in his mind back North, "humming `Song of the Bride'." The German Du Bois gives, "Freudig gefuehrt, ziehet dahin," means literally "Joyfully led, draw thither." I believe the verb tense for "ziehet dahin" indicates an address to the plural form of thou--something Du Bois would have known (he spent a year in Germany, where he heard Max Weber lecture). The note in the back of my edition of _Souls_ says Du Bois substituted "freudig" (joyfully) for "treulich" (faithfully), but I'm not sure of the significance. More than likely he was quoting from memory. The complexity of Du Bois's address in _Souls_ is such that one wants to think about just who this plural you is to whom John hums as the judge and his lynching party approach.

In any case, very curious how Du Bois's "fractured reference" (as you say) to Wagner relates to Du Bois's Marxism. Perhaps you could share some of your thoughts on this.

↑ Index

243. kathryne lindberg
Re: dubois
Sun 25 Dec 1994

Yes, Du Bois actually spent two years+, long enough to do all the work for his doctorate in sociology. I know that the passage is from Lohengrin, but I couldn't find the passage as such in Lohengrin, and the substitution means something more stunning than bad memory, I'd bet. I am still jamming on this paper, so I can't explain the Marx reference. It'd be the paper, I guess. But I can say that I am about unwinding some of the stunning moments of bubblings up of German philosophy and music in Du Bois's text. His use or abuse of Lohengrin was actually just a footnote or epigraph to his treatment of two letters Karl Marx wrote, one to Abraham Lincoln the other to Andrew Johnson. This is sketchy, I know, but what I wanted in order to pencil in one part of the picture was the exact passage from Lohengrin and why/how he had fractured, as I put it, the "Bride's Song," or "Song of the Bride," as Du Bois thought he had fused the Bridal Chorus and the scene right after the death of Telramund. I am not sure that it matters a whole lot, and this might just be the way I have of warming up to a more straightforward approach to Du Bois's fascinating strategies of historical and genealogical revisionism. He makes Marx the pupil of Frederick Douglass; he manages to lynch (at least in a sort of far fetched way) his German education and his ambivalence to German culture by putting that weird or at least inappropriate and dramatically implausible song in John's throat. These moments, rich in all sorts of ways, fascinate me. I know the DuBois text well; and when I go back to some of his sources, I getthe uncanny sense that he was just as weird a quoter as, say, Pound. Sorry for the length of this message. I'm sure that not everyone gets pulled into or laughs as hard as I do at this sort of stuff. FIN. But I'd still like the first couple of lines--in German--of the aforementioned Wagner tunes. Happy, etc.

↑ Index

244. Carla Billitteri
Re: dubois
Mon 26 Dec 1994

Sounds great--tell us more when you get further along. The opening two lines (but this is all my edition gives) are "Treulich gefuehrt, ziehet dahin / Wo euch der Segen der Liebe bewahr"--"Faithfully led, draw thither / Where over you the blessings of love keep watch." Robert Bernasconi is also working on Du Bois's response to German philosophy, by way of a reading of (I seem to recall) "The Conservation of the Races," but hasn't yet published anything.

↑ Index

245. Charles Bernstein
(no subject)
Mon 26 Dec 1994

Date: Fri, 23 Dec 1994 21:53:23 EST
From: Ben Friedlander <[redacted]>
Subject: announcement for p-list
To: [redacted]

below is the book announcement. slowly slowly slowly catching up with such projects, will finally be ready to do some reading soon. soon.

---

announcing a new series of books
from Editions Herisson

". . . it erases the borders, slips through the hands, you can barely hear it, but it teaches us the heart. Filiation, token of election confided as legacy, it can attach itself to any word at all, to the thing, living or not, to the name of herisson, for example . . ."

--Derrida, "Che cos'e la poesia?" ("What Is Poetry?")

"`Are _herisson_--_herissons_ messengers like eagles?' `Like what, Rose-of-the-Alps?' `Are _herissons_, I mean, mixed up like eagles with stories out of Greek books?' Now Doctor Berne Blum was an odd sort of person. Most people laughed when you asked them questions . . . or said, `Little girls shouldn't ask such things' . . . or pretended not to have heard, and talked about something else or just went out and whispered (rather loudly) behind closed doors, `Now what does one tell a child about such matters?' Doctor Berne Blum wasn't like any of these people. He said: `Little Rose-of-the-Alps, that is a most important question.'"

--H.D., _The Hedgehog_

now available:

Chaim Soutine
Bob Perelman

*

Three Poets
Pam Rehm
Nick Lawrence
Carla Billitteri

*

forthcoming

The Dream Poems
Thad Ziolkowski

jetting I commit the immortal spark
Benjamin Friedlander
_notes toward an essay
on Frank O'Hara_

*

all books are $5.00 postpaid
a limited number of signed and lettered copies available at $15.00
make checks payable to the U.B. Foundation

Editions Herisson
31 Norwood Ave. #2, Buffalo, NY 14222

↑ Index

246. Tony Green
Re: Who's Newt?
Tue 27 Dec 1994

Thanks Wystan for asking and to Ron Silliman for answering so interestingly who is Newt.

Saeson's Greetings to all the List.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]
post: Dept of Art History,
University of Auckland,
Private Bag 92019,
Auckland, New Zealand
Fax: 64 9-[redacted]
Telephone: 64 9 [redacted] ext. 8981 or 7276

↑ Index

247. Ron Silliman
Re: Who's Newt?
Tue 27 Dec 1994

Actually, Tony, I thought of a better, shorter response to the question of who's Newt shortly after my original post:

Our Zhirnovsky

Do they celebrate Kwanzaa in New Zealand?

Ron

↑ Index

248. krickjh
Re: Armand Schwerner
Thu 29 Dec 1994

Schwerner collaborated with someone (?) on something called "The Domesday Book" in the early sixties. It was a lexicon of nuclear weaponry - perhaps one of the earliest attempts to wring some humor from the arms race. It's quite an interesting - and still hilarious - work. I have a copy at home, and will send additional details tomorrow.

John Krick

↑ Index

249. krickjh
Re[2]: Armand Schwerner
Fri 30 Dec 1994

I dug out my copy of the Schwerner "Domesday Dictionary" last night and found when I called it "hilarious" I gravely misspoke, unless your idea of hilarity runs toward the gallows. In fact the book is horrifying. Not having picked it up in several years, I remembered it being a great deal more comic than it is. It IS, certainly, funny, but not the sort of funny that you can easily laugh at. It is nonetheless an incredibly powerful book. I'd like to know more about the history of this book - both its making and its reception.

In any case, the details are:

The Domesday Dictionary, Being An Inventory of the Artifacts and Conceits of a New Civilization

By Donald M. Kaplan and Armand Schwerner,
Edited by Louise J. Kaplan
Simon and Schuster, 1963

↑ Index

250. Ron Silliman
Domesday Dictionary
Sat 31 Dec 1994

>The Domesday Dictionary, Being An Inventory of the Artifacts >and Conceits of a New Civilization
>By Donald M. Kaplan and Armand Schwerner,
>Edited by Louise J. Kaplan
>Simon and Schuster, 1963
>
I remember seeing The Domesday Dictionary @ Cody's throughout the middle 1960s and never associated it with the poet I later came to know through the Tablets until Michael Andre used copious excerpts in The Poets' Encyclopedia (Unmuzzled Ox Vol IV No V/Vol V, 1979)--some 26 entries.

During the 60s and even AFTER the Encyclopedia, my imagination always rewrote that book's title to The Doomsday Dictionary. It wasn't until your post sent me back to the Encyclopedia that I realized my error.

Here's my question: Why ISN'T it called the Doomsday Dictionary?

↑ Index

251. Rodger Kamenetz
Re: Domesday Dictionary
Sat 31 Dec 1994

Ron Silliman asks about the provenance of teh Domesday book. It was a record of a survey completed for William the Conqueror in 1086. Nothing to do with doomsday as far as I can tell. But like Schwerner's work, I gather, an "inventory of the artifacts" of a civilization.

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

January 1995

225 messages · Sun 1 Jan 1995 – Tue 31 Jan 1995

The new Congress convenes on the fourth, the endowments are placed formally on the block, and on the seventeenth the earth opens beneath Kobe and takes six thousand souls before breakfast. The list keeps its own calendar. It has spent the whole winter building toward a single confrontation, and January is the month the confrontation at last arrives — not with the government, but with itself, over a slender magazine and the manifesto folded inside it.

The magazine is Apex of the M, and its editors have made the tactical error of printing their program where the elders can read it. Marjorie Perloff, who admires the poems well enough, confesses herself "dismayed by the manifesto" — a document proposing, in effect, that the Language poets now vacate the summit they spent two decades climbing. So the season declares its grand theme: succession, and the peculiar rudeness of asking one's own predecessors to please hurry up and finish.

The sparring is a pleasure to transcribe. Chris Stroffolino needles Tom Mandel over the very notion of a poet in mid-career, pronouncing the category "delicious really"; Mandel, defining it flatly as a poet in the middle of a long publishing life and daring anyone to object, tells the list to "gimme a break." Beneath the wit sits a genuine quarrel about who holds the authority to pronounce a generation finished, and whether pronouncing it makes it so.

Amid the skirmishing comes a quieter announcement, which posterity will judge the more consequential. Loss Glazier unveils the Electronic Poetry Center's new features — a poetry archive reachable by gopher and, for the daring few with Mosaic, by a thing called the World-Wide Web. Tom Mandel, ever practical, wants to know why no web address is given; Glazier patiently furnishes one. Neither can quite see that he stands at the doorway through which this very list will one day walk into permanence — the reason, reader, that you hold these letters at all.

And then, on Martin Luther King Day, the argument stops. Charles Bernstein relays the word Tom Raworth has just telephoned him: Eric Mottram "died this morning in London." The list that has spent a month insisting the old make room for the new subsides, for a day, into something like grief; Robert Kelly proposes they honor him on May Day, and George Bowering, stunned, can manage only that he "was reading him earlier today!" It is the truest sentence in the archive. I have ordered the letters, hidden the addresses, and left the mourning exactly where it fell.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 225 in all.

WRITERS

Amato, Joe 78
Arts, Mn Center For Book 18, 19
Berheimer, Alan 84
Bernstein, Charles 37, 61, 110, 155, 156, 210
BLUOMA 171, 172, 185, 186, 208, 209
Bmch 15, 25
Boughn, Michael 5, 135
Bowering, George 17, 64, 87, 133, 141, 167, 168, 169
Brannen, Jonathan 96
C/o, O Books 40, 47
C/o, Rachel DuPlessis 51
Clark, Susan 56
Clippinger, David W. 125
Conte, Joseph 8, 9
Department, Archives 175
Drake, Robert 58, 106, 166
Evans, Steve 59, 142
Evans/Moxley 62, 75, 76, 97, 107, 115, 119, 143, 160, 192, 204, 206
Gallego, Carlos 202
Geraets, John 191
Glazier, Loss 31, 46, 54, 77, 154, 205
Golding, Alan 21, 114
Guitart, Jorge 137, 147
I.LIGHTMAN 145, 146, 149, 193, 194
Januzzi, Marisa A 1, 10
Joris, Pierre 16, 24, 72, 124, 161
Kamenetz, Rodger 217
Kelly, Robert 67
Knighton, Ryan 116
Krickjh 11, 34, 43, 48, 57, 70, 89
Listings, Press 38, 39
Mandel, Tom 20, 44, 45, 65, 66, 68, 85, 86, 98, 99, 104, 178, 180, 214, 215
Monroe, Jonathan 93
Monster, The Evil Xmas Devil 26
MORIARTY, LAURA 128
Moxley, Steve Evans/Jennifer 60
Moxley/Evans 108
Nada 163
Nasdor, Marc 138, 139
Nathanson, Tenney 28
Notlep 35
Pape, Eric 102, 109, 118, 131, 189, 190, 198, 216, 220
Pelton, Ted 94, 140, 173, 195
Perloff, Marjorie 7, 63, 92
Peter 136
Phillips, Patrick 32, 42
Quartermain, Peter 69, 174
Ratcliffe, Stephen 95, 196, 197, 219
Reese, Marshall H. 36
Reiner, Christopher 81
Robinson, Kit 126
Ross, Joe 71
Rothenberg, Jerry 127
RSILLIMA 30
Sandra, Braman 158, 164, 165
Scheil, Chris 162
Scroggins, Mark 22, 23
Selby, Spencer 120, 134, 151, 184, 201, 218
Sherry, James 29, 53, 82, 90, 91, 123, 129, 130, 132, 144, 221, 222
Shoemaker, Steven Howard 4, 14, 49, 50, 74, 150, 187
Silliman, Ron 6, 27, 101, 159, 183, 203
Staehle, Wolfgang 100
Stroffolino, Chris 2, 3, 41, 73, 83, 111, 117, 121, 122, 148, 157, 170, 188
Tal, Kali 55, 105
Timmons, Jeffrey 152, 153, 176, 177, 179, 181, 182, 211, 212, 213, 223, 224, 225
Udle114 80, 88
Wallace, Mark 12, 13, 52, 79, 113, 199, 200
Waltuch, Michael 103, 112
Waples, Tim 33
Yates, Catherine 207

NAMES MENTIONED

Abish, Walter 94
Acker, Kathy 189
Alexander, Charles 83
Alexander, Jane 75, 140, 173
Alice, Mary 55, 216
Altieri, Charles 93
Americans, Asian 55, 140
Andrews, Bruce 6, 56, 65, 94
Andrews, Jim 40, 172
Arbor, Ann 89
Armand, Louis 18, 20, 21, 22, 24
Ashbery, John 4, 170
Ashcroft, John 89, 108
Atlanta, Mark P. 119
Atwood, Margaret 105
Auster, Paul 94
Austin, Geer 30, 74
Baraka, Amiri 94, 105
Barker, Andrew 55
Baron, Todd 47
Barthelme, Donald 9
Barthes, Roland 56

Barton, John 42
Beckett, Samuel 56
Benjamin, Walter 65
Bennett, Bill 89
Benson, Steve 40, 62, 86
Bentley, Scott 40, 47
Berkeley, Michael 40, 47
Bernheimer, Alan 84, 108
Bernstein, Emma 4, 58, 172, 186
Berrigan, Ted 47, 94
Berryman, John 94
Berstein, Charles 63
Blake, William 4
Blau, Rachel 93
Blumenreich, Julia 83
Bly, Robert 6, 50
Bowles, Paul 94
Bradley, George 89
Brecht, Bertolt 170
Bromige, David 94
Bronk, Bill 187
Brook, James 49
Brooks, Gwendolyn 4, 50
Brossard, Nicole 56
Brown, Ann 6, 12, 108, 192
Bryan, John 89
Bukowski, Charles 94
Bunting, Basil 77, 156, 210
Burns, Elizabeth 148
Burroughs, William 61
Butler, William 189
Byrd, Don 170
Byron, Philip 89
Campbell, Jeremy 89
Carlos, William 202
Carter, Angela 4, 49
Castro, Michael 147
Cervantes, James 94
Cheney, Don 109, 173
Child, Abigail 40, 47, 56
Chomsky, Noam 176, 195, 212
Cisneros, Sandra 94
Clausen, Jan 6
Clinton, Bill 108
Clippinger, David W. 125, 128
Clover, Joshua 40, 47
Cohen, Ethan 89
Columbus, Christopher 183
Conrad, Tony 89
Coolidge, Clark 94
Coover, Robert 94
Corman, Roger 125, 128, 163
Creeley, Robert 4, 94, 175
Crouse, John 47
Cunningham, John 183, 203, 204
Davies, Alan 47
Davies, Kevin 56
Day, Jean 56
Dennis, Carl 42
Derrida, Jacques 3, 146, 148, 189
Dickens, Charles 49
Dickey, Eric 42
Dickinson, Emily 50
Dickinson, Mark 146
Dole, Bob 76, 107
Doris, Stacy 56
Drucker, Johanna 56, 146
Duncan, Robert 69, 178, 181
Eliot, Joe 1, 4, 50, 55, 181, 183
Eliot, T. S. 92
Elliot, Joe 55
Emerson, Claudia 176
England, Amy 8, 77, 117, 156, 157, 210
Eshleman, Clayton 94
Evans, Bill 62, 75, 76, 97, 107, 108, 115, 119, 143, 160, 192, 204, 206
Farrell, Dan 56
Ferguson, Jesse 56
Fischer, Norman 47
Fisher, Allen 61
Foltz, Craig 60, 62, 108
Forche, Carolyn 131, 170
Forrest, Lisa 55
Foster, David 94
Foucault, Michel 50, 100
France, Peter 117
Friedlander, Benjamin 47, 175, 205
Frost, Corey 4, 50
Frost, Robert 4
Fuller, William 47
Gaddis, William 94
Gilbert, Susan 94
Ginsberg, Allen 94, 101, 212
Gizzi, Peter 136, 174, 192
Glück, Robert 4, 50
Godfrey, John 170
Graham, Lea 89
Gregg, Linda 89, 108
Grenier, Bob 47
Grenier, Robert 47
Hall, Donald 6
Harper, Michael 94, 143
Harryman, Carla 40, 47, 146
Hejinian, Lyn 56, 94, 172
Helms, Jesse 89, 166, 183, 209
Henri, Charles 16, 24, 72, 124, 161
Herbert, George 89
Herman, Rachel 16, 24, 72, 124, 161
Heron, Patrick 111
Hogan, Linda 94
Hollander, Benjamin 65
Hong, Maxine 94
Howe, Susan 10, 62, 123, 175
Hughes, Langston 4

Hughes, Peter 4
Hull, Jeff 108, 142
Inman, Peter 47
Jackson, Jesse 94
Jaffe, Larry 55
Jarnot, Lisa 205
Jefferson, Thomas 43
Jeffery, Mark 158, 186
Johnson, Charles 94
Johnson, Robert 42
Johnston, Daniel 89
Jones, Brian 105
Joseph, Safdie 9, 89
Joyce, Michael 205
Kelley, Mike 30
Kendall, Robert 58
Kennedy, David 42, 70, 89, 108
Kerouac, Jack 159
Kerry, John 89
Killian, Kevin 40
Kim, Myung Mi 60
Kinnell, Galway 94
Kramer, Scott 50
Krick, Jack 70, 183
Krick, John 11, 34, 43, 48, 57, 89
Kristeva, Julia 146
Lacan, Jacques 49, 189, 194, 202
Lakoff, George 41
Lauter, Paul 6, 50
Lauterbach, Ann 40
Lazer, Hank 205
Lennon, John 55
Leonard, Tom 128
Levertov, Denise 94
Levi, David 65
Levin, Jonathan 89
Levine, Phil 4
Levy, Andrew 47
Lightman, Ira 189, 194
Lindberg, Kathryne 1
Livingston, Reb 183, 203
London, Frank 15, 18, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 61, 67, 77, 80, 88, 156, 210
London, Rick 47
Lorde, Audre 105
Louise, Bobbie 4, 94
Lowell, Amy 4
Lubeski, Lori 47
Luoma, Bill 180, 185, 208, 209
Luther, Martin 61
Madison, James 124, 135, 173
Magee, Kevin 60, 108
Malcolm, Janet 186
Mandel, Charlotte 45, 86, 121, 170, 214
Mandelstam, Osip 178, 181
Manning, Nicholas 59, 72
Marsh, Bill 27
Martin, Camille 42
Martin, Paul 13
Mathews, Harry 94
Melville, Nicky 16, 24, 72, 124, 161
Miller, Paul D. 42
Moore, Allison 170
Morrow, William 90
Moses, Robert 214, 223
Mottram, Eric 61, 64, 67, 68, 80, 88
Moyers, Bill 6, 50
Mukherjee, Aryanil 94
Murray, Ian 89
Nelson, Cary 4, 50
Newton, Keith 42, 146
Niedecker, Lorine 50
Notley, Alice 47, 66, 94
Nowak, Mark 18
O'Hara, Frank 56, 92
Olds, Sharon 4, 6
Olson, Charles 77, 156, 175, 210
Olson, Kirby 1, 175
Oppenheimer, Joel 94
Osman, Jena 62, 108, 192
Owen, Maureen 94
Padgett, Ron 94
Parish, Jefferson 142
Pearson, Ted 47
Perelman, Bob 1, 30, 56, 63, 83, 123
Peters, Nancy 101
Pinsky, Robert 94
Potts, Robert 40, 47
Pound, Ezra 50, 194
Radul, Judy 56
Rakosi, Carl 94, 101
Randall, Karen 40, 47
Raphael, Dan 13
Raworth, Tom 47, 61
Reagan, Nancy 63
Reese, Marshall H. 36
Regula, Ralph 203
Rehm, Pam 132
Revell, Donald 94
Rexroth, Kenneth 94
Roberts, Gary 42, 56
Robertson, Lisa 49, 56
Robinson, Elizabeth 172
Rogers, Jennifer 109
Rothenberg, Jerome 127
Rothschild, Doug 185
Roy, Camille 47
Sanders, Jay 42
Sappho 1
Scalapino, Leslie 39, 47, 56, 62, 94, 123, 170
Schelling, Andrew 47, 175
Schultz, Susan 205
Schwerner, Armand 8, 9, 11, 15, 16, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 28

Shakespeare, William 3, 49, 145
Shapiro, David 170
Sherwood, Kenneth 37, 42, 77, 156, 205, 210
Shields, Bill 55
Shurin, Aaron 47
Simic, Charles 94
Simon, Greg 42, 89, 108
Simpson, Louis 89
Sinclair, John 55
Smith, Harry 89, 93
Smith, Rod 12, 66, 71, 108
Sorrentino, Christopher 94
Soto, Gary 4, 94
Spahr, Boyd 56
Spahr, Juliana 56, 197
Stafford, William 74, 98
Stein, Gertrude 146, 196
Steinem, Gloria 146
Stevens, Wallace 89
Stewart, Christine 56
Strang, Brian 56
Strauss, Zoe 65
Sullivan, Andrew 101
Swensen, Cole 21
Taggart, John 123
Tardos, Anne 56
Tate, James 94
Taylor, Tom 42, 175
Terry, Philip 30, 143
Texas, Irving 30, 74, 75
Thomas, Dylan 32, 42, 89, 108, 203
Thompson, George 89
Timmons, Matt 158
Toscano, Rodrigo 47, 204
Trujillo, Dorothy 56
Turner, Victor 45
Tysh, Chris 56
Veronica, Angela 77, 156, 210
Vincent, Stephen 143
Violi, Paul 94
Waldman, Anne 94
Waldrop, Rosemary 62
Waldrop, Rosmarie 75, 94
Walker, Alice 94
Walker, Laura 42, 96
Wallace, Nicole 94
Warner, Jim 89
Warren, Jim 34, 43, 57, 70, 89
Warren, Kenneth 34, 89
Warsh, Lewis 94
Washington, George 12, 52, 70, 75, 76, 79, 89, 107, 108, 119
Watson, Craig 47
Watten, Barrett 63
Weiner, Hannah 94
Welsh, Lawrence 49
White, Tom 123
Whitman, Walt 6, 50, 83
Williams, Paul O. 1, 6
Williams, William Carlos 74
Wilson, Pete 183
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 82, 202
Wordsworth, William 74
Wright, C. D. 75, 143
Yates, Katie 149, 157, 159, 161, 205, 207
Zukofsky, Louis 6, 146, 208

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 30, 55, 76, 105, 107
Aesthetics 1, 78, 108
African American poetry 55
Anthologies 47, 49, 50, 55, 93
Appropriation 12, 30, 33, 62, 65, 119, 183, 204
Archives and libraries 31, 37, 43, 46, 49, 53, 56, 62, 70, 77, 89, 145, 156, 210
Autobiography 55, 78
Avant-garde 1, 3, 50, 123, 195, 212
Biography 9, 51
Book announcements 36, 40, 49, 61, 77, 156, 210, 212
Bookstores 22, 39, 55, 101
Calls for submissions 51, 93
Capitalism 3, 12, 63, 65, 92, 123, 178
Censorship 12, 101, 108, 143, 173
Cities 56, 162
Class 105
Collage and montage 61
Conferences and festivals 4, 9, 55, 78, 93, 183
Confessional poetry 4
Copyright and permissions 89
Craft 78
Creative writing pedagogy 1, 4, 6, 12, 50, 74, 77, 156, 161, 210
Difficulty 49, 74, 194
Disability 55
Dreams 40, 47, 145, 216
Ecology and ecopoetics 78
Editing 9, 55, 56, 72, 134, 137, 143, 175
Electronic poetry and hypertext 31, 32, 37, 44, 46, 48, 53, 54, 58, 70, 77, 78, 154, 156, 175, 205, 210
Elegy 61
Empire and imperialism 55
Epic 39
Fascism 189, 194
Feminism 6, 105
Film 74
Formalism 4, 6, 93
Free verse 1, 92
Gender 6, 93, 146
Grants and funding 27, 30, 36, 55, 59, 60, 62, 66, 75, 76, 83, 84, 90, 94, 101, 107, 108, 109, 115, 119, 129, 138, 140, 143, 153,

158, 160, 162, 164, 166, 173, 179, 183, 192, 195, 203, 204
Humour and satire 145
Ideology 7, 78, 170, 183
Improvisation 58, 146
Interviews 47
Language poetry 4, 6, 50, 63, 65, 78, 86, 92, 93, 102, 105, 106, 109, 123, 132, 172, 186, 194, 211
Latino and Latin American poetry 4, 55
Letters and correspondence 89
List moderation 14, 33, 61, 84, 145
Little magazines 4, 18, 37, 49, 50, 55, 56, 72, 74, 77, 83, 119, 136, 137, 156, 170, 174, 175, 192, 205, 210, 219
Lyric poetry 49, 60, 93, 146, 209
Marxism 92, 115
Memory 39, 40, 41, 47, 49, 58, 67, 68, 216, 217
MFA programs 60
Modernism 4, 50, 78, 93, 175
Mourning and loss 31, 37, 41, 46, 53, 54, 77, 83, 154, 156, 205, 210
Multiculturalism 84, 93, 176
Music and poetry 55, 87, 119, 145, 170, 178, 194, 196, 215
Nature 40, 55, 58, 61, 105, 178, 181, 211
New Formalism 6, 93
Objectivism 6, 50, 170
Ontology 78
Performance and the poetry reading 52, 55, 74
Phenomenology 78
Philosophy 45, 50, 74, 195, 212
Place and region 37, 40
Poet laureate 143
Poetics 1, 6, 9, 30, 31, 33, 35, 37, 55, 56, 70, 77, 78, 93, 94, 105, 106, 108, 113, 123, 124, 131, 132, 155, 156, 186, 189, 190, 194, 197, 205, 207, 210, 212, 213
Post-structuralism 146, 170, 194
Postmodernism 93, 175
Print vs. digital 55, 69, 112, 145
Procedural and constraint writing 30
Psychoanalysis 146, 194
Queer poetics 6, 105, 179, 183, 212
Race and poetry 6, 72, 216, 217
Reading announcements 55, 142
Religion and the sacred 4, 50, 55, 63, 82, 86, 123, 146, 157, 194
Representation 96, 175, 176, 212
Reviewing and criticism 9, 37, 50, 56, 61, 62, 74, 92, 113, 132, 156, 161, 169, 210, 214, 223
Science 45
Semiotics 82
Small press publishing 37, 39, 40, 47, 55, 56, 61, 62, 75, 76, 77, 90, 94, 97, 107, 108, 112, 114, 139, 142, 143, 156, 192, 205, 210
Software and code 58, 77, 105, 156, 210
Sonnet 4
Structuralism 146, 170, 194
Subjectivity 4, 63, 66, 74
Surrealism 10, 24, 65
Terrorism 105
The academy 3, 4, 6, 9, 30, 45, 50, 51, 55, 61, 62, 74, 77, 78, 89, 93, 98, 105, 156, 158, 170, 209, 210
The body 37, 69, 82, 90, 145, 156, 175, 205, 210
The canon 3, 50, 74, 93
The Gulf War 55
The Holocaust 105
The internet 31, 32, 37, 46, 48, 49, 53, 54, 59, 60, 70, 75, 76, 77, 107, 154, 156, 210
The line 69
The listserv 1, 33, 37, 53, 66, 75, 89, 131, 143, 156, 190, 203, 204, 210, 213
Theatre 26, 28, 40, 74, 143
Translation 16, 24, 40, 47, 56, 72, 77, 124, 156, 161, 210
Vietnam 55, 83, 170
Visual and concrete poetry 1
Visual art 62, 75, 77, 90, 101, 109, 156, 194, 210
Women's writing 4, 56, 72

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 225 in all.

1 JAN 1995

1. Marisa A Januzzi — discursive disruptions//whether poetry makes anything happen
2. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Domesday Dictionary
3. Chris Stroffolino — Re: discursive disruptions//whether poetry makes anything happen

2 JAN 1995

4. Steven Howard Shoemaker — JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont. (fwd)
5. Michael Boughn — Re: Happy New Year
6. Ron Silliman — Poetry on the Margins of What?
7. Marjorie Perloff — Re: discursive disruptions//whether poetry makes anything happen

3 JAN 1995

8. Joseph Conte — Re: Domesday Dictionary
9. Joseph Conte — Re: Armand Schwerner
10. Marisa A Januzzi — motives for metaphor
11. krickjh — Armand Schwerner Live
12. Mark Wallace — America: A Prayer
13. Mark Wallace — Situation #8
14. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Poetry on the Margins of What?
15. bmch — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
16. Pierre Joris — Re: Armand Schwerner Live

4 JAN 1995

17. George Bowering — Re: America: A Prayer
18. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
19. Mn Center For Book Arts — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
20. Tom Mandel — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
21. Alan Golding — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
22. Mark Scroggins — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
23. Mark Scroggins — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
24. Pierre Joris — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
25. bmch — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
26. The Evil Xmas Devil Monster — Re: Armand Schwerner Live

5 JAN 1995

27. Ron Silliman — Reading?
28. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Armand Schwerner Live
29. James Sherry — Re: America: A Prayer
30. RSILLIMA — Congressional vote on NEH--forw
31. Loss Glazier — New Electronic Poetry Center Features

6 JAN 1995

32. Patrick Phillips — Re: Congressional vote on NEH--forw
33. Tim Waples — subscribing to Poetics list
34. krickjh — Senate vote
35. notlep — subscribing

7 JAN 1995

36. Marshall H. Reese — Arts Alliance Campaign to Save Arts Funding
37. Charles Bernstein — Re: subscribing to Poetics list

8 JAN 1995

38. Press Listings — Leslie Scalapino's DEFOE
39. Press Listings — Leslie Scalapino's DEFOE (2d try!)

40. O Books c/o — New O Books
41. Chris Stroffolino — Re: motives for metaphor

9 JAN 1995

42. Patrick Phillips — Congressional E-mail addresses
43. krickjh — Congress
44. Tom Mandel — Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
45. Tom Mandel — Re: motives for metaphor
46. Loss Glazier — Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features

10 JAN 1995

47. O Books c/o — O Books List
48. krickjh — Re[2]: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
49. Steven Howard Shoemaker — JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont. (fwd)
50. Steven Howard Shoemaker — JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont. (fwd)
51. Rachel DuPlessis c/o — Call for MLA Papers / 20th c. American Division

11 JAN 1995

52. Mark Wallace — possibilities for readings
53. James Sherry — Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
54. Loss Glazier — Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
55. Kali Tal — Re: Listings

12 JAN 1995

56. Susan Clark — RADDLE MOON listing
57. krickjh — Congress again
58. Robert Drake — HyperText Poetry course (forwarded message)

14 JAN 1995

59. Steve Evans — Defense of NEA

15 JAN 1995

60. Steve Evans/Jennifer Moxley — Freely Espousing

16 JAN 1995

61. Charles Bernstein — Eric Mottram: In Memorium
62. Evans/Moxley — Re: Freely Espousing
63. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Apex of the M

17 JAN 1995

64. George Bowering — Re: Eric Mottram: In Memorium
65. Tom Mandel — Re: Apex of the M
66. Tom Mandel — Re: Freely Espousing
67. Robert Kelly — Re: Eric Mottram: In Memorium
68. Tom Mandel — Mottram : In Memory's Hum
69. peter quartermain — Text of Robert Duncan Selected Poems

18 JAN 1995

70. krickjh — Congress again
71. Joe Ross — Re: Freely Espousing
72. Pierre Joris — Re: call for work for interface 10 (fwd)
73. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Apex of the M
74. Steven Howard Shoemaker — JRNL: Poetry in the Margins, cont. (fwd)
75. Evans/Moxley — Freely Espousing Update
76. Evans/Moxley — Press Release
77. Loss Glazier — Electronic Poetry Center Newsletter #1

19 JAN 1995

78. Joe Amato — apex of the m...

79. Mark Wallace — Re: Freely Espousing Update
80. udle114 — EM
81. Christopher Reiner — Freely Espousing
82. James Sherry — Re: apex of the m...
83. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Freely Espousing Update
84. Alan Berheimer — NEA Enemy Action
85. Tom Mandel — Re: Apex of the M
86. Tom Mandel — Re: apex of the m...
87. George Bowering — Re: call for work for interface 10 (fwd)

20 JAN 1995

88. udle114 — Eric Mottram
89. krickjh — GovAccess.091: Congressional contact-vectors (pass it along
90. James Sherry — Re: NEA Enemy Action
91. James Sherry — Re: call for work for interface 10 (fwd)
92. Marjorie Perloff — Re: apex of the m...
93. Jonathan Monroe — Cornell Poetry Conference
94. Ted Pelton — More Espousing
95. Stephen Ratcliffe — ???
96. Jonathan Brannen — Re: Freely Espousing Update
97. Evans/Moxley — Espousing Update 1/20
98. Tom Mandel — Re: apex of the m...
99. Tom Mandel — Saussure, you dummy
100. Wolfgang Staehle — Saussure, you

21 JAN 1995

101. Ron Silliman — Re: NEA Enemy Action
102. eric pape — Re: apex of the m...
103. Michael Waltuch — Address
104. Tom Mandel — Re: ???
105. Kali Tal — Re: apex of the m...
106. Robert Drake — Re: apex of the m...
107. Evans/Moxley — New Press Release

22 JAN 1995

108. Moxley/Evans — Freely Espousing 1/22 Update
109. eric pape — Re: apex of the m...
110. Charles Bernstein — Re: Address

23 JAN 1995

111. Chris Stroffolino — Re: apex of the m...
112. Michael Waltuch — Re: Freely Espousing
113. Mark Wallace — Re: apex of the m...
114. Alan Golding — New Press Release
115. Evans/Moxley — Espousing Update 1/23

24 JAN 1995

116. Ryan Knighton — sign
117. Chris Stroffolino — Re: apex of the m...
118. eric pape — Re: apex of the m...

25 JAN 1995

119. Evans/Moxley — Espousing Update 1/24
120. Spencer Selby — Re: apex of the m...
121. Chris Stroffolino — Re: apex of the m...
122. Chris Stroffolino — Re: apex of the m...
123. James Sherry — James, please post this; couldn't do it to: poetics@ , ubvm.cc.buffalo.edu (...
124. Pierre Joris — Re: James, please post this; couldn't do it to: poetics@ ,

125. David W. Clippinger — Cid Corman
126. Kit Robinson — Re: G.O.D.
127. Jerry Rothenberg — el cid
128. LAURA MORIARTY — Re: Cid Corman
129. James Sherry — Re: Espousing Update 1/23
130. James Sherry — Re: apex of the m...
131. eric pape — Re: apex of the m...
132. James Sherry — Re: apex of the m...
133. George Bowering — Re: apex of the m

26 JAN 1995

134. Spencer Selby — Re: apex of the m...
135. Michael Boughn — Up in smoke
136. Peter — Re: Up in smoke
137. Jorge Guitart — a reading of apex of the m 2
138. Marc Nasdor — Re: NEA Enemy Action
139. Marc Nasdor — Re: New Press Release
140. Ted Pelton — Re: freely espousing

27 JAN 1995

141. George Bowering — Re: apex of the m...
142. Steve Evans — Re: New Press Release
143. Evans/Moxley — Espousing Update 1/26
144. James Sherry — Re: apex of the m...
145. I.LIGHTMAN — apex of the m
146. I.LIGHTMAN — CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
147. Jorge Guitart — cienfuegos and socialist realism
148. Chris Stroffolino — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
149. I.LIGHTMAN — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
150. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Life Supports
151. Spencer Selby — Re: apex of the m...
152. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
153. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
154. Loss Glazier — epc.news (note)
155. Charles Bernstein — Re: sign

28 JAN 1995

156. Charles Bernstein — Re: sign
157. Chris Stroffolino — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
158. braman sandra — Funding Arguments
159. Ron Silliman — Katie Yates
160. Evans/Moxley — Re: Funding Arguments
161. Pierre Joris — Re: Katie Yates
162. Chris Scheil — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
163. nada — Re: el cid
164. braman sandra — Art Policy in the 90s
165. braman sandra — Apology -- it didn't work
166. Robert Drake — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
167. George Bowering — Re: cienfuegos and socialist realism
168. George Bowering — Re: apex of the m...
169. George Bowering — to Mark Wallace
170. Chris Stroffolino — reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
171. BLUOMA — Re: Espousing back at ya-hoo

172. BLUOMA — Re: the real language poet
173. Ted Pelton — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
174. peter quartermain — Re: Up in smoke
175. Archives Department — Dark Ages Clasp the Daisy Root, Sept. 1990
176. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
177. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
178. Tom Mandel — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
179. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Funding Arguments
180. Tom Mandel — Re: the real language poet

29 JAN 1995

181. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
182. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
183. Ron Silliman — NEA & Randy Cunningham
184. Spencer Selby — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
185. BLUOMA — Re: Re- the real language po
186. BLUOMA — Re: Re- the real language po
187. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Life Supports
188. Chris Stroffolino — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
189. eric pape — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)

30 JAN 1995

190. eric pape — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
191. John Geraets — Langusage
192. Evans/Moxley — Espousing Update 1/30
193. I.LIGHTMAN — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
194. I.LIGHTMAN — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
195. Ted Pelton — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
196. Stephen Ratcliffe — Gertrude Stein
197. Stephen Ratcliffe — Re: sign
198. eric pape — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
199. Mark Wallace — Re: apex of the m...
200. Mark Wallace — Re: apex of the m...
201. Spencer Selby — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
202. Carlos Gallego — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
203. Ron Silliman — Re: NEA & Randy Cunningham
204. Evans/Moxley — Re: NEA & Randy Cunningham
205. Loss Glazier — How to Subscribe to RIF/T (Informational Posting)
206. Evans/Moxley — Correction

31 JAN 1995

207. Catherine Yates — subscription
208. BLUOMA — Re: Re- CALL FOR A DECISIVE
209. BLUOMA — Re: Re- reified names vs. bo
210. Charles Bernstein — Re: subscription
211. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: apex of the m...
212. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Espousing Update 1/26
213. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
214. Tom Mandel — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
215. Tom Mandel — Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
216. eric pape — Spirits, etc.
217. Rodger Kamenetz — Re: Spirits, etc.
218. Spencer Selby — Re: Re- reified names vs. bo

219. Stephen Ratcliffe — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
220. eric pape — Re: Spirits, etc.
221. James Sherry — Re: apex of the m...
222. James Sherry — Re: apex of the m...
223. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
224. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: Re- reified names vs. bo
225. Jeffrey Timmons — Re: apex of the m...

1. Marisa A Januzzi

discursive disruptions//whether poetry makes anything happen

Sun 1 Jan 1995

Greetings from a formerly silent lurker!

With the indulgence of the list, I would like to revive the question of the political content of poetic form, implicitly continuing a discussion which arose at an MLA session called "Poetry: The Visual Dimension." Alan Golding gave a helpful paper about Susan Howe's visual poetics, and during the Q&A, Marjorie Perloff asked "the big skeptical question" (I wish I could remember her exact words!), wondering about the connection between the disruption for instance of the linear form of the poem on the page and the disruption of patriarchy. And Bob Perelman accelerated the question by raising the specter of the "history of the avant-garde."

Since then I have been wondering why poetry can't be construed as having political potential in a metaphoric mode. It seems to me that metaphors (whether formal or more simply rhetorical) not only express but also potentially restage political issues (as in for instance the work of Medbh McGuckian) in educational ways. When Mina Loy chose an open form for her notorious 1915-17 "Love Songs" (THE best since Sappho, she called them) the rhetoric of form and content immediately sent critics into a delirium of invective against free women, free verse, free love... in other words critics got the point before they "got" the poems, a situation which recurs every day in the poetry classroom where students and teachers can usefully confront prejudices in the guise of aesthetic questions.

Ten years ago I wrote an ill-thought-out essay about T.S. Eliot which earned me a 'D' from Kathryne Lindberg and caused this student (from a deeply traditional and right-wing family) to attend consciously to the question for the very first time. Although it now may sound nostalgic to say so, Williams and Olson (also on the syllabus) helped me out...and so did Kathryne, with a magnum of patience...

Language: the parent, not the child of thought? (Wilde)

With gratitude for all of you poetic teachers,
Marisa Januzzi <[redacted]>

↑ Index

2. Chris Stroffolino

Re: Domesday Dictionary

Sun 1 Jan 1995

I just wanted to take the opportunity to as unironically as possible wish each and every one of you a "Happy New(t) Year." Stroffolino...

↑ Index

3. Chris Stroffolino

Re: discursive disruptions//whether poetry makes anything happen

Sun 1 Jan 1995

Dear Marisa-- Thank you for the insight you bring to the issues of "metaphor" and its "antagonism" towards allegedly more "forward-looking" poetic disjunction. I believe the extent to which these issues have been "gendered" by the current dominant poetic factions is highly problematic for it's quite possible that what's called 'reactionary' and therefore patriarchal by a certain avant-garde strain (what's derided as "metaphor" or "symbolist" or even "Romantic") has been dismissed out of hand. If we look at it historically, one can see the rhetoric that has enabled the legitimation of so-called "nonmetaphoric" or "nonlinear" modes of poetry has, for all its claims of radical politicalization, too often played into the demands and dynamics of the "academic establishment." (This reminds me of the statement--"Derrida would not have ever been allowed into the academy were it not for the fact that it's extremely easy to read Shakespeare as such."). In the academic fashion-show, the notion that women (or other 'marginalized' groups) must reject anything that reeks of tradition, seems to be either (1) self-defeating or (2) a desperate attempt to justify the so-called 'new' poetry, a poetry which has now come to have its own share of investment not so much a matter of "which side are you on" or even "taste," but a matter not so much a matter of "which side are you on" or even "taste," but a matter and "form" is problematized. The fact is, the debate between "metaphor" and "nonmetaphor" based poetry, between minimalism and maximalism, between meaning and play, cuts across political lines. To the extent that debates over poetry center on the POLITICS OF FORM obscures a perhaps more serious issue. For if the great "Western Canon" is a repressive force that needs to be subverted, perhaps this can best be done so by entering into dialogue with it. Though we should be aware of the repressive partriachal capitalistic cases supported the so-called "alternative" as well. This is not to say that there aren't writers on both "sides" that ARE more politically subverive than certain formal code. Any more thoughts you have on this would be appreciated. Thanx, Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

4. Steven Howard Shoemaker

JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont. (fwd)

Mon 2 Jan 1995

Forwarded message:
From daemon Wed Dec 28 09:20:26 1994
Date: Wed, 28 Dec 1994 09:13:23 -0500
From: "[redacted] \"Randy Bass\"" <[redacted]
Subject: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont.
To: Multiple recipients of list T-AMLIT <[redacted]>

JRNL: T-AMLIT JOURNAL

Here are three more JOURNAL contributions to the discussion about the marginalization of poetry within the academy.

