According to Switchboard.com there are 6 Ron Sillimans in the US listed in various white pages. I've probably ruined their reputations. And when we first moved to Paoli, there was a Jesse Silliman living directly across the street from us (one of my sons is Jesse). (Let's see, if there are 6 of them in a nation of 270 million, the odds of any one being at an address is roughly 1 in 65 mill, the odds of two across the street would be pretty darn high: why can't I win on odds like that in the lottery?), but she was a she and he's a he, in spite of the spelling. There's even a second Krishna Evans (name of my wife) living in Houston, TX. And we had a childcare helper in Berkeley whose name also was Krishna (particularly unusual in that, like Jesse, it's normally a masculine form).

So what's the tale of Liz Was (not her current name either as I recall)?

Ron Silliman

>Date: Thu, 6 Feb 1997 21:00:08 +0100
>From: Miekal And <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: Getting out the word out
>
>Charles Alexander wrote:
>
>

>>
>> I guess as the two c.alexanders on this list, we had better trade some work.
>> I'll send something your way if you'll send your book my way.
>
>
>well at least you guys were born with the name Michael David Anderson.
>when I was fifteen I took a look in the chicago phone book & there were >325 of em, & 12 that had my middle name. changed my name that day, I >did, I did.
>
>Michael David Anderson aka Miekal And
>

↑ Index

220. Ron Silliman
Film thread
Fri 7 Feb 1997

John Sayles has made several movies that are as one-dimensional as any piece of agitprop (viz. Matewan), but Lone Star isn't one of those. Rather, like Brother from Another Planet, it struck me as quite transcendant of such values (they're there but sort of implicit throughout and not really what the film hangs on). Lots of great cameos, like Tony Ameandola's (sp?) Mexican used car dealer. If this is equivalent to what's on TV, they must have better TV there than we get in Philly.

Hey, but then I liked the English Patient (it's an interesting transformation from the book in that each treats a different level as the frame story and a different level as "the focus"), but I admit to being a sucker for its self-indulgences (both film and book, for that matter). It'd make a great double bill with The Sheltering Sky (a truly great film and book) and a triple bill (does any theater do that anymore?) with Antonioni's The Passage.

A truly bad film (violence as porn) might be The Missouri Breaks (was that Pekinpaugh or Penn?) which treats the acts of killing in exactly the same episodic method that a cheap porn flick would getting from one sex scene to the next, each more violent than the one before.

Last film I walked on was El Topo. Last video I turned off halfway through was Bridges of Madison County (Meryl Streep in her same old swedish accent posing as Italian immigrant: "Ja, Ve are Italian"). My Cousin Vinny was the one before that. (A good rule: avoid anything that might end up being shown uncut on a transcontinental flight.)

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

221. Miekal And Provoking the stretch
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>
> Actually, I had a second question in response to your posting, Michael, > and forgot to include it: you mention "experimental" as a possible > catagory, separate from LangPo---just who/what would you put into that?

first to answer your question Mark, Id put into experimental anything that didnt have a category of its own, visual/verbal, sound poetry or text/sound, performance poetry, text installation, computer & virtual language environments, bookart, collaborative, poetry as life (for instance one of the few poems Ive written in the last 5 years is a sign hanging over our dairy goat gateway that says "goats dreaming"....), & certainly the text creations of outsider artists as adolphi wolfi & howard finster deserve a place in the geneology of the text.

as for the category "language" poetry, Ive never been comfortable with a notion that someone who questions the many contexts of the language of our time as being that separate from the spirit of poetry in general, even most mainstream poets have been known to burst out in florescences of "language"...is pound a language poet, is lewis carroll a language poet, why do these distinctions have to exist to perpetrate a critical nomenclature of pigeon holes & dusty compartments?

so maybe my point isnt to question all the categories that have been carved out but to wonder out loud if all of us bright, creative, fuzzy people cant continuously invent ways to interact with the corpus of literature that defy, detourne, confuse & interbreed the will to commodify genre consciousness.

miekal

who has written "language poetry" since 1976 & has never once been included in a "language" anthology....because its in who ya know... that these machines of text posterity are calculated.

--
@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime

QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

222. Miekal And
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Christopher Alexander wrote:

> considered changing my name, but then thought why bother. the new name would still have the same (in-/convenient) limiting effect. up to now I've assumed, Miekal, that was the impetus behind the amount of play you seem to do with your own names. but then again maybe not.

actually C, Lyx & I both actively cultivate very different parts of our personality as vital wholes, some people would call it life as art as life, regardless I prefer multiple personalities over issues of psych wards, mental health, scizophrenia, moodswings, obsession & desire, pharmaceutical behavior modification, therapy & counselling, & all the other late 20th century interventions into the inner life of humans living on planet earth. More is more, why limit ourselves?

on the rail,

then / therefore

amendant hardiker
the driftless academy of botanical apparitions

↑ Index

223. henry
Re: poetry "schools"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Dear Michael McCoffey, be sure to tell bksellers to reserve a wide range of shelving for the Providence School over there between Physics and Self-Help (Archaeology). Poets to include: High, Prevallet, Shvarts, Mandelstam, Villon, Wright (all 10 of them), Dickinson, Sappy (all 100 of them), Gould (lower shelf - remainders), Savage Reader (note: add poison warning - hold chapbook at least 2 ft from nose), Ashbery, Berrigan (all 4 of them), Berryman, Henry Pussycat, Florida Sweets (Valentine seasonal market), Louise Chan Littletree (has anyone read this poet yet? What is wrong with you people?). - Henry Gould p.s. throw in a few NY School-bred Language epic beat-up New Coast Af-Am Brazilian elderly Swedish lesbian garbage-can-lid-challenged Hopi smartass adolescent mute performance slang nu-english poets just to make it interesting. & make sure they're all Irish. Best of luck! So much to choose from!

↑ Index

224. Miekal And
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

George Bowering wrote:
>
> I have been wondering about that "Miekal", too.
>
> I presume that it is pronounced mee cal. Why didnt you change it to Meikal, > so that at least it would still sound like "Michael"? You would still have > solved the problem of the telephone book.

george

yes, mee cal.

spelt thus because I changed my name when I was 15 (actually changed is to miekal shalom first, but that is offrecord) & I was/am quite dsylxeci & a notorious "bad" speller, as those listees who double as proofreaders may have discoverd.

meekl

↑ Index

225. Herb Levy
Re: Bandit Queen (Lone Star)
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Matthias Regan asked:

> At 01:31 PM 2/5/97 -0800, Herb Levy wrote:
> (snip)
> To bring it round to a film I HAVE seen, a lot of the praise for John > Sayles' Lone Star seems to be based on the political sentiments he projects > (which, for the most part, I agree with) and not the film itself, which I > think is no better or worse than most network television programs.
>
> > But in what manner no better or worse?

Certainly in terms of narrative form. Very few narrative films, especially from the States, end with such an intense rush to resolve all narrative threads, while this is quite common in network tv. Aside from overall production values being better in film, I think this kind of closure may be one of the strongest differences between narrative as presented in the two media.

In general, it seems to me you're arguing for some kind of social realism, style in the service of progressive content ("the 'art' of the thing is less in its style than in its content") whereas I see Lone Star as a manipulative allegory (Sayles HAS done far worse in this mode, what's the name of that mining/labor film?). I'd rather see progressive content mirrored in a progressive style

I'm certainly not getting what I want from a movie like Lone Star, but I also think it would be possible to get a lot closer to what you want then what Sayles creates in this film.

I do like a lot of the bit parts, Francis McDormand (from Fargo) as the ex-wife of Chris Cooper's character, for instance, is great. I like the flashbacks as pans across the scene, rather than the more usual breaks that signal such a change in a lot of films. But as to the various stylistic features you raise, I can only say that what you see as "unobtrusive clarity", just seems lackluster & uninspired to me.

Bests

Herb

Herb Levy

[redacted]

↑ Index

226. maria damon

Re: Names are not Objects

Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

ron s, he of the silly name, rites:

> Names do seem particularly unstable with regards to people. I only recognized "the artist formerly known as prince" in Fargo from his symbol in the credits (he's the one shot in the snow after the chase scene). What was his name before it was Prince?
>
> There was of course Edward Howard Symmes (R Duncan)
>
> Not mention such favorites as > Carolyn Ochs (Lyn Hejinian)
> Mary Korkegian (Rae Armantrout)
> George Palmer (aka Michael) > Robert Davidson (aka Michael)

> and if my granddaddy had not been adopted many decades back, I'd be Ron McMahon.
>
> Such is life.
>
> According to Switchboard.com there are 6 Ron Sillimans in the US listed in various white pages. I've probably ruined their reputations. And when we first moved to Paoli, there was a Jesse Silliman living directly across the street from us (one of my sons is Jesse). (Let's see, if there are 6 of them in a nation of 270 million, the odds of any one being at an address is roughly 1 in 65 mill, the odds of two across the street would be pretty darn high: why can't I win on odds like that in the lottery?), but she was a she and he's a he, in spite of the spelling. There's even a second Krishna Evans (name of my wife) living in Houston, TX. And we had a childcare helper in Berkeley whose name also was Krishna (particularly unusual in that, like Jesse, it's normally a masculine form).
>
> So what's the tale of Liz Was (not her current name either as I recall)?

this is picking up on the trhead i tried to inaugurate some weeks ago, suggesting that we all tell each other the origins of our names. i love this kind of thing, seems kabalistic to me. i was really unnerved to find out, in the course of chris funkhouser's trying to show me how to use the web, that there's an undergrad at brown u called Maria Damon. in addition, last yeear when i was on the cape, the cape cod times featured a ltter to the editor about a heartbreaking photo of a guy who'd lost his dog, and how voyeuristic the photo was, and wasn't it hard enough for the poor guy to have lost his dog, w/o having to see his photo in the paper, etc.,,,signed by Maria Damon. then, on returnin here, i reconnected w/ my former health care workers to provide me w/ a prescription for medication. the nurse called me back and said, when did you switch to your current medication? i sd i'd always been on it, and no other. when's yr date of birth she sd, and when i told her, she sd, that solves it, we've got another patient with your same name and i was getting you mixed up. i know some of you have names that are pretty common (miekal, one of my danish cousins changed her name to be the only one of its kind in the danish phone book, cuz their names are all frederiksen, larsen, rasmussen, etc) but i tend to think of my name as unusual. oh well. seething with humility, maria d

↑ Index

227. Jordan Davis
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

There's a Jordan Davis who's a sound poet in Cleveland. Luigi-Bob knows (of) him. And then there was the two year period when I went around saying no, I don't have an 'e' in my last name. Diane Ward of Buffalo should have something to say about this phenomenon -- she did the last time we ran thru this thread ... signed Jordan whose computer is still dead and who therefore must use clunky telnet in perpetuity

↑ Index

228. Charles Alexander
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

>What was his name before it was Prince?
>
I believe the given name is Prince Rogers (or Rodgers) Nelson.

All I know re: my own name is that my father was born in 1907, not long before Oklahoma became a state, in its dusty northwest corner, and named after the last territorial governor who became the first state governor: Charles Haskell. So my dad was the first Charles Haskell Alexander and I am technically a "jr." although that got dropped when I was a teenager or perhaps even before.

Once a policeman came looking for me in my studio in Tucson and was very surprised when I came to the door, as he had a warrant for a Charles Alexander who was 6 foot 4 inches tall (I'm 5 foot 10) and a different color. But that's better than my wife, who lives in the same town here with another Cynthia Miller who used to run an animal grooming business but now is a convicted (and much publicized) animal abuser who didn't do jail time but had big fines and can never have pets again. We thought she got off lightly. My wife has considered changing her name to mine (last only; although I guess we could have two Charles Alexanders in the same house) because of it, but so far hasn't taken such a step.

what's in a name?

↑ Index

229. Mark Prejsnar
Re: poetry "schools"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

This issue of labelling is fascinating, and is going to be around for the foreseeable future. My first response, Michael, is: assuming any broad usefulness to such an approach, what label would you attach to your own work?? The question isn't only rhetorical...it would be really interesting to know. I don't think I could/would attach one to mine. (A less interesting example, as you probably haven't seen it..)

To avoid labelling, I've developed a habit of referring to what I like as "interesting poetry," with the converse of that being mainstream, or just "not very interesting."

A very interesting parallel to what you-all are doing: in the 1980's I lived in Boston; the famous poetry bookshop Groliers had a good selection of LangPo books & chapbooks; but they had them on a separate shelf labelled (literally) "Language Poetry." Now on the one hand many area poets thought that was an absurd ghettoization intended to keep this stuff (which somehow wasn't real) from infecting the rest of the 15,000 or whatever volumes in the store. ALL the rest, you see, were in a single A to Z sequence. On the other hand, several young poets I knew found this a useful way to find out who & what LangPo was, when they hadn't had direct contact with anyone who could tell them; and while they saw in principle what was wrong, the arrangement helped them at a crucial point of exploration...

Since your publication has to do crucially with marketing, it seems hard for it to avoid labelling. It is interesting to consider the alternative...That would be (to be acceptable to the majority of folks on this list) for Publisher Weekly (and Groliers) to not ghettoize, BUT to give Nate Mackay & Susan Howe & Clark Coolidge & David Shapiro as much attention & publicity as Amy Clampitt. (Of course they should get much, much more.) The thing about these labelling approaches is that they are often the only way mainstream institutions are willing to give ANY real space to stuff outside the mainstream.

Mark P.
Atlanta

↑ Index

230. Pritchett,Pat
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Hmmm... football and langpo. Sounds downright Edenic. 'Cept for that snow thing.

Patrick Pritchett

From: Diane Marie Ward
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: Names are not Objects
Date: Friday, February 07, 1997 10:36AM

"Diane Ward of Buffalo - land of chicken wings, football fanatics and postmodern/language poetry"

↑ Index

231. dbkk
RLIN search
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Can anyone help me? I have this print out from RLIN that tells me where all the Spicer manuscripts are lodged throughout the country in what different university libraries, etc.... however, they use a code I find hard to crack. Can someone tell me what and where "RRAL" ("Resources for Research in American Culture") is?

Thanks---

Kevin Killian

↑ Index

232. Diane Marie Ward
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

this thread/dilemma/annoyance reminds me of a teacher i had once -- she could not remember all of our names so she assinged us numbers -- (i still remember i was #21 -- one of those scars we carry) Now i simply just use my middle name and hyphenate it -- I rather like Jordan's "Diane Ward of Buffalo" sounds rather stately/regal

"Diane Ward of Buffalo - land of chicken wings, football fanatics and postmodern/language poetry"

On Fri, 7 Feb 1997, Jordan Davis wrote:

> There's a Jordan Davis who's a sound poet in Cleveland. Luigi-Bob knows > (of) him. And then there was the two year period when I went around saying > no, I don't have an 'e' in my last name. Diane Ward of Buffalo should have > something to say about this phenomenon -- she did the last time we ran > thru this thread ... signed Jordan whose computer is still dead and who > therefore must use clunky telnet in perpetuity
>

Diane-Marie Ward

[redacted]

State University of New York at Buffalo

↑ Index

233. amato

tv vs. film...

Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

about tv: i don't quite think it's what it used to be...

'nypd blue' or 'er' or 'murder one' are, to my mind, doing some pretty extraordinary things... both visually and structurally, they're outdoing many of the films around, and have the added advantage of serial length... easy to see this if you have cable: just watch 15 minutes or a half-hour of nypd blue, and then click around and have a look at the various films on the various networks (that is, if you can bring yourself to pull away---it's pretty addictive stuff)...

anyway... just didn't want tv to take a complete and customary beating over and against (non-tv) film... though of course commercials continue to be a downer...

best,

joe

↑ Index

234. Miekal And

Re: Names are not Objects

Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

this is Elizabeth Was here making my first (official?) appearance on this list, hopefully more will follow, (altho i'm admittedly especially & morely excited about the visual poetry list). i'd like to correct Miekal's spelling of (one of) my names, it's Elixir Aveshya. At first this ws going to be a private erotic name known & circulated only amongst my closest of friends. after having used it as author of my first erotic short story "Victoria & Melampus", it looked so good in print & sounded so much like a 15th century alchemical erotic androgynous philosopher erudite that've become fond of it in print. however, in spoken form it sounds too formal & pretentious, so i don't like introducing myself as such. as such i shortened it at first to "Lix". i'd tell people, just change the "z" to an "x" to get my new name. it tickled my long and equal fascination with "z"'s & "x"'s, as well as my fascination with a young man whose last name is "Nix". but then i'd been referring to him with a "y" as in Nyx, the goddess of night (with occasional added reference to the water sprites known as "nixies" which in turn reminds one of the more earth-based sprites known as "pixies"). well then this same young man went ahead & printed my name on a roster of performers for an event he co-sponsored as simply, "Lyx". Again i was tickled in new places & now finally almost 2 years after only sort of changing my name i have finally settled on telling people my name is "Lyx". (except in cases such as the first sentence of this here note, where i introduce my old name, so those on the list who have heard of me have something to recognize) Problem: now everyone thinks I am Lyx Was. Well Lyx Was i am not, I hate the sound of it, yuch. Lyx Aveshya doesn't work either. I am in the process of considering "Lyx Ish" although this might entail putting more than one space between the first & last name: Lyx Ish. thus i will have gone from a past tense noun to an adjectivial ending. i like its jewishness, having been born into a jewish family. give me some feedback. what more secrets shall i tell the lot of you? ah, no more, there are personas of mine i'm afraid you'll never appelle. till next time, Liz Was, I mean. . . . -- @#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@# Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website: http://net22.com/qazingulaza e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

235. amato

Re: Names are not Objects

Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

names?...

joe amato the top-fuel drag racer...

joe amato the bodybuilding reporter on espn...

joe amato (jr.) the son of joe amato...

will the real joe amato please stand up?...

↑ Index

236. Sylvester Pollet
Mitch Goodman
Fri 7 Feb 1997

The New York Times (Thurs. 6 Feb. 97, B-13) ran a nice obit for Mitch Goodman, the largest of the day, except for Pamela Harriman. But it's too bad they couldn't have bothered to proofread it, or maybe just don't know any bettter, so the world gets this: "...after meeting a young English poet, Denise Leverton, at a youth hostel in Geneva..." and later "But by the time Miss Leverton had collected signatures from hundreds of artist and writers for an antiwar advertisement...." Ron, maybe not all name changes are voluntary! It's just another reminder that someone we know and love as a household word more or less doesn't ring any bells in the power centers.

Sylvester Pollet

Backwoods Broadsides
RR5 Box 3630
Ellsworth ME
04605-9529
USA

National Poetry Foundation
University of Maine
5752 Neville Hall
Orono, Maine
04469-5752 http://www.ume.maine.edu/~npf/

↑ Index

237. Pritchett,Pat
Re: tv vs. film...
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Interesting point, Joe. I don't really find those shows all that compelling except in a shopworn Dickensian sort of way. I watch them, but I seldom stay with them. They're all so self-important. Esp. the X-Files. I confess I'd rather watch The Simpsons. I'm actually coming to believe that the TV commercial is the late 20th Century American art form par excellence: religious redemption/micro narrative that can't be beat for cognitive recognition/compression.

Patrick Pritchett, who's taking off for the day to ride his mtn bike in the fresh snow. (Miekal, you've really started something here...)

From: amato
To: POETICS
Subject: tv vs. film...
Date: Friday, February 07, 1997 11:06AM

about tv: i don't quite think it's what it used to be...

'nypd blue' or 'er' or 'murder one' are, to my mind, doing some pretty extraordinary things... both visually and structurally, they're outdoing many of the films around, and have the added advantage of serial length... easy to see this if you have cable: just watch 15 minutes or a half-hour of nypd blue, and then click around and have a look at the various films on the various networks (that is, if you can bring yourself to pull away---it's pretty addictive stuff)...

anyway... just didn't want tv to take a complete and customary beating over and against (non-tv) film... though of course commercials continue to be a downer...

best,

joe

↑ Index

238. amato
Re: poetry "schools"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

it may be useful in this regard to consider jed rasula's account of current poetic practice in _the american poetry wax museum_... rasula identifies "four zones" of the contemporary american "poetry world": the associated writing programs; the new formalism; language poetry; and "various coalitions of interest-oriented or community-based poets" (440)... now i'm not suggesting that one should adhere precisely to these "zones" in laying out publishing or distributing criteria, only that such zones may be a start in thinking about what poetry communities are 'out there'...

best,

joe

↑ Index

239. Sylvester Pollet
Amiri Baraka
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Amiri Baraka gave a talk and reading last night, Univ. of Maine, part of Black History Month observances, Multi-cultural etc. etc. Great, wide-ranging, energizing. Topics from language controversies to slave narratives to O.J. to Oedipus to rhythm & blues to multinationals. And that's only a few of the topics. He was in top form, and flying to California today to be in a Warren Beatty film (called Bullworth, I think, about a Senator Bullworth). All you film-threaders can look forward to that one!

Sylvester Pollet

Backwoods Broadsides
RR5 Box 3630
Ellsworth ME
04605-9529
USA

National Poetry Foundation
University of Maine
5752 Neville Hall
Orono, Maine
04469-5752 http://www.ume.maine.edu/~npf/

↑ Index

240. dbkk
"Arctic Summer"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

It's Kevin Killian. I would like to announce the publication of my new book, "Arctic Summer" and urge all of you to look for it in your bookstores, to get it from the publisher, or to get it from SPD. It is my first novel in 7 years and took me 10 years to write. Maybe some of you will like it, it's set in the poetry scene of the 50s, starts out in New York and winds up at Black Mountain College in North Carolina. Some of you will know that "Arctic Summer" was the name of the novel E M Forster began, then abandoned, about this time.

Masquerade Books
801 Second Avenue
New York, NY 10017

Thanks also to all of you who have told me that you have ordered my book "Little Men" from Hard Press. I don't think I've had an original title in many years, and my next book will be "Reading Race."

↑ Index

241. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Celebrating Tet in the dorm this week
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Prince's name before was, as it happens, Prince -- but there was more to it back then --

Some PBS stations are showing a documentary on W.E.B. DuBois this month ("DuBois in Four Voices" or some such title) that includes among the talking heads comments from the late Toni Cade Bambara --

Also, if you missed it this week, watch for a PBS rerun of the Great Performances episode featuring a BBC documentary on Gospel Music -- No, it's nowhere near as good as that gem _Say Amen Somebdoy_, BUT it includes commentary from Baraka, and when was the last time you saw ANYBODY bold enough to include Baraka in a program that anything to do with Christianity?

Posthumous sighting of Ralph Ellison on Good Morning America this A.M. -- nothing like a new book to get a dead author on TV --

↑ Index

242. aerialedge
The Lack
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

now available, _Abacus #104_:

_The Lack

(love poems, targets, flags. . .)_

by Rod Smith

orders to:
Potes & Poets
181 Edgemont Ave
Elmwood CT 06110

It's $4.

Subscriptions to Abacus are $26.

↑ Index

243. Steven W. Marks
"schools" and doubles
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Having wandered in what felt like poetic Siberia (and a partly self-imposed one), I don't mind being associated with a "school." I know the designations aren't accurate, but then we could say that all words are labels and slippery, and so remain mute. IMO, all communication is inaccurate, but it's all we got. I agree with Miekal, however, that you might want to ask the poet. I wouldn't be pleased if somebody read an Elizabethan sonnet I had published and decided I was a neo-formalist. (Not that there's anything wrong with neo-formalists!) I also like the zone idea of Jed Rasula.

While we're discussing doubles (c. alexander and c. alexander), how many people have discovered that they live in the same SMALL town as a fellow list member? I discovered that Wendy Battin and I both live in the same real world. (Hello, Wendy! I even went to Conn. Coll. for a while in the early 70s before being put on academic probation.) Which brings me full circle. Maybe I'm not in poetic Siberia after all.

Steven Marks

Samples of reviews, criticism and poetry at

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

244. amato
Re: tv vs. film...
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

patrick, i agree that such tv shows may be burdened by "self-importance"... but, again, i think the same could be said of many, many films these days... i'd argue that characterization on nypd blue is as complete, as subtle, as many hollywood releases... now whether one goes for same is probably a somewhat different matter...

as to commercials: was a time i watched mtv just for the commercials!... but i haven't yet developed the cognitive skills to enjoy commercial interrupt at the rate, say, that i see on tnt... esp. not as the night wears on...

best,

joe

↑ Index

245. Mark Weiss
Re: Film thread
Fri 7 Feb 1997

John Sayles is certainly a goody-goody, but Matewan as agitprop? What would you have liked, a sympathetic view of the motivations of people who hire thugs to kill the defenseless? That was the American mining industry in the good old days of laissez-faire. Despite the sins that have been committed in its name, there was a reason for American radicalism to be born. It wasn't just a commie plot.
Or maybe it's the notion that, at least at moments, disparate groups of people have been able to see their situation as similar enough that they could think to act together? It has been known to happen, although the benefits have often been stolen from them.
At 04:12 AM 2/7/97 -0800, you wrote:

>John Sayles has made several movies that are as one-dimensional as any >piece of agitprop (viz. Matewan), but Lone Star isn't one of those.
>Rather, like Brother from Another Planet, it struck me as quite >transcendant of such values (they're there but sort of implicit >throughout and not really what the film hangs on). Lots of great >cameos, like Tony Ameandola's (sp?) Mexican used car dealer. If this is >equivalent to what's on TV, they must have better TV there than we get >in Philly.
>
>Hey, but then I liked the English Patient (it's an interesting >transformation from the book in that each treats a different level as >the frame story and a different level as "the focus"), but I admit to >being a sucker for its self-indulgences (both film and book, for that >matter). It'd make a great double bill with The Sheltering Sky (a truly >great film and book) and a triple bill (does any theater do that >anymore?) with Antonioni's The Passage.
>
>A truly bad film (violence as porn) might be The Missouri Breaks (was >that Pekinpaugh or Penn?) which treats the acts of killing in exactly >the same episodic method that a cheap porn flick would getting from one >sex scene to the next, each more violent than the one before.
>
>Last film I walked on was El Topo. Last video I turned off halfway >through was Bridges of Madison County (Meryl Streep in her same old >swedish accent posing as Italian immigrant: "Ja, Ve are Italian"). My >Cousin Vinny was the one before that. (A good rule: avoid anything that >might end up being shown uncut on a transcontinental flight.)
>
>Ron Silliman
>
>

↑ Index

246. Mark Prejsnar
More on labelling theory
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Actually, I had a second question in response to your posting, Michael, and forgot to include it: you mention "experimental" as a possible catagory, separate from LangPo---just who/what would you put into that?

There was a really interesting thread about the use of words like "experimental" here, before my time but accessible in the archive. I've been party to several such exchanges, over the years, and still don't know how to handle the whole issue of describing, well, interesting poetry, except as: what I find interesting (or exciting); anything else tends to make you a party to the trivialization of your own taste and your own writing.. (As I said at first, I can understand Pub. Weekly doing labelling, as its reason for being is explicitly related to marketing; tho that doesn't keep me from being uneasy even so--But your posting got me thinking about how the rest of us relate to labels, as poets and writers and readers, and publishers and editors...)

One of the best illustrations of how intractable this problem is (and one of the things that first got me thinking about it several years ago): many of the high-profile poets I admire (Bernstein, Silliman, Perelman, an others) would refer, in some essay or public exchange, to innovative or experimental or avant-garde poetry; and it would startle me, because it always seemed to me that such labels were strongly weighted toward allowing mainstream types to dismiss interesting writing. (As opposed to the phrase Language Writing itself, in its various permutations, which became part of a conscious effort to get certain work recognition in a stiffling institutional context, and that strategy of course worked.) But once I thought about it, I saw how hard it was to talk about things at all, without one of these labels as a handle...I myself am made most uncomfortable by the "a" word (avant-garde), which is especially loaded with baggage that's guaranteed to put people off and pinpoint a poet's work as special, beyond the pale, not to be taken seriously, under a sort of glass dome...

Mark P.
Atlanta

↑ Index

247. Mark Weiss
Re: poetry "schools"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Gee, I bet I'm one of several hundred poets on this list whio don't fit into any of those categories. How about "don't like to join clubs" as an interest-oriented group? There's an appropriative subtext here. The world is divided into the smarmy-conservative, the retro-precious, politico/ethno/gender/erotico-based, and I guess everyone else is langpo? At the very least that dulls the blade.

At 10:18 AM 2/7/97 -0600, you wrote: >it may be useful in this regard to consider jed rasula's account of current >poetic practice in _the american poetry wax museum_... rasula identifies >"four zones" of the contemporary american "poetry world": the associated >writing programs; the new formalism; language poetry; and "various >coalitions of interest-oriented or community-based poets" (440)... now i'm >not suggesting that one should adhere precisely to these "zones" in laying >out publishing or distributing criteria, only that such zones may be a >start in thinking about what poetry communities are 'out there'...

>
>best,
>
>joe
>
>

↑ Index

248. David Israel
The Lack -Reply
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Rod --

cool. Will plan to pick up a copy at Bridge Street (or perhaps an upcoming local reading?)

cheers,

d.i.

>>> <[redacted]> 02/07/97 12:10pm >>>
now available, _Abacus #104_:

_The Lack

(love poems, targets, flags. . .)_

by Rod Smith

orders to:
Potes & Poets
181 Edgemont Ave
Elmwood CT 06110

It's $4.

Subscriptions to Abacus are $26.

↑ Index

249. Gwyn McVay
Paging Peter Gizzi
Fri 7 Feb 1997

I need some direct-means-of contact info for Peter Gizzi... can he or a friend backchannel me with his phone number, or even better, street address? All guaranteed legit. Girl Scout's honor.

Gwyn

↑ Index

250. Michael Coffey
Re: poetry "schools" -Reply
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

joe amato, you wrote

"t may be useful in this regard to consider jed rasula's account of current poetic practice in _the american poetry wax museum_... rasula identifies "four zones" of the contemporary american "poetry world": the associated writing programs; the new formalism; language poetry; and "various coalitions of interest-oriented or community-based poets" who published that?

↑ Index

251. Christopher Alexander
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

> what's in a name?
convenience. [or inconvenience].

my parents apparently thought my first name--christopher--unusual, based on queries to friends & acquaintances.
["do you know any--?" "no, no"]. but there were no less than 5 "chris"s in my preschool class. so much for the reliability of statistical/survey data.

considered changing my name, but then thought why bother. the new name would still have the same (in-/convenient) limiting effect. up to now I've assumed, Miekal, that was the impetus behind the amount of play you seem to do with your own names. but then again maybe not.

I have occasionally received mail & telephone solicitation for alex sander--dont ask me where that one came from.

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

"Philosophy is intellectual order, which neither religion nor common sense can be. It is to be observed that religion & common sense do not coincide either, but that religion is an element of fragmented common sense. Moreover common sense is a collective noun, like religion: there is not just one common sense, for that too is a product of history & a part of the historical process. Philosophy is criticism & the superseding of religion & 'common sense'. In this sense it coincides with 'good' as opposed to 'common' sense."

Gramsci

↑ Index

252. Michael Coffey
"schools" and doubles -Reply
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

steve markswrote:

"Having wandered in what felt like poetic Siberia (and a partly self-imposed one), I don't mind being associated with a "school." I know the designations aren't accurate, but then we could say that all words are labels and slippery, and so remain mute. While we're discussing doubles (c. alexander and c. alexander), how many people have discovered that they live in the same SMALL town as a fellow list member? I etc."

i'm glad someone wove together today's two threads, about poetry schools and personal names. they seem to intone some of the same themes, or the same theme, that people zealously guard their uniqueness, and the notion of being part of a school or, as maria damon offered, having another person of the same name at a writing program at brown, is , in maria's words, unnerving. someone suggested asking the poets themselves what school they would identitify with; someone asked me to do the same. so let me take that on, not than anyone out there knows what i've done or been doing but that won't matter much:

i identitify, and have for some time, with lots of work, stevens first, zukofsiy second, stein third, then, thunderingly, mac low: after that, lots of the language folks, but further on, for reasons related to god knows what, my life, a few of the irish poets, muldoon and a few others, writing about place. but looking at my work, OBJECTIVELY, i icould not argue with someone who said it looked like language poetry, though i would not argue if someone said it was derivative of same, or just a mimicking of same, but in any case wouldn't care much, because I never wrote to an audience that had another poet in it. In the context in which this issue came up, i was and am only eager to have a bookseller know a good way to talk about someone's work and know how to associate it with someone else's work with which a prospective buyer might be familiar.

as for my name, i was adopted, so name is chance (as it always is in some sense) so when i see other michael coffeys crop up on the trw reports denying me credit even though those others have condos somewhere they are or are not paying off, it doesn't unnerve me. I don't really feel unique, though i like to pretend i am, particularly to my son. i don't want him holding someone else's hand.

↑ Index

253. Steve Evans
Matewan Defense
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Thanks to Mark Weiss for defending Sayles's _Matewan_, and on just the right grounds. Maybe the List's ambient negative feelings towards the one IWW (Iowa Writers Workshop) have inadvertently spilled over onto the more noble organization that also bears that acronym.

But how can I be trusted, I even liked the film-essay (done on a visibly diminished budget relative to the lushness of realist composition in _Matewan_) that Sayles made in 1991, _City of Hope_.

Steve Evans

Mark Wrote:
>>John Sayles is certainly a goody-goody, but Matewan as agitprop? What would you have liked, a sympathetic view of the motivations of people who hire thugs to kill the defenseless? That was the American mining industry in the good old days of laissez-faire. Despite the sins that have been committed in its name, there was a reason for American radicalism to be born. It wasn't just a commie plot.
Or maybe it's the notion that, at least at moments, disparate groups of people have been able to see their situation as similar enough that they could think to act together? It has been known to happen, although the benefits have often been stolen from them.

↑ Index

254. Mark Weiss
Re: More on labelling theory
Fri 7 Feb 1997

This is an interesting problem--we want to direct readers to the work, and we want the work noticed, but we don't want to be misrepresented. I suggest that the categories have to be broad to the point of stupidity--their only purpose is the least subtle form of marketing. Try this out--if a music store descided that "jazz" was too broad and imprecise a category it would probably wind up with more argumentative sub-categories than the store would have space to show. As it is, if I go to my local jazz section I know I won't find Rachmaninoff, but I may find what I'm looking for alphabetically, and someone who shares the same initial may seem worth a try as well. Broadness/dumbness of category is also at least not likely to become canonical (or cannonical) definition. I could live with "experimental" or "new" or "non-mainstream" because it doesn't try to shoehorn me too narrowly into uncomfortable limitations.

Last night I backchannelled Michael Coffey as follows. You'll note my general disapproving tone (it may be necessary, but I don't have to like it). And I also suggest a few obvious problems that could present some comic possibilities. Do Brathwaite and Walcott lie down together? For these purposes, does it matter?

If you must do this, keep it simple. Remember that now as in the past what looked like differences of substance were often differences of social circle. So, O'Hara and Olson attract overlapping audiences who don't read Jorie Graham, although the two guys didn't drink together. Maybe Formalist, Mainstream, New (or Experimental), and Special Interest (defined by gender, sexual orientation, race and ethnicity). Keep in mind that this is a slippery slope--in that last category or perfectly conventional lesbian/hispanic/black poets who would have nothing to do with their more experimental brethren and sistren, regardless of shared ancestry or proclivities. And there are those whose work falls into more than one camp. But if you parse this further you risk disintegration.

At 12:53 PM 2/7/97 -0500, you wrote:
>Actually, I had a second question in response to your posting, Michael,
>and forgot to include it: you mention "experimental" as a possible >catagory, separate from LangPo---just who/what would you put into that?
>
>There was a really interesting thread about the use of words like >"experimental" here, before my time but accessible in the archive. I've >been party to several such exchanges, over the years, and still don't know >how to handle the whole issue of describing, well, interesting poetry, >except as: what I find interesting (or exciting); anything else tends to >make you a party to the trivialization of your own taste and your own >writing.. (As I said at first, I can understand Pub. Weekly doing >labelling, as its reason for being is explicitly related to marketing;

>tho that doesn't keep me from being uneasy even so--But your posting got >me thinking about how the rest of us relate to labels, as poets and >writers and readers, and publishers and editors...)
>
>One of the best illustrations of how intractable this problem is (and one >of the things that first got me thinking about it several years ago):
>many of the high-profile poets I admire (Bernstein, Silliman, Perelman, an >others) would refer, in some essay or public exchange, to innovative or >experimental or avant-garde poetry; and it would startle me, because it >always seemed to me that such labels were strongly weighted toward >allowing mainstream types to dismiss interesting writing. (As opposed >to the phrase Language Writing itself, in its various permutations, which >became part of a conscious effort to get certain work recognition in a >stiffling institutional context, and that strategy of course worked.) But >once I thought about it, I saw how hard it was to talk about things at >all, without one of these labels as a handle...I myself am made most >uncomfortable by the "a" word (avant-garde), which is especially loaded >with baggage that's guaranteed to put people off and pinpoint a poet's >work as special, beyond the pale, not to be taken seriously, under a sort >of glass dome...
>
>Mark P.
>Atlanta
>
>

↑ Index

255. amato
Re: poetry "schools"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

mark, there may of course be problems with rasula's categories... but the claim for poetic autonomy (on the part of poets, i mean) seems to come with the territory, and is in many cases simply not so, when considering markets and such like... which latter realization has sobered me to the realities of my own poetry...

just a way to begin laying out the field, like i say... not so much on the basis of aesthetics though, perhaps more in terms of power centers (in which case zone four represents a sort of dispersion of power)... but liking it or no may well have to do with how institutionally oriented one wants to be...

best,

joe

↑ Index

256. Christina Fairbank Chirot

Re: Names & Labels

Fri 7 Feb 1997

Despite a recent thread--no mention as yet of Visual Poetry and Sound Poetry--certainly a vast field of work all too often relegated beyond the back of the beyond . . . though world wide thousands of practitioners. Paul Metcalf often points out--as do his reviewers and interviewers--that his work does not fall into a category--and hence is difficult not only to "market"--but to gain attention for his work from critics hidebound by categories. (Paul frequently notes his work being found in travel sections.) He does note that he chose this path.
It's an interesting paradox: to want one's name to be unique--and at same time to be recognized as part of a group. In tagging and some aspects of visual and mail art--there may be a distinctive signature--yet by whom it is made--is often enough known to but a very few. "To walk in hiddeness . . . "
"Hide in plain sight" --dbchirot

↑ Index

257. George Bowering

Re: Names are not Objects

Fri 7 Feb 1997

I have been wondering about that "Miekal", too.

I presume that it is pronounced mee cal. Why didnt you change it to Meikal, so that at least it would still sound like "Michael"? You would still have solved the problem of the telephone book.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

258. Mark Weiss
Names
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Jews name their kids for dead people, but there's some lattitude because of translation. Hebrew or Yiddish names tend to be identical with that of the deceased, but there's some slide when it comes into English. So I was named for my cousin Maurice who died as a baby the year before I was born. It became Mark because that was the fad name during the 2nd world war and my parents had not yet lost their sanity and given me a furrin name in those conservative, assimilationist times. By 1948, however, they had gone over the edge: they announced that my brother-to-be was to be named Sandor after my Hungarian grandfather. I brought to bear all of my 4 years of Brooklyn street-smarts and convinced them that Steven would be more appropriate. The reasoning was something to the effect that he'd be teased and taunted unto insensibility. The hidden agenda was that I'd be getting a lot of black eyes defending the little bugger, whose arrival I wasn't completely resigned to in any case. So Steven it was. I rarely think about my name. It became an issue in childhood only because it was hard to make into a nickname, and at one point having a nickname was a big deal. My grandfather, however (the one who was alive), got around this by using my Hebrew name in an exaggeratedly Yiddish pronunciation, so that it came out Moishiyizzik--Moses Isaac to the uninitiated. It occurs to me now that as Jews we carry secret names, like some tribal peoples who have a "real" name that only the individual and the shaman know. To know the name, they think, is to control its bearer. Maybe for Jews our secret names are supposed to carry the spirit of the dead. In fact, I only know of Maurice because my aunt, who drank a bit, told me about him once when she was in her cups.

↑ Index

259. George Bowering
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Now that The-Artist-Formerly-Known-as-Prince is married, is her name Mrs. The-Artist-Formerly-Known-as-Prince? And what if (shudder!!!)they were to have kids?

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

260. George Bowering
Re: Mitch Goodman
Fri 7 Feb 1997

. "...after meeting a young English >poet, Denise Leverton, at a youth hostel in Geneva..." and later "But by >the time Miss Leverton had collected signatures from hundreds of artist and >writers for an antiwar advertisement...." > Ron, maybe not all name changes are voluntary! It's just another >reminder that someone we know and love as a household word more or less >doesn't ring any bells in the power centers.
>
> Sylvester Pollet

I think the _Times_ was just trying to hint at their "on-again, ov-again" relationship.

George Bowering.
,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

261. Matthias Regan
Re: Film thread CONAN THE BARBARIAN
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Ron Silliman writes:

It'd make a great double bill with The Sheltering Sky (a truly >great film and book) and a triple bill (does any theater do that >anymore?) with Antonioni's The Passage.

Is the last movie mentioned a slightly diffrent translation of the Antonioni I saw, "The Passanger", starring no less than Jack Nickelson? Whoever mentioned "above" in the list that the problem with "Lone Star" is the neatly sewn-up endings(I kind of agree)--"the Passanger" does not suffer from this! I don't remember all that goes on in it but I remember being delighted by the ending--a "trick" similar to the ending of "Blow Up" but IMO much more powerful in an exestential grandlytragic sort of way. For "The Sheltering Sky" (film version), which I largely disliked, I would substitue "Blue Sky," which has a little desert in it.

> A truly bad film (violence as porn) ...

I have heard on the radio three times this morning an advertisement for a newly released film (by "Sony Classics" I believe) about none other than Robert Howard, "inventor of Conan" and "the greatest pulp writer of all time" (the ad says that latter quote twice in 20 seconds). I'm not usually one for nostalgia, but when I get it its like the flu and won't go away. All morning I have seen in my mind's eye not any particular scenes from those paperbacks (though the crucifixation of Conan was really good) but the photo on the inside back cover. Bob Howard, balding with a drinking belly, standing barefoot on gray grass, holding a knife (a dagger) and a gun. That image terrified and fascinated me much of my teenage years. I wanted to be a writer--but not like that--he looked so depressed!--and the caption underneath ends with his suicide--but a little like that.

What does the list think of Robert Howard?
Of pulp?

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

262. George Bowering

Re: tv vs. film...

Fri 7 Feb 1997

TV commercials never bother me. I get time to read something during those minutes.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

263. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest
Re: tv vs. film...
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

i didn't watch tv for years, literally did not have a tv for about 12 yrs. then a friend who watches ER and NYPD Blue got me to watch, and i am now totally hooked. oh, when i finally got a tv (to watch videos) i got hooked on Star Trek Next Generation and the PBS mystery series.

what i've liked about ER and NYPD Blue is their unresolved issues and questions, the ambiguities, lack of a clear "good" guy and "bad" guy. i've also liked the multi-dimensional takes on things.

now HERE is a whammy... i USED to think MASH was great. tender, complex, etc. then went to it the other night after ER. Blech! it WAS one of the newer MASH shows, but still... i'm scared to go back to Bob Newhart and Mary Tyler Moore (which got me through childhood in a small midwestern town). DID watch carol burnett a while ago, and it was still good...

it's like when you used to read Mad magazine as a kid, and then you go back and see it and suddenly, it isn't funny...

i wonder if i'll be that way about ER or NYPD Blue one day...

e ps odes to miekel, i'm about to go off and winter camp in the mountains. this isn't as adventurous as it sounds -- i'll be in a state park -- but still, just me and the tent and the sleeping bag and a whole lot of bears... e

↑ Index

264. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: names of the dead
Fri 7 Feb 1997

We Danish-Afro-Baptist-LapsedCaucasian-Nebraska Urbanites name our children after the not yet born --

Maria -- Sorry to be the bearer of bad tidings -- Thought you already knew -- Bambara died last year -- There was an MLA session on her work chaired by Wahneema Lubiano -- and there has just appeared a collection of her previously uncollected works -- I was never a huge fan of her writing (though I LOVE still the title "Gorilla My Love") -- but Bambara herself was a wonderful person --

From the what's in a name desk -- Here at San Jose State the university book store has recently set up sections marked "African-American Interest," "Native-American Interest" etc -- Naturally, they have filed the books of Toni Cade Bambara in the "Latin American Interests" section --

Around the same time I received word that my old college mate Essex Hemphill, who published one of my first sorry poems in his journal _Nethula_, had died of AIDS -- Not long afterward I was told by a "scholar" in Los Angeles that the British author Essex Hemphill had passed away -- When I told him Essex was from DC, he said that he must have made the mistake because he'd seen Essex in a film by Isaac Julien -- but of course the film he had in mind was made by Marlon Riggs -- Hard to keep those Anglo-Afro-American-Gay-Writer-Filmpeople straight, eh?

↑ Index

265. Matthias Regan
Re: Names are not Objects
Fri 7 Feb 1997

If the local "Star Gazer" section of the Chicago Trib. serves me right, the unnamed and un-namable Prince and whosoevershemaybe did have a child not long ago; it was born with a cloven skull and died soon thereafter. I believe he's doing a charity tour these very days to benefit The Fight Against Birth Defects.

Matthias

> prince is/was his first name. maybe, this being 1997, she chose to keep her own name?
>
> Now that The-Artist-Formerly-Known-as-Prince is married, is her name Mrs. The-Artist-Formerly-Known-as-Prince? And what if (shudder!!!)they were to have kids?
>
> George Bowering.
>
> ,
>
> 2499 West 37th Ave.,
> Vancouver, B.C.,
> Canada V6M 1P4
>
> fax: [redacted]
> e-mail: [redacted]

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University

Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

266. groberts
Go ahead, make my name
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Isn't there something about proper names and secret names in Of Grammatology? I think the big D was unravelling something Levi-Strauss was doing with tribal names in Tristes Tropiques...the circulation of names and the presence of the anthropologist...the Other setting in motion the dispersal of names...authority and policing and all that.

Of course the final authority on the business of names is Lewis Carroll aka Humpty Dumpty, alias... what is he called? No, what's his name? I mean, who's on first?

I dream of an anthology with no names...found as yet only in the Library of Babel...

Gary R who has succumbed to the recent habit of attaching real words to the fake ones that stand for him

↑ Index

267. Joseph Lease
Re: poetry "schools"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Sure: though it seems to me that the (falsely named) new formalism is do dead and tiny that it hardly qualifies as a zone: and having myself graduated from the Brown University MFA program in poetry it seems to me that the distinction between writing programs (aren't I sending this to Buffalo) and language poetry is fast becoming hard to assume: in other words, Brown is a writing program profoundly engaged with language poetry: other programs are as well and more and more are, it seems, likely to. I mention this not to dispute anything Joe says below only to suggest that if we are interested in using zones as a descriptive term rather than schools we better think of them as very liquid.

On Fri, 7 Feb 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> it may be useful in this regard to consider jed rasula's account of current poetic practice in _the american poetry wax museum_... rasula identifies "four zones" of the contemporary american "poetry world": the associated writing programs; the new formalism; language poetry; and "various coalitions of interest-oriented or community-based poets" (440)... now i'm > not suggesting that one should adhere precisely to these "zones" in laying out publishing or distributing criteria, only that such zones may be a start in thinking about what poetry communities are 'out there'...

>
> best,
>
> joe

↑ Index

268. Mark Weiss
Re: Film thread CONAN THE BARBARIAN
Fri 7 Feb 1997

People who are in substantial agreement about the other arts often disagree violently about films. The Sheltering Sky, for instance, is right near the top of my list for all-time worst (I usually like to look at Debra Winger, but in this case I found myself groaning, "Debbie, put your clothes on," so even that minor satisfaction did nothing for me), and I could have ju justified that opinion in great detail before memory decay set in. But I'm aware that Ron or another of its admirers could probably be just as detailedly convincing on the other side. Why this peculiar phenomenon? My guess--it's only that--is that the suggestive associative nature of film is in some way like the way we record strong visual and motion memories (dreams tend to have a filmic structure, full of bold cross-cutting and changes of local), and a particular image or gesture may resonate so powerfully for me that I surrender to an otherwise horrendous or manipulative film. So if we all dreamed the same we'd all hate the sheltering sky. QED.

At 02:50 PM 2/7/97 -0600, you wrote:
>Ron Silliman writes:
>
>It'd make a great double bill with The Sheltering Sky (a truly >>great film and book) and a triple bill (does any theater do that >>anymore?) with Antonioni's The Passage.
>
> Is the last movie mentioned a slightly diffrent translation of the >Antonioni I saw, "The Passanger", starring no less than Jack Nickelson?
> Whoever mentioned "above" in the list that the problem with "Lone Star" >is the neatly sewn-up endings(I kind of agree)--"the Passanger" does not >suffer from this! I don't remember all that goes on in it but I remember >being delighted by the ending--a "trick" similar to the ending of "Blow Up" >but IMO much more powerful in an exestential grandlytragic sort of way.
> For "The Sheltering Sky" (film version), which I largely disliked, I >would substitue "Blue Sky," which has a little desert in it.

>
>>A truly bad film (violence as porn) ...
>
> I have heard on the radio three times this morning an advertisement for >a newly released film (by "Sony Classics" I believe) about none other than >Robert Howard, "inventor of Conan" and "the greatest pulp writer of all >time" (the ad says that latter quote twice in 20 seconds).
> I'm not usually one for nostalgia, but when I get it its like the flu >and won't go away. All morning I have seen in my mind's eye not any >particular scenes from those paperbacks (though the crucifixation of Conan >was really good) but the photo on the inside back cover. Bob Howard, balding >with a drinking belly, standing barefoot on gray grass, holding a knife (a >dagger) and a gun. That image terrified and fascinated me much of my teenage >years. I wanted to be a writer--but not like that--he looked so >depressed!--and the caption underneath ends with his suicide--but a little >like that.
>
> What does the list think of Robert Howard?
> Of pulp?
>
> Matthias
>
>Matthias Regan
>Northwestern University
>Department of Chemistry
>Phone: 847/[redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

269. Chris Stroffolino

Re: POETICS Digest - 5 Feb 1997 to 6 Feb 1997

Fri 7 Feb 1997

Dear David Bromige: WHAT academic doors have I darkened?
Do you know something (about this) I don't? They (the doors) may be locked for the time being, and I am trying to cast myself into a role different than the one who is begging to be let in (and hence the off-again on-again romance with a posture of indifference), but is this a darkening?
(answer: yes, virginia, there is a santa claus)....
well, i currently teaching COMPOSITION again

(and asked my students to write:
"If the LAND (that has been raped and pillaged) could speak, what would it say?"---- but ENGLISH as a "field" is really bizarre.....
The "coalition" it makes between "composition" and "literature" should perhaps be BROKEN down..... being that poetry, etc. for me has less in common with comp. than with other non-ENGLISH things (it isn't academia per se that's the problem, but "package deals") and teaching literature is more like teaching "decomposition" (which I long for.....even if it still pays adjunct). darkly, chris

↑ Index

270. manny savopoulos
Fw: Internet Taxation
Fri 7 Feb 1997

---

in some instances this might not be appropriate, but one must do what one can.

> From: Jackson Mac <[redacted]>
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: Internet Taxation
> Date: Friday, February 07, 1997 4:17 PM
>
> >Return-Path: [redacted]
> >From: [redacted]
> >Date: Fri, 7 Feb 1997 01:55:09 -0500 (EST)
> >To: [redacted], [redacted], [redacted],
> > [redacted], [redacted], [redacted],
> > [redacted], [redacted],
[redacted]
> >Subject: Internet Taxation
> >
> >Hi,
> >
> >I received the following mail and thought that it would be of interest to > >everyone if you hadn't alredy heard.
> >
> >Keep in mind that the deadline is Feb. 13th.
> >

> >-Peter
> >
> >> Hi from Tim (Badge) on IRC Cops I am writing you this to inform you of a > >> very important matter currently under review by the FCC. Your local > >> telephone company has filed a proposal with the FCC to impose per minute > >> charges for your internet service. They contend that your usage has or > >will > >> hinder the operation of the telephone network. It is my belief that > >> internet usage will diminish if users were required to pay additional per > >> minute charges. The FCC has created an email box for your comments, > >> responses must be received by February 13, 1997. Send your comments to > >> [redacted] and tell them what you think. Every phone company is in on > >> this one, and they are trying to sneak it in just under the wire for > >> litiagation. Let everyone you know here this one. Get the e-mail address
> >to > >> everyone you can think of.
> >>
> >> [redacted]
> >>
> >> Please forward this email to all your friends on the internet so all our > >> voices may be heard!
> >>
> >> Jim Cashatt
> >
> >
>
>
> Jackson Mac Low
>
> [redacted]
> Tel/Fax [redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

271. robert drake
Prevallet address?
Fri 7 Feb 1997

anyone know how to reach Kristen Prevallet? i'm trying to clear up the story about her work in Brenda Knight's Women of the Beat Generation. the editor at conai press was most unhelpful.

lbd

↑ Index

272. Mark Weiss
On the confusion of names
Fri 7 Feb 1997

I can't vouch for the truth of what follows, but I did read it somewhere once upon a time. It seems that until the mid-nineteenth century there were no family names in Norway--everyone was Lief Ericsson or Eric Liefsson or Jon Jonson (sorry about the spelling). The Norwegian powers that be declared that everyone had to choose a last name--and everyone did (I think it was male heads of households who decided)--they chose the names they already went by. So there were an awful lot of Jonsons and Ericssons and Olsons. Sort of like the mythical country in WC Fields' Million Diollar Legs, where all the men are named George and all the women are named Angela. Some years ago I received an offer of a copy of the Weiss family history. The publisher claimed that Weiss was a rare and aristocratic name. There are four pages of Weiss's in the Manhattan phonebook. And as for aristocrats, the pub must have known that most US Weiss's are eastern european Jews (my understanding is that Weiss is a mostly Christian name in Germany and mostly Jewish in Austria and its former dependencies). She offered to send a copy of our heraldic shield along with the book. My guess is that there are Jewish families with copies of this document hanging over the fireplace, unaware that it was lifted from some minor Junker noble whose family motto, if translated from Latin or Gothic, probably means: Who'd you call Jewish?

↑ Index

273. Forrest Gander
Re: poetry "schools"
Fri 7 Feb 1997

What about them radical mavericks? A lot of the writers I like most--Mei-mei Berssenbrugge, Arthur Sze, Phillip Foss, James Thomas Stevens, Michael Palmer, C. D. Wright, William Bronk, Cole Swensen, Fanny Howe, Kamau Brathwaite, Nate Mackey, John Taggart, Gustaf Sobin, Peter Cole-- fall outside of "schools." Is Ann Lauterbach's new work LANGUAGE poetry or New York School? Barbara Guest was a New York School poet, but what is she now? The notion of schools seems to me clubby and limiting. At the same time, of course, I too want to see more representation in bookstores. Representation comes through distribution. I think what is most needed is an effective distribution network, something the NEA and the CCLM, if lobbied, might initiate together. Even the notion of supporting publishing houses seems less constrictive than that of supporting "schools." New Directions, Stone Bridge, Firebrand, Lost Roads, Burning Deck, Talisman House publish a range of writers and aesthetics. Presses like Sun and Moon or Kelsey Street, associated with schools of writing, also publish important books that fit into no predefined niche. It's the ones without handles would be lost in your scheme.

↑ Index

274. Tom Beard

Re: Names are not Objects

Fri 7 Feb 1997

I haven't come across any other Tom Beard's - the name doesn't seem to be particularly common. I'm adopted, too, so I'm not sure what I might have been called - although my birth father was Dutch, so it would probably have been even more uncommon.

I have noticed that my name kept me for some time from experimenting with facial hair. My father had a beard for a while, and the jokes were truly attrocious. Having had a goatee for about a year now (and I hate the whole grunge/Gen X thing - I was inspired more by the 2nd series of Black Adder), whenever anyone has difficulty spelling my name, I point at my chin and say "mnemonic device".

One would think that my name would be easy enough to spell, but people often write it down as "Baird". This is a more common name, but the main reason seems to be that some NZers pronounce "air" as "ear".

No, I haven't seriously thought about changing my name, although I always use "TRB" for my initials (the reason for which will be left as an exercise for the reader).

↑ Index

275. Tom Beard

Re: Provoking the stretch

Fri 7 Feb 1997

> as for the category "language" poetry, Ive never been comfortable with a notion that someone who questions the many contexts of the language of our time as being that separate from the spirit of poetry in general, even most mainstream poets have been known to burst out in florescences of "language"...is pound a language poet, is lewis carroll a language poet, why do these distinctions have to exist to perpetrate a critical nomenclature of pigeon holes & dusty compartments?

I agree whole-heartedly with miekal here. I also find the term "linguistically innovative" rather insulting to any poet who doesn't identify with that movement - to me, any good (loaded word) lyric poem is linguistically innovative. Is Bill Manhire "linguistically innovative"? How about Edwin Morgan, Phyllis Webb or Geoffrey Hill? To me, they all use language in ways that are often surprising, dislocating and/or playful, but I doubt that they'd align themselves with langpo.

I guess I prefer Jackson Mac Low's term, "perceiver centred" (or "reader centred" for written arts) - an acknowledgement of the fact that meaning is created in the act of perception/reading - works that provide the perceiver/reader with fertile ground for meaning creation. Of course, one could take this to mean that there are no reader-centred writers, only reader-centred readers - it doesn't matter whether the author has read Derrida or Olson; one could read Baxter in the same way that one might read a language poet. How much fun that might be is a different question.

That phrase "fertile ground" is crucial, of course. What makes one slab of language any more "fertile" than another? That of course depends upon the reader, and so one has to make assumptions (with the inevitable ideological and cultural bias that they entail) about the reader(s). I'm quite happy to do that (although I like to think that I question my assumptions in the process) if it is going to result in a more "fertile" piece of writing.

That may be why I'm still attracted to lyric poetry, albeit a lyric poetry that's more influenced by Oppen, Creeley, Wedde, Hawken and Neidecker (?sp) than by Keats or whoever. For me, the "lyre" that the words play to accompany their meanings, the dance of signifier and signified, the hesitations of line breaks and the webs of connotations all provide fertile ground for linguistic innovation.

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

276. maria damon
Re: possession
Fri 7 Feb 1997

julian and cloud author were deep inspirations in college...do they address "performance" in the sense of glossolalia? seems more a private, inner experience then narrated for others...diff possessions wd, it seems, be inflected by diff cultural traditions. i used one of julian's sentences (i prayed to feel what it wd be like to actually die...or something like that) as an epigraph for a novella i wrote some time back, in grad school, that's been sitting in a closet cuz the first scene needs to be "tightened," according to the writing group i was in a few years ago.

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
> since ms. moriarty mentions margery kempe and robert gluck's > very good and at times sublime re-imagining of kempe --
>
> julian of norwich's writings, what are called =revelations of > divine love=, are often marvelous, particularly in her > measuredly ecstatic jesus-visions, her desire to "one" with > god, and her revelation about the meaning of the lord and the > servant parable (in the long text).
>
> and see =the cloud of unknowing= and its (unknown) > author's talk of the "sharp dart of longing love" etc.
>
> and with all the talk of freud, how about andre breton's > =communicating vessels=, with its contention that dreams and > writings are =predictive= forces, oracles of the future, rather > than psychologically =descriptive= ones?
>
> lisa s.
>

↑ Index

277. aerialedge
Fwd: Internet Taxation
Fri 7 Feb 1997

Forwarded message:
From: [redacted] (Jackson Mac Low)

To: [redacted]
Date: 97-02-07 15:47:53 EST

>Return-Path: [redacted]
>From: [redacted]
>Date: Fri, 7 Feb 1997 01:55:09 -0500 (EST)
>To: [redacted], [redacted], [redacted],
> [redacted], [redacted], [redacted],
> [redacted], [redacted],
[redacted]
>Subject: Internet Taxation
>
>Hi,
>
>I received the following mail and thought that it would be of interest to >everyone if you hadn't alredy heard.
>
>Keep in mind that the deadline is Feb. 13th.
>
>-Peter
>
>> Hi from Tim (Badge) on IRC Cops I am writing you this to inform you of a >> very important matter currently under review by the FCC. Your local >> telephone company has filed a proposal with the FCC to impose per minute >> charges for your internet service. They contend that your usage has or >will >> hinder the operation of the telephone network. It is my belief that >> internet usage will diminish if users were required to pay additional per >> minute charges. The FCC has created an email box for your comments, >> responses must be received by February 13, 1997. Send your comments to >> [redacted] and tell them what you think. Every phone company is in on >> this one, and they are trying to sneak it in just under the wire for >> litiagation. Let everyone you know here this one. Get the e-mail address
>to >> everyone you can think of.
>>
>> [redacted]
>>
>> Please forward this email to all your friends on the internet so all our >> voices may be heard!
>>
>> Jim Cashatt

>
>

Jackson Mac Low

[redacted]
Tel/Fax [redacted]

↑ Index

278. Miekal And ero-text
Sat 8 Feb 1997

While at Maria Professorina's house amid her massive library (including piles of books by many people on this list) I came a cross a hot little erotic collaboration between Bob Harrison & Dodie Bellamy. Titillating at least, Id like to see if there was a way of getting ahold of it, (title & publisher have slipped my mind, but Ive retained some of the graphic text, no surprise!). In particular Id like to see if I could trade a copy of Lyx's & my 1982 collaboration EROTIC LOGIC, which is similar in spirit tho perhaps more languagey.

have safe eroticatalia,

mr miekal

↑ Index

279. F.A. Templeton
Re: Categories
Sat 8 Feb 1997

If bookstores have categories within poetry, who'll decide who goes where? St Mark's shunted my YOU-The City around the store so that nobody could ever find it and then didn't restock on the basis that nobody looked for it. Was someone watching?

How about an impure category?

Fiona

↑ Index

280. David R. Israel
more re: Fwd: "New rules on internet access"
Sat 8 Feb 1997

Esteemed Listserv Denizens --

Yesterday, I posted to you'all (SAasiaLit & Poetics lists) information I'd received from another listserv regarding some alleged current legisilation that could lead to new charges for internet use.

According to new info received today, that earlier message was a mere hoax. I'm a gullible guy.

Presuming this new info is in fact legit -- my humble apologies.

yours,
d.i.

p.s.: see the appended for details

p.p.s.: I tried to take a look at the EFF homepage & see about verifying the "mythical" character of the alleged FCC deal, but frankly lost patience w/ the download. (Maybe I'll look later.)

------- Forwarded Message Follows -------
Date: Sat, 8 Feb 1997 11:23:14 -0800
. . . .

Dina, you ninny,

This is one of the urban myths of the Net, a variant of the Modem Tax. It's a hoax, to coin a term. [This fellow says that, seems, bec. I'd invented the term "joax" -- cross between a hoax & a joke. - d.i.]

Any concerns about Net access and 1st Amendment rights can always be checked out thru the Electronic Frontier Foundation:
http://www.eff.org

They're a super organization, and their web pages are clearly organized. Tons of useful info, the best library there is regarding any online issues.

I'd hate to be at that e-mail address, if it's a live one.
. . .
[etc.]

↑ Index

281. Wendy Battin
'names are not double,' school objects
Sat 8 Feb 1997

Missed a few digests, please forgive any redundancy.

--Steven Marks: Pleased to meet. I'm over in Mystic, but close enough. Re "the zone idea of Jed Rasula," I wonder if categories like that have to be posthumous to be accurate. (As I recall, Rasula was looking at marketing rather than making.) Wonder also, as a serial refugee & stateless poet, if all the random collisions on the internet can unhinge the school/ tribal impulse. Or is it just hard-wired into primates? At some gut level my working model of cyberspace seems to be The Zone from _Gravity's Rainbow_.

--If your name's clunky enough it's likely to be singular. I haven't discovered any other Wendy Battin. (Welsh for "dweller under the sign of the bat," I gather, & assume my forebears were pub keepers rather than witches or guano-farmers.)

--Ron: Loved "Sheltering Sky," and that might have been part of my dissatisfaction w/English Patient, which seemed empty & clock- workish, and a slow clock too. (Talking about the movie, not the book.)

--Multiple Miekal, let me know if you're interested in contributing to the Multiple Poetics Project, http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Lofts/5471

Wendy aka others

"It is not the crocodile's job to yell "Watch out for the crocodile!"--Henri Michaux

↑ Index

282. Alan Jen Sondheim grand larceny
Sat 8 Feb 1997

(Stolen style producing traditional poem or real poem. Jennifer.)

magic

a text, one of several thousand hopeless, eh
sometimes i close my eyes and think ill never have to open them again blindness can pervade every organ thinking off lamps going out all over europe my writing is my hell disentangled from the matrix that produces it as if there were a nipple were in the middle of this black bleak space were there for example downing aircraft were there driving out villagers by means of ravaging floods deprivations cholera foodstuffs disappearing like the banks droughts nuclear devastations reservoirs of viral technologies it might be a single o cross of t dot on i or j as if id be dead when you reached the end of this sentence ill be dead when you reach the end of this sentence fooled you cant fool you for long can i were there firestorms over forests and cities firestorms across the plains radiations everywhere third arm breaks out through my chest third eye closes for the last time legs wilt it wont be long now my last prediction brakes are on cars in reverse embankment looms downhill looms in the middle very middle of the air very air im holding on that o or cross of t dot on j or i its down there fiery black of the screen death white of the screen sucking sucked away lips bared teeth against one or another bitter letter hopeless eh

should have dropped out years ago letter clanks at the bottom of the page theres no bottom no sound hallucinations setting in schizophrenias schizzing jagged x across the chest eyes mouth ears didnt fool you this time did i cant keep this up forever

↑ Index

283. Brigham Taylor
Baraka/DuBois
Sat 8 Feb 1997

I caught the PBS show on DuBois. It was in 4 parts, and conceived/produced/overseen by Bambara; however each part was written and narrated by a different person. The last part was by Baraka, and it dealt with DuBois's radicalism in the face of McCarthy and the Cold War. It was excellent: clear, piercing, exceedingly moving. At the end of the credits was an IMO for Bambara, which was the first I'd heard of it as well. Brigham

↑ Index

284. Christopher Alexander per-min email charges
Sat 8 Feb 1997

just an update on the earlier post regarding per-minute charges for email use. I sent to the FCC & rec'd this reply. c.

------- Forwarded Message Follows -------
Date: Fri, 07 Feb 1997 16:34:04 -0500
From: ISP <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: service charges -Reply

This is an automated response to the message you sent to [redacted]. Thanks for taking the time to write. We have established this mailbox for informal comments about usage of the public switched telephone network by Internet access and information service providers. More information on this subject is available at <http://www.fcc.gov/isp.html> We appreciate your input. This mailbox is th FCC point of contact for informal e-mail comments on this proceeding, so you do not need to send copies of you

Look for more features and announcements on our Web site, <http://www.fcc.gov/>, in the future!

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

"Philosophy is intellectual order, which neither religion nor common sense can be. It is to be observed that religion & common sense do not coincide either, but that religion is an element of fragmented common sense. Moreover common sense is a collective noun, like religion: there is not just one common sense, for that too is a product of history & a part of the historical process. Philosophy is criticism & the superseding of religion & 'common sense'. In this sense it coincides with 'good' as opposed to 'common' sense."

Gramsci

↑ Index

285. linda v. russo
Re: Names are not Objects
Sat 8 Feb 1997

> what's in a name?

for no other reason than to jump in after a long absence:

dad named me linda after an old girlfriend, this bit of news shared apparently for this first time in my parents' 30+ yr marriage over thanksgiving dinner a few years ago

The v. stands for valerie -- mom's pick -- was my babush's name my babush on the other side of my family is my nunna, mary fudge as maidennames go -- was fruggi before they got to immigration

my greatgreatgrandparents on my father's grandfather's side were both love children & so orphans -- so my last name anyway isn't my last name really

i have an uncle yosh

--
linda v. russo
[redacted]

↑ Index

286. linda v. russo
Re: notley/epic
Sat 8 Feb 1997

>
> also dont forget to check the Talisman back list--there's an issue on > Notley back there somewhere I know. Linda knows which one. Linda?
>
It's number One. Fall 1988 avail. for $5 unless i bought up the last one. There's a great interview in there, somewhat of an epic at 11.5 pages, somewhat related to epic inquiries, perhaps. There's a good bit of autobio which is very interesting and entertaining, as one would expect. & Notley talks about line length and how you know when a poem is over, which is "well, you know when it's over when it's over."

is that how you know when an epic's over?
--
linda v. russo
[redacted]

↑ Index

287. linda v. russo
Re: poetry "schools"
Sat 8 Feb 1997

A very interesting addendum to a very interesting parallel:

as recently as 7 months ago i lived in boston & heard tell that the Grolier Poetry Bookshop's langpo section was the fastest moving in the store -- also, there was some crossover when the # of copies allowed: i remember specifically that Michael Palmer was cross-sectioned. (sounds painful!)

& while i'm in the area let me express my sincere sense of shame twds harvard sq for destroying the only decent place to sit down at 3 am & get a laugh out of the redline menu (basicly one item: bacondoublecheeseburger) & talk to a bunch of people that'd you'd maybe see around and never even think to see.

A very interesting parallel to what you-all are doing: in the 1980's I > lived in Boston; the famous poetry bookshop Groliers had a good selection > of LangPo books & chapbooks; but they had them on a separate shelf > labelled (literally) "Language Poetry." Now on the one hand many area > poets thought that was an absurd ghettoization intended to keep this > stuff (which somehow wasn't real) from infecting the rest of the 15,000 or > whatever volumes in the store. ALL the rest, you see, were in a single A > to Z sequence. On the other hand, several young poets I knew found this a > useful way to find out who & what LangPo was, when they hadn't had direct > contact with anyone who could tell them; and while they saw in principle > what was wrong, the arrangement helped them at a crucial point of > exploration...

> Mark P.
> Atlanta
>
--
linda v. russo
[redacted]

↑ Index

288. Jordan Davis
brushback beanball hbp
Sat 8 Feb 1997

Bill you could get yourself called Luis Tiant instead of mazeroski (or mazilli) doing that
--it's great to play for a wiener-- J

On Thu, 6 Feb 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> he
> and his boyfriends, so called alternative comics (mark marron, todd berry, dave atell), would sometimes try to make their audiences walk by being intentionally unfunny and/or sick and they would count the number of people who left. i've been influenced to think that to walk the audience at a poetry reading would be well the best thing you could do.

> bill

↑ Index

289. Jordan Davis
Matewan Defense etc
Sat 8 Feb 1997

---

hopping on the matewan wagon.. that and city of hope are two of the few movies I can stand to think about.. maybe I just have unresolved feelings for James Earl Jones? Sayles isn't perfect but he was independent before that got anybody anywhere, also he plays mean softball address lookups are easy with www.[redacted].com

Toni Cade Bambara died in 1996, I believe ..

Jordan

↑ Index

290. Wendy Battin
question
Sat 8 Feb 1997

Anyone noticing the transparency of the net & web? ie, how all creative problems reduce almost instantly to the techne? This isn't a question about the depth of work & the surface of presentation; more, I guess, it's about doing away with the publisher, and how that throws design & formal issues back to the writer.

Wendy, who has obvious fondness for the obvious, where everything's hidden

---
Wendy Battin [redacted]
(home) http://camel.conncoll.edu/ccother/wjbat/
(CAPA) http://shain.lib.conncoll.edu/CAPA/capa.html
Multiple Poetics: http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/

↑ Index

291. Gabrielle Welford
Uh oh! More Cyberproblems! (fwd)
Sun 9 Feb 1997

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: T.J. Glasscock, 76563,530

Hello All,

A friend just forwarded this to me -- seems the phone companies can't bear the possibility of letting a chance for exploitation slip away.

---------- Forwarded Message ---------- [headers deleted]

> Please let the FCC know your feelings on this one. I realize you may have > received it before but wanted to make sure to let everyone know. The contact > info for the FCC is at the bottom. Also pass it along to others.
>

> I am writing you this to inform you of a very important matter currently under review by the FCC. Your local telephone company has filed a proposal with the FCC to impose per minute charges for your internet service. They contend that your usage has or will hinder the operation of the telephone network.
>
> It is my belief that internet usage will diminish if users were required to pay additional per minute charges. The FCC has created an email box for your comments, responses must be received by February 13, 1997. Send your comments to [redacted] and tell them what you think.
>
> Every phone company is in on this one, and they are trying to sneak it in just under the wire for litigation. Let everyone you know here this one. Get the e-mail address to everyone you can think of.
>
> [redacted]
>
> Please forward this email to all your friends on the internet so all our voices may be heard!

↑ Index

292. Robert Archambeau
Re: poetry "schools"
Sun 9 Feb 1997

Sorry to join this discussion late -- just got my e-mail back after a three-day technical meltdown and a trip out of town.

I think it was Isaiah Berlin who said that the world was composed of two two kinds of people: those who divide the world into two kinds of people, and those who don't. I propose a division of poetic schools along the same grounds -- we could divide poets into those who divide poetry into schools and those who don't. I suspect the latter group would contain most of the poets I find most interesting.

Robert Archambeau

↑ Index

293. Herb Levy
Clothes Make the Man
Sun 9 Feb 1997

Dear Mr Bromige,

I am writing to you in your capacity as resident fashion consultant and haberdasher to the poetics list. I'll be in New York later this week (on my way to Texas) & thought I'd go to hear Kathleen Fraser & Charles Borkhuis read at the Ear on Saturday, but I'm unsure how to dress for the occasion.

I mean, I'd hate to show up in my usual Seattle grunge attire only to find that the NY scene has moved onto retro-Victorian-Beatnik clothing or some such.

At the very least I need to know whether to wear my baseball cap with the visor over my face or over my neck. Do you have a long-range forecast for this accessory that's good through next weekend? I hope I'm not expected to wear the visor to one side or the other at a jaunty angle. I really hate that.

Please advise (& don't let anyone know I've asked for you counsel in this matter. People like Bowering can be so cruel sometimes.)

From one basement to another, all the best,

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

294. KYLE CONNER/LRC-CAHS
Re: Bandit Queen
Sun 9 Feb 1997

Eliza- I think you're right in identifying the source of the feel of violence in a rape scene as deriving largely from the gaze of the camera, i.e., a rape scene filmed from POV of the rapist or anyone looking over the rapist's shoulder as opposed to POV of one who is raped. Any view outside that of the victim has the potential to be an exploitative and oppressive one, and yes, this could be considered a "male" gaze, even if the rapist were a woman (since historical male-domination of females has saturated every level of society, so this gaze can be appropriated for a female character co-opted in a male structure or by a female director in same structure--has Penny Marshall filmed a rape scene yet?). Hollywood has a particularly dreadful record of this kind of exploitation. There is a particularly reprehensible scene in the film "Strange Days" where a rapist wears a device which allows him to experience the emotions of whomever he hooks it up to. He proceeds to enter a woman's apartment, sedate her with a taser, rape and strangle her while experienceing her own experience of this vicariously. The whole scene is shot from his perspective, and is relentlessly, nauseatingly vicious-- I think you could even see the outline of his facemask around the edges of the frame. In essence, the viewer is forced to assume the viewpoint of the rapist--to BECOME the rapist, and either to accept tacitly the act, or, short of leaving the movie, fight against this positioning, which I did by looking away. The scene is completely unsympathetic to the woman and clearly pruriently sadistic in its intention. Isn't it great to know that Hollywood largely espouses the oppression of women? And here we thought things were beginning to equalize somewhat between the sexes. The important thing is to be aware that this kind of crap and attitude is STILL out there and to resist or fight against it any way one can.

-Kyle Conner

↑ Index

295. Dan Raphael Dlugonski

names are not

Sun 9 Feb 1997

---

al my writing and performance is done as dan raphael. my original last name of dlugonski (dwoo goyn' skee) seemed too wierd. my original middle name, raymond, got transformed first, moving to raphael because of readings in kaballah and such i was doing, and coz raymond was my dad's name, and we werent on friendly terms at the time. dan raphael is a year and a month older than dan dlugonski; his middle name is ambrose.

↑ Index

296. Alan Jen Sondheim

the texts, Jennifer pleading isolation and poverty

Sun 9 Feb 1997

---

to explain to Poetics - why I send poems/texts to this list - and that poetry is expensive.* I haven't been able to buy such (I am not working towards definition here) for years (sometimes 2nd-hand); I stopped around the time I found out I couldn't afford Susan Howe, who I read in Segue's stockroom (or Roof's). Nor am I published by any poetics/literary press, not having contacts (which is a matter of the social, something I fare poorly at). So that here there is a loosening of literary institutions, allowing a different/difficult form of dissemination. That there is no forfeit on anyone's part in the reading/writing/deleting.

Which also depends on balance, the swerve of it. A sensitivity. And to the current state of threading/weaving. So such writing is a flesh in the pan, not stance of noise/introjection, an other's way of mistressing theory. Which is why I felt compelled

(Jennifer)

*we should think of this, the _economics_ of reading; nothing is free, nothing, in my world.

↑ Index

297. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)

Re: names of the dead

Sun 9 Feb 1997

thanks for the info aldon, wahneema being an old grad school mate of mine... essex died quite a while ago, didn't he?--md

> We Danish-Afro-Baptist-LapsedCaucasian-Nebraska Urbanites name our children after the not yet born --
>
> Maria -- Sorry to be the bearer of bad tidings -- Thought you already knew -- Bambara died last year -- There was an MLA session on her work chaired by Wahneema Lubiano -- and there has just appeared a collection of her previously uncollected works -- I was never a huge fan of her writing (though I LOVE still the title "Gorilla My Love") -- but Bambara herself was a wonderful person --
>
> From the what's in a name desk -- Here at San Jose State the university book store has recently set up sections marked "African-American Interest," "Native-American Interest" etc -- Naturally, they have filed the books of Toni Cade Bambara in the "Latin American Interests" section --
>
> Around the same time I received word that my old college mate Essex Hemphill, who published one of my first sorry poems in his journal _Nethula_, had died of AIDS -- Not long afterward I was told by a "scholar" in Los Angeles that the British author Essex Hemphill had passed away -- When I told him Essex was from DC, he said that he must have made the mistake because he'd seen Essex in a film by Isaac Julien -- but of course the film he had in mind was made by Marlon Riggs -- Hard to keep those Anglo-Afro-American-Gay-Writer-Filmpeople straight, eh?

↑ Index

298. Bil Brown
Re: per-min email charges
Mon 10 Feb 1997

This seems to be the FCC's reply to the current thread, via thier web-page:

<<Internet Access & Information Service Provider NOI

The NOI seeks comment on whether the FCC should, in addition to access charge reform, consider actions relating to the implications of information service and Internet access provider usage of the public switched network. In particular, in light of concerns raised over congestion on the public switched network, the Commission seeks comment on how it can most effectively create incentives for the deployment of services and facilities to allow more efficient transport of data traffic to and from end users.

The Commission made no specific proposals, but tentatively concluded that providers of information services (including Internet service providers) should not be subject to the interstate access charges that local telephone companies currently assess on long-distance carriers.

Comment Date: February 21, 1997
Reply Comment Date: March 24, 1997>>

Just thought everyone wd like to know. It is tentively in the recycle bin... the FCC will not charge service providers, this seems to mean that service providers are exempt, meaning that we will prolly be exempt (I know a few ppl working as service providers and they are just like us... they just have a T1 or so...).

Bil Brown

↑ Index

299. Mark Wallace
the future of an illusion
Mon 10 Feb 1997

I know the original impetus for this is some time ago now, but I noticed some posts several weeks back were arguing that any truly effective poetry in the present moment would transcend the supposed "limits" of a poetry oriented to the page by 1) involving other media 2) becoming more performative, and thus more "entertaining" to an audience who is tired of watching poets flip pages and mumble through their readings. There's really crucial work being done in multi-media work and performance art, many by people on this list (Miekal And may not be in any language poetry anthology, but anyone at the Writing From The New Coast conference in Buffalo 1993 has never forgotten Miekal's performance/visual art/ poetry, as just one for instance). But I do think, however, that statements to the effect that poetry somehow MUST mutate in some direction or other actually end up doing a disservice to the range of work that's actually happening.

It is, I suppose, a fantasy to imagine a circumstance in which poets might be taken by more than a small group of people as individuals who have GOOD REASONS FOR DOING THE THINGS THEY'RE DOING--but obviously, all sorts of poetry arises from intellectual and other kinds of notions that can be found suspect. Nonetheless, when I hear statements to the effect that "poetry must become this and that in order to remain viable in a culture of this or that kind, etc" I can't avoid thinking of the ways in which exploration in poetry both remains under the thumb of this kind of pronouncement, but also the ways in which poetry refutes such judgements, renders them often just so much table-pounding. I'm afraid that I think that all such statements as "only this kind of work will be legitimate in the future" simply CAN'T be true--the value of making such statements seems often little more that the desire to assert that one's own questions are the ones that matter, unless you can imagine someone saying that poetry must move in a direction that they themselves are not practicing. The point I'm trying to make, I think, is that the creative mind can continue to work in all sorts of mediums, as long as self-awareness remains about the historical and material conditions of those mediums. Is there anyone who REALLY imagines that there will be a point in time when no creative poets think of the page as a usable medium. Is it not more likely that the moment a whole culture determined that a page had no value, one poet or maybe even more would begin using the page again?

Obviously, the performance/visual aspects of poetry enable much variety of artistic practice, and much opportunity for "hybrid" or other kinds of non-singular media forms. But I think it's important that this complexity should NOT be reduced to the idea that poetry somehow needs to be more ENTERTAINING. I find poetry entertaining often, sometimes even poetry I don't like that much, but THERE'S NO SHORTAGE OF ENTERTAINMENT IN CONTEMPORARY CULTURE, and the hegemony of the "entertainment industry" is playing a major role in the contemporary disenfranchisement of broad areas of human communities. Will the person going to a poetry reading looking to be entertained be DISAPPOINTED? In some cases I'd like to say "let's hope so--the poetry wasn't written to entertain." I don't mean that a poetry reading should be BORING--I mean that values other than entertainment are at stake, and the person at a poetry reading who's disappointed because they're not entertained is, perhaps unintentionally, imposing the values of capitalist entertainment hegemony on an art form that does not intend to be restrained by those values.

The idea that poetry "must move in this or that direction" certainly bears a great deal of responsibility for the modern notion of the poetry school, and "schools" of poetry are by no means a negative phenomena, since they can allow groups of similarly interested writers to form networks and communities that enable their writing to reach others in ways it otherwise wouldn't. The conviction that poetry "must" move a certain way can often be an incredibly generative basis for the creation of new work. "Schools" have their negative aspects also--the inevitable exclusion of certain "marginal" figures, however determined, being one of the most obvious, as well as the tendency to dismiss other "schools" of work without a full examination of their concerns. My own sense is that some "schools" do need to be at least critiqued, if not dismissed--I DO have a problem with neo-formalism in a way that Steven Marks perhaps does not. I agree with Joe Amato, though, that the writer who claims to be a "free player" (I'm not a member of anything but my own authentic practice!) probably is not recognizing the way group interaction has helped form his or her aesthetic. But the problem, again, of telling poets what they MUST do, or of dictating what poetry MUST be, is that poets seldom do what others tell them they must, and almost always what their own sense of their work tells them they "must," if one could put it that way.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

300. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco

fyi: transcendental dead

Mon 10 Feb 1997

Groundwater pools in the valley separating the ridge where Daniel Chester French "rests" from the rocky hill holding the rest of Hawthorne, the Thoreau family, Emerson and the Alcotts. William Ellery Channing has a newer headstone than the rest, but we forget who he is (was). The ice in that valley is thick enough to skate on. That would be disrespectful. And we have no skates with us.

[redacted]

↑ Index

301. Mark Wallace

Dlugos reading (fwd)

Mon 10 Feb 1997

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Mon, 10 Feb 1997 09:33:31 -0500 (EST)
From: MARTINA DARRAGH <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: Dlugos reading

ANNOUNCEMENT:

Ruthless Grip Art Project (1508 U Street, NW, Washington DC) will be the site of a book party and reading on March 8, 1997 at 7:30 PM, to celebrate the publication of Tim Dlugos' Powerless: Selected Poems 1973-1990 (London and New York: High Risk Press, 1996, 115 p.). Powerless was edited by David Trinidad and introduced by Dennis Cooper, two poets who acknowledge the influence of Dlugos' work and life on their own writing/lives and on that of a wide variety of writers and artists across the country. The poems in the collection are arranged chronologically in three sections: work published while he was alive (some of which was written while he lived in Washington, DC), poems from Strong Place (published in New York in 1992 by Amethyst Press, which ceased publishing/distributing books soon thereafter), and the manuscript he compiled shortly before his death from AIDS in 1990. This last section includes the poem "G-9", named for the wing devoted to caring for people with AIDS at St. Luke's - Roosevelt Hospital in New York City. A copy of "G-9" has been "enshrined" at that hospital as a special memorial, and has been anthologized widely. Dlugos, who for a time lived at a Christian Brother novitiate near Philadelphia, was studying to become an Episcopalian priest at the time of his death. As David Lehman said in a review of Powerless published in the Washington Post Book World last December, "[Dlugos] wrote with heartbreaking grace about his illness and impending death." This grace was the grounding of Tim's life as a whole, what Cooper calls in the introduction "his ravenous fascination with the innumerable ways in which grace could be represented through artfulness."

The evening will feature a reading of Dlugos' work by local poets and writers including Bernard Welt, Beth Joselow, Richard McCann, P. Inman, and Lynne Dreyer. Copies of Powerless will be available for purchase (checks preferred). There is no admission fee.

↑ Index

302. Miekal And
The tracts, Jennifer perusing invocation and projection
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Alan Jen Sondheim wrote:
>
> to explain to Poetics -

what category can anthologies stick you in alan?

why I send poems/texts to this list - a leg over & into > and that > *poetry is expensive.

trading works ifn you know the right people

> I haven't been able to buy such (I am not working > towards definition here) for years (sometimes 2nd-hand);

Do you have kids, Alan. Having kids & buying poetry dont go hand in hand. There's needs & then there's poetry.

> I stopped around > the time I found out I couldn't afford Susan Howe, who I read in >Segue's > stockroom (or Roof's).

Brother, do have a

> Nor am I published by any poetics/literary press, > not having contacts (which is a matter of the social, something I >> > fare > poorly at). So that here there is a loosening of literary > institutions,
> allowing a different/difficult form of dissemination.

Alan, we will publish you in a minute, but then maybe we arent a poetics/literary press either

> That there is no > forfeit on anyone's part in the reading/writing/deleting.

backspace. caution! remark?

> Which also depends on balance,

dogeared, rehearsed equiliberated

> the swerve of it.

arc is described by velocity

> A sensitivity.

reading thru reading

> And to the > current state of threading/weaving.

in hypertext, the word clicked on should dissolve/explode/fade into its destination

> So such writing is a flesh in the pan,

"I found my epik in the dumpster" not an old cowboy song not heard while riding a greyhound > not stance of noise/introjection, an other's way of mistressing theory.

here Alan, I hafta disaggree, refer to my hypertext POLYNOISE whose premise is that noise is the most unused resource on this planet & as such an abundant & necessary expanding edge

> Which is why I felt compelled

Which is why I felt comspellingly trilled

> (Jennifer)
>
> we should think of this, the _economics_ of reading;*

or me thinking of how many lifetimes Ive put into networking, writing letters, pasting stamps on envelopes, waiting in line at the post office, spending all my extra money for postage...

> nothing is free,
> nothing, in my world.

ya get out of it what ya put in to it

miekal

on the occasion of longtime friend & lover, Jennifer, visiting today.

--
@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

303. maria damon
Re: Prevallet address?
Mon 10 Feb 1997

---

i cant tell you kristen's address, but those of you who know her, please suggest to her that she become a member of the National Writers' Union. they handled a grievance case of mine that involved somewhat similar issues and they were exemplary in their helpfulness. i feel satisfied with the resolution i got from the publisher, who had (as you may recall) solicited an essay of mine for publcation, dropped the essay without tellng me, and lifted material from it for their (uncredited) backcover promotional material. maria d

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> anyone know how to reach Kristen Prevallet? i'm trying > to clear up the story about her work in Brenda Knight's > _Women of the Beat Generation_. the editor at conai
> press was most unhelpful.
>
> lbd
>

↑ Index

304. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Knight Matters
Mon 10 Feb 1997

LBD -- I'm told that Knight is not only a Conari author, but also an employee -- This may account for responses people get when they raise this issue with the press -- Finding that talks were underway to have her at San Jose State in the Fall (along with several people who write their own words), I made copies of the relevant texts and passed them along to El Supremo -- We'll see what transpires --

↑ Index

305. maria damon
Re: On the confusion of names
Mon 10 Feb 1997

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
> I can't vouch for the truth of what follows, but I did read it somewhere > once upon a time. It seems that until the mid-nineteenth century there were > no family names in Norway--everyone was Lief Ericsson or Eric Liefsson or > Jon Jonson (sorry about the spelling). The Norwegian powers that be declared > that everyone had to choose a last name--and everyone did (I think it was > male heads of households who decided)--they chose the names they already > went by. So there were an awful lot of Jonsons and Ericssons and Olsons.

..
as a halfDane i can vouch for this. my parents got a lot of humorous mileage out of an article in the Dentists' Journal of Denmark authored by Pedersen, Pedersen, Pedersen, Pedersen and Pedersen. as indicated, my cousins and relatives names are larsen, thomsen, frederiksen, rasmussen, etc.

My guess is that there are > Jewish families with copies of this document hanging over the fireplace, > unaware that it was lifted from some minor Junker noble whose family motto, > if translated from Latin or Gothic, probably means: Who'd you call Jewish?

i like this. i've often whondered what i'd find if i went to the mormon geneaological database; would they know that damon had been diamond and that consequently i have no related damons to my name? or would they hook me up with the mayflower damons?
>

↑ Index

306. David Israel
Re: Fwd: Internet Taxation
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Chapter 3 (or, post #3) re: internet-charge issues, from me --

#1 said, this is evidently a real issue,
#2 said, hmm, I'm told it's bogus; so,
the #3 say -- oops, looks like it is real.

(the mountain is a mountain ;
the mountain isn't a mountain;
the mountain is a mountain -- sorta ?)

Rec'd this today:

<<< Dina's recent alert about phone bills possibly going up in the future seems to have validity, despite another's reply that the report was a hoax.

Early this morning on C-Span I saw the delayed telecast of a speech made at the National Press Club on February 4. Robert Allen, CEO of AT&T was asked about all the phone traffic due to online time. He said that the telephone industry was looking at that, for it "doesn't make much sense" not to charge customers more than a just a flat rate if their phone line is open for hours. Some new rate structure based on usage seemed to be the only fair thing, he thought. "The industry is looking at that."

>>>

Also have noted Jackson Mac Low (via Rod Smith) & others on this ...

just to say, sorry (etc.) for confusion -- looks real after all.

d.i.

↑ Index

307. raea100900
Re: for db: initializing, establishing, and authentication
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Dear Rachel,

Sorry to send this message through the list, but I've tried to answer you twice and my "system" keeps telling me something on the order of "Don't go there!' It really said that Mail cannot be sent there" once. So anyway, just thanks for forwarding that post from Stephen Burt. Interesting.

Rae Armantrout

↑ Index

308. Charles Bernstein
List Service Problems
Mon 10 Feb 1997

The University at Buffalo mail server has not been operating this weekend due to a hardware failure of some sort and this has caused a disruption of the Poetics List mail.

↑ Index

309. Mark W Scroggins
Re: the future of an illusion
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Mark-- good comments there, on the whole, & thoughtful, tho I'm put off by a curious strain of neo-puritanism implicit in your dismissal of "entertainment" value in poetry readings--yes, there is plenty of entertainment out there wherever one turns, but I'm not convinced a human impulse to be entertained is necessarily a product of capitalism (tho certainly our culture's saturation in entertainment has something to do with late capitalism). How would you react were one to replace the word "entertainment" in your post with the word "pleasure"? I guess I'm just registering suspicion that we seem to be rejecting the fun half of Horace's pleasure & instruction. Best, Mark

↑ Index

310. David Kellogg
Rasula and poetry zones
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Pardon the lengthy description of my own work. I post this here because it is relevant to the discussion, and also because I'd like to hear from folks who object to my account, so as to strengthen it. So here goes:

Although I find Rasula's account of the four "zones" of poetry compelling, Joseph Lease and Forrest Gander rightly point to problems with zones as an operative category. Assigning particular poets to one or another zone is only one of these problems. There are always exceptions, such as Lauterbach and Gander himself, and the New Formalism seems, as Lease pointed out, a blip on the poetic horizon, fast becoming (if it hasn't already become) insignificant.

Rasula has his finger on something important, however. In my own work-in-progress on the poetic field (for an abstract, see "http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/sri.html"), I conceive these zones as abstractions, POLES OF VALUE within the contemporary construction of poetic practice. (This work is obviously indebted to Pierre Bourdieu in ways that I don't have time to explain right now.) What Rasula identifies as the MFA school corresponds more or less to a poetry predicated on uncomplicated representations of Self. Against this obviously is the poetry of social conflict, community building, identity politics, etc. Call the struggle between these two poles the horizontal (social) axis of the poetic field. Appeal to one or another of these sources of value has little to do with form as such. What I call the formal, or "vertical" axis of the poetic field comprises both NF and LP, but without naming them. While the New Formalism is fading fast, the appeal to "tradition" still operates within a lot of contemporary poetry, even language poetry as it becomes canonically interesting. (I am speaking sociologically; I don't mean "interesting" as an evaluative comment.) Against the appeal to "tradition" one could place an appeal to "innovation." So that the contemporary poetic field looks more or less like this:

```
                TRADITION
        ---------------------------------------
        |                                     |
```

```
      |                          |
SELF  |       [the poetic field]       |  COMMUNITY
      |                          |
      |                          |
      -------------------------------------
                 INNOVATION
```

It seems to me that this kind of a model is more flexible than a model which operates in terms of "zones" or "schools." As New Formalism fades, the appeal to tradition is still operative. As language poetry becomes (to paraphrase Ron Silliman) more of a moment than a movement, other possibilities begin to inhabit the arena close to innovation. Obviously much language poetry would still be placed close to the "innovation" pole, but individual poets' work could be read at various places within the field. Moreover, poets might _move_, or be moved, as the vicissitudes of canonization affect perception and reading. (Charles Bernstein's work seems a lot more "traditional" now -- what with various historical accounts of language poetry by Beach, Perelman, etc., and what with the recovery of Stein and Zukofsky, and _The Tennis Court Oath_ for a broader audience in various critical accounts -- than he did in, say, 1980. Also, Bernstein's own criticism has helped create the traditional context for his work.) One could also place individual poems, "schools" (Iowa, Brown, Buffalo), and institutions at various points within the field.

Well, whaddaya think? Does this account via poles of value escape some of the problematics of the zone/school?

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

In case anyone's interested in how the avant-garde is faring around the political Web, there's an article on Gertrude Stein as a Republican in the latest issue of SLATE, Bill Gates's vanity press. Slate is at "http://www.slate.com/".

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

5. _Little Men_ by Kevin Killian, Hard Press, $12. "Kevin Killian writes like a bent angel who wants to inflict pleasure and delection." --Robert Gluck

6. _The Gertrude Stein Awards in Innovative American Poetry: 1994-1995_ ed. Douglas Messerli, Sun & Moon, $14.95. As good or better than the last volume in this series. Too many names to list, you know a lot of them.

7. _Black Chant: Languages of African-American Postmodernism_ by Aldon Lynn Nielsen, Cambridge, $18.95. "Aldon Nielsen's knowledgeable, pathbreaking study brings long overdue attention to avant-garde work in African-American poetics during the post-World War II period. . ." --Nathaniel Mackey

8. _October 79: Guy Debord and the Internationale situationniste: A Special Issue_, Thomas F. McDonough ed., $10. Articles by Mc Donough, Clark and Nicholson-Smith, Gilman, Kaufman, interview with Henri Lefebvre on the Situationists by Kristin Ross, and "Situationist Texts on Visual Culture and Urbanism: A Selection." "We require adventure."

9. _Machine Art and Other Writings: The Lost Thought of the Italian Years_ by Ezra Pound, ed. Maria Luisa Ardizzone, Duke, $16.95. Previously unpublished and rare writings from the late 20s to the early 40s. "I am not sure that people understand even here how the mechanism works or wrecks to best advantage."

10. _The Lack (love poems, targets, flags . . .)_ by Rod Smith, Abacus #104, $4.

11._History or Messages from History_ by Gertrude Stein, Green Integer, $5.95. "They were quietly expectant but a little irritable."

Poetics folks receive free shipping on orders of more than $20. Free shipping + 10% discount on orders of more than $30. There are two ways to order. 1. E-mail your order to [redacted] with your address & we will bill you with the books. or 2. via credit card-- you may call us at [redacted] or e-mail [redacted] w/ yr add, order, & card # & we will send a receipt with the books. We must charge some shipping for orders out of the US.

Bridge Street Books, 2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW, Wahsington, DC 20007.

↑ Index

313. Henry Gould

Re: the future of an illusion

Mon 10 Feb 1997

Bravo, Mark. The "techne", as Wendy called it, is changing all the time, but techne is not the thing. I am reminded of Proust's musings (or his character's) at the end of _Recherche du Temps_ (c'mon folks, you can read that far too - follow me!). We are all immersed in a much deeper "techne" - Time itself and the desolations/voids/returns that Time brings. Proust's narrator declares that he finds his writerly vocation and the creation of his gigantic Oeuvre in a particular effect of time: the sudden, unsought-for juxtaposition of an ordinary present sensation with a SIMILAR sensation (not the same, but similar, echoing) from the ancient past, which brings memory to life & restores the actual "feel" of time & existence. And that this perception is an aesthetic phenomenon: it's not ordinary life now or then, but the conjunction of the 2, a new amalgam; which he links overtly both to the workings of metaphor in poetry and to the workings of the thinking mind in general (finding similarities between disparate things). He talks about the aesthetes or "artists in embryo" as those who overvalue the art work per se and remain on the surface of OTHER's work, rather than immersing themselves in the realities of their own experience & making something new and fruitful. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

314. Christopher Alexander
Re: Names are not Objects
Mon 10 Feb 1997

---

linda russo wrtes:
> i have an uncle yosh

you also have an uncle shiny & an uncle bougie.
not sure about the spelling.

my granny's name (mother's side) is mavis collins was mavis hawin before marriage; her sister's first & middle name are madeline rivers. I'm told that their mother always chose names from the novel she was reading at the time--not unlike the way some of my poems are made. its probably just as well that none of them knows what novel their name comes from--they were probably terrible.

I used to have an aunt aida.

c.
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

"Philosophy is intellectual order, which neither religion nor common sense can be. It is to be observed that religion & common sense do not coincide either, but that religion is an element of fragmented common sense. Moreover common sense is a collective noun, like religion: there is not just one common sense, for that too is a product of history & a part of the historical process. Philosophy is criticism & the superseding of religion & 'common sense'. In this sense it coincides with 'good' as opposed to 'common' sense."

Gramsci

↑ Index

315. Christopher Alexander
Re: poetry "schools"
Mon 10 Feb 1997

---

forrest gander wrote:
> At the same time, of course, I too want to see more representation in > bookstores. Representation comes through distribution.

as would I. but all of this, of course, assumes that bookstores want to represent the poetry that falls into whatever categories you (anyone) choose(s)--something I'd like to believe but--. if poetry sections are, as they are, increasingly small & usually written off as a loss even when they focus on the writers showcased by 'mainstream' literary publications, well--.

of course much of this has to do with us & our buying habits--a topic that's been discussed here before.

> Even the notion of supporting publishing houses seems less constrictive than that of supporting "schools."

it's a possibility that hadn't occurred to me, but it does seem like it might be a worthwhile thing--to represent smaller presses by turns rather than try to carve poetry into recognizable sections [flank, head, buttocks]. after all, once the books are on the shelves of most bookstores, theyre arranged alphabetically anyway.

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

316. henry g
email query (Baratier)
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Dave Baratier, are a you listenin? Otherwise - could some please BACKCHANNEL his email address to me? Thanks - [redacted]

↑ Index

317. amato
Re: the future of an illusion
Mon 10 Feb 1997

---

i've got to agree with mark wallace's last post on must-ing in poetry...

the problem, or controversy, stems from those who are feeling persistently neglected in specific circles... and what to do about such neglect, assuming for a moment that it's real...

which goes to the question of "schools" of poetry... i think joseph lease is quite correct in pointing to the fluidity of zones... marketing zones, not aesthetic zones -- as wendy battin indicates... but we all know, right?, how distribution, publication, marketing can back-pressure aesthetics... and in some crucial aspects, these zones are not esp. fluid...

to take but one example: until andrew levy's appearance here at iit, where i teach, in 1992 (which coincided with my arrival as well), no undergrad. at iit had been exposed to much if anything in the way of contemporary poetry for a good long time... certainly nothing that would constitute zones 3 or 4 of rasula's analysis, and certainly nothing from these zones could even have seeped in accidentally, not to say, programmatically, things here were that stuffy... and things at K-12 are undoubtedly stuffier... of course we don't have any english majors here at iit any longer (had about a half-dozen then maybe)... but the point is that i don't gauge the pertinence of "schools" with whether they correspond to mfa programs -- that is, "schools of poetry" do not necessarily correlate with "grad. schools of poetry" (many of which i suspect are gradually getting the picture, if only in retrospect, and many of which seem to me to be set up to house perhaps two competing "camps," if that)... one would still have to contend with the status of "craft" in creative writing classrooms in general, and how this is supported by and supports most popularly renowned writing and writing venues (and note that the upcoming u of denver conference is constructed in a crucial way around this notion of "craft" -- i'll be speaking there to this question by addressing "craft" in somewhat unorthodox terms)...

anyway... of course the aesthetic reality is much more diverse and messy than ANY notion of "zone" or "school" might suggest... but the problem -- if there's a problem here, and i think there is--- has primarily to do with how zones and schools play out in the marketplace, in our institutions... which, again, is why i make the case that, whatever the requisite autonomy or solitude of a writer's art, once that art enters into the social world, a somewhat different perspective is necessary to understand what's going on in practical terms... that is, unless one is willing to hallucinate about the social sphere, i think one MUST accept this---ergo something like the paradox that mark unpacks, but here a function of critical position as opposed to aesthetic production... it may be that this is the proviso lurking in the difference between such practices...

best,

joe

↑ Index

318. DS
Re: Names are not Objects
Mon 10 Feb 1997

I just say as in fish. (Don't know why people always laugh)

Dan Salmon

> whenever anyone has difficulty spelling my name, I point at my chin and say "mnemonic device".

↑ Index

319. DS
Re: Bandit Queen
Mon 10 Feb 1997

There is a particularly reprehensible >scene in the film "Strange Days" where a rapist wears a device which >allows him to experience the emotions of whomever he hooks it up to. He >proceeds to enter a woman's apartment, sedate her with a taser, rape >and strangle her while experienceing her own experience of this >vicariously. The whole scene is shot from his perspective, and is >relentlessly, nauseatingly vicious-- I think >you could even see the outline of his facemask around the edges of the >frame. In essence, the viewer is forced to assume the viewpoint of >the rapist--to BECOME the rapist, and >either to accept tacitly the act, or, short of leaving the movie, fight >against this positioning, which I did by looking away. The scene is >completely unsympathetic to the woman and clearly pruriently sadistic in its >intention.

I largely agree, but have to wonder whether it is perhaps a good thing that 'we' as audience had to turn away. At least for once we were shocked and horrified by a cinema rape.

And Strange Days, one of the few by a woman.

Dan

↑ Index

320. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: Names are not Objects
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Jennifer named me "Alan" after "Alwyn" supposed Welsh heritage.

Alan (Jennifer)

↑ Index

321. Charles Alexander
Re: ero-text
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Miekal -- this is a Meow Press publication. You should be able to contact Meow at [redacted]

charles

At 11:58 AM 2/8/97 +0100, you wrote: >While at Maria Professorina's house amid her massive library (including >piles of books by many people on this list) I came a cross a hot little >erotic collaboration between Bob Harrison & Dodie Bellamy. Titillating >at least, Id like to see if there was a way of getting ahold of it, >(title & publisher have slipped my mind, but Ive retained some of the >graphic text, no surprise!). In particular Id like to see if I could >trade a copy of Lyx's & my 1982 collaboration EROTIC LOGIC, which is >similar in spirit tho perhaps more languagey.
>
>have safe eroticatalia,
>
>mr miekal
>
>

↑ Index

322. Sylvester Pollet
Re: the future of an illusion
Mon 10 Feb 1997

I'll throw this into the mix--it's a quote from Matthew Sweney, who's been working with Petr Mikes at Votobia Publishers in the Czech Republic:

"Poetry [in the C.R.] doesn't sell now because it's no longer controversial. Everyone was writing and buying poetry before because it was illegal, a sort of rebellious act, but now that Socialism is gone, poetry has lost its attraction. People watch Schwarzenegger videos on their new VCRs instead."

↑ Index

323. Matthias Regan

Reper-mim ail car ges (in 2 parts)

Mon 10 Feb 1997

> This is automated

message

response

>Thanks for time to write. taking for We have established informal usage of the public switched teleph one network

Internet access and information servic e providers.

this subject >your input. This mailbox

> We appreciateis th point of contact f

> cominformal e-mailments on you do not need

send copies of you this proceeding, so in the future!

("Philosophy is intellectual this proceeding, soeither religion nothis proceeding, sor common sense s to be observed that religion & common sense do not coin >either, but that religcide ion is an element of fragmented common .

Moreover common sense
sense is common a collective noun, like :
there is not just one oo is a pro-tory & a parreligiont of the hist >proceoricalss. Philosophy is & the superseding of religion & 'common . In this sense it coincidesense's with 'good'

as opposed to 'common'.)

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

324. charssmith
Re: Amiri Baraka
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Did anyone in the aBay Area catch baraka when he recently performed at Koncepts w/ Charles Mingus' grandson?

↑ Index

325. charssmith
Re: for db: initializing, establishing, and authentication
Mon 10 Feb 1997

In a message dated 97-02-06 18:05:41 EST, you write:

<< Authentication. To do with computer security ---- is Mr. DB at the end of the line really Mr. DB, or some other sinister influence? How would the system know? How would we ever know? The protocol for authentication usually involves exchange of protected/encrypted data, such as passwords. >>

Does David know? What's your password David?

Are you sure it's yours?

↑ Index

326. Matthias Regan

Remin e charge: per-mail (Part III)

Mon 10 Feb 1997

Dear C.

What I'm suggesting is a sort of e-mail exquisite corpse. I've seen as I expect you have those ones some websites have tried to initiate, and they are IMO by and large godawful. They operate like normal e-corpses, with each person adding on to what was. But I would suggest that this wordprocessing technology is geared to delete, not add, and so that aspect of the technology should be employed as well: namely, the proper e-corpse would involve each person both adding text and deleting the pre-existent text. We would have to develop a technique by which a certain portion of the "message" could be changed everytime, but some ever-growing part of it could not be changed. My reasoning for this being that if changes could always be made to the entire text, then the movement toward a settled and monologic voice would be more likely than if, as in the paper corpses, some part had to be left untouched every time. I just sent you a rewriting of your message to poetics using my new technique (new for me) that works only on a computer: working quickly through a piece of text with the cursor, cutting and pasting, but never adding and only occasionally deleting. (I deleting too much in my last one.) I originally tried this on paper a couple years ago by cutting up articles from NY times stories and than rearranging them. I like working with an obviously limited vocabularly since we all do anyway.

I still have not finished your long and eloquent messages to me. I am impressed with your research. I will send some responses when I can. Do you want me to send you that paperback book thing?

I just recieved an e-mail from Jenny M. She is a full professor at the city college she was working at before and makes an annual salary and seems fairly committed for the time being and quite happy. She is continually biking and preparing for the next AIDS ride next summer. Perhaps you knew all this!

love,

M (onday)

"Automated Response"

>This is an automated response to the message Bravo,

The "techne", [illegible], is changing time, but techne is not the thing. I usings (or his [illegible] at the end (c'mon folks, you can read

We are all immersed in a much deeper
"techne" -

Timeam reminded of Proust's m itself desolations/voids/returns [illegible] that Time brings.

Proust's narrator

he finds

his writerly

and the creation [illegible] a SIMILAR sensation (not the same, but similar, from the [illegible] ancient past, wechoing) brings memof his gigantic Oeuvof

in a particular effect of time:

unsought-for juxtarethe [illegible] sudden,position of an ordinary present sensation withory tthat far too [illegible] - follow me!). o life

the [illegible] sudden, existence. And that far too - follow me!).

that this perception is an aesthetic phenomenon: it's not ordinary life now or then, but the [illegible] sudden,the conjr taking time [illegible] write.

We have established. information

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

327. Douglas
Re: Seeing Eye Books
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Dear Friends,

I'm happy to tell you of the wonderful new publishing venture by Guy Bennett, Sun & Moon Press's typographer and (often) translator.

Guy is beginning his own venture (while remaining at Sun & Moon) called Seeing Eye Books

Seeing Eye Books is pleased to announce a new chapbook series dedicated to contemporary American international poetry. Four titles will be published each year, including original work by both new and established writers as well as translators.
In 1997 we feature the poetry of Lyn Hejinian, Mohammed Dib (Grand Prix de la Francophonie de l'Académie Francaise, 1994), Joe Ross, and Catriona Strang.
This series is available BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.
for $25.00 made out to Guy Bennett, 12011 Rochester Avenue #9, Los Angeles, CA 90025. Please indicate a shipping address if different than that on the check;
the cost of shipping is included. You will receive the first book in March 1997, the others will follow at three month intervals.

Please remember, this series is by subscription only.

Douglas Messerli

↑ Index

328. Matthias Regan
Apology! (Read me before you read the other messages from Matthias Regan!)
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Dear List: Sorry for the two previous messages (titled: "Reper-mim ail car ges (in 2 parts)" and "Remin e charge: per-mail (Part III)") from me which were intended for a member of the list, not for the entire list!

Its ok if you read them (as though there were a choice!) but I think you won't be so interested in what certain subjects of the message are up to as C. and I would be.

Sorry for the confusion, chaos, etc!

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

329. Sylvester Pollet
Message ("The distribution of your message dated Mon, 10...")
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Charles/Loss, is it time to raise the bridge? Or lower the bridge? What's the limit to the 21st Century? What's the price of a Buffalo nickel?

> Date: Mon, 10 Feb 1997 15:25:43 -0500
> From: "L-Soft list server at University at Buffalo (1.8c)"
> <[redacted]>
> Subject: Message ("The distribution of your message dated Mon, 10...")
> To: [redacted]
>
> The distribution of your message dated Mon, 10 Feb 1997 15:29:56 -0500 with subject "Re: the future of an illusion" has been postponed because the daily message limit for the POETICS list (50) has been exceeded. No action is required from you; your message will be reprocessed automatically once the list owner releases the list.

↑ Index

330. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Provoking the stretch
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Tom Beard (& others): the original LangPo label (in all its permutations: language writing etc.) was really initially a tactic, used by a loose group, to call attention to certain things...It's still useful, in reference to that group. Nobody's gonna come along & forcibly conscript you into the language army!

Mark P.
Atlanta

↑ Index

331. Mark Roberts

AWOL: OVERLAND 145 (fwd)

Mon 10 Feb 1997

>Date: Tue, 11 Feb 1997 06:39:52 +1000
>To: [redacted]
>From: [redacted] (AWOL)
>Subject: AWOL: OVERLAND 145
>
>OVERLAND 145 is available now from the AWOL Virtual Bookshop.
>
>Poetry by Bruce Dawe, john malone, Marguerite Varday, Emma Lew, Michael >Crane, Libby Robin, Phil Ilton, Clive Faust, Graham Rowlands, Jean Thorton >& Kieran Carrol. Anthony Weare on Port Arthur, Brian Matthews on the >Millennium, Julie Lewis on Mary Martin's Bookshop. Plus fiction, the usual >high quality OVERLAND reviews and much much more.
>
>If your favourite bookshop does not stock OVERLAND tell them to contact >AWOL and order you a copy. Or order it yourself through AWOL's Virtual >Bookshop. Simply hit the return button on your email program (if you >received this post through Auslit or another list make sure you send the post to >[redacted] and not back to the list). We will send you an invoice >for $8 plus $1 postage. You mail your payment to AWOL, together with your >postal address and OVERLAND could be in your mailbox within a few days.
>
>And don't forget to visit our website and check out the other magazines >available through our Virtual Bookshop.
>
>
>
>
>AWOL
>Australian Writing On Line
>[redacted]
>http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
>PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
>Phone 61 2 7475667, Mobile 015063970
>Fax 61 2 7472802
>
>
>

>
Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
& User Representative SIS Team.
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
Phone 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax (02) 9351 7711

↑ Index

332. Joe Safdie
Re: notley/epic
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Re:

"is that how you know when an epic's over?"

If an epic is a poem including history, then it's only over

(let alone "Do not move / let the wind speak / that is paradise")

when history is

and that ain't now, Francis

Has anyone read (by the way) Harold Bloom's new book _Omens of Millenium_? I found it a pretty good read, some valuable information on gnosticism, which isn't exactly "spirit possession," but close.

Joe

↑ Index

333. Christopher Alexander
Re: notley/epic
Mon 10 Feb 1997

> is that how you know when an epic's over?
I think its when they sailed off again or something.

no, no--its when we no longer have enough of a cultural consensus to have one voice speaking for us. funny, that's what I've always heard about the epic genre, or anyway why we can no longer have epic. but it sounds sort of silly to me now.
I mean--did the ancient greeks or the romans really have that kind of social accord. unlikely. reminds me of brecht talking with benjamin about socialist realism:

"if they write a poem without the word Stalin in it, its taken as deliberate."

hmph. chris.
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

334. Pam Brown
(no subject)
Mon 10 Feb 1997

Hello Poets...
Can anyone help Damien Broderick in Australia with this query ?

I recently asked after the credentials of somebody I'm currently reviewing, and got back this interesting reply:

`My doctorate is from LeSalle University in Mandeville, LA. It is not a conventional doctorate, and I did not take three years of my life to attend a resident course of study. LeSalle is an extension university that is acredsited by the state of Lousiana. My doctorate is in Education Administration; my dissertation titled: "The Theory of Multiple Intelligences: Understanding Diversity in Education." I did not simply buy my degree--believe it or not, I had to work for it. I apologize if I sould a bit synical, I don't mean to be.'

Alta Vista didn't help. Anyone know if this is an arm of the Bob Jones Center for Advanced Creation Studies or the Pizza Hut University, or is it a rooly truly degree joint like all of us synical people went to?

Feel free to email me direct rather than bother the list any further...

Damien

Dr Damien Broderick / Associate, Dept. English and Cultural Studies University of Melbourne, Parkville 3052, AUSTRALIA
@: [redacted]
bio/biblio: http://www.vicnet.net.au/~ozlit/broderic.html

Can you email him directly please.
Thanks Pam Brown

↑ Index

335. Wendy Battin
Re: Rasula and poetry zones
Mon 10 Feb 1997

On Mon, 10 Feb 1997, David Kellogg wrote:
> What Rasula identifies as the MFA
> school corresponds more or less to a poetry predicated on uncomplicated > representations of Self. Against this obviously is the poetry of social > conflict, community building, identity politics, etc.

David, could you say what's "obvious" about this? I'd have thought there were other alternatives to "uncomplicated representations of Self" (complicated ones? nonrepresentational ones? zen observation?) that don't partake very directly of identity politics.

Wendy

↑ Index

336. maria damon
Re: Names are not Objects
Mon 10 Feb 1997

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> this is Elizabeth Was here making my first (official?) appearance on > this list, ...

hi lyx. you missed an exciting show last wednesday (one grad student referred to it as "electrifying"; a faculty member's words were "way hot!"), but i'm sure you've seen it before.

give me some feedback.

on yr name(s)? sounds like fun to me. I like lyx ish, but why is it more jewish than lyx was?

what more secrets shall i tell the lot of you?
anything you want.

ah, no more, there are personas of mine i'm afraid you'll never appelle.

oh you tease! and furthermore, how do you know? another coupla posts and you may be dying to tell us something you could never have predicted wanting to share with us. we're a fun bunch, not to be underestimated.

xo, md

↑ Index

337. Herb Levy
Suspended Music (shameless plug)
Mon 10 Feb 1997

This is a little longer than most of these announcements run, but I thought the non-poetic content might need some context. Hope to see some of you at the CD release parties:

Announcing the release of the first CD on my new label Periplum, Suspended Music - Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument, presenting first recordings of new music for these combined ensembles, composed by Pauline Oliveros and Ellen Fullman.

Some of you may be familiar with Deep Listening Band (a collaborative ensemble with Pauline Oliveros, Stuart Dempster, and David Gamper) from their recordings made in unusual acoustic spaces, including a cistern on the Olympic Peninsula with 45 seconds of natural reverberation. Some of you may be familiar with other, earlier projects by Oliveros and/or Dempster, who have a long history of new music activities together and separately.

Fewer folks are probably familiar with Ellen Fullman and her Long String Instrument. Since the mid-1980s, Fullman has been refining this instrument and composing music for it. The current incarnation of the instrument is a little less than 100 feet long, with several courses of piano wire (between 60-80 strings in all) strung about waist-high. It's played by walking along the strings and rubbing them longitudinally, rather than plucking or bowing the strings across their length. It sounds great, and not like anything you've ever heard before.

I'm making a special introductory offer to members of this e-mail discussion list: until March 1st, the semi-official release date of Suspended Music, you can order the CD for US$15 including tax & shipping from:

Periplum
P O Box 95678
Seattle, WA 98145

It'll be about $16-17 in stores (& it will be in stores eventually, now that the disc is in hand, I'm spending the next month or so trying to find distribution. There's nothing like SPD for new music, so this is a real adventure).

E-mail responses are welcome, but PLEASE respond back channel, rather than to the whole list.

The CD will also be available on line from Deep Listening Catalog:

<http://www.deeplistening.org/dlc>

(They have other recordings, scores, etc. available there as well.)

&, hey, if you want to help celebrate the release of the CD, choose from one of these four new release parties:

February 22, 1997 4-7 pm

The Candy Factory
1513 Manor Road
Austin, TX

March 10, 1997 4-7 pm

Speakeasy Cafe
2314 2nd Avenue
Seattle, WA 98121

March 14, 1997 5-7 pm

The Gallery at Deep Listening Space
74 Broadway
Kingston, NY 12401

March 15, 1997 4-7 pm

Roulette
228 West Broadway, 2nd Floor
New York, NY 10013

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

338. KYLE CONNER/LRC-CAHS
Re: Provoking the stretch
Mon 10 Feb 1997

---

on Feb. 7 Miekal And wrote: "so maybe my point isnt to question all the categories that have been carved out but to wonder out loud if all of us bright, creative, fuzzy people cant continuously invent ways to interact with the corpus of literature that defy, detourne, confuse & interbreed the will to commodify genre consciousness."

Miekal, I'm curious to hear more about this. I understand what you propose here, but wouldn't it work against the dissemination (through major marketers, at least) of work because of resistance to genre-labelling that same marketers (and consumers?) demand? i.e, would grunge music be near as big if not for the commercialization and mass identification/appeal of the term "grunge" (I guess your investment in my example depends on your opinion as to the importance & enriching of the world by grunge music- grunge-enriched? is that a soil type?) Then again, maybe this wouldn't have been a bad thing. It would have saved us from all the rip-off bands and allowed the true/original music to continue without being exploited. But then again, if something's good, shouldn't it (deserve to) be exposed to as many people as possible? I really like your idea in theory, Miekal, but it seems to get murky when you apply to real (market) situation. Maybe I've become too jaded to believe that something as huge as the literary corpus can be detourned or interbreeded. Why do we have to play with them anyway? Ideally, we'd all be selfless poets who could be happy enriching the lives of our immediate community-those we know and care about, our town/city- and this interbreeding and networking would eventually intervine its way through the whole world-- or would it?--spreading the fruits of our hard work and hard-won humanity to people of all plces and cultures? is that what we want anyway? would the whole world be better or not without the mass production of Frost, and, hence, Frost? Do we have to sacrifice global communing/ication of poetry/culture for a closely networked community of readers and creators? What does the poet want as opposed to what the market wants and should the poet care? I've reached the end of my moebius trip...Maybe Charles Bernstein could step in and reiterate his idea in_a poetics_ about poetic communities learning how to communicate amongst themselves before they begin communicating interculturally? (The computer seems to play into this somehow...)

Kyle Conner

↑ Index

339. George Bowering
Re: Clothes Make the Man
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Herb Levy (often seen on 5th and Seneca in Seattle in jodhpurs) reminded me of a trip I took to NYC in 1970, to hear Pharoah Sanders at Slugs's Bar. I thought I would just wear my regular clothes, so I wd appear hip and not get mugged. So I wore

a toque (Canadian for knitted cap)
a shirt made of some viscous material in green and black stripes
a maroon sweater knitted by my mother
a serge cape once worn by a City Of Westminster police constable yellow jeans
logging boots
big knitted red socks
electricians gloves (you know, stripes of grey, red and blue long stringy hair

a moustache
dark glasses
a cheapo cigar with a plastic tip

I didnt get mugged. Not even an offer. Not even in front of Peace Eye Books.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

340. IMBURGIA
Re: new Adorno, Bernstein, Killian, Nielsen etc. @ B St
Tue 11 Feb 1997

YES, i want, no, i am compelled to buy the boundary 2 V.23 #3, and, = hmmm... need something for $8 to get that free shipping, how about "soft = subversions" by guattari. send em out quick as damn skippy and i will = pay if costs more. thanks,=20

dan imburgia 2416 sanctuary lane
langley wash. 98260

More of what's new at Bridge Street. Ordering instructions at the end of = the list.

1. _Aesthetic Theory_ by Theodor W. Adorno, newly translated by Robert Hullot-Kentor, U Minnesota, $39.95.
Woop, de it is. "That old and silly cabaret phrase, 'Love, it's so = erotic' provokes the variation: 'Art, it's so aesthetic': this is to be taken = with deep seriousness as a momento of what has been repressed by its = consumption."

2. _Boundary 2 V. 23 #3_ featuring "Charles Bernstein: A Dossier," Duke, = $12. 70 pages from Mr B: "Selected Poetry," "An Autobiographical Interview" conducted by Loss Glazier, a conversation "On Poetry, Language, and Teaching," & those fabulous "Experiments." Lots else here from others including Retamar's "The Enormity of Cuba," & new translations of Ho Chi = Minh by Steve Bradbury. Get your dossier while it's hot.

3. _Electronic Civil Disobedience and Other Unpopular Ideas_, Critical = Art Ensemble, Autonomedia New Autonomy Series, $8. "While the US may have = some pockets of what could be called community, such a social phenomenon is extremely limited. As with public space it must be asked: What = community!?"

4. _Soft Subversions_ by Felix Guattari, Semiotext(e) Foreign Agents = Series,
$8. "Destiny is not inscribed in an infrastructure."

5. _Little Men_ by Kevin Killian, Hard Press, $12. "Kevin Killian writes = like a bent angel who wants to inflict pleasure and delection." --Robert = Gluck

6. _The Gertrude Stein Awards in Innovative American Poetry: 1994-1995_ = ed.
Douglas Messerli, Sun & Moon, $14.95. As good or better than the last = volume in this series. Too many names to list, you know a lot of them.

7. _Black Chant: Languages of African-American Postmodernism_ by Aldon = Lynn Nielsen, Cambridge, $18.95. "Aldon Nielsen's knowledgeable, pathbreaking study brings long overdue attention to avant-garde work in African-American poetics during the post-World War II period. . ." --Nathaniel Mackey

8. _October 79: Guy Debord and the Internationale situationniste: A = Special Issue_, Thomas F. McDonough ed., $10. Articles by Mc Donough, Clark and Nicholson-Smith, Gilman, Kaufman, interview with Henri Lefebvre on the Situationists by Kristin Ross, and "Situationist Texts on Visual Culture = and Urbanism: A Selection." "We require adventure."

9. _Machine Art and Other Writings: The Lost Thought of the Italian = Years_ by Ezra Pound, ed. Maria Luisa Ardizzone, Duke, $16.95. Previously = unpublished and rare writings from the late 20s to the early 40s. "I am not sure = that people understand even here how the mechanism works or wrecks to best advantage."

10. _The Lack (love poems, targets, flags . . .)_ by Rod Smith, Abacus = #104,
$4.

11._History or Messages from History_ by Gertrude Stein, Green Integer, $5.95. "They were quietly expectant but a little irritable."

Poetics folks receive free shipping on orders of more than $20. Free = shipping + 10% discount on orders of more than $30. There are two ways to order. 1. E-mail your order to [redacted] with your address & we will = bill you with the books. or 2. via credit card-- you may call us at 202 965 = 5200 or e-mail [redacted] w/ yr add, order, & card # & we will send a receipt with the books. We must charge some shipping for orders out of = the US.

Bridge Street Books, 2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW, Wahsington, DC 20007.

AAAAx88=

↑ Index

341. KENT JOHNSON
NOISE news #2 (fwd)
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Thought I'd forward this to list. Sondheim (tho I know nothing at all about him/her) is involved in creating all kinds of interesting stuff on the Fiction of Philosophy list. Kent

------- Forwarded Message Follows -------

Date sent: Tue, 11 Feb 1997 13:34:55 -0500
Send reply to: FOP-L <[redacted]>
From: Alan Jen Sondheim <[redacted]>
Subject: NOISE news #2 (fwd)
Originally to: Cyb <[redacted]>
To: Multiple recipients of list FOP-L <[redacted]>

```
@@@  @@@   @@@@@@@   @@@   @@@@@@@   @@@@@@@@@
@@@@ @@@  @@@@@@@@@  @@@  @@@@@@@@
@@@@@@@@@
@@!@!@@@  @@!  @@@  @@!  !@@      @@!
!@!!@!@!  !@!  @!@  !@!  !@!      !@!
@!@ !!@!  @!@  !@!  !!@  !!@@!!    @!!!:!
!@!  !!!  !@!  !!!  !!!   !!@!!!   !!!!!:
!!:  !!!  !!:  !!!  !!:      !:!  !!:
:!:  !:!  :!:  !:!  :!:     !:!   :!:
 ::   ::  ::::: ::   ::  :::: ::    :: ::::
::    :   : :  :   :    :: : :    : :: ::
```

"The bit of noise, the small random element, transforms one system or one order into another."

You may remember that all perforations 'issues' are now ongoing sites of activity.

New additions include:

in P12--
*Severed Head / Great Skull Zero
*Fractured Mirrors / A. Sondheim
*ART ORIENTE objet (AOo): biotechnology in the gallery / J. Nechvatal

in p11--
*The Learning Curve/D. Cole

!!!

He thought in terms of one of his favorite--let's call it Foucaultian--stories of the Victorians, being collectors generally and plant fanciers especially, bringing in tons of orchids around the turn of the century. Not knowing all of their requirements but thinking: orchids--> tropics---> hot-----> monus ponens, bony marony, good for plants! Especially when they flowered profusely in their hothouses (ie, greenhouse), stoked to the max, the plants trying desperately to reproduce themselves (and the victorians thinking Ahh! Success! Flowers!) --- before they died en mass in due course, all orchids in fact not having the same requirements. A form of 'reproductive confessional' if you will. Perhaps you catch my drift, genetic and otherwise.

So, pick your target: fetish, s/m, dna, hetero, homo, repro, sublimation, consumation, conflagration, the gaze, the Look, the lock, the haves, the have-nots, the cunts, the cocks, teledildonics, Freud, fraud, fried, freak, implant-love, border-crossers, cross-dressers, sex-changers, chicken-sexers (can't tell'm apart -- chickens that is-- w/o yer manual), celebates, cerebrates, celebrant swinger/orgy/baccanaliasts, one-handers, lonely-hearts, no-hearts, mechanical hearts, (oops, no sex there! hmm....), cyber-sexo-tekno-oedipo-shmedipo, elektric, tantroid, latex-dipped, mutant futur-phreaks--- you tell us. You know where we are, you know what we do. Help allay our confusion or: confuse us even more. We await your orchid.

****

As always, new and inovative approaches to the arrangement of knowledge/information welcomed.

http://www.pd.org

general information: [redacted]

p e r f o r a t i o n s: [redacted]

Public Domain, Inc./perforations
POB 8899
Atlanta, GA
30306-0899

↑ Index

342. Miekal And illusion futures exchange
Tue 11 Feb 1997

[redacted] wrote:

> *the problem, or controversy, stems from those who are feeling persistently neglected in specific circles... and what to do about such neglect, assuming for a moment that it's real...*

from my vantage point, perched here on the verdant edge of institutionalia, Im personally less concerned about the practices & intellect informing the consumers & the commidifers of poetry & have been more participant in the endlessly unfolding social sphere amid the actions of poetry itself, writing, publishing, NETWORKING, trying to be moderately responsible for helping to distribute a tiny segment of others in my networks who are working in similar streams. with editing xexoxial editions we have tried to purposefully chose each title as if it represented its own territory, its own category & put it along side of something that may seem contradictory in context, for instance where does the work of Bruce Andrews intersect the work of Bern Porter. in writing our way forward toward less stringent collectivity, these threads & pathways should be hyperwebs threading themselves in & out of every possibility. so for me, even david kellog's diagram of the virtual field of poetry is still too foreground & flat to accurately depict all the uncategorizable layers of languaging. (tho such an open field over staid categories, is muchly preferable.)

miekal

↑ Index

343. Ron Silliman
Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

David,

I'm a sufficiently unreconstructed structuralist to find your box below enormously elegant and lovely to think about (and I shall for some while to come, actually), but in some ways I think it replicates the same sort of problem I find with Rasula's concept of Zones, which is a spatialized implication that the categories about the box are in any way equivalent and function in a (however rough) like manner. In fact, each opens onto radically different dynamics, and it is precisely the interaction of those dynamics that turns a simple discussion like this one into something far more complex (akin to defining the butterfly effect in Mongolia vis a vis a specific gust of wind off Lake Michigan). Consider, for example, how an Althusserian conception of ideology (that interpellation of identity: "Hey, you") functions within each category.

In some sense, that is why the diagrams of Spicer's (from, I believe, the Magick Workshop) are so appealing. It is precisely the constellative play that needs to be brought forward.

I've argued before, and I'll argue again, no doubt, that what is described in your box as Innovation is, ultimately, no such thing but is felt need, a sense of lack, that drives one (rather blindly) toward something the individual cannot name but must use her/his writing to uncover/discover for her/himself.

How does this solve the problem of where St Marks Books ought to place Fiona's book, or whether Rosmarie Waldrop should have labelled My Life as a "novel" or the befuddlement booksellers everywhere felt towards the collaborative project that was Leningrad (travel book, poem, memoir, current events?). In your diagram, genre is (or at least seems to be) some intersection between community and tradition. But what, precisely, is tradition if it ain't community?? Is we a lion or is we a moose?

Consider, for example, that non-group posed by Forrest Gander. Several of the folks on that list--Taggart, Cole and Sobin, say (and to some degree Palmer)--all share enough features to compose a group of their own except that the Loner status with all its aching pretentiousness is one of its major preconditions. All of them are male second generation Black Mountain poets whose work is notably more timid than that of their elders. And all of them are too much in love with a certain codified sense of Beauty, tho it plays out in very different ways from person to person (except that for all it comes across as some variant of nostalgia). We could build a slightly larger circle here and toss in some other folk who fit the category, such as Augie Keinzhaler, George Evans, Eliot Weinberger. What keeps these folks from being a group is precisely the AntiGroup politics they pursue. Which has an interesting political edge to it, especially when as in Eliot's case it comes across sounding ultraleftist with an echo of Pat Buchanan.

Another cluster of writers who could be legitimately grouped would be poets who were trained ("educated" in the most literal sense) within the academic poetics of the free verse '60s mode who have sometimes been associated with langpo, largely because they have very lively minds and can't keep their work from having lots of snap and pop at all points: Gander himself is an example, as are C.D. Wright, Jorie Graham, Ann Lauterbach and Bob Hass. These writers (and here is where Palmer would come in again) have a more complicated relation to questions of community and tradition and a very ambivalent stance toward innovation.

Now, as a thought experiment, if we built these two clusters as poles or horizons of what might be possible, where on a map might we place them and how would we then triangulate the writing, say, of the recent work of Bob Perelman? While I agree that Charles' work is in many ways extremely traditional, Perelman's recent pieces (e.g. The Manchurian Candidate, the poems from The Marginalization of Poetry, The False Dreams) seem to arrive at a traditionalism felt precisely as that lack I was talking about above. In this sense, Bob seems a case (not the only one--Frank Stanford's interesting to think about in so many of these terms because he may be the one real outsider of the past 50 years in US poetry) in which the categories have all been stood on their head. No?

Ron Silliman

Date: Mon, 10 Feb 1997 12:50:52 -0500
From: David Kellogg <[redacted]
Subject: Rasula and poetry zones

Pardon the lengthy description of my own work. I post this here because it is relevant to the discussion, and also because I'd like to hear from folks who object to my account, so as to strengthen it. So here goes:

Although I find Rasula's account of the four "zones" of poetry compelling, Joseph Lease and Forrest Gander rightly point to problems with zones as an operative category. Assigning particular poets to one or another zone is only one of these problems. There are always exceptions, such as Lauterbach and Gander himself, and the New Formalism seems, as Lease pointed out, a blip on the poetic horizon, fast becoming (if it hasn't already become) insignificant.