The original query to this thread also posed the open call for more discussion of poetry on this list (as does Tony Petrosky at the end of his first posting).
RBass
****

(1)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "Anthony R Petrosky" 14-DEC-1994 10:46:20.24
Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins

I just read the responses to the original posting. It's curious, I think, to see them as a cross section of responses, taking, as they do, various positions that it seems to me I have heard in my department at one time or the other. They all seem legitimate, serious, but in an odd way they would all, including mine, put off people for various reasons. Maybe it is that there is this atmosphere of critique dominating our reading and writing. I think of something Robert Creeley once said to a seminar I was in in graduate school: "you're all here because poetry is plastic, it's something you can do anything in." I think he meant that it is an open form, a place where traditions can dominate and invention can dominate and the mix of what happens will always, then, contain the tensions that arise from differences. Formalists disparage language poets, language poets disparage narrative poets, abstract expressionists like Louise Gluck disparage so called confessional poets like Sharon Olds. The differences create defense, posture. Now that seems similar to just about anything I can think of that allows difference, and the tensions get hightened, I think, we layer on to the scene the interests and motives of those who don't write poetry or teach it but critique it from various perspectives. So, yeah it seems, as one of the respondents put it, there are a lot of reasons why it is on the margins.

But why wouldn't it be possible to take as a project the reading and writing of radically different kinds of poetry: Sharon Olds next to Ashbery next to Rumi next to Gluck next to Bernstein? Why not let poetry of all sorts exist in the same space and ask students, then, to work on understanding it. We could give them traditions to use to frame the discussions. We could give them at least a sense of difference and a place to both respect it (as those who participate by writing the different kinds of poems do) and work on it. These are the kinds of solutions I am interested in. What we can do to bring our students to poetry.

It seems to me that we could make a huge catalogue of reasons why poetry is in the supposed state we think it is. But that is then a big complaint. Is that a good place for the energy? Maybe to point we can understand the situation of poetry this way, but I suspect the situation varies by location. Bucknell University, for instance, takes poetry seriously for undergraduates with its visiting poets every year, its Poetry Festival, its literary magazines, and its undergraduate workshops. Other places don't do anything near that, but at Pitt, for example, we put a tremendous emphasis on graduate work in poetry. Still other place do so also but with an emphasis on a different kind of poetry. So we learn from this kind of generalized talk, I'd say, that the situation of poetry is not uniform. Ok. So now what?

I'd love to continue the discussion of teaching poetry in various places in the curriculum. Rumi and LaLa and Kabir in religious studies along with Blake and Hopkins along with A. Rich and Phil Levine. Poetry in composition studies. Multi-genre writings that include poetry. Traditions of poetry juxtaposed against other traditions. Any takers?

(2)
From: IN%"[redacted]" 16-DEC-1994 15:41:37.16
Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins

I would like to chip in regarding reactions to poetry. I, too, find that even in academe, poetry is viewed with some trepidation or perhaps the notion that it's somehow old-fashioned, that the hot stuff is going on in fiction these days? And certainly many students are petrified of poetry, or think it will bore them to tears.

But the good news is, I have to agree with several other posters who noted having good success teaching poetry, even (or especially?) in composition classes, especially contemporary, more life-based works. I, too, have had this experience. I taught a section on poetry and writing about poetry in a composition class at a community college--mostly to students who had had very little previous exposure to poetry and whose discomfort level with the subject was high. I chose a range, from Robert Frost and Shakespearean sonnets to Langston Hughes, Gwendolyn Brooks, Sharon Olds, Gary Soto, and other contemporary writers. I brought in a record of poets reading their works--they heard Hughes and Brooks, as I recall. I tried not to overwhelm them; I wanted them to read each poem several times and pay attention to the language. I modeled this kind of reading in class and assigend them only a few poems at a time to read, though I encouraged them to browse further! Finally, I had students working in pairs or small groups give their reading of the poem to the class, ie make a presentation about what they had gotten out of the poem, what particular problems they encountered, how they came to some understanding with it.

I found this portion of the class quite successful; several students came up to me and told me how they'd never known poetry could be so interesting, or that they could make sense of it, etc. The students also wrote a paper comparing several poems that dealt with the same theme, comparing and contrasting the poems' differing approaches to the theme in terms of language, imagery, tone, etc.

(3)
From: IN%"[redacted]" 16-DEC-1994 23:52:52.46
Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins

Re poetry: You know, it depends somewhat on where you look. I don't have the sense (and I could easily be wrong) that poetry is marginalized in courses that focus on contemporary women writers or on Chicano/a writers, for example. I also think that while Carter Revard's funny account is true in essence, there have always been countertraditions to the deliberately complex and obscure modernism represented by Eliot, et al. Think of Sterling Brown and Langston Hughes, Amy Lowell, Frost, and many of the poets Cary Nelson discusses in REPRESSION AND RECOVERY. Part of the problem has, I think, to do with the struggle of the academic community to free itself from the still hegemonic New Critical pedagogical tradition, which was, after all, constructed by folks like Ransom, Tate, and Brooks, with predecessors like Eliot very much in mind.

↑ Index

5. Michael Boughn
Re: Happy New Year
Mon 2 Jan 1995

OK, so you've probably all already heard this one, but here goes anyway:

How many Intel engineers does it take to screw in a light bulb?

Three: one to screw in the bulb and one to hold the chair.

Cheers,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

6. Ron Silliman
Poetry on the Margins of What?
Mon 2 Jan 1995

Both Tony Petrovsky and Paul Lauter's comments reflect quite clearly some very different ideas of what might be meant by the proposition "poetry is at the margins."I don't know Tony but given Paul's long involvement with bringing radical politics to the academy, it's interesting how inherently non-market oriented each approach seems to be.

The idea that poetry "is at the margins" of course proposes some spatial model of something, with an identifiable center from which poetry could then be distant. What is that thing? Books sold? Cultural influence? Fame? Petrovsky speculates that the diversity of poetic subcultures in our society might be causal (rather than, say, a reflection or manifestation of some larger social process). Paul gets in a gratuitous (and completely reductive) slap at the avant-garde tradition (w/o recognizing it as the only international literary tradition the world has ever had). Its role in identitarian political movements is then posed as a truer center.

That reminded me of the condition that poets found themselves in the former Soviet Union (FSU). For a long time, almost 30 years, poets held a critical social function for political opposition. Since political meetings were verboten, poetry readings often took on the role of a public rally. Audiences were large. But it is not evident that this benefited more than a handful of individual poets and its impact on writing per se seems to have been quite a mixed bag.

Once a broader terrain of discourse was possible, the necessity of the poet as a symbol of resistance quickly disappeared. Audiences shrunk rapidly and the new market economy of Russia and the other republics has meant that the next generation of poets over there will probably be no more well distributed and read than their contemporaries here.

Jan Clausen, a poet and novelist who has long been involved with lesbian poetics and politics (until she married a man a couple of years ago, but that's another story), wrote an excellent pamphlet on this subject called A Movement of Poets: Thoughts on Poetry and Feminism (Brooklyn: Long Haul Press, 1982). She is generally very suspicious of the impact of each on the other. For example, writing of poetry's decline as a leading force for feminism once second-wave feminism created its own institutions, she notes:

"Ironically, I suspect that poetry as a genre has lost prestige within the women's movement for the same reason that fiction lacked it in nineteenth century patriarchal England--because it is perceived as something almost anyone can do. That is the hidden meaning of a code phrase like 'there's so much feminist poetry,' and it points to the hypocrisy of the general feminist rejection of critical standards; rather than apply them, we have sometimes simply stopped paying attention to poetry at all." (pp. 46-7)

If Clausen suggests the logical end result of the kind of reductivism that Lauter's comments exhibit, Petrovsky's variation of Teach the Conflicts seems equally problematic. I personally would prefer to have a new formalist who was both passionate and knowledgeable about that tendency to teach a lit course than a liberal who sees Sharon Olds and Bruce Andrews as points of equal interest on an undifferentiated plane. To have any value at all, the "teach the conflicts" approach requres the instructor to have (and argue) a theory of organization and history that positions every text and author.

Both Lauter and Petrovsky presume (reasonably enough for a Teaching of American Lit discussion group) a defining privilege for the classroom in determining the answer to the question. Needless to say, I have my doubts there.

So I keep coming up against the problem of the Margins of What. Walt Whitman self-published the first edition of Leaves of Grass. Much of Stein's work came out the same way. George Oppen's To Press, which Williams and Zukofsky hoped would be the vehicle to bring the objectivists to a larger audience, was just one more tiny press. As Charles Bernstein and others have pointed out (repeatedly, I must say), the problem of poetry's distribution to The Masses has changed very little in the past 200 years. What has changed, it seems to me, is the set of assumptions we making about what is central in public discourse, i.e., what is a center? Where is it and who defines it? Is Bill Moyers fawning over Donald Hall or Robert Bly an example of the potential success of poetry? Or quite the opposite?

What has changed, beyond the ongoing revolution in media (I'm old enough to remember the paperback as the exception, not the rule), has been an articulation of communities of writing. There may well be 300+ poets working in, or more or less directly from, what has been called Language Poetry. And publishing. Plus another 300 to 500 coming out of other variants of the New American tradition of 50s and 60s. And as Petrovsky notes in his comment of Gluck's attitude towards Olds, the establishmentarian tradition in American Lit is as well articulated. All of these discussions of the decenteredness or marginality of poetry seems to me to give very short shrift to very real communities, communities that are ultimately very different from the ones that Lauter imagines (precisely because they derive from lived experience of daily contact rather than application to some ideal of race, gender or nationality). Then the question of the marginality of any community would be one directly of its role within the larger society, poetry being the symptom more than the cause.

No?

As Lee Ann Brown,
the quintessential "NY School" poet of her generation might say,
"Happy New Year, y'all."

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

7. Marjorie Perloff

Re: discursive disruptions//whether poetry makes anything happen

Mon 2 Jan 1995

I just wanted to clarify one thing for Marina Januzzi. At that MLA session, I did not mean to imply that the choice of form does not have ideological implications, just that "disruption" of form is a complex matter that has to refer to more than breaking up a page--that is, there are breaks and breaks. I suppose I think each example has to be judged on its own merits--and, yes, the "metaphoric mode" may be just as "disruptive" depending. I actually thought Alan Golding's paper was terrific; it's just that all day I had been hearing someone or other say about whatever poems by women that they oppose patriarchy etc, by such things as typography and my sense is that there are often things said (not by Alan but by others) that could apply equally well to a very conventional male poet--say Ted Hughes--just as well so we have to be careful, that's all. Hope this clarifies... Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

8. Joseph Conte

Re: Domesday Dictionary

Tue 3 Jan 1995

There was an eleventh-century _Domesday Book_ that represents the record of a census of England taken by William I. It's a fairly important text for medieval studies, since it includes much of the surviving information on land division, land use, and economic resources of the time.

I'm not clear whether there's an etymological connection between Domesday and doomsday, but if I were being taxed by the King I might be inclined to confuse April 15 and the apocalypse.

I suppose Schwerner had both social registry and the nuclear apocalypse in mind.

Joseph Conte

↑ Index

9. Joseph Conte
Re: Armand Schwerner
Tue 3 Jan 1995

Brian:

I've just read your earlier query about the work of Armand Schwerner on the Poetics list. Although I very much enjoyed one of Schwerner's performances at the National Poetry Foundation conference in Orono two years ago, I haven't read enough of his work to comment personally.

But I've been editing a two-volume set on contemporary poets for the _Dictionary of Literary Biography_, and I "commissioned" an entry on Schwerner by a critic namer Arthur J. Sabatini. He sent me an excellent 5000 word essay, with a full critical bibliography, that includes discussion of the _Tablets_ and the oral-performance mode of Schwerner's work. I'm sure Sabatini would be happy to send you a copy of the essay at your request. His address:

Interdisciplinary Arts and Performance
Arizona State University West
4701 W. Thunderbird Road
P.O. Box 37100
Phoenix, AZ 85087-7100

E-mail: [redacted]

I'll let him know you're interested. Hope things are going well on your project. Did you go to the MLA this year? I passed on it.

Best regards,

Joseph Conte

*
| Joseph M Conte | "Where is the figure in the Department of English | carpet? Or is it just . . . SUNY at Buffalo |
carpet?" he asked. "Where is--" [redacted] | "You're talking a lot of

[redacted] | buffalo hump, you know that." | Donald Barthelme

_____*_____

↑ Index

10. Marisa A Januzzi motives for metaphor
Tue 3 Jan 1995

Hello everyone--

To Marjorie Perloff: thank you for the clarification; it's pretty much what I imagined you might say, and I'd guess we attended many of the same panels. In any case I understood the spirit of the question. And by the way, Compliments, Alan Golding, if you're out there, on your Susan Howe piece. Will you be publishing it?

Chris Stroffolino raises the interesting issue of the weird devaluation of metaphor in contemporary theory if not poetry. I remember having a pretty harsh discussion with someone who was trying to get me to admit that metonymy was preferable, ethically, to metaphor, which seemed authoritarian as a mode of discourse... but what ever happened to the surrealist potential for metaphor (the chance encounter described by Lautreamont)?

Also, can anyone recommend readings on this huge subject of the political content of poetic form? (i.e. best-case formulations of the question)? I throw it open like this because I'm curious if there are particular texts which you-- any of you-- mentally stand by when these questions come up.

Yours in the midst of sleepy weather,
--Marisa Januzzi

↑ Index

11. krickjh
Armand Schwerner Live
Tue 3 Jan 1995

Speaking of the "oral performance mode" does anyone know of any tapes of Schwerner reading from "The Tablets?"

And another thing: Do "The Tablets" stop at 15? That's the edition I have and I'm just wondering if there's more.

John Krick

↑ Index

12. Mark Wallace
America: A Prayer
Tue 3 Jan 1995

AMERICA: A PRAYER

The Honorable Newt Gingrich has informed us that prayer in the public schools is one of the most important issues facing this great nation, and in our firm belief that America doesn't have a prayer, we call upon The Poets of America to accept their intellectual responsibility to give America a prayer. Opportunity is crucial in a capitalist society. We feel therefore that this, the 104th Congress, should have the opportunity to authorize the production of the appropriate American prayer from amongst the deeply felt works of America's finest, most challenging, and dedicated writers.

America's prayer is meant to be read by everybody, but don't let that stop you. Your prayers should be 500 words or less. Please send two copies of your prayer, one marked "Proposal for Prayer for the Schools" to The Honorable Newt Gingrich, House of Representatives, 2428 Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20515. Send your other copy with self-addressed stamped envelope to Aerial/Edge at the address below. No strictures on style or content. Writers may or may not wish to imagine delivery of their prayer in a classroom context. You do not have to be a U.S. citizen to participate. Also interested in visual materials. A selection of the prayers will be published in The New Censorship (Denver). Other editors interested in this project should contact us. Please pass this opportunity on to as many people as possible.

Deadline: Feb 28, 1995.

Rod Smith Lee Ann Brown Mark Wallace

AERIAL/EDGE P.O. Box 25642 Washington, D.C. 20007

↑ Index

13. Mark Wallace
Situation #8
Tue 3 Jan 1995

Situation #8 features work by Stephen-Paul Martin, Connie Deanovich, Joshua McKinney, Dan Raphael, and others.

Cost is $2 for a single issue and $8 for four issues.

Please send subscriptions or submissions to:

Mark Wallace
Situation

10402 Ewell Ave.
Kensington, MD 20895

↑ Index

14. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: Poetry on the Margins of What?
Tue 3 Jan 1995

Ron,

Since i don't have your address, i have to post this query here. How wld you feel about me cross-posting your response back to the t-amlit list? It strikes me that transgressing these cyberboundaries could be productive. On the other hand, i wldn't want to start any flame wars. What do you think?

steve shoemaker

↑ Index

15. bmch
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Tue 3 Jan 1995

Some Schwerner dope: Station Hill Press brought out Tablets I-XXIV in 1983, in a volume together with a collection of shorter poems called "sounds of the river Naranjana."Then Altas Press, London, brought out in '89 I-XXIV plus new XXV and XXVI -- the latter, much longer than any of the earlier ones, is par- ticularly astonishing. XXVI is the last I've been able to locate; until I've checked with Schwerner himself, I'm assuming it's the last -- unless someone out there knows otherwise?

I've come across catalogue entries for recordings of Schwerner reading from the Tablets, but haven't had a chance to listen to any yet. I'm curious to know how he handles the visual dimension of the Tablets in performing them ... I think of them as really eye-oriented, page-bound texts, but perhaps that's a mistake...

Brian

↑ Index

16. Pierre Joris
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Tue 3 Jan 1995

Brian, you write:

> I've come across catalogue entries for recordings of Schwerner reading from th Tablets, but haven't had a chance to listen to any yet. I'm curious to know how he handles the visual dimension of the Tablets in performing them ... I think of them as really eye-oriented, page-bound texts, but perhaps that's a mistake...

indeed, that is a mistake, Schwerner is an absolutely first rate performer of the TABLETS -- they are among the wild-humourist poems it has ever been my pleasure to hear. Schwerner realizes the visual elements orally as interferences by the scholar-translator into the lyrical process of the poems & it is exactly in the oral realization of that tension, in the juxtaposition of those different levels of discourse, that one can get to the polysemic core of the work. Go & listen, you've got a major treat coming!

Pierre

========== Pierre Joris | He who wants to escape the world, translates it. Dept. of English | --Henri Michaux SUNY Albany | Albany NY 12222 | "Herman has taken to writing poetry. You tel&fax:[redacted] | need not tell anyone, for you know how email: | such things get around." [redacted]| --Mrs. Melville in a letter to her mother. ==========

↑ Index

17. George Bowering

Re: America: A Prayer

Wed 4 Jan 1995

Here's what a lot of people pray:

May the USA disappear and allow America an opportunity to survive.

↑ Index

18. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: Armand Schwerner Live

Wed 4 Jan 1995

I'm currently looking at eight pages which are collectively presented as "from Tablet XXXVI," by Armand Schwerener, which were the latest addition to the journal NORTH AMERICAN IDEOPHONICS ANNUAL, a by-invitation assembling journal or series edited by Mark Nowak. The address is 908 Franklin Terrace, 3rd floor, Minneapolis, MN 55406, USA, or by e-mail, [redacted]

Since this journal was assembled only on Dec. 17, 1994, I assume that this is work is new and may be an addition to the Tablet XXVI published in London, and that it probably brings the work pretty much up to date, although I would, as others have, suggest going to Armand Schwerner to verify that.

charles alexander

↑ Index

19. Mn Center For Book Arts

Re: Armand Schwerner Live

Wed 4 Jan 1995

Just to update my last post here, as I hadn't read my Schwerner pages for NORTH AMERICAN IDEOPHONICS ANNUAL yet, and they were given to me after the rest of the annual was assembled, an act with which I assisted. No, these are not eight pages, rather four copies of two pages. Some astonishing writing, nonetheless.

charles alexander

↑ Index

20. Tom Mandel

Re: Armand Schwerner Live

Wed 4 Jan 1995

How would one find the Altas Press (London) volume of Armand's Tablets? Any ideas???

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

21. Alan Golding

Re: Armand Schwerner Live

Wed 4 Jan 1995

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Tom--

One would have a hard time, since it's actually the Atlas Press--there was a typo in the original posting of that information. Anyway, The Tablets is distributed by SPD, along with a couple other of Armand's books. If for some reason that doesn't work, the press' London address is 10 Park Street, London SE1 9AB, England--but that's five years old.

General inquiry: Does anyone have an e-address for Cole Swensen? I need to get in touch with her.

Alan Golding

↑ Index

22. Mark Scroggins
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Wed 4 Jan 1995

On Wed, 4 Jan 1995, Tom Mandel wrote:

> How would one find the Altas Press (London) volume of Armand's Tablets?
> Any ideas???
>
> Tom Mandel
>
Got mine in a second-hand bookstore; others might try Atlas Press, 10 Park st, The Borough, London SE1 9AB, UK.

Hi Tom.

Mark Scrogging

↑ Index

23. Mark Scroggins
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Wed 4 Jan 1995

Tom--
Alan's post reminds me to check a more recent Atlas Book, which has BCM Atlas Press, London WC1N 3XX, UK. Maybe that'll work.
Mark

↑ Index

24. Pierre Joris
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Wed 4 Jan 1995

Tom asked:
>
> How would one find the Altas Press (London) volume of Armand's Tablets?
> Any ideas???

I don't know who -- if anyone -- distributes it in this country, but you could write directly to:

Aleister Botchie
Atlas Press
5 Ormond Mansions, flat 100A
Southampton Row
London WCI
GB

An excellent press, btw, with a range of interesting surrealist & post-surrealist titles.

Happy semi-new year,

Pierre

==========
========== Pierre Joris | He who wants to escape the world, translates it. Dept. of English | --Henri Michaux SUNY Albany | Albany NY 12222 | "Herman has taken to writing poetry. You tel&fax:[redacted] | need not tell anyone, for you know how email: | such things get around." [redacted]| --Mrs. Melville in a letter to her mother.
==========
==========

↑ Index

25. bmch
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Wed 4 Jan 1995

Just had a look & sure enough SPD carries Atlas Press books, & there's Tablets I-XXVI listed among them. Doesn't appear that the Station Hill Press edition is still in print, but the Tablets part of that would be superseded by the Atlas edition anyway.

Alan Golding's note now makes me wish I'd gone to MLA & heard Schwerner rather than stay home to try & write about him! Choices....

Brian

↑ Index

26. The Evil Xmas Devil Monster
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Wed 4 Jan 1995

BTW, don't forget that the Living Theater in New York put on a production of The Tablets five or six or seven years ago. I was priveleged to have attended one of the performances, & was brilliantly acted & scored. It took place at their place on E. 3rd St, one of the first productions at that space. Unfortunately, they lost the space after a couple of years.

Regards,

Marc Nasdor
[redacted]

↑ Index

27. Ron Silliman
Reading?
Thu 5 Jan 1995

Hello folks,

I'm wondering if it's too late to come up with a couple of readings/talks in the mid-Atlantic states at the end of May or even the very first few days of June? I've been asked by Alec Marsh to give a paper at the ALA in Baltimore (May 26-28) and would love to be able to say yes. But I need to come up w/ travel money to make it possible, since these scholarly meetings are run with the presumption that everyone who will attend comes with departmental funding (a 19th century concept of scholarship that should have died out in the 1930s with the rise of the public intellectual).

I need to let Alec know by January 13, so let me know if you're sitting on unspent departmental reading $$.

Ron Silliman
[redacted]
or [redacted]

↑ Index

28. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Armand Schwerner Live
Thu 5 Jan 1995

On Wed, 4 Jan 1995, The Evil Xmas Devil Monster wrote:

> BTW, don't forget that the Living Theater in New York put on a production of The Tablets five or six or seven years ago. I was priveleged to have attended one of the performances, & was brilliantly acted & scored. It took place at their place on E. 3rd St, one of the first productions at that space. Unfortunately, they lost the space after a couple of years.
>
> Regards,

> Marc Nasdor
> [redacted]

how strange to contemplate. I remember being in junior high school in the early sixties and going to see Jack Gelber's dope play The Connection at The Living Theatre (and feeling very hip); then all the terrifically weird stuff in the early seventies which I only heard about didn't see; and then The Tablets??? I guess I'd like to see a split stage, simultaneous staging of The Connection and The Tablets (a la Ashbery's "As We Know"?). Not really now; just a Theatrical Mind Boggler Koan.... happy new year all Tenney

↑ Index

29. James Sherry
Re: America: A Prayer
Thu 5 Jan 1995

As I said before, my prayer sent to NEWT and to YOUT is "Up yours, teach." As always, James

↑ Index

30. RSILLIMA
Congressional vote on NEH--forw
Thu 5 Jan 1995

I'm sending this to the Poetics Discussion List but am not sure it will get posted since I'm at work and am not currently subscribed from there. Charles, can you double check?

The message below comes from Bob Perelman. It sounds as if Newt et al plan to defund some or all of NEH, NEA, etc., asap and do so w/out any public discussion thereof. Time to act!

Ron Silliman

Ron,

See if this gets to you.
I'll also be e-ing on other matters.

Bob

According to Daniel Traister:
> From owner-english-faculty Thu Jan 5 17:24:20 1995
> From: [redacted] (Daniel Traister)
> Posted-Date: Thu, 5 Jan 1995 12:24:42 -0500

> Message-Id: <[redacted]>
> Subject: Congressional vote on NEH--forwarded from Frank Whigham (Texas), FYI and wide distribution > To: [redacted] (English Department Faculty), > [redacted] (English Graduate Students)
> Date: Thu, 5 Jan 1995 12:24:42 -0500 (EST)
> X-Mailer: ELM [version 2.4 PL23-upenn2.9]
> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Content-Type: text/plain; charset=US-ASCII
> Content-Transfer-Encoding: 7bit
> Content-Length: 2738
> Sender: [redacted]
> Precedence: bulk
>
> From: Frank Whigham <[redacted]>
> Subject: Congressional vote on the NEH
>
> Dear colleagues:
>
> I have just received (9:30 am, 1/5) the following news from my > colleague Terry Kelley.
> ==========
> Date: Thu, 5 Jan 1995 09:19:58 -0600 (CST)
> From: "theresa m. kelley" <[redacted]>
> Subject: NEH /NEA/PBS funding > To: Frank Whigham <[redacted]>
>
> Here is the news re Republican efforts to kill all funding for these > agencies by a simple majority vote on the Senate floor -- without going > through a hearing process.
>
> My source for this information is Carl Woodring, who received a call
with > this news from Tom O'Brien, in the Grants office of NEH. He called > Gingrich's office to find out what the hearing schedule would be and > learned this news. O'Brien is less concerned wth House deliberations, > where he believes it will be possible to work out an agreement for > funding, though probably reduced, than he is with the Senate, where > funding could disappear without anything more than a floor vote.

>
> If only for the record and possible future funding, I urge all to write > appropriate senators to protest this plan to kill this funding without a > hearing.
>
>
> Please distribute this news as widely as possible.
>
>
> Theresa M. Kelley > Associate Professor > University of Texas, Austin
> ==========
>
> Obviously we must all be extremely concerned at this news. It is > crucial that we make our collective voice heard in support of the institu> tions which contribute so much to our disciplines. (This matter will bring > us as close to unanimity as we'll ever get.) We in the academy have done > badly at making our case to those in authority, especially in recent > years. There has been much failure of the will. We need to write, not only > to protest the funding cuts (though cuts will surely be made), but to > protest the absence of open discussion on this crucial matter. This is a > procedural scandal, and might well be pre-emptive for much that we care > about, for years to come.
>
> If anyone who receives this mailing has a list of congressional > e-mail addresses, it would be very useful to distribute it for the rest of > us. We need to begin to be much more vocal with the new administration.
> (I'm sure that many would welcome all federal and state addresses as well;
> I would.)
>
> In addition to Kay Bailey Hutchinson's address above

[relevant > to residents of Texas ONLY], I can contribute [redacted] > (specify Newt Gingrich at the beginning of the message).
>
> Please distribute this message.
> ==========
> Frank Whigham
> Department of English, Parlin 108
> University of Texas at Austin
> Austin TX 78712-1164
> [redacted]
> [redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

31. Loss Glazier

New Electronic Poetry Center Features

Thu 5 Jan 1995

```
    ____    ____   ____
   /   /   /   / /   /
   EEEE   PPPPP  CCCCC
   EE /   PP PP  CC  C/
   EEE    PPPPP  CC   /        URL=gopher://writing.upenn.edu/hh/
  __EE  /_ PP |__ CC  C ____
 /  EEEE/  PP/    CCCCC/    /    internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift
/___________________________/
|-------------------------|
| Electronic Poetry Center |
|_________________________|
```

We are pleased to announce two new EPC features:

(Gopher and Web versions) A "search" feature has been designed to probe through the Poetics backfiles for you. You may now search the entire corpus by keyword. (The results screen will list documents containing your keyword. You then may open documents individually and search for the occurrence of the keyword. In most systems this would be /keyword, where "keyword" is your search term.) Now you can pinpoint that elusive phrase...

(Web version only) A "hotlist" has been added to most "major" levels of the web version. This means that from any point in the Web you can select "hotlist" and move with great facility to numerous key spots in the EPC web. This feature will pretty much place you within two keystrokes of most menus, making the EPC web much more quickly navigated.

↑ Index

32. Patrick Phillips
Re: Congressional vote on NEH--forw
Fri 6 Jan 1995

For what it's worth:

Article in NT Times, Jan 6 gives e-mail addresses for -

"Thomas" - as in Jefferson - a new place to read the full text of any bill introduced in Congress, new issues of the Congressional Record - seachable by keyword. For this service you must have an HTML Browser capable of viewing the Web's hypertext format:

http://thomas.loc.gov

Isn't it good to know we are on a first-name basis with Jeffersonian democracy!

For those who would brave the malestrom and contact Newt directly (more of a Hamiltonian "democrat"):

[redacted]

For any other congressional e-mail address one may gopher to:

gopher://una.hh.lib.umich.edu/0/sosci/poliscilaw/uslegi/conemail

I offer this list with a clear conscience, but with the understanding that I in a small way am participating in a communication scheme that is surely a marginal, elite display of virtual-class revisionism.

↑ Index

33. Tim Waples
subscribing to Poetics list
Fri 6 Jan 1995

Dear Moderator,

I learned of the Poetics list from a reference to it on the T-Amlit list, and would like very much to subscribe. Could you please either send me the appropriate address to subscribe, or add me to the list? Thank you very much for your assistance.

Sincerely,

Tim Waples
English Dept., U. of Pennsylvania
[redacted]

↑ Index

34. krickjh
Senate vote
Fri 6 Jan 1995

Dear Poetry List,

In response to Ron's posting abt the upcoming Senate floor vote, I sent a query to Jim Warren. Warren runs a mailing list called GovAccess. If he has a list of all Congressional e-mail addresses, or an address where such a list can be obtained, I'll post it.

Warren's mailing list is pretty interesting. It's not published often so if your e-mailbox is already full every morning, this won't add much. Here is the subscription info:

To join the GovAccess list, email a request to [redacted] .

John Krick

↑ Index

35. notlep
subscribing
Fri 6 Jan 1995

I would like to subscribe to the poetics list. I saw a posting from this list cross-posted to another list I'm on, Teaching American Literature (T-AMLIT). I'm not sure of the proper procedure for subscribing, so I hope I'm not getting in the way by using the wrong method. Thanks and, if needed, apologies.

Ted Pelton
Lakeland College

↑ Index

36. Marshall H. Reese
Arts Alliance Campaign to Save Arts Funding
Sat 7 Jan 1995

Item 625 06-JAN-95 17:25 American Arts Alliance
1-900 Emergency Number in Place

January 6, 1995

Dear Arts Advocates:

As you know, since the November elections the future of our national cultural agencies, including the National Endowment for the Arts, the National Endowment for the Humanities and the Institute for Museum Services, is seriously threatened. These agencies are facing severe cuts to their current funding or possible elimination. Arts advocates across the country must act NOW if these agencies are to be saved.

The Emergency Committee to Save Culture and the Arts, a project of the American Arts Alliance, has set up a 1-900 number (it is already working!) so that arts groups, artists, volunteers, arts patrons, audience members, contributors, local businesses, vendors and suppliers can quickly and easily register their support for continued funding for the arts and culture with their members of Congress, for a nominal fee. Time is short. You are invited to use this number immediately.

When you can call this number, [redacted], the following will happen:

1.) The caller will be handled by a live operator. Following a brief statement that the call costs $1.99 per minute and that you must be 18 or over, the operator then asks the caller if he/she would allow the Emergency Committee to send a mailgram in the caller's name to their two Senators and one Representative.

2.) If the caller says yes, the above process takes place and is billed to the caller's home phone. The caller leaves his/her name, address, and zip code which is then matched with the corresponding congressional district to assure that the correct elected officials receive the mailgram.

The Alliance has put together a steering committee currently made up of more than a dozen organizations to participate in message development and the disbursement of any funds that are collected over and beyond the costs for set up and maintenance of the number. You are invited to join this steering committee. There is no cost for this participation.

In order for this emergency campaign to be effective, we need your help to widely distribute the 1-900 number. Distribution of the number can be accomplished through the use of flyers, word of mouth, printing it in all local newspapers and membership organization's newsletters, radio announcements, posters, and on local computer Bulletin Board Services. (The first flyers are now available. Please call for a copy). Curtain speeches educating audiences about the crisis and drawing attention to ways to respond, are extremely effective and we urge you to undertake these and other activities. The success of the emergency campaign depends on this effort.

The future of arts and cultural funding in this country is being determined by members of Congress NOW. More than ever, the voices of arts supporters must be heard.

Thank you for participating in this critical grassroots effort. Please call the American Arts Alliance at [redacted] if you would like to join the steering committee or have any questions.

THIS POSTING IS FROM ARTSWIRE.

↑ Index

37. Charles Bernstein
Re: subscribing to Poetics list
Sat 7 Jan 1995

Welcome to the Poetics List.

Please note that this is a private list and information about the list should not be posted to other lists or directories. The idea is to keep the list to those with specific rather than general interests, and also to keep the scale of the list small and the volume managable. Word-of-mouth (and its electronic equivalents) seems to be working fine: please feel free to invite people you know to sign-up.

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to

[redacted]

body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

(The shorter bitnet address is [redacted]. All further references to "Listserve" are to this listserve.)

message, with no subject line, to the listserv address:

{or}

I will be sent a notice of all subscription activity.

ARCHIVES

There are two ways to get archives, the second (see end of message) may be easier.

Anyone interested in an archive of all postings after March may send this message to "Listserve":

index poetics

or

index poetics f=mail

You will receive a list of archived files in a format that includes something like this:

* rec last - change * filename filetype GET PUT -fm lrecl nrecs date time

POETICS LOG9403 ALL OWN V 80 1012 94/05/31 07:17:17
Started on Mon,
7 Mar 1994 12:51:12 -0600
POETICS LOG9404 ALL OWN V 83 1864 94/05/31 07:18:54
Started on Sat,
2 Apr 1994 16:01:07 -050
POETICS NOTEBOOK ALL OWN V 640 1693 94/06/09 15:27:09
Started on Sun,
1 May 1994 09:47:10 -0500

You can then send the "get" command to "Listserve" in the format:

get filename filetype (eg: get poetics log9403
get poetics log9403
get poetics notebook)

or

get filename filetype f=mail

depending on which log file you want (you can also get multiple files with one message). Note that each of the files has a different beginning and end date, eg LOG9404 starts 7 March and goes to 31 May and that dates overlap. Go figure! "Poetics Notebook" is an anomalous name for what is, in effect, another log file.

****

Send an e-mail message to [redacted]. Leave the "Subject" line of the e-mail message blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

subscribe e-poetry Firstname Lastname

where Firstname and Lastname correspond to your name.

You will receive a confirmation of your subscription soon thereafter. (Nonsubscribers can automatically sub to Poetics using this same format, but substituting "poetics" for "e- poetry".)

**

Date: Sun, 10 Jul 1994 19:14:05 -0400

From: Loss Glazier <[redacted]>
Subject: Announcement: Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo)
To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
<[redacted]>

The Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo) 7-10-94

_____Announcement_____

THE ELECTRONIC POETRY CENTER (BUFFALO). The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center will provide access to numerous electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the Poetics List archives, a library of poetic texts, news of related print sources, and direct connections to numerous related poetic projects.

The Center's first phase of implementation is scheduled for August 1, 1994. A subscription to the E-Poetry list provides a subscription to the electronic journal RIF/T and E-Poetry Center announcements. Subscriptions to E-Poetry to [redacted] Inquiries, suggestions for Center resources, submissions to RIF/T, and other mail may be directed to [redacted] The Center is located at gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/library/e- journals/ub/rift (Presently, the prototype is under construction but operational.)

Gopher Access:
For those who have access to gopher, type
gopher writing.upenn.edu
(or, if you are on a UB mainframe, simply type wings)
at your system prompt. First choose Libraries &
Library Resources, then Electronic Journals, then E-
Journals/Resources Produced Here At UB, then The

Electronic Poetry Center. (Note: Connections to some Poetry Center resources require Web access, though most
are presently available through gopher).

World-Wide Web Access:
For those with World-Wide Web or lynx access, type www or lynx at your system prompt. Choose the go to URL option then go to (type as one continuous string) gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/
library/e-journals/ub/rift

___Participation in the Electronic Poetry Center (Buffalo)___

For those interested in helping us build the Center, our goal is to provide a single Internet site that offers a doorway into the different poetic projects out there in the electronic (and paper) poetics world. We would like to offer access to information about poetics and poetry activities, electronic poetry journals, texts in progress, etc. We are currently developing a library of electronic poetry/poetics texts (submissions to [redacted]. buffalo.edu). The Center has other exciting possibilities:

1. Circulation of electronic journals with an emphasis on direct links to those of relevance to Center concerns;
2. Reviews of recent print and electronic publications. (Brief reviews may also be submitted electronically to [redacted]);
3. Direct links to other related electronic sites;
4. Multimedia resources. Sound and graphics relating to poetry.
5. Building our Small Press Alcove, a place for little magazine and book announcements. The point of including announcements of paper resources is to provide a listing of interesting work for people to look at; they can then write or e-mail the publisher to obtain publications.

(Send announcements to [redacted] or magazines/books to Loss Glazier, E-Poetry, P.O. Box 143, Getzville, NY 14068-0143);

6. Ultimately, the Center could also offer collaborative projects (perhaps for specific groups of writers), lists and/or archives of other lists, and texts-in-progress, as things develop.

The "Buffalo" in the title of the Center is not meant to suggest that this activity is limited to Buffalo, only to give the "visitor" a sense of place, i.e., where the mainframe that's providing this service is "located." Vigorous writing wants to "circulate." On this new electronic terrain, the Electronic Poetry Center will serve as a gathering place or point of entry for a range of poetic efforts.

How to Contact Us

Please contact us with your suggestions, texts, sound files, and graphics files to submit, or if you have expertise in these areas. LET US KNOW WHAT YOU THINK (this is meant to be a Center that grows with your ideas) by posting to this list, sending mail to E-Poetry, or to Loss Glazier ([redacted]) or Kenneth Sherwood (v001pxfu.ubvms.cc. buffalo.edu) privately.

The Archive is administered in Buffalo by E-Poetry and RIF/T in coordination with the Poetics List.

Loss Pequen~o Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood and Loss Glazier
in collaboration with Charles Bernstein
*****

Please contact me if you have any questions.

Charles Bernstein

↑ Index

38. Press Listings
Leslie Scalapino's DEFOE
Sun 8 Jan 1995

--Boundary (ID QzhTPcoSFEchzwbr98ykcw)--

↑ Index

39. Press Listings
Leslie Scalapino's DEFOE (2d try!)
Sun 8 Jan 1995

New from Sun & Moon Press (6026 Wilshire Boulevard, Los Angeles, CA 90036) distributed by Small Press Distribution, Consortium, and at select bookstores

DEFOE, by Leslie Scalapino,

Classics 46, 365 pages, $12.95; ISBN # 1-55713-163-5

DEFOE, Leslie Scalapino's new fiction, is an epic where images of battle become meditations, an epic wherein events flap in silence as the narrative moves toward a place where the reader and text become one. The images of this fiction don't resemble events, but are new occurences in time and space. In Part I, Waking Life, the heroine, in love with James Dean, discovers herself in a desert pocked with fires in which the "henna man"- a drug dealer- is being carried in a white cocoon. And throughout Scalapino's work the reader is taken into a world where the written word creates " an event retrieved from so far back that it is separated from its memory." While not resembling reality/history, the fictionalizing induces the simplest movement possible in its whole expanded, unique structure, to change real past and present.

↑ Index

40. O Books c/o

New O Books

Sun 8 Jan 1995

New O Books

O Books, 5729 Clover Drive, Oakland, CA 94618; & Small Press Distribution, 1814 San Pablo Ave. Berkeley, CA 94702. E-mail inquiries c/o [redacted]

Memory Play, Carla Harryman, 72 pages, $8.50. ISBN # 1-882022-22-x. In Memory Play, one is neither fixed in a memory nor is one in the (non-reactive) politicized moment of the present without memory. The child-non-innocent Pelican, Child, Reptile, and Fish, of Carla Harryman's play are lucid Alices (in Wonderland) observing history which as if backwards is creating phenomena. Harryman's play creates a state that is non/innocent in that it is our real present in our really being innocent, rather than an idea of such in a myth state of 'Garden of Eden.' Steve Benson says: "Suppose you had a dream life and woke up not a person interested in telling as a story what you could recall of it as it coudl be translated and tricked into the words and images of a narrative that made sense by referring to the things of this world as your interlocutor knows them as well as you do but woke rather or also as a polyvocal projection of theater articulating time and personality and politics in idiosyncratic motion and congruence much as clouds and birds in flight make sense to that visionary in you.....

Collision Center, Randall Potts, 72 pages. $9.00. ISBN # 1-882022-19-X. This is a first book by a young poet creating multiple narratives in a collision of lyrical and hard tones, isolating words and tones in order to allow their actuality, effectively to allow them to occur. Ann Lauterbach comments: "In Randall Potts' poems, nature and language collide, and then proceed, each having been transformed by the other. ... We witness the newly manifest being carried away on the stark clarities of his lines, "watchlessly dis-figuring / what remains to be seen." There is gratitude and there is terror: here they embrace.