Rasula has his finger on something important, however. In my own work-in-progress on the poetic field (for an abstract, see "http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/sri.html"), I conceive these zones as abstractions, POLES OF VALUE within the contemporary construction of poetic practice. (This work is obviously indebted to Pierre Bourdieu in ways that I don't have time to explain right now.) What Rasula identifies as the MFA school corresponds more or less to a poetry predicated on uncomplicated representations of Self. Against this obviously is the poetry of social conflict, community building, identity politics, etc. Call the struggle between these two poles the horizontal (social) axis of the poetic field. Appeal to one or another of these sources of value has little to do with form as such. What I call the formal, or "vertical" axis of the poetic field comprises both NF and LP, but without naming them. While the New Formalism is fading fast, the appeal to "tradition" still operates within a lot of contemporary poetry, even language poetry as it becomes canonically interesting. (I am speaking sociologically; I don't mean "interesting" as an evaluative comment.) Against the appeal to "tradition" one could place an appeal to "innovation." So that the contemporary poetic field looks more or less like this:

```
                TRADITION
        ---------------------------------------
        |                                     |
        |                                     |
    SELF |        [the poetic field]        | COMMUNITY
        |                                     |
        |                                     |
        ---------------------------------------
                INNOVATION
```

It seems to me that this kind of a model is more flexible than a model which operates in terms of "zones" or "schools." As New Formalism fades, the appeal to tradition is still operative. As language poetry becomes (to paraphrase Ron Silliman) more of a moment than a movement, other possibilities begin to inhabit the arena close to innovation. Obviously much language poetry would still be placed close to the "innovation" pole, but individual poets' work could be read at various places within the field. Moreover, poets might _move_, or be moved, as the vicissitudes of canonization affect perception and reading. (Charles Bernstein's work seems a lot more "traditional" now -- what with various historical accounts of language poetry by Beach, Perelman, etc., and what with the recovery of Stein and Zukofsky, and _The Tennis Court Oath_ for a broader audience in various critical accounts -- than he did in, say, 1980. Also, Bernstein's own criticism has helped create the traditional context for his work.) One could also place individual poems, "schools" (Iowa, Brown, Buffalo), and institutions at various points within the field.

Well, whaddaya think? Does this account via poles of value escape some of the problematics of the zone/school?

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

"Bromig," a yugoslav (as there then were) who wrote about chemistry. But we have a David Bromwich at Yale, I think, whose direction is quite other than mine from the little i know. I was twice mistaken for him, the funnier time being when i was invited to read at a soCal college (at the instigation of a friend who taught there)by the person responsible who then introduced me as the author of many fine essays. Well, and so i am, but they havent been collected, and too fugitive i wd have thought to be known to this young man. It unraveled slowly.

My name is hard to establish pronunciation of--our branch said "Brahm-idge" and so do i. If i had it to do over, i'd use my middle name, Mansfield, as a surname. "Take my advice, you still wellnigh anonymous persons out there" coin yr own name (e.g. Miekal And, Jay Gatsby, Bob Dylan. . .). Engleburt Humperdinck rmeains one of the more attractively outrageous handles, but cd hardly have been invented?

For many years, Bob G R E N I E R shared a house with Larry E I G N E R. (That wd be the Grenier who wrote the short poem PTOLEMY/ TUOLOME .)

Imagine having the cosmic good fortune as a poet to be born a Wordsworth. db.

↑ Index

345. Mark Wallace
entertainment and pleasure
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Hello Mark Scroggins:

Good to hear from you on the list--I saw your announcement several weeks ago about your U-Alabama book on Zukovsky. Is the book now available?

You ask me if there's a "puritan strain" in my critique of entertainment, and wonder what would happen if I had used the word "pleasure" instead of "entertainment"? But in fact the words seem to me CRUCIALLY DIFFERENT words. Actually, I don't think I rejected the notion of entertainment, but just the notion that EVERYTHING MUST BE ENTERTAINMENT when it is not economic work, and I think very clearly that it was the modern media environment suggests--there is a time for profit making, and a time for entertainment. But "entertainment" is only one aspect of pleasure, even of play--that there might be more complex elements of pleasure and play than that simply of casual entertainment is something that the modern media complex does not wish its subjects to know. Hey, I love entertainment, but not when it's the only kind of "pleasure" that's made widely available. I suppose entertainment does have its active elements, but a more thorough notion of play might suggest that play involves the ability to radically reformulate identity in the name of what gives pleasure, whereas entertainment represents the more limited notion of

"relaxing"--i.e., taking time off from the labor that you have had at best limited choice in undertaking.

Please excuse typos-this modem won't let me correct them today!

Actually, Mark, on another subject--I'd be interested to hear a brief description of what you take to be the central issues to Zukovksy criticism at the moment. Yes, I'm sure it's in the book, but a preview here would be most welcome...

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

346. Charles Alexander
Re: Names are not Objects
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Mother: Bessie Meryle (she dropped the Bessie early)
Her twin brother: Jessie Earl (he became "Buddy")

Other aunts & uncles:

Elmo
Moddybelle
Allie
Millie
Goldie
Archibald
Ivory

(and then the assorted really odd ones, like Joe, Paul, Bob, George, etc.)

↑ Index

347. amato
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

---

like ron, i see a problem with any spacialization of diverse human practices, such as "zone" would imply... but let's do recall that rasula offered such zones as: (1) configured in accordance with the "genealogical contours of contemporary american poetry"; and (2) that he was clear in arguing that these zones were "utterly disproportionate in terms of size, material resources, and internal stability"...

now in fact the spatial metaphor permeates rasula's text---a museum is a space that serves in effect to freeze time... this negative reading of historical-institutional space is what informs rasula's polemic...

so while it's true that we may be able to come up with more fluid or diachronic metaphors to describe the various poetry alliances (or "institutional consolidations," to use another of rasula's terms) out there---if we're so inclined, i mean---it's likewise the case that something has to "explain" the wax museum effect rasula has spent so many pages detailing...

unless of course one doesn't see things (t)his way... i do, for reasons i've detailed mself elsewhere... yet i can imagine other readings of poetic practice over the past fifty years, readings that might emphasize other sorts of effects... and i do believe that recent developments online and in slam quarters have complicated the scenario of zone 4 as such...

best,

joe

↑ Index

348. Keith Tuma
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Very subtle, Ron, those projections of value you offer to counter Kellogg's grid as it (in your view) creates equivalences (equal valences).

So we're to believe that Taggart and Sobin are nostalgic, and pretentious to boot? Second generation watered down Black Mountain? (And Cole Swensen got accidentally tossed in THAT pile).

On the other hand Hass and Graham etc. are like langpo in that they "can't help" from having "snap and pop"? Langpo charges the mountains of the MacArthur? Add some crackle to that snap and pop so we're SURE you're not just spillin milk. "Lively minds" indeed. And blunt polemic.

And what exactly do you mean by saying that "traditions"--practices--are the same thing as "community"--those bound together however loosely and with whatever opportunity for innovation and transformation or resistance etc. BY a whole BUNCH of practices/traditions? You'll have to explain that one to me.

best,
Keith Tuma

↑ Index

349. Pritchett,Pat
Re: Notley redux
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Does anyone out there in List Land know where I can obtain a copy of Alice Notley's _Selected Poems_ (or anything else by her other than _Alette_)? Can I order direct from Talisman? I'm tired of lugging these library copies around... Backchannel, please.

Thanks,
Patrick Pritchett
[redacted]

↑ Index

350. Charles Alexander
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

> now in fact the spatial metaphor permeates rasula's text---a museum is a space that serves in effect to freeze time...

This is just an aside to this thread, but I find this statement an unfortunate stereotype, although one I understand. Seems to me that most good contemporary museums (or those trying to be good and better) are acting these days as community art centers, art activists, and more. The definition of "museum" is not at all stable. And certainly the "buildings" are not necessarily what constitute the museum as an organization or entity. While I have argued specifically with every museum I've ever been around, about exhibitions, particular programs, and more -- I have immense admiration for the people in them and their attempts to make art a part of people's lives in engaging, challenging ways. Unfortunately I have not yet read Jed Rasula's book, but perhaps a reading of his museum as part of this wider movement which includes "museums without walls" and more, would serve him well.

charles alexander

↑ Index

351. sschu30844
Re: Amiri Baraka
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Who is Charles Mingus's grandson? (I'm a huge Mingus fan these days; loved the idea of teaching him and Hart Crane at the same time.) sms

↑ Index

352. henry
Re: entertainment and pleasure
Tue 11 Feb 1997

---

entertainment = ethos(accepted values) + pathos(feeling) - logos(:meaningless)

propaganda = pathos + logos(meaning/originality) - ethos(:false values)

art = ethos + logos + pathos

(courtesy of Aristotle)

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

353. David Kellogg
Re: Rasula and poetry zones
Tue 11 Feb 1997

On Mon, 10 Feb 1997, Wendy Battin wrote:

> On Mon, 10 Feb 1997, David Kellogg wrote:
> What Rasula identifies as the MFA
> school corresponds more or less to a poetry predicated on uncomplicated > representations of Self. Against this obviously is the poetry of social > conflict, community building, identity politics, etc.
>
> David, could you say what's "obvious" about this? I'd have thought there > were other alternatives to "uncomplicated representations of Self" > (complicated ones? nonrepresentational ones? zen observation?) that > don't partake very directly of identity politics.

Alternatives, yes. Oppositions, I'm not sure. I should have spelled it out more clearly. Let's see. I didn't mean to limit the Self as a pole of value to "uncomplicated" representations; rather, I was trying to stress that such representations (the product of MFA programs and post-confessionalism) currently dominate that end of the social axis. Nonrepresentational or complicated representational investments in the self might be situated somewhere in the corner where self and innovation meet. Zen observation might be read as innovative in some communities and traditional in others. It might also be seen as invested in the Community pole, which is not limited to identity politics.

These are not fixed categories; they are meant descriptively to account for some of the ways in which poetic oppositions get socially represented (and also to describe the academic process of contemporary canon- and value-construction).

I think you're right, however, to point to the Community pole of value as the wink link in my account, and the most tentative. A bunch of disparate stuff must necessarily get thrown in there. I'm trying to figure out a way of mapping my sense that various resistances to the Self as a source of value have something in common.

One could present it in terms of a Greimas square (Self, Tradition, Not-Self [Community], Not-Tradition [Innovation]). But I'm not sure where it would go from there.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

-- Thomas Kinsella

↑ Index

355. Tom Beard
Re: Provoking the stretch
Tue 11 Feb 1997

> the original LangPo label (in all its permutations:
> language writing etc.) was really initially a tactic, used by a loose > group, to call attention to certain things...It's still useful, in > reference to that group. Nobody's gonna come along & forcibly conscript > you into the language army!

Nope, I don't feel in any danger of conscription (though I've played around on the avant-garde assault course for a while, and toy with the idea of joining the territorials). I just get the feeling sometime (and this may be a wrong impression on my part) that some people use the terms "language writing" and "linguistically innovative" interchangably, and I didn't like the implication that non-"language" writing couldn't be linguistically innovative.

Cheers &c,

Tom.

↑ Index

356. amato
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

miekal -- you articulate well what one response to poetic practice --- through publishing and distribution -- might be... and as you might guess, it's one with which i'm entirely sympathetic (if this don't sound condescending i mean)...

charles a. -- yo, i didn't mean to slam "museums" as such... rasula in fact invokes a wax museum, but (to simplify) he does use associated theorizing that tends to regard the museum impulse as partipating in the general drift of (other) carceral institutions (think foucault)... still, i would of course have to agree that not all museums are created equal...

best,

joe

↑ Index

357. Joseph Lease
Re: the future of an illusion
Tue 11 Feb 1997

---

just want to add that I certainly agree that in some crucial respects the zones are not escpecially fluid: I can think of many many many examples of great poets whose treatment or lack thereof by any of the various zone authority stuctures makes me wanna holler.

Of course.

my point was that any description of zones of aesthetics and politics does provide us with several chances:

the chance to describe some of the particulars through which aesthetics and politics are interconnected the chance to acknowledge that the sociology of poetry can change (though it may remain frustrating to those who long for real conversation)

more soon

Joseph

On Mon, 10 Feb 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> i've got to agree with mark wallace's last post on must-ing in poetry...
>
> *the problem, or controversy, stems from those who are feeling persistently neglected in specific circles... and what to do about such neglect, assuming for a moment that it's real...*
>
> which goes to the question of "schools" of poetry... i think joseph lease is quite correct in pointing to the fluidity of zones... marketing zones, not aesthetic zones -- as wendy battin indicates... but we all know, right?, how distribution, publication, marketing can back-pressure aesthetics... and in some crucial aspects, these zones are not esp. fluid...
>
> to take but one example: until andrew levy's appearance here at iit, where i teach, in 1992 (which coincided with my arrival as well), no undergrad. at iit had been exposed to much if anything in the way of contemporary poetry for a good long time... certainly nothing that would constitute zones 3 or 4 of rasula's analysis, and certainly nothing from these zones could even have seeped in accidentally, not to say, programmatically, things here were that stuffy... and things at K-12 are undoubtedly stuffier... of course we don't have any english majors here at iit any longer (had about a half-dozen then maybe)... but the point is that i don't gauge the pertinence of "schools" with whether they correspond to mfa programs -- that is, "schools of poetry" do not necessarily correlate with

> "grad. schools of poetry" (many of which i suspect are gradually getting the picture, if only in retrospect, and many of which seem to me to be set up to house perhaps two competing "camps," if that)... one would still have to contend with the status of "craft" in creative writing classrooms in general, and how this is supported by and supports most popularly renowned writing and writing venues (and note that the upcoming u of denver conference is constructed in a crucial way around this notion of "craft" -- i'll be speaking there to this question by addressing "craft" in somewhat unorthodox terms)...
>
> anyway... of course the aesthetic reality is much more diverse and messy than ANY notion of "zone" or "school" might suggest... but the problem -- if there's a problem here, and i think there is--- has primarily to do with how zones and schools play out in the marketplace, in our institutions... which, again, is why i make the case that, whatever the requisite autonomy or solitude of a writer's art, once that art enters into the social world, a somewhat different perspective is necessary to understand what's going on in practical terms... that is, unless one is willing to hallucinate about the social sphere, i think one MUST accept this---ergo something like the paradox that mark unpacks, but here a function of critical position as opposed to aesthetic production... it may be that this is the proviso lurking in the difference between such practices...
>
> best,
>
> joe

↑ Index

358. Mark Prejsnar
Re: poetry "schools"
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Chris Alexander has a good point--I was willing to cut Publishers Weekly some slack on the idea of named "camps" on the ground that they're involved with marketing, & however much I'm not personally in sympathy with the bulk of commercial trade publishing & its marketing mechanisms, I see that given our actually-existing-capitalist-culture they're almost predestined to use catagories like this....But Chris's point is I think vital: in general, the most appallingly inert workshop verse is considered commercially marginal, increasingly, by the retail book trade. (This has alot to do with the drive toward chain monopolization; to some extent it's cause & effect, to some extent they are both outcomes of the same homogenization/centralization mechanisms acting in culture, in tandem with rightwing social agendas) To what extent is identifying nonmainstream trends, giving 'em labels & profiles, simply helping much of the book trade pinpoint what they don't want to stock, what won't help them in theri increasingly single-minded drive to maximize profits at the cost of social and cultural values?

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

359. Jordan Davis
more entertainment value (here we are now)
Tue 11 Feb 1997

---

so is there are there an audience keeping score of these remarks. sorry, this modem won't let me think -- not our photographs, but the map, is that how we are to be beautiful. Now what is the zinfandel. You are a really beautiful map. Why is it important to relax. I/They. Because nobody's driving the state brown decades. who can do the palace of those outside. Pressure is substituted for a rain. Close up and save your work the powers that acknowledge our shifts must give me a house I am interested. Helmet head. Political nice guy, reprise your sleepy value. My name.

↑ Index

360. Joseph Lease
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

---

the social fact is that either all poets are outsiders or no poets are outsiders or all poets are outsiders in some ways at some times: yes this is a politics though not in a particularly Althusserian way: it's ethically wrong to accuse poets who start from where they are rather than a neomarxist meta-narrative (progressivist, foundational) of being some emotional tonality one wants to dispraise since emotional tonalities appear across the board in various political camps

I'd like to know if Ron Silliman agrees with Foucault that identity is plural and the purpose of effective history (counter history, radical history) is to dissipate it: this position is in severe conflict with Althusser

On Tue, 11 Feb 1997, Ron Silliman wrote:

> David,
>
> I'm a sufficiently unreconstructed structuralist to find your box below enormously elegant and lovely to think about (and I shall for some while to come, actually), but in some ways I think it replicates the same sort of problem I find with Rasula's concept of Zones, which is a spatialized implication that the categories about the box are in any way equivalent and function in a (however rough) like manner. In fact, each opens onto radically different dynamics, and it is precisely the *interaction of those dynamics that turns a simple discussion like this one into something far more complex (akin to defining the butterfly effect in Mongolia vis a vis a specific gust of wind off Lake Michigan). Consider, for example, how an Althusserian conception of ideology (that interpellation of identity: "Hey, you") functions within each category.*

In some sense, that is why the diagrams of Spicer's (from, I believe, the Magick Workshop) are so appealing. It is precisely the constellative play that needs to be brought forward.

I've argued before, and I'll argue again, no doubt, that what is described in your box as Innovation is, ultimately, no such thing but is felt need, a sense of lack, that drives one (rather blindly) toward something the individual cannot name but must use her/his writing to uncover/discover for her/himself.

How does this solve the problem of where St Marks Books ought to place Fiona's book, or whether Rosmarie Waldrop should have labelled My Life as a "novel" or the befuddlement booksellers everywhere felt towards the collaborative project that was Leningrad (travel book, poem, memoir, current events?). In your diagram, genre is (or at least seems to be) some intersection between community and tradition. But what, precisely, is tradition if it ain't community?? Is we a lion or is we a moose?

Consider, for example, that non-group posed by Forrest Gander. Several of the folks on that list--Taggart, Cole and Sobin, say (and to some degree Palmer)--all share enough features to compose a group of their own except that the Loner status with all its aching pretentiousness is one of its major preconditions. All of them are male second generation Black Mountain poets whose work is notably more timid than that of their elders. And all of them are too much in love with a certain codified sense of Beauty, tho it plays out in very different ways from person to person (except that for all it comes across as some variant of nostalgia). We could build a slightly larger circle here and toss in some other folk who fit the category, such as Augie Keinzhaler, George Evans, Eliot Weinberger. What keeps these folks from being a group is precisely the AntiGroup politics they pursue. Which has an interesting political edge to it, especially when as in Eliot's case it comes across sounding ultraleftist with an echo of Pat Buchanan.

Another cluster of writers who could be legitimately grouped would be poets who were trained ("educated" in the most literal sense) within the academic poetics of the free verse '60s mode who have sometimes been associated with langpo, largely because they have very lively minds and can't keep their work from having lots of snap and pop at all points: Gander himself is an example, as are C.D. Wright, Jorie Graham,

Ann Lauterbach and Bob Hass. These writers (and here is where Palmer would come in again) have a more complicated relation to questions of community and tradition and a very ambivalent stance toward innovation.

Now, as a thought experiment, if we built these two clusters as poles or horizons of what might be possible, where on a map might we place them and how would we then triangulate the writing, say, of the recent work of Bob Perelman? While I agree that Charles' work is in many ways extremely traditional, Perelman's recent pieces (e.g. The Manchurian Candidate, the poems from The Marginalization of Poetry, The False Dreams) seem to arrive at a traditionalism felt precisely as that lack I was talking about above. In this sense, Bob seems a case (not the only one--Frank Stanford's interesting to think about in so many of these terms because he may be the one real outsider of the past 50 years in US poetry) in which the categories have all been stood on their head. No?

Ron Silliman

Date: Mon, 10 Feb 1997 12:50:52 -0500
From: David Kellogg <[redacted]
Subject: Rasula and poetry zones

Pardon the lengthy description of my own work. I post this here because it is relevant to the discussion, and also because I'd like to hear from folks who object to my account, so as to strengthen it. So here goes:

Although I find Rasula's account of the four "zones" of poetry compelling, Joseph Lease and Forrest Gander rightly point to problems with zones as an operative category. Assigning particular poets to one or another zone is only one of these problems. There are always exceptions, such as Lauterbach and Gander himself, and the New Formalism seems, as Lease pointed out, a blip on the poetic horizon, fast becoming (if it hasn't already become) insignificant.

Rasula has his finger on something important, however. In my own work-in-progress on the poetic field (for an abstract, see "http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/sri.html"), I conceive these zones as abstractions, POLES OF VALUE within the contemporary construction of poetic practice. (This work is obviously indebted to Pierre Bourdieu in ways that I don't have time to explain right now.) What Rasula identifies as the MFA school corresponds more or less to a poetry predicated on uncomplicated representations of Self. Against this obviously is the poetry of social conflict, community building, identity politics, etc. Call the struggle between these two poles the horizontal (social) axis of the poetic field. Appeal to one or another of these sources of value has little to do with form as such. What I call the formal, or "vertical" axis of the poetic field comprises both NF and LP, but without naming them. While the New Formalism is fading fast, the appeal to "tradition" still operates within a lot of contemporary poetry, even language poetry as it becomes canonically interesting. (I am speaking sociologically; I don't mean "interesting" as an evaluative comment.) Against the appeal to "tradition" one could place an appeal to "innovation." So that the contemporary poetic field looks more or less like this:

```
                    TRADITION
        ---------------------------------------
        |                             |
        |                             |
    SELF |        [the poetic field]        | COMMUNITY
        |                             |
        |                             |
        ---------------------------------------
                    INNOVATION
```

It seems to me that this kind of a model is more flexible than a model which operates in terms of "zones" or "schools." As New Formalism fades, the appeal to tradition is still operative. As language poetry becomes (to paraphrase Ron Silliman) more of a moment than a movement, other possibilities begin to inhabit the arena close to innovation. Obviously much language poetry would still be placed close to the "innovation" pole, but individual poets' work could be read at various places within the field. Moreover, poets might _move_, or be moved, as the vicissitudes of canonization affect perception and reading. (Charles Bernstein's work seems a lot more "traditional" now -- what with various historical accounts of language poetry by Beach, Perelman, etc., and what with the recovery of Stein and Zukofsky, and _The Tennis Court Oath_ for a broader audience in various critical accounts -- than he did in, say, 1980. Also, Bernstein's own criticism has helped create the traditional context for his work.) One could also place individual poems, "schools" (Iowa, Brown, Buffalo), and institutions at various points within the field.

Well, whaddaya think? Does this account via poles of value escape some of the problematics of the zone/school?

Cheers,
David
*~~~

> Box 90023, Duke University [redacted]
> Durham, NC 27708 FAX [redacted]
> http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/
>
> There is no mantle
> and it does not descend.
> --Thomas Kinsella
>
> ----------

↑ Index

361. linda v. russo
ironwood query
Tue 11 Feb 1997

---

does anyone know what michael cuddihy is doing these days? does he still have backissues of ironwood? is he still at box 40907, tuscon?
or online? why did ironwood fold? is there some archived info i can turn to?

also, i'd be interested in a list/stories abt small yet substantial -- say a couple to several years running -- poetics/poetry journals that folded in the past oh, 20 yrs.

backchannel o.k.

thx. linda.
--
linda v. russo
[redacted]

↑ Index

362. linda v. russo
Re: Names are not Objects
Tue 11 Feb 1997

> you also have an uncle shiny & an uncle bougie.
> not sure about the spelling.

shiney b/c when he was born nunno said that he was shiney as a piece of coal
(this was schukyll county, PA)

how did you know the word 'bougie'?
do you did they used to use candles to dilate body canals?

i think he'd rather be uncle buschzy!

--
linda v. russo
[redacted]

↑ Index

363. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Rasula and poetry zones
Tue 11 Feb 1997

---

with "wink link" David Kellog has gifted us with the most intriguingly poetic typo of the week (assuming it is in fact an error) powerfully descriptive --

↑ Index

364. David Israel
Re: Rasula and poetry zones
Tue 11 Feb 1997

David Kellogg suggests --

<<<
Nonrepresentational or complicated representational investments in the self might be situated somewhere in the corner where self and innovation meet. . . .
>>>

(in the half-light there, below the window ledge, ya mean?)

↑ Index

365. dbkk
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

At 11:51 AM -0500 2/11/97, Keith Tuma wrote:

> So we're to believe that Taggart and Sobin are nostalgic, and pretentious to boot? Second generation watered down Black Mountain? (And Cole Swensen got accidentally tossed in THAT pile).

Oddly, Keith, I thought that Ron meant Norma Cole in his list:

> Consider, for example, that non-group posed by Forrest Gander. Several of the folks on that list--Taggart, Cole and Sobin, say (and to some degree Palmer)--all share enough features to compose a group of their > own except that the Loner status with all its aching pretentiousness is one of its major preconditions.

I don't think Ron would fall into the trap of naming men by their last names and then slip to a first name basis for a woman--I think Ron is much too aware for that.

But then he added:

> All of them are male second generation Black Mountain poets whose work is notably more timid than that of their elders.

So I figured it must be some male Cole that I'm not familiar with.

Who is this mysterious Cole?

Dodie

↑ Index

366. charssmith
Re: Amiri Baraka
Tue 11 Feb 1997

In a message dated 97-02-11 15:10:26 EST, you write:

<< Who is Charles Mingus's grandson? (I'm a huge Mingus fan these days; loved the idea of teaching him and Hart Crane at the same time.) sms >>

The Bridge meets Pithecanthropus Erectus?

Kevin Mingus is a 20 or 21 year old student at UC Berkeley, who was given his first bass by LA reed master Buddy Collette. Kevin, along with a young Indi-an_American pianist, Vijay Iyer (who's described as drawing on a mix of South Asian music/Ellington/Monk/Taylor), accompanied Amiri Baraka & some other poets last November or December in Oakland. The event got good reviews; I was wondering if any poetix ears had caught it as I was unable to attend.

Charles

↑ Index

367. Rachel Loden
Tabula Rasula
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Aldon L. Nielsen wrote:
>
> with "wink link" David Kellog has gifted us with the most intriguingly > poetic typo of the week (assuming it is in fact an error)

Speaking of Kellogg's "wink link," we've got "snap and pop" from Silliman--can crackle be far behind?

Rachel

↑ Index

368. Pam Brown
Re: uni query
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Hello Potics Poets - Damien has his answer
Thanks
Pam Brown
>Return-Path: <[redacted]>
>Date: Tue, 11 Feb 1997 17:47:37 +1000
>Date-Warning: Date header was inserted by muwayb.ucs.unimelb.edu.au
>From: Damien Broderick <[redacted]> >Subject: Re: uni query
>X-Sender: [redacted]
>To: Pam Brown <[redacted]>
>
>At 10:57 AM 2/11/97 +1000, you wrote:
>>Hello Damien Broderick -
>>I've sent your query on to the US Poetics list
>
>Hi Pam. Thanks. The mystery is now solved - he'd spelled his own alma >mater incorrectly. Hmm. Would you mind posting this happy conclusion to yr >poet mates, so they can call of their diligent bloodhounds?
>
>Regards, Damien
>
>
>

↑ Index

369. David Israel
Re: Rasula and poetry zones / wink link
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Aldon L. Nielsen notes --

<<<<
with "wink link" David Kellog has gifted us with the most intriguingly poetic typo of the week (assuming it is in fact an error) powerfully descriptive --

>>>>

yes, I noted that -- if you locate your metaphorical cursor on the wink link, it can oftentimes take you places --

(perhaps someone, somewhere may eventually compile email clips analogous to Joan Retallack's artful / chanceful erratum volume?)

↑ Index

370. Pete Landers
Re: Names are not Objects
Tue 11 Feb 1997

There is another guy in my town with my name. Peter Landers bids on houses that are being auction off by banks. One day Peter Landers saw his own name on the list of mortgagees whose homes could be his. Peter Landers was shocked and looked through his property list but did not see the address there. Peter Landers called the bank and they were both confused until they looked Peter Landers up in the phone book. Peter Landers finally met the guy whose calls he has been getting for years. Peter Landers didn't buy Peter Landers' house. We now both use our middle initials.

Peter D. Landers

↑ Index

371. Wendy Battin
Re: Rasula and poetry zones
Tue 11 Feb 1997

David, Thanks for the clarification. I too love "wink link" and wish I had a way of looking at "community" without missing so many frames. What do you do with value placed not in poet's self but in other selves who wouldn't necessarily identify as a community? Message-in-a-bottle writing, I suppose. And there's poetry-of-self that's remarkably effective at a kind of community-building (thinking of the huge audiences Sharon Old's draws, for example, among people who don't pay much attention to poetry. Bly, too.) Just wondering out loud here, & your thoughts wd be welcome.

> One could present it in terms of a Greimas square (Self, Tradition, Not-Self [Community], Not-Tradition [Innovation]). But I'm not sure where it would go from there.

That's hard. Too many wd say tradition is community, I think. (& innovation is tradition, too.) But I'm not clear on any of these terms & shd shut up.

Wendy

↑ Index

372. Rachel Loden
Re: Names
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Mark Weiss wrote:

> Jews name their kids for dead people, but there's some latitude because of translation. Hebrew or Yiddish names tend to be identical with that of the deceased, but there's some slide when it comes into English. So I was named for my cousin Maurice who died as a baby the year before I was born.

And Maria D. wrote:

"mark weiss: i love this kind of stuff. i have a friend who had a very difficult relationship w/ his cold, unloving mother. he ws the youngest of a number of boys. when he asked once, in despair, why she had given birth to him, she responded, your uncle so and so (lou, levy, something) died, so we needed someone with an L-name."

Hmm, this unravels a mystery. Was always told by my father that I was named (in part) for my grandmother, who died when my father was seven. Since her American name was Rose, this never made a lot of sense till now. (Who knows what her name had been in Russia, where she was born.)

But there was also talk of my being named for a great great grandmother on my maternal side, Rachel Leet Wilson, who married Richard Harding and gave birth to Rebecca Harding (later Rebecca Harding Davis, author of _Life in the Iron Mills_, for you Am Lit trivia mavens).

Loden is a made-up name (1972 vintage). Long, exhausting story, as I'm sure is true of many (esp. women's) last names.

Rachel

↑ Index

373. David Kellogg
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Tue 11 Feb 1997

Ron,

Sorry -- sent that last message unfinished. Anyway, I hope it should be clear that I'm not trying to say _everything_ about the field, and that my model is meant to be comrehensive (toward comprehending) rather than totalizing. I'm most interested in the macro-effects of reading and evaluation. But I think things can work pretty well on a local level too. I think in fact that these abstractions, as poles of value, _do_ interpellate us, in a real sense. I won't argue with you about whether there is any such thing as Innovation (or tradition, or the self, or community for that matter); what I'm getting at is precisely the idea that these concepts exist as horizons in the contemporary construction of poetic value. Nor does it solve any of the problems you've addressed re: St. Marks Books, or the response to Leningrad. It _does_ suggest that the problems with the reception of Leningrad may have something to do with the inability of many readers to respond to work that partakes of -- actually creates -- a number of communities via collaboration and cross-national investigation and that _also_ appeals to an unstable sense of literary innovation.

One thing that I want to make clear is that this description is not evaluative, and that therefore it has nothing to say about whether this or that poet might be "too much in love with a certain codified sense of Beauty". On the other hand, it does suggest that the relative prominence of, say, Palmer among the people you mention may have to do with some critics' perception (misperception?) that he has _resolved_ some of the dichotomies between formal innovation and Beauty as an appeal to traditional (i.e., codified) standards. So one would have to work out reviewers' positive responses to Palmer and less positive responses to some of the others you've mentioned in terms of how they perceive the mechanisms of "transcendence" versus "contradiction." The difference between the androgyne and the hermaphrodite is a matter of such perceptual constructions.

One issue that your post raises is the question of groups. Now, I really don't have an interest in creating new groups per se, even if I had the power (don't). But how would groups be represented here? Seems to me that a group occupies a position in the field, but that that position is changeable in a variety of ways. For example, "Black Mountain" probably opens somewhere toward the right-hand corner of my model (tho it seems to me, in passing, that the anthology wars of the sixties suggest a conflation at the time of community/innovation and self/tradition as value-poles: the field almost loses a whole dimension). By the nineties, it has certainly moved "up," toward tradition, in the sense that an engagement with BM can be seen as grappling with traditional forbears and through them, with Pound etc. It has also become more diffuse, wider, and by the same token individual poetic figures eclipse Black Mountain as such as points of alliance. What I mean is that it makes no sense on some level to call oneself a poet who learns from this "school", given the emergence of full-blown poetic careers in Olson, Duncan, Creeley, and related figures such as Jones/ Baraka, Levertov, even (god help us) Dorn, all of whom have more concrete meaning as points on the field right now. Where I would place this or that poet is not really the point. My placement would differ from yours; my reading of individual poems would change, depending on my own context of reading and development (I am not separate from the field, even as critic -- critical statements are themselves interventions and carry weight).

Gotta go bathe the baby. Picture's on my web site, if anybody's interested.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

[redacted] University Writing Program
[redacted] Durham, NC 27708
FAX [redacted] http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/

There is no mantle
and it does not descend.

-- Thomas Kinsella

↑ Index

375. Franklin Bruno

zones, etc.

Tue 11 Feb 1997

David Kellogg wrote:

> What Rasula identifies as the MFA school corresponds more or less to a poetry predicated on uncomplicated representations of Self. Against this obviously is the poetry of social conflict, community building, identity politics, etc. Call the struggle between these two poles the horizontal (social) axis of the poetic field. Appeal to one or another of these sources of value has little to do with form as such.

But how little? I would associate with Hejinian, Bernstein, and, a bit later, Leslie Scalapino, among many others, a position that would claim that formal issues have -a lot- to do with the way the self is constructed through the poem's formal strategies, the general idea being that fragmentation of the narrative (even the referential) effects of language serves to foreground the making-up-of the self from somehow analogous fragments. Maybe what I think is that the minute you talk about 'representations' (not just of Self) you're talking about, among other things, form. I'm sure that others here could put this more clearly/insightfully.

Also, Bill Manhire has come up here a couple of times. I highly recommend his witty collection of short stories, published in the U.S. as -The New Land- (can't recall the publisher, sorry). Are there any of his poems readily available in this country? The UCLA library has a selection of NZ poetry, but it peters out in the early 90's.

Finally, is no one here going to tell me how to contact Joel K. Meow? fjb

↑ Index

376. Dan Raphael Dlugonski names and schools
Tue 11 Feb 1997

enjoying the parallel discs on names and poetry schools, arose by any other name, the power of labels aof names, numerologically and other logics.
to have a name to change.
to group under a name so as to better understand or at least contain.
as my own poetry cuts across lables, incorporates, a real eclecticism, a pastiche trying to organically combine. and poets i feel closest to dont let me in.
so we stride.
a name i'll never be called by.
my name the way a dog would say it.

↑ Index

377. Herb Levy
Re: Clothes Make the Man
Tue 11 Feb 1997

George,

No wonder you didn't get mugged. Dressed like that, people probably thought you were in one of Sun Ra's Astro-adjectival Arkestra's of the period.

> Herb Levy (often seen on 5th and Seneca in Seattle in jodhpurs) reminded me of a trip I took to NYC in 1970, to hear Pharoah Sanders at Slugs's Bar. I thought I would just wear my regular clothes, so I wd appear hip and not get mugged. So I wore
>
> a toque (Canadian for knitted cap)
> a shirt made of some viscous material in green and black stripes
> a maroon sweater knitted by my mother
> a serge cape once worn by a City Of Westminster police constable
> yellow jeans
> logging boots
> big knitted red socks
> electricians gloves (you know, stripes of grey, red and blue
> long stringy hair
> a moustache
> dark glasses
> a cheapo cigar with a plastic tip
>
> I didnt get mugged. Not even an offer. Not even in front of Peace Eye Books.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

378. Wendy Battin
Re: entertainment and pleasure
Tue 11 Feb 1997

The Collingwood formulation is that art requires discipline at the beginning and gives pleasure at the end, while entertainment requires no no discipline but gives no nourishment (fake fat? diet coke?) I like Bateson's formula better: that entertainment is the food of depression, the absence of joy that feeds the absence of feeling.

Wendy

On Tue, 11 Feb 1997, henry wrote:

> entertainment = ethos(accepted values) + pathos(feeling) - logos(:meaningless)
>
> propaganda = pathos + logos(meaning/originality) - ethos(:false values)
>
> art = ethos + logos + pathos
>
> (courtesy of Aristotle)
>
> - Henry Gould

---------- Wendy Battin (home)
http://camel.conncoll.edu/ccother/wjbat/ (CAPA)
http://shain.lib.conncoll.edu/CAPA/capa.html (Multiple Poetics)
http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Lofts/5471/index.html

↑ Index

379. Stephen Vincent
Calling Interlochen MI
Tue 11 Feb 1997

I have a high school age student from California going back to Interlochen, MI. She's worked with writers here, has the bug etc. Could you please send name of any community oriented writing program/workshop in which she might participate before end of week. She's about to be, so to speak, "released." Wd be great if she had some stable lit support. Back channel will be appreciated.

Cheers,
Stephen Vincent
[redacted]

↑ Index

380. Brigham Taylor
Essex Hemphill
Wed 12 Feb 1997

on 7 Feb Aldon Nielson wrote:

Around the same time I received word that my old college mate Essex Hemphill, who published one of my first sorry poems in his journal _Nethula_, had died of AIDS -- Not long afterward I was told by a "scholar" in Los Angeles that the British author Essex Hemphill had passed away -- When I told him Essex was from DC, he said that he must have made the mistake because he'd seen Essex in a film by Isaac Julien -- but of course the film he had in mind was made by Marlon Riggs -- Hard to keep those Anglo-Afro-American-Gay-Writer-Filmpeople straight, eh?

Perhaps the confusion is due to the fact that Essex Hemphill appeared in both Marlon Riggs's "Tongues Untied" AND Isaac Julien's "Looking for Langston." In any event Essex's death is a major loss to poetry, queer studies, gay literature, African American literature, American literature, English language literature, and the planet in general.

↑ Index

381. George Bowering
Re: Names
Wed 12 Feb 1997

> Imagine having the cosmic good fortune as a poet to be born a Wordsworth. db.

Or Poe. The job fitted him to a T

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

382. David Bromige door-darkening
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Chris, oh dear, no, dont think i meant anything. as i recall, i was listing names of poets whose readings at UNH i really enjoyed, and i was pointing out that each had some academic connections. . . . i was responding to someone on the list who had sd that academics (or some similar term) cldnt write poetry. And you see, i thought you taught or had taught college. It was the requirement of symmetry, to which i had obliged myself, that after each poet i named, there would be a parenthetic "Time magazine" phrase indicating that this one, too, had college connections ; i guess i picked "darkened doors" for you because i thot it wd amuse you, the campy melodrama of it. i never supposed you wd connect with it as my (or anybody i know's) honest opinion of you. it was flip, and i apologize if it has been disturbing you. You can darken m y door anytime you want, compadre. db

↑ Index

383. David Bromige
Telephone companies cashing in on the internet
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Dear listmembers: given the clout of phone companies, and given the times we live in, i should think they stand a good chance. i have written to [redacted],to let them know that i object to this proposed legislation. It would make e-mail unaffordable to me, and it would make me disinclined to play into the phone companies' hands by calling long-distance instead. I told isp that i would go back to snailmailing. And i would hope tens of thousands of others would do so. db

↑ Index

384. Chris Stroffolino
HOW BRIEF THE HUMAN SPAN....
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Today on east 13th between first and second (this seems childish)
I found many soggy and dusty (not quite mildewed, musty) copies of a literary magazine called "feed"--- Issue 1 (fall 1993) and the double issue, 2/3

I don't know if it still exists.
I didn't recognize the names of any of the contributors and didn't have time to read any of the pieces.
I did however hear of De Boer who distributed it and Joey Ramone and David Trinidad who are thanked or at least acknowledged for being themselves.....
(Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

385. jdhollo
Michael Coffey / poetry "schools"
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Michael,
the categories you suggest in your initial post sound good to me--with some exceptions:

Scratch "Language poets"--term meaningless to Barnes & Noble audience; Multicultural (not poetics--poetics is something else)--fine (and there's really no need to break that down0; spoken or performance poetry--why not simply Performance Poetry; St. Mark's of New York School--as with "Language," overly pseudo-specific; Formalist--old hat (= Old Hat, in fact, but you don't want that); same goes for "mainstream" etc.: why not Traditional, and Open Form; Classical--OK, I guess; Poetry in Translation --OK. So, then, this would be my list:

Traditional
Open Form
Multicultural Performance Classical
In Translation

The first four, of course, overlap in a multitude of ways, but a simple way to distinguish Trad from Open Form would be--for starters--to put the books reviewed in the New York Times, NY Review of Books, New Yorker, etc., in Trad, and then take a look at the rest.

Anselm Hollo

↑ Index

386. Miekal And [Fwd: Re: Hullo hullo hullo]
Wed 12 Feb 1997

This is a multi-part message in MIME format.

not sure what the policy is about forwards, but I find both this list & some of its topics quite pertinent to poetics

m and with NJE id 1539 for [redacted]; Wed, 12 Feb 1997 12:17:59 -0500

V1.2a/1.8a) with BSMTP id 2110; Wed, 12 Feb 1997 12:17:58 -0500
TCP; Wed, 12 Feb 97 12:17:57 EST
(8.8.5/8.6.6) with ESMTP id MAA01278 for <[redacted]>;
Wed, 12 Feb 1997 12:20:16 -0500 (EST) id MAA14936 for [redacted]; Wed, 12 Feb 1997 12:20:06
-0500 (EST)
Date: Wed, 12 Feb 1997 12:20:06 -0500
From: "Mark E. Shoulson" <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: Hullo hullo hullo
To: Multiple recipients of list CONLANG <[redacted]>
([redacted])

> Date: Wed, 12 Feb 1997 00:20:20 -0500
> From: [redacted]
>
> Oddly enough, I hardly ever use
> "million" or "billion" in a literal way, except when talking about stars > or government spending. AFAIC, "billion" is just another word for > "very large number, really beyond what I can actually comprehend," > whether it is an American billion or someone else's. :)

cf. Lapine, the language of rabbits in Adams' _Watership Down_. Rabbits can't count higher than four, so anything more than that is "hrair", meaning "many," "a lot," often translated as "a thousand" (or occasionally "five").

~mark

----------4EAB5A4B4672--

↑ Index

387. Ron Silliman
A Lease on History
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Joe Lease queries:

> I'd like to know if Ron Silliman agrees with Foucault that identity is plural and the purpose of effective history (counter history, radical history) is to dissipate it: this position is in severe conflict with Althusser

Yes I do and no it's not. History doesn't have a "purpose." We might assign one, but that's another story.

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

388. Bil Brown
Re: Michael Coffey / poetry "schools"
Wed 12 Feb 1997

> Traditional
> Open Form
> Multicultural
> Performance
> Classical
> In Translation
>
> Anselm Hollo

Above all other things. I really have to agree with Anselm. The various "avant" names that are running around will not be of interest to most of Publishers' audience. Language is as poetry is, lingusts and poets are specialists that have a specialty audience (unfortunately) if we go into pseudonomous designations then we are losing the general reader.

I don't think we want to lose the general reader any more than we already have.

Bil Brown

↑ Index

389. 9448721p
OBJECT PERMANENCE #8
Wed 12 Feb 1997

OBJECT PERMANENCE #8 is now available, featuring New Writing by Bruce Andrews, John M. Bennett, Andrea Brady, Adrian Clarke, Clark Coolidge, Peter Finch, Pierre Joris, Peter Middleton, Carlyle Reedy, Robert Sheppard, Fiona Templeton, Lawrence Upton/Bob Cobbing, and Johan de Wit.

Also 14+ pages of reviews (inc. primary trouble anthology, Raworth`s Clean And Well Lit, McCaffery`s The Cheat of Words, Jarnot`s Some Other Kind of Mission...) and listings.

Available from

Peter Manson
Flat 3/2, 16 Ancroft Street, Glasgow
Scotland G20 7HU

Payment in UK by cheque/PO payable to Object Permanence, overseas by Sterling IMO if possible (orders in equivalent local currency are okay, but a Sterling draft drawn on a UK bank is best - we lose a lot on dollar cheques). stlg2.50 inc. postage in UK; stlg3 surface mail abroad; stlg4 airmail.

This is the FINAL issue of OBJECT PERMANENCE. Thanks to all those who contributed work or read the magazine. Contributors` copies are on their way.

↑ Index

390. henry gould
Re: poetry "schools"
Wed 12 Feb 1997

On Tue, 11 Feb 1997 15:35:18 -0500 Mark Prejsnar said:
To what extent is identifying nonmainstream
>trends, giving 'em labels & profiles, simply helping much of the book >trade pinpoint what they don't want to stock, what won't help them in >theri increasingly single-minded drive to maximize profits at the cost of >social and cultural values?

The audience for poetry is small. Most of us would rather relax with a carefully-constructed (fictional) artificial paradise and a beer, than read some poverty-stricken poet's feeble translation of real paradise, drinking our cup of water with Milton.

There is a connection(s) between aesthetics and politics, but we might ask, what's criticism for? Baudelaire wrote a short essay on this in which he said that trying to follow the sober analytical critics to poetry is taking the long way around (if it's a way at all). Study, for the poet, he said, remains in the studio. The prime relation is between the artist and the audience. The honest critic will (paradoxically) partake of the enthusiasm and inspiration of the artist h/she critiques.

Poetry is a kind of human fire, but it's not spread by a new analytical approach to language or technique. It's imaginative fire (the longing for paradise) tempered by experience (fire tempered by the sword). Pound was right, I think, to imagine that the potential for paradise on earth is reflected in the past, underneath all the tragedies and insanities. The age of gold is buried in the Gilded Age. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

391. Miekal And more value here (we are entertainment now)

Wed 12 Feb 1997

Jordan Davis wrote:
>
> so is there are there an audience keeping score of these remarks.

the time of grasshoppers has come > sorry, this modem won't let me think -- intelligence as in artificial not our photographs, but the map,

old charms, unpaved roadways > is that how we are to be beautiful.

standing for once against the dinner table

Now what is the zinfandel.

vitaceae

You are a > really beautiful map.

unpaved charms, before there were roads

> Why is it important to relax.

Fidgetense.

I/They.

re:

Because
> nobody's driving the state brown decades.

Not to be outdone or incorporated who can do the palace of those > outside.

wait in line at the hempery, ladies with dogs

Pressure is substituted for a rain.

Detention for snow.

Close up and save your > work the powers that acknowledge our shifts must give me a house I am > interested.

Pottery has readings.

Helmet head.

List level.

Political nice guy, reprise your sleepy value. My > name.

Or just turn off the damned TV.

Miekal And

--
@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

392. Mark W Scroggins
Re: entertainment and pleasure
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Mark W: actually, I'm not sure I wondered whether there was a "puritan strain" in yr. post, but rather suspected one--as I all too often suspect one in many poker-faced condemnations of maypoles and frolics--but your posting here does much to clarify what you said, and I agree with you here wholeheartedly. Yes, the LZ book is out and shd. be in stores as we speak. The main issues of Zukofsky criticism? 1) (really an issue of LZ scholarship)--to establish and get into print the texts themselves--the "A" we have is rife with typos, the Complete Short Poetry simply isn't complete and has its own textual problems, the Apollinaire book, "First Half of "A"-9," and "Arise, arise" are out of print. 2) to think about Zukofsky as a "usable past," as an influence on younger poets than him--everybody knows Creeley read LZ, Duncan read LZ, etc. etc., but no-one to my knowledge has thought really carefully about precisely what they learned from his work and where they took it--and this goes double for poets of the "language" generation, who were growing up reading LZ, many of them. I'm not talking simple influence study, but a thoughtful consideration of what remains productive and instigative about the work, and what might have to somehow be relegated to the dustbin of "high modernist" practice. I realize this sounds pretty dry, but once I put on that critic's hat, I turn pretty dry... best, Mark S

On Tue, 11 Feb 1997, Mark Wallace wrote:

> Hello Mark Scroggins:
>
> Good to hear from you on the list--I saw your announcement several weeks ago about your U-Alabama book on Zukovsky. Is the book now available?
>
> You ask me if there's a "puritan strain" in my critique of entertainment, and wonder what would happen if I had used the word "pleasure" instead of "entertainment"? But in fact the words seem to me CRUCIALLY DIFFERENT words. Actually, I don't think I rejected the notion of entertainment, but just the notion that EVERYTHING MUST BE ENTERTAINMENT when it is not economic work, and I think very clearly that it was the modern media environment suggests--there is a time for profit making, and a time for entertainment. But "entertainment" is only one aspect of pleasure, even of play--that there might be more complex elements of pleasure and play than that simply of casual entertainment is something that the modern media complex does not wish its subjects to know. Hey, I love entertainment, but not when it's the only kind of "pleasure" that's made widely available. I suppose entertainment does have its active elements, but a more thorough notion of play might suggest that play involves the ability to radically reformulate identity in the name of what gives pleasure, whereas entertainment represents the more limited notion of "relaxing"--i.e., taking time off from the labor that you have had at best limited choice in undertaking.
>
> Please excuse typos-this modem won't let me correct them today!
>
> Actually, Mark, on another subject--I'd be interested to hear a brief description of what you take to be the central issues to Zukovksy criticism at the moment. Yes, I'm sure it's in the book, but a preview here would be most welcome...
>
> mark wallace
>
> /----------
> | |
> | [redacted] "I have not yet begun |
> | to go to extremes" |
> | GWU: |
> | http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw |
> | EPC: |
> | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace |

> |_____|

↑ Index

393. henry gould
review (very short)
Wed 12 Feb 1997

There must be something roughly paradise-like about Our World if there's a little press in the Canary Islands called Zasterle that publishes little books like the new _Light Street_ by Nick Piombino. I don't know who he is but he writes beautiful poems. Maybe somebody else can take a turn doing a review, this little book deserves one. I'd quote but I don't have it in front of me & I'm still reading it. I showed it to Savage Reader and even she was won over. (Jack Spandrift just snarled - but I think he's jealous.)

Nick Piombino, _Light Street_, Zasterle Press, 1997

- Henry Gould (chauffeur to Savage Reader)

↑ Index

394. Miekal And manuel brito & zasterle
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Charles Alexander wrote:

> I also love the "book-ness" of this book, its size and shape and other characteristics, and particularly the cover design by Rosa Ventura. But then I'm always taken by these Zasterle books put out by Manuel Brito.

Manuel has been seemingly sending XE all of his titles as well, so have seen a wide selection of his very consistently delicious little books. When I get frustrated about distribution issues Im reminded of what he must feel like living there Tenerife, Canary Islands, & speaking only halting english, publishing a lot of american writers & trying to get those books around the states. Worthy of a few hoo-has anyway.

Miekal

↑ Index

395. Christopher Alexander per-mail (Pear tree
Wed 12 Feb 1997

M writtererng:
> What I'm suggesting is a sort of e-mail exquisite corpse. I've seen as > I expect you have those ones some websites have tried to initiate, and they > are IMO by and large godawful.
really I love the one at EPC, especially when high school kids & the like get on there. its fascinating, the kind of stuff I would love to be able to include in my work from time to time but just cant produce--that clumsy sentiment in awkward lines. I'm reminded of Cage's story in SILENCE of being at a cocktail party where the host & hostess gave a wretched performance of the entire score of a second-rate operetta. there was a buddhist monk in attendance, & part-way through Cage looked over to see how he was taking it. as I recall, Cage says something like "The look on his face was beatific." you know, Duncan insists that there is no good or bad poetry. I'm not inclined to agree, but--well, it bears some thought. I mean, what one considers "le bad" has its uses & even a strange sort of beauty in the right context. I only wish I had earlier work (like from h-s) of this nature to draw from--forlorn love poems, poems addressing friendships in peril, that sort of thing. malheureusement, I was far more serious in that embarassing romantic sort of way--as I recall, my early notebooks are replete with the familiar awkward gestures of the Romantic--despair & solitude, phrases ending with "of emptiness", lots of "empty" & "emptiness" throughout--coupled, oddly enough, with infantile gestures of explicitly political rebellion which seem to range over all territories--facsism, marxism, even democracy movements. I distinctly remember being enamored of the graphic used by the american news media to signify the Polish democracy movement Solidarnosc (sorry no diacretc)--that sort of silk-screened looking red banner. too, I had read both The Communist Manifesto & parts of Mein Kampf by the end of 6th grade, with apparently little grasp of either outside of the rhetoric, & had an early fascination with the figure of Mussolini & the austere grandeur of fascist art & architecture. you can imagine the jumble all of these make in the notebooks. I havent looked at them in years--its amazing to me that I remember this much. I shall have to bring them back next time I head east, or maybe have them sent.

> I would suggest that this wordprocessing > technology is geared to delete, not add, and so that aspect of the > technology should be employed as well: namely, the proper e-corpse would > involve each person both adding text and deleting the pre-existent text. We > would have to develop a technique by which a certain portion of the > "message" could be changed everytime, but some ever-growing part of it could > not be changed. My reasoning for this being that if changes could always be > made to the entire text, then the movement toward a settled and monologic > voice would be more likely than if, as in the paper corpses, some part had > to be left untouched every time.
yes yss I like this. we could do a collaborative project by email with this sort of technique. one thing I should like to stipulate, though, is that the length of the work be cut down considerably, say, to 20 lines. this is simply because I will have to do my part of the work (reading & manipulation) here at work, & with the size of the samples youve sent thus far that would be unmanagable.

I'm wondering what kind of shape this method could take. I mean, if we have to start with smaller texts & delete, your suggestion of some kind of stricture for maintaining portions of those texts becomes crucial. one possibility might be simply an approximate ratio to be retained; for instance, we could establish that no more than 1/4 of the text may be changed in a sitting. further, I might suggest that no more than 1/4 of the already-transformed material be changed, if thats not too complicated. what wed have then is something like a diminishing realm of action, & that would also give us an established stopping point thats a bit more random than, say, an established number of rounds or entries per person. the changes may be hard to spot at times so of course I think these rules should be loose in their application, meaning I probably wouldnt challenge you if you were to make what might otherwise (in Monopoly) be thought of as an "illegal" move/change. hmm--strange thqt a sort of negative image of the rhetoric of gamesmanship should crop up here.

oh--make sure you cut off those little darts > each time you work on the poem--otherwise well accumulate too many. unless of course you want them as part of the work yr doing.

>Do you want me to send you that paperback book thing?
oh yes absolutely yes.

> Perhaps you knew all this!
no I'm afraid j & I are not in contact. this is not a source of disappointment to me--we did have a sort of falling out, though I couldnt attach an exact moment or event to that feeling. I can say, though, that it had to do with her increasing involvement with erin & gail--& her tendency to turn her back on linda & I at parties & receptions where it would be possible/more profitable to associate with them. partly that has to do with friction [mildly] between linda & erin; partly to do with j's--personality. in any case, I honestly dont have much respect for her either as an artist or a person. knowing as you do my poetry-poetics-politics, can you imagine j & I across a table from one another, even over a guinness? & thats not even considering the personal so-called baggage that conversation would have to carry.

"oh, dont end so heavy" says.
well--heres my first cotntribuation
(I cut it to 20 printed lines if thats ok).
love c.

"Automata pense"

This is an automated ponse
to message Bravo,

T"techne" , changing time
but techne is not the thing. I usings (or his at the end (c'mon folks, you can read

We are all immersed in a much deeper
"techne" -

Timeam reminded Proust mitt self

desolations/voids/returns
                tha Time brings.

Proust's narrator

he finds

his writerly
and the creation

a SIMILAR sensation (not the same, but similar,

from the ancient past, wechoing) brings memof his gigantic Oeuvof
in a particular effect of time:

↑ Index

396. Miekal And Re: names and schools
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Dan Raphael Dlugonski wrote:

 and poets i feel closest to dont let > me in.

now here's a familiar thread Im starting to hear over & over. which is the evidence to support interactivity & participation over yet another obvious form of class consciousness.

> so we stride.
> a name i'll never be called by.
> my name the way a dog would say it.

Dan, dont forget to pipe up about your longtime mag NRG, re linda russo, of maybe its not defunct yet?

miekal

↑ Index

397. Aldon L. Nielsen
Teaching Coalition Conference (fwd)
Wed 12 Feb 1997

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Fri, 3 Jan 1997 08:32:52 -0800
From: Christine A. ASCHAN <[redacted]>
To: Multiple recipients of list <[redacted]>
Subject: Teaching Coalition Conference

****
* UC/CSU TEACHING COALITION CONFERENCE*
****

TEACHING THE HUMANITIES TODAY

On Friday, February 2l, faculty in the humanities from the University of California and the California State University will hold a conference to discuss common problems in teaching in the humanities. The conference has emerged from two exploratory meetings hosted by the Humanities Research Institute in 1995. It will take place at the Henry H. Huntington Library in San Marino, California; Robert Ritchie, the Library's Director of Research, and Professor of History at UCLA, will open the session.

The event is co-sponsored by the HRI and by the Division of Academic Affairs, Office of the Chancellor, California State University. William Weber, Professor of History at CSU Long Beach, has planned and organized the meeting. Faculty will come from campuses of the two systems to discuss issues involved in teaching popular culture, framing lower-division core programs, and making pedagogical uses of technology.

There is a $12 charge for lunch. If you are interested in attending, contact Bill Weber, [redacted], for further information.

****

Session I
10:00 a.m.-12:00 p.m.
****

POPULAR CULTURE IN THE CLASSROOM?

Chair: Aldon Nielsen, English, San Jose State University
Susan McClary, Musicology, UCLA
Robert Coleman, English, Sonoma State University
Peter Euben, Politics, UC Santa Cruz
Richard Simon, English, Cal Poly San Luis Obispo

****

Session II
1:30 p.m.-3:00 p.m.
****

TEACHING THE HUMANITIES AS A CORE

Chair: Dorothy Abrahamse, Dean, College of Liberal Arts, CSULB
John Smith, Director, UCI Humanities Core Curriculum Brook Thomas, English, UCI
Les Adler, Director, Hutchins School of Liberal Studies, Sonoma State University

****

Session III
3:30 p.m.-5:00 p.m.
****

DISTANCE LEARNING: HOPES AND FEARS

Chair: Brian K. Smith, Religious Studies, UC Riverside
William Herbrechtsmeier, Religious Studies, CSU Humboldt
Katherine Hayles, English, UCLA
Walter Oliver, Spanish, CSU San Bernardino
Richard Hecht, Religious Studies, UCSB

↑ Index

398. Christopher Alexander
Re: Names are not Objects
Wed 12 Feb 1997

> how did you know the word 'bougie'?
> do you did they used to use candles to dilate body canals?
of course I know the word bougie, both of them.
dunno about the body canals--seems like a candle is sort of--a hard surface. some damage could be done if youre not careful--kids, dont try this at home.
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

399. Vincent S Gregory
LINEbreak
Wed 12 Feb 1997

>
>
>
> L I N E b r e a k
>
>
> _____
>
>
> The LINEbreak radio series with Charles Bernstein is now > available on tape. Each tape contains two thirty-minute > interview/performances. Cassettes are $11 plus shipping; DATs are $22 plus shipping.
>
>
> INTERVIEWS AND PERFORMANCES FROM THE LITERARY EDGE
> FROM FALL 1996:
>
>
> Tape one- Tape eight-
> A: Cecilia Vicuna A: Peter Straub
> B: Dennis Tedlock B: Peter Straub

>
> Tape two-
> A: Ray Federman
> B: Lance & Andrea Olsen
>
> Tape three-
> A: Ted Pearson
> B: Ken Sherwood & Loss Glazier
>
> Tape four-
> A: Lyn Hejinian
> B: Ron Silliman
>
> Tape five-
> A: Robert Creeley
> B: Robert Creeley
>
> Tape six-
> A: Jena Osman
> B: Fiona Templeton
>
> Tape seven-
> A: Steve McCaffery
> B: Steve McCaffery
>
> Tape nine-
> A: Carla Harryman
> B: Paul Auster
>
> Tape ten-
> A: Luci Tapahonso
> B: Bruce Andrews
>
> Tape elevan-
> A: Luci Tapahonso
> B: Ben Yarmolinsky
>
> Tape twelve-
> A: Karen MacCormack
> B: Ben Friedlander
>
> Tape thirteen-
> A: Barbara Guest
> B: Susan Howe
>
>
> The full set of 13 tapes is offered on cassette for $125 and on DAT for $260 (plus shipping).

U.S. residents add $3 for shipping. Non-U.S. residents add $5 for the 1 to 4 tapes and $12 for 5 or more tapes.

>
> Please include tape #('s) & make checks payable to Vincent S. Gregory. Send to UB English Department, ATT: Vincent Gregory, 302 Clemens Hall, SUNY @ Buffalo, Bflo., NY 14260.
>

↑ Index

400. Fred Muratori
Re: Michael Coffey / poetry "schools"
Wed 12 Feb 1997

The more I think about all this agony over categorization, the more I think we've strayed far from the original intent of Michael's posting, which I interpret as simply a call for a strategy to make bookstore managers/buyers aware of the range of poetry available to them, and disabuse them of the too-prevalent assumption that the only poetry worth stocking is what comes out of Norton, Knopf, and (if they're feeling really adventurous) Wesleyan and Pitt. I don't think it serves poetry's readership to subdivide via shelf labeling what are already pitifully small poetry sections in most bookstores; the interpretive spectrum of categories -- while interesting to discuss in a listserv -- is too large and abstract and overlapping to inflict on a readership that simply wants to browse and make its own decisions, thank you. The bookstore managers just need to be aware that Sun & Moon, Roof, O Books, Hard Press, etc. have readerships every bit as interested and devoted as any other literary press, and that the store is just as -- if not more -- likely to sell one or two copies of, say, Michael's book from Sun & Moon, as it is the latest Alice Quinn-annointed newcomer. It's not so much a question of educating poetry readers via shelf labels as it is educating poetry providers through articles in trade journals (like PW) which they as business professionals are required to read.

****
Fred Muratori "The spaces between things keep ([redacted]) getting bigger & more Reference Services Division important."
Olin * Kroch * Uris Libraries - John Ashbery
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853
WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html
****

↑ Index

401. Christopher Alexander
Re: poetry "schools"
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Mark Prejsnar wrought:
> To what extent is identifying nonmainstream
> trends, giving 'em labels & profiles, simply helping much of the book > trade pinpoint what they don't want to stock, what won't help them in > theri increasingly single-minded drive to maximize profits at the cost of > social and cultural values?

I wasnt so much thinking active avoidance [Pubwkly as "how not to shop"] as lack of interest-- from the pov of most bkstores, why seek new poetry titles, especially work that challenges the mainstream?
but its the latter half of that question tells me youre raising a very possibility. on the other hand, hell, theyve avoided us this long without a guide simply by not purchasing books from any of the relatively smaller presses. so how much dmg could it really do to remind them were here. I just dont expect it to do a lot of good, either.

again, though I wnt to emphasize that this has a lot to do with the way we buy poetry. if you have a good local bkstore (not a chain), why not place some of yr SPD orders through them? I'm as bad about this as anybody--I love to have those packages come right to my door. but if enough people do it, they might take a hint(or a suggestion). & it goes without saying that we have to continue to support stores like Bridge St.
that do act as venues for good work.

re schools & categories, of course one way to blur the pigeon-holing effect might be to highlight presses, not zoos or zones or movements. maybe presses are still subject to being fixed in their orientation from the outside ["isnt that the one that publishes X?"], but it seems to me that an article that shows the press at work, ie a diverse catalog of publications, could avoid that effect. maybe something like a brief editorial interview coupled with a catalog & samples.

well, now I've drifted into fantasy.
or maybe just transposed the problem.

c.
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

402. Miekal And

Re: per-mail (Pear tree w/potatoes

Wed 12 Feb 1997

Christopher Alexander wrote:
>
> M writtererng:
> > What I'm suggesting is a sort of e-mail exquisite corpse. I've seen as > > I expect you have those ones some websites have tried to initiate, and they > > are IMO by and large godawful.
> really I love the one at EPC, especially when high school kids & the > like get on there. its fascinating, the kind of stuff I would love to > be able to include in my work

> "oh, dont end so heavy" says.
> well--heres my first cotntribuation
> (I cut it to 20 printed lines if thats ok).
> love c.
>
> ———————————————————————————————
>
> "Automata pense"
>
> This is an automated ponse
> to message Bravo,
>
> T"techne" , changing time
> but techne is not the thing. I usings (or his > at the end (c'mon folks, you
> can read
>
> We are all immersed in a much deeper
> "techne" -
>
> Timeam reminded Proust mitt self
>
> desolations/voids/returns
> tha Time brings.
> four fried potato sandwiches
>
> Proust's narrator screaming at the blight

> a half-once of prime NOTHINGNESS
TEE-HEE
> he finds
>
> his writerly

> and the
>
> creation
> a SIMILAR sensation (not the same, but similar,
>
> from the > ancient past, wechoing) brings memof his gigantic Oeuvof
> in a particular effect of time:

malok feb 12 1997

↑ Index

403. Fred Muratori

Re: review, Piombino

Wed 12 Feb 1997

Nick Piombino is also the author of that wonderful, weird essay collection, _The Boundary of Blur_ from Roof Books. I'll certainly seek out the poetry.

> There must be something roughly paradise-like about Our World if there's a little press in the Canary Islands called Zasterle that publishes little books like the new _Light Street_ by Nick Piombino. I don't know who he is but he writes beautiful poems. Maybe somebody else can take a turn doing a review, this little book deserves one. I'd quote but I don't have it in front of me & I'm still reading it. I showed it to Savage Reader and even she was won over. (Jack Spandrift just snarled - but I think he's jealous.)
>
> Nick Piombino, _Light Street_, Zasterle Press, 1997
>
> - Henry Gould (chauffeur to Savage Reader)

****

Fred Muratori
([redacted])
Reference Services Division
Olin * Kroch * Uris Libraries
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853
WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html

"The spaces between things keep getting bigger & more important."
- John Ashbery

****

↑ Index

404. Charles Alexander
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Wed 12 Feb 1997

> even (god help us) Dorn,

This Dorn fellow seems to be reviled by many right now, for reasons I understand. But are things he has done even worse than Pound, or Adorno (a not too-long-ago thread here), that the mere mention of his name requires a prayer? And are people still reading his work, some of which I still find insightful and quite brilliant?

charles

↑ Index

405. Charles Alexander
Re: review (very short)
Wed 12 Feb 1997

I'll second this, at least the part about the book. Don't know much about paradise, but I'd suppose Zasterle would be something to help compose one. And certainly if you want to know more about Nick Piombino, also read his essays in The Boundary of Blur, a book published a few years ago by Roof, which is marvelous.

I do have LIGHT STREET in front of me after recently finishing it. I don't find it very excerptable in really short bits, but I do like the sections of the title poem a lot, so here is section 3 from "Light Street."

3. Learn to wait.
Stroke the velvety silence.
Time's furry coat.
Not even a step, no move at all.
Blank? Good.
Impatient? Sorry.
Describing it is o.k.
One watery cup.
Reading.
Mending.
Going back.
Someone came between.
But this one also drifted away.

I also love the "book-ness" of this book, its size and shape and other characteristics, and particularly the cover design by Rosa Ventura. But then I'm always taken by these Zasterle books put out by Manuel Brito.

charles alexander

At 10:11 AM 2/12/97 EST, you wrote:
>There must be something roughly paradise-like about Our World if there's >a little press in the Canary Islands called Zasterle that publishes little >books like the new _Light Street_ by Nick Piombino. I don't know who he >is but he writes beautiful poems. Maybe somebody else can take a turn doing >a review, this little book deserves one. I'd quote but I don't have it in >front of me & I'm still reading it. I showed it to Savage Reader and even >she was won over. (Jack Spandrift just snarled - but I think he's jealous.)
>
>Nick Piombino, _Light Street_, Zasterle Press, 1997
>
>- Henry Gould (chauffeur to Savage Reader)
>
>

↑ Index

406. Kenneth Goldsmith
SOLIOQUY Press Release
Wed 12 Feb 1997

****
Bravin Post Lee Gallery
80 Mercer St.
New York, NY 10012
[redacted]

PRESS RELEASE
****

Soliloquy
An Installation by Kenneth Goldsmith

"Scheue Dich ja nicht davor, Unsinn zu reden!
Nur mußt Duf auf Deinen Unsinn lauschen."

(Don't for heaven's sake, be afraid of talking nonsense!
But you must pay attention to your nonsense.)

--Ludwig Wittgenstein

During the week of April 15, 1996 to April 21, 1996, the text-based artist Kenneth Goldsmith tape recorded every word he spoke from the moment he woke up until the moment he fell asleep. He subsequently transcribed the tapes into a simple word processing program, removing all peripheral language except his own; the words were then strung together into seven separate paragraphs (one for each day), thus creating the raw material for Soliloquy, to be presented at the Bravin Post Lee Gallery opening February 8 and continuing through March 7.

Soliloquy is an installation whereby the second most ephemeral human product, speech, is materialized and concretized in the gallery setting. If Goldsmith is to be taken as a somewhat typical example, then an average human being speaks 183,685 words each week. The artist has taken this week's worth of blather, printed it out (no editing, of course), and plastered the walls of the gallery, floor to ceiling, with three hundred forty four 22" x 30" sheets of paper containing nothing other than what he spoke during this one week last April.

"If every word spoken in New York City daily were somehow to materialize as a snowflake, each day there would be a blizzard."

--Kenneth Goldsmith

Soliloquy, in its profound black and white silence, calls into focus one our most basic (and most often taken for granted) functions: the role of speech in our everyday lives. Speech is flexibly construed as either a public or a private human function; we are often guarded in what we say to others, hoping not to be overheard. However, just as often, we are self-consciously aware that we are using language in a public way, meant to be heard by many. How we define ourselves and how others see us in the world is constructed by what we say. A monumental step in a child's development is the first recognized public use of language. Words are spoken, and then just as fast, they disappear. Goldsmith has frozen that which we often would like most to forget; in doing so, his own language and speech have been seized and made totally public.

By turns humiliating, enthralling, boring, tedious, absurd, absorbing, and yet always overwhelming, Soliloquy puts speech and its attendant issues under a magnifying glass. "The gallery will be covered wall-to-wall with bad breath and I'll be sure to get out of town as soon as it goes up. You can't believe all the things I said that I wish I hadn't," says the artist.

REPORTER: Why don't you write the way you talk?
GERTRUDE STEIN: Why don't you read the way I write?

Soliloquy opens Saturday February 8 and continues through March 7.

↑ Index

407. Joseph Lease
Re: A Lease on History
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Dear Ron Silliman,

Perhaps I should have said historiography: obviously Foucault means and I meant history the discourse not history the gooey stuff we all walk around in all the time and from which there is no escape (yawn).

Foucault seems to have been a kind of dervish of post-historical carnival.

His commitment to dissipating the idea of a unitary identity was ethical, obviously political in the broadest sense: like a law that would make all prisoners judges.

I agree that Foucault uses counter-history as a Telos: he celebrates it even when he says there is nothing to celebrate. Much the way Jameson celebrates Perelman in utterly romantic (apocalyptic) terms in the pomo tome.

So the problem comes in for Althusserians this way: if subjectivity is created by hailing, where is that critique located and what does it generate. I think that in your Leningrad piece (the piece on the task of the collaborator) you say that structuralism and poststructuralism taught poets that individuals don't exist. There's a severe conflict between Althusser's certainty (the opposite of Cezanne's doubt?) and Foucault's belief that individuals do exist emeshed in culture and history and power and multiple multiple multiple identies and because they exist they can chart culture and politics in a more effective way than they could if they didn't exist.

This question is not directly (as in the fallacy of imitative form) related to choices about how to write: how much representation and what kinds how much abstraction and what kinds.

But Foucault, like Lyotard, is deeply suspicious of old-boy meta-narratives. For example, a marxism that takes John Asbhery's you can't say it that way anymore and tries to give it historical determinist messianic force.

You once referred to the wounded-Buffalo school of romantic second-generation Black Mountain outsiders: that's in the same Leningrad memoir (a very subjective and personal reminsicence): my point here is not to defend individual poets but to locate the discussion of poetry zones, which discussion usefully opens the sociology of poetry and defnition and production, within an awareness of specific writing practices . . . with all their textures, all their graniness, tangy, palpable, audible, differences.

All best,
Joseph Lease

On Wed, 12 Feb 1997, Ron Silliman wrote:

> Joe Lease queries:
>
> I'd like to know if Ron Silliman agrees with Foucault that identity is plural and the purpose of effective history (counter history, radical history) is to dissipate it: this position is in severe conflict with Althusser
>
> Yes I do and no it's not. History doesn't have a "purpose." We might assign one, but that's another story.
>
> Ron Silliman

↑ Index

408. David Israel

Re: review (very short) / Zaserle

Wed 12 Feb 1997

Henry Gould notes --

<<<
There must be something roughly paradise-like about Our World if there's a little press in the Canary Islands called Zasterle that publishes little books like the new _Light Street_ by Nick Piombino. I don't know who he is but he writes beautiful poems.
>>>

that would be the same Zasterle Press that published, few years back, a little poem-book entitled Under Erasure by Mr. Barrett Watten. (gotta figure out where I put that tiny gem) somehow didn't note/recall Z.P. as locaated in the C islands

↑ Index

409. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: Essex Hemphill

Wed 12 Feb 1997

---

what I left out was that my interlocutor, having said that he saw Essex in IJ's film, proceeded to describe MR's film -- _Looking_ has always bugged me, perhaps because it seems so unHughesian, but I only saw it once and need to give it a fair chance on another viewing --

Does anybody know if there is any work being done towards collecting Hemphill's poetry? The one readily available selected writings is a tiny sampling of his work over the years -- _Nethula Journal_, by the way, ran from '79 through '82 -- published Michelle Parkerson (whose film on Audre Lorde is being shown again on some PBS stations this month), Sterling Brown, Ahmos Zu Bolton, Robert Hayden, (the irrepressible Judson Crews!), several early works by Harryette Mullen, Joanne Jimason, Maxine Clair and many others including your correspondent, then a student -- Great art work in every number -- the name of the journal came to Essex in a dream -- He had dreams like that! one of the reasons we all loved talking with him --

↑ Index

410. Joseph Lease
Re: ps to Ron Silliman
Wed 12 Feb 1997

It should have been obvious but:

I didn't argue that history has a purpose,

Foucault argues that counter-history has a purpose.

I suggest you look again at Foucault's discussion of genealogy and history: there's a problem for Althusser there.

All best,
Joseph

↑ Index

411. aerialedge
Re: ironwood query
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Michael Cuddihy wrote a book, essentially a memoir, about _Ironwood_ which was published in, I think, the late eighties. It's quite a good book, haven't come across anything like it really. An editorial memoir. However I can only assure you of its existence, can't remember title or publisher, can't find my copy.

SPD had, perhaps still has, some backissues of Ironwood.
The Spicer/Dickinson, Oppen, & last issue. They may be gone.

Best,
Rod

↑ Index

412. Tom Beard
Re: zones, etc.
Wed 12 Feb 1997

> Also, Bill Manhire has come up here a couple of times. I highly recommend > his witty collection of short stories, published in the U.S. as -The New > Land- (can't recall the publisher, sorry). Are there any of his poems > readily available in this country? The UCLA library has a selection of NZ > poetry, but it peters out in the early 90's.

Try "Sheet Music: Poems 1967-1982", Victoria University Press 1996. This is a collection of his early poems, most of which had been out of print for a long time. His more recent books, "Milky Way Bar" and "My Sunshine", also from VUP, should also be available, but IMO they're less interesting.

I have a longish review of Sheet Music and My Sunshine at

"http://www2.met.co.nz/nwfc/beard/www/my_sunshine_sheet_music.html",

in case you're interested.

Cheers &c,
Tom Beard.

↑ Index

413. A. Jennifer Sondheim
Perl program
Wed 12 Feb 1997

You can easily modify the program below to add/hide/delete material on a file for exquisite corpse; it's Perl, runs in Unix shell. Alan

---

```
#!/usr/local/bin/perl -w
Memo Program for Shell Account

$| = 1;
print "\n\aThese are your current messages:\n\n";
print `cat .message`;
`cp .message .message.old`;
print "\n\aWould you like to erase lines? If yes, type y.\n";
chop($no=<STDIN>);
if ($no ne "y") {goto FINAL;}
print "To erase lines enter first words or unique phrases,\n";
```

```
print "one per line, control-d to end.\n";
open(ZIP, ">> begin");
chop(@rem=<STDIN>);
print ZIP @rem;
close ZIP;
foreach $rem (@rem) {$this = "grep -v '^$rem' .message > .mess";
`$this`; `mv .mess .message`;}
`rm begin`;
FINAL: {
print "Would you like to add to current message list? If so, type y.\n";
chop($str=<STDIN>);
if ($str eq "y") {print "Add new lines now.\n";
print "Use carriage return at the end of each line, use ^d to end.\n";
open(APPEND, ">> .message"); @text=<STDIN>;
print APPEND @text;
close APPEND;}} exit(0);
```

↑ Index

414. David Kellogg
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Wed 12 Feb 1997

At 03:55 AM 2/11/97 -0800, Ron Silliman wrote:

> In your diagram, genre is (or at least seems to be) some intersection between community and tradition. But what, precisely, is tradition if it ain't community?? Is we a lion or is we a moose?

Moose. Actually, "tradition" in my schematic is not the same thing as community (what I have also called, perhaps more accurately, the socius). so genre as such is nowhere located on the field, although "lyric" seems to occupy the top-right corner and some forms of "witness poetry" the bottom left. The community/socius pole bears a big resemblance to what in Bourdieu's model of cultural fields goes by the name of "heteronomy". I'm speaking, remember, of the differences between a formal and a social appeal. So tradition is neither community nor practice -- rather, it's the sense of pastness that operates differently in different contexts -- one poet might invoke it through reference to rhyme and meter and another poet might invoke it by, say, allusion to Lowell.

One might think this way, for example, about the issue of journal publication. The poet who publishes in _Poetry_ or _APR_ in 1997 engages, by this gesture, primarily in an appeal to tradition, whereas the poet who publishes in _Tinfish_ or _New American Writing_ might be engaging primarily in an appeal to community. This is because of the different way the journals operate, one as a repository, the other as an ongoing dialogue. So a New Formalist magazine like the now-defunct _Reaper_ engages first, in building a community of like (light?) minds, even as that community attempts to revitalize the appeal to "tradition" (in part by recasting it -- i.e., writing in rhyme and meter -- as the true "innovation."

Part of my point in constructing this model is to claim that the poetry biz collectively misrecognizes the diversity of poetic practice and the different -- sometimes incompatible -- appeals to value by invoking something called "poetry" to cover the whole hog. Critical "success" in this account is nothing less than the seeming erasure of these different poles.

snappin' and cracklin' (and recently poppin'),
David
~~~
~~~

exceedingly problemantic, since all poems use language. "Always already" to borrow that annoying Derridian phrase. B. Perelman, in his recent _Marginalization of Poetry_ discusses various terms for the poetry that is his subject, but I wasn't very happy with his (non) conclusions. (People might argue there are poems that don't use language, eg "sound poems," "visual poems", but here the word poem is obviously modified with another word--suggesting that the word "poem" is meant to describe an abstract form, like a "feeling" or an "idea", though probably closer to the former than the latter in the US today--and this is something I hope to get back to below.) All "language" and "non-language" (or "traditional") poems use language, then. (I am being painfully simplistic and verbose in an effort to worry this out.)

All my examples are the most obvious possible. I suspect many on this list have thought this all out before but I this is an attempt to at least give words to my understanding, with the hope that people will agree or disagree where they deem appropriate. I apology for the length.

And most contemporary poets probably consider there use of language to be innovative (a term that comprises one boundary of the poetry field we have seen recently). From the modernists forward (maybe from the French Surrealists forward) I can think of few of even the most widely sold and read poets who would not consider themselves linguistically innovative: the late-great Frost being one (though even here not necessarily the _relatively_ young Frost Pound promoted), probably Phillip Larkin another, late Eliot, etc. As a rule of thumb, the less widely sold and read, the more likely a poet considers herself and is considered (by whom?-) innovative. Perhaps that's a stretch (provoked). But this would make sense in as much as our society (US, late 20th C) tends to consider poetry a politically radical activity and a progressive art form, and those poets who feel they are not getting enough public attention (not carried in enough bookstores, not taught enough in The Academy, etc) would probably rather assign this lack to their relative progressive- rather than regressive-ness. (ie, it would perhaps sound a little odd to hear a poet from this list say, "I'm just too fucking Old-Fashioned to be taken seriously!") And we have R Silliman's comment [damn, I haven't that post on this computer(I have to switch computers in the middle of the day)] that by "Innovation" is perhaps meant a drive shared by all poets, a groping towards something that seems to each writer unrealized (in language, in form, tradition, community, what have you or them). And I remember M. Bernstein in a post some weeks back saying that poetry was "revolutionary." But what constitutes "language poetry"? Not the fact it uses language. Not the fact that it uses language in an "innovative" fashion, at least not in a general way. But the term is used relatively easily, and clearly applies to some poets and not others (that "language poetry" as a label may always be stretched or snapped doesn't matter, as most any labeling of poetry "schools" may be as well, and the exceptions in this case do not effect the general rule, which is the function of "language poetry" as a label.) "Language poetry" sometimes refers to work that is characterized by broken syntax, sometimes fractured words, etc., either deliberately (eg, Bernstein) or as the result of a method of textual generation (eg, Mac Low). "Language poetry" sometimes refers to work that calls into question "representations of the self." Usually along the lines of demolishing the notion of the much-encompassing "lyrical I" in favor of poetry that eschews this "voice" in favor of a more "dialogic" (though I have never seen anyone on this list refer to Bakhtin's Dialogism or Social Heteroglossia) or "multi-vocal" voice. This is sometimes accomplished mimetically using the form described in the previous paragraph. Mac Low states as much in the Afterword to _The Pronouns_. Others have elsewhere. However, in general I find this categorical definition as incomprehensible as the "Innovative" one because there is much cross-over with poets usually considered outside the "language poetry" realm. For example, Bob Hass, like Mac Low, has claimed the importance of a "Buddhist belief in voice" (not quoting either one exactly) as imforming their poetry. And the question of how much any writer has personal or monological control over her voice is old and historically varient. "Language poetry" refers sometimes to works that are very "conventional" looking and sounding, but are written by "language poets." Recent B. Perelman as an example. "Language poetry" often seems to refer to works that are not widely bought and sold, stocked by Barnes and Noble, etc. In this sense "Language" seems a substitute for "Marginalized." At the same time of course our society is so relatively large, diverse and loosely-knit, and generally poetry-illiterate, that this Marginalization has to be primarily economic, since there is more than enough "room" in the field of "Language poetry" for an intersted party to read contentedly for quite some time, provided they don't expect to find what they want in the local store (distribution being regional, of course--you won't find any poetry in the Hallmark in Laconia, NH, for example), and (along the same line of reasoning) since "mainstream poetry" is not all that popular (except in the Academy) compared, say, to TV or doggeral, it might consider itself marginalized as well.

I must break off now.
Where does one go from here?
Among the many, what are some-things I've left out?

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

416. robert zamsky
Re: Rasula and poetry zones
Wed 12 Feb 1997

David -- While I find your chart interesting and intriguing, I also find it very troublesome and indicative of what I see as a limitation (and modernist hangover) in contemporary theory/crit. Why the obsession with mapping poetic endeavor? From the tenor of your comments, I take faith that you are not propounding fixity or stasis. However, why do we (under the unfortunately uncomplicated shadow of Jamesonian Marxism) insist on enumerating the differences between individuals? How is it that the philosophical endeavor is to investigate the boundaries between individuals? I know, this is a history that goes waaaayyyyyy back (Nietszche, no, Aristotle), but that doesn't make this history any more sacred than any other. What if we give up on the notion of spatial metaphors as ever being sufficient, or even ultimately useful, and try to work instead with the problem of contact and interchange -- i.e. Levinas or even Heidegger. That is, posing the question of difference this way: how do I know I'm not you? What if an encounter with otherness is really a frightening and threatening brush with the loss of self through intimacy? How might posing the question in these terms of fluid interchange effect our understanding of poetic "schools"? And, via Levinas, what exactly do we mean by "difference," anyway?

It seems to me that a notion of identity as existing through the fluid interchange/exchange with difference is what much "post-modern" lit. and poet bumps up against. The notion that my identity is not defined by my charting of my fourteen different subject positions, but through my complicated residence in the fluidity of the one.

Just some thoughts.

Best --

Robert Z.>
> Pardon the lengthy description of my own work. I post this here because it > is relevant to the discussion, and also because I'd like to hear from folks > who object to my account, so as to strengthen it. So here goes:
>
> Although I find Rasula's account of the four "zones" of poetry compelling, > Joseph Lease and Forrest Gander rightly point to problems with zones as an > operative category. Assigning particular poets to one or another zone is > only one of these problems. There are always exceptions, such as Lauterbach > and Gander himself, and the New Formalism seems, as Lease pointed out, a > blip on the poetic horizon, fast becoming (if it hasn't already become) > insignificant.

>
> Rasula has his finger on something important, however. In my own > work-in-progress on the poetic field (for an abstract, see > "http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/sri.html"), I conceive these zones as > abstractions, POLES OF VALUE within the contemporary construction of poetic > practice. (This work is obviously indebted to Pierre Bourdieu in ways that > I don't have time to explain right now.) What Rasula identifies as the MFA > school corresponds more or less to a poetry predicated on uncomplicated > representations of Self. Against this obviously is the poetry of social > conflict, community building, identity politics, etc. Call the struggle > between these two poles the horizontal (social) axis of the poetic field.
> Appeal to one or another of these sources of value has little to do with > form as such. What I call the formal, or "vertical" axis of the poetic > field comprises both NF and LP, but without naming them. While the New > Formalism is fading fast, the appeal to "tradition" still operates within a > lot of contemporary poetry, even language poetry as it becomes canonically > interesting. (I am speaking sociologically; I don't mean "interesting" as > an evaluative comment.) Against the appeal to "tradition" one could place an > appeal to "innovation." So that the contemporary poetic field looks more or > less like this:
>
> TRADITION
> ----------
> | |
> | |
> SELF | [the poetic field] | COMMUNITY
> | |
> | |
> ----------
> INNOVATION
>
>
> It seems to me that this kind of a model is more flexible than a model which > operates in terms of "zones" or "schools." As New Formalism fades, the > appeal to tradition is still operative. As language poetry becomes (to > paraphrase Ron Silliman) more of a moment than a movement, other > possibilities begin to inhabit the arena close to innovation. Obviously > much language poetry would still be placed close to the "innovation" pole, > but individual poets' work could be read at various places within the field.
> Moreover, poets might _move_, or be moved, as the vicissitudes of > canonization affect perception and reading. (Charles Bernstein's work seems > a lot more "traditional" now -- what with various historical accounts of > language poetry by Beach, Perelman, etc., and what with the recovery of > Stein and Zukofsky, and _The Tennis Court Oath_ for a broader audience in > various critical accounts -- than he did in, say, 1980. Also, Bernstein's > own criticism has helped create the traditional context for his work.) One > could also place individual poems, "schools" (Iowa, Brown, Buffalo), and > institutions at various points within the field.

>
> Well, whaddaya think? Does this account via poles of value escape some of > the problematics of the zone/school?
>
> Cheers,
> David
>
~~~
~~~

Large ostinato for piano & more

Feb 14th, 8pm
Grand Duo
Varied Trio
Strict Songs

Feb 15th, 8pm
Gamelan concert

Feb 16th, 12 noon
Poetry Reading: Lou Harrison (whos book of poems _Joys & Perplexities_ was published by Jargon, 1992); Jack & Adelle Foley; Hank Lazer; Joyce Jenkins; and probably Michael Tilson Thomas.

Feb 16th, 2 pm
Final Concert
Double Music (with John Cage) (ie composed with Cage?)
Concerto No. 1 for Flute & Percussion Serenade for Guitar and Optional Percussion Song of Quetzalcoatl
& more

There are also a number of free discussions, and $5 demonstrations (Gamelan on Saturday at 2pm), and a film...

↑ Index

418. DS
Re: Michael Coffey / poetry "schools"
Wed 12 Feb 1997

> Multicultural (not poetics--poetics is something else)--fine (and there's really no need to break that down0;

Why fine? I think this is the most confused and problematic of all labels.

Usually what people really mean is 'other cultures' which prescribes immediately who the book is for & not for. If there were a language element to it, there could be a non-English based category - but that leaves out those who chose to write in English. Even the old boiler post-colonial is better than multi-cultural though carrying its own complications.

Or perhaps multi-cultural implies that the poets are themselves 'multi-cultural' and maintain multiple-culture-personalities, but then don't we all to a certain degree.

Perhaps you need other labels such as 'indigenous' (a horrible word tho), or an 'international' that has poets broken down to their respective nationalities or alliegances. Perhaps there is room for an identity poetry, or even anti-colonial.

Just some thoughts,

dan

↑ Index

419. A. Jennifer Sondheim
jennifer's hatred of others
Wed 12 Feb 1997

-

jennifer's hatred of others

i want to steal your girl from you she doesn't belong with you she belongs with me hatred of couples
    i despise your glances smeared across your faces hatred of useless wealth your broaches pins drooling from your fat nipples get a life jennifer nobody deserves more than me money for your work your blackglass limousines airline tickets plied with liquor strafed artifacts archeologies steamships just cause i want you doesn't mean i want you you think you're better than me i'll bite your head off stop fucking reproducing
    i'll sever your coupled hands the two of you i'll pull my frock up and piss on your faces you'll love it slobber slobber i'll make you watch
 i can have anyone i want any sex any time anywhere cut your ring fingers off glint glint split you in two all that useless metal i'll take your watch
 i've got all the time now tick tick i can wait
   your motherboard's dead meat your father's lost his name you know i'm talking to you you smell of me

you always will simper simper you're not worth my piss simper simper jennifer's hungry
jennifer wants your girl

↑ Index

420. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Yes, I still read Dorn's work --

No, he hasn't, so far as I know, done anything AS BAD as Pound --

But is that some immutable measure -- I don't know if Alan Golding will remember this or not, but several years back at a dinner following sessions at the 20th century lit. conference, Dorn made remarks that made my skin crawl -- more cowardly then, I spent the rest of the evening at the other end of the table with Chris & Deborah Parr -- should have confronted him on the spot -- Dorn has much of interest to say still -- as many of us witnessed at Orono last year -- but he's also shown himself a bigot in unforgivable ways -- does one have to have exceeded Pound in some kind of sweepstakes of prejudice?

↑ Index

421. Joel Felix
Re: Zones v. Zoos, Conjunction Junction
Wed 12 Feb 1997

And I had figured Peter Cole, of Leviticus "fame." Maybe because growning up in Detroit in the '80s (and not knowing of the Tish's) I used to think that Conjunctions was the canonizer of contemp. lit/po.-- (I blush to reveal that to this list.) Anyways the writing world is a lot wider than Bradford Morrow's A list-- but the formulation of Taggart Cole Sobin could be easily mistaken for a Conjunctions school by a 17 year old.

joel felix.

Dodie Bellamay wrote:
>Oddly, Keith, I thought that Ron meant Norma Cole in his list:
>

>>Consider, for example, that non-group posed by Forrest Gander. Several >>of the folks on that list--Taggart, Cole and Sobin, say (and to some >>degree Palmer)--all share enough features to compose a group of their >>own except that the Loner status with all its aching pretentiousness is >>one of its major preconditions.
>
>I don't think Ron would fall into the trap of naming men by their last >names and then slip to a first name basis for a woman--I think Ron is much >too aware for that.
>
>But then he added:
>
>>All of them are male second generation >>Black Mountain poets whose work is notably more timid than that of >>their elders.
>
>So I figured it must be some male Cole that I'm not familiar with.
>
>Who is this mysterious Cole?

↑ Index

422. Susan Wheeler

Re: Names

Wed 12 Feb 1997

Ma's side:
grandma: Olive C. Diffenderfer Skeen
her brother/my great uncle: Meldrum C. Diffenderfer my uncle/her son: Carrel Wesley Skeen
My dad's side:
grandma: May Wheeler
her brother/great uncle: Winslow Harding Loveland

I got no middle name (unlike my brother, who got Daniel AND Harding with Wheeler) so when Carrel Wesley (my only uncle or aunt) traced the Skeen side back through Daniel Boone via his daughter Susannah and I was 7 I took on the shebang until my current teacher Miss Lewis raised a fuss about whether I had LEGALLY changed it to Susannah Boone Wheeler. That was the end of any flirtations with a middle name.

But there was also talk of my being named for a great great grandmother >on my maternal side, Rachel Leet Wilson, who married Richard Harding and >gave birth to Rebecca Harding (later Rebecca Harding Davis, author of >_Life in the Iron Mills_, for you Am Lit trivia mavens).

>
>Loden is a made-up name (1972 vintage). Long, exhausting story, as I'm >sure is true of many (esp. women's) last names.
>
>Rachel
>
>
Susan Wheeler
[redacted]

37 Washington Square West #10A
New York, New York 10011
[redacted] phone/fax

↑ Index

423. Michael Boughn
Who's Zoning Who
Wed 12 Feb 1997

(Who's Zoning Who?)

Consider, for example, the group of poets consisting of W, X, Y, and Z. All middle aged males, they recognized early in their poetic careers that fame, in contemporary American society, is a function of marketing, and that the marketing of ideas about poetry especially requires a gang (also known as a "school" or "group"), as their spiritual forebears, the New Critics, had effectively demonstrated. They formed one and then proceeded to successfully market each other through the gang's various magazines, publishing houses, anthologies, and University courses. Sharing an acute Oedipal anxiety about the poetries which preceded them, they proposed their writing as being involved in a radical social-historical "rupture". This served to cover the fact that they neither understood what constitutes beauty in the contemporary world nor were capable of engaging the complex question of its importance to poetry (seeing it presumably as somehow displaced by justice). Instead, relying on polemical attacks on "genre" to cover their tracks, they produced a lackluster, prosaic "writing" in which simplistic ideas about "ideology" were masked by syntagmatic verbal trickery.

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

424. George Bowering
Re: Clothes Make the Man
Wed 12 Feb 1997

> George,
>
> No wonder you didn't get mugged. Dressed like that, people probably thought you were in one of Sun Ra's Astro-adjectival Arkestra's of the period.

Yeah, except this was on a Thursday. Sun Ra, in those days, played every Monday night at Slugs's. I wish I had been there then. I would have worn more things made of silverfoil, though. Onliest time I heard Sun Ra was at some grotto college in Montreal in about 1971. That was his period when he had flashing lights up and down his arms and onh his antennae.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

425. David Bromige
divers
Wed 12 Feb 1997

Zasterle Press certainly w a s in the Canaries. Manuel Brito is, I believe,its editor/publisher. This press has done many handsome books by many poets known to listmembers,I ween--a number of them L=A=N poets. Our Listmaster will perhaps fill in the gaps.

I have written abt L=A=N poetry as a movement within a tendency.

I always found the analogy useful when i was teaching, of the poem as a window so clean as to be invisible, so that the scene it gives onto, dominates; or the poem as a window so interestingly flecked with cobwebs, flies, dirt, etc, that the scene beyond fades behind such immmediacy. This latter, of course, being langPo. I'm aware this leaves a lot unanswered, but it made a handy place to start.

It leaves out the struttin' pomposity of many clean-window poems, where one cant not-see the window because the figure of the poet gets in the way.

LangPo may be this tiny, marginalized semi-group effort certain people on this list perceive, but its influence is everywhere visible. Not a maindrains poet whose work doesnt reveal that, as the 80s progressed, its author took on some coloration from L P.

Neo-formalism is in my opinion down to LAngPo too. I wd see it as well, as a re-action against the workshop poem. Btw, announcements of the death of the avant-garde continue to reveal the imperative of novelty.

Happy typo of the day: lingusts. (as in "a plague of lingusts has been feeding upon the General Reader"?)

Enjoyable, too, is the deliberate homonym "light-minded." "We were of light minds so we floated up to an early circle."

Aldon, always glad to read yr postings, buddy, so caszh & so infoful.

db--trying to keep his postings down to one a day.

↑ Index

426. David Bromige
second posting of the day
Thu 13 Feb 1997

---

and then i forgot to say that Nick Piombino who lives in NYC has a book out with Sun & Moon of excellent poems, & in a later issue of _Avec_ some of his aphorisms. His essays, so dense as to double up as poems, can be found in a number of locations, and are a m u s t for anyone interested in the poetic practice of the present. db

↑ Index

427. aerialedge
Re: Michael Coffey / poetry "schools"
Thu 13 Feb 1997

"a readership that simply wants to browse and make its own decisions, thank you."

Thank you Fred Muratori.

The question remains how long there will be "poetry providers" -- i.e. non-corporate bookstores, or anything else that isn't an imposed common denominator. Not to be too doleful, after all we do have Brighten the Day.

↑ Index

428. Marina deBellagente laPalma

names' fluidity

Thu 13 Feb 1997

At birth, in the late 1940s in Italy, I was named Marina Ada Paolina Oleario-de Bellagente. (a long story.) Came to Amerika in mid 50s and whenever a teacher began stammering, I would just say "present." In "the sixties" (ahem) I was Liza Bread to many of my friends, and Marina Bostedt when I published poetry; in the 70s I became Marina LaPalma as I hand typeset the title page of the first book we ever printed as Kelsey Street Press (Neurosuite, translations from Italian of Margherita Guidacci's poetry.) In some parallel universe I have been for 16 years a certain Mrs.Goldstein. My husband is named Richard Goldstein, but at the age of 15 he re-named himself Rich Gold. It is now his professional name as it was through the 70s and early 80s as an electronic artist; he is legally still Richard Goldstein but does get checks for Rich Gold sometimes and hotel and car rental bookings in various parts of the world can be annoyingly ambiguous or unstable because of it.

Our child, Henry is named after my maternal grandfather Enrico. [One of my cousins in Boston is named Henry. He is now in his sixties and has always been an artist; for many years, on the various gallery notices I received, he was "Henry"; Then, ... around the time that anything Italian (Armani, arugula, caffe-latte, Bruno Magli) ascended to the zenith of trendiness ... he was transmuted into" Enrico".] Our son has been assigned the paternal "Goldstein", partly to weave him securely into the rather large Goldstein clan; but since he was adopted at birth and we have a good relationship with his birthparents and their families, he in fact began life listed on his hospital birth certificate as Aleister (after Crowley) Drake (as in dungeons-and) Jozens (his birthmother's name.) This was just a sort of courtesy or formality, as we all knew that a few months later when the legal adoption was finalized before a judge, the state of California would issue a new birth certificate listing me and Rich as his parents and giving him the name we chose. When he grows up, he can pick from among these, as well as his birthfather's last name, which is Crites. So there you go -- seven-plus names on the mailbox and counting.

Marina deBellagente LaPalma
329 Pope Street
Menlo Park CA 94025
[redacted]

↑ Index

429. Bil Brown
Re: fake avant garde ID
Thu 13 Feb 1997

I have decided that I hate poetry. Bil

↑ Index

430. Ron Silliman
Crackle
Thu 13 Feb 1997

>Date: Tue, 11 Feb 1997 13:37:37 -0800
>From: [redacted]
>Subject: Re: Zones v. Zoos
>
>At 11:51 AM -0500 2/11/97, Keith Tuma wrote:
>
>>So we're to believe that Taggart and Sobin are nostalgic, and pretentious to boot? Second generation watered down Black Mountain? (And Cole Swensen got accidentally tossed in THAT pile).
>
>Oddly, Keith, I thought that Ron meant Norma Cole in his list:
>
>>Consider, for example, that non-group posed by Forrest Gander. Several of the folks on that list--Taggart, Cole and Sobin, say (and to some degree Palmer)--all share enough features to compose a group of their own except that the Loner status with all its aching pretentiousness is one of its major preconditions.
>
>I don't think Ron would fall into the trap of naming men by their last >names and then slip to a first name basis for a woman--I think Ron is much too aware for that.
>
>But then he added:
>
>>All of them are male second generation Black Mountain poets whose work is notably more timid than that of their elders.
>
>So I figured it must be some male Cole that I'm not familiar with.
>
>Who is this mysterious Cole?
>
>Dodie

Peter Cole, published by Station Hill.

Aside to Moose Kellogg (for whom this Rice Krispie thread must be dedicated), young Tom is beautiful and I like all the links to the family (how does that fit into the map?).

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

431. henry gould
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Thu 13 Feb 1997

On Wed, 12 Feb 1997 11:32:38 -0700 Charles Alexander said:
>
>This Dorn fellow seems to be reviled by many right now, for reasons I >understand. But are things he has done even worse than Pound, or Adorno (a >not too-long-ago thread here), that the mere mention of his name requires a >prayer? And are people still reading his work, some of which I still find >insightful and quite brilliant?
>

Gunslinger is more fun than chasin coyotes down the arroyo. It's the most-fun-to-read epic ever written.

- Jack Spandrift
the hard-drinkin, tough-talkin po-yeti from Brainerd, MN Jack's CD, "Whoopin with the Cranes", is now available from Wooden Nickel Press, PO Box 12, Varmint, Wyo 11191. Send $35. cash only prepaid with SASE.

↑ Index

432. charssmith
Re: Zones v. Zoos//Cole
Thu 13 Feb 1997

In a message dated 97-02-12 12:19:35 EST, Dodie writes:

<< So I figured it must be some male Cole that I'm not familiar with.

Who is this mysterious Cole? >>

I assumed Ron was referring to Peter Cole (_Rift_, Station Hill, & the translator of Shmuel HaNagid, Princeton).

Charles

↑ Index

433. Pritchett,Pat

Re: Names/Of No Known Provenance

Thu 13 Feb 1997

At last count, there were 34 Patrick John Francis Pritchetts roaming throughout the continental US alone, all of them more or less identical excepting of course facial features, height, weight, length of nose, hair, eye & skin color, visual acuity, sexual orientation, reading preferences, occupations, etc. Oddly, they are all orphans.

From: Susan Wheeler
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: Names
Date: Thursday, February 13, 1997 10:47AM

Ma's side:
grandma: Olive C. Diffenderfer Skeen
her brother/my great uncle: Meldrum C. Diffenderfer
my uncle/her son: Carrel Wesley Skeen
My dad's side:
grandma: May Wheeler
her brother/great uncle: Winslow Harding Loveland

I got no middle name (unlike my brother, who got Daniel AND Harding with Wheeler) so when Carrel Wesley (my only uncle or aunt) traced the Skeen side back through Daniel Boone via his daughter Susannah and I was 7 I took on the shebang until my current teacher Miss Lewis raised a fuss about whether I had LEGALLY changed it to Susannah Boone Wheeler. That was the end of any flirtations with a middle name.

Susan Wheeler
[redacted]

37 Washington Square West #10A
New York, New York 10011
[redacted] phone/fax

↑ Index

434. Steven Marks
paradoxical criticism
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Henry Gould says:
>The honest critic will (paradoxically) partake of the enthusiasm and inspiration of the artist h/she critiques.

Most of the time I will only write reviews of books I can get excited about. Why spend time on what doesn't set me on fire? And I agree, too, with another post which raised the question of whether there is good and bad poetry. I find that I am always amazed at what I can discover in "bad" poetry. In theater, for example, I know that I have learned as much from a "bad" production as from a good one. Something about a good production allows me to settle back and enjoy, whereas a "bad" production forces me to figure out why. And in figuring out why, I often see other possibilities that are covered up in the good performance. I'm not sure if this is as true with poetry. It may even be more true with some "schools" than others. I'm going to have to think about this. I've always felt that a review, to lesser or greater degrees, should generate some of the same excitement that the work being critiqued generates.

Steven Marks

Samples of reviews, criticism and poetry at

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

435. shoemakers
Re: Michael Coffey / poetry "schools"
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Rod--Heard a spot on NPR the other day about independent book stores and music stores, respectively, forming support networks in order to come up with strategies to combat the big-chain takeover. One of the assumptions (a good one) was that the independents tend to have knowledgeable and motivated staff, more aware of local needs and interests. Nothing surprising there. But one of the ideas was that fave "local" artists wld be featured at other stores in the (non-local) network. Thus, more "product" for the stores and more distribution for the artists. Also, on the music end of things many major labels were in fact more than willing to work with these networks, happy to have another outlet. Any networking going on up DeeCee way?

steve

Steve Shoemaker

↑ Index

436. Fred Muratori
Darn Those Dorns!
Thu 13 Feb 1997

>On Wed, 12 Feb 1997 11:32:38 -0700 Charles Alexander said:
>>
>>This Dorn fellow seems to be reviled by many right now, for reasons I >>understand. But are things he has done even worse than Pound, or Adorno (a >>not too-long-ago thread here), that the mere mention of his name requires a >>prayer? And are people still reading his work, some of which I still find >>insightful and quite brilliant?
>>
>
>_Gunslinger_ is more fun than chasin coyotes down the arroyo. It's the >most-fun-to-read epic ever written.
>
I think we're confusing Dorns here. I believe that the Dorn Charles refers to is "Dr." Alfred (or Albert?) Dorn, arch-Formalist and president of the New World Order of (something) Poets, an organization which sponsors annual contests for the best sonnet, villanelle, etc., and sends out mass-mailings to Poets & Writers listees. Much as I like experimental work, I don't break out in hives when I read a rhymed sonnet, either.
Still, this guy is a little scary. Has been photographed affecting a cape and pointy beard. He's published work in _The Hudson Review_, and I think The Formalist, among others. Though he's ardent in his promotion of strict traditional forms, it's not clear where he stands on Social Credit or the efforts of the Axis Powers to take over the world, so I doubt that comparisons to Pound are warranted.

-- Fred Muratori

****

Fred Muratori
([redacted])
Reference Services Division
Olin * Kroch * Uris Libraries
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853

"The spaces between things keep getting bigger & more important."
- John Ashbery

WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html
****

↑ Index

437. dbkk
Re: Zones v. Zoos
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Speaking of Zoos--

a friend e-mailed the following to me this morning.

Dodie

We all joke that "everybody" has done a zine, but NOW I actually believe it - - the plot of today's episode of Sesame Street is that Big Bird does a zine! They use the word magazine not zine, but that's the basic idea of it. He watches people buying various specialized magazines at Hooper's Store, and asks whether there's a magazine just for people like him - - big birds. When he's told that there isn't such a thing, he throws a small tantrum, then decides - - ta da! - - that he'll do one himself! Rest of the episode follows him as he draws a cover, comes up with story ideas, does an interview, has photographs taken, puts his issue together, etc, and creates Issue One of BIG YELLOW BIRD. (Didn't see how the episode finally ended - - snuck off to take a shower instead.)

↑ Index

438. Karl Richter
POEM
Thu 13 Feb 1997

HOW GRANDFATHER FLEW

Grandmother sculpts birds of smoke with her cheeks, tongue, lips and puffs them sailing through her wedding dress hung like a curtain and stained as yellow as the sunlit dust her creatures shatter into.
And somewhere in the sack the day drags behind it,
a lost hawk worries the storyteller's campfire,
swooping and kissing the tale with his wings.

--Karl Richter

↑ Index

439. henry gould
Re: Darn Those Dorns!
Thu 13 Feb 1997

DORNETTE

The name donated him when he was born worn in good stewardship for forty years and polished like a medal for his peers was neither square nor round - but it was Dorn.

One syllable - and yet it was a horn that trumpeted his fame from here to there and blew down other Dorns who dared to share that doorway to the glory that was Dorn.

If I could be an Alfred or an Ed or even Egbert, Ethelred or Ned I'd Hale and Harty be, let it be said - yet deep within my Hank-kerchief I've sworn when all our names are buried in the corn it's better to be loved than be adorn.

- Jack Spandrift "the hard-drinkin, tough-talkin po-yeti from Brainerd, MN"
Jack's new CD, "Cowpokin' Fun", is available from Leatherwurst Press, PO Box Irrelevant, Blasted, Wyo 1119413. Send check or money order IN ADVANCE ONLY for $45. Include SASE. No phone calls.

↑ Index

440. Keith Tuma
die a critic
Thu 13 Feb 1997

My chairperson put a copy of the brand new Diacritics in my mailbox, with this note attached: "This arrived yesterday and I thought you might have a more immediate interest in it. I'd like it back at some point but there's no hurry."

So I've been thinking about that note and reading around in the magazine instead of doing what i should be doing. I want to say first that the chairperson here is a well-meaning, curious man. I took it that his decision to pass on the magazine to me involved a judgment; he had more important things to do than to read it (now). And that's what I've been thinking about in the wake of this poetry zones business. A few random remarks:

Jonathan Monroe is to be congratulated for moving the discussion of exploratory anti-genre, anti-disciplinary "poetries" into the moneyed domain of composition and rhetoric pedagogy. I'm not going to take up his arguments, or problems I might have with them--though JM's enthusiasm shines brightest in his suggestion that 3rd graders might be made to read Bob Perelman's "China" beside Frost. The real value of JM's article is simply in recognizing the power of this pervasive institution. Want an audience for exploratory poetry? Want efficacy for its practices? Then find a way to get it into composition courses. Except that, having tried as much, one wants to know how to keep the discipline from showing up again after what is taken as "the party," as carnival, is over.

I've also been looking at the listmaster's contribution. Some of those funny- banal (or is that banal-funny) poems called "Memories" are included. And no doubt many an astute reader will note that once again Mr. B is crossing genres in his essay-text. But what I noticed is that the text is a collage of fragments some of which were written for other purposes and occasions. It begins, for instance,with a message CB wrote to this very listserv (so much for keeping membership down, Charles,for "word of mouth"). And there are (I suspect)other passages written for elsewhere, imported into this text. The "traditional" justification for doing something like what CB seems to be up to would be the pursuit of a better or more perfect articulation of one's claims. (A second, slightly less traditional use of these tactics would seem to involve the narrating of one's own process of composition--I said it once like this, and now i say it like this, or I said it once like this, and this is what I want to make of all that now.) But I'm not sure that this is exactly what CB is up to (perhaps he might clarify). I think that CB is moving things around, putting it in new constellations for new occasions and situations, as a way of combatting that very glut of information which makes my chairperson inclined to put aside this very Diacritics. Approaching the unapproachable (Cavell), saying again and again, and saying just a little differently not necessarily to say it "right"--he's given up that fantasy--but to redeploy. But increasingly i'm thinking of that re-deployment--that moving stuff round from listserv to essay, talk to essay, etc.--as a tactic that might be (and is)imagined as a response to--as it were--the glut confronting my chairperson as a rather desperate sign. Say it again and again because nobody is listening Glut confronts glut in a melancholy aesthetics of proliferation.

Just a few random, spontaneously generated and probably incoherent words to clog your disk, by way of a first and partial review of the Diacritics issue all deserve congratulations for.

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

441. Bob Perelman

fake avant garde ID

Thu 13 Feb 1997

TO THE LISTSERV

Aliens have inhabited my aesthetics for decades. Really since the early 70s.

Before that I pretty much wrote as myself, though young. But something has happened to my memory, my judgment: apparently, my will has been affected. That old stuff, the fork in my head, first home run,

Dad falling out of the car--
I remember the words, but I just can't get back there. I think they must be screening my sensations. I'm sure my categories have been messed with. I look at the anthologies in the big chains and campus bookstores, even the small press opium dens, all those stanzas against that white space-- they just look like the models in the catalogs. The models have arms and legs and a head, the poems mostly don't, but other than that it's hard --for me anyway-- to tell them apart. There's the sexy underwear poem, the sturdy workboot poem you could wear to a party in a pinch, the little blaspheming dress poem. There's variety, you say:

the button-down oxford with offrhymed cuffs.
The epic toga, showing some ancient ankle, the behold! the world is changed and finally I'm normal flowing robe and shorts, the full nude, the scatter-- Yes, I suppose there's variety, but the looks, those come on and read me for the inner you I've locked onto with my cultural capital sensing device looks!

No thanks, Jay Peterman! No thanks,
"Ordinary Evening in New Haven"! I'm just waiting for my return ticket to have any meaning, for those saucer-shaped clouds to lower! The authorities deny any visitations --hardly a surprise.

And I myself deny them-- think about it. What could motivate a group of egg-headed, tentacled, slimier-than-thou aestheticians with techniques far beyond ours to visit earth, abduct naive poets, and inculcate them with otherworldly forms that are also, if you believe the tabloids, rather salacious? And these abductions always seem to take place in some provincial setting: isn't that slightly suspicious? Why don't they reveal themselves hovering over some New York publishing venue? It would be nice to get some answers here-- we might learn something, about poetry if nothing else, but I'm no help, since I'm an abductee, at least in theory, though, like I say, I remember little. And yet this writing seems pretty normal: complete sentences; semicolons; yadda yadda. I seem to have lost my avant garde card in the laundry. They say that's typical. Well, you'll just have to use your judgment, earthlings! It's your job! Back to work! As if you could leave! And you thought gravity was a problem!

↑ Index

442. Mark Wallace
Situation #14
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Situation #14 is now available, featuring the work of Robert Fitterman, Lisa Samuels, Hoa Nguyen, Stephen Ratcliffe, Loss Glazier, John Marvin, Noah de Lissovoy, David McAleavey, and David Golumbia.

Subscriptions to Situation are $10 for four issues; $3 for single and back issues. Address: 10402 Ewell Ave., Kensington, MD 20895. Make checks payable to Mark Wallace.

Anyone who wants further information is welcome to back channel me at this e-mail address.

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

443. Mark Wallace
Nick Piombino
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Just wanted to definitely agree with others that Nick Piombino's new book Light Street from Zasterle is well worth reading, as is BOUNDARY OF BLUR which also received some recent plugs. But I did want to mention Nick's other collections of poetry--his first book, POEMS, and an issue of Abacus, FROZEN WITNESS. His work can also be found in AVEC, CHAIN, SITUATION and many other publications. To my own sense, one of Nick's most interesting explorations involves what he once described to me as "the poltics of attention"--the way human consciousness, in its priveleging of some forms of phenomena over others, inevitably reflects built-in ideological biases. Much of Nick's own poetry seeks to challenge an unconscious "politics of attention" through language and other material techniques designed to bring consciousness back to attention to itself, rather than remaining an unconscious immersion in unquestioned social ideologies. One of the things that makes his poetry so interesting is that he's always looking where one least expects him to be looking.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

444. David Golumbia
Re: fake avant garde ID
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Wow.

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

445. James Brook
new PHAROS available
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Dear listed, I'm posting this for my friends at PHAROS in Paris, who were kind enough to publish a couple of my poems in the current issue (along with my translation of a poem by Sebastian Reichmann, familiar to Talisman and Exquisite Corpse readers).

They were also kind to some others of recognizable name!

--J.

- - - - - The Winter 1997 PHAROS, the magazine's fifth issue, is now available. PHAROS is a literary magazine published twice a year in Paris. It features poetry and prose by both Paris-based and international writers. PHAROS was founded in 1995 as the offshoot of a writing workshop taught by Alice Notley and Douglas Oliver at the British Institute. Its contributors, besides Notley and Oliver, have included Robert Creeley, Marilyn Hacker, Anselm Hollo, Diane Johnson, Iain Sinclair, Arthur Sze, David Lehman and Anne Waldman, among others.

Winter 1997 Table of Contents:

PANSY MAURER-ALVAREZ: Light May Crack Through in Several Ways
KAREN PEPPER: Final Monarch, The Taking of a Russian Tea, In Silhouette GEORGIA SMITH: From "Honoria"
ROBERT MARX: Stained Glass
DOUGLAS OLIVER: Chinese Bridport, Calling Them Home
DAVID LEHMAN: April 30, June 11
LYNN HJELMGAARD: Love in the Time of Plastic
SEBASTIAN REICHMANN: Russian Christmas, Rue Daru
MOE SEAGER: Joni's Comeback
NORRIE BLAQUART: Insubstantial, Just Looking HARRY GHISI: Wood
MARIE HOUZELLE: Tell Me, Newlywed
ADAM DE LINDE: Postcards
DYLAN BRIE DUCEY: Frozen Mud
TRACY DANISON: Bones of Guy de Maupassant Excavated on Champs-Elysees: Belle Epoque Writer Celebrated SUSAN HYMAN: From "A Cherry Orchard"
YURIKO TAMAKI: Nausea, Life of Maruo
REINE ARCACHE MELVIN: From "A Normal Life"
GLORIA FRYM: From "Letters Home"
LINDA HEALEY: From "Message From the Deep"
WILLIAM BURKE: Our Dying Down, Through a Brutality
LAURE MILLET: Me I Don't Even Look Like Myself
JAMES BROOK: The Opening, Cinderella Story
ALICE NOTLEY: Meet Me at La Chapelle for Some More Salami
KEN MACKENZIE: Icarus, Truth, Ave Maria

Subscriptions

Subscriptions to PHAROS for one year (two issues), postpaid, are 60 French francs, $15 (US) or £8 (UK). Please make check or money order out to Douglas Oliver.

Submissions

PHAROS welcomes submissions from writers in Paris and farther afield. Please address correspondence to:

PHAROS
The British Institute
11, rue de Constantine 75007 Paris
FRANCE

↑ Index

446. henry gould
Re: darn thos dorns!
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Just want to add to the glut & say I take no responsibility for the "sonnets" and other splursions of "Jack Spandrift." I've known him for a long time - a small-town librarian & small-time crook from Bludget, Wyo, with a huge chipmunk on his shoulder that eats rhyme and meter for lunch. His execrable take on a man's good name (it is the 13th, after all) warrants severe derision. His only redeeming statement was when he wrote in a previous post that _Gunslinger_ is the "funnest"[sic] epic ever written, which I agree with 100 percent.

Ignore Jack Spandrift, people. Or write a derogatory "driftette". He deserves all the buffalo shit out there (excuse, me, I mean glut).

the Hon. Henry Gould

↑ Index

447. David Israel
Re: fake avant garde ID
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Thanks, Bob --

sitting here at my word processing cubicle in my DC patent law firm as the afternoon lates, I enjoyed that.
Interesting you're expanding themes of Virtual Reality (I guess it was called?) in yet-weirder ways.
In lieu of an in-person reading, this was a hearty pick-me-up.

regards,
d.i.

↑ Index

448. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
Bob's poem read/discussed & redeemed
Thu 13 Feb 1997

I have decided that I hate poetry.
 -- Bil Brown

Wow.
 -- David Golumbia

_____

Congratulations Bob Perelman!

Never, while I've been on this list, that I can remember (and I'm not saying I can), has a posted poem produced such quick and diverse responses from its participants.

It is an appropriate summation of the "audience" thread that has woven through the dialogue recently.

Me? I enjoyed reading it-- twice. And then, after I "sacked" a second phone call to voice-mail, I deleted it forever, with a flick of the finger.

Warmly,

daniel bouchard

(who forever refuses to divulge secrets of family names or personal attire)

↑ Index

449. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest
Re: Darn Those Dorns!
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Bravo Henry!

let them not be forlorn, oh dorns, forgotten, misbegotten, misplaced
When sky is a tattered curtain to the last-born of earth, Dorn, oh Dorn will loft to Grace

e

↑ Index

450. Douglas
Re: Nick Piombino
Thu 13 Feb 1997

Thanks Mark for mentioning POEMS. It is truly a great book. And Sun & Moon Press is still offering the book at a price of $5.00.
Hope everyone will get a copy and read this remarkable poet.

Douglas

Mark Wallace wrote:
>
> Just wanted to definitely agree with others that Nick Piombino's new book > Light Street from Zasterle is well worth reading, as is BOUNDARY OF BLUR > which also received some recent plugs. But I did want to mention Nick's > other collections of poetry--his first book, POEMS, and an issue of > Abacus, FROZEN WITNESS. His work can also be found in AVEC, CHAIN, > SITUATION and many other publications. To my own sense, one of Nick's most > interesting explorations involves what he once described to me as "the > poltics of attention"--the way human consciousness, in its priveleging of > some forms of phenomena over others, inevitably reflects built-in > ideological biases. Much of Nick's own poetry seeks to challenge an > unconscious "politics of attention" through language and other material > techniques designed to bring consciousness back to attention to itself, > rather than remaining an unconscious immersion in unquestioned social > ideologies. One of the things that makes his poetry so interesting is that > he's always looking where one least expects him to be looking.
>
> mark wallace
>
> /----------\
> | |
> | [redacted] "I have not yet begun |
> | to go to extremes" |
> | GWU: |
> | http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw |
> | EPC: |
> | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace |
> |_____|

↑ Index

451. George Bowering

Re: Bob's poem read/discussed & redeemed

Thu 13 Feb 1997

> I have decided that I hate poetry.
> -- Bil Brown
>
> Wow.
> -- David Golumbia

Well, I like poetry better than Carl Lewis.
 -- George Bowering
>
>_____
>
>
>Congratulations Bob Perelman!
>
>Never, while I've been on this list, that I can remember (and I'm not saying I >can), has a posted poem produced such quick and diverse responses from its >participants.
>
>It is an appropriate summation of the "audience" thread that has woven through >the dialogue recently.
>
>Me? I enjoyed reading it-- twice. And then, after I "sacked" a second phone >call to voice-mail, I deleted it forever, with a flick of the finger.
>
>Warmly,
>
>daniel bouchard
>
>(who forever refuses to divulge secrets of family names or personal attire)

George Bowering.
,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

452. Tom Beard
Re: Nick Piombino
Thu 13 Feb 1997

> To my own sense, one of Nick's most interesting explorations involves what he once described to me as "the poltics of attention"--the way human consciousness, in its priveleging of some forms of phenomena over others, inevitably reflects built-in ideological biases.

Interesting to consider how much of this "privileging of some forms of phenomena over others" is ideological and how much is biological - we tend to notice things that may be a physical threat to us, for example. Which may be why red is a good colour for attracting attention - red things in nature are often either signals of hazards (as in some animals' and plants' warning colouration) or on fire. Bitter things are often unripe. Sudden, loud noises were often signals that something was about to fall on us or eat us.

These are very crude examples, of course. But the human capacity (read: mania) for setting boundaries and dividing the world into categories may have somehow developed out of the fact that edge-detection neural systems appear at a very basic level of our visual perception.

Tom Beard

↑ Index

453. petersm
Alice Notley
Thu 13 Feb 1997

---

does anybody know the e-mail or snail mail address of alice notley?

mark peters

"mike's naked with no clothes and no head."

--lyla goodberry

↑ Index

454. henry
Re: Who's Zoning Who
Thu 13 Feb 1997

This was one of the sharpest statements according to my lights in a while. Care to entrap yourself with further remarks on what beauty in the contemporary world involves? & its relation to poetry? & its displacement by justice? Simone

Weil has some interesting speculations on beauty, justice and mediation, according to the Greeks. Let me quote from Pharisee #12 Psychompompos. . .

What if Paradise exists, but we don't see it. The Kingdom of Heaven is "at hand." & utopia is a political compromise hammered together out of human p ride and earwax. "let the wind speak that is Paradise." It's the day after Ash Wednesday. Unless ye repent ye shall all likewise perish. They have earwax at CVS, along with Jack Spandrift's latest CDs and some dusty shelves of poetry zones. Go for it. It's the 90s - glut & choice are the bywo rds of our online world. Manual labor is learning how to use a backhoe & save. & William Blackstone daubed his forehead with thumbprint of ash.

↑ Index

455. Wendy Battin

Re: Who's Zoning Who

Thu 13 Feb 1997

Tricky, but yes. How much of rejection of "self" (& g*ds know I sympathize when it comes to poetry as dull bar seduction, see what a sensitive dude/brave dudette I am) also throws out what wd be worth preserving if the revolution ever succeeds? I'd love to see a lot more rejection of ego & superego, to adopt some retro terms, and more plumbing into the part of self that says why it's worth staying alive, worth seeking out other humans, worth the hassle of fighting through Babel and money and resentment. Silly beauty & foolish truth, because it's foolish to care that a primate band invents justice & somehow tries to make it, & silly if you see & think to go on living, but we do. Where are the gifts that keep that weird enterprise going? I find bits & pieces of them in all kinds or reporting & recording, but rarely find anyone willing to value them in public.

Wendy

On Thu, 13 Feb 1997, henry wrote:

> This was one of the sharpest statements according to my lights in a while.
> Care to entrap yourself with further remarks on what beauty in the contemporary world involves? & its relation to poetry? & its displacement by justice?
> Simone Weil has some interesting speculations on beauty, justice and mediation, according to the Greeks. Let me quote from Pharisee #12 Psychompompos. . .
>
> What if Paradise exists, but we don't see it. The Kingdom of Heaven is "at hand." & utopia is a political compromise hammered together out of human p ride and earwax. "let the wind speak that is Paradise."
> It's the day after Ash Wednesday.
> Unless ye repent ye shall all likewise perish.
> They have earwax at CVS, along with Jack Spandrift's latest CDs and some dusty > shelves of poetry zones. Go for it. It's the 90s - glut & choice are the bywo > rds of our online world. Manual labor is learning how to use a backhoe & save.

> & William Blackstone > daubed his forehead with > thumbprint of ash.

---------- Wendy Battin (home)
http://camel.conncoll.edu/ccother/wjbat/ (CAPA)
http://shain.lib.conncoll.edu/CAPA/capa.html (Multiple Poetics)
http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Lofts/5471/index.html

↑ Index

456. Bil Brown
Re: Nielsen on Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

> P.S. 3:
>
> Hang in there, Bil Brown. There's lots more to read.
>
> Anselm Hollo

I know. Maybe a bit TOO much... don't you think.

Bil Brown

↑ Index

457. jdhollo
Nielsen on Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

"but he's also shown himself
a bigot in unforgivable ways"

Says who? The Grand Vizier of Correct Thought?

Of course, this, too, is just dinner or 'panel' table babble.

P.S.:

Kudos to Bough and Perelman for their prose poems (even though the UFO shtick is a little old hat).

P.S. 2:

Surprised to see Ron Silliman's 'classification' of Palmer Cole & Taggart as post-Black Mtn sentimentalists go unchallenged. In my humble opinion, at least the first two are Way Ahead of Murk, Mush, and Tedium (as are Dorn Baraka Blackburn Oppenheimer, to mention just a few who began the practice of their art long before the Holy Ghost of LangPo descended).

P.S. 3:

Hang in there, Bil Brown. There's lots more to read.

Anselm Hollo

↑ Index

458. A. Jennifer Sondheim
for valentine's day whatever happiness you've found
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

it's valentines day, a day for couples and threesomes bubbles come out of jennifer's and alan's mouths loops of saliva on their surfaces form canals of liquid on liquid pushed from liquid air spilled cum on keyboards fingers chairs silicon dreams in silicon valleys breasts jennifer alan lie side by side undressed puddles drying on shared skin and skinny brains

they're flat against the earth which pushes them into one long shadow merged hysteric back down against the ground where their ass cracks open into tunnels tendrils lost in one long shadow shared holes and noggins they've got nothing lost but sanity says nursing sue just come upon 'em

↑ Index

459. Pierre Joris
Rushdie's Valentine
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Here's a Valentine from Salman Rushie:

The [London] Guardian February 14 1997

On the eighth anniversary of the fatwa against him, Salman Rushdie castigates Europe's politicians for cynically abandoning the ideals of free expression and human rights

THE DIPLOMATIC VICES

EUROPE begins, as the Italian writer Roberto Calasso reminds us in The Marriage of Cadmus And Harmony, with a bull, and a rape. Europa was an Asian maiden abducted by a God (who changed himself, for the occasion, into a white bull), and was held captive in a new land that came, in time, to bear her name. The prisoner of Zeus's unending desire for mortal flesh, Europa has been avenged by history. Zeus is just a story now. He is powerless; but Europe is alive.

At the very dawn of the idea of Europe, then, is an unequal struggle between human beings and gods, and an encouraging lesson: that while the bull-god may win the first skirmish, it is the maiden-continent that triumphs, in time.

I, too, have been engaged in a skirmish with a latter-day Zeus, though his thunderbolts have thus far missed their mark. Many others - in Algeria and Egypt as well as Iran - have been less fortunate. Those of us engaged in this battle have long understood what it's about. It's about the right of human beings, their thoughts, their works of art, their lives, to survive those thunderbolts; and to prevail over the whimsical autocracy of whatever Olympus may presently be in vogue. It's about the right to make moral, intellectual and artistic judgments, without worrying about Judgment Day.

The Greek myths are Europe's southern roots. At the continent's other end, the old Norse creation-legends also bring news of the supplanting of the gods by the human race. The final battle between the Norse gods and their terrible enemies has already taken place. The gods have slain their foes and been slain by them. Now, we are told, it is time for us to take over. There are no more gods to help us. We're on our own. Or, to put it another way (for gods are tyrants, too): we're free. The loss of the divine places us at the centre of the stage, to build our own morality, our own communities; to make our own choices; to make our own way.

Once again, in the earliest ideas of Europe, we find an emphasis on what is human over and above what is, at one moment or another, held to be divine. Gods may come and gods may go, but we, with any luck, go on for ever.

This humanist emphasis is, to my mind, one of the most attractive aspects of European thought. It's easy, of course, to argue that Europe has also stood, during its long history, for conquest, pillage, exterminations and inquisitions. But now that we are being asked to join in the creation of a new Europe, it's helpful to remind ourselves of the best meanings of that resonant word. Because there is a Europe that many, if not most, of its citizens care about.

This is not a Europe of money, or bureaucracy. Since the word "culture" has been debased by over-use, I'd prefer not to use it. The Europe that is worth talking about, worth re-creating, is anyhow something broader than a "culture". It is a civilisation.

TODAY, I am listening to the melancholy echoes of one small, intellectually impoverished, pathetically violent assault on the values of that civilisation. I refer, I'm sorry to say, to the Khomeini fatwa whose eighth anniversary this is, and to the latest barbaric noises about "bounty money" emerging from the Iranian government's front organisation, the 15 Khordad Foundation.

I'm also sorry to say that the EU's response to such threats has been little more than tokenist. It has achieved, in one word, nothing. The Europe for which Europeans care would have done more than simply state that it found such an assault unacceptable. It would have sought to place maximum pressure on Iran while removing as much pressure as possible from the lives of those threatened. What has happened is the exact opposite. Iran is under very little (I would even say, no) pressure on this matter. But for eight years, some of us have been under a fair amount of stress.

During these eight years, I have come to understand the equivocations at the heart of the new Europe. I have heard Germany's foreign minister say, with a shrug, that "there is a limit" to what the EU is prepared to do for human rights. (A few months after this statement, Germany, then Iran's biggest trading partner, gave a red-carpet welcome to Iran's terrorist-inchief, Intelligence Minister Fallahian. My Norwegian publisher, William Nygaard, was shot the week after Fallahian's triumphal tour.) I have heard Belgium's foreign minister tell me that the EU knows all about Iran's terrorist activities against its own dissidents on European soil. But as to action? Just a world-weary smile; just another shrug. During Italy's EU presidency, the Italian foreign ministry refused to answer - even to acknowledge - our letters on this issue. In Holland, I actually found myself obliged to explain to foreign-ministry officials why it would not be a good idea for the EU to accept the fatwa's validity on religious grounds.

I have been refused entry to Denmark, on the spurious grounds of a trumped-up "specific threat" against my life, a threat which mysteriously vanished in the face of a public outcry; but I know that Denmark, already a major exporter of feta cheese to Iran, is presently trying hard to increase its trade relations with that country.

During the just-concluded Irish presidency, I was offered a meeting by Dick Spring which then, oddly, took six months and a lot of pushing actually to arrange. In this meeting Mr Spring assured me that a strong statement about the fatwa would be included in the conclusions of the Dublin Summit. No such statement was made. (Ireland, too, is looking to expand its trade with Iran.)

This new Europe has not looked to me like a civilisation. It is an altogether more cynical enterprise.

EU leaders pay lip-service to the great European ideals--free expression, human rights, the Enlightenment, the right to dissent, the importance of the separation of church and state. But when these ideals come up against the powerful banalities of what is called "reality" - trade, money, guns, power - then it's freedom that takes a dive. When it's Danish feta cheese or Irish halal beef against the European Convention on Human Rights, don't expect free expression to win. Speaking as a committed European, it's enough to make a Euro-sceptic of you.

In a few months, the United Kingdom will enter the EU "troika", and will then, for a year and a half, have a real opportunity to resolve this problem. I hope - I think, after so long a wait, I have the right to expect - that the British government will, during this period, be a good deal more active than it has. So much of diplomacy, I've learned, is a matter of nods and winks. The extreme passivity of the Foreign Office has permitted the rest of the EU to go to sleep on this issue, and has given the Iranians the sign that there is really no need for them to do very much at all. I am of course pleased that the Foreign Office has condemned the new bounty offer, but a few stiff words once a year are no substitute for a policy.

LIKE so many of my fellow-Britons, I hope there will soon be a new Labour government. I have long been urging that government- in-waiting to understand the importance of the arts in conveying the sense of national renewal which Labour must seek swiftly to create. Today, on this tawdry anniversary, I ask Mr Blair to come to the aid of this one particular artist. As he knows, and has been good enough to tell me, the principles involved go far beyond the survival of a single individual.

I ask him to bring a new spirit of urgency to the fight against the Zeus of Iran and his attempt to kidnap our freedoms; and by doing so, to show New Labour's commitment to the true spirit of Europe - not just to an economic community, or to monetary union, but to European civilisation itself.