MOB, Abigail Child, 96 pages. $9.50. ISBN # 1-882022-21-1. Child's writing scrutinizes the factor of need, our "making need / the figure they want," as the mind's need as contemplation of lust touching a civilization. Bruce Andrews comments about MOB: "Only the impossible is intimate enough." She creates a form that isn't landscape yet is a visible reverberation, "the sky is drunk with ... The center in front of the future," realistic and filmic in that the non-landscape is "frames (which) hit the screen/dependent on the intent", thus subject and object of their own scrutiny and direction which is motivation. Kevin Killian comments: "her new book is a fiery J'Accuse against a war-fueled heterosexist Uberhaus that flaunts "the privilege of a window ignoring its cost." She has always been a provocative poet and thinker, but now she writes her twin obsessions into transparence. Between the words vast flamethrowers aimed by angels singe and give off steam."

GROUND AIR, Scott Bentley, xerox 59 pages, $6.00. ISBN # 1-882022-23-8. A first book by a young poet about whose work Jennifer Moxley comments: "As for AIR, so what if we continue to build our loves on the banks of sorrowful Ilion, stolen kisses and all that. At least Scott, like Dido, knows there's more to life than duty. After all, those paleolithic bison were so real you could've hunted them and this language is so true that it runs a body amuck. In both we find the inherent vulgarity of the natural, where every key or brush stroke makes desire's ineffable history more seductive." Kit Robinson says: "Then, having established this deceptively enveloping GROUND, Bentley takes off into AIR, constructing intimate spaces where 'Everything's / tender and sudden.'"

↑ Index

41. Chris Stroffolino
Re: motives for metaphor
Sun 8 Jan 1995

Marisa (Januzzi)- I wasn't going to reply because I too feel "at a loss" when it comes to "recommended readings" on the huge subject of political content of poetic form. It's not because of a dearth of material but because of a plenitude. It's so prevalent an issue in most of what I read to have run the risk of becoming a BLASE issue. At least IN THEORY. Yet theory is only as "good" as its praxis, its enactment. So I work by a case-by-case basis here in quoting this just because I happen to be reading it at the time (not that I mean to irresponsibly claim it's a mere arbitrary issue of 'taste'): In Carla Harryman's VICE, page 28, and 29, she writes: "and he went over to talk to his linguist friend, George Lakoff, about the sense of finality evoked by the word LAND when what he was really looking for was more like some forward moving limbo. George, however, counseled him against zombielike, trancelike conditions. If LAND ended the matter, then move out of the house. The boy looked at George, "You're thinking in metaphors and I thought you tore them apart." George told him that he was human just like everybody else." I read Lakeoff's METAPHORS WE LIVE BY over ten years ago, and my memory is extremely vague of it. IS HE TAKEN SERIOUSLY by any of you, or is his mode of thinking facile and discredited? Just curious. Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

42. Patrick Phillips

Congressional E-mail addresses

Mon 9 Jan 1995

The following list of House/Senate E-Mail addresses can be found at:

gopher://una.hh.lib.umich.edu/11/socsci/poliscilaw/uslegi and was retrieved on 1-9-95. There were very few Senate addresses available, but there is more senate information available at the same gopher site.

CONGRESSIONAL E-MAIL ADDRESSES
104th Congress
1995/96

United States Senate

ST	Name	E-Mail Address
ID	Craig, Larry	[redacted].
IL	Simon, Paul	[redacted]
MA	Kennedy, Ted	[redacted]
	(www home page: http//www.ai.mit.edu/projects/iiip/ Kennedy/homepage.html)
NM	Bingaman, Jeff	[redacted]
VA	Robb, Charles	[redacted]
VT	Leahy, Patrick	[redacted]
VT	Jeffords, Jim	[redacted]

United States House of Representatives

http://www.house.gov
http://thomas.loc.gov

ST	DS	Name	E-Mail Address
AR	4	Dickey, Jay	[redacted]
AZ	2	Pastor, Ed	[redacted]

CA 7 Miller, George [redacted]
CA 12 Lantos, Tom [redacted]
CA 13 Stark, Pete [redacted]
CA 14 Eshoo, Anna [redacted]

CO 2 Skaggs, David [redacted]

CT 2 Gejdenson, Sam [redacted]
CT 4 Shays, Christopher [redacted]

FL 6 Stearns, Cliff [redacted]
FL 12 Canady, Charles [redacted]
FL 20 Deutsch, Peter [redacted]

GA 6 Gingrich, Newton [redacted]

IL 14 Hastert, Dennis [redacted]

KA 1 Roberts, Pat [redacted]

MI 3 Ehlers, Vernon [redacted]
MI 4 Camp, Dave [redacted]
MI 14 Conyers, John [redacted]

MN 3 Ramstad, Jim [redacted]

NC 7 Rose, Charlie [redacted]
NC 11 Taylor, Charles [redacted]
NC 12 Watt, Mel [redacted]

ND Pomeroy, Earl [redacted]

NJ 12 Zimmer, Dick [redacted]

NY 7 Manton, Thomas [redacted]
NY 23 Boehlert, Sherwood [redacted]
NY 27 Paxon, Bill [redacted]

OH 2 Hoke, Martin [redacted]

OK 5 Istook, Jr. Ernest [redacted]

OR 1 Furse, Elizabeth [redacted]
OR 4 DeFazio, Pete [redacted]

PA 16 Walker, Robert [redacted]

TX 3 Johnson, Sam [redacted]
TX 6 Barton, Joe [redacted]

VA 6 Goodlatte, Bob [redacted]
VA 9 Boucher, Rick [redacted]

VT Sanders, Bernie [redacted]

U.S. House of Representatives Committees

Education and Labor Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations
[redacted]

Natural Resources
[redacted]

Science, Space, and Technology
[redacted]

The above information was compiled from the Senate and House Gophers.

Corrections/additions to [redacted]
1-3-95

↑ Index

43. krickjh
Congress
Mon 9 Jan 1995

Here is the reply from Jim Warren, proprietor of the GovAccess list:

> Last year's list is archived at cpsr.org . I have asked > [redacted] for a current copy, but have not > yet received a > reply. Ask 'em, too! :-)
>
> Also, you might check the new web server reputedly at:
> http://thomas.loc.gov , the "Thomas Jefferson" site at the > Library of Congress.

I GUESS cpsr.org is an FTP site. I'm going to look into both of these and I'll tell ya what I find!

John Krick

↑ Index

44. Tom Mandel
Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
Mon 9 Jan 1995

You mention Web features, but there's no http url listed.

tom mandel

↑ Index

45. Tom Mandel
Re: motives for metaphor
Mon 9 Jan 1995

George Lakoff's work is certainly taken seriously and is well worth attending to. Although METAPHORS WE LIVE BY is still a worthwhile place to start, GL has two other books which should not be missed:

Women, Fire, & Dangerous Things (University of Chicago Press) and More Than Cool Reason (can't put my hand on my copy in mess at hand, so no pub. listed, but I think it is also u of c press)

More... is co-authored by Mark Turner, whose READING MINDS (Princeton U Press) is also well worth reading. Think of the dep't of english as a part of cognitive studies.

Good luck. I might mention that the study of theory in regard of its core subject matters of mathematics, physics, etc. (and of philosophy of science) is a more rewarding activity, in my experience at least, than time spent with the "theory" movement in american academic writing. In '92 I spent a while reading thru this latter corpus of mat'ls, reading something by everybody in the big Literary Theory compilation (pub. - again! u of c?) and a dozen or so other books (not scrupulously read, but tried). This reading project resulted in a trimester of extreme depression, and I do not recommend it to anyone.

tom Mandel

↑ Index

46. Loss Glazier
Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
Mon 9 Jan 1995

> You mention Web features, but there's no http url listed.

Tom,

> World-Wide Web and Mosaic Access:
> For those with World-Wide Web (lynx) or Mosaic access,
> from your interface, choose the go to URL
> option then go to (type as one continuous string)
> gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/
> library/e-journals/ub/rift

Perhaps I should be clearer in this "flyer" I regularly send out but the url you would enter would start with "gopher" in the expression above. Try it; it works! In fact the web version has begun to evolve as much more useful. (Why the dichotomy in terms, I don't know but apparently you don't have to have an http to have web access.) If any snags, please feel free to let me know, on or off the list. For those with a graphical interface, there are increasingly more graphics, etc., as in decorating the home.

↑ Index

47. O Books c/o

O Books List

Tue 10 Jan 1995

O Books List:
O Books: fax: [redacted]. 5729 Clover Drive, Oakland, CA 94618.
Small Press Distribution: 1814 San Pablo Ave. Berkeley, CA 94702.

RETURN OF THE WORLD, Todd Baron, $6.50
GROUND AIR, Scott Bentley, $6.00
A CERTAIN SLANT OF SUNLIGHT, Ted Berrigan, $9.00 TALKING IN TRANQUILITY: INTERVIEWS WITH TED BERRIGAN, Avenue B and O Books, $10.50
MOB, Abigail Child, $9.50
IT THEN, Danielle Collobert, $9.00
CANDOR, Alan Davies, $9.00
TURN LEFT IN ORDER TO GO RIGHT, Norman Fischer, $9.00
PRECISELY THE POINT BEING MADE, Norman Fischer, $10.00
TIME RATIONS, Benjamin Friedlander, $7.50
BYT, William Fuller, $7.50
THE SUGAR BORDERS, William Fuller, $9.00
PHANTOM ANTHEMS, Robert Grenier, $6.50
WHAT I BELIEVE TRANSPIRATION/TRANSPIRING MINNESOTA, Robert Grenier, $24.00
THE INVETERATE LIFE, Jessica Grim, $7.50 MEMORY PLAY, Carla Harryman, $8.50
THE QUIETIST, Fanny Howe, $8.00
VALUES CHAUFFEUR YOU, Andrew Levy, $9.00
CURVE, Andrew Levy, $10.00
DREAMING CLOSE BY, Rick London, $6.00
ABJECTIONS, Rick London, $4.00
DISSUASION CROWDS THE SLOW WORKER, Lori Lubeski, $7.50
CATENARY ODES, Ted Pearson, $6.00
COLLISION CENTER, Randall Potts, $9.00
(WHERE LATE THE SWEET) BIRDS SANG, Stephen Ratcliffe, $8.00
VISIBLE SHIVERS, Tom Raworth, $8.00
KISMET, Patricia Reed, $8.00
COLD HEAVEN, Camille Roy, $9.00

O ONE/AN ANTHOLOGY, ed. Leslie Scalapino, $10.50
O TWO/AN ANTHOLOGY: WHAT IS THE INSIDE, WHAT IS OUTSIDE?, $10.50
O/3: WAR, $4.00 (OUT OF PRINT)
O/4: SUBLIMINAL TIME, $10.50
CROWD AND NOT EVENING OR LIGHT, Leslie Scalapino, $9.00
THE INDIA BOOK: ESSAYS AND TRANSLATIONS, Andrew Schelling, $9.00
A'S DREAM, Aaron Shurin, $8.00
PICTURE OF THE PICTURE OF THE IMAGE IN THE GLASS, Craig Watson, $8.00

Forthcoming in 1995:

CLOSE TO ME & CLOSER ... (THE LANGUAGE OF HEAVEN) and DESAMERE, TWO BOOKS, Alice Notley
VEL, Peter Inman
LAPSES, John Crouse
THE DISPARITIES, Rodrigo Toscano
THE HISTORY OF THE LOMA PEOPLE, Paul Degein Korvah, (History: Liberia)

↑ Index

48. krickjh
Re[2]: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
Tue 10 Jan 1995

Gopher vs. http:

> (Why the dichotomy in terms, I don't know but apparently you don't have to have an http to have web access.)

RE: the dichotomy in terms, Gopher refers to an earlier menu-driven, mostly text-only interface to the net. Http addresses reference World Wide Web sites that can deliver graphics sound and video. You can access either type of site using a browser such as Mosaic, but Gopher can be accessed with very minimal machine resources as well. You cannot access Web sites and get the full functionality without a graphical browser however.

John Krick

↑ Index

49. Steven Howard Shoemaker

JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont. (fwd)

Tue 10 Jan 1995

Forwarded message:
From daemon Tue Jan 10 10:53:13 1995
Date: Tue, 10 Jan 1995 09:49:47 -0500
From: "[redacted] \"Randy Bass\"" <[redacted]
Subject: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont.
To: Multiple recipients of list T-AMLIT <[redacted]>

JRNL: T-AMLIT JOURNAL

From: IN%"[redacted]" "Carter C. Revard" 9-JAN-1995 14:54:57.
25
Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont.

With regard to Shoemaker's further remarks and Silliman's contributions, maybe a few more comments might buzz along the web from here and draw some interest from whoever "lives along the line," as Pope and his classical ancestors have put it. First, is it not interesting that "poets" have their separate web? Is it not also interesting that networkers can assume those of us etherized on this part of the table are professors NOT poets, while those in the poet-hammock hangup of this network ARE poets, whether professors or not? Does anyone think this kind of compartmenting is part of the reasons poets and poetry are perceived as marginalized? Second, since a poet has asked the question of what the metaphor of margins is supposed to mean, let me respond--as medievalist, teacher of American Indian Literature, and practicing poet--that I believe the basic metaphor is that of TEXT vs. MARGIN, and I take it that in the medieval period the text was that "woven" part of the page's words, while the margin was the place outside the weaving, where space was "free." One way "progress" took place, that is, people invented an idea called the Renaissance and relegated the medieval period to a meaningless dark MIDDLE AGES unlike the clean well-lighted humanistic Sixteenth Century of enlightened popes, holy Roman Emperors, reformed bishops and kings able to marry all they wanted, and so on--one way was to turn the marginalized things of the previous age into the textualized central part of the page. Instead of the Virgin Mary, they looked at models for the Virgin Mary, instead of a human image representing a cosmos, they looked at the image as representing an individual unlike all others. You no longer talked of a soul, you talked of a self--in English, that is, a language in which it was possible to take the former pronominal intensifier and turn it into a noun and let it carry the responsibilities which a soul had earlier had to bear. You invented psychology. You invented a blank table on which the senses wrote you you you. (Well maybe you didn't do this, and neither did I, but it seems kind of nasty to keep blaming THEM for it, so I am giving you the honor of riding out of the Middle Ages on the rail of Self.) So anyhow, I take it that behind all the political discourse of margins there is the original textual discourse, the manuscript making, the writerly image. Does that make sense? It should please any language poet, should it not?

But there is another assumption I'd like to look at. Someone pointed out very usefully that poetry requires readers to learn the culture inscribed within it, before the poems make sense. Is this not also true of prose? Is it not true of the Dick and Jane readers, as well as of the James and Nora or Tom and Viv or Emily and God anthologies? Is it not true of any human utterance, or lifting of an eyebrow? I suspect therefore that it does not differentiate poetry from the rest of the noises off or on the page or stage or CD-ROM.

I was thinking about this particular Silver Screen Dialogue as I was looking up, yesterday, the pseudo-Albertus Magnus Book of Secrets, in which I finally found (having looked off an on since 1980 or so) the probable source of a Latin excerpt copied about 1340 in or near Ludlow by a scribe who was a minor lawyer and probably a chaplain there. The excerpt occurs on fol. 137r of BL MS Harley 2253, and its two parts describe the herbs heliotrope (marigold) and celandine. Of heliotrope it is said that whoever gathers it in summer, when the Sun is in the Virgin, i.e. in August, and rolls it in a laurel leaf and adds the tooth of a wolf, will be able to pacify all opponents with his discourse; also, if anything has been stolen from him, and he lays this under his head at night, he will see the thief and perceive all the thief's circumstances. Further, if one places this leaf etc. inside a church within which are women who have committed adultery, none of the women shall have power to go out of that church without confessing to it. Of celandine, we are told that if one wraps it around the heart of a mole, one will successfully overcome all opponents in discourse, even litigation; and if one places the celandine and mole-heart under the head of any sick person, then if that person is fated to die he or she will begin to sing loudly, but if fated to recover will begin at once to weep. What, you may ask, has this to do with the difficulty of reading poetry, or with the alienation of poetry's audience, or with marginalizing of poetic discourse? Well, there is a poem in this manuscript (Harley 2253--in case you are interested, there is a facsimile that is Early English Text Society No. 255, 1964, edited by the great paleographer N. R. Ker; and there is an edition of the famous "Harley Lyrics" from this manuscript by G. L. Brook, as well as by various other scholars), which consists of five stanzas in each of which the poet compares the lady he is praising to something beautiful and wholesome: in stanza one, to various gems; in two, to flowers and herbs (including celandine and marigold--solsecle is the poet's term for the latter, which is derived from the Latin Solsequium that occurs in the latin excerpt I have mentioned above); in three, to birds; in four, to medicinal herbs or potions; and in five, to heroes and heroines of "romances" including Welsh, Germanic, and French prose and poetry.

By now you have guessed that my point is how obscure and difficult this poem must be. It is also heavily alliterative, obviously a highly ornate piece of poetry. But one of the nicest things about it is that its poet has found a very clever way to both conceal and give away the name of the lady he is praising--I should add that in such poems, the medieval writers usually make it a taboo to name the lady, since a courtly lover's affair is actually not supposed to be made public except so far as the pair of them show the symptoms of love, and the man is allowed to "complain" in a GENERAL way, naming no names. This poet, however, has managed to name his beloved in a riddling way, in the third stanza when he is comparing her to birds: HIRE NOME IS IN A NOTE OF THE NYHTEGALE, IN ANNOTE IS HIRE NOME: NEMPNETH HIT NONE! WHOSO RIGHT READETH, RUNE TO JOHON! The clever reader or listener will easily see that the lady's name is Annote, and any medieval or medievalist with half a brain would know that that is a pet name or nickname for Agnes, so the poet is saying: Listen up now and you'll hear her name--and when you get it, whisper it to John!

I think the poet could certainly expect his readers (it may have been HER readers, though we have little evidence for women lyricists in the 1300's; little is not NONE!) to get the riddle. But at that point we have another question: what's the poet doing breaking this taboo? I think the answer is that the poem is addressed to, and intended for reading aloud to, a courtly audience of men and women, and that the names Agnes and John were very common names--so that a given audience might have several women and men with those names. The "answer" would therefore become a "debate topic", and not only WHICH Agnes, but which JOHN for which Agnes, would be debated. Can we now go back to that Marigold and Celandine? The poet expects his audience to understand that the lady is not merely like flowers of various colors and fragrances, but flowers and herbs and gems and birds and medicines of various powers--reputed or real, credible or just "interesting" is not certain, according to Lynn Thorndike's History of Science account of the pseudo-Albertus Magnus BOOK OF SECRETS in which the powers of celandine and marigold are explicated, and from which the Harley 2253 scribe carefully copied those passages. The audience would not only know this plant-lore and gem-lore and bird-lore (and star-lore, since the gems and plants linked to Zodiac), but would presumably have the romances all by heart so that comparing the lady to their heroes and heroines would make as much sense as our references to Hamlet or Portia or Oedipus or Prufrock.

SO, AS I SAY, I was thinking about this question of marginalizing poetry yesterday as I was dinking about the Science and History of Science shelves trying to get a little footnote finished. But you know, one reason I was doing that was that I had just read Gayle Margherita's new book on medieval literature, all the Lacan and Freud and Marx and such, and been greatly interested by her marvelous hammerlock on the poet of ANNOTE AND JOHON, who clearly was a patriarchal bastard if ever there was one. And I was the more interested because she cited Daniel Ransom's earlier book on the Harley Lyrics in which he claimed there are all sorts of obscene puns in ANNOTE AND JOHON, and it was a little hard to tell whether she thought Ransom was right or thought he was worse than the Harley Lyricist. Anyhow it occurred to me that one reason we may have a lot of non-readers of poetry is that we have convinced so many potential readers that they have to ask a professor before daring to dip into any collection of real literature. And once we ask, we are treated to an incredible pile of unbelievable interpretations, all of burning importance, all proving that every medieval poet was John D Rockefeller plus John Gacy plus the Marquis de Sade plus Faulkner's Popeye, at least when not proving that the poets were really (according to D. W. Robertson of blessed Princetonian memory) John Knox or a Polish Pope. So it is just possible that professors have marginalized their texts pretty athletically. Having perfected an Explanation Factory, having apprenticed all readers to this factory and seen to it that they are chained to the sewing machines fabricating not glosses or footnotes but literary bi-ogre-phy, we have committed them to reading poetry, fiction, essays, newspapers, laws as projections of the psyches of damaged tyrants and misers and sociopaths of various talents and inclinations.

Well, maybe that is just auld, lang, and syne.

But having got into the Science section of our library, and actually found a book on the shelf that was said by the computer system to be there, and got the footnotes, and read the intelligent and interesting discussion by Margherita (U of Penn Press, 1994; well worth reading, lots besides the problematic misreading of the Harley Lyrics), and so on, I managed to get a copy of the magazine SCIENCE and look at its piece casting doubt on the existence of Black Holes (Jeez, how to write a headline for THAT?!) and another on the anniversary of Oncogene Research in which Harold Varmus, head of NEH and recent Nobelman for that work, had a few things to say and I was reflecting on what a good student of English Literature Varmus had been at Amherst College when I was a junior instructor there. And I kept thinking, you know, if I pick up SCIENCE, I expect to get news, some surprises, some revisions. If I pick up a journal of poetry I don't expect that. Is that maybe one reason people don't pick up poetry journals? But of course scientists complain of being marginalized too. I read that 14.7% of Math Ph.D.'s are going unemployed. Wonder what kind of poet Harold Varmus would have made?

You must have asked me the question I am about to answer: How to get back into the text people read? The answer is: be a good host. You let some of the guests tell stories too. You answer questions, you bring other characters onto the show. You treat readers as guests, and not as unworthy approachers of your throne. I bet this will make quite a few readers--especially some who class themselves as poets--mad as hell. I bet the romantic view of poets as dictating rather than as entertaining is still the going thing. I bet the view of readers as not deserving of the wonderful stuff poets are writing is the common one. I bet poets still think of themselves as abused victims of the Philistine masses. And of course the damnable truth is that I write what I please and invent, afterwards, excuses, rationales, explanations which may have little to do with motives and techniques and processes of the actual writing. Still, it seems to me poetry is intended to be a shared thing, a way of getting together with people and things and creatures, not a way of walling out or walling in only. A really great poet should do what Shakespeare did, or Dickens, take a popular medium and make it bear great poetry. The rest of us can try to do that and no doubt fall way short. But I still think if we do it right people will laugh with us, go up the mountain with us, because they will find our words help them, speak to them, make sense of experience they know personally and closely. Sometimes it even seems that really good poetry is whatever people read for themselves because they need it. But that would allow the directions for microwaving a tuna casserole to be poetry, I suppose.

↑ Index

50. Steven Howard Shoemaker

JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont. (fwd)

Tue 10 Jan 1995

Forwarded message:
From daemon Tue Jan 10 10:35:40 1995
Date: Tue, 10 Jan 1995 09:48:37 -0500
From: "[redacted] \"Randy Bass\"" <[redacted]
Subject: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont.
To: Multiple recipients of list T-AMLIT <[redacted]>

JRNL: T-AMLIT JOURNAL

Two more contributions to the lively thread relfecting on the marginalization (alleged?) of poetry within the academy.
RB
****

(1)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "Anthony R Petrosky"
Subj: RE: JRNL: Poetry on the Margins, cont.

I would like to respond to a few things Ron Silliman mentions in his reponse to our responses to the Poetry on the Margins questions. I thought his comments on the communities of poets helps a lot. They are everywhere, in towns and boroughs, on electronic boards, in letters that they exchange with each other. More so I suspect than 10 or 20 years ago and I take that as hopeful. I'm not as interested as he is, though, in setting up good guys and bad guys in the language of the establishment poets and the others, more particularly the Language Poets. I remember being very excited about what was happening in Language Poetry when Ironwood did an issue devoted to the work, but itdidn't seem to me then nor does it seem to me now that Language Poetry needs to have the establishment to stand against in order to be language poetry in the Objectivist tradition and to extend that tradition. I feel thesame way, for example, about Gluck and Olds. They represent different traditions, different extensions of those traditions, but they don't need to position the other as the blackhat in order to be credible. The philosophy and language of each is not the others but so what. I think of a recent poem by Elaine Equi that goes like this: PRESCRIPTION

Take Herrick for melancholy

Niedecker for clarity

O'Hara
for nerve

The poem, for me, says there are different things totake fromm differnt poets. So the, for teaching, it becomes a question ofhowto putbefore my students, most of whom are not readers of poetry or fiction, contemporary poetry so that they would be willing to contiue to read and perhaps to write it. Ithink then of letting them see the difference rather than, say, presenting them with just my preferences, and letting them write and talk about the difference to see for themselves what might be available to them from modern poetry. Sure I have a theory of organization and history, as Ron points out, and I can certainly see his suspicion of it as I would be suspicious of other teachers and their agendas if I had one I was proposing over others, but it isnot ppossible to not have, even in the slightest way, a theory of organization and history. At best, I think, I can see mine, such as it is, and be up front with my students about where I come from and how I organize.

This is a related problem to thinking about teaching any texts, it seems. I don't want it to prevent me from presenting modern poetry to my composition students or my intro. to lit. students or my school of Ed. students who want to be secondary teachers. Most of them know almost nothing about poetry. They have smatterings of Frost, Whitman, and Emily Dickinson in them, but what they have read usually stops there. The don't kow about the communities of writers in magazines like AMERICAN VOICE or the ST.MARKS POETRY PROJECT NEWSLETTER. So it's not that I would propose that there is a "defining privilege for the classroom in determining the answer to the question" of why poetry is marganilized but thatI would propose the classroom, all kinds of classrooms (e.g., religious studies, composition, educational methods, and so on)as places where poetry can be a part of the curriculum to address questions in those subjects and areas, to be, that is, a part of the conversations of thinking about, say, soul, or language and culture, or American traditions.

It is within thiscontext, the one that has to do with speaking to my collelagues about why I might include poetry in these courses, that I locate the problem of poetry on the margins. THe other issues, the unchanged state of distribution of poetry, Bill Moyers and Robert Bly, the creation of good guys and bad guys in poetry weren't my subjects in the last postings, although those seem to me to be certainly related issues. My expeerience is that my colleagues, college and secondary English teachers, by and large are not familiar with the vaariious traditions and commnities of poets or fiction writers, and I'm interested in how this might be changed and I see a place to begin in my immediate teaching by positioning poetry as a serious voice avaailble to my students. I still don't see theusefulness of fractionalism. As poets it is possible to discuss poetry that is not the poetry we write or prefer without positioning it to be establishment, representative of larger social forces, bad, and so on. The difference is a place for discussion rather than dissmisal. In the movesof dismissal and disparagement the new boss--the culturall critique--is the old boss--New Critical critique--with another name and another set of terms. It'sthe same end game: who shall be judged or critiqued the true (and we all know about the will to truth now, don't we, from Foucault for instance), with the same divisiveness, and I don't think that helps poetry communities, poetry, or my thinking about howto present poetry to my students and colleagues. I like theEqui poem and what it proposes. Locate me there.

(2)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "Paul Lauter" 8-JAN-1995 17:47:48.97
Subj: Poetry at the Margins

I want to pick up on one of Ron Silliman's side comments, which criticized me for making what he called "a gratuitous (and completely reductive) slap at the avant-garde tradition (w/o recognizing it as the only 'international' literary tradition the world has ever had)." Ron is certainly right in criticizing the offhand way I criticized the tradition of Eliot and Pound, and many of their successors. One shouldn't do that in a sentence, any more than one should attack the equally pernicious impact of abstract expressionism and its apologists, like Hilton Kramer, in a sentence. I didn't want to repeat what I had written at length elsewhere--there's one piece coming out in an NCTE volume edited by Jim Slevin and Art Young and another in the next issue of the Yale J of Crit. In both I reflect on the powerful hold that the critical tradition derived from Eliot, Pound, Ransom, Brooks, etc. has had even on those of us committed to a revisionist canon. I think that hold is most of all demonstrated in the New Critical ways in which poetry continues largely to be taught, especially in secondary schools. And in the ways we conceive--even in a revisionist anthology like the HEATH--literary/ historical conceptions like "modernism." Here it's worth considering the other post, from an unnamed high school teacher, that appeared with Ron's post. The teacher mourned the fact that his or her students don't share a great deal of the culture assumed even by relatively approachable poets like Frost. Thus the teacher is put in the position of being the class expert--nothing wrong with that, as such, and probably inevitable in many situations. Yet for students, in my observation, that turns poetry into a puzzle to which an observably more "mature" person has the key, rather than into a form in which they may participate. I think the result of this dynamic is to create among many and perhaps most students a kind of fear and loathing, a sense that poetry, writing in general, is something done by people other than themselves, different from them, distant from them. And that, it seems to me, is precisely the intent of Eliot's form of modernism--see, for example, his comments on the special qualities of the poet's "sensibility" in "The Metaphysical Poets." Eliot's point, I would argue (after Adreas Huyssen in "Mass Culture as Woman: Modernism's Other," AFTER THE GREAT DIVIDE), is precisely to create the critical and teaching apparatus that underwrites the elite forms of poetic practice he helped develop. This is still a shorthand form of the argument, to be sure. And one can speculate about Eliot's psychology--as in "Tom and Viv"--or about the conservative politics he shared with the founders of the New Criticism. Those are interesting issues, to be sure. But here I only want to suggest that the continuing impact of this tradition is to help create distance between many people who pass through the educational system and those forms of language designated within it as "poetry." Underlying the argument is, of course, the question of what we agree to call "poetry." It's the issue Cary Nelson powerfully joins by, for example, quoting H.H. Lewis' little argument about material conditions and consciousness: Here I am Hunkered over the cow-donick, Earning my one dollar per And realizing, With goo upon overalls,

How environment works up a feller's pant-legs to govern his thought. (Thinking of Russia) Let's leave it at that for the time being.

Paul Lauter

↑ Index

51. Rachel DuPlessis c/o
Call for MLA Papers / 20th c. American Division
Tue 10 Jan 1995

Call for Papers

Twentieth-Century American Division

1995 Modern Language Association

Three topics:

1. The Literary and Cultural Constructions of Twentieth-Century "Whiteness."
2. Creolization, Hybridity, Syncretisms and Mixings--theory and practice.
3. The Zone of Walden. Hybrid genres--essay, poetic essay, essay-poem.

Deadline: Submit up to a two-page abstract, with affiliation and one paragraph brief biographical note by March 15 to

Program Chair: Rachel DuPlessis
English Department, 022-29
Temple University
Philadelphia, PA 19122

or 211 Rutgers Avenue
Swathmore, PA 19081-1715

Phone inquiries to (h) [redacted]. Sorry no e-mail. Persons must be MLA members to offer papers. Persons may undertake one paper per MLA. The 1995 MLA will be in Chicago.

↑ Index

52. Mark Wallace possibilities for readings
Wed 11 Jan 1995

We've got a number of reading series going on in Washington, D.C. these days and are always interested in readers. No money to offer at this time, but anyone who's thinking about coming through should contact me via e-mail, and I'd be happy to see what I can do.

Mark Wallace

↑ Index

53. James Sherry
Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
Wed 11 Jan 1995

LOSS, I notice a lot of back and forth about instructions. Having done this kind of thing for a living, I suggest you might get a good result from have a standard bulleted format for instructions, so you don't have to rely on anyones' intelligence.... to put it mildly.

If this of any use...

James

On Mon, 9 Jan 1995, Loss Glazier wrote:

> You mention Web features, but there's no http url listed.
>
> Tom,
>
> World-Wide Web and Mosaic Access:
> For those with World-Wide Web (lynx) or Mosaic access,
> from your interface, choose the go to URL
> option then go to (type as one continuous string)
> gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/
> library/e-journals/ub/rift
>
> Perhaps I should be clearer in this "flyer" I regularly send out but the url you would enter would start with "gopher" in the expression above. Try it; it works! In fact the web version has begun to evolve as much more useful. (Why the dichotomy in terms, I don't know but apparently you don't have to have an http to have web access.) If any snags, please feel free to let me know, on or off the list. For those with a graphical interface, there are increasingly more graphics, etc., as in decorating the home.

↑ Index

54. Loss Glazier
Re: New Electronic Poetry Center Features
Wed 11 Jan 1995

> LOSS,
> I notice a lot of back and forth about instructions. Having done this kind of thing for a living, I suggest you might get a good result from have a standard bulleted format for instructions, so you don't have to rely on anyones' intelligence.... to put it mildly.

James,

This is a wonderful thought! The problem is the old thinking-on-your- feet angle. In other words, things are changing so fast that it's not only the challenge but the luxury and joy of maintaining such a "center."

Dichotomies seem to be the crux of the issue. We originally designed everything for gopher but as the Web grew, that became preferable. And the small details, now able to load numerous graphics and sound files into the system, it's incredible to watch it grow. It's not just the challlenge but the thrill of it.

Now, even as we discuss this, I learn that an http address will have been shortly instituted. So an announcement there will be shortcoming!

Only to say I try to stay on it, here we go, and the present possibilities are immense...

Best wishes,
Loss

↑ Index

55. Kali Tal
Re: Listings
Wed 11 Jan 1995

Hi, folks. I've been meaning to respond to Charles Bernstein's invitation to post information about our press at least since October, but haven't had the time or energy to sit down and write up a proper description until now.

Viet Nam Generation, Inc. is a small literary and educational nonprofit 501(c)(3) corporation. I founded it in 1988 when I was a grad student in American Studies. Viet Nam Generation, Inc. was founded to support the publication of an interdisciplinary journal, _Viet Nam Generation_, dedicated to providing a forum for scholars, artists and activists interested in the 1960s in the U.S. and internationally. Now the journal is entering its seventh volume-year. In 1990 we started publishing a line of monographs, fiction and poetry related, in some fashion, to our subject area of the 1960s. We've currently got 27 titles in print (including those forthcoming in 1995). I was joined in my endeavors by my partner Dan Duffy (in 1991) and Steve Gomes (in 1993). We continue to work full-time on a volunteer basis, but hope to be stable enough to pay small salaries by the end of 1995.

Viet Nam Generation, Inc. also sponsors the Sixties Project, a collective of scholars interested in the 1960s, housed at the Institute of Advanced Technology in the Humanities at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville. As part of the Sixties Project we maintain the electronic discussion list SIXTIES-L.

POETICS readers might be interested in the publications listed below. As you'll notice, many of the books are in our "White Noise" series. I think we may be the only press admittedly publishing middle-aged white guys as an ethnic group. Our other series is titled "Widespread Panic," and features a variety of poets whose work is distinguished by its confrontational nature....

Best,
Kali Tal
Viet Nam Generation, Inc./Burning Cities Press
18 Center Rd., Woodbridge, CT 06525
FAX: 203/[redacted]
Email: [redacted]

VIET NAM GENERATION/BURNING CITIES PRESS POETRY PUBLICATIONS

Viet Nam Generation: A Journal of Recent History and Contemporary Culture. Accepts poetry submissions. We're looking for work which can be at least loosely related to the 1960s in subject matter, influence, politics, or form. Length is no object--we've published everything from short-shorts to 30-page cycles. We usually produce double-issues, so the journal effectively comes out twice a year, averages 220pp, perfect bound, with no advertising. There are only three of us reading all poetry submissions and responding to authors, so it sometimes takes us a while (up to 4 months) to respond. We publish 15-20 poets in an issue. Sample copies are available for $15 each.

AMATO, JOE. _Symptoms of a Finer Age_. 92 pages, perfect bound, paper, 4-color cover, forthcoming March 1995. White Noise #5. ISBN: 1-885215-12-6. Joe will no doubt blush when he reads this (hi Joe!), but we think the world of him. Joe teaches English and composition at the Illinois Institute of Technology. His technical expertise is combined with passion, a fine ear for language, and a strong sense of social justice. Reading his work is like watching a skilled professional put on a stunning display of Fourth of July fireworks--even the most cynical can't help being taken in by the magic. We figure that 25 or 30 years from now, when the lit critters look back and marvel at the wealth of talent that Viet Nam Generation, Inc. has managed to assemble, we'll be most appreciated for showcasing Joe....

BARKER, DAN, _Warrior of the Heart_. 276 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, 1992. ISBN: 0-9628524-7-3. $15. When Dan Barker's manuscript came "over the transom," we knew it was the answer to our publishing prayers. What arrived that day was one of the finest Viet Nam war narratives that we'd ever read. And we'd read hundreds. We never did figure out if _Warrior of the Heart_ was poetry or prose, and we don't really care. It's fucking beautiful, and it doesn't flinch. Dan Barker served as a naval corpsman attached to the Marine Corps in Viet Nam. He is the founder and director of The Home Gardening Project, which has built over 1,100 raised-bed vegetable gardens for the aged, disabled and single-parent families of Portland, Oregon.

CHRISTOPHER, RENNY, _Viet Nam and California_. 82 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, forthcoming September 1995. Widespread Panic #2. ISBN: 1-885215-13-4. Renny's poems are strong and straightforward. They tell the story of a woman's coming-of-age in the period during and after the Viet Nam war, and of her relationships with several Viet Nam veterans. These spare portraits are grounded in Renny's solid sense of herself as a woman with working-class roots.

COLEMAN, HORACE, _In the Grass_. 84 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, forthcoming October 1995. Widespread Panic #3. ISBN: 1-885215-17-7. Horace is an African-American rebel poet. His early Viet Nam war poetry was featured in the first collections assembled by W.D. Ehrhart and First Casualty Press, and his poem gave the title to Ehrhart's _Carrying the Darkness_ anthology. Over the years Horace's tongue has sharpened and his anger has been refined into the razor bite of _In the Grass_. This is a long overdue collection of his work.

CONNOLLY, DAVID, _Lost in America." 72 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, 1994. White Noise #1. ISBN: 1-885215-00-2. $12. David Connolly was born, raised, and still lives in South Boston. He was a nineteen-year-old infantryman in Viet Nam--the product of a close Irish Catholic, pro-IRA, working class family. During his year at war he became sick at heart over what his country was doing to a people whose lifestyle and struggle he came to see as being closely related to that of his own heritage. A quarter of a century later, Connolly still makes those connections with passion and power. We just put this book out, so the reviews haven't started to filter back to us yet, but David gave a reading at a conference we held in November and in December we got 15 orders for his book from professors who wanted to use it in literature courses.

EHRHART, W.D., _Just for Laughs_. 84 pages, perfect bount, paper, 4-color cover, 1990. ISBN: 0-9628524-0-6. $10. By his writing and editing, W.D. Ehrhart made it possible to be a Viet Nam veteran writer. By his continued work, Ehrhart has become the conscience and inspiration for those who have been sparked into literature by seeing the American war machine on parade. _Just for Laughs_ brings poems addressing Ehrhart's return to Viet Nam, his marriage and family life, and the American wars in Central America. The final poems of this book summon Ehrhart's nightmare past as a Marine in Viet Nam, and evoke his pessimism about the future, from a sense that embraces the present with care and fear. "W.D. Ehrhart continues to deserve recognition, perhaps more than any other, as the Vietnam author in his generation who in fact made the idea of such a thing possible in the first place." --Philip D. Beidler, _Re-Writing America: Vietnam Authors in their Generation_.

JAFFE, MAGGIE, _Continuous Performance_. 64 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, 1990. ISBN: 0-9628524-6-5. $10. Maggie Jaffe, peace activist and poet, interrogates the images of empire that form American ideals of war. She places "Viet Nam" in a continuum of aggression that begins with the Pilgrim Fathers and extends through the secret wars of the 1980s and 1990s. Her short poems are connected to the historical record by direct reference and opinionated statement. "Maggie Jaffe's new poems expose the rot behind the baby pink veneer of our image makers. Her verse is boldly political, her human commitment passionate and profound." --Marianne Hauser. "_Continuous Performance_ stands out as a testimony that Maggie Jaffe was not silent, when the times demanded that poets write about important issues." --Jon Forrest Glade, _American Book Review_.

LIEBLER, M.L., _Stripping the Adult Century Bare_. 88 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, forthcoming March 1995. White Noise #6. ISBN: 1-885215-09-6. $12. M.L. has been called a cross between T.S. Eliot and Ward Cleaver. He is a professor of English at Wayne State University, a small press publisher, and a social activist. His Magic Poetry Band regularly performs in his home town of Detroit, and occasionally tours. _Stripping the Adult Century Bare_ is an anthology of Liebler's new and older verse, focusing on the impact of the 1960s on his life. His heroes are Jesus and John Lennon. "M.L. Liebler is a tremendous source of poetry energy in the The Motor City and beyond." --John Sinclair. "M.L. Liebler is a complex mix of poet, university professor, performance poet, Lollapalooza performer and Christian writer... he has played a vital role in keeping the poetry scene alive during its dark days of the 70s and 80s." --_The Detrois News_. "M.L. Liebler is a piece of the reality poetry needs to stay alive. Alive, and kicking, not forgetting the hurt Americans inflict on themselves, each other, and the world--but ready to fight, and sing, the song of hope. He is a beacon! More power to Mike, and to the republic (of poetry and love) for which he stands." --Alice Ostriker

MCCARTHY, GERALD, _Throwing the Headlines_. 72 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, forthcoming April 1995. White Noise #4. ISBN: 1-885215-12-6. $12. Gerald McCarthy is well known to those who study the soldier-poets of the Viet Nam war. This collection spans two decades of McCarthy's work and is an important new contribution to the field of Viet Nam war poetry. The poems in _Throwing the Headlines_ reflect McCarthy's continuing passion for peace and justice.

QUINTANA, LEROY, _Interrogations_. 102 pages, perfect bound, paper, 4-color cover, 1990. ISBN: 0-9628524-5-7. Introduction by Yusef Komunyakaa. $10. The cover of this book features a watercolor made from a snapshot of Quintana's Long Range Reconnaissance Patrol. The short poems inside make art of the brief glimpses of his tour in Viet Nam. The collection of sharp, sudden poems from Viet Nam mounts to a longer moral address to then-President Bush, written just after the Gulf War. Introduce yourself to the details of jungle fighting, the perspective of a Chicano soldier, and the mature view of a poet who was a soldier once. "The characters in _Interrogations_ have been given genuine depth, and in a few succinct lines they emerge as sharply defined human beings...." --Jon Forrest Glade, _American Book Review_.

RICHMAN, ELLIOT, _Walk On, Trooper_. 92 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, 1994. White Noise #2. ISBN: 0-9628524-9-X. $12. Elliot Richman published his first poem in 1984, when he was forty-two years old. Since then, his work has appeared widely in the small press. In 1993 he was awarded fellowships for his poetry by both the NEA and the New York Foundation for the Arts. Asylum Arts has published is two previous collections, _The World Dancer_ and _Honorable Manhood_. Not a veteran, Elliot has probably published more individual poems about the Viet Nam war in more literary magazines than almost any veteran writer. His passion and preoccupation (some might even say obsession) fascinated us, and we felt that we needed to collect his Viet Nam war poems and publish them under one cover. Bill Shields, cowboy poet and hardcore combat vet (_Southeast Asian Book of the Dead_ and _Human Shrapnel_) has this to say about Elliot's work: "_Walk On, Trooper_ is one fucking real book. A straight walk into the beast with eyes wide open; it is the best--and I mean the best--book I've seen on the Viet Nam war. He went into hell to write it." We don't know if we completely agree with Bill, but we're sure that _Walk On, Trooper_ is mesmerizing.

RITTERBUSCH, DALE, _Lessons Learned_. 82 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, forthcoming July 1995. White Noise #7. ISBN: 1-885215-08-8. $12. Dale Ritterbusch began writing the poems in this volume over twenty years ago, while sitting in a class on M-60 emplacement in OCS at the Infantry School at Fort Benning. He's been writing ever since. Ritterbusch teaches English at the University of Wisconsin-Whitewater. His poetry came to our attention through the recommendation of W.D. Ehrhart, who discovered Dale years ago, while Ehrhart was compiling the poetry for the anthology _Carrying the Darkness_. A version of _Lessons Learned_ received a publication grant in 1984 from the Ohio Arts Council, but the pressn which had committed to producing the book folded before it could be published. We are proud to produce a long-delayed volume which we are sure will become an instant classic of Viet Nam war literature.

VANCIL, DAVID, _The Homesick Patrol_. 72 pages, perfect bound, paper, 2-color cover, forthcoming June 1995. White Noise #3. ISBN: 1-885215-15-0. $12. David Vancil served in Vietnam in 1969 in Khanh Hoa Province as a military advisor. He is a rare books librarian and small press publisher. David is the author of an earlier volume of poetry titled _The Art School Baby_, and is working on a memoir titled _The Sanest Man in Vietnam_. His verse is disciplined and elegant, the work of careful literary artist.

Make check or money order payable to Viet Nam Generation, Inc. All individual orders must be prepaid. We accept purchase orders from bookstores and libraries. Shipping is included in the price. We do not accept returns unless books are received in damaged condition.

Orders Dept.
Viet Nam Generation, Inc.
18 Center Rd., Woodbridge, CT 06525
FAX: 203/[redacted]
email: [redacted]

Kali Tal
Sixties Project & Viet Nam Generation, Inc.
18 Center Rd., Woodbridge, CT 06525
203/[redacted]; fax 203/[redacted]
email: [redacted]

↑ Index

56. Susan Clark
RADDLE MOON listing
Thu 12 Jan 1995

RADDLE MOON listing

Here's some information on current and future issues of Raddle moon. Thanks to Charles Bernstein for suggesting these listings.

The expanded editorial collective is currently reading manuscripts;
we are especially interested in looking at image/text, collaborative work, "engaged criticism" (these terms!
try: poetics of criticism [ref. Spahr et al]; see e.g. most reviews and essays recently published in RM), long works, translation-based work, and work by women.

Susan Clark
[redacted]

****

RADDLE MOON (Vancouver)

edited by Susan Clark with new editors (beginning #13):
Catriona Strang, and Lisa Robertson and new contributing editors:

Nicole Brossard (in Qu bec); and Norma Cole (in San Francisco)

****
CURRENT ISSUES:
****

RADDLE MOON 13 (available):

new work by Vancouver writers Dan Farrell, Christine Stewart & Paul Mutton; and Calgary writer, Yasmin Ladha

the second round of the Women/Writing/Theory project with contributions by Chris Tysh, Johanna Drucker, Jean Day, Susan Clark, Abigail Child, & Juliana Spahr;

an excerpt from the Lyn Hejinian/Leslie Scalapino collaborative project Sight;

three Dante translations by Bruce Andrews (from EARTH);

work by Sianne Ngai and Juliana Spahr; reviews of Dahlen and Samuel Beckett

****

RADDLE MOON 14 (forthcoming, spring, '95):

work by Vancouver writers Deanna Ferguson, Gerald Creede, Dorothy Trujillo Lusk, Lissa Wolsack, Judy Radul (cover image), and (former Vancouverite) Kevin Davies;

two long pieces by Bob Perelman, "A False Account of Talking with Frank O'Hara and Roland Barthes in Philadelphia" [late night on the heaven channel] and "The Manchurian Candidate: a remake";

multi-language poems and image/text pieces from Anne Tardos;

and others.

****

RADDLE MOON 15 (open for submissions):

special section on younger French women writers, edited by Stacy Doris and Norma Cole;

photo-based images by Rhoda Rosenfeld

****

COVER ART : We are soliciting images for our covers.
Our bias is photographic and photo-based work.
Please note: our new size is: 6 1/4 " x 8 " with 4" french flaps; cover images wrap around, so can be various proportions/dimensions with a maximum 8" height.
Please query first.

****

SUBSCRIPTIONS are $12 for one year (two issues) Single issues are $7; most back issues are $6 (tables of contents, details on request)

Cheques/checks should be made out to RADDLE MOON.
Submissions and subscriptions should be addressed to:

Raddle Moon Press
2239 Stephens St., upstairs
Vancouver, BC
V6K 3W5 Canada

US POSTAGE : through the kindness of another small press in the city, RADDLE MOON has access to the US Mail via Pt. Roberts, Wa. and can reply using your US postage if you cannot supply IRCs with your SAE.

LIBRARIES can be asked to subscribe to periodicals. (Library subscribers who are patient and faithful and don't move every two years are a great boon to small publishers; getting your library the most useful things you can do to extend the life of your favourite magazine[s].)

Libraries may subscribe through subscription services such as Faxon, Ebsco, McGregor, SMS, or a number of others.

****

.... next posting will do GIANTESS, our "casual irregular" .....

↑ Index

57. krickjh
Congress again
Thu 12 Jan 1995

Jim Warren, proprietor of the GovAccess list, published this in his latest mailing:

<from a kindly US House of Representatives (H.I.S.) email specialist>

To obtain a current list of Representatives available via email send an email message to the following address:
[redacted]

Or, you can also peruse our gopher service in the House Email Addresses category at:
gopher.house.gov

To learn the e-mail addresses of your Senators you will need to contact them directly at [redacted].

House Web and Mosaic access is at:
WWW = www.house.gov

Hope this helps.

John Krick

↑ Index

58. Robert Drake
HyperText Poetry course (forwarded message)
Thu 12 Jan 1995

---

forwarded message:

Message #294 (298 is last):
Date: Wed Jan 11 18:33:25 1995
From: [redacted]
Subject: Course In Hypertext Poetry

Robert Kendall will be teaching a class in hypertext fiction and poetry in the Spring 95 term at the New School for Social Research in New York, NY. The class will also be offered in the summer and fall as part of the New Schools Distance Instruction for Adult Learners (DIAL) program, in which all instruction takes place on-line.

Kendall would like to hear from anyone at other schools that offer classes in hypertext or interactive literature. He's interested both in exchanging ideas about teaching such a class and in exploring ways his students could exchange work with students in similar programs.

HYPERTEXT POETRY AND FICTION
Robert Kendall
12 Tuesday evening sessions beginning Jan. 31, 1995.

This course will provide an introductory survey of published interactive poetry and fiction that uses the computer monitor as its medium instead of the printed page. It will also be a workshop for students to create their own writing in this new genre. Students will explore

- how the resources of the computer--hypertext, kinetic text, decision-making algorithms, randomization functions, graphics, and audio--can take literature in new directions not possible in print.

- how poems and stories can assume nonlinear, reader-determined structures that emulate the dynamic nature of actual human experience, memory, and thought processes.

- how the computer can combine the written tradition of literature with elements of its oral tradition, such as real-time performance (with or without musical accompaniment), improvisation, and audience interaction.

Students will learn Storyspace, a program for creating hypertext, and will create and discuss their own hypertext stories and poems. The course will also cover opportunities for disseminating interactive literature through the burgeoning new field of electronic publishing.

Phone or fax registration for the class is accepted until Jan. 23, in-person registration until Feb. 7.

For more information about the course, contact Robert Kendall at: [redacted]

For information about registration phone
The New School for Social Research at [redacted] or send a fax to [redacted]

For information about the on-line program write:
The DIAL Program
The New School for Social Research
68 5th Ave., 3rd Fl.
New York, NY 10011

---------- Mark Bernstein
[redacted] Eastgate Systems, Inc. voice: [redacted] 134 Main St Watertown MA 02172 USA fax: [redacted]

---

end forwarded message

lbd

↑ Index

59. Steve Evans
Defense of NEA
Sat 14 Jan 1995

In light of recent indications that the Republican controlled 104th Congress intends to summarily eliminate Federal funding for the arts, Jennifer Moxley and I have begun organizing an event that we would like to make known to the participants on this list.

We are organizing in Providence, and we invite members of this list to organize in their cities, a "read-in" on Saturday, January 28th. We are calling the event Freely Espousing and welcome the adoption by others of that name. We are inviting artists, writers, publishers, scholars, students, and interested citizens to manifest their support for National Arts Funding by participating in a 5 hour read-in (1-6 pm EST) of materials partly or fully funded by the National Endowment for the Arts. We are scheduling speakers at roughly the midway point in the reading, probably from 3-4 that afternoon. If interest warrants, we will stretch both the reading and the speaking component of the event by several hours. We plan to distribute a petition and also pre-fab postcards (probably the ones The Literary Network is producing) at the event.

Two weeks is a mercilessly short time in which to organize an event, but the debate on the Balanced Budget Amendment (beneath which rubric we've been told the NEA-NEH's fate will be decided) is scheduled to begin on Tuesday, January 24th. If we do not act immediately, what slim chance we have of affecting the outcome will be entirely pre-empted. Indeed, the opponents of the NEA/NEH have a clear majority on this issue and the RI Democrats that I spoke with (including people at the office of Senator Pell, architect of the NEA legislation in 1965) seem resigned to losing the Endowment. The message I got was, with Social Security on the block, no one is going to go to the wall for art.

Jennifer and I chose Freely Espousing as the name for this event not only for its resonance in our poetic tradition, but also because the Republican attempt to completely bypass democratic procedure in their 100-day dash to the right is deeply offensive to us. Indeed, although organizing and participating in this defense of the NEA may not save the program, it could be a small but important step toward de- legitimating Newt Gingrich's show of legislative thuggery. Our message should be: this assault on the arts is symptomatic of a cynical and despicable disregard for democracy on the part of Gingrich, Dole, and their followers in the House and Senate (not to mention the Governors). We must oppose their secrecy with openness, their arrogance and greed with generosity and solidarity.

Jennifer and I have had tentative discussions with people in San Diego and San Francisco about organizing parallel events on January 28th. While it is not imperative that all events take place on the same day or follow the same program, it does lend a certain credibility (as well as giving local media another "angle" on their coverage) to be able to cite other places around the country where people are convened for the same purpose.

If anyone reading this post has some time to spare in the next two weeks (or knows of someone who does but isn't on this list or even on the Internet), Jennifer and I would welcome communication either via e-mail ([redacted]. brown.edu) or phone [redacted]. If you are willing to participate, but don't have the time to coordinate the event, let us know and hopefully we'll be able to put you in touch with someone where you are. From our standpoint, self-organization is the best solution, but we want to keep communication lines open so people in one area can act with knowledge of what others, in other areas, are doing.

While Jennifer and I share the misgivings others on this list have voiced about the NEA's unresponsiveness to valid poetic work, we believe that dismantling what should be further democratized is not an acceptable alternative. The fight for the NEA should simultaneously be a fight to make it responsive to your concerns as writers, artists, and, in the case of the NEH, scholars.

We hope to hear from some of you in the next days. Happy New Year!

Steve Evans and Jennifer Moxley
61 E. Manning St., Providence RI 02906-4008
[redacted]

↑ Index

60. Steve Evans/Jennifer Moxley

Freely Espousing

Sun 15 Jan 1995

Regarding our announcement of Freely Espousing, an event in defense of the NEA to take place on January 28th, we can now provide names and phone numbers for contact persons in two West Coast cities.

Craig Foltz is the San Diego contact. His phone number is [redacted]. Craig graduated from UCSD and is currently in the MFA program at San Diego State. He co-edits a zine called)39.

Kevin Magee is the San Francisco contact. His phone number is [redacted]. Kevin's book, Tedium Drum, was recently published by Lyric&. Kevin and his partner, Myung Mi Kim, have just started a monthly Salon de Refuse in SF and have been kind enough to let us build off the organization already in place because of their iniative.

Craig and Kevin have undertaken to serve as initial points of contact and organization in their respective cities, but both could use a hand--especially from people in their areas with access to the Internet. If you are interested, either contact them directly, or send a post to us and we'll put you in touch with them.

We hope to have established contact people in other cities in the next few days. If there is a critical mass of already (or almost) organized writers & artists in your area, please consider mobilizing with us on the 28th.

Finally, we are trying to build a list of texts that in some way exist because of NEA monies so that people can begin compiling materials for the "read-in." If you can take ten minutes to scan your minds and libraries for work that can be included on a skeleton-list of such texts, your suggestions would be greatly appreciated. Just post to us off-list and we will make sure a master copy gets compiled and distributed to the contact people in various cities.

Thanks to everyone and remember, Freely Espouse today or Forcibly Emigrate tomorrow.

Jennifer Moxley & Steve Evans
[redacted]

↑ Index

61. Charles Bernstein
Eric Mottram: In Memorium
Mon 16 Jan 1995

Martin Luther King, Jr. Day, 1995
3:45pm NYC time

Eric Mottram died this morning in London. Tom Raworth just phoned me, just while Allen Fisher was phoning Pierre Joris, both telling us that Eric had died four to five hours ago from multiple infections. He had been hospitalized a day or two ago.

Eric turned 70 on this past December 29.

From the introduction to Alive in Parts of this Century: Eric Mottram at 70, just out from North and South Press:

"Eric Mottram is one of the most important figures of post-war literature and teaching. He was the first to teach Beat writing in Europe in the 1950s, the first teacher of American Studies at the University of London, and a co-founder of the Institute of United States Studies in the University of London in 1963. He edited Poetry Review in 1972-75, ran the King's Poetry Series in 1967-80 and co-edited The New British Poetry (1988). He has had two dozen collections of poetry published since the late 1960s including Elegies, A Book of Herne and Selected Poems. [*Selected Poems (1989) Alive in Parts of This Century, both from North and South, are available from Small Press Distribution.] His essay collections include The Algebra of Need, the first essay full study of William Burroughs, and Blood on the Nash Ambassador, a selection of essays.

An indefatigable supporter of the most adventurous, inventive, and socially engaged poetry of the UK and USA, Mottram introduced at least two generations of poets to poetry hidden from view by the a literary establishment, on both sides of the Atlantic that, in Mottram's words, promoted a conformist poetry decoration and decorum. Mottram's own uncompromising poetry demonstrated how poetry can be political without sacrificing formal investigation. As Pierre Joris wrote of Eric's poetry -- this is work of "gut passion, crystal clarity of intellect."

For Alive in Parts of This Century, Pierre Joris chose lines (almost all) from Eric Mottram's work for his contribution. (The format of the poem was disrupted in e-conversion; it should be flush right.)

HOMAGE/COLLAGE FOR ERIC MOTTRAM @ 70

1. ...I am searching unceasingly for my own discovery"
2. it takes leisure to be a man is revolution
3. granddad, why are they all whispering?
4. this is not what I want to do, I want to know
5. an image an open hand with things in it
6. the result of composed ascent
7. concepts as modes of ordering
8. performance as what is revealed, moving outwards
9. the embryonic form of organisation
10. laughter of naked bathers
11. of transformed beings returned to the steep sea
12. break the mesh that grips us
13. an errand in wilderness
14. consult a good bookseller as to whether a book is
15. the fields of exchange
16. back there at origins a travelling forward soul springs up
17. the waterfall the illuminating gas
18. I hope this list will be regarded as an open
19. do you enter space from edges by intersecting lines
20. you eat light your eyes carry
21. a parenthesis of what is to be known
22. but a gun to show that he was a faithful private
23. in liberty a space of flame between us
24. Social roles, rituals, taboos, manners and conventions are boundaries of
25. their bark and moan songs of the story tellers
26. believe that in offering a candid account of himself he creates
27. to chose insecurity
28. gather surprise among limestone turf plants
29. The clearest example of work which actually leapt out of the area of
30. knows that the naturally depraved yearns to be a policeman
31. trample workers
32. Intelligent ones should generate the excellent Bodhi-mind

33. when creatures learn brain nucleic acids change
34. our nostrils move we stride on a hill curve air moves
35. from then on my road meets everymanUs road from the south of solitude
36. shieldless venture in adventure / we dare in the undaring sea
37. tracks laid down underwater
38. from seperate existence/this bites in my mouth your kiss
39. "Collage-design method is, as he puts it, 'transformation.' It is similar
40. neck erect for songs at a high level space/
41. on each cusp spandrel corbel lovers beside angels
42. have you woken up mad with information
43. against fluted pillars the grainy dark of news
44. "the subversions of his own power and confidence"
45. tokens of myself brought here up through clay and soil
46. so a tongue breaks words it assumed memorized
47. the balance acts refuse sacrifice the waste loneliness
48. from a man half through our wall strides towards us parts us / and
49. few leaves touch to live a difference of breath
50. satori
51. determined not to disappear
52. living in a world more or less homicidal and desperately mercantile
53. "gut passion, crystal clarity of intellect: two energies, two modes"
54. the work: encounter between and consolidation
55. he returns me to his head
56. here rewrite the message that is you
57. shaken by the fire and darkness of his time I lived the lives of others
58. friends we need to believe
59. whereby I lived, and moved, and had my being aboard the
60. media prisons through terrors of recognition
61. three kinds of silence and movement in the long wind-strung day
62. "Mottram demonstrates how poetry can be political without"
63. a liberation into power
64. of leisure without guilt
65. shards in winter Night in Tunisia
66. fertile to recognize resemblance
67. a man goes forth stops in the sun
68. beneath light surface fold on fold
69. we to whom the world is our native country
70. "figures always foreboded, awaited, and loved rise into view"

↑ Index

62. Evans/Moxley
Re: Freely Espousing
Mon 16 Jan 1995

Two more cities now have contact people for Freely Espousing on January 28th.

Jena Osman produced incredible results in Buffalo, garnering a sponsor (National Association of Artists Organizitions) and a site (Hallwalls Gallery) within about thirty minutes on a legal holiday!
If you don't hear from Jena first, get in touch with her via e-mail ([redacted]) or phone ([redacted]).

In Milwaukee, Woodland Pattern had already planned a marathon fund-raising reading for the 28th. Bob Harrison is discussing with them ways of linking the events. He has also agreed to be a contact person for Milwaukee. His net address is [redacted]. His phone numer is [redacted] (home).

In San Diego, Cole Heinowitz has joined Craig Foltz in organizing things. Craig's number remains the one to use and we are currently working on hooking them up with someone on the net.

Two people wrote in from the vicinity of University of Virginia this afternoon, but neither felt they were in a position to organize something. Does anyone have a suggestion for a contact person in or near Charlottesville?

Several people have asked about ways to identify NEA recipients. The best way Jen and I have found (besides gossip) is the NEA Annual Report, in book form through 1990, fiche through 1993.
We found it in the Government Documents section of Brown's library (call no. NF 2.1:993).

A quick scan of the 1990 awards yields many familiar names, including Leslie Scalapino, Susan Howe, Steve Benson, Jimmy Santiago Baca, Lawson Inada, and Rosmarie Waldrop. Journals that received grants that year included
o-blek, Sulfur, Five Fingers Review, Conjunctions, Tyuonyi, Callaloo and others. Among the publishers there were Four Walls Eight Windows, Avenue B, Dalkey Archive, The Figures, Burning Deck. Small Press Traffic, Seque, Woodland Pattern, Beyond Baroque, Small Press Distribution, Minnesota Center for Book Arts, and the Poetry Project in NYC were all granted varying degrees of organization funding.

Different years of course tell different stories, and we have watched operations fold for lack of Endowment monies since 1990. Still it's worth having a browse over the history if you're not already familiar with it.

Right now we're working on writing a press release (never done that before), tracking down more precise information on how the Endowment will be dealt with in Appropriations, getting something going in DC and NYC. If anyone can provide tips on any of these fronts they will be deeply appreciated. We're also trying to re-write our initial post to this list for easy travelling on local b-boards etc.

Thanks to everyone who has helped so far!

Steve Evans & Jennifer Moxley

[redacted]

↑ Index

63. Marjorie Perloff

Re: Apex of the M

Mon 16 Jan 1995

Dear Friends: I was pleased to get the most recent Apex of the M and read the poetry with interest but I must say I was dismayed by the manifesto "The Contextual Imperative," put out by the editors.

Certainly, the post-language generation has every right to want to move in different directions--that's only logical--but the slight on the L poets vis-a-vis politics seems entirely misguided. The editors write "language poetry, in reproducing and mimicking the methods and language of contemporary capitalism, ultimately commits itself to the same anonymity, alienation, and social atomization of the subject in history that underlie capitalist geo-politics." And they go on to compare the language poets to Reagan, Bush, and Quayle! Come on now! Ron Silliman, Barrett Watten, Bob Perelman, Charles Berstein, (the most "political" of the L poets) reproducing and mikcing the language of contemp capitalism!? Just the opposite was/is true--these poets have worked very hard and put themselves on the line to break down language so that it couldn't function as the voice of "contemporary capitalism." At the same time, what about the editors? The sentence above is distinguishable from capitalist geo-politics??? How can it be when it is a tissue of cliches. The very phrases "contemporary capitalism," "social atomization" "capitalist geo-politics" are nothing but buzz words of the type one hears/sees on TV every minute. Whose capitalism? Japanese? U.S.? Serb? what's it really like? What "social atomization" precisely are we talking about? And let's look at that language in, say, Silliman's work and read it against Quayle's and see if it really IS like that.,

And then what in hell is 'radical transparency"? Literally, it means that language is absolutely see-through, which means what language you use doesn't matter because you want to get behind it to the Big Ideas. But the danger of doing this is that you start spouting the language of those "ruling classes throughout Western history" poets are supposedly oppsing.

At its best, Language poetry never valorized language "for its own sake" as the editors claim. Nor is it the case that theirs is the only or hegemonic way of writing. But if language poetry is to be attacked--and don't we have enough attacks from the dominant poetic discourses already?-- it had better be attacked in a more responsible way than it is here. That means informing oneself about what's really going on around the globe and not just throwing out phrases like "Reagan-Bush" or "triumph of capital"? If there's a blueprint for a new economic program let's hear what it is. In specifics. But surely, in the heyday of Newt Gingrich it's rather ineffectual to drop phrases like "triumph of capital".

A final question: who is to read the new revolutionary poetry (what it will be like remains to be seen) the editors advocate? Is poetry going to "deliver victims from the daily miseries inflicted by the politicians and the bourgeoisie?" How is this to happen? Certainly not via ignorance,as in the statement (page 7) about "wars of the West against Islam and in Asia." In Asia: Does China have no responsibility for 'wars in Asia"? Japan? and Islam:are the Islamic countries really just innocent victims of "the West"?

I would think "revolution," poetic or otherwise, would require a little more analytic rigor than what we see here.
Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

64. George Bowering
Re: Eric Mottram: In Memorium
Tue 17 Jan 1995

Dear Charles Thanks for the word on Eric Mottram. That is bad news. But I had no idea that he was 70 already. We grow up many and too fast. I was reading him earlier today!

GB

↑ Index

65. Tom Mandel
Re: Apex of the M
Tue 17 Jan 1995

I originally began this as a private message to Marjorie Perloff, to tell her she'd hit the nail on the head in her comments on the Apex intro, meaning to quote to her what Hobbes said of Spinoza - _I durst not have spoke so freely_ (that's a paraphrase, source not being handy), being a Language Poet myself (wch when it happened to me meant being in a loosely-(un)defined and altogether anonymous group of abt 15-20 folks but now means being in an altogether over-commented and literally undefinable crowd of ?3-500?), but have decided to make the comment openly, wanting to add one or two things...

1. To go from the introduction of the Apex issue in question to the work gathered therein is an interesting study. Mostly what's in the issue is the work of poets in mid-career, many of whom associated (i.e. _are associated_) with LP -- how can this so-called manifesto claim them for a next or new way?

2. I believe the editors must understand themselves to have chosen these poets in mid-career as illustrative of their (the editors') sense of where poetry needs to go now, as illustrative of the ideas in the introduction. Thus, the making of manifestos (manifesti?) and new movements is reduced from that of actually creating a new poetry to being a thoughtful editor. The surrealists too had their chosen forebears to bring forward (i.e. Lautreamont), but they were rescuing work wch had been neglected and even rejected not putting together a table of contents wch cd as easily have been found in Temblor in the late 80's (obviously, _somewhat_ different) or Oblek in the earlier 90's. Moreover, the relative proportion of forebears (a few) to active perpetrants of the revolutionary new poetry (a triple handful) seems more appropriate than in the case of Apex volume.

3. Thus new tendencies in poetry as the acts of editors? Sorry, I don't think so. It's hard not to see in this volume a 2d chapter in a different town of the intentions of the editors of ACTS in SF who invented a term _analytic lyric_ which they wished to counterpose to Language Poetry, then went around telling everybody that this was what they wrote. I remember asking Benjamin Hollander (along with David Levi Strauss, the editor of ACTS) what the term meant. Mostly, his answer was that it was what I was writing! (I and others, of course - I don't mean they were vaunting me in particular) No thanks, Benjamin, I'm a language poet -- i.e. my work, wherever it goes and whoever it attracts the attention of, is historically located in that tendency. If I write rhymed couplets I'll be a langpo who does so (well,... that's _a little_ over-simplified, tho not as much as one might think: I mean it's an ostensively defined term, supplemented with interpretations wch are motivated by a desire to see our work somehow together. there's little else in common between say me and say Bruce Andrews who is a dear, old friend and comrade, or Ron or Lyn; in some sense I believe we will desire our works to be buried in a common historical grave).

4. The test of the Surrealist manifesto was the work of Breton, Eluard, Peret, Aragon, Desnos, et. al., not the validity of the ideas in the manifesto, somehow interpreted in the presence of some other test but absent the test of new work. I don't for a minute doubt the gifts or motivation of the poets who edit Apex. It would have been better, however, to place the intro before a volume of new writers who simply blew one away (and, gentle reader, you cannot imagine how intently I - and most other language poets I know, tho not all surely - await this experience), where its rodomontade, its stuffy certainties abt historical directions/needs, its empty rejection of the exact social and economic matrix which enabled it (doesn't anybody read the Communist Manifesto anymore? viz. its eloge of capitalism?) -- in such a context, all these qualities would be irrelevant in the face of the experience of a new poetry. A new poetry. We always want a new poetry.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

66. Tom Mandel
Re: Freely Espousing
Tue 17 Jan 1995

This is great.

Just got the list of this year's nea poetry fellowship awardees - got and threw away, alas, so all I can report is that Wang Ping (whom I only know as a name mentioned earlier in this same week in aconversation in NY) and Alice Notley received fellowships. Mine was a quick scan, so there are probably others whom we might know and contact on the subject.

Surely, there shd be a DC aspect to this event. I can't volunteer to organize it, but do you all have addresses for Rod Smith, Joe Ross, Buck Downs, Mark Wallace or others who may be able to undertake it? I'm assuming so (and Mark and Joe at least are on this forum...).

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

67. Robert Kelly
Re: Eric Mottram: In Memorium
Tue 17 Jan 1995

Please let us honor Eric, in text and memory. How about May Day in New York, to honor the political power of his work, all his work? When Pierre called and told me of Eric's death, I thought of a day in London when Eric chided me for climbing to the top of St Pauls---bad for the health. The man cared. And knew. I wonder if any AMerican can see our work as clearly and compassionately and all round, as he did.

RK

↑ Index

68. Tom Mandel
Mottram : In Memory's Hum
Tue 17 Jan 1995

> _The issue is the orphic difference... between the perpetuation of myth, and its agents, and the freedom of the creative process...._
>
> _Towards Design in Poetry_ / p.24

more and more people will never have known more and more people.

Tom Mandel

↑ Index

69. peter quartermain
Text of Robert Duncan Selected Poems
Tue 17 Jan 1995

I have just finished a fairly detailed draft catalogue of problems, puzzles, errors, and the like of the first 44 pages of the New Directions edition of Robert Duncan: _Selected_Poems_. The format of this list (14 pages in hard copy) is severely distorted by e-mail conversion so I cannot post it here. If anyone out there wants a copy, please let me know and I'll send it as soon as I can print one off for you. A couple of bucks ((on receipt) to cover xerox and postage is not necessary but would be helpful, especially if about fifty people want one.

Let me point out, though, that unless we know the status of the copy-text, most of the "errors" I report might not be errors at all; I am however absolutely certain that the text of "For A Muse Meant" is seriously flawed, and that some of the dates are wrong. The textual history of _Medieval_Scenes_ is so complicated that it is simply impossible to say anything certain about the text in the _Selected_Poems_ of 1993, save that it agrees with that of _The_ First_Decade_, published in 1968. From the discussion in _Medieval_Scenes_1950_and_1959 (text cross-checked against the original Centaur Press edition, for there are errors in the 1978 reprint), I'm certain that it is not the text of 1947, and almost certain that it is not that of 1950.

The most serious error in the book, for those who don't want the full treatment, is the substitution of "however" for "hoverer" in the 8th line of "For A Muse Meant" (pp. 35-37), and the printing of a page-wide rule in the middle of the poem (towards the foot of page 36), interrupting the text in a nonsensical way. This is a carryover from the Jargon Press edition of _Letters_: the page-wide rule is at a page break; it separates the footnote from the body of the text. The stanza itself continues without a break through that line, so you need to close up that final line of the stanza: "a con glomerations without rising".

Most of the other errors are of lineation, punctuation and capitalisation, and so forth, with some quite seriously misleading dates in the table of contents. Without knowing what copy text was used in preparing this edition, it is impossible to sort out or estimate the accuracy of this text. New Directions, to whom I have sent this schedule, is no doubt gnashing its collective teeth.

Peter Quartermain

Peter Quartermain
128 East 23rd Avenue voice and fax [redacted]
Vancouver
B.C. e-mail: [redacted]

Canada V5V 1X2

↑ Index

70. krickjh

Congress again

Wed 18 Jan 1995

Dear Poetics folk:

More info on Congressional Web access follows, this time from Teddy Kennedy's office via Jim Warren of the GovAccess list.

Jack Krick

CapWeb: A Guide to Congress on the WWW

Thu, 12 Jan 95 09:16:45 EST
From [redacted]

CapWeb is an "unauthorized" hypertext guide to Congress on the World Wide Web. Committee assignments, contact information including phone numbers, fax, e-mail addresses, state delegation lists, and party rosters are among the information that is available for every member of the Senate and House of Representatives.

CapWeb will collect and maintain links to information being provided by individual members of Congress on the Internet; the Library of Congress and other Congressional agencies; state governments; political parties and other related resources.

CapWeb is part of Policy.Net, a service of Issue Dynamics, Inc. and can be found at: http://policy.net

kennedy.senate.gov /''''\ http://www.ai.mit.edu/people/casey/casey.html /_____\
|@@@@@@@@|
202/[redacted] ||0||0||0|

Office of Senator Kennedy _____/_____ " " " "
"_____/_____
Washington, DC 20510 {|| || || || || ____/_____||
|| || || ||}
_____{||_||_||_||_||____/______||_
||_||_||_||}__

[I wouldn't normally include such an baroque "sig-file," but this is so novel that I tho't I'd inflict it on yer email. --jim]

↑ Index

71. Joe Ross
Re: Freely Espousing
Wed 18 Jan 1995

On Tue, 17 Jan 1995, Tom Mandel wrote:

> Surely, there shd be a DC aspect to this event. I can't volunteer to organize it, but do you all have addresses for Rod Smith, Joe Ross, Buck Downs, Mark Wallace or others who may be able to undertake it? I'm assuming so (and Mark and Joe at least are on this forum...).
>
> Tom Mandel

Tom et. al. - -

It is already in the works - details to follow . . . .

Joe Ross

↑ Index

72. Pierre Joris
Re: call for work for interface 10 (fwd)
Wed 18 Jan 1995

Forwarded message:
> From interfac Sun Jan 15 14:22:01 1995
> From: Interface Ejournal <interfac>
> Message-Id: <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: call for work for interface 10
> To: joris (Pierre Joris)
> Date: Sun, 15 Jan 1995 14:21:57 -0500 (EST)
> In-Reply-To: <[redacted]> from "Pierre Joris" at Ja

> X-Mailer: ELM [version 2.4 PL23]
> Content-Type: text
> Content-Length: 1740
>
>
> Call for Work
> Women on the Net(work) > inter\face Electronic Literary Magazine
>
>
> VOICES
>
> Voices to the left > to the right > near > and far > rise up and be numbered.
>
> Resurrect the voices past and present,
> those lost from constant screaming,
> those buried in layers of silence.
> Summon them to rise as phoenixes > and proclaim
> "I am woman." I, am woman.
> --Tanya Manning
>
> "Women on the Net(work)" is the focus for inter\face's tenth > issue (coming Spring 1995). This issue is especially dedicated to > providing women writers an electronic forum for the multiplicity of > their voices. Metaphorically the title "Women on the Net(work) stands > for the magazine operating as a net to catch the multiplicity of writings > by women that may typically go unknown.
> The search for subjects and forms of discourse are unrestricted.
> Whether you write in a "technological/mechanical" voice or > "renaissance/romantic" style, we're interested. Whether your poems or > stories are of topical relevance to politics or race relations, women's > rights or women's magic, sexual orientation or erotica, or anything > unmentioned, we want you to contribute your work.
> The criteria for this issue is simple. To preserve the writer's > integrity and promote the writer as publisher, editing of content is > minimal. In the spirit of accepting "contributions" as opposed to > "submissions," we believe in your right as a writer to say whatever > you want to say in the way you want to say it. However, we do ask of > you to limit for publishing fairness your contributions to three > separate pieces. Please send your entries no later than February 14, > 1995 to [redacted]. For more information, please contact > Tanya Manning at [redacted].

>

==========
========== Pierre Joris | He who wants to escape the world, translates it. Dept. of English | --Henri Michaux SUNY Albany | Albany NY 12222 | "Herman has taken to writing poetry. You tel&fax:[redacted] | need not tell anyone, for you know how email: | such things get around." [redacted]| --Mrs. Melville in a letter to her mother.
==========
==========

↑ Index

73. Chris Stroffolino

Re: Apex of the M

Wed 18 Jan 1995

Dear Tom--just how do you DEFINE a "poet in "mid-career""? This is delicious really. CS.

↑ Index

74. Steven Howard Shoemaker

JRNL: Poetry in the Margins, cont. (fwd)

Wed 18 Jan 1995

Forwarded message:
From daemon Wed Jan 18 09:25:51 1995
Date: Tue, 17 Jan 1995 23:05:07 -0500
From: "[redacted] \"Randy Bass\"" <[redacted]
Subject: JRNL: Poetry in the Margins, cont.
To: Multiple recipients of list T-AMLIT <[redacted]>

JRNL: T-AMLIT JOURNAL

Here are four more contributions (the first two fairly brief, the next two longer) to the thread of Poetry in the Margins.
RBass
****

(1)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "Carol A. Jago"
Subj: Poetry on the Margin

I was struck by the comment that poetry teachers should be good hosts. As I do with dinner guests, I try to offer my high school students some familiar poems but also some dishes they would never think of trying but so obviously related to what they know or care about that they taste. Slipping a little fried squid in with the shrimp.

In one class where I ask students to write tabloid pieces to actual headlines from the Enquirer and Globe (oh, you know, RMan Glues His Butt Shut" and such), I slipped in a Lucille Clifton poem:

them and us something in their psyche insists on elvis slouching into markets, his great collar high around his great head, his sideburns extravagant, elvis, still swiveling those negro hips. something needs to know that even death, the most faithful manager can be persuaded to give way before real talent, that it is possible to triumph forever on a timeless stage surrounded by lovers giving the kid a hand.

we have so many gone. history has taught us much about fame and its inevitable tomorrow. we ride the subways home from the picture show, sure about death and elvis, but watching for marvin gaye.

Poetry is just part of what we do in class. No big deal. You like this one, I like that one. It seldom feels difficult. Slips down like yellow peppers in oil.

Carol Jago, Santa Monica High School in soggy California

(2)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "LISA M. HOGELAND" Subj: Jrnl: Poetry on the Margins, Cont.

If it's not already beaten to death, I have a small thought. Why do we assume that "participation" in poetry need be writing it? I have students who claim to hate poetry precisely because they cannot imagine ever writing it (and they frequently refuse to write about it because they cannot imagine writing it). Why not participation as readers? I'm a movie junkie, but that doesn't make me want to be an actor (or even a director); I'm deeply interested in poetry, but no longer write it (one less bad poet is no tragedy). The work of readers is not to be despised or dismissed; for some students, the role of reader (and critic) is more enabling than the role of author. Lisa Maria Hogeland Univ. of Cincinnati

(3)
From: IN%"[redacted]" 13-JAN-1995 08:52:00.53
Subj: RE: Poetry on the Margins

Putting aside the question of whether poetry is any more on the margins than novels or drama, here's my two-cents-worth. Students have more difficulty reading poetry (and are less likely to take poetry courses) because they are taught early on that they CAN'T read it. The two main culprits--and words which have come to haunt me as a teacher--are Symbols and Themes.

Ask a student (try this--I guarantee it will work), "what's the theme of Frost's 'The Road Not Taken'?" and he or she will tell you that the "theme" is that we need to dance to the beat of a different drummer (or some such variant), to boldly go where no man has gone before, and follow our hearts and be an artist. Ask then, "and what are the symbols in this poem?" and the student will dutifully tell you that the Road, of course, is the main symbol and that it symbolizes that road in life that few people dare to travel, the path off the beaten track that only poets go down.

Now especially since when you actually READ the poem, you discover that there's almost no difference between the two roads ("Though as for that, the passing there / Had worn them really about the same"), how do students come to these conclusions? They come to them because they were told that's what the poem MEANS (where's Archibald MacLeish when you really need him). They are told over and over that poetry (in fact, all literature) must be reduced to some moral lesson, formulable in a sentence and that they keys to these formulae are symbols--mysterious words whose true meanings are known only to English teachers, who no doubt are given some secret Book of Symbols upon graduation from English Ed. programs. Read Frost's own "Education By Poetry" and see what he has to say about these ideas.

Even if we offer students more sophisticated versions of themes and symbols, we need to recognize as teachers when we are telling students what some thing means as opposed to allowing them to generate meanings. In other words, are we supplying students with the contexts in which they can build their own readings of poems or are we telling them particular allegories of meaning without showing them the contexts and ideas that foster those allegories? I think, particularly with poetry, we tell them the meaning and in doing so tell them the poem means something other than what it directly says--something they can't possibly know, because they can't possibly know as much as we do (about culture, about literature, about history, about oppression, . . . you fill in the blank). In other words, I think poetry highlights issues of power and interpretation in the classroom in ways that other genres perhaps avoid. At the very least, students feel better able to read other kinds of literature.

Sorry if all this sounds a bit shrill, but I needed to get it off my chest.

Brian A. Bremen
William Carlos Williams Review
Department of English
The University of Texas, Austin Phone: [redacted]
Austin, TX 78712-1164 Fax: [redacted]

(4)
From: IN%"[redacted]" "Pam Dane"
Subj:

> I have been reading the posting about poetry with enjoyoment. All of the discussions highlight the fun that I thought academic life might offer, but often doesn't. Now I would like to add my thoughts on the subject. First of all it is interesting that only males have been participating in this discussion. Are women also on the electronic "margins?' Next, it seems to me that poetry is not on the margins in academia--in fact, school is the one place where poetry is mainstream! Where elso do so many people aread Wordsworth and Olds? In English departments, poetry is one of the staples--you know the canon. You can't leave school without so to speak. Unlike some of the other "posters" (is that the correct term?), I find students usually enljoy poetry---it's short and fast to read (not meaning that it's easy of course). Seriously, students do enljoy poetry and I don't think it is important for them to understand all of the symbols and allusions in order to love poems. In fact, If anything marginalizes poetry, it is teachers who insist that in order to "really understand" poetry you must memorize different rhyme schemes, symbols, etc. or you can't possibly read poetry. Why not just let studnets readl, discuss, write, and then read some more? I ask my students to adopt a poet. they must find a living poet who is publishing today and then present his/her poetry to the class. They write papers on theirs poet's poetry. Then I mank a book of all of the poems for the class. This works really well. I also have them buy books of poetry--let's support our poets--Rich, Love, Stafford, etc. Finally I assign them to attend a poetry reading. I also have poets attend my classes. Another thought, if poetry is marginalized, then what about all of the poetry slams. Poetry readings are widely attended in my town. Olds had standing room only.
>
> Finally a question to Petrosky--I used lyour Ways of REading as a test in my comp classes. If lyou teach poetry in your comp classes, then why isn't there any poetry in lyour book? I know Rich is there, abut she > is included as an essayist. Also how does poetry work in your comp classes with your writing philosophy.

>
> Pam Dane

↑ Index

75. Evans/Moxley
Freely Espousing Update
Wed 18 Jan 1995

What follows is a longish post updating people on Freely Espousing. Please refer any questions to us or to the Contact person nearest you (cf.
earlier posts giving that information).

WASHINGTON DC

As Joe Ross hinted earlier today, and as we can confirm now, Washington D.C. is the sixth city to join in our manifestation of support for the NEA/NEH. You can contact Joe at:
redacted, redacted, redacted.
His net address is [redacted]. His street address is 1719 S Street NW#2, Washington DC, 20009.

Mark Wallace has also agreed to be a DC contact.
His phone number is redacted. His net address is [redacted].

Our thanks to both Joe and Mark!

The DC events will take place at Willow St. Gallery.
Contact Joe or Mark for specifics.