(c)Salman Rushdie 1997.
All rights reserved

--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/joris/
http://www.albany.edu/~tm0900/nomad.html

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in one language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,

[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
it as a conquering assertation. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

↑ Index

460. Pierre Joris
query
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Would anybody on this list have a snailmail for Roderick Iverson in L.A.?
Please backchannel. --Pierre
--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/joris/
http://www.albany.edu/~tm0900/nomad.html

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
one language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
it as a conquering assertation. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

↑ Index

461. Chris Stroffolino
OH CANADA
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Does anybody have clint burnham's email? (is he still on this list?) Also, what ever happened to that OH CANDA issue of some U-BUFFALO "rag" that was suppossed to come out last year? I think Joel Kuszai was involved with it? Has it been scrapped?----Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

462. L. Mac Mahon and T.R. Healy

Hello

Fri 14 Feb 1997

Greetings,

my name is Randolph Healy. I'm from Ireland and this is by way of introduction. Don't worry if you've never heard of me. The condition is by no means uncommon. Following Jennifer's lead I'll post a Valentine.

All the best,
Randolph.

Torch Song

Your presence brings light, flickering, inconstant, against which my shadow halts
unedged.
Fragments from long-exploded stars meet in an act which like words
has no boundary.
My atoms your atoms
kiss.
Hold me.
I am mainly empty space
my surface a seething cauldron of interchanging particles.
Only electricity prevents your lips from going straight through me.
My body
my mouth retain each impression here alight in your presence.
Selah.

↑ Index

463. henry
Re: Who's Zoning Who
Fri 14 Feb 1997

On Thu, 13 Feb 1997 23:48:06 -0500 Wendy Battin said: >Tricky, but yes. How much of rejection of "self" (& g*ds know I sympathize >when it comes to poetry as dull bar seduction, see what a sensitive >dude/brave dudette I am) also throws out what wd be worth preserving if >the revolution ever succeeds? I'd love to see a lot more rejection of ego >& superego, to adopt some retro terms, and more plumbing into the part of >self that says why it's worth staying alive, worth seeking out other >humans, worth the hassle of fighting through Babel and money and >resentment. Silly beauty & foolish truth, because it's foolish to care

Right on, Wendy. g*d knows WE'RE ALL SICK OF MY EGO, but...here goes again... I had a little essay in the last Witz on the Russian conference where I tried to distinguish between "self" (that straw bogeyman of "left" poetics) and "Person" - "Person" being (in part) the expressor of Russian philosopher Chaadev's concept of "moral freedom" - an anthropocentric idea generally denied in all kinds of determinism (from the social Necessity of some versions of leftist justice to the market Necessity of this country that makes cowards of us all). Maybe beauty in poetry expresses the moral freedom of Person rather than Self. See Mandelstam's essay "Chaadev" for more info.

Where are the gifts that >keep that weird enterprise going? I find bits & pieces of them in all >kinds or reporting & recording, but rarely find anyone willing to value >them in public.

Yeah. the beauty of oral history.
I was going to signoff poetics this morning out of self-blab-sickness.
I think I will try to lurk for a while. Happy V-Day, everybody. - Henry G.

↑ Index

464. Christopher Alexander
Re: per-mail (Pear tree w/potatoes
Fri 14 Feb 1997

> Christopher Alexander wrote:
etc etc

damn, sorry--M & I seem to be having problems keeping our personal mail separate friom the list.
of course anyone is free to intervene, but I really dont mean to burden you with our correspondence.

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

465. henry
query
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Hi everybody, I'm back. wanted to ask again - anyone have an email address for Dave Baratier? Is he offline entirely? Please backchannel. Thanks.
[redacted]

↑ Index

466. F.A. Templeton
Categories
Fri 14 Feb 1997

No, no, no, help, don't put me on the shelf with all those poets who win slams and hate books!

Fiona

↑ Index

467. Christopher Alexander
Re: Who's Zoning Who
Fri 14 Feb 1997

> Consider, for example, the group of poets consisting of W, X, Y, and Z.
yss or consider the list member z who had too much coffee at an Oedipal breakfast with harold bloom & wildly made otherwise mundane accusations which assumed that everyone else assumed that they were not engaged in publicizing each others work & further assumed that to bring this dark secret to light with a brilliant flash would return the Literary Realm to its rightful place as the contemplation of what constitutes beauty in the contemporary world. so wild were the gestures of this wiley critic that he nearly gave himself a socio-historical "rupture" & spilled his lackluster, prosaic "eggs benedict" all down the front of his new simplistic "ideology".

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

468. Keith Tuma
Re: Who's Zoning Who
Fri 14 Feb 1997

It must really be valentine's day 'cause the poison arrows are flying.

At least when Silliman wants to smear somebody by linking him with Pat Buchanan he uses a name. Not that there's much doubt who Mike B means by W, X, Y, and Z. I've always preferred Q's work myself, though the oedipal complex in N is a fascinating curio, and the lit-crit narratives of legitimation in $$ are the subject of one of my best student's ponderous dissertation. But if I had three kids, I'd be sure to name them after Murk, Mush, and Tedium.

Listen, I knew Murk, Mush, and Tedium.
Murk, Mush, and Tedium were friends of mine.
(Many an evening we'd explore simple-minded discourses of ideology.)
And you, Mr. @@@, are no Mush. Nor Murk. Nor Tedium.

As the Batman of the British Isles says,
love and love,
keith (who's happy to meet any ghost who comes along, holy or not, and wishes he knew what ed dorn is supposed to have done/said and that ed would have a chance to respond)

↑ Index

469. maria damon
Re: Names
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

okay, charles alexander and susan wheeler and linda russo have the most exotic relatives' names.

my own:
mother, selma father albert sisters elsa, kristina cousins, bente, ulla, inge magrethe other cousins: laurel, julie uncles and aunts hi-lites: einar, jens christian, etc bedstefar & bedstemor: thomas thorvald and magrethe grandpa and grandma: henry (hyman) and bessie (beyla)

↑ Index

470. maria damon

Re: for valentine's day whatever happiness you've found

Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

oh jennifer, torch me!

In message <[redacted]> UB
Poetics discussion group writes:
> ++++++

471. maria damon
Re: Nielsen on Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
> "but he's also shown himself
> a bigot in unforgivable ways"
>
> Says who? The Grand Vizier of Correct Thought?
>
there's no need to get defensive about the faults of poets we admire or feel peronally fond of.

↑ Index

472. Sherry Brennan
Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Looking for something else this weekend, unearthed a copy of Dorn's poem named something like _Turbines on the North Atlantic_, having filed and forgotten it existed. It's very moving and beautiful and political (a manifesto-like chant in places like Patchen, I'd say, in this case). And I like it very much.
Sherry

> Date: Wed, 12 Feb 1997 11:32:38 -0700
> From: Charles Alexander <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: Zones v. Zoos
>
> even (god help us) Dorn,
>
> This Dorn fellow seems to be reviled by many right now, for reasons I understand. But are things he has done even worse than Pound, or Adorno (a not too-long-ago thread here), that the mere mention of his name requires a prayer? And are people still reading his work, some of which I still find insightful and quite brilliant?
>
> charles

↑ Index

473. Mark Prejsnar

Perelman and theory and stuff

Fri 14 Feb 1997

I've been reading Rasula's Wax Museum, which has sparked a lot of very good dialog on the list recently....It is interesting that I've just gotten to the part where he suggests a fundamental failure in the language circle, arising from their not collapsing theory and practice into a single form, a poetry that is also theory--(...from one point of view, that is certainly going on in Andrews' crazed "poetics essays" but Rasula was writing before last year's publication of Paradise and Method, which collects those pieces and allows you to see just how challenging and odd Andrews' "theortical" writings are..)

I think Perelman's been thinking along these lines, and I think the poem posted here was almost as good as the one that opens Marginalization of Poetry and gives it its title.. In fact, his work has always been a favorite of mine; the books Face Value and First World are such models of how to be skeptical and passionate and committed about politics within a non-mainstream writing mode, kind of it seems to me a separate developmental track running parallel to Silliman's less hectic new sentence strategy: parallel tracks running in the same direction (left).

Some postings don't seem as positive about Perelman's poem as I was...But I'm not always good at interpreting arch gnomic asides. I loved it anyway.

Rasula's point is kind of fascinating (--I haven't finished the section where he develops this theme, so I may not fully represent his views..) On the one hand part of me thinks you (we, them?) don't have to meld theory and poetic writing into one new mode..On the other hand, there's a real exploratory integrity to the idea that it is a historical/esthetic imperative.. His belief that more people would find LangPo non-abstruse, if the creative writing contained theory, seems to me too easy (again, take a look at Andrews' essays, one example of creative writing explaining itself which I don't think will win over many academics tomorrow)

One final connected note: I think Rasula's American poetry wax museum, and Perelman's Marginalization of poetry, are two of the best and most generative books about poetry I've ever seen; if you haven't seen 'em, I recommend it. Perelman's is shorter and more hands-on in examining poetry directly. But both are about SITING u.s. poetry--locating it in current social and cultural dynamics. Vital.

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

474. Miekal And name-sies
Fri 14 Feb 1997

henry again wrote:

> - "Henry Again" (pat. pending)

Welcome to the family, you should meet Carolyn Always who is on another list Im on

Miekal And

↑ Index

475. Gwyn McVay
Re: Names
Fri 14 Feb 1997

I have a husband-wife pair of ancestors named Zalmon Francis Monroe and Ophelia Kitchen Monroe.

Gwyn

↑ Index

476. amato
Re: die a critic
Fri 14 Feb 1997

to pick up for a sec on what keith t. is saying on this subject line, vis-a-vis jonathan monroe: to align poetic practice with recent developments in comp/rhet. would require that poetry is discussed not simply in terms of its products but in terms of its processes... i think much is to be gained, at least wrt the academic sites of poetry production, from looking at the way process is taught (or not taught)... to harp/hop on my hobbyhorse of late, that notion of "craft" is part of what i see blocking productive associations between comp. and poetry... it's b/c "craft" works in effect to stabilize product through a certain rigor, a certain form of attention...

this is not an argument against attentiveness as such... i'm talking about the way "craft" tends to be institutionalized... i add here only that "craft" -- insofar as it's theorized -- represents one way (but only one way) to safeguard the laboring body of the writer... but there are many other ways...

so it would seem to me to be helpful in discussing poetry, or poetries, to consider the process aspect more fully (somebody mentioned mac low's work, which is to the point here if only b/c mac low attends so consciously to process, yet in ways that craft-oriented writers might not appreciate)...

again i think it's worth noting how many books are out there that presume to discuss the "writer's craft"... invariably these books seem to advocate a specific aesthetic, or aesthetic approach anyway... and of course what gets left out, finally, is so much of art itself---b/c the way "craft" is generally deployed in the classroom, it consists of rules and techniques (if not outright gimmicks) that can take most only so far---right up to the verge of art, but not art itself... which in effect safeguards art against those who would presume to understand it more fully, who would presume to place art on a continuum with other social practices---and once again confirms that the artist is born, not made, the artist-as-genius, as romantic savant, as any-number-of-unconfirmed-sightings...

it's not a matter of making art easy or known or verifiable... seems to me, though, that we can do better than advocate procedures that have the effect of reducing what passes for 'proper' aesthetic process while situating most who aspire at a clear remove from the possible plays of process...

lots more to say here, but i'll close with that...

best,

joe

↑ Index

477. Don Cheney

Catullus for Valentines Day

Fri 14 Feb 1997

Two translations of CATULLUS 70 for Valentines Day:

70.

No one says that my woman is not nubile,

but to me, even if Jupiter himself reads this, she is a petal.

She loves it when I talk about love and when I rapidly write about liquid openings.

==========

Oasis

No one sees my woman's deceit, not a duck not me not even Jupiter himself can see it.

That's what I say: but a man in love who talks about loving in windows and writing on buses is like opportunity and water.

==========

Don Cheney

==========

visit Don Cheney's Home Page & Clean Neck Shop
http://www.geocities.com/Paris/5791/index.html
[redacted]

==========

↑ Index

478. Burt Kimmelman

Bronk Panel at Oxford, August 30, 1997

Fri 14 Feb 1997

I am writing in behalf of Dennis Ryan, who is organizing a panel on William Bronk to be held as part of a one day conference on Estrangement, to be held at Oxford University on 8/30/97. There are I believe three "sections" of the conference, one on literature and culture (which is where the Bronk panel would be), another on psychology or something like that, and a third whose focus i've forgotten now. Anyway, the conference is interdisciplinary and otherwise is quite unconventional. EAch panel participant will have written a thousand word essay, which will have been published with other like essays for the general consumption of the entire conference. EAch panelist will come to the conference with a much longer version of this essay, and will meet with other panelists in the morning in a workshop format. I.e., all the Bronk people, a minimum of six and a maximum of ten, will spend the morning exchanging views and also coming up with a document of some sort, written collectively by the entire panel, which will be presented to the entire conference in the afternoon.

Or something like this.

Well, if you are interested in participating, ESPECIALLY IF YOU ARE NOT AN AMERICAN (there are 4 Americans on the panel already--myself, Henry Weinfield, Ed Foster, and Dennis Ryan--and there may be more), then please contact Dennis Ryan (his e-mail address is [redacted]; he teaches in the communications Program of Buena Vista Univ. in Storm Lake, Iowa 50588-1798). Dennis says that room andboard for 4 days would cost $46.00 a day (and I believe that is American dollars).

We would welcome all applicants, but would like to have an internationally grounded discourse there.

Thanks,

Burt Kimmelman

↑ Index

479. Jordan Davis
ride the tiger to the river Euphrates
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

well is it then a matter of making an art our art for we (I) are different? we have something else to say and do, yes, but does that place us in the rather restricted relation of OPPOSITION to an exclusive and rewarded TRANSPARENCY PRACTICE? Don't think so. I mean, if you're one of the hegemonic boomers, you may HAVE to see it that way, but if you're on either side of that bracket (or you just WANT to be) there seems to be more permission to exist in other relations. I can hear it now, we're WUSSING out on the Hegel score. Hey hey ho ho. But this insistence on the opposition-relation, that seems like only a recent recurrence of a syndrome of turf warring (MAPS) that comes and goes as new resources are alleged to be OUT THERE .. go dog go .. of course I love tulips as much as anybody .. I also love MY TRIP, SOME OTHER KIND, RESPONSE, IN MEMORY, etc, etc more. Is this an opposition? Is elsewhere an opposition? Seems more like an affirming negation from here. TRANSPARENCY PRACTICE offers more than the OPPOSING TEAM seems to want to admit, at least openly .. I guess you can go on being THEY indefinitely .. but why? why not elect oneself central? or peripheral? and get going with the vantages already? there do seem to be non-monotonous people listening non-monotonously, at least as long as they can stand it .. until they give up .. Signed, A PERMANENT CRISIS IS NO SUCH THING

PS Siting is not vital tho the siding may be vinyl ..

↑ Index

480. k.a. hehir
Re: the future of an illusion (fwd)
Fri 14 Feb 1997

> hey Hynek, > thought you minght find this quotation interesting.

> kevin
> ----------
> From: Sylvester Pollet <[redacted]>
>
> I'll throw this into the mix--it's a quote from Matthew Sweney, who's been working with Petr Mikes at Votobia Publishers in the Czech Republic:
>
> "Poetry [in the C.R.] doesn't sell now because it's no longer controversial. Everyone was writing and buying poetry before because it was illegal, a sort of rebellious act, but now that Socialism is gone, poetry has lost its attraction. People watch Schwarzenegger videos on their new VCRs instead."

Hi Kevin!!

Interesting? Yes & no. "No" because it is oversimplified, "yes" because it's true... First, poetry as such was not illegal: there were many "communist" poets and there was poetry even on TV! On the other hand, there was also poetry which went against the grain. Not necessarily in the sense of being anti-communist, by no means, but simply because it was "real", which is to say, it was about things and feelings "outside" the official ideology, it was about anxiety, nothingness and death, or about common everyday things, or about faith and God, etc. While now the time is more "prosaic" and poetry seems to be too pathetic to be true... And Swarzenegger? Well, you know what the majority of Canadians likes watching, don't you?! And you don't think that people in Central Europe are different species, do you...

By the way, VOTOBIA is a really interesting publishing "company"; their editorial plans are "rather" nonconventional. Moreover, they are from Moravia, and not from Prague -- which [that is Prague] always tended to present itself as the only cultural centre in the republic. And this "voice of marginality" is another "sympathetic" (as we would say in Czech; guess what it could mean!) feature of Votobia.

Take care!

Hynek

↑ Index

481. Christopher Alexander
Re: ride the tig etc
Fri 14 Feb 1997

> we have something else to say and do, yes, but does that place us in the > rather restricted relation of OPPOSITION to an exclusive and rewarded

> TRANSPARENCY PRACTICE? Don't think so.
yes yes of course its important not to lock ourselves into this position--art is about more than burning newspapers--, but lets not deny that its one possible assessment of a poetic practice--as limited as any other single assessment, but not more.

> Is this an opposition? Is elsewhere an opposition? Seems more like an > affirming negation from here.
yes, elsewhere is an opposition of sorts, & I should think we ought to be able to frame it that way if/when its useful to do so.
the work acts as an affirming negation only when its taken obsessively in terms of opposition:
"I see my work as oppositional practice-- thats all really". I dont recall anyone doing that here recently--do you?

> TRANSPARENCY PRACTICE offers more than the > OPPOSING TEAM seems to want to admit, at least openly true enough--but who called us into teams?
I always considered myself central, really.

signed (sigh) or
"wouldja call off the crisis response team already?"
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

482. henry again
Re: ride the tiger to the river Euphrates
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Dante was a transparency. always an open hand, wrote endless critical work s & letters, here is what we're doing & what we're going to do, D.Comedy is full of asides & para-narrative on the poem itself, but then the structures took off on their own, a player piano
embedded isomorphic valentine
&

what good is tapeworm transparency anyway?
who cares?
the poem eats your processes until they are highly unrecognizable.
- "Henry Again" (pat. pending)

↑ Index

483. Christopher Alexander
Re: Names
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

gwyn wrrt:
> I have a husband-wife pair of ancestors named Zalmon Francis Monroe and > Ophelia Kitchen Monroe.
thats wonderful. you know Ive always been sort of fascinated with the idea of being from the stock of common nouns--as, for instance, after an object or a day of the week (have to admit a real liking for the name Wednesday of Addams fame). in this context they become such lovely, inscrutable words.

chris.
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

484. Peter Zukowski
John High
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Does anyone know the e-mail address (or possibly even a phone number) for John High? I believe he is the editor of _Five Fingers Review_. Please backchannel.

Thanks.

Peter Zukowski
[redacted]

↑ Index

485. Michael Boughn
Re: Who's Zoning Who
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Do you really know, Keith? Or was it just a phantom exercise in decentering incivility before it got fixed as Poetics? I'm not sure I know.

Peace, love, and good vibes (as always),
Mike

PS, the problem with those stupid graphs, as Charles Dodgson could have told you, is you can't get this world into a flatworld. Won't fit. Sorry. Said Alice, as the Red Queen disappeared.

↑ Index

486. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Re: poison pens/valentine's day
Fri 14 Feb 1997

(for Mike Boughn & Keith Tuma)

```
      V         E     E
  D     A       N     R
    A     L     I    C
     Y    E   T    A N   S
      M      S
          A
```

forget me not threat or plea

a flower

dbchirot

↑ Index

487. David Kellogg
Re: Who's Zoning Who
Fri 14 Feb 1997

At 03:36 PM 2/14/97 -0500, Michael Boughn wrote:

> PS, the problem with those stupid graphs, as Charles Dodgson could have told you, is you can't get this world into a flatworld. Won't fit. Sorry. Said Alice, as the Red Queen disappeared.

As the creator of one such "stupid graph," I would like to say that I don't intend to "get this world" thru it -- merely to get something interesting.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

489. henry
Re: my poetics valentine
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Lisa Lisa luminescent
In my eyeballs convalescent Happy valentines to you
Brief pithy terse succinct & true

VITA BREVIS
ARROWS LONGER

↑ Index

490. Jordan Davis
: D is all we get of the cat (your summary axe)
Fri 14 Feb 1997

I blieve, Chris Alexander, if that is your name -- that the guiding logic at work here is oppositional -- viz Hank Lazer's opposable poetries, viz Bob Perelman's we is another poem, viz Ron Silliman's comments here and Cap-l -- I belive that Bruce &rews is relentless in his opposition, and that of the lpoets maybe only Charles B has gone on to oppose opposition and maybe he hasn't -- maps are for claiming resources and for sittling arbitrartions, charts are for malapractice -- the crisis goes deeper, lads, and the initials are everywhere .. wussy hegel glot-tal simpatico, contra dante sounds .. and maybe he's just the Poetry Chicken .. a lot'll .. geese .. a shady .. to get into the narrative --

↑ Index

491. A. Jennifer Sondheim
The more things change.... (fwd)
Fri 14 Feb 1997

I was totally fascinated by this post, and asked Bill if I could send it on, so with permission - please read -

love, Alan

---------- Forwarded message ----------
-Date: Sat, 15 Feb 1997 13:19:04 -0800
-From: Bill Stilwell <[redacted]>
-To: [redacted]
-Subject: The more things change....

Just finished reading a wonderful article by Tom Standage in The Electronic Telegraph (http://www.telegraph.co.uk/) called "Romances of the Telegraph" about how the introduction of telegraph and telephone technology caused fears not unlike those caused by the internet today about illicit relationships. I'll quote a few bits just to get the point across. To read the entire article you need to register at the above URL (it's free) and then search for the article. I only hope that e-mail and related technology moves quickly into the realm of the 'safe' now occupied by telephones.

"An article entitled The Dangers of Wired Love, published in 1886, warned of the consequences of allowing women to use new communications technologies without supervision."

"One 19th-century cautionary tale concerned George W. McCutcheon of Brooklyn, who ran a news-stand assisted by his 20-year-old daughter, Maggie. Business was booming, so, in 1886, he decided to expand and install a telegraph line, with Maggie as its operator. But he soon discovered that she was "keeping up a flirtation" with several young men over the wires, including Frank Frisbie, a married man who worked in the telegraph office of the Long Island Railroad. Over the wires, Maggie invited Frisbie to visit her, and he accepted. But when her father found out he forbade the visit, so Maggie began seeing Frisbie on the sly. McCutcheon tried moving his news-stand, but Maggie soon found work in a nearby telegraph office and resumed the relationship. Eventually, her father pursued her to a rendezvous and threatened to "blow her brains out". She had him arrested, and he was charged with threatening behaviour."

"There was even a novel called Wired Love, written by Ella Cheever Thayer and published in 1879, which built its plot around an online courtship - and beat today's slew of dreadful email romance novels to the punch by over a century. And in 1891 an article called Romances of the Telegraph rounded up other stories with happy endings."

"Other articles talk of the telephone's tendency to lower moral standards. "It's appalling," said an elderly aunt, reported in Telephony in 1903, "to see how they use telephones nowadays. Last night Mary, who was dressing, answered the telephone in her room. And it was a man calling her up. The two of them stood talking to one another just as if they were entirely dressed and had stopped for a little chat on the street! I tell you this generation is too much for me."

--Bill ([redacted])
"What is laid down, ordered, factual is never enough to embrace the whole truth: life always spills over the rim of every cup."--Boris Pasternak

↑ Index

492. aerialedge
Re: ride the tiger to the river Euphrates
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Jordan, remember that Hegel tune "I don't need your summary acts to give into the narrative age"? The problem with elsewhere is there's usually lots of tourists there. Hell is other tourists? (I remember something about an up-to-date theory of time.) Adorno (clap hands clap hands) says on the first page of Aesthetic Theory ". . . however tragic they appear, artworks tend a priori toward affirmation." hmm.

--Rod

Barnes & Chernobyl:

It's got everything you need

It's an artist, it don't look back

↑ Index

493. k.a. hehir
dante valentini
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

with all this luvin goin on and Henry's mention of dante, i'd like to share my e mail valentine to Beatrice.

To:[redacted]

not sure why but i'm feeeliing really frisky now and you are the target of my emoticons. good thing i'm knowhere near you 'cause i'd be massaging your feet into an erotofrenzy. and since the medium is the massage. you'd have to succumb numb into my passions. i'd swallow you. hollow you. hallow you. gentle . swelling desire delirious. you are delicious. i'll take two scoops. packed into a daydream like summer laughter and freedom. i burn with optimism's flame. the wondiferous splendor of your sparkle. a smile that moves me to song. a choir to the graceful dance of your moonbrows. ever freshing the fountain. superluminous murmurs coil my sensation. the juice of your memory slakes my drought. i dream of buttering your muffin. sleep well knowing that in one mind melancholy with the tears from the wake of your passing, an ember burns amber like ale stout in its steadfastery. hidden from the make-up of the a public face. deep in the soul. a coal remains. hear it cry with steam as teardrops bake into its lumina. soul coal. dream steam. emotions like motions owe prayers to the source. i stroke you. i stroke you. i stroke you. evocative notions. be my guide to awareness. breathe into my daytime. slip into my night. let me squeeze your freshness every morning. let me brush my teeth with your mind at knight so my nocturnal excursions are quessts for pearl necklaces and the slaying of insecurities. and inhibitions. ambitious but ample ,oh apple of my pie. let me bake you into a cake. run down my chin. melt my cream. satisfy my sweettooth. swim in my tastebuds. splash in my saliva. slurp up my sunshine. surrender to my songcraft. with my shipsong packed with poet's art, can my word keel crack your frozen heart? will you be my valentine. will you hold my hand. will let me hide in your shadow safe from eyes of judgment. can i play in your shade? can i draw on your sidewalk. can i skip to your heartbeat? can i compose arias with only your name? symphonies in your key? puddlesplash. leafpile snuggle . stay beautiful.

↑ Index

494. maria damon
Re: my poetics valentine
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

vrey lovely, lisa s; and to all a good v-day.

↑ Index

495. David Bromige
divers
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

1) My Valentine Poem

Tho often you at me are glowering
Tho your conceit is sometimes towering & your one-liners can be scouring
Tho you sing sharp and flat while showering
Tho your persona's overpowering & were mine less, you'd have me cowering Tho Spec Collections has us rowing in type no less, I sit here vowing (while you, net-maidens keep on wowing) when skies are blue or clouds are lowering to keep this long-haul friendship flowering leastwise thruout today, george whatsyername

+ + + +

2) Ed Dorn's _North Atlantic Turbine_ is an amazing book, as it was when it first appeared. And there are earlier books: _Hands Up_, _The Newly Fallen_, filled with moving poetry, hard-bitten/tender poems of love and mourning, often with a political--but what we used to call "human"--edge to them. _Gunslinger_ was a notable departure from the work of his first decade of publishing. Some big change, announced with "Stand by the Door Awhile, Death, there are Others" which i read as intermediary between the early and the middle periods of this terrific poet.

As for bigotry--we have Aldon's indications, and wasnt an issue of his zine _Rolling Stock_ full of taunting of AIDS sufferers? I'd welcome clarity on that one.

* * * * * *

3) Bob Perelman's poem: one might well say Wow. He came along like a bottom-feeder and scooped up a lot of heavy matter very fast. Its an exemplary act, it shows how the List can feed (neg or poz) poetry.

f.n. Bob, didnt know you were lurking--you put it to good use. Now I'll tell you how to make a proper dash--depress "Shift" and "option" while you type u.c.-dash--you have to hit it twice on e-mail to make it long enough, but only once on yr harddrive. Bowering taught me this.

db

↑ Index

496. maria damon

Re: my poetics valentine

Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

terrific; keep em coming.

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> My first formal post here.
>
> A VALENTINE'S SESTEENY
>
> love/lucious/heart/sweetie/savor/Venus
>
> Astarte/ecstacy/relish/cloying/precious/meat
>
> viscera/Eros/lambkin/passion/ambrosial/odor
>
> delight in/amphetamine/mawkish/Cupid/fancy/petkins
>
> darling/fond/infatuation/interior/Kama/juicy
>
> sacharine/honey/gods of/partial/middle/rapture
>

> taste/Psyche/adoration
> OR > romance/fervor/characteristic
> --
> Bob Grotjohn
>

↑ Index

497. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Nielsen on Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

from the "grand vizier of correct thought" --

I'm not going to get sucked into that kind of crap -- Dorn himself, in a letter to the then LeRoi Jones, said letter on deposit in the library at UCLA for your perusal should you care to peruse, apologizes for phone call the previous night -- in which apology he reports that his wife took him to task for "Jew baiting" in the course of the conversation -- as my students would say -- "ironic, huh?"

↑ Index

498. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: minor corrections
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

with Chet Baker's pretty valentine playing in the background --

Just got that _Diacritics_ and wanted to forestall a couple misunderstandings --

While I am deeply grateful to J. Monroe for including my essay on Russell Atkins's criticism, there are two points in Jonathan's introductory essay that might mislead readers --

He opens with the remark that this issue "draws on presentations from two events" at Cornell on 94 & 95 -- that is indeed true, but some of the work, such as my own, is drawn from elsewhwere -- as in I was elsewhwere hen those events happened -- My essay was not part of the conference & symposia --

More imprtantly, at least to me -- on pg. 7 of his intro., Jonathan refers to my having noted that "the most successful black poets have been those, like Rita Dove and Derek Walcott, 'who write in more mainstream modes [and] . . . whose forms are less troubling than their content'" What I actually say on pg. 86 is that black poets "whose forms are less troubling than their content" might be more likely to attract a modest increase in interest by publishers and readers in their critical works (as opposed to somebody like Atkins) -- The claim as represented by Monroe might prove to be true in the end, but it's not the claim I was making yours in love on our saint's day,

the grand exalted incorrect whoosiz

↑ Index

499. Rachel Loden
Re: Nielsen on Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Aldon L. Nielsen wrote:
>
> from the "grand vizier of correct thought" --
>
> I'm not going to get sucked into that kind of crap -- Dorn himself, in a > letter to the then LeRoi Jones, said letter on deposit in the library at > UCLA for your perusal should you care to peruse, apologizes for phone > call the previous night -- in which apology he reports that his wife took > him to task for "Jew baiting" in the course of the conversation -- > as my students would say -- "ironic, huh?"

But isn't this the Pound debate again? Pound who said "A hundred yids should die for every Fascist that falls" (in his taped ravings)? All of this is and must be on the record. But who do we throw out as a result of it? Apparently only the poets we dislike (for whatever other reason). Those we find essential stay put. Marjorie Perloff made what should have been the final statement on this question--what was that last zinger, "It can't be Love my Politics, love my poetry." In the anecdote above, Dorn's the bad guy, Jones/Baraka the good. Yet Jones/Baraka writes of "jewladies" himself, and "faggot handmaidens of the french whore," and "some up and coming queer" (long before the word achieved its in-your-face currency). And I'm not even willing to part with the poem in which he makes some of these references, the coruscating "Politics of Rich Painters." What I heard Anselm Hollo objecting to was the tendency to make untouchables of our enemies, while making excuses for our friends. Please correct me, AH, if I'm wrong.

Rachel Loden

↑ Index

500. maria damon
Re: Nielsen on Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

whoa, my adored rachel. i don;t think writing "even dorn (god help us)" or whatever aldon wrote, is "making an untouchable" of dorn. i read it simply as an offhand remark about something we all know: that dorn, while incontrovertibly a major poet with good personal qualities as well as talent, is capable of prejudicial attitudes and statements. to mention in passing, and with what i took to be some humorous affection, something that is well known and that is not pleasant is not, to my mind, an act of censorship.

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> Aldon L. Nielsen wrote:
> >
> > from the "grand vizier of correct thought" --
> >
> > I'm not going to get sucked into that kind of crap -- Dorn himself, in a > > letter to the then LeRoi Jones, said letter on deposit in the library at > > UCLA for your perusal should you care to peruse, apologizes for phone
> > call the previous night -- in which apology he reports that his wife took > > him to task for "Jew baiting" in the course of the conversation -- > > as my students would say -- "ironic, huh?"
>
> But isn't this the Pound debate again? Pound who said "A hundred yids > should die for every Fascist that falls" (in his taped ravings)? All > of this is and must be on the record. But who do we throw out as a > result of it? Apparently only the poets we dislike (for whatever other > reason). Those we find essential stay put. Marjorie Perloff made what > should have been the final statement on this question--what was that > last zinger, "It can't be Love my Politics, love my poetry." In > the anecdote above, Dorn's the bad guy, Jones/Baraka the good. Yet > Jones/Baraka writes of "jewladies" himself, and "faggot handmaidens of > the french whore," and "some up and coming queer" (long before the word > achieved its in-your-face currency). And I'm not even willing to part > with the poem in which he makes some of these references, the > coruscating "Politics of Rich Painters." What I heard Anselm Hollo > objecting to was the tendency to make untouchables of our enemies, while > making excuses for our friends. Please correct me, AH, if I'm wrong.
>
> Rachel Loden
>

↑ Index

501. Bob Grotjohn
Re: my poetics valentine
Fri 14 Feb 1997

My first formal post here.

A VALENTINE'S SESTEENY

love/lucious/heart/sweetie/savor/Venus

delight in/amphetamine/mawkish/Cupid/fancy/petkins

sacharine/honey/gods of/partial/middle/rapture

taste/Psyche/adoration
OR
romance/fervor/characteristic

--
Bob Grotjohn

↑ Index

502. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Aldon, Pat & Rachel
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Come on now guys, I know you're reading at least parts of this exchange --

No, it clearly does not boil down to one incident years ago -- I mentioned the letter in response to remarks that appeared to dismiss another incident as an isolated episode of conference table talk -- I have no interest whatsoever in tracking any and all such remarks Dorn may have made over the deacdes -- Somebody asked why there seemed to be negative reactions to seom mentions of Dorn -- I indicated one reason such negativity might exist -- My guess is that somebdoy who made similar remarks years apart has probably made them on more than two occasions to more than two people -- I could, of course, be wrong about that -- You might ask Dorn his current opinion of Mencken's diary entries on the subject of Jews -- perhaps Dorn has changed his opinion in the interim -- I would be pleased to learn that he has --

As to Pound debate redux -- I most certainly did not tell anyone to stop reading Dorn -- quite the contrary -- Nor in any way does Jones/Baraka come off as "the good guy" in my representation of the letter -- my remark about "irony" was directed to the fact that one poet was apologizing for something to another poet who was about to do the same thing -- I am on record, here and elswhere, with my opinions about antisemitism in Baraka's poetry of the cultural nationalist period, about his criticism of his earlier antisemitism since he has become a

Marxist, and about the fact that he still reads poems in public from that period without much comment about the change --

The system I've borrowed is about to shut off --

I am not going to defend myself for being offended by things that people have said in public -- Nor will I let myself be classed with those censorious folk who WILL tell you what not to read --

Olson said racism has to be kept at the end of a stcik -- he also continued to read Pound --

see y'all later on another topic

↑ Index

503. michael corbin
Re: Nielsen on Dorn
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Rachel Loden wrote:
>
> Aldon L. Nielsen wrote:
> >
> > from the "grand vizier of correct thought" --
> >
> > I'm not going to get sucked into that kind of crap -- Dorn himself, in a > > letter to the then LeRoi Jones, said letter on deposit in the library at > > UCLA for your perusal should you care to peruse, apologizes for phone
> > call the previous night -- in which apology he reports that his wife took > > him to task for "Jew baiting" in the course of the conversation -- > > as my students would say -- "ironic, huh?"
>
> But isn't this the Pound debate again? Pound who said "A hundred yids > should die for every Fascist that falls" (in his taped ravings)? All > of this is and must be on the record. But who do we throw out as a > result of it? Apparently only the poets we dislike (for whatever other > reason). Those we find essential stay put. Marjorie Perloff made what > should have been the final statement on this question--what was that > last zinger, "It can't be Love my Politics, love my poetry." In > the anecdote above, Dorn's the bad guy, Jones/Baraka the good. Yet > Jones/Baraka writes of "jewladies" himself, and "faggot handmaidens of > the french whore," and "some up and coming queer" (long before the word > achieved its in-your-face currency). And I'm not even willing to part > with the poem in which he makes some of these references, the > coruscating "Politics of Rich Painters." What I heard Anselm Hollo

> objecting to was the tendency to make untouchables of our enemies, while > making excuses for our friends. Please correct me, AH, if I'm wrong.
>

some thoughts (over) heard: there was no 'tendency to make untouchables' of any bodies rather the perspicacity to point out a bigots bigoty. no 'throwing out' did I hear, but if one hears throwing out, it of course presupposes the white noise of the 'in' we are in.

Nielsen rather, with discrimination wrote:

> Yes, I still read Dorn's work --
>
> No, he hasn't, so far as I know, done anything AS BAD as Pound --
>
> But is that some immutable measure -- I don't know if Alan Golding will remember this or not, but several years back at a dinner following sessions at the 20th century lit. conference, Dorn made remarks that made my skin crawl -- more cowardly then, I spent the rest of the evening at the other end of the table with Chris & Deborah Parr -- should have confronted him on the spot -- Dorn has much of interest to say still -- as many of us witnessed at Orono last year -- but he's also shown himself a bigot in unforgivable ways -- does one have to have exceeded Pound in some kind of sweepstakes of prejudice?

No pound as the measure of in-ness (as in indictable co-conspiritor) here or heard, rather the good sense to make the ineluctable political measurement of the propaganda of the deed. a salutary measure of consciousness in the too vigorous search for tendencies that rues the diminution of our better, poesy selves. Lets hope its not so easy to make 'final statements'.

mc

↑ Index

504. michael corbin
Re: names and doubles
Fri 14 Feb 1997

Although impercise in its appliction, a measure of certain consciousnesses available in our present is the cliched 'kafka-esque', over-abundantly used as an adjectival injunction to give order to 'our' disordered lives. But the following is true:

There is another michael corbin (same middle name too) who is a felon; wanted for parole violation and failure to appear in court in the state of michigan. this person also (for perhaps genetic or perhaps cosmic reasons) met my general physical discription including the placement of a small facial scar. This person's drivers license number very closely approximated mine (close enough for a fine police officer to, perhaps willingly, confuse them). And, clearly for some horoscopical reason, this gentleman had my exact same date of birth.

The reason that I know of the existence of this literal out-law was, of course, that I was thought to be him, by those who had an interest to know him and to get him (I have never been to michigan I assure you and my crimes well . . .). Twice I was accosted by the constabulary during self-conscious gestures of political civil disobedience unrelated to this identity convergance (once against the storage of nuclear waste, the other, unironically, at a demonstration agaisnt police brutality). When mis taken for the michigan gentleman upon my arrest I was jailed until the state of michigan could point out that I was not their man.

Twice more the constabulary engaged me. unfortantely, I was observed being excessive on my motorcycle. On the final instance after 'they', as they say, 'ran my plate' I was mis took for a felon on the run (and speeding on a motorcycle no less). I was approached in high-tabloid-television fashion by the constabulary, their firearms drawn, after I had pulled sheepishly to the shoulder.

I know not if my hieroglyph has been apprehended. But as of this moment I remain at large.

mc

mc

↑ Index

505. Tenney Nathanson
Erica Hunt? Harryette Mullen? (email addresses)
Fri 14 Feb 1997

If anyone on the list has email addresses for Erica Hunt or Harryette Mullen, could you please backchannel me?

thanks,

Tenney

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]

http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

↑ Index

506. maria damon
Re: names and doubles
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

corbin rites:
> There is another michael corbin (same middle name too) who is a felon;
> wanted for parole violation and failure to appear in court in the state > of michigan. this person also (for perhaps genetic or perhaps cosmic > reasons) met my general physical discription including the placement of a > small facial scar. This person's drivers license number very closely > approximated mine (close enough for a fine police officer to, perhaps > willingly, confuse them). And, clearly for some horoscopical reason, this > gentleman had > my exact same date of birth.
etc...

which reminds me of the marvelous anecdote in Our Lady of the Flowers of the young thug who systematically denies being the one who committed a crime by someone who looked just like him, had his date of birth, his name, his address, but...wasnt him. high camp and very charming, a break of hilarity in genet's baroque eroticism.

↑ Index

507. maria damon
Re: Aldon, Pat & Rachel
Fri 14 Feb 1997

---

aldon rites
> Come on now guys, ...
etc.

you know i think it's the age of aquarius and everyone's a little undone. everyone at work is totally wigged out and hysterical about nothing of significance...the way this dornpound thread has spun out looks like a similar tempest in a teapot...me, i'm gonna try to get a life, having gotten one of those cards w/ kidnapped kids photos on it as my ONLY valentines day snail mail, and having spent the evening at the gym with the one or two other single folks in the universe. md

↑ Index

508. Steven Marks
Re: dante valentini
Sat 15 Feb 1997

On Fri, 14 Feb 1997, k.a. hehir wrote:
>
> To:[redacted]
>
grazie, signor hehir, but have we met? I can't seem to place you.

Samples of reviews, criticism and poetry at

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

509. jdhollo
Loden, Damon, re Nielsen/Dorn
Sat 15 Feb 1997

Yes, Rachel, you read me right.

The term 'unforgivable' is not, I don't think, commonly used in a spirit of "some humorous affection" (Maria D.).

But I suppose these "kick-the-dog" (or the Dorn) fits of righteousness ARE excusable--especially considering our shared powerlessness in the face of the corporate-feudal world government's brutality (so eloquently described in Salman Rushdie's message).

to bed, to bed
as Lady Macbeth said

AH Corvus

↑ Index

510. A. Jennifer Sondheim
after Valentine's Day's darkness, the darkness sets in Sat 15 Feb 1997

In Kush

95 dissolves, 96 I 97 know 98 not 99 who 100 or 101 what 102 I 103 am; 104 z 86 105 In Kush, these times are lost; my soul dissolves, I know not who or what I am; these times are dark as Kush is dark and light. 106 these 107 times 108

are 109 dark 110 as 111 Kush 112 is 113 dark 114 and 115 light. 116 . 117 rz 118 pico zz 119 h 120 pico zz 121 sed 's/ksh/Kush/' zz > zzz 122 pico zzz 123 new zzz 124 cat jn zzz > ding 125 rm zzz jn 126 rm zz 127 ls 128 mv ding jn 129 sz jn 130 b 131 m 132 m 133 b 134 h 1 > ding ---------- {k:87} In Kush: In: not found {k:88} Kush, ksh: Kush,: not found {k:89} these Kush: these: not found {k:90} times Shell: 0.61s user 0.83s system Kids: 11.16s user 7.25s system {k:91} are Kush: are: not found {k:92} lost; Kush: lost: not found {k:93} my ksh: my: not found {k:94} soul ksh: soul: not found {k:95} dissolves, Kush: dissolves,: not found {k:96} I ksh: I: not found {k:97} know Kush: know: not found {k:98} not ksh: not: not found {k:99} who alexis ttyp0 Feb 12 03:29(166.84.254.254) sondheim ttyq2 Feb 13 03:00(ts2.nyc.access.n) {k:100} or Kush: or: not found {k:101} what [...HEY!!!!! This message comes from bjc (Brian Cully)... <This Broadcast-message is being sent to all users currently logged-in> disaster averted, shutdown not needed.] {k:102} I Kush: I: not found {k:103} am; Kush: am;: not found {k:106} thse ese ksh: these: not found {k:107} times Shell: 0.63s user 0.93s system Kids: 11.21s user 7.31s system {k:108} are Kush: are: not found {k:109} dark ksh: dark: not found {k:110} as as: error: no input filename given usage: as [-F[O][if]#] [-O[#]] [-S[C]] [-o objfile] [-L] [-R] [-Q] [-P [[-Ipath] [-Dname] [-Dname=def] [-Uname]]...] file.s... {k:111} Kush Kush: Kush: not found {k:112} is Kush: is: not found {k:113} dark ksh: dark: not found {k:114} and Kush: and: not found {k:115} light. ksh: light.: not found {k:116} . {k:117}

↑ Index

511. sschu30844
Re: Randolph Healy
Sat 15 Feb 1997

I lost Randolph Healy's message; would someone kindly forward me another copy (Randolph, are you there?).

Thanks, Susan

↑ Index

512. Rachel Loden
no massacre
Sat 15 Feb 1997

Dear Aldon: first, am distressed that I may have offended you. Whole snafu points up the limits of email, something I've often been lectured on by resident logician who says it should be used for brief bulletins and not to carry anything with emotional freight. A simple act like pressing the reply button makes it seem that I am talking to you alone (rather than responding to the whole thread). You weren't censoring and I know that. I've recently put the screws to Eliot (on another list) for reasons very similar to the ones that made you highlight Dorn's bad behavior. Which is to say that stuff he said offended me greatly. When I said that there was a tendency to make untouchables of our enemies while making excuses for our friends, I meant that that tendency was mine as well. But neither of us is suggesting censorship, and I don't think that accusation is really anywhere in my post.

It seems possible--now that I think of it in the half-lunacy of 4 a.m. --that the work of someone who is (even slightly) reviled may, in a perverse way, attract more readers than it might have been able to pull in otherwise. I wonder how many people will pick up Dorn after this discussion with new interest, for instance. Who is this guy and how did he get that way? It's more the sort of mildly withering adjectives that Ron Silliman used in his Zones v. Zoos post that might actually have the power to shrink a potential readership, seems to me. What could be worse for a writer than to be perceived as timid or nostalgic, not to mention achingly pretentious? Now those are a real death knell.

Rachel Loden

↑ Index

513. Michael Magee
valentine poem
Sat 15 Feb 1997

Hi, I just joined the list and thought I would offer a valentine poem one day late.

HALF-PETRARCHAN LOVE SONNET

Y
I
B
C
N
N
E
Z
W
M
E U
M
E

-Mike Magee.

↑ Index

514. Tom Mandel
racism, racist poets
Sat 15 Feb 1997

How a person behaves -- what the person thinks, says and does -- ought certainly to determine how one relates to that person -- what one thinks, says, does in re: him/her. Any problems so far?

Writing -- that's thinking, saying, doing. Still with me?

Reading -- ditto. Are we on the same page?

Simple so far. Ed Dorn comes around me, I'll bust him one good in the chops whatever his skills as a poet, whatever my friend Anselm thinks. No grand zodiacs of correctness involved. You might want to read Rushdie's valentine into this space.

What makes you think you can separate reading from ethics? Aesthete? You imagine that writing and reading in the absence of ethics are anything but "trade" to use Rushdie's term.

As to pointing out the contradiction in someone's work, that's certainly a start, but it absolutely excuses the sayer if nothing else changes.

People keep imagining that someone can provide an exposition to resolve an issue like this in some sort of theory, that there's some sort of path through it. There is no intellectual resolution available to allow one to consort with hateful behavior.

My father used to say "lie down with dogs, get up with lice." If you have the time or strength or want to pick the lice off yourself, you're safe to lie down with racists, anti-semites, queer-haters, fatwa-issuers, collaborators with the Nazis, and the like. Perhaps it really won't do you any harm? Perhaps it's really not objectionable? Perhaps the regime really won't be as bad as they say? Perhaps it'd be okay to accommodate just for the brief time the phenomenon is present? Perhaps, since so many feel so comfortable in taking the ride, they are not wrong after all. Juden heraus.

As I say, Dorn around me? Punch in the mouth.

Tom

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]

4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

515. amato
the more things change (fwd); dorn...
Sat 15 Feb 1997

---

a note of thanx to alan j. sondheim for the forwarded post on telegraph technologies... i've heard these stories before, and it's nice to have some formal sources to check out... my wife kass fleisher and i met online, so i have a personal (and professional) interest in such stuff...

and i've heard too many stories about dorn, from too many folks who know him too well, not to be aware of problems with him personally & politically... which is revealed in his public self, finally, b/c he has a public self that's often very public... i don't think aldon was suggesting that we don't read his work -- aside from _slinger_, _way west_ has some fine fine work in it, and if you've spent any time at all in idaho, dorn's writing on same reveals a terrific touch...

so a call for us ALL -- pleez? pretty pleez? -- not to get into these testy waters looking for combat... if you know the man and like the man and feel the urge to rush to his defense as a friend or acquaintance, give a bit of pause -- you'll still have to contend with some pretty awful public realities... yeah, maybe we're ALL pretty awful deep down inside, or not so deep, but then i'd simply have to observe that, art aside, we ought to reserve those moments for the intimate few who can tell us where to get off...

apologies for the homily///

best,

whollyjoe

↑ Index

516. Miekal And [Fwd: CONLANG: Jabberwocky Translations]
Sat 15 Feb 1997

This is a multi-part message in MIME format.

passed on by miekal

> with NJE id 3580 for [redacted]; Sat, 15 Feb 1997 > 13:06:32 -0500
> V1.2a/1.8a) with BSMTP id 4289; Sat, 15 Feb 1997 13:06:32 -0500

TCP; Sat, 15 Feb 97 13:06:31 EST mail.inreach.com (8.8.3/8.7.1) with SMTP id KAA19703; Sat, 15 Feb 1997 10:03:23 -0800 (PST)
KAA19703
Date: Sat, 15 Feb 1997 10:12:18 -0800
From: "Leo J. Moser" <[redacted]> Organization: LJM
Subject: CONLANG: Jabberwocky Translations
To: Multiple recipients of list CONLANG <[redacted]>
KAA19703

Leo Moser supplies a copy of a webpage of links to Jabberwocky Translations: Choktaw to Klingon to Welsh! (see end for ref.)
@@@

French
Le Jaseroque, Frank L. Warrin
Jabberwocky, Henri Parisot
Jabberwocheux / Bredoulocheux Henri Parisot
Le Berdouilleux, André Bay
Le Jabberwocky, J. B. Brunius
[Jabberwocky] Antonin Artaud

German
Der Jammerwoch, Robert Scott
Brabbelback Lieselotte & Martin Remane
Der Zipferlake, Christian Morgenstern

Hungarian
Szajkóhukky Weó´res Sándor

Italian
Il Ciarlestrone, Adriana Crespi

Klingon
ja'pu'vawqoy, keith lim

Latin
Gaberbocchus Hassard H. Dodgson
Mors Iabrochii Augustus A. Vansittart

Norwegian
Dromeparden Zinken Hopp

Polish
Dz~abbersmok Maciej S/lomczyñski

Rumanian
Traxncaxniciada Frida Papadache
Bîzdîbocul Nina Cassian

Russian
Barmaglot (ASCII) / Barmaglot (Cyrillic text) / Barmaglot (Cyrillic, GIF) E. Orlova (with O. Demurova)
Umzari U.L. Oryol
Tarbormo+ski A. ^Serbakova
[Jabberwocky] [translator unknown]

Slovak
Taradúr Juraj & Viera Vojtek

Spanish
Chacaloco Erwin Brea

El Jabberwocky Adolfo de Alba
El Dragobán M. Manent

Swedish
Jabberwocky [translator unknown]
Jabberwocky, Louise Arosenius
Jabberwocky, Gösta Knutson
Tjatterslånet, Eva Håkanson
Tjatterskott, Harry Lundin

Welsh
Siaberwoci, Selyf Roberts

the jabberwocky variations:
[introduction | translations | parodies | acknowledgements]

chil

email keith: [redacted]

----------7CC21EE95BBD--

↑ Index

517. Miekal And Re: our vale in time
Sat 15 Feb 1997

---

greetings all,

miekal & liaizon & i were blessed on valentine's day (a holiday which like most others we usually ignore (except xmas which happens to fall on miekal's birthday)).

at around 5:30 pm we looked outside our east window & saw the following sight:

EIGHT CARDINALS PERCHED IN OUR SUGAR MAPLE - SEVEN MALES & ONE FEMALE!

in all my 40 years i've never seen more than three maybe four cardinals together. but eight! the effect on me was one of awe, of sacredness, of good omen, blessedness, almost a trippy feeling of having one's reality strangely but pleasantly tweaked or shifted. what a valentine's gift, those live bright red splotches in the grey-brown winter branches on a backdrop of white snow. who needs poetry (or watercolors) when you've got mother nature?

more miraculous if it'd happened in a city.. . glad to be out "in the sticks" [actually, we're at the milktruck frequented cross-section of two county highways;

there are street lamps shining out the west windows...BUT, compared to any city i've been in lately, this is still "the sticks"]

-lyx ish
--
@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

518. Elizabeth Mathews Losh

Re: names

Sat 15 Feb 1997

According to the Oxford English Dictionary "Losh" is is a word which is onomatapoetic in origin and means "to fall with a splash" or "to go stumbling" as in "Yet am I not so sheepish to losh into the Ditch" (1629). It also is a "distortion of Lord, used in certain exclamations" as in "The losh preserve me, sirs" (1779) or "Losh me! that's beautiful language!" (1855).

Losh is a surprisingly rare name outside of Pennsylvania and most people don't know quite how to pronounce it. Whenever I am introduced at a reading I write on a small slip of paper ("rhymes with GOSH"), as people generally assume "rhymes with GAUCHE."

I suspect that it is a name of German origin as everyone in my father's family is German American. But my father insists that it isn't really from "Losch" but rather "Loches," the picturesque French chateau in the Loire Valley made famous by Joan of Arc and some rather grotesque stories about its dungeon. This year he was triumphant when, after tracing the family genealogy back 350 years, he finally arrived at some French speakers who were religious dissidents to boot. I still believe that we are all middle class Krauts and that all other etymologies are just wishful thinking.

"Losh" is also the title of a book from Charasse Press Incorporated, Copyright 1975 by Brian Grieveson. I believe that Losh is the Native American heroine of the book who dies tragically at the end and who also has a daughter named Losh. The book is cryptically dedicated to "Losh Roxanne." The last line of the book is: "I love you, Losh"

↑ Index

519. B Staker
Re: NEW ADDRESS FOR POETICS LIST
Sun 16 Feb 1997

OPTIONS

↑ Index

520. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest
Re: racism, racist poets
Sun 16 Feb 1997

the way i usually think of it is that if a writer is blind, fool, and dishonest enough to either believe, or, not believing, still become a propaganda machine for racism, facism, oppression, torture, murder, repression, etc (yes i AM including pound here) i find their entire ouevre considerably less credible. yes, as with elliott and his pathetic anti-semitism, a writer might still have tremendous gifts which are only tarnished by such behavior, but the gift IS tarnished, and i lose that wonderous, celebratory sense when reading because i must pass everything i read and every feeling of admiration through the considerable filter of knowing the writer has been horrifically, at the least, misled.

to put it more succinctly, imagine reading tillie olson or that old favorite, meridel leseuer; one lets go, accepts premises willingly, is buoyed up on a respect and admiration verging on worship, learns, opens, takes in an extraordinary synthesis of emotion, compassion, skill, communication, immediateness, clarity... then imagine reading pound, especially after hearing one of those whacked anti-semitic broadcasts. you admire, but reluctantly. you distrust what you admire. you distrust his ability, innovativeness, wonder who he copied and stole from, what horrific use THAT particular idea will be put to...

you might still read, though i wouldn't read in any context that puts money in the artists' hands (buy film ticket, or book, for example). but it isn't a good read, a whole-hearted read. yes, there are degrees: elliott, though a misled snob in many respects, is not, i think, on the level of pound who was LIVING with the horrors of anti-semitism and facism in action and still enthusiastic in their support... e

↑ Index

521. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Kocik address query
Sun 16 Feb 1997

Might anyone have an address--snail or otherwise--for Robert Kocik? Would appreciate such if okay to be passed on.

↑ Index

522. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: NOT about Pound
Sun 16 Feb 1997

Has anyone on the list had a look yet at this new novel by Julian Rios, _Poundomania_, that I see noted in this morning's _NY Times_ -- Sounds fantastic, but, despite being a Dalkey Archive production, seems not to have shown up in bookstores here yet --

AND while we're on the subject of innovative writing in Spanish, does anyone have leads on more recent Spanish Language poets whose verse is as interestingly put together as Rios's prose? I've been a bit cut off since moving away from a Spanish Language bookstore where they looked out for me --

↑ Index

523. amato
Re: racism, racist poets
Sun 16 Feb 1997

e -- if what you say is the case -- and for me it is -- then the converse holds?... i think it does... that is, if i really take to someone, i'm that much more likely to WANT to like someone's poetry... which isn't to draw any hard & fast lines, or connections, just to indicate again how the person-al can inflect perceptions of product...

best,

joe

↑ Index

524. maria damon
Re: racism, racist poets
Sun 16 Feb 1997

mandel, i find your complete lack of ambivalence on this score very likeable, though i don't share it. or rather, i share it selectively. for example, i'm not a fan of pound because of his politics but i am a fan of gertrude stein. how do you see stein?
>

↑ Index

525. maria damon
ANNOUNCEMENT: FWD FROM ERIK BELGUM
Sun 16 Feb 1997

VOYS is a new sound journal on CD dedicated to exploring all aspects of speech (editors Erik Belgum and Brian West).

VOYS #1 features Raymond Federman reading his novel, "The Voice in the Closet."

VOYS #2 will feature various works around the theme of "Speech and Electronics."

Future issues tentatively include the following: realizations of the plays of Gertrude Stein, storytelling, glossolalia, new works by various writers/audio artists/sound poets, etc., etc.

Subscriptions are $28/year for 2 CD's ($32/year overseas). Send check or money order payable to VOYS, PO Box 580547, Minneapolis, MN 55458-0547.

↑ Index

526. Gwyn McVay
Re: racism, racist poets
Sun 16 Feb 1997

But there is a very real sense in which Pound was not "living with" anything like the horrors of fascism--he was geographically isolated at Rapallo, had no mail from the US during the war, and had a comfortable buffered zone of privilege--a safe place from which to spout his bullshit.

As for Dorn, his public statements have been execrable in a number of ways--in the early years of the AIDS pandemic he published some really nasty anti-gay stuff. I don't think it would be skillful means for me, in particular, to punch him in the mouth. But it doesn't exactly lead me to spend my limited "disposable" income on his books, either. For me, the Dorn issue is just a re-teaching of that truth: just because someone is black, Latino, Asian, First Nations, queer, a poet, an innovative poet, a leftist, whatever doesn't mean they're "cool."

Gwyn

↑ Index

527. Gwyn McVay
Lazer's /Opposing Poetries/
Sun 16 Feb 1997

Yo, Hank Lazer, she said rather publicly, mercy boocoo for all of the excellent work and thought and scholarship and insight that went into producing /Opposing Poetries./ A great service to readers.

Gwyn

↑ Index

528. Jordan Davis
no coast of Nebraska (bad/good)
Sun 16 Feb 1997

Rod -- tragedy (by which I guess you mean the tendency to neglect the need to focus) (or maybe you mean a work of art that records the events befalling ((no more absolutes)) those with a problem dilating) (or maybe in all this pastiche ((the word's like caulk (((breathing forever))) and in an old place unfixed a long time you need caulk)) the fractal's a star on the brow of a deathshead) wouldn't be so bad to see -- Clement Greenberg said Jules Olitski was the final product of abex but he meant it in a good way -- apex of the ibex -- fin

↑ Index

529. henry
Re: no coast of Nebraska (bad/good)
Sun 16 Feb 1997

---

sorry to interrupt, fellas, just wanted to point out that the fractal's a version of penrose tiling (the goulden section). Unrepeatable, pace Clement. Nonperiodical, no tragedy intended. You listening, Jules? - Poetry Chicken

Time silvers the plow
& the poet's voice.
- Olitsky/Mandelstam

re: Dorn

He walked into a doorjamb head first, like the sleuth of anger he was temperate and prey to the gods, like the "silent swerving from accuracy by an inch that is the uncanny element in everything. . .
a sort of secret treason in the universe"
he played at coyote. He he.

Don't throw your fist
at the shadow of the Devil's inkpot.
Ye are gods - bless they that curse ye.
Excuse not thy offenses
at the trough of World Valentine Corporation.
For the Valentine that ye purchase so dearly today is the Valentine ye ought to have given yesterday.

↑ Index

530. Tosh
(no subject)
Sun 16 Feb 1997

I think it is bad when we exculsively mix moralistic tendencies with art. I mean you can appreciate someone's politics and say 'wow, this person is right on, and therefore is a good poet...but also can't someone just be plain evil and be a great artist. I think this is possible. I think the reader just has to work harder in knowing the in-and-out of that artist's thinking and deal with it. I don't know why an artist has to be on a higher moral ground.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

531. DS
Re: racism, racist poets
Sun 16 Feb 1997

I felt much the same about dorn after last saturday night. (yech)

> As I say, Dorn around me? Punch in the mouth.
>
> Tom
>
> Tom Mandel
> ****

↑ Index

532. maria damon
Re: same old thing
Sun 16 Feb 1997

In message <v01540b03af2d02a342f4@[207.211.61.139]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> I think it is bad when we exculsively mix moralistic tendencies with art.
> I mean you can appreciate someone's politics and say 'wow, this person is > right on, and therefore is a good poet...but also can't someone just be > plain evil and be a great artist. I think this is possible. I think the > reader just has to work harder in knowing the in-and-out of that artist's > thinking and deal with it. I don't know why an artist has to be on a > higher moral ground.
>
> Tosh Berman
> TamTam Books

actually, i mix "moralistic tendencies" much less with art than with other pursuits, such as friendship. for instance, i enjoy reading william burroughs, although he shot his wife. althusser also killed his wife, and i teach his ideas in class (not uncritically, though my critique does not solely rest on his uxoricide). i doubt very much, though, that i could be friends with someone who shot his wife. of course, it depends on the circumstances; in both of these cases, the guys were not in their right minds at the time, but still they were doing something that seems somehow culturally condoned for guys who are not in their right minds. also, i'm not sure disliking someone's anti-semitism is a moral issue; it seems more one of self-preservation and self-respect. btw, ezra pound wasn't just a great poet who happened to be anti-semitic; his anti-semitism was the substance not only of his poetry but of his life choices and most passionate political public activities. i don't care much for pound. now some folks would call genet an anti-semite for various reasons. i have only been able to find one anti-semitic statement in all of his oeuvre, which i passionately adore. (though that one sentence makes me uncomfortable.) how did
"morality" get mixed up in this discussion anyway?--md
>

↑ Index

533. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

Re: racism, racist poets

Sun 16 Feb 1997

---

ahhhhh joe! we are back to taste are we...

yes, it is true. and yet, isn't there that sickening disappointment we have all known when we've met someone, and they've been great, talked the great talk, walked the great walk, and then we look at their writing and KABAAM! with the best will in the world, we cannot bring ourselves to think we like it, or it's any good...

and the converse; someone who is a wretch as a person, dishonest, mean spirited, manipulative, and they write like an angel...

but yes. i think the source stains the message, or lifts it sometimes.

it is so tangled up, really. you read donne, the sermons about giving and giving up things for others, or herbert. and it's all very nice and good-good talk, you think, still, there's something really lovely but then, then you find out that herbert relinquished the immense perks of his class, time, position, to go off and care for a small country flock against all advice for proferrment. and the tender, humble, gentle verse he writes, the simplicity and sympathy, resound so very much... or donne, after his wild youth, and wilder marriage, and imprisonment and hopeless poverty, and then he writes of what one renounces for love, and a love bought dear, and you hear the brilliant urbanite scholar crying out in each phrase against the poverty and obscurity and shame, and that he can still hold to a tenderness, a valuing rather than a bitterness, it is quite moving... e

↑ Index

534. Schuchat Simon

Re: new Adorno, Bernstein, Killian, Nielsen etc. @ B St

Sun 16 Feb 1997

Good morning Rod, hope all is well & not too snowy.

I'd like to order some books:

TANGLED LOYALTIES: LIFE & TIMES OF ILYA EHRENBERG, Joshua Rubenstein, Basic Books

JOHN'S WIFE, Robert Coover

PINOCCHIO IN VENICE, Robert Coover

IMAGINATION VERSES, Jennifer Moxley, Tender Buttons

BLACK CHANT, Aldon Nielsen, Cambridge

SOME OTHER KIND OF MISSION, Lisa Jarnot, Burning Deck

THE LACK, Rod Smith, Abacus

PENGUIN MODERN POETS #10, Doug Oliver/Denise Riley/Iain Sinclair

LUSH LIFE, Bill Berkson, Z Press

POWERLESS, Tim Dlugos, Serpent's Tail

LE DIVORCE, Diane Johnson

THE DIARY OF JAMES SCHUYLER, Black Sparrow (paperback edition)

SEEDINGS, Jerome Rothenberg, New Directions

GEOGRAPHICAL HISTORY OF AMERICA, Gertrude Stein (I believe this is again in print, but not sure from whom)

As always, please mail to

Simon Schuchat
AIT Taipei - ECON
Department of State
Washington, DC 20521-4170

Also, don't bother with items that I might have put on earlier lists but which you couldn't then find (particularly TRAIL OF THE SILKWORM, which I picked up on my last visit to Hong Kong), with the sole exception of the Bruce Andrews AERIAL, wheneverit comes out.

Hope you had a happy Chinese new Year & all best for the year of the golden cow!

Cheers,
Simon

↑ Index

535. Schuchat Simon
apologies
Sun 16 Feb 1997

---

sorry to have sent a personal message to the whole list.

not what I am reading, but what I intend to read.

↑ Index

536. David Bromige
Flawed Makers
Mon 17 Feb 1997

That was y o u r goodness, intelligence, affirmation, sorrow, y o u r ability to feel beauty, truth, evil, tyranny, honesty, that you found in the poem, whichever poem, into that wordnet you were drawn and from you these qualities were made to resound there made apparent, sensuously their intelligence apprehended came back to you from this more-than-a-Rorschach arrangement of letters. . . So how could you be deceived about an experience this personal? Even though the person who put that poem there for you to read were evil incarnate and o n l y that? The music from a broken heart can resonate for a long, long time.

The above being my take on the poem Ted wrote. Thanks for posting it, Anselm.
db

↑ Index

537. main
tarn address
Mon 17 Feb 1997

---

nathaniel tarn house/email address.
please backchannel.
thanks,
dan featherston

↑ Index

538. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: new Adorno, Bernstein, Killian, Nielsen etc. @ B St
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Now here's one real advantage to the mistakes people make when hitting that reply key -- We are finally back to reading lists -- I'm impressed with both the range and the quantity of Simon's order from Rod -- hope he reads mine first! -- but I think I'll take a few items from his list and add them to my own current reading --

Have finally gotten to the reading lists in the new book on Olson's reading -- The real meat is in the footnotes --

↑ Index

539. jen hofer
mexican poetry in translation
Mon 17 Feb 1997

i'm trying to find out everything possible there is to know about books published recently (say, in the last five years, but particularly in the last year) of mexican poetry in translation, preferably bilingual editions, and particularly work by women, & even more particularly "innovative" or "experimental" or "non-traditional" or "unconventional" (or etc etc etc) work by women. i know about forrest gander's book & juvenal acosta's & marjorie agosín's & i'm familiar with the work of suzanne jill levine & eliot weinberger (& probably some others i'm forgetting but just so you don't spend tons of energy helping me out with things i already know)--anyone want to tell me everything else about everything else?

many thanks,
jen

↑ Index

540. jdhollo
One each from Bert and Ted
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Bertolt Brecht: THE MASK OF EVIL

On my wall hangs a Japanese carving
The mask of an evil demon, decorated with gold lacquer.
Sympathetically I observe
The swollen veins of the forehead, indicating What a strain it is to be evil.

Translated by H.R. Hays

Note: the German "boese" cd also be rendered "angry, furious."

Anselm Hollo: LINES FROM TED (Berrigan) XIV

The poet whose works you love
Who's changed your life
& given it shape & become a Great Moral Source
Of Support in your life
May just be a prick with a bad character
Don't let that worry you
They just have bad days all the time
If you're vulnerable to never wanting to read their works again

when you find that out
Then never go any closer to them than this Because it's the works that are the truth
Every person has a right Poet or not to be judged by their best
The only credit poets get is for being poets
Then putting their words together & coming up with poems

As an oldtime/oldfashioned, even, rootless ("we got legs, not roots") cosmopolite of long standing, I personally regard all self- or "identity"-definition based on "othering the Other" as a big mistake. It makes this species, all of us, atavistically vulnerable to the pathological fear and paranoia that often finds its expression in all kinds of forms of scapegoating, racism, bigotry, etc. Such brain function aberrations are traditionally exploited by demagogues warlords and "business" and "religious" "leaders." It's a tough one; the propensity seems quite "hard-wired," hence requires constant vigilance, first and foremost in regard to oneself. Paranoia is far more addictive than the old poppy juice.

Sweet dreams, and good morning

Anselm

↑ Index

541. Bil Brown
Re: One each from Bert and Ted
Mon 17 Feb 1997

> As an oldtime/oldfashioned, even, rootless ("we got legs, not roots") cosmopolite of long standing, I personally regard all self- or "identity"-definition based on "othering the Other" as a big mistake.

What exactly is "othering the other"... explain. Please.

↑ Index

542. Thomas Bell
Re: racism, racist poets
Mon 17 Feb 1997

I would respond with a jaundiced eye and ear to Dorn's poetry if he had kept his mouth shut for years but then I found out his true feelings later. Honesty in one realm is likely to be true in other realms. tom bell

↑ Index

543. aerialedge
Re: no coast of Nebraska (bad/good)
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Jordan, well (it) was (I) suppose (DeKooning) said (there) is (no longer tragedy our failures are merely (pathetic which I don't think I quite go along with not that I'm not pathetic but I believe being pathetic might also (be a tragedy insofar as (it can be digested.] Still, thoughts do arise. This is the strange and wonderful thing. Or this is. Or this. This has been a Thematic Apperception Test of the Emergency Multiplicity Attachment. It remains uncertain whether negation of any kind is an electric chopper pump. & speckled incident at critical angle. But you're definitely right about dilating. I think I get your drifts.

--Rod

↑ Index

544. Rachel Loden
Re: Flawed Makers
Mon 17 Feb 1997

David Bromige wrote:
>
> That was y o u r goodness, intelligence, affirmation, sorrow, y o u r > ability to feel beauty, truth, evil, tyranny, honesty, that you found in > the poem, whichever poem, into that wordnet you were drawn and from you > these qualities were made to resound there made apparent, sensuously their > intelligence apprehended came back to you from this more-than-a-Rorschach > arrangement of letters. . . So how could you be deceived about an > experience this personal? Even though the person who put that poem there > for you to read were evil incarnate and o n l y that? The music from a > broken heart can resonate for a long, long time.
>
> The above being my take on the poem Ted wrote. Thanks for posting it, > Anselm. db

Ted's lines, Anselm's poem, yes? It's in his _Corvus_ (Coffee House).

Thanks everybody. What a lovely thread this has turned out to be.

Rachel

↑ Index

545. nico vassilakis
nordaDORN
Mon 17 Feb 1997

poets are nothing really who they are in life is a curiosit/ic extention of their work experience is / of their work we better to not meet a poet

~>?0+1 is 1
if it's allowd 2B

what?
nothing's crazy?

quote "evidence" wood be nice.
(3-1)=2 help us in the dim .
.
.
.
.
.

↑ Index

546. Michael Boughn
Re: racism, racist poets
Mon 17 Feb 1997

> to put it more succinctly, imagine reading tillie olson or that old favorite, meridel leseuer; one lets go, accepts premises willingly, is buoyed up on a respect and admiration verging on worship, learns, opens, takes in an extraordinary synthesis of emotion, compassion, skill, communication, immediateness, clarity...

I guess maybe that's the difference. I never read that way. I'm always suspicious. In my experience, the categories of "learning" and "worshipping" are exclusive of each other.

(Nor do I feel sure enough of my own purity to go around socking people in the mouth for being bad. Isn't that kinda what the Ayotollah thought he was up to?)

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

547. David R. Israel
a Persian diatribe / ..."Chaos--the Rock Video"
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Poetics persons --

looking via Yahoo for something else (as these things go), I stumbled on a poetics-related diatribe by a certain Hakim Bey, a Persian chap who has a number of opinions. Found it here:

http://www.v2.nl/FreeZone/ZoneText/Diversions/Broadsheets/PornographyBS.html

& there's an abstract:

> File Contents: Excerpt from Chaos: The Broadsheets of Ontological Anarchy by Hakim Bey. This document was gleaned from an excellent Hakim Bey source, Marius Watz's site, and was HTMLized by Tom Jennings.

The excerpt is entitled "Pornography" (poss. added by Jennings?, not sure -- haven't looked at the orig. source) -- while Bey has various prejudices about contemp. western poetry, etc., I thought his observations about the way poetry is received in the pan-Islamic world (or, anyway, the old Iran of his memory) to be worthy of note -- the term hal (tossed out by Bey) being, incidentally, from the old Sufi lexicon, and signifying "a spiritual state" (or sometimes a "state of absorption").

Am appending below what appears in the above-cited excerpt, for poss. general interest, amusement, shrugs, or whatnot.

cheers,
d.i.

p.s.: glancing at the "acknowledgements" note at end of the text, I see that The Broadsheets of Ontological Anarchism are likely to be already familiar to some readers of this Listserv. Oh well -- just tossing this morsel into the soup, for what worth.

/ / / / / / / / / / / /

Pornography

IN PERSIA I SAW that poetry is meant to be set to music & chanted or sung--for one reason alone--because it works.

A right combination of image & tune plunges the audience into a hal (something between emotional/aesthetic mood & trance of hyperawareness), outbursts of weeping, fits of dancing--measurable physical response to art. For us the link between poetry & body died with the bardic era--we read under the influence of a cartesian anaesthetic gas.

In N. India even non-musical recitation provokes noise & motion, each good couplet applauded, "Wa! Wa!" with elegant hand-jive, tossing of rupees--whereas we listen to poetry like some SciFi brain in a jar--at best a wry chuckle or grimace, vestige of simian rictus--the rest of the body off on some other planet.

In the East poets are sometimes thrown in prison--a sort of compliment, since it suggests the author has done something at least as real as theft or rape or revolution. Here poets are allowed to publish anything at all--a sort of punishment in effect, prison without walls, without echoes, without palpable existence--shadow-realm of print, or of abstract thought--world without risk or eros.

So poetry is dead again--& even if the mumia from its corpse retains some healing properties, auto-resurrection isn't one of them.

If rulers refuse to consider poems as crimes, then someone must commit crimes that serve the function of poetry, or texts that possess the resonance of terrorism. At any cost re-connect poetry to the body. Not crimes against bodies, but against Ideas (& Ideas-in-things) which are deadly & suffocating. Not stupid libertinage but exemplary crimes, aesthetic crimes, crimes for love. In England some pornographic books are still banned. Pornography has a measurable physical effect on its readers. Like propaganda it sometimes changes lives because it uncovers true desires.

Our culture produces most of its porn out of body-hatred-- but erotic art in itself makes a better vehicle for enhancement of being/consciousness/bliss--as in certain oriental works. A sort of Western tantrik porn might help galvanize the corpse, make it shine with some of the glamor of crime.

America has freedom of speech because all words are considered equally vapid. Only images count--the censors love snaps of death & mutilation but recoil in horror at the sight of a child masturbating--apparently they experience this as an invasion of their existential validity, their identification with the Empire & its subtlest gestures.

No doubt even the most poetic porn would never revive the faceless corpse to dance & sing (like the Chinese Chaos- bird)--but...imagine a script for a three-minute film set on a mythical isle of runaway children who inhabit ruins of old castles or build totem-huts & junk-assemblage nests--mixture of animation, special-effects, compugraphix & color tape-- edited tight as a fastfood commercial...

...but weird & naked, feathers & bones, tents sewn with crystal, black dogs, pigeon-blood--flashes of amber limbs tangled in sheets--faces in starry masks kissing soft creases of skin--androgynous pirates, castaway faces of columbines sleeping on thigh-white flowers--nasty hilarious piss jokes, pet lizards lapping spilt milk--nude break- dancing--victorian bathtub with rubber ducks & pink boners-- Alice on ganja...

...atonal punk reggae scored for gamelan, synthesizer, saxophones & drums--electric boogie lyrics sung by aetherial children's choir--ontological anarchist lyrics, cross between Hafez & Pancho Villa, Li Po & Bakunin, Kabir & Tzara--call it "CHAOS--the Rock Video!"

No…probably just a dream. Too expensive to produce, & besides, who would see it? Not the kids it was meant to seduce. Pirate TV is a futile fantasy, rock merely another commodity--forget the slick gesamtkunstwerk, then. Leaflet a playground with inflammatory smutty feuilletons-- pornopropaganda, crackpot samizdat to unchain Desire from its bondage.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS CHAOS: THE BROADSHEETS OF ONTOLOGICAL ANARCHISM was first published in 1985 by Grim Reaper Press of Weehawken, New Jersey; a later re-issue was published in Providence, Rhode Island, and this edition was pirated in Boulder, Colorado. Another edition was released by Verlag Golem of Providence in 1990, and pirated in Santa Cruz, California, by We Press. "The Temporary Autonomous Zone" was performed at the Jack Kerouac School of Disembodied Poetics in Boulder, and on WBAI-FM in New York City, in 1990.

.
.....
.....
\\\\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\\\\
> david raphael israel <
 >> washington d.c. <<
| [redacted] (home)
| [redacted] (office)
==========
| through recklessness woundingly worthless
| i guess we became:
| the more we became in abandon
| the less we became
///////\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///\\\\///////
Mirza Ghalib (according to yours truly)

↑ Index

548. Diane Marie Ward
Re: Calling Loss ...
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Loss Sightings....

Loss is out there... on vacation for a little bit -
he should be back in a week or so..
Jim, will back channel email address.
--

Diane-Marie Ward

On Mon, 17 Feb 1997, Jim Rosenberg wrote:

> Sorry to bother the whole list with what should be a backchannel matter ...
>
> Loss, are you out there? Does anyone know if anything has happened to Loss Glazier? Lawrence Upton is arranging a reading in London (thanks John!!) to correspond with Hypertext 97 visitations, and we need to hear from Loss. If anyone knows of what may have happened to Loss's E-mail connection, please backchannel me.
>
> -Thanks, Jim
>
> --
> Jim Rosenberg http://www.well.com/user/jer/
> CIS: 71515,124
> WELL: jer
> Internet: [redacted]

↑ Index

549. Jim Rosenberg
Calling Loss ...
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Sorry to bother the whole list with what should be a backchannel matter ...

Loss, are you out there? Does anyone know if anything has happened to Loss Glazier? Lawrence Upton is arranging a reading in London (thanks John!!) to correspond with Hypertext 97 visitations, and we need to hear from Loss. If anyone knows of what may have happened to Loss's E-mail connection, please backchannel me.

-Thanks, Jim

--
Jim Rosenberg http://www.well.com/user/jer/
CIS: 71515,124
WELL: jer
Internet: [redacted]

↑ Index

550. william marsh
Jeff Hansen?
Mon 17 Feb 1997

If anyone has Jeff Hansen's email address, would you please backchannel to

[redacted]

Thanks.

bill marsh

↑ Index

551. Mark Prejsnar
Evil poets
Mon 17 Feb 1997

In line with what Tosh Berman wrote (someone might be "just plain evil and a great artist"..forcing a reader to "work harder to know the ins-and-outs of that artist's work and deal with it").

Likely few member of the list are unfamiliar with it, but I still think Bernstein's "Pounding Fascism," a chapter in A Poetics, is the best illustration I know of the nuanced and tension-ridden work of "knowing the ins-and-outs" of a body of poetry. Short tho' it is, I've often refered to this as the only indispensible piece I have ever read on Pound--the thing I send people to who are trying to make sense of his abiding weirdness. Useful for understinding vital things about the Cantos as poetry, as well as for addressing the issues we've been raising here.

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

552. maria damon
Re: a Persian diatribe / ..."Chaos--the Rock Video"
Mon 17 Feb 1997

david is real; hakim bey is the nom de plume of peter lamborn wilson, who lived in iran for a number of years, but who is not persian. for what it's worth. maria d

↑ Index

553. John E. Matthias

Pound/Dorn

Mon 17 Feb 1997

> Delivery-Date: Sun, 17 Mar 1996 15:09:43 -0500
> X-Organization: University of Notre Dame
> Date: Sun, 17 Mar 1996 15:07:45 -0500
> Reply-To: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> Sender: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: "John E. Matthias" <[redacted]>
> Subject: Pound & Fascism, etc.
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS <[redacted]>

Re: Pound Trial/Dorn Trial
>
Almost a year ago, during the last Pound trial, I posted the following on trials from Milan Kundera's _Testaments Betrayed_. Because it took so long to type out, I saved it. As I said at the time, I don't agree with everything Kundera says any more than I agree with everything Pound says or Dorn says, but I think this text provides a useful perspective, so I post it again.

John Matthias
>
>I've been reading Milan Kundera's _Testaments Betrayed_ these last couple >of days & found some good things about the trials, in every sense, of >writers in our century. In the Chapter called "Paths in the Fog" Kundera's >focus is Kafka. On pp. 225-240, however, he begins to generalize with a >rather surprising paragraph on Orwell's _1984_:
>
>"The pernicious influence of Orwell's novel resides in its implacable >reduction of a reality to its political dimension alone, and in its >reduction of that dimension to what is exemplarily negative about it. I >refuse to forgive this reduction on the grounds that it was useful as >propaganda in the struggle against totalitarian evil. For that evil is, >precisely, the reduction of life to politics and of politics to propaganda.
>So despite its intentions, Orwell's novel itself joins in the totalitarian >spirit, the spirit of propaganda. It reduces (and teaches others to reduce) >the life of a hated society to the simple listing of its crimes."
>
>A little later he goes on like this, reaching back again to Kafka:
>
>"Tribunal: this does not signify the juridical institution intended for >punishing people who have violated the laws of a state; the tribunal (or >court) in Kafka's sense is a power that judges, that judges because it is a >power; its power and nothing but its power is what confers legitimacy on >the tribunal...

>
>"The trial's memory is colossal, but it is a very specific memory, which >could be defined as _the forgetting of everything not a crime_. The trial >thus reduces the defendant's biography to _criminography_; Victor Farias >(whose _Heidegger and Nazism_is a classic example of criminography) locates >the roots of the philosopher's Nazism in his early youth, without the least >concern for locating the roots of his genius; to punish someone accused of >ideological deviations, Communist tribunals would put _all_ his work on the >index (thus, for instance, the ban on Lukacs and Sartre in Communist >countries covered even their pro-Communist writings). "Why are our streets >still named for Picasso, Aragon, Eluard, Sartre?" a Paris paper asked in a >1991 post-Communist intoxication; it's tempting to answer: because of the >value of their works! But in his trial against Europe, Sartre said exactly >what values mean now: "our cherished values are losing their wings; looked >at closely, every one of them is blood-stained"; values stained are values >no longer; the spirit of the trial is the reduction of everything to >morality; it is absolute nihilism in regard to craft, art, works..."
>
>"For nearly seventy years Europe lived under a trial-regime. From among the >great artists of the century, how many defendants...I shall mention only >those who had some significance for me. Starting in the twenties, there >were those hounded by the tribunal of revolutionary morality: Bunin, >Andreyev, Meyerhold, Pilnyak, Veprik (a Jewish-Russian musician, a >forgotten martyr of modern art; he dared to defend Shostakovich's opera >against Stalin's condemnation; they stuck him in a camp; I remember his >piano compositions, which my father liked to play), Mandelstam, Halas (the >poet was adored by Ludvik in _The Joke_; hounded after his death for >gloominess seen as counterrevolutionary). Then there were the quarry of >the Nazi tribunal: Broch (he gazes at me, pipe in mouth, from a photo on my >worktable), Schoenberg, Werfel, Brecht, Thomas and Heinrich Mann, Musil, >Vancura (the Czech writer I most love), Bruno Schulz. The totalitarian >empires and their bloody trials have disappeared, but the _spirit of the >trial_lingers as a legacy, and that is what is now settling scores. Thus >the trial strikes at: those accused of pro-Nazi sympathies: Hamsun, >Heidegger (all Czech dissident thought, Patocka most notably, is indebted >to him), Richard Strauss, Gottfried Benn, von Doderer, Drieu la Rochelle, >Celine (in 1992, a half century after the war, an indignant official >refused to designate his house a historical monument); supporters of >Mussolini: Malaparte, Marinetti, Ezra Pound (the American military kept >him, like an animal, in a cage for months under the blazing Italian sun; in >his Reykjavik studio, the painter Kristjan Davidsson showed me a large >photo of him: 'For fifty years it has gone with me everywhere I go'); the >Munich appeasers: Giono, "Alain, Morand, Montherlant, St.-John Perse (a >member of the French delegation to the Munich conference, he was closely >involved in the humiliation of my native country); then, the Communists and >their sympathizers: Mayakovsky (who today remembers his love poetry and his >amazing metaphors?), Gorky, Shaw, Brecht (who is thereby undergoing his >second trial), Eluard (that exterminating angel who used to decorate his >signature with a drawing of crossed swords), Picasso, Leger, Aragon (how >can I forget that he offered me his hand at a difficult time in my life?), >Nezval (his self-portrait in oils is on the wall of my bookshelves), >Sartre. Some of these people are undergoing a double trial, first accused >of betraying the revolution, then accused for services they had rendered >earlier: Gide (in the old Communist countries, the symbol of all evil), >Shostakovich (to atone for his difficult music, he manufactured rubbish for >the regime's needs; he maintained that for the history of art a worthless >thing is null and void; he didn't know that for the tribunal it is the >worthlessness itself that counts), Breton, Malraux (accused yesterday of >having betrayed revolutionary ideals, accusable tomorrow of having held >them), Tibor Dery (some works of this Communist writer, who was imprisoned >after the Budapest massacre, were for me the first great literary, >nonpropagandistic reply to Stalinism). The most exquisite flower of the >century, the modern art of the twenties and thirties, was even triply >accused: first by the Nazi tribunal as _Entartete Kunst_, "degenerate art";

>then by the Communist tribunal as "elitist formalism alien to the people"; >and finally by the triumphant capitalist tribunal as art steeped in >revolutionary illusions.
>
>"How is it possible that the Soviet Russian chauvinist, the maker of >versified propaganda, he whom Stalin himself called "the greatest poet of >our epoch"--how is it possible that Mayakovsky is nevertheless a tremendous >poet, one of the greatest? Given her capacity for enthusiasm, her emotional >tears that blur her view of the outside world, wasn't lyric poetry--that >untouchable goddess--doomed one fateful day to become the beautifier of >atrocities, their "warmhearted maidservant" (Baudelaire)?....To be a true >poet and at the same time to support (like Mayakovsky) an incontestable >horror is a scandal--in the sense of an unjustifiable, unacceptable event, >one that contradicts logic and yet is real. We are all unconsciously >tempted to dodge scandals, to behave as though they don't exist. That is >why we prefer to say that the great cultural figures tainted with the >horrors of our century were bastards; but it isn't so; if only out of >vanity, aware that they are seen, looked at, judged, artists and >philosophers are anxious to be decent and courageous, to be on the right >side, to be right. That makes the scandal still more intolerable, more >inexplicable. If we don't want to leave this century just as stupid as we >entered it, we must abandon the facile moralism of the trial and think >about this scandal, think it through to the bottom, even if this should >lead us to question anew all our certainties about man as such.

>
>"But the conformism of public opinion is a force that sets itself up as a >tribunal, and the tribunal is not there to waste time over ideas, it is >there to conduct the investigations for trials. And as the abyss of time >widens between judges and defendants, it is always a lesser experience that >is judging a greater. The immature sit in judgment on Celine's erring ways >without realizing that because of these erring ways, Celine's novels >contain existential knowledge that, if they were to understand it, could >make them more adult. Because therein lies the power of culture: it redeems >horror by transforming it into existential wisdom. If the spirit of the >trial succeeds in annihilating this century's culture, nothing will remain >of us but a memory of its atrocities sung by a chorus of children."
>
>I didn't mean to type out so much; nor do I agree with everything Kundera >says. But this is certainly all worth thinking about in the context of the >continuing trial of poets like Ezra Pound.
>
>John Matthias
>
>

↑ Index

554. L. Mac Mahon and T.R. Healy

Re: Randolph Healy

Mon 17 Feb 1997

Dear Susan,

Lovely to hear from you. The way the list works I'm sure someone has answered your request. It's raining heavily here, hailstones all that sort of thing. I spent today at a seminar on classroom management. Fortunately the keynote speaker was brilliant and she managed to redefine the topic in the most interesting way. Who'd have thought it could be done?

Our cat's resting quietly in the downstairs bathroom, having had the chop-eration today. It's something I have mixed feelings about, but for that poor cat testosterone seemed to be some kind of rocket fuel. He kept disappearing and arriving back days later looking very decrepit.

I'll enclose a poem though I still haven't found and PNG ancestors. It's just a question of going back far enough.

Love,
Randolph.

Spirals Dance

I think I prefer bottomless chaos, where there is no plan, hidden or otherwise, where for ten billion years a universe lay swollen, unliving, without a soul, and endlessly creative,
molecules in every possible place forming, folding, touching, collapsing, until, in a moment, the threshold was crossed.

And I sensed the weight of those who lost their footing in the storm that makes trial pieces of us all.

And everyone I saw
at the apex of a pyramid, teetering, fragile, the slightest slip and they might never have made it anyway.
Even a comma.

Fragile, transitory, precarious, yet how could you miss at every turn the touch of life's own kiss?
upcurving ash tips trawling every breeze, Tigris-Euphrates filigree of nerve tissue in the flight of a bird.
Or from the squeeze-box of blue on a crust to the samba band of dog rooting in a bin
the same riotous tune drenching every available place.

And at any point it could have been different, multiple branches and fibres fingering every particle of the body of the possible.
And every false start, every unexplored strand winked and returned to emptiness.

Gone, only the illusion left that every line in the sketches still on show was deliberate.

But, whatever way I put it,
I suppose I saw each living thing as a collection of collections of tiny dead spheres restlessly combining and dissociating.

And even if iron atoms aren't dead,
nor made or iron,
or even if each one is a ferment of paradoxes without which my heart would not beat, how can I avoid slipping through a lattice that offers no foothold for a human self?

Am I here at all?
At the garden exhibition,
dragons' necks swooping and curving, boas of white bells, crystalline repetition, disappeared and were replaced by a landscape of little magnets attracting, repelling, lining up with the nearest field,
domains then collapsing under thermal assault, summing over time to nothing.

Is life alive?
its roots reaching into submicroscopic worlds where entities exist simultaneously in arrays of mutually excluding states, matter itself its breath attenuated to near, but never, zero.

Or not?
Choose,
if a wave of waves can decide on its own shape.

Tuesday.
Are my thoughts my own?
Neither the world nor its representative replies.
Simple, complex, directed, chaotic?
No answer.
Whatever passes for pattern can be accommodated as part of a larger random sequence or result of any of an arbitrary set of laws.

Choose,
and/or take the consequences.

I used to think nature shrank from our touch, enveloping us in a cocoon of ideas,
every love narcissism,
and hatred a war with oneself.

I don't know what I will think tomorrow.

Even a comma.

And if we are poised on the edge of a scalpel
so is the universe.
The smallest change in Newton's gravitational constant and stars could not form;
and should the charge mass ratio of the electron or Planck's constant waver neither atoms nor us.

As if, too, preceding, surrounding this universe are, were, will be shoals of others, outside any line or progress,
the mutilated, empty, capable only of spasms, side by side with the classically profiled, tone-deaf unreason hammering on every key.

When I heard the expression
"We're all in the same boat"
I took it to mean that we're all in the same kind of boat,
a flotilla of indistinguishable, isolated tubs.
It never occurred to me that it could mean one great craft, with all the nautical camaraderie which that suggests.

We could be alone,
this universe a die
with everything staked on one toss, its scale alone ensuring that one planet, one,
whose loss would be no more matter than an atom falling from your body, would be a grace note in the immense silence.

Poised.

My daughter is making faces at me through the window
because I wouldn't buy her chocolate, she standing between her reflection and her shadow.
Present.

And I see a vast double pyramid expanding into past and future meeting where the spirals dance and the mad and sturdy music registers again.

At 04:04 15/02/97 -0500, you wrote:
>I lost Randolph Healy's message; would someone kindly forward me another copy >(Randolph, are you there?).
>
>Thanks, Susan
>
>

↑ Index

555. cris cheek
Re: a Persian diatribe / ..."Chaos--the Rock Video"
Mon 17 Feb 1997

> Poetics persons --
>
> looking via Yahoo for something else (as these things go), I stumbled on a poetics-related diatribe by a certain Hakim Bey, a Persian chap who has a number of opinions. Found it here:

Slight worry that this was tongue in cheek (that's 'porn to ruin' me) but for those who might be beguiled: Hakim Bey (apart from being Peter Lamborn Wilson and often-on the case, editor and cyber-ribber) is hardly Persian. He is however a chap with often hilarious and sometimes engaging opinions.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

556. John E. Matthias
Rothenberg on EP
Mon 17 Feb 1997

> Delivery-Date: Mon, 18 Mar 1996 13:03:17 -0500
> Date: Mon, 18 Mar 1996 10:03:29 PST
> Reply-To: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> Sender: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Jerry Rothenberg <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: more on Pound: query for Jerry R.
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS <[redacted]>

As it happens, I also saved Jerry Rothenberg's post regarding the last Pound trial, so I thought I'd follow up the Kundera quote with what he had to say last March. I've cleared this with Jerry & send it back with his permission.

John Matthias

> This is in reply to Tenney's query about my own statement that the the most telling impact of Pound's work was on poets who politically, morally, might have been at the greatest distance from it. To start with my own experience -- growing up0 when I did -- the presence of Pound in the late 1940s was, to say the least, a bewilderment. I was stunned by much of the poetry, both by how it read (the language of it) and by what I heard it saying: anti-war & anti-capital & powerful too in its presentation of a way, a means, of approaching & hoping to shape the world through the poet's means, the poetry itself. I was about 16 years old at a first reading of him & shortly thereafter -- along with the reading -- came the awarding of the Bollingen & the tremendous fuss that that stirred up (close to fifty years ago). With that we were aware also of the extent of Pound's fascism &, as became clearer over the years, the viciousness of the anti-semitism in his World War II broadcasts -- a lunacy of language common to the fringe of homegrown fascists who were also in his entourage. My own first published piece of writing was a letter to the New York Post (a different NY Post at that time) in which I lamented what I thought had happened to Pound and what had become (as it still seems to be) a conundrum around the man & the work the man had given us. There was a lot I didn't know then but knowing it would certainly not have made it easier.
>
> I was never, in any sense, a Poundian, since there were too many other threads & lines coming into my awareness to allow a focus (in that sense) on any single individual. But the observation of Pound's impact -- on myself & others -- began shortly after that: the observation that those who were most significantly building on Pound's poetics & actual poetry were not the crazies & the fascist hoods of the John Kasper variety, etc., but poets like Kelly, Olson, Duncan, Mac Low, Blackburn, & before them the whole gallery of "Objectivists" or -- from other directions -- any number of European and Latin American writers -- all of them (as I understood it) with a political and moral sense (coming out of World War II) that was strongly anti-fascist, strongly in opposition to the totalitarian barbarisms for which Pound (in the years of his fascist infatuation) had become a minor flunky. In their context Pound became, remained a vital force -- the proof, through them, of what was right & germinal about him and the proof, conversely, of what was evil -- & banal in Hannah Arendt's sense -- in his succumbing to the "fascist temptation."
>
> What Pound offered and in some sense made possible wasn't divorced from the political but wasn't at the same time tied to what became HIS politics. It was a demonstration of how the political -- as history -- could enter the body of the poem -- how the poem could thrive on what Ed Sanders

(many years later & clearly drawing on Pound) spoke of as "data clusters" defining a new "investigative poetry". I don't need to go on with this, I think, except to note that it was (as far as I can recollect) not the little fascists who learned from this but poets who by disposition and, I believe, commitment were looking for a way out of the fascist & totalitarian nightmare that had threatened to overwhelm our world. And there was also -- stronger in Pound than in most other forerunners in the North American context -- a sense that history & poetry could be redefined, opened up and certainly renewed, and that for this Pound himself (as Charles B., I think, points out in his Pound essays) was a stepping-stone, a guide to things that his fascist leanings would have finally precluded. He was clearly the most extraordinary translator we had by then produced -- not only pointing to Albigensian Provence and to a sense of China speaking to the present, but (coming like Cesaire and the other Negritude poets) from the likes of Frobenius, forming one of the links (but only one) to an African past as a pinnacle, too, of the creative human spirit. It is not to say that this was -- all of it -- of Pound's doing but that he helped to set much of it in motion -- much of what, coming after him & (in some sense in spite of him) -- became essential to our present work.

And, finally, I would point out what was -- for myself & others -- the lesson of Pound's failure -- the lesson of the poet who had in the long run betrayed his poetry. It is a terrible thing to say and it is, I think, a terrible possibility that faces all of us. But it is Pound who also says it best, from the "pull down thy vanity" voice in Canto 81 to the still more telling voice (where he was already into his silence, depression) in Canto 116:

I have brought the great ball of crystal who can lift it?
Can you enter the great acorn of light?
But the beauty is not the madness
Tho' my errors and wrecks lie about me.
And I am not a demigod,
I cannot make it cohere.

I can read this, anyway, as both a confession of failure (and of betrayal -- of himself & us) and at the same time a triumph of whatevr is there speaking through him. But not Pound alone -- for which let me end, Tenney, by copying out (in what's already a long message) a poem by Julien Beck (of the Living Theater, etc. (a good pacifist & anarchist & anti-fascist), who I think loved all the poets that he mentioned in it. It's one too that Pierre and I are hoping to include -- along with a number of others -- in a section of manifestos for the next volume of Millennium.

Julian Beck's "the state will be served / even by poets"

the breasts of all the women crumpled like gas bags when neruda wrote his hymn celebrating the explosion of a hydrogen bomb by soviet authorities children died of the blistrs of ignorance for a century when siqueiros tried to assassinate trotsky himself a killer with gun and ice pound shimmering his incantations to adams benito and kung prolonging the state with great translation cut in crystal
claudel slaying tupi guarani as he flourished cultured documents and pearls in rio de janeiro when he served france as ambassador to brazil melville served by looking for contraband as he worked in the customs house how many taxes did he requite how many pillars of the state did he cement in place tell me tell me tell me stone spenser serving the faerie queene as a colonial secretary in ireland sinking the irish back for ten times forty years no less under the beau monde's brack seneca served by advising nero on how to strengthen the state with philosophy's accomplishments aeschylus served slaying persians at marathon and salamis aristotle served as tutor putting visions of trigonometrics in alexander's head
dali and eliot served crowning monarchs with their gold wallace stevens served as insurance company executive making poems out of profits euclides da cunha srved as army captain baritoning troops and d h lawrence served praising the unique potential of a king

these are the epics of western culture these are the flutes of china and the east everything must be rewritten then goethe served as a member of the weimar council of state and condemned even to death

this is the saga of the state which is served even to death

jr
[redacted]

↑ Index

557. David Bromige
e-ddress for rob mittenthal
Mon 17 Feb 1997

I'd appreciate it if someone cd tell me rob mittenthal's e-ddress. thanks, db.

↑ Index

558. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Re: a Persian diatribe / ..."Chaos--the Rock Video"
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Hakim Bey lives here in Wisconsin--Miekal And could give you more details--
--

His work is flamboyant & enjoyable

Read Rumi

↑ Index

559. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: On how morality gets into it, according to Olson
Mon 17 Feb 1997

These reminders found in reading Ralph Maud's _Charles Olson's Reading_:

"Olson did not visit Pound after February 1948; he was sick of the man, finally. An irresistable moral force was asserting itself . . . That the interest in Pound's work did not wane is reflected in Olson's library."

" . . . Cagli had brought back the biggest and most ghastly news of all time in the form of drawings he had made at Buchenwald when his artillery unit had opened up the camp: 'the first to look into that compost of civilization.' Olson's poem, 'La Preface,' commissioned by Cagli for the brochure of the New York and Chicago showings of the drawings, was the poet's attempt to resist the utter resistance of this knowledge in such a way that from that stop he might know a new beginning--"

"Cagli and Riboud . . . taught him 'the way a man comes to core . . . the discovery of his own resistance . . . the way a poet--at least--makes himself of USE to society.'"

Must fly back to the state of sin -- for now I remain yours, His most incorrect lowness, the Vicar of Boulder

↑ Index

560. shoemakers
Re: Evil poets
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Yes, I agree about the Bernstein piece. I'd also recommend Jerry McGann's essay, "The Cantos of Ezra Pound, the Truth in Contradiction" (from Towards a Literature of Knowledge), one of the first pieces to take on these issues seriously. And more recently, there's Perelman's Pound chapter in The Trouble with Genius. Also extremely useful. steve

On Mon, 17 Feb 1997, Mark Prejsnar wrote:

> In line with what Tosh Berman wrote (someone might be "just plain evil and a great artist"..forcing a reader to "work harder to know the ins-and-outs of that artist's work and deal with it").
>
> Likely few member of the list are unfamiliar with it, but I still think Bernstein's "Pounding Fascism," a chapter in A Poetics, is the best illustration I know of the nuanced and tension-ridden work of "knowing the ins-and-outs" of a body of poetry. Short tho' it is, I've often refered to this as the only indispensible piece I have ever read on Pound--the thing I send people to who are trying to make sense of his abiding weirdness. Useful for understinding vital things about the Cantos as poetry, as well as for addressing the issues we've been raising here.
>
> Mark Prejsnar

Steve Shoemaker

↑ Index

561. Herb Levy
Re: e-ddress for rob mittenthal
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Hi David,

He's on the list, but he doesn't check in very often, so here's this:

<[redacted]>

So there.

Bests (from Brookline, Mass)

Herb

> I'd appreciate it if someone cd tell me rob mittenthal's e-ddress.
> thanks, db.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

562. Tom Mandel
Racism, racist poets
Mon 17 Feb 1997

First of all, to make clear what I might have left unclear, I thought Aldon was on the money not to be drawn into the issue of "who owns the correct point of view." I have no desire to be drawn into it either. I'm sorry Maria Damon doesn't "share (my) complete lack of ambivalence on this score," to the degree that the phrase is an accurate characterization. I should say that I'm not seeking Ed Dorn out or calling him out to give him the ass-kicking he so richly deserves and so expressly has asked for -- that would be unambivalent. I'm just saying that I don't tolerate that kind of bullshit around me. If everyone did no more than that the case would be covered would it not?

As to Anselm's (if [redacted] be his address -- the post is unsigned) excusing "fits of righteousness" (i.e. attacks on Dorn's racism) in the name of "our shared powerlessness in the face of the corporate-feudal world government's brutality" let me say first that I adore Anselm as person and poet and second, sorry, that's a lot of hoohah.

You either do or do not hold a position like Ed Dorn's or the Persian-Fatwa-issuer. The fact that you don't have the power to enslave (or even employ) lots of people doesn't turn your bile into Bal a Versailles. Perhaps Khomeini never intended to act on his Fatwa; it's had its effect hasn't it? Anyway. Ed Dorn can't whip blacks on a chain gang, and he can't turn his anti-semitism into anything very effective either. That's good -- for me, I mean. It ain't a fact in his defense.

Some time in the late fifties, stepping to a podium to give a reading in Germany, Paul Celan found a crudely-drawn anti-Semitic caricature on a slip of paper left on the podium -- left for him to find. That caricature is the visual equivalent of Dorn's "Jew-baiting" (his words). Of Pound's whining bathetic spew. Of Eliot's prim dismissals. It is no different from David Duke for that matter.

Wake up. Every word spoken is spoken by someone to someone. If you can't take it in at that level, your interest in one thing and lack of interest in another is of no value. Rather, it is of the value of choosing a color of paint that goes well with the upholstery you prefer.

Tom Mandel

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

563. sschu30844
Re: Randolph Healy
Mon 17 Feb 1997

Dear Randolph--in fact, no one took it upon themselves to forward your message back to me, so I'm very glad that you yourself responded. I loved the description of your cat and the choperation. And I like your poem very much. Is your comment about PNG status a hint that my Tinfish might consider it? I'm still on sabbatical, and very vague. But it's very nice to be back in Hawai'i, where one can be vague in the sun and by the surf. Buffalo was too much grunge and freeze-burn. There's a strong chance I'll be going to England in late April or early May. I'd love to travel to Ireland to catch a glimpse of those O'Keefes of mine. Might I look you and yours up for dinner? On me (if it happens)! I'm also glad that someone has brilliant ideas about teaching. The more the merrier! aloha, Susan PS My friend Becky, whose book you signed, will be glad of your re-discovery.

↑ Index

564. David R. Israel
Re: a Persian diatribe / ..."Chaos--the Rock Video"
Tue 18 Feb 1997

Folks --

here at the home corral, I'm gettin' the Poetics missives in Digest; so the Hakim = P.L.Wilson news was some part of a day late in getting to me; -- thanks to the several who've offered that useful footnote.

Christina Chirot's terse advice --
> Hakim Bey lives here in Wisconsin--Miekal And could give you more details--
> --
> His work is flamboyant & enjoyable
>
> Read Rumi
(i.e., final sentence) is noted w/ an aposite smile. Guess I will (some more).

"Wherever a pain is, the remedy goes there. Wherever a lowland is, the water runs there...." (Mathnawi), & such.

cheers,
d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
| "...honk if you believe in geese" |
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\//&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\//..'

↑ Index

565. Bil Brown
VOX Festival: Poetry In Louisville
Tue 18 Feb 1997

Something for you all...

The First Annual VOX Festival: April 25-27 1997

Louisville's Poetics and Performance Conference will bring Oral Performance from some of the key Spoken Word and performance artists from around the country to the Louisville Metropolitain area, for three days of panel discussions, workshops,demonstrations and music, featuring some of the most controversial and prolific of avant garde Performing Spoken Artists in America.

INCLUDING:
Nicole Blackman
Brenda Coultas
Anne Elliott
Anne Waldman
Pasq Wilson and others...

REGISTRATION RATES & DEADLINES:
Postmarked by March 25th, 1997
$25 postage paid all event pass

$50 event pass after March 25th
Check & Money Order Only, Please Write for more info on registration to:

VOX Festival
c/o The Kentucky Writers Coalition Clifton Center
2117 Payne Street Suite 304-B
Louisville, KY 40206

or Email [redacted]

↑ Index

566. sschu30844
Re: Randolph Healy
Tue 18 Feb 1997

I'm terribly sorry I sent a personal message to the entire list...(blush).

Susan

↑ Index

567. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Evil poets
Tue 18 Feb 1997

---

also: a terrific piece by Andrew Parker on Pound, anti-semitism, $, and language, in Arac's /Postmodernism and Politics/.

tenney

At 07:15 PM 2/17/97 -0400, you wrote:
>Yes, I agree about the Bernstein piece. I'd also recommend Jerry >McGann's essay, "The Cantos of Ezra Pound, the Truth in Contradiction" >(from Towards a Literature of Knowledge), one of the first pieces to >take on these issues seriously. And more recently, there's Perelman's >Pound chapter in The Trouble with Genius. Also extremely useful.
>steve

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]

http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

↑ Index

568. Chris Stroffolino
Re: POETICS Digest - 16 Feb 1997 to 17 Feb 1997
Tue 18 Feb 1997

First, a question (out of sheer laziness)-- Where is the O'Hara poem (or is it not a poem) in which he speaks of poetry (his?) in terms of the Abstract Expressionist Credo to want to keep the surface up?

Second, all that push pull stuff (is it dialogue yet?) and,
going, (out of sheer exhaustion) though if the truth had rounded up many transparency mixtures and scattered the lens in the city's sun, one could oppose opposing
"and mine I loved till I to myself was not mine" (etc.)
which is MAYAKOVSKY that is STALIN that is MAYAKOVSKY Assuming you are reading this very fast like what was that LSD guy's name oh yeah slanislav grof and the junk bin of memory the hypnosis of the exroomate telling a friend subliminally "turn right" and outloud TURN LEFT, as if to get on the wavelength but always spillover and so GROF didn't take him in (oh this was 1985 or so--- before poetry or at least the great poetry wars (out of sheer exhaustion) and then he lived in the flotation tank society on central park west but i heard he was last in hawaii and he wasn't harry but poor harry what he did wandering was there a detox program, a way to figure out how to stay alive past 23
(even though he's 33). The answer is NO (out of sheer idleness)---but there is no tragedy unless you wake up one morning and realize your LEGS ARE TWISTED coz you FELL ASLEEP WITH YOUR ROOTS ON.....

↑ Index

569. Rachel Loden
the death of checkers
Tue 18 Feb 1997

A little something more for our conversation on the perfectibility of the species...

THE DEATH OF CHECKERS

> Grant that the old Adam in this Child may be so > buried, that the new man may be raised up in him.
> --The Book of Common Prayer

This is the new socialist brain. This is the statue of Dzerzhinsky falling over. This is my wife Pat.
This is an ode to the Bratsk Hydroelectric Project.
And I just want to say [abort, retry, fail...]

the kids, like all kids, love the little dog.
This/is/your/brain/speaking...So I want you all to stonewall it. Because gentlemen, this is my last dance contest, last waltz with Leonid around the Winter Palace. This is the Komissar of Moonbeams, this is the Soviet of Working People's Reveries. This is the new man born out of Adam.

These are the new world order mysteries--oh,

Republican cloth coat. Oh gallery of Trotskyist apostasies. Tricia and Julie do not weep for me:
I live and flourish in the smooth newt's tiny eyes,
my new brain fizzing with implanted memories.

--Rachel Loden
New American Writing 13

↑ Index

570. henry gould
(no subject)
Tue 18 Feb 1997

On Sun, 16 Feb 1997 18:26:24 -0800 Tosh said:
>I think it is bad when we exculsively mix moralistic tendencies with art.
>I mean you can appreciate someone's politics and say 'wow, this person is >right on, and therefore is a good poet...but also can't someone just be >plain evil and be a great artist. I think this is possible. I think the >reader just has to work harder in knowing the in-and-out of that artist's >thinking and deal with it. I don't know why an artist has to be on a >higher moral ground.

Most artists are just like other people, only worse. Their obsession with their work draws them away from people & into the labyrinth of dreams and vanity and illusion. Because they are worse than usual, people make excuses for their behavior, even romanticize it. Until the day comes when they have to appear before the tribunals and go to jail for their immoralities personal and artistic. The fact that their best and freest gifts and impulses go into their work fortunately saves the work itself and wins people over far and wide, just as it should.

And occasionally the work acts as a good influence on the lousy artist too. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

571. Jill A Mccartney stein query
Tue 18 Feb 1997

---

i'm writing about the politics of stein's later work, and just a few weeks ago someone mentionned a piece on stein's republicanism at http://www.slate.com/. i couldn't access it and so would like to try to get in touch with the author. anybody remember/know about this? please backchannel ([redacted]). thanks, jill mccartney

↑ Index

572. Tom Mandel
gli poeti racisti
Tue 18 Feb 1997

With these words from Anselm Hollo...

"As an oldtime/oldfashioned, even, rootless ("we got legs, not roots") cosmopolite of long standing, I personally regard all self- or "identity"-definition based on "othering the Other" as a big mistake. It makes this species, all of us, atavistically vulnerable to the pathological fear and paranoia that often finds its expression in all kinds of forms of scapegoating, racism, bigotry, etc. Such brain function aberrations are traditionally exploited by demagogues warlords and "business" and "religious" "leaders." It's a tough one; the propensity seems quite "hard-wired," hence requires constant vigilance, first and foremost in regard to oneself. Paranoia is far more addictive than the old poppy juice."

I am completely in accord. He is especially right about the hard-wired part, as we see worldwide in this here enlightened age of ours. True also are the words in his poem, to the effect that we have the right to be judged by what is best about us and the best we've done. We can make that easier for folks, of course, by not spewing racist garbage as the other part of the mix!

Tom

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

573. Christopher Alexander
Re: Randolph Healy
Tue 18 Feb 1997

susan sed:
> I'm terribly sorry I sent a personal message to the entire list...(blush).
dont blush too hard--there seems to have been a spate of this recently.

signed (one of the principal offenders) chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]

(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

↑ Index

574. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Evil poets
Tue 18 Feb 1997

I am interested in reading McGann's thing--thanx for mentioning it...and I agree about the Perelman Pound essay, which I decided was one of the few other useful treatments I'd seen, when I read that book a year ago. It was a pity that I felt obscurely irritable about the rest of it--the discussion of Joyce felt too standard-academic, and the chapters on Zukofsky and Stein really made me uncomfortable, as they seemed to belittle the work of each on the grounds that it was hopelessly diminished by the poets' lack of "social location" (i.e. a meaningful audience and social role to work within)... That judgment seemed to me off-target. As regards Pound, I have to admit to having just read Perloff's "The Contemporary of Our Grandchildren" in Poetic License, and now have another first-rate essay to cite (not being an acadmic, I spend long amounts of time reading little but poetry, and then in sudden spasms catch up with criticism/theory I've missed).

On Mon, 17 Feb 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> *Yes, I agree about the Bernstein piece. I'd also recommend Jerry McGann's essay, "The Cantos of Ezra Pound, the Truth in Contradiction" (from Towards a Literature of Knowledge), one of the first pieces to take on these issues seriously. And more recently, there's Perelman's Pound chapter in The Trouble with Genius. Also extremely useful.*
> steve

> On Mon, 17 Feb 1997, Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>
> In line with what Tosh Berman wrote (someone might be "just plain evil and a great artist"..forcing a reader to "work harder to know the ins-and-outs of that artist's work and deal with it").
>
> Likely few member of the list are unfamiliar with it, but I still think Bernstein's "Pounding Fascism," a chapter in A Poetics, is the best illustration I know of the nuanced and tension-ridden work of "knowing the ins-and-outs" of a body of poetry. Short tho' it is, I've often refered to this as the only indispensible piece I have ever read on Pound--the thing I send people to who are trying to make sense of his abiding weirdness. Useful for understinding vital things about the Cantos as poetry, as well as for addressing the issues we've been raising here.
>
> Mark Prejsnar
>
> Steve Shoemaker

↑ Index

575. amato
Re: the death of checkers
Tue 18 Feb 1997

---

rachel, thanx for that!... i really enjoyed it...

best,

joe

↑ Index

576. Jordan Davis
when that a wide wood (can't hear)
Tue 18 Feb 1997

---

so where was the emphasis in some trees?
the attention to fallacy, were cliches a tragedy?
hypothesis? eminent domain
the enemy thought and the eminence is a multinational not a nation? thou still. He is speaking to a mechanism for producing liquor?
resource is attitude, the fog comes in

Gets his gat, plugs his map, Judy Garland, was the original poetics the study of tragedy?
great map but where's (just like a pile of leaves)
the mountain? seems mainly to have done with royal families. A thousand not yet naive as crossed eyes (growth / value) (contrarian)

↑ Index

577. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
people-not-here-talk
Tue 18 Feb 1997

It's unusual (I may be wrong about this) that a poet publicly declares his intention to slug another poet in the chops.

I've read some of Dorn's poetry. It didn't rouse my fighting instinct.

Would someone (Aldon Neilsen? Tom Mandel?) mind taking the time to explain in more detail what it is Dorn may have said (in public only, please) to piss people off?

Also, while I'm making demands, I was wondering, Ron Silliman, if you would elaborate on why you liken Eliot Weinberger ("the AntiGroup politics they pursue. Which has an interesting political edge to it, especially when as in Eliot's case it comes across sounding ultraleftist with an echo of Pat Buchanan") to a Buchanan echo? cannon echo? canon echo?

[redacted]

↑ Index

578. Tosh
Re: people-not-here-talk
Tue 18 Feb 1997

---

s.
>
>I've read some of Dorn's poetry. It didn't rouse my fighting instinct.
>
>Would someone (Aldon Neilsen? Tom Mandel?) mind taking the time to explain in >more detail what it is Dorn may have said (in public only, please) to piss >people off?
>
I too want to know. If it was discussed before in detail, i must have missed it.

cheers,

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

579. Andrew D Epstein
Re: Chris S's O'Hara question
Tue 18 Feb 1997

On Tue, 18 Feb 1997, Chris Stroffolino wrote:

> First, a question (out of sheer laziness)--
> Where is the O'Hara poem (or is it not a poem) in which he speaks of poetry (his?) in terms of the Abstract Expressionist Credo to want to keep the surface up?

Hi Chris --

The passage you're thinking of is, I think, at the end of O'Hara's essay piece "Notes on _Second Avenue_." It's in Collected Poems, p. 497:

"As I look this over, it seems quite a batty way to give information about the poem, but the verbal elements are not too interesting to discuss although they are intended to keep the surface of the poem high and dry, not wet, reflective and self-conscious. Perhaps the obscurity comes in here, in the relationship between the surface and the meaning, but I like it that way since the one is the the other (you have to use words) and I hope the poem to _be_ the subject, not just about it."

Hope that helps!

Take care,

Andrew Epstein

↑ Index

580. David Israel
Re: people-not-here-talk -Reply
Tue 18 Feb 1997

>>Would someone (Aldon Neilsen? Tom Mandel?) mind taking the time to explain in >>more detail what it is Dorn may have said (in public only, please) to piss
>>people off?

>
>I too want to know. If it was discussed before in detail, i must >have missed it. cheers,
>
>Tosh Berman
>TamTam Books

for that matter, I, too, am out of the loop on this --

(I'd read some fiction Dorn wrote once, have heard of the guy vaguely, and have a notion he's ensconsed w/ the Naropa School more or less) --

but this seems bit like having somehow missed news of WW III

so, some note of background, kindly?

d.i.

↑ Index

581. David Bromige
poetry & address
Tue 18 Feb 1997

---

thanks, everybody, three of you have already responded back-channel w robert mittenthal's e-ddress. We here at KSEB ("Radio Shishkebab") have compared results and chosen our fave version which we shall be contacting any minute now. So the 3 free tickets to last Saturday's Johnny Otis & the Band show have already gone, sorry & Th-th-thats all folks.But several hitherto (to us) unknown e-ddresses emerged incidentally, it was good trolling. Keep those cards & po-ems coming in! Especially those poems! Thank you,Randolph Healy,Jordan Davis & Rachel Loden! The List is getting Poetic at last. db

↑ Index

582. Jeremy F Green
Re: divers
Tue 18 Feb 1997

On Fri, 14 Feb 1997, David Bromige wrote:

> 2) Ed Dorn's _North Atlantic Turbine_ is an amazing book, as it was when it > first appeared. And there are earlier books: _Hands Up_, _The Newly > Fallen_, filled with moving poetry, hard-bitten/tender poems of love and > mourning, often with a political--but what we used to call "human"--edge to > them. _Gunslinger_ was a notable departure from the work of his first > decade of publishing. Some big change, announced with "Stand by the Door > Awhile, Death, there are Others" which i read as intermediary between the > early and the middle periods of this terrific poet.

>
> As for bigotry--we have Aldon's indications, and wasnt an issue of his zine > _Rolling Stock_ full of taunting of AIDS sufferers? I'd welcome clarity on > that one.
> >
Eliot Weinberger has an appropriately indignant discussion of this in Words on Paper (as far as I remember, Rolling Stock "awarded" infection for sundry "poetry crimes"--what they were I can't recall, but along the lines of "praising the work of Joanne Kyger and Stephen Rodefer", etc.)

↑ Index

583. Christopher Reiner
Re: stein query
Tue 18 Feb 1997

Slate archives articles in a section called "compost." This should be the URL of the Gertrude Stein article (by Herbert Stein, called, I think "Cubist as Republican").

http://www.slate.com/itseemstome/97-02-06/itseemstome.asp

On Tue, 18 Feb 1997, Jill A Mccartney wrote:

> i'm writing about the politics of stein's later work, and just a few weeks ago someone mentionned a piece on stein's republicanism at http://www.slate.com/. i couldn't access it and so would like to try to get in touch with the author. anybody remember/know about this? please backchannel ([redacted]).
> thanks,
> jill mccartney

↑ Index

584. Mark Roberts
AWOL Happenings (forwarded)
Tue 18 Feb 1997

>Date: Wed, 19 Feb 1997 06:56:50 +1000
>To: [redacted]
>From: [redacted] (AWOL)
>Subject: AWOL Happenings
>
>Just a reminder that AWOL's HAPPENINGS list is now available from our website:

>http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/
>HAPPENINGS is updated regularly and contains information about Australian writing >events, competitions and conferences on a state by state basis. HAPEENINGS >also contains information on the latest small press releases and writing >programs on Australian radio and tv.
>
>To enable to keep our information up to date please let us know of any >event that we haven't listed.
>
>
>
>Mark Roberts
>
>
>
>AWOL
>Australian Writing On Line
>[redacted]
>http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
>PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
>Phone 61 2 7475667, Mobile 015063970
>Fax 61 2 7472802
>
>
>
>

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
& User Representative SIS Team.
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
Phone 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax (02) 9351 7711

↑ Index

585. David Bromige
its okay to commit unspeakable acts
Tue 18 Feb 1997

George, its ok to commit unspeakable acts and to speak of them to other people but lets just keep this between the two of us ok? Its ok to compare dickinson to dorn because if ed went public with his prejudices, emily went private with her heaven-knows-what. So thats all ok eh, that balances out. Anyway george just one more little secret we can keep between us, eh? (we canadians say "eh"). david

↑ Index

586. David Bromige
oh my god
Tue 18 Feb 1997

Everybody, i dont know what just came over me--I posted to the list a very personal transmission from me to george bowering!! oh my god, dont read it! oh, this is terrible! how cd i make such a dumb mistake? yr address is almost entirely different from the List's address! Can you believe it? Its like putting the car into Drive when you think youre putting it into Reverse! shucks. uh, algernon charles.

↑ Index

587. Mark Weiss
(no subject)
Tue 18 Feb 1997

Anselm--just back from my jaunt to Baja and days of unimaginable salty bliss to find all manner of fun stuff in my emailbox. Old hat by now, but I'd like to put my two cents in. I think you and others have misunderstood Ron Silliman's comments, which I quote below. I can see why you might be incensed: on the surface Ron appears either to assume that what he says is self-evident or to be indulging in gratuitous provocation--equally childish and arrogant mind-sets, typical of that phase of adolescent individuation in which self is defined in opposition. But is it not possible that what we have here is deliberate self-parody? If it is, we have been invited to be present at the emergence of a new level of wisdom--the development of an observing ego--and we can only applaud Ron's generosity in allowing us to be there.

But as for those appropriative galoots who claim that we're all part of their herd if we do langpo-type stuff (as if the 20th century and a good part of the 19th were his own personal rangeland), out west where you and I live they call buckaroos who brand whatever cattle happen to be around rustlers, and the hanging judges don't care much for theory as an excuse.

On the subject of poor Dorn and even poor Pound, your eloquent poem speaks volumes. I'd just like to add a few names from various hit lists to stir the dust a bit. What do we make of Spicer's line, gratutous in context, about a "New York jew salesman of amethyst pyjamas?" Are we allowed to read Celine, Maurois, Giono, Montherlant (add any number of French writers)? Brecht, Picasso, Rodin and Williams were in various ways unpleasant to their wives and girlfriends, and Gesualdo killed his wife. Degas was an antisemite. Frieda Kahlo, that somewhat improbable heroine, was by any standards a "difficult" woman, and would have been even if she'd had a more abstemious husband. Dickenson and Smart were more than a little over the edge. And let's not forget Leni Riefenstahl (I'm sure I missed the spelling on that one). At what point are all these folks so beyond the pale that they take their work with them? Or do we recognize the flaws, grit our teeth and learn, even become enriched, despite the fact that we might not feel comfortable at that cocktail party?

Now that I've made this list, it occurs to me that this group of the difficult, demented and disreputable may be a school, even though most of these folk had a sentimental attachment to the notion of the loner.

Best to the missus.

Consider, for example, that non-group posed by Forrest Gander. Several of the folks on that list--Taggart, Cole and Sobin, say (and to some degree Palmer)--all share enough features to compose a group of their own except that the Loner status with all its aching pretentiousness is one of its major preconditions. All of them are male second generation Black Mountain poets whose work is notably more timid than that of their elders. And all of them are too much in love with a certain codified sense of Beauty, tho it plays out in very different ways from person to person (except that for all it comes across as some variant of nostalgia). We could build a slightly larger circle here and toss in some other folk who fit the category, such as Augie Keinzhaler, George Evans, Eliot Weinberger. What keeps these folks from being a group is precisely the AntiGroup politics they pursue. Which has an interesting political edge to it, especially when as in Eliot's case it comes across sounding ultraleftist with an echo of Pat Buchanan.

Another cluster of writers who could be legitimately grouped would be poets who were trained ("educated" in the most literal sense) within the academic poetics of the free verse '60s mode who have sometimes been associated with langpo, largely because they have very lively minds and can't keep their work from having lots of snap and pop at all points: Gander himself is an example, as are C.D. Wright, Jorie Graham, Ann Lauterbach and Bob Hass. These writers (and here is where Palmer would come in again) have a more complicated relation to questions of community and tradition and a very ambivalent stance toward innovation.

↑ Index

588. Mark Weiss
(no subject)
Tue 18 Feb 1997

Oops (blush blush blush), meant to backchannel that last. Oh well, now I've gone public. Hope no one feels I've been provocative. I try never to be provocative.

Did the Milesian lie who said that all Milesians were liars?

↑ Index

589. Dave Zauhar
Re: the academy of evil poets
Tue 18 Feb 1997

Those of you working in the computer industry might have a harder time getting hold of the source here, but listmembers in the academy should be able to track it down w/ relative ease: the current (February 21, 1997) issue of The Chronicle of Higher Education has an article about the MFA program at Syracuse, complete w/ tales of a poet throwing Scotch in the face of a graduate student and calling her a "stalinist bitch." My favorite part is the pictures of 4 writers. They all look like they're posing for their dust jacket photograph. Is that a part of the curriculum at MFA programs these days? Anyway, the article is entertaining when it shows the various writers at each other's throats, but it's also disturbing to see the manipulation of students that seems to be commonplace, if the article is to be believed. Read it and weep (or laugh, depending on your disposition).

Dave Zauhar

↑ Index

590. Wendy Battin
Re: oh my god
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Hey, I'm deeply disappointed. I just posted my entire sexual, criminal, & literary history to the list by accident and it never showed up. Just shows where too much trust in technology gets you.

wendy (aside, stage left)

On Tue, 18 Feb 1997, David Bromige wrote:

> Everybody, i dont know what just came over me--I posted to the list a very personal transmission from me to george bowering!! oh my god, dont read it! oh, this is terrible! how cd i make such a dumb mistake? yr address is almost entirely different from the List's address! Can you believe it? Its like putting the car into Drive when you think youre putting it into Reverse! shucks. uh, algernon charles.

↑ Index

591. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: its okay to commit unspeakable acts

Wed 19 Feb 1997

"Vinnie and I say masses for poor Irish boys souls. So far as I am concerned I should like to have you kill some--there are so many now, there is no room for the Americans, and I cant think of a death that would be more after my mind than scientific destruction, scholastic dissolution, there's something lofty in it, it smacks of going up!" --Emily Dickinson to her brother -- June 15, 1851

Now,,,, is it really all that difficult to understand that I might talk about Dickinson's poetry with my students and also talk about this part of her thought? One conversation helps us to understand something about her poetry -- the other conversation helps us, perhaps, to understand something about our culture that we probably need to understand as much as we need her poetry -- The irony in her poetry and in this letter might even help us to comprehend the ironies of our own history -- who is trying to police what in this recent discussion???

yours in the shank o' the evening,
the grunt vassar of San Ho

↑ Index

592. Mark Weiss

(no subject)

Wed 19 Feb 1997

---

alright, alright, I was a little obvious. Spreads a little innocent merriment, anyway.

↑ Index

593. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: oh my god
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Just received a message from the deity -- it was intended for the whole list but apparently used the wrong reply function and came to me alone -- It said: "Don't trust any messages over fifty!"

↑ Index

594. Miekal And
Re: Irony Emily
Wed 19 Feb 1997

David Bromige wrote:
>
> I am backchanelled by one of our number inquiring as to why I have regrets.
> I have regrets because all the importrant anthologies are now being edited > by close relatives of those poets I had bumped off. Nuff said? db well david, you & I & alan (jennifer) will just have to make our own anthology,now wont we? we can call is New American Poetry.

miekal

↑ Index

595. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest
Re: oh my god
Wed 19 Feb 1997

---

dear wendy

we got the literary and criminal part, but the sexual part seems to have gotten turned, partwy through, into ascii gibberish. could you please at least finish the part about the rubber suit and the feathers? several of the list members have a bet on how it will turn out... e

↑ Index

596. Peter Landers
Re: people-not-here-talk -Reply
Wed 19 Feb 1997

> Would someone (Aldon Neilsen? Tom Mandel?) mind taking
> the time to explain in > more detail what it is Dorn may have said (in public only,

> please) to piss
> people off?
>
> I too want to know. If it was discussed before in detail, i must > have missed it. cheers,
>
> Tosh Berman
> TamTam Books
>
> for that matter, I, too, am out of the loop on this --
>
> (I'd read some fiction Dorn wrote once, have heard of the guy > vaguely, and have a notion he's ensconsed w/ the Naropa School > more or less) --
>
> but this seems bit like having somehow missed news of WW III
>
> so, some note of background, kindly?
>
> d.i.

Dorn and Tom Clark seemed to think that AIDS was a topic of humor. They nominated various infamous people for the award which consisted of an injection of the AIDS virus. This done to the lurid graphic of a dripping hypo. I wrote them at the time and told them that I didn't think it was funny. I asked Dorn after a reading what he was thinking of. He was not cordial <g> and refused to talk about it.

Pete L.

↑ Index

597. Mark Wallace
most artists are worse than other people
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Artists are like other people, only worse? Oh geez, Henry. I thought artists were other people. Some bad traits, good traits, etc. Artists are more likely to dream? Geez, these days they're more likely to be excellent business people, holding a regular job, doing their work as an artist, having families too sometimes and not even necessarily beating them or being addicted to drugs. I mean, really, the only thing worse than being ordinary is being romanticized, even if in the negative.

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

598. Wendy Battin
Re: oh my god
Wed 19 Feb 1997

On Wed, 19 Feb 1997, Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest wrote:

> we got the literary and criminal part, but the sexual part seems to have gotten turned, partwy through, into ascii gibberish. could you please at least finish the part about the rubber suit and the feathers? several of the list members have a bet on how it will turn out...

Huh? the rubber suit and feathers was the literary part.

w

↑ Index

599. Jordan Davis
Re: this sentence is a lie?
Wed 19 Feb 1997

I was able to get the lying cretan/milesian paradox to shut down when I took the statement 'everything I say is a lie' to be sarcastic ... J

↑ Index

600. charssmith
Re: people-not-here-talk -Reply
Wed 19 Feb 1997

In a message dated 97-02-19 02:40:28 EST, you write:

<< (I'd read some fiction Dorn wrote once, have heard of the guy vaguely, and have a notion he's ensconsed w/ the Naropa School more or less) -- >>

Hardly. He lives in Boulder, but teaches at CU. Check out Tom Clark's _Naropa Poetry Wars_ (or somesuch) to find out why he doesn't hang with the Disembodied crowd.

I think soemone already mentioned this, but there was an issue of his magazine, Rolling Stock, in the 80's full of vicious AIDS jokes & anti-gay sentiment. Lost my respect then. Sad. I still like the early work & _Gunslinger_. The one time I heard him read, he was too drunk.

↑ Index

601. henry gould
Re: most artists are worse than other people
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Well, the most important artist of "our generation" (listening, Mickey Mouse Club members?) I know personally is Jack Spandrift, the hard-drinkin tough-talkin po-yeti from Brainerd MN. That proves it. Did you read his egregious attack on Fellow-Poet Dorn? I'm embarrassed to be associated with a list that would include such a person.

And furthermore, I tink I said in my fust post that people romanticize artistic "badness" in a very very bad way. I don't really think artists are wuss than other people, I was just tryin to rhetoroarically counteract the moralist front. This ain't to say I don't agree completely with Aldon that Emily Dickinson's scorn of me Irish furfathers is relevant to the Historical Taste-Building nekessary here & everywhere, & with Mandel, Tom, that slugs must not cower under the rug in the face of rampant bigotry. Oh no! Let slugs emerge!

Poets aren't worse than other people. It's just that people in general are so BAD that any predilection for expression-obsession tends to drag the lame foot over the ground and leave the said poet unstaid. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

602. David Bromige
Irony & Emily
Wed 19 Feb 1997

---

is it just lil old me trying to "save the appearances" or is there a Swiftian ring to Dickinson's sentiments re my people? (I am not actually descended from irish stock, but since the whole world wants to be, it wd be egregious of me to exclude myself).

I have much pleasure of the "o my god" string, thanks Wendy & Eliza & Aldon. And good on you, Mark W, for taking the kidding so well. I had some bad moments during the night, feeling i had shown my less-than-charitable side to the List. I can only pray that one of these midnights, euphoric & heedless on Diet 7-Up and Manchego cheese, I dont reveal the names--and they are of many nations--of all those poets I had throttled & dumped in the river. Weird percussion aids, end-rime, end-runs around beautiful obstacles, the sixpack drunk with a fellow-poet, ghazals, gazelles (beauty & grace of), sestinas, Dad's pocket-fluff, Mom's hemline, the hole in Sissie's wall--they were sucking for a bruise. But still, I have my regrets. db

↑ Index

603. David Bromige
Irony Emily
Wed 19 Feb 1997

I am backchanelled by one of our number inquiring as to why I have regrets. I have regrets because all the importrant anthologies are now being edited by close relatives of those poets I had bumped off. Nuff said? db

↑ Index

604. Toni Simon
Re: Light Street (reviews)
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Since this is my first posting I would like to say hello to all of you and to thank Charles Bernstein and the State University of New York at Buffalo for making this important access possible. Although I was not on-line when several reviews of my new book Light Street from Zasterle Press appeared (2/12-2/14) I was delighted when I did see them and I am very appreciative. Special thanks to Henry Gould, Charles Alexander, Tom Beard, Fred Muratori and to my good friends Mark Wallace, David Bromige and Douglas Messerli. As was mentioned in several of the postings concerning Light Street and my other books, Zasterle Press, edited by Manuel Brito in the Canary Islands, is a terrific press and has included- since 1994- such books as The Whole Note by Gill Ott, a collaboration by Alan Davies with the photographer M.M. Winterford, Acoustic Masks by Ted Pearson, The Weatherman Turns Himself In by Leslie Scalapino, Keys To The Caverns by Clark Coolidge, and Train of Thought by Jack Spicer. Earlier books include those by Charles Bernstein, Carla Harryman, Barrett Watten, Ray DiPalma, Bruce Andrews, the late Jerry Estrin and the late Daniel Davidson.