LEGISLATIVE UPDATE

Most of you will have heard by now that the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources (Chair, Nancy Kassebaum, R-KS) will begin hearing testimony regarding the Endowment on Tuesday, January 24th. We are told the Jane Alexander will testify the first day. If you were putting off writing a letter to the editor, you may wish to draft one now so that your local paper has something to hand when the NEA becomes "news" next week.

You may also have heard that the House Budget Committee, chaired by John Kasich (R-OH), is currently making rescisions in FY95--i.e. cutting monies from programs that have already been allocated funds for this year. Keep a very close eye on the activities of this Committee, which is effectively serving as Newt's assassination team.

BLIND SPOTS IN OUR ORGANIZING

Given the rush, it's not surprising that there remain a number of places around the country where support such as we're seeing in the six cities already organized (with NYC, a seventh, still a few phone calls away from being "in") exists but is unreachable by us.

Joe Ross reminded us this morning that Texas, Ohio, and Georgia are KEY places in which to rally support. Any suggestions on how to get something going there would be vastly appreciated. Even though ten days may prove too short notice to bring something off on the 28th, there's nothing wrong with bringing something together for the following weekend, etc.

PRESS RELEASE

With the help of Kit Robinson, we have finally composed a press release, which we will post separately to the list. We recommend that Contact people download the release and supplement it with local information. Of course, the release could also be used for re-posting to local bulletin boards and so forth. Please feel free to use, alter, or ignore the release, depending on the complexion events are taking on where you're at.

EXPLOITING A STEREOTYPE OR TWO

I don't know about other areas, but here in Providence several people have shown interest in two fairly incidental points about this event. 1) It is being organized by people in what the media call "gen x" (and not, e.g., by professional art bureaucrats); and (2) the Internet is involved.

If it makes the difference between getting your event covered or not, Jen and I think you should consider playing to the current buzz-words on these two points. Just a thought.

ALBANY

We know many people in the Eastern part of the country are going to be in Albany for a gathering this coming weekend. Neither of us will be able to make it, but we hope that the incredibly e-literate bunch at Albany can keep us posted any developments, discussions, thoughts people are having about Freely Espousing during the weekend.

HERE IN PROVIDENCE

An Ad-Hoc Committee of Literary Publishers, consisting of Burning Deck, Lost Roads, Paradigm, Tender Buttons, Garlic Press, and the Impercipient, should exist by sometime tomorrow. Rosmarie Waldrop (Burning Deck) and C.D. Wright (Lost Roads) have been working hard with Jennifer and I to handle the local details.

AND REMEMBER OUR MOTTO: FREELY ESPOUSE TODAY OR FORCIBLY EMIGRATE TOMORROW

Regards to all,

Steve Evans and Jennifer Moxley
[redacted]

↑ Index

76. Evans/Moxley
Press Release
Wed 18 Jan 1995

For Immediate Release

Contact: Steve Evans
[redacted]

ARTISTS AND WRITERS ORGANIZE TO DEFEND NEA, NEH

Events Planned in Six Cities to Protest Attack on Arts Groups

19 January 1995, Providence--In response to strong indications that the Republican-controlled 104th Congress intends to summarily eliminate federal funding for the arts and humanities through the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) and the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH), writers, artists, scholars, and concerned citizens in a half-dozen American cities have organized Freely Espousing, a day of events manifesting support for public arts funding on Saturday, January 28, 1995.

Begun on the initiative of two Rhode Islanders (the home state of Senator Clairborne Pell, architect of the 1965 legislation that created the NEA/NEH), the idea has spread quickly--partly through use of the Internet--to San Diego, San Francisco, Milwaukee, Washington D.C., Buffalo, and New York City.

Providence organizers Steve Evans and Jennifer Moxley chose the name Freely Espousing to underscore the vital role of the arts in a democratic society and to call attention to what they identify as a lack of rational public debate on a host of issues currently being forced through Congress under the leadership of House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole.

The centerpiece of Freely Espousing events throughout the country will be a marathon "read-in" of literary works whose creation the NEA has facilitated in its thirty-year existence. A variety of speakers and round-tables are also planned.

APPEND LOCAL INFORMATION HERE / ALSO, CORRECT HEADER INFORMATION ABOVE (PERHAPS GIVING EVANS/MOXLEY IN PROVIDENCE AS SECOND CONTACT?)

↑ Index

77. Loss Glazier

Electronic Poetry Center Newsletter #1

Wed 18 Jan 1995

```
    ____    ____   ____
   /   /   /   / /   /
   EEEE   PPPPP  CCCCC
   EE /   PP PP  CC  C/
   EEE    PPPPP  CC   /        URL=gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/
  __EE  /_ PP |__ CC  C ____
 /  EEEE/  PP/    CCCCC/    /    internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift
/_________________________/
|-------------------------|
| Electronic Poetry Center |
|_________________________|
```

E P C . N E W S

No. 1 (January, 1995)

Contents:

1.0 Basic Assumptions
2.0 Poetry and the Electronic Place
3.0 Interfaces: Gopher, Web, Mosaic; Bookmarks

4.0 RIF/T Notes
5.0 EPC New Additions
6.0 How to Connect

1.0 Basic Assumptions

The Electronic Poetry Center seeks to provide a central _place_ for Internet resources for poetry and poetics.

The lay of the land:

1.__Welcome : Electronic Poetry Center Welcome & FAQ's (About)/
2.__RIF/T : RIF/T / New Poetry, Prose, & Poetics (Texts)/
3.__Poetics : Calendar, Poetics List Archive & Files (Texts)/
4.__Authors : Electronic Poetry & Poetics - Authors (Texts)/
5.__E-Journals : Gateway to Electronic Poetry Journals (Texts)/
6.__E-Resources : Gateway to Electronic Poetry Resources (Connects)/
7.__Small Press : Electronic Poetry Center Small Press Alcove (Cites)/
8.__Gallery : The Electronic Poetry Gallery (Visuals)/
9.__Sound : The Electronic Poetry Sound Room (Sound Files)/
10._Documents : Poetry & Poetics Document Archive (Texts)/
11._Exhibits : Electronic Poetry Center Exhibit case (Texts)/
12._Notices : Electronic Poetry Center Announcements (Info)/

The Center continues to provide access to the electronic poetry and poetics journal, RIF/T, and the archives of the Poetics List. Needless to say, the EPC provides quality archival materials for these resources. For the Poetics archive, a feature has recently been added to allow keyword searching for the immense number of files comprising this archive.

The EPC author library offers texts and/or information about contemporary poets in a variety of formats.

A number of electronic journals are archived and distributed by the EPC. Journals distributed through the EPC differ from other e-journal archives in a significant way: the texts presented here have been checked and verified by their issuing agency, thus at least getting to you versions of electronic journals that have a direct link to their source. We are delighted to offer these journals to you and will continue to make sure texts presented are done so in collaboration with their producers. For resources outside the EPC, we have written links to make seamless connections to these resources. It is our aim to be vigilent about our links so that persons interested in poetry and poetics do not have to spend a lot of time digging for addresses, remembering sites, and locating resources. Through the selections available at the EPC, users of the system have simple and direct access to many other related Internet resources.

The Center also provides information about contemporary little magazines and small presses engaged in poetry and poetics. Since this information is often difficult to locate, it is presented at the EPC in hopes of recongizing these contributions, facilitating communication, and providing an additional outlet for these extremely valuable print sources. Look here also for Selby's List of Experimental Magazines.

The Poetry & Poetics Document Archive provides access to a number of documents of use to poets, teachers, and researchers. Here you will find essay material and current obituaries. This area should be consulted in conjunction with the Poetics Files and Small Press Sources areas, which also offer material of pedagogical use.

The EPC also presently offers gallery, sound, exhibts, and an announcements area.

2.0 Poetry and the Electronic Place

Compared to say, a year ago, many people might agree that the idea of some sort of an electronic forum for poetry is not only a possibility but an inevitability. We have seen the continued growth of the Poetics List (I counted around 250 postings the month of December 1994 alone) and the development of the Electronic Poetry Center. The EPC has maintained a significant circulation. We regularly get letters from various world outposts attesting to the reality of such connectivity. Interesting also are the number of visits taking place, both locally and across distance; despite the dips and peaks that typify any active place, the EPC has seen a good amount of traffic across its doorstep. For those with such inclination (and it is illuminating that the following compare favorably with circulation statistics, say, for a little magazine) here are some numbers:

Month	_Connects_
Nov 1994	573
Oct 1994	429
Sep 1994	367
August 1994	348
July 1994	614
June 1994	110

These statistics give only a sense of scale, it should be noted, since direct connections to EPC submenus and entries through Veronica searches, a significant number of connects, are not included in the above statistics.

3.0 Interface: Gopher, Web, Mosaic

Even as activities converge, it is also the time of divergent interfaces. I am often surprised by the number of our contributors and participants who do not even have gopher access. (These, again, not represented in the above statistics.) Most people, we figure, have at least gopher access, though Web access is quickly becoming a standard. Mosaic, it would be assumed, though assuming predominance in the University setting, has hardly become a reality for most dial-up users, particularly internationally. (For the sake of a common ground, gopher is an ascii-based interface that offers access through the selection of menus; the web is an ascii-based interface that offers access through _screens_ of information with links to other areas appearing as highlighted text; Mosaic is a graphical interface basically superimposed on the Web structure that offers images, sound, video, and allows you to use your mouse as a navigational tool.) The EPC is accessible through any of these interfaces. It is presently evolving strongly towards exclusive Web/Mosaic access.

Informational Notes: (1) The standard for Web/Mosaic documents is the markup protocol called html. These are imbedded codes that you will see once in a while when you download an html document. These codes give instructions to the software about highlighting, fonts, and screen layout, as well as providing for the _hot links_ that make possible Web/Mosaic navigation. (2) A feature of these interfaces that should be mentioned is the bookmark. You may wish to investigate this as most systems allow you to set a bookmark, say at the EPC, and gain immediate access to it when you invoke your interface.

4.0 RIF/T Notes

Forthcoming from RIF/T are two special issues. The first of these is the Transpoeisis issue (see EPC Announcements for details) which will offer a muti-faced and multi-format approach to the presentation of translations. Also forthcoming, a planned special issue on Charles Olson. RIF/T will also soon issue the first in a series of special chapbooks. Much on the way!

5.0 EPC New Additions

Many additions have been made to the EPC in the past six months. Following are some of the journals archived and directly distributed by the EPC:

DIU / Albany
Experioddi(cyber)cist / Florence, AL
Inter\face / Albany
Poemata - Canadian Poetry Assoc. / London, Ontario (Info)/
RIF/T: Electronic Space for New Poetry, Prose, & Poetics
Segue Foundation/Roof Book News / New York
TREE: TapRoot Electronic Edition / Lakewood, Ohio
We Magazine / Santa Cruz
Witz / Toluca Lake, CA / via Syntax

Significant connections which the EPC would like to highlight include the following:

Alternative-X
Basil Bunting Poetry Centre (Durham, England) [Informational]
Best-Quality Audio Web Poems (Rhode Island)
Carma Bums 'Tour of Words'
CICNET Electronic Journal Archive
Institute for Advanced Technology in the Humanities (Virginia)
Internet Poetry Archive (North Carolina)
Michigan Electronic Text Archive
Nous Refuse Discussion List (Illinois)
Postmodern Culture (North Carolina)
Whole Earth 'Lectronic Magazine

6.0 How to Connect

The Center is located at gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/ library/e-journals/ub/rift

Gopher Access: For those who have access to gopher, type
gopher writing.upenn.edu
at your system prompt. First choose Libraries & Library Resources, then Electronic Journals, then E-

Journals/Resources Produced Here At UB, then The Electronic Poetry Center. (Note: Connections to some Poetry Center resources require Web access, though most
are presently available through gopher).

World-Wide Web and Mosaic Access:
For those with World-Wide Web (lynx) or Mosaic access,
from your interface, choose the _go to URL_
option then go to (type as one continuous string)
gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/
library/e-journals/ub/rift

(Substituting hh for 11 in the URL above may produce better results on your system.)

Check with your system administrator if you have problems with access. Also ask about setting a "bookmark" through your system for quick and easy access to the Center when you log on.

If you have comments or suggestions about sites to be added to the Center, do not hesitate to contact Loss Pequen~o Glazier, [redacted] or Kenneth Sherwood, [redacted]

The Electronic Poetry Center is administered in Buffalo by E-Poetry
and RIF/T in coordination with the Poetics List.

Loss Pequen~o Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood and Loss Glazier
in collaboration with Charles Bernstein

End of EPC.News #1

↑ Index

78. Joe Amato
apex of the m...
Thu 19 Jan 1995

---

i felt i just had to weigh in here (& apologies in advance for a long post)

with a sort of 'outsider's' response to marjorie's & tom's posts... it'll soon become apparent that my outside is another's inside & another's outside & another's inside-outside... the phenomenology is necessarily blurred, as are the borders... there's much in what both marjorie & tom say with which i find myself in essential agreement... but i believe there's a number of things that have gone unsaid, specifically in these regions, re this issue of how to address the (as i take it, ongoing) phenomenon of poetry, language poetry in particular (& i don't see the point any longer of hedging over that term

---it's here to stay)... & because i'm somewhat on the margins, if you will, of this particular discourse as far as my poetics/poetry is concerned, i need to wax a bit autobiographical in order to situate my remarks some...

1. i came to poetry, formally, a little over a decade ago, deciding to leave
the engineering profession (& "deciding" is far too genteel a term) to pursue my desire to---as i understood it then & even to some extent now---SAY something... this is a terribly atheoretical way of putting it, i know, but fact is, the alphabet just happened to be the technology through which my saying was to take place... by way of placing things further: during approx.

the years charles b. was penning the items in his fascinating collection
_content's
dream_, i was busy running around a brand new brewery & an aging pharmaceutical plant with a hardhat, safety glasses & earplugs, trying to resolve corrupt labor practices on the construction site & still 'get the job done,' so to speak... trial by ordeal for a young guy in his early 20s, as male as it may sound to say so...

2. so i decided, like i say, at 29, to return to school, & under the able guidance of don byrd & judith johnson at suny/albany, i picked up my doctor of arts (yep) & hit the job market, eventually ending up a decade later here in chicago, at illinois institute of technology, teaching technical & professional writing... i bet some of you could have seen this coming, but i couldn't... anyway... point is that i get questions from my tech. students, even now, that conjure up my former institutional self, & set my teeth on edge as to what it is makes a writer tick... i'm still not sure i know...

3. & fact is, over the past decade, the academic job scene has become, as we all know, miserable... & the politics of the past decade, well... i mean, i came out of the early 70s... as i progressed more & more in my saying activity as a poet, i became more & more aware of the language poets, thanks largely to the liberal learning atmosphere at albany... in any case, the work itself, the poetry, struck me as incredibly difficult, strikingly different from what i had envisioned poetry to be...

i never quite came to aesthetic terms with works such as, say, ron silliman's _lit_---& i take this to be a mark of my own poetic limitations, tastes, etc. (but i'll come back to this question of how to evaluate aesthetic practice)... at the same time, i found myself engrossed in the sorts of debates over poetic practice that (had & have) emerged from this collective enterprise, & although i found the work, contextually speaking, a reaction in some ways to the political realities of the day (this is not a political assertion per se, but an aesthetic

assertion---& methinks one would be well-advised not to read political ethos too closely into aesthetic articulations), i nevertheless recognized that these folks were serious about what they were doing... & at the same time, it was clear to me that they were constructively self-conscious as to their respective institutional histories... they were, in all, i felt (& still feel) against the grain...

4. but the scene, the academic scene (as i've said) was getting tighter & tighter
job-wise... & in fact that the language poets were, relatively speaking, fully theorized (if for some, theoretically overdetermined) played well in light of the american academic tendency toward theory... at least, this is how i read the situation, in broad strokes... hence folks like charles bernstein

[sorry for picking on you, charles!] thankfully found their way into 'the academy'... &, i might add, this development was long overdue...

5. but my 'initiation,' if you will, into the community of language poets---& i'll refrain from speaking in terms of 'generation' & the like, & by 'initiation' i mean simply acquaintance/friendship & the like---didn't really come until march 1993, at the new coast conference... my colleague & friend here

andrew levy had been invited to speak, so i decided (again!) to attend to promote my own little venue.... there i stood during the day, my kinko-green sheets in hand
(as some of you may recall), trying to get participants interested in my electronic writing collective, nous refuse (juliana spahr & i had discussed

the electronic stuff electronically prior to the conference)... i found the general tenor of the conference, at the time, extremely exclusive at times... that is, i felt my place in the proceedings marginal at best, & i found the overarching discourse, what with presumptions as to a 'new coast," downright presumptuous...

in retrospect, this was a somewhat hasty judgement, to the extent that many folks at that conference knew each other, had shared histories, whereas i had no reason to expect these folks---strangers initially---to understand either me,

say,
or my electronic orientation ipso facto... but there was, i'll maintain, an (unintended) air at the conference, to one such as me, of self-importance---not perhaps entirely without warrant, but perhaps a bit off-putting initially to other sorts of aesthetic orientations... i mean, one can't be all things to all people, but then, i thought, just who were these people? (many of whom were a good deal younger than me, albeit no less equipped to discuss their craft)...

6. before i entirely alienate many of you out t/here, i wish to state as clearly as possible that the thing that's really struck me since march '93

has been the generosity of the folks i met at buffalo, thereby invalidating
my hasty evaluation as to 'exclusivity' & the like, at least in personal terms
... near everybody i met there, & have since met, who are linked in some way with that group (if i may) has been extremely interested in discussing & promoting poetic practice---alternative, mainstream, what have you... sometimes the discussions are heated, yes---but this need not be a sign of agon, simply of commitment... i've found the group in general to be among the most tolerant & supportive around when it comes to appreciating aesthetic diversity, whatever one's "taste" (& no, i don't wish to neutralize this latter category, simply to bracket it for a moment)... in fact it might be argued that this (now somewhat academically centered) group is far more tolerant than most academic press poetry groupings... i'll leave this latter speculation to this list's collective imagination...

7. but ysee, now that i've discussed Personalities-Writ-Large, as it were (hopefully in the process avoiding any unnecessary vitriole from whatever quarter, incl. mine) i need to come back to this issue of aesthetic practice---not 'vs. political practice,' not even 'as informed by political practice'---i wanna talk aethetics as such for a moment, and bracket for a change---not the social, but the political per se... i can't hope to lay out parameters here---this is not what i'm about, in any case... & i'm with tom as to the necessity of practicing what (& mebbe AS) you preach... but at the

meta-level, anyway: what i see the need for at the moment is less manifesto

(& this reverses my sentiments of a coupla years back) & more a discussion, in critical terms, of how to situate the artist/poet amid this increasingly academic environs... what is the purpose of poetry in shaping even,
for example,
the poetic part of one's world?... i'm a persistent promoter, on the one hand, of things electronic, & i might even be heard to drone on occasionally as to the more existential or pleasure-based or non-utilitarian value of the various pursuits in which i indulge myself... on the other hand, it's lost on me not for a nanosecond that this text, & those prompting it, come to you-us courtesy of our postsecondary institutions (similar such entities being where most of you are no doubt currently locating your corporeal & ethereal

selves)... along these lines, i'm reminded of charles' superb piece in alh last year,
"what's art got to do with it?" etc... we need more such work, motivated by such concerns...

8. perhaps we need more poetry too, a new poetry, as tom indicates, & despite whatever modernist misgivings i---we each---may have...

9. but perhaps, as well, situating the artist/poet as a member of a specific ecological or ontological or intellectual sect is somewhat less important than shaping new discourses---poetic-critical hybrids, creoles, what have you--- the point being that all forms of code-switching & mutating should be explored... & explored with at least some consideration given as to why one would wish to so explore as well as where one is, institutionally speaking, while exploring (& as michael joyce from the hypertext world would be quick

to point out, constructing)... what is the value of the alphabet in a world such as ours, such as ours is becoming?... & what do we do (if this is not too naive a question this late in the 20th. century) with the more oral basis for poetry, the idea of poetry 'readings'?... perhaps we need a better collective sense as to the history of readings of this latter variety, as opposed to the currently more popular tendency to read critical reception as a writing enterprise (?)... is this a political issue, strictly speaking (& i have the debates over literacy fluttering around in my head as i write this, as well as talk of discursive hegemonies of one sort or another), or is recourse to politics here merely one way of avoiding sustained discussion of the value of a specific aesthetic dimension? (& again, not that i wish to avoid either

ideology
or politics per se)...

10. & as to politics per se, & given the very real & recent concern evident in these regions as to the status of aesthetic practice in general in american society:
perhaps we need to work harder to convince folks outside of our more individualistic aesthetic pursuits that, whatever this our contested site, it's not a luxury...

joe amato
[redacted]
(line breaks courtesy of elm)

↑ Index

79. Mark Wallace
Re: Freely Espousing Update
Thu 19 Jan 1995

In regards to the "Freeley Espousing" event in Washington, D.C., my e-mail was incorrectly listed. I can be reached at [redacted]

Thanks

mark wallace

↑ Index

80. udle114
EM
Thu 19 Jan 1995

To all the friends of Eric Mottram:

This is just to keep you up to date with whatever is happening in London. Eric's family placed notices in the national papers that there will be a smallprivate cremation ceremony on the 25th of this month. They regret that it is not possible to have a ceremony open to all of Eric's friends but there will be a celebration of Eric's life and work in a few weeks time. To this all are welcome. The family have also asked that no flowers be sent - they hav asked instead for contributions to the Eric Mottram Trust Fund which they are planning to establish. The address for any donnations is The Eric Mottram Trust Fund 1 Sandford Close 72 The Avenue Beckenham Kent BR3 2ES United Kingdom

I am Shamoon Zamir at the Department of English at King's College, London. If you have any question or need further information please do not hesitate to contact me on e-mail or by phone or fax.

Shamoon Zamir
Department of English
King's College
Strand
London WC2R 2LS
United Kingdom

Phone: Country code + 71 [redacted]
Fax: country code + 71 [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

81. Christopher Reiner
Freely Espousing
Thu 19 Jan 1995

Have you heard from anyone in L.A. about a Freely Espousing event here? If not, I don't know if I could put one together single-handedly...but it might be worth a shot. This is not really a big town for poetry, as you might expect. But there are reading spaces, and there are poets (tho mostly the type that relate their bouts with bad drugs or bad dates). If someone else is doing an event, I'd be glad to help. If not, I'll do what I can.

--Chris Reiner

↑ Index

82. James Sherry

Re: apex of the m...

Thu 19 Jan 1995

The Apex if it's M exhibits the superficies of the dialectic and boy is the thesis the. But the seeds of the M in the L are multiple while the interpretation of the seeds by the M is faulty but understandable. The quotation which I have overused from Wittgenstein helps my explanation. "If we speak of a think, but there is no object that we can point to, there, we may say, is the spirit."

Those objectless things in the L include, but are not limited to, vaguely:

-the sign: the signified is not the thing, but the idea of the thing, -the body which is a constantly referenced thing but sex in most of the L is skirted to a spirit of the body by both the French and the L, and -Language itself which is constantly reified by the L writers;

and also create the hook by which the M writers can attach to L and attack. That these things are misinterpreted by the M writers need not be disputed to thwart the attacks by the L writers. They are the places where we have left openings for the next generation of artists. That the M takes unfair advantage of these ideas doesn't matter either, misinterpretation has already been valorized by the L.

The attacks by the M writers are particularly galling, but again represent the same tactic used by the L writers on the previous generation of NY School and Beat writing, although the M writers are less substantive in their attacks on the L than the L was on NY, but isn't that what the M is saying, so at the very least they are consistent.

The sad parts of the issue for me are the lack of recognition of these facts by the L and the unconsciousness of the M writers about the openings which they have left to be eviscerated by not only the next generation of writers whom we can conveniently dub... the Nth. They will rue the day they used the word spirit in their fashion when it is used to attack their right to write as they write. For that reason, the most egregious and annoying part of the M is how they have forgotten the lessons of the enlightenment exposing the weakness of spiritual allegiances and its institutions. But I guess we have to "pay to keep from going through all this twice."

James

↑ Index

83. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Freely Espousing Update
Thu 19 Jan 1995

Dear jennifer & Steve-- What about Philadelphia? When I lived there (1986-1992) we had gotten a pretty interesting scene together, most of whom seem to be gone now or at least not on line. There's Perelman who is on line, but he's probably too busy with school. Ditto no doubt for DuPlessis. maybe Gil Ott, is he still sick. Or Julia Blumenreich. I could senf you there mail (not email) addresses. Valerie Fox of the magazine 6ix is now in Japan. There's Mossin and the TO crowd but they're more aesthetes than politicos it seems. My friend Dave baratier just moved to phila. and edits pavement saw magazine there--If anybody, I would suggest him. Of course, just over the river in CAMDEN is Lamont Steptoe, black vietnam vet poet who used to run readings at the Painted Bride but now works at the Walt Whitman Ctr. and he would probably be a very good connection for you in terms of the NEA. I have a phone # again but no email. Does anybody else know anything about Phila.???? There's Eli Goldblatt. (Charles Alexander probably has his address. I lost it) at (is it) Villanova? For PENNSYLVANIA may be a crucial state as well, Jen & Steve, especially with the new conservative senator replacing Woffod (though I'm not mourning the loss of its conservative democrat governor CASEY to a conservative repub. etc.). Wofford not Woffod. Anyway, just to send this along in lieu of being able (i think) to do anything here in (sm)allbany. Chris Stroff.

↑ Index

84. Alan Berheimer
NEA Enemy Action
Thu 19 Jan 1995

In defending and rallying round the NEA it could be useful to distinguish the underlying Republican impulse from some of the straw men that are trotted out for the bonfire. I heard recently of a meeting involving Gingrich financial backers in which it was clear their objections were not to Mapplethorpe and other well-known NEA headline "scandals" (much as these are useful ammunition in appealing to fellow conservatives). What really sticks in their craw is their belief the NEA is promoting multiculturalism at the expense of "American" culture. Implicit and explicit is their view that the latter is qualitatively superior. (I have to resort to reference like "the latter" since "what means American if not multicultural?" seems so obvious to me, but you can let your imagination run wild with what it means to an angry white male.)

What can we do with this information? Use it to build a broader base of support for the NEA by appealing to multicultural constituencies, undercutting elitism-based arguments and drawing the debate away from kinkiness that so frightens moderate politicians.

Alan Bernheimer
[redacted]

↑ Index

85. Tom Mandel
Re: Apex of the M
Thu 19 Jan 1995

---

poet in mid-career, defined: a poet in the middle of a long publishing life. As far as delicious: sure, why not? This is a controversial term? gimme a break

tom

↑ Index

86. Tom Mandel
Re: apex of the m...
Thu 19 Jan 1995

IN James Sherry's post he rightly sees the apexers critique cum rejection of the Language poets in a continuum with the LP's treatment of the generation preceding. Surely, it is true that this need to get this seemingly pervasive presence out of the way, so to clear a space to write, afflicts or at least affects any generation. I don't like it, but it makes sense to me; I can even see it as a strength of character.

There remains the question of what is done in this cleared space, and by whom.

I'm not sure I understand the first 1/3d of James' post, unless he is beginning to list the features of Language Poetry that he sees as taken over by the Apex of the M group. If so, I'm interested to read a more lengthy treatment of that. Of these non-thing objects.

The influence on some Language poets of the NY school is also undeniable, esp. on the early work of Charles Bernstein, Kit Robinson, Steve Benson, Tom Mandel, and others.

The intellectual rigor of Language theory is also as open to critique as the intro to the Apex volume which lurks behind this discourse (smugly, non-dislodged, I think). You have only to read the banner and statement of intentions in the early Language magazines (w/ =, etc.) to find yourself in an ill-stirred pudding of the Whorf-Sapir thesis, an utterly misconceived version of the speech/language distinction in (oh what's his name; the swiss linguist's lectures - I really am losing my grip if I can't remember his name... and I can't!), and other sinking suspensions. But, this in no way excuses the Apex intro, does it?

All the same, I'm not sure there're any definite _lessons of the enlightenment_ which must be held onto, but James will have expected my disagreement in that matter. I am an utterly secular person (that is, I cd _describe myself_ as _an utterly spiritual person_), and in some sense I like the world I live in (less and less). But I'm afraid I must say that the secularizing of the world over the last 500 years has not pluralized the world, not at all. Just different and even more baleful idols being worshipped. And it is a pluralizing, call it a creolizing if you want, of our world is all can save it. Purity cults, even my favorite one the Pharisees, have demonstrated their horrendous effects over and over, and theese are magnified and multiplied in a world of weapons and media with such powers to make a hell of difference.

Finally, if, as in the Apex intro I find so appalling, the poet is to be an iconoclast, she will have to knock over an idol and smash it. Another poet is a poor choice to begin.

tom mandel

↑ Index

87. George Bowering

Re: call for work for interface 10 (fwd)

Thu 19 Jan 1995

I am curious about that phoenix in Tanya Manning's message.

What does the phoenix mean by the sentence: "I am woman!"?
I have heard it before, in some pop song, I think, and elsewhere, but I have a real curiosity here.
I can understand, say, "I am a woman."
Or "I am the woman."
Or "We are women."
Or "I am French."

?

↑ Index

88. udle114
Eric Mottram
Fri 20 Jan 1995

Update on the planned celebration for Eric Mottram:

The celebration will be held on March 3rd (Friday) between 6 and 8pm in the Great Hall at King's College in London.

If anyone wants to send messages, poems etc. (on tape, in print etc) please send be present at the event.

Shamoon Zamir
Department of English
King's College
Strand
London WC2R 2LS
United Kingdom

Phone: Country code + 71 [redacted]
Fax: Country code + 71 [redacted]
E-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

89. krickjh
GovAccess.091: Congressional contact-vectors (pass it along
Fri 20 Jan 1995

More congressional stuff via Jim Warren's GovAccess

If I'm overdoing the forwards of this material, someone please let me know.

John Krick

_____ Forward Header
_____ Subject: GovAccess.091: Congressional contact-vectors (pass it along Author: Jim Warren <[redacted]> at Internet_Mail Date: 01/20/95 09:02 AM

From [redacted]
(InterLock SMTP Gateway 3.0 for <[redacted]>);
Thu, 19 Jan 1995 23:23:58 -0500
Th
u, 19 Jan 1995 16:07:47 -0800
Date: Thu, 19 Jan 1995 16:07:47 -0800
From: Jim Warren <[redacted]>

To: [redacted]
Subject: GovAccess.091: Congressional contact-vectors (pass it along!)

Congressional Phones, Faxes and - Sometimes - Email Addresses, as of 1/12/95

The following only lists U.S. Senate members - all of 'em. The list for the House of Representatives is so large that I'll leave it for those who desire it to fetch from the several sites that have been cited in this and recent GovExcesses. However --

The next GovAccess - much shorter than this one - will give the email-addrs of those relatively-few Senate and House Congress-creatures who have eaddr and reportedly accept public email ... at least from their state/district constituents.

--jim

<author!> <author!> <applause ...>

Thu, 19 Jan 1995 13:54:31 -0500 (EST)
>From Grace A York <[redacted]>

You're welcome to share the [following] information. I can't claim perfection; typing all those names and phone numbers is tedious. Am more than willing to make corrections, however.

The latest version of the House and Senate directories, Congressional e-mail addresses, and a fledgling list of committee assignments are available on the University of Michigan Library Gopher. LC Marvel also points to them under its U.S.Congress section.

Grace York, Coordinator
Documents Center
The University of Michigan Library
Ann Arbor, Michigan 48109-1205

Phone: [redacted]
Fax: [redacted]
E-Mail: [redacted]

[illustrating the list's geneology and rapid infection-rate]
Wed, 18 Jan 95 15:33:16 EST
>From [redacted]

Thu, 12 Jan 1995 11:57:32 -0500 (EST)
>From Grace A York <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]

1-12-95

UNITED STATES CONGRESS

SENATE DIRECTORY

104th Congress
1995-96

CapitolÊpitol Building
DSOB=Dirksen Senate Office Building
HSOB=Hart Senate Office Building
RSOB=Russell Senate Office Building

Washington, D.C. 20510

E-Mail correspondence may be limited to constituents. Include your mailing address with your e-mail message if a reply is desired.

P ST Name and Address Phone & E-Mail Fax = ==
========== ==========
========== R AK Murkowski, Frank H. [redacted]
[redacted] 706 HSOB

R AK Stevens, Ted [redacted]
522 HSOB

D AL Heflin, Howell T. [redacted] [redacted] 728 HSOB

R AL Shelby, Richard C. [redacted] [redacted]
509 HSOB
(Switched to the Republican Party on 11-9-94)

D AR Bumpers, Dale [redacted] [redacted] 229 DSOB

D AR Pryor, David [redacted] na
267 RSOB

R AZ Kyl, Jon [redacted] [redacted] 363 RSOB

R AZ McCain, John [redacted] na
111 RSOB

D CA Boxer, Barbara [redacted] na
112 HSOB

D CA Feinstein, Dianne [redacted] na
331 HSOB

D CO Campbell, Ben N. [redacted] [redacted] 380 RSOB

R CO Brown, Henry [redacted] na
716 HSOB

D CT Dodd, Christopher J. [redacted] na
444 RSOB

D CT Lieberman, Joseph I. [redacted]
316 HSOB

D DE Biden Jr., Joseph R. [redacted] na
221 RSOB

R DE Roth Jr. William V. [redacted] [redacted] 104 HSOB

D FL Graham, Robert [redacted] na
524 HSOB

R FL Mack, Connie [redacted] [redacted] 517 HSOB

D GA Nunn, Samuel [redacted] [redacted] 303 DSOB

R GA Coverdell, Paul [redacted] na
200 RSOB

D HI Akaka, Daniel K. [redacted] [redacted] 720 HSOB

D HI Inouye, Daniel K. [redacted] [redacted] 722 HSOB

D IA Harkin, Thomas [redacted] [redacted] 531 HSOB

R IA Grassley, Charles E. [redacted] [redacted] 135 HSOB

R ID Craig, Larry E. [redacted] [redacted] 313 HSOB
[redacted]

R ID Kempthorne, Dirk [redacted] [redacted] 367 DSOB [redacted].
senate.gov

D IL Moseley-Braun, Carol [redacted] na
320 HSOB

D IL Simon, Paul [redacted] [redacted] 462 DSOB
[redacted]

R IN Coats, Daniel R. [redacted] [redacted] 404 RSOB

R IN Lugar, Richard G. [redacted] na
306 HSOB

R KS Dole, Robert [redacted] [redacted] 141 HSOB

R KS Kassebaum, Nancy L. [redacted] [redacted] 302 RSOB

D KY Ford, Wendell H. [redacted] na
173A RSOB

R KY McConnell, Mitch [redacted] [redacted] 120 RSOB

D La Breaux, John B. [redacted] na
516 HSOB

D LA Johnston, J. Bennett [redacted] na
136 HSOB

D MA Kennedy, Edward M. [redacted]
315 RSOB [redacted]
(www address: http://www.ai.mit.edu/projects/iiip/Kennedy/homepage.html)

D MA Kerry, John F. [redacted] 421 RSOB

D MD Mikulski, Barbara A. [redacted] 709 HSOB

D MD Sarbanes, Paul S. [redacted] 309 HSOB

R ME Snowe, Olympia [redacted]
176 RSOB

R ME Cohen, William S. [redacted] 322 HSOB

D MI Levin, Carl [redacted] na
459 RSOB

R MI Abraham, Spencer [redacted] B40 DSOB

D MN Wellstone, Paul [redacted] 717 HSOB

R MN Grams, Rod [redacted]

R MO Bond, Christopher S. [redacted] 293 RSOB

R MO Ashcroft, John [redacted]

R MS Cochran, Thad [redacted] na
326 RSOB

R MS Lott, Trent [redacted] 487 RSOB

D MT Baucus, Max [redacted] na
511 HSOB

R MT Burns, Conrad R. [redacted]
183 DSOB
v. Jack Mudd

R NC Faircloth, D. M. [redacted]
702 HSOB

R NC Helms, Jesse [redacted] na
403 DSOB

D ND Conrad, Kent [redacted] na
724 HSOB

D ND Dorgan, Byron L. [redacted] 713 HSOB

D NE Exon, J. J. [redacted] na
528 HSOB

D NE Kerrey, Bob [redacted]
303 HSOB

R NH Gregg, Judd [redacted] 393 RSOB

R NH Smith, Robert [redacted] 332 DSOB

D NJ Bradley, William [redacted] 731 HSOB

D NJ Lautenberg, Frank R. [redacted] 506 HSOB

D NM Bingaman, Jeff [redacted] na 1110 HSOB [redacted].
senate.gov

R NM Domenici, Pete V. [redacted] 427 DSOB

D NV Bryan, Richard H. [redacted] na
364 RSOB

D NV Reid, Harry [redacted] 324 HSOB

D NY Moynihan, Daniel P. [redacted] 464 RSOB

R NY D'Amato, Alfonse M. [redacted] 520 HSOB

D OH Glenn, John [redacted] na
503 HSOB

R OH Dewine, Michael [redacted]

R OK Inhofe, James [redacted]
453 RSOB

R OK Nickles, Donald [redacted] 133 HSOB

R OR Hatfield, Mark O. [redacted] na
711 HSOB

R OR Packwood, Robert [redacted] na
259 RSOB

R PA Santorum, Rick [redacted]

R PA Specter, Arlen [redacted] na
530 HSOB

D RI Pell, Claiborne [redacted] 335 RSOB

R RI Chafee, John H. [redacted] na
567 DSOB

D SC Hollings, Ernest F. [redacted] na
125 RSOB

R SC Thurmond, Strom [redacted] 217 RSOB

D SD Daschle, Thomas A. [redacted] 317 HSOB

R SD Pressler, Larry [redacted] 283 RSOB

R TN Thompson, Fred [redacted]
506 DSOB

R TN Frist, Bill [redacted]

R TX Hutchison, Kay Bailey [redacted] 703 HSOB
[redacted]

R TX Gramm, Phil [redacted] na
370 RSOB

R UT Bennett, Robert [redacted] na
241 DSOB

R UT Hatch, Orrin G. [redacted] 135 RSOB

D VA Robb, Charles S. [redacted] 493 RSOB
[redacted]

R VA Warner, John W. [redacted] 225 RSOB

D VT Leahy, Patrick J. [redacted] na
433 RSOB [redacted]

R VT Jeffords, James M. [redacted] na
513 HSOB [redacted]

D WA Murray, Patty [redacted] 302 HSOB

R WA Gorton, Slade [redacted] 730 HSOB

D WI Feingold, Russell [redacted] na
502 HSOB

D WI Kohl, Herbert H. [redacted] na
330 HSOB

D WV Byrd, Robert C. [redacted] 311 HSOB

D WV Rockefeller, John D. [redacted] 109 HSOB

R WY Simpson, Alan K. [redacted] 261 DSOB

R WY Thomas, Craig [redacted]

Corrections to [redacted]

&&&&&&&&&&&&&&&&&&&&

We the People of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure Domestic Tranquillity, provide for the Common Defense, promote the General Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America. [via sig-file of Brad Schrick ([redacted])]

Mo' as it Is.
--jim

GovAccess is a list distributing irregular info & advocacy, maintained by Jim Warren, columnist, MicroTimes, Government Technology, BoardWatch, etc. 345 Swett Rd., Woodside CA 94062; voice/[redacted]; fax/<# upon request> [redacted] (well.com = well.sf.ca.us; also at [redacted])

& To add or drop the GovAccess list, email to [redacted] . & & Permission herewith granted for unlimited reposting and recirculation. & & Past postings are at ftp.cpsr.org: /cpsr/states/california/govaccess & & by WWW at http://www.cpsr.org/cpsr/states/california/govaccess &

↑ Index

90. James Sherry
Re: NEA Enemy Action
Fri 20 Jan 1995

I too would support Alan Bernheimer's approach to creating extended constituencies both for supporting NEA and for breaking down the petty fiefdoms which have grown up in the arts, especially non-profit arts, over the past decades. The appeal might also be to attack elitism in the for profit arts which will both confuse the issue and focus the point of the artists for social production as opposed to artists for commodity production, a fight which we have been waging for decades also.

But the real issues are I think not those which Alan raises, although they are the public ones. The real issues are twofold and come from different consituencies.

1. When I worked for Hearst Corp. a few years ago, their beef was that the government was funding small presses to be able to compete against them and that was unfair to the for profit presses. Why should Sun & Moon and Greywolf, etc. be allowed to compete unfairly against William Morrow and Avon? (Obviously they are not the same market, but that argument does not convince the "shelf-space" conscious marketeers who are threatened by any kind of alternative as competition.) I think the same argument is at the root of the corporate attacks on NEA and holds true for public broadcasting as well.

2. The other constituency that is attacking the NEA is the right. Originally their attention was galvanized by the body oriented art that received so much publicity, but their real concern is that NEA is not funding their art. They are not represented. I think if a painter of Elvis on Velvet from North Carolina were funded and publicized that a lot of this constituency's opposition will disappear.

I don't make these points to discourage coalition building that Alan suggests, I simply think the real (indefensible) anxieties of the attackers needs to be addressed in addition to coalition building. Perhaps some of the more astute political organizers can suggest the route to coalitions that can be effective.

Finally, I think the big entertainment money support of NEA will save it or kill it. Pell's argument that it's either NEA or Social Security tells a lot about what even the more liberal in Congress really think and the falsity of their polarizing. Alas.

↑ Index

91. James Sherry

Re: call for work for interface 10 (fwd)

Fri 20 Jan 1995

The phoenix of course replies at the end of any discourse whether "am woman" or "am French", "je suis fini". James "born again" Sherry

↑ Index

92. Marjorie Perloff

Re: apex of the m...

Fri 20 Jan 1995

It's true, of course, as Tom Mandel says, that every generation needs to clear a space for itself and that the Language poets, as James Sherry points out, did the same thing to the NY poets of the previous generation. And Frank O'Hara and company did it to T. S. Eliot (God save us from fisher kings!"). Still, there's an air of implosion about this latest "manifesto." For one thing, the language poets were attacking an Establishment, but it's hardly the case that today the L poets ARE the establishment. Most people around the country still consider them upstarts if they've so much as heard of them. Let's get real. Secondly, if you want to launch a line of attack, you must have an articulated position. "Violence and precision" as Marinetti put it. It needn't be totally coherent--and I agree that the Language manifestos of the 70s were hardly argued through--but you have to stand for something that's then visible in the poetry itself. I just don't see this "change" in Apex of the M. The poets printed therein take for granted that poetry is written in free verse (or prose) for starters. It's a given. The rejection of a "high style" is another given. And so on. That leaves the manifesto with saying, more or less, we're more against capitalism than the Language poets were and, at that level, the rhetoric fizzes out because the L poets in question had/have a particular Marxist position and carried it through. Ron Silliman, after all, was editor of the New Socialist Review. So if the editors of Apex don't share that position, but feel Capital is the source of all evil, I'd like to know what they propose to do to fight capital.