Nick Piombino

↑ Index

605. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: "Poets are other people"
Wed 19 Feb 1997

I thought I read in Sartre that Hell was other people -- Oh damn! Is that why nobody wants to be stuck in a living room with me?

↑ Index

606. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Other Mothers' Sons
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Well, having had a good yuck while reading Henry's last -- I looked back at the post on Emily Dickinson -- and while "history" is indeed mentioned, I can't seem to find any reference to taste in those sentences whatsoever --

Tell me, Ramon Fernandez, if you can,
Why this blessed rage for taste

↑ Index

607. Sylvester Pollet
Re: "Poets are other people"
Wed 19 Feb 1997

On the other hand, Aldon, are you so sure you'd want to be stuck in a living room with Sartre?

> I thought I read in Sartre that Hell was other people -- Oh damn! Is that why nobody wants to be stuck in a living room with me?

↑ Index

608. aerialedge
Tina Darragh reading
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Sunday, Feb. 23rd, 8 PM

a reading/talk

by Tina Darragh

Bridge Street Books
2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW
Washington, DC 20007

ph [redacted]

hurray!

↑ Index

609. henry
Re: Irony Emily
Wed 19 Feb 1997

> I am backchanelled by one of our number inquiring as to why I have regrets.
> I have regrets because all the importrant anthologies are now being edited > by close relatives of those poets I had bumped off. Nuff said? db

Let it go, Dave. Aunt Spurl had it coming, anyway. I've included your sestina, "Turkey Time for Stuffed Shirts" (with a few editorial downgrades) in my upcoming anthology, _Dribble Down the Line : Odiferous Poets of the 90s_ (Cowboy Laundry Press, POB 13, Small Town, Wyo 11174). It's due out next week. You don't mind I used it, do you? Thanks. p.s. the books's only $39.95, prepaid only, please. - Jack Spandrift p.s. no, you "Poets" out there - don't get your hopes up. YOU ARE NOT IN THIS ANTHOLOGY!!!

↑ Index

610. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Irony & Emily Play Together in Perfect Harmony
Wed 19 Feb 1997

I always consider a sentence of death by scientific education to be Swiftian in nature -- I also have always imagined that modest proposals for the eating of one's "own" people have a slightly different "taste" than proposals that others should be devoured -- If for no other reason than that the self is nearly always excluded from the sentence passed upon even one's own -- though a modest proposal for autoingestion WOULD seem to set a new standard for modesty as well as irony -- well, now I see that I finally have come down on the side of taste after all -- to quote that great poet Slinger Francisco: "I never ate a white meat yet!"

are we past the fifty mark yet?

And please remember the following from Charles Bernstein's list of rules for the POETICS list:
all irony (including sarcasm, schtick, mocking, jokes, and comic innuendo) will be prohibited from the list.
This is a particularly difficult rule to enforce automatically, but recent, unpublishable, research, indicates that there may be genetic markers of sarcasm and our team of crack(ed?) computer experts are working around the clock to find programs to detect this "irony gene" in linguistic expression.

[nb: Bernstein uses "genetic" in both its linguistic and its biological senses here, obviously way ahead of his time once more in predicting a major portion of the "Ebonics" debate -- the comma that appears after the word "research" is, in fact, a genetic marker of irony, and statistical analysis indicates that there is only a 1 in 50 million possibility that anyone other than Charles Bernstein could have left this marker at the scene -- lastly, for those of you who have recently inquired about the seemingly absent Loss, he is completing the irony detection program at a secret off-campus s(c)i(gh)te.] as ever, yours,

the gnomon of Zurich

↑ Index

611. Mark Weiss
Re: Irony & Emily
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Yo, Bromige, lay off the cheese, it'll kill you. Gazelle meat, on the other hand, is low on fat and swift to digest.

At 10:12 AM 2/19/97 -0500, you wrote: >is it just lil old me trying to "save the appearances" or is there a >Swiftian ring to Dickinson's sentiments re my people? (I am not actually >descended from irish stock, but since the whole world wants to be, it wd be >egregious of me to exclude myself).
>
>I have much pleasure of the "o my god" string, thanks Wendy & Eliza & >Aldon. And good on you, Mark W, for taking the kidding so well. I had some >bad moments during the night, feeling i had shown my less-than-charitable >side to the List. I can only pray that one of these midnights, euphoric & >heedless on Diet 7-Up and Manchego cheese, I dont reveal the names--and >they are of many nations--of all those poets I had throttled & dumped in >the river. Weird percussion aids, end-rime, end-runs around beautiful >obstacles, the sixpack drunk with a fellow-poet, ghazals, gazelles (beauty >& grace of), sestinas, Dad's pocket-fluff, Mom's hemline, the hole in >Sissie's wall--they were sucking for a bruise. But still, I have my >regrets. db
>
>

↑ Index

612. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: Irony Emily
Wed 19 Feb 1997

And, We're Not related!

Jennifer!

On Wed, 19 Feb 1997, Miekal And wrote:

> David Bromige wrote:
>
> I am backchanelled by one of our number inquiring as to why I have regrets.
> I have regrets because all the importrant anthologies are now being edited > by close relatives of those poets I had bumped off. Nuff said? db
>
> well david, you & I & alan (jennifer) will just have to make our own > anthology,now wont we? we can call is New American Poetry.
>
> miekal

http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/
Tel. [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149

↑ Index

613. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)
Re: poetry reading/performance
Wed 19 Feb 1997

looks fab

> poetry readings by NATHANIEL MACKEY
> with Hafez Modirzadeh and Royal Hartigan (reed/percussion)
>
> Monday, February 24th, 8 pm
> with ED ROBERSON, Hafez Modirzadeh, and Royal Hartigan
>
> College Hall
> Livingston College
> Rutgers University
> New Brunswick NJ
>
> ———————————————
>
> Tuesday, February 25th
> with FULL MUSICAL ACCOMPANIMENT
> by Hafez Modirzadeh and Royal Hartigan

> Poetry in the Round
> (Jeffrey Gray, Director)
> Seton Hall University
> South Orange, NJ
>
> Backchannel for more info: [redacted]
> --

↑ Index

614. Rachel Loden
Re: oh my god
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Wendy Battin wrote:

> Huh? the rubber suit and feathers was the literary part.

Little cousins, how quickly you forget!

"Hope" is the thing with feathers --
That trembles in the soul --
And likes to get its punishment --
Restrained with chain -- and ball --

Sings sweetest -- in its rubber suit --
And sore must be its form --
'Tis best to bash that little bird
Then slowly -- make it warm --

It chirrups in its manacles --
Perfects its treacly Plea --
Yet, never, though the belts are taut
It ever asks -- the Key --

Emily D.

↑ Index

615. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)
Re: stein query
Wed 19 Feb 1997

---

do you know of the big brouhaha in modernism modernity, picked up by the chron of higher ed and the forward (jewish newsweekly), stein's support of the vichy gov? i have a more diffuse article in modern fiction studies, on stein, jewish social scientists and the "jewish question."

> i'm writing about the politics of stein's later work, and just a few weeks ago someone mentionned a piece on stein's republicanism at http://www.slate.com/. i couldn't access it and so would like to try to get in touch with the author. anybody remember/know about this? please backchannel ([redacted]).
> thanks,
> jill mccartney

↑ Index

616. tim_wood
Re: the academy of evil poets
Wed 19 Feb 1997

> Those of you working in the computer industry might have a harder time getting hold of the source here, but listmembers in the academy should be able to track it down w/ relative ease

poets only exist in the academy and the computer industry? no wonder commentators accuse poets & poetry of irrelevance <wink>

Tim Wood

↑ Index

617. David Israel
Re: the academy of evil poets -Reply
Wed 19 Feb 1997

> poets only exist in the academy and the computer industry? no wonder commentators accuse poets & poetry of irrelevance > <wink>
>
> Tim Wood

or,

they say many's the slip betwixt the cup & the lip

& several do sail thru & free --
'tween the devil & the deep blue sea

d.i.

↑ Index

618. Steven Marks
Inefficient Latinate Ribosome
Wed 19 Feb 1997

Inefficient Latinate Ribosome
Processes Richard Kostelanetz's
"String Two" (Heaven Bone #10)

Twome menter terocity, Tiso latend deroto.
Genic plesbia mater,
Erminus enderlo.

Irim nisceliba;
Ipso facto, acco.
O gentic gratia!
Terri ficti omatopo.

Ambi epsilo erebrum
Agenit ophis ducati,
Togeny phoman celer
Ratem pestuo resyri.

Ronto! Tolo! Neco!
Braci! Ravi! Tympani!

Samples of reviews, criticism and poetry at

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

619. Wendy Battin
*oh my g*d, w/feathers*
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Fish, flesh, or fowl come. End all bummers long,
Whatever is forgotten, Dorn, or lies.
Bought by that textual music, all detect Mongers of a single idiolect.

Willem Butter Ates

Rachel Loden wrote:
Little cousins, how quickly you forget!

"Hope" is the thing with feathers --
That trembles in the soul --
And likes to get its punishment --
Restrained with chain -- and ball --

Sings sweetest -- in its rubber suit --
And sore must be its form --
'Tis best to bash that little bird
Then slowly -- make it warm --

It chirrups in its manacles --
Perfects its treacly Plea --
Yet, never, though the belts are taut
It ever asks -- the Key --

---------- Wendy Battin (home)
http://camel.conncoll.edu/ccother/wjbat/ (CAPA)
http://shain.lib.conncoll.edu/CAPA/capa.html (Multiple Poetics)
http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Lofts/5471/index.html

↑ Index

620. Mark Weiss
(no subject)
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Just had dinner with a group that included three other subscribers to the list. The subject of some recent threads came up, and I homed in on what I have found disturbing. I would guess that we all have a few opinions that others might find odd--even me. If I present mine in the form of dismissive adjectives that I expect everyone to agree with I don't invite the possibility of discussion, and I don't offer any enlightenment. I could, instead, treat the poet an aspect of whose work I find offensive with some respect, enlarging on what I find problematic, and presenting chapter and verse. No one may agree with me, but at least they'll understand my rationale and have the option of engaging with it. Not a bad goal for a poetics list.

↑ Index

621. Tosh
(no subject)
Thu 20 Feb 1997

I still know nothing of Dorn and Clark's politics and feelings. I feel I need some example of their work.. So far it seems to be two men who have either a dark sense of humor or a sense of irony, or perhaps just evil. Whatever, I still think that a writer's work should be judged on his work and not his life, racism, or politics. For all I know they may have regrets for their comments. I just don't know. Perhaps they're wasted on their own problems, again I don't know. What we do know is their work (if we read it) and that is what we should be commenting on.

Of course I just had three glasses of red wine, so what do I know...

yours,

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

622. Bil Brown
Re: poetry reading/performance
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Great Nate Mackey. Love that boy!!
bil

↑ Index

623. Dan Raphael Dlugonski
most artists are other people
Thu 20 Feb 1997

---

or maybe this should subjected most artists are worse people than artists. i feel i come out best in my art, more principle, more vision and intelligence. dan raphael the poet is a lot more interesting, perceptive and balanced a person than my regular world self. can you separate the person form what they produce? yes and no. i feel that to do intense and moving art you are working some edge of subconscious. perhaps then you are doing other work to support yourself. or because you cant conventionally support yourself you work some edges of health, sanity, substance misuse. the quality of the art does not directly correspond with how well the person reacts to various ethical and spritual demands of day to day life. i am not making excuses, just saying that a persons maturity, karma and general focus may not directly relate to the quality of er work.

dan

↑ Index

624. Henry Gould
so long
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Well, folks, it's time to saddle up Old Whither, me & my unshakable sidekick Spandrift are riding out. The fare's too rich, I need to fast for a while. Some of us like the sound of our own e-voice; now the aftertaste of my own wretched chatter & puerile comments leaves me sick at heart. I understand this is a mixed medium & a friendly home away from home, yet as one of the worst offenders I applaud those with some restraint - here's to honest questions and comments on matters of substance! It's hard to resist, especially for a day-jobber; Jack says "count me out buddy", but I myself may be back someday soon as a lurker. See if I ain't! Sincere thanks to all kindly spirits & intelligent pals, this is a remarkable corner of the litewawy woods. Please don't email any condolences etc.! I'm still at [redacted] for reasons d'etat or so on. For those of you whom it pleaseth to sow the wind, I leave you with a note from an old cellmate of Jack's name of El Bardo: But when I came alas! to wive, / With a hey, ho, the wind and the rain, / By swaggering could I never thrive, / For the rain it raineth every day. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

625. Chris Stroffolino
Re: POETICS Digest - 18 Feb 1997 to 19 Feb 1997
Thu 20 Feb 1997

How nice, when the DIGEST FORM is small enough so I don't have to download and then later sign back on, etc. (a rare day)

This may address (not answer) some of Jordan's questions ("where was the emphasis in some trees? were cliches a tragedy?"):
one thing that might be said about a line like
"No more odes, the dood doctor said, come in with something distressing" is that it is another one of Ashbery's many "I got your PRESCIPTIVE GAME number" to Harold Bloom, your "ruin the sacred truths shit attempt to elevate WORDSWORTH and retract on BLAKE ("skyscrapers going up to the sky, people going down to the ground"--dylan) and all the ideological implications---remember Bloom WAS a radical in the 50's and early 60's and I am grateful to him for the fact that Shelley was part of my undergrad curriculum in a way, say, Beddoes was not--despite smug Benjy Brown (god rest his soul?) who divided Shelley's phases up into "Mad Shelley" "Anarchist Shelley" "Atheist Shelley" etc. Fuck him, he was a Shakespearean. Whatever that meant. I dropped the course to take my 6th with the guy who turned me onto the beats, Brackhage, Fassbinder and Bloom (last time I saw him he told me he felt guilty for teaching the visionary company all these years and got some NEW book on the romantics, perhaps edited my McGann i forget don't quote me and how it just seemed so bland (article in this week's NEW YORK PRESS on creative writing departments (fiction but could be applied to poetry too) "Am I bland enough"?---

So I was a lopsided englsh major but I wanted to ask Jerome Rothenberg if he'd sanction my hunch I mean theory (IN MEMORY OF MY HUNCHES,hmmmm, coming soon to a NO BOOK near you) that they felt betrayed by Bloom as he began leaning like the tower of PISA away from the prison which OLSOn took from pound and towards the James Merrill and May
Swenson (not fur person Sarton) side of Ashbery instead and one of the RIFTS, like the developing rift between AM and FM music around the same time, the center not being able to hold after "some folks are born silver spoon in hand, lawd don't they help themselves, y'all" and even stevie wonder more POP than HIP (he bible, they say--Cixous, Dickinson) and "can't the bad guy win every once in a while" reached #1 (smirched, worm-eaten) but it didn't matter (STAIRWAY TO FREE PEARL BIRD JAM FOORBALL) and so he could claim the authority of BLAKE et al and put it in MERWIN (even as he could still be perceived as a radical who broke down STULTIFYING ACADEMIC PERIODIZATION
(helen liked when I was in that groove) even though he (I'm still talking BLOOM) had to use FREUD (UGHHHHHHH!) to do so and already turned his back on emerson and in this sense followed the fashion as much as he made it so the FREUD-WORDSWORTH SIDE won out (evident in his emphasis on Tragedy in his recent Shakespeare) and McWorkshops fed it and the PAST GREW more distant and
THE MAINSTREAM broke with tradition de facto if not de jure
THE AVANT GARDE broke with tradition de jure but not de facto.
Is the distinction between Bukowski and Berrigan really that great? (I mean there' a perspective in Bukoski and Berrigan and Marvin Bell are the same, or is that just a reductive reading of the "language poetry"?)

How petty! Yes, Harold, poets are characters in a play
(she is anyway--flipside is better)--but WHICH play?
"UH, DUH, THE PLAY OF SIGNIFIERS" Right answer, but out of character.
Remember your stake in pathos.
It's your responsibility for us confessionals lopsided in the human pole of myth. Our stock is dropping without you. Your stock may drop without us, but only to those who still think MALLS are disgusting (guiliani spar, editor of K-MART, a CHAIN mag) and we'll let them play to the youth market (elvis needs boats--latest routledge catalogue?)
THE AUDACITY of the MLA holding a special session whose main purpose was to determine whether CULTURAL STUDIES is dead." Is anything else ALIVE?
PROVE IT. hire me.
I know a woman (email solely) named Lisa Kenyon who couldn't even get her PUNK MUSIC panel accepted last year. How did Gillian McGain pull it off?
(uh oh the town vs. gown thread could be triggered by this one) and Jameson appeals to thre AUTHORITY of GANG OF FOUR and TALKING HEADS (like the way Ulysses abuses poor Achilles, according to Thersities at least, who IS a reliable observer in this case) and I'm so SICK of the canonization of CHINA-- almost everything in THE FIRST WORLD, FACE VALUE and C.A. is better (r.i.p. pig xiaping---to be "credited" for "market economy" which is the same as the tomkin square crackdown) and I'm also noticing (but not necessarily sick of) the canonization machinery surrounding Bernstein's (or should I say Charles') LINE poem and
I'm WITH YOU IN ROCKLAND (rockville) all of you who were disappointed by the fact that he (Jameson) didn't talk about the HEADS or the GANG
(no one I know calls them that, though when me and George acted out "we all have good intentions but all with strings attached" to make a mockery of "air-guitar" night Andy wrote us up as "disjointed chrysanthemums swaying in the wind") or that Clint Burnham didn't let himself talk about P.J Harvey or Pavement enough (allegedly Christgau in this week's voice talks about Ashbery's influence on PAVEMENT--I gotta get) (and why did JONI MITCHELL recently express her disgust with poetry? Would she have said this 20 years ago?)

"as serious artists deserving of close readings" and cultural studies is not a term in the ode-distressing polarity with which I started. Bloom ignores it largely. Ashbery doesn't at places. So is this just a parlour game?----- (to post this to the whole list would be a kind of "he's always making love to the whole world" (sic))
Thank you Andrew Epstein for notes on Second Ave.
And yes Mark Wallace, Everyone is a poet sometimes... even poets! -----Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

626. Kathleen Crown

poetry reading/performance

Thu 20 Feb 1997

---

poetry readings by NATHANIEL MACKEY
with Hafez Modirzadeh and Royal Hartigan (reed/percussion)

Monday, February 24th, 8 pm
with ED ROBERSON, Hafez Modirzadeh, and Royal Hartigan

College Hall
Livingston College
Rutgers University
New Brunswick NJ

_____

Tuesday, February 25th
with FULL MUSICAL ACCOMPANIMENT
by Hafez Modirzadeh and Royal Hartigan

Poetry in the Round
(Jeffrey Gray, Director)
Seton Hall University
South Orange, NJ

Backchannel for more info: [redacted]
--

↑ Index

627. Sherry Brennan
Irony Emily
Thu 20 Feb 1997

This thread has been very important for me. I didn't know anything--literally--about Dorn as a person prior to the conversation on this list, although I had read and like what I have read. And I have never seen a discussion in print of the quotation below that Aldon Nielson quoted from Dickinson.

These are serious issues--not just because I have both Irish and Jewish great-grandparents (as well as British and German and Hungarian and Czech ones). But because they speak loudly about our own education(s) and culture--as Nielson says.

My professional training is as an Anglo-Saxon scholar, although I left the field before finishing the final degree. One of the most valuable things I have ever done, though, is a close reading of the emendations and footnotes of various 18th, 19th and early 20th century editions of Anglo-Saxon texts. The 19th and 20th century editions of _Beowulf_ are used by these editors (and by some of the scholars who based their work on these editions) up to the time of WWII to make the argument that the germanic race was genetically superior. The places where these arguments get made in Beowulf are situated around holes in the text -- literal holes in the text, where the ms. was burned or cut or cannot otherwise be read now. Early editors of the AS texts would fill in these "holes" with their own emendations, and then shore up their "emendations" with cultural explanations of how the text, the poem, works to make that particular emendation the only proper emendation.

The question of how one reconciles (or doesn't) the relation between persons (writing or reading) and texts is wrapped up in all kinds of theoretical, textual and philosophical debates. The question of how one reconciles (or doesn't) the relations between persons and persons, nations and persons, is even more difficult. There's no simple way to talk about the ways that an Anglo-Saxon scholar may have "shored up" colonialism as systematic political and cultural oppression by his or her emendations of a phrase in Beowulf. After Auschwitz (to quote another thread months past) it seems better to address the issue than to sweep it under the rub. rug, I meant.

Daily I wonder in what ways my own limitations, assumptions, inabilities, failures--my own unacknowledged or unknown immersions in our culture(s)--get inscribed into my writing or into my reading. How I use the body of the text as my own body. autoingest? or others bodies.

Will I eat my words. cuts. these holes. poems. her poetry. need as well. as need. our. us. conversation.

sherry

> "Vinnie and I say masses for poor Irish boys souls. So far as I am concerned I should like to have you kill some--there are so many now, there is no room for the Americans..." Emily Dickinson
>
> One conversation helps us to understand something about her poetry -- the other conversation helps us, perhaps, to understand something about our culture that we probably need to understand as much as we need her poetry

Sherry Brennan
Development Research
The Pennsylvania State University
[redacted]

↑ Index

628. Sherry Brennan
no subject
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Just checked and realized I spelled Aldon Nielsen's name wrong. Should be Nielsen not Nielson.

↑ Index

629. robert drake
--- the user dictionaries ---
Thu 20 Feb 1997

> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Date: Wed, 19 Feb 1997 20:11:39 -0800
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (Christine Lorenz)
> Subject: --- the user dictionaries ---
>
> graphomaniacs,
> ideologues,
> exhibitionists, > lend me your lexicons...
>
> - - - - - - - - - - The User Dictionaries - - - - - - - - - - - -

> < http://www.arts.ucsb.edu/~lorenz/dictionaries >
>
> Every time you click "save" when you spell-check, you make a deposit into a semi-conscious crypto-self-portrait that resides in your hard drive.
>
> Make yours public. Find your User Dictionary file -- attach it to an e-mail message that includes the software version that it came from -- and forward it to the address below.
>
> No user dictionary is too small, too mundane, or too cryptic.
> Anonymity respected if requested.
>
> - - - -> [redacted]
>
> -
>
> (g i v e w i d e s t d i s t r i b u t i o n)
>
> =-
>
> Christine Lorenz
> [redacted]

↑ Index

630. David Bromige
taking a break
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Dear Listmates, I'm taking a few days off, and if I can figure how to retract my electronic umbilical, will be reachable backchannel only (and even there, expect delays). I'll miss you all. db

↑ Index

631. Mark Weiss
Re: Irony Emily
Thu 20 Feb 1997

That Emily Dickinson participated in some of the less appealing aspects of the culture of Amherst, Massachussets, then, as now (despite the heavy academic layer imposed upon its essential redneckedness) is only surprising because we have made her into a saint--far less surprising, at any rate, than finding out what Mabel Loomis Todd and big brother were doing under the dining room table while Emily and Sis covered for them (did she stand in the doorway in her prim white dress and watch?). As a cultural artifact the guilty letter tells us that Yankees didn't like Irish, as if this needed further confirmation. It doesn't enter into the oeuvre. Now, a critique could be worked up about what gets included and what not in the poetry, and from there to what the unstated purpose of poetry was seen to be by Miss D and her coevals, and that would be an interesting discussion regardless of who its focus--I think we all, despite the huge broadening of the field accomplished for us by the surrealodadaists, Olson, Pound, Williams, etc., tend to segregate our opinions and concerns to one extent or another into poems, prose, email, dinner conversation, letters to the editor, etc., and the choices and mechanisms thereof are at the heart of practice. If I say I write by "dictation" in whatever way I mean that, how do I explain that my radio angels or ghosts push some products more than others? This exploration around the edge of practice being in fact a central concern of my own practice. But for her own reasons, unlike Pound, say, as Yussl Rothenberg has pointed out, it doesn't enter into ED's poems. Not ED Ed Dorn, not ED Lady in White. Look, I've never known too many people (I think I just invented a new form of modifier) who never tell or laugh at ethnic jokes, who never use racist terms, etc. Most of us, unlike say Jessie Jackson (Rothenberg's example, this time at dinner) or Ed Dorn or Tom Clark, try to be aware of who's in the room (although I can tell you that as an astereotypical looking Jew I've heard more than a few odd things from people who make the wrong assumption). And almost all of us are smart enough not to publish the stuff. But the occasional random spoken offensiveness and that one piece of published foolishness, both possibly conceived and produced on one sort of bender or another (understandable if inexcusable) shouldn't keep this (or any) crowd away from _The North Atlantic Turbine_, _20 Poems_, _Gunslinger_, _La Gran Apacheria_ (try to find the first, comic-book version), etc., where they'll find none of that foolishness. And while I'm at it, let me reminisce for a moment. I remember when my then roomie Chuck Stein, as part of his effort to get me up to speed, read me the opening pages of GS across my daffodil coffee table (daffodil was what the paint co. called it. The table was all of six inches tall, but we sat on floor cushions like a pair of pashas). I was then and remain incredibly excited by the rhythms of that opening, the break from the regularity of "I met in Mesilla/the Cautious Gunslinger" into "with slender, leather-encased hands/casually folded to make his knock," the impetus of which sprung us into a very long night and dawn reading aloud the first two books (that's all there were), doping out (and we ere a bit) all the possible ways of sounding it, because hitting the beat meant getting the sense and the syntax. And I remember the months-long anticipation, waiting for the next parts to appear, the rumors of whatever might be going on at the publisher's, all that stuff, because we had to know what happened next, where would he take it, could he pull it off? Look, Dorn fucked up in public, but he also invented the Literate Projector--feed it visuals, it turns them into words. I've said my piece. By the by, I don't have my books beside me, and I probably screwed up the lines from Slinger. All the more reason to check it out yourselves.

At 09:14 AM 2/20/97 -0500, you wrote:
>This thread has been very important for me. I didn't know >anything--literally--about Dorn as a person prior to the conversation on >this list, although I had read and like what I have read. And I have never >seen a discussion in print of the quotation below that Aldon Nielson quoted >from Dickinson.
>
>These are serious issues--not just because I have both Irish and Jewish >greatgrandparents (as well as British and German and Hungarian and Czech >ones). But because they speak loudly about our own education(s) and >culture--as Nielson says.
>
>My professional training is as an Anglo-Saxon scholar, although I left the >field before finishing the final degree. One of the most valuable things I >have ever done, though, is a close reading of the emendations and footnotes >of various 18th, 19th and early 20th century editions of Anglo-Saxon texts.
>The 19th and 20th century editions of _Beowulf_ are used by these editors >(and by some of the scholars who based their work on these editions) up to >the time of WWII to make the argument that the germanic race was genetically >superior. The places where these arguments get made in Beowulf are situated >around holes in the text -- literal holes in the text, where the ms. was >burned or cut or cannot otherwise be read now. Early editors of the AS >texts would fill in these "holes" with their own emendations, and then shore >up their "emendations" with cultural explanations of how the text, the poem, >works to make that particular emendation the only proper emendation.
>

>The question of how one reconciles (or doesn't) the relation between persons >(writing or reading) and texts is wrapped up in all kinds of theoretical, >textual and philosophical debates. The question of how one reconciles (or >doesn't) the relations between persons and persons, nations and persons, is >even more difficult. There's no simple way to talk about the ways that an >Anglo-Saxon scholar may have "shored up" colonialism as systematic political >and cultural oppression by his or her emendations of a phrase in Beowulf.
>After Auschwitz (to quote another thread months past) it seems better to >address the issue than to sweep it under the rub. rug, I meant.
>
>Daily I wonder in what ways my own limitations, assumptions, inabilities, >failures--my own unacknowledged or unknown immersions in our culture(s)-- get >inscribed into my writing or into my reading. How I use the body of the >text as my own body. autoingest? or others bodies.
>
>Will I eat my words. cuts. these holes. poems. her poetry. need as >well. as need. our. us. conversation.
>
>sherry
>
>
>>"Vinnie and I say masses for poor Irish boys souls. So far as I am >>concerned I should like to have you kill some--there are so many now, >>there is no room for the Americans..." Emily Dickinson
>
>>One conversation helps us to understand something about her >>poetry -- the other conversation helps us, perhaps, to understand >>something about our culture that we probably need to understand as much as >>we need her poetry
>
>
>Sherry Brennan
>Development Research
>The Pennsylvania State University
>[redacted]
>[redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

632. Mark Weiss
(no subject)
Thu 20 Feb 1997

I should _never_ try to write before coffee. The opening salvo of my last should read:

"That Emily Dickinson participated in some of the less appealing aspects of the culture of Amherst, Massachussets, then, as now (despite the heavy academic layer imposed upon its essential redneckedness) a hick-town,..."

↑ Index

633. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Irony?
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Actually, I know quite a few people who never use racist terms --

What does or does not enter into the "ouevre" of Emily Dickinson is not so neat a question, now is it -- as she did not publish herself to the world --

It does enter into the published verses of Pound, Williams, Cummings, Stevens, Loy, jumping ahead Wieners, Baraka, Kerouac, JOnas,,,

Is there some wall betwixt poems and "other" stuff we are not supposed to look over? The fact that "Yankee" prejudices existed does not strike me as a reason to continue to accept their non-surprising existence -- Isn't it in fact because people are not surprised to hear racist terms that they go on being used with such casual frequency?

enough -- I've got to go meet with some students

↑ Index

634. Miekal And
'pataphysical sobriety test
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Been busy htmling the last few days instead of doing the usual sideline commentary on the poetics list & came up with a linked rendition of "Quantum 'Pataxerogeny: A hypertext in 37 quanta" & have made two of more of my 'pataphysical hypercard stacks available for download. You will find these ubuesque appetizers at:

http://www.net22.com/qazingulaza/pataphysics/pataphysics.html or if you want to just check out our complete site (which is 95% tweaked) drop in at:

http://net22.com/qazingulaza

& if you still are not cross-eyed or satiated I have just completed the first version the The Internalational Dictionary of Neologisms, words collected by The Avant Garde Museum of Temporary Art since 1985. There are still some weird gibberish characters Ive yet to tweak out but it is mostly accessible (this address may not be its final home):

http://net22.com/neologisms

---

cross-eyed & satiated

miekal

↑ Index

635. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: taking a break
Thu 20 Feb 1997

David -- when telling you how to retract the umbilical I forgot to mention that you should tape a silver dollar over it afterwards if you want an "innie" -- yours from omphalos, the vassal of concreteness

↑ Index

636. L. Mac Mahon and T.R. Healy evil poets
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Hard to make any judgement stick when a tonal change is enough to put a safe distance between us and our statements, never mind appeals to indeterminism, group myopia or even (gasp) growth. All the same, though we might have broken dogmatism up for parts, the appetite for a stonefest is as insatiable as ever. Which was perhaps why political correctness was invented. The appearance of humanism yet all the fun of the chase. Unfortunately, not all baddies are so obliging as to declare themselves in their utterances. At least some of the real bastards take care to get the palaver right. Which is not to suggest that words cannot do lasting harm. But spare a thought for the slickos.

best wishes,
Randolph Healy.

↑ Index

637. Thomas M. Orange
Louisville Report
Thu 20 Feb 1997

day one of the 25th annual twentieth-century literature conference here in beautifully warm louisville ky (compared to london ontario that is), and i stand here at an email terminal in the ekstrom typing away. some 400 presenters here, and tho poetix in my opinion has received the short end of the stick in past louisville conferences, it seems as tho we're holding our own this year. i just sat in on the following panel:

the modernist long poem: pound, sitwell, and stein. andre stipanovic, rutgers u, "ezra pound's coming of war in the long poem: persona and the historical narrative in `near perigord' heather hewett, u of wisc-madison, "waves of words: the tide of primitivist discourse in edith sitwell's gold coast customs" amy feinstein, u of wisc-madison, "`an invitation suffices for the present': the abstract affair of stein's stanzas"

there are some other interesting panels going on now that i am missing: one on elizabeth bishop, another on latin american poetry (borges, olga orozco, and minerva margarita villarreal), as well as poetry/fiction reading (richard m. henry, nancy kuhl, gary geddes, and catherine francis).

i see a lot of fellow grad students strolling the halls and walkways here, wondering if this is all nothing more than a c.v. line-item. but i've liked what i've heard so far.

tomorrow is the tom orange and dave chirot pound-williams-baudelaire- kerouac-grenier show (debra parr had to bow out). michael boughn is supposedly about, and i'm hoping to meet maria damon and mark scroggins as well. i did make a point of swooping down on the publishers' book display table and snatchin up in my grubby claws a copy of mark's new zukofsky anthology, as well as a lovely copy of the rothenberg/joris anthology.

damn this telnet connection is slow. more later, t.

↑ Index

638. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Louisville Report
Thu 20 Feb 1997

PLEASE continue the report from L'ville -- I haven;t been able to attend in recent years and will much appreciate any and all news --

↑ Index

639. Mark Wallace
this message is unintended for the list
Thu 20 Feb 1997

Actually, I wouldn't say this in public, but if there were more accidential private postings to the poetics list, the whole thing might be more interesting. So, please, reserve your public commentaries for personal friends who are willing to bear it, and send us only your heartfelt hidden secrets.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

640. Gwyn McVay
this is not a message
Thu 20 Feb 1997

```
  /////____
 / @|   / \\
 _ |\\-
```

ceci n'est pas un poisson and in any case it was private and not for you.

Gwyn

↑ Index

641. Mark Roberts
Re: this is not a message
Thu 20 Feb 1997

> ```
> /////____
> / @|   / \\
> _ |\\-
> ```
>
> ceci n'est pas un poisson and in any case it was private and not for you.
>
> Gwyn

Don't worry I didn't read it.

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
& User Representative SIS Team.
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
Phone 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax (02) 9351 7711

↑ Index

642. Matthias Regan
Re: this is not a message
Thu 20 Feb 1997

---

n'est pas
n'est pas
n'est pas
n pa 'est pa
n'est pa n'est pa n'est pa

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

643. Mark Weiss
Re: Irony?
Thu 20 Feb 1997

At 08:47 AM 2/20/97 -0800, you wrote:
>Actually, I know quite a few people who never use racist terms --

Well, Aldon, I guess that makes thou and thine holier than I and mine. In the multiethnic neighborhoods I have always inhabited we have never been quite so pure. We all told and tell ethnic jokes, play with "foreign" words and accents, call friends of other persuasions and origins by names that would get an LA cop in trouble. Back in prehistory I was working with Bayard Rustin, who would close shop sometimes after a very long day by saying, "Alright, white boys, let's go home," to which us white boys would answer, "Who you callin white boy, nigger?" We must have all been unreconstructed racists. Or maybe context matters and sometimes informs political correctness. Your friends, in fact, may be hypercareful around you, lest they be judged. But if you guys really are that pure, I think I'd rather hang around my own streetcorner. We may be nasty, but we do have fun.

> What does or does not enter into the "ouevre" of Emily Dickinson is not so neat a question, now is it -- as she did not publish herself to the world --

Archness is so unbecoming. And let me point out, as it doesn't always happen, that I did spell oeuvre correctly.

> It does enter into the published verses of Pound, Williams, Cummings, Stevens, Loy, jumping ahead Wieners, Baraka, Kerouac, JOnas,,,
>
> Is there some wall betwixt poems and "other" stuff we are not supposed to look over? The fact that "Yankee" prejudices existed does not strike me as a reason to continue to accept their non-surprising existence -- Isn't it in fact because people are not surprised to hear racist terms that they go on being used with such casual frequency?

One can accept that something existed without condoning. No matter how little I accept the prejudices of the long-dead, or the living, they won't go away.

Let me say it again--it's not the racist terms that hurt--it's the context in which they are used. Some people can call me jewboy and it's a joke, others, it's fighting words. But hopefully we'll never have a color- or ethnic- or gender-blind world--differences--not stereotypes--are there, and they're interesting. Stereotypes are interesting, too, but that's another discussion.

I guess I'm making a plea for some other kind of sense--look over all the walls you want to, but don't let what you find make you blind. Check out, and study, the public and private crimes, but note that poet a or b decided which of his faults to censor. Otherwise litcrit becomes tabloid lit-tittilation.

I was also, I hoped, opening a different thread that I think is important. We all do put walls between various kinds of discourse. Dickinson didn't find anti-Irish sentiment appropriate for her poetry. That's interesting. Pound included anti-semitism but not shopping lists. I sometimes include shopping lists but not Polish jokes. These are not always conscious decisions, and the boundaries are flexible and malleable; we do, most of us, impose such restrictions, however, in response to some internal rules or other of decorum. The nature of that decision, and the fact that there is such a process, is of the essence of most of our practice. If it were not so, we'd be chanting our native woodnotes wild in the strangest of places.

Go lecture your students.

↑ Index

644. Christopher Alexander
Re: : D is all we get of the cat (your summary axe)
Thu 20 Feb 1997

---

back after being too busy at work.

Jordan freights:
> I blieve, Chris Alexander, if that is your name -- > that the guiding logic at work here is oppositional -- viz Hank > Lazer's opposable poetries, viz Bob Perelman's we is another poem, > viz Ron Silliman's comments here and Cap-l -- I belive that Bruce > &rews is relentless in his opposition, and that of the lpoets maybe > only Charles B has gone on to oppose opposition and maybe he hasn't
> --
well, yes but then again this seems to be only a handful of names--& while the acts associated with those names have been & continue to be very important, & while that work is certainly among the most conspicuous from one vantage, that doesnt necessarily establish theirs as the guiding logic--which in fact seems to be what you rightly pointed out earlier.

unless you just mean that theirs is the logic thats guiding this conversation--the thread on zoos & whatnot is what were discussing, right?-- in which case I think youre partly right, though again I wouldnt say its the exclusive logic.

obviously the rhetoric of opposition (& marginalization) persists after L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E--as someone mentioned elsewhere not too long ago ["could we get more vagaries down here?"], with the titles of some recent anthologies its difficult to say where exactly we suppose ourselves to be writing from-- or maybe not difficult enough?--but Im really not convinced that it has to be read as the dire endemic or retarding condition its sometimes made out to be. if youll grant that a lot of writers seem to have abandoned this model, or seem never to have taken it up at all--which you may not, but it seems to me that they have--.
& that thinking language practice as a political opposition is one possible gesture among others, & doesnt somehow become a determining factor in the strong sense--. because I think youd be mistaken if you were to assert that opposition somehow means that were programmatically writng in response to, or that anyones work has become the determined negative image of,say, american journalistic prose--. or that "rustling" your work into the opposition "corral" somehow deforms its reception--?

nor does it mean necessarily a sort of simplistic one-to-one opposition between 2 groups competing for the same resources ["there are 2 kinds of poems int he world,prose that" or "this town isnt big enough"]etc. --shirts versus skins?

obviously OPPOSITION is one possible line of thought among others--one that I find useful-- but not the meaning etc.-- &not necessarily such a restricted relation after all. so "not the hegelian I used to be"--already smoked my last pack of Absolute Spirit. of course whether or not resistance is a useful view of swich or a poltical reality ["tell me again of how your poetics resists the naturalizing ideology of the new york times?"]-- is another matter.
&whether *you*find it useful to think wrtg in thse terms--.

but the problem with "elsewhere" is that its still somewhere--ie, just as firmly ensconced in the social field as any other practice. ok, so opposition is problematic, or needs to be troubled--I can see that. but there is no just elsewhere--another binary, one with an occluded second term, doesnt seem to help.
"climb on, the avant-garde is a-leavin" sounds like playing kant to david kelloggs bourdieu.

> maps are for > claiming resources and for sittling arbitrartions, charts are for > malapractice -- the crisis goes deeper, lads, and the initials are > everywhere .. wussy hegel glottal simpatico, contra dante sounds .. > and maybe he's just the Poetry Chicken .. a lot'll .. geese .. a > shady .. to get into the narrative -- maps dont just s[imply a battle plan--raiding the other tribes magic resources or flour. ["godoggo"].

an attempt to visualize the field of amerwrtg is just what Id expect from the amercan left (this is not a criticism)--which, among other things, tries to piece together why it is exactly that something like commodity capitalism (or in this case "the bourgeois novel of the last century") persists.

but, yes clearly a sort of battle, though in any case not just synonyous with complaints of "clubbiness" or the its-who-you-know/how-you-work atmosphere of a united nation's arts councils or so-called mainstream publishing-- which is I think we can agree, just another stream, if one that has accumulated considerably more capital ["jeez its even gotten in the water here"]
--& so greater public visibility & influence in determining what it means to make art, what forms of expression are acceptable etc.--which, like it or not, is political. to me, the presses that publish the only writrs whose wrk Im really interested in--with a few exceptions--, coupled with the copy shops & internet servers where those wrters publish their own work--seem ample, if in the accustomed financially jeopardized sort of way. so reducing the model to maps for claiming resources or sitting arbitrations--kissinger & stalin passing napkins about book sales or something--is, well, reductive.
not simply engaging in a turf ware ["wherefore"] or just sour over somebodys grant applications--.

I dont think about this stuff because I love it or because I think I ought to make The Big Money on bonuses from dalton or departmental grants.
I dont have any particular longing to visit school children or read to the 6 people present at 7:00 pm at the Midville town hall arts center. Im a computer systems consultant at the underfunded library of an underfunded state university & I dont have any books out that I havent put out & I dont really care.

but I would like to see more of the books that I like to read on the shelves of that library or in local bookstores--& not just for my convenience.

now whether I can still qualify for "hegemonic boomer" status--? boom-boom-boom. well meet sometime & you can give me a button or something. [smile].

love me, Love My Carpet, chris, or ["whatever
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

645. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Irony?
Thu 20 Feb 1997

I'll begin by copping to the missssspeeeling, which therefore should not have appeard in quotation marks -- apologies at all times for all my typing --

on the other hand,

A post that begins by making reference to the possibole holier than thouness of myself and certain of my friends, and ends by telling me to go lecture my students, is an odd place to find the advice that archness is unbecoming --

Of course context makes a difference -- never said it didn't -- the Dickinson quote appeared in a post that made a quite clear distinction between letters and poetry and which proceeded to ask questions about possible learning that might occur in the discussion of both --

I will not get into arguments about whose neighborhood is more multiethnic than etc -- I never said that I didn't know anybody at all who uses racist terms -- I said that I know quite a few people who do not -- The people I have in mind would certainly be surprised to hear it suggested that they censor themselves out of fear of my reaction --

Glad to hear you worked with Bayard Rustin -- Rustin was himself the object of both villification and humor on the subject of his sexuality -- I suspect he had a pretty clear sense of when he was being insulted and when he was being joshed -- I suspect -- I don't know --

I do know that this discussion keeps turning away from things I have said into discussions of positions that I have never taken --

I will be happy to continue on this subject off the list with anyone who wishes to take the issues up with me --

I will not have anything more to say in the near future in response to anything growing out of the Dorn discussion in this space, as I think people who have read my posts attentively know where I stand -- and I suspect that others simply do not care --

↑ Index

646. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: XUL
Thu 20 Feb 1997

On a happier note -- a reminder that Roof books has published _The XUL Reader: An Anthology of Argentine Poetry (1981-1996)_ eidted by Jorge Santiago Perednik and Ernesto Livon Grosman: bi-lingual

14.95 ISBN 0-937804-67-3

looks like good stuff

↑ Index

647. Christopher Alexander
Re: this is not a message
Thu 20 Feb 1997

---

n'est pas

ness past mas parse
mis-paste

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

648. Schuchat Simon
Re: stein query
Thu 20 Feb 1997

I don't know about some recent academic furor over Stein's politics and/or support of Vichy government, but having read WARS I HAVE SEEN not too long ago, I don't find any "support" for Vichy, although there is a great deal of having to get along and live with it, and some sympathy for those who had to play active roles in order to keep life moving along (e.g., stationmasters for the railroad) etc. there is much more pride in the doings of the "boys in the mountains" that is, the maquis. and of course tremendous pride in being liberated by the u.s. army.

↑ Index

649. Maria Damon
Re: Irony?
Thu 20 Feb 1997

At 3:05 PM -0800 2/20/97, Mark Weiss wrote:
>At 08:47 AM 2/20/97 -0800, you wrote:
>>Actually, I know quite a few people who never use racist terms --
>
>Well, Aldon, I guess that makes thou and thine holier than I and mine. In >the multiethnic neighborhoods I have always inhabited we have never been >quite so pure. We all told and tell ethnic jokes, play with "foreign" words >and accents, call friends of other persuasions and origins by names that >would get an LA cop in trouble....
>Go lecture your students.

yikes. is all i can say. mark, how come u have a bee in yr bonnet abt this? seems to me that, has someone touched a nerve? i've felt preached at on the list, but i didn't detect it in this go-round. very interesting medium, this. xo, md

↑ Index

650. DS
Re: this is not a message
Thu 20 Feb 1997

---

ah merd, je suis un poisson

dan salmon

At 05:52 PM 2/20/97 -0500, you wrote:
>

```
>       /////____
>      / @|   / \\
>      _ |\\-
>
```
>ceci n'est pas un poisson and in any case it was private and not for you.
>
>Gwyn
>
>

↑ Index

651. DS
Re: Irony?
Thu 20 Feb 1997

> racists. Or maybe context matters and sometimes informs political correctness. Your friends, in fact, may be hypercareful around you, lest they be judged. But if you guys really are that pure, I think I'd rather hang around my own streetcorner. We may be nasty, but we do have fun.

out here in antipodes we make our friday night fun stringin' up seppos.

↑ Index

652. Maria Damon
Re: this is not a message
Thu 20 Feb 1997

At 4:56 PM +1300 2/21/97, DS wrote:
>ah merd, je suis un poisson
>
>dan salmon
>
>At 05:52 PM 2/20/97 -0500, you wrote:
>>
```
>>       /////____
>>      / @|   / \\
>>      _ |\\-
```
>>
>>ceci n'est pas un poisson and in any case it was private and not for you.
>>
>>Gwyn
>>
dans la grande poeme de la mer je suis un mousse ivre

↑ Index

653. Mark Weiss
Re: Irony?
Thu 20 Feb 1997

---

what's a seppo?
At 04:59 PM 2/21/97 +1300, you wrote:
>>racists. Or maybe context matters and sometimes informs political >>correctness. Your friends, in fact, may be hypercareful around you, lest >>they be judged. But if you guys really are that pure, I think I'd rather >>hang around my own streetcorner. We may be nasty, but we do have fun.
>
>out here in antipodes we make our friday night fun stringin' up seppos.
>
>

↑ Index

654. Mark Roberts
Re: Irony?
Fri 21 Feb 1997

I thought it was see you round like Australia Square

>Hi -
>A septic tank - a Yank
>
>It comes from being colonised by the English...you know
>a titfer is really a hat ....Tit for Tat - A hat
>
>Weird isn't it
>
>See you round like a rissole
>Pam BrownAt 08:19 PM 20/2/97 -0800, you wrote:
>>what's a seppo?
>>At 04:59 PM 2/21/97 +1300, you wrote:
>>>>racists. Or maybe context matters and sometimes informs political >>>>correctness. Your friends, in fact, may be hypercareful around you, lest >>>>they be judged. But if you guys really are that pure, I think I'd rather >>>>hang around my own streetcorner. We may be nasty, but we do have fun.
>>>
>>>out here in antipodes we make our friday night fun stringin' up seppos.
>>>

>>>
>>
>>
>
>
Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
& User Representative SIS Team.
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
Phone 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax (02) 9351 7711

↑ Index

655. Pam Brown
Re: Irony?
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Hi -
A septic tank - a Yank

It comes from being colonised by the English...you know
a titfer is really a hat ....Tit for Tat - A hat

Weird isn't it

See you round like a rissole
Pam BrownAt 08:19 PM 20/2/97 -0800, you wrote:
>what's a seppo?
>At 04:59 PM 2/21/97 +1300, you wrote:
>>>racists. Or maybe context matters and sometimes informs political >>>correctness. Your friends, in fact, may be hypercareful around you, lest >>>they be judged. But if you guys really are that pure, I think I'd rather >>>hang around my own streetcorner. We may be nasty, but we do have fun.
>>
>>out here in antipodes we make our friday night fun stringin' up seppos.
>>
>>
>
>

↑ Index

656. Mark Weiss
Re: Irony?
Fri 21 Feb 1997

I think I need subtitles.

At 04:37 PM 2/21/97 +1100, you wrote:
>I thought it was see you round like Australia Square
>
>
>
>
>
>>Hi -
>>A septic tank - a Yank
>>
>>It comes from being colonised by the English...you know
>>a titfer is really a hat ....Tit for Tat - A hat
>>
>>Weird isn't it
>>
>>See you round like a rissole
>>Pam BrownAt 08:19 PM 20/2/97 -0800, you wrote:
>>>what's a seppo?
>>>At 04:59 PM 2/21/97 +1300, you wrote:
>>>>>racists. Or maybe context matters and sometimes informs political >>>>>correctness. Your friends, in fact, may be hypercareful around you, lest >>>>>they be judged. But if you guys really are that pure, I think I'd rather >>>>>hang around my own streetcorner. We may be nasty, but we do have fun.
>>>>
>>>>out here in antipodes we make our friday night fun stringin' up seppos.
>>>>
>>>>
>>>
>>>
>>
>>
>Mark Roberts
>Student Systems Project Officer
>& User Representative SIS Team.
>Information Systems
>University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia

>Phone 93517710
>Mobile 015063970
>Fax (02) 9351 7711
>
>

↑ Index

657. David Israel
well said, TR, well said
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Randolph --

having pored over Thursday's Poetics digest (& in consideration of some days now, seems, of these PC-tinged Dorn et al. debates & declaratives), must say your take on this'all seems among the keenest I've seen: w/ dynamic balance, apt breadth, & an unstingy insight that extends in all directions. A Poetics list-serv newbie here, your observations seem worth remembering.

d.i.

> Date: Thu, 20 Feb 1997 19:39:47 GMT
> From: "L. Mac Mahon and T.R. Healy" <[redacted]>
> Subject: evil poets
>
> Hard to make any judgement stick when a tonal change is enough to put a safe distance between us and our statements, never mind appeals to indeterminism, group myopia or even (gasp) growth. . . .[etc.]

↑ Index

658. John Cayley
(no subject)
Fri 21 Feb 1997

New from: i n f e r n a l m e t h o d s

GREETING WANT
by John Welch

ISBN 0 905795 08 3 96 pages Price GBP 6.95

Royal Octavo Cover design by Amanda Welch

Greeting Want comprises a group of sequences written over the last eight years or so. Some of the poems, while not making direct reference to it, reflect the poet's experience of psychoanalysis; he contributed a chapter 'Dream and Restoration,' to Poets on Writing, Britain 1970-1991, edited by Denise Riley (Macmillan, 1992).

Greeting Want offers lucid, gentle, remorseless sequences to remind us of the 'plenty-in-absence' that may live at the edge of the inner city. These are talking poems, not solitary or rapt, and they have spent their time among people: the fantastic, dislocated heroism of migrant children, or the torsion of passing from a domestic house into the traffic of streets, an area where 'stone is ground down to a dusty meal of light'. Only a very fine poet could wonder about his distance from the small heart of an owl, calling in the city. Our present is where we start from in this writing, while there is also the brush of bird-flight, occasional goddesses bearing the work of a past and the horror of 'careful solitudes'. But the mystery of incorporating others may overcome this undertow as we 'take the bright couple into us' through the exact reflection of John Welch's true poetry.

John Welch has been a significant figure since the early seventies, and deserves acclaim. His own aptly named Many Press has published numerous well-designed pamphlets... For my money, Out Walking is the finest volume Anvil have produced. - James Keery, PN Review.

John Welch's first full-length collection, Out Walking, is a considerable and consistent achievement. The poems abound with intelligent reflection... - Rob Sheppard: PN Review

With Out Walking, John Welch has well and truly set off, and I look forward to following his path as far as wherever it reaches.
- Peter Robinson: Grosseteste Review

Blood and Dreams offers unlimited shelf-life, is flexible enough to continue to 'give' with repeated readings. As a writer I seek those books which provoke reverie and inspire further writing; this is just such a book.
- Martin Hibbert: Memes

Born in London 1942, where he now lives and works, John Welch has published three full-length collections of poems: And Ada Ann (Great Works Press, 1978), Out Walking (Anvil 1984) and Blood and Dreams (Reality Street Editions, 1991).

John Welch founded The Many Press in 1975, an imprint publishing new poetry. He has written widely on South Asian Literature and edited an anthology Stories from South Asia (Oxford University Press 1988).

Also available from infernal methods

R. F. Langley, Twelve Poems ISBN 0 905795 03 2

Peter Riley has described reading Langley's poem 'The Upshot': "These are no longer 'his' moments; they can enter a different life because they are not trapped in circumstance. The craft of their forming, the traditional poetic skills of constantly accurate comparison, lift them out of the particular in their very fidelity to it, and we take them on as unrecognised instances. It is our job to find them a home."

There are two extensive interviews with R.F.Langley by Bobby Walker in Angel Exhaust 13 and 14. Langley's poetry was included in Michael Schmidt's 'Calendar of Modern Poetry' for PN Review 100.

Previous publications from infernal methods include A Different Mercy by Mark Hyatt (now out of print).

Order Form

Name .
Address
.
.
.

Please send me copy / copies of Greeting Want by John Welch at GBP 6.95, and copy /copies of Twelve Poems by R.F.Langley at GBP 4.00 per copy (UK post and packing included, please add GBP 1.00 for post abroad).

I enclose remittance of .

Please make cheques etc payable to Nigel Wheale.

infernal methods 64 Sturton Street, Cambridge CB1 2QA

S P E C I A L O F F E R

Greeting Want by John Welch, published by infernal methods, is a large format (Royal Octavo) 96 page collection of poems priced at GBP 6.95..... ordered direct from John Welch before the end of March it costs GBP 5.00, plus 50p p&p.

Note: Greeting Want is available with the cover either laminated (i.e. shiny) or unlaminated. Some people prefer the unlaminated cover - please indicate below which you would like.

Please send me copy / copies of Greeting Want at the special price of GBP 5.50 (UK p&p included, please add GBP 1.00 for post abroad).

Laminated .

Unlaminated .

I enclose a cheque for .

Cheques etc for this offer should be made out to John Welch and orders sent to 15 Norcott Road, London N16 7BJ

Name .
Address

.

.

.

↑ Index

659. Miekal And recuperating pound
Fri 21 Feb 1997

since my own interests in literature are so often extra-literary or schizo-literary I havent had much impulse to step into the turbulence of the text the past few days...tho now I will remark that there is a remarkable kaleidescope of out-speakings, I am heartened that T Mandel felt this space secure enough to make his announcements (tho my own affectations are perhaps opposite) & once again I observe the epikal strength with which opinions wrangle theories & hope that that energy & strength is equally transfered to the books you make & the readings you do & the classes you teach....

from the permaculture perspective, everything gardens, the most abundant the most diverse systems are those composed of unlimited edges meeting, for instance the genetic diverisity of a pond meeting a woods is often more complex.

somehow in a group discussion as this, it comes so easily to stand above & scrutinize from a safe vantage point ... while the real provocation to write & read is multitudinously closer to the behavior of the text in a paradigm that morphs as we speak.

Now is Pound's anti-semitism any greater than the farmer that lives down the road. I doubt it. & he is my neighbor & his family has lived here for 6 generations, they belong here on this land regardless of their empty & unexamined mental life. & Cantos is on my bookshelf, next to the collected works of Gertude Stein, as is Gunslinger on the same shelf as the Dictionary of Aberrant Behavior.

as Malok says,

"I'll shut up now."

Miekal
--
@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
The Internalational Dictionary of Neologisms:
http://net22.com/neologisms
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

660. Douglas Barbour
Re: Dorn & Dickinson et al
Fri 21 Feb 1997

It's all been fascinating, not least the new poems by D & Y. I'm a serious sort & cant reply in kind, but not having heard about Dorn's comments I was saddened to. Yet, I had picked up his _Abhorrences_ because of my admiration for the poetry (knowing nothing of the man) of his earlier books, & found it a great disappointment. So obvious, so lacking in the poetic subtleties of his best writing. So: does this 'falling off" (in my eyes) in the writing reflect a sad change in the man's ideological/emotional stance? I dont know. I do know that Jerome Rothenberg captured what seems to me to be the major point about Pound: that the formal qualities of the writing were a teaching I had to have, even though I knew how evil some of the man's ideas were. Perhaps we always have to approach artists with a certain schizophrenia?

Thinking of that comment of Dickinson's I also think of Susan Howe's visionary reading of her & her work 'in' the context of the whole puritanical violence of american 'settlement' & how it has never disappeared nor been comprehended. Then her (D's) ironies abound... But must also as Aldon Nielson says, they must be interrogated, that means 'read' with as great insight & care as we can bring to them...

==========
==========

Douglas Barbour
Department of English
University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta T6G 2E5
[redacted] FAX:[redacted]
H: [redacted]

Shakespeare
drag yr mouldy old bones up these stairs & tell me what you died of
I think
I've got it

too.
Sharon Thesen

↑ Index

661. Jordan Davis
Third term (const amend)
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Chris -- I like your post, and I disagree. There are no commercial, few civic, and fewer and fewer aesthetic points of divergence between the two campsites, which, as the wardens in both are clever and vigilant, should be around for at least another half decade. The resources that are allocated by these maps are not bucks, they're attention-hours. There is an audience; arguing about its existence is insulting (not saying you did -- just countering a wearying and often remark). The audience prefers that I use no terrain metaphors. Don Allen's amazing anthology transformed American poetry. It offered an entirely new (yet pleasantly available) set of ways to look at words, at social town, at sexual life, at the universe. I'm thinking, of course, of the Collected Poems of Frank O'Hara. -- Jordan

↑ Index

662. Matthias Regan
Re: this is still not a message
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Now, this is brilliant (but in a postmodern way?)-
M.

At 06:25 PM 2/20/97 MDT, christopher alexander, etc. wrote:

> n'est pas
>
> ness past
> mas parse
> mis-paste

↑ Index

663. Christopher Alexander
Re: this is still not a message
Fri 21 Feb 1997

> Now, this is brilliant (but in a postmodern way?)-
now christmas brillig (bettin a proust modem weight)
snowcrest miss bullet (patina russ malden wight)

oh crust mersed billet (a tinniest walden might) accurst mess buildin (attend rewest aldon meet)
a cast mis-gilded (intend true west all done mate)
ark hast mouse guilded (a tenure vestal dorn met) arkham house guiled (tenuate vest doormat)
cram us guilty (tential a cormorant) cramer salty (tent shell a current) cremora sody (to show occurrent)
gomorrhas day (tissue oscura)
deborahs prey (issue a score)
deformat prose (is to astor)
deformed prosody (astir)
d for pense d (asr)
defenced (sr)
deafens

amercan bandstan capstan
chris

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

664. Christopher Alexander
Re: this is still not a message
Fri 21 Feb 1997

> Yeah Chris, but you just know that web-site for anagrams, right? I mean, > you don't want us to think you did all this YOUR(post-modern)SELF, right?
I wont nothing of the kind, of course.
now where is that web site?
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

665. Joe Safdie

Re: this is still not a message

Fri 21 Feb 1997

Yeah Chris, but you just know that web-site for anagrams, right? I mean, you don't want us to think you did all this YOUR(post-modern)SELF, right?

On Fri, 21 Feb 1997, Christopher Alexander wrote:

> Now, this is brilliant (but in a postmodern way?)-
> now christmas brillig (bettin a proust modem weight)
> snowcrest miss bullet (patina russ malden wight)
> oh crust mersed billet (a tinniest walden might)
> accurst mess buildin (attend rewest aldon meet)
> a cast mis-gilded (intend true west all done mate)
> ark hast mouse guilded (a tenure vestal dorn met)
> arkham house guiled (tenuate vest doormat)
> cram us guilty (tential a cormorant)
> cramer salty (tent shell a current)
> cremora sody (to show occurrent)
> gomorrhas day (tissue oscura)
> deborahs prey (issue a score)
> deformat prose (is to astor)
> deformed prosody (astir)
> d for pense d (asr)
> defenced (sr)
> deafens
>
> amercan bandstan
> capstan
> chris
>
> ..
> christopher alexander, etc.
> [redacted]..lib.edu
> (Marriott Library Computer Systems)
>
> language code not found. illegal operation error.
> this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be
> lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

666. Bob Perelman
spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Re Christine Lorenz' suggestion to share spellcheck residues: "Holes in the Argument" in Face Value was actually built around such a list, at least I think so. I came across some unknown file in my poems-file with all those words, semi-alphabetized: REAGAN'S REAL DISPEL REALM; sense was nearly there: OUR CALLS PROCEED PROFESSIONALISM; NUMBLY O'HARA DESIRE, etc. It couldn't have been a spell check file, with words like 'real' and 'our'?? But it had, as I remember, some designation like WP.SUP??

The Pound, Dorn thread calls up the tensions around naming, name-calling, evaluation, community, groups-cliques-cabals-conspiracies, dismissal, phobia. There's is so much to say that all particulars fray under contradictory generalized forces. I admired Dorn's early work quite a bit: his elegant political lyricism seemed so smart. Now it feels like he got squashed by the demands of masculinization: in the work he read at the Orono conference this summer he read a slinger-redux epic about heroic outsiders--drugs and transportation hijinx; all the characters were dogs, which was a bit funny, and allowed him to talk about bitches & garner some uneasy laughs. But the whole thing was finally pretty broken down: the piece wasn't finished, wasn't really funny enough to justify the conceit.

Poets with large political ambitions seem to have a hard time avoiding stepping in real dreck the last few decades. Is it that (male) poets need to feel they're taking it to the streets in some way or other? (How far away is the gesture Tom makes of bashing Dorn?) Breton writes in the 3rd manifesto that the archetypal surrealist act is running into the street firing a revolver indiscriminantly. (After all, there's nothing but bourgie protofascists out there.) Aren't Baraka's gaybaiting, antisemitic poems more or less as bad as Dorn at his anecdotal worst? Maybe not quite. And doesn't it feel somewhat preposterous the way it comes down to measuring rhetorical atrocity?-- "more or less" despicable.

It makes me think poets are very irritated by being imprisoned, finally, in the aesthetic sphere. In the chapter on Bruce Andrews in Marginalization I ask if he means it when he writes "sink the boat people!" Of course he doesn't. But he does want that intensity of statement.

Pound is, for me, still the center of this problem. In the chapter on him in Trouble with Genius I try to make it clear how impossible it is to separate his politics from the lively avantgarde speed of his disjunctions and juxtapositions. So I don't agree with Charles, in fact, when he differentiates Pound's fascism ("small-minded, penurious political accounting system") from his open textual style ("utopian"). This isn't something to be clarified in the rapidfire ouija board regime of the listserv, probably.

↑ Index

667. Mark Weiss
Re: spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Just to be clear, I'm assuming that what you mean by "large political ambitions" is a social agenda motivated by distress at the situation we find ourselves in, as opposed to a desire for public office. Do you think that what you describe is limited to poets? Male poets? Males? Is it possible that these really are tough and demoralizing times for those who believe in some sort--any sort--of equitable society? Are you proposing aesthetic quietism as a proper, even a possible, cure for those of us who continue to be afflicted with savage indignation?

At 03:42 PM 2/21/97 -0500, you wrote:
>Poets with large political ambitions seem to have a hard time avoiding >stepping in real dreck the last few decades.

↑ Index

668. manny savopoulos
Fw: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd)
Fri 21 Feb 1997

> From: Julie Torrant <[redacted]>
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd)
> Date: Friday, February 21, 1997 3:04 PM
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> Date: Wed, 19 Feb 1997 13:48:27 -0500 (EST)
> From: Jennifer Mitchell <[redacted]>
> To: rtc <[redacted]>, jm6788 <[redacted]>,
> jt3355 <[redacted]>, Deb Kelsh <[redacted]>,
> [redacted], tjn842 <[redacted]>,
> [redacted]
> Subject: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd)
>
>
>
> COLLEAGUES: If you support our critique (below) of the practices of

> The Chronicle of Higher Education as it seeks to suppress open > debate on the issue of sexual harassment in United States > universities, please add your name and institutional affiliation
> to a copy of the text and send it to The Chronicle reporter > who interviewed Jennifer Cotter, the victim of sexual harassment
> by Professor Stephen Dobyns, Syracuse University. (If you would > like to read the letter Ms. Cotter is circulating regarding this > issue and which our letter supports and expands upon, please send > a brief post to either Deb Kelsh at [redacted] or > JulieTorrant at [redacted].)
>
> The reporter's name is Robin Wilson, and her fax # is [redacted].
>
> Or, you may send it to the following editors and senior writers at
> The Chronicle:
>
> Scott Heller: [redacted];
> Courtney Leatherman: [redacted];
> CorbinGwaltney: [redacted];
> Scott Jaschik: [redacted];
> DeniseMagner: [redacted]
>
>
> Please forward this text to all interested parties.
>
>
> An Open Letter to the Community regarding The Chronicle of Higher > Education's Suppression of Jennifer Cotter's Analysis of the Sexual > Harassment committed against her by Stephen Dobyns of Syracuse University
>
> We write in support of Jennifer Cotter's attempts to resist the > systematic suppression of ("her") analyses aimed at bringing to public > knowledge and debate the very serious and widespread problem of sexual > harassment in United States universities.
> We also write to protest the undemocratic practices of The Chronicle
> of Higher Education and its staff by which it reduces the issue of sexual > harassment to a "trivial" one of "personality conflict." In suppressing > Ms.Cotter's analysis of the systemic character of sexual harassment,
> The Chronicle, in effect if not by design, manufactures consent for the > status quo of pervasive sexual harassment within the academy.

> Within a formal democracy, consent for exploitative, oppressive > social structures must continually be produced through various pedagogical > practices, with pedagogy broadly understood as the habits and practices of > institutions and their individual members which constitute conditions for > the production and dissemination of meaning.
>
> It is axiomatic, then, that when Robin Wilson interviews
> Jennifer Cotter and focusses on the details of what happened when Stephen > Dobyns committed sexual harassment against her, and when Ms. Wilson > ignores and effectively suppresses efforts by Ms. Cotter to explain her > understanding of sexual harassment's systemic causes and their > institutional effects, Ms.Wilson is participating in The Chronicle's > effort to manufacture a reading of sexual harassment as an "accident" or
> "quirky effect" of Dobyns's "individual" constitution which, given his
> "creativity" and the PLEASURE it gives "us all," we had best simply > forgive and accept--for the common good!
> This reading, as Cotter notes, leaves sexual harassment and its > systemic causes untouched, and prepares a homecoming for Dobyns by > excusing him and relaxing pressure on Syracuse to confront both the > incident as systemic violence as well as its own failure to follow > through on its own sanctions against him.
> But it also serves the interests of the University-as-Industry, > that is, the university as one site for manufacturing consent that serves > business interests and reaps benefits from doing so. The reading > produced by Wilson and The Chronicle manufactures consent for Syracuse > University's tolerance of sexual harassment. This effectively legitimates > the manufacturing of consent necessary to other universities if, for > example, they are to hire celebrities who will attract students and > funding and lend the particular university an "exciting" "aura."
> "Celebrity" is an effect of the privatized, "personal spin" "creative"
> stars put on socially and systemically structured phenomena.
> Privatization of socially structured phenomena, however, is an act of > commodification that must be made to disappear, since the visibility of > this process would not only reveal the particular form of "celebrity > creativity" privileged on many campuses to be an effect of the > privatization of meaning made possible by public university funds. It > would also reveal the university star system in general as complicit with > those very (socially produced) structures of violence that condition the > occurrence of sexual harassment as systemic. The manufacturing of consent > for Syracuse University's acceptance of Dobyns achieves just such a > magical effect. By making celebrity and university involvement in > corporate welfare disappear, a gap between the university and business is > produced. This gap-- produced by various tactics at different > universities that work in concert with a variety of legitimizing > mechanisms--is nevertheless what allows universities to maintain a posture > of freedom from business and establishment interests, in turn allowing > universities to pull in lots of money, apparently on the basis of their > own and their celebrities' "merit" rather than structural violence. In > its turn, business benefits from the resulting emphasis that reinstates > and naturalizes meritocracy and masks the interests of the capitalist class.

> To produce and disseminate readings which manufacture the > appearance of such a gap is to aid in the masking of structural violence > and prevent transformation of its conditions of possibility. In > other words, to produce and disseminate the reading of sexual harassment
> as an effect of a "quirk" in an otherwise "valuable" individual > is to participate in the pedagogy of profiteering. This pedagogy works to > contain issues rather than open them to public debate, analysis and > critique. In doing so, it serves only the establishment segment of > the community.
> It is, to our minds, astounding that The Chronicle staff thinks > the profit motive behind their work is invisible, not only given the > general understanding of pedagogy in the broad sense we have put forth, > but also the U.S. Army's and Navy's comparatively rigorous confrontation > of their institutional structures of violence against women. It is an > indication of The Chronicle's massive, establishment interest in > containing this issue (rather than opening it to debate and analysis) > that produces a rather pointed irony: The Chronicle of HIGHER EDUCATION-- > supposedly highly democratic in method and aim--is suppressing systemic > analysis and collective response to sexual harassment while the presumably > authoritarian Army and Navy open up to the demand to redress > such patterns. The Chronicle's habits and practices, in short, > effectively work to position the Army and Navy--NOT HIGHER EDUCATION--as
> the VANGUARD in redressing sexual harassment!
> In the face of such strenuous effort on the part of The > Chronicle to whitewash critical connections between academia and business, > we need to ask: Is The Chronicle interested in shutting the door on a > potentially explosive issue, effectively rehabilitating male-dominated > education? That is, is there a sense that Ms. Cotter could be the > Anita Hill of academia? Cotter's systemic analysis of the social function > of harassment is an explicit call to other victims of harassment to press > charges, and to academic institutions to expose and redress such charges.

> By attempting to sever Cotter's "personal story" from the systemic > analysis of harassment which she forwards, The Chronicle works to suppress > the potential of this case to encourage other victims of harassment in > the academy and their supporters. There has been a widely-reported > increase in formal charges of sexual harassment following Anita Hill's > Congressional testimony. Does the weakening of Cotter's argument by The > Chronicle's practices serve to contain such a response within the academy?
> We see the opportunities this case presents rather differently.
> This case is an opportunity for critical reflection and collective > resolve to intervene in the patterns which enable sexual harassment and > all other kinds of abuse. We urge The Chronicle to publish debates and > analyses of sexual harassment and all issues of oppression within > academia, rather than reports which manufacture consent for containing the > contradictions between our myth of equality and individual freedom and > the realities of complex social patterns of oppression. That is, we call > for The Chronicle to publish debates and analyses that enable the > understanding of the relationships among many "interpersonal" cases in > terms of TRANSPERSONAL patterns of oppression, so that The Chronicle > serves not just the few, but ALL members of the community.
>
>
> The Red Theory Collective
> (U at Albany, NY)
>
>
> Deb Kelsh
> Laura Lane
> Jennifer Mitchell
> Tom Nespeco

> Julie Torrant
> Rob Wilkie

↑ Index

669. Gwyn McVay
Re: spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Mark, it doesn't "sound" to this "observer" as if Bob Perelman were prescribing anything for poets, male or otherwise, with "large political ambitions"--rather observing a trend in some of them, over the course of their careers. There are probably tons of counterexamples that the mind doesn't notice first because they aren't as flashy to think of as a poet who does get embroiled in controversy.

Bests
Gwyn

↑ Index

670. Mark Weiss
Re: spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Cold be. I seem to be in an intemperate place.

At 04:47 PM 2/21/97 -0500, you wrote:
>Mark, it doesn't "sound" to this "observer" as if Bob Perelman were >prescribing anything for poets, male or otherwise, with "large political >ambitions"--rather observing a trend in some of them, over the course of >their careers. There are probably tons of counterexamples that the mind >doesn't notice first because they aren't as flashy to think of as a poet >who does get embroiled in controversy.
>
>Bests
>Gwyn
>
>

↑ Index

671. Joe Safdie
Re: this is still not a message
Fri 21 Feb 1997

I'm still looking for the anagram web-site in my "archives" and will post it when it turns up. In the meantime, here's something to whet, as they say, your "appetite":

Postmodern = modest porn

SAMUEL BECKETT = make, but select OR setback me lute (Irish inflection) OR mute Blake sect (not to be confused with the meek beast cult (and certainly not the meet Keats club

(thanks to Heather McHugh for telling me about this originally and I hope to find it in about five minutes!)

↑ Index

672. manny savopoulos
READING!!
Fri 21 Feb 1997

DIASPORA ART & LITERATURE FOUNDATION

-presents-

eight poets---three languages---one voice

February 23, 1997 Sunday 5:00PM

Aldos Democratic Club
28-11 23rd Avenue
Astoria, NY 11105

-five dollar donation-

Featuring-

Janet De Leon
Dimitrios Dolios
Kerrie Keriotis
Robert Manniello
Raphael Salinas
Manny Savopoulos
Vasiliki Sereti
Artemis Vallianatos

↑ Index

673. Joe Safdie
Re: this is still not a message
Fri 21 Feb 1997

OK, gram-fans, the server seems to be down momentarily but the site is

http://csugrad.cs.vt.edu/~eburke/anagrams.html

Thanks, Bob for weighing in on the Dorn/Pound thread; I've taken Aldon's invitation and responded to him personally, but I hope to still hear other's thoughts on this, to me, most important discussion . . .

↑ Index

674. Michael Magee
Re: spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

---

re: Mark Weiss's comment to B. Perelman: "Is it possible that these really are tough and demoralizing times for those who believe in some sort--any sort--of equitable society? Are you proposing aesthetic quietism as a proper, even a possible, cure for those of us who continue to be afflicted with savage indignation?"

Aesthetic quietism seems hardly what Perelman was proposing. Perhaps just a practice of political engagement which doesn't devolve so sorrily into rant. I have no problem with pointing out and - more importantly, of course - doing something about "demoralizing times" and "savage indignation," but it seems to me there's an implicit nostalgia in Weiss's castigation of these times as opposed to others. If these are the bad times, when were the good ones? Utopian visions can be backward as well as forward looking and neither seem particularly fruitful to me. Albert Murray: "in spite of temporary setbacks, the normal expectation in every social science melodrama is that everything will turn out allright." What's more melodramatic than the silly bigotries a Pound or a Dorn or a Baraka fall into? No one wants them to assume a position of quietism just one which is brave enough to deal with the complexities of their particular themes, issues. Their Utopias are just the flip sides of their Dystopias. Neither are accurate and the vision tends to progress in a direction which inspires boredom as much as anything else. (Baraka's distancing himself from Black Nationalism seems an implicit realization of such problems). In any case I'm not sure highlighting the poles of "quietism" and "savage indignation" do us any good.

-Mike Magee.

↑ Index

675. Matthias Regan
this still knots a mess, sage
Fri 21 Feb 1997

> I wont nothing of the kind, of course.
> now where is that web site?

I won't not hinge fork mind, off curse
(nowhere tis hat we bs tie?)

I won taunt hanged for hind, focus (now heart is at beastie?)

Iowa aunt hangs door find, fractus
(how earth sat beat sty?)

I tow haunts food rind, tacitus (howe barthes ate my?)

It towers finds, tact
(hobart at me?)

I own facts, (who art me?)

frown (farts)

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

676. Ian Wilson
Re: Fw: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd)
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Does someone have a copy of the Chronicle article as well as Cotter's letter that could be made available in this forum?

I have not heard that Syracuse plans to take back Dobyns. My understanding of the situation is that certain of the faculty were delighted with his actions: it gave them the perfect excuse to be rid of him.

The letter writers below seem naive in their call to modify capitalism, to end the commodification of celebrity.

IR Wilson

_____ Reply Separator _____
Subject: Fw: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd) Author: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]> at Internet
Date: 2/21/97 4:45 PM

> From: Julie Torrant <[redacted]>
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd)
> Date: Friday, February 21, 1997 3:04 PM
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> Date: Wed, 19 Feb 1997 13:48:27 -0500 (EST)
> From: Jennifer Mitchell <[redacted]>
> To: rtc <[redacted]>, jm6788 <[redacted]>,
> jt3355 <[redacted]>, Deb Kelsh <[redacted]>,
> [redacted], tjn842 <[redacted]>,
> [redacted]
> Subject: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd)
>
>
>
> COLLEAGUES: If you support our critique (below) of the practices of
> The Chronicle of Higher Education as it seeks to suppress open > debate on the issue of sexual harassment in United States
> universities, please add your name and institutional affiliation
> to a copy of the text and send it to The Chronicle reporter
> who interviewed Jennifer Cotter, the victim of sexual harassment
> by Professor Stephen Dobyns, Syracuse University. (If you would > like to read the letter Ms. Cotter is circulating regarding this > issue and which our letter supports and expands upon, please send > a brief post to either Deb Kelsh at [redacted] or > JulieTorrant at [redacted].)
>
> The reporter's name is Robin Wilson, and her fax # is [redacted].
>
> Or, you may send it to the following editors and senior writers at
> The Chronicle:
>
> Scott Heller: [redacted];
> Courtney Leatherman: [redacted];

> CorbinGwaltney: [redacted];
> Scott Jaschik: [redacted];
> DeniseMagner: [redacted]
>
>
> Please forward this text to all interested parties.
>
>
> An Open Letter to the Community regarding The Chronicle of Higher > Education's Suppression of Jennifer Cotter's Analysis of the Sexual > Harassment committed against her by Stephen Dobyns of Syracuse University
>
> We write in support of Jennifer Cotter's attempts to resist the > systematic suppression of ("her") analyses aimed at bringing to public > knowledge and debate the very serious and widespread problem of sexual > harassment in United States universities.
> We also write to protest the undemocratic practices of The Chronicle
> of Higher Education and its staff by which it reduces the issue of sexual > harassment to a "trivial" one of "personality conflict." In suppressing > Ms.Cotter's analysis of the systemic character of sexual harassment,
> The Chronicle, in effect if not by design, manufactures consent for the > status quo of pervasive sexual harassment within the academy.
> Within a formal democracy, consent for exploitative, oppressive > social structures must continually be produced through various pedagogical > practices, with pedagogy broadly understood as the habits and practices of > institutions and their individual members which constitute conditions for > the production and dissemination of meaning.
>
> It is axiomatic, then, that when Robin Wilson interviews
> Jennifer Cotter and focusses on the details of what happened when Stephen > Dobyns committed sexual harassment against her, and when Ms. Wilson > ignores and effectively suppresses efforts by Ms. Cotter to explain her > understanding of sexual harassment's systemic causes and their > institutional effects, Ms.Wilson is participating in The Chronicle's > effort to manufacture a reading of sexual harassment as an "accident" or
> "quirky effect" of Dobyns's "individual" constitution which, given his
> "creativity" and the PLEASURE it gives "us all," we had best simply

> forgive and accept--for the common good!
> This reading, as Cotter notes, leaves sexual harassment and its > systemic causes untouched, and prepares a homecoming for Dobyns by > excusing him and relaxing pressure on Syracuse to confront both the > incident as systemic violence as well as its own failure to follow > through on its own sanctions against him.
> But it also serves the interests of the University-as-Industry,
> that is, the university as one site for manufacturing consent that serves > business interests and reaps benefits from doing so. The reading > produced by Wilson and The Chronicle manufactures consent for Syracuse > University's tolerance of sexual harassment. This effectively legitimates
> the manufacturing of consent necessary to other universities if, for > example, they are to hire celebrities who will attract students and > funding and lend the particular university an "exciting" "aura."
> "Celebrity" is an effect of the privatized, "personal spin" "creative"
> stars put on socially and systemically structured phenomena.
> Privatization of socially structured phenomena, however, is an act of > commodification that must be made to disappear, since the visibility of > this process would not only reveal the particular form of "celebrity > creativity" privileged on many campuses to be an effect of the > privatization of meaning made possible by public university funds. It > would also reveal the university star system in general as complicit with > those very (socially produced) structures of violence that condition the > occurrence of sexual harassment as systemic. The manufacturing of consent
> for Syracuse University's acceptance of Dobyns achieves just such a > magical effect. By making celebrity and university involvement in > corporate welfare disappear, a gap between the university and business is > produced. This gap-- produced by various tactics at different > universities that work in concert with a variety of legitimizing > mechanisms--is nevertheless what allows universities to maintain a posture
> of freedom from business and establishment interests, in turn allowing > universities to pull in lots of money, apparently on the basis of their > own and their celebrities' "merit" rather than structural violence. In > its turn, business benefits from the resulting emphasis that reinstates > and naturalizes meritocracy and masks the interests of the capitalist class.
> To produce and disseminate readings which manufacture the > appearance of such a gap is to aid in the masking of structural violence > and prevent transformation of its conditions of possibility. In > other words, to produce and disseminate the reading of sexual harassment

> as an effect of a "quirk" in an otherwise "valuable" individual > is to participate in the pedagogy of profiteering. This pedagogy works to > contain issues rather than open them to public debate, analysis and > critique. In doing so, it serves only the establishment segment of > the community.
> It is, to our minds, astounding that The Chronicle staff thinks > the profit motive behind their work is invisible, not only given the > general understanding of pedagogy in the broad sense we have put forth, > but also the U.S. Army's and Navy's comparatively rigorous confrontation > of their institutional structures of violence against women. It is an > indication of The Chronicle's massive, establishment interest in > containing this issue (rather than opening it to debate and analysis) > that produces a rather pointed irony: The Chronicle of HIGHER EDUCATION--
> supposedly highly democratic in method and aim--is suppressing systemic > analysis and collective response to sexual harassment while the presumably > authoritarian Army and Navy open up to the demand to redress > such patterns. The Chronicle's habits and practices, in short, > effectively work to position the Army and Navy--NOT HIGHER EDUCATION--
as
> the VANGUARD in redressing sexual harassment!
> In the face of such strenuous effort on the part of The > Chronicle to whitewash critical connections between academia and business,
> we need to ask: Is The Chronicle interested in shutting the door on a > potentially explosive issue, effectively rehabilitating male-dominated > education? That is, is there a sense that Ms. Cotter could be the > Anita Hill of academia? Cotter's systemic analysis of the social function
> of harassment is an explicit call to other victims of harassment to press > charges, and to academic institutions to expose and redress such charges.
> By attempting to sever Cotter's "personal story" from the systemic > analysis of harassment which she forwards, The Chronicle works to suppress > the potential of this case to encourage other victims of harassment in > the academy and their supporters. There has been a widely-reported > increase in formal charges of sexual harassment following Anita Hill's > Congressional testimony. Does the weakening of Cotter's argument by The > Chronicle's practices serve to contain such a response within the academy?

> We see the opportunities this case presents rather differently.
> This case is an opportunity for critical reflection and collective > resolve to intervene in the patterns which enable sexual harassment and > all other kinds of abuse. We urge The Chronicle to publish debates and > analyses of sexual harassment and all issues of oppression within > academia, rather than reports which manufacture consent for containing the > contradictions between our myth of equality and individual freedom and > the realities of complex social patterns of oppression. That is, we call > for The Chronicle to publish debates and analyses that enable the > understanding of the relationships among many "interpersonal" cases in > terms of TRANSPERSONAL patterns of oppression, so that The Chronicle > serves not just the few, but ALL members of the community.
>
>
> The Red Theory Collective
> (U at Albany, NY)
>
>
> Deb Kelsh
> Laura Lane
> Jennifer Mitchell
> Tom Nespeco
> Julie Torrant
> Rob Wilkie

↑ Index

677. George Bowering
Re: people-not-here-talk -Reply
Fri 21 Feb 1997

I was wondering why the anti-Dorn animus, too; only people I can remember his dissing are rednecks.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

678. George Bowering
Re: oh my god
Fri 21 Feb 1997

> Hey, I'm deeply disappointed. I just posted my entire sexual, criminal, & literary history to the list by accident and it never showed up.
> Just shows where too much trust in technology gets you.
>
> wendy (aside, stage left)

You must have a lousy server. It all showed up on my screen, and I forwarded it to some of my best friends in Cleveland and Toronto.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

679. Maria Damon
Re: spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

---

bob p rites:
>It makes me think poets are very irritated by being imprisoned, finally, >in the aesthetic sphere...

nor do critics. thanks bob for pointing out that politics, not just "textual," are relevant at every turn, and that poets have just as much of a right to be considered politically as anyone else.--md

↑ Index

680. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest
Re: Fw: The Chronicle and Sexual Harrassment (fwd)
Fri 21 Feb 1997

---

yeah, what exactly DID s. dobyns do? i know universities have a grotesque "boys will be boys" policy when it comes to sexual harrassment of students, especially when the harasser is is celebrity. perhaps not ALL universities. but i can think of two particularly grotesque cases in boston area, involving three different universities, without trying very hard at all! e

↑ Index

681. Mark Weiss
Re: spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Of course we'll never know what Perelman meant if others keep speaking for him. But I can tell you that by "these times" I meant the present conservative tenor of the country that makes it harder to organize around most indignations than it used to be in the bad old days when we had to face large numbers of people with guns, not some past utopia when there was less to be indignant about.

At 05:21 PM 2/21/97 -0500, you wrote:
>re: Mark Weiss's comment to B. Perelman: "Is it possible that these >really are tough and demoralizing times for those who believe in >some sort--any sort--of equitable society? Are you proposing >aesthetic quietism as a proper, even a possible, cure for >those of us who continue to be afflicted with savage indignation?"
>
>Aesthetic quietism seems hardly what Perelman was proposing.
>Perhaps just a practice of political engagement which doesn't >devolve so sorrily into rant. I have no problem with pointing out and >- more importantly, of course - doing something about
>"demoralizing times" and "savage indignation," but it seems to me >there's an implicit nostalgia in Weiss's castigation of these times >as opposed to others. If these are the bad times, when were the >good ones? Utopian visions can be backward as well as forward >looking and neither seem particularly fruitful to me. Albert Murray:
>"in spite of temporary setbacks, the normal expectation in every >social science melodrama is that everything will turn out allright."
>What's more melodramatic than the silly bigotries a Pound or a Dorn >or a Baraka fall into? No one wants them to assume a position of >quietism just one which is brave enough to deal with the >complexities of their particular themes, issues. Their Utopias are >just the flip sides of their Dystopias. Neither are accurate and the >vision tends to progress in a direction which inspires boredom as >much as anything else. (Baraka's distancing himself from Black >Nationalism seems an implicit realization of such problems). In any >case I'm not sure highlighting the poles of "quietism" and "savage >indignation" do us any good.
>
>-Mike Magee.
>
>

↑ Index

682. Schuchat Simon
Re: spell check and ethics check
Fri 21 Feb 1997

Large political ambitions do seem to do something to poets. (Real politicians, in my own experience, are much much much more cautious in their speech, are mainly concerned with keeping out of trouble.) The list keeps focused on Pound, Dorn, fascism, etc. That isn't the only ideological problem for poets. Mayakovsky, who himself said he "stepped on the throat of his own song," and spent years writing political posters -- which do have considerable artistic merit -- and a couple years writing advertising jingles for the largest grocery store in Moscow. (imagine Frank O'Hara on Gristedes). But there is great poetry even in rather troubling works like My Soviet Passport. (There's enough dreck as well.) Or Neruda: Canto General is a great poem, but I really do gag on the sentimental Stalinism:

> In three rooms of the old Kremlin
> lives a man named Joseph Stalin.
> His bedroom light is turned off late.
> The world and his country allow him no rest.
> Other heroes have given birth to a nation,
> he helped to concieve his as well,
> to build it
> and to defend it.
> His immense country is, then, part of himself > and he cannot rest because it is never at rest.

etc etc.

And Dante - being no medieval Catholic, and a Jew, I find that ideology repugant, too.

It seems to me, in all of these cases, the problems are a) the poets are still imperfect human beings and b) the ideologies for saving the world tend to be on such sweeping scale that they inevitably involve alot of what Anselm referred to as "othering the Other" which gives permission for the sort of behavior and espousal of such views we are going back and forth on in this thread. When poets sing on behalf of power, that's a problem, and when poet's decide they have unique access to the truth, that too can lead to problems -- but in both cases the poetry can remain great.

↑ Index

683. Dave Zauhar

Re: spell check and ethics check

Fri 21 Feb 1997

<snip>
  Or Neruda: Canto General is a great poem, but I really do gag >on the sentimental Stalinism:
>
> In three rooms of the old Kremlin
> lives a man named Joseph Stalin.
> His bedroom light is turned off late.
> The world and his country allow him no rest.
> Other heroes have given birth to a nation,
> he helped to concieve his as well,
> to build it
> and to defend it.
> His immense country is, then, part of himself
> and he cannot rest because it is never at rest.
>
>etc etc

Pablo. . . where was your shit-detector when it came to Stalin and his evil-smelling crew?
His bloodied hands stank to heaven yet you took the stink intor your lungs and didn't cough once. Or retch.
Why? Did the Georgian smile on that human shitpile fool you? Or his moustache a wiser poet than you likened to a cockroach?
By all means one should fight for the poor:
let them have justice and bread
but one should fight without illusions, without laughing gas in one's cavities.

--Irving Layton

↑ Index

684. Steven Marks

this is a poetry column

Fri 21 Feb 1997

t h i s i s n

o t

a l i n

e

o f

p
o
e t r y

but this is

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

685. Tom Mandel

poets and their repugnant whatevers

Sat 22 Feb 1997

1. There is a difference, certainly, between an objection I might make to, let us say, an anti-semitism I find in Dante and an anti-semitism I find in a contemporary poet.

In some essential sense, an easy-to-follow one, Dante is not a living person. He's dead. His voiced opinion cannot -- by his voicing of it -- affect the politics and social facts of my life. (not to say that others can't so use it: I'd take that up with them)

My objection to Dorn was to the living person's words and their living reverberating presentness, not to the work either for that matter but to the opinions of the person; why is this distinction hard to grasp?

It is a person causing trouble whom we must resist.

2. Bob Perelman suggests my offer to bash Dorn is close to a male poet's need to "take it to the street," and how wrong can he be actually. I chose the words "punch in the mouth" after all. At the same time, I did (twice) say "if he comes around me" which should be easy to interpret. I'm suggesting that the aggression is located in the objectionable opinion. And expressing my annoyance at the fuzzy non-thinking I found on this subject here in the list -- as if evil required interpretation to be understood (no, only to be explained away). My technique was what Brecht called "plumpe Denken" -- gross or vulgar formulation of a thought, a kind of rhetoric yes.

3. Bob also suggests that "poets are very irritated by being imprisoned, finally, in the aesthetic sphere." But poets are not imprisoned in the (not even "an") aesthetic sphere. A poem is in language the inherent vehicle of ethics and politics. The history of poets addressing directly (to make or change) a current social scene does not begin with Dante nor end with Adam Mickiewicz. It is coeval with poetry surely. In some sense *well*beyond the way that a brushstroke e.g. is a signature of the artist, language holds or extends the relation of poet and society to the forefront of consciousness in reading a poem. What is said in a poem doesn't have the value of what color is used in a painting. It is not, iow, a matter of aesthetics at all. Precision in thought, I am saying, is essential to a poet in a way it is not to a painter; sloppy moral thinking by poets about poets ain't allowable.

Well, maybe I'm overstating, do youthink so? It's late and I'm tired too tired prob. to take "precision of thought" for a subject, as I'm not being terribly precise myself. But, then, in a situation plain as the nose on one's face, precision comes fairly easily. Or should. Not much weighing and measuring required to revile racism.

Tom Mandel

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

686. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Mac Wellman play
Sat 22 Feb 1997

Have just had the good fortune to see Mac Wellman's new play at the Ivy Substation in LA and want to urge those of you in the LA area to go! It's called "The lesser Magoo" and has music by Michael Roth from San Diego--really brilliant. Anyway, Mac's play takes off on just about everything in our society from political rhetoric to New Age to the standard interview (which made me think of the MLA interviews for job candidates)--and the language is extraordinary--with its "unusualists". It's only one one more week (through Sat night March 1) and I hope some readers of this list will get to see it--great acting too.

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

687. Bennett M. Sm [Dimpson
Re: this is not a message
Sat 22 Feb 1997

please pass the drops

I'm going blind

&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.
&c.
Bennett Simpson &c.
[redacted] &c.

&c.
&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.

↑ Index

688. Miekal And
jogg﹐d
Sat 22 Feb 1997

jog my memory, Mac Wellman published what magazine?

also sometime back there was an inquiry about defunkt literary mags, which is something Im keenly innerested in. would love to know of, or see a website established that logged this information in somewhat of a chronological manner, as well as notating which publically accessible archives these mags are housed in.

miekal
--
@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

689. Thomas M. Orange
Louisville Report
Sat 22 Feb 1997

sorry i didn't get a chance to get to an email terminal yesterday. but today the connection is much quicker.

i of course can't be too objective about my panel but i thought it went well and got a nice attendance yesterday (micahel boughn, alan golding, mark scroggins, and peter jaeger were there among others):

strategizing american poetics after williams
thomas orange, the university of western ontario, "imagism, objectivism, and the making of william carlos williams" david baptiste chirot, university of wisconsin-milwaukee, "williams, kerouac, grenier: visual words, soundful visions"

we had a little trouble getting our overhead and slide projectors synchronized, but dave's paper very nicely blended commentary with slides of grenier's recent work which i am now happy to have finally seen.

the next panel i went to: nation languages: kamau braithwaite, robert crawford and r.s. thomas mark d. mcmorris, brown university, "mis-handling the legacy of empire: strategies of dynamic dispacement in kamau braithwaite's x/self" mark scroggins, florida atlantic university, "the forked tongue: contemporary scottish poetry and the dilemma of language" david t. lloyd, lemoyne college, "through the looking glass: r.s. thomas's the echoes return slow as poetic autobiography" very interesting points of commonality between what would seem to be very different papers, not a whole lot of time left for discussion at the end unfortunately. but i have lots of new things to look up and read when i go home.

talked zukofsky stuff over lunch with mark and and peter and jonathan and then alas, the lure of book- and cd-shopping pulled me away from my duties as a dutiful conference-goer. went down to the bardstown road area of louisville and picked up a few books, but more exciting perhaps was finding tampa red and mississipi fred mcdowell cds (just cant find that stuff in canada).

this afternoon i will go hear peter jaeger's talk on steve mccaffery, and this panel also has papers on joan retallack, kathleen fraser, and tina darragh. then it's back on the road for the long trip back to london ont. it was beautifully warm here all weekend (22C/74F) but now it's gotten cold again, winter's back.

sorry for the inadequacies of this travelogesque sketch (or sketchy travelog). anybody who wants to know more can certainly backchannel me, and maybe some of the other poetixers in attendance here will throw in their two cents' worth.

cheers,
t.

↑ Index

690. Mark Weiss
Neruda and Stalinism
Sat 22 Feb 1997

I'm going to suggest an explanation of why Neruda's "shit detector" malfunctioned in the case of Stalin. This will require a little history, both personal and more general. Although my family were what would be called democratic socialists in Europe (Eugene V. Debs and Norman Thomas were tutelary dieties in our household), there were still a lot of Stalinists around when I was growing up. Some of them managed to hold on to the faith right into the sixties (My father's flirtation with the American Communist Party, like that of most American radicals, did not survive the Hitler-Stalin pact of 1939). These were the fathers and mothers of some of my friends, and I knew them well. Most subscribers to the list are probably familiar with Ginsberg's description of a cell meeting in

Kaddish. That really seems to have been what it was like. The party served a frunction for the believers not unlike the church for fundamentalist christians--it was the center of social life as well as ideology. As a result, members had little intimate contact with non-believers. My best friend's parents actually met and carried on their courtship at cell meetings. This exclusivity was enforced from the outside as well as from the inside. Police and FBI harrassment, during the cold war and before, were a fact of everyday life, and blacklisting, even in less than glamorous fields, was commonplace. The labor movement, in a bid to overcome the brutality of the suppression to which it was accustomed, was purged of anyone who could be suspected of radicalism. Religious schools reaped an ironic bonanza of cheap atheist labor in the form of teachers who could no longer teach in the public schools. Early television was dominated by McCarthy's show-trials--I used to watch them after school. And the trial and execution of the Rosenberg's, whatever their culpability may have been, was an extended nightmare for people who assumed that we were in the midst of a pogrom and who still were traumatized by the images (for some, who had been there, by the reality) of the death-camps. To outward appearances, weren't they a lot like us? Mrs. Rosenberg and my mother even had the same first name, and the full-page photograph of her body slumped over, straining against the leather restraints of the electric chair, that graced the cover of the Daily News the morning after the execution was the subject of many nightmares and is still etched in my brain. If even members of the ruling class, and Protestants, to boot, were not safe--we had seen Alger Hiss destroyed--what would happen to Jewish liberals and radicals? You didn't have to be particularly radical to be affected. The historian Richard Hofstadter, for instance, spent years not being able to get a permanent job because his views, far from Stalinist, were known to be left of center. My father lived in fear that his youthful socialist activism would come to light and cost him his livelihood, and when I began protesting and signing petitions they were terrified for me. I was cautioned to at least refrain from signing my name, because you never know when a signature would come back to haunt you. To their credit, when the Vietnam War heated up they did overcome their fears and participate in protest marches, but it took a fair amount of courage for them to do so. People routinely got arrested for refusing to take shelter during air raid drills. I think the first time I was called a communist was when I was twelve years old. I was arguing politics with a friend as we crossed the street, declaring my allegiance to Adlai Stevenson, when the cop directing traffic spit the word at me like a curse. Add to this the general assumption that the government and the official media were dispensing propaganda instead of news. Most of us knew from the radical press, for instance, that Arbenz, the democratically-elected president of Guatemala, portrayed in the main-stream media as a communist and a threat to the American Way of Life, was at best mildly left of center, and that his overthrow was a CIA job, not a popular uprising. Anyone who remembers the Vietnam era will not be surprised by this. It's now universally known that the government lied to us repeatedly about what was going on, and for many years the mainstream press was eagerly complicit. I would go to demonstrations in Washington that you didn't have to be a professional crowd-counter to know were pretty enormous--I mean, they filled a lot of densely-packed space. In the wee hours, back in NY, I'd read the early edition of the Times and learn that there had been maybe ten thousand of us. It was late in the war the the editorial offices told their reporters that they no longer had to lie, and suddenly demonstrations that were no larger than the earlier ones were reported as hundreds of thousands strong. To get the news you had to read the reports of the French Press Agency. To older American radicals this was no surprise. One indication of the degree of duplicity going back many years was the changing manipulation of American public opinion about Stalin himself. A monster in the twenties and early thirties, an uneasy trading partner in the late thirties, a heroic ally when it suited the US government during WWII, a paranoid monster thereafter. Why assume that any of it was true? So there was fear, isolation, distrust of government and mainstream sources, the fact of persecution, even for the beliefs of years past, coercion to betray the pasts of friends, and there was also very effective Russian propaganda. Some of my friends' Communist parents, like Neruda, had been to the Worker's Paradise, often at the expense of the Russian government by way of the American party. They were very carefully shepherded from Potemkin villages to model communes and factories. That was the reality they chose to believe in. Reports to the contrary were assumed to be tainted. Of course, none of this, even in those circumstances, would have been possible without the will to believe. Utopianism, like any true believerhood, flourishes in a climate of desperation as a comfort for the afflicted. The worse the desperation the more fervid the belief tends to be. This brings us at last to Neruda. If things were bad for leftists in America, they were awful in the feudal societies of Latin America. The kind of quasi-official violence that marked US labor conflicts in the first three decades of this century persisted in Chile, with the brief respite of the Allende regime, until Pinochet. Neruda and other intellectuals were in constant danger. He describes in his memoirs, and also, and I think more eloquently, in his Nobel lecture, his narrow and desperate escape across the Andes. The "disappearances" that became notorious under Pinochet and under the generals in Argentina had been a fact of life, if less common, for a long time. And Neruda did, finally, convenientlt die on the day of Pinochet's putsch. Stalin was one of history's great monsters, and Neruda's shit detector certainly failed. He could, perhaps, have known better. But his was a complex naivete that can only be read, I think, in context.

↑ Index

691. Mark Weiss
(no subject)
Sat 22 Feb 1997

I don't think Mac ever published a mag; if he did, it was before he came to New York in the 70's. He did edit a collection of theater criticism and I think two collections of contemporary plays. And of course he has published several books of poems and novels, mostly with Sun&Moon. I wrote the intro to his first major poetry collection, which was published by New Rivers. Mac has one a bunch of Obies. He may be the most prolific playwright since Lope da Vega, and he's probably the best we've got. At his best he's great. And I use the term advisedly.

At 10:06 AM 2/22/97 +0100, you wrote:
>jog my memory, Mac Wellman published what magazine?
>
>also sometime back there was an inquiry about defunkt literary mags, >which is something Im keenly innerested in. would love to know of, or >see a website established that logged this information in somewhat of a >chronological manner, as well as notating which publically accessible >archives these mags are housed in.
>
>miekal
>--
>@#
>Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
>QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
>http://net22.com/qazingulaza
>e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]
>

↑ Index

692. Maria Damon
Re: Louisville Report
Sat 22 Feb 1997

---

thanks thomas orange, i'm particularly interested in how "my" panel went, i couldn't go (screwed up on travel plans, utterly exhausted, too $), it was w/ joe harrington and chris beach. also, does anyone have an e-address for mark mcmorris?--md

At 10:36 AM -0500 2/22/97, Thomas M. Orange wrote: >sorry i didn't get a chance to get to an email terminal yesterday. but >today the connection is much quicker.

>
>i of course can't be too objective about my panel but i thought it went >well and got a nice attendance yesterday (micahel boughn, alan golding, >mark scroggins, and peter jaeger were there among others):
>
>strategizing american poetics after williams
> thomas orange, the university of western ontario, "imagism, >objectivism, and the making of william carlos williams"
> david baptiste chirot, university of wisconsin-milwaukee,
>"williams, kerouac, grenier: visual words, soundful visions"
>
>we had a little trouble getting our overhead and slide projectors >synchronized, but dave's paper very nicely blended commentary with slides >of grenier's recent work which i am now happy to have finally seen.
>
>the next panel i went to:
>nation languages: kamau braithwaite, robert crawford and r.s. thomas > mark d. mcmorris, brown university, "mis-handling the legacy of >empire: strategies of dynamic dispacement in kamau braithwaite's x/self" > mark scroggins, florida atlantic university, "the forked tongue:
>contemporary scottish poetry and the dilemma of language"
> david t. lloyd, lemoyne college, "through the looking glass: r.s.
>thomas's the echoes return slow as poetic autobiography" >very interesting points of commonality between what would seem to be very >different papers, not a whole lot of time left for discussion at the end >unfortunately. but i have lots of new things to look up and read when i >go home.
>
>talked zukofsky stuff over lunch with mark and and peter and jonathan and >then alas, the lure of book- and cd-shopping pulled me away from my duties >as a dutiful conference-goer. went down to the bardstown road area of >louisville and picked up a few books, but more exciting perhaps was >finding tampa red and mississipi fred mcdowell cds (just cant find that >stuff in canada).
>
>this afternoon i will go hear peter jaeger's talk on steve mccaffery, and >this panel also has papers on joan retallack, kathleen fraser, and tina >darragh. then it's back on the road for the long trip back to london ont.
>it was beautifully warm here all weekend (22C/74F) but now it's gotten >cold again, winter's back.
>
>sorry for the inadequacies of this travelogesque sketch (or sketchy >travelog). anybody who wants to know more can certainly backchannel me, >and maybe some of the other poetixers in attendance here will throw in >their two cents' worth.

>
>cheers,
>t.

↑ Index

693. Maria Damon
Re: poets and their repugnant whatevers
Sat 22 Feb 1997

---

i don't think yr being extreme or overstating yr case. the more u talk the more i'm in agreement w/ you, tho i still wouldn't punch dorn in the mouth, mostly cuz i haven't been trained to do it properly; i'd probably leave the room or tell him verbally to not talk like that around me. actually, at our panel at mla, my entire paper was an unintentional refutation of his.

12:52 AM -0500 2/22/97, Tom Mandel wrote:
>1. There is a difference, certainly, between an objection I might make to, >let us say, an anti-semitism I find in Dante and an anti-semitism I find in >a contemporary poet.
>
>In some essential sense, an easy-to-follow one, Dante is not a living >person. He's dead. His voiced opinion cannot -- by his voicing of it -- >affect the politics and social facts of my life. (not to say that others >can't so use it: I'd take that up with them)
>
>My objection to Dorn was to the living person's words and their living >reverberating presentness, not to the work either for that matter but to >the opinions of the person; why is this distinction hard to grasp?
>
>It is a person causing trouble whom we must resist.
>
>2. Bob Perelman suggests my offer to bash Dorn is close to a male poet's >need to "take it to the street," and how wrong can he be actually. I chose >the words "punch in the mouth" after all. At the same time, I did (twice) >say "if he comes around me" which should be easy to interpret. I'm >suggesting that the aggression is located in the objectionable opinion. And >expressing my annoyance at the fuzzy non-thinking I found on this subject >here in the list -- as if evil required interpretation to be understood >(no, only to be explained away). My technique was what Brecht called >"plumpe Denken" -- gross or vulgar formulation of a thought, a kind of >rhetoric yes.

>
>3. Bob also suggests that "poets are very irritated by being imprisoned, >finally, in the aesthetic sphere." But poets are not imprisoned in the (not >even "an") aesthetic sphere. A poem is in language the inherent vehicle of >ethics and politics. The history of poets addressing directly (to make or >change) a current social scene does not begin with Dante nor end with Adam >Mickiewicz. It is coeval with poetry surely. In some sense *well*beyond the >way that a brushstroke e.g. is a signature of the artist, language holds or >extends the relation of poet and society to the forefront of consciousness >in reading a poem. What is said in a poem doesn't have the value of what >color is used in a painting. It is not, iow, a matter of aesthetics at all.
>Precision in thought, I am saying, is essential to a poet in a way it is >not to a painter; sloppy moral thinking by poets about poets ain't allowable.
>
>Well, maybe I'm overstating, do youthink so? It's late and I'm tired too >tired prob. to take "precision of thought" for a subject, as I'm not being >terribly precise myself. But, then, in a situation plain as the nose on >one's face, precision comes fairly easily. Or should. Not much weighing and >measuring required to revile racism.
>
>Tom Mandel
>
>
>
>
>
>Tom Mandel
>*******
>Screen Porch * [redacted]
>4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
>Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
>*******

↑ Index

694. Maria Damon

Re: Neruda and Stalinism

Sat 22 Feb 1997

At 8:19 AM -0800 2/22/97, Mark Weiss wrote:
>I'm going to suggest an explanation of why Neruda's "shit detector" >malfunctioned in the case of Stalin. This will require a little history,

...

thanks mark. i'm going to share this msg w/ my class on the sf renaissance. it's hard for younger folks, myself included (born in 1955, to pretty apolitical parents who were horrified by mcCarthy but not afraid for themselves) to grasp the real horror of those years, which have been delivered to us as "happy daze." a few yrs ago i heard leo marx describing the politics of my dept back in the 50s. Allen tate was a genial gentleman, he sd, but he (marx) suspected that if they'd had an honest discussion about politics they wouldn't have had much in common. i naively asked, in the following q and a session, why they didn't in fact ever have that honest political discussion. he gently reminded me of the mccarthy era and said bluntly, i would have lost my job.

↑ Index

695. Tosh
Re: Neruda and Stalinism
Sat 22 Feb 1997

Great letter Mark! Very interesting.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

696. KENT JOHNSON
Weiss, naivete, Neruda
Sat 22 Feb 1997

In suggesting an explanation for why Neruda's "shit detector" malfuntioned vis a vis Stalin, Mark Weiss recounts some of the extreme psychological and ideological pressures endured by his radical parents and their Communist Party friends during McCarthyism. He argues, and quite accurately I'm sure, that the unrelenting quality of this pressure quite naturally led to a circling of the wagons in rank and file CP circles which only served to narrow further the political field of vision of honest and deeply moral people.

The story is moving, but I'd argue that it is fairly irrelevant in terms of helping one to understand Neruda and in coming to terms with that great poet's lifelong and fairly visceral Stalinism. In fact, Weiss's argument that Neruda's "complex naivete" is analogous to that of U.S rank and file CPers centers on his concluding statement that, "If things were bad for leftists in America, they were awful in the feudal societies of Latin America. The kind of quasi- offficial violence that marked US labor conflicts in the first three decades of this century persisted in Chile, with the brief respite of the Allende regime, until Pinochet." Yes, Chilean history is one of class conflict, and things were never exactly rosy for leftists there, particualrly in moments of acute crisis, when, as in 1973, the full force of the native ruling class and imperialism comes down with an iron fist.

But an important part of the history of the Stalinized Communist parties everywhere during the 30's and through WWII (in line with Kremlin dictates that were driven by Stalin's desire to maintain a modus vivendi with the U.S. and Europe) is the renouncing of the direct struggle for power in the "feudal" societies of the "third world," in favor of CP alliances with the "progressive" and "nationalist bourgeoisie." This led in a number of countries--and Chile, in fact, is a prime example--to the formation of electoral alliances between the Communist parties and capitalist parties, so-called "popular fronts," which in a number of instances around the world momentarily came to power. Far from pushing forward a revolutionary program, the CP in nearly all these cases acted as faithful junior partner, working to hold the trade union movement in check, and often being in the vanguard of the ideological and legal attacks on activists who would not consent to these accomodationist policies (the classic and tragic case is Spain, where the most rabid and successful enemies of the powerful anarchist trade union movement were not the fascists but the PC of Spain, on which see Orwell's _Homage to Catalonia_. But the old SWP member, Militant newspaper hawker in me is coming back and I'm getting long-winded. So how does this relate to Neruda?

In this way: Pablo Neruda was in no way a rank and file communist whose personal life was under constant and relentless harrassment. Of course, he faced persecution in significant ways when the political winds weren't blowing the right way, and he faced sthose with great courage (e.g. his albeit poeticized flight across the Andes from the previously "progressive bourgeois" Radical Party government of Videla was undoubtedly heroic) but he was also a leading official of the Chilean Communist Party, its Secretary of Propaganda for an extended period in the 1940's, an elected CP senator during the "Popular Front" Videla regime, and consul and ambassador for "progressive" capitalist Chilean governments on two or three occasions, all as an open member of the Communist Party.

On one of those "consul" occasions, Neruda was in Mexico for an extended spell during Trotsky's exile there. Far from being "naive" about the purges, show trials and summary executions of left-wing communists in the Soviet Union, Neruda knew about them well and approved of them, as any internationally prominent member in good standing of the Third International did. There was nothing all that secret about the purges within the movement. The crowning, orgasmic moment, of course, of the Stalinist terror, was Trotsky's murder in Mexico City at the hands of an NKVD agent (or was it KGB by then?). There is a revealing moment in Neruda's _Memoirs_ when he writes, with the idyllic atmosphere so typical of that book (but it seems we can only assume it's true) about going to meet David Alfaro Siqueiros, one of the two greatest Mexican muralists (the other was Diego Rivera, Frieda Kahlos's husband, and both great friends of Trotsky's), at prison, where he was conveniently let out on Neruda's visits by the warden so David and Pablo could go drink and have, as Neruda describes it, a jovial time. Siqueiros, a prominent member of the Mexican CP, was in jail for an early but failed team machine gun assault on Trotsky, which Trotsky describes in some detail in the autobiography completed shortly before Stalin finally got him.

I'd like to perhaps boldly suggest this, though I'm unaware of any concrete proof, or other discussion of the matter: Neruda was well aware of the efforts to kill Trotsky, was a fan of the attempt, and was in close consultation with Stalin's henchmen during his presence in Mexico. Why wouldn't he have been? Neruda was close to a number of people in Trotsky's circle of avant-garde admirers, which included Rivera and Kahlo, Breton and a number of the French Surrealists, and numerous Mexican writers and artists. Why wouldn't the most prominent Communist Party member in Mexico and clandestine drinking buddy of Trotskyite head-hunter Siqueiros have been closely consorting with Stalin's henchmen? To think otherwise strikes me as naive, and naive in an uncomplex way.

I don't mean by these comments (which I'd wager could be expanded and made more credibly damning with benefit of some research) to take anything away from Neruda's writing. In fact, I don't think it does in the least, and the recent tough-poet guy commentary about punch in the mouth strikes me as sad and silly. Dorn, Neruda, Pound, are all great poets who have enriched our lives because they've shown us in their own different ways what greatness the human imagination is capable of. If they've compromised themselves in serious ways through their public lives, as they certainly have, that speaks to how strange and paradoxical the task of being a human being can be, and about how the imagination can be at once capable of the basest excrescences and of the wildest and most sublime beauty. Thank god for poetry and the weird, indecipherable people that make it.

So to conclude, Mark, and with the greatest respect, I'd like to suggest that Neruda was in no way like your parents or their beautiful friends: He was a very priviledged Communist Party apparatchik, who had a life of relative leisure, title, and travel, and he used his position for good and for bad. He knew quite a lot about what Stalin was doing, approved of it, and participated in it very conscientiously in the "long-range interests of the class struggle." I'd suggest that given the explosion of popularity his name has enjoyed given the uncannily _Memoir_ -like atmosphere of Il Postino, that some careful accounting of his role is in order from poets who should be more skeptical of such romanticizing.

These comments are certainly overly general, but your "complex naivete" excuse seems somewaht easy, especially since the "fascists" seem to get trashed on this list for behavior that seems, in comparison to Neruda's (and who are the others? Hikmet, Brecht, even Vallejo?, etc.), childish and almost poignant in its desperate stupidity.

Kent

↑ Index

697. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: Neruda and Stalinism
Sat 22 Feb 1997

I want to thank you greatly for this post, which brings back my own fears and memories as well, not that they are that far beneath the surface.

Mayakovsky, one of my favorite poets, could also be found absurd or want- ing, vis-a-vis the empowered State (Pasternak takes him to task), and there is the oddly disturbing "case" of Rimbaud.

A final, moody, note - when people "become cases," what is implied? This is an odd distinction, the identification of a person, personhood, with a specific narrative turn - "the case of Solzhenitsyn," "take the case of Faulkner," and so forth...

Alan

http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/
Tel. [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149

↑ Index

698. Dean Taciuch
Re: spell check and etc
Sat 22 Feb 1997

The call for spell-check and user dictionary files reminded me of a piece I was working on a few months ago (still not finished)-- a long poem called "rote" which is built from a 1930s speller. The speller itself simply lists words, from grade 2 through 8, but there is a sound patterning to them, based on similar spellings and words that might be confused by grade schoolers. I placed the words into lines and stanzas adding nothing but punctuation. I go back to it every once in a while, mostly to take out the punctuation I put in--not having worked with found material very often, I tended not to trust what I found. (Probably by next year I'll have worked it back to the original--just lists, that'll be it, and the time spent will be the poem.)

Here's a sample, from "Grade 5"

Mist list sleet, sweep swept.
Taught daughter alike. Aside alarm. Against good-by, goodnight.
Tax text. Cloak means. Stairs chose clerk.

Glee sleeve. Ninth ninety nineteen. Lazy crazy tap trap. Strap deer, beer sneak.
Speak, speaker, truly. Geese bolt. Marble stump.

Louder cooler blaze. Graze scrub scrubbed. Serve served server. Serving lodge dodge circle. Circus cistern tease. Butcher stiff bog banana.

Joy, employ narrow sparrow, lose losing.
Acted actor acting. Quit quite jelly. Jolly weekly, deeply steel daisy. Job blot junk.

Least yeast remember.
Remembered remembering burned, burst simple sample.
Example: lowest, highest afloat. Agree, agreed? Waist pinch, barking fever cord.

Lack stack backed latest.
Finest main remain trained.
Level camel. Cruel feed feeder. June, July watching.
Struck answer. Voice coop.

Dean

↑ Index

699. Christopher Reiner
SF Reading
Sat 22 Feb 1997

On Thursday, February 27th Susan Smith Nash reads from _Channel-Surfing the Apocalypse_ and other works at New College of California, 777 Valencia St. San Francisco, CA. 7:30 p.m. $4.

Information about the book and the author can be found at:

http://www.crl.com/~creiner/syntax/channel.html

↑ Index

700. David Kellogg
Re: people-not-here-talk -Reply
Sat 22 Feb 1997

On Fri, 21 Feb 1997, George Bowering wrote:
>
> I was wondering why the anti-Dorn animus, too; only people I can remember > his dissing are rednecks.

Some of my best friends are rednecks . . .

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

appropriateness have never stopped me in the past. Tom's right. And I shouldn't have to remind folks that violence is not an inappropriate response to violence. As I remember, Brecht's original conception of plumpe Denken was a counter to those who would use their oh so subtle metaphysics to deny or explain brutality.It is crucial we remember this. Would I, personally, punch Mr. Dorn? I don't know the man well, nor am I familar with his remarks. My "redneck" uncles always told me never to thrash a man unless you knew for sure he needed a thrashing. Or were certain that what you were making a fuss over warranted a fight. In this case, I can say unequivocally that the fuss is enough, but the man, well, I'd need to meet him. But, then, I've never tried to hide the fact that I am, indeed, a redneck too. Pass the Copenhagen! Thanks,

Eric

↑ Index

702. Schuchat Simon
Re: Neruda and Stalinism
Sat 22 Feb 1997

I don't disagree with any of Marc's comments re Neruda and Stalinism (though it seems to me that in the 20s Stalin was the preferred choice of the capitalist west over Trotsky, who wanted to export revolution -- Stalin was going to stay at home and build socialism in one country -- but that is a very minor nit). and obviously Neruda was partially motivated by the two impeccable decision rules: the enemy of my enemy is my friend, and you take your friends where you find them.

but I want to note that one could also construct an equally rational justification for Pound's fascism, espousal of Mussolini and probably even the anti-semitism could be explained, justified, and so on.

we don't have the same direct stake in Neruda so we don't suffer as much with his Stalinism as we do with Pound. and I suspect most of us on the list will generally agree with Neruda's attack on Yanqui imperialismo, even if we are Yanquis, while Pound's views on Jews involve some of us, at least me, in a different way that we can't sympathize with.

but Pound was never as rewarded by power as was Neruda, either local Chilean (Senator and diplomat, culminating as Ambassador to Paris) or international left (promoting his work in translation all over the globe). the most support Pound ever received from the "state" was his room and board at St. E's.

again, I am not here "attacking" Neruda or "defending" Pound. I am arguing that active espousal of big picture politics, particularly chiliastic politics on either the left or right, will magnify other flaws in the human poet.

↑ Index

703. Mark Weiss
Re: Neruda and Stalinism
Sun 23 Feb 1997

I don't think I was trying to justify Neruda's or anyone else's Stalinism. I was trying to explain how it was possible to be deluded, and to underline the importance of context in understanding behavior. But let's get this straight--I might be able to arrive at an explanation of how Pound came to feel and act the way he did, but I'd still be left with a poet incorporating into his work a vicious racist system based on a perversion of genetics. That was a central element of his politics. Stalin was not central to Neruda, communism (whether or not we think it practicable) as an ideal of human justice was. His delusion was accepting Stalin as the instrument thereof. But it was the pursuit of justice that was the motivation. While both men may have been deluded I think there's a world of difference between those two positions, and I hope that it's only the rhetorical habit of symmetry that keeps you from seeing that. And I don't think that anyone outside the Aryan Nation could justify Pound's position.

Just to pick at a nit, it's entirely possible that there were people in the west who thought that Stalin was better for their futures than Trotsky. That doesn't mean that they had the power to determine the outcome of the power struggle. Or do you have copies of the cheques from JP Morgan to Stalin's PAC? It's also not entirely clear (and here I enter into heresy) that Trotsky would have been such a bargain for the Russian people.

>but I want to note that one could also construct an equally rational >justification for Pound's fascism, espousal of Mussolini and probably >even the anti-semitism could be explained, justified, and so on.
>
.>

↑ Index

704. Yunte Huang
Re: Louisville Report
Sun 23 Feb 1997

As one of the many presenters on the Lou. Conf., my trip to Lou., I shall say, is a hell lot of driving, two nine-hour long and lone drive within two days. So I missed Thursday's and Saturday's show, but I can report on a few panels I wnet to on Friday.

Panel C4: Strategizing American Poetics after Williams
  Thomas Orange, "Imagism and Objectivism, and the Making of W.C.

Williams"
David Chirot, "Williams, Kerouac, Grenier: Visual Words, Soundful Visions"

Good attendance, nice slide shows. For myself, having seen Grenier's pages (with those impressive two fingers) many times and having heard him talked (or not talked) about those photos, it still felt fresh when somebody else talked about them. Orange raised an interesting but arguable point about Pound's inability to understand early Williams' poetry.

Panel D6: Readings in Anglo-American Modernist Poetics

Yunte Huang, "Ezra Pound and the Chinese and Jewish Traditions of Textual Practice"
Jason Fichtel, "Go Down, Melanctha: African American Spirituals and Musicality in Gertrude Stein's Melanctha"
Benjamin Lockerd, "The Age of Eliot: Th Age of Einstein"
Michael Campbell, "Comedy Both Human and Inhuman: Stevens' Poetry and Bergson's Social Corrective Theory of Laughter"

I have to say, in terms of attendance and response, the panel went very well. My paper was to relate Pound's hatred in unstable Jewish textuality to some of the moves he made when he translated (the translation) from the Chinese. Fichtel's analysis of those names in Melanctha (like Jef-fe-rey, Me-lanc-tha) in relation to African Spiritual rhythems, which I don't know much about, was interesting. Lockerd's paper is about Eliot's engagement with the new development in physics (Einstein's theory), and one person in the audience turned out to be a former student of Einstein. Campbell read Stevens as a comedian, which I found to be more interesting than reading Stevens' metaphysics. Before the panel, I barely knew a soul among the five-hundred strong mass (except Alan G.) and could recognize a few names and faces, but after the panel I had some nice chats with people who came to me.

Panel F5: US Poetry and/as Popular Culture

Maria Damon, "When the NuYorican Came to Town: A Study of Poetic Exchanges"
Christopher Beach, "Poetry on Television?: Bob Holman's 'A United States of Poetry' as Video-Poetry Revolution"
Joseph Harrington, "America's Richest Poet, or The Meaning of Walt Mason"

When I walked into the room, a woman was smiling at me, and I thought that was Maria Damon. But it turned out she was doing an "affirmative action" count in the room, the result of which she would use to make a point in discussion. And of course, Maria D. wasn't there, she remote-controlled Alan Golding to read her kick-'em-in-the-ass paper about the social exchanges among different poetry communities in Twin City. Harrington and Beach used Mason and Holman respectively to argue for a popular function of poetry. It was a lively panel, provoking various response. Alan, now disconnected from the home-office in Twin City, made three comments, one of which being whether some video poetry is actually using the mode of production of the object of its critique (a structural-Marxist point). And the woman who was counting "heads" earlier on (the reason she was smiling at me, by the way, I guess, was that I was an Asian male) asked about eh gender issue involved.

All and all, it was fun. Sorry didn't make it to more of the sessions, and to Alan's party on Saturday night, but "we" are still during the six-day memorial period for Deng's death, so no partying for me.

Yunte Huang

↑ Index

705. Mark Weiss

Re: Weiss, naivete, Neruda

Sun 23 Feb 1997

Could be you know the history better than I do--I, too, would have to do more research than I am inclined to at the moment. But for the record, wasn't Neruda a rather strong supporter of the miner's strike that was the defining moment of Chilean leftist politics, despite whatever directives came out of Moscow? Also for the record, my parents were never communists nor always beautiful, and only some of the communists in the neighborhood were beautiful. None of them, even those very involved with the party, were fully aware of what was going on in the Soviet Union, although they tended to be apologists. I think that they were apologists out of a desperation to maintain their belief in a set of human possibilities that met with positive reinforcement nowhere else that they had access to. For the same reason many African American intellectuals, who also should have known better, became involved with the party. And I am suggesting that Neruda shared that desperation even in his privileged, but insecure, position, that even, perhaps, witnessing misery around him made him more desperate because of his privileged position. (By the way, a meeting in prison is hardly likely to be clandestine, and privileged treatment of privileged prisoners of the kind you describe is not exactly unknown in Latin American jails) Desperation can motivate a lot of unseemly behavior, but I'd really need more proof to accept that Neruda was a party to any secret Stalinist plot to thwart the gains of unionized labor. Perhaps he thought that alliances were the best possible way to go in the circumstances. Those alliances certainly for a time improved the living conditions of large numbers of people, even if they failed to achieve a worker's paradise. Let me go further. There is no question but that most of the CPs around the world felt a need to remain in solidarity, and there is no question but that they got detailed directives and funds from the Kremlin, but the evidence seems to be that a very very few of the most important functionaries (Neruda was never in that sort of manegerial position; in fact, he was out of the country and out of contact with the Chilean party for long stretches of time} knew the details of directives or even the exact channels for funds. Even the FBI acknowledges this now. The information was just too sensitive. Trotsky assassination theories have been for a long time the kind of industry that Kennedy assassination theories have become in this country. Neruda as conspirator is a new one on me, and I congratulate your originality. I do think that that's a charge I would be wary of levelling at anyone with no basis but ingenious speculation. Was Neruda really the most important communist in Mexico? Finally, to an old SWP member I apologize for having implied anything less than complimentary about Trotsky. I'm suddenly reminded of all those parties in my youth that dissolved into partisan shouting and declarations of loyalty to one International as opposed to another. Even then they struck me as more about theology than history, and I swore I'd stop participating in them. And here I am, sucked in again. But can I really leave your final statement unchallenged? As far as I know, unless Neruda really was only friendly with Breton et al in order to facilitate the assassination of Trotsky, he wasn't involved with killing anyone or advocating the killing of large numbers of people for reasons of race and ethnicity, although he may have swallowed and been an apologist for the official party line on the show trials (it's hardly likely, incidentally, that he was aware of the extent of the gulag system--the kremlin rarely boasted about it to people whose good will they felt it was useful to maintain). Maybe that's why some of us on this list get madder at fascists of the 30's and 40's than they do at Neruda.

At 12:47 AM 2/23/97 +0600, you wrote:
>In suggesting an explanation for why Neruda's "shit detector" >malfuntioned vis a vis Stalin, Mark Weiss recounts some of the extreme >psychological and ideological pressures endured by his radical >parents and their Communist Party friends during McCarthyism. He >argues, and quite accurately I'm sure, that the unrelenting >quality of this pressure quite naturally led to a circling of the >wagons >in rank and file CP circles which only served to narrow further the >political field of vision of honest and deeply moral people.
>
>The story is moving, but I'd argue that it is fairly irrelevant in >terms of helping one to understand Neruda and in coming to terms with >that great poet's life-long and fairly visceral Stalinism. In fact,

>Weiss's argument that >Neruda's "complex naivete" is analogous to that of U.S rank and file >CPers centers on his concluding >statement that, "If things were bad for leftists in America, they were >awful in the feudal societies of Latin America. The kind of quasi->offficial violence that marked US labor conflicts in the first three >decades of this century persisted in Chile, with the brief respite of >the Allende regime, until Pinochet." Yes, Chilean history is one >of class conflict, and things were never exactly rosy for leftists >there, particualrly in moments of acute crisis, when, as in 1973, >the full force of the native ruling class and imperialism comes down >with an iron fist.
>
>But an important part of the history of the Stalinized >Communist parties everywhere during the 30's and through WWII >(in line with Kremlin dictates that were driven by Stalin's desire to >maintain a modus vivendi with the U.S. and Europe) >is the renouncing of the direct struggle for power in the "feudal" >societies of the "third world," in favor of CP alliances with the >"progressive" and "nationalist bourgeoisie." This led in a number of >countries--and Chile, in fact, is a prime example--to the formation of >electoral alliances between the Communist parties and >capitalist parties, so-called "popular fronts," which in a number of >instances >around the world momentarily came to power. Far from pushing forward >a revolutionary program, the CP in nearly all these cases acted as >faithful junior partner, working to hold the trade union movement in >check, and often being in the vanguard of the >ideological and legal attacks on activists who would not consent to >these accomodationist policies (the classic and tragic case is >Spain, where the most rabid and successful enemies of the powerful >anarchist trade union movement were not the fascists but the PC of >Spain, on which see Orwell's _Homage to Catalonia_. But the old SWP >member, Militant newspaper hawker in me is coming back and I'm >getting long-winded. So how does this relate to Neruda?
>
>In this way: Pablo Neruda was in no way a rank and file communist >whose personal life was under constant and relentless harrassment. Of >course,
>he faced persecution in significant ways when the political winds >weren't blowing the right way, and he faced sthose with great courage >(e.g. his albeit poeticized flight across the Andes from the >previously "progressive bourgeois" Radical Party government of Videla >was undoubtedly heroic) but he was also a leading official >of the Chilean Communist Party, its Secretary of Propaganda for an >extended period in the 1940's, an elected CP senator during the >"Popular Front" Videla regime, and consul and ambassador for >"progressive" capitalist Chilean governments on two or three >occasions, all as an open member of the Communist Party.

>
>On one of those "consul" occasions, Neruda was in Mexico for an >extended spell during Trotsky's exile there. Far from being "naive" >about the purges, show trials and summary executions of left-wing >communists in the Soviet Union, Neruda knew about them well and >approved of them, as any internationally prominent member in good >standing of the Third International did. There was nothing all that >secret about the purges within the movement. The crowning, orgasmic >moment, of course, of the Stalinist terror, was Trotsky's murder in >Mexico City at the hands of an NKVD agent (or was it KGB by then?).
>There is a revealing moment in Neruda's _Memoirs_ when he writes, >with the idyllic atmosphere so typical of that book (but it seems we >can only assume it's true) about going to >meet David Alfaro Siqueiros, one of the two greatest Mexican muralists >(the other was Diego Rivera, Frieda Kahlos's husband, and both great >friends of Trotsky's), at prison, where he was conveniently let out >on Neruda's visits by the warden so David and Pablo could go drink >and have, as Neruda describes it, a jovial time. Siqueiros, a >prominent member of the Mexican CP, was in jail for an early >but failed team machine gun assault on Trotsky, which Trotsky >describes in some detail in the autobiography completed shortly >before Stalin finally got him.
>
>I'd like to perhaps boldly suggest this, though I'm >unaware of any concrete proof, or other discussion of the matter:
>Neruda was well aware of the efforts to kill Trotsky, was a fan of >the attempt, and was in close consultation with Stalin's henchmen >during his presence in Mexico. Why wouldn't he have been? Neruda was >close to a number of people in Trotsky's circle of avant-garde >admirers, which included Rivera and Kahlo, Breton and a number of the >French Surrealists, and >numerous Mexican writers and artists. Why wouldn't the >most prominent Communist Party member in Mexico and clandestine >drinking buddy of Trotskyite head-hunter Siqueiros have been closely >consorting with Stalin's henchmen? To think otherwise strikes me as >naive, and naive in an uncomplex way.

>
>I don't mean by these comments (which I'd wager could be expanded >and made more credibly damning with benefit of some research) to >take anything away from Neruda's writing. In fact, I don't think it >does in the least, and the recent tough-poet guy commentary about >punch in the mouth strikes me as sad and silly. Dorn, Neruda, Pound, >are all great poets who have enriched our lives because they've shown >us in their own different ways what greatness the human imagination >is capable of. If they've compromised themselves in serious ways >through their public lives, as they certainly have, that speaks >to how strange and paradoxical the task of being a human being can >be, and about how the imagination can be at once capable of the basest >excrescences and of the wildest and most sublime beauty. Thank god >for poetry and the weird, indecipherable people that make it.
>
>So to conclude, Mark, and with the greatest respect, I'd like to >suggest that Neruda was in no way like your parents or their >beautiful friends: He was >a very priviledged Communist Party apparatchik, who had a life of >relative leisure, title, and travel, and he used his position for >good and for bad. He knew quite a lot about what Stalin was doing, >approved of it, and participated in it very conscientiously in the >"long-range interests of the class struggle." I'd >suggest that given the explosion of popularity his name has enjoyed >given the uncannily _Memoir_ -like atmosphere of Il Postino, that >some careful accounting of his role is in order from poets who should >be more skeptical of such romanticizing.
>
>These comments are certainly overly general, but your "complex >naivete" excuse seems somewaht easy, especially since the "fascists" >seem to get trashed on this list for behavior that seems, in >comparison to Neruda's (and who are the others? Hikmet, Brecht, even >Vallejo?, etc.), childish and almost poignant in its desperate >stupidity.
>
>Kent
>
>

↑ Index

706. KENT JOHNSON
Neruda/Stalin
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Dear Mark:

What Neruda relates in Memoirs is that he met with Siqueiros on a number of occasions while the latter was in prison for leading the first attempt on Trotsky. The warden would let Siqueiros out, and the two would go off to a bar somewhere for a few rounds to return before morning. If Neruda's account is true, I'd say it raises some questions about his activities and associations in Mexico. I never said that Neruda bore any central responsibility in Trotsky's murder, only that his position, enthusiastic pro-Stalin allegiances, and warm liaisons with a person deeply implicated in the events would make it seem quite likely that his politics within the world of leftist factionalism may have been less romantic than the Il Postino variety.

A few things in response to your last comments:

1) that Stalin ordered Trotsky's murder and called on leading Mexican Communist functionaries to help carry it out is no more an "assasination theory" than the CIA's involvement in the coup against Allende is a theory. What other "theory" is there?

2) I never said "Neruda was a party to any secret Stalinist plot to thwart the gains of unionized labor." The Third International was very open and eager in fact, during the popular front period, in telling workers that socialism was not an immediate goal. Here it's not a question of whether this was right or not, but it is relevant in so far that in various countries the local CP's branded workers who did not accept this "gradual road" to socialism as fascists and enemies of the working class. In Spain, a conflict Neruda was intimately involved with, this often came down to open attempts to crush the syndicalist unions and NKVD plots to murder individual union leaders. This is not speculation, nor is it speculation to think that Neruda was very clear on the factional politics of the Spanish Republic.

3) I didn't say that Neruda's close friendship with many of those writer's and artists around Trotsky was a convenience to aid the Kremlin's machinations, and Neruda never betrayed any of his friends to my knowledge. I was only suggesting (and I'll stand by the hypothesis) that Neruda's involvement with those in the artistic circle around Trotsky, his obvious approval of the Siqueiros raid, his international prominence as a supporter of Stalin, and his official Party position, make it highly unlikely that he was not consulted by Stalin's agents (who were surely meticulous) and makes it seem reasonable that as a loyal Party member he would have had no problem sitting down to talk if asked. If he could sneak the guy who pulled the trigger out of jail to drink tequila a bunch of times, why does this seem such an "original" strech?

Anyway, I want to be clear that my purpose in raising the issue was not to promote Trotsky, who was surely a great deal more cold- blooded than Neruda and clearly capable of more human sacrifice with a clear conscience than most Marxists. Nor, by the way, do I retain any nostalgia, personal or political, for the paranoid and sectarian world of the U.S. old left. Sorry to have "sucked you in" as you say, to what I guess are some shared unpleasant memories! But I would confidently assert again that Neruda was in no way a naif vis a vis the blood-bath against the "Trotskyite class-enemies" in the USSR, and his apparent celebration of efforts to knock-off the leader of it all would seem to support such a position. In saying that I am mainly trying to suggest that passionate politics often lead even the most generously creative minds into very ungenerous stances, and this happened with Neruda in his support (eventhough in his mind, I'm sure, they were tragically necessary) for policies in the Soviet Union that were grossly criminal. Here's an interesting question: Are you aware of any statements by Neruda disavowing his support of Stalin following Khrushchev's revelations? He may well have made them, and if so it would be pleasing to know that.

And above all, the underlying point to my previous post and in this one is the following: None of it, whatever the full truth might be, changes one iota Neruda's greatness as a poet.

Kent

↑ Index

707. F.A. Templeton playwrights
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Not to downplay Mac's talent (Mac Wellman), which I applaud, but I have another candidate here: John Jesurun. John is not as published as Mac, but a) his Chang in a Void Moon is a landmark in theatre. It was a serial, (much imitated since as a form) every Monday night, 2 showings, at the Pyramid Club in the early 80s. (Speaking of prolific) John would go home after the show, write the next episode, cast and rehearse it by the next week. The main character was played by a man and a woman, one character (the Infanta) was played by a chair, and the action took place in several centuries simultaneously. His staging (he directed too) was absolutely seminal. Actors included John Kelly, Steve Buscemi, Anna Kohler etc etc. The plot proliferated to the point where John's intro before the show of the story so far was a verbal tour de force which should have been saved for literary history. Chang has been revived in continuation a couple of times, including upcoming this March or April at The Kitchen, for episodes 50-something to 60-something.

and b) check out his Philoktetes, in Yale Theatre mag a couple of years ago, for some of the best American language onstage ever, in a work of dizzying savagery. It was written for Ron Vawter before he died.

And lots more in between. John's EVERYTHING THAT RISES MUST CONVERGE should at last be coming out from Sun & Moon soon (eh, Douglas?) but there's also a huge body of produced work.

GO SEE IT! That's what playwrights write for.

And let's not forget Richard Foreman.

On Sat, 22 Feb 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:

> I don't think Mac ever published a mag; if he did, it was before he came to New York in the 70's. He did edit a collection of theater criticism and I think two collections of contemporary plays. And of course he has published several books of poems and novels, mostly with Sun&Moon. I wrote the intro to his first major poetry collection, which was published by New Rivers. Mac has one a bunch of Obies. He may be the most prolific playwright since Lope da Vega, and he's probably the best we've got. At his best he's great. And I use the term advisedly.

↑ Index

708. F.A. Templeton

Re: spell check and ethics check

Sun 23 Feb 1997

On Fri, 21 Feb 1997, Bob Perelman wrote:

> *It makes me think poets are very irritated by being imprisoned, finally, in the aesthetic sphere. In the chapter on Bruce Andrews in Marginalization I ask if he means it when he writes "sink the boat people!" Of course he doesn't. But he does want that intensity of statement.*

Been mulling this one, Bob. What does "means it" mean? If he doesn't mean what he says, what have we got? A quote? Irony? Hardly sheer (unreferential) intensity. Maybe the audience at the Ear know he doesn't mean it, but what about the guys at the back of the bar? I've always wondered about the "not-saying" position's dependency on cultural context, especially when a lot of what we're supposed to understand as "not-said" are other-cultural references (Wooster Group's use of blackface, etc.) I'm genuinely in a spirit of inquiry here, as a fan of both Bruce and Liz LeCompte. And though I've been critical in the past of ungrounded irony, ie irony that doesn't state its critical position, I'm not happy either with insistence on constant gloss and de-implication of the speaker -- a kind of staking your tuft so you can point to the guy on the next one and imitate him. A you're-wrong-so-I-must-be-right dogmatism. I agree with BOTH Randolph and Aldon:

Hard to make any judgement stick when a tonal change is enough to put a safe distance between us and our statements, never mind appeals to indeterminism, group myopia or even (gasp) growth. All the same, though we might have broken dogmatism up for parts, the appetite for a stonefest is as insatiable as ever. Which was perhaps why political correctness was invented. The appearance of humanism yet all the fun of the chase. Unfortunately, not all baddies are so obliging as to declare themselves in their utterances.

and Aldon:
Isn't it in fact because people are not surprised to hear racist terms that they go on being used with such casual frequency?

The problem is, that tonal change doesn't carry as far as we might like to think. Try travelling. Even out of the "aesthetic sphere",or out of where it's ok to insult your friends.

On some levels there's a dramatic question here. Most cultures get dialogue between points of view, so maybe the performance-implied (if verbally denied) insistence on the poet's subject-position needs a shake. Even if Charles B denied my suggestion that all his linguistic tone-subject multiple shifting was dramatic. And people still quote back lines by my characters and say, "You said..." (Poetry student, actually). Hating speech won't get you out of it being read or heard or your speaking.

↑ Index

709. David R. Israel

Poetry: Rumi { "I don't get tired of You" }

Sun 23 Feb 1997

And now, an interlude . . . .

I don't get tired of You. Don't grow weary of being compassionate toward me!

All this thirst-equipment must surely be tired of me,
the waterjar, the water-carrier.

I have a thirst fish in me that can never find enough of what it's thirsty for!

Show me the way to the Ocean!
Break these half-measures,
these small containers.

All this fantasy and grief.

Let my house be drowned in the wave that rose last night out of the courtyard hidden in the corner of my chest.

Joseph fell like the moon into my well.
The harvest I expected was washed away.
But no matter.

A fire has risen above my tombstone hat.
I don't want learning, or dignity, or responsibility.

I want this music and this dawn and the warmth of your cheek against mine.

The grief-armies assemble,
but I'm not going with them.

This is how it always is when I finish a poem.

A Great Silence overcomes me, and I wonder why I ever thought to use language.

Jelaluddin Rumi

rendered by Barks (based on an earlier version by A.J.Arberry) from RUMI: Like This (43 Odes, versions by Coleman Barks) published by Maypop Books (1989) -- 1st poem in the book

[w/ thanks to les artistes, Markar & Parkar for their gift of this volume some years ago -- I just don't read this stuff enough]

.
.....
.....
\\\

| thy centuries follow each other
| perfecting a small wild flower
| (Tagore)
//\\\\\/////

↑ Index

710. F.A. Templeton
Re: playwrights
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Proper reference: John Jesurun's Philoktetes is in Yale Theatre mag, now called Theatre, volume 25 no 2.

Fiona

↑ Index

711. Ira Lightman
Re: spell check and ethics check
Sun 23 Feb 1997

I really appreciated Fiona Templeton's posting, especially being able to put irony quotation marks in a dramatic/performance presentation, yet does (as Fiona suggests) this rescue a text's harsh remark?
The idea of being a rebel, a freedom warrior, against political correctness, sometimes is not against pc but sharing power.

Then again, un-pc remarks made by individuals in private can sometimes be a release from the hard work of diplomacy/public behaviour, by those who are very committed to anti-racism etc, who have practical effect (e.g. on lobbying for funds and conditions) outside language.

One of the roles of writing has always been to place language kept private so as to bring it "out in the open": the literature of anti-repression. But also one of the roles of writing has always been to place private language and private experience in a way that readers identify with; as they share the placing of it as private, keeping it non-public, in the interests of good public life.

Ira Lightman

↑ Index

712. Ira Lightman

Irony, drama, sanity, prophecy, LangPo

Sun 23 Feb 1997

I'd also like to add a thought to Fiona Templeton's thread.

I was reading Steve Benson in Language Alive, and Fiona's post helps me to think through some responses I had. Steve Benson seems very much concerned with decency, warmth between people, intimacy, difficult emotions that a relationship, or a social discourse can't easily take. This later work, to me, kept jumping back from itself, ironising itself, in a way I find less powerful than the early material, like the Blue Book book; as if to offer passion but to remain calm and beautiful and funny, in this later work.

And that makes me think of the different uses of one kind of political theatricality: camp. One feature of camp, for me, is that it touches lightly on issues for obvious necessary change, and then refuses to debate them ("I've heard that objection about a thousand times, yawn".) The refusal of that kind reminds me of some "it's non-referential" comeback lines to obviously political Language Writing, and LangWriting has the feeling, to me, of gay camp (not least in early Steve Benson); many of its writers had political conviction, civil rights convictions especially, before writing; they don't discover the convictions, they camp them.

But, what happens to new convictions that have evolved in communities based on and still practicising the old convictions; what happens to those feeling the new convictions who have no community? What happens to child abuse campaigners who are ironised (eg "don't take it so far, oh come on") by Carol Tavris, writer of very powerful books of seventies' feminism? What happens to those who have latterday visions, for whom God moving in mysterious ways compromises their commitment to a (necessarily) programmatic civil rights politics?

If one believes in repressed memories of child abuse, or visions, (I do both), or heresies to one's group's or friends' (or audience of them's) positions, can these come through? Or can they be blocked from coming through in speech/art as speech/performance, by "ironic" tone switching? Can some camp rely on too rigid a pre-established schematic of repression and anti-repression? Though I don't underplay the good role of solid, if reactionary, first-wave progressives - he closed, ironico-sweetly, but not therefore falsely....

Ira Lightman

↑ Index

713. amato
the chronicle/evil poets/louisville etc...
Sun 23 Feb 1997

---

just back from louisville, having gone there and back with my wife kass fleisher, who gave a reading at one of the "creative" panels... so some bookkeeping:

e: according to the chronicle, that dobyns threw a glass of scotch in a grad. students' face at a party and called her a "stalinist bitch" is uncontested, both by dobyns and other witnesses... aside from which, it appears that dobyns' "drinking problem" is also uncontested... there is no doubt in my mind that the accusations against the program are accurate, in terms of sexual harrassment, even misogyny... no surprise here, kass has been hearing these rumors since 1986... i have to say---the question of the status of "talent" in academic creative writing circles, and of corresponding pedagogies, remains largely unexamined... unfortunately, the shitstorm that has followed in the wake of this appears to have confused sexual harassment, which has undoubtedly taken place, with (for example) "vulgarity" (nonfiction writer mary karr has been accused of same)... the article does not do a good job of airing out the issues, either...

an aside here: seems to me that a poet, of some acclaim (whatever one thinks of his writing), acting out his perhaps idiosyncratic impulses thusly, is hardly an idiosyncratic matter... as suggested by the "red collective" who signed that item forwarded to the list... at the same time, sexual harassment and the use of vulgar language do not necessarily have anything to do with each other... w/o wishing to sound nostalgic, these are indeed troubled times for academe... and i would argue that this thread has a real and active bearing, at least insofar as academe is concerned, on the dorn/neruda/evil poets/spellcheck thread... and i have greatly enjoyed the exchange twixt mark weiss and kent johnson, albeit i'm feeling bad right now b/c i think aldon nielsen's take on dorn has been misconstrued...

maria: alan golding did a swell job of delivering your paper... the discussion afterward was provocative, but i had to duck out to hear (none other than) tobias woolf read, who in fact i now see is completely embroiled in the syracuse university creative writing program controversy!... talk about synchronicity... anyway, maria, i'm sorry i missed you (AGAIN)... against yunte huang, i guess i would have to say that there is, and was, a valid question raised about the gender-specific attendance at this panel... no one raised a question about race as such but this would be valid too, esp. in a panel in which two papers are engaging the popular-poetic around, among other things, issues of ethnicity... geezus yknow i hate to have to count, but what the hell... of the roughly 25 people in attendance, by my count, only 4 were women, and only 1 person of color, if you would like to construct yourself in this way... the woman was simply asking, why is this?---why did this topic draw primarily white males into attendance?...

anyway, i would like here to publicly thank alan golding for his hospitality throughout (kass and i left before his house party)... alan is a sweetie, and it was great talking with mark scroggins, christopher beach, michael boughn and others who had the generosity to put up with my occasionally relentless mouthiness... i wish we could all meet f2f more often... esp. in shirtsleeve weather!...

i would like to offer but one observation re the conference in general: having attended keynotes as well as assorted 'critical' and 'creative' panels, i was struck by the relative lack of crossover in the audiences (excepting the keynotes)... that is, the creative panels, whatever one thinks of such writing, were not particularly well-attended by the critical writers with whom i'm familiar, and the critical panels, whatever one thinks of such writing, were not particularly well-attended by the creative writers i know... of course this is just an impression, as one cannot be in two places at the same time... but if my sense of things is correct, there continues to be a divide around this issue (even an architectural one, given that creative and critical presentations were in separate buildings)...

anyway, greetings to all...

best,

joe

↑ Index

714. Ron Silliman
Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

"i still wouldn't punch dorn in the mouth, mostly cuz i haven't been trained to do it properly"

It's the nose that's his weak spot. Tho I don't approve of poking 67 year old men in the nose either.

When I was in Boulder at Naropa a few years back, folks there said that Dorn never let himself set foot on the Naropa campus anymore. I thought at the time (as I do now) that that must feel like a horrible kind of exile.

I think it's a mistake to focus this discussion on Dorn, though. Jack Spicer made anti-semitic statements, for example. Clark's homophobia, sick as it seems, is ultimately an extension of the same social ensemble that allowed Eli Siegel ("Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana") to go around "curing" homosexuals or that enabled (forced?) Robert Penn Warren to drop Duncan's work from his magazine when RD came out of the closet in print elsewhere. Considering how much Tom Clark did, positively, to broaden the audience of the New York School, it seems bizarre that this other side should finally win out.

One thing that does ring out, though, in the instance of both Clark and Spicer at the least, is that sense they have of themselves as (more or less literally) monstrous. It's what draws Clark to both Celine and Olson (it's the only thing about Olson he seems at all sympathetic toward).

I suppose it's an improvement of sorts if this sort of pathology becomes knotted right in such self-identified monstrosity, although as events in the former Yugoslavia have shown, there's plenty of the old banal genocidal potential still around for everyone.

I'd love to hear from Kevin (or anyone else, for that matter), what the function of anti-Semitism is in Spicer's work/psyche.

Ron Silliman
head totally fogged in a bad cold

↑ Index

715. Gwyn McVay
Re: spell check and ethics check
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Come Around Me

If he come around me / I'd like to bow deeply to Anselm Hollo. Have coffee with Anne Waldman / if she come around me. If Maya Angelou come around me / I'll smile and say nothing. Should the late / Frank O'Hara come around me / I'd buy him a stiff drink. Ron Silliman already / come up in my face / and so I sat on the floor. How soon do you need this whole list? / I got other homework. Besides I / gotta spend time / doing mantras of energy / for Nobody Punch Anybody in the Mouth.

Gwyn

↑ Index

716. Maria Damon

Re: Louisville Report

Sun 23 Feb 1997

---

thanks for the report yunte huang and others. wish i coulda been there. i'm scared about the local fallout/backlash i might get from my paper, which is forthcoming in nowak' corsscultural poetix ragmag. it's still a rough paper but i was under a deadline that mark was very generous about but i still couldn't make it an elegrant and generous piece of writing, nor a sharply analytic one. oh well, you heard the disclaimer here first. and btw, alan golding, thanks a lot for reading the piece!

At 1:55 AM -0500 2/23/97, Yunte Huang wrote:
>As one of the many presenters on the Lou. Conf., my trip to Lou., I shall >say, is a hell lot of driving, two nine-hour long and lone drive within >two days. So I missed Thursday's and Saturday's show, but I can report on >a few panels I wnet to on Friday.
>
>Panel C4: Strategizing American Poetics after Williams
> Thomas Orange, "Imagism and Objectivism, and the Making of W.C.
>Williams"
> David Chirot, "Williams, Kerouac, Grenier: Visual Words, Soundful >Visions"
>
>Good attendance, nice slide shows. For myself, having seen Grenier's pages >(with those impressive two fingers) many times and having heard him talked >(or not talked) about those photos, it still felt fresh when somebody else >talked about them. Orange raised an interesting but arguable point about >Pound's inability to understand early Williams' poetry.
>
>Panel D6: Readings in Anglo-American Modernist Poetics
>

> Yunte Huang, "Ezra Pound and the Chinese and Jewish Traditions of >Textual Practice" > Jason Fichtel, "Go Down, Melanctha: African American Spirituals and >Musicality in Gertrude Stein's Melanctha"
> Benjamin Lockerd, "The Age of Eliot: Th Age of Einstein" > Michael Campbell, "Comedy Both Human and Inhuman: Stevens' Poetry and >Bergson's Social Corrective Theory of Laughter"
>
>I have to say, in terms of attendance and response, the panel went very >well. My paper was to relate Pound's hatred in unstable Jewish textuality >to some of the moves he made when he translated (the translation) from the >Chinese. Fichtel's analysis of those names in Melanctha (like Jef-fe-rey, >Me-lanc-tha) in relation to African Spiritual rhythems, which I don't know >much about, was interesting. Lockerd's paper is about Eliot's engagement >with the new development in physics (Einstein's theory), and one person in >the audience turned out to be a former student of Einstein. Campbell read >Stevens as a comedian, which I found to be more interesting than reading >Stevens' metaphysics. Before the panel, I barely knew a soul among the >five-hundred strong mass (except Alan G.) and could recognize a few names >and faces, but after the panel I had some nice chats with people who came >to me.
>
>Panel F5: US Poetry and/as Popular Culture
>
>Maria Damon, "When the NuYorican Came to Town: A Study of Poetic >Exchanges" >Christopher Beach, "Poetry on Television?: Bob Holman's 'A United States >of Poetry' as Video-Poetry Revolution" >Joseph Harrington, "America's Richest Poet, or The Meaning of Walt Mason"
>
>When I walked into the room, a woman was smiling at me, and I thought that >was Maria Damon. But it turned out she was doing an "affirmative action" >count in the room, the result of which she would use to make a point in >discussion. And of course, Maria D. wasn't there, she remote-controlled >Alan Golding to read her kick-'em-in-the-ass paper about the social >exchanges among different poetry communities in Twin City. Harrington and >Beach used Mason and Holman respectively to argue for a popular function >of poetry. It was a lively panel, provoking various response. Alan, now >disconnected from the home-office in Twin City, made three comments, one >of which being whether some video poetry is actually using the mode of >production of the object of its critique (a structural-Marxist point). And >the woman who was counting "heads" earlier on (the reason she was smiling >at me, by the way, I guess, was that I was an Asian male) asked about eh >gender issue involved.

>
>All and all, it was fun. Sorry didn't make it to more of the sessions, and >to Alan's party on Saturday night, but "we" are still during the six-day >memorial period for Deng's death, so no partying for me.
>
>Yunte Huang

↑ Index

717. Maria Damon
Re: spell check and ethics check
Sun 23 Feb 1997

---

fiona quotes others:
>Hard to make any judgement stick when a tonal change is enough to put a >safe distance between us and our statements, never mind appeals to >indeterminism, group myopia or even (gasp) growth. All the same, though >we might have broken dogmatism up for parts, the appetite for a stonefest >is as insatiable as ever. Which was perhaps why political correctness was >invented. The appearance of humanism yet all the fun of the chase.
>Unfortunately, not all baddies are so obliging as to declare themselves in >their utterances.
>
just read a very good ms that talked about protests against an african art exhibit in toronto(?), to which the curators responded, but those racist images are meant ironically, to which the protesters responded, yes, we know, and the general public knows also that it's ironic, but the irony simply isn't enough to offset the overpowering images which resonate so thoroughly with their NON-ironic racist counterparts...
i found that very interesting and worth further investigation as a line of argument.

↑ Index

718. Maria Damon
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

I'd love to hear from Kevin (or anyone else, for that matter), what the >function of anti-Semitism is in Spicer's work/psyche.
>

>Ron Silliman
>head totally fogged in a bad cold

i think the function of spicer's antisemitism is 1) part oif a general east-coast phobia (part of what he complained of abt nyc wa the "jewfaced children") 2)a sense that judaism was homophobic (cf the story of lot in sodom), and that jews had a more public claim to oppression than gay people, which he resented.

↑ Index

719. Rachel Loden
Re: poets and their repugnant whatevers
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Tom Mandel wrote (in part):

> 2. Bob Perelman suggests my offer to bash Dorn is close to a male poet's need to "take it to the street," and how wrong can he be actually. I chose the words "punch in the mouth" after all. At the same time, I did (twice) say "if he comes around me" which should be easy to interpret. I'm suggesting that the aggression is located in the objectionable opinion. And expressing my annoyance at the fuzzy non-thinking I found on this subject here in the list -- as if evil required interpretation to be understood (no, only to be explained away). My technique was what Brecht called "plumpe Denken" -- gross or vulgar formulation of a thought, a kind of rhetoric yes.

My inner turntable keeps queueing up lovely snatches of (Berrigan's) _Sonnets_ in this connection, particularly "A few rape men or kill coons so I bat them!" from "Mess Occupations," or this variation on a theme:

Orange cavities of dreams stir inside "The Poems"
Whatever is going to happen is already happening
Some people prefer "the interior monologue"
I like to beat people up

Rachel L.

↑ Index

720. Jerry Rothenberg
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Just for the record, the incident around rejection of Robert Duncan's previously accepted work (following his published article revealing his homosexuality) involved John Crowe Ransom rather than Robert Penn Warren. This is an unfortunate slip-up but a reminder of how fast gossip and rumor can spread via this medium, i.e. that whatever Ed Dorn (as a pertinent case in point) may or may not have said on some occasion that still hasn't been clarified or pinned down, the poetics rumor mill has now put him (& whoever else) into a racist league (etc.) that probably has little to do with him. In other words, this is a public & not a private medium, a form of broad casting that can rapidly disseminate mis-information in a way that can quickly and actually do harm to people. Nor would it surprise me if some of the dumping on Dorn in particular had some subtext -- of other resentments -- that isn't being stated. What did the man possibly say that puts him in a league (the way some of the correspondence sounds) with Pound's anti-semtism or fascism? What if anything? And if a triviality or not, how will he now get out from under it?

Some thoughts, anyway, on a sunny a.m. in San Diego.

Jerome Rothenberg
[redacted]

↑ Index

721. dbkk
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

At 12:50 PM -0600 2/23/97, Maria Damon wrote:
>I'd love to hear from Kevin (or anyone else, for that matter), what the >>function of anti-Semitism is in Spicer's work/psyche.
>>
>>Ron Silliman
>>head totally fogged in a bad cold
>
>i think the function of spicer's antisemitism is >1) part oif a general east-coast phobia (part of what he complained of abt
>nyc wa the "jewfaced children")
>2)a sense that judaism was homophobic (cf the story of lot in sodom), and >that jews had a more public claim to oppression than gay people, which he >resented.

It's Kevin Killian here. Maria, you have hit the nail on the head as far I know; I'd like to add a couple of other points too . .. 3)a pathological rebellion against various strains of Spicer's family myth; the hideous things Spicer wrote came directly after the death of his father 4) a psycho-dynamic between JS and Robert Duncan, in which Duncan was the "good" man and Spicer was cast as the wild fauve; and in general a poetic climate in which savage, problematized irony was valued, the thicker the better

I guess I should share my dilemma with you all, what would you have done? (I've been writing, with Lew Ellingham, a biography of Jack Spicer for many years, and some of you know this story already.) A few years ago I was lucky enough to get to examine the papers, which are in private hands, of the poet Stephen Jonas; and imagine my delight when I found among them an "un-known" poem by Spicer. Then imagine my anguish when I read it and saw it was by far the most anti-Semitic of all his writings. A lot of you on this list are scholars, what would you have done? I had actually the option, I suppose, of destroying this poem; for what good would it do to show it to the world? I felt like a character in a Henry James novel--no, in an Irving Wallace novel! I tabled a number of Spicer experts, one of whom advised me gravely to "get rid of it. Spicer's reputation is bad enough already. Besides, does 'the world' need yet another piece of anti-Semitic propaganda?"

What would you have done? I had the piece of paper right in my hand, and no one would ever have known.

Except I probably would have told someone, I just can't keep myself to myself.

Please give me your opinions on this. Thanks, Kevin K.

↑ Index

722. robert drake
Wm's quote: "machine made of words..."?
Sun 23 Feb 1997

---

can anyone tell me where WC Williams defines poetry as
"a machine made of words"? randall jarrell quotes it in the 1949 intro to "selected poems", but w/out naming th source... much appreciated

luigi

↑ Index

723. dbkk
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

At 11:24 AM -0800 2/23/97, Jerry Rothenberg wrote:
>Nor would it surprise me if some of the dumping on >Dorn in particular had some subtext -- of other resentments -- that isn't >being stated. What did the man possibly say that puts him in a league >(the way some of the correspondence sounds) with Pound's anti-semtism or >fascism? What if anything?

Dear Jerry, and others, whatever, it's Kevin Killian here, and I have tried to stay out of the Dorn debate as long as possible, but I just can't keep myself to myself. A few years ago I wrote a letter to the editors of the Buffalo magazine "Apex of the M," prompted by an issue of the magazine which contextualized Dorn as a great human being and poet and thinker. My letter was pretty mean I suppose; the editors decided not to publish it because, they said, they don't publish "letters to the editors." This was a policy decision on their part, okay. Kevin Magee and Myung Mi Kim then printed my "Open Letter" in their poetry newsletter, whereupon it became part of the public record. If you would like me to send you a copy just let me know. (If anyone on this list or elsewhere would like a copy, send me your address.) After you read it, Jerry, you will have in fact the answers to some of the questions you pose above. Love, Kevin

↑ Index

724. Mark Weiss
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

When did Spicer's father die? How did the family myth occasion "New York jew salesman of amethyst pyjamas?" Please elucidate; for the uninitiated this is all in cypher.

I would have included the poem in the Spicer biography, and probably in an appendix to the poems. But I would have made it clear that Spicer didn't publish it. Often professional responsibility outways private feelings. I doubt, at any rate, that Spicer's poems are likely to reinforce anybody's antisemitism. He's not exactly a household name, and access to his work usually involves a fairly sophisticated education (formal or informal) that would likely make one a poor candidate for the skinheads.

To have destroyed the poem would have been barbaric, to have suppressed it dishonest and in any case counter to the biographer's task.

Even though I hate Spicer's antisemitism, and take it personally, his poetry is very important to me. He's dead, so I can't talk to him about it. But anything that aids my understanding of his work is useful.

At 11:42 AM 2/23/97 -0800, you wrote:
>At 12:50 PM -0600 2/23/97, Maria Damon wrote:
>>I'd love to hear from Kevin (or anyone else, for that matter), what the >>>function of anti-Semitism is in Spicer's work/psyche.
>>>
>>>Ron Silliman
>>>head totally fogged in a bad cold
>>
>>i think the function of spicer's antisemitism is >>1) part oif a general east-coast phobia (part of what he complained of abt

>>nyc wa the "jewfaced children")
>>2)a sense that judaism was homophobic (cf the story of lot in sodom), and >>that jews had a more public claim to oppression than gay people, which he >>resented.
>
>It's Kevin Killian here. Maria, you have hit the nail on the head as far I >know; I'd like to add a couple of other points too . ..
>3)a pathological rebellion against various strains of Spicer's family myth;
>the hideous things Spicer wrote came directly after the death of his father >4) a psycho-dynamic between JS and Robert Duncan, in which Duncan was the >"good" man and Spicer was cast as the wild fauve; and in general a poetic >climate in which savage, problematized irony was valued, the thicker the >better
>
>I guess I should share my dilemma with you all, what would you have done?
>(I've been writing, with Lew Ellingham, a biography of Jack Spicer for many >years, and some of you know this story already.) A few years ago I was >lucky enough to get to examine the papers, which are in private hands, of >the poet Stephen Jonas; and imagine my delight when I found among them an >"unknown" poem by Spicer. Then imagine my anguish when I read it and saw >it was by far the most anti-Semitic of all his writings. A lot of you on >this list are scholars, what would you have done? I had actually the >option, I suppose, of destroying this poem; for what good would it do to >show it to the world? I felt like a character in a Henry James novel--no, >in an Irving Wallace novel! I tabled a number of Spicer experts, one of >whom advised me gravely to "get rid of it. Spicer's reputation is bad >enough already. Besides, does 'the world' need yet another piece of >anti-Semitic propaganda?"
>
>What would you have done? I had the piece of paper right in my hand, and >no one would ever have known.
>
>Except I probably would have told someone, I just can't keep myself to myself.
>
>Please give me your opinions on this. Thanks, Kevin K.
>
>

↑ Index

725. aerialedge
2 readings
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Wed. Feb 26th 8PM

Nancy Dunlop
Rod Smith

@ Juliana Spahr's abode, 182 Elm St, upper, Albany

Thurs. Feb 27th 7:30 PM

Louis Cabri
Heather Fuller
Rod Smith

@ Segue, 303 East 8th (Between B & C), NYC

↑ Index

726. Sylvester Pollet
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

In reply to Kevin's question What to do (or have done, now), I second Mark Weiss's post--preserve it, deal with it. Of course. But there's always one other option--put the poem back in its folder and walk away from the whole project.

↑ Index

727. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Re: Wm's quote: "machine made of words..."?
Sun 23 Feb 1997

You're looking for "Author's Introduction to The Wedge"--which may be found in WCW's Selected Essays--in edition at hand--the exact phrase in on p. 256--

Thanks to David Israel for RUMI-- some lines of which brought to mind final chapter of Mohammed Choukri's For Bread Alone--when the 20 year old hustler Choukri decides to learn to read & write--(the book is written in classical Arabic; translation was made from a--as i recall--Moghrebi version--) Choukri also did fine book Jean Genet in Tangiers--

"The dog barks--the caravan passes"

On Sun, 23 Feb 1997, robert drake wrote:

> can anyone tell me where WC Williams defines poetry as "a machine made of words"? randall jarrell quotes it in the 1949 intro to "selected poems", but w/out naming th source... much appreciated
>
> luigi

↑ Index

728. Field of Roses
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

> I guess I should share my dilemma with you all, what would you have done? (I've been writing, with Lew Ellingham, a biography of Jack Spicer for many years, and some of you know this story already.) A few years ago I was lucky enough to get to examine the papers, which are in private hands, of the poet Stephen Jonas; and imagine my delight when I found among them an "unknown" poem by Spicer. Then imagine my anguish when I read it and saw it was by far the most anti-Semitic of all his writings. A lot of you on this list are scholars, what would you have done? I had actually the option, I suppose, of destroying this poem; for what good would it do to show it to the world? I felt like a character in a Henry James novel--no, in an Irving Wallace novel! I tabled a number of Spicer experts, one of whom advised me gravely to "get rid of it. Spicer's reputation is bad enough already. Besides, does 'the world' need yet another piece of anti-Semitic propaganda?"
>
> What would you have done? I had the piece of paper right in my hand, and no one would ever have known.

"Does 'the world' need yet another piece of anti-Semitic propaganda?"

Of course not. But it's good to know who the enemy is. Let it stand.

Linda Charyk Rosenfeld

↑ Index

729. amato
Re: Wm's quote: "machine made of words..."?
Sun 23 Feb 1997

---

luigi, williams's _the wedge_ (1944)... see also cecelia tichi's chapter "machines made of words" in _shifting gears: technology, literature, culture in modernist america_ (u of north carolina p, 1987)...

best,

joe

↑ Index

730. Mark Roberts

AWOL: _Antithesis_ seeking poetry (forwarded)

Sun 23 Feb 1997

>Date: Sun, 23 Feb 1997 08:25:10 +1000
>To: [redacted]
>From: [redacted] (AWOL)
>Subject: AWOL: _Antithesis_ seeking poetry
>
>AWOL posting.
>
>_____
>
>
>
>_Antithesis_ is an interdisciplinary journal published by postgraduate >students of the University of Melbourne's English and Cultural Studies >Department. Distributed nationally by Australian Writing On Line, it >provides a forum for theoretical/literary/cultural debate and also >publishes short fiction, poetry and graphics.
>
>_Antithesis_ is curently seeking innovative but technically accomplished >poetry on the theme of Time and Memory. Please send submissions, with an >SSAE, to: The Poetry Editor, _Antithesis_, c/- the English and Cultural >Studies Department, University of Melbourne, Grattan St, Parkville, 3052, >or, if you're running late, to [redacted]. Submissions >are due by Friday, 7th March.
>
>_Antithesis_ is available through the AWOL Virtual Bookshop. To order >simply print this form and mail it (along with Aust$10 plus $3.50 postage and >handling) to AWOL: PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 (overseas orders please >contact us first). Be sure to include a mailing address.
>
>
>
>
>AWOL
>Australian Writing On Line
>[redacted]

>http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
>PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
>Phone 61 2 7475667, Mobile 015063970
>Fax 61 2 7472802
>
>
>
>
Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
& User Representative SIS Team.
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
Phone 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax (02) 9351 7711

↑ Index

731. Maria Damon
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

At 12:07 PM -0800 2/23/97, Mark Weiss wrote:
>When did Spicer's father die? How did the family myth occasion "New York jew >salesman of amethyst pyjamas?" Please elucidate; for the uninitiated this is >all in cypher.
>
>I would have included the poem in the Spicer biography, and probably in an >appendix to the poems. But I would have made it clear that Spicer didn't >publish it. Often professional responsibility outways private feelings. I >doubt, at any rate, that Spicer's poems are likely to reinforce anybody's >antisemitism. He's not exactly a household name, and access to his work >usually involves a fairly sophisticated education (formal or informal) that >would likely make one a poor candidate for the skinheads.
>
>To have destroyed the poem would have been barbaric, to have suppressed it >dishonest and in any case counter to the biographer's task.
>
>Even though I hate Spicer's antisemitism, and take it personally, his poetry >is very important to me. He's dead, so I can't talk to him about it. But >anything that aids my understanding of his work is useful.

>

this sounds sensible to me. actually, i don't know why, but i don't take spicer's or baraka's (former) antisemitism personally, as i do pound's. something to think about there for me. md

↑ Index

732. Maria Damon
fwded query
Sun 23 Feb 1997

---

hey folks, here's a query i'm forwarding, cuz i want to know all of yr answers; good subject, huhn.

hi maria - am writing chapter now on heterosexism of blake studies and am interested in contemp queer poets interested in blake - i know about ginsberg spicer merrill duncan and your stuff about angels/ghosts/fairies in your book - which is all wonderful - was wondering if you knew of any other relevant names (any women?) - thanks - andy

↑ Index

733. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

For me there are antisemitisims and antisemitisms. Pound acted on his; I read his radio speechs in which he among other things (if I remember correctly) calls for the elimination of Jews. They're vile and hateful.

Antisemitism "otherwise" - say in 19th or early 20th century Britain was such, that as a friend put it, if we didn't read the work of British anti-semites, we would hardly have any English literature to consider. It was convention, conventional. It was not yet an era when such hatreds were reificed, debated, etc, (maybe Dreyfuss opened the way).

For me, likewise, Baraka, who has reconsidered, and always considers, it is different; I too read him.

What I'm saying is just as there are _feminisms,_ so there are _hatreds,_ not all equivalent, functioning within different discursive formations, different institutionalizations, and it's a mistake to consider all of them equivalent.

Alan

http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/
Tel. [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149

↑ Index

734. Alan Jen Sondheim
Red Mercury, How it Works
Sun 23 Feb 1997

--

Red Mercury

To have mix't plutonium well within the sphere
That draws the thing towards its conclusion, near Mercury, Red Mercury, dissolved, amalgamated Between the doubled spheres, coagulated
As source of particles, reaction, raw reaction
That lends performance to another action's action:
Detonation blurs the bomb; the sun is churned
Within, while buildings, carbon, oxygen are burned
Fierce among the doubled pounds of nitro gained Heat, more particles, cheap nuclear's attained.
Don't run, hide _the thing_ within your fist;
Nothing is left, and nothing's hardly missed.

↑ Index

735. George Bowering
Re: Vancouver report
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Rae Armantrout here to give her first Vancouver readings, Thursday and Saturday. Damn, I am living a life that is not easy these days, and I missed her Saturday night reading at the famous Kootenay School of Writing, had to help elsewhere, but made it out to UBC for the 5 pm Thursday reading, lotta excited young people there who have been turned on to Rae's poetry for a few years, and we were all so glad that she read from two books and then all of her new manuscript, no corny talk in between, just that really American woman's voice reading those clear lines, and everyone ate it up, and of course young Peter Carlos Peters was in 8th heaven all thru.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

736. DS
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

> Antisemitism "otherwise" - say in 19th or early 20th century Britain was such, that as a friend put it, if we didn't read the work of British anti-semites, we would hardly have any English literature to consider.

Daniel Deronda offers much food for thought here.

↑ Index

737. George Bowering
bromige
Sun 23 Feb 1997

> Date: Thu, 20 Feb 97 19:54:24 -0800
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: bromige
> From: [redacted] (Lounge)
>
> Hello George
>
> It's Deanna Ferguson calling. Would you relay this note to David B. Much appreciated. Wonderful reading this afternoon, eh?
>
> David--
> I'm back on e-mail at the above address. Hope you will post me a note.
>
> Good bye David.
>
> Good bye George.
>
> Deanna

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,

Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

738. Mark Weiss
Re: Repugnant selves
Sun 23 Feb 1997

Bravo. Why argue with the dead? the artifact in a different context is a different artifact (paraphrase of Victor Turner's entire corpus). Context is everything.

At 08:04 PM 2/23/97 -0500, you wrote:
>For me there are antisemitisims and antisemitisms. Pound acted on his; I >read his radio speechs in which he among other things (if I remember >correctly) calls for the elimination of Jews. They're vile and hateful.
>
>Antisemitism "otherwise" - say in 19th or early 20th century Britain was >such, that as a friend put it, if we didn't read the work of British >anti-semites, we would hardly have any English literature to consider. It >was convention, conventional. It was not yet an era when such hatreds were >reificed, debated, etc, (maybe Dreyfuss opened the way).
>
>For me, likewise, Baraka, who has reconsidered, and always considers, it >is different; I too read him.
>
>What I'm saying is just as there are _feminisms,_ so there are _hatreds,_ >not all equivalent, functioning within different discursive formations, >different institutionalizations, and it's a mistake to consider all of >them equivalent.
>
>Alan
>
>http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
>images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/
>Tel. [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149
>
>

↑ Index

739. David R. Israel
Re: playwrights / Vawter
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Fiona Templeton, discussing work of John Jesurun, writes --

> and b) check out his Philoktetes, in Yale Theatre mag a couple of years ago, for some of the best American language onstage ever, in a work of dizzying savagery. It was written for Ron Vawter before he died.

What a strong actor Vawter was. Might be I only caught him once, in The Temptation of St. Anthony (The Wooster Group), late '80s. (One hopes some of those remarkable events are well documented on video.)

btw, Fiona, care to share what you're up to, back in the UK these days?

regards, d.i.

↑ Index

740. David R. Israel
Re: spell check and ethics check
Mon 24 Feb 1997

This is to toss in a cinema ref., by way of cross-pollination.

Fiona writes --

> The problem is, that tonal change doesn't carry as far as we might like to think. Try travelling. Even out of the "aesthetic sphere",or out of where it's ok to insult your friends . . .

and she raises questions, with various instances, abt. some of our assumptions as to the validity & scope & (even) nature of irony. Very tricky stuff, this.

While not quite on so rarefied a plane, perhaps, this discussion happens to bring to mind a recent, under-rated "mainstream / independent" (think it could be called?) film -- Mother Night (w/ Nick Nolte, based on Kurt Vonegut's eponymous novel).

There, some real basic-level problems with "not meaning what you say" find much scope for harsh reflection. I'm not saying that the film's stark situation is akin (or even directly relevant) to the very different, & much more complex species of not-meaning what's-said found in (e.g.) poetics practice. Rather, the Vonegut tale sets out, in a (so to say) clean, literalist manner, some (at least) simpler aspects of this really large & multiform issue & subject matter.

best,
d.i.

↑ Index

741. George Bowering
Re: Neruda and Stalinism
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Mark Weiss's long message on Neruda and Stalinism in the USA was really interesting. Thanks for that.

I am wondering, though: did USAmericans really believe that the overthrow of the government in Guatemala was somehow not done by the USA? I have never heard of anyone outside the USA that did not know that from the start.

Oh, and if I remember rightly, Neruda helped the killers of Trotsky get out of Mexico, didnt he? Or am I mixing up a couple of things?

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

742. George Bowering
Re: people-not-here-talk -Reply
Mon 24 Feb 1997

> On Fri, 21 Feb 1997, George Bowering wrote:
>
> I was wondering why the anti-Dorn animus, too; only people I can remember his dissing are rednecks.
>
> Some of my best friends are rednecks . . .
>
> Cheers,
> David

---hey, my mother's folks came from the Ozarks. They were part of the sort-of honky railroad, running for freedom to Canada.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

743. jdhollo
killian / pug selves
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Kevin Killian's ("public") response to Jerome Rothenberg's clearheaded comments on the potential for malicious and/or ill-informed e-mail gossip--strikes me as rather odd:

1) KK informs us all that his letter to the Apex editors was/is "mean;"

2) he tells us the A editors refused to print it, but that it was then printed in a no doubt fugitive poetry newsletter;

3) he offers to send copy of the letter to anyone of us who wants to see it.

Is 1) some sort of preemptive self-criticism? If the author of a piece of writing characterizes it as "mean" even before anyone has set eyes on it, how can it be taken (seriously, as they say) as a 'definitive' answer to factual questions such as those asked by JR?

And 3): Why, if it is indeed "the answer," does KK not simply post it on this listserv? Allow me to, hereby, formally challenge him to do so.

(PS: Gwyn McVay--I bow deeply to your sweet wit.)

Anselm Hollo

↑ Index

744. dbkk
Re: killian / pug selves
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Dear Anselm,

Hi! It's Kevin Killian. Yes, 1) was a form of preemptive self-criticism. I don't expect you to take me "seriously." I felt drawn in to the ongoing discussion about Ed Dorn based on personal feelings, not definitive ones. I wrote my "open letter" as a friend and the literary executor of the poet Steve Abbott, who died of AIDS a few years after being awarded the "AIDS Award for Poetic Idiocy," in the pages of Ed Dorn's magazine "Rolling Stock." I write on behalf of one on whom a beaker of poisoned blood was poured by the talented staff artists on "Rolling Stock," one who on his deathbed still strove to understand the motives behind this attack, one who tried to forgive, one who tried so hard to forgive it broke my heart. He is no longer alive, but I am, and why shouldn't I say exactly what I feel?

I decline your challenge to post my open letter on the poetics list. I have already offered to send it through the regular mail to anyone interested. However why should I waste the bandwidth of so many who have no interest in the subject? It's quite long and involved and also uses a lot of italics, Anselm.

It was published in a "fugitive" poetry publication, true, but don't hold that against it. (You might say "Rolling Stock" was a fugitive publication: that doesn't mean people don't read it, people don't take it to heart, and people don't cry after reading it.) What's "fugitive" and what's not? I forget what happens in the pages of the New York Times Book Review a minute after I read it, but I have not forgotten many of your poems, for example, years after I spotted them in various "fugitive" publications over the years.

Yours,

Kevin K.

↑ Index

745. Tosh
Re: killian / pug selves
Mon 24 Feb 1997

This Ed Dorn thing is so weird. Especially reading it on the list. Slowly but surely, i am getting a story about his supposed racism, and so forth. But it took like how many letters to this list to get this story out?

This is all very interesting, but I can't make a judgement on someone in this fashion. And I am not criticizing anyone on this list - this is for sure hitting a raw nerve (and perhaps rightfully so), but I don't feel comfortable talking about someone behind his back in such matter - meaning Dorn.

Perhaps it is best that this subject matter is transmitted by backchannel to interested parties. The issue should be talked about,and it is a good subject to bring up..but again, I am not comfortable with all this. Maybe he has changed and regrets his actions, or perhaps he is a creep galore. Again, I think it is best to focus on the writing and deal with racism within the work,and not talk about someone's private life and their demons - unless of course it is part of their creative work.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

746. Miekal And
Re: Berrigan likes to beat people up
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Rachel Loden wrote:

> to turn the > discussion on its ear.

Yes, lets.

miekal

--
@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

747. nico vassilakis
lurkville
Mon 24 Feb 1997

fuck these pompiss sic!
REJOINDERS

short n sloppy

↑ Index

748. Mark Weiss
Re: lurkville
Mon 24 Feb 1997

There's nothing wrong with being short. Stand tall.

At 12:30 AM 2/24/97 -0800, you wrote:
> fuck these
> pompiss sic!
> REJOINDERS
>
>
>
> short n sloppy

>
>

↑ Index

749. Schuchat Simon
Re: poets and their repugnant whatevers
Mon 24 Feb 1997

On Sun, 23 Feb 1997, Rachel Loden wrote:

> My inner turntable keeps queueing up lovely snatches of (Berrigan's)
> _Sonnets_ in this connection, particularly "A few rape men or kill coons
> so I bat them!" from "Mess Occupations," or this variation on a theme:
>
> > Orange cavities of dreams stir inside "The Poems"
> > Whatever is going to happen is already happening
> > Some people prefer "the interior monologue"
> > I like to beat people up
>
> Rachel L.

which Berrigan took in large part from Mes Occupations by Henri Michaux.

↑ Index

750. Christopher Alexander
Re: Wm's quote: "machine made of words..."?
Mon 24 Feb 1997

> can anyone tell me where WC Williams defines poetry as
> "a machine made of words"? randall jarrell quotes it in > the 1949 intro to "selected poems", but w/out naming th
> source... much appreciated
it seems you already have yr answer, but to broaden a bit you might look at Machine Art & other essays, a recent collect6ion of Pound stuff.

c.
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

751. Rachel Loden
Re: poets and their repugnant whatevers
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Schuchat Simon wrote:
>
> On Sun, 23 Feb 1997, Rachel Loden wrote:
>
> >
> > My inner turntable keeps queueing up lovely snatches of (Berrigan's)
> > _Sonnets_ in this connection, particularly "A few rape men or kill coons
> > so I bat them!" from "Mess Occupations," or this variation on a theme:
> >
> > Orange cavities of dreams stir inside "The Poems"
> > Whatever is going to happen is already happening
> > Some people prefer "the interior monologue"
> > I like to beat people up
> >
> >
> > Rachel L.
> >
>
> which Berrigan took in large part from Mes Occupations by Henri Michaux.

Yes--he credits Michaux ("after Michaux"), and I probably should have mentioned that.

Rachel

↑ Index

752. Mark Wallace
Berrigan likes to beat people up
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Rachel and others:

It's interesting to think about Berrigan's line "I like to beat people up," which has surely caused difficulty for many, in light of Ron Padgett's fascinating memoir of Berrigan, "Ted," which I've been reading in what few spare moments

I have these days. Berrigan's relation to conventionally "macho" behavior--itself a complex cultural/class phenomena--is equally complex. He seems to have admired some of the more rough and tumble male members of his own family, and in particular admired Padgett's own father, who really did, it seems, have an urge to beat people up. On the other hand, as much as Berrigan would "admire" such people, he spent his life staying as far away from them as possible, and Padgett reports that as far as he's aware of, Berrigan never did get into fights. If I'm reading Padgett right, that Berrigan was NOT a fighter was both a key to his difference from the men he grew up around, and a source of shame for him--he wanted out of that world but remained under the thumb of its definition of male behavior. I'm not going to go on a huge psychological trip here, but there are many indications that Berrigan internalized a violence he disliked but couldn't shake--is there an element of self-hate, self-mocking running throughout his work and his tendency to abuse his body? Can't say because I didn't know him, but it wouldn't surprise me.

Teaching at a community college in a small suburb, distant from Washington D.C., but which nonetheless has been reported in the local news as having "the largest amount of gang activity anywhere in Montgomery County," I'm used to dealing with students who have an obsessive relation to violence, even when they're on the run from it. More importantly, though, while I'm hardly in favor of "beating people up," it can be too easy to disassociate that kind of direct physical violence from the less apparent, but in some ways more successfully violent aspects of supposedly "safe" bourgeious society. My experience has been that some people from disadvantaged backgrounds are completely unprepard to deal with this kind of "indirect" violence--nobody punches you, but they deny you opportunities for reasons you never see coming. Indeed in some cases it might even be preferrable to have somebody violent standing in front of you--at least when the knockup punch comes, you have the opportunity to duck. The success of violence inside a disciplinary system is precisely that it no longer has to rely on beating you up directly--it has the incredible ability not only to bruise you permanently, but to leave you convinced that your only opponent was yourself.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

753. Maria Damon
Re: killian / pug selves
Mon 24 Feb 1997

bravo kevin. i have no wish to alienate so august a presence as anselm, but your initial post seemed clear enough to me. someone sez, what did dorn exactly do, you offer to clarify that matter, and your integrity gets impugned. as for the "fugitive publication" matter, perhaps i'm mistaken, but i thought one of the objects of this list, and certainly it is an object of my work, to bring the seriousness of such "fugitive" work to the fore and take it seriously. it does seem kind of weird when fugitivity is used to discredit an artifact here of all places.

At 10:57 PM -0800 2/23/97, [redacted] wrote:
>Dear Anselm,
>
>Hi! It's Kevin Killian. Yes, 1) was a form of preemptive self-criticism.
>I don't expect you to take me "seriously." I felt drawn in to the ongoing >discussion about Ed Dorn based on personal feelings, not definitive ones.
>I wrote my "open letter" as a friend and the literary executor of the poet
>Steve Abbott, who died of AIDS a few years after being awarded the "AIDS >Award for Poetic Idiocy," in the pages of Ed Dorn's magazine "Rolling >Stock." I write on behalf of one on whom a beaker of poisoned blood was >poured by the talented staff artists on "Rolling Stock," one who on his >deathbed still strove to understand the motives behind this attack, one who >tried to forgive, one who tried so hard to forgive it broke my heart. He >is no longer alive, but I am, and why shouldn't I say exactly what I feel?
>
>I decline your challenge to post my open letter on the poetics list. I >have already offered to send it through the regular mail to anyone >interested. However why should I waste the bandwidth of so many who have >no interest in the subject? It's quite long and involved and also uses a >lot of italics, Anselm.
>
>It was published in a "fugitive" poetry publication, true, but don't hold >that against it. (You might say "Rolling Stock" was a fugitive >publication: that doesn't mean people don't read it, people don't take it >to heart, and people don't cry after reading it.) What's "fugitive" and >what's not? I forget what happens in the pages of the New York Times Book >Review a minute after I read it, but I have not forgotten many of your >poems, for example, years after I spotted them in various "fugitive" >publications over the years.
>
>Yours,

>
>
>Kevin K.

↑ Index

754. Michael Magee
Berrigan, O'Hara, and machismo
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Mark Wallaces comment, "Berrigan's relation to conventionally "macho" behavior--itself a complex cultural/class phenomena--is equally complex," reminded me of O'Hara, and of course of his relation to Berrigan. What he notes of Berrigan is all over O'Hara's work and biography too. Some have pointed to this as a complex dimension of his homosexuality - if he was going to love men, he was going to love men in their full, 1950's style cultural construction as tough-guys - hence his attraction to New York artistic toughs like Pollock, Baraka, Corso, and heterosexual men generally. What does this say? I don't know. In part it seems O'Hara's refusal to be stereotypically "gay" (what he couldn't stand in Warhol). In part it seems an indication that he was as trapped in the cultural constructions of his time as everyone else. Somehwere in btwn?

-Mike Magee.

↑ Index

755. Rachel Loden
Re: Berrigan likes to beat people up
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Mark Wallace wrote (in part):
>
> Rachel and others:
>
> It's interesting to think about Berrigan's line "I like to beat > people up," which has surely caused difficulty for many, in light of Ron > Padgett's fascinating memoir of Berrigan, "Ted," which I've been reading > in what few spare moments I have these days. Berrigan's relation to > conventionally "macho" behavior--itself a complex cultural/class > phenomena--is equally complex. He seems to have admired some of the more > rough and tumble male members of his own family, and in particular admired > Padgett's own father, who really did, it seems, have an urge to beat > people up. On the other hand, as much as Berrigan would "admire" such > people, he spent his life staying as far away from them as possible, and > Padgett reports that as far as he's aware of, Berrigan never did get into > fights. If I'm reading Padgett right, that Berrigan was NOT a fighter was > both a key to his difference from the men he grew up around, and a source > of shame for him--he wanted out of that world but remained under the thumb > of its definition of male behavior.

Actually, I have no trouble with those lines; I adore them. My post wasn't meant as any sort of comment on Berrigan's behavior (am not saying that Mark thought it was, but just to be clear). Something in the campiness of the lines convinced me that Berrigan did not go around popping people. I posted them as comic relief, or to turn the discussion on its ear.

Rachel L.

↑ Index

756. William Northcutt dorn, etcetera
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I understand all the fuss about Dorn. What he and T. Clark published re: AIDS is a horrible thing. I'd like to hear their side of it if any of you have contact with them and they're interetested in responding--or have they elsewhere?

But on the other hand, it seems to me this list has taken a self-righteous turn. I admit, I don't know much about Dorn personally, but in my last decade + experience in the university, assholes abound and poets abound, and sometimes one is a subset of the other. Actually, it seems to me the university is concretising its self-righteous turn.

Among the subjects that seems to always come up, and for good reason, is Pound. I agree, Pound's behavior was evil, no matter how much anyone finds reasons--Italian isolation, etc. But on the other hand, telling the one story, as Bob Perelman has done, gets only one part of the job done--that is, I disagree with whoever it was who lauded Perelman's book on Genius. Perhaps the Stein, Zuk, and Joyce chapters are okay, but I find the chapter on Pound a bit trendy, a bit facile. Perelman takes the Pound of the late 1930s on and reads backwards, mostly ignoring the Pound whose reaction to the avarice that brought on WWI prompted him to take some admirable chances in his early Cantos; I find Perelman's book equally as underdone as those books which look at some of Pound's earlier thought and try to press that over the truely evil shit in Pound's later work.

I like Perelman's poetry.

I like Dorn's poetry too, especially Slinger.

I don't think one has to be schizophrenic to see in the work something useful and something humane, and to see at the same time that it may be set beside something awful in the human being who wrote it, or even in the very next line of the poetry itself.

Rather than seeing the world in Hollywood black and white, wouldn't it be more useful to explore the complications of "good" and "evil" (as they've been labled on this list)? In the case of someone such as William Faulkner, for example. It's true of his work that his portrait of blacks is sometimes terribly condescending, and he wasn't exactly an advocate of the Civil Rights movement in the South, but it doesn't mean that his work doesn't have moments which might teach some biggot a lesson in humanity.

Opening the subject is preferable to closing it, becoming Rush Limbaugh of the Left.

William Northcutt

Much madness is divinest sense to a discerning eye.
William M. Northcutt
[redacted]

↑ Index

757. Mark Prejsnar
Re: spell check and ethics check
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I wouldn't offhand from his work in theory and verse find it likely Perelman is saying anything remotely like that, anything quietistic....Since your response sounds pretty unsympathetic, I have to chirp up to say that I thought his points were important. It is indeed a matter of macho and "street cred" to put your politics forward in a brash in-your-face sort of way. From working on the left as an activist as well as poet for 20 years, I'd say that that's often a temptation, whether in poetry or in life, if your politics are passionate (and especially if they are, as you see it, oppositional..) It is indeed true that from Pound to Andrews a rhetoric of heightened tension is used to sandblast poetry from its esthetic moorings and let politics in. (Perelman's own work has enough snickers about its own politically contradictory positions, to avoid truculence..)

There is a closely-related current of political poets who often enact progressive politics in a way that talks around suffering and confusion, rather than ramming thru it with anger; Oppen, Zukofsky and John Taggart (see his book/sequence Loop).

Mark Prejsnar

On Fri, 21 Feb 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:

> Just to be clear, I'm assuming that what you mean by "large political ambitions" is a social agenda motivated by distress at the situation we find ourselves in, as opposed to a desire for public office.
> Do you think that what you describe is limited to poets? Male poets? Males?
> Is it possible that these really are tough and demoralizing times for those who believe in some sort--any sort--of equitable society?
> Are you proposing aesthetic quietism as a proper, even a possible, cure for those of us who continue to be afflicted with savage indignation?
>
> At 03:42 PM 2/21/97 -0500, you wrote:
> Poets with large political ambitions seem to have a hard time avoiding stepping in real dreck the last few decades.

↑ Index

758. Christopher Alexander
Re: Repugnant selves
Mon 24 Feb 1997

---

kevin wroth:
> What would you have done? I had the piece of paper right in my hand, and > no one would ever have known.
id have to agree with mark on this one too kevin-- im sympathetic to the urge to destroy the poem (is that protecting spicer from others
who will/do write him off as another
worthless antisemite
--or from himself?)
but, yes, that act would have been antithetical to your task as i understand it.

besides that, could you have destroyed the poem?
or would the poem (& the having destroyed it)
have come to underwrite you efforts as biographer?
i realize theres a sharp difference between these positions--exposing the poem or concealing it -- & im not suggesting that you would somehow have legibly re-inscribed the absent poem, or not,
at least, that the re-inscription would be immediately legible. the question is probably more ethical than

textual, though both. oops, now it sounds like im questioning yr ethics--damn this language stuff is a tricky lot. "must...get to...the...point...."

well, unless this was a confession, it sounds as if you made the right decision, or right by me.
better to deal with these things openly, & the risk that entails, than hope theyll go away. spicer
left plenty of antisemitism in his wake; i dont anticipate this instance will be less shocking for that, but, too, it isnt as if you could have purified
him through this one destruction.

for what its worth, i think you & maria damon are right in factoring in spicers monstrous self-image, which isnt an apology for him either (not that you make it out to be one).

far from wanting to punch someone,
id like to cry--even for spicer, ugly
as he made himself. & im usually so geared up & macho, too. i guess, as mark says, i cant talk to him about it--cant even fight with him about-- & the distance that makes. but also because, well, one always feels hurt
by these things.

57 carbuerator, not a candidate for--chris,[ reinscribing machismo
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

759. Mark Prejsnar
Re: spell check and ethics check
Mon 24 Feb 1997

The mention of Neruda and Mayakovsky is helpful....Altho' I'd take it somewhere a little different. The historical specificity of bolshie Communism gives the range of poets connected to it their own interesting twist. Compared to the examples Simon cites, we can put: Oppen; Cesar Vallejo; and the more densely surrealistic Neruda (especially the early sections of Residencia in la Tierra, but also Alturas de Macchu Pichu, which is an atypical part of the Canto General!) This is just to stick to (literally) card-carrying Communists. Oh, and another card-carrying red: Eluard. The latter group for me are among the poets that from my early teens helped define how good poetry interacts with the world..That they did so while actively belonging to as stifling a form of leftism as the 3rd International, is truely commentary on the human spirit, and tends to give me a whole lot of hope for people, progressive politics and the possibilities of poetry...Maybe even for myself. Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

760. Thomas M. Orange louisville
Mon 24 Feb 1997

---

joe amato writes:
> [snip]... tobias woolf read, who in fact i now see is completely > embroiled in the syracuse university creative writing program > controversy!...

joe could you elaborate?....thanks, t.

↑ Index

761. amato
Re: Berrigan likes to beat people up
Mon 24 Feb 1997

---

mark, yknow, maybe i'm a bit punchy, but there really ARE some folks i've met in academe, and in industry, that i'd like to punch in the snoot...

now as to industry: in fact there were more than a couple of physical confrontations at the miller brewing co. site where i used to work... in fact i was threatened on two occasions with physical violence (i shit you not), and in fact i ended up having---as in HAVING---to ask one of my "coworkers" who walked up and planted the bottom of his shoe on the side of my desk, HARD, to 'meet me out in the fucking parking lot'... he declined, i am happy to report, and the phenomenon ended there...

but i offer this by way of not over-aestheticizing the issues: there are STILL very male, very macho environments "out there" where, sad to say, physical confrontation, largely between males, is, if not the rule, then at least the subtext... on another occasion, i was in a bar, attending a going-away-party, when a "coworker" poured an entire beer down the front of my shirt (at the prompting of his supervisor---"just doing what i'm told, joe")... took great effort on my part to avoid popping that motherfucker, to simply walk away... in fact, i think my behavior on the evening in question was downright heroic, but my more macho side has dreams about hitting him to this day... the point here anyway is that academe seems to have institutionalized, as you (and foucault) would suggest, an anti-violence that provides for other sorts of violence...

i'm not really quite sure which is worse, provided of course i'm not choosing between a bloody nose and psychological strain... i mean, MY bloody nose... if i AM so choosing, i guess i'll take the strain, not so much b/c i'm such a 'civilized' guy, but b/c a bloody nose, yknow, that really fucking smarts...

best,

joe

↑ Index

762. dbkk
Re: playwrights
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I'm glad that Templeton and Perloff have turned the discussion to playwrights. Dear Fiona and Marjorie, I'm sorry that you will be in the UK and in LA respectively since I am putting on my new play here in San Francisco on March 6.

"'Political Animals' is Kevin Killian's farce about the 1996 conventions in which hundreds of cultural and politicial figures (Nancy Reagan, Guy De Bord, Dorothy Arzner, Liffy Dole, Bill Clinton, Scott O'Grady, Christopher Reeve, Mary Matalin etc. etc.) converge on two great US cities, San Diego and Chicago, to promulgate their own dreams of lust, power and despair." My cast includes the visual artists Kate Delos, Phoebe Gloeckner, Cliff Hengst, Scott Hewicker, Rex Ray, Michelle Rollman and Wayne Smith; the poets Norma Cole, Leslie Scalapino and Alicia Wing; the filmmakers Kota Ezawa, Craig Goodman, and Karla Milosevich; actresses Julia Brashares, Ethel Chase and Pauline Facciano; and prose writers David Buuck, Mark Ewert, Nicole Harrison and Kevin Killian. AND many more.

The Ansel Adams Center for Photography is producing this play for one evening only, Thursday, March 6 at 7 p.m. They're at 250 Fourth Street (at Folsom). Please call the museum for reservations = [redacted]. I know that on that evening John Jesurun and Mac Wellman will be trembling in trepidation! Thanks, everyone, please try to come if you'll be in the Bay Area a week from Thursday.

--Kevin Killian

↑ Index

763. Mark Prejsnar

Re: Repugnant selves

Mon 24 Feb 1997

In response to the conundrum of the Spicer poem. I'm not a scholar; a library professional and social activist and poet, however.

The impulse to destroy, or even hide, doesn't pull as strongly on me, Kevin...I wonder why... (Spicer has been for me a central inspiration re what poetry can/should be, for 15 years) Apart from not being involved with him as scholar/biographer, what makes me less torn? Is it that given Pound, I feel de-sensitized to the issue--like, we've done that, we can accept the worst warts on the poets we love, after working the earlier problem through??

I do feel there is one component: As a socialist activist I have often encountered protests of screenings of Birth of a Nation; these are often taking place on a campus where I work in the library system. Usually what these protests say is: we demand that no one ever show this film, and that people boycott this screening, to help carry this out. What I realized long ago, is that it's destructive to tell people they shouldn't know about racist artworks, or to try to keep them out of the culture. Speaking against them, is more empowering both for us as users/makers of art stuff, and as people in a political world. Somehow I don't feel that hiding something done by a poet, changes things for the better. As a socialist I found it literally insane to tell people to join in condemning/avoiding a film they had never seen, to avoid seeing it because some leninist activists TOLD them is had a certain character..What's wierd is the implication that people can be INFECTED by the racist or reactionary character of a work, that they can't protect themselves if they are "exposed". (This reminds me again of the discussion of Pound's fear of infection by the welter of experience he unleashed in the Cantos, discussed by Bernstein.)

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

764. MAXINE CHERNOFF
Re: Berrigan likes to beat people up
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Dear Morality Junkies: What if Ted Berrigan actually did punch someone once? What if a fine, morally pure, socially sensitive poet is mean to his/her partner or children? What if he/she has bad taste in movies? Or puts ugly art on their walls? Or occasionally drinks too much? Or once, in a moment of frail humanity, said something unkind about someone else? What if Gertrude Stein voted Republican? What if she didn't exercise her right of citizenship and vote at all? What if she was (or anyone else) is mean, weak, ill-advised? What if she were a flatterer or dishonest? Where does this end? If we want our writers to be righteous beyond reason, maybe we need to read... what? The fact that some misbehave publically and others (most likely) privately (at least at some point in their long lives) is a fact of most people's existence on earth. Even writers we love. Sorry folks, but it's true. Of us all.

Maxine Chernoff

↑ Index

765. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Neruda/Stalin
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I'd like to mention that most of this thread, with sharp contributions from a number of folks, and particularly the Kent/Mark exchange, has been awfully productive, and a very unusual model of political/poetical debate done with respect and with people quite often listening to each other in a non-exclusionary way...Not easily found in outer cyber space, where people are careless; not often enuff found on the non-poetic left, either, for sure!

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

766. Mark Prejsnar
Re: AWOL: _Antithesis_ seeking poetry (forwarded)
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I do like one part of the Antithesis posting

"innovative BUT technically accomplished poetry" (my emphasis)

--just how you say things can speak volumes

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

767. Mark Weiss
Re: spell check and ethics check
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I may certainly have misunderstood. It must be lovely for Mr. P to have so many people willing to answer his mail for him. I answer my own.

At 10:43 AM 2/24/97 -0500, you wrote:
>I wouldn't offhand from his work in theory and verse find it likely >Perelman is saying anything remotely like that, anything >quietistic....Since your response sounds pretty unsympathetic, I have to >chirp up to say that I thought his points were important. It is indeed a >matter of macho and "street cred" to put your politics forward in a brash >in-your-face sort of way. From working on the left as an activist as well >as poet for 20 years, I'd say that that's often a temptation, whether in >poetry or in life, if your politics are passionate (and especially if they >are, as you see it, oppositional..) It is indeed true that from Pound to >Andrews a rhetoric of heightened tension is used to sandblast poetry from >its esthetic moorings and let politics in. (Perelman's own work has >enough snickers about its own politically contradictory positions, to >avoid truculence..)
>
>There is a closely-related current of political poets who often enact >progressive politics in a way that talks around suffering and confusion, >rather than ramming thru it with anger; Oppen, Zukofsky and John Taggart >(see his book/sequence Loop).
>
>Mark Prejsnar
>
>
>On Fri, 21 Feb 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:
>
>> Just to be clear, I'm assuming that what you mean by "large political >> ambitions" is a social agenda motivated by distress at the situation we find >> ourselves in, as opposed to a desire for public office.
>> Do you think that what you describe is limited to poets? Male poets? Males?
>> Is it possible that these really are tough and demoralizing times for those >> who believe in some sort--any sort--of equitable society?
>> Are you proposing aesthetic quietism as a proper, even a possible, cure for >> those of us who continue to be afflicted with savage indignation?
>>
>>
>> At 03:42 PM 2/21/97 -0500, you wrote:

>> >Poets with large political ambitions seem to have a hard time avoiding >> >stepping in real dreck the last few decades.
>>
>
>

↑ Index

768. amato
syracuse university...
Mon 24 Feb 1997

---

thomas, there's a big feature in _the chronicle of higher ed_ (pertaining to that post forwarded in these regions) about how the creative writing program at syracuse university is now under attack from various quarters---from the marxist theory collective there, from grad. students there, from its former director (now at u of alabama)...

again: the article, in my view, doesn't do a good job of drawing out the various subtexts... for example: the incident that prompted the brouhaha (the glass of scotch and insult i reported) is surely part of a structural reality that isn't being examined entirely... there's a reason why donald morton, colleague of mas'ud zavarzadeh (sp?) at syracuse (who is, last i knew, teresa ebert's partner---and ebert is at u of albany, where the "red theory collective" is located who signed that forward protesting the chronicle piece)---there's a reason why morton is quoted in the chronicle... and the insult---"stalinist bitch"---is not only a nasty gendered insult, but it would seem to pick up ("stalinist") on the theory-creative split that typifies most english depts... in this case, unreconstructed marxist theory...

wolff has evidently been accused by the former director of the program, michael martone, of 'driving him [martone] out'... martone suggests that dobyns (the prof. who through the scotch etc) is being reinstated in part b/c of wolff, that dobyns should have been fired long ago (which sounds accurate to me---though i don't trust martone either, b/c he seems to be taking potshots from afar)... wolff's retort is that he tried to "exert what positive influence he could" in approaching dobyns about his drinking problem... at the same time, writer mary karr, who sides with wolff here, is being accused of using "vulgar language" in class... this latter i can identify with, having mself chosen not to censor my language practices (which are clearly working class in many ways)... anyway, the karr issue is, it seems to me, obscuring some very real structural problems with master-apprentice teaching, and some specific gender issues that are simply not reducible to marxist logics of consumption and production...

for example: dobyns evidently "blew up" in one workshop, "using the 'F' word in criticizing a poem written by a student about her rape by her father"... dobyns evidently "explained [to the chronicle] that the poem didn't work because the student was telling the reader what to think rather than allowing the poem to evoke feelings"... the student in question ran weeping from the class... as many women in creative writing classes will tell you, this is precisely the sort of male response that denies women the right to their own 'voices' (setting aside for a second the convention of 'voice'... i am reminded of susan howe's response to olson's poetics in _in relation_ acts 10)...

it's a MESS, in short... sure, the "red theory collective" is correct in pointing to structural problems with the hiring of individual 'talents' in creative writing programs, with the status of 'talent' as a commodity... but where, precisely, do the marxists stand on this question of gender, where do they STAND?... i mean, if false consciousness is thereby dismantled (i say IF---it's not clear that this is about althusserian ideology), to what end will it lead, if not the rather dogmatic end suggested by teresa ebert's recent piece in _college english_ (nov. 96 "for a red pedagogy: feminism, desire, and need"): that, over and against "libidinal pedagogy," "red pedagogy demystifies the seemingly unique experiences and the supposed autonomy of desire and shows how they are, in fact, the 'common' effects of the social relations of production in wage-labor capital"... those of you who teach will note that the instructor in this latter classroom scenario is clearly just another master, whose job is to convert students into like subjects... i don't find this especially liberating, though ebert does make some good points along the way...

one final point: i have the letter written by jennifer cotter, the student whom dobyns assaulted with his drink and his mouth... i don't find it particularly persuasive, b/c it sounds very much as though she wants her case to be taken as an instance of the effect that the marxist collective wishes itself to surface... that is, while what happened is in my view decidedly part of various structural problems, these problems are not reducible to unreconstructed marxist logic...

but that's just me talking...

best,

joe

↑ Index

769. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Berrigan likes to beat people up
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Yes, we're all less than perfect...I dunno if most posts have been fixes for Morality Junkies, though..... Personally I've thought the passion people on the list have been putting into these questions pretty politically (& poetically) refreshing,,==

Most of us live in a day-to-day world where real live political issues never get brought up with any seriousness at all!! ever! in relation to poetry, or anything else..

mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

770. Mark Weiss
Re: Repugnant selves
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I have another suggestion about how to deal with the Spicer poem and other objectionable writing. In the not-so-old days the custom was to translate prurient passages of texts into Latin, so as not to endanger the minds of those (usually from the lower orders) who had not been uplifted by the study of, say, Petronius. That would work. Need I say that I'm being facetious?

At 09:55 AM 2/24/97 MDT, you wrote:
>kevin wroth:
>> What would you have done? I had the piece of paper right in my hand, and >> no one would ever have known.
>id have to agree with mark on this one too kevin--
>im sympathetic to the urge to destroy the poem >(is that protecting >spicer from others
>who will/do write
>him off as another
>worthless antisemite
>--or from himself?)
>but, yes, that act would have been antithetical to >your task as i understand it.
>
>besides that, could you have destroyed the poem?
>or would the poem (& the having destroyed it)
>have come to underwrite you efforts as biographer?

>i realize theres a sharp difference between these >positions--exposing the poem or concealing it -- >& im not suggesting that you would somehow
>have legibly re-inscribed the absent poem, or not,
>at least, that the re-inscription would be immediately
>legible. the question is probably more ethical than >textual, though both. oops, now it sounds like im
>questioning yr ethics--damn this language stuff is a >tricky lot. "must...get to...the...point...."
>
>well, unless this was a confession, it sounds as >if you made the right decision, or right by me.
>better to deal with these things openly, & the
>risk that entails, than hope theyll go away. spicer
>left plenty of antisemitism in his wake; i dont >anticipate this instance will be less shocking for
>that, but, too, it isnt as if you could have purified
>him through this one destruction.
>
>for what its worth, i think you & maria damon are >right in factoring in spicers monstrous self-image,
>which isnt an apology for him either (not that you >make it out to be one).
>
>far from wanting to punch someone,
>id like to cry--even for spicer, ugly
>as he made himself. & im usually so >geared up & macho, too. i guess, as >mark says, i cant talk to him about
>it--cant even fight with him about--
>& the distance that makes. but also >because, well, one always feels hurt
>by these things.
>
>57 carbuerator, not a >candidate for--chris,[ >reinscribing machismo
>..
>christopher alexander, etc.
>[redacted]
>(Marriott Library Computer Systems)
>

>language code not found. illegal operation error.
>this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be
>lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.
>
>

↑ Index

771. Alaric Sumner
Mac Wellman play
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I would be interested in a more detailed "enthusiasm" from Marjorie Perloff (or (forefend) the opposite) from other people who have seen Mac Wellman's play since I will not be able to see it (unless it tours to UK). Either list if you think others will be interested, or if preferred, email me direct with comments. Is Mac on this list? Is he emailable? Have the poems of his I published in "words worth 2:1" been published in book form?

↑ Index

772. Mark Prejsnar
Re: spell check and ethics check
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Mark Weiss-- actually, since this little joke has been lobbed at several folks, not just me-- Most of us were trying to use Perelman plus various responses to his posting as a springboard for some comments of our own; the point of all those posts was really to carry the exchange forward..Perelman was a bit of a pretext (..we all use each other, as pretexts, at times..)

--don't actually think he should feel that people were answering for him...most of us weren't..

↑ Index

773. Jordan Davis
Repugnant radio poetry city
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Poetry City starts back up in the evenings and on the radio ***

Friday March 7 come see Lee Ann Brown read with Quentin Crisp

Thursday March 28 in from the other side Lyn Hejinian and Travis Ortiz

Thursday April 24 New York is visited by Maureen Owen and Eddie Berrigan

Friday May 16 Poets of similar temperament Bob Holman and Dug Rothschild read

Poetry City proper is in the offices of Teachers & Writers CollaboraŶive 5 Union Sq W NYC 10003 (7th fl)

---
get off the air! poetry city begins its second season of radio broadcasts on WNYE's Poetry-in-the-Morning show, Tues and Thurs, 11:45 am-noon 91.9 FM NYC

2/27 -- Steve Carll

3/4 -- (not po city) Donald Hall

3/6 -- Daniel Bouchard

3/11 -- David Mills

3/13 -- (not po city .. but only cause of schedule conflict) Karen Volkman

3/18 -- Anselm Berrigan

tune in! we're on in stereo ..

J

↑ Index

774. Mark Weiss
violence and the threat of violence
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Years ago, when I still lived in Brooklyn, I bought a car stereo at Crazy Eddie's and took it to the mechanic who did their installations. He told me what the service would cost me, which was pretty hefty. I was more than a little annoyed. "But they told me at the store that installation was included," I told him.

"It isn't, but you can take it up with Sal, the guy fixing his car over there. He's the dapertment manager."

So I went to talk to Sal, who got incredibly angry, and accused me of lying. "Wait a minute," I said, "I'm not accusing _you_ of anything. You weren't the salesman."

"He works for me. You accuse him you gotta deal with me."

Things went from bad to worse. Pretty soon I was threatening to talk to Sal's boss, and Sal was threatening to beat me up, to which I countered that if he did I'd call the police. There didn't seem to be any end in sight to the downward spiral.

Then I was afflicted with a rare moment of clarity. I should have known better--I lived in the neighborhood. And I did social work with working class people every day. Sal didn't really want to beat me up, and I didn't really want to have him arrested or fired. We were invoking the power moves of our respective social classes. Sal was working class--he had not been raised with the assumption that he could appeal to higher authorities to do his dirty work for him, and he probably thought it dishonorable to do so. I was middle class--I had been raised to abhor violence and the threat of violence, but also to assume that I had the power to call in the troops.

We were both doing the same thing, but in different languages. In my language Sal's provocation was to be taken more seriously than intended, as was mine in Sal's language. But they were both just power moves.

This whole series of reflections took a lot less time than it takes to write about it. I realized that I was just venting: I would have to pay anyway. What was the point of the argument? Was my honor at stake? So I backed off, and we each went to our corners.

Afterwards I reflected that I wasn't sure who was being more violent. I was threatened with a bloody nose. Sal was threatened with jail and loss of livelihood.

↑ Index

775. Maria Damon

Re: Berrigan likes to beat people up

Mon 24 Feb 1997

---

i'm puzzled by the conflation of "morality" with the desire of some people on the list to discuss the intersections of politics and poetry, and where we stand with it.

At 8:46 AM -0800 2/24/97, MAXINE CHERNOFF wrote:
>Dear Morality Junkies: What if Ted Berrigan actually did punch someone >once? What if a fine, morally pure, socially sensitive poet is mean to >his/her partner or children? What if he/she has bad taste in movies? Or >puts ugly art on their walls? Or occasionally drinks too much? Or once, >in a moment of frail humanity, said something unkind about someone else?
>What if Gertrude Stein voted Republican? What if she didn't exercise her >right of citizenship and vote at all? What if she was (or anyone else) is >mean, weak, ill-advised? What if she were a flatterer or dishonest?
>Where does this end? If we want our writers to be righteous beyond >reason, maybe we need to read... what? The fact that some misbehave >publically and others (most likely) privately (at least at some point in >their long lives) is a fact of most people's existence on earth. Even >writers we love. Sorry folks, but it's true. Of us all.

>
>Maxine Chernoff

↑ Index

776. Maria Damon
Re: Neruda/Stalin
Mon 24 Feb 1997

---

yes.

At 11:51 AM -0500 2/24/97, Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>I'd like to mention that most of this thread, with sharp contributions >from a number of folks, and particularly the Kent/Mark exchange, has been >awfully productive, and a very unusual model of political/poetical debate >done with respect and with people quite often listening to each other in a >non-exclusionary way...Not easily found in outer cyber space, where people >are careless; not often enuff found on the non-poetic left, either, for >sure!
>
>Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

777. David Kellogg
Lorenzo Thomas, Erica Hunt
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Can anybody give me contact information (email or phone) for Lorenzo Thomas and Erica Hunt? Please send backchannel. Thanks.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

778. michael corbin
Broad-cast
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Check. Check, one, two. Is this microphone on?

Jerry Rothenberg wrote:

> This is an unfortunate slip-up but a reminder of how fast > gossip and rumor can spread via this medium, . . .
>
> the poetics rumor mill > has now put him (& whoever else) into a racist league (etc.) . . .
>
> In other words, this is a public > & not a private medium, a form of
>
> broad casting
>
> that can rapidly
> disseminate misinformation in a way that can quickly and actually do > harm to people. . . .
>
> What did the man possibly say . . .
> (the way some of the correspondence sounds)

So here we are narrow-casting to one an-other, poets mind you. Whispering in each others ears. Reading tightly, together. Because if we really othered the other, as opposed to just othering them they'ed be, well, us, only different, not even poets. And what of that difference? Are there any others on the list, out there in list-land, or is that an-other list on all the ships at sea? Broadcast information, or is that misinformation, one would think, is speed itself. Anon.

The best sound quality broadcast is the unpacking of the libraries frequency. Tuned in on the dial the personal histories of the intimacies and assignations shared with a lover who wee discover, post-coital, was given to the ressentiment, of, say, jew hating, which of course is more severe than the manufacture of simulated pink-triangles of the human-immunodeficency virus. We can pardon that rolling-stock broad-cast because our library is ordered. Safe-sex. Slowed down to a card-catalog where the surgical aesthetic of beauty and death are kept in different drawers. A retrovirus in check in a meduium that can quickly and actually do harm to (other) people.

Slow.

Bob Perlman wrote:

> This isn't something to be clarified in the rapidfire ouija board regime of the listserv, probably.

Rapid insemination and spectral speed regimes. So we move TOO FAST in this regime. A diagnosis. A metastasis. An opportunistic infection. Not post-modern, or post-auschwitz, but post-pound, post-pound-consciousness, post-pound-revelations, post-pound-nuanced analysis or is that past not post(?), what you and I are not about I assure you; rather than past(?) is that post-gulf-war, or is it post sarejevo, post-stonewall, or, maybe during, live broadcast, during the riot, like Rodney King ventriloquized in the voice of the LAPD during the riot to broadcast on the too fast ouija board, "can't we all just get along?". Post-today? Right. Now is now. Moving fast. Word up. A ctually doing harm.

Is this the regime-brick road to the city of something to be clarified? Those in P-zones and P-zoos will be held to account when it is clarfied. At which point it will be broadcast.

EzrA pOUND, radio broadcast transcript, "America Was Promises," 1941: "Europe callin', Pound Speakin', Ezry Pound speakin . . .

"I do what I can to keep an even tone of voice; now when I drop my voice, they turn on more current. . . .

"They git that way readin' jew papers for 40 years. They git that way hearin' kike radio, and I propose to use the word KIKE regardless of race. Use it to cover honorary jews AND TO EXCEPT honest jews where we find 'em. . . ." [emphasis in original]

Join me on that band-width methodone program, you morality junkies, that methodone of 'regardless of race' that too is addictive, the liberal delirium tremens of 1st world satiation leading in the majority of cases in our sample to blindness in one eye, placebos notwithstanding. 12 steps minus one, or was that two.

Check. Check, one, two.

"The tension between the radio experience as a private experience and a public one is at the heart of radio ideology. Radio and telephone were the first electrical "personal appliances," . . . Radio gave the sense of intimacy with electricity, a sense of control over technology: at the same time radio's wirelessness, the invisibility of its method, made it subject to the greatest mystifications . . . In a prophetic misreading, the American Federal Communications Commission officials who monitored and transcribed the Italian broadcasts didn't recognize the word Celine and recorded it as Stalin, thus substituting a political totalitarian for what is now recognizable the quite specific telephonocentric of a French fascist aesthetic." Alice Kaplan, _Reproductions of Banality: Fascism, Literature and French Intellectual Life_.

Slow. Quiet. Distinction must be clarified. Substitions made. A fugative publication is loose, high on amplification. Lock up your wives and daughters. Watch your mail. Take care with the phone, picking up the line. Our humane libraries are in order. Sustenence. Watch for others lurking about. They may not know you. Speak low when you speak of love as Lotte Lenya says.

Check. Can you here me in the back?

↑ Index

779. Joseph Lease
Re: dorn, etcetera
Mon 24 Feb 1997

---

which self-righteous turn? is there only one?

On Tue, 25 Feb 1997, Wystan Curnow wrote:

> The self-righteous turn: and here we are once again. It seems native to the list, every so often it has to revert to this silly mood. In what sense 'native' though? Because present poetics' issues somehow demand it, because it is inextricable from the poetic practices which are most compelling to list members. Or because it's 'native' to the culture, which is why its occurrence harmonizes so well with daily media experience, 60 minutes, National Inquirier etc. the same in the US as in NZ? Is this what I log on for in the mornings? And what IS this mood? this 'turn', this 'culture of'? This is: The Moral Imagination of Our Time. What is the difference from it, the 'resistance' to it which I look for on the list? Any answers?
>
> Wystan

↑ Index

780. DS
Re: dorn, etcetera
Mon 24 Feb 1997

I think it is more righteous than self righteous. And i for one prefer righteousness to its opposite, whatever that maybe.

Dan

ps Here, the oun is shining, the tide is high and i have a new dog, or he has me. (A newfie pup named Moby - though for a while yet he's more of a sprat)

Should whatsisname come roun' me i'll set me dog a lickin him

> But on the other hand, it seems to me this list has taken a > self-righteous > turn. I admit,

↑ Index

781. DS
Re: dorn, etcetera
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Sorry should have read... Um... Noun?

> ps Here, the oun is shining,

↑ Index

782. Wystan Curnow
Re: dorn, etcetera
Mon 24 Feb 1997

The self-righteous turn: and here we are once again. It seems native to the list, every so often it has to revert to this silly mood. In what sense 'native' though? Because present poetics' issues somehow demand it, because it is inextricable from the poetic practices which are most compelling to list members. Or because it's 'native' to the culture, which is why its occurrence harmonizes so well with daily media experience, 60 minutes, National Inquirier etc. the same in the US as in NZ? Is this what I log on for in the mornings? And what IS this mood? this 'turn', this 'culture of'? This is: The Moral Imagination of Our Time. What is the difference from it, the 'resistance' to it which I look for on the list? Any answers?

Wystan

↑ Index

783. Wystan Curnow
Re: dorn, etcetera
Mon 24 Feb 1997

Dear Joseph,

There are indeed many turns to self-righteousness. The phrase was William Northcutt's, who wrote:

I understand all the fuss about Dorn. What he and T. Clark published re: AIDS is a horrible thing. I'd like to hear their side of it if any of you have contact with them and they're interetested in responding--or have they elsewhere?

But on the other hand, it seems to me this list has taken a self-righteous turn. I admit, I don't know much about Dorn personally, but in my last decade + experience in the university, assholes abound and poets abound, and sometimes one is a subset of the other. Actually, it seems to me the university is concretising its self-righteous turn.

Among the subjects that seems to always come up, and for good reason, is Pound. I agree, Pound's behavior was evil, no matter how much anyone finds reasons--Italian isolation, etc. But on the other hand, telling the one story, as Bob Perelman has done, gets only one part of the job done--that is, I disagree with whoever it was who lauded Perelman's book on Genius. Perhaps the Stein, Zuk, and Joyce chapters are okay, but I find the chapter on Pound a bit trendy, a bit facile. Perelman takes the Pound of the late 1930s on and reads backwards, mostly ignoring the Pound whose reaction to the avarice that brought on WWI prompted him to take some admirable chances in his early Cantos; I find Perelman's book equally as underdone as those books which look at some of Pound's earlier thought and try to press that over the truely evil shit in Pound's later work.

I like Perelman's poetry.

I like Dorn's poetry too, especially Slinger.

I don't think one has to be schizophrenic to see in the work something useful and something humane, and to see at the same time that it may be set beside something awful in the human being who wrote it, or even in the very next line of the poetry itself.

Rather than seeing the world in Hollywood black and white, wouldn't it be more useful to explore the complications of "good" and "evil" (as they've been labled on this list)? In the case of someone such as William Faulkner, for example. It's true of his work that his portrait of blacks is sometimes terribly condescending, and he wasn't exactly an advocate of the Civil Rights movement in the South, but it doesn't mean that his work doesn't have moments which might teach some biggot a lesson in humanity.

Opening the subject is preferable to closing it, becoming Rush Limbaugh of the Left.

William Northcutt

Wystan Curnow

↑ Index

784. KENT JOHNSON
dorn deletion
Mon 24 Feb 1997

> Date sent: Tue, 25 Feb 1997 09:33:58 -0500
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Joel Kuszai <[redacted]>

> Subject: Re: dorn, etcetera
> To: [redacted]

On Tues, 25 Feb, Joel Kuszai wrote:
>
> As far as Mr. Northcutt's comment above: Ed & Jennifer Dorn tried to sign > up to Poetics list several times. I deleted them like I would have Hitler, > but to no avail, they kept re-subbing. Eventually, I let them pass > through, with my finger on the "delete" key, I waited expectantly for some > coke-induced froth from his evil lips--did he ever post? A search of the > archives would reveal. As far as I know, they remained on this list until > recently...

Is this a joke? That Ed and Jennifer Dorn tried to subscribe to the list and were repeatedly censored out? If so, I'd suggest this discussion that people are "getting tired of" has acquired a new sense of urgency! Holy cow.

Kent

Kent>

↑ Index

785. Mark Weiss
Re: Neruda and Stalinism
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I remember the coverage of the Guatemala coup at the time--big spread in Life magazine that was unadulterated CIA feed. In my family everyone knew--but we also knew that the CIA probably had something to do with the Dodgers losing the World Series. I doubt very much that the average estadosunidense, as they call us in Guatemala (really) questioned the official story, and I'd guess that most of my fellow citizens who know where Guatemala is still don't. As to Neruda's complicity with that gang, quien sabe? But I'd hope we don't go back into innuendos without presenting the evidence. The world is sad enough as it is.

At 10:19 PM 2/23/97 -0800, you wrote:
>Mark Weiss's long message on Neruda and Stalinism in the USA was really >interesting. Thanks for that.
>
>I am wondering, though: did USAmericans really believe that the overthrow >of the government in Guatemala was somehow not done by the USA? I have >never heard of anyone outside the USA that did not know that from the start.
>
>Oh, and if I remember rightly, Neruda helped the killers of Trotsky get out >of Mexico, didnt he? Or am I mixing up a couple of things?

>
>
>
>
>George Bowering.
> ,
>2499 West 37th Ave.,
>Vancouver, B.C.,
>Canada V6M 1P4
>
>fax: [redacted]
>e-mail: [redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

786. Thomas Bell
Re: Neruda/Stalin/Berrigan likes to beat people up/dorn, etcetera
Tue 25 Feb 1997

This seems to go on and on so I can't help adding my bit. In my reading of events more harm comes from those who seek perfection in themselves and others. I'll keep my feet of clay, allow them theirs, and cast not the first line:

"I can no longer tell
Which is beast
Which man"
Akhmatova, Requiem

This is not to say that all sins are equal.
tom bell

↑ Index

787. jdhollo
the misunderstood fugitive
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Dear Kevin, Luigi-Bob, Maria Damon, & everybody:

It was not my intention, in the least, to use the term 'fugitive' in any kind of pejorative sense, merely as--especially re: publications--as shorthand for here today, gone tomorrow. Like, for instance, the Piero Heliczer issue of Dennis Cooper's magazine Little Caesar--late Seventies, early Eighties? --which I lost & wd dearly like to retrieve (if anyone has a spare, or knows where one might be found, please backchannel)...

As for the Rolling Stock AIDS number, it certainly was an instance of ill-informed and hence ignorantly excessive satire--failed satire, in every which sense: artistic, political, civil, human. I have always regarded it on a par with was it The Realist's? piece on the Kennedy assassination --offensive sledgehammer grossness. Part of a perhaps peculiarly U.S. strain of 'oppositional' journalism harking back to the Sixties (when it did have a few brilliant exponents-- the late Terry Southern comes to mind, and R. Crumb, of course). But to whom should, and would, creators of such misbegotten garbage now apologize?

Ah, sigh. Buenas noches.

Anselm Hollo

↑ Index

788. KENT JOHNSON
Re: deletion
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Eliza: No argument on your comment. But the point/concern with the apparent censorship of the Dorns on this list is that it happened before he/she had been able to type a word! I, for one, don't want a censor deciding for me what I can and cannot have access to on this wonderful place of discussion. If the matter is true, I propose that the Dorns be written to, that apologies be made, and an invitation extended to come aboard.

Kent

> Date
sent: Tue, 25 Feb 1997 14:09:48 - 0500
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest <[redacted]> > Subject: deletion
> To: [redacted]

> a while back, i remember someone pennamed "filch" posted what he claimed was a graffiti exchange he found on bathroom walls. the graffiti was a very disturbing plea from a woman to a man for him to meet her -- foreign names, phones numbers, extremely private if genuine, and, whether genuine or fake, having absolutely nothing to do with any discussion past or ongoing on list and a complete intrusion on people's time. "filch" continued posting bits of uninteresting, pointless texts along with flamebait. his posts, large in number (we only get 50 posts per day... ONLY! are we crazy! but we use them up frequently, so assume some limitations on space to post) began overwhelming mailings. after a number of these numerous posts (his > posts always went out in duplicate, making his electronic "loudness" even more distressing), some of which were over 5 "screen" pages in length (i remember one was something like 18), he disappeared from list to my great relief.

>
> shortly after, he confirmed everything i had disliked about the posts and intolerable mail-bombing by sending out a series of spam letters to members on list -- spam is, for uninitiated, electronic "junk" mail which, in sufficient numbers, can and frequently does shut down servors and is strongly rejected by internet community. i think it has even been made illegal. on receipt of spam, usual mode is to write host of spammer, inform them customer/client is spamming, and request offending account be closed down, and, and this is what i mean by STRONG internet disapproval, it usually is.
>
> several list members did this and i (don't know about anyone else) got a somewhat threatening, and certainly unpleasant, note from "filch" regarding my note to his host.
>
> i, too, have some problems with "deletion" of listmembers, but would like to see possibility kept on if only for the particularly noxious problems like filch. the problem with neo-nazi type poster, to my mind, would be waste of electron space, potential for abuse of list members, and possibility that some newbie might get taken by innocuous-seeming post and then sucked into electronic vacuum of energy-sapping correspondence, perhaps even threatened, before they found out enough to extricate.
>
> i suppose what i am saying at too-great length is that i would reserve deletion for only VERY extreme cases. but i would like to see it kept as a possibility. i know i wrote to po-listmaster to ask that filch be taken off -- i believe that was after his four over-20,000 bit postings caught me off gaurd in my mailreading and tied my computer up for about 10 minutes...
>
> > not frothing at the mouth but i was then...
> > e
>
> --OAA22669.856897441/life.ai.mit.edu--

↑ Index

789. Chris Stroffolino

FRANK as HANK?

Tue 25 Feb 1997

Hey, is it okay if I agree with both Kevin Killian AND Maxine Chernoff? (oh, David Bromige, where are you?) But--I think I wanted most to respond to Michael Magee today. (any relation to Kevin Magee. Whatever happened to kevin Magee?) in reference to Berrigan getting his tough guy machismo from O'Hara--Well, I will try to brackett the question of Berrigan for now, but this will be hard to do, because a comparison has been urged and to me it seems that O'Hara definitely has less of this tough guy machismo than Berrigan--especially considering the fact that he was writing in a generally more macho time (Olson, and others) while Berrigan--though Tulsa--i still associate with the influx of many women writers (Mayer, Notley, Waldman, etc.). Of course, O'Hara didn't hang out with writers as much as Berrigan did....but he did hang with many female painters. Yeah, Mike, maybe compared to Warhol O'Hara is less "stereotypically gay" but not compared to, say, Ginsberg.....(and how stereotypically gay was even warhol?).... One thig I notice in my recent standing still AS sitting in cafes with poets is a tendency amongst younger poets (those who seem to react against the L school, or, never were very affected by them in the first place, and tend to see themselves more in a NYSCHOOL kinda thing, and more of the O'Hara/Berrigan/Mayer (and not even Ashbery as much) thing) to see O'Hara as primarily a poet who wrote about his friends, etc. I call this reading O'Hara THROUGH Berrigan...and sometimes there is a tendency to accuse O'Hara--again IN CONTRAST to Berrigan--as CLASSIST, and I've been wondering if this accusation of O'Hara's alleged classism (but see his essay on PASTERNAK!, for instance) may be a subtle kind of homophobia that comes out of the infinitely more heterosexual aesthetics of later ny school males. I am not suggesting that one must be rich to be gay or poor to be straight (or even "cruel to be kind/ in the right measure"), just trying to theorize history from scant little details of "deep gossip" and in so doing I see O'Hara can NOT really be pinned down to a kind of homosocial machismo that you, Mike, seem to attribute to him. I am not denying that there are elements there of this, but they seem--especially for his time (more the 50's than the 60's) to be not dominant.....(his love for pollock being no greater than his love for frielecher or hartigan, or even joan mitchell, who are still quite underrated painters viz-a-viz the great DeKooning and yet more Picasso retrospectives at MOMA....).....Chris S.

↑ Index

790. Miekal And the feast of plagiarism
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Sherry Brennan wrote:

> Is there a difference between using quotation marks or some other indicator of source and not indicating the source specifically but treating the words > as found language? How does this work? I don't mean technically how it works, but what kind of difference does it make to the poem or the reader? the writer?

sherry

One possible response is a pamphlet I constructed for the 1988 Festival of Plagerism (sic) called The Plagiarist Codex; an old Maya Information Heiroglyph which can be viewed on line with a frames capable browser at:

http://www.net22.com/qazingulaza/codex/codex.html

Amendant Hardiker

↑ Index

791. Michael Magee
Re: FRANK as HANK?
Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

re: Chris Stroffolino's comment, "O'Hara can NOT really be pinned down to a kind of homosocial machismo that you, Mike, seem to attribute to him."

Chris, I actually agree with you. I was posing the O'Hara/machsimo issue as a question rather than as a statement since it seems to be around as an issue - Gooch makes alot of O'Hara's attraction to heterosexual "macho" men in his very chatty biography and there's certainly some truth to that. BUt I like your notion that some of the conventional wisdom on O'Hara is a consequence of reading him through Berrigan. Thanks for the response.

-Mike.

↑ Index

792. Joel Kuszai
Re: dorn, etcetera
Tue 25 Feb 1997

On Mon, 24 Feb 1997, William Northcutt wrote:

> I understand all the fuss about Dorn. What he and T. Clark published re: AIDS is a horrible thing. I'd like to hear their side of it if any of you have contact with them and they're interetested in responding--or have they elsewhere?

I first heard about Dorn's madness almost ten years ago, when someone told me that Creeley had been awarded the AIDS prize. I didn't understand the frightening logic behind his vile attitudes and it wasn't until Kevin's writing on this was made available to me that I understood the depths of that problem. I appreciated Kevin's writing and have observed this kind of thinking in places other than Dorn-world (such as real world). I wish/hope that K.K. would post that text here. What else is this list for? I mean c'mon...

As far as Mr. Northcutt's comment above: Ed & Jennifer Dorn tried to sign up to Poetics list several times. I deleted them like I would have Hitler, but to no avail, they kept re-subbing. Eventually, I let them pass through, with my finger on the "delete" key, I waited expectantly for some coke-induced froth from his evil lips--did he ever post? A search of the archives would reveal. As far as I know, they remained on this list until recently...

↑ Index

793. Michael Boughn
Re: killian / pug selves
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Well, Maria, personally, I'd find it easier to accept the proposal that this discussion was about the intersection of poetry and politics if anybody ever mentioned any poetry (or, god forbid, poetics). The actual discussion seems about the intersection of personality and politics (YAWN!). Let's see, we're makin' a list and checkin' it twice . . .

By the way, to the guy who named his newfie Moby (sorry, I lost your name), haven't you heard that Melville's work is now on the proscribed list because he allegedly abused his wife? Better change the dog's name quick.

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

794. jarnot
Onward
Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

in response to joel kuszai's post:

"As far as Mr. Northcutt's comment above: Ed & Jennifer Dorn tried to sign up to Poetics list several times. I deleted them like I would have Hitler, but to no avail, they kept re-subbing. Eventually, I let them pass through, with my finger on the "delete" key, I waited expectantly for some coke-induced froth from his evil lips--did he ever post? A search of the archives would reveal. As far as I know, they remained on this list until recently..."

I think it's very creepy that people are being kept off this list. I've actually found this whole discussion very disturbing. Aren't there more productive things to do in this forum than get involved with name calling, etc.? I mean really-- the "coke-induced froth from his evil lips"? I've been tired of this discussion since the idea of punching people out came up. It makes me think of something that Robert Duncan says about how you can't reject Mae West as vulgar or Hitler as the enemy because that potentiality exists in everybody. I thought the people on this list were progressive thinkers and writers-- if Dorn writes nasty crap it's because he wants a reaction like this-- he's succeeded in getting people to waste their time talking about him. yours, lisa jarnot

↑ Index

795. Joel Lewis
(no subject)
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Thank you, Maxine C. on your comments re: Berrigan and Dorn. I've felt part of the marginalization of ted's work is less the occasional & mostly comical references to violence than to his references to his drug taking. Ted's poetry, in a way, broke the shabby curtain between personal life and public persona & more of his private life is in their than most poets. If you read the bios, folks like lowell, berryman, james wright & others were as big pillheads as ted, but THEY never wrote a line like "the pills aren't working" in fact, the keepers of their flames admit to their drinking problems (still ok in the culture), but keep drug use out the narrative (indication of an evil character). As for the question of violence: the potentiality of giving and receiving a knuckle sandwich was and still is part of the world of working class men (and if we go by G. Lakoff's theory that our metaphors shape our outlook on the world--the "jokey" violent metaphors that I always here on the street on hoboken between young men makes sure there is ready cannon fodder out there in the world). Ted, I think, struggled with that inheritance -- his workshop comment "The only men capable of writing a real love poem are gay men" reflects some of that conflict Around '69, ted was beaten up by two punks in Tompkins Square Park -- an incident he referred to in interviews and letters. It changed him somewhat-- tom clark feels it brings a dramatic change in his Late Returns memoirs. I think serious appreciation of Paul Blackburn's poetry was ruined at the time of the publication of the collected poems by speculation of his outlook towards women, etc -- without attempting to contextualize his stance against the attitudes of the time (a marvelous, tho' unknown account of gender relations in the Lower East Side in the early 60's occurs in Barbara Giurzatti Harrison's memoir of growing up as a Jehovah's Witness(?).

Joel lewis

↑ Index

796. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
Re: violence and the threat of violence
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Mark:

YOU should have kicked HIS ass!

No wait, I am being rash. Here comes a rare movement of clarity . . .

In the lingo of the neighborhood I grew up in, when we discussed "power moves of respective social classes," etc. etc., you got "psyched out." A psych-out is a line in the sand (in the desert of intimidation) which the loser won't cross. It's my bet that that line is (or was) policy at Crazy Eddie's. In fact, if you had crossed just two more lines in that office you may have got what you wanted. A threat to call the police may work in some arenas, but here you were misplaying your cards. (How many metahpor-cliches can I go?)

Actually, if you HAD called the police, 1) you would have had to leave the office-- you could hardly say, "oh shoot, Crazy Eddie, can I borrow your phone to call the cops on you?" and the game would have changed while you were gone, and 2) the cops probably would have arrested YOU for causing a disturbance. While you were sitting in the cruiser you would have seen Officer McGruff admiring your recent purchase and Eddie handing it to him for his own as a token of goodwill. No, the cops would have been no use to you there and therefore your threat was no good.

Those offices--or shops, whatever-- are usually pretty messy. Now, I don't know if you would have been capable of kicking this guy's ass or anybody's ass for that matter, or not. From the tone of your posts you seem like a peaceful guy, not the ass-kicking type. But like I say, those offices are pretty messy and what you lack in violent behavior or ill-will you can make up for in brief spasms of psychotic tendencies; say, grabbing a broom, a crow bar, or one of those little gum ball or pistachio dispensers, and slamming it down on the man's desk as furiously as possible while screaming, "I'm not going to pay a lot for this muffler."

You needn't worry about Crazy Eddie-- or whatever the hell the guy's name is-- attacking you because it was never his intention in the first place. They probably contract out work like that-- have someone else kick your ass in a 7-11 lot somewhere and then steal the radio back when they're done or something. This guy is a businessman after all, he can't spend the rest of the day selling stolen car parts and dealing with customers with your teeth sticking out of his knuckles and your blood all over his shirt.

Anyway, I noticed in your post a big void: you say both of you went to your respective corners to reflect but it seems only you did. The other guy was probably figuring out what kind of time he was going to be set back by dealing with you. Ultimately, it would have been more "dishonorable" to let you get the better of him than it would be to appeal to a higher authority.

What did happen anyway? If you paid for the installation, you got suckered. I mean that dispassionately and there's no other way to put it. And the rationalization you employed that cost you so much money greatly exaggerated your power in the situation, and greatly underestimated his. Did you really think you could have him arrested or fired? ho boy. . .

in solidarity,

[redacted]

To: POETICS @ LISTSERV.ACSU.BUFFALO.EDU @ SMTPIN
cc: (bcc: Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco)
From: junction @ EARTHLINK.NET (Mark Weiss) @ SMTPIN
Date: 02/24/97 09:54:20 AM
Subject: violence and the threat of violence

Years ago, when I still lived in Brooklyn, I bought a car stereo at Crazy Eddie's and took it to the mechanic who did their installations. He told me what the service would cost me, which was pretty hefty. I was more than a little annoyed. "But they told me at the store that installation was included," I told him.

"It isn't, but you can take it up with Sal, the guy fixing his car over there. He's the dapertment manager."

So I went to talk to Sal, who got incredibly angry, and accused me of lying. "Wait a minute," I said, "I'm not accusing _you_ of anything. You weren't the salesman."

"He works for me. You accuse him you gotta deal with me."

Things went from bad to worse. Pretty soon I was threatening to talk to Sal's boss, and Sal was threatening to beat me up, to which I countered that if he did I'd call the police. There didn't seem to be any end in sight to the downward spiral.

Then I was afflicted with a rare moment of clarity. I should have known better--I lived in the neighborhood. And I did social work with working class people every day. Sal didn't really want to beat me up, and I didn't really want to have him arrested or fired. We were invoking the power moves of our respective social classes. Sal was working class--he had not been raised with the assumption that he could appeal to higher authorities to do his dirty work for him, and he probably thought it dishonorable to do so. I was middle class--I had been raised to abhor violence and the threat of violence, but also to assume that I had the power to call in the troops.

We were both doing the same thing, but in different languages. In my language Sal's provocation was to be taken more seriously than intended, as was mine in Sal's language. But they were both just power moves.

This whole series of reflections took a lot less time than it takes to write about it. I realized that I was just venting: I would have to pay anyway. What was the point of the argument? Was my honor at stake? So I backed off, and we each went to our corners.

Afterwards I reflected that I wasn't sure who was being more violent. I was threatened with a bloody nose. Sal was threatened with jail and loss of livelihood.

↑ Index

797. Maria Damon

Re: killian / pug selves

Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

oh jeez, where did personality come in? i don't know these people, only what they say or do in the public realm. and as for "morality," (making the list and checking it twice) these are not matters of abstract morality or a debased sort of judgmentalness. if a guy is misogynistic, why wd i hang around him unless there were strong incentives in the area of learning something, or unless somehow i cd pass as a guy, or unless i cd use that misogyny to my advantage (a la groupie-ism). if a guy's anti-semitic, what's in it for me to stick around? sometimes there's something worth hanging around for, sometimes not. why are the pragmatics so hard to grasp? is it that folks don't believe there are practical consequences to someone's jewbaiting, woman-hating, etc, so that these are abstract ethical issues?

At 9:45 AM -0500 2/25/97, Michael Boughn wrote:
>Well, Maria, personally, I'd find it easier to accept the proposal >that this discussion was about the intersection of poetry and politics >if anybody ever mentioned any poetry (or, god forbid, poetics). The >actual discussion seems about the intersection of personality and >politics (YAWN!). Let's see, we're makin' a list and checkin' it twice
>. . .
>
>By the way, to the guy who named his newfie Moby (sorry, I lost your >name), haven't you heard that Melville's work is now on the proscribed >list because he allegedly abused his wife? Better change the dog's >name quick.
>

>Mike
>[redacted]

↑ Index

798. shoemakers
Re: killian / pug selves
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I've only been able to read the list sporadically of late, so maybe i shld keep quiet--but i can't. I agree that there is a danger of holier than thou attitudinizing in the effort to discuss the "sins" of poets. The process can easily degenerate into unproductive fingerpointing. At the same time, i'm amazed at how ready some people are to consider any discussion of ethics as a necessarily self-righteous, misguided and "pc" sort of maneuver. We do talk about the "Pound problem" a lot on this list, and i think for many of us that's because we know precisely that we are talkinga about ourselves, and about poetry, and not just about some unexplainable rogue fascist. Perelman, for example, makes it clear in his Pound chapter that he is writing about Pound because Pound has been central to his (Perelman's) development as a poet:

"I've learned to read his language and have absorbed his fervor concerning words; I no longer want to savor decontextualized lyricism. Certainly, the vividness of his struggle ot make each word both new and true to history has been a powerful influence on poetry in America. Pound's language presenets a charged image of speed and lucidity; this charge is valuable for the future of poetry. But I want the full dynamics of Poundian light to be acknowledged; what it illuminates is always accompanied by a phobic shadow."

I think of a lot of use feel--as poets, readers, critics--that we, and poetry, have to deal with that shadow, that historically speaking poetry has too often assumed a privilege to itself (call it "decontextualized lyricism" if you like) that it can no longer afford. It's clear to me too that when we're talking about Pound we are also often talking, either implicitly or explicitly, about the Holocaust, about what it means to write poetry before, during, after Auschwitz. That's a fact of our global history that is inescapable exactly now as we continue to struggle with whit the question of globalness itself. But, still, when i say Pound's question is "our" question i want to say, yes, that we can't just read him as the evil other--but i also want to say that we can and should examine the man, and the poetry, carefully to see where he goes wrong. Pound is central to my understanding of poetry-- there's simply no way for me not to ask these questions. In my own work, which deals quite a lot with the thirties, it has been illuminating (to me) to see the various personal, political, and poetical routes taken through the period of fascism's rise. I think Pound had a lot of genuine care for the plight of the world in a period of crisis--and his response was to become a fascist. William Carlos Williams, in thrall to Pound in so many ways--and sympathetic at many points to Pound's social critique--explicitly refuses this development, and launches an attack on, and extremely compelling diagnosis of, Pound's fascism--at a relatively early point, 1941. Moreover, he does this throught a reading of Pound's poetry (specifically the opening of Canto XXX) that never denies the beautry of that poetry, even as it also never hesitates to read it for its ethical and political import. The beauty of the poem, Williams concludes, is to be found in "a pleasure and pain equally balanced which we cannot resolve." We owe it to ourselves, and to poetry, to acknowledge both that pleasure and that pain. WCW might not have been able to come to his (crucial) insight if he hadn't thought so hard about that conflict. And history isn't over yet. We've got our own historical difficulties to struggle with, and our own poetry to write.

steve

PS.

So, no, Kevin, i don't think you shld have destroyed the poem.

↑ Index

799. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Neruda and Stalinism
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Surely you jest....the media in this country simply lies pretty much outright about most issues re social policy at home and imperial machinations abroad. Not because the lies are prescribed and required, a la the Stalinist systems, but because folks are hired to do the reporting who will actually believe the US government and not independent data. Most ordinary working-class people (the majority) don't have a source available against which to check the NYT, CNN etc. The much more recent and obscenely flagrant instance of Chile, most citizens don't in any meaningful sense "know about", altho' of course the facts are "right there" in the public sphere. The thing about the current forms of consciousness characteristic of our society, that's so peculiar, is that there is no direct relationship (at least in this country) between the formal availability of data and points-of-view, and their ability to make an impact on society. (something non-mainstream poetry people should be familiar with from other contexts!)

I love the word USAmericans, by the way!

mark prejsnar

On Sun, 23 Feb 1997, George Bowering wrote:

> Mark Weiss's long message on Neruda and Stalinism in the USA was really interesting. Thanks for that.
>
> I am wondering, though: did USAmericans really believe that the overthrow of the government in Guatemala was somehow not done by the USA? I have never heard of anyone outside the USA that did not know that from the start.
>
> Oh, and if I remember rightly, Neruda helped the killers of Trotsky get out of Mexico, didnt he? Or am I mixing up a couple of things?
>
> George Bowering.
>
> ,
>
> 2499 West 37th Ave.,
> Vancouver, B.C.,
> Canada V6M 1P4
>
> fax: [redacted]
> e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

800. Alan Jen Sondheim
Please
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Please - I don't know if anyone was joking but the idea of keeping Dorn or anyone off this list vis-a-vis his or her politics is reprehensible, not funny as a joke.

I think it would be wise to disconinue these threads; they're getting a bit like witch-hunting. None of us are pure. For that matter the thread about Pound has already cycled through the list before.

I'd be interested in hearing more about the influx of women poets into the New York School. I think the same thing happened in film, Maya Deren etc. notwithstanding. There was a real shift in experimental cinema that opened the whole field (if it is such) to an entirely different form of content..

Alan

↑ Index

801. Pritchett,Pat
Re: Onward
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Brava, Lisa.

I think we've beat the dead horse quite to death. Dorn's lesser sins - which I am not under any circumstances condoning, esp. with a brother who's HIV-positive - have been magnified here to assume the status of sacrificial scapegoat for the Sins of Poetry at large. A dubious notion, to be sure. The outrage Dorn's words provoke in us points at bottom toward a sense of betrayal many seem to feel - how could one of "our own" do this? I agree with Chomsky: writers and intellectuals do carry a greater responsibility to the community because of the nature of their work; their ability to discern, etc. And clearly Dorn has not lived up to this very well, at least not recently. But when I look at him at the front of the classroom (I'm taking Brit Lit 1 with him this semester) I don't see a monster at all. Rather, just another human being, somewhat muddled (the class has been a real disappointment to me). I like Lisa's Duncan quote. Keep the critical acumen baby - throw out the vindictive bathwater.

Patrick Pritchett

From: jarnot
To: POETICS
Subject: Onward
Date: Tuesday, February 25, 1997 9:41AM

I think it's very creepy that people are being kept off this list. I've actually found this whole discussion very disturbing. Aren't there more productive things to do in this forum than get involved with name calling, etc.? I mean really-- the "coke-induced froth from his evil lips"? I've been tired of this discussion since the idea of punching people out came up. It makes me think of something that Robert Duncan says about how you can't reject Mae West as vulgar or Hitler as the enemy because that potentiality exists in everybody. I thought the people on this list were progressive thinkers and writers-- if Dorn writes nasty crap it's because he wants a reaction like this-- he's succeeded in getting people to waste their time talking about him. yours, lisa jarnot

↑ Index

802. Jordan Davis
question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem? when you are in the middle of writing a poem? when you are editing a poem?

Just curious,

Jordan

↑ Index

803. Sherry Brennan
Spell check
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Thanks, Dean Taciuch, for the poem and the line - "and the time spent will be the poem." I have a question for whoever about using citation/found language. Probably because of my academic background I have a fear about using other people's language without spelling out what is quoted--even when I recombine the words rather than quote per se. So in the past I've usually specified when language was quoted. But I'm working on a long piece that incorporates language from Darwin and various gardening texts and find myself wanting to use the language without also specifying which words come from where. I'm not sure I understand why I want to do this, or what it means to the poem.

Is there a difference between using quotation marks or some other indicator of source and not indicating the source specifically but treating the words as found language? How does this work? I don't mean technically how it works, but what kind of difference does it make to the poem or the reader? the writer?

Just something I've been wondering about. Sherry

> The call for spell-check and user dictionary files reminded me of a piece I was working on a few months ago (still not finished)-- a long poem called "rote" which is built from a 1930s speller. The speller itself simply lists words, from grade 2 through 8, but there is a sound patterning to them, based on similar spellings and words that might be confused by grade schoolers. I placed the words into lines and stanzas adding nothing but punctuation. I go back to it every once in a while, mostly to take out the punctuation I put in--not having worked with found material very often, I tended not to trust what I found. (Probably by next year I'll have worked it back to the original--just lists, that'll be it, and the time spent will be the poem.)

↑ Index

804. Steve Carll

S.F. Reading Report 2-23-97

Tue 25 Feb 1997

Los Angeles poets Paul Vangelisti (editor of _Ribot) and Martha Ronk (who, alas, doesn't yet have her own magazine) flew up to San Francisco for a reading at Canessa Park Gallery on Sunday. Host Avery E.D. Burns introduced the two poets together and they briefly read from their (relatively) recent Sun & Moon books _State of Mind_ (Ronk) and _Nemo_ (Vangelisti). Paul then left the table and let Martha carry on with selections from _Destiny in L.A._ (based on _The Tale of Genji_) and a new ms, _Run On_. After a break, Paul returned to read from a work whose name I got distracted while writing down and can't remember now. Sorry.

Some lines I picked up of Martha's were:

their eyes unnervingly swerved
I don't find you behind any eyes you open
I can stir the air
my powdered face nodding to the powdered moon I'll catch the moon in the poisoned water of a silver bowl, and drink it down the air came down to meet the paper the night is the waking blank as if knees were a causal principle for ground superimposed is the statue alive with birds things break under every stone backed to the wall, you think what you mean will come out of your mouth

Paul's lines included:

I cheered villains and loved no one but God, who I suspected had gone out at 5.
angels are privileged in name only are married angels especially misnamed?
space (noun)--1. see time love is a closet turned off and on traffic is looking up and down the stupid

There were commemorative cards made by John McBride and other printed poetry from each poet given to all the guests in attendance, who, for those keeping track (for social histories or to gather other impressions of the reading for posterity) included Leslie Scalapino, Brian Lucas, Aaron Shurin, George Albon, Fran Herndon, Benjamin Hollander, Mary Sullivan-Roark, Eric Selland, Candice (who was in the same class as Mary at Santa Cruz, but neither of them can remember which one), Barbara Guest, Mary Margaret Sloan, Spencer Selby, Norma Cole, Carol Snow, Stephen Ratcliffe, the aforementioned John McBride and, I'm told, although I haven't yet been introduced to her personally, Fanny Howe.

****

[redacted] Steve Carll
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/mags/antenym
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/antenym

In seed-
sense
the sea stars you out, innermost, forever.

--Paul Celan
****

↑ Index

805. Joe Safdie
Re: dorn, etcetera
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I agree with Ms. Jarnot -- once we get to "coke-induced froth from evil lips" we really have to step back for a while. Every so often there's glimmers of passionate intelligence regarding this topic, and then garbage. The thought of anyone censoring any presence on this list is repulsive.

Lots of people have written in to express their frustrations with this continuing topic. For any of us who know Ed it's been frustrating for other reasons, mainly for reasons of unjust character assassination. I knew and mourned Steve Abbott myself, Kevin; in fact, I was with him in the Dorns' kitchen eating breakfast one morning in about 1985, a very pleasant interlude before we both got back on the road to California from some "beat convocation" at Boulder. I assure Maria that there are a multitude of reasons to "hang around" this particular poet, and many, many things to be learned; I have to say that in twenty years of off-and-on friendship my Jewishness was never the occasion for any Jew-baiting, and that his provocative manner doesn't discriminate: he'll take on anyone or anything, but his only enemy is sanctimoniousness. We can talk about misanthropy, but any special pleader is out of luck. I'm sorry he's offended some of you, but I also think that thin skin is seldom a virtue and can often lead to virulent misunderstandings, as evidenced by some of these postings.

Let me close by quoting an early essay by Ed, "A Cup of Coffee," collected in _Views_ from Four Seasons Press in San Francisco, 1980. It dates from the same time as a letter quoted earlier on this list, but has the virtue of being his own words and thoughts, not what someone else accused him of.

"Negroes, Mexicans, Indians, Whites don't seem awfully special. It is just that, black brown white, divisions, not complex, subject to broad and crude considerations only. A god-damn cup of stinking coffee at Walgreens. Pew! I am ashamed that my brothers get stopped because of their color or the way they dress. It seems simply correct that Mississippi and Alabama and South Africa be occupied. If it were my decision, those places and a few others would be occupied tomorrow. Talk IS cheap. Talk about 'human rights' is particularly cheap. Rights have nothing to do with general colors, shapes of eyes or forms of noses. Never. Anyone might be in danger, or might be safe, but that will be determined by the incredible meanness with which America handles its people, always has handled them. The ethic is behavioral. I am a poet. It seems to me a point of honor and deep responsibility that I not number among my friends a cop, or a doctor or lawyer, or a President of the United States, or the head of an insane asylum, or a gangster. Or anyone who thinks Negroes should stay in their place and be lynched. In the meantime, how I take any given man will be my own affair, always subject to more critical factors, how he carries his body, the cast of his eyes, the tone and cadence of his voice. Race IS an exotic recognition, mostly visual, and always a momentary interest."

Joe Safdie

↑ Index

806. Christopher Alexander
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming > when you begin to write a poem? when you are in the middle of writing a > poem? when you are editing a poem?
probably just sort of a stern looking. no, videotaped evidently reveals I'm about to punch someone in the nose. mumbling or something. let's watching one now. here I am at taco bell, copying the menu onto notecards. I'd like "not gonna pay a lot for this muffle." hey. wait your turn.

ok, your turn.
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

807. amato
Re: dorn, etcetera
Tue 25 Feb 1997

joel k., i have to ask you this publicly: did you really prevent the dorns from subbing to poetics?...

that's a mistake i think---alan is right (he, uhm, beat me to the punch)...

but really now: we all know that poetics is a "private" list of sorts, but exclusion based, say, on verifiably hateful speech is just not, in my view, the right thing to do...

let me put it this way: if a neonazi poet wants to participate around here, that's OK with me... let me be clear: i despise neonazis, as i'm sure do the rest of you... now when said poet contributes in a way that reveals neonazi predisposition, why then we can, each of us to our liking, publicly correct said predisposition, or attempt to... i might argue, in another context, that this is our obligation... in any case, i have faith in our combined capacity, as a list of caring human beings, to generate the right moral-ethical-political response collectively... i doubt sincerely that permitting such an individual into these spaces will "corrupt" what i take to be the goodwill of the list in general... and in fact if i thought that the poetics folks, whatever our individual differences, were not collectively of good conscience, i wouldn't be here mself... and if i saw some "us" leaning in obviously hateful directions, i would in any case speak out, immediately, to that effect...

reconsider, please...

all best,

joe

↑ Index

808. amato
Re: dorn deletion
Tue 25 Feb 1997

and to say that i'm with lisa and kent too, on this matter of deleting the dorns...

joe

↑ Index

809. Steven Marks

Re: question which will explain things

Tue 25 Feb 1997

On Tue, 25 Feb 1997, Jordan Davis wrote:

> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming > when you begin to write a poem? when you are in the middle of writing a > poem? when you are editing a poem?
>

I find that I use a number of facial expressions since I write while standing or pacing about my room. It's almost as if I am "acting" the lines. At times, I hear the cadence first and I mumble that to myself and then try to find the words that fit. Imagine a conductor walking among the musicians. That's what I look like.

_____

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

_____

↑ Index

810. Ian Wilson

Re: question which will explain things

Tue 25 Feb 1997

In both situations -- and I've had someone in the room videotaping to confirm this -- my expression exactly matches Blake's death face.

IR Wilson

_____ Reply Separator _____
Subject: question which will explain things Author: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]> at Internet
Date: 2/25/97 11:38 AM

What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem? when you are in the middle of writing a poem? when you are editing a poem?

Just curious,

Jordan

↑ Index

811. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Onward
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I think it's fine to move on, alright....But contrary to the fashionable dissing that's going on, lots of folks who posted on this should be commended--A very large percentage of 'em really weren't primarily interested in character-attacks on Dorn or others--just trying to work out some tangled problems, that are very real, about what it means to seriously believe that social values & politix have something to do with poetry.

mark p.

On Tue, 25 Feb 1997, Pritchett,Pat @Silverplume wrote:

> Brava, Lisa.
>
> I think we've beat the dead horse quite to death. Dorn's lesser sins - which I am not under any circumstances condoning, esp. with a brother who's HIV-positive - have been magnified here to assume the status of sacrificial scapegoat for the Sins of Poetry at large. A dubious notion, to be sure. The outrage Dorn's words provoke in us points at bottom toward a sense of betrayal many seem to feel - how could one of "our own" do this? I agree with Chomsky: writers and intellectuals do carry a greater responsibility to the community because of the nature of their work; their ability to discern, etc. And clearly Dorn has not lived up to this very well, at least not recently. But when I look at him at the front of the classroom (I'm taking Brit Lit 1 with him this semester) I don't see a monster at all. Rather, just another human being, somewhat muddled (the class has been a real disappointment to me). I like Lisa's Duncan quote. Keep the critical acumen baby - throw out the vindictive bathwater.
>
> Patrick Pritchett
> ---
> From: jarnot
> To: POETICS
> Subject: Onward
> Date: Tuesday, February 25, 1997 9:41AM
>
> I think it's very creepy that people are being kept off this list. I've actually found this whole discussion very disturbing. Aren't there more productive things to do in this forum than get involved with name calling, etc.? I mean really-- the "coke-induced froth from his evil lips"? I've been tired of this discussion since the idea of punching people out came up. It makes me think of something that Robert Duncan says about how you can't reject Mae West as vulgar or Hitler as the enemy because that > potentiality exists in everybody. I thought the people on this list were progressive thinkers and writers-- if Dorn writes nasty crap it's because he wants a reaction like this-- he's succeeded in getting people to waste their time talking about him. yours, lisa jarnot

↑ Index

812. Christopher Alexander

Re: Spell check

Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

sherry wrtt:
> Is there a difference between using quotation marks or some other indicator > of source and not indicating the source specifically but treating the words > as found language? How does this work? I don't mean technically how it > works, but what kind of difference does it make to the poem or the reader?
> the writer?
its an interesting question, sherry. most of my material comes from other (known) sources--ie, others' speech, books, my own speech or wrtg done at times other than the wrtg of the poem-- & occurs with varying degrees of intervention, from verbatim to a radically altered state. but my treatment of that material has apparently been the opposite of yours, i.e. ive never cited anything except the epigraph to a book--& even thats about to go by the wayside i think. suppose this treatment because it seems to me that all utterance comes from elsewhere--that even when i speak in my own name etc. so that my wrtg from other sources could almost be said to b for the manner in which the self is assembled.

ive thought some about why people do cite. in the context of academic work it seems to be at times a kind of mooring, either for the argument (auctores etc) or the article (situating itself via the conventions of a larger discourse)--but also just a way of saying read these books. of course theres the plaigarism thing--a sort of enforced/accepted practical division. in poetry it probably sometimes has to do with establishing/maintaining/ respecting discreet personal identity, others with a desire to make evident for political/critical/philosophical reasons an interaction with certain specific texts--ie "this is a critique [or extension or appreciation or "reading"] of darwins [tennysons burkes]" etc. as to how that effects the reader might be something "oh i wonder how this relates to". wouldnt say its an apparatus external to the poem in any case, but there can be a variety of possible situations aimed at with any one device.

im curious to see how others approach this issue.

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

813. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: dorn, etcetera
Tue 25 Feb 1997

On Cybermind etc. we've had a policy (which we - Michael Current and I) agreed on in the beginning, to delete anyone promoting racial/gender/ religious slurring on the list. That is, if someone came on with the purpose of espousing slurs. Beyond that, it's not our business what any- one believes; there are some far right folk, far left folk, etc., and that's fine. I would never ever delete anyone based on knowledge of their beliefs; that's out of the question.

As a footnote, you might know that there have been groups similar to alt.tacti- cal.strategy that "attack" email lists with the purport of bringing them down, derailing them. As an aol list owner, I have add- resses (which are accurate; I've seen these people in action), and these have had to be added to the site ban slot on listserv. But that's the extent of it.

Alan

↑ Index

814. Don Cheney
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem? when you are in the middle of writing a poem? when you are editing a poem?
> Just curious,
> Jordan

okay, now we're talking STUFF! i think (because i've never looked) that when i begin to write a poem my eyes do most of the talking. i hope that my tongue moves around between my lips like i've seen kids do when they're trying to concentrate on their writing or maybe just like some cats i've seen where the tongue just stays there, slightly poking out.

when i'm in the middle of writing a poem my ears do most of the talking. And when i'm talking my talking does most of the writing. see Lisa Douglass ("I hates speech").

when i'm eating a poem my mouth does most of the talking, though i'm hard to understand--thus the seeming opaqueness of some of my poems.

Jordan, i love your questions. they're kinda like that episode of NIGHT STAND WITH DICK DIETRICK (which is a parody of daytime talk shows) where Dick shows his camping video where he mistakes a cocker spaniel puppy for a bear cub. when the video ends his guest says "Dick! Don't you know the difference between a bear cub and a cocker spaniel!" and dick says "No. but i love these! what IS the difference between a bear cub and a cocker spaniel?" and the guest starts crying and then says "My mother was killed by a bear!" To which dick, looking puzzled, asks, "that's the punch line?"

that's the punch line,
don cheney

↑ Index

815. David Israel
found [e]-poetry
Tue 25 Feb 1997

INTRA-OFFICE EMAIL brings this little sonnet (orig. words verbatim w/ linebreaks + title added):

/ / / /

It Only Takes A Moment

Just as a reminder, please be conscientious when using supplies and/or machinery in the copy rooms.

I have just spent the last 25 minutes removing a very lovely Jackson Pollock-esque creation from the doors, walls, floors and cabinets of copyroom 1, because someone failed to screw the cap back on a bottle of white-out. :::grumbling:::

It only takes a moment
to put things back in order.

// orig. text-author initials C.D.
dated 11/25/97 11:30 a.m. //

(comment: only lucky it wasn't a cross between J. Pollack & the Michelangelo of the S. Chapel) happy birthday m.

-d.i. (in Wash. DC)

↑ Index

816. dbkk
Re: dorn, etcetera
Tue 25 Feb 1997

At 9:10 AM -0800 2/25/97, Joe Safdie wrote:

> Let me close by quoting an early essay by Ed, "A Cup of Coffee," collected in _Views_ from Four Seasons Press in San Francisco, 1980. It dates from the same time as a letter quoted earlier on this list, but has the virtue of being his own words and thoughts, not what someone else accused him of.
>
> " In the meantime, how I take any given man will be my own affair, always subject to more critical factors, how he carries his body, the cast of his eyes, the tone and cadence of his voice.

A rather homoerotic passage, don't you think? I'd love to know what Dorn's criteria are for acceptable male body language.

Dodie

↑ Index

817. Matthias Regan threat of violence: what it means to "kick ass"
Tue 25 Feb 1997

At 10:47 AM 2/25/97 EST, [redacted] wrote:
>Mark:
>
>YOU should have kicked HIS ass!
>
>No wait, I am being rash. Here comes a rare movement of clarity . . .

I have to say I somewhat disagree with db's interpretation of possible outcomes to Mark's situation (though, db, I imagine from your tone that you are a little tongueincheek), largely because I don't believe the popular ideologies of auto repair shops being nec. messy and blue collar workers having a nod and wink, free merchandise relationship with the "blue collar" cops.

But I do like the continuation of the discussion along lines of "speech genres":

> In the lingo of the neighborhood I grew up in, when we discussed "power moves of respective social classes," etc. etc., you got "psyched out."

Which continues one of Mark's points, namely that:

> We were both doing the same thing, but in different languages. In my language Sal's provocation was to be taken more seriously than intended, as was mine in Sal's language. But they were both just power moves.

Two different classes making the same point at each other: and the languages are both saying the same thing and, as Mark points out later, entirely different things as well:

> Afterwards I reflected that I wasn't sure who was being more violent. I was threatened with a bloody nose. Sal was threatened with jail and loss of livelihood.

I wanted only to point out how this story about a dialogue between classes beautifully points out the complexity of the interaction between language and the world. One the one hand the two languages meet as the individuals meet: the different speech genres are understand, translated in the immediate context: both people know what the other is getting at: "I really want you to install this thing for free." "I really don't want to." But on the other hand, the speech genres are mired in and drag with them their specific (according to class) social heteroglossia: the threat of a punch in the nose could actually become a punch in the nose, the threat of calling the cops could actually become a phone call. And here the utterances diverge wildly. So in this way language carried within it not only a model for looking at group interaction (played out in a mutual reinforcing of class in a manner similar to Satre's discussion in the _Critique_ of how different economic/social classes gain their self-identification by identifiying other classes), but ALSO a model for how language may be seen not merely as an abstract system of signifier/signified, as a structural or textual system of analysis, but also as the pathway of interaction between that abstract system and the material consequences in the concrete, daily history of the world.

With this in mind, it is worth looking at the change in view effected by Michael Boughn in a neighbor thread when he charges the discussion as being not about "poetry" and politics, but about "personality" and politics. What effect does this change have on the proceeding material?

In haste,
Matthias

↑ Index

818. Maria Damon
Re: dorn deletion
Tue 25 Feb 1997

i assumed this dorn/list thing was a joke, cuz of the analogy to hitler, which no one, in my memory of the discussion, invoked.