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

93. Jonathan Monroe
Cornell Poetry Conference
Fri 20 Jan 1995

CALL FOR PAPERS * CALL FOR PAPERS * CALL FOR PAPERS

PAST, PRESENT, FUTURE TENSE: A CONFERENCE ON CONTEMPORARY POETRY

Cornell University
March 31st - April 1st, 1995

Speakers include:

Charles Altieri
Rachel Blau DuPlessis
Bei Dao
Li-Young Lee
Marjorie Perloff
Evangelina Vigil-Pinon

Proposals are invited for a conference on the consequences for poetry of the global redrawing of cultural, political, and economic boundaries underway since the late 1980's and the implications of the increasingly multicultural, multiethnic, multilingual environment within the United States for poetry's inheritance from the past and its legacies for the 1990's and the new millenium. Possible topics include, but are not limited to:

dominant modes and alternative practices; anthologies, canon formation, and the distribution and reception of poetry; reading habits and writing communities; poetry's potential and actual contributions to the idea of a "culture-at-large"; poetry and gender; multiculturalism and the poetics of voice; lyric and narrative; poetry and interdisciplinarity; modernism, postmodernism, and contemporary poetry; poetry after the Cold War; language poetry; expansive/new formalist/new narrative poetry; poetry, technology, and mass media; creative writing and critical theory; poetry and performance; how poems matter, what poems know; bodies in/of poetry; poetries of the Americas; U. S. poetry in international context.

Please send 500-word abstracts (for twenty-minute papers), suggestions for additional panels, or inquiries by February 10, 1995 to:

Jonathan Monroe
Department of Comparative Literature
Goldwin Smith Hall
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853-3201
email: [redacted]

↑ Index

94. Ted Pelton

More Espousing

Fri 20 Jan 1995

To those of you doing freely espousing gigs around the country:

My name is Ted Pelton and I was an NEA recipient in fiction this past year. I was in touch this morning with Alexander Ooms at the NEA and he faxed me a list of some 250 well-known recipients of fellowships. If you want to contact him directly, his number is [redacted]. Unfortunately the NEA doesn't have email (they are so wasteful with their current budget, I guess). He's a friendly sort who I don't think would mind giving a 15 minute rap about where they stand right now or faxing you info like he did me. He says the current feeling is the fight could go either way, with a lot depending on how the hearings went yesterday and today with the Corporation for Public Broadcasting (no word yet -- he's going to keep me posted). But, if not the full list, let me list some names which may be of interest to poetics subscribers from the NEA grantee names he sent me:

Walter Abish, Rodolfo Anaya, Bruce Andrews, Paul Auster, Amiri Baraka, Jonathan Baumbach, Charles Bernstein, Ted Berrigan, John Berryman, Mei Mei Berssenbrugge, Paul Bowles, T. Corahessan Boyle, David Bromige, Rosellen Brown, Charles Bukowski, Ana Castillo, Lorna Cervantes, Sandra Cisneros, Lucille Clifton, Andrei Codrescu, Clark Coolidge, Robert Coover, Robert Creeley, Diane DiPrima, Stuart Dybek, Louise Erdrich, Clayton Eshleman, William Gaddis, Dagoberto Gilb, Allen Ginsberg, Nikki Giovanni, Spalding Gray, Marilyn Hacker, Joy Harjo, Michael Harper, Lyn Hejinian, Linda Hogan, Fanny Howe, Charles Johnson, Janet Kauffman, Jamaica Kincaid, Maxine Hong Kingston, Galway Kinnell, Denise Levertov, Jackson MacLow, Carole Maso, Harry Mathews, Bharati Mukherjee, Fea Myenne Ng, Alice Notley, Peter

Orlovsky, Joel Oppenheimer, Maureen Owen, Ron Padgett, Grace Paley, Robert Pinsky, Francine Prose, Carl Rakosi, Ishmael Reed, Donald Revell, Kenneth Rexroth, Alberto Rios, Kit Robinson, Leslie Scalapino, Ntozake Shange, Leslie Marmon Silko, Ron Silliman, Charles Simic, Jane Smiley, Ted Solotaroff, Gilbert Sorrentino, Gary Soto, Ronald Sukenick, James Tate, Paul Violi, Anne Waldman, Rosmarie Waldrop, Alice Walker, David Foster Wallace, Lewis Warsh, Bruce Weigl, Hannah Weiner, Marianne Wiggins.

This is meant as a list to help people, but let me apologize for any exclusions (good NEA-winning writers left off -- I'm sorry). The NEA press release highlights the most visible authors; Ooms then threw in some more experimental writers he knew off the top of his head. Then I selected names I knew from this hodgepodge of names. And, to top it off, I'm a fiction writer; names of other fiction writers are more familiar to me than poets.

Nonetheless, it's an impressive list. Many are older names, reminding us that the NEA came into existence in the 60s, but also that they gave out a lot more awards then, and the amount actually could buy you a year to write. Fewer awards at a sum that hasn't been adjusted for inflation -- this makes me think that after we win this battle (I think we will), we should keep the pressure on to fund the arts at a rate more consistent with what's spent elsewhere. The current NEA budget is 64 cents per U.S. citizen. Canada and france each spend 32 dollars per, and Germany 27 dollars. The NEA itself makes a good case for more money, but there's no little grass roots support. Quoting from their press release: "Every dollar awarded by the NEA attracts $11 from state and local arts agencies, corporations, foundations, businesses and other private entities. The not-for-profit arts create $37 billion in economic activity and suppost 1.3 million jobs. They also return $3.4 billion to the Federal Treasury through income taxes, 20 times the budget of the NEA."

While I'm uncomfortable with this kind of language (support arts because it's profitable), I think it can be turned to our advantage more than it is currently. In other words, if this is the language that's being spoken, and it shows us off well, we might as well learn to manipulate said language to our own benefit. Will this deprive us of counter-languages? In the short-run, perhaps; but in the long run it could turn to our benefit. How do you feel about being a state-supported artist? Well, that's a question we have to answer each for ourselves. But if we want the endowment, we should also want to use the best terms to make it strong within the framework that's most successful.

Sorry for the digression. I'd like to thank Steve Evans and Jennifer Moxley for getting this ball rolling. I live in a small city, Sheboygan, Wisconsin, and was lamenting not being able to get something like this together here. But then word came in about the Milwaukee gathering. They're only an hour away, but I found out about it on-line. This was an insight into the new technological geography for me. I like it.

Ted Pelton

↑ Index

95. Stephen Ratcliffe

???

Fri 20 Jan 1995

I come back from long winter break, spent mostly travel to Mexico, Calif. mountains & Hawaii, to find some 370 pieces of mail from all of you -- so my work's cut out. Can I catch up??? Ratcliffe

↑ Index

96. Jonathan Brannen

Re: Freely Espousing Update

Fri 20 Jan 1995

Does anyone know if plans are being made for Minneapolis/St. Paul participation in Freely Espousing? If not, there should be since the red flag the Newt most likes to wave is a misrepresentation of an event sponsored by the Walker Arts Center in the Twin Cities.

If anybody knows of existing plans or is interested in bringing Minneapolis/St. Paul into the loop, please contact me.

Jonathan Brannen

↑ Index

97. Evans/Moxley

Espousing Update 1/20

Fri 20 Jan 1995

We're working on a more exhaustive update to be posted tomorrow, but Ted Pelton's recent post seques nicely with the fact that Joe Ross has gotten Alexander Ooms to speak at Freely Espousing-DC.

We also have a new & improved Press Release (courtesy of Diana Cantu's expertise) which we will be happy to fax to you upon request.

Cities we currently have initial leads in now include Seattle, Portland, Philadelphia

(thanks to Chris Stroffolino for the open post on that one), and Wilmington/Charlotte, North Carolina. If anyone has scoop on those communities, please e-mail us (or: make a few exploratory calls of your own and then let us know what you've found).

Finally (for now): we want to encourage anyone who is not able to attend Freely Espousing to compose a statement that can be worked into the various programs across the country. We're exploring the possibility of having Net-links at some of the events, but short of that we'd at least like to have virtual participation along with the palpable participation.

More shortly.

Steve Evans

↑ Index

98. Tom Mandel

Re: apex of the m...

Fri 20 Jan 1995

When I mentioned that we L poets critiqued the NY school I did not go on to say, as I shd have but didn't want to take the time to, that in fact our reaction was _not_ against them, nor against the New Am. Poets, but against the devitalizing and de-authorizing and de-pressing movement in conventional postwar american verse, e.g. the Wm. Stafford school with its endless white male middleclass and most often academic epiphanies of symbolic yet private experience, so small ever so small so heart's needle small and yet so important ever so important so much something they at the center of the universe were doing for everyone; _I did it for all of us_ as Stafford puts it somewhere. Not for me buddy. No thanks.

Stafford died earlier this year, having devoted most of more than eighty years life to poetry. I don't like his work one bit. So what. My opinion, and even my critique, is an unproductive fact in the face of his work (which was his life). The only effective counterpoise I can make to work I reject is my own work, my own commitments, and beyond that some way that I may intend deeply that they create a community which does not present itself as a symbolic order in place of social life but an example of social life modeling itself as in the making. That is a counterpoise.

(Not earlier this year, but in '94 of course)

tom mandel

↑ Index

99. Tom Mandel
Saussure, you dummy
Fri 20 Jan 1995

Kit Robinson kindly mailed me to remind of the name of _the Swiss linguist_ in my post a couple of days ago. Saussure, bien sur. But were it Ferdinand or Fernand, I fergit?

tom mandel

↑ Index

100. Wolfgang Staehle
Saussure, you
Fri 20 Jan 1995

> bien sur. But were it Ferdinand or Fernand, I fergit?

It's Ferdinand de Saussure. I misspelled Foucault the other day.

[redacted]

↑ Index

101. Ron Silliman
Re: NEA Enemy Action
Sat 21 Jan 1995

James Sherry wrote that > The real issues are twofold and come from >different consituencies.
>
>1. Why should Sun & Moon >and Greywolf, etc. be allowed to compete unfairly against William Morrow

>and Avon?

This, I think, is exactly right. I've heard this argument made against all manner of nonprofits, quite aggressively, up to and including public schools and libraries. (Jack Shoemaker used to complain bitterly about how libraries reduced the need to sell individual copies of a book. As someone who didn't even know about bookstores until I was 15 or 16, I always thought that was nuts.)
>
>2. I think if a painter of >Elvis on Velvet from North Carolina were funded and publicized that a lot >of this constituency's opposition will disappear.
>
Wrong on this one, James. George Dukmejian (whose last name I think I just butchered), back when he was governor of California, made a very pointed effort to appoint fellow Armenians to every single commission in California. So his "painter" on the Cal. Arts Commission was a woman from Long Beach who did watercolors of battle ships. It made no difference.

By the way, folks, the right is also currently blasting Stanford for spending $1 million+ on the archives of Allen Ginsberg. (His membership in NAMBLA is their main point.) So there will be a focus on censorship at the opening of his archives on February 10. Marjorie Perloff, Carl Rakosi, Ginsberg, Nancy Peters (editor at City Lights) & your humble servant will be on one panel. Kathleen Sullivan (the law professor & wife of the former mayor of SF, Joe Alioto) is doing something else (I'm not sure what). And Allen's reading.

Feb. 10 at Stanford. I'm sure Marjorie's got the details.

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

102. eric pape
Re: apex of the m...
Sat 21 Jan 1995

As usual, I feel as if I am blindly shooting into an argument that I know nothing about, not having read any of the apex manifestoes and only having scanned briefly all previous postings on this subject. However, it seems to me as if someone needs to say the stupidly obvious and that is that every revolution, including any poetry that pretends to be fully fulfilled revolutionary poetry, is written in language. This point, an admittedly stupid point, I think is important when you realize how many revolutions have failed due tothe fact that they are indeed, simply a revolution of the existing social structure, a kind of endlessly self-fulfilling Hegelian loop that we don't seem able to get around. For instance, I remember this guy Mike I used to work with at Taco Bell and he hated the manager for her petty and often cruel treatment of employees. He began a systematic, and I always thought very intelligent campaign to discredit her in the fact of the owner. After many highly entertaining confrontations, he was able to get her fired. Of course, as I'm sure is already apparent, he was then named the manager and after an agonizing, I mean you could see it on his face a lot of the time, three months, he began to do the same things the person he so hated did before him. Simple, easy, maybe too easy, but the point is that you cannot change the particulars of any culture without changing the way if functions. You can't have a revolutionary poetry that says I am revolutionary and therefore I am going to write about coal miners in the language of coal miners etc. Transparency doesn't exist in the poetic context. It seems to me that Language Poetry is a neccessary, but certainly not final step towards a revolutionary poetry because it takes as its project the subversion of language. I don't know anywhere else to start. It doesn't end here, of course, but any revolutionary poetry that is going to succeed Language Poetry, and that will inevitably have to happen, will have to take into account its achievements, as well as its problems. Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

103. Michael Waltuch

Address

Sat 21 Jan 1995

If you know the current address of the Slovenian poet Tomas Salamun, please send it to me.

Thanks,
Michael Waltuch

↑ Index

104. Tom Mandel

Re: ???

Sat 21 Jan 1995

Back to Mexico, Stephen! But this time, take me with you...

tom

↑ Index

105. Kali Tal
Re: apex of the m...
Sat 21 Jan 1995

I'm outside both the traditional academic and literary poetry circles. Until Joe Amato introduced me to the work of the Language Poets, I'd never heard them. I like Joe's work (that's why I publish it), but my longest-lasting literary affections lie with "movement" poets, primarily feminist and/or African American and/or war veteran writers who see themselves and their work as inseperable from their politics and their activism. My perspective on the whole _apex of the m_ debate is shaped by a general distrust of manifestos which seem to be substitutes for action, or which are taken as actions in and of themselves. I'd like to respond to some of eric pape's comments in that spirit:

> every revolution, including any poetry that > pretends to be fully fulfilled revolutionary poetry, is written in > language.

I am not sure that this is true. In extremity, language is a luxury that many cannot afford. Violent revolutions (and perhaps most acts of physical violence) are not written--that is specifically what makes them violent; pens are not swords, however much the revolutionary (or reactionary) poet might wish that they were, might yearn to make language strike like a blow. My particular critical speciality is "literature of trauma"--specifically, the literature of "survivors" of man-made violence (Holocaust, combat, rape, etc.)--and I have found that a characteristic spanning every literature of trauma which I have yet uncovered is the agonizing tension between the failure of language ("You can't understand!") and the desperate need for language to suceed (You must understand!). Revolutionary poets yearn to write with such strength that their audience is traumatized as they have been traumatized (Jones/Baraka raging that "poems are bullshit unless they are/ teeth or trees or lemons piled/ on a step," wanting his own poem to be a machine gun, reduced to helpless ratatatting; the anger is real, the danger behind the poem is real, but the poem can never be real in the sense Baraka desires it to be). There was, last year, a lengthy discussion of "terrorist" poetics/poetry on the TNC list--some of you will remember. It seems to me that both "terrorist" and "revolutionary" poetry are impossible constructions unless one is talking about them as documentary (at one remove) rather than actual (the thing itself). Soldiers who write or talk about combat state unequivocally that language fails to describe their experience. Yet every soldier who writes or talks about combat says something--uses language in ways that fail, though he/she uses it all the same. There are qualities of "revolution" which lie outside of language--the violence that language can describe in the before and the after, but never at the now. The realm of the traumatic event is silence, speechlessness, a breach in the narrative, a space for which there are no words or explanations or stories: THIS ISN'T SUPPOSED TO BE HAPPENING! Narrative constructions come later, to explain, to rationalize, to describe "what happened," but they can never represent it properly, since its nature and impact are derived from the fact that trauma is *un*representable. There are some truths which cannot be conveyed, some instances in which "only being is believing."

> It seems to me that Language Poetry is a neccessary, but certainly not final step towards a revolutionary poetry because it takes as its project the subversion of language. I don't know anywhere else to start.

The subversion of language is certainly the project of poets like Audre Lorde (whose description of language as "the master's tools," and whose position as the Sister Outsider make even her use of language and the poetic form subversive) and Margaret Atwood and Monique Wittig, and so on. But these feminist poets are not considered (I believe) to be connected to the Language Poets. Nor are they given much serious attention by either the literary or academic establishments (dismissed as "political"--and therefore possessing an "agenda"--as lesbian, as feminist). I am asking, as an outsider myself, the honest question: what is subversive about what the Language Poets? What is the distinction between the sort of subversion practiced by Lorde, for example, and various Language Poets?

> You can't have a revolutionary poetry that says I am revolutionary and therefore I am going to write about coal miners in the language of coal miners etc. Transparency doesn't exist in the poetic context.

Sometimes I think that we don't see poetry when it is transparent. We don't usually look very carefully at what coal miners are doing... or what disfranchised black ghetto kids are doing... or what working class women are doing... Some of the strongest and most "revolutionary" American poetry is spouted by kids at house parties, and used-to-be-kids who now have recording contracts with major record labels. Ice-T is a poet, though you might not much like what he's doing (I do). Ice-T is writing poetry about revolution--even if it is not revolution itself--and at least the poetry is being televised (hey, Gill Scott-Heron has a new album out, did you hear?). Black Entertainment Network rap programming and "Yo! MTV Raps" are pretty interesting.

Which brings me back around to the _apex of the m_ intro, which I haven't read, but have now read about at length. It seems to me that one can't be revolutionary without being clear what one is for and what one is against, and without being willing to put one's body on the line for one's beliefs. (Revolution is risky.) In a culture where a poet can be taken out and shot for writing a protest verse, it makes sense to talk about "revolutionary" poets. In this culture, it might even make sense to talk about some poets that way.

But it's real hard for me to swallow the notion of "revolutionary" poets who live in relative comfort and are not actively engaged in taking physical risks to participate in social or political movements. Maybe I'm just a hard-line kinda gal, but I like to save the word "revolutionary" for times when I really mean it....

Kali Tal

Kali Tal
Sixties Project & Viet Nam Generation, Inc.
18 Center Rd., Woodbridge, CT 06525
203/[redacted]; fax 203/[redacted]
email: [redacted]

↑ Index

106. Robert Drake
Re: apex of the m...
Sat 21 Jan 1995

i'd like to suggest a reading experiment (hat tip to chas b.'s "writing experiments") in re _apex of the m_: begin reading on page 9--an excerpt frm ed dorn's "langue d'oc around the cloc"-- and read thru or around in the following 168 pages... & form an opinion ov the work presented. then, & only then (if you want), go back and read the introduction. how is your opinion of the contents changed?

ov course, this is a sham--even if you don't read the intro first, you've read the various comments here, & have those in mind. & my comment--the screed that passes for an introducion is even more vitrolic than the intro to AotM #1; despite that, the issues raised are (to my mind) important ones, and worth addressing--and not just defending against.

yes, my proposed re-vision of the work-as-a-whole is a reading that is _not_ the reading intended by the editors... defer to their intended reading if you prefer. fr m'self, i learn several thangs (so far)--i enjoyed much of the work presented (chris stroffolino, susan thackery, & peter gizzi among others,1st time thru); i'm still unable to appreciate jerome rothenberg's work, despite being sympathetic to his stated poetics; the work seems to me to be various & assorted, some better than others, but none of it "revolutionary"; and finally: i _can't_ find the connection between th intro and th work. that might well be my failing as a reader. it might also be a failure of vision, self-perception, or articulation of the editors-- this assuming that the intro is the work of the editors, tho it is unsigned... at anyrate, reaction so far has seemed to be reaction to the intro, rather than the work-as-whole--3 pages out of 176.

praps the "problem" is one of perspective. one editor confided in me that one impetus was a collective tiredness with poor imitations of Language poety--something you might well tire of (as tiresome as poor plath imitations, or bukowski imitaitons), especially if yr in the relatively narrow confines of a particular graduate program. but in the rest of the world, we've never heard of l=a=n=g=a=g=e, let alone tired of it; while others with an personal investment might feel their own bastions under attack. i dunno--it hardly seems like getting worked up over, there's so little at stake...

lbd

↑ Index

107. Evans/Moxley
New Press Release
Sat 21 Jan 1995

From Freely Espousing Headquarters:

A slightly punchier version of our press release is attached below. We invite you to forward this message but ask that you encourage Internet rather than phone responses in your prefatory language. Our e-mail address is [redacted].

----------Original message----------

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
January 20, 1995
Contact: Steve Evans [redacted]

ARTISTS & WRITERS ORGANIZE NATIONAL DAY OF ACTION TO DEFEND NEA, NEH

Events Planned in Seven Cities to Protest
Attack on the Arts

Writers, artists, scholars, and concerned citizens in more than a half-dozen American cities have organized Freely Espousing, a day of events in support of public arts funding on Saturday, January 28th, 1995. Marathon readings, exhibits, and other activities are being planned in response to threats that the new 104th Congress intends to slash federal funding for the arts and humanities provided through the National Endowment for the Arts (NEA) and the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH).

Initiated by two Rhode Islanders--RI Senator Clairborne Pell was the architect of the 1965 legislation that created the NEA/NEH-- the idea for a day of protest spread quickly across the Internet from Providence to New York City, San Francisco, Milwaukee, San Diego, Buffalo, and Washington D.C.

Providence event organizers Steve Evans and Jennifer Moxley say "we chose the name Freely Espousing in order to underscore the vital role of the arts in a democratic society. It is important to call attention to the lack of rational, public debate not just on this issue, but on a range of social and cultural issues currently being forced through the Congress under the leadership of House Speaker Newt Gingrich and Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole."

The centerpiece of Freely Espousing events nationwide will be a marathon "read-in" of literary works created with NEA support. Featured speakers, round-table discussions, musical performances, exhibits, and other events are also planned.

###

(append local information here)

↑ Index

108. Moxley/Evans
Freely Espousing 1/22 Update
Sun 22 Jan 1995

What follows is a lengthy post updating you on the progress of Freely Espousing. Ten days after our initial announcement, momentum continues to gather and to lead in unexpected directions.

Jen and I want to thank everyone who has contributed advice (technical and imaginative) to us in recent days.

LEGISLATIVE UPDATE

The Senate Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities is composed of the following 16 senators. We give phone numbers for each Senator, followed by fax (if available) and e-mail (if available). This is a subcommitte of the Labor, Human Resources, and Education Committee. Testimony regarding the NEA is scheduled to begin Tuesday, January 24.

Jeffords (chair; R-VT): [redacted], [redacted]
Kassebaum, Nancy (R-KS): [redacted], [redacted]
Dodd, Christopher (D-CT): [redacted]

Harkin, Thomas (D-IA): [redacted], [redacted]
Simon, Paul (D-IL): [redacted], [redacted], [redacted]
Coats, Daniel (R-IN): [redacted], [redacted]
Kennedy, Edward (D-MA): [redacted], [redacted], [redacted].
gov
Mikulski, Barbara (D-MD): [redacted], [redacted]
Abraham, Spencer (R-MI): [redacted], [redacted]
Wellstone, Paul (D-MN): [redacted], [redacted]
Ashcroft, John (R-MO): [redacted]
Gregg, Judd (R-NH): [redacted], [redacted]
Pell, Clairborne (D-RI): [redacted], [redacted]
Frist, Bill (R-TN): [redacted], [redacted]
Gorton, Slade (R-WA): [redacted], [redacted]
DeWine, Michael (R-OH): [redacted], [redacted]

(Nine Republicans, 7 Democrats)

*

FREELY ESPOUSING CONTACT PEOPLE (A REMINDER)

Seven cities have confirmed events for Jan. 28. Home phone and e-mail information for contact people follows. Very different formats exist for the days events so be sure to be in touch with the local Contact Person for details!

Providence: Steve Evans, Jennifer Moxley
[redacted]
[redacted]

Buffalo: Jena Osman
[redacted]
[redacted]

note: in Buffalo, event will not be called Freely Espousing. Instead it will publicized as SAVE THE artWORLD.

Milwaukee: Bob Harrison
[redacted]
[redacted]

New York: Jeff Hull
[redacted]
[redacted]

San Diego: Craig Foltz
[redacted]

San Francisco: Kevin Magee
[redacted]
(fax) [redacted]

Washington DC: Joe Ross
[redacted]
[redacted]

*

SPONSORING A WOODLAND PATTERN READER

Woodland Pattern has agreed to link their already-scheduled Marathon Reading to the Freely Espousing effort. Bob Harrison informs me that WP seeks "sponsors" for each person reading on January 28: suggested sponsoring fee is $25. This Benefit was scheduled in anticipation of lost/reduced NEA support in the coming year.

Their address is: 720 E. Locust St., Milwaukee WI 53212.
Their fax number: [redacted].

Please contact Bob for more information.

*

BEYOND JAN 28 Part 1

Los Angeles, Baton Rouge, St.Paul/Minneapolis, Wilmington (NC), Seattle, Portland, Charlottesville, and Pittsburg as some of the cities where people have expressed interest in organizing a Freely Espousing event. Because of obvious time constraints, it is unlikely that more than a few of these places will be able to join us on the 28th. We therefore strongly encourage people to synchronize a second wave of events for the following Saturday, Feb. 4th.

Our goal from the beginning has been self-organization strengthened by open information channels. Jennifer and I, in concert with the Ad-Hoc Committee of Literary Publishers here in RI, will be happy to provide what advice and coordinating support we can to interested parties. As combined independent agents, we can be sure that viewpoints excluded by the extant arts bureaucracies have a place on the program (even while including spokes-persons from those art bureaucracies).

BEYOND JAN 28th Part 2

Most people we've talked with have expressed concerns about sustaining and expanding on the momentum generated by these events. We invite an open debate on how this may best be done. As Alan Bernheimer and James Sherry have pointed out in open posts to the Poetics List, communication across segmented aesthetic, generic, and (most importantly) social lines is imperative if our larger goal of preserving and sustaining democratic means of expression and action is to be approached. I doubt anyone needs reminding of what 1996 could bring if concerted efforts are not made now to generalize the material and symbolic conditions of possibility for democratic action. The "Loose Coalition for Democratic Inspiration" that Rod Smith, Lee Ann Brown, and Mark Wallace proposed a while back (vis-a-vis the Prayer in the Schools initiative) is something we should all consider "joining."

*

SOME OBSERVATIONS ON MEDIA ISSUES

The opening of Senate hearding on the NEA certainly will be overshadowed by Clinton's State of the Union Address later the same day. The advance line on the Address proffered by Administration spokespersons today indicates that Clinton will not so much as mention the NEA/NEH on Tuesday night (the highlight, we are told, will be a xenophobic initiative to increase spending on anti-Immigration measures). If by some chance the NEA/NEH is mentioned, by all means use the opportunity to increase local media coverage of your standpoint on Federal Arts Funding. If it isn't, sit tight: the NEA will probably surface in Thursday's print media.

Anybody who can get a Charger or 49er to make a statement in support of the NEA/NEH will be guaranteed early entrance into the Small Press Hall of Fame.

You may wish to seize on Murdoch's funding/bribing of a writer of little discernible talent (cf. _The Window of Opportunity_) and a nationally-recognized penchant for obscenity as a brilliant argument for why we need alternatives to the market. (_Window_ is Newt Gringrich's 1984 "blueprint for the future," published by Tom Doherty Associates, written when NG was Reagan's point-man for SDI).

And finally, vis-a-vis Censorship. We abhor the NEA's imposition of censorship on itself as an agency and on the artists it funds. The point to keep foregrounded is that eliminating Federal Funding for the Arts and contributing to the further consolidation of corporate ownership of the means of expression is itself an unparalleled act of censorship. Herb Schiller's Culture, Inc. (NY: Oxford, 1989) remains a great reference on this point. *

Steve Evans & Jennifer Moxley
[redacted]

↑ Index

109. eric pape
Re: apex of the m...
Sun 22 Jan 1995

Kali: Just a brief response to your provacative posting in the midst of all the Freely Espousing excitement. What is beyond language? You speak of the traumatized persons you work with expressing their frustration at the fact that they cannot communicate their experiences; you can't understand; you must understand. This seems to me certainly as you suggested a symptom of the inadequacy of language, but it also seems to see some personality, or personality issues that are beyond or before language. Isn't language the closest thing we have to an identity, a personality? Which means, I think, that identity is something we share with others,exterior. This is what I was trying to get at when I was speaking of transparency as not being in the poetic context. I'd like to amend that and say as far as I know transparency, despite Carl Rogers, is not in any context. Transparency assumes the stability of both the sender and the receiver. I can't tell you how many times I have spoken or wrote and said not five seconds after that I was full of shit and how could I say such things. It wasn't me who said them I think to myself. The frustration everyone feels with language is in this lack of coherence of identity from moment to moment. There is no rapport; something always escapes. As far as language poets vs. Lorde and others, well, that is something I'd rather not get involved in. I can say that I think of Lorde's most subsversive act is simply being there, unavoidable, unplacatable. What she does with language, which is considerable, is to remind us that there are other forms out there that not only have a right to exist, but have informed the dominant language greatly. I should shut up about the apex of the m'ers, because frankly I don't know anything about them. Nor do I want to be seen as some language school apologist. I mean, I just got here. Nobody knows me. I'm surprised anyone even listens to me. I find them intersting (and here I speak of them as if they were already stuffed and mounted on a gallery wall) because I think they have pinpointed where to begin to define an oppositional, or revolutionary, or whatever, poetry. We start at the beginning of poetry, at the beginning of personality, at the beginning of culture. We start with language. What I find particularly interesting is that not only do many language poets subvert language, like you have properly noticed Lorde doing, but they make a sort of intervention into language. They try to change its structure. If we are to make any kind of intervention into history, this seems to me a model we can work with. Maybe the apexers are working with this. Maybe not. I don't know. I will say at this point that I think folks tend to discount manifestoes. Must be some sort of American anti-intellectual thing. The fact that both the language poets and the apexers wrote manifestoes is all to their credit as far as I am concerned. If we have learned anything in the last few years of NEA/NEH controversy after controversy it is that the people doing the work had better take the time to define themselves before someody else, like Lynn Cheney,does. Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

110. Charles Bernstein
Re: Address
Sun 22 Jan 1995

No I don't. Sorry.

↑ Index

111. Chris Stroffolino
Re: apex of the m...
Mon 23 Jan 1995

Hey, Kali Tal--have you heard that new Gil Scott Heron album? Is it as good as 1980? and some of the other stuff he did before his decade or so hiatus from recording/releasing?

↑ Index

112. Michael Waltuch
Re: Freely Espousing
Mon 23 Jan 1995

Steve Evans & Jennifer Moxley:

Here's a suggestion: This week's What's New with NCSA Mosaic Pick of the Week Home Page is something called BookWire, "the book publishing industry's Online Information Resource". They will doubtless have a lot exposure this week at their Web site. It might be good to send them a press release. They are at http://www.bookwire.com or [redacted].

Michael Waltuch

↑ Index

113. Mark Wallace
Re: apex of the m...
Mon 23 Jan 1995

In regards to James Sherry's post, why the (again) valorization of the M as the sole "meaningful" response of younger "experimental" writers to Language poetry?

Why does no one respond to A Poetics of Criticism, Poetic Briefs, various essays in Witz and Texture and (sometimes interesting essays) Talisman, which have all said much more complex, insightful, and useful things regarding this issue?

mark wallace

↑ Index

114. Alan Golding
New Press Release
Mon 23 Jan 1995

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Steve/Jennifer:

Have you distributed your Freely Espousing press release to the TAMLIT list?

↑ Index

115. Evans/Moxley
Espousing Update 1/23
Mon 23 Jan 1995

This will be a brief one.

LEGISLATIVE UPDATE

We have learned that the Senate Committee on Labor and Human Resources has postponed their scheduled hearing on the NEA until later in the week. As usual, the Committee staff proved rather unforthcoming, but we will post the new time as soon as we learn it.

Also, in yesterday's post we provided detailed information on the Subcommittee on Education, Arts, and Humanities. This week's hearing was called by the Full Committee (L & HR), not the subcommittee, so the people you see on C-SPAN may not be precisely the one's we provided information for.

CALL FOR STATEMENTS

As we have mentioned before, one way to participate in Freely Espousing is to post a succinct statement expressing your viewpoint on the issue of federal arts funding. We will do our best to distribute these statements to all participating sites. So far, response has been very low on this count. We think these statements can play a crucial part in facilitating solidarity between otherwise isolated locations, so please do consider writing one.

ATTACK ON INTEREST FREE LOAN DEFERMENT FOR GRAD/PROF.
SCHOOLS

We received an action alert today (via the Marxist Literary Group's list-serve) concerning Contract with/on America legislation to dismantle interest free loan deferments to grad students. We will be happy to forward that post upon request. A 1-800 number, similar to the one established by American Arts Alliance on the NEA issue, has been set up (cost $3.95). We haven't got the number to hand, but will include it in our next update.

Alright--we're a little weary here in Providence, and a little nervous after having moved our event to a much larger space, but reports from across the country are very encouraging. Good work everyone!

Steve Evans & Jennifer Moxley

↑ Index

116. Ryan Knighton sign
Tue 24 Jan 1995

Could you please sign me up or on or whatever.... Or, could you tell me how. Or, at least tell me something.

thanks,
Ryan Knighton (knighton#sfu.ca)

↑ Index

117. Chris Stroffolino
Re: apex of the m...
Tue 24 Jan 1995

Dear mark--maybe a hint at an answer to your question about APEX BASHING may be found in the analogy with U.S.A. cold war politics...The USA certainly paid far more attention to the USSR than it did to England or France (despite its force du frappe) and the BIPOLAR POLITICAL MODEL still seems to exist in the poetry scene, despite the hype to the contrary... This had alot to do with how the L poets "got (in)famous" and have similar effect on MMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMMM.

↑ Index

118. eric pape
Re: apex of the m...
Tue 24 Jan 1995

This analogy is very useful if only to demonstrate the absurdity of reducing all the alternatives, political or poetical, down to two.

But considering the structural similarites of Soviet and US style administration, I wonder if you're trying to draw some correlation between the claims of m and of the l school? Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

119. Evans/Moxley
Espousing Update 1/24
Wed 25 Jan 1995

Another late-night update:

LEGISLATIVE UPDATE

The Senate Hearing on the NEA has been rescheduled for Thursday, January 26th, at 9:30 am.

The Congressional Record for January 23rd includes a speech given by Senator Pell in defense of the Endowment which event organizers/participants may wish to glance at. Also included in the record are editorials from various national newspapers.
They are:

We Need the NEA (Providence Journal 1/15/95)
Don't Axe Federal Support for Art (NYT 1/13/95)
Maintain Subsidies to Support the Arts (Chicago Sun-Times 1/13/95)
Shunning the Yahoo Point of View (Wall St. Journal 1/13/95)
Making a Case for the Arts (Atlanta Constitution 1/10/95)
GOP Has A Song for NEA: Taps (LA Times, Washington edition 1/11/95)
America's Art and Soul (Boston Globe 12/17/94).

In the House, the Committee on Appropriations, Subcommittee on Interior and Related Agencies, was to have met this afternoon at 1:30. I haven't yet seen or heard anything about that (check tomorrow's papers).

NEA "PLANS TO" DISTRIBUTE $24 MILLION

Or so I read in 1/24 Boston Globe (but nowhere else so far). Massachusetts artists and orgs got $1.3 million. Reports of who received funds in your area could be a handy-way of tracking down further Freely Espousing participants.

Best to everyone,

Steve Evans & Jennifer Moxley
[redacted]

↑ Index

120. Spencer Selby
Re: apex of the m...
Wed 25 Jan 1995

Dear Chris, If what you're saying is true (about hate giving its object power), then wouldn't the same apply to Newt Gingrich?
All Best, Spencer Selby

↑ Index

121. Chris Stroffolino
Re: apex of the m...
Wed 25 Jan 1995

No, eric (pape), actually, the analogy is severely flawed. I apologize for bringing it up. I do not know "the dealing that goes on behind the wings" but I prefer to be naive enough to hold out hope that if Mr. Mandel or Ms. Perloff sent work to Apex that they would read it seriously and "on its own merits" as it were. I don't want to put words in anyone's mouth, but in a letter I received several years ago from a dear friend of mine who happens to be an APEX editor, Mandel's work was mentioned positively--So I don't understand why he needs to say "I'm a language poet" in such a card-carrying way, as if these NAMES matter more than the poetry...

↑ Index

122. Chris Stroffolino
Re: apex of the m...
Wed 25 Jan 1995

Well, Spencer, that IS a tricky question is it. Let's SAY i HATE Newt Gingrich, or at least the interests for which he stands. Well, certainly that hatred isn't gonna make him or them go away, nor necessarily make him a larger threat then he is (except perhaps in our minds--LEST WE FORGET, etc.). It may be a quite different phenomena we're dealing with with the "divided left" which is basically how i read this L vs. M controversy... That the L vs. the M debate seems to obscure a more real debate... If we're going to be political, be political. Anyway, it's way more complicated than this...I'll use paper "without a net" to engage it more. All for now, Chris.

↑ Index

123. James Sherry
James, please post this; couldn't do it to: poetics@ , ubvm.cc.buffalo.edu (fwd)
Wed 25 Jan 1995

Leslie asked me to forward this to the group.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Tue, 24 Jan 95 15:40:27 PST
From: [redacted]
To: [redacted]
Subject: James, please post this; couldn't do it to: [redacted]

Dear James,

L&M S&M?, you're right. The most troubling thing is we've now got G.O.D. known only by the (spiritual) authorities (the fundamentalists; and even people saying they're Zen which they want codified, saying even Zen is essentially authority /convention as a positive assertion); where analysis (of one's language/form), or the form being what occurs or where/how it occurs, is to be overthrown as 'conservative.' Or 'merely reactive.' What's to occur as 'vision' must be given one from outside in that case. Yet that again is similar to the L's (on the West coast, usually two or three dominants, by whose ideas the entire group was then characterized - sometimes messages being given in manifesto group style; the point being that this behavior, which is now reoccurring, is jousting for dominance in which value is defined as power not related to literary substance per se, given credence by the stated assumption that displacing one's predecessors and peers is necessary. This is not the same as being a 'capitalist.'): always saying 'Question yourselves (laid bare by writing process), not us, or you're conservative; and you're (politically/socially) conservative by 'definition' if you question us.' 'You' not being an authority. Lew Daley's book on Susan Howe and John Taggart uses the word God as the reference authority about every third line; it's limiting the vocabulary. Similar to Perelman in the past finding the word "intuition" meaningless, essentially wanting to eliminate it; but not finding the word "thought" meaningless. Daley's book is a work of engagement (certainly passion) and complexity, yet his 'God' is as if a given which 'we' are supposed to know (by authority/tradition) (and renders valid the poetic observations?) rather than phenomena 'to be found out' by experience. In either case, elimination of vocabulary is exclusion of words which allow the perception of those distinctions as they are 'making' distinctions; which exclusion is also 'ordering.' The work of most Language poets is still continually changing and vital as is that of the various multitudinous dark horses, who're always there changing what is occurring. I think the poetic issues, delineated by the two (M/Language) here, parallel the contemporary religious and political moves; are not merely reactivity by them. For that reason, the Apex of M writing these matters is provocative. Personally, I'd rather 'react' to a humane rationalist (meaning even the limitations of such a specifically delineated stance) from which 'place' one can bound freely into one's own (inner) terrain, not usurped by anyone, than to have to have 'vision,' 'tradition' and 'spirituality' ('one's own place,' so that one would simply have to make another place) defined and held as a product or a poetic 'position;' which, when defined, and defining as power (as one avant-garde overtaking another), is voided. Leslie Scalapino

Tom White Leslie Scalapino

Fax: [redacted] [redacted]

↑ Index

124. Pierre Joris

Re: James, please post this; couldn't do it to: poetics@ ,

Wed 25 Jan 1995

Just as I was reading Leslie's piece, that wierd "G.O.D." in her second line appeared in huge letters on the side of a truck driving down Madison in front of my window & explaining in smaller letter that it meant:

Guaranteed Overnight Delivery

==========
========== Pierre Joris | He who wants to escape the world, translates it. Dept. of English | --Henri Michaux SUNY Albany | Albany NY 12222 | "Herman has taken to writing poetry. You tel&fax:[redacted] | need not tell anyone, for you know how email: | such things get around." [redacted]| --Mrs. Melville in a letter to her mother.
==========
==========

↑ Index

125. David W. Clippinger

Cid Corman

Wed 25 Jan 1995

I was wondering if anyone has Cid Corman's current address. Your help would be much appreciated.

Thanks,

David Clippinger

↑ Index

126. Kit Robinson

Re: G.O.D.

Wed 25 Jan 1995

Reply to: RE>G.O.D.
Pierre,

Wow! I thought Leslie meant Grand Old Deity.

Kit Robinson

↑ Index

127. Jerry Rothenberg
el cid
Wed 25 Jan 1995

For David Clippinger --

Cid Corman's address, as of maybe two years ago, was the following:

Fukuoji-cho 80
Utano
Ukyo-ku
Kyoto 616

Not in any way private as far as I know, so I send it to you over the net.

Jerome Rothenberg

↑ Index

128. LAURA MORIARTY
Re: Cid Corman
Wed 25 Jan 1995

David,

The address we have at the Poetry Center as of 1991 is

Fukuoji--Cho 80
Utano, Ukyo--Ku
Kyoto, 616, Japan

Also:

c/o Dr. Leonard Corman
87 Dartmouth St.
Boston, MA 02116

On Wed, 25 Jan 1995, David W. Clippinger wrote:

> I was wondering if anyone has Cid Corman's current address. Your help would be much appreciated.
>
> Thanks,
>
> David Clippinger

↑ Index

129. James Sherry
Re: Espousing Update 1/23
Wed 25 Jan 1995

NEA is a good thing for our country to support. A nation should support its culture not as a business but as its representative to the world.