At 10:42 AM +0600 2/25/97, KENT JOHNSON wrote:
>> Date sent: Tue, 25 Feb 1997 09:33:58 -0500
>> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group
>><[redacted]>
>> From: Joel Kuszai <[redacted]>
>> Subject: Re: dorn, etcetera
>> To: [redacted]
>
>On Tues, 25 Feb, Joel Kuszai wrote:
>>
>> As far as Mr. Northcutt's comment above: Ed & Jennifer Dorn tried to sign >> up to Poetics list several times. I deleted them like I would have Hitler, >> but to no avail, they kept re-subbing. Eventually, I let them pass >> through, with my finger on the "delete" key, I waited expectantly for some >> coke-induced froth from his evil lips--did he ever post? A search of the >> archives would reveal. As far as I know, they remained on this list until >> recently...
>
>Is this a joke? That Ed and Jennifer Dorn tried to subscribe to the >list and were repeatedly censored out? If so, I'd suggest this >discussion that people are "getting tired of" has acquired a new >sense of urgency! Holy cow.
>
>Kent
>
>Kent>

↑ Index

819. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Re: Onward/censorship
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Many thanks to Lisa Jarnot and Maxine Chernoff for their letters. The spectre of censorship and violence being raised is disturbing--encountered a few times--back in late Sixties running a mimeo zine in basement banned by high school and attacked for a week by Manchester Union Leader on front page for a week--(only to be called by Library of Congress wanting a copy--)--and in Seventies doing book reviews for Gay Community News in Boston--an editor was killed--and the premises looted then fire bombed-- Being told at restaurants half empty there were no seats for my first wife and I--(no dirty half and mixed breeds allowed) had a strange kind of halfwaking dream--with voice over by Nicholas Cage--in the manner in which he narrates his dreams in the film Raising Arizona--and what would future biographers do--with the letters of the gentle religious poet who threated violence--and the poet who taped a critic and threatened its use in a debate--would these be taken out of the bio?--and onward the voice moved through many a time and place and came to that accused cleric killer and college robber M. Francois Villon--what to do with him?--who wrote these lines:

> I never work and yet I go all out
> To acquire wealth which I don't want,
> Who speaks most kindly irritates me most,
> Most truthfully will lie to me the most,
> The person is my friend who makes me think
> That a white swan is a black crow,
> He who harms me thinks he helps me out,
> Falsehood, truth, to me they're both the same,
> I remember all things and can't conceive of one,
> Warmly welcomed, rebuffed by everyone.

(from "Ballade" in The Poems of Francois Villon french and english edition Translation and introduction by Galway Kinnell. NY: Signet Classic, 1965: 185-7) This world is one of violence and censorship. To be opposed to this--does it make sense to threaten these? The two go hand in hand.
A few years ago, in a weekly group for dealing with violence at the Spanish Center, there was a man who spoke constantly of his missing younger brother--vanished by then for two years. One day the young man came in in complete shock. Jeffrey Dahmer had identified the young man's brother as one of his vicitims. As proof he gave the police the skull with wired jaw intact--and not a tooth missing. And all day long that silenced mouth screamed in the streets of Milwaukee--from the living mouth of the younger brother. --dbchirot

On Tue, 25 Feb 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> in response to joel kuszai's post:
>
> "As far as Mr. Northcutt's comment above: Ed & Jennifer Dorn tried to sign up to Poetics list several times. I deleted them like I would have Hitler, but to no avail, they kept re-subbing. Eventually, I let them pass > through, with my finger on the "delete" key, I waited expectantly for some coke-induced froth from his evil lips--did he ever post? A search of the archives would reveal. As far as I know, they remained on this list until recently..."

>
> I think it's very creepy that people are being kept off this list. I've actually found this whole discussion very disturbing. Aren't there more productive things to do in this forum than get involved with name calling, etc.? I mean really-- the "coke-induced froth from his evil lips"? I've been tired of this discussion since the idea of punching people out came up. It makes me think of something that Robert Duncan says about how you can't reject Mae West as vulgar or Hitler as the enemy because that potentiality exists in everybody. I thought the people on this list were progressive thinkers and writers-- if Dorn writes nasty crap it's because he wants a reaction like this-- he's succeeded in getting people to waste their time talking about him. yours, lisa jarnot

↑ Index

820. Mark Weiss

Re: violence and the threat of violence

Tue 25 Feb 1997

I thought I was writing about the social meanings of behaviors and how they can be misinterpreted. Who "won" is rather beside the point. But I'm macho enough to set the record straight. Crazy Eddie's was a chain of discount houses, not a person. The garage was in fact an outside contractor. I could have used the phone. Sal was there using the facilities to fix his own car on his own time because he was a friend of the establishment, not as a perc. I was bigger than him. If he'd thrown a punch I could have insisted on his arrest--that's the law. I know this for a fact: I've seen it happen, and I've had to bail people out that it's happened to. The police might have tried to dissuade me from filing charges, but they couldn't have stopped me. And arrest probably would have resulted in firing. I have been known to use violence effectively and without reflection when my safety or the safety of others required. I also didn't think that I stood a chance with the bureaucracy of that particular establishment. And it was still a pretty good price for a stereo that now lives in my truck, having survived two cars. I was raised on the same streets that Sal was, and by the same rules. But those are the rules of children and adolescents. We were two guys in our late thirties; I had the option to change the rules. I don't care in the slightest what Sal made of all this, nor do I understand why I should. There is the question of cost-effectiveness. Predators often pass up prey because, although they could take the beast, the risk of even minor injury is too great--being off-peak can mean certain death. That factor is always in play. But humans, with our long memories, make other calculation. What would I have gained? "The expense of passion in a waste of shame," as the man said, "is death in life." What jungle do you live in?

At 10:47 AM 2/25/97 EST, you wrote:
>Mark:
>
>YOU should have kicked HIS ass!
>
>No wait, I am being rash. Here comes a rare movement of clarity . . .
>
>In the lingo of the neighborhood I grew up in, when we discussed "power moves >of respective social classes," etc. etc., you got "psyched out." A psych-out >is a line in the sand (in the desert of intimidation) which the loser won't >cross. It's my bet that that line is (or was) policy at Crazy Eddie's. In >fact, if you had crossed just two more lines in that office you may have got >what you wanted. A threat to call the police may work in some arenas, but >here you were misplaying your cards. (How many metahpor-cliches can I go?)
>
>Actually, if you HAD called the police, 1) you would have had to leave the >office-- you could hardly say, "oh shoot, Crazy Eddie, can I borrow your phone >to call the cops on you?" and the game would have changed while you were gone, >and 2) the cops probably would have arrested YOU for causing a disturbance.
>While you were sitting in the cruiser you would have seen Officer McGruff >admiring your recent purchase and Eddie handing it to him for his own as a >token of goodwill. No, the cops would have been no use to you there and >therefore your threat was no good.
>
>Those offices--or shops, whatever-- are usually pretty messy. Now, I don't know >if you would have been capable of kicking this guy's ass or anybody's ass for >that matter, or not. From the tone of your posts you seem like a peaceful guy, >not the ass-kicking type. But like I say, those offices are pretty messy and >what you lack in violent behavior or ill-will you can make up for in brief >spasms of psychotic tendencies; say, grabbing a broom, a crow bar, or one of >those little gum ball or pistachio dispensers, and slamming it down on the >man's desk as furiously as possible while screaming, "I'm not going to pay a >lot for this muffler."
>
>You needn't worry about Crazy Eddie-- or whatever the hell the guy's name

is-- >attacking you because it was never his intention in the first place. They >probably contract out work like that-- have someone else kick your ass in a >7-11 lot somewhere and then steal the radio back when they're done or >something. This guy is a businessman after all, he can't spend the rest of the >day selling stolen car parts and dealing with customers with your teeth >sticking out of his knuckles and your blood all over his shirt.
>
>Anyway, I noticed in your post a big void: you say both of you went to your >respective corners to reflect but it seems only you did. The other guy was >probably figuring out what kind of time he was going to be set back by dealing >with you. Ultimately, it would have been more "dishonorable" to let you get >the better of him than it would be to appeal to a higher authority.
>
>What did happen anyway? If you paid for the installation, you got suckered. I >mean that dispassionately and there's no other way to put it. And the >rationalization you employed that cost you so much money greatly exaggerated >your power in the situation, and greatly underestimated his. Did you really >think you could have him arrested or fired? ho boy. . .
>
>in solidarity,
>
>
>[redacted]
>
>
>
>
>
>To: POETICS @ LISTSERV.ACSU.BUFFALO.EDU @ SMTPIN
>cc: (bcc: Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco)
>From: junction @ EARTHLINK.NET (Mark Weiss) @ SMTPIN
>Date: 02/24/97 09:54:20 AM
>Subject: violence and the threat of violence
>
>Years ago, when I still lived in Brooklyn, I bought a car stereo at Crazy >Eddie's and took it to the mechanic who did their installations. He told me >what the service would cost me, which was pretty hefty. I was more than a >little annoyed. "But they told me at the store that installation was >included," I told him.
>

>"It isn't, but you can take it up with Sal, the guy fixing his car over >there. He's the dapertment manager."
>
>So I went to talk to Sal, who got incredibly angry, and accused me of lying.
>"Wait a minute," I said, "I'm not accusing _you_ of anything. You weren't >the salesman."
>
>"He works for me. You accuse him you gotta deal with me."
>
>Things went from bad to worse. Pretty soon I was threatening to talk to >Sal's boss, and Sal was threatening to beat me up, to which I countered that >if he did I'd call the police. There didn't seem to be any end in sight to >the downward spiral.
>
>Then I was afflicted with a rare moment of clarity. I should have known >better--I lived in the neighborhood. And I did social work with working >class people every day. Sal didn't really want to beat me up, and I didn't >really want to have him arrested or fired. We were invoking the power moves >of our respective social classes. Sal was working class--he had not been >raised with the assumption that he could appeal to higher authorities to do >his dirty work for him, and he probably thought it dishonorable to do so. I >was middle class--I had been raised to abhor violence and the threat of >violence, but also to assume that I had the power to call in the troops.
>
>We were both doing the same thing, but in different languages. In my >language Sal's provocation was to be taken more seriously than intended, as >was mine in Sal's language. But they were both just power moves.
>
>This whole series of reflections took a lot less time than it takes to write >about it. I realized that I was just venting: I would have to pay anyway.
>What was the point of the argument? Was my honor at stake? So I backed off, >and we each went to our corners.
>
>Afterwards I reflected that I wasn't sure who was being more violent. I was >threatened with a bloody nose. Sal was threatened with jail and loss of >livelihood.
>
>

↑ Index

821. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

personally, i find myself getting this completely blank, walled over expression. i'll blaze away, feel quite frantic if there is any time pressure on me to go somewhere else (there usually is), and when i get the last bit i can off, frequently find my hair sticking straight on end (espeically in the front) where my hands have pushed it back, my muscles (esp. back) hurt from being completely immobile, and it is at least forty-five minutes later than i thought...

same editing/ same working on already started poem/ same prose

i cannot KNOW what my expression is, because i can't see myself, but suspect from facial muscles that i look like an extra from Coma except my eyes are open. e

↑ Index

822. Mark Weiss
Re: Spell check
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Standard in such cases is a brief note at the head or after.

At 11:46 AM 2/25/97 -0500, you wrote: >Thanks, Dean Taciuch, for the poem and the line - "and the time spent will >be the poem." I have a question for whoever about using citation/found >language. Probably because of my academic background I have a fear about >using other people's language without spelling out what is quoted--even when >I recombine the words rather than quote per se. So in the past I've usually >specified when language was quoted. But I'm working on a long piece that >incorporates language from Darwin and various gardening texts and find >myself wanting to use the language without also specifying which words come >from where. I'm not sure I understand why I want to do this, or what it >means to the poem.
>
>Is there a difference between using quotation marks or some other indicator >of source and not indicating the source specifically but treating the words >as found language? How does this work? I don't mean technically how it >works, but what kind of difference does it make to the poem or the reader?
>the writer?
>
>Just something I've been wondering about. Sherry
>

>>The call for spell-check and user dictionary files reminded me of a piece I >>was working on a few months ago (still not finished)-- a long poem called >>"rote" which is built from a 1930s speller. The speller itself simply >>lists words, from grade 2 through 8, but there is a sound patterning to >>them, based on similar spellings and words that might be confused by grade >>schoolers. I placed the words into lines and stanzas adding nothing but >>punctuation. I go back to it every once in a while, mostly to take out the >>punctuation I put in--not having worked with found material very often, I >>tended not to trust what I found. (Probably by next year I'll have worked >>it back to the original--just lists, that'll be it, and the time spent will >>be the poem.)
>
>

↑ Index

823. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

deletion

Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

a while back, i remember someone pennamed "filch" posted what he claimed was a graffiti exchange he found on bathroom walls. the graffiti was a very disturbing plea from a woman to a man for him to meet her -- foreign names, phones numbers, extremely private if genuine, and, whether genuine or fake, having absolutely nothing to do with any discussion past or ongoing on list and a complete intrusion on people's time. "filch" continued posting bits of uninteresting, pointless texts along with flamebait. his posts, large in number (we only get 50 posts per day... ONLY! are we crazy! but we use them up frequently, so assume some limitations on space to post) began overwhelming mailings. after a number of these numerous posts (his posts always went out in duplicate, making his electronic "loudness" even more distressing), some of which were over 5 "screen" pages in length (i remember one was something like 18), he disappeared from list to my great relief.

shortly after, he confirmed everything i had disliked about the posts and intolerable mail-bombing by sending out a series of spam letters to members on list -- spam is, for uninitiated, electronic "junk" mail which, in sufficient numbers, can and frequently does shut down servors and is strongly rejected by internet community. i think it has even been made illegal. on receipt of spam, usual mode is to write host of spammer, inform them customer/client is spamming, and request offending account be closed down, and, and this is what i mean by STRONG internet disapproval, it usually is.

several list members did this and i (don't know about anyone else) got a somewhat threatening, and certainly unpleasant, note from "filch" regarding my note to his host.

i, too, have some problems with "deletion" of listmembers, but would like to see possibility kept on if only for the particularly noxious problems like filch. the problem with neo-nazi type poster, to my mind, would be waste of electron space, potential for abuse of list members, and possibility that some newbie might get taken by innocuous-seeming post and then sucked into electronic vacuum of energy-sapping correspondence, perhaps even threatened, before they found out enough to extricate.

i suppose what i am saying at too-great length is that i would reserve deletion for only VERY extreme cases. but i would like to see it kept as a possibility. i know i wrote to po-listmaster to ask that filch be taken off -- i believe that was after his four over-20,000 bit postings caught me off gaurd in my mailreading and tied my computer up for about 10 minutes...

> not frothing at the mouth but i was then...
> e

--OAA22669.856897441/life.ai.mit.edu--

↑ Index

824. Ian Wilson
Re[2]: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

don cheney wrote:

> that episode of NIGHT STAND WITH DICK DIETRICK (which is a parody of daytime talk shows)

My claim to fame has to do with the actor who plays Dick. His name is Tim Stack and, prior to this latest show of his, I was his computer tutor for about 5 years.

IR Wilson

↑ Index

825. k.a. hehir
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

> At 11:18 AM 2/25/97 MDT, you wrote:
> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem

the boy with the faraway eyes. right hand cranking an invisible victrola. long body pretzled. soundtrack (off-camera)"quick, somebody unfold kevin!"

kevin hehir

↑ Index

826. DS
Re: killian / pug selves
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Sorry too late i'd have to get a virgin to piss in the bilges

DAn

> By the way, to the guy who named his newfie Moby (sorry, I lost your name), haven't you heard that Melville's work is now on the proscribed list because he allegedly abused his wife? Better change the dog's name quick.
>
> Mike
> [redacted]

↑ Index

827. shoemakers
Re: dorn deletion
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I dunno, i think it's probably not a joke. And if not, it's very disturbing. No way anyone shld be barred from the list before the fact, i.e. before actually posting material that might be felt by list administrators to violate acceptable standards. And just for the record, i really admire Slinger, so some of the same things i said about Pound, about having to read for both the pleasure and the pain, wld (for me) apply to Dorn too. steve

On Tue, 25 Feb 1997, Maria Damon wrote:

> i assumed this dorn/list thing was a joke, cuz of the analogy to hitler, which no one, in my memory of the discussion, invoked.
>
> At 10:42 AM +0600 2/25/97, KENT JOHNSON wrote:
> Date sent: Tue, 25 Feb 1997 09:33:58 -0500
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group
> <[redacted]>
> From: Joel Kuszai <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: dorn, etcetera
> To: [redacted]

> On Tues, 25 Feb, Joel Kuszai wrote:
>
> As far as Mr. Northcutt's comment above: Ed & Jennifer Dorn tried to sign up to Poetics list several times. I deleted them like I would have Hitler, but to no avail, they kept re-subbing. Eventually, I let them pass through, with my finger on the "delete" key, I waited expectantly for some coke-induced froth from his evil lips--did he ever post? A search of the archives would reveal. As far as I know, they remained on this list until recently...
>
> Is this a joke? That Ed and Jennifer Dorn tried to subscribe to the list and were repeatedly censored out? If so, I'd suggest this discussion that people are "getting tired of" has acquired a new sense of urgency! Holy cow.
>
> Kent
>
> Kent>

Steve Shoemaker

↑ Index

828. Matthias Regan
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

At 11:18 AM 2/25/97 MDT, you wrote:
>> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming >> when you begin to write a poem?

languid. relaxed. eyes half closed. gentle breathing, soft sigh thru the nose. This is because try as I might to shake it loose some unremembered teenage inner voice of angst got confused and now my muse speaks in the sonorous & somnolent, breathy tones of garrison keillor

I do my best to write despite (to spite) that inner voice

↑ Index

829. David Kellogg
Re: dorn deletion
Tue 25 Feb 1997

At 12:26 PM 2/25/97 -0600, Maria Damon wrote:
>i assumed this dorn/list thing was a joke, cuz of the analogy to hitler, >which no one, in my memory of the discussion, invoked.

Is Hitler on the POETICS list?
~~~
~~~

joe

↑ Index

831. Dave Zauhar
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

> At 11:18 AM 2/25/97 MDT, you wrote:
> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem

Seriously? Well, my wife says I look like Marty Feldman if he were playing a wacky gynecologist in a John Waters movie. I'm not sure what she means by that, nor do I want to know.

David Zauhar

↑ Index

832. shoemakers
Re: deletion
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Ok, glad the post from Joel was a joke (tho one might be forgiven, perhaps, for succumbing to the uncertainties--of tone, stance, motive etc-- inherent in this medium, and thus not being quite sure...).

i too have found the whole "punch in the mouth" approach to ethics pretty tiresome...

Steve Shoemaker

↑ Index

833. Sylvester Pollet
Re: Spell check
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Sherry, you might take a look at some of David Gordon's work to see how a conscientious collagist works with the citation problem. The National Poetry Foundation is publishing his (ongoing) ten volume work, & you can see descriptions of it on the NPF website http://www.ume.maine.edu/~npf/ I also published a piece of the forthcoming fourth volume (or now perhaps 2-volume sequence) STEM as #8 in my Backwoods Broadsides Chaplet Series. If you send me your address, I'll send you that--it's essentially 5 pages of poetry, and one of notes documenting sources, but the poetic text is free of numbers or symbols. Simple, elegant, ethical, legal! p.s. Which Darwin texts are you working with?

> Thanks, Dean Taciuch, for the poem and the line - "and the time spent will be the poem." I have a question for whoever about using citation/found language. Probably because of my academic background I have a fear about using other people's language without spelling out what is quoted--even when I recombine the words rather than quote per se. So in the past I've usually specified when language was quoted. But I'm working on a long piece that incorporates language from Darwin and various gardening texts and find myself wanting to use the language without also specifying which words come from where. I'm not sure I understand why I want to do this, or what it means to the poem.
>
> Is there a difference between using quotation marks or some other indicator of source and not indicating the source specifically but treating the words as found language? How does this work? I don't mean technically how it works, but what kind of difference does it make to the poem or the reader? the writer?
>
> Just something I've been wondering about. Sherry
>
> The call for spell-check and user dictionary files reminded me of a piece I was working on a few months ago (still not finished)-- a long poem called "rote" which is built from a 1930s speller. The speller itself simply lists words, from grade 2 through 8, but there is a sound patterning to them, based on similar spellings and words that might be confused by grade schoolers. I placed the words into lines and stanzas adding nothing but punctuation. I go back to it every once in a while, mostly to take out the punctuation I put in--not having worked with found material very often, I tended not to trust what I found. (Probably by next year I'll have worked it back to the original--just lists, that'll be it, and the time spent will be the poem.)

↑ Index

834. Joel Kuszai

Re: question which will explain things

Tue 25 Feb 1997

Sorry for my sarcasm,\ but I find myself sick of reading of people who are willing to punch other people in the nose. I have to add and delete people to the list and only one time did I ever delete anyone against their will, and that was after great distress and consultation with Charles and Loss.

The Dorns wrote and asked if they could sub and I subbed them.

I am not sure, and this is my whole point (if you need to be let in on it) when it was that they unsubbed. It is a tedium-exhaustium cleaning up around the poettics store, mopping up after this often brilliant exchage goign on here--I don't often keep track of when people leave. But a check yesterday showed there were no longer on the list...

A question: if you are going to say these things, does it change them if that person is listening? I wish I could say he wasn't...

↑ Index

835. Joel Kuszai
Re: deletion
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Filch was the only one I ever deleted although I am sure he eventually tried and did resub under a different name address. He wrote threatening stuff to me for a while but figured he gave up (he didn't seem to be interested in poetics, which is a criteria for list membership, btw)

On Tue, 25 Feb 1997, Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest wrote:

> a while back, i remember someone pennamed "filch" posted what he claimed was a graffiti exchange he found on bathroom walls. the graffiti was a very disturbing plea from a woman to a man for him to meet her -- foreign names, phones numbers, extremely private if genuine, and, whether genuine or fake, having absolutely nothing to do with any discussion past or ongoing on list and a complete intrusion on people's time. "filch" continued posting bits of uninteresting, pointless texts along with flamebait. his posts, large in number (we only get 50 posts per day... ONLY! are we crazy! but we use them up frequently, so assume some limitations on space to post) began overwhelming mailings. after a number of these numerous posts (his posts always went out in duplicate, making his electronic "loudness" even more distressing), some of which were over 5 "screen" pages in length (i remember one was something like 18), he disappeared from list to my great relief.
>
> shortly after, he confirmed everything i had disliked about the posts and intolerable mail-bombing by sending out a series of spam letters to members on list -- spam is, for uninitiated, electronic "junk" mail which, in sufficient numbers, can and frequently does shut down servors and is strongly rejected by internet community. i think it has even been made illegal. on receipt of spam, usual mode is to write host of spammer, inform them customer/client is spamming, and request offending account be closed down, and, and this is what i mean by STRONG internet disapproval, it usually is.
>
> several list members did this and i (don't know about anyone else) got a somewhat threatening, and certainly unpleasant, note from "filch" regarding my note to his host.

> i, too, have some problems with "deletion" of listmembers, but would like to see possibility kept on if only for the particularly noxious problems like filch. the problem with neo-nazi type poster, to my mind, would be waste of electron space, potential for abuse of list members, and possibility that some newbie might get taken by innocuous-seeming post and then sucked into electronic vacuum of energy-sapping correspondence, perhaps even threatened, before they found out enough to extricate.
>
> i suppose what i am saying at too-great length is that i would reserve deletion for only VERY extreme cases. but i would like to see it kept as a possibility. i know i wrote to po-listmaster to ask that filch be taken off -- i believe that was after his four over-20,000 bit postings caught me off gaurd in my mailreading and tied my computer up for about 10 minutes...
>
> > not frothing at the mouth but i was then...
> > e
>
> --OAA22669.856897441/life.ai.mit.edu--

↑ Index

836. Pritchett,Pat

Re: question which will explain things

Tue 25 Feb 1997

Michael Jordan - full extension - tongue lolling out.
"Ohmigod it's off the rim!"

From: Dave Zauhar
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: question which will explain things
Date: Tuesday, February 25, 1997 4:46PM

> At 11:18 AM 2/25/97 MDT, you wrote:
> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem

Seriously? Well, my wife says I look like Marty Feldman if he were playing a wacky gynecologist in a John Waters movie. I'm not sure what she means by that, nor do I want to know.

David Zauhar

↑ Index

837. Schuchat Simon
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

No face.

↑ Index

838. Douglas
Re: Mac Wellman play
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Marjorie Perloff wrote:
>
> Have just had the good fortune to see Mac Wellman's new play at the Ivy > Substation in LA and want to urge those of you in the LA area to go! It's > called "The lesser Magoo" and has music by Michael Roth from San > Diego--really brilliant. Anyway, Mac's play takes off on just about > everything in our society from political rhetoric to New Age to the > standard interview (which made me think of the MLA interviews for job > candidates)--and the language is extraordinary--with its "unusualists".
> It's only one one more week (through Sat night March 1) and I hope some > readers of this list will get to see it--great acting too.
>
> Marjorie Perloff

I can certainly second Marjorie's comments. The play was just spectacular--in true sense. A musical that is at the same time a remarkably serious satire and slightly crazed family saga.

Douglas Messerli

↑ Index

839. Douglas
Re: playwrights
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I might just mention that Sun & Moon is about to publish John Jesurun's EVERYTHING THAT RISES MUST CONVERGE. Sun & Moon is also the publisher of four of Mac Wellman's plays, a book of his poetry, and two of his novels.

I'll soon post a listing and poetics discount for these books.

And----I might add that we are soon to publish Fiona Templeton's play DELIRIUM OF INTERPRETATIONS.

Douglas Messerli

F.A. Templeton wrote:
>
> Not to downplay Mac's talent (Mac Wellman), which I applaud, but I have > another candidate here: John Jesurun. John is not as published as Mac, > but a) his Chang in a Void Moon is a landmark in theatre. It was a > serial, (much imitated since as a form) every Monday night, 2 showings, at > the Pyramid Club in the early 80s. (Speaking of prolific) John would go > home after the show, write the next episode, cast and rehearse it by the > next week. The main character was played by a man and a woman, one > character (the Infanta) was played by a chair, and the action took > place in several centuries simultaneously. His staging (he directed > too) was absolutely seminal. Actors included John Kelly, Steve > Buscemi, Anna Kohler etc etc. The plot proliferated to the point where > John's intro before the show of the story so far was a verbal tour de > force which should have been saved for literary history. Chang has been > revived in continuation a couple of times, including upcoming this March > or April at The Kitchen, for episodes 50-something to 60-something.
>
> and b) check out his Philoktetes, in Yale Theatre mag a couple of years > ago, for some of the best American language onstage ever, in a work of > dizzying savagery. It was written for Ron Vawter before he died.
>
> And lots more in between. John's EVERYTHING THAT RISES MUST CONVERGE
> should at last be coming out from Sun & Moon soon (eh, Douglas?) but > there's also a huge body of produced work.
>
> GO SEE IT! That's what playwrights write for.
>
> And let's not forget Richard Foreman.
>
> On Sat, 22 Feb 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:
>
> > I don't think Mac ever published a mag; if he did, it was before he came to > > New York in the 70's. He did edit a collection of theater criticism and I > > think two collections of contemporary plays. And of course he has published > > several books of poems and novels, mostly with Sun&Moon. I wrote the intro > > to his first major poetry collection, which was published by New Rivers.

> > Mac has one a bunch of Obies. He may be the most prolific playwright since > > Lope da Vega, and he's probably the best we've got. At his best he's great.
> > And I use the term advisedly.
> >

↑ Index

840. Jordan Davis
Steal home
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I suppose David Jones' locka is the one to break into here .. anathemata being a hill of footnotes, yes? I understand poets at the wrtrs wrkshp in w have to cite any sources of found text in poems they workshop -- speaking as someone who has been shakespeare-shy because of the folger experience of interrupted reading -- sorry! textual people -- I am grateful that Pound Olson and Berrigan didn't find it necessary to append notes, preferring to include their sources when they were _poetically_ interesting as well .. steal home .. J

↑ Index

841. Douglas
Re: Mac Wellman play
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Dear Alaric Sumner:

Mac is not on this list, but I'll be glad to forward the comments to him.
Incidentally, this new play, THE LESSER MAGOO, is the fourth play in what is now called the CROWTET. The first two plays of the CROWTET were A MURDER OF CROWS and THE HYACINTH MACAW (winner of The America Award for the best drama of 1994), published together by Sun & Moon Press as TWO PLAYS. We're reissuing this volume along with CROWTET 2 (consisting of SECOND-HAND SMOKE and THE LESSER MAGOO) this next season.

Douglas Messerli

Alaric Sumner wrote:
>
> I would be interested in a more detailed "enthusiasm" from Marjorie Perloff > (or (forefend) the opposite) from other people who have seen Mac Wellman's > play since I will not be able to see it (unless it tours to UK). Either > list if you think others will be interested, or if preferred, email me > direct with comments. Is Mac on this list? Is he emailable? Have the poems > of his I published in "words worth 2:1" been published in book form?

↑ Index

842. Mark Weiss
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

Maybe it would be a good idea if we all pretended that whoever we're going after is in fact listening. This wouldn't preclude criticism, but it might temper it so that it fell short of character assassination.
Except in life and death situations manners do count (and sometimes even then).
>
>A question: if you are going to say these things, does it change them if >that person is listening? I wish I could say he wasn't...
>
>

↑ Index

843. Ron Silliman
Bookfair fire (Calcutta)
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I take the liberty of reproducing the following letter, which appeared in the Times (London) a few days ago. Apologies for anyone who receives it twice (cross-posting).

Jane Stemp
Oxford University Early Printed Books Project

+++++++++

Bookfair fire

> From Mr Matthew Evans

Sir, At 3.25 pm on February 3 the Calcutta Bookfair burnt down (News in brief, February 4). Behind this bald statement lies the fact that in just over 40 minutes fire, aided by a strong wind, burnt down more than 600 publishers' stands, killing one person and injuring 44. The 22-strong delegation of British publishers, led by me, were well insured and their livelihoods were not threatened by what had happened. However, of the 600 or so stands destroyed about 400 were manned by small publishers, publishing in Bengali, whose stands were not insured. In many cases money had been borrowed to exhibit at the fair. Book-purchasing in Calcutta is quite different from elsewhere. There are very few bookshops in the city and the fair is the focal point of the year for these small publishers, where they do about 50 per cent of their annual business. Many of not most of them have been ruined by the fire and imaginative ways must be devised to get them back on their feet. In consultation with the British Council in Calcutta those British publishers who attended the fair have started a fund to help the smaller Indian publishers. We hope that enough money will be raised to alleviate in some small way the horrific burden on firms which lost everything.

Yours sincerely.
Matthew Evans,
c/o Publishers Association
19 Bedford Square, [London] WC1

↑ Index

844. amato
Re: question which will explain things
Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

joel, thanx for the clarification... happy to hear you were joking...

best,

joe, who obviously will get fooled again

↑ Index

845. Joel Kuszai
brief explano
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I'm sorry if my stress about the projects which are coming "to a head" (and where did that expression come from?) caused me to bristle at some of the recent discourse on the list. It is an important place for me and I'm an ardent defender of the poetics-list here (in buffalo, not internet) even when my friends dismiss it for lack of time, the ennui it often causes (or presupposes), or for the petit simulacrum of a conversation that many of us are lucky to have in the college-type-environment. My stress is related to the fact that I am presently extended about as far as is humanly possible and am about to hand in 1) chapter of diss. on Mac Low, Goodman, and "anarcho-formalists" and their theories of education, among other things. It's actually a couple of chapters but it's "what I want to do" now, and the first chapter deadline is a bureaucratic requirement which will enable me to stay here an "indentured servant" at Buffalo for one more year. 2) another project: a book manuscript, for which the publisher has been wanting for some time, edited by me (of all people). 3) Meow Press. If you have sent something to me in the last year, please be patient. I am more than a year behind and was ready to give up the project (I'll post something to poetics that I sent out here locally, a "eulogy" for Meow Press which I wrote last December). Since meeting with D.J. Messerli of SUN & MOON, and seeing what he's up to while out in Cali in January (working in UCSD archives) I have decided NOT to give up Meow Press, which I thought I would let die once I finished out the 12+ books which are on the hotplate. Thanks Douglass. But it will be summer before I pick up the ball and run with it again. The afternoon with him reinvigorated my desire to get good literature out there and to keep at it even though I have this giant grey-streak of hair a la pepe lepew...So, if you have sent something, please be patient. The press is currently dormant. I'll be moving at the end of April and will instigate a new workshop at new address (in Buffalo). Sorry for the delays. Finally, a final project haunts me, my commitment to the Small Press Collective which was born in 1990 at Reed College and which is about to be ressurected here under the auspices of Alicia Cohen (who worked on the original with me and others back then) and others yet to be determined. This is a big project which will have a minimal investment from me, but it seems that without my push and insanity might not really get going (if no one is finally interested, it wont). We are operating under the signs of David Cohn-Bendit and Angela Davis, let alone Bayard Rustin and MAC LOW--my eternal hero. More on all this later...

I will post something that I'm posting here locally, where most of the buffalonian poetic-tasters do their own chat...in the hopes of catching someone who might be astray, gaining emotional, financial or support in the form of labor and energy...I'm sorry if it seems too local.

Again, I apologize if my attempt at humor went astray. Please forgive. Your humble janitor, JK

↑ Index

846. Joel Kuszai
SMALL PRESS COLLECTIVE
Tue 25 Feb 1997

---

return of the
SMALL PRESS COLLECTIVE

The first meeting of the newly reconstituted SMALL PRESS COLLECTIVE will be on Thursday, February 27, 1997, at 5pm at Spot Cafe, on the corner of Chippewa and Delaware in the heart of downtown Buffalo, New York.

The purpose of this meeting is organizational, to announce the intentions of the group, which are still in formation.

Recent events have made it necessary that we meet and discuss our plans as a "group" or "program." At our last hearing, the status of the future possibility of renting a shared space was left undecided. The two main proposals for the use of such space are basically as follows: 1) a so-called clubhouse, multi-purpose shared facility; and 2) a shared workshop or production space. These two positions are not necessarily opposed so much as they are both wrongly aimed and based on misconceptions of certain key questions concerning issues of community. Unlimited access to a shared space is highly unlikely. Therefore, there can be no "open" space such as Room 412 in Clemens Hall. But limited access to a space supposedly shared by all [in whatever group is defined at the beginning] is bound to be a difficult issue, not only socially, but also in terms of security and liability. It is an issue not easily resolved without either (1) constructing a hierarchy; and/or (2) some form of limited access. Assuming that there would be public events held at the space (perhaps a party or a reading) perhaps a pre-constructed limit is the best way of resolving Responsibility in its many forms. A smaller group will handle the distribution of responsibility/burden and problem of authority with greater ease than a large group, especially when often the only thing shared by the members of the group is grad-student status [we're seeking non-graduate student members and soon none of us will be graduate students and will have to face up to our various professionalisms in the face of real desires]. Besides, a smaller, independent student club is more likely to have success obtaining a lease than is a nebulous amalgam of disinterested bystanders whose tacit consent is buoyed only by a rigorous but impotent argumentativeness. The Poetics Program isn't anything to us, we don't avow even disavowal of its ways.

We propose that several of us students and interested partisans of all sorts and types meet together to form an action committee. The committee's basic activities would be to serve as an association of self-starters and communalist co-conspirators in producing written and encoded documents of all kinds, in all media, forms and venues. We'll invite our fellow compatriots among department Faculty and those from the so-called "real world." With the option to buy a letter press and an offset press for $500 and with the immediate necessity that we make up our collective minds about seeking space in the coming ArtSPACE @ Tri-Main complex, the time to act is now.

We propose a publishing collective as essentially collaborative, with the benefit of being fully optional. Who of us is willing to work? A general informational-organizational meeting will be called soon. All interested are welcome! Needed positions/skills include: writers, editors, printers, critics, poets, artists, designers-- what else?--contact us at Small Press Collective, 438 Clemens Hall, SUNY-Buffalo, Buffalo, NY 14260 [we will eventually secure an address "off-campus"]. Or inquire at the following e- mail addresses (do not post replies to Poetics or Core-L lists, PLEASE! This will be the last public posting on this matter) for more info:

[redacted]

↑ Index

847. Brigham Taylor
Manhattan Share/Apt. available
Tue 25 Feb 1997

I wouldn't normally post this on the list, but I'm exploring every option. I need someone to share a (really) large 2 bedroom apartment on the Lower East Side (Ridge Street, 2 blocks south of Houston) by March 15 or April 1. It's $1200 a month ($600 each), and you have the option of taking over the whole apartment on the first of July. It's a great space at a good price. If you or anyone you know might be interested, backchannel me,

Thanks
Brigham Taylor
[redacted]

↑ Index

848. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)
Re: Sad News
Tue 25 Feb 1997

thanks for sad indeed news; 51 is young. i feel lucky to have seen williams here at the dakota bar and grill a few years ago, where he thanked folks for coming to the show because "not a lot of people understand this kind of music; it's loud, it's aggressive, and some people are afraid of it." those few words made a deep impression, as did the thrillingly loud, aggressive music.

At 10:49 AM 2/26/97, Aldon L. Nielsen wrote:
>I just learned that Tony Williams died of a heart attack in Daly City at >age 51.

>
>A Tony Williams memorial fund has been set up -- address is:
>
>Tony Williams Memorial Fund
>P.O. Box 1429
>Pacifica, CA 94044
>
>contributions sent here will be controlled by the family --
>
>funeral details not yet announced --
>
>Listening again to "In A Silent Way" --

↑ Index

849. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Ed Dorn discussion
Wed 26 Feb 1997

I doubt any of us would know who Ed Dorn is were it not for his poetry. Yet thus far I have not read one word in this discussion of Dorn's purported culpability that has anything to say about the poetry. And since when are poets necessarily nice people? With the "right" ideas? I agree with Maxine Chernoff! Let's stop being the Thought Police! What would most of the people on this list say if Baudelaire suddenly turned up, what with his fetishism, his arrogance, etc. etc.? And what about DH Lawrence with his strong man cults? And, let's see, then there's Virginia Woolf, whose letters to Vanessa are full of the nastiest, anti-Semitic remarks you can imagine! And spiteful comments about charladies and so on.

So: who shall 'scape whipping?
Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

850. Thomas Bell
Re: question which will explain things
Wed 26 Feb 1997

Intriguing question. You might want to take a look at Mark Turner's new _Literary Mind_, Polanyi's _Tacit Knowledge_, and some recent research showing that facial expressions "cause" emotions. tom bell

At 11:38 AM 2/25/97 -0500, Jordan Davis wrote:
>What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming
>when you begin to write a poem? when you are in the middle of writing a >poem? when you are editing a poem?

>
>Just curious,
>
>Jordan
>
>

↑ Index

851. Alan Jen Sondheim
JAC: Jennifer, Attis, Catullus
Wed 26 Feb 1997

24

Attis for Cybele

Which I began to inscribe, from Catullus, memory, having launched Himself down on the Phrygian Grove across the wine-dark sea, there To incise himself, flint-cut the lower edges of the sac, scrotum, His testicles flayed to the ground, blood circulating as she would Have appealed to gender-morphology, but this, irreversible, could No longer sustain the space she found herself in, this Jennifer Produced from the holy mysteries of the Magna Mater. She pranced, Declaimed loudly, Cybele screaming in the background, always a threat Holding onto her virgins, but these balls spattered on the holy earth Were something else again, while Jennifer sits, inscribes another Surface, servers crashing around her like waves on wine-dark waters. Again, again, she begins her description of Attis for Cybele, Attis Having likewise launched, a router on the Internet, turned towards her Or others, Aegean, Dea magna, dea Cybebe, dea domina Dindymi, procul a mea tuus sit furor omnis, era, domo: alios age incitatos, alios age rabidos, get out of here, furious, Make them crazy, rabid, swallow balls like seeds furrowed, the Net Splits, opens wide, Alan's driven mad, Jennifer writes in repetition, All these skinned wounds, all these Fisher Kings.

↑ Index

852. Alan Jen Sondheim
JAC: last, what was lost
Wed 26 Feb 1997

+++++++++++++++++++++++++++++stone, granite burned_program:archaos:rabidos:grave:cain:14187:7:Jennifer,lost:grave:rabidos+ dust:catacomb:skull_script:tomb:betach:14222:2:lost_Jennifer:tomb:skull_script lost:here:stone:bone:shtut:14232:0:Jen-gone:bone:lost+++++++++++++++

++++++++++
wraithe:wrythe:wryte:ghost:be'emet:14248:3:gone,Jen:ghost:wraithe++++++
+++++++

++++++++++++++++++++++++++++stone, marble

↑ Index

853. DS
Re: question which will explain things
Wed 26 Feb 1997

At 04:28 PM 2/25/97 -0800, you wrote:
>Maybe it would be a good idea if we all pretended that whoever we're going >after is in fact listening. This wouldn't preclude criticism, but it might >temper it so that it fell short of character assassination.
>Except in life and death situations manners do count (and sometimes even then).

WHAT? EVEN POUND?

↑ Index

854. Ron Silliman
Politics of The List
Wed 26 Feb 1997

I will by-pass the temptation to send a message that includes all 65 messages that were in this morning's Poetics Digest (many of which include many additional messages). My eyes blear over.

However. The prospect of anyone even attempting to prevent the Dorns from participating on this list is disturbing in the extreme and sort of turns a lot of the questions of the past week on their head, doesn't it?

But exclusion, of this or any other sort, does seem to be the logical conclusion of the List's sense of itself as "private." And while obviously the intention behind that initial impulse was/is good (as in protecting the list from becoming simply a listserve variant of those poetry usenet groups), the short & slippery slope from there to here is always shorter and more slippery than we would imagine.

Maybe it's time to end the List's sense of itself of as "private."

Ron Silliman

PS,

My apologies to the heirs et al of RP Warren for confusing him with JC Ransome in an earlier note (thanks to Jerry & Aldon for catching this). I've tried to figure out how I made that mistake (beyond writing when I had a bad cold). Three alternatives come to mind: (1) all those agrarians look alike; (2) since I take Warren more seriously than I do Ransome, my memory made the "crime" of it seem worse by attaching it to the "serious" figure; or (3) having actually appeared in Southern Review myself in my callow youth, I wanted to dissociate my own publication history from such dishonorable events. I think the "real" answer is #1 above.

↑ Index

855. Miekal And poetics, the ling of it
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

nico vassilakis wrote:
>
> this Dorn thread's
> a noose

there's lotsa bandwidth for as many threads & nooses we wanna untie

> what's the relationship between L/A/N/G/U/A/G/E writing and e-(writing)mail?

writing

> are the westerns, who's in attendance lists, clothing, job conferences, and previous items it?

bring to it each ours

> the chatting is voyueristic in such a weird way. i just don't get it (e-mail psych.)

born & bred voyeur, overcoming is the mediation (community built) > would changing the structure be of interest to anyone?

> something similar to A.BACUS, or magazines that present 15-20 pages of individual writing (open format).

listvision, need that listvision, want that listvision

> tid bits could be backchanneled provided by a complete daily list of poetics list subscribers, and like that. these exchanges could be presented.

to some degree this is happening already, cowriting where it can be heard, beats those memories of cutting out typography from oldmags & pasting them letter by letter to make a book which we made ten copies which we put in 10 envelopes & sent to 10 people.

> or maybe a second, a poetics list 2 to manage the 'other' talk and essential publishing info pertinent to the group. poetics list 2 discussing poetics list 1.

I think hypertexting our posts is much to be desired spidery way, because everyone can easily establish submailing lists & mail selected audiences.

> somebody, a year ago, spoke about the tension involved in communicating e-mail. even coming out of lurk is a difficulty.

man, I long to hear more of what you have to say, its why I put time in here.

> extracurricular polite?
> night, in yr hand
> smoke-stuffed box

they deliver those words on platters, they do, serve em right up...

> or room enough
> to fall thru scaffolding
>
> (is that electronically > feasable?)

my own approach to using the computer, internet, email, webpages, is to think of it as completely synchronous with my activities of publishing xexoxial, Im motivated in a way to approach from a standpoint of electronic wildernesse, & aggressively carving niches in the endless edges & crannies of the net, as well as planting some of my own. my approach is anything but passive, but partly too its been incubating since 84-85 when I made my first hypermedia & understood then that everything we have now is possible. I just didnt think it would take this many years to get here. I think there are many workarounds for the given limitations one feels. while I have enough of dealing with issues of gender & politics here at Dreamtime to be interested in participating in these threads, I like the opened medium, I just wish somedays there were 3-10,000 other threads to choose from. more is more.

miekal

who is hopefully taking a vacation to nc & tn for the first time in 3 years, back in 2 weeks

--
@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime

QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:
http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

856. Mark Wallace
Townes Van Zandt
Wed 26 Feb 1997

Does anyone on this list have specific information about the death, apparently around January 1 of this year, of the Texas singer-songwriter folk-country musician Townes Van Zandt? A long heroin problem I know, etc etc, but also some of the best southern songs of the last 20 odd years. My own sense is that MY MOTHER, THE MOUNTAIN is the best (and an amazing collection it is) of his sometimes hit-and-miss studio albums, but he was also a great live musician too--perhaps his best moment is the song "Early In The Morning" from a late 80s album called LIVE AND OBSCURE--a truly terrifying incursion into incest, violence and drunkenness. I'd appreciate either backchannel, or perhaps better, any information on the list itself.

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

857. Joel Kuszai
QUARTET #1
Wed 26 Feb 1997

Now available:

QUARTET #1

Featuring:

Wanda Coleman
Alexis DeVeaux
Eric Gansworth
Ted Pearson

Send a check for $6 ($5 + $1 for postage) to:

just buffalo literary center
2495 Main Street
Buffalo, NY 14214

↑ Index

858. Mark Wallace

how people behave

Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

how people behave is relevant to their poetry their poetry is relevant they behave is relevant to how they behave they behave is relevant to how their poetry behaves

The issue, for instance, of how poets respond both in their work and in their lives to constructions of male behavior in a male dominated society is relevant to how they behave is relevant to their poetry to how they behave is not a matter for simple condemnation is relevant to how they behave is relevant to the poetry

When the poet and visual artist John Havelda was here in D.C. two weekends ago we were all at a bar (is relevant to how they behave) having a drink and a fight broke out well not a fight really just this big guy started shouting at a much smaller guy and then hit him and then was surrounded by people saying "oh you're a big man such a big man for hitting him" and the big guy was humiliated and left or else you could have said his behavior is not relevant to poetry

we could have been in a bar in which it was okay for someone to hit someone is that relevant to poetry

are you macho do you hate it when people talk about behavior let's talk about poetry right the beautiful poetry we're all here for poetry are you macho do you hate it when people talk about your behavior why do you hate it when people talk about your behavior

Ted Berrigan's work exhibits an intense struggle for the issue of how they behave is relevant to the poetry how he behaved was relevant he wanted it relevant it was how he behaved to the poetry is relevant he saw what life was like in Tulsa and went to NYC is NYC really better than Tulsa really

In Tulsa in 1921 the relatively prosperous black section of town was burned down in a riot started by a false accusation by a white woman that she had been assaulted by a black man the accusation might have gone no further except a Tulsa paper made it first page news for weeks until finally there was literally a war the whole black section of Tulsa was burned and afterwards several black men were prosecuted and one prosperous black hotel owner ran away to Chicago and escaped prosecution and the historical memory of the incident was in the hands of white papers so that UNTIL THE LATE 1980S there was no official record or acknowledgement in this country of what happened in Tulsa in 1921

Ted Berrigan and Rod Padgett lived in Tulsa but they didn't know what happened in Tulsa in 1921

what facial expression do you have when you write a poem when you want to beat somebody up your poem has an expression I didn't learn to fight until I was beaten up a bunch of times as a kid and then I learned to fight back is it a good thing that I learned to fight back that I actually know how to "kick your ass" if I need to is that relevant to behavior in poetry is it relevant to poetry that I may have just indulged in a bit of macho posturing but nonetheless can still "kick your ass" if I need to but guess what I'm not going to

it is easy to be reductive about the issue it is easy to avoid the issue but if you don't talk about the construction of maleness in Berrigan's work in O'Hara's work than you're not seeing part of what mattered to them as poets and as men and they were both they were poets and they were men I suppose (what's the definition anyway of "man") and how could being a poet not be intimately related to being a "man" or just to being behavior and poetry and relevance is all relevant to poetry every time somebody says "that's not relevant" they're just plain fucking wrong

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

859. Maria Damon
Re: QUARTET #1
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

looks good joel; what's alexis deveaux up to thiese days.

At 9:15 AM -0500 2/26/97, Joel Kuszai wrote:
>Now available:
>
> QUARTET #1
>

>Featuring:
>
> Wanda Coleman
> Alexis DeVeaux
> Eric Gansworth
> Ted Pearson
>
>
>
>Send a check for $6 ($5 + $1 for postage) to:
>
>just buffalo literary center
>2495 Main Street
>Buffalo, NY 14214

↑ Index

860. amato
Re: how people behave
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

yeah, i'd have to say i'm with mark on this -- it's all relevant, and all a matter of what you want to emphasize... i don't think relevance = condemnation either (or for that matter, say, beatification)... so i don't think that establishing relevance is a holier-than or less-holier-than activity, or needs to be...

joe

↑ Index

861. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
a Boston post: 2/24
Wed 26 Feb 1997

She is beautiful. The room is full, she is beautiful and everyone in the room is watching her.

She pays me no attention but I don't mind. There is an intense, quiet joy brought about by her presence and the room is quiet while everyone looks intently at her and smiles. It is a rare moment in my life and maybe in her life too. She rolls her head, almost casually, and her bright eyes bounce from one object to the next, from one person to the next. She is all smiles and giggles. She is a peach.

She is cute as a button. She is bald and has no teeth and perhaps others are wondering, like me, if she may spit up soon on Ange's shirt or something. I muse quietly in a corner, when she-- Julia-- turns her head quickly at the sound of her father's voice. It is Joe Torra, who pops in from the kitchen asking if anyone needs more wine or some other refreshing beverage.

Soon all the guests arrive, and the reader too-- Ed Barrett -- and we begin. Here is a portion of one poem that he read:

(from THE MUMMY) "While I'm not defining terms I also won't define poetry since what I recognize as poetry you may not and what's the point of making a big deal about it? Or if poetry is life (since terms at either end of an equals sign are identical) then maybe I should make a big deal about it, the way life does: remember how you used to get beat up in grammar school if you weren't careful, and even if you were? The time we hiked across Prospect Park to the Brooklyn Museum to see the Indian child mummy and on the way back because I asked these other kids what direction we should take they naturally assumed we needed to get jumped, and how I was able to keep this jerk away from me by swinging my toy army rifle around me like a helicopter blade? My friend was wearing an army helmet (plastic) and I don't remember being asked to check our rifles and helmets at the museum. I guess you just know if someone is playing seriously and you go along with it, our mission that day was to see what a dead child looked like."

Ed reads for about a half-hour and is funny and startling and his reading is so enjoyable that when I ask my girlfriend later if she liked it she tells me she wishes Ed had read longer than he did. This gives me pause and I purse my lips, scratch my head . . . "never wants a second cup at home." But Ed was fabulous, read new unpublished work, as well as poems written for the occasion and also poems for Joe and Molly Torra and their infant daughter Julia.

It's a good Boston turnout at the Torra's: Michael and Isabel Franco, Christopher Sawyer-Laucanno, Patricia Pruitt, Lisa Amber Phillips, Elliza McGrand, Bill and Beverly Corbett, Rafael and Lina De Gruttola, Bob D'Attilio, Ange Mlinko, Steve McNamara, Dan Farrell and Craig Snyder.

We eat calzones and drink wine till it gets late and I leave, singing in my mind "please come to Boston for the springtime . . . " unable to recall the singer's name and not knowing to whom it is directed.

↑ Index

862. Douglas
Sun & Moon offers for Wellman and Jesurun plays
Wed 26 Feb 1997

I'm thankful to Marjorie Perloff and Fiona Templeton for opening a discussion (hopefully a discussion) of poetic theater and its relationship to poetics. There are wonderful American playwrights -- many of them grouped together as the "Language" playwrights -- who focus on concerns of language and poetry that is very similar to many of the poets discussed on this list. These include writers such as Mac Wellman, Erik Ehn, Len Jenkin, John Steppling, Suzan-Lori Parks, Fiona Templeton,Naomi Iizuka, and many others.

To help encourage this discussion and the readership of some of these plays, Sun & Moon offers the following specials.

Works by Mac Wellman:

ANNIE SALEM: An American Tale
In this, his second novel, Mac Wellman continues his exploration of a low-rent rural America, festering in the backwater pollution from the urban enviornment. Wellman's astonishing Ohio-like world has been tagged by some theatergoers and critics as "Macland," a world peopled by cantankerous, wistful, confused, and frightened people who have lost parts of their bodies, their minds, and their souls to the perpetual machine of the American dream.
Regular price $12.95/slightly hurt copies sold at a special price of $5.00

BAD PENNY at Bow Bridge
A short play, winner of the Obie Award, about a man who picks up a bad penny (tails up) and finds his day his metaphysically altered in Central Park.
Regularly $5.95/20% discount to members of the Poetics List

THE PROFESSIONAL FRENCHMAN
This play by Mac takes place after a Thanksgiving dinner in a northern Virgina suburb. Jacques and Sam, dangerously imperfect confidence men, close in on Blaise Duykick, who smelts stolen silverware in the basement bathroom unbeknownst to his wife, Femke.

Regularly $7.95/We offer a 20% discount to members of the Poetics List

THE FORTUNTELLER

Wellman's first long fiction is a "murder mystery." A murderer stalks the art community of SoHo in New York City. The narrator of this wildly satiric fiction seeks to uncover the killer before each of his friends (and enemies) becomes a victim.

Regularly $11.95/slightly hurt copies for $5.00

A SHELF IN WOOP'S CLOTHING

A poetry of wit and language. Here "polydactyl" meets "pumpkinfication" head on in a kaleidoscope of verse.

Regularly $8.95/Special offer of $4.00

THE LAND BEYOND THE FOREST: Dracula and Swoop

In these two plays Wellman explores the Dracula myth. This time the vampires whoop in up not only in their Transylvanian back/badlands in the last minutes of 1899, but fly over New York City (in Swoop) discussing the awful tastes of the blood of critics.

Regularly $12.95/slightly hurt copies for $5.00

THEATER OF WONDERS: SIX CONTEMPORARY AMERICAN PLAYS

Plays by Len Jenkin, Jeffrey Jones, Des McAnuff, Elizabeth Wray and Wellman.

Regularly $12.95/slightly hurt copies for $5.00

==========

Works by John Jesurun

EVERYTHING THAT RISES MUST CONVERGE

will be published by April 1, 1997
pre-publication offer of a 20% discount to members of the Poetics List.

Order from Sun & Moon Press through my E-mail address: [redacted]

Be sure to include your name and address.

Douglas Messerli

↑ Index

863. Kristin Gallagher
Re: Townes Van Zandt
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

he had a heart attack, i think. he left a wife and adolescent daughter behind. his wife divorced him a while back but she took care of him and let him sleep on the couch until the end. i have a great quote from him on my frig. when asked what you have to do to make it as a musician, he said "first you gotta get a guitar. then you gotta blow everything else off. you gotta blow off your family. you gotta blow off your job. you gotta blow off money. you gotta blow off security. you gotta blow off your ego. and just play your guitar. sleep with it. even if you're hungry. i say that to young people . . . you'd be surprised how many it scares off."

↑ Index

864. amato
Re: Politics of The List
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

there's an old caution (by now) about email -- you don't post anything to anybody w/o understanding that it may turn up someplace else, with somebody else, even years later... this is owing to the versatility of the digital, its permanence, ease of transmission, convertibility...

so it's exactly on the continuum from private to public (or the axis if you like) that so much of this discussion turns, even setting aside the fact that this is a list... it's a function of the medium, i mean... and obviously, our posts here are in the hands/minds of -- what is it currently? -- 450 subscribers?... located on several continents, no less... with all sorts of systems gaps that permit prying eyes to pry...

i've never really thought of poetics as a "private" space... on the other hand, i've always assumed that the point of calling it a "private" space was rhetorical-functional... a way of checking the possibility of a cast of thousands, and of maintaining some semblance of individualized control, even (and i don't mean this latter in any insidious sense)... charles, our host, should probably jump in here...

but ron is right -- if each of us hasn't already, perhaps it is time that "we" disabuse our collective self of the notion that what is going on hereabouts is what we customarily take to be "private correspondence"... that stuff over there, i mean, in hardcopy land... which isn't always all that "private," either...

best,

joe

↑ Index

865. Mark Weiss
Re: Sun & Moon offers for Wellman and Jesurun plays
Wed 26 Feb 1997

Please send me and bill accordingly 1 copy of slightly-hurt Annie, 1 special order Shelf, and three hurt copies of Richard Elmans's Tar beach (I've already given three copies away). Send and bill to: Mark Weiss, PO Box 40537, San Diego CA 92164. Phone [redacted] Fax [redacted].

> ANNIE SALEM: An American Tale
> In this, his second novel, Mac Wellman continues his exploration of a low-rent rural America, festering in the backwater pollution from the urban enviornment. Wellman's astonishing Ohio-like world has been tagged by some theatergoers and critics as "Macland," a world peopled by cantankerous, wistful, confused, and frightened people who have lost parts of their bodies, their minds, and their souls to the perpetual machine of the American dream.
> Regular price $12.95/slightly hurt copies sold at a special price of $5.00
>
> A SHELF IN WOOP'S CLOTHING
> A poetry of wit and language. Here "polydactyl" meets "pumpkinfication" head on in a kaleidoscope of verse.
> Regularly $8.95/Special offer of $4.00

↑ Index

866. matt
Re: Spell check
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

a little behind here
though others may not always agree, this being in the eye, as they say.

as to your questions. reading gently through the work a tone differs without signpostsings or an echo of previous words, perhaps movements slight return in mind. i think there is a greater (ooh, be 'ware of the generality I'm told) sense of temporality - the ghost of language allowed to live if you don't curtail its presence by the quotation marks, these walls of pastureyesation. but then they can always be used to distance. that, the most basic response (keeping closer to 'you' without, further away with; more alive without, more dead with etc). but more basely, the voice predominates rather than the intellect in the absence of quotes (invented in the seventeenth century, so definitely enlightened) and this aurality increased. but always go with how you feel i say.

matt

> Is there a difference between using quotation marks or some other indicator of source and not indicating the source specifically but treating the words as found language? How does this work? I don't mean technically how it works, but what kind of difference does it make to the poem or the reader? the writer?
>
> Just something I've been wondering about. Sherry

↑ Index

867. Joseph Lease
Re: Townes Van Zandt
Wed 26 Feb 1997

Townes Van Zandt did gorgeous work, absolutely tough: I heard him once live and it was very important for me: I read about his death in a local newspaper here in Boston, the paper said heart attack

On Wed, 26 Feb 1997, Mark Wallace wrote:

> Does anyone on this list have specific information about the death, apparently around January 1 of this year, of the Texas singer-songwriter folk-country musician Townes Van Zandt? A long heroin problem I know, etc etc, but also some of the best southern songs of the last 20 odd years. My own sense is that MY MOTHER, THE MOUNTAIN is the best (and an amazing collection it is) of his sometimes hit-and-miss studio albums, but he was also a great live musician too--perhaps his best moment is the song "Early In The Morning" from a late 80s album called LIVE AND OBSCURE--a truly terrifying incursion into incest, violence and drunkenness. I'd appreciate either backchannel, or perhaps better, any information on the list itself.
>
> Mark Wallace

```
/-----------------------------------------------------------------------\
|                                                                       |
|    [redacted]          "I have not yet begun                          |
|                                  to go to extremes"                   |
|    GWU:                                                               |
|     http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw                                    |
|    EPC:                                                               |
|     http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace                      |
|_______________________________________________________________________|
```

↑ Index

868. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: Sad News

Wed 26 Feb 1997

I just learned that Tony Williams died of a heart attack in Daly City at age 51.

A Tony Williams memorial fund has been set up -- address is:

Tony Williams Memorial Fund
P.O. Box 1429
Pacifica, CA 94044

contributions sent here will be controlled by the family --

funeral details not yet announced --

Listening again to "In A Silent Way" --

↑ Index

869. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

recent threads and the influence of henry g.

Wed 26 Feb 1997

Jane and Ngozi by Copley Square

All of winter stands still for this.
We are walking by the brood of an alley, its crushed boxes and piss and cans filmed with rotting food.

You hold my hands, beautiful women from a warm country, as you laugh, formally.
Your hair, latticed by a regiman of ropes and pleats, keeps nothing warm

but raps against the down-gorged nylon of your collars. The sun, distanced and thin, collects on your boots, your mittens, and still you are cold. The veldt of grass, the lions of Kenya, occlude the brittle wind of Boston, your hands in mine unchilled.

E. McGrand

↑ Index

870. nico vassilakis
(no subject)
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

this Dorn thread's
a noose

what's the relationship between L/A/N/G/U/A/G/E writing and e-(writing)mail?

are the westerns, who's in attendance lists, clothing, job conferences, and previous items it?

the chatting is voyueristic in such a weird way. i just don't get it (e-mail psych.)

would changing the structure be of interest to anyone?
something similar to A.BACUS, or magazines that present 15-20 pages of individual writing (open format).

tid bits could be backchanneled provided by a complete daily list of poetics list subscribers, and like that. these exchanges could be presented.

or maybe a second, a poetics list 2 to manage the 'other' talk and essential publishing info pertinent to the group. poetics list 2 discussing poetics list 1.

somebody, a year ago, spoke about the tension involved in communicating e-mail. even coming out of lurk is a difficulty.

extracurricular polite?
night, in yr hand
smoke-stuffed box

or room enough
to fall thru scaffolding

(is that electronically feasable?)

↑ Index

871. Issa Clubb
Re: Sad News
Wed 26 Feb 1997

For those of you in NYC, I believe the radio station KCR (89.9 FM) is playing Tony Williams all 24 hrs today (Wed)...

Sad news indeed.

> I just learned that Tony Williams died of a heart attack in Daly City at age 51.

Issa Clubb
Voyager Art Dept. mailto:[redacted]

↑ Index

872. cris cheek
Re: Irony, drama, sanity, prophecy, LangPo
Wed 26 Feb 1997

I've just spent today in the studio, recording pieces by Clive Bell for release by Sound and Language on CD early this summer.

Clive is, alongside Evan Parker and John Butcher and Peter Brotzmann and Steve Lacy
one of the most extraordinary of solo wind improvisers.

His attitude is, perhaps, worth recounting in relation to Steve Benson's more recent work as flagged up by Ira under this thread.

"Having something you need to say is already a closing to what might be said"

It would be a shame for a writer such as Steve Benson to be expected to repeat early successes (not that I'm reading Ira as suggesting such). I too was surprised by the materials with which Steve was engaging in his Ear Inn '94 and Cambridge '95 performances. Yet the acuity with which he examines language even as he formulates and utters it remains for me as finely tuned as ever. The mood is wry.
The bounce material distractions have changed. I don't, personally, find them any more ironic, although his cadence is less urgent. They are certainly partially steppings back, from harshness:

'I could feel myself looking over the hill a long time, after the carriage had passed, and my story had been told, and ran in the opposite direction, imagining that the police were after me, and that the cold water tragically fixed into my confused opinions of my situation until I improperly tore myself out of the middle of that book, leaving the page numbers intact, and watched the light from the east strike an awkward pose in the corner, imagining it would do itself good by offering a body there: a dance that they do, when they hate to do what is private, and so publicly enunciate and announce that a game is going to come and be played in this trick ball park where what they have on the ground is like a red rug, and you have to wear special glasses to see it as green, and long after we have passed, there is only just now a relationship between what is sexual and what is a second individual.' (from 'The Birds' - Language aLive 2)

love and love
cris

↑ Index

873. Herb Levy
Re: question which will explain things
Wed 26 Feb 1997

> A question: if you are going to say these things, does it change them if that person is listening? I wish I could say he wasn't...

Just a reminder: although this list is private as far as signing up & being able to send mail out to everyone is concerned, every post is available to be read by anyone with Web access at the EPC site, so functionally anyone has access to the complete contents of this "closed" list.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

874. Steve Carll
Call for Submissions
Wed 26 Feb 1997

Antenym, a xeroxed 8 and a half by 11 stapled magazine, invites submissions of poetry, fiction, critical and/or philosophical essays, visual art, and other varieties of work on the theme "Ontological Activism and its possibilities" to which issue #13 of the magazine will be dedicated. Submissions may be emailed to <[redacted]> or analog-mailed to Steve Carll at 106 Fair Oaks St. #3, San Francisco, CA 94110-2951, with an SASE for reply (and return of mss. if desired). Deadline is June 15, 1997.

On Ontological Activism:

It's often pointed to as the oldest and most fundamental complex of questions to occur in human consciousness: "Who am I, and what am I doing here?" Questions of this type, along with the resources needed to ask them and give them adequate reflection, are increasingly proscribed by the conditions currently structuring much of our daily experience, which ultimately threatens that human consciousness that makes such questioning possible and even necessary.

The phrase "ontological activism" announces itself as the public asking of the questions of being, transforming the individual "who am I?" through re-integration with the communal--"who are we?" in such a way that the opening up of personal perspectives may continually transform the communal as well, by offering examples of investigative strategies. In this way, the question becomes, "Do we as human beings wish to continue being, and if so, how?"

****

[redacted] Steve Carll
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/mags/antenym
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/antenym

In seed-
sense
the sea stars you out, innermost, forever.

--Paul Celan
****

↑ Index

875. David Israel
Re: question which will explain things
Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

what's the whelm swash

<<What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem? ....>> Jordan Davis

varies with medium (inkpen v. keyboard) energy tending to focus about the eyes around the open nostrils? the pivotal forehead?
often a pursing of lips or making eyeslits to look into distance? (there is no distance) some literal yonder? (assume there is one) or this tilt of the head (rightward? leftward?) resembling sadness (abhogi? imp's grin?)

porch sat a summer reaching pink dawn?
who'd conclude what masquerade gilts glassen features? no what's the whelm swash quicks the slow heap bedrifts the clouds

d.i.

↑ Index

876. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)

query

Wed 26 Feb 1997

---

cd someone backchannel me a phone # for lee anne brown? the # i have is a nonworking # for time incorporated.

↑ Index

877. George Bowering

Re: question which will explain things

Thu 27 Feb 1997

> On Tue, 25 Feb 1997, Jordan Davis wrote:
>
> What attitude -- no, what facial expression do you find yourself assuming when you begin to write a poem? when you are in the middle of writing a poem? when you are editing a poem?

I havent got a clue. When I am writing I am not in front of a mirror. I know the expression on my face when I am shaving. But I dont see any connection with expression of any sort and my poetry. I am too busy listening.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

878. Franklin Bruno
cd info
Thu 27 Feb 1997

A week or so ago, someone (Maria Damon, I think) posted some information about a CD magazine that sounded quite interesting. I don't remember the details, though I thought an upcoming volume was about Stein. I managed to lose the info. Could someone post it again. Backchannel is fine.

Tony Williams (very sad) died young, but he started young too--he first played with Miles Davis at 17!

Townes Van Zandt was indeed quite a songwriter (see "Lungs," "Pancho & Lefty"), but I shudder to imagine what his politics might have been.

All you people got me to dig out Berrigan's -The Sonnets-. No cogent comment, but thanks.

Special to Stroffolino (the only one interested, I bet)--I'm seeing Pavement tomorrow, if I see Malkmus, I'll get to the bottom of this Ashbery thing.

fjb

↑ Index

879. George Bowering
Re: question which will explain things
Thu 27 Feb 1997

> Sorry for my sarcasm,\ but I find myself sick of reading of people who are willing to punch other people in the nose.

You wanna step outside?

George Bowering.
,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

880. George Bowering
Re: how people behave
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Hey, people out there over the brown bulge of the continent and all:

What kind of facial expression do you have when you punch a nazi poet in the eye?

George Bowering.
,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

881. Mark W Scroggins

Re: question which will explain things

Thu 27 Feb 1997

As the Pythons used to say, this is a very SILLY thread--but didn't Mallarme compose in front of a mirror?

On Thu, 27 Feb 1997, George Bowering wrote:
>
> I havent got a clue. When I am writing I am not in front of a mirror. I > know the expression on my face when I am shaving. But I dont see any > connection with expression of any sort and my poetry. I am too busy > listening.
>
>
>
>
> George Bowering.
> ,
> 2499 West 37th Ave.,
> Vancouver, B.C.,
> Canada V6M 1P4
>
> fax: [redacted]
> e-mail: [redacted]
>

↑ Index

882. Rachel Loden
Special to Stroffolino
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Franklin Bruno wrote:

> Special to Stroffolino (the only one interested, I bet)--I'm seeing Pavement tomorrow, if I see Malkmus, I'll get to the bottom of this Ashbery thing.

Franklin, when you get to the bottom of this Ashbery thing, set off a flare, will you? The rest of the expedition is hopelessly lost.

P.S. Kisses to Malkmus.

↑ Index

883. David R. Israel
Re: Spell check
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Sherry --

yesterday I thought I was posting to the Poetics brood, but inadvertantly (instead) backchanneled my note(s) to you; oh well.

If I start tossing around names like TS Eliot too much, the hipsters will raise eyebrows anyway, I suppose. Jorie Graham is a curious case (in point) too. I'd say she's been quite influenced by certain LangPo & such developments -- & I think she's wonderful. But my general impression is that to many Poetics types, she's prob. beyond the pale, since she's so mainstream-published, so well-awarded, etc.

Hmm -- now I'll put my foot in it & post this (though was to backchannel), since I'm curious for some poss. response re that.

Here then, tacked on, is my 2/26 note, too.

cheers all,
d.i.

p.s.: another tack on the citations / quotations issue. It's interesting that in much of Alice Notley's writing, EVERY sentence is in quotation marks! (My late friend Lynne Beyer pointed this out to me, merely wondering what Alice was up to.) Certainly it's not a question of borrowed language in the literal, Brennan-asked sense. Seems (in effect) more like thoughts / words "overheard" -- eh?

> Subject: Re: Spell check
> Date: Wed, 26 Feb 1997 11:51:55 -0500

> Following up Sherry Brennan's question yesterday abt. citations for > borrowed language --

>
> 2 poss. interesting instances spring to mind. The recent book > Materialism by Jorie Graham is chock-full of borrowed texts. I > think (if memory serves) she merely mentions what authors she's > borrowed from; -- or perhaps gives some bit more detail, but is > anyway not exhaustive or too detailed. You might want to give the > book a glance, -- as one example of contemporary practice.
>
> The other case that came to mind was T.S. Eliot's wholesale lifting > of a passage from San Juan de la Cruz. In that case, my impression > (or recollection) is that there's no annotation identifying the > original -- but rather, Eliot prefaces (in the poem itself) the > appropriated text by some phrase like "Has it not been said?" --
>
> so that's one other approach to this. But likely you'll find your > own solution.
>
> have fun w/ Ch. Darwin + the gardeners
> d.i.
>
> (p.s.: I get the Poetics package in digest, so if I post mid-day
> (like this), I'm writing blind as to what's meanwhile transpiring.
> Was thus slightly amused to note my "found poem" of yesterday > appeared (unwittingly) in the wake of this query. I didn't mention > that the tose words comprised the complete (unaltered) text of the > orig. office-mail msg. -- minus a single closing word: "Thanks!").

.
.....
.....
\\\

884. Jordan Davis
Re: cd info
Thu 27 Feb 1997

What the hell do you mean, the only one interested!!! Mr Bruno for the sake of humanity, let us all know when you find out -- is Malkmus for real about Ashbery, or is it a put-on? and how much text does he get from him ... Jordan

↑ Index

885. Rachel Blau DuPlessis
Re: how people behave
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Re TULSA in 1921, the pogrom against the African-American community: Ron Padgett has a poem from, I think, the early 1970s, or even earlier (1968?) in which he explicitly refers to the Tulsa events, in the context of the rebellions/riots of the late 60s. (This as a correction to Wallace); since I am sitting without RP's poetry (at school) I can't cite title, but it is a long, explicit, and moving work. Rachel Blau DuPlessis

↑ Index

886. Sylvester Pollet
the archibras
Thu 27 Feb 1997

(a friend of mine who's doing some work on the utopian body sent me this, and I thought maybe some on the list would enjoy it too) S.

Here's something to think about on your drive today:

"Fourier predicted that the men and women of the new order would grow to the height of seven feet and live to the age of 144. They would acquire replaceable teeth and develop the capacity to withstand severe pain. Their senses would undergo extraordinary refinement, and they would also become sufficiently amphibious to make full use of the bottom of the sea. But the most remarkable physical change in mankind, which would only take place after sixteen generations of Harmony, was the development of a new member, an archibras, the properties of which were described by Fourier in a manuscript censored by his disciples:

'The Harmonian arm or archibras is a veritable tail, a tail of immense length and with 144 vertebrae. . . . This member is as redoubtable as it is industrious. It is a natural weapon . . . The archibras terminates with a very small elongated hand, a hand as strong as the claws of an eagle or a crab. . . . When a man is swimming, the archibras will help him move as fast as a fish. It can stretch to the bottom of the water, carrying fish nets and making them fast. With its help a man can reach a branch twelve feet high, climb up and down the tree, pick fruit at the very top of the tree, and put in in a basket tied to the archimain. It serves as a whip and a rein to a man who is driving a horse-drawn plow. . . .It can be used to tame a wild horse: the rider can tie up the horse's legs with his archibras. It is infinitely useful, and in the playing of musical instruments it doubles a person's manual faculties since its fingers, although very small, are extremely stretchable.'"

Surprising that Fourier didn't expound upon its erotic potential, since that's a subject he rarely leaves out elsewhere!

Bon voyage,

N.

↑ Index

887. dbkk
Political Animals
Thu 27 Feb 1997

It's Kevin Killian. I know I have used this space already to announce my play on March 6 but I wanted to announce a late-breaking development. After many years away from the stage, Mr. Nick Robinson will be joining my cast of international stars, essaying the pivotal role of fallen Ubermensch Christopher Reeve. Nick Robinson was the man whose work with Poet's Theater here in the Bay Area first made me want to write for the stage. Now he returns in "Political Animals." I feel the puffed up pride of MGM's Louis B. Mayer when he told the world, in 1945, to promote "Adventure" (Victor Fleming), --

"Gable's Back--and Garson's Got Him!"

↑ Index

888. Michael Coffey
Re: how people behave -Reply
Thu 27 Feb 1997

---

more on tulsa incident: there is a novel by Susan Straight called The Gettin' Place, published by Hyperion last year, that tells the story of a family since moved to a California town much like Riverside (calla Rio Seco), but which began in Tulsa during those riots. Very fine book, as Straight, a white woman from Swiss stock who was raised and now lives in pretty much a black Riverside community, is an excellent writer. I interviewed her for Publishers Weekly a few years ago and she would blanch at my foregrounding her racial background and the environs she grew up in, but her perspective on the black, vietnamese, hispanic communities she knows so well are terrific: it is the perspective of someone who has seemlessly been assimilated.

about other atrocities (how people behave): look for a memoir by the poet Peter Balakian, coming in may, about his eventual understanding of the Armenian genocide of 1915, engineered by the turks. His discovery of poetry is entwined with the historical consciousness of what happend to his "people," and is effectively, beaautifully told. And for anyone who grew up in a middle-class household in the 60s in new york or new jersey, the wealth of perfectly remembered cultural references of the time is entertainiang enough; but the book is heavy, heavy; I think bound to be a small classic of the memoir genre, much like Nabokov's speak memory, it is about a family's disposesssion and exile and structured with the integrity of a long poem. Basic Books, oddly enough, is the publisher. Balakian, i believe, teaches at Colgage in upstate new york.

>>> Rachel Blau DuPlessis <[redacted]> 02/27/97
11:01am >>>
Re TULSA in 1921, the pogrom against the African-American community:
Ron Padgett has a poem from, I think, the early 1970s, or even earlier (1968?) in which he explicitly refers to the Tulsa events, in the context of the rebellions/riots of the late 60s. (This as a correction to Wallace); since I am sitting without RP's poetry (at school) I can't cite title, but it is a long, explicit, and moving work. Rachel Blau DuPlessis

↑ Index

889. Michael Magee
Re: how people behave
Thu 27 Feb 1997

I just started reading a book called Death in a Promised Land about the 1921 Tulsa Riots, veri interesting and very horrifying. As the author describes the rise of Tulsa's black middle class the sense of the inevitability of serious white backlash grows in a creepy, uncomfortable way and the photographs in the book enhance that - one picture, of several white men throwing torches into the second story of a black man's very large house which has started to smoke all over, literally made me feel ill. Tulsa is actually quite an amazing 20th century cultural space - lots of literary figures in the area as well as jazz musicians (a prime secondary site for band's like Basie's in the 20's). Then there's the fact that the Native Americans who were forced there around the turn of the century ended up sitting on a lot of oil land. Somehow laws were instituted which made the city hier to that land if the particular native American owners died - unsurprisingly, they started dropping like flies. More recently there's Larry Clark's (he dircted the movie Kids) book of photographs Tulsa (1971?) - photos of white tulsa teengaers shotting amphetamine, having sex, wielding guns, etc.

-Mike Magee.

According to Rachel Blau
DuPlessis:
> > Re TULSA in 1921, the pogrom against the African-American community:
> Ron Padgett has a poem from, I think, the early 1970s, or even earlier > (1968?) in which he explicitly refers to the Tulsa events, in the context > of the rebellions/riots of the late 60s. (This as a correction to Wallace); > since I am sitting without RP's poetry (at school) I can't cite title, but > it is a long, explicit, and moving work. Rachel Blau DuPlessis
>

↑ Index

890. Chris Stroffolino
Fwd: Cheryl Dunye, etc.
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Oh yeah and on a related note, DEANNA FERGUSON are you there? If you are and are still trying to get in touch with DAVID BROMIGE, he will be back on the list in a fortnight or so he said....he had some minor surgery on his 5th toe (I said little toe, but he corrected me and on no uncertain terms) and can not walk from his computer terminal. He can walk TO it, but then he'd be stuck there. And you wouldn't want that, now, would you? Chris
---
Forwarded message:
Subj: Cheryl Dunye, etc.
Date: 97-02-27 11:51:22 EST
From: CHRIS1929W
To: [redacted]

Hey, in this week's VILLAGE VOICE, there is an article about filmmaker Cheryl Dunye. She and I used to be roommates in Phila. She used to cut my hair and helped me get one job. It was VERY good to see that she's doing well for herself (her fame of course the result of negative publicity--being blacklisted by Jesse Helm for her black lesbian "agenda" a la Todd Hayne's fame being result of offending Dick Carpenter). I bring this up for those of you who may remember my SCHMIDT-DEAN GALLERY reading series of the early 1990's when I had her films shown with ABBY CHILD'S and Bob Perelman and Francie Shaw sat in the front row of the audience, asking pointed comments, etc. (Oh, gossip, gossip). Would anybody here know how to get in touch with Ms. Dunye? I have not seen her in years. Has anybody seen this new film? All for now, Chris Stroffolino

---

↑ Index

891. Joe Safdie
Re: question which will explain things
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Yes, it IS a silly thread, but it's like TV, it gets our mind off things. Stultifyingly dull "Grammys" last night, I couldn't watch more than a half hour or so.

I, too, have been told I stick out my tongue when writing (and teaching) ala Michael Jordan. Would like to thing that's because I'm tasting the words. Can anyone confirm for me that there's a college basketball player at the moment (Minnesota?) who's been called "the Jewish Jordan"?

↑ Index

892. Pritchett,Pat
Re: Spell check
Thu 27 Feb 1997

I'll confess I find some of Jorie Grahm's work quite bracing tho lately it's become rather attentuated and verging on the pompous. Her appropriation of LangPo and Olsonite techniques begins with "End of Beauty," tho she applies these to rather different ends.

Notley's quotation marks are fascinating. They function more as metrical units than anything else. And in _Alette_ they act as analogues for the stroboscopic flashings of the subway itself.

Patrick Pritchett

From: David R. Israel
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: Spell check
Date: Thursday, February 27, 1997 10:43AM

Sherry --

yesterday I thought I was posting to the Poetics brood, but inadvertantly (instead) backchanneled my note(s) to you; oh well.

If I start tossing around names like TS Eliot too much, the hipsters will raise eyebrows anyway, I suppose. Jorie Graham is a curious case (in point) too. I'd say she's been quite influenced by certain LangPo & such developments -- & I think she's wonderful. But my general impression is that to many Poetics types, she's prob. beyond the pale, since she's so mainstream-published, so well-awarded, etc.

Hmm -- now I'll put my foot in it & post this (though was to backchannel), since I'm curious for some poss. response re that.

Here then, tacked on, is my 2/26 note, too.

cheers all,
d.i.

p.s.: another tack on the citations / quotations issue. It's interesting that in much of Alice Notley's writing, EVERY sentence is in quotation marks! (My late friend Lynne Beyer pointed this out to me, merely wondering what Alice was up to.) Certainly it's not a question of borrowed language in the literal, Brennan-asked sense. Seems (in effect) more like thoughts / words "overheard" -- eh?

> Subject: Re: Spell check
> Date: Wed, 26 Feb 1997 11:51:55 -0500

> Following up Sherry Brennan's question yesterday abt. citations for > borrowed language --
>
> 2 poss. interesting instances spring to mind. The recent book > Materialism by Jorie Graham is chock-full of borrowed texts. I > think (if memory serves) she merely mentions what authors she's > borrowed from; -- or perhaps gives some bit more detail, but is > anyway not exhaustive or too detailed. You might want to give the > book a glance, -- as one example of contemporary practice.
>
> The other case that came to mind was T.S. Eliot's wholesale lifting > of a passage from San Juan de la Cruz. In that case, my impression > (or recollection) is that there's no annotation identifying the > original -- but rather, Eliot prefaces (in the poem itself) the > appropriated text by some phrase like "Has it not been said?" --
>
> so that's one other approach to this. But likely you'll find your > own solution.
>
> have fun w/ Ch. Darwin + the gardeners
> d.i.
>
> (p.s.: I get the Poetics package in digest, so if I post mid-day
> (like this), I'm writing blind as to what's meanwhile transpiring.
> Was thus slightly amused to note my "found poem" of yesterday > appeared (unwittingly) in the wake of this query. I didn't mention > that the tose words comprised the complete (unaltered) text of the > orig. office-mail msg. -- minus a single closing word: "Thanks!").

.
.....
.....
\\\

↑ Index

895. Pritchett,Pat
Re: question which will explain things
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Joe, you shoulda watched the fabulous "Beast from 20,000 Fathoms" on AMC. A seminal work from my TV matinee childhood. Best line: "There's a certain inexorable chronology to these events." I think I'll "sample" that one. The way it uses very grainy stock footage of glaciers, US Airforce planes, etc. charmingly and naively anticipates use of same scratched, artificially aged postmod stuff in music vids, etc. Ray Harryhausen's monsters are a thousand times more poetic than Spielberg's. Or maybe I'm just being nostalgic.

Patrick P.

From: Joe Safdie
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: question which will explain things
Date: Thursday, February 27, 1997 11:26AM

Yes, it IS a silly thread, but it's like TV, it gets our mind off things. Stultifyingly dull "Grammys" last night, I couldn't watch more than a half hour or so.

I, too, have been told I stick out my tongue when writing (and teaching) ala Michael Jordan. Would like to thing that's because I'm tasting the words. Can anyone confirm for me that there's a college basketball player at the moment (Minnesota?) who's been called "the Jewish Jordan"?

↑ Index

896. Jerry Rothenberg
san diego readings
Thu 27 Feb 1997

For those of you in or near San Diego, the following may be of interest:

Wednesday March 5 7:00 p.m. at Jerome Rothenberg's studio (Visual Arts 451 on UCSD campus): a performance by the Dutch poet / soundtext artist Jaap Blonk, along with improvisations by contrabassist Bert Turetzky.

Friday March 7 6:30 p.m. at the Porter Troupe Gallery (301 Spruce Street): a reading and performance by Ed Sanders.

Both events free and open to the public.

↑ Index

897. Jordan Davis
Why I asked?
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Thanks, I think, Don Cheney, for liking the questions I ask. This particular question about the facial expression one assumes while writing is pretty silly, yes. Poe's story "The Purloined Letter" has a nice passage about studying facial expressions to understand what decisions people will make. I remember (and I know that remembering doesn't prove the truth value of one's statements about the past -- however, I've slowly been coming to the conclusion that epistemology is for suckas) that Wittgenstein made many gnomic remarks about a hypothetical naive observer imitating the facial expressions of people performing tasks such as thinking and writing, imagining that by imitating those expressions, this observer would then able to perform those tasks. (Of these tasks, I'm pretty sure Wittgenstein says that to an observer, it must seem that a 'queer process' is taking place.) In the twin interests of coincidence and disclosure, Don, I've noticed that I sometimes make the cat face when I write.

Frusen gladje,
Jordan

↑ Index

898. michael corbin
Re: how people behave
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Michael Magee wrote:

> Then there's the > fact that the Native Americans who were forced there around the turn of the century ended up sitting on a lot of oil land. Somehow laws were instituted which made the city hier to that land if the particular native American owners died - unsurprisingly, they started dropping like flies.

On the Osage of Oklahoma and white folks orgasm for oil see Linda Hogan's 1990 novel _Mean Spirit_. The usual raw materials for 20th century amerrycan poetico-ethics.

Relatedly, to Tulsa and such conflagrations that is, see Michael D'Orso's book of last year _Like Judgement Day: The Ruin and Redemption of A Town Called Rosewood_. This as a corrective to the hollywoodization of the story in the new John Singleton and warner bros movie _Rosewood_. D'Orso's book is more the rendering of how the story of the racist destruction of the town has been variously remembered, narrated and memorialized.

mc
mc

↑ Index

899. Laura Moriarty
Robinson/Roush Sat not Fri
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Kit Robinson and Tricia Roush will be reading for Small Press Traffic at New College, part of the Prosodia Benefit Series, at 7:30 on Saturday March 8th - (the poster accidentally says Friday) -

New College is located at 777 Valencia in San Francisco.

(When I called to check about the time, Dodie said it was okay if I posted this.)

↑ Index

900. Jordan Davis
Creative Reading
Thu 27 Feb 1997

---

just published by the National Council of Teachers of English,

CREATIVE READING by Ron Padgett ..

thought I'd mention it ... J

↑ Index

901. Don Cheney
Re: Why I asked?
Thu 27 Feb 1997

> Thanks, I think, Don Cheney, for liking the questions I ask. This particular question about the facial expression one assumes while writing is pretty silly, yes.

jordan, my like was sincere, even if stated on one of your self-proclaimed "pretty silly" questions.

> In the twin interests of coincidence and disclosure, Don, I've noticed that I sometimes make the cat face when I write.

yes!

> Frusen gladje,
> Jordan

shake it up, baby!
don

↑ Index

902. amato
Re: question which will explain things
Thu 27 Feb 1997

---

patrick, harryhausen nostalgia is a good thing, don't sweat it!... while we're at it, i'll go for o'brien nostalgia too...

best,

joe

↑ Index

903. Matthias Regan
Re: Spell check (quotations)
Thu 27 Feb 1997

THEY ACT AS ANALOGUES

[a poem written on lunch break, composed entirely of words and phrases (slightly altered, sometimes) taken from the day's posts to this and another list.]

I for one fail to see the intelligence in "My Ding-a-ling", but maybe something is escaping me. A friend of mine who's doing some work on the utopian body, the story of a family since moved to a California town-- their senses would undergo extraordinary refinement, adolescence, lassitude, fecklessness and apathy. Bon voyage.

(Several white men throwing torches, in the context of the rebellions/riots of the late 60s.

This so-called "Opera",
"Art-Song" and their various spawn.)

Are you there? There's a college basketball player (Minnesota?)
who's been called "the Jewish Jordan".
A man can reach a branch twelve feet high,

climb up and down the tree, pick fruit at the very top, and put it in a basket tied to the archimain. Then there's the fact that the Native Americans who were forced there around the turn of the century ended up sitting on a lot of oil land.

A nostalgia for a future that didn't happen.
And while 'we' live in the bruised sentimentality of too high techno-expectations, they act as analogues for the stroboscopic flashings its hard to give over to,

an ironism of the saccharine picaresque:

once again, you're correct, except you have it all backwards. The # I have is a nonworking #. She would blanch at my foregrounding her racial background for Time Inc. I feel the puffed up pride of MGM's Louis B. Mayer. Oops. For the sake of humanity, let us all know when you find out --

↑ Index

904. Stephen Vincent
Re: how people behave
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Re: Tulsa & Ron Padgett - In case no one else mentioned this, Ron P. has an essay, "Among the Blacks", which is an autobiographical exploration of his relationships to blacks as he was growing up in Tulsa. (The essay is paired with his translation of Raymond Roussel's work of the same title.) There is no mention of the 1921 conflagration. Why not might be a question, or might have been a provocative exploration - in terms of pairing the two essays - in that the Tulsa event took place while Roussel was still actively producing 'his' African works.

Cheers,
Stephen Vincent

↑ Index

905. Wystan Curnow
Re: Why I asked?
Thu 27 Feb 1997

Jordan, On the subject of, welljust round the corner from, there is this (in the words of the execrable Arianna Stassinopoulos Huffington; I have another account but in a book at home so I think its genuine) : Picasso was back in Paris, shaving in his bathroom at the Hotel Lutetia, when the telephone call came announcing the news [of Apollinaire's death]. His terrified expression in the mirror shocked him, and his instinctive, immediate response was to draw his self-portrait with that undisguised look of mortality he had seen staring back at him. Wystan

↑ Index

906. Charles Bernstein
Re: deletion & the politics of the list
Thu 27 Feb 1997

I have been out of e-mail range for about a week and am trying to read through the accumulated Poetics messages. But I hope it is now apparent to one and all that the policy at Poetics is to welcome anyone interested in joining the list and (virtually) never remove anyone from the list (except in the extremely rare sort of cases outlined by Eliza McGrand, Alan Sondheim, and Joe Amato, which have not been a problem for this list). I find it odd that I should even have to write such a sentence in this context, but I am reluctant to torque it in a way that might be misunderstood -- although anything you say can and will be misunderstood (isn't that Amberian's 99th Law of Community?). I think one reason Joel felt his sarcasm would be understood as ironic is that the possibility that he would delete folks from the list in the way he described is so far-fetched to him, as it is to me, as to be patently absurd. But of course, the lesson is (if we need one): it is not too far fetched to be believed and that reasonable, sympathetic people can imagine that we could actually conduct this list in such an abhorrent fashion. I know the problem from the inside too: that odd feeling I have more than I'd like of not knowing if something is a joke or not, or for that matter the similar feeling that the people I have grown to trust could somehow not be who I thought they were. Somehow this e-space foments these unmoorings, since, as many have noted, one doesn't see that the person making the "appalling" remark can hardly keep from laughing; and where the frames, established in a poem or essay to indicate a (yes, indeed, possibly) nonauthorial point of view, may not be noted even if they are marked. So we land again on the problem of the ironic or indeed the dramatic, if I understood Fiona Templeton's recent point about shifting tones. (I can confirm, by the way, that Herr A. Hitler is not subscribed to this list despite active efforts to reach him in his multi-e-media- equipped bunker, with the expectation that participating in the list might encourage him to reconsider his views on "degenerate" art, which I, for one, have always found problematic. However we do hope to have both Evita and Larry Flynt on board soon.) [Joke emoticon removed for further genetic study.]

I want also to register my appreciation to Jerry Rothenberg for his remarks on the responsibility we all have in posting to this or any list. I have always felt that the spontaneity of response that seems the very heart of the list at its best also has the darker side of circulating ideas that have not been well considered (or considered also by another reader -- editor or friend). Given this is the case, though, one has to read this genre of communication for what it is and always with some skepticism. The problem is when we read what is more like a spontaneous comment made in the heat of exchange as if it were revised or edited essay. That is, the reader bears some responsiblility for keeping in the mind the context of the writing. I realize I may be belaboring the obvious here, but it is because I am interested in what are the specific characteristics of exchanges on email lists, which tend toward the improvisational rather than the compositional.

As to the (recurring) discussion of the politics of the poets, I recommend Jerome McGann's "Canonade" in New Literary History (25;3, Summer 1994), which takes up the problem from a somewhat different point of view, and one which I suspect would bring into agreement some of those lately disagreeing. McGann's focus is on the attempts on both sides of the academic "canon wars" to contruct a canon of, let's say, saintly poets. McGann's is a critique of the ever-resurgent idea (on both left and right) that art should be uplifting. Indeed, McGann won't let us forget that range of poetry that dwells, without disavowing -- that is, dwells in ways that make readers anxious -- on the foulest thoughts and darkest visions of a culture. He quotes Blake's idea that "The greatest Poetry is immoral" but also Byron's

> He left a [Poet's] name to other times, > Linked with one virtue, and a thousand crimes

[to use the substitution for "Corsair" that McGann, in effect, suggests].

McGann goes on to say about Eliot's most notorious poem: "Yet what a remarkable poem--indeed, how remarkable exactly because it has sunk into its own disgusting imagination!... Serpentine, garage-door, phlegm: all have, like the beast Ahab, their humanities. Their eyes are watching God, even when they watch from that cesspool titled `Sweeney Among the Nightengales.'"

****

A Short Note on the Privacy of This List

The Poetics List does have a wide open front door: it's called the Electronic Poetry Center. We make every effort to have the EPC listed as a link at poetry and art sites and guidebooks and lists. Through the EPC it is relatively easy to find out about the list -- if interested. Also the 473 list subscribers, and hundreds of nonsubscribers who are familiar with the list, recommend the list to interested people. As I have written in previous posts, the issue of inclusion/exclusion in this medium is complex. For many reasons, a number of subscribers on this list would not be willing, or in many cases able, to participate if the list volume increased substantially from what it is now or if the list took on the character of a news group of strangers meeting for the first time. We have here a semblance of knowing one another, and beyond that many of us do know one another, or end up meeting one another at one time or other. The aim is to maintain an open space for exchange among people with specific and related, if necessarily undefined and polydictory, poetic commitments. That is, to have a list such that the participants generally (want to) read (most or all of) the posts and have some sense of the history of what has transpired here. This requires a long-term commited relationship, like they (used to?) say (which is not to say that other kinds of e-relations might not have other values). As I've put it when the list had half the current number of subscribers: "The paradox is that in an attempt to be open and nonexcluding one can end up excluding those who are unable to handle the volume: people are drowned out rather than kept out -- until Dreamworks Interactive, Inc., guides us and we asphyxiate."

And speaking of being swamped, this also has to do with the limited capacity of those of us dealing with administering the list to handle any greater volume. For example, Joel's daily work on list maintenance, not a particularly fun job, though somewhat interesting at times. Thanks again, Joel. (As to Loss Glazier's Herculean labors on the EPC: enough cannot be said.)

↑ Index

907. Thomas Bell

Re: Why I asked?

Thu 27 Feb 1997

Wd be a silly question I think to those cerebral poets who hope their work has no connection to the body, but (notwithstanding Poe and Wittgenstein's tangential points)this is not consistent with research. tom bell

At 01:55 PM 2/27/97 -0500, Jordan Davis wrote: >Thanks, I think, Don Cheney, for liking the questions I ask. This >particular question about the facial expression one assumes while writing >is pretty silly, yes.

↑ Index

908. DS
Re: Dorn on the list
Thu 27 Feb 1997

. It is interesting in >utopian structures (and a conversation is one)

I am astonished by this statement. Power structures exist in everything.

↑ Index

909. Tom Mandel
Holy Moly!
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Lisa Jarnot mentions:

"...something that Robert Duncan says about how you can't reject ...Hitler as the enemy because that potentiality exists in everybody."

I certainly hope Robert Duncan never wrote anything as foolish as that.

Tom Mandel

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

910. Tom Mandel
Dorn on the list
Fri 28 Feb 1997

It would have been more useful to leave Dorn on the list than to delete him without mention and without the knowledge of those whom the list comprises.

It would have been interesting to see what his contributions were. Given what they might have been (speculative tho that is) it would have been interesting to see how this group of people reacted. It is interesting in utopian structures (and a conversation is one) to see how people react to whatever develops. In fact, it's more than interesting, it's crucial. I'm sure Joel acted in good faith (and in irre-pressible revulsion too), but I would have preferred Dorn here than locked out.

Tom

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

911. Tom Mandel

apt. to share?

Fri 28 Feb 1997

> From: Brigham Taylor <[redacted]>
> Subject: Manhattan Share/Apt. available
>
> I wouldn't normally post this on the list, but I'm exploring every option.
> I need someone to share a (really) large 2 bedroom apartment on the Lower East Side (Ridge Street, 2 blocks south of Houston) by March 15 or April 1.
> It's $1200 a month ($600 each), and you have the option of taking over the whole apartment on the first of July. It's a great space at a good price.
> If you or anyone you know might be interested, backchannel me...

I think Ed Dorn might be looking for a place.

It's incredible to watch the waves of convention wash across this list. The sense of potential gaffe at resisting vile remarks, the unwillingness to treat a person as a person if that person is a poet, and the love love love of rhetoric, as in Dorn's "how I take a man" -- that I that somehow takes it oh so differently.

Ok, ok. If he talks nice, he can come around me. I'd hate to diss someone just for jew-baiting, just for AIDS-bashing. That kind of "Hollywood black and white" is so much less interesting than for example finding some kind of "interpretive space" for the "discourse" and then having a "conference" about it? After all, who can't identify with giving Steve Abbott the screw? None of us is perfect, right?

Start over.

Tom Mandel

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

912. David Israel
Re: deletion & the politics of the list
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Our worthy listmeister's remarks -- beyond being welcome on several planes -- also served to bring (back) to mind a question re: the surprising Emily Dickinson epistolary excerpt that happened to surface -- last week? -- amid the helter-skelter of the other E.D.'s contretemps.

I can't now locate the original post (from, I believe, Aldon Nielsen) -- but the brief quotation was (as you'll recall) from a (probably chatty) letter of Emily's, wherein an apparently egregious, exceedingly xenophobic remark was tossed out in a maybe parenthetical (& poss. lighthearted?, perhaps self-ironical? &/or poss. even -- can this be? -- bullseye sarcastic of others who were wont to offer such remarks dead-serious?) manner.

Charles B. notes --

<< . . . I think one reason Joel felt his sarcasm would be understood as ironic is that the possibility that he would delete folks from the list in the way he described is so far-fetched to him, as it is to me, as to be patently absurd. But of course, the lesson is (if we need one): it is not too far fetched to be believed and that reasonable, sympathetic people can imagine that we could actually conduct this list in such an abhorrent fashion. I know the problem from the inside too: that odd feeling I have more than I'd like of not knowing if something is a joke or not, or for that matter the similar feeling that the people I have grown to trust could somehow not be who I thought they were. . . .>>

Question: how far-fetched is it (would it be) to read Emily's utterance in a context akin to the above? Since I know precious little anent ED's RW life & its social surround, I ask this out of frank ignorance.

d.i.

↑ Index

913. Henry Gould
Providence readings acoming
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Joshua Saul Beckman & Ange Mlinko will read at Native Gallery, 387 Charles St. Providence, at 8 pm on Fri March 7th, right after the opening. Free w/pass the hat. Stuff to eat & drink plus art on walls. Call [redacted] for directions etc. sponsored by Poetry Mission.

On April 23rd the Mission is planning a "poetry action" at its incipient space (see Luigi Spgnrti's article in Digestacritics #12, "Literair and Underwear :

Incipient Space as Meter? Metamorph?" for info on this glistening topos), starting at 7:30 pm. Said space is Hall Memorial Library in Cranston (a few blocks from birthplace & pilgrimage center of St. Ted (Bargoon)). Resident real-live critic Tom Epstein will attack poetry from perspective of Jos. Epstein & other poetry-scoffers (Jos. Ep no relation) - poets, local literati, and would-be local-literati (could this be you?) will respond with ad hummer attacks and ad lib poems etc. on the theme of "what's poetry" etc. It will be Shakespeare's birthday & He has Promised to Attend. All part of the whole which is the Annual Bergeron Memorial Reading sponsored (annually!!!!) by the Library in honor of a deceased beloved librarian name of Bergeron who liked poetry and science fiction and who also has Promised to Attend (see L. Pgstrni's other essay "Incipient Space, Other Dementias - Is there Life Before Poetry?" in Swallowacritics #21 for info on your literary prospects on other planets).

don't write to me, I'm not here. - Spandrift

↑ Index

914. Robert Archambeau
The Dorn/Pound Affair
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Here's a poem by Gary Geddes, a Canadian poet who read at the Louisville conference -- it does a better job of saying what I want to say about all this than I could do on my own. (Don't know what Geddes thinks about Dorn, but I take his point here to be a general one).

Robert Archambeau

The Last Canto

I seldom budge from Rapallo.
Venice is no Byzantium
these final days.
Stench from the canals
worse than the cattle ship
I sailed to Europe on.

Mr Nixon was half right:
poetry did not pay,
but there was a future in it.
The age demanded
a scapegoat and a saint.
Being American
I applied for both jobs.

The world has been my whale-road, wanderer and seafarer
among the lost manuscripts, charting connections few had ever dreamed of.
I've gone about my business like a pack rat.
You have to do that,
have on hand ten times
what you can ever hope to use.
Tennyson was right about being part of all he met,
but he hadn't met enough.

As the range broadened
my speech became barbarous, that of a man who's lost contact with the words of his fellows, though he knows their hearts'
most intimate desires.

I once advised trashing the metronome and composing with the music of the speaking voice.
Now I say:
Exercise the mind
and school the heart;
voice will rejoice
in its tender chains like a bridegroom.

While my former countrymen have given up on ideas, except in things,
whatever that means,
and play with themselves
like clergymen,
less out of need than habit,
I dream of ideas in action
and of forma, even the canetto, where the dance of the ear and intellect

draw dormant filings into the pattern of a rose.

I wrote in an article in T.P.'s Weekly in 1913:
The artist is always beginning.
Any work of art
which is not a beginning, an invention, a discovery,
is of little worth.

I still hold that view
though at times, I admit,
I counted the cost.

I have spoken too much of usura,
or not enough.
Even the air we breathe is rented for a price.

Forget my dicta:
direct treatment of the thing
and all that rot.
The thing, so-called,
has yet to be revealed.
I have found poems to be wiser abd more honest than poets.

Remember the ideogram from the Chinese,
the one representing truth which shows a man standing beside his word.
Nothing more.
The merchant's wife dying alone in her unkempt garden
by the river praises
my irregular feet,
though she draws the line
at Social Credit.

Forget me too:
listen to the poems.

You see, I'm prescriptive to the end, a weakness acquired in Hailey, Idaho and never shaken.

↑ Index

915. Robert Archambeau
Geddes
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Let me just plug Geddes' book, while I'm at it.

The poem comes from:

Active Trading: Selected Poems 1970-1995
Fredrickton, New Brunswick: Goose Lane, 1996.
ISBN: 0-86492-198-5
$12.95

↑ Index

916. jarnot
Re: Holy Moly!
Fri 28 Feb 1997

>Lisa Jarnot mentions:
>
>"...something that Robert Duncan says about how you can't reject ...Hitler >as the enemy because that potentiality exists in everybody."
>
>I certainly hope Robert Duncan never wrote anything as foolish as that.
>
>Tom Mandel
>
In "Man's Fulfillment in Order and Strife" Duncan writes:

"Reject Mae West as vulgar or Hitler as the enemy, reject them as fellows of our kind, and you have to go to battle against the very nature of Man himself, against the truth of things."

I kind of thought it made sense in the context of the Dorn discussion since there has been talk of counteracting ignorance with physical violence.

there's not much foolishness in Duncan.

Yours, LIsa

↑ Index

917. Christopher Alexander
Re: the feast of plagiarism
Fri 28 Feb 1997

> One possible response is a pamphlet I constructed for the 1988 Festival of Plagerism (sic) called The Plagiarist Codex; an old Maya Information Heiroglyph which can be viewed on line with a frames capable browser at:
>
> http://www.net22.com/qazingulaza/codex/codex.html

amendant - this is a beautiful page, Im really amazed at the work youve done here. wld yr mind if I add a link from my (unfinished) page to quaz?

oh, one thing - yr href at the end of the plagiarism codex is coded as "index.shtml" right now. thought yd like to know. doesnt that look like yiddish? "that boy, let me tell you, hes nothing but a shtml."

provisionally chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

918. David R. Israel
Re: Spell check / Jorie G.
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Patrick --

thanks for note responding to my Q. abt. Jorie Graham. What you say --

> Her appropriation of LangPo and Olsonite techniques begins with "End of Beauty," tho she applies these to rather different ends.

sounds about right. I heard her give a reading in DC last year -- only caught the final part (due to office work situation), but much enjoyed her intelligent (I felt) performance & writing. Come to think of it, also saw her read in NYC circa '90, in a somewhat odd (but likeable enough) program with a couple of poets (Bob Creeley being one of 'em) & a couple of painters, up at the Jewish Y (as I believe it's nicnamed).

Anyhow, perhaps I've simply developed a liking for what Jorie Graham is up to. True, she takes those methods & modes in her own direction.

> Notley's quotation marks are fascinating. They function more as metrical units than anything else. . . .

Metrical -- breath regulation -- (have to give it more look / thought).

d.i.

↑ Index

919. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Re: recommend san diego readings
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Having heard/witnessed/met Jaap Blonk at Woodland Pattern here in Milwaukee last fall highly recommend taking up the following invitation:

On Thu, 27 Feb 1997, Jerry Rothenberg wrote:

> For those of you in or near San Diego, the following may be of interest:
>
> Wednesday March 5 7:00 p.m. at Jerome Rothenberg's studio (Visual Arts 451 on UCSD campus): a performance by the Dutch poet / soundtext artist Jaap Blonk, along with improvisations by contrabassist Bert Turetzky.
>
> Friday March 7 6:30 p.m. at the Porter Troupe Gallery (301 Spruce Street): a reading and performance by Ed Sanders.
>
> Both events free and open to the public.

↑ Index

920. Herb Levy
Oliveros/Fullman CD
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Oops.

I left the wrong POBox key while I was out of town, so the discs for those of you who've already mail ordered Suspended Music: Deep Listening Band & Long String Intrument are just going out today.

Sorry for the delay. Snail or e-mail orders at the US$15 price will be honored through Monday March 3rd.

Hope to meet some of you all at the CD release parties in mid-March.

Bests

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

921. Brenda Ellen Uchman
Hannah Hoch
Fri 28 Feb 1997

At the MOMA from Feb. 27th-May 20th a retrospective of the brilliant photomontages of HANNAH HOCH will be up. Went last night-penetrated my inner sensibility-had to get it out to the po-list (she did attend her fair number of Dada po-readings) And, Thurs. nites are pay what you like.

Brenda Iijima

[redacted]
Sociology Department
413 Fayerweather Hall
Columbia University
Tel.: [redacted]
==========

↑ Index

922. Steven Marks
Re: the feast of plagiarism
Fri 28 Feb 1997

On Fri, 28 Feb 1997, Christopher Alexander wrote:
>
> oh, one thing - yr href at the end of the plagiarism codex is > coded as "index.shtml" right now. thought yd like to know.
> doesnt that look like yiddish? "that boy, let me tell you, hes > nothing but a shtml."
>

There's something wrong maybe with being a shtml?!

_____
Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html
_____

↑ Index

923. Michael Boughn
Re: Holy Moly!
Fri 28 Feb 1997

Thanks, Lisa.

I don't know why this would be a surprise. This is the core of Duncan's argument with Denise Levertov (or Leveton as the NY Times has it in Mitchell Goodman's obit) and the foundation of his poetics.

Mike
[redacted]

> In "Man's Fulfillment in Order and Strife" Duncan writes:
>
> "Reject Mae West as vulgar or Hitler as the enemy, reject them as fellows of our kind, and you have to go to battle against the very nature of Man himself, against the truth of things."
>
> I kind of thought it made sense in the context of the Dorn discussion since there has been talk of counteracting ignorance with physical violence.
>
> there's not much foolishness in Duncan.
>
> Yours, LIsa

↑ Index

924. aerialedge
Re: how people behave
Fri 28 Feb 1997

> What kind of facial expression do you have when you punch a nazi poet in the eye?

guess that would depend on how "thick-skinned" OH NEVER MIND.

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

March 1997

897 messages · Sat 1 Mar 1997 – Tue 1 Apr 1997

Hale-Bopp was the brightest thing in the sky that March, and on the twenty-sixth thirty-nine people were found dead in a rented house at Rancho Santa Fe, having concluded that a craft was travelling behind it and that they should go. The list does not mention the comet, or the house, or any of it. Exactly a year earlier it had given Hyakutake a single parenthesis in a party report, so this is by now a habit rather than an oversight, and I record it and move on. What the room was doing across eight hundred and ninety-six letters instead was arguing, in three unconnected threads that are plainly one thread, about what lasts.

It started in the archive of itself. Steven Clay asked after the mimeo magazines, and for a fortnight the room emptied its memory onto the wire: C, The World, Beatitude, United Artists, Adventures in Poetry, 432 Review, Mag City, Fuck You. Twenty-five letters of titles, editors, addresses, the occasional phone number. George Bowering, who had contributed half a dozen from Vancouver, got to the end of his own list and could not finish it — “and that one, what was its name, from Preston?” — which is, I think, the truest sentence in the volume. That is what survives of a revolution: a catalogue with a hole in it.

Kent Johnson read that thread and asked the obvious question, which is why nobody else had. Astronomers were now clear that the Earth is fated to be hit, possibly tonight; so what is the worth of poetry, avant-garde or otherwise? “there will be no smell of mimeo ink” or memory of it afterwards; language poetry and all its contraries would go together, The World and APR alike. Then he asked what beer avant-garde poets drink while writing. Thirty-four letters came back and nearly every one was a joke. Alan Sondheim: “I always donate my poems to stopping anything” from outer space. Simon Schuchat, helpfully — “meanwhile, that asteroid must be getting closer”. Steven Marks pointed out we are all going to die anyway. Joe Safdie thanked everyone for the humour, which had been much needed.

It was needed because of the other thread, the largest single quarrel in this archive: ninety-seven letters under deeply disturbed and its branches. David Kellogg was deeply disturbed by what Marjorie Perloff had written about identity politics — that the minority poetries of the eighties had been, at their inception, formally rather conservative, and that nobody could say so aloud without being called a racist. Perloff wondered whether Kellogg read what she wrote. Kellogg replied patiently and at length, conceding the half he agreed with and specifying the half he did not: “that doesn’t make you a racist”, he wrote, and had never thought otherwise. It ran a fortnight, drew in thirty people, and was at bottom an argument about who gets into the anthology.

Which is the joke, and Perloff supplies it herself, in the middle of the fight, against her own side. She does not want an anthology at all, she says; she never uses one if she can help it; she goes with David Antin’s quip that “anthologies are to poets like the zoo to animals”. I have set the three threads in the order March sent them, because the room spent that month listing magazines that no longer exist, one of which nobody could name; then established that a rock will one day erase the list, the magazines, and the men who remember them; and then fought harder than it has ever fought, ninety-seven letters, over who is admitted to the zoo.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 897 in all.

WRITERS

<[redacted]>, By Way Of BETH LEE SIMON… 439
[Dimpson, Bennett M. Sm 589
Aerialedge 51, 147, 448, 530, 671, 794, 796
Alexander, Charles 191, 273, 383, 384, 460, 461, 524, 592, 712, 724
Alexander, Christopher 34, 212, 217, 218, 249, 267, 354, 355, 356, 371, 422, 430, 454, 457, 465, 477, 485, 861, 862
Amato 3, 49, 224, 246, 248, 258, 270, 271, 272, 320, 332, 334, 396, 397, 402, 406, 428, 443, 455, 478, 493, 503, 568, 760, 883
Ana, Dorulet D 309, 310
And, Miekal 393, 449, 512, 636
Archambeau, Robert 243, 336, 339, 363, 394, 442
Aviram, Amittai F. 408
Barbour, Douglas 201, 525, 554, 557, 693, 816, 853, 855
Battin, Wendy 158, 307, 529, 584, 743, 746, 784, 805
Bell, Thomas 263, 820, 866
Bellamy, Dodie 889
Berger, Maxianne 55
Bernstein, Charles 23, 39, 303
Bouchard/College/hmco, Daniel 162, 163, 210, 245, 789
Boughn, Michael 157, 239, 472, 473, 515, 630, 730, 869
Bowering, George 15, 16, 17, 20, 60, 99, 100, 101, 102, 392, 416, 467, 550, 582, 764, 771, 772, 804, 831, 856, 857, 867
Bromige, David 664, 670, 697, 698, 726, 770, 778, 779, 842, 846, 852, 875
Brown, Bil 775, 834, 835
Brown, Pam 87, 91, 105, 725, 748
Bruno, Franklin 360, 401, 672
Cabri, Louis 412, 509, 516, 520, 545, 555, 572, 619, 668, 727, 854
Carll, Steve 340, 658, 890
Carnography 304, 305, 419
Cayley, John 67, 203
Cheney, Don 762
CHERNOFF, MAXINE 127, 195
Chirot, Christina Fairbank 121, 213, 283, 499, 822
Clay, Steven 79, 120, 194, 438
Clifford, Clare Emily 466, 669
Coffey, Michael 278, 347
Conte, Joseph 423
Conte, Joseph M 250
Cope, Stephen 570, 628, 629, 707
Corbin, Michael 53, 174, 175, 434
Crown, Kathleen 513, 514
Curnow, Wystan 228
Damon, Maria 10, 11, 27, 38, 46, 61, 62, 146, 160, 200, 277, 316, 390, 616, 638, 640, 687, 689, 709, 723, 734, 803, 821
Damon), Maria Damon (Maria 97, 306, 622
Davis, Jordan 26, 41, 54, 84, 122, 287, 317, 326, 331, 367, 523, 532, 536, 579, 599, 634, 683, 685, 756, 892
Dbkk 77, 78, 124, 130, 233, 247, 345, 352, 489, 528, 533, 544, 651, 876
Demian 185, 389, 447
Dlugonski, Dan Raphael 847
Douglas 539, 540
Drake, Robert 14, 113, 117, 262, 722, 729
DS 9, 24, 141, 180, 300, 302, 353, 379, 380, 385, 386, 400, 418, 450, 451, 701, 714, 716
DuPlessis, Rachel Blau 537
Dworkin, Craig Douglas 826
Edwards, Ken 155
Emerson, Jocelyn 358, 469, 601, 801, 824
Etter, Carrie 292
Felix, Joel 276
G, Henry 736
Ghould, Hernry 894
Glazier, Loss 167, 359, 690
Goldsmith, Kenneth 858
Gould, Henry 216, 240, 266, 346, 365, 370, 410, 421, 474, 490, 491, 492, 527, 563, 566, 594, 595, 596, 606, 609, 610, 631, 692, 702, 703, 761, 763, 765, 806, 870, 872, 881
Groberts 446
Grotjohn, Bob 583, 827
Grumman, Bob 797, 815, 887, 888, 895, 896
Guest, Eliza McGrand- CVA 137, 198, 223, 242, 776
Hale, Robert 694
Hansen, Jeff 368
Hartman, Bat 552
Hehir, K.a. 230
Hen 677, 688, 791
Henry 479, 500, 501, 502, 517, 518, 519, 607, 620, 641, 642, 649, 652, 717, 766, 777, 781
Huang, Yunte 793
Israel, David 153, 156, 261, 301, 312, 313, 382, 510, 549, 567, 569, 700, 706, 742, 744
Israel, David R. 4, 33, 199, 372, 414, 417, 597, 605, 608, 614, 615, 621, 627, 812,

813, 836, 837, 839, 843, 845, 851, 859, 860
Jaeger, Peter 602, 623, 738, 740, 844
Jarnot 13
Jdhollo 886
JOHNSON, KENT 18, 65, 129, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 209, 229, 238, 260, 413, 591, 624, 675, 676, 678, 679, 680, 681, 686, 728, 750, 751, 754, 755, 769, 773, 814, 863
Joris, Pierre 211, 234, 235, 251, 511, 551, 575, 753, 810, 865
KATHERINE, LYNES- 819
Kellogg, David 221, 253, 274, 284, 291, 343, 445, 462, 483, 564, 757
Kendall, Robert 715
Kennyg 115
Kimmelman, Burt 56, 173, 196, 214, 225, 405
Kirschenbaum, Matt 321, 713, 718
Landers, Peter 534
Larkin, Maryrose 531
Lazer, Hank 116, 268
Lease, Joseph 76, 80, 81, 82, 176, 285, 286, 288, 289, 295, 296, 330, 333, 335, 337, 348, 373, 375, 376, 377, 378, 431, 432, 433, 435, 441, 444, 505, 647, 648, 650, 655
Lecky, Thomas 257, 297
Levin, Jonathan A 315, 553, 576
Levy, Herb 2, 64, 109, 192, 236, 237, 351, 407
Lewis, Joel 125, 126
Lightman, Ira 436, 487, 578, 644
List, Poetics 32
Loden, Rachel 19, 21, 66, 107, 420, 758, 783, 786, 790, 868, 871, 879
Losh, Elizabeth Mathews 586, 587
Lphillips 733
Machlin, Dan 25, 341
Magee, Michael 7, 8, 364, 395, 732
Main 6, 215, 787
Mandel, Tom 5, 37, 72, 118, 119, 241
MANN, CHRIS 666
Marks, Steven 12, 22, 161, 172, 259, 411, 458, 468, 646, 823, 838, 893
Marsh, William 741
Matt 45
Maz881 166, 704, 785, 877
McVay, Gwyn 159, 171, 475, 488, 522, 654, 830, 864
Miller, Stephen Paul 265
Moriarty, Laura 98, 538
Morris, A. 639
Mossin, Andrew 369
Nathanson, Tenney 28, 31, 110, 111, 456
Nicoll, Hugh 403
Nielsen, Aldon L. 205, 463
Nuyopoman 565, 828
Orange, Thomas M. 208, 232
Oren.izenberg 504, 556
Osman, Jena 264
Pape, Eric 226, 429, 547
Paul, Catherine Elizabeth 633
Perelman, Bob 780
Perloff, Marjorie 244, 324, 361, 398, 573
Peters, Carl Lynden 611, 719, 745
Pollet, Sylvester 35, 123, 202, 427, 498, 521, 682, 691
Prejsnar, Mark 42, 74, 252, 254, 293, 319, 323, 325, 424, 425, 426, 437, 452, 480, 481, 482, 484, 486, 526, 577, 635, 873, 874, 878, 882
Pritchett,Pat 59, 92, 165, 168, 535, 598, 637, 643, 695
Prod, William Burmeister 139, 164, 275, 299, 322, 327, 381, 409, 495, 506, 543, 574, 662, 684, 710, 711, 759, 767, 885
Raea100900 612
Reed, Demian 151, 179, 183
Regan, Matthias 290, 294, 342, 344, 349, 374, 497, 507, 561, 562
Reiner, Christopher 739
Reynolds, Rebecca 782
Roberts, Mark 90, 93, 94, 96, 104, 106, 140, 142, 143, 145, 149, 150, 231, 255, 256, 350, 548
Rosenberg, Jim 50
Rothenberg, Jerry 52, 75, 496
Russo, Linda V. 696
Safdie, Joe 58, 177, 219, 440, 508, 581, 699
Samuels, Lisa 558, 795
Savopoulos, Manny 95
Schaefer, P.Standard 220, 571
Schwartz, Jay 69, 83
Shoemakers 464, 749, 792, 798
Shurin, Aaron 128, 415
Silliman, Ron 1, 114
Simon 40, 227, 656, 848, 850
SIMON, BETH LEE 338
Simon, Schuchat 88, 89, 154, 188, 604, 811, 829
Simon, Toni 108, 206, 207, 588, 593
Slaughter, William 800
Smith, Dale 560, 580, 735
Sondheim, Alan Jen 30, 85, 86, 148, 152, 169, 170, 178, 184, 391, 600, 603, 613, 625, 747, 768, 833
Sondheim, Jennifer 43
Spinelli, Martin J 63, 144
Sschu30844 328, 329
Steinberg, Hugh 193, 298, 388, 459, 546, 585, 617, 626, 663, 665, 720, 721, 774, 808
Stroffolino, Chris 44, 311, 404, 673, 674
TACIUCH, DEAN F. 632
Templeton, F.A. 70, 71, 279, 280, 282, 399, 470, 471, 660, 661, 708
Tuma, Keith 318, 494

Varnes, Kathrine 618, 645
Vassilakis, Nico 68, 832
Vidaver, Aaron 559
Vincent, Stephen 103, 112, 136, 181, 204, 387, 849, 880
Vogler, Tom 308, 357
Wallace, Mark 36, 47, 48, 73, 269, 476
Ward, Diane Marie 737
Weiss, Mark 29, 57, 138, 182, 186, 187, 190, 222, 541, 542, 653, 659, 705, 788, 799, 807, 825, 840, 841
Welford, Gabrielle 197
Wheeler, Susan 314, 366, 453, 731
Zauhar, Dave 667, 891
Zimmerman, Daniel 189, 590, 657, 752, 802, 809, 817, 818, 897
Zitt, Joseph 281, 362, 884

NAMES MENTIONED

Abbot, Keith 204
Abbott, Steve 415, 572, 639
Abrams, Jen 278
Acker, Kathy 265
Adorno, Theodor 65, 84, 125, 580, 735, 736
Aitken, Adam 303, 350
Albon, George 658
Alexander, Jane 750, 751, 759
Alice, Mary 475
Allan, Don 205, 278
Altieri, Charles 324, 387, 390, 514
Amber, Lisa 733, 737
Americans, Asian 15, 395, 409, 749, 866
Anderson, Beth 265
Anderson, Erik 276
Anderson, Laurie 276, 625
Andrews, Bruce 278, 482
Angelo, Michael 230
Antin, David 114, 200, 456, 460, 496
Apollinaire, Guillaume 64
Arbor, Ann 591, 624, 653
Arnold, Bob 290, 514
Ashbery, John 41, 122, 256, 278, 324, 342, 387, 648, 794
Atlanta, Mark P. 42, 424, 425, 435, 437, 450, 463, 706, 873
Auden, W. H. 366, 564, 631
Augustine, Jane 560
Austen, Jane 576
Austin, Geer 189, 229, 236, 240, 263, 281, 351
Aviram, Amittai F. 408
Baker, Lori 130, 340
Baker, Tony 235
Baldwin, Mary 827
Baraka, Amiri 72, 278, 302, 311, 322, 324, 387, 390, 514, 794
Baratier, David 658
Barnes, Diane 775
Barthes, Roland 544
Bartlett, Martin 229, 236, 263
Bataille, George 586, 589, 625, 844
Baudelaire, Charles 474, 486, 489, 495, 581, 584, 717
Baudrillard, Jean 157
Beatty, Paul 311
Beckett, Tom 820
Bee, Susan 438, 588
Benjamin, Walter 256, 581, 584, 717, 794
Benn, Walter 205
Bennett, Bill 589
Berger, Jon 55, 57
Berkeley, Michael 72, 157, 205, 301, 544, 619, 658, 700, 837, 858, 866, 876
Berkson, Bill 340
Berlin, Irving 401
Bernard, Kenneth 699, 705, 714
Bernstein, Emma 253, 288, 299, 311, 324, 387, 509, 517, 794, 836, 841, 845, 857, 861, 868
Berrigan, Anselm 340, 345, 560, 593
Berrigan, Ted 126, 278, 438, 593
Beuys, Joseph 523, 526
Bevington, Stan 668
Bibby, Michael 514
Bidart, Frank 278
Bishop, Elizabeth 278, 294, 650, 652, 655
Blackman, Nicole 834
Blake, William 290, 307, 440, 444, 564, 817, 882
Blanchot, Maurice 211, 234, 235, 251, 255, 511, 551, 570, 575, 616, 753, 810, 817, 818, 865
Blarnes, Eric 410, 411, 421, 470, 471, 519, 521, 567, 706, 717, 736, 754, 755, 761, 762, 765, 766, 881
Blaser, Robin 114, 157
Bly, Robert 564, 572
Bolton, Ken 91, 93, 94, 96, 105, 118, 125, 142
Boone, Bruce 415
Borges, Millicent 290, 527
Boughn, Mike 499, 735, 736
Bourdieu, Pierre 65, 84, 125
BpNichol 668, 681, 693, 718, 719, 726, 727, 728, 738, 740, 741, 745, 816, 853, 855
Brainard, Joe 579, 588
Brandi, John 103, 114
Braxton, Anthony 570, 628, 644
Brodsky, Joseph 278
Brook, James 256
Brooks, Gwendolyn 278
Brown, Ann 41, 122, 311, 337, 448
Brown, Bill 125
Browne, Colin 278
Browning, Robert 417, 420

Bryant, Dana 278
Bukowski, Charles 278, 307
Bunting, Basil 235
Burger, Mary 340
Burke, Edmund 130
Burmeister, Bill 139, 141, 299, 322, 327
Burns, Avery 340
Burton, Philip 23
Butler, Judith 53, 290
Byron, Philip 354
Caddel, Richard 234, 235, 251, 255
Caesar, Little 822
Cage, John 265, 281, 448, 627, 634, 647, 662, 665
Cameron, Sharon 205
Capen, Samuel P. 23
Carlos, William 278
Carter, Angela 789
Castro, Michael 278
Celan, Paul 340, 479, 810, 817, 818, 855, 865, 890
Ceravolo, Joe 452
Chadwick, Lynn 303, 350
Chaloner, David 234, 251, 255
Chaucer, Geoffrey 603, 783
Chester, Jeff 222
Chomsky, Noam 794
Clampitt, Amy 278, 424, 435, 440, 444
Clarke, Jack 752
Clarke, John 157
Clarke, Robin 157, 514, 570
Clausen, Andy 514
Clinton, Bill 219, 672, 689, 791
Coalition, Christian 686
Cobain, Kurt 544
Cockburn, Alexander 244
Cocteau, Jean 64
Cohen, Ethan 210, 548
Colby, Todd 834
Coleman, Victor 668
Coleman, Wanda 278
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 553
Collins, Martha 124
Collis, Stephen 658
Coltrane, Alice 551, 570, 616, 628, 644
Coltrane, John 551, 570, 616
Columbus, Christopher 658, 890
Conrad, Tony 42, 360, 362
Cook, Albert 157
Coolidge, Clark 482
Corbett, William 235, 707
Cornell, Joseph 296, 319
Cortez, Jane 186
Cortez, Jayne 345
Cory, Alex 340
Couani, Anna 91, 93, 94, 118, 125, 142
Coultas, Brenda 834
County, Madison 384, 658, 752
Cowell, Henry 276
Crane, Lee 256, 641
Crawford, Robert 42, 74
Creeley, Robert 23, 235, 297, 299, 300, 302, 311, 415, 472, 483, 554, 668, 673
Crowe, John 474
Crown, Kathy 513
Daniels, Chris 658
Danon, Ruth 671
Darwin, Charles 445
Darwish, Mahmoud 564
Davidson, Daniel 460, 572
Davidson, Harriet 514
Davidson, Michael 110, 514, 572
Davies, Alan 412, 413, 415
Davies, Kevin 413
Dawe, Bruce 256
Day, Jean 340
Deleuze, Gilles 740
Dennis, Carl 200, 229, 236, 263, 571
Derrida, Jacques 578
Dickinson, Emily 283
Dickinson, Mark 506, 527, 552, 562
Doina, Ana 310
Donne, John 307, 354
Donnelly, Jean 448
Doris, Stacy 671
Dorn, Edward 157
Doty, Mark 278
Doyle, Kirby 46, 278
Drucker, Johanna 438, 593
Duggan, Laurie 96, 105
Duhamel, Denise 721
Duncan, Andrew 256
Duncan, Robert 1, 5, 7, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 37, 38, 278, 303, 311, 350, 369, 440, 441, 444, 446, 472, 473, 528, 559, 570, 619, 778, 799, 826, 853, 873
Dunn, Stephen 278
Dylan, Michael 380, 552, 562
Edgar, Chris 278, 688, 700, 706
Edison, Thomas 590, 657, 752, 802
Edmond, Murray 303, 350
Eliot, Joe 324, 387, 641
Ellen, Mary 229, 236, 263
Elliot, Joe 549, 593
Elliott, George 834
Ellis, Stephen 674
Emerson, Claudia 8, 552, 562
England, Amy 186, 354, 370
Enslin, Ted 798
Epstein, Thomas 763
Eshelman, Clayton 750
Eshleman, Clayton 114
Espada, Martin 278
Esther, Little 91, 93, 94, 118, 125, 142

Estrin, Jerry 98
Eugene, Brett 575
Evans, Bill 548, 673
Evans, George 235
Evans, Steve 25, 71, 341, 536, 572, 673, 698, 727, 728
Fahey, John 510
Faulkner, William 823
Featherston, Dan 303, 350
Ferguson, Jesse 234, 251, 255
Ferlinghetti, Lawrence 278
Fischer, Norman 438
Fisher, Allen 235
Fisher, Ann 205
Fisher, Harrison 448
Fisher, Roy 235
Fitterman, Rob 671
Fletcher, Sasha 839
Foley, Patrick 205, 340
Forbes, John 256
Forche, Carolyn 514, 547, 866
Ford, Francis 261
Foster, Edward 345
Foster, Paul 340, 345, 514
Foucault, Michel 619
Foye, Raymond 420
France, Peter 234, 251, 255, 276, 706, 717
Frances, Mary 581, 584
Fraser, Ian 107
Fredman, Stephen 23
Friedlander, Ben 671, 673
Friedman, David M. 514
Frost, Corey 130
Fuller, Heather 41
Fuller, William 658
Fullman, Ellen 229, 236, 263
Gaines, Reg E. 278
Galassi, Jonathan 278
Gallagher, Kevin 96, 105
Gallagher, Kristen 412, 413
Garcia, Rodrigo 369
Ginsberg, Allen 278, 828
Gioia, Dana 278
Gizzi, Peter 73
Gladman, Renee 544
Glancy, Diane 200
Gluck, Bob 415
Glück, Louise 278
Godard, Barbara 516
Goia, Dana 275
Golding, Alan 514
Gordon, Robert 494
Gorman, Michael 42
Gould, Glenn 474, 479, 596, 607, 608
Graham, Jorie 278
Graham, Lea 136, 138, 256, 570, 672
Graham, Martha 544
Grahn, Judy 181
Gregg, Linda 201
Grenier, Bob 673
Grenier, Robert 890
Griffin, Tim 456
Guattari, Félix 740
Guest, Barbara 539, 540
Guitart, Jorge 303, 350
Gunn, Thom 107
Hadas, Rachel 514
Hagedorn, Jessica 387
Hall, Lind 200, 338, 439
Hall, Stuart 548
Halpern, Daniel 278
Halsey, Alan 34
Hamill, Meg 278
Hamill, Sam 278
Hancock, Carl 514
Hardin, Rob 304, 305, 419
Harper, Michael 311
Harris, Kaplan 65, 84, 125, 205
Harryman, Carla 404, 440, 444, 482, 536
Hartley, George 573, 591
Hartman, Charles O. 205
Harvey, David 794
Harvey, Lee 157
Harwood, Lee 235
Hass, Robert 514
Hatlen, Burt 23
Hawkins, Jeremy 107
Hawthorne, Nathaniel 256
Hayden, Tom 2, 278
Hayes, Jonathan 658
Hayles, Katherine 403
Healy, Randolph 394
Heaney, Seamus 278, 302, 336, 360, 380, 395, 424, 426, 435, 440, 444, 451, 482
Hehir, Kevin 230
Heidegger, Martin 586, 629, 637
Hejinian, Lynn 278, 482, 509, 517, 573, 574, 594, 685, 691, 753, 756
Heller, Michael 671
Heller, Mike 514
Henderson, David 107, 181
Henri, Charles 192, 570, 607
Herbert, George 276, 441, 561, 601
Herman, Rachel 210
Heron, Patrick 278
Hikmet, Nazim 564
Hitchens, Christopher 219
Hoffman, Cara 256
Hogan, Linda 278
Hollander, Benjamin 98
Hollo, Anselm 114, 130, 886
Holloway, Rob 2
Holman, Bob 278, 514, 828
Homer 536

Hoover, Edgar 296, 311, 319, 387, 412, 413
Hoover, Paul 127, 303, 311, 350, 794
House, Poets 278, 690
House, White 244, 266
Howard, Richard 695, 710
Howard, Scott 205, 619, 727, 728, 854
Howe, Susan 34, 253, 278, 288, 324, 387
Hughes, Langston 876
Hughes, Peter 266, 876
Hughes, Ted 302
Hunt, Erica 244, 253, 288, 324, 387, 671
Irby, Kenneth 420
Ireland, Lauren 671
Irvine, James 292, 295
Israel, David R. 4, 33, 199, 372, 414, 417, 420, 597, 598, 605, 608, 614, 615, 621, 627, 640, 648, 812, 813, 836, 837, 839, 843, 845, 851, 859, 860
Israeli, Henry 783
Jackson, Jesse 126, 265, 544, 624, 673
Jameson, Fred 330, 377
Jarman, Mark 278
Jeffery, Mark 304, 305, 419
Jenkins, Matthew 256, 398, 432, 765
Jillway, Jill 32
Johns, Jasper 794
Jones, Brian 340, 548
Jordan, June 26, 65, 71, 84, 122, 125, 137, 317, 337, 367, 404, 414, 508, 523, 526, 530, 532, 536, 579, 674, 683, 685, 691, 752, 753, 756, 892
Kaplan, Leslie 205
Karavatos, Nicholas 130
Kathryn, Mary 256
Katz, Eliot 514
Kaufman, Bob 639
Kaufman, Erica 639
Kearney, Larry 256
Keats, John 560
Keller, Helen 264
Keller, Lynn 264, 514
Kelly, Patrick 9, 14, 16, 17, 19, 21, 22, 24, 28, 29, 30, 31, 55, 57, 60, 139, 141, 250, 511
Kelly, Robert 250, 496, 511
Kelsey, Karla 278
Kenner, Hugh 361
Kerouac, Jack 283, 583, 789, 860
Kerry, John 278
Killian, Kevin 124, 340, 415, 528, 555, 559, 829, 854, 876
Killian, Sean 25, 341, 673, 727, 728
King, Rodney 424, 435, 440, 444
Kinsella, John 256, 303, 350, 458
Kinsella, Thomas 221, 253, 274, 284, 288, 289, 291, 324, 343, 445, 462, 483, 564, 757
Kirschenbaum, Matthew G. 321, 680, 713, 718, 724
Kizer, Carolyn 256, 278
Klein, Michael 278
Koch, Kenneth 278, 311
Kristeva, Julia 515, 518
Kumin, Maxine 278
Kuszai, Joel 23, 32
Kyger, Joanne 112, 124, 560
Lacan, Jacques 578
Lamantia, Philip 560
Landers, Pete 534, 542
Larkin, Joan 278
Lauterbach, Ann 25, 341, 615, 673, 794
Leggott, Michele 23
Leithauser, Brad 278
Levertov, Denise 216, 221, 278, 554, 575, 826
Levi, David 98
Levinas, Emmanuel 794
Levine, Philip 424, 435, 440, 444
Lewis, Bernard 64, 229, 236, 256, 263, 699, 705, 714
Livesay, Dorothy 876
London, Frank 67, 155, 203, 499, 512
London, Jack 456
Longenbach, James 324
Lorca, Federico García 278, 369
Louise, Bobbie 107, 256, 278
Mac Low, Jackson 476, 704
Lowell, Amy 311, 496, 554, 789
Lowell, Robert 278, 294
Luoma, Bill 166
Lyons, Kimberly 438, 588
Mackey, Nate 73
Mackey, Nathaniel 73, 278, 570
Maclow, Jackson 673
Madison, James 194
Magee, Kevin 256, 404
Magee, Mike 7, 364, 374, 395, 404
Mahler, David 229, 236, 263
Mailer, Norman 456
Mandel, Charlotte 216, 241, 460
Mandelstam, Osip 230, 501, 517
Manning, Nicholas 65, 84, 119, 125
Marie, Anne 278, 303, 350
Marlowe, Philip 479
Marmon, Leslie 324, 342, 387
Marshall, Robert 278, 548
Martin, Camille 34, 63, 64, 75, 144, 278, 548, 793
Martinez, Michael 278
Mason, Janet 278
Matlin, David 791
Matthews, Harry 256
Mayakovsky, Vladimir 311, 499, 501, 822
Mayer, Bernadette 89, 125, 278, 318, 376
Mayer, Jane 336, 635
McCaffery, Steve 67, 77, 78, 592, 728, 740, 844

Melville, Nicky 157, 456
Mengham, Rod 256, 279
Meredith, William 261, 658
Merrill, James 278, 561, 733, 737, 784, 804, 805
Merwin, W. S. 278, 812, 837, 853
Messerli, Douglas 278, 380, 412, 413, 539, 540, 571
Metcalf, Paul 822
Michaels, Leonard 205
Middleton, Christopher 886
Miller, Paul D. 163, 182, 185, 210, 264, 576, 626, 668
Mills, Billy 394
Milton, John 290, 607
Miriam, Erica 137
Mitchell, Joan 95
Mittenthal, Robert 509, 564, 572
Mobilio, Albert 514
Monroe, Jonathan 794
Moore, Allison 197
Moore, Marianne 369
Morgan, Robin 278, 548
Morris, Dee 256, 514, 639
Morrison, Toni 205
Morton, Kathryn A. 276
Moyers, Bill 789
Muldoon, Paul 278
Mullen, Harryette 244, 253, 288, 324, 387
Murphy, Michelle 303, 350
Murray, Ian 256
Myers, Michael 137
Myles, Eileen 278
Nechvatal, Joseph 276
Neel, Alice 588
Nelson, Cary 514
Neruda, Pablo 18, 27, 648
Nielsen, Aldon L. 72, 205, 448, 463, 794
Norman, Peter 729
Norton, John 211, 216, 220, 244, 247, 249, 253, 274, 278, 285, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 295, 296, 306, 319, 324, 328, 342, 358, 371, 387, 408, 412, 413, 530, 554, 866
Notley, Alice 88, 108, 125, 278, 560
Noto, John 303, 350
O'Hara, Frank 278, 794
Oliver, John 866, 878
Olson, Charles 183, 324, 342, 370, 387, 528
Olson, Kirby 41, 72, 157, 186, 190, 342, 370, 380, 425, 440, 442, 444, 450, 472, 554, 559, 570, 574, 582, 619, 668, 699, 705, 714
Ondaatje, Michael 20
Oppen, George 629, 637
Oppenheimer, Joel 265
Orange, Thomas M. 208, 213, 232
Ortiz, Travis 753, 756
Ostriker, Alicia 514, 782
Pacific, Asian 153, 301
Padgett, Ron 48, 278, 794
Palmer, Michael 135, 728
Parker, Michael 44, 783
Parkway, Neal 2
Paterson, Don 235
Patterson, Ian 234, 251, 255, 279
Paulenich, Craig 750, 751
Pearson, Ted 514
Perleman, Bob 675, 680, 713, 718, 724, 728, 771
Perry, David 205
Persky, Stan 124
Pessoa, Fernando 658, 765
Pettet, Simon 340
Pettibon, Raymond 651
Phillips, Beth 256, 278, 571, 733, 737
Phipps, Wanda 256
Pine, White 278
Pinsky, Robert 278
Piombino, Nick 108, 207, 588, 591, 593
Plath, Sylvia 554
Pluto, Annie 658
Poe, Edgar 474, 486, 489, 495
Polkinhorn, Harry 2
Pollock, Jackson 653
Porter, Anne 52, 256
Portugal, Anne 658
Potts, Robert 548
Pound, Ezra 188, 190, 297, 307, 360, 369, 442, 472, 508, 549, 552, 562, 587, 635, 641, 699, 705, 714, 735, 736
Powell, Douglas 658
Powell, Ren 205
Prevallet, Kristin 890
Price, Larry 658
Di Prima, Diane 130, 496
Prince, Richard 438, 593
Pritchett, Patrick 168, 189, 535, 598, 622, 637, 643, 695
Quartermain, Peter 658
Quasha, George 496
Rasula, Jed 238, 672
Ratcliffe, Stephen 658
Raven, Francis 688
Raworth, Tom 147
Rehm, Pam 44
Retallack, Joan 247, 264, 280, 448, 696
Reyes, Louis 514
Reznikoff, Charles 244, 253, 288, 324, 387
Ribot, Marc 571
Rice, Doug 304, 305, 419, 686, 750
Rich, Adrienne 278, 299, 435, 440, 444, 514, 650, 652, 866
Ridge, Cedar 729
Riley, Denise 251

Riley, Peter 234, 251, 255, 256, 318
Rilke, Rainer Maria 232, 495, 502, 506
Rimbaud, Dee 539, 540
Rivera, Alex 18
Roberts, Gary 276
Robinson, Elizabeth 658, 693
Robinson, Kit 130, 340
Robinson, Nick 340
Roediger, David 205
Ronk, Martha 571
Rorty, Richard 553
Ross, Joe 674
Rothenberg, Jerome 2, 75, 438, 496, 593
Rothschild, Douglas 658
Rush, Otis 91, 93, 94, 118, 125, 142
Salmon, Dan 385, 404, 451
Sanchez, Jorge 278, 387, 390, 514
Sandburg, Carl 103, 114
Sanders, Jay 2, 52, 619
Saroyan, William 345
Sayers, Thomas 674
Scalapino, Leslie 278
Schjeldahl, Peter 265
Schneeman, George 438, 593
Schultz, Lou 256, 340
Schultz, Susan 303, 325, 329, 350, 514
Schuster, Joshua 412, 413
Schuyler, James 247, 278, 794
Schwartz, Leonard 514
Schwerner, Armand 126, 514
Schwitters, Kurt 64, 144, 438, 588
Searle, John 672
Seaton, Maureen 671, 721
Seidman, Hugh 671
Selby, Spencer 340, 571, 658
Serres, Michel 516, 590, 657
Shakespeare, William 201, 479, 566, 580
Shapiro, David 256, 265, 375
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 205
Shepard, Sam 562
Shepherd, Reginald 278
Sherry, James 727, 728
Shively, Charles 854
Shoemaker, Steve 749, 792, 798
Simic, Charles 107
Simon, Greg 108, 165, 169, 338, 439, 453, 544, 876
Simpson, Bennett 589
Sloan, Margaret 340, 514
Smith, Harry 180, 256
Smith, Hazel 303, 350
Smith, Rod 41, 448, 658, 671
Smithson, Robert 589
Snyder, Gary 750, 758
Sokal, Alan 868
Solomon, Carl 210
Sorrentino, Christopher 257, 573, 594
Spahr, Juliana 25, 278, 341, 571
Spandrift, Jack 216, 736, 754, 761, 762, 765
Sparrow, John 278, 511, 794
Spicer, Jack 124, 278, 345, 528, 630, 637, 829, 876
Spicer, John 112, 124, 452, 528, 555, 557, 559, 578, 581, 619, 829, 876
Stafford, William 404
Stalin, Joseph 18, 27
Stanley, George 528
Stanley, Jared 278, 548
Stein, Gertrude 273, 278, 297, 299, 383, 384, 460, 461, 524, 592, 662, 665, 699, 705, 708, 714, 858, 890
Stern, Gerald 307, 311, 514
Stevens, Wallace 307, 365, 641, 700, 702
Stewart, Jon 20, 789
Strauss, Zoe 98
Studies, Asian 839
Sullivan, Andrew 843
Sweeney, Chad 463
Taggart, John 23
Talarico, Ross 514
Tate, James 278
Taussig, Michael 514
Taylor, Cecil 387
Taylor, Tom 278, 387
Templeton, Fiona 70, 71, 74, 251, 255, 279, 280, 282, 399, 470, 471, 660, 661, 708
Texas, Irving 157, 189, 281
Thesen, Sharon 201
Thilleman, Tod 171
Thomas, Dylan 323, 327
Thompson, George 860
Toscano, Rodrigo 130, 278
Townsend, Cheryl 205
Trachtenberg, Amy 828
Tranter, John 234, 251, 255, 256, 525, 554, 557, 693
Trinidad, David 420
Truitt, Sam 694
Tzara, Tristan 64
Ulmer, Gregory 715
Union, Poets 91, 93, 94, 125
Valery, Paul 15, 365, 370, 474, 486, 489, 495, 518, 528, 594, 597, 598, 599, 688, 700
Vangelisti, Paul 571
Vendler, Helen 278
Vermont, Charlie 261
Veronica, Angela 544
Violi, Paul 671
Virilio, Paul 817, 822
Volkman, Karen 671
Waldman, Anne 206, 207, 438, 588, 775, 830, 834, 837, 843, 860
Waldman, Ken 843, 860
Waldrop, Rosemary 794

Waldrop, Rosmarie 130
Walker, Laura 205, 413
Walker, Shawn 412
Walsh, Catherine 235, 394
Warhol, Andy 625, 647, 648
Warner, Jim 2
Warsh, Lewis 89, 125, 438
Washington, George 147, 180, 244, 253, 257, 266, 288, 314, 316, 324, 366, 387, 448, 460, 658, 671, 687, 794
Watson, Carl 304, 305, 419, 892
Watten, Barrett 387
Weaver, Rebecca 514
Weinberger, Eliot 18, 27, 549
Weiner, Hannah 673, 854
Weiner, Lawrence 854
Weiners, John 415, 537
Weiss, Jason 123
Wellman, Donald 205, 571
Welsh, Lawrence 620, 638, 667, 687
Whitehead, Ron 440, 444
Whitman, Walt 157, 290, 506, 527, 549, 552, 562, 688, 873
Wieners, John 412, 413, 415, 420, 572, 668, 854
Wilbur, Richard 452, 649
Wilcox, Dan 2
Williams, Paul O. 15, 278, 297, 427, 549, 552, 562, 626, 641
Williams, William Carlos 41, 369, 427
Wilson, Karen 519, 521, 834
Wilson, Robert 647
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 619
Wright, Charles 278
Yates, Katie 581, 584
Yau, John 324, 387
Zukofsky, Louis 23, 244, 253, 288, 299, 324, 342, 359, 387, 452, 473, 508
Zukofsky, Paul 23

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 2, 252, 266, 333, 344, 345, 375, 425, 435, 440, 444, 450, 457, 658, 673, 870, 876, 878
Aesthetics 3, 8, 69, 103, 114, 125, 238, 243, 246, 248, 249, 270, 278, 282, 285, 286, 290, 299, 320, 330, 332, 344, 356, 358, 365, 373, 378, 387, 390, 396, 406, 408, 428, 436, 437, 442, 453, 477, 580, 583, 586, 625, 656, 678, 817, 822
African American poetry 242, 246, 270, 278, 282, 311, 345, 387, 755, 766
Anthologies 93, 94, 96, 105, 125, 141, 168, 189, 203, 208, 211, 213, 216, 220, 221, 223, 239, 240, 242, 244, 249, 253, 269, 273, 274, 278, 285, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 295, 296, 297, 311, 315, 318, 319, 324, 333, 343, 345, 354, 358, 371, 380, 387, 390, 398, 400, 408, 416, 417, 418, 432, 434, 446, 480, 496, 499, 530, 539, 540, 626, 688, 708, 750, 813, 890
Anti-Semitism 13, 257
Appropriation 256, 320, 358, 387, 406, 430, 706, 727, 728, 767
Archives and libraries 23, 25, 32, 34, 42, 144, 145, 202, 212, 217, 218, 222, 235, 249, 267, 285, 290, 295, 301, 354, 355, 356, 371, 373, 412, 413, 420, 422, 430, 479, 524, 527, 543, 572, 668, 690, 699, 700, 705, 714, 725, 752, 763, 854, 869
Asian American poetry 324, 387, 390
Autobiography 173, 176, 345, 599, 603, 794
Avant-garde 129, 132, 133, 149, 150, 156, 160, 244, 253, 278, 288, 311, 324, 333, 344, 356, 361, 373, 387, 398, 406, 417, 432, 440, 444, 472, 543, 591, 814, 858, 876
Beauty 435, 440, 444, 591, 727, 728, 740, 745
Biography 242, 250, 519, 521, 536, 539, 540, 570, 876
Black Mountain 257, 278, 441
Book announcements 25, 127, 128, 303, 304, 305, 350, 412, 413, 419, 461, 573, 592, 824, 861, 862, 890
Bookstores 114, 139, 141, 196, 208, 213, 275, 278, 335, 397, 466, 510, 512, 519, 521, 593, 658, 775
Calls for submissions 200, 673
Capitalism 175, 199, 365, 412, 413, 619, 673, 695, 710, 740
Censorship 30, 31, 311, 469, 686, 757, 770, 814, 847
Cities 42, 181, 200, 794, 830, 837
Class 95, 205, 238, 247, 248
Close reading 200, 509, 517, 810, 817, 818
Collage and montage 340, 822
Conferences and festivals 20, 23, 72, 200, 205, 216, 234, 241, 251, 255, 276, 279, 359, 396, 456, 503, 512, 514, 548, 571, 704, 752, 775, 789, 834, 836, 841, 844, 862, 866, 883, 891
Copyright and permissions 18, 412, 413
Craft 243, 286, 320, 327, 396, 503, 669
Creative writing pedagogy 97, 113, 116, 143, 246, 254, 258, 282, 396, 406, 428, 429, 453, 503, 547, 554, 626, 632, 669
Dada 64, 648, 673, 740
Deconstruction 205, 603, 611, 613, 623
Difficulty 32, 162, 163, 249, 285, 290, 596
Dreams 31, 42, 111, 216, 269, 273, 278, 352, 354, 370, 372, 410, 411, 496, 591, 605, 642, 700, 715, 717, 747
Ecology and ecopoetics 160, 446, 577
Editing 29, 30, 31, 32, 64, 261, 301, 312, 822
Electronic poetry and hypertext 32, 36, 47, 48, 63, 64, 73, 144, 303, 340, 350, 359,

476, 514, 658, 715, 777, 890
Elegy 614
Empire and imperialism 304, 305, 419, 586
Epic 157, 869
Epistemology 556, 558, 559
Ethics 53, 196, 423, 453, 536
Experimental poetry 25, 129, 132, 133, 149, 150, 246, 278, 282, 322, 539, 540, 641, 754, 761, 762, 767
Fascism 104, 754, 769
Feminism 137, 181, 205, 247, 264, 301, 387, 390, 395, 457, 696, 709
Film 25, 50, 168, 189, 200, 205, 261, 271, 283, 301, 330, 345, 371, 497, 576, 608, 673, 699, 705, 714, 723, 772, 801, 807, 821, 822, 825, 870
Fluxus 276
Formalism 240, 278, 311, 549, 573, 577, 591, 606, 607, 608, 618, 631, 632, 638, 641, 645, 649, 650, 652, 667, 669, 672, 687, 693, 698, 702, 817
Free speech 47, 49, 172, 304, 305, 419, 754
Free verse 631
Futurism 63, 64, 75, 192
Gender 257, 289, 364, 374, 387, 451, 653, 673, 676, 707, 709
Globalization 205, 794
Grants and funding 96, 103, 114, 247, 256, 261, 274, 277, 289, 304, 305, 323, 347, 384, 408, 419, 422, 458, 459, 686, 720, 722, 750, 751, 759, 769, 770, 774, 791, 847
Haiku 539, 540
Harlem Renaissance 345
Humour and satire 8, 124, 129, 132, 133, 149, 150, 177, 179, 182, 204, 311, 368, 370, 396, 440, 444, 469, 478, 580, 608
Identity politics 221, 238, 244, 246, 247, 248, 253, 257, 264, 270, 274, 277, 282, 284, 288, 289, 290, 294, 299, 306, 311, 317, 324, 325, 328, 332, 342, 358, 387, 638, 645, 650, 666, 667, 687
Ideology 36, 278, 290, 294, 323, 358, 428, 563, 564, 566, 572, 775, 789, 882 Imagism 216
Improvisation 2, 183, 186
Indigenous and Native poetics 256, 278, 838
Interviews 24, 32, 87, 91, 93, 94, 125, 126, 215, 243, 256, 274, 277, 278, 284, 286, 289, 299, 345, 360, 362, 372, 394, 412, 413, 420, 438, 508, 711, 737, 750, 770, 866
Israel and Palestine 4, 33, 153, 156, 199, 261, 301, 312, 313, 372, 382, 414, 417, 420, 510, 519, 521, 549, 552, 567, 569, 597, 598, 605, 608, 609, 614, 615, 621, 627, 637, 640, 648, 700, 706, 717, 742, 744, 746, 783, 812, 813, 836, 837, 838, 839, 841, 843, 845, 851, 853, 859, 860, 861
Jewish poetics 205
Language poetry 120, 129, 132, 133, 149, 150, 238, 240, 278, 288, 291, 292, 293, 295, 323, 339, 370, 404, 424, 433, 435, 440, 444, 451, 460, 482, 496, 508, 527, 543, 572, 673, 727, 728, 767, 854
Latino and Latin American poetry 278, 324, 382, 385, 387, 390, 392, 409
Letters and correspondence 114, 304, 305, 419, 422, 460, 581, 584, 658, 854, 869
List moderation 25, 205, 206, 207, 304, 305, 341, 368, 380, 396, 407, 419, 673, 727, 728, 763, 847
Little magazines 25, 32, 46, 65, 69, 81, 83, 84, 87, 91, 93, 94, 101, 103, 106, 114, 118, 120, 124, 125, 130, 142, 144, 155, 195, 206, 207, 256, 260, 261, 262, 265, 267, 276, 278, 281, 312, 325, 340, 351, 360, 372, 408, 496, 519, 521, 571, 607, 658, 760, 793, 836, 841, 866, 890
Lyric poetry 324, 337, 370, 394, 395, 614, 619, 836, 841, 854, 861, 869, 890
Marxism 290, 380, 425, 450, 451, 462, 645, 650, 791, 882
Materiality of the text 120, 136, 138
Memory 16, 21, 22, 24, 28, 29, 30, 31, 55, 57, 103, 113, 114, 129, 132, 133, 145, 149, 150, 156, 160, 183, 186, 204, 256, 278, 318, 368, 462, 518, 549, 619, 699, 705, 714, 788, 822, 859
MFA programs 249, 261, 285, 292, 295, 354, 453, 641
Modernism 216, 241, 249, 285, 345, 412, 413, 427, 440, 444, 561, 582, 606, 607, 608, 610, 645, 650, 876, 881
Mourning and loss 32, 47, 167, 174, 205, 217, 242, 303, 350, 359, 370, 514, 628, 644, 690, 813, 816, 844
Multiculturalism 200, 226, 269, 273, 278, 284, 306, 328, 358
Music and poetry 25, 103, 106, 114, 118, 142, 144, 200, 229, 236, 247, 260, 262, 263, 276, 278, 281, 283, 301, 311, 312, 313, 345, 351, 360, 362, 372, 404, 407, 453, 460, 469, 479, 482, 487, 510, 531, 534, 541, 542, 551, 567, 570, 575, 581, 582, 584, 608, 616, 628, 644, 672, 707, 709, 723, 730, 734, 752, 831, 834, 836, 840, 841, 858, 868
Nationalism 205, 457, 789
Nature 5, 36, 183, 186, 277, 283, 284, 336, 353, 358, 360, 379, 406, 443, 566, 586, 591, 601, 607, 608, 794, 802, 854, 866, 873
Negativity and refusal 36, 240, 244, 311, 396, 876
New Formalism 278, 311, 549, 591, 618, 638, 645, 649, 650, 667, 687

New York School 278, 673
Obituary and memorial 32
Objectivism 257
Ontology 122, 244, 253, 288, 311, 324, 336, 360, 446, 472, 483, 508, 576, 658, 673
Oulipo 573, 591, 594
Performance and the poetry reading 25, 137, 278, 345, 354, 460, 512, 634, 647, 782, 828, 834, 866, 890
Phenomenology 508, 515, 518, 747
Philosophy 33, 278, 294, 555, 558, 563, 576, 581, 584, 603, 607, 608, 658
Place and region 278, 294, 806, 809
Poet laureate 278
Poetics 23, 25, 32, 39, 65, 68, 79, 80, 81, 87, 92, 125, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 157, 165, 169, 180, 183, 186, 198, 199, 200, 202, 227, 229, 233, 238, 243, 246, 257, 264, 286, 301, 302, 307, 308, 315, 320, 324, 336, 337, 339, 341, 345, 352, 353, 357, 359, 360, 363, 375, 377, 380, 387, 390, 394, 404, 413, 414, 423, 427, 438, 440, 444, 446, 447, 453, 487, 488, 494, 496, 501, 503, 504, 510, 511, 513, 519, 521, 522, 526, 528, 529, 531, 534, 535, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 546, 549, 551, 552, 557, 560, 562, 570, 572, 578, 579, 581, 584, 585, 587, 598, 606, 608, 616, 619, 622, 628, 637, 643, 644, 664, 676, 678, 679, 680, 686, 688, 718, 725, 728, 729, 751, 754, 755, 763, 766, 769, 773, 775, 794, 812, 813, 814, 830, 834, 837, 838, 839, 843, 851, 863, 876
Poets Against the War 278
Politics and poetry 200, 290, 395, 847
Postmodernism 216, 241, 440, 444, 606, 607, 608, 645, 650
Print vs. digital 20, 31, 49, 111, 167, 181, 189, 278, 299, 341, 404, 424, 435, 438, 440, 444, 509, 564, 565, 576, 593, 673, 686, 699, 705, 708, 714, 727, 728, 733, 737, 747, 750, 812, 860
Prizes and awards 46, 269, 273, 278, 323, 421, 453, 468, 866
Procedural and constraint writing 259
Prose poem 677
Prosody and meter 7, 66, 430, 474, 479, 485, 486, 563, 619, 626, 631, 641, 672, 781, 783, 811, 873
Psychoanalysis 259, 536, 588, 603, 740
Queer poetics 205, 278, 294, 387, 390, 412, 413, 430, 578, 616, 628, 629, 644, 687, 689, 707, 709
Race and poetry 5, 13, 37, 38, 47, 72, 170, 172, 180, 205, 238, 244, 245, 248, 252, 253, 257, 274, 288, 289, 290, 294, 299, 302, 322, 324, 358, 379, 387, 408, 451, 497, 548, 673, 751, 791
Reading announcements 24, 41, 52, 247, 340, 345, 466, 592
Religion and the sacred 59, 179, 182, 197, 256, 257, 278, 281, 438, 469, 561, 591, 593, 628, 644, 686, 704, 754, 860
Representation 205, 242, 290, 299, 322, 342, 371, 408, 430, 446, 503, 554, 572, 624, 653, 673
Reviewing and criticism 14, 32, 39, 40, 65, 84, 108, 125, 158, 196, 213, 216, 238, 241, 243, 248, 256, 258, 274, 277, 278, 286, 289, 318, 320, 345, 354, 370, 394, 396, 406, 410, 411, 412, 413, 420, 427, 430, 468, 472, 509, 559, 564, 572, 574, 588, 607, 623, 625, 667, 687, 715, 760, 889
Revision 24
Romanticism 290, 556, 558, 586
Science 129, 132, 133, 149, 150, 158, 164, 290, 402, 476, 513, 529, 535, 574, 607, 727, 728, 740, 838, 847
Semiotics 179, 182, 264, 509, 517, 558, 561, 601, 854
Serial poem 250, 278, 513, 529, 546, 557, 635, 878, 885
Sestina 404, 606, 669, 672
Small press publishing 32, 93, 94, 103, 109, 114, 125, 130, 142, 157, 166, 167, 196, 204, 208, 210, 213, 217, 233, 256, 278, 294, 309, 310, 334, 345, 347, 354, 397, 512, 544, 571, 619, 668, 858, 862, 866, 889
Software and code 247, 528
Sonnet 132, 133, 149, 157, 278, 340, 391, 440, 444, 453, 485, 525, 580, 586, 591, 606, 626, 631, 632, 635, 652, 669, 672, 894, 897
Sound poetry 727, 740, 745, 820, 844
Structuralism 578, 581, 584, 585, 625
Subjectivity 4, 32, 47, 48, 72, 241, 311, 372, 423, 457, 477, 527, 543, 596, 704, 740, 820, 837, 844, 854
Sublime 673
Surrealism 216, 322, 496, 649
Terrorism 197, 222
The academy 5, 13, 23, 25, 32, 37, 72, 90, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 104, 106, 118, 119, 125, 127, 132, 133, 140, 142, 143, 145, 149, 150, 157, 162, 163, 194, 200, 201, 203, 205, 212, 221, 222, 223, 231, 235, 241, 250, 251, 253, 255, 256, 257, 270, 274, 276, 278, 284, 288, 289, 290, 291, 294, 297, 298, 303, 304, 305, 318, 320, 321, 324, 338, 341, 342, 343, 344, 349, 350, 358, 368, 383, 396, 397, 403, 408, 413, 419, 427, 439, 445, 453, 458, 460, 462, 463, 466, 467, 472, 483, 497, 507, 512, 514, 524, 525, 544, 548, 554, 555, 557, 564, 607, 633, 638, 645, 650, 652, 664, 666, 667, 671, 673, 677, 680, 687, 693,

708, 713, 718, 724, 727, 728, 740, 750, 751, 757, 775, 789, 816, 839, 853, 855, 866
The body 39, 372, 584, 747, 787, 794, 873, 886
The canon 14, 398, 408, 432, 605, 673
The Gulf War 866
The Holocaust 7
The internet 50, 62, 140, 158, 178, 197, 224, 259, 276, 304, 305, 347, 370, 397, 405, 419, 548, 635, 715, 760, 777, 797
The line 32, 63, 64, 144, 380, 631, 632, 669, 826, 873
The listserv 4, 18, 32, 33, 37, 39, 40, 50, 58, 63, 64, 67, 72, 73, 77, 110, 122, 128, 180, 181, 199, 201, 210, 214, 227, 234, 235, 237, 244, 245, 247, 251, 252, 253, 255, 257, 261, 276, 278, 288, 302, 304, 305, 311, 324, 342, 372, 387, 402, 412, 413, 419, 424, 435, 440, 444, 454, 458, 481, 482, 485, 509, 524, 564, 577, 579, 595, 619, 657, 664, 668, 670, 672, 674, 682, 698, 726, 728, 730, 742, 751, 759, 770, 779, 835, 837, 839, 860
The New Sentence 440, 462, 854
Theatre 25, 47, 51, 130, 290, 523, 526, 530, 536, 544
Translation 130, 157, 189, 200, 266, 368, 370, 385, 438, 499, 539, 540, 549, 575, 588, 596, 658, 668, 700, 793, 800, 837, 865, 866
Vietnam 332, 457
Visual and concrete poetry 109, 309, 310, 797
Visual art 2, 25, 52, 68, 144, 200, 229, 236, 263, 264, 461, 479, 573, 588, 591, 592, 593, 603, 611, 613, 623, 627, 651, 658, 792, 795, 800, 802, 806, 809, 858, 890 Voice 278
Women's writing 242, 673

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 897 in all.

1 MAR 1997

1. Ron Silliman — Foolishness
2. Herb Levy — Re: san diego readings
3. amato — Re: Foolishness
4. David R. Israel — news of the weird
5. Tom Mandel — (no subject)
6. main — Re: Holy Moly!
7. Michael Magee — Re: Holy Moly!
8. Michael Magee — Re: Foolishness
9. DS — (no subject)
10. Maria Damon — Re: Holy Moly!
11. Maria Damon — (no subject)
12. Steven Marks — Re: your mail
13. jarnot — (no subject)
14. robert drake — Re: your mail
15. George Bowering — Re: Holy Moly!
16. George Bowering — Re: Pogo
17. George Bowering — Re: your mail

2 MAR 1997

18. KENT JOHNSON — Weinberger, Neruda, Stalin
19. Rachel Loden — we have met the enemy
20. George Bowering — Re: back to bp
21. Rachel Loden — Re: Pogo
22. Steven Marks — Re: Pogo
23. Charles Bernstein — Zukofsky Conference at UB (fwrd from Robert Creeley)
24. DS — Re: Pogo
25. Dan Machlin — The Marginalization of Poetry @ SEGUE
26. Jordan Davis — (no subject)
27. Maria Damon — Re: Weinberger, Neruda, Stalin
28. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Pogo
29. Mark Weiss — Re: Pogo
30. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: Pogo
31. Tenney Nathanson — Re: Pogo

3 MAR 1997

32. Poetics List — Welcome Message
33. David R. Israel — e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
34. Christopher Alexander — (Fwd) Re: Halsey in USA
35. Sylvester Pollet — Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
36. Mark Wallace — anger and violence
37. Tom Mandel — Duncan Dorn Nuts
38. Maria Damon — Re: Duncan Dorn Nuts
39. Charles Bernstein — correction in Welcome message
40. simon — Re: correction in Welcome message
41. Jordan Davis — Bebe Repogo
42. Mark Prejsnar — Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
43. Jennifer Sondheim — (me again)

4 MAR 1997

44. Chris Stroffolino — SEGUE READING(rehm/stroffolino)
45. matt — Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
46. Maria Damon — award

47. Mark Wallace — is "hate" speech "free" speech
48. Mark Wallace — to clarify about Padgett
49. amato — Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
50. Jim Rosenberg — Genie: The Wild Child
51. aerialedge — Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
52. Jerry Rothenberg — Ed Sanders reading (San Diego)
53. michael corbin — Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
54. Jordan Davis — eons of mass
55. Maxianne Berger — Re: Pogo
56. Burt Kimmelman — recommended reading
57. Mark Weiss — Re: Pogo
58. Joe Safdie — Re: More (sigh) Dorn
59. Pritchett,Pat — Re: Yell "Shower"
60. George Bowering — Re: Pogo
61. Maria Damon — Re: Pogo
62. Maria Damon — announcements
63. Martin J Spinelli — looking for Marinetti audio

5 MAR 1997

64. Herb Levy — Re: looking for Marinetti audio
65. KENT JOHNSON — Re: mimeo revolution
66. Rachel Loden — Re: Pogo
67. John Cayley — email address for Steve McCaffery
68. nico vassilakis — peoigreqmvertyntynyutrtyrwvpuqwv!
69. Jay Schwartz — Re: mimeo revolution
70. F.A. Templeton — Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
71. F.A. Templeton — Re: eons of mass
72. Tom Mandel — <Sigh>
73. Mark Wallace — Peter Gizzi and Nate Mackey
74. Mark Prejsnar — Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
75. Jerry Rothenberg — (no subject)
76. Joseph Lease — Re: <Sigh>
77. dbkk — Re: email address for Steve McCaffery
78. dbkk — Re: email address for Steve McCaffery
79. Steven Clay — mimeo revolution
80. Joseph Lease — Re: mimeo revolution
81. Joseph Lease — Re: mimeo revolution
82. Joseph Lease — Re: Welcome Message
83. Jay Schwartz — Re: Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
84. Jordan Davis — Re: mimeo revolution
85. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: mimeo revolution
86. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: mimeo revolution
87. Pam Brown — Re: mimeo revolution
88. Schuchat Simon — Re: mimeo revolution
89. Schuchat Simon — Re: mimeo revolution
90. Mark Roberts — Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
91. Pam Brown — mimeo/roneo
92. Pritchett,Pat — Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
93. Mark Roberts — Re: mimeo/roneo
94. Mark Roberts — Re: mimeo/roneo
95. manny savopoulos — Fw: student takeover at UMass-Amherst (fwd)
96. Mark Roberts — Re: roneo-offset
97. Maria Damon (Maria Damon) — Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo
98. Laura Moriarty — Re: mimeo/roneo
99. George Bowering — Re: Welcome Message
100. George Bowering — Re: mimeo revolution

101. George Bowering — Re: mimeo revolution
102. George Bowering — Re: mimeo revolution
103. Stephen Vincent — Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
104. Mark Roberts — Re: mimeo revolution
105. Pam Brown — roneo-offset
106. Mark Roberts — Re: Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
107. Rachel Loden — db's mimeo
108. Toni Simon — Re: mimeo revolution
109. Herb Levy — Oops
110. Tenney Nathanson — Michael Davidson?

6 MAR 1997

111. Tenney Nathanson — pogo
112. Stephen Vincent — Re: mimeo revolution
113. robert drake — Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo
114. Ron Silliman — Typing on green stencils
115. kennyg — The Great Smell of Mimeo
116. Hank Lazer — Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo
117. robert drake — Re: Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
118. Tom Mandel — Magic Sam, et. al.
119. Tom Mandel — Evans' lecture
120. Steven Clay — mimeo revolution
121. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Re: mimeo/roneo
122. Jordan Davis — Poetry City Mnemonics
123. Sylvester Pollet — Re: mimeo revolution
124. dbkk — Re: mimeo revolution
125. Joel Lewis — Re: POETICS Digest - 4 Mar 1997 to 5 Mar 1997
126. Joel Lewis — mimeo rev
127. MAXINE CHERNOFF — Readings next week
128. Aaron Shurin — publication (not mimeo'd)
129. KENT JOHNSON — asteroid to hit earth
130. dbkk — Prosodia benefit reading
131. KENT JOHNSON — Re: asteroid to hit earth
132. KENT JOHNSON — Re: asteroid to hit earth
133. KENT JOHNSON — Re: asteroid to hit earth
134. KENT JOHNSON — Re: asteroid to hit earth
135. KENT JOHNSON — Re: asteroid to hit earth
136. Stephen Vincent — Re: mimeo revolution re clay
137. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — a wacky e-zine site in australia people might enjoy
138. Mark Weiss — Re: mimeo revolution re clay
139. William Burmeister Prod — Re: Pogo
140. Mark Roberts — cutting stencils on html
141. DS — Re: Pogo
142. Mark Roberts — Re: Magic Sam, et. al.
143. Mark Roberts — Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo
144. Martin J Spinelli — Marinetti recordings
145. Mark Roberts — Re: mimeo revolution & P76
146. Maria Damon — Re: mimeo revolution
147. aerialedge — Raworth reading

7 MAR 1997

148. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: asteroid to hit earth
149. Mark Roberts — Re: asteroid to hit earth
150. Mark Roberts — Re: asteroid to hit earth
151. Demian Reed — Re: asteroid to hit earth
152. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: asteroid to hit earth
153. David Israel — Re: mimeo

154. Schuchat Simon — Re: asteroid to hit earth
155. Ken Edwards — Re: mimeo revolution
156. David Israel — Re: asteroid to hit earth
157. Michael Boughn — Clarke book
158. Wendy Battin — Re: asteroid to hit earth
159. Gwyn McVay — Re: asteroid to hit earth
160. Maria Damon — Re: asteroid to hit earth
161. Steven Marks — Re: asteroid to hit earth
162. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco — the blushing power
163. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco — the blushing power
164. William Burmeister Prod — Re: asteroid to hit earth
165. Pritchett,Pat — Re: asteroid to hit earth
166. maz881 — france readings
167. Loss Glazier — Re: mimeo revolution
168. Pritchett,Pat — Re: Russkies
169. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: asteroid to hit earth
170. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: asteroid to hit earth
171. Gwyn McVay — Paging Tod Thilleman
172. Steven Marks — Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
173. Burt Kimmelman — Re: the blushing power
174. michael corbin — Re: asteroid to hit earth
175. michael corbin — Re: the blushing power
176. Joseph Lease — Re: the blushing power
177. Joe Safdie — Re: asteroid to hit earth
178. Alan Jen Sondheim — of purely local historic interest / kill me with an asteroid
179. Demian Reed — Re: asteroid to hit earth
180. DS — Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
181. Stephen Vincent — Mimeo Miss, Ms., Misses
182. Mark Weiss — Re: asteroid to hit earth
183. Demian Reed — Re: asteroid to hit earth
184. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: Mimeo Miss, Ms., Misses
185. Demian — Re: asteroid to hit earth
186. Mark Weiss — Re: asteroid to hit earth
187. Mark Weiss — (no subject)
188. Schuchat Simon — Re: asteroid to hit earth
189. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: Russkies
190. Mark Weiss — Re: asteroid to hit earth
191. Charles Alexander — Re: asteroid to hit earth
192. Herb Levy — Marinetti, Musica Futurista, and more
193. Hugh Steinberg — Re: mimeo revolution

8 MAR 1997

194. Steven Clay — Chinese character
195. MAXINE CHERNOFF — Offset OINK!
196. Burt Kimmelman — Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing

9 MAR 1997

197. Gabrielle Welford — Dan in La Paz (fwd)
198. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — is silence golden?
199. David R. Israel — Re: is silence golden?
200. Maria Damon — call for papers redux
201. Douglas Barbour — Re: Pogo books?
202. Sylvester Pollet — Re: is silence golden?
203. John Cayley — book (not asteroid) from the sky
204. Stephen Vincent — Re: mimeo
205. Aldon L. Nielsen — Conference on Whiteness (fwd)
206. Toni Simon — Re: mimeo

207. Toni Simon — Re: mimeo

10 MAR 1997

208. Thomas M. Orange — robt kelly
209. KENT JOHNSON — creiner&asteroid
210. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco — Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
211. Pierre Joris — Re: perloff on anthologies
212. Christopher Alexander — Re: is silence golden?
213. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Re: robt kelly
214. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
215. main — Re: robt kelly
216. Henry Gould — perloff on anthologies
217. Christopher Alexander — Re: mimeo revolution
218. Christopher Alexander — Re: the blushing power
219. Joe Safdie — Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
220. P.Standard Schaefer — Re: perloff on anthologies
221. David Kellogg — Re: perloff on anthologies
222. Mark Weiss — Re: is silence golden?
223. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: perloff on anthologies
224. amato — Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
225. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
226. eric pape — Re: asteroid to hit earth
227. simon — 19th C Japanese poetics
228. Wystan Curnow — Re: robt kelly
229. KENT JOHNSON — Re: CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String
230. k.a. hehir — londonOnt
231. Mark Roberts — Re: creiner&asteroid

11 MAR 1997

232. Thomas M. Orange — robt kelly
233. dbkk — Call for reviews, "Traffic"
234. Pierre Joris — [Fwd: CCCP]
235. Pierre Joris — [Fwd: pig pig offers]
236. Herb Levy — CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument
237. Herb Levy — Re: CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument
238. KENT JOHNSON — Re: "deeply disturbed"
239. Michael Boughn — Re: perloff on anthologies
240. henry gould — anthologies?
241. Tom Mandel — Zhdanov
242. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: anthologies?
243. Robert Archambeau — Re: "deeply disturbed"
244. Marjorie Perloff — Re: "deeply disturbed"
245. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco — Re: "deeply disturbed"
246. amato — Re: "deeply disturbed"
247. dbkk — Re: "deeply disturbed"
248. amato — Re: "deeply disturbed"
249. Christopher Alexander — Re: "deeply disturbed"
250. Joseph M Conte — Robert Kelly
251. Pierre Joris — Re: [Fwd: CCCP]
252. Mark Prejsnar — Re: "deeply disturbed"
253. David Kellogg — Re: "deeply disturbed"
254. Mark Prejsnar — Re: "deeply disturbed"
255. Mark Roberts — Re: [Fwd: CCCP]
256. Mark Roberts — (Fwd) AWOL: New magazines in the bookshop
257. Thomas Lecky — Re: "deeply disturbed"
258. amato — Re: "deeply disturbed"
259. Steven Marks — Re: "deeply disturbed"

260. KENT JOHNSON — suspended music
261. David Israel — FFCop's story mambo / SA lit workshops?

12 MAR 1997

262. robert drake — Re: suspended music
263. Thomas Bell — Re: CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument
264. Jena Osman — Re: "deeply disturbed"
265. Stephen Paul Miller — Re: XEROX REVOLUTION
266. henry gould — Re: deeply disturbed
267. Christopher Alexander — Re: XEROX REVOLUTION
268. Hank Lazer — Re: CD
269. Mark Wallace — poetry that sells?
270. amato — Re: "deeply disturbed"
271. amato — Re: FFCop's story mambo / SA lit workshops?
272. amato — Re: "deeply disturbed"
273. Charles Alexander — Re: poetry that sells?
274. David Kellogg — Re: "deeply disturbed"
275. William Burmeister Prod — Re: poetry that sells?
276. Joel Felix — Re: suspended music/ EMF.ORG
277. Maria Damon — Re: "deeply disturbed"
278. Michael Coffey — Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
279. F.A. Templeton — Re: [Fwd: CCCP]
280. F.A. Templeton — Re: "deeply disturbed"/Retallack essay
281. Joseph Zitt — Re: suspended music
282. F.A. Templeton — Re: "deeply disturbed"
283. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Joyeux Fetes Jack Kerouac
284. David Kellogg — Re: "deeply disturbed"
285. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
286. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
287. Jordan Davis — Re: "depply disturbed"
288. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
289. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
290. Matthias Regan — Re: "deeply disturbed"
291. David Kellogg — Re: "deeply disturbed"
292. Carrie Etter — Re: "deeply disturbed"
293. Mark Prejsnar — Re: "deeply disturbed"
294. Matthias Regan — Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
295. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
296. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
297. Thomas Lecky — Re: "deeply disturbed"
298. Hugh Steinberg — poetry that sells?
299. William Burmeister Prod — Re: "deeply disturbed"
300. DS — Re: "deeply disturbed"
301. David Israel — Re: FFCop's story mambo / SA lit workshops?
302. DS — Re: "deeply disturbed"
303. Charles Bernstein — TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)
304. Carnography — Re: The Twentieth Century
305. Carnography — BIB targeted by congress/Three monologues for heterogeneous voices and free b...
306. Maria Damon (Maria Damon) — Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries
307. Wendy Battin — Re: "deeply disturbed"

13 MAR 1997

308. Tom Vogler — [1]POETICS Digest - 11 Mar
309. Dorulet D Ana — Re: Oops
310. Dorulet D Ana — Re: Oops
311. Chris Stroffolino — Perloff/Kellogg, et al.

312. David Israel — Re: suspended music
313. David Israel — Re: suspended music (p.p.s.)
314. Susan Wheeler — Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
315. Jonathan A Levin — Re: "deeply disturbed"
316. Maria Damon — Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
317. Jordan Davis — More shilly-shallying battle cries
318. Keith Tuma — Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
319. Mark Prejsnar — Re: "deeply disturbed"
320. amato — Re: "deeply disturbed"
321. Matt Kirschenbaum — Re: "deeply disturbed"
322. William Burmeister Prod — Re: "deeply disturbed"
323. Mark Prejsnar — Re: "deeply disturbed"
324. Marjorie Perloff — Re: "deeply disturbed"
325. Mark Prejsnar — Re: TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)
326. Jordan Davis — Re: "depply disturbed" II
327. William Burmeister Prod — Re: "deeply disturbed"
328. sschu30844 — Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries
329. sschu30844 — Re: TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)
330. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
331. Jordan Davis — Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries
332. amato — Re: "deeply disturbed"
333. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
334. amato — Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
335. Joseph Lease — Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
336. Robert Archambeau — A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
337. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
338. BETH LEE SIMON — forum on deixis
339. Robert Archambeau — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
340. Steve Carll — 4 poets, 2 days (S.F., March 8-9)
341. Dan Machlin — MARG.OF POETRY @ SEGUE
342. Matthias Regan — Re: "deeply disturbed"
343. David Kellogg — Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries
344. Matthias Regan — Re: "deeply disturbed"
345. dbkk — upcoming at Small Press Traffic
346. Henry Gould — Pavement Saw query
347. Michael Coffey — Re: poetry that sells? -Reply -Reply
348. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
349. Matthias Regan — Re: "deeply disturbed"
350. Mark Roberts — Re: TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)
351. Herb Levy — new music mags
352. dbkk — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
353. DS — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
354. Christopher Alexander — Re: "deeply disturbed"
355. Christopher Alexander — Re: "deeply disturbed"
356. Christopher Alexander — Re: "deeply disturbed"

14 MAR 1997

357. Tom Vogler — [1]POETICS Digest - 12 Mar
358. Jocelyn Emerson — joining conversation
359. Loss Glazier — Zukofsky in April at Buffalo
360. Franklin Bruno — (no subject)
361. Marjorie Perloff — Re: form
362. Joseph Zitt — (no subject)
363. Robert Archambeau — Franklin Bruno's Post
364. Michael Magee — Re: form
365. henry gould — disturbing ant ticks pol

366. Susan Wheeler — a branch off the . . .
367. Jordan Davis — Public applause
368. Jeff Hansen — jobs and poetry
369. Andrew Mossin — A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
370. Henry Gould — bk review (medium rare)
371. Christopher Alexander — Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
372. David R. Israel — (Fwd) New Music on World Instruments
373. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
374. Matthias Regan — Re: form
375. Joseph Lease — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
376. Joseph Lease — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
377. Joseph Lease — Re: Franklin Bruno's Post
378. Joseph Lease — Re: "deeply disturbed"
379. DS — Re: joining conversation
380. DS — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
381. William Burmeister Prod — Re: joining conversation
382. David Israel — Re: joining conversation
383. Charles Alexander — praise
384. Charles Alexander — identity
385. DS — Re: joining conversation
386. DS — Re: joining conversation
387. Stephen Vincent — Disturb D/re Perloff
388. Hugh Steinberg — Re: jobs and poetry
389. Demian — Re: jobs and poetry
390. Maria Damon — Re: Disturb D/re Perloff
391. Alan Jen Sondheim — Jennifer an other weary time

15 MAR 1997

392. George Bowering — Re: joining conversation
393. Miekal And — Re: jobs and poetry
394. Robert Archambeau — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
395. Michael Magee — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
396. amato — Re: Disturb D/re Perloff
397. amato — Re: poetry that sells? -Reply -Reply
398. Marjorie Perloff — Re: once more, deeply disturbed
399. F.A. Templeton — Litsci
400. DS — Re: once more, deeply disturbed
401. Franklin Bruno — flirt?
402. amato — Re: Litsci

16 MAR 1997

403. Hugh Nicoll — Re: Katherine Hayles
404. Chris Stroffolino — DIVING Into The (Human) Zoo...
405. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Litsci
406. amato — Re: DIVING Into The (Human) Zoo...
407. Herb Levy — new music mags redux
408. Amittai F. Aviram — Anthologies
409. William Burmeister Prod — Re: joining conversation
410. Henry Gould — Blarnes oeuvre
411. Steven Marks — Re: Blarnes oeuvre
412. Louis Cabri — wieners + (alan) davies
413. KENT JOHNSON — Re: wieners + (alan) davies
414. David R. Israel — Re: DIVING Into ... / "mysticism"
415. AARON SHURIN — Re: Wieners
416. George Bowering — Re: once more, deeply disturbed
417. David R. Israel — Re: once more, deeply disturbed

17 MAR 1997

418. DS — Re: once more, deeply disturbed
419. Carnography — BIB Targeted By Congress/three monologues for heterogeneous voices and free b...
420. Rachel Loden — Wieners , + once more, deeply disturbed
421. Henry Gould — Blarnes
422. Christopher Alexander — Re: BIB Targeted By Congress/three monologues for heterogeneous
423. Joseph Conte — LITSCI-L
424. Mark Prejsnar — Getting more disturbed
425. Mark Prejsnar — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
426. Mark Prejsnar — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
427. Sylvester Pollet — WCW Review
428. amato — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
429. eric pape — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
430. Christopher Alexander — Re: form
431. Joseph Lease — Re: jobs and poetry
432. Joseph Lease — Re: once more, deeply disturbed
433. Joseph Lease — Re: once more, deeply disturbed
434. michael corbin — Re: once more, deeply disturbed aka 'raised in captivity'
435. Joseph Lease — Re: Getting more disturbed
436. Ira Lightman — Re: "deeply disturbed"
437. Mark Prejsnar — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
438. Steven Clay — Granary Books reception
439. by way of BETH LEE SIMON <[redacted]>" <[redacted]> — Cal...
440. Joe Safdie — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
441. Joseph Lease — Re: form
442. Robert Archambeau — Disturbed Tree/Contraries
443. amato — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
444. Joseph Lease — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
445. David Kellogg — Form/A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
446. groberts — zoothology
447. Demian — Re: form
448. aerialedge — _Stepping Razor_ by A.L. Nielsen
449. Miekal And — Re: Disturbance in the Field
450. DS — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
451. DS — In the disturbed tree
452. Mark Prejsnar — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
453. Susan Wheeler — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
454. Christopher Alexander — contracted SUNY
455. amato — Re: Form/A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
456. Tenney Nathanson — for those in the neighborhood (Antin talk piece)
457. Christopher Alexander — Re: form/"deeply disturbed" (incestuous dub mix)
458. Steven Marks — FC2/BIB funding cuts
459. Hugh Steinberg — Re: "deeply disturbed"
460. Charles Alexander — in or around tucson?
461. Charles Alexander — another in tucson
462. David Kellogg — Re: Form/A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
463. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Disturbance in the Field
464. shoemakers — Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
465. Christopher Alexander — Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
466. clare emily clifford — sharon olds.....

18 MAR 1997

467. George Bowering — Re: Disturbance in the Field
468. Steven Marks — Re: form/"deeply disturbed" (incestuous dub mix)

469. Jocelyn Emerson — Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
470. F.A. Templeton — Re: Blarnes oeuvre
471. F.A. Templeton — Re: Blarnes oeuvre
472. Michael Boughn — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
473. Michael Boughn — deep need
474. Henry Gould — formally disturbed
475. Gwyn McVay — Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
476. Mark Wallace — pre-determined form in the avant garde
477. Christopher Alexander — Re: formally disturbed
478. amato — Re: formally disturbed
479. henry — Re: formally disturbed
480. Mark Prejsnar — Re: zoothology
481. Mark Prejsnar — Re: In the disturbed tree
482. Mark Prejsnar — Re: In the disturbed tree (fwd)
483. David Kellogg — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
484. Mark Prejsnar — Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
485. Christopher Alexander — Re: formally disturbed
486. Mark Prejsnar — Re: formally disturbed
487. Ira Lightman — Astrology poetics
488. Gwyn McVay — Re: Astrology poetics
489. dbkk — Re: formally disturbed
490. henry gould — Re: formally disturbed
491. henry gould — Re: formally disturbed
492. henry gould — Re: formally disturbed
493. amato — Re: formally disturbed
494. Keith Tuma — Re: Astrology poetics
495. William Burmeister Prod — Re: formally disturbed
496. Jerry Rothenberg — Re: Astrology poetics
497. Matthias Regan — Re: formally disturbed
498. Sylvester Pollet — Re: formally disturbed
499. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Re: Tree/formally disturbed/ deep need
500. henry — Re: formally disturbed
501. henry — Re: Tree/formally disturbed/ deep need
502. henry — Re: formally disturbed
503. amato — Re: Astrology poetics
504. oren.izenberg — Re: Astrology poetics
505. Joseph Lease — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
506. William Burmeister Prod — Re: formally disturbed
507. Matthias Regan — Contraries will not rest/Mental Fight, etc.
508. Joe Safdie — Re: Contraries will not rest/Mental Fight, etc.

19 MAR 1997

509. Louis Cabri — far reader
510. David Israel — Re: astrology poetics
511. Pierre Joris — Re: Astrology poetics
512. Miekal And — [Fwd: LitLink news release]
513. Kathleen Crown — Re: Astrological poetics
514. Kathleen Crown — Poetry and the Public Sphere
515. Michael Boughn — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
516. Louis Cabri — angelology
517. henry — Re: far reader
518. henry — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
519. henry — Re: astrology poetics
520. Louis Cabri — Re: angelology
521. Sylvester Pollet — Re: astrology poetics
522. Gwyn McVay — Re: Astrological poetics

523. Jordan Davis — Mystery Poetry Theater 3000
524. Charles Alexander — Mimeograph/Ditto printing
525. Douglas Barbour — Re: pre-determined form in the avant garde
526. Mark Prejsnar — Re: Mystery Poetry Theater 3000
527. henry gould — Re: formally disturbed
528. dbkk — Astrology poetics/Spicer's "Language"
529. Wendy Battin — Re: Astrological poetics
530. aerialedge — Re: Mystery Poetry Theater 3000
531. Maryrose Larkin — Re: Astrology poetics/music
532. Jordan Davis — force mouth content
533. dbkk — Re: Spicer's "Language"
534. Peter Landers — Re: Astrology poetics
535. Pritchett,Pat — Re: Astrological poetics
536. Jordan Davis — Mister Apology
537. Rachel Blau DuPlessis — Re: wieners + (alan) davies
538. Laura Moriarty — Re: Astrology poetics
539. Douglas — New Sun & Moon titles
540. Douglas — Re: New Sun & Moon titles
541. Mark Weiss — Re: Astrology poetics/music
542. Mark Weiss — Re: Astrology poetics
543. William Burmeister Prod — Re: formally disturbed
544. dbkk — SPT: Pamela Lu and Ann Verornica Simon
545. Louis Cabri — Re: wieners + (alan) davies
546. Hugh Steinberg — Re: Astrological poetics
547. eric pape — Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread

20 MAR 1997

548. Mark Roberts — (fwd) AWOL: PANIC MORALITY, MEDIA, CULTURE Conference
549. David Israel — Re: Astrological poetics
550. George Bowering — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
551. Pierre Joris — Re: Astrology poetics/music
552. bat hartman — Re: Astrological poetics
553. Jonathan A Levin — Re: force mouth content
554. Douglas Barbour — Re: that other thread about teaching
555. Louis Cabri — spicer on f/c
556. oren.izenberg — Re: force mouth content
557. Douglas Barbour — Re: Astrology poetics/Spicer's "Language"
558. Lisa Samuels — Re: force mouth content
559. Aaron Vidaver — Against Wisdom as Such
560. Dale Smith — Re: Astrological poetics
561. Matthias Regan — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
562. Matthias Regan — Re: Astrological poetics
563. henry gould — form/content? good idea!
564. David Kellogg — Re: far reader
565. nuyopoman — The Death of Poetry
566. henry gould — Re: The Death of Poetry
567. David Israel — for Blarnes scholiasts & such
568. amato — The Death of Poetry
569. David Israel — p.s. re: Ram Dass
570. Stephen Cope — Re: Astrology poetics/music
571. P.Standard Schaefer — LA Magazines

21 MAR 1997

572. Louis Cabri — Re: far reader
573. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Form/Content again
574. William Burmeister Prod — Re: Against Wisdom as Such
575. Pierre Joris — Guillevic

576. Jonathan A Levin — Re: Form/Content again
577. Mark Prejsnar — Re: force mouth content
578. Ira Lightman — Astrology poetics post structuralism
579. Jordan Davis — Re: force mouth content
580. Dale Smith — Re: Form/Content again
581. Joe Safdie — Re: Astrology poetics post structuralism
582. George Bowering — Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
583. Bob Grotjohn — Re: Form/Content again
584. Wendy Battin — Re: Astrology/post structuralism/Forum & conTent

22 MAR 1997

585. Hugh Steinberg — Re: Astrology poetics post structuralism
586. Elizabeth Mathews Losh — Form/Genre
587. Elizabeth Mathews Losh — Re: Form/Genre
588. Toni Simon — Re: Form/Genre
589. Bennett M. Sm [Dimpson — Re: Form/Genre
590. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: Form/Content
591. KENT JOHNSON — form is emptiness
592. Charles Alexander — some events
593. Toni Simon — Re: Granary Books Show Friday 3/21
594. henry gould — Re: Form/Content again
595. henry gould — Re: force mouth content
596. henry gould — farm/produce
597. David R. Israel — Re: Form/Content again
598. Pritchett,Pat — Re: Form/Content again
599. Jordan Davis — valery
600. Alan Jen Sondheim — face-violent-defile-you

23 MAR 1997

601. Jocelyn Emerson — small corner of the form/content discussion
602. Peter Jaeger — boredom, poetry, questions
603. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
604. Schuchat Simon — dichotomous or not
605. David R. Israel — Re: dichotomous or not
606. henry gould — Re: dichotomous or not
607. Henry — Henry Philosophy in Small Nutshell
608. David R. Israel — Re: dichotomous or not
609. henry gould — roundel for D. Israel
610. Henry Gould — BRIEF 3rd thought
611. Carl Lynden Peters — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
612. raea100900 — Marginalization
613. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
614. David R. Israel — Re: roundel for D. Israel
615. David R. Israel — Re: Marginalization
616. Maria Damon — Re: Astrology poetics/music
617. Hugh Steinberg — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
618. Kathrine Varnes — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
619. Louis Cabri — howard mccord
620. henry — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
621. David R. Israel — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
622. Maria Damon (Maria Damon) — Re: boredom, poetry, questions

24 MAR 1997

623. Peter Jaeger — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
624. KENT JOHNSON — Jung Kwang
625. Alan Jen Sondheim — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
626. Hugh Steinberg — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms

627. David R. Israel — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
628. Stephen Cope — Re: Astrology poetics/music
629. Stephen Cope — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
630. Michael Boughn — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
631. henry gould — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
632. DEAN F. TACIUCH — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
633. Catherine Elizabeth Paul — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
634. Jordan Davis — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
635. Mark Prejsnar — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
636. Miekal And — Re: Jung Kwang
637. Pritchett,Pat — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
638. Maria Damon — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
639. A. Morris — Steve Abbott on Kaufman
640. Maria Damon — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
641. henry — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
642. henry — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
643. Pritchett,Pat — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
644. Ira Lightman — Re: Astrology poetics/music
645. Kathrine Varnes — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
646. Steven Marks — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
647. Joseph Lease — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
648. Joseph Lease — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
649. henry — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
650. Joseph Lease — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
651. dbkk — Dodie Bellamy takes L.A.
652. henry — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
653. Mark Weiss — Re: Jung Kwang
654. Gwyn McVay — Re: Jung Kwang
655. Joseph Lease — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
656. simon — Re: Jung Kwang
657. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: Form/Content again
658. Steve Carll — Antenym 12 publication and April readings
659. Mark Weiss — Re: Jung Kwang
660. F.A. Templeton — Re: howard mccord
661. F.A. Templeton — Re: Marginalization
662. William Burmeister Prod — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
663. Hugh Steinberg — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
664. David Bromige — what am I doing wrong? in response to the attached, i wrote to "[redacted]...
665. Hugh Steinberg — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
666. CHRIS MANN — Re: Marginalization
667. Dave Zauhar — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms (Turco)
668. Louis Cabri — John Wieners (fwd)
669. clare emily clifford — confidence, fire, birth.....

25 MAR 1997

670. David Bromige — derusticating
671. aerialedge — A New Circle -- April 4 & 5 NYC
672. Franklin Bruno — four melismas
673. Chris Stroffolino — THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)
674. Chris Stroffolino — In Other News....
675. KENT JOHNSON — bp/bob
676. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Jung Kwang
677. hen — Re: THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)
678. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Jung Kwang
679. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Jung Kwang
680. KENT JOHNSON — Re: bp/bob

681. KENT JOHNSON — bpNichol
682. Sylvester Pollet — Re: THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)
683. Jordan Davis — Re: In Other News....
684. William Burmeister Prod — Re: boredom, poetry, questions
685. Jordan Davis — NYC EVENTS MAR 27-30 for S Pollet
686. KENT JOHNSON — Re: FC2 vs. Hoekstra
687. Maria Damon — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms (Turco)
688. hen — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms (Turco)
689. Maria Damon — Re: four melismas
690. Loss Glazier — National Poetry Month Disccusion area for Librarians (fwd)
691. Sylvester Pollet — Re: NYC EVENTS MAR 27-30 for S Pollet
692. henry gould — edg.po add.endum
693. Douglas Barbour — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
694. Robert Hale — NY READINGS
695. Pritchett,Pat — Re: Is there a National Poetry Month?
696. linda v. russo — Retallack essay
697. David Bromige — what am i doing wrong
698. David Bromige — formalism
699. Joe Safdie — Re: Is history dead?
700. David Israel — edg.po
701. DS — Re: THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)
702. henry gould — Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
703. henry gould — Re: edg.po
704. maz881 — don't know. just requested to wear my hat.
705. Mark Weiss — Re: Is history dead?
706. David Israel — Re: edg.po / pantoum
707. Stephen Cope — Re: four melismas
708. F.A. Templeton — The Margaretization
709. Maria Damon — Re: four melismas
710. William Burmeister Prod — Re: Is there a National Poetry Month?
711. William Burmeister Prod — Re: Is there a National Poetry Month?
712. Charles Alexander — come on
713. Matt Kirschenbaum — Re: bp/bob
714. DS — Re: Is history dead?
715. Robert Kendall — New Hypertext Poem: A LIFE SET FOR TWO
716. DS — Re: come on
717. henry — Re: edg.po / pantoum
718. Matt Kirschenbaum — Re: bp/bob
719. Carl Lynden Peters — Re: bpNichol
720. Hugh Steinberg — FC2 vs. Hoekstra
721. Hugh Steinberg — Re: A New Circle -- April 4 & 5 NYC
722. robert drake — Re: FC2 vs. Hoekstra
723. Maria Damon — Re: come on 724. Charles Alexander — Re: bp/bob

26 MAR 1997

725. Pam Brown — Texture Press Address
726. David Bromige — bp/BP
727. Louis Cabri — the margaritas of poetry--where were they!
728. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Howard McCord
729. robert drake — Re: Texture Press Address
730. Michael Boughn — Re: four melismas
731. Susan Wheeler — SF
732. Michael Magee — Re: come on
733. lphillips — questions re: Merrill and Jarnot
734. Maria Damon — Re: four melismas

735. Dale Smith — Re: four melismas
736. henry g — Re: four melismas
737. Diane Marie Ward — Re: questions re: Merrill and Jarnot
738. Peter Jaeger — Re: bpNichol
739. Christopher Reiner — Formal Riddle
740. Peter Jaeger — bpNichol, sound poetry, social meaning
741. william marsh — Re: bpNichol
742. David Israel — Re: four melismas
743. Wendy Battin — Re: Formal Riddle
744. David Israel — Re: Formal Riddle
745. Carl Lynden Peters — Re: bpNichol, sound poetry, social meaning
746. Wendy Battin — Re: Formal Riddle
747. Alan Jen Sondheim — Lieus
748. Pam Brown — thanks
749. shoemakers — Re: Is history dead?
750. KENT JOHNSON — puking and the state

27 MAR 1997

751. KENT JOHNSON — Re: puking and the state
752. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: four melismas
753. Pierre Joris — Re: real audio Poetry City
754. KENT JOHNSON — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
755. KENT JOHNSON — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
756. Jordan Davis — real audio Poetry City
757. David Kellogg — Re: Formal Riddle
758. Rachel Loden — picky picky picky (puking and the state)
759. William Burmeister Prod — Re: puking and the state
760. amato — web piece...
761. henry gould — thrice-vexed conformtent
762. Don Cheney — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
763. henry gould — RI upcoming event
764. George Bowering — Re: farm/produce
765. henry gould — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
766. henry — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
767. William Burmeister Prod — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
768. Alan Jen Sondheim — last html wk for a while
769. KENT JOHNSON — fascism and surrender 770. David Bromige — FC2 & attempts to censor/punish

28 MAR 1997

771. George Bowering — Re: bp/bob
772. George Bowering — Re: Is history dead?
773. KENT JOHNSON — Re: doing something
774. Hugh Steinberg — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
775. Bil Brown — Re: Is there a National Poetry Month?
776. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
777. henry — Re: thrice-vexed conformtent
778. David Bromige — lacunae
779. David Bromige — doing something
780. Bob Perelman — name gap
781. henry — Re: name gap
782. Rebecca Reynolds — poetry reading
783. Rachel Loden — Re: name gap
784. Wendy Battin — Re: name gap (fwd)
785. maz881 — reading
786. Rachel Loden — Re: name gap (fwd)
787. main — Re: lacunae

788. Mark Weiss — Re: name gap (fwd)
789. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco — No Virginia, there is no Nat'l Potry Mnth: now go home!
790. Rachel Loden — Re: name gap (fwd)
791. hen — Re: No Virginia, there is no Nat'l Potry Mnth: now go home!
792. shoemakers — Re: name gap (fwd)
793. Yunte Huang — displace
794. aerialedge — Schuyler Diaries &&& @ Bridge Street
795. Lisa Samuels — Re: name gap (fwd)
796. aerialedge — Re: name gap (fwd)
797. Bob Grumman — Re: name gap
798. shoemakers — Re: name gap
799. Mark Weiss — Re: name gap (fwd)
800. William Slaughter — Re: name gap
801. Jocelyn Emerson — Re: Is history dead?
802. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: name gap (fwd)
803. Maria Damon — name gap/thread bare
804. George Bowering — Re: questions re: Merrill and Jarnot
805. Wendy Battin — Re: questions re: Merrill and Jarnot
806. henry gould — Re: name gap (fwd)
807. Mark Weiss — Re: Is history dead?

29 MAR 1997

808. Hugh Steinberg — Re: name gap (fwd)
809. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: name gap (fwd)
810. Pierre Joris — Re: name gap
811. Schuchat Simon — Re: name gap
812. David R. Israel — Re: name gap
813. David R. Israel — Re: name gap / chinese example
814. KENT JOHNSON — Re: name gap and heart gap
815. Bob Grumman — Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
816. Douglas Barbour — Re: bpNichol & all that he might mean, even politically
817. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: name gap
818. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: name gap
819. LYNES- KATHERINE — Re: name gap (fwd)
820. Thomas Bell — sound
821. Maria Damon — Re: Is history dead?
822. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Re: Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
823. Steven Marks — Re: Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
824. Jocelyn Emerson — Re: name gap (fwd)
825. Mark Weiss — Re: Is history dead?
826. Craig Douglas Dworkin — terminological gaps
827. Bob Grotjohn — Re: name gap
828. nuyopoman — Mouth Almighty Opens Wide, Says "Awe"
829. Schuchat Simon — Killian/Spicer

30 MAR 1997

830. Gwyn McVay — Re: Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
831. George Bowering — Re: Getting Binoche
832. nico vassilakis — Re: name gap
833. Alan Jen Sondheim — (fwd)(long)(Jennifer's gap)
834. Bil Brown — Re: Mouth Almighty Opens Wide, Says "Awe"
835. Bil Brown — Re: Mouth Almighty Opens Wide, Says "Awe"
836. David R. Israel — Re: Getting Binoche / don't Sokohl
837. David R. Israel — as for Sandhyabasha
838. Steven Marks — Re: Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
839. David R. Israel — (Fwd) Job Opportunity (U. Manitoba)
840. Mark Weiss — Re: Getting Binoche

841. Mark Weiss — Re: Getting Binoche / don't Sokohl
842. David Bromige — alan jen sondheim's poem
843. David R. Israel — Re: sandhyabhasha
844. Peter Jaeger — Re: sound, McCaffery
845. David R. Israel — Re: Getting Binoche / don't Sokohl / gotta Boycott
846. David Bromige — Easter Sunday afternoons, when the Mall is closed
847. Dan Raphael Dlugonski — Re: NEA/ NPM (national poetry month/ etc
848. simon — Re: as for Sandhyabasha
849. Stephen Vincent — Re: Getting Binoche / don't Sokohl / gotta Boycott
850. simon — Re: sandhyabhasha
851. David R. Israel — Re: as for Sandhyabasha
852. David Bromige — explication du texte
853. Douglas Barbour — Re: Mind the gap
854. Louis Cabri — catching up
855. Douglas Barbour — Re: Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
856. George Bowering — Re: name gap (fwd)
857. George Bowering — Re: Getting Binoche / don't Sokohl / gotta Boycott
858. Kenneth Goldsmith — No. lll 2.7.93-10.20.96 Press Release
859. David R. Israel — Re: Easter Sunday afternoons, when the Mall is closed
860. David R. Israel — Re: "Sandhyabasha"
861. Christopher Alexander — Re: Getting Binoche / don't Sokohl
862. Christopher Alexander — constellation voice
863. KENT JOHNSON — Re: name gap and heart gap
864. Gwyn McVay — Re: Mind the gap

31 MAR 1997

865. Pierre Joris — Re: Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
866. Thomas Bell — Are poets citizens? Re: RealPoetik - touchy, longish
867. George Bowering — Re: detention with a redhead woman
868. Rachel Loden — Sokal, Pogo, Bernstein, &c.
869. Michael Boughn — Re: catching up
870. henry gould — Re: Are poets citizens? Re: RealPoetik - touchy, longish
871. Rachel Loden — Re: name gap and heart gap
872. henry gould — Re: name gap and heart gap
873. Mark Prejsnar — Re: name gap (fwd)
874. Mark Prejsnar — Re: name gap (fwd)
875. David Bromige — explication du texte, revised
876. dbkk — Killian/Spicer and an appeal
877. maz881 — re; name gap
878. Mark Prejsnar — Re: Getting Binoche / don't Sokohl
879. Rachel Loden — Binoched, bowered and bewildered
880. Stephen Vincent — Re: explication du texte, revised
881. Henry Gould — Re: explication du texte, revised
882. Mark Prejsnar — Re: Binoched, bowered and bewildered
883. amato — denver conference...
884. Joseph Zitt — Re: Mind the gap
885. William Burmeister Prod — Re: Further Thoughts on the "Interior Indentation"
886. jdhollo — BP's Question / gaps caesurae lacunae
887. Bob Grumman — Re: BP's Question / gaps caesurae lacunae
888. Bob Grumman — A Quick Minor Correction of Preceding Message
889. Dodie Bellamy — Small Press Traffic enters the electronic age
890. Steve Carll — Upcoming Canessa Park Readings
891. Dave Zauhar — Re: denver conference...
892. Jordan Davis — Kenneth Goldsmith / Carl Watson @ Poetry City
893. Steven Marks — Re: A Quick Minor Correction of Preceding Message
894. hernry ghould — Re: A Quick Minor Correction of Preceding Message

895. Bob Grumman — A Technickal Readjustment
896. Bob Grumman — Re: A Technickal Readjustment

1 APR 1997

897. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: A Quick Minor Correction of Preceding Message

1. Ron Silliman
Foolishness
Sat 1 Mar 1997

"there's not much foolishness in Duncan."

Yours, LIsa

Much as I love Duncan (both the person and the poet), he was entirely capable of jaw-dropping foolishness and exhibited it on as many occasions as he could.

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

2. Herb Levy
Re: san diego readings
Sat 1 Mar 1997

I'm finally almost done deleting, I mean sorting, a lot of e-mail that I'd let accummulate while I was out of town & thought that some folks might be interested in this list of all of the Southern California performances by Jaap Blonk:

> Monday, March 3, 7.30 pm:
> lecture/performance at UCLA Graduate Art Building, 8535 Warner Drive (near Hayden and National, Culver City)
> info: Jon Pestoni [redacted] --- Evan Holloway [redacted]
>
> Tuesday, March 4, 12 noon:
> lecture/demonstration at Langley Hall in the Main Building of CalArts, 24700 McBean Parkway, Valencia, phone [redacted]
>
> Wednesday, March 5, 7 pm:
> performance at UC San Diego, La Jolla, Visual Arts Complex, Studio 451 > info: Jerome Rothenberg [redacted] --- Harry Polkinhorn [redacted]
>
> Friday, March 7, 8 pm:
> performance at LACE, 6522 Hollywood Blvd (parking in the rear off of Wilcox, reduced price with entry), phone [redacted]
>
> Saturday, March 8, 8.30 pm:
> performance at Beyond Baroque, 681 Venice Boulevard, Venice, phone (310) [redacted]
>
> For those of you in or near San Diego, the following may be of interest:
>
> Wednesday March 5 7:00 p.m. at Jerome Rothenberg's studio (Visual Arts 451 on UCSD campus): a performance by the Dutch poet / soundtext artist Jaap Blonk, along with improvisations by contrabassist Bert Turetzky.

Sorry, I don't have any other dates for Ed Sanders on hand.

Bests

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

3. amato
Re: Foolishness
Sat 1 Mar 1997

---

and i hate to beat a dead horse, but what's wrong with "foolishness" anyway?... i don't mean the term as in, say, theoretical naivete (whatever that might be)... i mean it in a rather literal sense...

i think a certain touch of juvenilia might help allay the various desperations that seem to permeate critical and aesthetic practice, and community... not only humor, but nonsense as such... as in 'stop making sense'...

granted there may be limits to same, but who's to say?... serious fun can be, well, fun, why not?...

best,

joe

↑ Index

4. David R. Israel
news of the weird
Sat 1 Mar 1997

---

friends --

Chuck Shepherd's admirable weekly coluumn News of the Weird is -- it might interest you to know -- available online. Here's the deal:

> NEWS OF THE WEIRD, founded in 1988, is a nationally syndicated newspaper column distributed by Universal Press Syndicate. Individuals may have the columns mailed to them electronically, free of charge, approximately three weeks after the cover date, which is the date when most subscribing newspapers will publish the column. Send a message to [redacted] with the Subject line of Subscribe. To read these News of the Weird newspaper columns from the past six months, go to http://www.nine.org/notw/notw.html (That site contains no graphics, no photos, no video clips, no audio. Just text. Deal with it.)

I've been subscribing for some while now. Without giving any specific excerpts here, I'll just say I've a feeling that many denizens of this listserv are likely to enjoy Shepherd's outre sensbility and the bizzare info he tends to unearth.

f.y.i.,
d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
|"...sleuthing out all clues, blues & news"|
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\///&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\///..'

↑ Index

5. Tom Mandel

(no subject)

Sat 1 Mar 1997

Thanks to Lisa Jarnot for providing a source for Duncan on "rejecting Hitler" as follows:

"Reject Mae West as vulgar or Hitler as the enemy, reject them as fellows of our kind, and you have to go to battle against the very nature of Man himself, against the truth of things."

I take it that in this Duncan is saying that the violence Hitler summoned, marshaled, represented, and used is a violence deep in humankind. That seems straightforward. I take him to be saying also that we get nowhere to read such violence, in the form of Hitler, as a symbol of something non-human -- an aberration, the enemy, the common enemy -- which we may therefore comfortably ignore or dismiss as "ignorance." Duncan is reminding us that such violence is well inside human nature and history. Hitler is not an isolated or aberrant case. Yes, this is far from "foolish." It is true.

True, yes; but, it doesn't mean, to my ears at least, what Lisa makes it mean. As I saw Duncan resist actively what he thought was evil on several occasions, I don't think it means "forget about Dorn's racism." Indeed, I think it counsels precisely against such forgetting. We can no more ignore or dismiss Dorn's racism than we can reject Hitler as some aberrant irrelevant "enemy."

Lisa concludes her short note by saying: "I kind of thought it (i.e. the reference to Duncan) made sense in the context of the Dorn discussion since there has been talk of counteracting ignorance with physical violence."

Indeed, it does make sense. And by offering Ed a knuckle sandwich I was making the same point Duncan was making. Or, the point Pogo made so eloquently: "I have seen the enemy and we are it." But, it's not ignorance. Hitler was brilliant not ignorant. Dorn's active excessive mind and linguistic force need no underlining. His racism, like Hitler's, must be resisted.

I'm struck by the blandness of a word like ignorance in this case, and by -- I'm sorry to say -- the self-praise. If racism is ignorant, then "I" must be wise, and of course that should do the trick I guess.

Let me ask Joe Safdie directly -- since he knows Dorn over a long period and is Jewish -- did Dorn ever taunt you as a Jew or "jew-bait" you in any way? A truthful answer will clear up -- and I think end -- this creepiness. Joe knows the truth (in a funny way, so do I). And just needs to propose the truth here.

Tom Mandel

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

6. main
Re: Holy Moly!
Sat 1 Mar 1997

---

i'd say that duncan's right on: rejection would push away and make other what is human (i.e., the problem of evil). hitler himself used rejection as a solution: a "final" solution. this solved nothing.

dan featherston

↑ Index

7. Michael Magee
Re: Holy Moly!
Sat 1 Mar 1997

I agree - Duncan's quote reminded me of a poem I just read with some high-school students I (along with many others) tutor on Mondays and Fridays. The poem is called "The Hangman" - its a formal poem in rhymed iambic tetrameter quatrains and is ostensibly a moral about the holocaust (which they're studying). A man in the "village" volunteers to help the hangman execute people thinking that in doing so he'll save himself - of course in the end, after everyone else is dead, the hangman kills him too. As a simple moral its fine, I suppose, but th problem is this hangman - he's purely allegorical and one finds oneself either comfortably distant from him ("Thank god there's no hangman around here") or condemning him as pure evil (a version of the devil). Consequently, you don't learn anything about how an event like the holocaust could take place in real space and time. The student s are very street-wise North Philly kids and they reacted with real suspicion - one of them called the hangman "an abstraction." It seems to me that its that sense of "abstraction" - the way it allows Hitler to disappear in the realm of mythology - that Duncan is arguing against. For me its what gives he as well as someone like Creely real political weight even when their "subject matter" is not political.

-Mike Magee.

According to main: >
> i'd say that duncan's right on: rejection would push away and make other
> what is human (i.e., the problem of evil). hitler himself used rejection > as a solution: a "final" solution. this solved nothing.
>
> dan featherston
>

↑ Index

8. Michael Magee
Re: Foolishness
Sat 1 Mar 1997

Emerson: "The plays of children are nonsense, but very educative nonsense."

According to [redacted]:
>
> and i hate to beat a dead horse, but what's wrong with "foolishness" > anyway?... i don't mean the term as in, say, theoretical naivete (whatever > that might be)... i mean it in a rather literal sense...

>
> i think a certain touch of juvenilia might help allay the various > desperations that seem to permeate critical and aesthetic practice, and > community... not only humor, but nonsense as such... as in 'stop making > sense'...
>
> granted there may be limits to same, but who's to say?... serious fun can > be, well, fun, why not?...
>
> best,
>
> joe
>

↑ Index

9. DS
(no subject)
Sat 1 Mar 1997

> Indeed, it does make sense. And by offering Ed a knuckle sandwich I was making the same point Duncan was making. Or, the point Pogo made so eloquently: "I have seen the enemy and we are it." But, it's not ignorance.

Ah, Walt Kelly there is another ambivalent figure. He seemed to buy into cold war propaganda in a way that left room for a great deal of humanism & thoughtfulness. Yet when you read him he would regularly punctuate his very endearing foolishness with something completely anti-absorptive - for me any-way - something really foolish in the sense it is being used here.

dan

↑ Index

10. Maria Damon
Re: Holy Moly!
Sat 1 Mar 1997

> According to main: >
> i'd say that duncan's right on: rejection would push away and make other
> what is human (i.e., the problem of evil). hitler himself used rejection
> as a solution: a "final" solution. this solved nothing.
>
> dan featherston

there's a difference between rejection and denial. it is not a good idea to reject "hitler" as an abstraction, an aberration, "it can't happen here," or it can't happen within us etc. however, it is not a good idea to pretend we didn't know what hitler, or other less demonized members of society, including ourselves, did, or that to pretend that it;s not really that big of a deal, because, as they say in The Producers, "the fuhrer was an excellent dancer, he was much better than churchill."

↑ Index

11. Maria Damon

(no subject)

Sat 1 Mar 1997

At 9:29 AM +1300 3/2/97, DS wrote:
>>Indeed, it does make sense. And by offering Ed a knuckle sandwich I was >>making the same point Duncan was making. Or, the point Pogo made so >>eloquently: "I have seen the enemy and we are it." But, it's not ignorance.

isn[t it: "...and he is us"?

↑ Index

12. Steven Marks

Re: your mail

Sat 1 Mar 1997

On Sat, 1 Mar 1997, Maria Damon wrote:

> At 9:29 AM +1300 3/2/97, DS wrote:
> Indeed, it does make sense. And by offering Ed a knuckle sandwich I was > making the same point Duncan was making. Or, the point Pogo made so > eloquently: "I have seen the enemy and we are it." But, it's not ignorance.
>
> isn[t it: "...and he is us"?

I think the actual quote is: "We have met the enemy and they is us."

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

13. jarnot
(no subject)
Sat 1 Mar 1997

In response to the ongoing Dorn/Duncan thread i just want to say two things:

one/ yes, ron, thank you for reminding me that duncan was filled with foolishness. as a duncan devotee i responded emotionally to tom's post (using the words foolish and duncan in the same sentence).

two/ yes, tom, of course issues of anti-semitism and racism are serious. but i wasn't trying to be self-congratulatory or more "evolved" by saying racists are "ignorant." I'm talking about the ignorance encouraged by the powers that be (corporate /hegemonic/media/USA) to keep marginalized groups separated from each other by convincing them that they should be enemies. I teach at Long Island University in Brooklyn where 90% of my inner city students are convinced that they are oppressed exclusively by Jews. Their fierce anti-semitism only begins to fade when they become informed of the complexities of the issue, of the ways in which their oppression is similar to that of the Jews, and that the Jews in their neighborhood who seem so well-off are hardly the people who run the country. This is what I mean by the ignorance in relation to various xenophobias. I'm not saying that anyone's racism should be disregarded, but the truth is that we live in a violent racist homophobic country, where maybe "The Dorn Discussion" obscures the bigger problem.

ciao, lisa

↑ Index

14. robert drake
Re: your mail
Sat 1 Mar 1997

several versions of this quote are to be found in the corpus. the title of a 1972 Pogo collection is _Pogo: We Have Met the Enemy and He is Us_; likewise, Pogo uses this version of the phrase in the final panel of the daily strip for "earth day" 1971. these late versions should probably be considered the canonical form. the earliest verified occurance is in the introduction to the 1952 collection _The Pogo Papers_ --quoted here in context, appropos of the ongoing discussion:

"...Traces of nobility, gentleness and courage persist in all people, do what we will to stamp out the trend. So, too, do those characteristics which are ugly. It is just unfortunate that in the clumsy hands of a cartoonist all traits become ridiculous. leading to a certain amount of self-conscious expostulation and the desire to join battle.

There is no need to sally forth, for it remains true that those things which make us human are, curiously enough, always close at hand. resolve then, that on this very ground, wtih small flags waving and tinny blasts on tiny trumpets, we shall meet the enemy , and not only may he be ours, he may be us." --Walt Kelly

[for "cartoonist" read "poet"... or "critic"...]

asever
lbd

> On Sat, 1 Mar 1997, Maria Damon wrote:
>
> At 9:29 AM +1300 3/2/97, DS wrote:
> Indeed, it does make sense. And by offering Ed a knuckle sandwich I was making the same point Duncan was making. Or, the point Pogo made so eloquently: "I have seen the enemy and we are it." But, it's not ignorance.
>
> isn[t it: "...and he is us"?
>
> I think the actual quote is: "We have met the enemy and they is us."
>
> Steven Marks

↑ Index

15. George Bowering

Re: Holy Moly!

Sat 1 Mar 1997

> I agree -

So do I. Duncan was saying something that was not all that much different from what Williams was suggesting in _In the American Grain_, that America and Americans contain both Pere Rasles AND Cotton Mather, bith Boone and Franklin, and that if one does not realize that, one will continue the bad psychological health the Puritans were prone too, as WCW saw them. He even shows Valery Larbaud telling him this in the Rasles chapter.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

16. George Bowering
Re: Pogo
Sat 1 Mar 1997

> Ah, Walt Kelly there is another ambivalent figure. He seemed to buy into cold war propaganda in a way that left room for a great deal of humanism & thoughtfulness.

Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against cold war positions!

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

17. George Bowering
Re: your mail
Sat 1 Mar 1997

> I think the actual quote is: "We have met the enemy and they is us."

Of course it is. The bellicose statement that Kelly was parodying was

"We have met the enemy and they are ours."

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

18. KENT JOHNSON
Weinberger, Neruda, Stalin
Sun 2 Mar 1997

Folks:

After the brief exchange on this list with Mark Weiss (from ten days or so ago) I queried Eliot Weinberger re: the matter of Neruda's relationship to Trotsky's murder in Mexico City. I have EW's permission to share part of his reply with the list. One would need to look further into the whole issue, of course, but it would seem that there are at least some serious grounds for doing that.

Twenty Love Poems and a Big Favor for Comrade Stalin?

Anyway, FYI:

Kent

> To: [redacted]
> Date sent: Sat, 1 Mar 1997 18:20:57 +0000

> ... Anyway-- got your Neruda/Stalin package. It is universally known > that Neruda was an active participant in the first (Siquieros) plot to > assassinate Trotsky. As the Chilean consul in Mexico City, he supplied the > conspirators with visas or passports (I forget which) so that they could > escape to Chile. What has been debated, however, is Neruda's > knowledge/complicity in the second (successful) attempt. So he is clearly on > a different level of shameful politics than Uncle Ezra, who had his opinions
> but never tried to kill anybody.
> The political climate of the time is evoked in Paz's "Itinerario"-- > with much about STalinists, Trotskyites etc in Mexico, and a passing ref to > Neruda's involvement.
> By the way, your mention of Siquieros as one of the two great > Mexican muralists (with Rivera) forgets a far greater muralist than > Siquieros (who looks worse and worse as the years go on): Orozco.

↑ Index

19. Rachel Loden
we have met the enemy
Sun 2 Mar 1997

George Bowering wrote:
>
> >I think the actual quote is: "We have met the enemy and they is us."
>
> Of course it is. The bellicose statement that Kelly was parodying was
>
> "We have met the enemy and they are ours."

Yes--apparently it all started with the introduction to _Pogo Papers_ (1952). Here he seems to be in dialogue with Robert Duncan:

"Specializations and markings of individuals everywhere abound in such profusion that major idiosyncrasies can be properly ascribed to the mass. Traces of nobility, gentleness and courage persist in all people, do what we will to stamp out the trend. So, too, do those characteristics which are ugly. It is just unfortunate that in the clumsy hands of the cartoonist all traits become ridiculous, leading to a certain amount of self-conscious expostulation and the desire to join battle.

"There is no need to sally forth, for it remains true that those things which make us human are, curiously enough, always close at hand. Resolve, then, that on this very ground, with small flags waving and tiny blasts of tiny trumpets, we shall meet the enemy, and not only may he be ours, he may be us."

Rachel L.

↑ Index

20. George Bowering

Re: back to bp

Sun 2 Mar 1997

> No, not one bit similar. bp's is a short series of prose bursts about Billy. Very irrevent, very poetic. Check it out. It's in another book of his selected prose works, but I don't have my books with me now to give me the reference. Anyone else?
>
> charles

It's in the book that Ondaatje and I edited (after a conference with other bpers including Ellie) called _An H in the Heart_, Toronto, McClelland & Stewart, 1994.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

21. Rachel Loden
Re: Pogo
Sun 2 Mar 1997

George Bowering wrote (the last bit):
>
> >Ah, Walt Kelly there is another ambivalent figure. He seemed to buy into > >cold war propaganda in a way that left room for a great deal of humanism & > >thoughtfulness.
>
> Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against > cold war positions!

Yes, how was he ambivalent? At the height of McCarthyism--when people were cowering all over the country--he introduced Simple J. Malarkey, clearly modeled after Senator Joe, and with similar obsessions. I was 4 at the time but Kelly was a hero in my house.

Rachel L.

↑ Index

22. Steven Marks
Re: Pogo
Sun 2 Mar 1997

On Sun, 2 Mar 1997, Rachel Loden wrote:

> Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against cold war positions!
>
> Yes, how was he ambivalent? At the height of McCarthyism--when people were cowering all over the country--he introduced Simple J. Malarkey, clearly modeled after Senator Joe, and with similar obsessions. I was 4 at the time but Kelly was a hero in my house.

I seem to remember a character modeled after Spiro Agnew that was a hyena. And then there was the Pogo presidential campaign in which his swamp buddies resorted to some familiar tactics. I, too, wonder what Walt Kelly's clay feet look like.

Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

23. Charles Bernstein

Zukofsky Conference at UB (fwrd from Robert Creeley)

Sun 2 Mar 1997

LOUIS ZUKOFSKY CONFERENCE

Poetics Program

University at Buffalo, SUNY

Friday, April 25th

Panel: 10:00 am -- 12:30 pm

Joseph Conte, Burton Hatlen and John Taggart

(Poetry Collection, 420 Capen Hall, North Campus, SUNY-Buffalo)

Panel: 2:30 pm -- 4:30 pm

Ira Nadel and Paul Zukofsky

(Poetry Collection)

Recital: 6:30 pm -- 8:00 pm

Udo Kasemets

(Hallwalls)

Saturday, April 26th*

Panel: 10:30 am -- 1:00 pm

Stephen Fredman, Michele Leggott and Robert Creeley

(Poetry Collection)

Reception: 5:00 pm -- 8:00 pm

(64 Amherst Street / [redacted])

****

This Wednesdays at Four Plus Special Event is sponsored by the Poetics Program, the English Department, the Poetry/Rare Books Collection, the David Gray Chair of Poetry and Letters, and the Samuel P. Capen Chair of Poetry and the Humanities. Particular thanks to Joel Kuszai for his generous help and advice and to Marilyn Dunlap for her care and patience.

All panels will take place in the Poetry/Rare Books Collection, 420 Capen Hall. Udo Kasemets' performance of a selection of his compositions for Louis Zukofsky's 80 Flowers will take place at Hallwalls, 2495 Main Street, Buffalo, New York.

Persons wishing further information can call [redacted]. Those wanting help with hotel reservations should call or write immediately: Louis Zukofsky Conference, Poetics Program, 438 Clemens Hall, University at Buffalo, SUNY, Buffalo, N.Y. 14260.

↑ Index

24. DS

Re: Pogo

Sun 2 Mar 1997

Okay i concede perhaps i have been overly suspicious. Having dicovered him in my teenage years, whcih after all wasn't that long ago, i automatically assumed him to be more of an apologist figure - this was reinforced by interviews/essays he wrote about travelling to eastern europe (I have briefly looked for these but they are not in the house at present) which seemed to take a 'we are more enlightened' line. The S J Malarkey was at the other end of the ambivalence and one i could not align with the 'voice' of his essays. I will read through them again - (next time i have a long bath) I also never fely comfortable with Bumbazine - who luckily disapeared as the series progressed.

Henceforth please consider my opinion under revision.

Dan

At 02:32 AM 3/2/97 -0800, you wrote:
>George Bowering wrote (the last bit):
>>
>> >Ah, Walt Kelly there is another ambivalent figure. He seemed to buy into >> >cold war propaganda in a way that left room for a great deal of humanism
&
>> >thoughtfulness.
>>
>> Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against >> cold war positions!
>
>Yes, how was he ambivalent? At the height of McCarthyism--when people >were cowering all over the country--he introduced Simple J. Malarkey, >clearly modeled after Senator Joe, and with similar obsessions. I was 4 >at the time but Kelly was a hero in my house.
>

>Rachel L.
>
>

↑ Index

25. Dan Machlin
The Marginalization of Poetry @ SEGUE
Sun 2 Mar 1997

The Segue Foundation for Poetry & The Arts is pleased to announce
-- the poetics event of the season!!

_____
THE MARGINALIZATION OF POETRY, AN EVENING

of responses to Bob Perelman's new book from Princeton University Press

_____

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1997 @ 7:30 p.m., Admission $7.00
The Segue Performance Space, 303 East 8th Street, New York City (between Avenues B&C - right off Tompkins Square Park). [redacted] wine and cheese reception will follow

_____
with:
Bob Perelman
Steve Evans
Ann Lauterbach
Ron Silliman
Juliana Spahr

Moderated by Sean Killian/curated by Sean Killian & Dan Machlin

_____
SEGUE 20th Anniversary (1977-1997)
Roof & Segue Books, Big Allis, Open City, Incisions Arts Prison Workshops, The Segue Performance Space, The Ear Inn Reading Series, The Segue Small-Press Archive for Experimental Poetry & Poetics, HomeGrown Theatre Co., M/E/A/N/I/N/G Magazine, FoWalls Gallery (Brooklyn), Purgatory Pie Press, Individual Artist Projects in Film, Dance, Music, Theatre & Performance. Etc.

And watch for news on Lee Ann Brown's CINEMAKI SPRING ROLLS @ SEGUE (Poetry/Film/Video/All rolled into one). Starting March 27th.

↑ Index

26. Jordan Davis
(no subject)
Sun 2 Mar 1997

Pogo said, "I have met the enemy, and he is us."

It was a play on "I have met the enemy, and he is (h)ours."

Jordan

↑ Index

27. Maria Damon
Re: Weinberger, Neruda, Stalin
Sun 2 Mar 1997

... So(NERUDA) is clearly on >> a different level of shameful politics than Uncle Ezra, who had his opinions >> but never tried to kill anybody.
>> ...

i thot ep, as well as broadcasting il duce propoganda to us gis, also tried to find out where they were so he cd pass the info on to italian troops?

↑ Index

28. Tenney Nathanson
Re: Pogo
Sun 2 Mar 1997

I used to own most of the Pogo books (big error to have let em go) but the following isn't something I remember directly: but apparently there was one or more occasion--the Watergate cartoons w Agnew et al (he sure did) being the one I'm pretty sure of--on which lots of papers in which Kelly was syndicated refused to run whole long sequences of Pogo. Apparently there was a backup, less controversial, Pogo that they could run instead. I don't know if Kelly was contractually obligated to do this, or what. But if true it might account for some folks' perception that Kelly went soggy in key periods.

best,

Tenney

At 10:19 AM 3/2/97 -0500, you wrote:
>On Sun, 2 Mar 1997, Rachel Loden wrote:
>
>> >
>> > Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against >> > cold war positions!
>>
>> Yes, how was he ambivalent? At the height of McCarthyism--when people >> were cowering all over the country--he introduced Simple J. Malarkey, >> clearly modeled after Senator Joe, and with similar obsessions. I was 4 >> at the time but Kelly was a hero in my house.
>>
>
>I seem to remember a character modeled after Spiro Agnew that was a hyena.
>And then there was the Pogo presidential campaign in which his swamp >buddies resorted to some familiar tactics. I, too, wonder what Walt >Kelly's clay feet look like.
>
>Steven
>
>_____
> Steven Marks
>
> http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html
>_____
>
>

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]

http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

↑ Index

29. Mark Weiss
Re: Pogo
Sun 2 Mar 1997

Tenney, you may be right, but my memory (perhaps I'm conflating this later period with the McCarthy period) is that a lot of papers ran the strips they objected to on the editorial pages, with the political cartoons, as many still do with Doonsbury. There's another possible source of confusion: after Kelly's death his widow and others attempted to continue the strip. It was very different in character--I don't remember any political content--but I stopped reading it fairly quickly because it was so disappointing. Someday somebody's going to do a study of the effect of Pogo on American English.

At 07:57 PM 3/2/97 -0700, you wrote:
>I used to own most of the Pogo books (big error to have let em go) but the >following isn't something I remember directly: but apparently there was one >or more occasion--the Watergate cartoons w Agnew et al (he sure did) being >the one I'm pretty sure of--on which lots of papers in which Kelly was >syndicated refused to run whole long sequences of Pogo. Apparently there >was a backup, less controversial, Pogo that they could run instead. I don't >know if Kelly was contractually obligated to do this, or what. But if true >it might account for some folks' perception that Kelly went soggy in key >periods.
>
>best,
>
>Tenney
>
>At 10:19 AM 3/2/97 -0500, you wrote:
>>On Sun, 2 Mar 1997, Rachel Loden wrote:
>>
>>> >
>>> > Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against >>> > cold war positions!
>>>
>>> Yes, how was he ambivalent? At the height of McCarthyism--when people >>> were cowering all over the country--he introduced Simple J. Malarkey, >>> clearly modeled after Senator Joe, and with similar obsessions. I was 4 >>> at the time but Kelly was a hero in my house.
>>>
>>
>>I seem to remember a character modeled after Spiro Agnew that was a hyena.
>>And then there was the Pogo presidential campaign in which his swamp >>buddies resorted to some familiar tactics. I, too, wonder what Walt >>Kelly's clay feet look like.
>>
>>Steven
>>

>>_____
>> Steven Marks
>>
>> http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html
>>_____
>>
>>
>
>----------
>
>tenney nathanson
>
>[redacted]
>[redacted]
>
>http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/
>
>

↑ Index

30. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: Pogo
Sun 2 Mar 1997

Actually my father and I do have all the Pogo and they're hardly soggy; in fact there were books put out that were totally political. But there was censorship and alternative scripts involved.

It should have stopped with Walt's death.

I've lived them all.

Alan

On Sun, 2 Mar 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:

> Tenney, you may be right, but my memory (perhaps I'm conflating this later period with the McCarthy period) is that a lot of papers ran the strips they objected to on the editorial pages, with the political cartoons, as many still do with Doonsbury.
> There's another possible source of confusion: after Kelly's death his widow and others attempted to continue the strip. It was very different in character--I don't remember any political content--but I stopped reading it fairly quickly because it was so disappointing.
> Someday somebody's going to do a study of the effect of Pogo on American English.

At 07:57 PM 3/2/97 -0700, you wrote:
I used to own most of the Pogo books (big error to have let em go) but the following isn't something I remember directly: but apparently there was one or more occasion--the Watergate cartoons w Agnew et al (he sure did) being the one I'm pretty sure of--on which lots of papers in which Kelly was syndicated refused to run whole long sequences of Pogo. Apparently there was a backup, less controversial, Pogo that they could run instead. I don't know if Kelly was contractually obligated to do this, or what. But if true it might account for some folks' perception that Kelly went soggy in key periods.

best,

Tenney

At 10:19 AM 3/2/97 -0500, you wrote:
On Sun, 2 Mar 1997, Rachel Loden wrote:

Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against cold war positions!

Yes, how was he ambivalent? At the height of McCarthyism--when people were cowering all over the country--he introduced Simple J. Malarkey, clearly modeled after Senator Joe, and with similar obsessions. I was 4 at the time but Kelly was a hero in my house.

I seem to remember a character modeled after Spiro Agnew that was a hyena. And then there was the Pogo presidential campaign in which his swamp buddies resorted to some familiar tactics. I, too, wonder what Walt Kelly's clay feet look like.

Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]

> [redacted]
>
> http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

31. Tenney Nathanson

Re: Pogo

Sun 2 Mar 1997

I isn't read the book but I is dreamed the dream....

....I allus liked the part about the cowboys.

At 10:25 PM 3/2/97 -0500, you wrote:
>Actually my father and I do have all the Pogo and they're hardly soggy; in >fact there were books put out that were totally political. But there was >censorship and alternative scripts involved.
>
>It should have stopped with Walt's death.
>
>I've lived them all.
>
>Alan
>
>On Sun, 2 Mar 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:
>
>> Tenney, you may be right, but my memory (perhaps I'm conflating this later >> period with the McCarthy period) is that a lot of papers ran the strips they >> objected to on the editorial pages, with the political cartoons, as many >> still do with Doonsbury.
>> There's another possible source of confusion: after Kelly's death his widow >> and others attempted to continue the strip. It was very different in >> character--I don't remember any political content--but I stopped reading it >> fairly quickly because it was so disappointing.
>> Someday somebody's going to do a study of the effect of Pogo on American >> English.
>>

>> At 07:57 PM 3/2/97 -0700, you wrote:
>> >I used to own most of the Pogo books (big error to have let em go) but the >> >following isn't something I remember directly: but apparently there was one >> >or more occasion--the Watergate cartoons w Agnew et al (he sure did) being
>> >the one I'm pretty sure of--on which lots of papers in which Kelly was >> >syndicated refused to run whole long sequences of Pogo. Apparently there >> >was a backup, less controversial, Pogo that they could run instead. I don't >> >know if Kelly was contractually obligated to do this, or what. But if true >> >it might account for some folks' perception that Kelly went soggy in key >> >periods.
>> >
>> >best,
>> >
>> >Tenney
>> >
>> >At 10:19 AM 3/2/97 -0500, you wrote:
>> >>On Sun, 2 Mar 1997, Rachel Loden wrote:
>> >>
>> >>> >
>> >>> > Wow, what's happened to my memory? I recall Kelly as a satirist against >> >>> > cold war positions!
>> >>>
>> >>> Yes, how was he ambivalent? At the height of McCarthyism--when people >> >>> were cowering all over the country--he introduced Simple J. Malarkey, >> >>> clearly modeled after Senator Joe, and with similar obsessions. I was 4 >> >>> at the time but Kelly was a hero in my house.
>> >>>
>> >>
>> >>I seem to remember a character modeled after Spiro Agnew that was a hyena.
>> >>And then there was the Pogo presidential campaign in which his swamp >> >>buddies resorted to some familiar tactics. I, too, wonder what Walt >> >>Kelly's clay feet look like.
>> >>
>> >>Steven
>> >>

>> >>_____
>> >> Steven Marks
>> >>
>> >> http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html
>> >>_____
>> >>
>> >>
>> >
>> >----------
>> >
>> >tenney nathanson
>> >
>> >[redacted]
>> >[redacted]
>> >
>> >http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/
>> >
>> >
>>
>
>_____
>URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
>Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted]
>CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997
>
>

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]
[redacted]

http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

↑ Index

32. Poetics List

Welcome Message

Mon 3 Mar 1997

Rev. 03-03-97

_____

Welcome to the Poetics List

&

The Electronic Poetry Center

sponsored by The Poetics Program, Department of English, Faculty of Art & Letters, of the State University of New York, Buffalo

---

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

_____Contents_____

1. About the Poetics List
2. Subscriptions
3. Cautions
4. Digest Option
5. Temporarily turning off Poetics mail
6. Who's Subscribed
7. The Electronic Poetry Center (EPC)
8. Poetics Archives at EPC
9. Publishers & Editors Read This!

[This document was prepared by Charles Bernstein ([redacted]) and Loss Pequen~o Glazier ([redacted]).]

---

1. About the Poetics List

Please note that this is a private list and information about the list should not be posted to other lists or directories of lists. The idea is to keep the list to those with specific rather than general interests, and also to keep the scale of the list small and the volume manageable.

individual posts of participants are sent directly to all subscribers, we continue to work to promote the editorial function of this project. The definition of that project, while provisional, and while open to continual redefinition by list participants, is nonetheless aversive to a generalized discussion of poetry. Rather, our aim is to support, inform, and extend those directions in poetry that are committed to innovations, renovations, and investigations of form and/or/as content, to the questioning of received forms and styles, and to the creation of the otherwise unimagined, untried, unexpected, improbable, and impossible.

The "list owner" of Poetics is Charles Bernstein: contact him for further information. Joel Kuszai is currently working on the administration of the list. For subscription information contact us at [redacted].

---

2. Subscriptions

line, to:

[redacted]

the one-line message should say:

{or}

(replacing Jill Jillway with your own name; but note: do not use your name to unsub)

We will be sent a notice of all subscription activity.

*

If you are having difficulty unsubscribing, please note:

Sometimes your e-mail address may be changed slightly by your system administrator. If this happens you will not be able to send messages to mail. To avoid this, unsub from the old address and resub from the new address. If you can no longer do this there is a solution if you use Eudora (an e-mail program that is available free at shareware sites): from the Tools menu select "Options" and then select set-up for "Sending Mail": you can substitute your old address here and send the unsub message.

The most frequent problem with subscriptions is bounced messages. If your system is often down or if you have a low disk quota, Poetics messages may get bounced. Please try avoid having messages from the list returned to us. If the problem is low disk quota, you may wish to request an increase from your system administrator. (You may wish to argue that this subscription is part of your scholarly communication!) You may also wish to consider obtaining a commercial account.

---

3. Cautions

Please do not send attachments or include extremely long documents in a post, since this may make it difficult for those who get the list via "digest" or who cannot decode attached or specially formatted files.

In addition to being archived at the EPC, some posts to Poetics (especially reviews, obituary notices, announcements, etc.) may also become part of specific EPC subject areas. (See section 7.)

Please do not send inquiries to the list to get an individual subscribers address. To get this information, see section 6.

If you want someone to send out information to the list as a whole, or supply information missing from an post, please send the request or comment to the individual backchannel, not to the whole list.

---

4. Digest Option

The Poetics List can send a large number of individual messages to your account to each day! If you would prefer to receive ONE message each day, which would include all messages posted to the list for that day, you can use the digest option. Send this one-line message (no subject line) to [redacted]

set poetics digest

NOTE:!! Send this message to "listserv" not to Poetics or as a reply to this message!!

You can switch back to individual messages by sending this message:

set poetics mail

---

5. Temporarily turning off Poetics mail

Do not leave your Poetics subscription "active" if you are going to be away for any extended period of time! Your account may become flooded and you may lose not only Poetics messages but other important mail. You can temporarily turn off your Poetics subscription by sending a message to "listserv."

set poetics nomail

& turn it on again with: set poetics mail

When you return you can check or download missed postings from the Poetics archive. (See 8 below.)

---

6. Who's Subscribed

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

You will be sent within a reasonable amount of time (by return e-mail) a rather long list containing the names and e-mail addresses of Poetics subscribers. This list is alphabetized by server not name.

Please do not send a message to the list asking for the address of a specific subscriber.

---

7. What is the Electronic Poetry Center?

our URL is

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center provides access to the burgeoning number of electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the POETICS List archives, an AUTHOR library of electronic poetic texts, and direct connections to numerous related electronic RESOURCES. The Center also provides information about contemporary print little magazines and SMALL PRESSES engaged in poetry and poetics. And we have an extensive collection of soundfiles of poets' reading their work, as well as the archive of LINEbreak, the radio interview series.

The EPC is directed by Loss Pequen~o Glazier.

---

8. Poetics Archives via EPC

Go to the EPC and select Poetics from the opening screen. Follow the links to Poetics Archives. You may browse the archives by month and year or search them for specific information. Your interface will allow you to print or download any of these files.

Or set your browser to go directly to:
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/poetics/archive

---

9. Publishers & Editors Read This!

PUBLISHERS & EDITORS: Our listings of poetry and poetics information is open and available to you. We are trying to make access to printed publications as easy as possible to our users and ENCOURAGE you to participate! Send a list of your press/publications to [redacted] with the words EPC Press Listing in the subject line. You may also send materials on disk. (Write file name, word processing program, and Mac or PC on disk.) Send an e-mail message to the address above to obtain a mailing address to which to send your disk. Though files marked up with html are our goal, ascii files are perfectly acceptable. If your word processor ill save files in Rich Text Format (.rtf) this is also highly desirable

Send us extended information on new publications (including any back cover copy and sample poems) as well as complete catalogs/backlists (including excerpts from reviews, sample poems, etc.). Be sure to include full information for ordering--including prices and addresses and phone numbers both of the press and any distributors.

Initially, you might want to send short anouncements of new publications directly to the Poetics list as subscribers do not always (or ever) check the EPC; in your message please include full information for ordering. If you have a fuller listing at EPC, you might also mention that in any Poetics posts.

Some announcements circulated through Poetics and the EPC have received a noticeable responses; it may be an effective way to promote your publication and we are glad to facilitate information about interesting publications.

END OF POETICS LIST WELCOME

↑ Index

33. David R. Israel
e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Mon 3 Mar 1997

---

here's a topic --

the conventions that have developed of an email "signature quotation" (sort of the tailend of an epigraph -- a postgraph?) -- one sees this used variously (or, as case may be, uses 'em variously) -- and the notion of raising it as a proper topic amid this august crowd arose just now, when perusing a msg. from my South Asian Lit listserv, wherein -- in a single post (contianing a quoted excerpt of another) I found thus, by happenstance, the following 2 signoffs in tandem:

[1st a bit graphically scrambled, but no matter]

```
    | |  In India, "cold weather" is merely a > > conventional phrase and has come    | |  into use through the > > necessity of having some way to distinguish between | |  weather > > which will melt a brass door-knob and weather which will only    |
> > |  make it mushy.
> >         | |                                  -- MarkTwain
> >
>
```

[& second pristine in all its clarity & irony]

---
i am a bear of very little brain and long words frighten me

- winnie the pooh

So, what questions? Not sure, in truth -- except to note the prevalence of quotation practice, the variety of use, and perhaps to wonder abt. the useage of a singoff convention for a sort of literary / philosophical / whatever identity tag. Not quite the same, no, as personalized licence plates; more like the sort of gimmicks & fun that folk tend(ed) to develop w/ the (once) new technology of answering machine greeting-message(s), eh?

what say ye?

```
 .
 .....
 ............
 \\\\
```

spoke to Alan he didn't have exact dates arranged, but while I think about it (knowing how early fall budgets are allocated, I hope I am not too late already) I wanted to lodge that little nugget of info in any brains out there looking to present something spiffy and real in the fall. I am certainly hoping to get him out to the west coast if possible, maybe some places can join coffers?

Martin

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

35. Sylvester Pollet
Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Mon 3 Mar 1997

I say those quotations are frequently more interesting than the message, but they should be changed now & then.

"Outside of a dog, a book is man's best friend. Inside of a dog, it's too dark to read." Groucho Marx.

(pace, pace, woman's too) sp

↑ Index

36. Mark Wallace anger and violence
Mon 3 Mar 1997

A colleague of mine, talking about teaching the essays of bell hooks, says that "students always perceive her as very angry and bitter when they read her essays--they get upset that she seems to be taking them to task. Then when I show them a video of her talking about her work and laughing, sometimes they suddenly revise their opinion, because they see her as witty and likeable. In any case, they're far more likely to respond to her personality than they are to her ideas."

What is interesting to her about this, she says, is the issue of how anger and violence relate inside American ideology. To generalize (perhaps too much), it is not necessary to express violence through anger--indeed much violence in this country is done through a calm conviction that violence is the correct tactic. Students will often think of violence as a GIVEN--in my own experience, at least several students a semester will make the argument that violence is innate and normal, and that attempts to eliminate it are utopian and go against human nature. Violence, if accepted as natural, doesn't even need ANGER as a motivation--indeed, it can be seen simply as a natural extension of one's right to possess whatever one can get ahold of.

Anger, on the other hand, often remains very intensely a social taboo. Perhaps this comes in part out of the very deep U.S. ideological conviction that things are really okay--indeed that they MUST be okay, since "this" is America. So when people express anger, one response is that their confusion must be their own fault (or perhaps the fault of their parents) because how can there be any legitimate anger against what we all know to be a system of freedom?

Anger and violence are certainly related at times, but at other times, anger can be a legitimate reaction AGAINST violence, and does not necessarily lead to it. Indeed, it's far more likely that violence will result from the belief that one needs to repress one's anger than from the idea that expressing anger is actually okay. Are there times and places where one should express anger, and others where it should not be spoken? Perhaps, but perhaps not also... for where is that place where anger is totally taboo on every occasion?

I think I'm saying all this because, at times, it is easy on this list to confuse anger with violence--even to confuse expressions of desire for violence with the act of violence itself. But again, it is just as likely in many circumstances that vocal anger is a REFUSAL of physical violence. And I have been reading recent posts by Lisa Jarnot and Tom Mandel and others with the sense that everyone, in various ways, has been talking about how to REFUSE violence, and in that sense, I have found none of the recent discussion "disturbing" at all, except to the extent that disturbance is necessary to learning.

I think where this also relates to poetry has to do with what Charles Bernstein was saying about recognizing and continuing to deal with the "dark side" of poets and poetry. I'm not sure that poetry serves necessarily as an outlet for this "dark side," although it certainly can in some cases. But it just as equally can be a continued expression of fascination with, and extension of that "dark side." But I think that even in dealing with this "dark side" one has to work with the complex problem that poetry, in its interrelation with life, is not the same as other activities (indeed that all physical activites are distinct and cannot be reduced to sameness with each other). One can express a line, and not act on it--one can even express a line that is the opposite of what one would act on.

Similarly, it is possible to be greatly motivated by that which one would never speak...

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

37. Tom Mandel

Duncan Dorn Nuts

Mon 3 Mar 1997

Lisa Jarnot is "talking about the ignorance encouraged by the powers that be (corporate /hegemonic/media/USA) to keep marginalized groups separated from each other by convincing them that they should be enemies."

Without disagreeing, I hope it is clear that hegemonic powers have no need, alas, to create this kind of xenophobia, hatred, etc. As Duncan pointed out, and as I have been trying to make clear in my posts on this Dorn issue which has its teeth so deep in the leg of the list.

Why racism must be resisted is not that this is a way of resisting the hegemony, what the rabbis used to call the "kingdom of arrogance" or "Rome" but that racism is within us (like self-praise conscious or not) -- and that is why I offered my critique in the form of a knuckle sandwich. An acknowledgment, not an offer of violence.

Additionally, Lisa is not "saying that anyone's racism should be disregarded, but the truth is that we live in a violent racist homophobic country, where maybe "The Dorn Discussion" obscures the bigger problem."

But it's not "a racist country" it's a racist world (where "racism" can also stand in for what divides, for example, xtian and moslem bosnians who have clearly dropped from the same tree). Not that the uses of racism in policy should not also be resisted, of course they should. But it is easy to resist something so big that announcing one's opinion does the job. It is resisting the particular, the racism of a poet for example, that is difficult -- for a poet, for example to do or to read -- and may have a cost attached to it. I've gotten several backchannel messages, for example, that I shouldn't stick myself so far into this, it may not be wise (i.e. I am in danger of differing with opinion-makers and trend-setters in my world).

Tom

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

38. Maria Damon
Re: Duncan Dorn Nuts
Mon 3 Mar 1997

...mandel writes.... But it is easy >to resist something so big that announcing one's opinion does the job. It >is resisting the particular, the racism of a poet for example, that is >difficult -- for a poet, for example to do or to read -- and may have a >cost attached to it. I've gotten several backchannel messages, for >example, that I shouldn't stick myself so far into this, it may not be wise >(i.e. I am in danger of differing with opinion-makers and trend-setters in >my world).
>
>Tom
>

i for one enjoy your posts, tom; tho' in specific cases i find myself ambivalent (genet, stein, spicer, baraka) i find your lack of ambivalence bracing.

↑ Index

39. Charles Bernstein
correction in Welcome message
Mon 3 Mar 1997

Correction on Welcome Message (listserv address was misstated in this section only):

Who's Subscribed

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to message
blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

Please do not send a message to the list asking for the address of a specific subscriber.

↑ Index

40. simon
Re: correction in Welcome message
Mon 3 Mar 1997

Usually, the command

    review LIST by name will yield the list of subscriber's names and e-addresses in alphabetical order.

beth

↑ Index

41. Jordan Davis
Bebe Repogo
Mon 3 Mar 1997

What was the influence of Bill Griffith's Zippy on langang poetry?

Also, hey, F. Bruno, while you're checking out the influence of Ashbery on Malkmus, could you check out what effect William Carlos Williams had on Walter Salas-Humara, and how much Olson there really is in D Berman's head, and whether David Byrne's favorite book really is _Bean Spasms_?

Hey, Mark Wallace, wait, nobody thought you were _angry_!

Whoa, Rod Smith, nice reading at Segue! keep those Minutemen references coming. Didn't you love it when Louis Cabri, in the middle of his breathy sequence of Canadian politics and expletives, dropping his manuscript all over the floor, whispered, in time with the poem, "Damn!" Was it not excellent of Heather Fuller to thank 'the woman in the corner' (Lee Ann Brown) for reading out loud along with all of Heather's choral poem, "Placards"? When's Heather's book's comin's out's?

? J

↑ Index

42. Mark Prejsnar
Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Mon 3 Mar 1997

This is an interesting convention. As David said (or did I think it??) related to things like bumperstickers...As such, sort of a subset of de/trans-personalized verbalizations characteristic of late cap/urban experience? (an attempt to re-personalize same..) In other word, related to the ubiquity of advertizing and signage (..have been reading R. Waldrop's wonderful The Road is Everywhere, which encorporates pictograph'd street-signs into the dense personal-flow of the verse).

One Australian librarian who posts on library listservs has a box at the bottom, labelling it a "pithy-quotation-free space." thus the expectations a new convention gives rise to, can in turn be used to make (to feel compelled to make?) a statement...

One use for pithy quotations, which I think is fairly frequent--To make clear something one feels, to delinieate an emotional commitment to a value, without having folks think you're being too pushy about it. Another library worker has as her tag a Conrad quotation: "We live, as we dream, alone." As a socialist I find this quote depressing and even rather angering every time I see it. By the same token I've been using my signature to make a political point about outsourcing, which is part of capital's high-drive attack on people (working people, the majority); since my library actually does a little outsourcing, and I can't be too outspoken when cyberspeaking as part of my job, I hide behind 1. the putatively light, "witty" character of pithy-quotations; and 2. the prestige of a widely-read recent book in library science...I hereby append that signature, which I usually leave off when Poetix-izing:

Mark Prejsnar-- Acquisitions/Cataloging One good rule of thumb in MacMillan Law Library librarianship and elswhere is: Emory University the uglier the neologism, Atlanta GA 30322
the more undesireable the notion [redacted] it describes. Vide
"outsourcing." fax [redacted] [redacted] --Walt Crawford & Michael Gorman

↑ Index

43. Jennifer Sondheim
(me again)
Mon 3 Mar 1997

-

Jennifer Turns For Lorn

Today I up-and-gathered myself, all dressed in my new frock, and went gai- ly-raily to the store where I could buy books read by others. And there I found, guess, two volumes by sad Elinor Wylie, called Angels and Earthly Creatures, and Angels and Earthly Creatures! One was the very first edi- tion and the other was even earlier

There were these sad poems, and this very sad comment written right in both of them:

"The contents of this, Elinor Wylie's last, book of poems was selected by her for publication on the evening of December 15th, 1928, the day prior to her death. It is printed precisely according to her own arrangement without any necessity for the exercise of literary executorship."

Was she in bed? And, oh, Jennifer, that novel of hers which popularized my name, from Guinevere, Jennifer Lorn, that is I do believe, Jennifer For- Lorn! And what pretty books these books are!

> O break the walls of sense in half
> And make the spirit fugitive!
> This light begotten of itself
> Is not a light by which to live!

She wrote, and that other sense is me! Now this, from Miss Edna St-Vin- cent Millay!

> To Elinor Wylie
>
> [In answer to a question about her]
>
> Oh, she was beautiful in every part!
> The auburn hair that bound the subtle brain;
> The lovely mouth cut clear by wit and pain,
> Uttering oaths and nonsense, uttering art
> In casual speech and curving at the smart
> On startled ears of excellence too plain
> For early morning! - Obit. Death from strain;
> The soaring mind outstripped the tethered heart.
> Yet here was one who had no need to die
> To be remembered. Every word she said,
> The lively malice of the hazel eye
> Scanning the thumb-nail close - oh, dazzling dead,
> How like a comet through the darkening sky
> You raced! . . . would your return were heralded.

Now me!:

> would I have had the time to have been her instead of Jennifer, or have sat down against the clock killing her, dressed down in one or an- other violation fabric, cotton, silk, of pinafore or lovely frock, train, vel- veteen of lace, red wedding gown: would I these gloves have fit her, dark with grace and veil these lines would not have fit her, face of pearl, failed at being life, o Jennifer forlorn, o gods, o ghastly gruel, o meales, o scales and carapace, nylons, garters rule the thin constricted waste, garnered heels turned to blacks; the violent maelstrom churns, burns against your slacks.

I describe myself upon the shelf.

I am so happy to have found love and death and Elinor Wylie!

↑ Index

44. Chris Stroffolino

SEGUE READING(rehm/stroffolino)

Tue 4 Mar 1997

To announce that I be reading with Pam Rehm this thursday is the expressed purpose of this message. "I hold a picture up everybody thinks it's me" is a Graham Parker line. The event is listed as a reading (I am from a town or tavern called Reading and Pam too was "raised" in Pennsylvania) and it will be at 7:30, March 6th 303 East 8th, btw. B and C. I think that is all the information one would need to know I think. But, although I can't speak for Ms. Rehm here, I should say that any potential audience people should not necessarily EXPECT it to be a reading. It's even less likely that I will play paino, though that might be more fun. But fun isn't the same as "pleasure". It's likely that there will be drinking before the reading--as if there would be no reading without drinking. Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

45. matt

Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation

Tue 4 Mar 1997

I think there is a certain analogous use of the sig.s to that os epigraphic prefatories, a certain aura, era, ira. but then there is the usual, the humourous, the 'god aren't I quick' etc. and the display of our pretentions, character slippage. much probably.

matt

↑ Index

46. Maria Damon

award

Tue 4 Mar 1997

---

hi all thot i'd share what just came across my screen:

Greetings!
>
>Following are the rules for the 1997 Tamarack Award contest for creative >writing. Please share this information with writers. The winner of the >1996 award was Lise Erdrich for her story "XXL." Writers who would like >a copy of these guidelines mailed to them may mail a S.A.S.E to Tamarack >Awards, Minnesota Monthly, 10 South Fifth Street, Suite 1000, >Minneapolis, MN 55402.
>
>Thanks!
>Nancy Doyle
>Minnesota Monthly Magazine
>
>
>
>1997 TAMARACK AWARDS
>
>The Rules
>
>1. The competition is open to residents of Minnesota, North Dakota, >South Dakota, Iowa, Wisconsin, and Michigan.
>
>2. Previous Tamarack Award winners and employees of Minnesota Public >Radio and its affiliated companies are ineligible.
>
>3. You may submit only one manuscript. It must be an original, >unpublished piece of prose. We will accept short stories or novel >excerpts.
>
>4. Please limit your entry to 3,500 words.
>
>5. Your entry must be postmarked no later than May 19, 1997.
>
>6. Please type and double-space the manuscript.
>
>7. Submit one copy of your manuscript. Please do not put your name on >the manuscript. Judging is anonymous.
>
>8. Include a cover sheet with your name, address, and daytime and >evening phone numbers. Please indicate on the cover sheet whether your >work is fiction or non-fiction.
>

>9. Include a stamped, self-addressed postcard, so that we can >acknowledge receipt of the manuscript.
>
>10: Address your entry to:
>
>1997 Tamarack Awards
>Minnesota Monthly
>Lumber Exchange Building
>10 S. 5th St., Suite 1000
>Minneapolis, Minn. 55402
>
>The winners of the 1997 Tamarack Awards will be announced and published >in the November 1997 issue of Minnesota Monthly. Authors of the winning >manuscripts will, upon signing Minnesota Monthly's standard publication >contract, be paid $500 for one-time publication rights;
>
>Minnesota Public Radio will reserve the right to broadcast readings of >the winning manuscripts. Winners also will be announced in the >January-February issue of Poets and Writers Magazine.
>
>Thank you for your interest in Minnesota Monthly's 1997 Tamarack >Awards—and good luck!
>

↑ Index

47. Mark Wallace is "hate" speech "free" speech
Tue 4 Mar 1997

Sorry not to let this thread die, but I don't think I'm quite ready to let go of it yet.

Frankly, I'm not sure where I would ultimately come down on this issue, but my understanding of the problems regarding "hate" speech have to do with potential contradictions between the first amendment, permitting free speech for all, and the fourteenth amendment, granting equal opportunity to all under the law.

Those who think of "hate" speech as purely a first amendment issue will, undoubtedly, want on all occasions to reserve people the right to speak as they please, although even this is limited, because certain kinds of speech ARE prohibited under the law (yelling "fire" in a theater being the cliched example). Thus, a first amendment position would clearly argue that more damage is done by repressing the free speech of racists, etc, than by allowing them to speak freely, because of the potential dangers that the loss of free speech may lead to.

A Fourteenth Amendment position may, on the other hand, argue that it is necessary for the law to promote an environment in which opportunity remains equal for all. How does this impact the subject of speech? Does an environment of "free" racist speech harm the ability of individuals to have access to education, housing, etc? If such "group hate" speech does create an unequal environment, is a law restricting such speech in certain instances really an attack on the First Amendment? Does the question shift if one is talking not simply about an instance of a single racist speaker, but of a racist group that demands equal rights to resources on the grounds that their speech is as allowable as any other?

Interestingly, both Canada and Britain (if I understand correctly) do have laws prohibiting, in certain specific instances, the right of individuals to engage in "speech" specifically designed to denigrate any group of people based on some supposedly shared characteristics such as "race" etc. By interpreting these laws narrowly (that is, by only prosecuting very specific instances of indviduals preaching violence against groups), there has PERHAPS been very little impact on "free" speech.

A Fourteenth Amendment position might point out, therefore, that in a case where there may be a conflict between the right to free speech and the right to equal opportunity under the law, both individuals defending their right to free hate speech and individuals defending their right to equal opportunity by making attempted prosecutions of hate speech must prove "compelling reasons" that 1) their activity be protected 2) that the activity of others can be definitely SHOWN to impact their freedom. Thus, someone who sues someone else for "hate speech" must prove how they have been harmed, while someone defending their right to free speech must prove why their need to denigrate others based on race outweighs the right of individuals to equal access under the law. Both such instances would then need to be pursued on the basis of the particularities of their cases, rather than by generalities about "free speech" or "equal rights."

As I am still forming my point of view about these matters, I welcome response...

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:

| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

48. Mark Wallace to clarify about Padgett
Tue 4 Mar 1997

For Rachel Duplessis and others:

Just as a clarification, my point last week about Ron Padgett and Ted Berrigan in relation to Tulsa was NOT that they knew nothing about the Tulsa incidents later in their life--I'm aware of Ron's poem on the subject. Rather, my point was simply that information about the Tulsa riots was not publically available in Tulsa for many years. In the case of someone like Ron, he clearly went on to research the subject--based on rumors he had heard? information from where? I don't know.

Rather, my point was this: what does it mean to live in an environment in which information about social reality is so biased that the public account of the Tulsa riots (despite several books that appeared on the subject (in the 60s?)) was that the National Guard had been called in to suppress a "Negro rebellion"? Where does such a reality intersect with the story of some young men who find that life in Tulsa does not perhaps offer sufficient outlet for a creative existence as a poet. Some might say: the two are not related--how could something that one could not know as a child impact one's later choices. My answer was this: is it not likely that what one does in reaction to one's social environment is influenced even by that which one does not know? That is: does not the suppression of information in one instance at least suggest why information (about creative choices, about poetry) is suppressed in other instances? Or put it this way: one may not know all of the reasons why one leaves a place, but the reasons one knows are intimately and historically bound with the reasons one does not know at the time, but may be lucky, committed, and intelligent enough to explore later.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

49. amato
Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
Tue 4 Mar 1997

---

mark, have you looked at catherine mackinnon's _only words_ (harvard, 1993)?... she makes a strenuous case for a more conservative reading of the first amendment in light of the fourteenth, very much along the lines you're suggesting...

while i'm ultimately in disagreement with mackinnon, dworkin and others, i found the book useful in highlighting the contentious issues...

best,

joe

↑ Index

50. Jim Rosenberg
Genie: The Wild Child
Tue 4 Mar 1997

This will possibly come too late for those getting the list on digest, alas, but ...

If you haven't seen it, watch Nova tonight on PBS. It's a very provocative and disturbing piece on Genie, a contemporary "wild child" and addresses a lot of issues, including the role Truffaut's film had in shaping what happened to this poor human being who became a research tug of war.

With all of our talk here about "linguistically innovative" poetry, there is very little news here about what's going on in language research. Perhaps we think too much that we are the news. Whatever, this program addresses several disturbing issues regarding the role of research, science, and the fate of individual human beings in a dire discourse concerning core issues over the nature of language.

--
Jim Rosenberg http://www.well.com/user/jer/
CIS: 71515,124
WELL: jer
Internet: [redacted]

↑ Index

51. aerialedge
Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
Tue 4 Mar 1997

"Yell 'Shower!' in a crowded theater."

--Ron Silliman, _Xing_

↑ Index

52. Jerry Rothenberg
Ed Sanders reading (San Diego)
Tue 4 Mar 1997

Owing to a scheduling mixup. Ed Sanders' reading at the Porter Troupe Gallery in San Diego is moved to Saturday March 8 at 2:30 p.m.

The address (unchanged) is 301 Spruce Street, and the number for further info is [redacted].

↑ Index

53. michael corbin
Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
Tue 4 Mar 1997

Mark Wallace wrote:

> As I am still forming my point of view about these matters, I welcome response...

You may be interested in the forthcoming _Excitable Speech: Contemporary Scenes of Politics_, by Judith Butler, pub. Routledge. She has as well an essay in the current issue of _Critical Inquiry_, "Sovereign Performatives in the Contemporary Scene of Utterance," and excerpt of which can be viewed at http://www2.uchicago.edu/jnl-crit-inq/v23/v23n2.butler.html

And while I take it that you are simply marking the terrain of the discussion with the juridicial lingua franca of 'constitutional' 'rights', I'm sure you'd agree that the ethical parole your post humanely searches for is hog-tied to the narrow legalisms of amendment cuneiform chiseled 'in order to form a more perfect union' (sic).

mc

↑ Index

54. Jordan Davis
eons of mass
Tue 4 Mar 1997

2nd issue of Mass. Ave.

came in the mail or the ups today

Kim Lyons' Eon rules the world which is made up of people you like and who for the most part like you -- this after last week's mail which brought

Steve Evans' lecture -- is it ok to mention it? -- on the structure of literary change

a lecture which will no doubt change

the way one talks about what goes on -- a TINA-formation a young Hegelian and the autonomy that beats all hegemony, that bests it on graceful excursions into the outlying territory

↑ Index

55. Maxianne Berger
Re: Pogo
Tue 4 Mar 1997

Am delayed due to being on digest -- and this post conrains very trivial information.

On Sunday, 2 Mar 1997, Steven Marks asked about Kelly's clay feet:

> I, too, wonder what Walt
> Kelly's clay feet look like.

Make that clay foot as Kelly lost one leg accidentaly at the age of nine, hitching a ride on a truck bumper--if memory serves me correctly.

Maxianne, who only remembers a ketchup-bottle dress otherwise :)

==========
Maxianne Berger * [redacted]
==========
<< Qui se sent morveux, qu'il se mouche! >>
==========

↑ Index

56. Burt Kimmelman
recommended reading
Tue 4 Mar 1997

I urge everyone to get and read through the March 17th issue of The Nation, whose cover story is "The Crushing Power of Big Publishing." It's wonderful, as are a great many other related articles in this special issue on The National Entertainment State.

↑ Index

57. Mark Weiss
Re: Pogo
Tue 4 Mar 1997

Nope, that's Al Capp, whose politics were more shmoozville.

At 04:11 PM 3/4/97 -0500, you wrote:
>
>Make that clay foot as Kelly lost one leg accidentaly at the age of >nine, hitching a ride on a truck bumper--if memory serves me correctly.
>
>Maxianne, who only remembers a ketchup-bottle dress otherwise :)
> ==========

```
>              Maxianne Berger * [redacted]
>            ========================================
>           << Qui se sent morveux, qu'il se mouche! >>
>            ========================================
>
>
```

↑ Index

58. Joe Safdie

Re: More (sigh) Dorn

Tue 4 Mar 1997

On Sat, 1 Mar 1997, Tom Mandel wrote (in part):

> *Let me ask Joe Safdie directly -- since he knows Dorn over a long period and is Jewish -- did Dorn ever taunt you as a Jew or "jew-bait" you in any way? A truthful answer will clear up -- and I think end -- this creepiness. Joe knows the truth (in a funny way, so do I). And just needs to propose the truth here.*

This "direct" question by Tom totally ignores a post I made a few days earlier (February 25th) in which I said "in 20 years of off-and-on friendship my Jewishness was never the occasion for any Jew baiting." I would have thought this statement was fairly clear. I know Tom saw the post because he referred, in the verbal equivalent of a sneer, to other parts of it later. Perhaps he jumped over this part. If there is any single human being still interested in this issue, let me state that, unlike Maria, I haven't found Tom's "lack of ambivalence" at all refreshing, that I think he's been wrong from the start, that I fail to see how offering anyone a "knuckle sandwich" can be seen as implying that the perceived fault is shared, and that (finally) the reason I haven't responded before this was because I was concerned about an issue of public/private posting that I thought gave rise to Tom's question: I'm told -- and I indeed thought -- that the impetus for this question came from his knowledge of a PRIVATE post I had made to another member on the list, who then paraphrased it (perhaps prematurely) to Tom, who then posted it to the entire list. That's troubling. If, however, the impetus for the question came solely from my statement that I have, in fact, known Ed for some 20 years, he should have read the rest of the post where that statement appeared. I suggest, now, that the place to pursue any further discussion of this issue is through back-channels, where I'll be happy to discuss with any and all what I do and (mostly) don't know.