↑ Index

130. James Sherry
Re: apex of the m...
Wed 25 Jan 1995

Chris, What do you mean that the L vs M debate obscures the real debate. What is this real debate? James

↑ Index

131. eric pape
Re: apex of the m...
Wed 25 Jan 1995

Wanted to post this to Chris privately, but the nodeid wouldn't work. Will have to display my further ignorance of M. I was very interested in Chris's reply to Spencer: if you're going to be political, be political. I agree entirely, but isn't a technique, a method, a mode of production political? Is politics simply contents? Because Forche and others say their work is revolutionary even though written in what may be considered reactionary forms, do we accept this? And this is where my ignorance is most apparent. I know nothing of M, their claims or their practises. The work seemed to be characterized in a certain way on the list and it was this characterization I was responding to.Perhaps illegitimately? I am interested in M materials. Any suggestions as to who and where? I do believe there is now room in poetry and poetics for another vital movement, another school in the American passion for schools. My concern is that this other take into account the insight into politics and poetics I believe L school provides. Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

132. James Sherry
Re: apex of the m...
Wed 25 Jan 1995

I think, although others may differ, that the attention to M is based on its "belligerent" attack on L, its infantile "why aren't we being included in the scene" resentment, and its frontal oversimplified politics when addressing such sensitive and subtle issues as spirit.

People are too eager to accept or credit or pay attention to these simplified attacks as if such simplicity were a more direct line to truth. The L group has tried to represent an alternative to such bluntness as antithetical to the complex process of writing and the multifold relations between that process and its dissemination to other writers to individual readers to the culture as a whole through its ideas and recursively to the writer of the original work. M seems to be trying to replace that complex web with an antiquated iconography thinly updated. I think also that Pam Rehm is a fine poet and the prose writing in Apex is admirable and profoundly misdirected. I think it's that combination which has attracted attention.

A Poetics and my personal favorite of the new publications "Chain" and others have not gotten that attention and that speaks to the exchange Chris Stro.. is involved in today. They are engaging in an ongoing dialog on many and interesting issues which we wouldn't think about combining in some false rubric and reifying to death. They are getting on with the work of making a world of poetry.

I wish that the M issue would just go away, but it won't and needs to be addressed even if addresssing it does make it more palpable. I wish all of those reactionaries disguised as the "new" thing would go away but Newt must also be dealt with and all such metered nonsense by people afraid to face the future.

I hope that's what you meant by why. Jamses

On Mon, 23 Jan 1995, Mark Wallace wrote:

> In regards to James Sherry's post, why the (again) valorization of the M as the sole "meaningful" response of younger "experimental" writers to Language poetry?
>
> Why does no one respond to A Poetics of Criticism, Poetic Briefs, various essays in Witz and Texture and (sometimes interesting essays) Talisman, which have all said much more complex, insightful, and useful things regarding this issue?
>
> mark wallace

↑ Index

133. George Bowering
Re: apex of the m
Wed 25 Jan 1995

In 1964 a revolutionary Central American poet told me what he thought about the relationship between language and fighting. He said "Agrarian reform of the mind before agrarian reform of the land."

↑ Index

134. Spencer Selby
Re: apex of the m...
Thu 26 Jan 1995

Dear Chris, When it comes to most editorial response today, names do matter more than the poetry. You're not naive to believe otherwise, you're in denial, and you've got a lot of company. (Forgive me for responding to yr letter to eric rather than the one to me, which I did appreciate.) Yrs, Spencer

↑ Index

135. Michael Boughn
Up in smoke
Thu 26 Jan 1995

Is the question, Is L more genuine than M, or is M less rigorous than L? Or is it that L + M = (aside from a nostalgia for smoking) M + L which is greater than the sum of its parts. Actually, you have to hand it to the Mers, who seemed to have learned well from the Lers (who I suspect, if "truth" be told, got it from the Yippies) (who, of course, got it from Madison Avenue) that a catchy logo(s) is half the battle of marketing. That and a "movement" to tag it to.

Call me I=R=R=E=S=I=S=T=I=B=L=E.

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

136. Peter
Re: Up in smoke
Thu 26 Jan 1995

Connell McGrath is in the process of breaking down the o-blek office and asked me to post the following announcement:

POETRY READERS

o-blek magazine is out of business and I want to pass on our overstock to interested readers. They are available on a first-come first serve basis at the following rates:
o-blek /#'s 1 thru 9 & 11 are a $1.50 per book, o-blek/12's are $4 per set while they last. These amounts will cover the cost of mailing materials and postage. Please help me to get these wonderful books into the right hands. Tell all who may be interested, buy as many as you like, do it soon.

Respectfully,

Connell McGrath

Send Check made out to o-blek to:
o-blek
PO Box 1242
Stockbridge, MA 01262

Please feel free to post this annoucement to other lists or to print out and pass on to others. Thanks

Peter Gizzi

↑ Index

137. Jorge Guitart
a reading of apex of the m 2
Thu 26 Jan 1995

I have read Apex of the M 2, of the famous editorial.

Nothing in it is 100% certified radically transparent--and that includes the editorial calling for radical transparency.

Some of the stuff in the editorial struck me as radically opaque
Some as medium opaque
Some of the poems were of medium transparency some of medium opacity

but every poem was extraordinary (though not in the sense of "used for a special service or occasion"--I thought of the wall street journal, where the editorials are conservative and (some of) the stories liberal. Here the editoria "radical" and the poems are "conservative".

i am pessimistic about radically transparent poetry bringing about the classless waste your time on me: organize.

↑ Index

138. Marc Nasdor
Re: NEA Enemy Action
Thu 26 Jan 1995

RE: James's posting on the NEA:

I think maybe I can rustle up a few "big hair" and long-nail salons out here in Staten Island to apply for a grant to satisfy the GOPpers. Do you think we should apply under the Folk Art category? :-)

Seriously, though, an effective strategy would be to accentuate the positive and argue for the NEA's survival based on the many small arts organizations and presses, etc., that the endowment funds. They should have have gotten rid of the fellowships a long time ago anyway. Besides, you can't even live for a year on $20,000 anymore, at least not on the coasts.

Cheers,

Marc Nasdor
[redacted] or [redacted]

↑ Index

139. Marc Nasdor
Re: New Press Release
Thu 26 Jan 1995

I've been off the wire for awhile.

Could someone tell me where the New York Freely Espousing event will take place, and at what time?

Thanks.

Marc Nasdor
[redacted]
[redacted]

↑ Index

140. Ted Pelton
Re: freely espousing
Thu 26 Jan 1995

Thinking about the NEA again and just having listened to NPR: When is it better to lose than to win? Jane Alexander testified to the senate today about all the travelling she had done and when she spoke to the common people how much art meant to them. Then the freshman senator from Missouri (I forget his name) asked about the problem of art being funded that the majority of Americans felt challenged their basic values. Did Jane Alexander then say that that was precisely the type of art that a democracy should fund? No. Instead she waffled about how they were trying to make sure that such things didn't happen in the future, that they had safeguarded again funding such things in the future (Mapplethorpe, of course, but not said out loud). Seeing an opening, the senator then said that he for one did not trust the NEA to make such safeguards themselves. Do you see where this is going? What if the NEA is preserved, but only to fund orchestras and such?

Talking to Alexander Ooms (in the lit program at the NEA) a week ago, he mentioned something that happened in Louisiana a couple of years ago. The legislature axed all arts funding. This so mobilized the arts community that they put enough pressure on government and the next year the legislature gave the arts funding at a dollar per citizen, double their previous budget.

The NEA being eliminated might not be as bad as what's currently shaping up. What if federal grants to individual artists were dropped and all money given to states in block grants instead? One can imagine that this might lead to no new artists being funded at all, at least in some (most?) states, the climate being such that what's most feared is anything potentially perceivable as dangerous, as critical, as confrontational.

I don't like the way this is going.

Ted Pelton

↑ Index

141. George Bowering

Re: apex of the m...

Fri 27 Jan 1995

Cienfuegos said, when the Communist Party was trying to impose socialist realism on Cuban art and writing: "Revolutionary art is part of the revolution." He did not mean realist stories about heroic peasants. He did not mean (have you seen it?) the 1960 National Art Museum in Sofia.

↑ Index

142. Steve Evans

Re: New Press Release

Fri 27 Jan 1995

Marc,

You may want to double check with Jeff Hull, but I am pretty sure FE will be at the Poetry Project

(Parish Hall) from 3-6pm. People are being encouraged to attend Kate Rushin's reading at the Ear Inn and then proceed over to the Project.

Jeff's number is [redacted] or you can call Brenda at the Project.

Glad to hear of your interest in all this.

Steve

↑ Index

143. Evans/Moxley
Espousing Update 1/26
Fri 27 Jan 1995

This didn't make it through on a first try....

----------Original message---------- As the 28th draws near, reports from all Freely Espousing sites sound very encouraging. We once again thank everyone who has devoted some of (or all of) their time recently to making sure that the events will be thought- and action- provoking. We will try to make "field reports" available to the list as soon after the events as possible. So far, attempts to have on-line links haven't panned out, but that was probably more due to time constraints than anything else.

SUGGESTED PETITION LANGUAGE

We, the undersigned, wish to make known our unwavering support for federal funding of the arts, humanities, and public broadcast media. We endorse a strong, uncensored National Endowment of the Arts; a vigorous National Endowment of the Humanities; and continued public ownership of and access to the airwaves. As citizens, we will oppose all attempts to dismantle the nation's cultural infrastructure. Arts and education must be democratized, not-- as some members of the 104th Congress currently argue--privatized. Furthermore, in our capacity as artists, writers, scholars, educators, students, curators, and persons committed to democratic cultural and social ideals, we will continue to assist the public in coming to an informed opinion about the enormous return on what is indeed a modest national investment in the arts and humanities.

(Note: Joe Ross may have suggestions for alternative language on the petitions by tomorrow. Joe--can you post such if indeed you get it?)

ALEXANDER'S TESTIMONY

We were unable to listen to JA's testimony this morning, but on Ted Pelton's account it seems well within her usual range. And we agree with Ted that it is a sobering/depressing range indeed (tho not so sobering perhaps as Mr. Heston's House testimony!). The narrowly economic approach being taken by many of the arts advocacy bureacracies should, we think, be countered by an articulate collective voice within the context of continued support for federal arts funding. Here in Providence, that's one thing we'll be interested in watching on Saturday: as organizers, we are arguing democracy, not the bottom line, as the bottom line. Many of our featured speakers, however, will take the prevailing economic line. Should be interesting.

PROVIDENCE FEATURED SPEAKERS

We don't have detailed programmes for other sites, but we thought people might be interested to know the speakers we'll be featuring on Saturday. They are:

Roger Mandle, President of Rhode Island School of Design and NEA Advisory Counsel Member Liam Rector, Freedom to Write-Boston
C.D. Wright, RI Poet Laureate
Ray Rickman, Host of PBS's _Bestsellers_
Terry Ann Greenwood, Director of RI Arts Advocates, Dir. of RI Philharmonic
Randy Rosenbaum, Director of Rhode Island State Council on the Arts
Doreen Bolger, Director of RISD Museum
Michael Harper, Professor of Creative Writing at Brown, Former State Laureate Rudy Cheeks, journalist for local alternative weekly(The Phoenix)
Congressman Jack Reed
Mayor of Providence Vincent "Buddy" Cianci

Many other people from the education, dance, theater, small press, and artists collectives "scenes" in RI have leant support and will participate throughout the day.

STATEMENTS FROM AFAR

After our last request, we received several excellent statements that will be read on Saturday. We'll include further statements if they arrive in time to be printed up, so take twenty minutes tomorrow and dash one out.

NEA COVER STORY IN THIS WEEKS VILLAGE VOICE

A valuable four pages or so in this week's Voice includes a terrific piece by Michael Feingold in which he applies to Switzerland for "amnesty" on behalf of the U.S.'s half-million cultural workers. C. Carr's "Hanging by a Thread" is useful for identifying the key advocacy groups currently working on saving arts funding. Elizabeth Hess tallies the costs of internal censorship on both the NEA & NEH's parts.

AND DON'T MISS

The editorial in today's NY Times entitled "Eating Her Offspring" by Mike Rich. Rich adopts OJ-speak to point out the considerable contra- dictions in Lynne Cheney's testimony to Tuesday's House subcomittee, most importantly her attack on the National History Standards that she helped to write and that she now cites as evidence of the NEH's unacceptable behavior.

↑ Index

144. James Sherry
Re: apex of the m...
Fri 27 Jan 1995

OK George, what DID he mean? James

On Thu, 26 Jan 1995, George Bowering wrote:

> Cienfuegos said, when the Communist Party was trying to impose socialist realism on Cuban art and writing: "Revolutionary art is part of the revolution." He did not mean realist stories about heroic peasants. He did not mean (have you seen it?) the 1960 National Art Museum in Sofia.

↑ Index

145. I.LIGHTMAN
apex of the m
Fri 27 Jan 1995

The truth of a process makes sense to and among those at the end of the process, where the transcription of thought on the page is a clean mirror to both writer and readers, writer as s/he writes, reader as s/he reads; the book unwritten is the look that speaks volumes between and among such.

This so rare that most of us do in the name of more, ever more, vocal and verbal, dropped out of empathy then yanked back, the lack of us in "you-you" the vocation of study, time out.

Oscar does not believe that art is being and thought is ugliness. He says so as in his day was no art and thought. Those who use Freud as if he were himself as benign and liberational as they do what he did not put sex against the ban on sex, power against stable.

Such sects! Lift up hearts, prey on. The dream can only create if sleep is not for the provision of rest, o day for rest and night for study. Bade the body. The good faith goads the intellect setting the church of our agenda which, fulfilled, burns. We digest the stone and break into a jog.

Dream breathing. Think, your very heart beating is bleeding and the blood next to come is bleeding into your heart, the oxygen is bleeding to become blood, the folks with beating blood are beating the air only. Dream wing.

All every night walk by the venue in their heads where perfect truth of process plays the energy of creation. All have greater artists than Shakespeare to meet, but avery eye, don't converse, few attend, few remember, we are special in knowing we're special not especially.

The perfect dreamer in all, in each, not a speaking to us all. Few go to sleep with the energy to mingle. I know I'm not alone in this. Shakespeare the artist in history, fifty of the sixteenth and seventeenth hundreds of years, everyone is Shakespeare.

The dead can dance. Dreams trot through our excuses, scared to knock such vital guards. The fear's not explained till the dream's not come back against twenty such sentries. Step out of the stage and into the tubes.

Stick to your gun till you blow off your head, walk again on your legs no one else's, carry your seed as she grows in your arms, out of your pain, let her, away from your pain. Think well of yourself, use your hands, get a grip, on the non-carnal gun.

So many arms, swinging under the noosed throats, the unspoken carried on so many legs. Like dream life's accidents, vile, we dream nearer and nearer, the guard hangs in the air, twitching, tapping. We feel bumped into until, joy, we are alive.

The ambient never wake up. Like you don't. You begin to ban humour and alcohol, the mares buck and head for the guards in new hope. Rest is not it, without truth towards process towards truth.

If you're still reading, no-one's got anything. Some should let thoughts fester in the mind, process the festering. I know mortally the years from when I was born, each day the unit of measurement cuts history into me-sized portions, knowing ledges. I dodder to think the art of it.

Sophocles mortal braved Freud, now so less winning. The Freud-led walk through him, more to hurt that if they'd gone by him, on every shelf in every flame-stricken library? Mind how you go. Excavate Plato, afraid to go out, for dream research.

Nothing like life to keep you from dying, the nerves are steel strings, loud acoustic. Song begins the vibration, words reason the entry, into society, largely worthy of nothing so clarity!

Be you once, the harsh heart sooner or timely, a slick into two dimensions, of prose, this nuisance is losing its once fascination, the pattern returns to its usual dynamic. Think in the two, drink in the third, things they don't want to reveal indicate why do you say that.

I get it. Draw on planes, repairing the prairie, the gasses from the busses, the hole us. Destroy two to save three. The hurt behind the face understood yields to surf on the face again.

The month from a flame that took our collection, from our senses, and flashed a banner over a dish of a dominant hemisphere, the northern, a cap with the bill right in front of our eyes. A missable interactive experience, a miserable sky made it so.

Is cool holodeck sky? I sensed it cambe back to my name, but a short therapist circuits the patient, tree dimensional. I'll take my "clumsiness", I didn't dream "it" up, I ride broken in the bumps of a world I ought never to have believed was mine only thought. Alive-in world.

The process of a sense makes truth to and among those at the head of a process, where the transcription of truth on the page is a claimed mirror to both writers and reader, writer as reader as utter; the book unsmitten is the look that speaks volumes between and among such.

MANIFESTO FOLLOWS SHORTLY

↑ Index

146. I.LIGHTMAN

CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)

Fri 27 Jan 1995

From: CPCMB::P280 "I.LIGHTMAN" 27-JAN-1995 15:42:29.58
To: P280
CC:
Subj:

1) Spiritualism. Never assume that in attacking something as religious, you are not part of a religion yourself. Jung not Freud.

2) If you are going to use the I-Ching, notice how your interaction with it produces a different work than is produced by someone else using the I-Ching. Notice that your works are more like each other, than your I-Ching works are like I-Ching works by other artists. Stockhausen not Cage.

3) Keep listening.

5) Have Pound's decency to look back on what you've represented. Next Generation not Kirk.

8) If improvisation is free, why do many of its evenings go out to the same boundary and no further? Leibniz not Newton.

13) To lecture, Stein milking not mocking a restrained common vocabulary to write descriptions, not Derrida punning and concatenating with abstracts to provoke, always with fixed unspoken loyalties of his own, and not own explicitly. Close to who you pretend?

21) Non-Freudian not neo-Freudian post-structuralism, if any.

34) Gloria Steinem not Julia Kristeva.

55) Fuck gender-fuck, open up genre. Harryman not Silliman. Thresh hold of "becoming" an adult and "no longer" being like a child. Neil Gaiman not Ridley Scott. Nurture, non-sexual love sexual life; actual practice of community, professor. Elizabeth Burns' _Letters to Elizabeth Bishop_, not Derrida's _The Post Card_.

89) Hyper-reality and reality, extend, object both ways. Posters and paintings of words not handwritten notebooks. Brush syntax. Johanna Drucker meets Emily Dickinson.

144) The sentence was a good stretch, but now I choose my jailors. Sing energy. So long when you misuse lyric poetry as a prison term. "The voice makes possible the entire continuum from the most extreme consonant-like noises to the purest vocal sound, and is far superior to even the most modern apparatus for creating tone-colours". Stockhausen not Zukofsky, the musical phrase, remember, not the metronome.

IF YOU FOLLOW (OR ARE NEARER TO THIS MANIFESTO THAN TO OTHERS), PLEASE SUBMIT WORK TO "CHEERFUL FOLK POP OUT OF BUXTEHUDE"

[redacted]

OR

IRA LIGHTMAN
48 GLOUCESTER STREET NORWICH
NR2 2DX
UNITED KINGDOM

↑ Index

147. Jorge Guitart
cienfuegos and socialist realism
Fri 27 Jan 1995

Was that Camilo Cienfuegos, who disappeared mysteriously in Oct '59? (played centerfield for the San Francisco Seals (AAA) before the Rev) it couldnt have been Osmany Cienfuegos, Castro bureaucrat and murderer of bay of pigs invaders (put them in a cattle truck without ventilation).

↑ Index

148. Chris Stroffolino
Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
Fri 27 Jan 1995

Hey--great fibonnuci (sic0 sequence, Ira. Anyway, Elizabeth Burns is here in Albany, NY and she'll no doubt to be thrilled your mention of her icw Derrida. Ah, names! chris s.

↑ Index

149. I.LIGHTMAN
Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
Fri 27 Jan 1995

HI Chris,

Isn't Katie Yates in Albany? She's fab. How would one move to Albany, work there? I'm thinking of it as a next place to live. Ira

↑ Index

150. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Life Supports
Fri 27 Jan 1995

Does anyone know how i can obtain a copy of Life Supports, William Bronk's Collected Poems, which seems to have recently and lamentably become "unsupportable," i.e. gone out of print?

Steve Shoemaker
[redacted]

↑ Index

151. Spencer Selby
Re: apex of the m...
Fri 27 Jan 1995

Well, Chris, I don't know about yr distinction here. You talk about work read "on its own merits," that's what I was responding to. To me the group label is a secondary issue, though certainly related to what I consider primary--namely that people are unwilling or unable to respond to the work on its own merits. They need the signature, the name behind it, whatever might go along with that, whether it be group affiliation, things they've heard about you, yr publishing and/or life history or what they know of it, relations or encounters they've had with you, what they think of you, what they've heard other people think of you, what you believe and what you say about yrself (or anything else under the sun). In short, what they know or think they know of who you are. This is what I mean by name, and this is what is more important in our social reality than the work, unfortunately--most unfortunately. Yrs, Spencer

↑ Index

152. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
Fri 27 Jan 1995

"DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST"? Hm.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

153. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Espousing Update 1/26
Fri 27 Jan 1995

I am standing on the fringes. . .of this NEA thing, interested and provoked, yet not quite knowing where I stand on the issue. I am curious if someone would care to articulate the argument exactly why the federal government should keep funding the arts, humanities, etc. Now, keep in mind I am of the inclination that it should be continued--that we need support for arts and culture in this country--but that I am particularly curious how it is possible to argue with what appears a majority (hardly) who feel that such funding has been to undermine their values. How does one make the argument that the government ought to fund something that may militate against convention and "American" values? The way I see this is that it is going to very difficult to persuade people with power (reflecting the national mood-swing) to fund something that offends them. Does the federal government have a responsibility to fund art? Yes, of course it does, but if resources are few and the choices even fewer then . . .? Gosh, you know, I know I may be putting my head in the proverbial lion's mouth here, but I am interested in what and why on this issue and ask it so that I might understand it better. I don't want to offend anyone who feels strongly about this, I mean, afterall, I'd much rather the government fund education, art, mass transportation, etc, etc, than the military, etc, etc, etc. . . . And I'm also interested in the possibility that this fiscal argument is actually a covert way of making a cultural argument, of defunding the opposition. But here's where it gets real interesting, doesn't it, I mean, should those that feel that their values are under attack from these agencies honestly be persuaded that they should cough up tax money for something that offends them. It's our money, too, I suppose, but, sometimes I wonder if they're aren't more of them than there are of us. . . and I hate saying that cause we should all be having a broader dialogue with others of different opinions so we can explain what it is that we are attempting when we reread Western Civilisation and so they can articulate why it upsets them . . . and this all makes it so clear of how much is really at stake I suppose and I have to wonder if the opposition between the for/against isn't a distraction from some larger issue that we should be paying attention to ...or, I mean that the argument is a distraction from something else we should be noticing or . . . . And, you know, I just want to know why, why is arts funding important and why should someone who believes it's not fiscally responsible and culturally offensive pay for it? Sorry so long.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

154. Loss Glazier

epc.news (note)

Fri 27 Jan 1995

A slightly corrected version of the epc.news posted to this list has been placed in the Electronic Poetry Center. Epc.news is available through the web version under the "hotlist."

↑ Index

155. Charles Bernstein

Re: sign

Fri 27 Jan 1995

How did you hear about the Poetics List? IS SFU State?

↑ Index

156. Charles Bernstein

Re: sign

Sat 28 Jan 1995

Welcome to the Poetics List.

Please note that this is a private list and information about the list should not be posted to other lists or directories. The idea is to keep the list to those with specific rather than general interests, and also to keep the scale of the list small and the volume managable. Word-of-mouth (and its electronic equivalents) seems to be working fine: please feel free to invite people you know to sign-up. It is easier for me if they sign-up by themselves AND send me ([redacted]) a note telling me how they heard about the list. I will send them this document in reply.

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to

[redacted]

body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

(The shorter bitnet address is [redacted]. All further references to "Listserve" are to this listserve.)

message, with no subject line, to the listserv address:

{or}

I will be sent a notice of all subscription activity.

ARCHIVES

There are two ways to get archives. The easiest way is to use the archives of the list at the Electronic Poetry Center (EPC), for which see the end of this message. The other way is described below:

Anyone interested in an archive of all postings after March may send this message to "Listserve":

index poetics

or

index poetics f=mail

You will receive a list of archived files in a format that includes something like this:

* rec last - change * filename filetype GET PUT -fm lrecl nrecs date time

POETICS LOG9403 ALL OWN V 80 1012 94/05/31 07:17:17
Started on Mon,
7 Mar 1994 12:51:12 -0600
POETICS LOG9404 ALL OWN V 83 1864 94/05/31 07:18:54
Started on Sat,
2 Apr 1994 16:01:07 -050
POETICS NOTEBOOK ALL OWN V 640 1693 94/06/09 15:27:09
Started on Sun,
1 May 1994 09:47:10 -0500

You can then send the "get" command to "Listserve" in the format:

get filename filetype (eg: get poetics log9403
get poetics log9403
get poetics notebook)

or

get filename filetype f=mail

depending on which log file you want (you can also get multiple files with one message). Note that each of the files has a different beginning and end date, eg LOG9404 starts 7 March and goes to 31 May and that dates overlap. Go figure! "Poetics Notebook" is an anomalous name for what is, in effect, another log file.

****

Send an e-mail message to [redacted]. Leave the "Subject" line of the e-mail message blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

subscribe e-poetry Firstname Lastname

where Firstname and Lastname correspond to your name.

You will receive a confirmation of your subscription soon thereafter. (Nonsubscribers can automatically sub to Poetics using this same format, but substituting "poetics" for "e- poetry".)

**

```
    ____    ____   ____
   /   /   /   / /   /
   EEEE   PPPPP  CCCCC
   EE /   PP PP  CC  C/
   EEE    PPPPP  CC   /        URL=gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/
  __EE  /_ PP |__ CC  C ____
 /  EEEE/  PP/    CCCCC/    /    internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift
/___________________________/
|-------------------------|
```

| Electronic Poetry Center |
|_____|

E P C . N E W S

No. 1 (January, 1995)

Contents:

1.0 Basic Assumptions
2.0 Poetry and the Electronic Place
3.0 Interfaces: Gopher, Web, Mosaic; Bookmarks
4.0 RIF/T Notes
5.0 EPC New Additions
6.0 How to Connect

1.0 Basic Assumptions

The Electronic Poetry Center seeks to provide a central _place_ for Internet resources for poetry and poetics.

The lay of the land:

1.__Welcome : Electronic Poetry Center Welcome & FAQ's (About)/
2.__RIF/T : RIF/T / New Poetry, Prose, & Poetics (Texts)/
3.__Poetics : Calendar, Poetics List Archive & Files (Texts)/
4.__Authors : Electronic Poetry & Poetics - Authors (Texts)/
5.__E-Journals : Gateway to Electronic Poetry Journals (Texts)/
6.__E-Resources : Gateway to Electronic Poetry Resources (Connects)/
7.__Small Press : Electronic Poetry Center Small Press Alcove (Cites)/
8.__Gallery : The Electronic Poetry Gallery (Visuals)/
9.__Sound : The Electronic Poetry Sound Room (Sound Files)/
10._Documents : Poetry & Poetics Document Archive (Texts)/

11._Exhibits : Electronic Poetry Center Exhibit case (Texts)/
12._Notices : Electronic Poetry Center Announcements (Info)/

The Center continues to provide access to the electronic poetry and poetics journal, RIF/T, and the archives of the Poetics List. Needless to say, the EPC provides quality archival materials for these resources. For the Poetics archive, a feature has recently been added to allow keyword searching for the immense number of files comprising this archive.

The EPC author library offers texts and/or information about contemporary poets in a variety of formats.

A number of electronic journals are archived and distributed by the EPC. Journals distributed through the EPC differ from other e-journal archives in a significant way: the texts presented here have been checked and verified by their issuing agency, thus at least getting to you versions of electronic journals that have a direct link to their source. We are delighted to offer these journals to you and will continue to make sure texts presented are done so in collaboration with their producers. For resources outside the EPC, we have written links to make seamless connections to these resources. It is our aim to be vigilent about our links so that persons interested in poetry and poetics do not have to spend a lot of time digging for addresses, remembering sites, and locating resources. Through the selections available at the EPC, users of the system have simple and direct access to many other related Internet resources.

The Center also provides information about contemporary little magazines and small presses engaged in poetry and poetics. Since this information is often difficult to locate, it is presented at the EPC in hopes of recongizing these contributions, facilitating communication, and providing an additional outlet for these extremely valuable print sources. Look here also for Selby's List of Experimental Magazines.

The Poetry & Poetics Document Archive provides access to a number of documents of use to poets, teachers, and researchers. Here you will find essay material and current obituaries. This area should be consulted in conjunction with the Poetics Files and Small Press Sources areas, which also offer material of pedagogical use.

The EPC also presently offers gallery, sound, exhibts, and an announcements area.

2.0 Poetry and the Electronic Place

Compared to say, a year ago, many people might agree that the idea of some sort of an electronic forum for poetry is not only a possibility but an inevitability. We have seen the continued growth of the Poetics List (I counted around 250 postings the month of December 1994 alone) and the development of the Electronic Poetry Center. The EPC has maintained a significant circulation. We regularly get letters from various world outposts attesting to the reality of such connectivity. Interesting also are the number of visits taking place, both locally and across distance; despite the dips and peaks that typify any active place, the EPC has seen a good amount of traffic across its doorstep. For those with such inclination (and it is illuminating that the following compare favorably with circulation statistics, say, for a little magazine) here are some numbers:

Month	_Connects_
Nov 1994	573
Oct 1994	429
Sep 1994	367
August 1994	348
July 1994	614
June 1994	110

These statistics give only a sense of scale, it should be noted, since direct connections to EPC submenus and entries through Veronica searches, a significant number of connects, are not included in the above statistics.

3.0 Interface: Gopher, Web, Mosaic

Even as activities converge, it is also the time of divergent interfaces. I am often surprised by the number of our contributors and participants who do not even have gopher access. (These, again, not represented in the above statistics.) Most people, we figure, have at least gopher access, though Web access is quickly becoming a standard. Mosaic, it would be assumed, though assuming predominance in the University setting, has hardly become a reality for most dial-up users, particularly internationally. (For the sake of a common ground, gopher is an ascii-based interface that offers access through the selection of menus; the web is an ascii-based interface that offers access through _screens_ of information with links to other areas appearing as highlighted text; Mosaic is a graphical interface basically superimposed on the Web structure that offers images, sound, video, and allows you to use your mouse as a navigational tool.) The EPC is accessible through any of these interfaces. It is presently evolving strongly towards exclusive Web/Mosaic access.

Informational Notes: (1) The standard for Web/Mosaic documents is the markup protocol called html. These are imbedded codes that you will see once in a while when you download an html document. These codes give instructions to the software about highlighting, fonts, and screen layout, as well as providing for the _hot links_ that make possible Web/Mosaic navigation. (2) A feature of these interfaces that should be mentioned is the bookmark. You may wish to investigate this as most systems allow you to set a bookmark, say at the EPC, and gain immediate access to it when you invoke your interface.

4.0 RIF/T Notes

Forthcoming from RIF/T are two special issues. The first of these is the Transpoeisis issue (see EPC Announcements for details) which will offer a muti-faced and multi-format approach to the presentation of translations. Also forthcoming, a planned special issue on Charles Olson. RIF/T will also soon issue the first in a series of special chapbooks. Much on the way!

5.0 EPC New Additions

Many additions have been made to the EPC in the past six months. Following are some of the journals archived and directly distributed by the EPC:

DIU / Albany
Experioddi(cyber)cist / Florence, AL
Inter\face / Albany
Poemata - Canadian Poetry Assoc. / London, Ontario (Info)/
RIF/T: Electronic Space for New Poetry, Prose, & Poetics
Segue Foundation/Roof Book News / New York
TREE: TapRoot Electronic Edition / Lakewood, Ohio
We Magazine / Santa Cruz
Witz / Toluca Lake, CA / via Syntax

Significant connections which the EPC would like to highlight include the following:

Alternative-X
Basil Bunting Poetry Centre (Durham, England)
[Informational]
Best-Quality Audio Web Poems (Rhode Island)
Carma Bums 'Tour of Words'
CICNET Electronic Journal Archive
Institute for Advanced Technology in the Humanities (Virginia)

Internet Poetry Archive (North Carolina)
Michigan Electronic Text Archive
Nous Refuse Discussion List (Illinois)
Postmodern Culture (North Carolina)
Whole Earth 'Lectronic Magazine

6.0 How to Connect

The Center is located at gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/ library/e-journals/ub/rift

Gopher Access: For those who have access to gopher, type
gopher writing.upenn.edu
at your system prompt. First choose Libraries & Library Resources, then Electronic Journals, then E-Journals/Resources Produced Here At UB, then The Electronic Poetry Center. (Note: Connections to some Poetry Center resources require Web access, though most are presently available through gopher).

World-Wide Web and Mosaic Access:
For those with World-Wide Web (lynx) or Mosaic access, from your interface, choose the _go to URL_ option then go to (type as one continuous string)
gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/internet/
library/e-journals/ub/rift

(Substituting hh for 11 in the URL above may produce better results on your system.)

Check with your system administrator if you have problems with access. Also ask about setting a "bookmark" through your system for quick and easy access to the Center when you log on.

If you have comments or suggestions about sites to be added to the Center, do not hesitate to contact Loss Pequen~o Glazier, [redacted] or Kenneth Sherwood, [redacted]

The Electronic Poetry Center is administered in Buffalo by E-Poetry
and RIF/T in coordination with the Poetics List.

Loss Pequen~o Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood and Loss Glazier
in collaboration with Charles Bernstein

End of EPC.News #1

↑ Index

157. Chris Stroffolino

Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)

Sat 28 Jan 1995

Yates left Albany in August for Boulder, Co. Naropa scene buddhist holistic meditation trip. Her whereabouts are unknown to me and as far as I know to most here in Albany. If anybody, probably funkhouser would know.... As for moving to Albany, I'm torn about what to tell you. We certainly would enjoy the presence of another poet here. Why would you want to leave England for a country (gendered masculine--sorry) who has "Blown its wad" in a century that is approaching its end? Just curious--chris

↑ Index

158. braman sandra

Funding Arguments

Sat 28 Jan 1995

In answer to Jeffery Timmons, and anyone else -- As a scholar whose field of research is information policy, I've spent some time over the past couple of years articulating reasons why a nation-state should be concerned about arts policy. The arguments I offer differ from those traditionally available (makes money for the communities, eg...) because I believe the position of the arts within the postmodern condition/the information society play a different role vis a vis private and public power structures. Theories of self-organizing systems are used. Happy to send a "popular" and/or academic version of these arguments fully laid out to anyone who sends a snail address, and will try to put a one-screen version of the arguments up later today. Sandra Braman Institute of Communications Research University of Illinois-Urbana [redacted]

↑ Index

159. Ron Silliman

Katie Yates

Sat 28 Jan 1995

When I saw her at Naropa last summer, Katie Yates was saying that she planned to move permanently to Boulder. She'd attended Naropa before Albany (and is, in fact, the first grad of the Kerouac school to go on to get a PhD in writing, odd degree that that is). She was on this list when she was at Albany, but I don't know if she still has access. Katie, are you there?

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

160. Evans/Moxley
Re: Funding Arguments
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Sandra:

We would love to make the "popular" version of your argument available to the audience at Freely Espousing this afternoon. Any chance of having it, via e-mail, by 1:30 or so?

Yours,

Steve Evans and Jennifer Moxley

↑ Index

161. Pierre Joris
Re: Katie Yates
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Ron, A PhD in writing wld be an odd degree indeed. The Albany grad program,however, involves what we call "a nexus of discourses" with three primary areas: writing / criticism / pedagogy. A degree has to involve at least 2 of those, as did, for example, Katie's.

Pierre

========== Pierre Joris | He who wants to escape the world, translates it. Dept. of English | --Henri Michaux SUNY Albany | Albany NY 12222 | "Herman has taken to writing poetry. You tel&fax:[redacted] | need not tell anyone, for you know how email: | such things get around." [redacted]| --Mrs. Melville in a letter to her mother. ==========

↑ Index

162. Chris Scheil
Re: Espousing Update 1/26
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Jeffrey Timmons has articulated certain vague apprehensions that I have also entertained in regard to the whole NEA funding controversy. In particular, I have always entertained a certain unease about the funding of individual artists; there is a sense that by allowing the government (through whatever assemblage of artist-advisors brought in to make value judgements, ect) to pick and choose them, that we are perpetuating a hegemonic acceptance of and de facto perpetuation of whatever stylistic movement is deemed to have sufficient cultural currency at any given time.

Rather, I would probably like to see the NEA become an organization dedicated to funding other local organizations, who in turn would support those individuals in whom they find merit. Let The Knitting Factory, the local Urban Institute for Contemporary Arts, and the regional art organizations decide where the federal dollars are spent. Local funding, local control...

Just wanted to put my 2 cents in...

Chris Scheil

↑ Index

163. nada
Re: el cid
Sat 28 Jan 1995

I talked to Cid Corman on the phone a couple of months ago. His current address is

Fukuoji-cho 88
Kyoto 616
JAPAN

↑ Index

164. braman sandra
Art Policy in the 90s
Sat 28 Jan 1995

The following more lengthy message articulates in broad brushstrokes what art policy might b e in the 1990s relative to today's policy environment, the postmodern characteristics of our culture, and what it means to be in an information economy. The NEA ain't the only game in town. Sandra Braman

↑ Index

165. braman sandra
Apology -- it didn't work
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Attempt to send art and poetry policy text failed. Sorry to have disturbed you. Iced and snowed out of freely espousing in Milwaukee. Will try again later. S. Braman

↑ Index

166. Robert Drake
Re: Espousing Update 1/26
Sat 28 Jan 1995

<deleted musings on NEA as arbiter/bestower of "quality">

> Rather, I would probably like to see the NEA become an organization dedicatd to funding other local orgaizations...

so would i, but that sort of thing is _exactly_ what the first round of hearings made clear was unacceptable to congress. they want _more_ control, not less...

and, since i have in the past voiced my own misgivings about the NEA, let me say that Newt Helms & co. do not need my help in bashing any segment of the arts communities, and i hope the Espousing events went well...

luigi

↑ Index

167. George Bowering
Re: cienfuegos and socialist realism
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Cienfuegos didnt disappear all that mysteriously. His plane went down somewhere, not all that much to the dismay of the CP adherents who didnt like his barbudo style.

↑ Index

168. George Bowering
Re: apex of the m...
Sat 28 Jan 1995

He meant revolutionary ART, not art about the revolution.

↑ Index

169. George Bowering
to Mark Wallace
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Did you write a review of Bromige's book from Brick Books? If so, wd you get in touch with me at

[redacted]

↑ Index

170. Chris Stroffolino
reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Sat 28 Jan 1995

I'm changing the "name" of this debate/discussion--not so much because I necessarily see the issue as more 'real' in an absolute way but it is perhaps more empowering. There are several 'issues' or 'insights' I'd like to 'address'. Tom Mandel's recent post claims "difference is where it's at" and basically I agree. The question then becomes a matter of the debate between the structuralist "Difference between" and the post-structuralist "difference within," a "meta" debate I find engaging. When Tom writes "I want the discourse to proceed at the level of the poetry" he raises the question of the RELATION between poetry and polemics. Eric Pape brings up the "politics is not simply content" but also form and that can be a little too black and white at times. For the example he uses claims that the trouble with Forche is her work in "reactionary forms". Yet, maybe that wouldn't be such a problem werethe work engaged in a more rigorous questioning of the complexities of current political/ideological/economic questions rather than the relatively SAFE poems about World War II, etc. And maybe Kali Tal would argue, but too much VIETNAM poetry seems to do this too... Nonetheless, I do not wish to reject these voices out of hand. And in terms of this i find Leslie Scalapino's comments quite helpful. She considers Lew Daly's appeal to "God" as a too limiting vocabulary and equates it to perelman's rejecting "intuition" but not "thought." And this illuminates but one way in which the L poets (Baby boomers?) and the M editors (gen. x?) are actually quite similar, despite James Sherry's assertion that "The L group (not the CHUBB group] has tried to represent an alternative to such bluntness as antithetical to the complex process of writing..." Yes! However, I can not necessarily totally side with the urge for boundless vocabulary. In the first place, even if i hold it a value to have no taboos in my work and say everything (as it were), there are certain "charecteristic" things I return to often.In the second place this may be as much of an issue of "difference within" as "difference between" (When I first got into poetry in around 1986 I remember going back and forth, dialectically as it were, between Brecht and Ashbery and i also remember being rather skeptical towards the "times they are a changing" and the "gotta serve somebody" dylan--prefering the more complex "Bringin' It All/Hiway 61" stuff--but then one day it hit me "YES, there is a certain level on which it's BLACK AND WHITE"). I do not claim to solve any of this nor do I mean to come off like some "independent" "third party candidate" with an "open mind" (ever hear the song by MAGAZINE--"My mind ain't so open that anything would crawl in") but I'm curious when Tom (Mandel) writes that a NEGATIVE RESPONSE IMPLIES A CLOSED MIND. In the first place, what IS a NEGATIVE RESPONSE? Don Byrd told me (forgive me if I'm misquoting you Don) that although his last book of poetry was reviewed quite favorably, it wasn't the response he wanted. he didn't think people "got it." Often, so-called NEGATIVE responses show far more engagement with the work than so-called POSITIVE ones. But not always. One last point I would like to flog like a dead horse is the question of Mandel's definition of the identity of himself as a LANGUAGE poet as historical and not card-carrying. Do we define say David Shapiro or John Godfrey, roughly the same age and with many of the same concerns as a good number of the L poets, as LANGUAGE poets--historically. Doesn't this become like the academic co-optation of poets. i had a teacher at Temple who was bent on proving that marianne moore was an objectivist, because she saw herself as an objectivist and began to like Moore. That can be interesting I suppose, but what i'm more interested in at present is what Leslie Scalapino calls "multidinous dark horses."(typo at multitidinous) In what context? Chris...

↑ Index

171. BLUOMA

Re: Espousing back at ya-hoo

Sat 28 Jan 1995

Reply to: RE>Espousing back at ya-hoo

Thanks, all goes well in nuevoyourko. gringos & heathens alike.
when yall comin to town?
BillyDglsMark&Jeff

↑ Index

172. BLUOMA

Re: the real language poet

Sat 28 Jan 1995

Reply to: RE>the real language poet

look, the other day i was sitting in this stupid pretend english pub that was less like a real english pub than anyone in hollywood could ever imagine (even the evil eisner), & my head bounced off the fucking floor when i realized that james sherry, tom mandel, & charles bernstein were raking this guy over the coals for writing an article 2 (not one, but 2) YEARS ago about Language Poetry. (& how they weren't that thing.)

FINE--They're not, infact no one except ME ever was.

Yes--I AM THE FIRST, THE ONE & ONLY LANGUAGE POET.

Silliman, Andrews, Bernstein, Hejinian, Harriman, Palmquist, Veal-Scalapino, 1000w Lig htBulb, & Hello Kitty Robinson are all imposters-posers-reactionary posse. (at best PROTO-LANGUAGE poets.) {More precisely, NEO-Door.}

I am THE Language Poet.

Group identification is merely another marketing ploy & the oldest one at that.

-Tony Door
Calabria, Italy
1/29/95

↑ Index

173. Ted Pelton
Re: Espousing Update 1/26
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Reply to Jeffrey Timmons re: arts & humanities funding:

First of all, I don't believe that there is a national mood supporting Gingrich & co., but rather that it's manufactured; neither do I believe the country is in terrible financial trouble, as NEA/NEH detractors would have it. Sometimes their manuevers are naked: witness Lynn Cheney testifying against the NEH two years after chairing the agency herself and testifying it should be renewed, and that at a time when we had a worse deficit. But to the point (I could get into an interrelated media and politicians and corporations thing, but it's a rather familiar tune by now), I offer the following quotations: "I believe, as a free society, we need to protect diversity and encourage the exchange of ideas. I regard some recent attempts to cut funding for NEA as attempts at censorship, and at silencing one part of this discussion." "The world leadership which has come to the United States cannot rest solely upon superior power, wealth, and technology, but must be solidly founded upon worldwide respect and admiration for the Nation's high qualities as a leader in the realm of ideas and of the spirit." "Democracy demands wisdom and vision of its citizens. It must therefore foster and support a form of education, and access to the arts and the humanities, designed to make people of all backgrounds and wherever located masters of the technology and not its unthinking servants." The first quote is from Sen. Russ Feingold, D-Wisconsin. Why doesn't something like this come from Jane Alexander was my question a couple days ago. It isn't outside the debate, but she chose to compromise before the fight began. Conservatives are trying to censor those who stand for values they don't agree with. Values is a word that's been taken over by the Right, as if you have to be a fundamentalist to have values. But things that are happening in Congress right now are deeply offensive to my values -- the right to have an art that functions as critique and antidote to prevailing norms, a neccessity in a democracy. (That much more necessary because the press -- which Madison and Jefferson and co. thought would save us -- have abdicated their adversarial position vis a vis government, preferring a scandal-sheet mentality.) The second two quotes are also from the center, or at least what used to be the center: both come from the original NEA/NEH charter in 1965. I particularly like "masters of their technology and not its unthinking servants." Is it possible that the US Government once produced language like that? Now all the powers that be seem to want are unthinking servants. Thus the endowments are opposed. Who are the people we're always being told support this and condemn that? I don't buy what I'm told the people want. Polls are a sophisticated form of lie; similarly, I can structure my lectures to my students so that I see my own phrases coming back to me on tests. But as a part of the people, I'm going to demand what I think the nation should stand for; that first government quote hits home for me -- I'm tired of being known around the world for our endless flow of weapons to the world's thugs, or as the world's biggest thug. James Sherry said something similar the other day: "A nation should support its culture not as a business but as its representative to the world." I could add: others will represent you if you don't represent yourself.

Ted Pelton

↑ Index

174. peter quartermain

Re: Up in smoke

Sat 28 Jan 1995

In message Thu, 26 Jan 1995 12:03:35 EST,

Peter <[redacted]> writes:

Peter Quartermain asks,

Can you please reserve me one dozen copies of #12 at $4.oo each, PLUS TWO complete sets of Oblek #1-#9 at $1.50 each?

I've put a cheque for $75.00
in the mail but the Canadian Post Office is sometimes so slow that they might all otherwise be sold before my cheque reaches you. Thanks.
Peter

(I'd be grateful indeed if you could forward this message to Connell McGrath. Thanks.

> Connell McGrath is in the process of breaking down the o-blek office > and asked me to post the following announcement:
> _____
>
> POETRY READERS
>
> o-blek magazine is out of business and I want to pass
> on our overstock to interested readers. They are available > on a first-come first serve basis at the following rates:
> o-blek /#'s 1 thru 9 & 11 are a $1.50 per book, o-blek/12's > are $4 per set while they last. These amounts will cover > the cost of mailing materials and postage. Please help > me to get these wonderful books into the right hands. Tell > all who may be interested, buy as many as you like, do it soon.
>
> Respectfully,
>
> Connell McGrath
>
> Send Check made out to o-blek to:
> o-blek
> PO Box 1242
> Stockbridge, MA 01262
> _____
> Please feel free to post this annoucement to other lists or > to print out and pass on to others. Thanks
>
> Peter Gizzi
>

Peter Quartermain
128 East 23rd Avenue voice and fax [redacted]

Vancouver
B.C.
Canada V5V 1X2
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

175. Archives Department

Dark Ages Clasp the Daisy Root, Sept. 1990

Sat 28 Jan 1995

[The editors of Dark Ages Clasp the Daisy Root are preparing electronic versions of some of the material from their magazine, which will soon be available at the EPC. This text is provided as introduction.]

Dark Ages Clasp the Daisy Root #4, Sept. 1990

Editorial:

We live at a time in which "modern" no longer makes clear what differentiates the present from the past. Comes instead the prefix "post-," illuminating like a metaphysical truth an age that never did, perhaps, exist, signifying above all our wish to be rid of words that no longer help us speak. What Beverly Dahlen calls "a journey of indecipherables.a way in the cloying dark" defines a relation to history no longer indifferent to language. Fate throws the darkness in our path. We believe that terms, outwitting their applications, charge us with the task of preparing further journeys.

The "ancient confidence" Charles Olson felt when he named himself "POST-MODERN," idiosyncratically, to state that he _did_ belong to something called a "universe," no longer moves us to overthrow estrangement. As long ago as 1950, Olson realized that what is modern is "Man" itself, that "Man's" only means of opposing "himself"--withstanding the brutality of "his" will, the tyranny of a modern logos--is the body, "intact and fought for." Without this ground--without an experience specific to time and place--we are lost. "The _modern_," declared Olson, writing Robert Creeley, "(and we have to push this biz, of the SINGLE I, to undo the modern) does--admit it or not--feel he does _not_ belong to what--just, quick, call it, the universe."

Such "undoing" (a word that recalls the spinning of the Moirai) represents what theologian Mark C. Taylor terms "errant" thought. "Repeatedly slipping through the holes in the system within which it must, nevertheless, be registered," writes Taylor, "such thought is perpetually transitory and forever nomadic." The individual, the single I, given over as one might yield the most useless of properties, to the _properties_ of that "Worth"--a breath that is taken, the beating of a heart no less a fact than the fiction of God by which history is made and written--insofar as _it is_ given, announces itself as an illusion. This is what the Old Testament called _tselem_: a phantom, a representation, an image.

Held in the procreant hands of time, the postmodern--applying that word as Olson coined it--enters upon the Earthly Paradise so errantly addressed in _Maximus_.

> Man came here by an intolerable way. When man is reduced to so much fat for soap, superphosphate for soil, fillings and shoes for sale, he has, to begin with, one answer, one point of resistance only to such fragmentation, one organized ground, a ground he comes to by a way the precise contrary of the cross, of spirit in the old sense, in old mouths. It is his own physiology he is forced to arrive at. And the way--the way of the beast, of man and the Beast.

If Olson resists the call of God in this, he does so to repossess creation, to mark and insist "that the idea of one god itself is only an extension of the principle, that one man can, by the labor of his life, give light that others can use to have theirs."

Man and woman--in _their_ image, the shadow of divinity, fallen. Is this the apotheosis of what Postmodernism would inaugurate? What other names for our relation to the past, for the burden of our present? _So many stumble / going out of the world_, writes Susan Howe, _word flesh crumbled page edge . . . A question of overthrowing_. No longer indifferent to language, have we become, in our disaffection, our estrangement, unused to other paths, other ways through the cloying dark? Has the brashness denoted by the prefix "post-" become a despair, an intellectual despair, rigorous as geometry?

A journey of indecipherables

A question of overthrowing

For its power, writes Olson, thinking of what he came to call the soul, _is bone muscle nerve blood brain man or woman, its fragile mortal force its old eternity, a stumbling_.

Andrew Schelling & Benjamin Friedlander
September 1990

↑ Index

176. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Espousing Update 1/26
Sat 28 Jan 1995

I thought Ted's response was pretty right on about the manufacturing of consent (Chomsky?) and I agree with him on this point, but (and this for the sake of sorting this out better for myself) doesn't that idea sort of deny the validity of those that--false consciousness or manufactured consent be it may--honestly hold and feel as strongly about their beliefs? And that's what seems to me to be the issue here: cultural conflict, in the sense that various versions of America are being brought into conflict, that it's being described as a battle, a cultural war, and it's actually taking on more and more shades of division and separation between my America and your's--so to speak. Proposition 187 and the calls for tighter immigration, the Haitian invasion, Newt's defense of American Civilisation, and all the negative reactions to multiculturalism as a weakening of WESTERN CIVILISATION--these all seem to reflect an attitude or a drawing of battle lines or a restratification ... where am I? Or as Emerson said, "Where do we find ourselves?" I think that's what he said . . . The point is, the question I have for Ted is if consent or opinion is manipulated or manufactured does that mean that those that hold those views are embodiments of a form of false consciousness--and does that make us any less subject to alternative forms of that same process from other loci of power? And if--if, mind you--their consent or opinion is not manufactured and neither is ours and we both have--demand--a representation in America of our views how do we mediate these positions. This is only a lame attempt to think about these issues, so don't hold me to any accuracy or clarity in articulating them--they've been hounding me, especially as I've tried to listen over the past few months to conservative points of view in order to understand the arguments. I'm a registered independent, for what it's worth. Anyway....

Jeffrey

↑ Index

177. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Espousing Update 1/26
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Interested in seeing the text sandra braman alluded to.

Jeffrey

↑ Index

178. Tom Mandel

Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary

Sat 28 Jan 1995

---

chris stroffolino can't be serious in thinking that if I'm historically a language poet (I hope this subject goes away soon) then I must mean that anyone else my age is too. I meant my history and that of the others associated with this group.

Anyway, what difference can it possibly make?

it's not whether your mind is open or closed but what is it closes or opens your mind. What makes this the end of a century? a convention. What makes this _late_ capitalism. a convention. what makes this the deadend of a culture? a convention.

the music of alois haba invalidated the theoretical/ critical/historical harmonic judgment theories of schoenberg. work renders theory its meaningful or meaningless place. but haba's music does not invalidate the music of schoenberg. work only underlines the interest, the possibility, of other work - of previous work, of new work.

a discourse in re: poetry that is interesting to poetry is one that adds space for poetry to be made. Adds space. It is in the nature of powerful work, interesting work, fabulous work, to provide more not fewer places for next work to take off from. Hence, "a fundamental break with the past" is a marketing term with meaning if you want to rev your network, but of no interest to long scope activities like poetry. a connection with the past is no different from a connection with the future. This is the reason it is possible for poets like Duncan or Mandelstam to write about Dante in ways that unveil new possibilities for poetry.

tom mandel

↑ Index

179. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: Funding Arguments
Sat 28 Jan 1995

I agree with Robert Drake that it's not a rational issue at all. It seems very weird to me (or par for the course) that the smithsonian exhibit has taken so much flak (ha) for daring to challenge the conventional wisdom of the enola gay. Conventional, not informed opinion, apparently. And isn't this what it comes down to, that history, politics, poetry are empty--essentially (were there such a thing)--and that we and everyone else realizes this and that we are contesting who gets to define and represent such things as Hiroshima and the dropping of the bomb to ourselves? I share robert drake's pessimism, particularly when it comes to being able to negotiate competiting histories. More to say, always more to say, but not more time to say it . . . .

Jeffrey Timmons
PS--sorry about the weird posting

↑ Index

180. Tom Mandel
Re: the real language poet
Sat 28 Jan 1995

Luoma - henceforth and immediately : stop stealing my ideas and if you are going to steal them, please present them in boring ways. If you continue in your present mode, you will only bring credit upon yourself.

mandel
a period alone at the margin on a line by itself

↑ Index

181. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Sun 29 Jan 1995

On Sat, 28 Jan 1995, Tom Mandel wrote:

> a discourse in re: poetry that is interesting to poetry is one that adds space for poetry to be made. Adds space. It is in the nature of powerful work, interesting work, fabulous work, to provide more not fewer places for next work to take off from. Hence, "a fundamental break with the past" > is a marketing term with meaning if you want to rev your network, but of no interest to long scope activities like poetry. a connection with the past is no different from a connection with the future. This is the reason it is possible for poets like Duncan or Mandelstam to write about Dante in ways that unveil new possibilities for poetry.

Invalidated schoenberg? Hm. Long scope? Yeah, ok. And, well, a connection with the past is different than a connection with the future, but connection is the important thing. As with capital so with poetry, there is no out; and that's ok. Eliot discusses this in Tradition and the Individual Talent; it's really also Bloom's argument in any number of places where he takes about revisionary ratios and misreading, la, la, la.... And tom, if I read this right, is right: marketing strategy, but not useful. Tradition, if only to empty it out.

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

182. Jeffrey Timmons
Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Sun 29 Jan 1995

Tom Mandel wrote:

> work renders theory its meaningful or meaningless place.

Ok, how is theory not work? Freud said writers had said all that he said before and better (rough paraphrase, I assure you) than he--is this the difference between theory and work? In a sense, then the poetry is no less theoretical. I missed the schoenberg is not invalidated--but tom had it the other way as well--schoenberg is invalidated. " I contain multitudes . . . ."

Jeffrey Timmons

↑ Index

183. Ron Silliman
NEA & Randy Cunningham
Sun 29 Jan 1995

The individual most likely to determine whether or not the NEA survives in 1995 is a GOP Congressman from San Diego, Randy (Duke) Cunningham. Every writer (and, indeed, artist) in California needs to contact this dude and let him that his future as a statewide politician may hinge on the House reauthorizing the NEA.

Others with less strategic, but nonetheless critical, roles include Congresspeople (I believe they are all men actually) Livingston of Louisiana; Bill Goodling of Gettysburg, PA; Kasich of Columbus, OH; Regulia of Canton, OH; Gunderson of Wisconsin (the gay member of the GOP); Rukema (of where?) and Castle of Delaware.

Not one of these folks has email.

These are the key players according to Eliot Figman of Poets and Writers & Jim Sitter of CLMP, with whom I met today. Both have been accompanying Gigi Bradford, the lit director of the NEA, on a tour. (Bradford s constrained by her position from discussing such matters, although she was quite enthusiastic about the Freely Espousing events.)

Figman & Sitter believe that, with Kassabaum (I m probably misspelling a lot of these names, but I m working fast late at night) and Jeffords both supporting the Endowment, the votes exist in the Senate for the NEA, but that House is much more problematic.

Here s why: for reasons of parliamentary procedure, the NEA needs to be blessed by three separate processes in each house this year. It must first receive authorization from each house. It must also receive an appropriation. And the budget must leave enough room in the general category for the appropriation to be budgeted. The first two processes are especially important, since the third can happen through a number of different scenarios.

If the Senate authorizes and the House does not, it goes to conference committee. In such a circumstance, the bill is not conferenceable, meaning that you can t half authorize it. It s all or nothing. So the Senate version would have to win out in conference. The exact same scenario applies for appropriation. If the House fails to authorize and/or appropriate and its version wins in either conference committee, then the NEA is kaput. On the budget bill, there s much more room for raising and lowering sums and jockeying around between categories.

This means that the chance of the NEA of surviving is at best one in four.

Randy Duke Cunningham chairs the House committee that is charged with authorizing (or not) the NEA. To give you an idea of its centrality to that committee s purpose, it s the Early Childhood, Youth and Families subcomittee (of Ways and Means?).

Goodling chairs the committee that it reports up to. So that s his role. Regulia and Livingston are keys in the appropriation bill. My notes are not clear on the committee that Gunderson, Goodling, Rukema and Castle all sit on, but it may be budget.

I don t know if Cunningham is a pure opportunist reactionary (as is Newt Gingrich, a man who once co-authored a bill to legalize marijuana for cancer patients), a true believer libertarian type (a la Barry Goldwater), or a not wrapped too tight dingbat (a la John Briggs, Michael Huffington, Bullet Bob Dornan and Sonny Bono), but that tends to be what the Southern California GOP serves up. In this case, opportunism is good. If Cunningham wants to go onto a larger stage later (for example, Pete Wilson was once mayor of San Diego, a very weak position from the point of view of formal power, and now he s got a 50-50 chance of being on the 96 national ticket for the GOP). Every California Republican expects to be president someday. But the arts play a major role in California, both commercial and nonprofit. And failing to authorize the NEA is one way to get identified as an ideologue. He could "authorize" the NEA without voting for its appropriation, for example, and accomplish some real good.

We need to let him know that this is a high-profile issue and that he is being watched closely. Can anybody in San Diego give us more details?

I should note that last time the NEA came up, Cunningham voted against its appropriation and went so far as wave a check for $2,000 to the San Diego Symphony (I m not certain that that was the agency), saying that this is how the arts deserve to be funded. Gingrich copied this gesture this year right down to the dollar figure (his donation was the Corporation for Public Broadcasting).

If the NEA gets authorized in both houses, but appropriated only in the Senate, its chances of making it through the conference committees is much better. So Cunningham is the key.

I should note that I share a lot of the same reservations about the NEA that just about every poet has, certainly every progressive poet. But I agree with Luigi Bob completely that we should not aid Helms, Gingrich et al by airing those problems at an inopportune moment. I d rather communicate those directly to the folks at the NEA (and I have, from time to time). The lit program receives 16.85 percent of all applications at the NEA, even tho lit gets only 3.05 percent of the program's funds. I too have doubts over the Lit Program's commitment to funds for individuals over programs (it has the highest percentage of funding for individual artists of any NEA program). However, I noted that seven of the current winners (there were just 37) were writers I read and pay attention to. Frankly, just under 20 percent's not that bad.

Maybe Jack Krick or someone can get us the phone and fax #s for these people. Let's do it!

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

184. Spencer Selby
Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Sun 29 Jan 1995

A lot of this discourse is interesting, but I question whether it leads to many of the values being alluded to for the work. This discourse does not proceed at the level of the poetry. I don't believe it. Nor do I believe much space is being added for this different, fabulous work, this dark horse that may be too dark to recognize or see. Spencer Selby

↑ Index

185. BLUOMA
Re: Re- the real language po
Sun 29 Jan 1995

Reply to: RE>Re: the real language poet
Re>> Luoma - henceforth and immediately : stop stealing my ideas and if you are going to steal them, please present them in boring ways. If you continue in your present mode, you will only bring credit upon yourself.
<<

Fortunately or unfortunately, Tony Door is Dougy Rothschild MD, who was a guest on my account.

Bill Luoma
[redacted]

↑ Index

186. BLUOMA
Re: Re- the real language po
Sun 29 Jan 1995

Reply to: RE>Re: the real language poet In 1989, the Sixth District Court of the United States ruled in the case of Jeffery M. Masson vs. Janet Malcolm & The New Yorker that, "Fabricated quotations do not prove actual malice." {This decision was later over turned.} [sic]

The information gathering sources which i have employed for the past few years seem to be defective. Previously they had informed me that Mr. Charles Bernstein was at an unspecified drinking establishment speaking on the weather or knots of language poetry. Further inquirey has re-veal-ed that he was not. My sincerest apologies to Mr. Bernstein. There was indeed a third party at the poetics-fest; it was, however, NOT Charles Bernstein.

Tony Door
out on a canal Venice, Italy
30/1/95

↑ Index

187. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Life Supports
Sun 29 Jan 1995

Thanks to everyone who responded w/ suggestions for getting hold of the Bronk volume. Seems like i shld be able to scrape up a copy one way or another...

steve

↑ Index

188. Chris Stroffolino
Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Sun 29 Jan 1995

Dear Spencer--Yes, immediately after sending my "contribution" to this discussion I felt like I wanted to retract--not so much everything I said as the way I said it. Agitation. Agitation. Oh what good does any of it do. In fact I was considering asking to temporarily cancel my subscription to this list, since it's taking up way too much of my psychic energy and is frustrating. To OVERDOSE on polemics, etc. Instead, I will try to hold myself to avoiding getting caught up in such argumentative vortexes. But will others do it? I guess it doesn't matter who started it. It was probably Tony Door disguised as Nils Ya disguised as Saint Geraud disguised -----BUT, then, Spencer, I'd like to ask you to help me with something... If we (and I think we're similar in this) want to get the discussion here in this email forum to be more like poetry, HOW can we go about doing it? Should we send rough drafts of poems to each other over email? Would that work? I'm considering it. Any other ideas? I'm certainly "open." Chris

↑ Index

189. eric pape
Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
Sun 29 Jan 1995

How can there be a decisive break with the past when the past is neither decisive nor is the break? I have two responses to Lightman which I have been thinking about a lot this weekend and I'm going to sound pompous as hell but that hasn't stopped me before and it only proves I am interested. First, the manifesto. This is not a break at all with the past and it in fact repeats old conflict. It in fact only sees those conflicts that have been handed down to it from, where, the past? Freud and Jung? Not really interesting anymore. Lacan and Butler would be perhaps a little more interesting. Maybe. Irigaray and Steinem? Who? What about Sedgewick and Wittig? Derrida? Which Derrida? Where's Bhabha, Haraway, Acker? My point is not to parade a list of names, but to demonstrate how much this list seems determined by a past that is not at all broken with. Nor should it.Nor can it be. Not that there isn't anything of interest in both the manifesto and to a greater extent the work. There is the possibility of great confusion which seems interesting. I'm interested in the reference to Gaiman. It seems to me that there may be room for a messier poetics to come. Not sure this is it, but may be a proper direction. When I think of L school poetry and poetics, I think of a very pure poetry, in its engagement of its materials. Could be a legitimate response to muddy up the waters. But if there is going to be this Jung stuff, then forget it frankly. There is a lot more interesting things happening out there and a return, and I do mean return, to crypto-fascist mysticism instead of say a hybrid (to jargon bait a little) form of cultural community won't be able to compete. There may be something to this, and its probably not fair to judge a movement on the basis of one guys work over an impersonal medium, but I think it is important to be very very aware of the past, to break with or to build with. And I believe also that the difference between mainstream poetry and avant-oppositional-experimental-whatever poetry is how well it is theorized. Mainstreamers don't bother to do that at all and as such, they are just not that interesting. Thus it'scrucial for any movment to compete theoretically as well as poetically. To pick the right voice. Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

190. eric pape
Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Mon 30 Jan 1995

Chris, Spencer and all: I understand the frustrations and the anxieties very well. I've just got on the list not too long ago and already I've been in more wars then I can remember. Probably my fault, certainly, but what I want to say is that I think these have as well as being stressful been very stimulating. I've been forced to think about poetry and poetics thanksto Chris and Tom, and Ron and Steve, in ways I would never have before. Brecht-like, I say, you've made me think and I don't think that is a bad thing. I think the list is doing what well what it should do. Thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

191. John Geraets

Langusage

Mon 30 Jan 1995

When words stop being logical they sound like this.

Breath usually is quite nice because it isn't outlined.

John Geraets
[redacted]

↑ Index

192. Evans/Moxley

Espousing Update 1/30

Mon 30 Jan 1995

A quick overview of what transpired on 1/28:

*We estimate that 500 people turned out for Freely Espousing events on Saturday. (This figure does not include the many people who attended Woodland Pattern's benefit reading in Milwaukee.)

*While it is difficult to estimate the amount of mail generated, we do know that between New York City and Providence at least 150 letters and 250 postcards were generated. Actual numbers for the combined events are probably safely estimated at somewhere around 700 pieces of mail. In our push to Outwrite the Right, we made a good start.

*Here in Providence, we had sympathetic coverage from the Providence Journal. A substantial article appeared in the Sunday ProJo entitled: "Writers gather in Providence to fight cuts in Endowment" (by John Castellucci, 29 Jan 95: B3). Rather than focusing on our "big name" speakers, Castelluci reported on the small press crowd: the Waldrops, Jennifer Moyer of Moyer Bell, Peter Gizzi, Lee Ann Brown, and Sianne Ngai were all cited. The article closed with words from Keith Waldrop's _Potential Random_!

Jena Osman reports that at least two Buffalo t.v. stations covered her event, and WBFO (the NPR station there) has run two pieces on the event.

Cole Heinowitz expects coverage of the San Diego event in today's San Diego Union.

On a more modest note, Brown's campus daily is beginning a three part series on FE and on the right's attack of federal arts funding more generally today.

*We have compiled field reports from the various sites and we hope to have time, by late today, to post again with info about the specific shape the various programs took.

*As one of our organizers remarked, making sure Saturday's events went smoothly was like "tending a wildfire." To all the people who so tended, our very deep thanks.

↑ Index

193. I.LIGHTMAN

Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)

Mon 30 Jan 1995

Hi Chris,

I just got the Dec issue of Poetic Briefs in the mail from Elizabeth: it and your own response to my posting are reasons why I'd like to get to a continent where I can write to, meet and telephone some people who've read the same books with the same mix of part enthusiasm part reservation and thresh that all out till we write our way into new ways forward. Perhaps the worse the state of the U.S., the more the writers will be shook up to write better?

Ira

↑ Index

194. I.LIGHTMAN

Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)

Mon 30 Jan 1995

Eric Pape is missing my point but, ah well. For what it's worth, I know some history, and I have read all the writers Eric Pape mentions, could indeed argue out reasons against each, mainly covered by my point "non-Freudian not neo-Freudian post-structuralism, if any", which was in the manifesto. The line before my line about "Jung not Freud" sets what I meant: the utterly rationalist, that's religious therefore dumb, line pervades everywhere in Language Writing and indeed on POETICS. "Jung rather than Freud", if you want. So many buy into Freud, and not into Jung even a little; fascist connections don't make the rest of Pound unreadable, and not Jung either; Freud's connections with countless molesters of children should rule him out totally of consideration by the same logic, but I don't like the logic, applied to Jung or Freud. If you look, Eric, at the start of Lacan's ecrits, you will see he raises exactly my point, that Freudians attack religion but are not religious. I thought I'd make the point without explicit reference to Lacan, as Lacanians would get it anyway (some hope). You've also missed everything I said about painting and music. Ah well.

Ira Lightman

↑ Index

195. Ted Pelton

Re: Espousing Update 1/26

Mon 30 Jan 1995

Jeffrey, Let me know if you find anything interesting in your forays into contemporary conservative political thought; to my mind, an anti-immigrant movement or a desire to keep the U. S. culture pure means no more today than it did when the Know-Nothings tried it in the 19th century. I don't consider fear of the unknown a viable or useful political or cultural philosophy.

I, like Ron Silliman, find that many writers I read have gotten individual awards (not to mention benefitting from funded presses, mags, etc., through the pittance given the lit program). That's a good thing, to my mind, which is the only one I can speak for. The People (some say) don't find their values represented in NEA/NEH funding decisions. I don't believe that. Let's give the NEA and NEH bigger advertising budgets so they can circulate their truths. Then we might be able to talk about it. In the meantime, I distrust anyone who claims to speak for American values (Chomsky does read this well, I agree); the main American value I personally see as having come out of the recent elections is that the overwhelming majority of citizens lead private lives very distant from the machinations of policy-making and choose not to participate (or at least don't actively seek to vault the blocks preventing their participation).

Generally speaking, I think that it's in the interest of a healthy state to help support an avant-garde that will question the values the state puts forth as mainstream. A state that becomes intolerant of and seeks to eliminate such non-mainstream voices is, to my mind, that much less healthy. When cost of such programs is called a main issue and we're talking about 65 cents a person, then the distortions have reached an obscene level to my mind. I resist the current rhetoric that persists in such mislabelling under the umbrella of traditional values. My own values are insulted. You may be right, it may be cultural war, but I know what side I'm on if that's true (and so do you, I'd suspect).

Ted Pelton

↑ Index

196. Stephen Ratcliffe
Gertrude Stein
Mon 30 Jan 1995

"Listening and Talking at the Same Time": Gertrude Stein at Mills College. October 26-28, 1995, the 60th anniversary of Stein's appearance on the Mills campus in Oakland, where she delivered her lecture "Poetry and Grammar" to 500 students and faculty in the Music Hall, after having learned there isn't any there there). Inquiries/proposals for papers/readings to Stephen Ratcliffe, Mills College, Oakland, CA 94613. [redacted]. [redacted]

↑ Index

197. Stephen Ratcliffe
Re: sign
Mon 30 Jan 1995

---

learned about Poetics List via letter from Juliana Spahr, who suggested not only its interest (indeed) but possibility I might "notice" Avenue B books to those in group who might be interested. Hope to do get to that (having seen Peter Gizzi's similar announcement re: o.blek. Look forward to seeing you Charles here next week. Stephen Ratcliffe

↑ Index

198. eric pape
Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)
Mon 30 Jan 1995

It is quite possible that I missed the point of Ira's posting. I don't deny that, nor did I mean to imply that I somehow know more names than he and as such am more qualified, though I admit it sounded that way even to me after I read it. My point is that the past has never been fixed, thus no break. The enterprose is flawed in itself and I tried to demonstrate that the conflicts mentioned are perennial, not new. And as far as Jung goes, I'm just not interested. Remember also that Lacan's point was not that God exists, but that s/he is unconscious, as for example is woman, which also doesn't exist. I'm not claiming, by the way, that this is any more interesting. Anyway, thanks, Eric ([redacted])

↑ Index

199. Mark Wallace
Re: apex of the m...
Mon 30 Jan 1995

I appreciate James Sherry's remarks about my query. I have one more query for him. James, what is it about the "prose style" (hope I'm getting it right) of Apex that you find admirable?

mark wallace

↑ Index

200. Mark Wallace
Re: apex of the m...
Mon 30 Jan 1995

---

to add to my post of a moment ago, I see that James said "prose writing." My query still stands.

mark wallace

↑ Index

201. Spencer Selby
Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Mon 30 Jan 1995

Dear Eric, I'm not saying this forum is a bad thing. I'm saying it's important to interrogate the discourse (some of it, at least) as much as the participants seem to want to interrogate each other. Dear Chris, Thank you for yr response, yr honesty and willingness to step back. I'm not sure sending poems is the answer, though I wouldn't rule it out either. As I say above, there are times when the overall discourse deserves more critique than the positions individuals are taking. I admit that I don't buy this "theory is practice" thing. I know people can be very articulate in that direction and I know there's not always a clear line between the two and I know theory can be helpful to practice. But it can also be a negative, a weapon, a suit of armor, a self-promotion, an excuse to revel in one's intellect and ability to rationalize. Or maybe theory/practice is not the issue. Maybe the issue is the relation between the social discourse of writers and the work. Here again the discourse is helpful and even necessary, but it can also be destructive and counterproductive. Maybe more attention should be paid to the dark side here, to the ways this discourse may close off space or possibilities. My other suggestion would be to encourage those who don't participate to get involved, offer their two cents, or reconsider their silence. Perhaps it's natural that few do most of the talking, but it's certainly not preferable. I will even say it doesn't seem right that so many signed on here seldom if ever jump in. Spencer Selby

↑ Index

202. Carlos Gallego

Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE APEX)

Mon 30 Jan 1995

---

perversion of context, but that's o.k.-- it serves a purpose (Wittgenstein):

> tHE PaST (or) His-Story--HiStOry: "In you more than you..." THUS,
> "a decisive break with past?"
> hm is (?) right
>
> (all this more of an interruption than a position-- like > listening more than saying)
>
> P.s. "In you more than you..." some french guy named Lacan

> Carlos Gallego
> Stanford Univ. (THE tower of Babylon)
> [redacted].

↑ Index

203. Ron Silliman

Re: NEA & Randy Cunningham

Mon 30 Jan 1995

Here are the office phone #s for the members of Congress who will determine whether or not the NEA gets funded. Also included are their snail mail addresses (LHOB = Longworth House Office Building, I believe; RHOB = Rayburn; I don;t what the C is for).

As I noted in my last email, Cunningham is the person who will have the most impact. Michael, Jerry, Rae -- you can have the most impact of all the people on the list. Steve/Jennifer, call in your old San Diego friends.

My experience as a lobbyist in the mid-70s (when I stopped over $240 million in construction funds for new prisons) taught me two things worth remembering:

1) Almost all legistlation comes down to one or two interested members who basically trade their pet projects with each other to make up coalitions and majorities. These are the folks for the NEA.

2) It is awfully easy to halt spending, much harder to start it. The NEA is up against the wall.

Member Party State/ Room Phone
Name District Number Area Code: 202

Michael N. Castle R DE00 1207 LHOB [redacted] Randy "Duke" Cunningham R CA51 227 CHOB [redacted] Newt Gingrich R GA06 2428 RHOB [redacted] William F. Goodling R PA19 2263 RHOB [redacted] Steve Gunderson R WI03 2185 RHOB [redacted] John R. Kasich R OH12 1131 LHOB [redacted] Bob Livingston R LA01 2406 RHOB [redacted] Ralph Regula R OH16 2309 RHOB [redacted] Marge Roukema R NJ05 2469 RHOB [redacted]

These numbers are all available through Thomas, the congressional WWW site.

And, oh yes, I was wrong. There is one woman involved in the process at this level. But the general boys club effect still seems to hold.

Onward,
Ron Silliman

↑ Index

204. Evans/Moxley
Re: NEA & Randy Cunningham
Mon 30 Jan 1995

Thanks to Ron for the concise breakdown of key legislators on the NEA issue. On Randy "Duke" Cunningham, I understand from Cole Heinowitz in San Diego that a group of people stayed after Freely Espousing wrapped up on Saturday to discuss ways of working on him. Cole mentioned a tentative plan to work with the Escondido Arts Center (Escondido is "Duke"'s district) and possibly the mayor of SD to get a meeting with Cunningham.

If anyone has information that could help in this effort, please pass it along, either via e-mail to us or by phone directly to Cole.

Cole's phone number is [redacted]. She is working with Deedee Halleck (of Paper Tiger TV & Video), Roderigo Toscano, and several other people on this.

And Ron--did your contacts mention a time-line for the House appropriations process? I'm assuming the curve is shorter there than in the Senate's reauthorization process, but precise info would be highly valuable.

We won't have time to post a detailed update on 1/28 this evening (our lives--more or less suspended for the past two weeks--demand some attendance just now). We'll get something to the list shortly.

Greetings to All.

Steve Evans & Jennifer Moxley
[redacted]

↑ Index

205. Loss Glazier
How to Subscribe to RIF/T (Informational Posting)
Mon 30 Jan 1995

RIF/T Subscription FAQ Rev. 1-28-95
---------- H O W T O S U B S C R I B E T O R I F / T (An Electronic Journal of Poetry, Poetics, and Writing)

[redacted]
Leave the "to" and "subject" lines of your e-mail message blank.
In the body of the e-mail message type:
subscribe e-poetry Firstname Lastname where
"Firstname" and "Lastname" correspond to your actual name. You will receive a message confirming your subscription in short order.

Recent contributors include Charles Bernstein, Ben Friedlander, Michael Joyce, Lisa Jarnot, Robert Kelly, Hank Lazer, Susan Schultz, Katie Yates, and many others. Plus Riffs: dialogs on electronic compositional space ... and Rif/t chapbooks.

Thanks for your interest in RIF/T,
Loss Pequen~o Glazier
for Kenneth Sherwood & Loss Glazier

↑ Index

206. Evans/Moxley
Correction
Mon 30 Jan 1995

I mistakenly provided Craig Foltz's phone number in my previous post. The actual number for Cole Heinowitz is: [redacted].

Sorry for the confusion.

Steve Evans

↑ Index

207. Catherine Yates subscription
Tue 31 Jan 1995

Please send me information as to how to re-enlist myself on the poetics list. I've forgotten. With thanks.
Katie Yates

↑ Index

208. BLUOMA
Re: Re- CALL FOR A DECISIVE
Tue 31 Jan 1995

Reply to: RE>Re: CALL FOR A DECISIVE BREAK WITH THE PAST (NURTURE THE_ Ira,

I'm encouraged by your reply to Eric Pape contrasting Freud and Jung. Could you do this for all your points?

I haven't read a whole lot and I'm wondering who Stockhausen is and why Stockhausen is better than Cage and Zukofsky.

Bill Luoma
[redacted]

↑ Index

209. BLUOMA
Re: Re- reified names vs. bo
Tue 31 Jan 1995

Reply to: RE>Re: reified names vs. boundless vocabulary
Spencer,

> But it can also be a negative, a weapon, a suit of armor, a
>
> self-promotion, an excuse to revel in one's intellect
>
> and ability to rationalize.

Yes, I agree theory often functions in this way. It's also a way to market yourself, especially in terms of academic jobs. If you want to eat on the university meal ticket, you'd better be able to argue convincingly if not arrogantly.

However, there are other times where you need a thorough and convincing polemical stance to accomplish some "good" means. What if you were on a senate panel with Jesse Helms? What if you were a Language Poet in 1980 and you saw what was passing as good writing and good teaching?

Thanks to the L poets (and Tony Door), the field is now wide open. I would like clarification from the M on why they want to narrow down the present opening to one acceptable "lyric" mode.

Bill Luoma
[redacted]

↑ Index

210. Charles Bernstein

Re: subscription

Tue 31 Jan 1995

Sign yourself up using these instruction: however if you have any problem doing that just reply to this message and I will sign you up. It is funny to see you send that message to the whole list since there were several messages inquiring/speculating about yr whereabouts on the list last week or the week before, as you will no doubt now here from other! --charles ****

Welcome to the Poetics List.

Please note that this is a private list and information about the list should not be posted to other lists or directories. The idea is to keep the list to those with specific rather than general interests, and also to keep the scale of the list small and the volume managable. Word-of-mouth (and its electronic equivalents) seems to be working fine: please feel free to invite people you know to sign-up. It is easier for me if they sign-up by themselves AND send me ([redacted]) a note telling me how they heard about the list. I will send them this document in reply.

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to

[redacted]

body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

(The shorter bitnet address is [redacted]. All further references to "Listserve" are to this listserve.)

message, with no subject line, to the listserv address:

{or}

I will be sent a notice of all subscription activity.

ARCHIVES

There are two ways to get archives. The easiest way is to use the archives of the list at the Electronic Poetry Center (EPC), for which see the end of this message. The other way is described below:

Anyone interested in an archive of all postings after March may send this message to "Listserve":

index poetics

or

index poetics f=mail

You will receive a list of archived files in a format that includes something like this:

```
*                        rec            last - change * filename filetype   GET PUT -fm
lrecl nrecs   date     time

  POETICS  LOG9403    ALL OWN V      80  1012 94/05/31 07:17:17
Started on Mon,
7 Mar 1994 12:51:12 -0600
  POETICS  LOG9404    ALL OWN V      83  1864 94/05/31 07:18:54
Started on Sat,
2 Apr 1994 16:01:07 -050
  POETICS  NOTEBOOK   ALL OWN V     640  1693 94/06/09 15:27:09
Started on Sun,
1 May 1994 09:47:10 -0500
```

You can then send the "get" command to "Listserve" in the format:

```
get filename filetype  (eg: get poetics log9403
                       get poetics log9403
                       get poetics notebook)
```

or

get filename filetype f=mail

depending on which log file you want (you can also get multiple files with one message). Note that each of the files has a different beginning and end date, eg LOG9404 starts 7 March and goes to 31 May and that dates overlap. Go figure! "Poetics Notebook" is an anomalous name for what is, in effect, another log file.

****

Send an e-mail message to [redacted]. Leave the "Subject" line of the e-mail message blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

subscribe e-poetry Firstname Lastname

where Firstname and Lastname correspond to your name.

You will receive a confirmation of your subscription soon thereafter. (Nonsubscribers can automatically sub to Poetics using this same format, but substituting "poetics" for "e- poetry".)

**

```
 ____   ____   ____
/   /  /   /  /   /
EEEE   PPPPP  CCCCC
```

```
   EE /   PP PP  CC  C/
   EEE    PPPPP  CC   /        URL=gopher://writing.upenn.edu/11/
  __EE  /_ PP |__ CC  C ____
 /  EEEE/  PP/    CCCCC/    /    internet/library/e-journals/ub/rift
/_________________________/
|-------------------------|
| Electronic Poetry Center |
|_________________________|
```

E P C . N E W S

No. 1 (January, 1995)

Contents:

1.0 Basic Assumptions
2.0 Poetry and the Electronic Place
3.0 Interfaces: Gopher, Web, Mosaic; Bookmarks
4.0 RIF/T Notes
5.0 EPC New Additions
6.0 How to Connect

1.0 Basic Assumptions

The Electronic Poetry Center seeks to provide a central _place_ for Internet resources for poetry and poetics.

The lay of the land:

1.__Welcome : Electronic Poetry Center Welcome & FAQ's (About)/
2.__RIF/T : RIF/T / New Poetry, Prose, & Poetics (Texts)/
3.__Poetics : Calendar, Poetics List Archive & Files (Texts)/
4.__Authors : Electronic Poetry & Poetics - Authors (Texts)/
5.__E-Journals : Gateway to Electronic Poetry Journals (Texts)/
6.__E-Resources : Gateway to Electronic Poetry Resources (Connects)/
7.__Small Press : Electronic Poetry Center Small Press Alcove (Cites)/

8.__Gallery : The Electronic Poetry Gallery (Visuals)/
9.__Sound : The Electronic Poetry Sound Room (Sound Files)/
10._Documents : Poetry & Poetics Document Archive (Texts)/
11._Exhibits : Electronic Poetry Center Exhibit case (Texts)/
12._Notices : Electronic Poetry Center Announcements (Info)/

The Center continues to provide access to the electronic poetry and poetics journal, RIF/T, and the archives of the Poetics List. Needless to say, the EPC provides quality archival materials for these resources. For the Poetics archive, a feature has recently been added to allow keyword searching for the immense number of files comprising this archive.

The EPC author library offers texts and/or information about contemporary poets in a variety of formats.

A number of electronic journals are archived and distributed by the EPC. Journals distributed through the EPC differ from other e-journal archives in a significant way: the texts presented here have been checked and verified by their issuing agency, thus at least getting to you versions of electronic journals that have a direct link to their source. We are delighted to offer these journals to you and will continue to make sure texts presented are done so in collaboration with their producers. For resources outside the EPC, we have written links to make seamless connections to these resources. It is our aim to be vigilent about our links so that persons interested in poetry and poetics do not have to spend a lot of time digging for addresses, remembering sites, and locating resources. Through the selections available at the EPC, users of the system have simple and direct access to many other related Internet resources.