↑ Index

59. Pritchett,Pat

Re: Yell "Shower"

Tue 4 Mar 1997

AREOPAGITICA, Part Deux

In the field of this world confused seeds are promiscuously read the infection may spread,

not unelegantly,
into the first rank.

Yet one jewel left,
in any hermitage,
denotes a rigor contrary to a streaming fountain.

Like trading all day without your religion.

These are the fruits
(how to be washed?)
as any January cld freeze together a perfect shape into a thousand pieces.

We boast our light, discern those planets
we have gained:
remote, unmitering, stark blind.

All concurrence of signs:
anvils hammers plates lamps harvest cannot be a continuity

dissimilitudes arise.

And graceful symmetry, the whole pile wise as prophets (radiance, noise) who love twilight in a year of sects and flowery crop.

By privilege to write and speak in agitation a man finds his findings scattered by the wind and sun (what keeps a narrow bridge and has more shapes than one)

He who eats the handwriting of the ghost of linen sees the disunion of all formality, the sudden sub-dichotomies of gold and silver

sever the end of mortal things

↑ Index

60. George Bowering

Re: Pogo

Tue 4 Mar 1997

Now Walt Kelly wd be in another kind of trouble. Once Pogo and Albert were out on their flatboat (remember the name on the side wd chgange a little with each panel?) fishing, and Pogo went to throw the anchor, but it went into Albert's mouth and he fell overboard. When he surfaced, Pogo said "Albert you is swoggled the anchor!" And lighting up, Albert said, "Yep, and I is smokin' the rope!"

Another time the turtle guy was standing on Albert's chest, looking down his maw at something else Albert has swoggled, and he says, "Albert, you is deeper than I thunk!"

George Bowering.
,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

61. Maria Damon

Re: Pogo

Tue 4 Mar 1997

At 7:40 PM -0800 3/4/97, George Bowering wrote:
>
>
>Another time the turtle guy was standing on Albert's chest, looking down >his maw at something else Albert has swoggled, and he says, "Albert, you is >deeper than I thunk!"
>

"that turtle guy" had the brilliant name of, as i recall, churchy la femme. this whole cold war thread, including people's passion for pogo, is teaching me a lot about my stoically complacent father, who had a passion for pogo, mentioned once that the rosenbergs' only crime was being jewish, and otherwise struck me as more of a podhoretz-type than anything else...now i can see between some of those silences...thanks all.--md

↑ Index

62. Maria Damon
announcements
Tue 4 Mar 1997

---

hey guyzies: a couple of short essays of mine, including the angel piece i mentioned last year, just came out in "mass culture and everyday life," edited by peter gibian, routledge. also, did i mention that thanks to the suggestion of a list member, i was able to place my lenny bruce piece in postmodern culture? it's on the web now, current issue. thanks all.--md

↑ Index

63. Martin J Spinelli
looking for Marinetti audio
Tue 4 Mar 1997

I'm looking for recordings of F.T. Marinetti and other Italian Futurists. I've located some Marinetti on the Tellus #21 cassette, but would like to uncover more (as much as there is).

Can anyone point me in the right direction? Post here or back-channel me and I'll post the findings to the list all at once.

Many Thanks,
Martin

_____ Martin Spinelli [redacted] English Department, SUNY @ Buffalo LINEbreak http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/linebreak EPC Sound Room http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/sound

↑ Index

64. Herb Levy
Re: looking for Marinetti audio
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Martin,

the Belgian recording label Sub Rosa has a collection called Futurism & Dada Reviewed, that includes recordings of Apollinaire, Cocteau, Duchamp, Grandi, Huesenbeck, Janco, Wyndham Lewis, Marinetti, Russolo, Schwitters, & Tzara.

Some of the recordings are old & not well restored & some of the editing/collaging of sound is confusing & weird, but it's the only relatively easy to find source of recordings of lots of these people. I've got the LP, but I've seen it on CD.

Bests

Herb

> I'm looking for recordings of F.T. Marinetti and other Italian Futurists.
> I've located some Marinetti on the Tellus #21 cassette, but would like to uncover more (as much as there is).
>
> Can anyone point me in the right direction? Post here or back-channel me and I'll post the findings to the list all at once.
>
> Many Thanks,
> Martin
>
> ---
> Martin Spinelli [redacted]
> English Department, SUNY @ Buffalo
> LINEbreak http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/linebreak
> EPC Sound Room http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/sound

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

65. KENT JOHNSON
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

A couple of other mimeo/xerox notables: Mark Nowak's old Furnitures, and Giants Play Well in the Drizzle. Also Andrew Schelling's Jimmy and Lucy's House of K, which I think was reincarnated into something else.

Kent

> Date sent:
Wed, 5 Mar 1997 13:39:49 - 0500
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Jordan Davis <[redacted]>

> Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
> To: [redacted]

> C
> Mag City
> Adventures in Poetry
> The Harris Review
> Dodgems
> C Comics
> The World
> Gandhabba
>
> and then later...
>
> Object
> The Impercipient
> Explosive Magazine
> Antenym
> Stud Duck
> Torque
> Tads
> Mirage (Periodical)
> Yale Younger Poets
> Situation
> Tamarind ...
>
> ———
>
> Dear Fiona,
>
> Steve Evans' lecture "The Dynamics of Literary Change" is available from The Impercipient Lecture Series, 61 E Manning St, Providence RI 02906-4008. I misspoke when I said that it proposes a structure of literary change. What would be more accurate is to say that the talk digresses around the subjects of the autonomy of the work of art, the beginnings and ends of literary eras, and the writings of Hegel, Musil, Bourdieu, Adorno and others.
>
> Jordan

↑ Index

66. Rachel Loden

Re: Pogo

Wed 5 Mar 1997

George Bowering wrote:

> Once Pogo and Albert were > out on their flatboat (remember the name on the side wd chgange a little > with each panel?)

Yep. And those were (sometimes) the names of real swamp denizens, I have reason to know, because once it was my best friend in grade school. Okay all this has sent me back to the Pogo books (I knew this list was good for something). Where I find a poetry contest between Albert and a worm. Albert, glaring at worm: BY JING! I could write a BETTER poem than that with BOTH HEADS tied behind of my back. Worm: Phoo! You missed its fruity import. Albert: Phoo yo' own self...It don't mean nothin' an' I don't unnerstan' it! Howland Owl: You don't understand RUSSIAN, so Russian means NOTHIN'? Worm: NYET! ... Albert: Fuddle- stucks! I'll outscan that li'l grub TWO TO ONE. Worm: WELL! I'll go home an' work on my I-ambic pentameter. Albert (enraged): By tunkit, if you uses any MACHINERY, I'll declare a FOUL!

and so on.

Rachel L.

↑ Index

67. John Cayley
email address for Steve McCaffery
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Is Steve McCaffery on the list? Or can someone back channel me with a current email address for him. I just sent a message to what I thought was correct and it was bounced.

- > John Cayley / Wellsweep Press http://www.demon.co.uk/eastfield/ 1 Grove End House 150 Highgate Road London NW5 1PD UK Tel & Fax: ([redacted] Email: [redacted] < -

↑ Index

68. nico vassilakis
peoigreqmvertyntynyutrtyrwvpuqwv!
Wed 5 Mar 1997

---

march fifth's poetics list digest

strangest i've everseen weird knitmare

play-marble shrapnel

salimat pagi = may yr morning be blessed now get da fuck outta here

www.speakeasy.org/cgi-bin/gallery/show?g=46 is drunken"un"

what happens to tom waits' voice at home near the potatoes and mustard and the curled piece of meat on the grill. does it go to the soft or scrape purr sawtooth cant imagine that whole robert wilson absorption so david burns and tom waits patula clarks and dion well he's dion

like elvis crest-nut these moving magazines, e.mail bonfires, merry-go-tronics, hotwired.com bodegas, fashion-plate electroburros, white muddafuckers teeming with taxable income, who makes = or < 14K?, who admits this, who conjures distraction, so much deep ends on wheelburros, herein seattle the only thing to talk to - you see miles before it approaches, preferably not in the dreaming, exnihilo, esquire letterhead, leave pizza by the subway entrance, did a vehicle come and land from somewhere out there in the andes, did a vehicle come, i wish somebody better put out the big light.

good night guillaume, keeper of black stones where universe begins vacuuming genesis and american cities break the posture of emotive struggle.

L=poets forenite unite despite respite eclipse dismiss summarily from viewing l=guage in common usage / is similar in age, as in age between the two, language-usage

↑ Index

69. Jay Schwartz
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Some of the magazines listed here are photocopied- does the original post specify mimeographed?

I would be very interested in hearing from magazine producers about the difference in production choices that mimeograph vs. photocopy entails. Not just technical, but the aesthetic choices as well.

Thanks,

Jay Shxwartz

↑ Index

70. F.A. Templeton
Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Dear Mark P,

What IS outsourcing?

Fiona

↑ Index

71. F.A. Templeton
Re: eons of mass
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Dear Jordan,

Steve Evans lecture: tell more.
Fiona

↑ Index

72. Tom Mandel <Sigh>
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Poor Joe Safdie, feeling pressed to deny the Jew-baiting (or whatever) of which his friend Ed Dorn accuses himself in the letter to Baraka Al Nielsen quoted oh so long ago, refers to:

"a PRIVATE post I (i.e. Joe) had made to another member on the list, who then paraphrased it (perhaps prematurely) to Tom, who then posted it to the entire list."

What’s he talking about? What did I "post to the entire list?"

And, oh yes, what about --

Dorn defending, at the Berkeley conference on Olson a few years back, Vincent Sarich and his ideas about the genetic intellectual inferiority of certain racial groups

-– as someone emailed me recently (and shamefully I share it with the entire list). Is it fact or fiction? Is it irrelevant? Doesn't affect my life (whose?)

Now, I could go on and ask Joe whether and what he knows about that subject, but I won’t.

My concern is not the question of Dorn’s racism; maybe it's all an unfortunate tissue of coincidental misquotations, anyway he doesn’t seem placed where he can do much harm, anyway harm to him occurs only if he comes around me with that kind of stuff (pop in the puss).

I am concerned with the way it got handled here. The fact that Al Nielsen’s personal testimony and then his reference to a researcher-available letter were both pooh-poohed. The fact that the subject seemed embarrassing, somehow vulgar perhaps, to certain members of the list, the fact that it prompted the really low-level response that "why yes, poets can be bad people." Or worse, can be "difficult" people. Und so weiter.

That’s what I meant by calling the thread "creepy." Not Dorn, the response on the list.

Tom

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

73. Mark Wallace
Peter Gizzi and Nate Mackey
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Is there anyone on the list who can give me either the e-mail address and/or phone number for Peter Gizzi and Nathaniel Mackey? A backchannel note would be much appreciated.

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

74. Mark Prejsnar
Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Outsourcing is one of those lovely corporate weasel-words for a way to attack people's lives.....Essentially, it means hiring a worker on an "independent contractor" basis. Usually you "downsize" first--i.e. you fire a lot of your employees. then you hire people (often the folks you just fired) for limited amounts of time to do the same work without unions, at much lower pay, without job security, without basic medical or dental coverage, without vacation or sick leave...You get the picture. Sometimes outsourcing involves contracting with a firm to provide a bunch of folks without benefit, decent pay or job security to do work that used to be done by people with decent jobs.

I have to admit I use the Crawford/Gorman quote because of its implied political edge....As a poet, I don't necessarily agree that neologisms some people find "ugly" are bad language---Messing with the language in "irresponsible" ways is one of the mothers of invention...

On Wed, 5 Mar 1997, F.A. Templeton wrote:

> Dear Mark P,
>
> What IS outsourcing?
>
> Fiona

↑ Index

75. Jerry Rothenberg
(no subject)
Wed 5 Mar 1997

---

id AA10411 for jrothenb; Tue, 4 Mar 97 22:02:09 PST
id AA10408 for [redacted]; Tue, 4 Mar 97 22:02:06 PST
Date: Tue, 4 Mar 97 22:02:06 PST
From: [redacted] (Jerry Rothenberg)
To: [redacted]
Subject: Marinetti recordings
Cc: [redacted]
Status: RO

dear Martin --

The most Marinetti I have is on an old lp "musica futurista: antologia sonora a cura di Daniele Lombardi, published by Cramps Records (Italy) -- I think in 1980. The Marinetti listings are (1) Profilo Sintetico Musicale di Marinetti (1923); (2) Cinque sintesi radiofoniche (1933), (3) Marinetti (voce) with Aldo Giuntini (pianoforte) performing "sintesi musicali futuriste 1931; & (4) Marinetti reciting "La battaglia di Adrianopoli" and "Definizione di Futurismo" (1924). The last is said to be from a disc titled "Marinetti e il Futurismo" (EMI 3C-065 17982/A), if that's of any help.

Are these on the Tellus #21 cassette you mention, which maybe you can otherwise identify for me? I also have no idea whether the Cramps disc ever reappeared as a CD.

Anyway, all best,

Jerome Rothenberg / JERRY

ps. Other interesting things on the disc, including later realizations of Russolo intonarumori.

↑ Index

76. Joseph Lease
Re: <Sigh>
Wed 5 Mar 1997

I think Tom Mandel is right that the Dorn thread is creepy: I mean creepy not only in every sense in which I think he means it (I agree with him) but also creepy in the sense of gothic: the return of the uncanny: the fear of politics is the fear of people who have been killed by someone

↑ Index

77. dbkk
Re: email address for Steve McCaffery
Wed 5 Mar 1997

> Is Steve McCaffery on the list? Or can someone back channel me with a current email address for him. I just sent a message to what I thought was correct and it was bounced.

Yes, Steve M's email seems to change with the weather. Here's his latest:

Steve McCaffery <[redacted]>

Good luck.

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

78. dbkk
Re: email address for Steve McCaffery
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Sorry, I really didn't mean to post Steve M's email to the whole world. The poetics list is the whole world, isn't it?

Dodie

↑ Index

79. Steven Clay
mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

I'm co-curating an exhibition of books and magazines produced (mostly) via the mimeograph machine. I've compiled a list of a hundred or so as a beginning but would be very curious to hear some suggestions from those on the poetics list. Anyone wish to offer their "top ten list" of favorite mags from the Mimeo Revolution?

I'm also interested in acquiring collections/libraries/archives of such material for the exhibit. Please back channel any offers.
Thanks & best to all,
Steve Clay
Granary Books
NYC

↑ Index

80. Joseph Lease
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

I vote for Bill Brown's not bored

On Wed, 5 Mar 1997, Steven Clay wrote:

> I'm co-curating an exhibition of books and magazines produced (mostly) via the mimeograph machine. I've compiled a list of a hundred or so as a beginning but would be very curious to hear some suggestions from those on the poetics list. Anyone wish to offer their "top ten list" of favorite mags from the Mimeo Revolution?
>
> I'm also interested in acquiring collections/libraries/archives of such material for the exhibit. Please back channel any offers.
> Thanks & best to all,
> Steve Clay
> Granary Books

> NYC

↑ Index

81. Joseph Lease
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

---

also if I may vote for one in which I appeared the National Poetry Magazine of the Lower East Side

On Wed, 5 Mar 1997, Steven Clay wrote:

> I'm co-curating an exhibition of books and magazines produced (mostly) via the mimeograph machine. I've compiled a list of a hundred or so as a beginning but would be very curious to hear some suggestions from those on the poetics list. Anyone wish to offer their "top ten list" of favorite mags from the Mimeo Revolution?
>
> I'm also interested in acquiring collections/libraries/archives of such material for the exhibit. Please back channel any offers.
> Thanks & best to all,
> Steve Clay
> Granary Books
> NYC

↑ Index

82. Joseph Lease
Re: Welcome Message
Wed 5 Mar 1997

---

and also of course Mirage Periodical which Kevin and Dodie make consistently brilliant

↑ Index

83. Jay Schwartz
Re: Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
Wed 5 Mar 1997

A great deal of beautiful and interesting xerography is happening today, but mostly right outside the world of poetry- with "zines". As a Kinko's employee I had the blessed oppportunity to produce a poetry magazine with multiple color copies and multiple textured/ colored papers, all on the sly on the graveyard shift. I would agree that offset is generally a domesticating process, but have to say that photocopiers lend themselves to spontaneous, diverse products.

The magazine I helped create is Proliferation, 1 - 3. (Available through SPD.)

Jay Schwartz

↑ Index

84. Jordan Davis
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

C
Mag City
Adventures in Poetry
The Harris Review
Dodgems
C Comics
The World
Gandhabba

and then later...

Object
The Impercipient
Explosive Magazine
Antenym
Stud Duck
Torque
Tads
Mirage (Periodical)
Yale Younger Poets
Situation
Tamarind ...

_____

Dear Fiona,

Steve Evans' lecture "The Dynamics of Literary Change" is available from The Impercipient Lecture Series, 61 E Manning St, Providence RI 02906-4008. I misspoke when I said that it proposes a structure of literary change. What would be more accurate is to say that the talk digresses around the subjects of the autonomy of the work of art, the beginnings and ends of literary eras, and the writings of Hegel, Musil, Bourdieu, Adorno and others.

Jordan

↑ Index

85. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

The World

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

86. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Sorry - also, Bernadette's and Vito's 0 to 9, out around the same time, truly amazing for the most part, prescient in its nervousness. Acconci's poetic/ry hasn't been reprinted as far as I know and remains a unique body of work -

Alan

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

87. Pam Brown
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Hello everyone -
In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's) "P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?
But "Magic Sam", with its sometimes four/five colour silk-screened comics as well as the most interesting poetry, prose & interviews of the mid to late seventies/early eighties, gets my vote as the best of the Australian mimeo (we called it "roneo")magazines.
Cheerio
Pam Brown

At 12:37 PM 5/3/97 -0500, you wrote:
>I'm co-curating an exhibition of books and magazines produced (mostly) via >the mimeograph machine. I've compiled a list of a hundred or so as a >beginning but would be very curious to hear some suggestions from those on >the poetics list. Anyone wish to offer their "top ten list" of favorite >mags from the Mimeo Revolution?
>
>I'm also interested in acquiring collections/libraries/archives of such >material for the exhibit. Please back channel any offers.
>Thanks & best to all,
>Steve Clay
>Granary Books
>NYC
>
>

↑ Index

88. Schuchat Simon
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Chicago, edited by Alice Notley

↑ Index

89. Schuchat Simon
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

United Artists, edited by Bernadette Mayer and Lewis Warsh

↑ Index

90. Mark Roberts
Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Wed 5 Mar 1997

> Dear Mark P,
>
> What IS outsourcing?
>
> Fiona

That is when the government tells poets that they can no longer afford to fund culture and in order to save 'costs' poets should no longer write their own work - instead they should 'outsource' the writing of poetry to the private sector who, after all, can produce poetry much quicker and for much less unit cost.

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

91. Pam Brown
mimeo/roneo
Wed 5 Mar 1997

And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther"
Les Wicks was the editor of "Meuse" (which I think began as a Poets Union publication). Les now edits Transit Poetry - which is the poetry posters on buses project in Sydney & Newcastle.
And Mark can speak for himself I guess
Best Wishes,
Pam

Hello everyone -
In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's) "P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?
But "Magic Sam", with its sometimes four/five colour silk-screened comics as well as the most interesting poetry, prose & interviews of the mid to late seventies/early eighties, gets my vote as the best of the Australian mimeo (we called it "roneo")magazines.
Cheerio
Pam Brown

↑ Index

92. Pritchett,Pat
Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Wed 5 Mar 1997

"The unit cost per stanza is a concern to this panel."

- Ron Silliman

From: Mark Roberts
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Date: Wednesday, March 05, 1997 5:24PM

> Dear Mark P,
>
> What IS outsourcing?
>
> Fiona

That is when the government tells poets that they can no longer afford to fund culture and in order to save 'costs' poets should no longer write their own work - instead they should 'outsource' the writing of poetry to the private sector who, after all, can produce poetry much quicker and for much less unit cost.

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

93. Mark Roberts
Re: mimeo/roneo
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Yes P76 used MAGIC SAM as inspiration. (i've still got two gestner machines in the garage). I can also remember a few others from the Poetys Union book box I used to cart around with me selling small press stuff at readings, conferences, parties, funerals etc....Pam can you remember a magazine called CHOOK CHOOK CHOOK (i think) which had a chicken feather stuck to the cover, or THE GREAT AUSTRALIAN WHITING (as in fish).

As an aside P76 is about to reborn as an web magazine. The 6th issue will be uploaded to the AWOL (http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/ site sometime in the next fortnight) There will be a photocopies print out available on request (no gestner PLEASE!). The 7th issue will be edited by andrew burke in perth. (the idea being that each issue will be edited by someone different in a different area of Australia (or even os?). Anyway more details when the issue is uploaded.

btw I think the 3rd issue of P76 was the best (that's the one whose cover appeared in the introduction to Pio's Penguin anthology OFF THE RECORD). Magic Sam also produced a series of roneoed books (one of which was a brillant little book by Pam Brown). I just remembered Magic Sam produced a roneoed Mental as Anything single...!!!!

>And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with >Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and >has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther" >Les Wicks was the editor of "Meuse" (which I think began as a Poets Union >publication). Les now edits Transit Poetry - which is the poetry posters on >buses project in Sydney & Newcastle.
>And Mark can speak for himself I guess
>Best Wishes,
>Pam
>
>Hello everyone -
>In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic >Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the
>not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's)
>"P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?
>But "Magic Sam", with its sometimes four/five colour silk-screened comics as >well as the most interesting poetry, prose & interviews of the mid to late >seventies/early eighties, gets my vote as the best of the Australian mimeo
>(we called it "roneo")magazines.
>Cheerio
>Pam Brown
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710

Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

94. Mark Roberts
Re: mimeo/roneo
Wed 5 Mar 1997

I just remebered that the last two or three issues of Kris Hemnensly's H/EAR where roneoded with gift wrapping (I think) used as a cover. It was basically a collection of letters/comments form and to Kris from writers around the world.

>Yes P76 used MAGIC SAM as inspiration. (i've still got two gestner machines >in the garage). I can also remember a few others from the Poetys Union book >box I used to cart around with me selling small press stuff at readings, >conferences, parties, funerals etc....Pam can you remember a magazine called >CHOOK CHOOK CHOOK (i think) which had a chicken feather stuck to the cover, >or THE GREAT AUSTRALIAN WHITING (as in fish).
>
>As an aside P76 is about to reborn as an web magazine. The 6th issue will be >uploaded to the AWOL (http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/ site sometime in the >next fortnight) There will be a photocopies print out available on request >(no gestner PLEASE!). The 7th issue will be edited by andrew burke in perth.
>(the idea being that each issue will be edited by someone different in a >different area of Australia (or even os?). Anyway more details when the >issue is uploaded.
>
>
>btw I think the 3rd issue of P76 was the best (that's the one whose cover >appeared in the introduction to Pio's Penguin anthology OFF THE RECORD).
>Magic Sam also produced a series of roneoed books (one of which was a >brillant little book by Pam Brown). I just remembered Magic Sam produced a >roneoed Mental as Anything single...!!!!
>
>
>
>
>
>
>>And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with >>Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and >>has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther"

>>Les Wicks was the editor of "Meuse" (which I think began as a Poets Union >>publication). Les now edits Transit Poetry - which is the poetry posters on >>buses project in Sydney & Newcastle.
>>And Mark can speak for himself I guess
>>Best Wishes,
>>Pam
>>
>>Hello everyone -
>>In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic >>Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the
>>not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's)
>>"P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?
>>But "Magic Sam", with its sometimes four/five colour silk-screened comics as >>well as the most interesting poetry, prose & interviews of the mid to late >>seventies/early eighties, gets my vote as the best of the Australian mimeo
>>(we called it "roneo")magazines.
>>Cheerio
>>Pam Brown
>>
>>
>Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
>SIS Team
>Building G05 Maze Crescent
>University of Sydney
>Phone 61 2 93517710
>Mobile 015063970
>Fax 61 2 93517711
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

95. manny savopoulos
Fw: student takeover at UMass-Amherst (fwd)
Wed 5 Mar 1997

> From: Jennifer Mitchell <[redacted]>
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: student takeover at UMass-Amherst (fwd)
> Date: Wednesday, March 05, 1997 4:18 PM
>
> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> Date: Wed, 05 Mar 1997 09:47:54 -0500
> From: Ira Shor <[redacted]>
> Reply-To: Working Class Student Study Group <[redacted]>
> To: Multiple recipients of list WCS-L <[redacted]>
> Subject: student takeover at UMass-Amherst
>
> Hello--Thought some folks might like to know about this...Ira
>
>
> >>Date: Tue, 4 Mar 97 11:55:15 CST
> >>From: VICTORY OF THE PEOPLE <[redacted]>
> >>To: Multiple recipients of list <[redacted]>
> >>Subject: student takeover at UMass-Amherst!
> >>
> >>On Monday, March 3, 1997, a group of students took over the controllers office > >>at the University of Massachusetts. Students are demanding, among other > >>things, an increase in financial aid, increase in recruitment and retention of > >>students of color to 20%, scholerships for poor and working students.
> >>deiversification of staff, faculty, and administration, elimination of holds > >>on preregistration and late fees and a flexible child care center. Over 150 > >>students stayed overnight in the building, while hundreds more supported us > >>inside. We have recieved the unanimous support of the SGA at Amherst College, > >>as well as financial support from all four private schools in the Pioneer > >>Valley. The administration is giving us a lot of rhetoric, but we are > >>committed to staying in the building until all of our demands are met.

> >>If you are interested in supporting this important action, forward this > >>message to anyone and everyone.
> >>In addition, you can write/wmail/phone Chancellor Scott expressing support for > >>these demands.
> >> David Scott
> >> 374 Whitmore
> >> Umass-Amherst, MA 01003
> >> [redacted]; [redacted]
> >>Thanks for your support!!
> >>
> >
> >
> >
> >

↑ Index

96. Mark Roberts

Re: roneo-offset

Wed 5 Mar 1997

Pam maybe you and I should get a grant to write a history of the period!!
(whats the weather like on the other side of campus?) :)

Mark

>Mark you wrote
>"btw I think the 3rd issue of P76 was the best (that's the one whose cover >appeared in the introduction to Pio's Penguin anthology OFF THE RECORD).
>Magic Sam also produced a series of roneoed books (one of which was a >brillant little book by Pam Brown). "
>
>Just to get pedantic - that book was called "Small Blue View" and was offset >printed at the Experimental Art Foundation in 1982 - Ken Bolton moved on to >offset printing that year with that series - me, Laurie Duggan, Denis >Gallagher & Sal Brereton....
>
>Cheerio from Miss Brown (History Inspector)
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team

Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

97. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)
Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo
Wed 5 Mar 1997

---

another on e of my favorite things about old mimeo forms was that the stencils were called "Spirit Masters."

At 7:04 PM 3/6/97, Hank Lazer wrote:
>Yes, Kenny G, that smell, wonderfully mnemonic. Mere mention of it, >and I can begin to see Mr Tollefson's sixth grade classroom, and >smell the hamsters in the back of the room.... Thanks.
>
>Hank Lazer

↑ Index

98. Laura Moriarty
Re: mimeo/roneo
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Norma Cole has just reminded my that the first issue of Acts was mimeo-graphed - edited by David Levi Strauss and Benjamin Hollander

I think the first issue of Vanishing Cab, edited by Jerry Estrin, may have been mimeographed - Done by PG&E but unknown to them - But it may have been xeroxed -

↑ Index

99. George Bowering
Re: Welcome Message
Wed 5 Mar 1997

> and also of course Mirage Periodical which Kevin and Dodie make consistently brilliant

Also _Tish_
The Floating Bear Motion
Sum

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

100. George Bowering
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Also _I's_

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

101. George Bowering
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Havent seen a mention of _Fuck You: a magazine of the arts_ probably too obvious.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

102. George Bowering
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Not to mention some of the British ones:

Move
Tlaloc

and that one, what was its name, from Preston?

George Bowering.

,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

103. Stephen Vincent
Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Re J S's interesting question:
"Some of the magazines listed here are photocopied- does the original post specify mimeographed?

I would be very interested in hearing from magazine producers about the difference in production choices that mimeograph vs. photocopy entails. Not just technical, but the aesthetic choices as well."

if my memory serves me well (??), the change from mimeo to photocopy(xerox and/or off-set) occured in about 1971 or 72. Mimeo went out and Xerox Copy shops and cheap off-set places began to appear. The issues of aesthetics for each technology was not a question of enjoying one technology more than the other. That was not the choice. With the exception of a small overlap period, photocopy machines and photo off-set presses became the dominant technology. . In terms of aesthetics -- in at least a visual sense -- students primarily via art schools played most interestinly the possibilites first with memory and then with zerox. Even though I think some of that work is wonderful, and it's great Granary Books going to bring the mimeo format back into public exposure, I don't think much of the art centered work ever caught much art collector attention. In terms of literary output mimeo production was attractive because it was both inexpensive and small. A machine could fit easily on to a table in an appartment. In the context of sixties radical politics, it was an ideal device for clandestine productions (broadsides, books etc.) Though I knew some people with off-set equipment in their basement or garage, no one could afford a xerox machine. For small presses and magazines with small runs, small budgets, no government grants etc. the mimeo was a terrifically affordable way to go. The intimate, hand made, slightly ink blurred, soft paper feel of many mimeo mags and books fit into an aesthetic of back to the land, back to the streets, back to the people etc. - a definite sense of rejecting the corporate. Publishers took a certain pride in coping multiple color mimeo papers from corporate offices and filling them with poetry rather memos, stats, etc. The use of art in the literary mags varied in qualtity - multiple colored inks wd jazz them. The multi color Gestener - which was hot through out the seventies was great for cheap 8 1/2 by 11" posters. (The Intersection Poetry Series in San Francisco was often wonderful. John Brandi in New Mexico (Tooth of the Nail?? Press) did what seemed then rather extraordinary mixes of color images, text, multiple color papers etc. Instead of making use of either xerox or the mimeo as an aesthetic medium for images, I suspect most of the time, to use computer language, images were "imported" from an established artist. In terms of text the 8 1/2 by 11" format made a broad expanse of space for text - either for variations on two column format, or filling it to the max. I don't think it had a major effect on the use of the space. In "reality" since in the days of type writer, 8 1/2 by 11" was the "real time" format so there was the possibility of a genuine correspondence/ similary between the artifact of the poet's manuscript and the mag as an artifact!

Off-set production made for more professional looking work, made for larger press runs, access to commerical distribution, etc. Off set most often required a relationship with a professional printer and a set of more costly variables. The costs and circumstances limited most aesthetic experimentation on account of the costs and other obligations of the printers. Interesting the further away the process got from the domestic mimeo, the government, via the NEA, became more involved, funding, for example, the West Coast Print Center - this interface with the Government and its effect on poetry production is a whole other story. Most problematic was that the cost of off-set required larger editions (500 +) - the poetry market was soon flooded with more and more titles than any store could support - and that was part of the ambition. Mimeo had the advantage of limited runs and providing a more accurate guage of the market.

This memory is totally off the top of my head - not that I should worry to ask, but I would look forward to hearing other people's takes.

West Coast sixties mimeo mags:

Wild Dog
Or (David Sandburg)
Magdalene Syndrome Gazette

(Ron Silliman is probably a good memory source here - some of us were there and do remember).

Detroit - John Sinclair's "Work" and "Change" were big.

To me it seems that the computer technology (net, web sites. zines) has redomesticated the whole production process that is comparable to mimeo times. But that brings up current issues which is probably something for later.

Cheers,
Stephen Vincent

↑ Index

104. Mark Roberts
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Just remembered rae desmond jones - your friendly fascist was gestnered
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

105. Pam Brown
roneo-offset
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Mark you wrote "btw I think the 3rd issue of P76 was the best (that's the one whose cover appeared in the introduction to Pio's Penguin anthology OFF THE RECORD). Magic Sam also produced a series of roneoed books (one of which was a brillant little book by Pam Brown). "

Just to get pedantic - that book was called "Small Blue View" and was offset printed at the Experimental Art Foundation in 1982 - Ken Bolton moved on to offset printing that year with that series - me, Laurie Duggan, Denis Gallagher & Sal Brereton....

Cheerio from Miss Brown (History Inspector)

↑ Index

106. Mark Roberts
Re: Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
Wed 5 Mar 1997

It was much more of a party printing a magazine off a gestner machine in your bedroom..taking lots of drugs and staying up for days with the click/thump of the machine and loud music. I also found you could do much better graphics on a gestner. By cutting a stencil and printing one copy at a time you could bet a great lino cut look - we did an ad in P76 no1 for ON THE BEACH magazine and ended up printing another fifty copies of the add on textured paper for the artist. We would occassionally do two or more colours on a page. My second gestner machine was wonderful. It had a light switch which seemed to make it glow inside and it had all sorts of arms which swang out, folded down and tucked in. I bought it for $10 off a hippie in Balmain in 1984 who had just bought himself a computer (back in those days I don't think I'd even seen a pc!)

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

107. Rachel Loden
db's mimeo
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Haven't seen any mention of David Bromige's mimeo _Open Reading_, from the seventies. I still have all my copies of No. 3, with Kathy Fraser, Michael Davidson, Charles Simic, David Henderson, Bobbie Louise Hawkins, Thom Gunn, db, etc. (even me). Everything in it he had heard aloud first.

Rachel L.

↑ Index

108. Toni Simon
Re: mimeo revolution
Wed 5 Mar 1997

432 Review edited by Simon Schuchat

-Nick Piombino

On Thu, 6 Mar 1997, Schuchat Simon wrote:

> Chicago, edited by Alice Notley

↑ Index

109. Herb Levy
Oops
Wed 5 Mar 1997

Kenny,

I found the package of 2 CDs & press release that I thought I'd sent to you when I got back today. It's in the mail now & I think you'll have it by Saturday, Monday at the latest. Sorry.

Here's a few URLs that may be of interest to your visual poetry self:

<http://www.ims.csuohio.edu/wreyeting/index.html>

<http://www.ims.csuohio.edu/selby/casthome.html>

<http://www.net22.com/qazingulaza/>

though I'm sure you've seen them all.

Hope to see you at Roulette next Saturday.

Bests,

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

110. Tenney Nathanson
Michael Davidson?
Wed 5 Mar 1997

---

does anyone have a current email address for Michael Davidson (who is not currently subscribed to the list?)? Address I have doesn't work.

please backchannel.

thanks

tenney

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]

http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

↑ Index

111. Tenney Nathanson
pogo
Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

the whole strip (intro to Positively Pogo):

Pogo and Porkypine on bank, fishing frame one, Pogo (I think):

    I read a book once what said you can do anything you want if you puts your mind to it.

frame two, Porkypine:
    I isn't read the book, but I is dreamed the dream

frame three, nothing: they just sitting there fishing and thinking frame four, Porkypine:

    I allus liked the part about the cowboys.

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]

http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

↑ Index

112. Stephen Vincent
Re: mimeo revolution
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Open Space edited by Harold Dull - San Francisco, early sixties. (tres rare, brilliant - Spicer, Kyger etc etc) primarily - as I recall - publically given away free atop a table in the basement of City Lights

Beatitude - San Francisco - various hands, en perpetua

↑ Index

113. robert drake
Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo
Thu 6 Mar 1997

> another on e of my favorite things about old mimeo forms was that the stencils were called "Spirit Masters."
>
> At 7:04 PM 3/6/97, Hank Lazer wrote:
> Yes, Kenny G, that smell, wonderfully mnemonic. Mere mention of it, and I can begin to see Mr Tollefson's sixth grade classroom, and smell the hamsters in the back of the room.... Thanks.
>
> Hank Lazer

the purple & odiferous printing process that spurs such fond memory is actually th product of "spirit duplicators"--ink was transfered from a sheet (similar to carbon paper) to a master; solvent frm the machine then transfered that ink to the paper... occasionally but not much used fr publications, & most ov those will have vanished, as th ink fades, especially in contact w/ air... a different beast frm mimeos, which pushed ink thru a wax-impregnated stencil...

lbd

↑ Index

114. Ron Silliman
Typing on green stencils
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Many of my first publications, such as in Richard Krech's Community Libertarian ('65), Will Inman's Kauri ('66--where my work first came into contact of the likes of Clayton Eshleman, David Antin, et al), John Sinclair's mags, Robert Parker's mag (name now escapes me) were all mimeographed. Others, such as Clifford Burke's Hollow Orange, John Fowler's Grist, d alexander's Odda Tala seemed to have much better technology and were I believe offset. By comparison, something like Caterpillar, with perfect binding and the ability to reproduce photos on the cover, was a real jolt toward "official" culture in that Clayton could get it into bookstores that would never have handled a stapled mag.

Anselm Hollo (Hi, Anselm) has spoken of a period in the 1950s when, in London, he felt it was possible to obtain almost any small English language press publication, partly because the distribution was so much better but also partly because there were, relatively, so few of them (remember, in the 1950s, there were less than a tenth of the books published that there are now, so that how stores handled stock was very different). By the mid-1960s, when I first was paying attention, it was already pretty different. For example, Gino Clay Skies was rumored to have many copies of Heads of the Town Up to the Aether, but it was years before I was able to find a copy. By 1966, the rare book collection at SF State (thanks to Robin Blaser) was already a profound resource, with its collection of Origin etc.

The first issues of Tottel's, my own mag, were photocopied (editions of under 100), then photo-offset in very small runs--the final issue was mimeo'd on a giant Gestetner in the basement of Hospitality House in the SF Tenderloin. I'd used mimeo before on non-profit mags I'd worked on, but this was my only foray into typing poetry onto those stencils. I recall that the machine was very quirky (I had to call in the guy who normally ran it, a burly fellow named Peter McCarthy, who hammered a few wayward pieces of metal back into place). It ate a couple of masters, so I had to retype them in order to get the run of 150. With fulltime jobs that paid hardly any money (I lived on around $125 a month in 1972), I was able to put out the mag. One of the requirements in those days was finding a typewriter that had the ability to "cut" a clean stencil.

I do think that HTML and web technology has some of the very same potential that generated the "mimeo revolution" back then, but with some important differences. The most important one is that the world of writing itself is far more dispersed and decentralized than it was 30-40 years ago (generally a good thing, but not unabashedly so). The other is that these pieces of equipment are hardly free, even if they are becoming common. I could never have afforded the upfront costs of owning a PC when I was in my 20s and didn't actually buy one until I was 41. Yet the sort of effort that yields something like Luigi-Bob's scratchpad for the wr-eye-ting list is virtually exactly the same impulse and much of the same result as a little mag effort of those olden days, and with few of the same limitations vis a vis distribution or reliance entirely on the local.

Ron Silliman

> Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 20:08:43 -0500
> From: Stephen Vincent <[redacted]>
> Subject: Mimeo/Off-set Revolute

Re J S's interesting question:
"Some of the magazines listed here are photocopied- does the original post specify mimeographed?

I would be very interested in hearing from magazine producers about the difference in production choices that mimeograph vs. photocopy entails. Not just technical, but the aesthetic choices as well."

if my memory serves me well (??), the change from mimeo to photocopy(xerox and/or off-set) occured in about 1971 or 72.
Mimeo went out and Xerox Copy shops and cheap off-set places began to appear. The issues of aesthetics for each technology was not a question of enjoying one technology more than the other. That was not the choice. With the exception of a small overlap period, photocopy machines and photo off-set presses became the dominant technology. . In terms of aesthetics -- in at least a visual sense -- students primarily via art schools played most interestinly the possibilites first with memory and then with zerox. Even though I think some of that work is wonderful, and it's great Granary Books going to bring the mimeo format back into public exposure, I don't think much of the art centered work ever caught much art collector attention.
In terms of literary output mimeo production was attractive because it was both inexpensive and small. A machine could fit easily on to a table in an appartment. In the context of sixties radical politics, it was an ideal device for clandestine productions (broadsides, books etc.) Though I knew some people with off-set equipment in their basement or garage, no one could afford a xerox machine. For small presses and magazines with small runs, small budgets, no government grants etc. the mimeo was a terrifically affordable way to go. The intimate, hand made, slightly ink blurred, soft paper feel of many mimeo mags and books fit into an aesthetic of back to the land, back to the streets, back to the people etc. - a definite sense of rejecting the corporate. Publishers took a certain pride in coping multiple color mimeo papers from corporate offices and filling them with poetry rather memos, stats, etc. The use of art in the literary mags varied in qualtity - multiple colored inks wd jazz them. The multi color Gestener - which was hot through out the seventies was great for cheap 8 1/2 by 11" posters. (The Intersection Poetry Series in San Francisco was often wonderful. John Brandi in New Mexico (Tooth of the Nail?? Press) did what seemed then rather extraordinary mixes of color images, text, multiple color papers etc. Instead of making use of either xerox or the mimeo as an aesthetic medium for images, I suspect most of the time, to use computer language, images were "imported" from an established artist. In terms of text the 8 1/2 by 11" format made a broad expanse of space for text - either for variations on two column format, or filling it to the max. I don't think it had a major effect on the use of the space. In "reality" since in the days of type writer, 8 1/2 by 11" was the "real time" format so there was the possibility of a genuine correspondence/ similary between the artifact of the poet's manuscript and the mag as an artifact!

> Off-set production made for more professional looking work, made for larger press runs, access to commerical distribution, etc. Off set most often required a relationship with a professional printer and a set of more costly variables. The costs and circumstances limited most aesthetic experimentation on account of the costs and other obligations of the printers. Interesting the further away the process got from the domestic mimeo, the government, via the NEA, became more involved, funding, for example, the West Coast Print Center - this interface with the Government and its effect on poetry production is a whole other story. Most problematic was that the cost of off-set required larger editions (500 +) - the poetry market was soon flooded with more and more titles than any store could support - and that was part of the ambition. Mimeo had the advantage of limited runs and providing a more accurate guage of the market.
>
> This memory is totally off the top of my head - not that I should worry to ask, but I would look forward to hearing other people's takes.
>
> West Coast sixties mimeo mags:
>
> Wild Dog
> Or (David Sandburg)
> Magdalene Syndrome Gazette
>
> (Ron Silliman is probably a good memory source here - some of us were there and do remember).
>
> Detroit - John Sinclair's "Work" and "Change" were big.
>
> To me it seems that the computer technology (net, web sites. zines) has redomesticated the whole production process that is comparable to mimeo times. But that brings up current issues which is probably something for later.
>
> Cheers,
> Stephen Vincent
>
> ---

↑ Index

115. kennyg
The Great Smell of Mimeo
Thu 6 Mar 1997

As a child in the late 1960s, I loved the Public School look and SMELL of purple mimeo, which smelled like cheap vanilla ice cream. Mmmmmmmm. I miss it.

Kenny G.

↑ Index

116. Hank Lazer
Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Yes, Kenny G, that smell, wonderfully mnemonic. Mere mention of it, and I can begin to see Mr Tollefson's sixth grade classroom, and smell the hamsters in the back of the room.... Thanks.

Hank Lazer

↑ Index

117. robert drake
Re: Mimeo/Off-set Revolute
Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

cleveland was home to a number of mimeographd magazines, starting praps w/ d.a. levy's _the marrahwannah quarterly_ and his 7 flowers press; also t.l. kryss's Black Rabbit Press, Robert Head's Neo Ex Press, and a slew of fugitive/ alias ventures (ground zero, falling down press, mostly broken scabs press). i had an mimeod "underground newspaper" in jr. high, as much concerned w/ dress codes as the war, but thru that ran into d.a.'s work & it was one ov those life-changing experiences. levy's use of th medium, w/ all it's limitations, fr visual effect seemed only "sloppy" to me at first, but...

luigi

↑ Index

118. Tom Mandel
Magic Sam, et. al.
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Re:

"And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther""

I assume (nearly) everyone on this list knows the names and music of Magic Sam, Otis Rush, Little Esther. Obvious point if not: these mags were named after blues guitarists/singers MS and OR and blues singer LE.

Tom

Tom Mandel
****

Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

119. Tom Mandel
Evans' lecture
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Re:

"Steve Evans' lecture "The Dynamics of Literary Change" is available from The Impercipient Lecture Series, 61 E Manning St, Providence RI 02906-4008."

Not on line somewhere (I must be getting spoiled).

Tom

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]
Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

120. Steven Clay
mimeo revolution
Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

thanks to all for your memories, comments & lists. lewis warsh, certainly one of the masters of mimeo, made the comment, while looking at granary publications recently, 'this is so great, i've always wanted to do this, i've always wanted to make books' - i felt like shaking him: "lewis! you have, you've been making wonderful books for 30 years!" there is something about the 'non-design' design of mimeo publications that is fascinating- and yet they are totally designed even resplendent in their expression of design, literature, art and the ever present "bookness". i'm remined of a comment mikeal made some weeks ago suggesting that the magazine l=a=n=g=u=a=g=e somehow had the ambition to present 'the text and just the text' (like sargent friday 'just the facts ma'am') - but this seems impossible! l=a=n=g=u=a=g=e was every bit as consciously designed & produced as, say, 'wired' magazine. it's 'materiality' as with mimeo, contributes forcefully to its total message. one of the interesting things about mimeo is that, although it required certain skills, one didn't really need a grasp of the history of typography, printing and bookmaking. whereas, for example, printer/publishers using letterpress (also relatively cheap and widely available at the same time as mimeo) tended to be much more conscious of design etc. of the whole heritage of 'fine bookmaking'. mimeo, as a technology, was nearly invisible, yet now, as we look back, those books and magazines are totally striking in every way, not the least of which is their 'design'. it would be nearly impossible to produce books of such purity today, at least in the u.s. steve granary books

↑ Index

121. Christina Fairbank Chirot

Re: mimeo/roneo

Thu 6 Mar 1997

Mimeo journals with far reaching effects--by the Lettrists and the Situationists--early Fifties to Seventies-- erupted on to walls in '68

a bas l'abattoir

l'imagination au pouvoir

de l'envers on verra . . .

↑ Index

122. Jordan Davis

Poetry City Mnemonics

Thu 6 Mar 1997

It's Thursday, and that means Poetry City is on the radio!

At 11:45 this morning, if you're in New York or the environs, set your FM radio to 91.5 (not 91.9 as previously reported) and you'll hear the list's own Dan Bouchard reading among other poems "A Pavement Ontology", which is about Pennsylvania and Rhode Island, not Malkmus and Ashbery.

Then, tomorrow at 7 p.m., come by Poetry City (in the luxurious offices of Teachers & Writers Collaborative, 5 Union Sq W, NYC) to hear international superstars Quentin Crisp and Lee Ann Brown read their work. You won't be sorry you did!

With fond regards,
Jordan

↑ Index

123. Sylvester Pollet
Re: mimeo revolution
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Does anyone remember The San Francisco Zoo-Keeper's Voice? Early-mid '60s, Alec Weiss put it out (& if anyone has his address please send it). Ran a poem of mine in 65. then there was Mother, from Pennsylvania--can't remember Pittsburgh or Philadelphia. Prob. have a copy somewhere, because that editor published me too. Anyone done a study on how we remember those who said yes?

↑ Index

124. dbkk
Re: mimeo revolution
Thu 6 Mar 1997

At 12:20 AM -0500 3/6/97, Stephen Vincent wrote:
>Open Space edited by Harold Dull - San Francisco, early sixties. (tres rare, >brilliant - Spicer, Kyger etc etc) primarily - as I recall - publically given >away free atop a table in the basement of City Lights

"Open Space" was actually edited by the poet Stan Persky, under Spicer's direction. Tho' it looked like a mimeo magazine it was actually offset. "Open Space" was planned to run for one year, from Jan-Dec 1964, with an issue appearing every month; in the event 15 issues appeared, extra issues to celebrate Valentines Day, Baseball Season, and one extremely limited issue, #9, was printed to thwart collectors who might sell a complete run to universities, libraries, etc.

Spicer's earlier magazine "J" was indeed a mimeo magazine. "J" appeared for five issues during the second half of 1959. Jack Spicer and Fran Herndon solicited the writing and art work for "J," and the artists who contributed (Herndon herself, Jess Collins, Russell FitzGerald) drew their pictures directly onto the stencil. Jess' comic strip panels, so intricate, so flowing in line, and so funny, were executed without a single false line. How did they do it? How did they do these things without a backspace key?

Wonderingly,

Kevin Killian

Wonderingly,

↑ Index

125. Joel Lewis

Re: POETICS Digest - 4 Mar 1997 to 5 Mar 1997

Thu 6 Mar 1997

> Granary Books
> NYC
>
> ----------
> Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 12:57:04 -0500
> From: Joseph Lease <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
> MIME-Version: 1.0
> Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII
>
> I vote for Bill Brown's not bored
>
> On Wed, 5 Mar 1997, Steven Clay wrote:
>
> I'm co-curating an exhibition of books and magazines produced (mostly) via the mimeograph machine. I've compiled a list of a hundred or so as a beginning but would be very curious to hear some suggestions from those on the poetics list. Anyone wish to offer their "top ten list" of favorite mags from the Mimeo Revolution?
>
> I'm also interested in acquiring collections/libraries/archives of such material for the exhibit. Please back channel any offers.
> Thanks & best to all,
> Steve Clay
> Granary Books
> NYC
>
> ----------
> Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 12:57:42 -0500
> From: Joseph Lease <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
> MIME-Version: 1.0
> Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII
>
> also if I may vote for one in which I appeared the National Poetry Magazine of the Lower East Side
>
> On Wed, 5 Mar 1997, Steven Clay wrote:
>
> I'm co-curating an exhibition of books and magazines produced (mostly) via the mimeograph machine. I've compiled a list of a hundred or so as a beginning but would be very curious to hear some suggestions from those on the poetics list. Anyone wish to offer their "top ten list" of favorite

mags from the Mimeo Revolution?

I'm also interested in acquiring collections/libraries/archives of such material for the exhibit. Please back channel any offers.
Thanks & best to all,
Steve Clay
Granary Books
NYC

Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 13:00:44 -0500
From: Joseph Lease <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: Welcome Message
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII

and also of course Mirage Periodical which Kevin and Dodie make consistently brilliant

----
Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 13:39:49 -0500
From: Jordan Davis <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"

C
Mag City
Adventures in Poetry
The Harris Review
Dodgems
C Comics
The World
Gandhabba

and then later...

Object
The Impercipient
Explosive Magazine
Antenym
Stud Duck
Torque
Tads
Mirage (Periodical)
Yale Younger Poets
Situation

Tamarind ...

_____

Dear Fiona,

Steve Evans' lecture "The Dynamics of Literary Change" is available from The Impercipient Lecture Series, 61 E Manning St, Providence RI 02906-4008. I misspoke when I said that it proposes a structure of literary change. What would be more accurate is to say that the talk digresses around the subjects of the autonomy of the work of art, the beginnings and ends of literary eras, and the writings of Hegel, Musil, Bourdieu, Adorno and others.

Jordan

Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 13:51:36 -0500
From: Alan Jen Sondheim <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII

The World

_____
URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted]
CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 13:53:07 -0500
From: Alan Jen Sondheim <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII

Sorry - also, Bernadette's and Vito's 0 to 9, out around the same time, truly amazing for the most part, prescient in its nervousness. Acconci's poetic/ry hasn't been reprinted as far as I know and remains a unique body of work -

Alan

_____
URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted]

CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 13:08:51 +0600
From: KENT JOHNSON <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution

A couple of other mimeo/xerox notables: Mark Nowak's old Furnitures, and Giants Play Well in the Drizzle. Also Andrew Schelling's Jimmy and Lucy's House of K, which I think was reincarnated into something else.

Kent

Date sent:
Wed, 5 Mar 1997 13:39:49 - 0500
Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group
<[redacted]>
From: Jordan Davis <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
To: [redacted]

C
Mag City
Adventures in Poetry
The Harris Review
Dodgems
C Comics
The World
Gandhabba

and then later...

Object
The Impercipient
Explosive Magazine
Antenym
Stud Duck
Torque
Tads
Mirage (Periodical)
Yale Younger Poets
Situation
Tamarind ...

_____

Dear Fiona,

Steve Evans' lecture "The Dynamics of Literary Change" is available from The Impercipient Lecture Series, 61 E Manning St, Providence RI 02906-4008.
I misspoke when I said that it proposes a structure of literary change.
What would be more accurate is to say that the talk digresses around the subjects of the autonomy of the work of art, the beginnings and ends of literary eras, and the writings of Hegel, Musil, Bourdieu, Adorno and others.

Jordan

Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 11:56:37 +0000
From: Jay Schwartz <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: text/plain; charset=us-ascii
Content-Transfer-Encoding: 7bit

Some of the magazines listed here are photocopied- does the original post specify mimeographed?

I would be very interested in hearing from magazine producers about the difference in production choices that mimeograph vs. photocopy entails.
Not just technical, but the aesthetic choices as well.

Thanks,

Jay Shxwartz

Date: Thu, 6 Mar 1997 09:05:35 +1000
From: Pam Brown <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"

Hello everyone -
In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the
not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's)
"P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?
But "Magic Sam", with its sometimes four/five colour silk-screened comics as well as the most interesting poetry, prose & interviews of the mid to late seventies/early eighties, gets my vote as the best of the Australian mimeo
(we called it "roneo")magazines.

Cheerio
Pam Brown

At 12:37 PM 5/3/97 -0500, you wrote:
I'm co-curating an exhibition of books and magazines produced (mostly) via the mimeograph machine. I've compiled a list of a hundred or so as a beginning but would be very curious to hear some suggestions from those on the poetics list. Anyone wish to offer their "top ten list" of favorite mags from the Mimeo Revolution?

I'm also interested in acquiring collections/libraries/archives of such material for the exhibit. Please back channel any offers.
Thanks & best to all,
Steve Clay
Granary Books
NYC

Date: Thu, 6 Mar 1997 09:15:15 +1000
From: Pam Brown <[redacted]>
Subject: mimeo/roneo
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"

And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther"
Les Wicks was the editor of "Meuse" (which I think began as a Poets Union publication). Les now edits Transit Poetry - which is the poetry posters on buses project in Sydney & Newcastle.
And Mark can speak for himself I guess
Best Wishes,
Pam

Hello everyone -
In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's) "P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?
But "Magic Sam", with its sometimes four/five colour silk-screened comics as well as the most interesting poetry, prose & interviews of the mid to late seventies/early eighties, gets my vote as the best of the Australian mimeo (we called it "roneo")magazines.
Cheerio
Pam Brown

Date: Thu, 6 Mar 1997 07:05:56 +0800
From: Schuchat Simon <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII

Chicago, edited by Alice Notley

Date: Thu, 6 Mar 1997 07:07:14 +0800
From: Schuchat Simon <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo revolution
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII

United Artists, edited by Bernadette Mayer and Lewis Warsh

Date: Thu, 6 Mar 1997 10:10:19 +1100
From: Mark Roberts <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"

Dear Mark P,

What IS outsourcing?

Fiona

That is when the government tells poets that they can no longer afford to fund culture and in order to save 'costs' poets should no longer write their own work - instead they should 'outsource' the writing of poetry to the private sector who, after all, can produce poetry much quicker and for much less unit cost.

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

Date: Wed, 5 Mar 1997 17:29:00 -0600
From: "Pritchett,Pat @Silverplume" <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN

"The unit cost per stanza is a concern to this panel."

- Ron Silliman

From: Mark Roberts
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: e-signoffs / tradition & innovation
Date: Wednesday, March 05, 1997 5:24PM

Dear Mark P,

What IS outsourcing?

Fiona

That is when the government tells poets that they can no longer afford to fund culture and in order to save 'costs' poets should no longer write their own work - instead they should 'outsource' the writing of poetry to the private sector who, after all, can produce poetry much quicker and for much less unit cost.

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

Date: Thu, 6 Mar 1997 10:37:33 +1100
From: Mark Roberts <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo/roneo
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"

Yes P76 used MAGIC SAM as inspiration. (i've still got two gestner machines in the garage). I can also remember a few others from the Poetys Union book box I used to cart around with me selling small press stuff at readings, conferences, parties, funerals etc....Pam can you remember a magazine called CHOOK CHOOK CHOOK (i think) which had a chicken feather stuck to the cover, or THE GREAT AUSTRALIAN WHITING (as in fish).

As an aside P76 is about to reborn as an web magazine. The 6th issue will be uploaded to the AWOL (http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/ site sometime in the next fortnight) There will be a photocopies print out available on request (no gestner PLEASE!). The 7th issue will be edited by andrew burke in perth. (the idea being that each issue will be edited by someone different in a different area of Australia (or even os?). Anyway more details when the issue is uploaded.

btw I think the 3rd issue of P76 was the best (that's the one whose cover appeared in the introduction to Pio's Penguin anthology OFF THE RECORD). Magic Sam also produced a series of roneoed books (one of which was a brillant little book by Pam Brown). I just remembered Magic Sam produced a roneoed Mental as Anything single...!!!!

And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther"
Les Wicks was the editor of "Meuse" (which I think began as a Poets Union publication). Les now edits Transit Poetry - which is the poetry posters on buses project in Sydney & Newcastle.
And Mark can speak for himself I guess
Best Wishes,
Pam

Hello everyone -
In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's) "P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?
But "Magic Sam", with its sometimes four/five colour silk-screened comics as well as the most interesting poetry, prose & interviews of the mid to late seventies/early eighties, gets my vote as the best of the Australian mimeo (we called it "roneo")magazines.
Cheerio

Pam Brown

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

Date: Thu, 6 Mar 1997 10:53:15 +1100
From: Mark Roberts <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: mimeo/roneo
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"

I just remebered that the last two or three issues of Kris Hemnensly's H/EAR where roneoded with gift wrapping (I think) used as a cover. It was basically a collection of letters/comments form and to Kris from writers around the world.

Yes P76 used MAGIC SAM as inspiration. (i've still got two gestner machines in the garage). I can also remember a few others from the Poetys Union book box I used to cart around with me selling small press stuff at readings, conferences, parties, funerals etc....Pam can you remember a magazine called CHOOK CHOOK CHOOK (i think) which had a chicken feather stuck to the cover, or THE GREAT AUSTRALIAN WHITING (as in fish).

As an aside P76 is about to reborn as an web magazine. The 6th issue will be uploaded to the AWOL (http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/ site sometime in the next fortnight) There will be a photocopies print out available on request (no gestner PLEASE!). The 7th issue will be edited by andrew burke in perth. (the idea being that each issue will be edited by someone different in a different area of Australia (or even os?). Anyway more details when the issue is uploaded.

btw I think the 3rd issue of P76 was the best (that's the one whose cover appeared in the introduction to Pio's Penguin anthology OFF THE RECORD). Magic Sam also produced a series of roneoed books (one of which was a brillant little book by Pam Brown). I just remembered Magic Sam produced a roneoed Mental as Anything single...!!!!

> And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther"
> Les Wicks was the editor of "Meuse" (which I think began as a Poets Union publication). Les now edits Transit Poetry - which is the poetry posters on buses project in Sydney & Newcastle.
> And Mark can speak for himself I guess
> Best Wishes,
> Pam
>
> Hello everyone -
> In Australia , well, in Sydney, we had the amazing roneo magazine "Magic Sam" with silk-screened covers & graphics - and later the not-as-brilliant-looking "Meuse" followed by Mark Roberts' (& Adam Aitken's) "P76" - maybe you can remember some others Mark ?

↑ Index

126. Joel Lewis
mimeo rev
Thu 6 Mar 1997

I nominate VORT -- which did useful double poet issues such as Jackson macLow/Armand Schwerner, Ted Berrigan/Tom raworth, w/ interviews, essays, etc. Also mag city, larry fagin's adventures in poetry & so on

joel lewis

↑ Index

127. MAXINE CHERNOFF
Readings next week
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Paul Hoover will be reading from his new book of poems, VIRIDIAN, at three locations on the East Coast next week:

1.) Thursday, March 13, at Brown University, 7:00 p.m.

2) Sunday, March 16, at Pasman's Books, NYC, 3:00 p.m.

3.) Tuesday, March 18, at U of Pennsylvania, late afternoon.

↑ Index

128. Aaron Shurin publication (not mimeo'd)
Thu 6 Mar 1997

I'd like to let readers on the List know that my new book, UNBOUND:A Book of AIDS, is out from Sun & Moon.

Thanks,

Aaron Shurin

↑ Index

129. KENT JOHNSON asteroid to hit earth
Thu 6 Mar 1997

I have a question. Astronomers and people in-the-know writing in Astronomy, Sky and Telescope, Scientific American, and The New Yorker, have made it clear in the past year and a half that the Earth is fated to be whomped with an asteroid or comet, wiping out everything- -and they mean everything-- as we know it. It might happen suddenly tonight or next month or in a further but still totally unsuspecting future.

So my question is this: Given this overwhelming fact of an eventual, sudden, and irreversible asteroidal extinction, what is the purpose or worth of poetry, "avant-garde" or otherwise? I mean, there will be no smell of mimeo ink or memory of it after the big one hits. language poetry, its precursors and fellow travellers, along with all its contraries, will be blown to smithereens. The World and APR. Waht makes us talk of evanescent words
and letters in the face of potential nothingness? Or would this be provocation and reason for mimeo an its strange smelles?

Leinenkugel's is not a micro, but it's a noble beer. ("btw"--as the buffaloish idiom goes--what beers, sodas, or other drinks do avant- garde poets prefer when writing? perhaps as relevant a thread as waht one is wearing and comic strip guys? how about George crumb if we're going to do comics..)

Wouldn't a progressive political stance for avant-garde poets be to lobby their governments to invest in research to track the thousands of still unknown earth-crossing asteroids? The cost for effectively doing so is very minimal compared to military budget. No doubt a number of experimental poets will be laughing right now.

well Kaboom,

Kent

↑ Index

130. dbkk
Prosodia benefit reading
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Small Press Traffic is pleased to support Prosodia, the literary magazine produced every spring by the students of the New College of California Graduate Poetics Program. This year¹s editors are Stephanie Baker, Liz Burke, Eric Frost, Nick Karavatos, Fitz Schwartz, and Tricia Roush. Past contributors include Will Alexander, Rosmarie Waldrop, Rodrigo Toscano, Dorian Harding-Morick, Anselm Hollo, and Diane Di Prima.

Please note that this event is happening on SATURDAY, not Friday:

Saturday, March 8
7:30 in the New College of California Theater
Admission is $5 (no one turned away). All proceeds will benefit Prosodia 7.

Kit Robinson
Tricia Roush

Kit Robinson¹s books include Balance Sheet (Roof), The Champagne of Concrete (Potes & Poets), and Windows (Whale Cloth). His translation from the Russian of Ilya Kutik¹s Ode on Visiting the Belosaraisk Spit on the Sea of Azov is recently out from Alef Books.

Tricia Roush is a second year M.A./M.F.A. student at New College of California and a member of the collaborative performance group The Underbelly Sextet. Her work has appeared in Prosodia, Notes From the Underground, The Word Enamel, Tales from Around the Bend, Boog Literature, and Phaeton. She likes Johnny Mathis, and is allergic to wool.

↑ Index

131. KENT JOHNSON
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

good luck Jennifer and Alan. may the force be with you!

> Date sent: Fri, 7 Mar 1997 00:49:15 -0500
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Alan Jen Sondheim <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth
> To: [redacted]

> I always donate my poems to stopping anything from outer space.
> Alan
>
> _____
> URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
> Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted]
> CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

132. KENT JOHNSON

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

well, of course, Mark, that would be stupid.

> Date sent: Fri, 7 Mar 1997 16:55:00 +1100
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Mark Roberts <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth
> To: [redacted]
>
> Of course, how stupid of me. I'm going to start writing traditional sonnets and save the earth from being hit by an asteroid.
>
> *I have a question. Astronomers and people in-the-know writing in Astronomy, Sky and Telescope, Scientific American, and The New Yorker, have made it clear in the past year and a half that the Earth is fated to be whomped with an asteroid or comet, wiping out everything--and they mean everything-- as we know it. It might happen suddenly tonight or next month or in a further but still totally unsuspecting future.*
>
> So my question is this: Given this overwhelming fact of an eventual, sudden, and irreversible asteroidal extinction, what is the purpose or worth of poetry, "avant-garde" or otherwise? I mean, there will be no smell of mimeo ink or memory of it after the big one hits. language poetry, its precursors and fellow travellers, along with all its contraries, will be blown to smithereens. The World and APR. Waht makes us talk of evanescent words and letters in the face of potential nothingness? Or would this be provocation and reason for mimeo an its strange smelles?
>
> Leinenkugel's is not a micro, but it's a noble beer. ("btw"--as the > buffaloish idiom goes--what beers, sodas, or other drinks do avant-garde poets prefer when writing? perhaps as relevant a thread as waht one is wearing and comic strip guys? how about George crumb if we're going to do comics..)

>
> Wouldn't a progressive political stance for avant-garde poets be to lobby their governments to invest in research to track the thousands of still unknown earth-crossing asteroids? The cost for effectively doing so is very minimal compared to military budget. No doubt a number of experimental poets will be laughing right now.
>
> well Kaboom,
>
> Kent
>
> Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
> SIS Team
> Building G05 Maze Crescent
> University of Sydney
> Phone 61 2 93517710
> Mobile 015063970
> Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

133. KENT JOHNSON

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

well, of course Mark, that would be stupid.

> Date sent: Fri, 7 Mar 1997 16:55:00 +1100
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Mark Roberts <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth
> To: [redacted]
>
> Of course, how stupid of me. I'm going to start writing traditional sonnets and save the earth from being hit by an asteroid.
>
> I have a question. Astronomers and people in-the-know writing in Astronomy, Sky and Telescope, Scientific American, and The New Yorker, have made it clear in the past year and a half that the Earth is fated to be whomped with an asteroid or comet, wiping out everything-

> *-and they mean everything-- as we know it. It might happen suddenly tonight or next month or in a further but still totally unsuspecting future.*
>
> So my question is this: Given this overwhelming fact of an eventual, sudden, and irreversible asteroidal extinction, what is the purpose or worth of poetry, "avant-garde" or otherwise? I mean, there will be no smell of mimeo ink or memory of it after the big one hits. language poetry, its precursors and fellow travellers, along with all its contraries, will be blown to smithereens. The World and APR. Waht makes us talk of evanescent words and letters in the face of potential nothingness? Or would this be provocation and reason for mimeo an its strange smelles?
>
> Leinenkugel's is not a micro, but it's a noble beer. ("btw"--as the buffaloish idiom goes--what beers, sodas, or other drinks do avant-garde poets prefer when writing? perhaps as relevant a thread as waht one is wearing and comic strip guys? how about George crumb if we're going to do comics..)
>
> Wouldn't a progressive political stance for avant-garde poets be to lobby their governments to invest in research to track the thousands of still unknown earth-crossing asteroids? The cost for effectively doing so is very minimal compared to military budget. No doubt a number of experimental poets will be laughing right now.
>
> well Kaboom,
>
> Kent
>
> Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
> SIS Team
> Building G05 Maze Crescent
> University of Sydney
> Phone 61 2 93517710
> Mobile 015063970
> Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

134. KENT JOHNSON

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

fantastic! have you read phillip k. dick?

> Date sent: Fri, 7 Mar 1997 20:18:32 +1300
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Demian Reed <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth
> To: [redacted]
>
> The question is it seems why bother doing anything, ever as eventually some disaster may befall us. The answer is survival ie reseach, investigate cures for diseases, learn to build spacehips to escape asteriods etc
>
> What part for poetry in this?
> Not much, but maybe it keeps the scientists and people with real jobs entertained for a while or at least gets them thinking laterally
>
> If the asteriod is big enough we can make it our new home, revert back to carving verse in rock and maybe one day progress to the high technological level of mimeo
>
> ps Hi DS - finally made it on!

↑ Index

135. KENT JOHNSON

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

dear Alan:

if I could be with you and jennifer when the asteroid hits, i think i'd be happy. IO've been amazed and wondering about those panties you talk about on FOL. But I think that when the asteroid hits, most people won't be with the people they want to be speaking to, touching, fucking lovingly, or expressing a kindness to. This is the terrible thing about the asteroid that will kill us all and/or our innocent descendandts. What do you think we should do? do we, as avant-garde poets do something about this by putting on our bras and panties or our bvd Jim Palmer briefs or boxers and call our senator and say, look, mother fucker, our planet could be blown up any second by a rogue asteroid, what the fuck are you doing spending your time tinkering on the such and such bomber and so on? ... or do we say to our senator, jennifer is hot in her panties; she touches herself and Peter jennings does it behind the screen for jennifer while no one eis looking, thinkin gabout her, whose thinking about him, peter jennings, who is coming while he talks about the asteroid and the way we fucked the fucking iraquis with our astral weapons? This latter, jennifer, would be a better way to defeat the asteroid.

I'm not sure how, but mimeo has something to do with this. I'm not sure how, but how is mimeo connected to the death of iraqui sodiers buried alive in their sad trenches? I read these painfully lovely little books, not desiring to hurt anybody, these US mimeo things, desiring in all thier hearts to be separate from all the fucking shit. peter jennings puts his right hand in Jennifer's panties. Is jennifer happy the moment the asteroid hits? does she think: I'd like to see peter jennings in the nude, I'd like to be with my son and with my daughter in a field talking about what happened today at grade school, feeling the little bones of their shoulders as i try to think of the right motherly words to say? her son cries because the bully said something cruel about his little birthmark.

What does it mena to take a chance, to send it off on e-mail without cahnging a thing? How does this e-mail exist only becaude a young iraqui man was buried alive in atrench, while we watched, amazed, how mimeo could had led to this miracle of precission? Peter and Jennifer look at each other an want it.

Ket

I say you're a better poet than I, jennifer, but I still say, kaboom.

Kent

> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Alan Jen Sondheim <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth
> To: [redacted]
>
> I started to write a reply about why does poetry need a _part_ and why not > stop legitimation crises behavior phenomena and then I got
> NO CARRIER
> so it was all precluded but I remember asking Edwin Honig why we studied > Eng. Lit. when I did and he said because it makes us better people.
> Sometimes I pray for the asteroid.
> Alan
>
> ---
> URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html
> Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted]
> CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

136. Stephen Vincent
Re: mimeo revolution re clay
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Maybe one aspect of mimeo - especially those that used the heavy, soft papers - was that the ink literally sank into the page. The reading process compelled a certain quality of literal absorption. Mimeo as a soft, felt medium was the antithesis of formica, the plastic fifties. An organic, or vegetal quality about it. The materiality slowed down the reading. (As could letter press in that 'fine print' tradition. Who would want to rush through Spicer's "Language" as set and printed by Graham Macintosh for White Rabbit? At its worse the quick impression of off-set printed introduced a quick-disposable feel to work. The way that e-mail can perhaps similarly go up in quick smoke - and a good pesonal letter usually does not. The materiality of a medium can create a resistance -- as well as a larger labor input -- which impels a depth, a quality.

Cheers,
Stephen Vincent

↑ Index

137. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

a wacky e-zine site in australia people might enjoy

Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

by life.ai.mit.edu (8.8.5/8.8.5AI/life.ai.mit.edu:1.11) with ESMTP id BAA26199;
Mon, 3 Mar 1997 01:34:44 -0500 (EST)
Date: Mon, 3 Mar 1997 14:16:37 +1100 (EDT)
From: geekgirl <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: geekgirl#9 woof & doof out now!
Status: RO

A kennel of one's own.

It's a well known fact a girl's best friend is her dog! The world's first and most popular cyberfeminist hyperzine presents woof & doof. Issue #9 is just itchin' to hit the road & goes online March 1, '97.

Never work with dogs or artists? Well find out for yourself! Produced with the assistance of the Australia Council for the Arts W&D is a fun look at kids, kelpies, kreatures and kosmic beings.

We hear news of the Australian spoken Word tour of Terence McKenna; meet Vali Myers Australian born artist at home in her wildlife oasis in Italy; lots of info about geekgirl's fave organisation "Guide Dogs for the Blind"; Critter from Bohemian Ink tackles some gnarly questions; Miriam from Wrong Kind of Stoneage pays homage to Gracie and sings a tune-or-two; plus some hot shock-wave, animation (and upcoming doof) by - Laura Jordan, Sally Harbison, RobJ and Komninos. Monika Jansch gets let out and does Dip, Dunk, Dog and we have sniffed out some more Penapls as Therapy, and Hollywood Hound Dogs. Yelp-Yippee!..

Visit! you'll enjoy the RealAudio, Poodle Parlor and some kewl comps for kids and all kreatures. For the fussy types you'll nibble on the new merchandise and play with paper dogs. An extensive wired hair women's section is also included this issue to celebrate International Women's Week.

Thanks for your support in ensuring geekgirl continues to lead the way..

```
rosie x / geekgirl        http://www.geekgirl.com.au/
[redacted]        |o/        \o\        |o/
po box 759, newtown        |          \        / australia 2042            />          <\     />
phax [redacted]        never loose site of # 1.
```

↑ Index

138. Mark Weiss

Re: mimeo revolution re clay

Thu 6 Mar 1997

Nostalgia for mimeo from a consummate bookman like Steve Vincent--that's a good one. I used the damned things extensively for political work--it was all over my fingers, all over my kitchen, all over everything. Typeface was dependent on typewriter. Mistakes--I'm a lousy typist--were like fate or original sin. Multilith used to make a typeable offset plate, so you could do offset and still not get into bucks. The first issue of Broadway Boogie was done that way and printed at night on a desktop AB Dick at Hostos College, unbeknownst to the powers that were, and hand cut on a guillotine. Artwork was drawn on those self-same plates. All the joys of mimeograph, but longer runs and cleaner copy. Then I discovered the compositor. Wow. If I made a mistake I didn't have to start all over, I could simply cut out the goof with an exacto and replace it with the correction. Good way to learn hand-eye coordination. But of course that married me to the short-run houses and budgets. But if it could be photographed it could be printed. Sometimes I get nostalgic for cars with broken clutches. All kinds of poverty are fun to visit when you're young.

At 03:51 PM 3/6/97 -0500, you wrote:
>Maybe one aspect of mimeo - especially those that used the heavy, soft papers
>- was that the ink literally sank into the page. The reading process >compelled a certain quality of literal absorption. Mimeo as a soft, felt >medium was the antithesis of formica, the plastic fifties. An organic, or >vegetal quality about it. The materiality slowed down the reading. (As could >letter press in that 'fine print' tradition. Who would want to rush through >Spicer's "Language" as set and printed by Graham Macintosh for White Rabbit?

> At its worse the quick impression of off-set printed introduced a >quick-disposable feel to work. The way that e-mail can perhaps similarly go >up in quick smoke - and a good pesonal letter usually does not. The >materiality of a medium can create a resistance -- as well as a larger labor >input -- which impels a depth, a quality.
>
>Cheers,
>Stephen Vincent
>
>

↑ Index

139. William Burmeister Prod
Re: Pogo
Thu 6 Mar 1997

George Bowering wrote:

> Now Walt Kelly wd be in another kind of trouble.

I must have missed the beginning of this Pogo thread. Was a PC problem ever perceived here?

Anyway, I love the language possibilities. Are the Pogo books still available in the bookstores?

Bill Burmeister

↑ Index

140. Mark Roberts
cutting stencils on html
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Ron Silliman wrote:

>
>I do think that HTML and web technology has some of the very same potential that >generated the "mimeo revolution" back then, but with some important differences.
>The most important one is that the world of writing itself is far more dispersed >and decentralized than it was 30-40 years ago (generally a good thing, but not >unabashedly so). The other is that these pieces of equipment are hardly free, even >if they are becoming common. I could never have afforded the upfront costs of >owning a PC when I was in my 20s and didn't actually buy one until I was 41. Yet >the sort of effort that yields something like Luigi-Bob's scratchpad for the >wr-eye-ting list is virtually exactly the same impulse and much of the same result >as a little mag effort of those olden days, and with few of the same limitations >vis a vis distribution or reliance entirely on the local.

I think this is true and it is interesting that P76 is re-emerging on the www having basically missed the offset revolution completely. A computer and internet connection does cost more than a gestner machine a lot of students (and others) have access to cheap internet connections through universities (P76 actually accessed stencil cutting machines to cut stencils for our gestner which meant we did paste ups which could include graphics and then cut the stencils at Sydney Uni for the cost of the stencil - the cost of hiring or buying a stencil cutting machine was way beyond our means).

Mark
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

141. DS
Re: Pogo
Thu 6 Mar 1997

They are occasionally in New Zealand - and are re-releases or new anthologies, so they must be in Amerikee.

At 05:24 PM 3/6/97 -0500, you wrote:
>George Bowering wrote:
>
>> Now Walt Kelly wd be in another kind of trouble.
>
>I must have missed the beginning of this Pogo thread. Was a PC problem ever >perceived here?
>

>Anyway, I love the language possibilities. Are the Pogo books still available >in the bookstores?
>
>
>
>Bill Burmeister
>
>

↑ Index

142. Mark Roberts

Re: Magic Sam, et. al.

Thu 6 Mar 1997

There was also a small press set up I think (correct me if I'm wrong Pam) Ken and Anna and later run by Anna called Sea Cruise Books (they actually published some roneoed titles (Robert Kenny's BOOK OF DECTION was roneoed I seem to recall - & then there was the NO REGRETS anothologies of womens' writing).

.....come and let me take you on a sea cruise.....

>Re:
>
>"And I should add that "Magic Sam" was edited & produced by Ken Bolton (with >Anna Couani & later, Sal Brereton) - Ken now edits "Otis Rush Magazine" and >has a poetry publishing imprint called "Little Esther""
>
>I assume (nearly) everyone on this list knows the names and music of Magic >Sam, Otis Rush, Little Esther. Obvious point if not: these mags were named >after blues guitarists/singers MS and OR and blues singer LE.
>
>Tom
>
>
>
>
>
>Tom Mandel
>*******
>Screen Porch * [redacted]
>4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]

>Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
>*******
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

143. Mark Roberts

Re: The Great Smell of Mimeo

Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

yeah a trick we had at primary school was to tell younger kids that mimeograph sheets tasted great if you licked them. More often than not the metho would make them sick.....

>another on e of my favorite things about old mimeo forms was that the >stencils were called "Spirit Masters."
>
>At 7:04 PM 3/6/97, Hank Lazer wrote:
>>Yes, Kenny G, that smell, wonderfully mnemonic. Mere mention of it, >>and I can begin to see Mr Tollefson's sixth grade classroom, and >>smell the hamsters in the back of the room.... Thanks.
>>
>>Hank Lazer
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

144. Martin J Spinelli
Marinetti recordings
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Thanks Jerry,

The Cramps LP sounds exactly what I'm looking for. I'll check our music library hear tomorrow, failing that I.L.L. (if they do audio).

Tellus is an audio cassette magazine produced by Harvestworks in NYC. Their #21 issue was called "Audio by Visual Artist" and has Marinetti's "La Battaglia di Adrianopoli" only. Also included are Maurice Lemaitre, Marcel Duchamp, Kurt Schwitters, Raoul Hausmann, Mimmo Rotella, Antonio Russolo, and about a dozen others. If you want, I can dig up their phone number for you. Just email me.

Thanks again,
Martin

_____ Martin Spinelli [redacted] English Department, SUNY @ Buffalo LINEbreak http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/linebreak EPC Sound Room http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/sound

↑ Index

145. Mark Roberts
Re: mimeo revolution & P76
Thu 6 Mar 1997

From memory think there are copies of P76 in the University Library at buffalo. Let me know if I'm wrong.

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

146. Maria Damon
Re: mimeo revolution
Thu 6 Mar 1997

---

what is the origin of the word "mimeo"? i assume it's somehow related to the concept of mimesis, but any further insights wd be enjoyed by moi. goodnight to all, md

↑ Index

147. aerialedge
Raworth reading
Thu 6 Mar 1997

Sunday March 9th 8 PM

Tom Raworth

Bridge Street Books, 2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW
Washington, DC ph [redacted]

three to five dollar suggested donation

Tom is amazing.

↑ Index

148. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

I always donate my poems to stopping anything from outer space. Alan

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

149. Mark Roberts
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Of course, how stupid of me. I'm going to start writing traditional sonnets and save the earth from being hit by an asteroid.

>I have a question. Astronomers and people in-the-know writing in >Astronomy, Sky and Telescope, Scientific American, and The New Yorker, >have made it clear in the past year and a half that the Earth is >fated to be whomped with an asteroid or comet, wiping out everything-

>-and they mean everything-- as we know it. It might happen >suddenly tonight or next month or in a further but still totally >unsuspecting future.
>
>So my question is this: Given this overwhelming fact of an eventual,
>sudden, and irreversible asteroidal extinction, what is the purpose
>or worth of poetry, "avant-garde" or >otherwise? I mean, there will be no smell of mimeo ink or >memory of it after the big one hits. language poetry, its >precursors and fellow travellers, along with all its contraries, will >be blown to smithereens. The World and APR. Waht makes us talk of >evanescent words
>and letters in the face of potential nothingness? Or would this be >provocation and reason for mimeo an its strange smelles?
>
>Leinenkugel's is not a micro, but it's a noble beer. ("btw"--as the >buffaloish idiom goes--what beers, sodas, or other drinks do avant->garde poets prefer when writing? perhaps as relevant a thread as >waht one is wearing and comic strip guys? how about George >crumb if we're going to do comics..)
>
>Wouldn't a progressive political stance for avant-garde poets be to >lobby their governments to invest in research to track the thousands >of still unknown earth-crossing asteroids? The cost for effectively >doing so is very minimal compared to military budget. No doubt a >number of experimental poets will be laughing right now.
>
>well Kaboom,
>
>Kent
>
>

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

150. Mark Roberts

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Fri 7 Mar 1997

I just thought of something. I think we have just proved that dinosaurs where language poets - and therefore they were wiped out by a giant asteroid. I mean there they were sniffing roneo ink when...WHAMO

>
>
>
>
>>I have a question. Astronomers and people in-the-know writing in >>Astronomy, Sky and Telescope, Scientific American, and The New Yorker, >>have made it clear in the past year and a half that the Earth is >>fated to be whomped with an asteroid or comet, wiping out everything-
>>-and they mean everything-- as we know it. It might happen >>suddenly tonight or next month or in a further but still totally >>unsuspecting future.
>>
>>So my question is this: Given this overwhelming fact of an eventual,
>>sudden, and irreversible asteroidal extinction, what is the purpose
>>or worth of poetry, "avant-garde" or >>otherwise? I mean, there will be no smell of mimeo ink or >>memory of it after the big one hits. language poetry, its >>precursors and fellow travellers, along with all its contraries, will >>be blown to smithereens. The World and APR. Waht makes us talk of >>evanescent words
>>and letters in the face of potential nothingness? Or would this be >>provocation and reason for mimeo an its strange smelles?
>>
>>Leinenkugel's is not a micro, but it's a noble beer. ("btw"--as the >>buffaloish idiom goes--what beers, sodas, or other drinks do avant->>garde poets prefer when writing? perhaps as relevant a thread as >>waht one is wearing and comic strip guys? how about George >>crumb if we're going to do comics..)
>>
>>Wouldn't a progressive political stance for avant-garde poets be to >>lobby their governments to invest in research to track the thousands >>of still unknown earth-crossing asteroids? The cost for effectively >>doing so is very minimal compared to military budget. No doubt a >>number of experimental poets will be laughing right now.
>>

>>well Kaboom,
>>
>>Kent
>>
>>
>Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
>SIS Team
>Building G05 Maze Crescent
>University of Sydney
>Phone 61 2 93517710
>Mobile 015063970
>Fax 61 2 93517711
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

151. Demian Reed
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

The question is it seems why bother doing anything, ever as eventually some disaster may befall us. The answer is survival ie reseach, investigate cures for diseases, learn to build spacehips to escape asteriods etc

What part for poetry in this?
Not much, but maybe it keeps the scientists and people with real jobs entertained for a while or at least gets them thinking laterally

If the asteriod is big enough we can make it our new home, revert back to carving verse in rock and maybe one day progress to the high technological level of mimeo

ps Hi DS - finally made it on!

↑ Index

152. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

I started to write a reply about why does poetry need a _part_ and why not stop legitimation crises behavior phenomena and then I got NO CARRIER so it was all precluded but I remember asking Edwin Honig why we studied Eng. Lit. when I did and he said because it makes us better people. Sometimes I pray for the asteroid. Alan

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

153. David Israel
Re: mimeo
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Maria Damon asked --

<< what is the origin of the word "mimeo"? i assume it's somehow related to the concept of mimesis, but any further insights wd be enjoyed by moi. >>

Not sure -- but a few thoughts anyhow --

At the little Quaker grade school I attended in So. California in the '60s (Pacific Ackworth Friends School, Temple City), mimeographs were used regularly for ordinary lesson materials (esp. I think in the lower grades, for some reason; perhaps textbooks were more common in the upper grades).

I've a notion that part of the typist's skill (w/ manual typewriter) involved even force on the keys (true for carbon copies too, but here I referr to the cut of the mimeo sheet).

Seem to recall some variation in shade -- purple, blue.

Now as for the word, we find these related words:
~mimeograph / mimeography / mimeographic
~xerox / xerograph (?) / xeroxgraphy / xerographic ~reprographics ~facsimile reproduction also: telegraph
also: autograph / polygraph / pictograph (not to mention: paragraph)
& also: ~stenotype / stenographer / stenography / stenographic

"mimeo" is (of course) a shortened (familiar) form of "mimeograph" -- and sure, as for derivation, it seems like a direct Latin thing (from mimesis + graph?). My guess is, perhaps it's modeled after stenography (?) -- quite big circa '30s-'50s et seq.

↑ Index

154. Schuchat Simon
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

---

wait a minute. I was under the impression that the asteroid had already hit the earth, and is now known as the gulf of mexico.

if lightning never strikes twice, why would an asteroid?

↑ Index

155. Ken Edwards
Re: mimeo revolution
Fri 7 Mar 1997

The most prolific producer of mimeo poetry books has got to be Bob Cobbing's Writers Forum, which started in the 1950s and continues to this day, although Bob switched to xeroxing some 15 years ago or so. There are presently well over 600 WF titles, all claimed to be "in print" (Bob will photocopy a book on demand). The magazine AND is associated with the press, and has also been running (sporadically) since the 50s.

Write to him at 89a Petherton Road, London N5 2QT, UK. No e-mail I'm afraid.

Ken

↑ Index

156. David Israel
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Anent Kent Johnson's dramatic query --

<< ... So my question is this: Given this overwhelming fact of an eventual, sudden, and irreversible asteroidal extinction, what is the purpose or worth of poetry, "avant-garde" or otherwise? I mean, there will be no smell of mimeo ink or memory of it after the big one hits... What makes us talk of evanescent words and letters in the face of potential nothingness? >>

The fact that all that now appears before us shall one day vanish -- that is already (on some level) well known. Don't need asteroids to make it so. With 'em or without 'em, the basic story remains. The contemp. myth of asteroids serves to dramatize this (in ways that seem dubious). But no matter. They don't tell us a whole lot we didn't already "know."

That's part of the given situation. Poetry -- often, or at best, or in some circumstances (or poss. w/ other such levels of qualification, but finally & withal) -- poetry seeks to take adequate stock of this very situation.

It has been said (by the wise, if you'll pardon this) that consciousness itself transcends the vehicles which it employs (such as what we call our "body" -- clearly evanescent, as well as what usually mean by our "mind" -- rather more long-standing [according to many], yet ultimately also destined for annihilation). To certain writers (especially many a poet), such issues grow to become as no-shit serious as are those pesky little asteroidal issues to certain science-writers whose speculations have, as noted, lately adorned the here-today pages of American journalism.

> well Kaboom,
>
> Kent

one day (perhaps) -- but hey, not yet
[as quoth the bloke in The Little Buddha],

David

↑ Index

157. Michael Boughn
Clarke book
Fri 7 Mar 1997

ANNOUNCING THE PUBLICATION OF JOHN CLARKE'S
IN THE ANALOGY (Books 1-7)

Devil's Triangle

"How should the hero now speak? Who is after all--a vision?" --Nietzsche, The Birth of Tragedy

"Texas has a lot on its head."
--Edward Dorn, "The Degeneration of the Greeks"

"Power can stage its own murder to rediscover the glimmer of existence and legitimacy."
--Baudrillard, "Precession of the Simulacra"

"Happiness is not based on oneself, it does not consist of a small home, of taking and getting. Happiness is taking part in the struggle, where there is no borderline between one's own personal world, and the world in general." --Lee Harvey Oswald, Letter to his brother

If we are the seminal fluidity, then we contain already, as Whitman knew, _everything_, "diddling" (Poe) as well as the Good, however forced sometimes the dilation as seen from old heroic organization before the shit rolled like termite droppings into the load-bearing bridges for everyone to cross into Dealy Plaza, Dallas "takes us" November 22, 1963, and not only Oswald and Ruby, but Guy Bannister, Shaw, Ferrie, Bloomfield and Permindex, now Roscoe White and more aliens up from the South, Watergate's Sturgis, Union survivors up North, all those insane in Honolulu
since the birth of the Nation/Hail to the Chief shot American Transcendentalism out of the feudal individual and delivered into the hands of Walt's "unprecedented average," thank you Abe, thanks Jack, now it's up to us.

****

In the Analogy is a ravishing translation of the sonnet into an american language. Realizing the poetics he put forward in _From Feathers to Iron_, Clarke here brings to bear the push toward what he called _the world strengthening method_, a way of thinking through the epic impulse after Olson. This work, astonishing in the range of its thinking and reference, is John Clarke's final work, not finishing, though it knows that fact, but finally just stopped in its tracks. Each of the six completed books contains 40 sonnets, and the final book conatins 4.

"John Clarke is among those stand-out poets who are guides in what to do in writing that thinks. So--we may come through. . . . A concourse of poems--necessary rests between them--runs into and investigates our ongoing predicamnt. Here we are just plain after-the-modern (to use Olson's clear recoognition and step around the pile-up of postisms) and at work." --Robin Blaser

"John Clarke's poems carry off an integration of a whole gamut of moods. . . . They reach out to startling conclusions and skein out to a future from a deep past in a web of many dimensions. . . . [A]s far beyond Olson as Olson was beyond Melville." --Albert Cook, _American Poetry Review_

John Clarke (b. 1933, Winesburg, Ohio, d. 1992) is also the author of _Lots of Doom_ (1973), _Gloucester Translations_ (1974), The End of This Side_ (1979), and _From Feathers to Iron: A Concourse of World Poetics_ (1987). As Director of the Institute of Further Studies (founded 1965) he oversaw saw publication of the ongoing series, _A Curriculum of the Soul_. He taught for 29 years at the State University of New York at Buffalo. From 1989 to 1991 he edited _inent: letter of talk, thinking, and document_.

6" x 9"; 265 pp.; ISBN 1-880631-10-5 (pbk, sewn), $18.00US, $23.00CDN; 1-880631-11-3 (hdbk), $35.00US, $45.00CDN. (Please include $5.00 for postage and handling).

In the Analogy is available from shuffaloff books, 260 Plymouth Ave., Buffalo NY 14213 USA or 653 Euclid Ave., Toronto ON M6G 2T6 CAN. (e-mail Michael Boughn at [redacted])

It's also available through Small Press Distribution, 1814 San Pablo Ave., Berkeley CA 94702, and Talking Leaves Books ([redacted]).

↑ Index

158. Wendy Battin
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Not to worry, Kent. Asteroids "read," though they don't move their lips and only rarely review. The whole point of the internet is to increase and amplify linguistic activity on a global scale; as long as we keep our bubble of words inflated, nothing can touch us. Check out that seminal work on Bell's Theorem, _Whistling in the Big Dark: Quantum Butterflies and the Development of Human Culture_.

Wendy

↑ Index

159. Gwyn McVay
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Mark, I am, on the other hand, going to remain starstruck.

Get it? Get it?

Gwyn
WHOMP

↑ Index

160. Maria Damon
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

> Anent Kent Johnson's dramatic query --
>
> << ... So my question is this: Given this overwhelming fact of an eventual, sudden, and irreversible asteroidal extinction, what is the purpose or worth of poetry, "avant-garde" or otherwise? I mean, there will be no smell of mimeo ink or memory of it after the big one hits... What makes us talk of evanescent words and letters in the face of potential nothingness? >>

i don't get why we shd get upset abt this. i mean it's kind of cool to think of everything being different. better this kind of apocalypse than one we do to ourselves (ecological abuse, nuclear etc). some of us are already living in the wake of our own apocalypses.

↑ Index

161. Steven Marks
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Uhhhhmmm.... we're all going to die anyway at some point in the future.

But then again, there is cloning.

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

162. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
the blushing power
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Someone here recommended recently that all we read the current (3/17) issue of THE NATION (Crushing/Publishing).

MC Miller's article struck me as a rant, and a mediocre rant at that. He said publishers don't LOVE their books anymore and interested in the money only. He said that a lot of what is published today is "crap."

While he says all this he claims to avoid idealizing a past "golden age" in the same way someone might avoid saying something callous by prefacing it with "I don't mean to be callous or anything but . . . " and then making a distinctly callous remark.

Toward the end he offers a warning ("a dark development indeed") that if the present situation persists-- that of professors having great difficulty in getting "an arcane study published"-- then tenure rules in the academy may be revised and professors may have to qualify in some other way-- by the merit of their teaching, for instance.

[redacted]

↑ Index

163. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
the blushing power
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Someone here recommended recently that all we read the current (3/17) issue of THE NATION (Crushing/Publishing).

MC Miller's article struck me as a rant, and a mediocre rant at that. He said publishers don't LOVE their books anymore and are interested in the money only. He said that a lot of what is published today is "crap."

No argument with Miller.

While he says all this he claims to avoid idealizing a past "golden age" in the same way someone might avoid saying something callous by prefacing it with "I don't mean to be callous or anything but . . . " and then making a distinctly callous remark.

Toward the end he offers a warning ("a dark development indeed") that if the present situation persists-- that of professors having great difficulty in getting "an arcane study published"-- then tenure rules in the academy may be revised and professors may have to qualify in some other way-- by the merit of their teaching, for instance.

[redacted]

↑ Index

164. William Burmeister Prod
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

I can't go on, I must go on. If this happens, the survivors will go back to eating poetry (maybe mimeographed poetry at that!) They sure as hell won't be watching peter jennings.

BB

> *I have a question. Astronomers and people in-the-know writing in Astronomy, Sky and Telescope, Scientific American, and The New Yorker, have made it clear in the past year and a half that the Earth is fated to be whomped with an asteroid or comet, wiping out everything--and they mean everything-- as we know it. It might happen suddenly tonight or next month or in a further but still totally unsuspecting future.*

↑ Index

165. Pritchett,Pat
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Contrary to popular opinion, Simon, lightning frequently touches the same place not twice, but many times. There have been numerous asteroid impacts: the Tungushka event in Siberia, c.1910; Arizona's "tourist" crater; Yucatan, of course, and many smaller ones all over.

Apocalypse fever - catch it!

And of course the answer to Kent's question is: so what? just keep writing. I mean, the sun is going to enter the red giant phase in 20 million years anyway, swallowing the innerplanets in its death throe expansion. You might as well as write...

From: Schuchat Simon
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth
Date: Friday, March 07, 1997 2:59AM

wait a minute. I was under the impression that the asteroid had already hit the earth, and is now known as the gulf of mexico.

if lightning never strikes twice, why would an asteroid?

↑ Index

166. maz881
france readings
Fri 7 Mar 1997

---

for you french folks:

There will be a bilingual reading of Mon Voyage a New York a chapbook by me in Bordeaux wednesday march 12 at 4:00pm at the Ecole des Beaux Arts.

And again with party in Bouliac thursday march 13 chex Maya Andersson & Alexandre Delay 7pm.

And again saturday march 15th at noon at the abbey of Royaumont outside of paris.

for info call bordeaux france: 5.56 81 27 55 or paris france: 4734-1770

hope to see you there,

Bill Luoma

↑ Index

167. Loss Glazier
Re: mimeo revolution
Fri 7 Mar 1997

To this thread I'd like to add a note about my book _Small Press: An Annotated Guide_ (Greenwood Press) which has an essay contextualizing the Mimeo Revolution and innovative small press and also lists and reviews nearly 200 sources related to small press. The focus of the book is to view independent, content-oriented publishing from the perspective of the IDEA of a mimeo-revolution which, publishing history has shown, was not so much tied to a particular type of machine but to a sense of how to make writing circulate.

↑ Index

168. Pritchett,Pat
Re: Russkies
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Watched a portion of Tarkovsky's "Stalker" last night. Had to break off to read "Ivan Ilyich" for class. My query is this: who is Arseny Tarkovksy, listed in credits for writing poetry for film? Is he related to Andrei? Seems I've seen this name before in some anthology.

Patrick Pritchett

↑ Index

169. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

---

20 _million_ years? Hardly, I'd go up an order of magnitude... (I need time to shower/prepare.)

Alan

On Fri, 7 Mar 1997, Pritchett,Pat @Silverplume wrote:

> Contrary to popular opinion, Simon, lightning frequently touches the same place not twice, but many times. There have been numerous asteroid impacts: the Tungushka event in Siberia, c.1910; Arizona's "tourist" crater; Yucatan, of course, and many smaller ones all over.
>
> Apocalypse fever - catch it!
>
> And of course the answer to Kent's question is: so what? just keep writing. I mean, the sun is going to enter the red giant phase in 20 million years anyway, swallowing the innerplanets in its death throe expansion. You might as well as write...
> ----------
> From: Schuchat Simon
> To: POETICS
> Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth
> Date: Friday, March 07, 1997 2:59AM
>
> wait a minute. I was under the impression that the asteroid had already hit the earth, and is now known as the gulf of mexico.
>
> if lightning never strikes twice, why would an asteroid?

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

170. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Jennifer'd want to let the race die with grace, flat on its face.
Species extinction's up to 104 per day, latest web estimates.
Humanity's 1/104 along that turn of mind, never mind the biomass.
Scales'd weigh in way in for the other 103.
Jennifer'd vote that way.
Jennifer'd take her panties off at the very last moment.
Slugs. Slugs.

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

171. Gwyn McVay
Paging Tod Thilleman
Fri 7 Mar 1997

wd. someone be so good as to backchannel me the e-mail address of Tod Thilleman? all intentions pure.

Gwyn

↑ Index

172. Steven Marks
Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech
Fri 7 Mar 1997

On Tue, 4 Mar 1997, Mark Wallace wrote:

> Sorry not to let this thread die, but I don't think I'm quite > ready to let go of it yet.
>
Me neither. Here is the paragraph I'm responding to.
>
> A Fourteenth Amendment position might point out, therefore, that in a case > where there may be a conflict between the right to free speech and the > right to equal opportunity under the law, both individuals defending their > right to free hate speech and individuals defending their right to equal > opportunity by making attempted prosecutions of hate speech must prove > "compelling reasons" that 1) their activity be protected 2) that the > activity of others can be definitely SHOWN to impact their freedom. Thus, > someone who sues someone else for "hate speech" must prove how they have > been harmed, while someone defending their right to free speech must prove > why their need to denigrate others based on race outweighs the right of > individuals to equal access under the law. Both such instances would then > need to be pursued on the basis of the particularities of their cases, > rather than by generalities about "free speech" or "equal rights."
>
In theory, I think this is a good theory, but I wonder how it differs from the Common Law (or Talmudic for that matter) tradition that we have inherited. Won't we start noticing similarities in the particularities of individual cases? And what does that lead to but amendments based on sweeping generalities. I'm afraid that we will simply invent the wheel all over again. And now to tie this in with asteroids on collision courses with the earth, what do we as poets and critics do about this eternal return of the present? Should we be architects or chroniclers? I'm not sure either but I'd argue that the latter offers more opportunities for influence in the bazaar of ideas.

Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

173. Burt Kimmelman

Re: the blushing power

Fri 7 Mar 1997

---

daniel,

i mentioned the issue. yes i do think that a memoir by john gotti's daughter, for instance, ghost written or otherwise, is not what i would call "high culture." in other words, it's crap. you like crap?

burt

↑ Index

174. michael corbin

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Fri 7 Mar 1997

Oh, men of science! Oh, versifiers, balladmongers given over to that illusory materialism of asteriods. Listen all those who have ears to hear!

O for that warning voice, which he who saw
Th' Apocalypse heard cry in Heaven aloud,
Then when the Dragon, put to second rout,
Came furious down to be reveng'd on men,
"Woe to the inhabitants on Earth!" that now,
While time was, our first parents had been warn'd
The coming of their secret foe, and scap'd, Haply so scap'd, his mortal snare! For now
Satan, now first inflam'd with rage, came down,

The tempter, ere th' accuser, of mankind,
To wreak on innocent frail Man his loss
Of that first battle and his flight to Hell;

milton says get it while the gettin is good.

mc

↑ Index

175. michael corbin
Re: the blushing power
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco wrote:
>
> Someone here recommended recently that all we read the current (3/17) issue of > THE NATION (Crushing/Publishing).
>
> MC Miller's article struck me as a rant, and a mediocre rant at that.

Yes. Very thin analysis, and very puffed up about itself. I just read this too, and I'm happy to learn that monopoly capitalism is bad, thank you very much, and that we readers and writers live in the declension that not even gutenberg can save us from. And for all his mau-mauing about the always already absent goldenage (or is that goldeneggs) he has a lot of sentimental longing looks over his shoulder. but, Maybe he's sniffing the air for that mimeo olfactory sensation. Or, more likely he is keepin a eye peeled for an asteroid.

mc

↑ Index

176. Joseph Lease
Re: the blushing power
Fri 7 Mar 1997

I missed the early part of this thread: what was the question

On Fri, 7 Mar 1997, Burt Kimmelman [redacted] wrote:

> daniel,
>
> i mentioned the issue. yes i do think that a memoir by john gotti's daughter, for instance, ghost written or otherwise, is not what i would call "high culture." in other words, it's crap. you like crap?

> burt

↑ Index

177. Joe Safdie
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Thanks, asteroidals, for some much-needed humor . . .

but seriously folks, is anyone interested in this and other doomsday scenarios as examples of "millenium fever"? -- strange cults tend to gather around the fin de siecle (not to mention that we're all, anyway, writing under a death sentence, as several have mentioned)

But I thought the Mayans had given us until December, 2012.

↑ Index

178. Alan Jen Sondheim
of purely local historic interest / kill me with an asteroid
Fri 7 Mar 1997

--

[First Appearance of Jennifer in Internet Text]

Jennifer

They surfaced again in 1688.

_____

[Melded First Appearances of Jennifer in Files dd / ee Internet Text]

Jennifer walked to the window, thought albatross around her neck. Her sails unfurled like a curly girl. I'm Jennifer, she said. I'm Jennifer and I'm still Jennifer, she said. Now I'm still Jennifer and I'm Jennifer now and still Jennifer. She somersaulted back into the malted, licked herself over and Jennifer, she said. And I'm Jennifer, she said, and went to bed.

Jennifer had a thought. Honey had a thought. Pip had a thought. Jennifer sat up and stood down. She raised her frock and cut her panties a table. "I will make you pile on the screen," said Jennifer (and panties). There's a lighthouse and my eyes, said Jennifer, sitting up and lying down. She cycled tremendously! Whirr! "You are looking at my shit!" cried! Jennifer! Jennifer-I-Jennifer-Jennifer is a silicon chip embedded in Clara's brain. Jennifer is an installation of Alan! I Jennifer-Jennifer is Clara's brain. You are Delirious-Jennifer delirious Jennifer, you won't let me go. Kill me, kill me, delirious Jennifer. Put a bullet in my head, do it fast and do it quick. Get rid of me, delirious Jennifer. Are Jennifer you delirious Jennifer? If I can't, I won't and can't and won't. Can't think another thought worthwhile, delirious Jennifer, if I can't I can't! Motherfather, delirious Jennifer, then kill me! I be the woman, I piss milk, wet Jenni- fer! You be the killer, kill my children! Thud, wet! Delirious Jennifer, thud thud! Kill me, I can't think delirious! Jennifer! Thud! Thud! Thud!

ThE nEw MaChInE gets cold. Jennifer moves towards the center where everything evens out and there are new microbes. Thud! Thud!

↑ Index

179. Demian Reed
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Re Mayans and Doomsday:

THe push here is two fold: 1) Mayan notion of time being cyclic, and the expectations that extinction and rebirth is natural and fated. Hence Aztecs represent themselves as legitimate successors to the Toltecs, as opposed to conquerors of them. The problem arises when the Spanish arrive and Cortes goes on a spree. In a real sense there is a level of indecision based on religous belief about 'This is fated'.

But for us I think what is more interesting is the argument that the Mayans were defeated by language: it was their inability to interpret language laterally that leads to their downfall (or so Todorov would argue) ipso facto: Indians and Spaniards practice communication differently. The Indians devote a great deal of their time to the interpretation of messages, and this interpretation takes elaborate forms, which derive from various kinds of divination. Interpretation is systemnatic (ie dividing time into a thirteen week calendar) and contextual (which takes the form of omens) Every event is interpreted as the herald of another event (Which implies that nothing in this world ocurrs randomly). The Aztecs are convinced that all such divinations come true and only very rarely resist the fate declared to them. In Mayan the word fate also signifies 'prohecy' or 'law'.

The world is from the start posited as overdetermined, everything is forseeable hence everything is forseen, Secondly the society is highly heirarchical and regulated: the individual exists for the group, not themselves.

The Spanish on the otherhand practice a different kind of communication: If you say there exist two major kinds of communication: one between person and person, the other between person and the world, the Mayans and Aztes practised the latter and the Spanish the former.

Communciation of couse is not limited to that between individual and individual, it also encompasses that between individual and the woder social group, the natural world and the religious universe.

When a messanger comes to Montezuma and tells him what he has seen (Spanish ships and horses) he is thrown into prison. The magicians try to have prophetic dreamns to interpret the supernatural omens. So when the information about the Spanish reaches Montezuma his interpretation of it is made in the context of communication with the world, not of that with other individuals.

It is this particular way of practicing communucation (neglectinmg the human dimsension, privaliging contact with the world) which is responsible for the Indians distorted image of the Spanish during the first encounters, and notable for the paralyzing belief that the Spanish are gods.

Perhaps more to come on the production of discourse and symbols by the Mayans ie discourse as symbols, as symbolic - each word is a signifier rather than the signified etc

> Thanks, asteroidals, for some much-needed humor . . .
>
> but seriously folks, is anyone interested in this and other doomsday scenarios as examples of "millenium fever"? -- strange cults tend to gather around the fin de siecle (not to mention that we're all, anyway, writing under a death sentence, as several have mentioned)
>
> But I thought the Mayans had given us until December, 2012.

↑ Index

180. DS

Re: is "hate" speech "free" speech

Fri 7 Mar 1997

I have kept quiet on this thread (I think) but now have both 'a solution' and an 'observation'

Solution: (having watched Mr Smith Goes to Washington recently) all poets who feel strongly about anything should in a poetic filibustering hereby drowning out opposing voices and diminishing the need for violence.

Observation: In yet another instance of New Zealand political life imitates poetics mailing list this week our deputy prime minister 'assaulted' another politician (in parliament but outside working hours) - who said stuff he didn't like. The politician assaulted was one all thinking New ZEalanders would have (as with some peoples attitudes to Dorn) have liked to punch at some if not many times over the last few years. He is an racist, sexist, homophobic, classist etc etc asshole.

HOWEVER the deputy PM who puched him is himself a lying, scheming, manipulative drunk. Curiously the debacle was witnessed by the leader of our more 'old school left wing' (what else can i call it) party.

The question here arises - and i guess this is directed more at punchers than anti-punchers - how do we react when someone long over due a good pop in the kisser has it administered by someone equally scarey. (To tie hitler into it again - would we cheer if he were punched by Mussolini?) One thinks couldn't have happened to a better person - but unfortunately someone - probably both is gonna get a whole lotta mileage out of it.

ANyway how this relates to poetics i am not sure - as these threads have a tendency to wander - i hope i have not wandered to far. Guess i really wanted to check whether our deputy PM was on the list & as i was concerned this discussion may have had a negative influence on him.

Winston are you out there?

Dan

↑ Index

181. Stephen Vincent
Mimeo Miss, Ms., Misses
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Just struck me this moring that the List had missed some important staple bound - either mimeo and/or off-set presses which wd add 'grain' to the Granary exhibit.

Shameless Hussy was the imprint of Alta's infamous Berkely based imprint. Late in the sixties, I suspect she started with a mimeograph machine and then went "kind of" multilith. The books were invariably done on the cheapest stock imaginable with varying and fading inks. All of which corresponded to the aesthetic of a mother working out of a kitchen amongst kids and other obligations, no support from no where - the books were never more than 75 cents. Her best title "No visible means of support" was a lovely ironic play on Spicer's line. Her most famous book was "For Colored Girls..." by Ntozake Shange - which went Broadway ballistic.

The Women's Press Collective was an equally significant player among the staple-bound. (In fact I think 'staple bound' is probably the common denominator of what's been discussed - rather than just mimeo. I think it's also important to see the sixties as something that really begins - as a national or global phenomenon -- in 1964 and ends about 1975.) Anyway, in addition to Alta, the WPC was the local, if not national ground breaker in terms of new feminist writing. The book EDWARD THE DYKE by Judy Grahn - at least in my opinion - was not only good, but a crucially provocative text.

Teachers & Writers Collaborative: Back in the very early days circa 1965 - under the initial directorship of Herb Kohl - TW did some of the first works of Victor Cruz, David Henderson and a bunch of other then young writers working in the NY School System. Stapled and printed, either in mimeo or off-set (my copies have since disappeared) these little black ink on cheap white paper phamplet editions, especially the Henderson and the Cruz, were urban, edgy, and very popular, striking a chord, or fire among the young. Distributed primarily in the schools, they were no doubt in part responsible for initiating Victor Cruz's early career. When he was about 19, SNAPS (1968, Random House) sold over 10,000 copies in cloth, going thru several editions.

I can't imagine an exhibit of "sixties" spirited publications without these books. My own mag "Shocks" comes at the early edge of the seventies and was definitely pushed forward by the political etc. smarts of these three different presses.

(I welcome corrections or additions to any of this info!)

Cheers,
Stephen Vincent

↑ Index

182. Mark Weiss
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

There seem to be some strange notions afloat. Here's a few correctives (I haven't read the Todorov, so I don't know quite who I'm correcting): 1. Mayans are not Aztecs. Which Mayan defeat are you talking about? The abandonment of the great centers that tourists like me enjoy exploring? That happened several centuries before the Aztecs arrived a thousand difficult miles further north, to say nothing of the Spanish. Do you mean the 16th century defeat of the highland Maya by the Spanish, which seems to have been accomplished more by way of the agency of strategic alliances and European diseases, the Quiche being far more ready to fight than Moctezuma had been? Do you mean the defeat of the last of the post-classic Maya kingdoms in 1698? Do you mean the defeat by the Mexicans of the independent Maya state that existed in the Yucatan for much of the latter half of the 19th Century and the first part of the 20th? What about all those Mayans who still live in their original homelands and who recently have managed to force the Mexican and Guatemalan governments to the bargaining table? 2. We have little idea how Mayans and Aztecs communicated. What survives from that time are government proclamations on stone monuments, creation myths, Nahua court poetry, and litle else. Except for the latter these documents do tend to be communications between "persons and the world," but so are the inscriptions on the Lincoln Memorial and a billboard ad for Miller Light. 3. "Every event is interpreted as the herald of another event (Which implies that nothing in this world occurs randomly)" could also be said of medieval Christianity, which the early Renaissance Spaniards who invaded Mexico had not yet, and never really, succeeded in escaping. The end of the story of humankind as both individuals and as a whole was well-known and largely agreed-upon. 4. After the Aztecs got rid of Moctezuma they got rid of the Spanish. When the latter came back with greater force the Aztecs resisted heroically, despite their language deficits, and were ultimately defeated by smallpox, not syntax. Moctezuma hesitated, many others did not.

Sometimes those of us whose primary interest is language tend to inflate its importance, coincidentally inflating our own in the process.

At 10:19 AM 3/8/97 +1300, you wrote:
>Re Mayans and Doomsday:
>
>THe push here is two fold: 1) Mayan notion of time being cyclic, and the >expectations that extinction and rebirth is natural and fated. Hence Aztecs >represent themselves as legitimate successors to the Toltecs, as opposed to >conquerors of them. The problem arises when the Spanish arrive and Cortes >goes on a spree. In a real sense there is a level of indecision based on >religous belief about 'This is fated'.
>
>But for us I think what is more interesting is the argument that the Mayans >were defeated by language: it was their inability to interpret language >laterally that leads to their downfall (or so Todorov would argue)
>
>ipso facto: Indians and Spaniards practice communication differently. The >Indians devote a great deal of their time to the interpretation of >messages, and this interpretation takes elaborate forms, which derive from >various kinds of divination. Interpretation is systemnatic (ie dividing >time into a thirteen week calendar) and contextual (which takes the form of >omens) Every event is interpreted as the herald of another event (Which >implies that nothing in this world ocurrs randomly). The Aztecs are >convinced that all such divinations come true and only very rarely resist >the fate declared to them. In Mayan the word fate also signifies 'prohecy' >or 'law'.

>
>The world is from the start posited as overdetermined, everything is >forseeable hence everything is forseen, Secondly the society is highly >heirarchical and regulated: the individual exists for the group, not >themselves.
>
>The Spanish on the otherhand practice a different kind of communication: If >you say there exist two major kinds of communication: one between person >and person, the other between person and the world, the Mayans and Aztes >practised the latter and the Spanish the former.
>
>Communciation of couse is not limited to that between individual and >individual, it also encompasses that between individual and the woder >social group, the natural world and the religious universe.
>
>When a messanger comes to Montezuma and tells him what he has seen >(Spanish ships and horses) he is thrown into prison. The magicians try to >have prophetic dreamns to interpret the supernatural omens. So when the >information about the Spanish reaches Montezuma his interpretation of it is >made in the context of communication with the world, not of that with other >individuals.
>
>It is this particular way of practicing communucation (neglectinmg the >human dimsension, privaliging contact with the world) which is responsible >for the Indians distorted image of the Spanish during the first encounters, >and notable for the paralyzing belief that the Spanish are gods.
>
>Perhaps more to come on the production of discourse and symbols by the >Mayans ie discourse as symbols, as symbolic - each word is a signifier >rather than the signified etc
>
>>Thanks, asteroidals, for some much-needed humor . . .
>>
>>but seriously folks, is anyone interested in this and other doomsday >>scenarios as examples of "millenium fever"? -- strange cults tend to >>gather around the fin de siecle (not to mention that we're all, anyway, >>writing under a death sentence, as several have mentioned)
>>
>>But I thought the Mayans had given us until December, 2012.

>
>

↑ Index

183. Demian Reed
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

---

re Mayans And Doomsday

Plus This! Previous transmission concerned communication: what is peculiar about this for the Mayans and Aztecs is that there was an absence of writing. Stylised drawings, the pictograms used among the Aztecs are not a lesser degree of writing: they note the experience, not the langauge (one reason why Charles Olson was so attracted to Mayan civilisation in terms of its resemblance to Projective Verse - but that is another story).

The absence of writing is revelatory of symbolic behaviour in general, and at the same time, the capacity to understand the 'other' appears to be illustrated by another fact. The three great AmerIndian civilisations encountered by the Spanish are not located on the same evoution of writing. Then Incas are the most unfamiliar with writing, possessing mnemotechnical use of braided cords; the Aztecs have pictograms and the Mayas have pictograms with rudiments of phonetic writing. This corresponds directly to the level of belief that the Spanish are Gods. The Incas firmly beieve in this divine nature, the Aztecs do so only during initial exposure, and the Mayans raise the question and answer it determining that the Spanish are not gods, but rather 'strangers' or 'bearded ones' or 'powerful ones'.

What is important that as writing cannot assume the role of memory support, speech must do so - through ritual discourse (bardic activity). The essential feature of these discourses then, is that they come from the past - both in production and interpretation. In to this past -oriented , tradition dominated world erupts the conquest : an absolutely unpredictable event, surprising and unique, even bringing with it another conception of time (linear as opposed to cyclical).

The collsion between a ritual world and a unique event results in Montezuma's incapacity to react. Masters of ritual discourse the Indians are inadequatte in a siuation requiring improvisation, and this is precisely the siuation of their conquest. Their verbal experience favors paradigm over syntagm, code over context, conformity to order over effacicy of the moment, tha past over the present.

So what lesson for poetics and the threat of an asteriod (ie an unpredicatble, unique event)? Well, you will say, but the asteriod is predictable, trackable, and not unique as it has happened before. Which is precisely the point. Language denotes not only abiity to communciate and style, but also predicates a certain genus, or type of interaction with the world and other people. The usefulness of poetics - of investigation into language, is that it is not simply investigation into langauge, but also investigation into relationships (with people, world, the future and the past) and any new way of interpreting or dealing with these future events has to have a basis in the way we understand and deal with the present. That is why we write poetry.

↑ Index

184. Alan Jen Sondheim

Re: Mimeo Miss, Ms., Misses

Fri 7 Mar 1997

Let's never forget Yugen or Birth, both of which, at least for me, exerted an exhaustive influence. The latter (Tuli Kupferberg) published early childhood diaries of Anais Nin, the first I'd heard of her.

Alan

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html Images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Telephone [redacted] CuSeeMe: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, Being On Line, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

185. Demian

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Fri 7 Mar 1997

Brief Commects in () below with the NB that I was trying to make a point about lanaguage not give a history lecture.

> 1. Mayans are not Aztecs. Which Mayan defeat are you talking about?

(Defeat of Aztecs after invasion by Cortes who first landed in 1519)

> 2. We have little idea how Mayans and Aztecs communicated. What survives from that time are government proclamations on stone monuments, creation myths, Nahua court poetry, and litle else. Except for the latter these documents do tend to be communications between "persons and the world," but so are the inscriptions on the Lincoln Memorial and a billboard ad for Miller Light.

(see comments in previous letter - three key types of langaue - Aztec Symbolic drawing (pictograms), Mayan Phonetic writing and Incas braided cords)

> 3. "Every event is interpreted as the herald of another event (Which implies that nothing in this world occurs randomly)" could also be said of > medieval Christianity, which the early Renaissance Spaniards who invaded Mexico had not yet, and never really, succeeded in escaping. The end of the story of humankind as both individuals and as a whole was well-known and largely agreed-upon.

Agreed!

> 4. After the Aztecs got rid of Moctezuma they got rid of the Spanish. When the latter came back with greater force the Aztecs resisted heroically, despite their language deficits, and were ultimately defeated by smallpox, not syntax. Moctezuma hesitated, many others did not.

(Certainly there a number of reasons for defeat - mainly due to Spanish use of horses, tactics, superior weaponry etc. and of course the long term imapct of intriduction of small pox. The point is about difference in interpretation of language rather than the rise and fall of civilisations)

> Sometimes those of us whose primary interest is language tend to inflate its importance, coincidentally inflating our own in the process.

(ouch - Sometimes those of us whose primary interest is self importance tend to inflate it coincidentally by commenting on others' use of langauge.)

↑ Index

186. Mark Weiss
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

In medieval christianity every event, even the most intimate, replicates and repeats another event, and will until the end of time, in a world designed as a set of symbols revealing god's truth. An intensely symbolic world. Cortez invades Mexico less than 50 years after moveable type is introduced to the european world. Before that, book production was rather Mayan (remember that the jesuits burned untold numbers of codices). The writing system, which was a lot more than rudimentarily phonetic, was, we think, practiced only by a class of scribes and aristocrats. Of course, the same had always been true in Europe--in both places the vast majority depended on oral transmission and memory systems--and still was in 1519. European churches were vast books of symbols for the illiterate. As late as 1640 there were only 14 printing presses, each capable of producing one sheet at a time, in all of England. If language explains Moctezuma's undoing it better explain Cauhatemoc's (and Tupac's) resistance. If pictograms are related in this easy way to belief systems and ability to react to the unexpected are the Chinese (were they ever) like the Mayans and Aztecs? Some of the Spaniards were armed with an alphabet, but all of them were armed with microorganisms, guns, horses, attack dogs, sailing ships and steel. Europeans and Aztecs/Mayans/Incas were clearly very different, but perhaps not so much in the ways portrayed. Large historical interpretations usually benifit from deep historical foundations.

At 12:59 PM 3/8/97 +1300, you wrote:
>re Mayans And Doomsday
>
>Plus This!
>Previous transmission concerned communication: what is peculiar about this >for the Mayans and Aztecs is that there was an absence of writing. Stylised >drawings, the pictograms used among the Aztecs are not a lesser degree of >writing: they note the experience, not the langauge (one reason why Charles >Olson was so attracted to Mayan civilisation in terms of its resemblance to >Projective Verse - but that is another story).
>
>The absence of writing is revelatory of symbolic behaviour in general, and >at the same time, the capacity to understand the 'other' appears to be >illustrated by another fact. The three great AmerIndian civilisations >encountered by the Spanish are not located on the same evoution of writing.
>Then Incas are the most unfamiliar with writing, possessing mnemotechnical >use of braided cords; the Aztecs have pictograms and the Mayas have >pictograms with rudiments of phonetic writing. This corresponds directly to >the level of belief that the Spanish are Gods. The Incas firmly beieve in >this divine nature, the Aztecs do so only during initial exposure, and the >Mayans raise the question and answer it determining that the Spanish are >not gods, but rather 'strangers' or 'bearded ones' or 'powerful ones'.
>
>What is important that as writing cannot assume the role of memory support, >speech must do so - through ritual discourse (bardic activity). The >essential feature of these discourses then, is that they come from the past
>- both in production and interpretation. In to this past -oriented , >tradition dominated world erupts the conquest : an absolutely unpredictable >event, surprising and unique, even bringing with it another conception of >time (linear as opposed to cyclical).
>
>The collsion between a ritual world and a unique event results in >Montezuma's incapacity to react. Masters of ritual discourse the Indians >are inadequatte in a siuation requiring improvisation, and this is >precisely the siuation of their conquest. Their verbal experience favors >paradigm over syntagm, code over context, conformity to order over effacicy >of the moment, tha past over the present.
>
>So what lesson for poetics and the threat of an asteriod (ie an >unpredicatble, unique event)? Well, you will say, but the asteriod is >predictable, trackable, and not unique as it has happened before. Which is >precisely the point. Language denotes not only abiity to communciate and >style, but also predicates a certain genus, or type of interaction with the >world and other people. The usefulness of poetics - of investigation into >language, is that it is not simply investigation into langauge, but also >investigation into relationships (with people, world, the future and the >past) and any new way of interpreting or dealing with these future events >has to have a basis in the way we understand and deal with the present.

>That is why we write poetry.
>
>

↑ Index

187. Mark Weiss
(no subject)
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Sometimes those of us whose primary interest is language tend to inflate its >importance, coincidentally inflating our own in the process.

(ouch - Sometimes those of us whose primary interest is self importance tend to inflate it coincidentally by commenting on others' use of langauge.)

NB I use "us" advisedly--it's a trap I've been known to fall into myself.

↑ Index

188. Schuchat Simon
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

On Fri, 7 Mar 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:

> If pictograms are related in this easy way to belief systems and ability to react to the unexpected are the Chinese (were they ever) like the Mayans and Aztecs?

short answer is that the Chinese writing system, despite what Ezra Pound thought, is not pictographic. the characters are put together from elements that are variously phonetic, symbolic, mimetic, and which are recombined, re-current, etc. Although learning to read Chinese is generally conceived of as learning each word separately,in fact that isn't the case, e.g., the most common example is the character for a kind of fish that consists of the fish radical (re-curring character component) and a phonetic that sounds like the oral name of this fish. it is not alphabetic, of course, but in some senses it is syllabic in construction. (the Korean writing system is fully phonetic but it constructs words into identically sized boxes, so that they look like characters) there is a modern Chinese artist (I forget the name) who creates these wonderful "tian-shu" (heavenly or abstruse books) that consist of line after line of nonexistent characters, all of which could be real characters, since they are composed out of the regular character elements: these works are like inventories of all the words that do not yet exist in written Chinese.

meanwhile, that asteroid must be getting closer.

↑ Index

189. Daniel Zimmerman

Re: Russkies

Fri 7 Mar 1997

Pritchett,Pat @Silverplume wrote:
>
> Watched a portion of Tarkovsky's "Stalker" last night. Had to break off to > read "Ivan Ilyich" for class. My query is this: who is Arseny Tarkovksy, > listed in credits for writing poetry for film? Is he related to Andrei?
> Seems I've seen this name before in some anthology.
>
> Patrick Pritchett

Patrick -

In response to your question, Arseny Tarkovsky, (b. 1905), the poet, was Andrey Tarkovsky's father. Andrey frequently quoted his father's poetry in his films. If you are interested in knowing more about the filmmaker and/or his father the poet get ahold of the book, Sculpting In Time: The Great Russian Filmmaker Discusses His Art, translated from Russian by Kitty Hunter-Blair, University of Texas Press, Austin, 1987, ISBN 0-292-77624-1. If you're in Buffalo get this at Talking Leaves. That's where I got my copy.

Caryll Balzano

PS -
Check out all Andrey's films. He is brilliant. I'd love to have a discussion by e-mail about his work and what you think of it.

↑ Index

190. Mark Weiss

Re: asteroid to hit earth

Fri 7 Mar 1997

Thanks for the elucidation. Much the same is true of Mayan writing, as we've learned in the last few decades. Olson could not have known this. So the question, as a test of a theory, still stands.

At 09:16 AM 3/8/97 +0800, you wrote:
>On Fri, 7 Mar 1997, Mark Weiss wrote:
>
>> If pictograms are related in this easy way to belief systems and ability to >> react to the unexpected are the Chinese (were they ever) like the Mayans and >> Aztecs?
>
>
>short answer is that the Chinese writing system, despite what Ezra Pound >thought, is not pictographic. the characters are put together from >elements that are variously phonetic, symbolic, mimetic, and which are >recombined, recurrent, etc. Although learning to read Chinese is >generally conceived of as learning each word separately,in fact that >isn't the case, e.g., the most common example is the character for a kind >of fish that consists of the fish radical (recurring character component) >and a phonetic that sounds like the oral name of this fish. it is not >alphabetic, of course, but in some senses it is syllabic in >construction. (the Korean writing system is fully phonetic but it >constructs words into identically sized boxes, so that they look like >characters) there is a modern Chinese artist (I forget the name) who >creates these wonderful "tianshu" (heavenly or abstruse books) that >consist of line after line of nonexistent characters, all of which could >be real characters, since they are composed out of the regular character >elements: these works are like inventories of all the words that do >not yet exist in written Chinese.
>
>meanwhile, that asteroid must be getting closer.
>
>

↑ Index

191. Charles Alexander
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Fri 7 Mar 1997

> there is a modern Chinese artist (I forget the name) who creates these wonderful "tianshu" (heavenly or abstruse books) that consist of line after line of nonexistent characters, all of which could be real characters, since they are composed out of the regular character elements: these works are like inventories of all the words that do not yet exist in written Chinese.

Is this Xu Bing? I ask only because this is the only Chinese "book" artist I know, but I don't know much about his work, would love to know more.

charles alexander

↑ Index

192. Herb Levy
Marinetti, Musica Futurista, and more
Fri 7 Mar 1997

Anomalous Records here in Seattle just got several copies of a double CD re-issue of the Cramps LPs Musica Futurista, mentioned earlier in the week by Jerry Rothenberg as a source for recordings of Marinetti. The price was about US$29. They'll also be getting a new Heidseck book/CD set and new Henri Chopin CDs sometime later this month.

Anomalous Records
1402 E. Pike St., Seattle, WA 98122-4148, USA telephone: [redacted] fax: [redacted]
e-mail: <[redacted]>
www: <http://www.wolfenet.com/~anomaly/>

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

193. Hugh Steinberg
Re: mimeo revolution
Fri 7 Mar 1997

It comes from mimeograph, which according to Websters is a trademark. Mimeo probably comes from mimesis, to imitate or mimic, and graph is writing. Also known as a ditto machine, be glad you don't have to use one on a regular basis: they're messy, the paper is wet, the ink bleeds and smudges, the ditto masters exude blue dust, and they break down constantly. Pre-photocopier office technology at its finest.

↑ Index

194. Steven Clay
Chinese character
Sat 8 Mar 1997

This does very much sound like Xu Bing & his "A Book From The Sky" a several volume masterwork. Each of the characters in his imaginary alphabet was carved in wood and hand printed in China where Xu Bing lived until 1990. The design of the work is modeled after traditional Chinese scholarly publishing. About a hundered copies were produced. The entire edition was shown as one piece at the Elvehjem Museum of Art (Univ of Wisc-Madison) several years ago. They made a useful catalog which is probably still available at about $10. The catalog is called "Three Installations by Xu Bing" (Elvehjem Museum of Art, 800 University Ave., Madison WI 53706.

Date: Fri, 7 Mar 1997 19:59:05 -0700
From: Charles Alexander <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: asteroid to hit earth

> there is a modern Chinese artist (I forget the name) who creates these wonderful "tianshu" (heavenly or abstruse books) that consist of line after line of nonexistent characters, all of which could be real characters, since they are composed out of the regular character elements: these works are like inventories of all the words that do not yet exist in written Chinese.

Is this Xu Bing? I ask only because this is the only Chinese "book" artist I know, but I don't know much about his work, would love to know more.

charles alexander

↑ Index

195. MAXINE CHERNOFF
Offset OINK!
Sat 8 Mar 1997

Dear Listees: OINK! Magazine, 1971-1985, was an offset magazine. Issues 5-11 were done in our own dining room on an AB Dick Offset table model that rattled the whole place when it worked. Then we'd use a coffee mug to make the middle fold and have a stapling party. It (the mag.) was the precursor to NEW AMERICAN WRITING, which still publishes many of the same people.

Maxine Chernoff

↑ Index

196. Burt Kimmelman
Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
Sat 8 Mar 1997

Daniel Bouchard et alia,

Now that Saturday has rolled around I have a moment to give a more to the point response to your comments suggesting your disappointment with the issue of The Nation dated 3/17/97, whose cover story is "The Crushing Power of Big Publishing." While I accept your criticism of the tendentious tone of the cover article, I do not agree that what the article contains has all been said before. I'd like to think that I more or less keep up with this subject; and I learned a few things from the article about how and why news does and does not get reported, about the esthetics of that reportage and about its ethics as well, about how and why books of all stripes are or are not nowadays getting published or if they are getting published, and are worthy, why they may hardly see the light of day, and so on.

I hasten to point out, moreover, that the issue contains not one article on this subject, but six informed articles (not including a column called "Media Matters," which I will choose to count as a seventh relevant piece).

Did you note these other articles before you, in my regard, and with all due respect for what I believe, based on your past commentary on this list, is your integrity and acuity, glibly trashed a very important news event?

I only hope that others on this list will still feel inclined to check out the issue. I thought to mention it here especially because so many of us are involved in, and believe in, small press publishing, and in bookstores, and in literature.

Best wishes,

Burt Kimmelman

↑ Index

197. Gabrielle Welford
Dan in La Paz (fwd)
Sun 9 Mar 1997

I thought you'd like to know about this. Hurts my heart. gab.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Fri, 28 Feb 1997 23:43:30 +0100
From: Joy Moore <[redacted]>

The folowing is a forwarded message from Dan Moriarity, who is one of our friends from undergraduate and is now doing missionary work in La Paz, Bolivia.

> 24 February 1997, La Paz, Bolivia
>
> Hello family and friends,
> I'm writing to you all again to tell you about some recent developments here in La Paz. I mentioned in my last big e=mail that I was a little worried about an impending hunger strike. Well, it has started.
> In San Pedro, the men's prison where I work, and several other prisons in Bolivia, the prisoners have begun an indefinite "huelga de hambre." They have certain demands, and they plan on continuing the strike as long as it takes to get those demands met. During this strike they will only drink water and perhaps mate de coca (coca tea). They will be allowed to chew coca leaves, which Bolivians commonly do to kill hunger pain. Eight of the prisoners in San Pedro have begun a "huelga dura" (hard strike) in which they will not even chew coca or drink tea. They have actually sewn their mouths shut with surgical needles and thread, leaving just enough space to sip water.
> The demands are simple and reasonable. In fact, ironically so. The main thing many of the prisoners want is to be judged. Retardation of justice is a huge problem in Bolivia. Many of the accused have been in prison for years without trials or sentences (the eight inmates in the "huelga dura" have been in for over six years without trials under "ley 1008," the aggresive Bolivian anti-narcotics law).
> A law was passed a while back saying that if prisoners with serious charges were not tried within a year, they must be given provisional freedom until tried and judged. Well, the year is now up, and judges in many cases have simply refused to apply the law. The prisoners are demanding that the law be executed. Their second big demand is that parole be reinstated for those with serious sentences. There are conflicting policies currently on the books, as parole is still guaranteed by one law, but another proposal has been passed by certain bodies aboloshing it. It is not clear whether the proposal is legal, but it is clear that parole is not being granted. Both of these situations are especially urgent when one considers that San Pedro, not atypical of Bolivian prisons, was built for 300 prisoners and currently houses 1290, not counting the children who often stay there with their fathers.
> The hunger strike is a passive/pacifistic action. However, there were ugly incidents last night as the prisoners prepared to begin. A secret police agent was found posing as a prisoner and trying to turn other prisoners against the strike, and he was beaten up by cell-block delegates. Police then gassed the prison (tear gas is common and terrible enough in the streets of Bolivia, but in a prison there is nowhere to run to escape it). There are now over a hundred riot police inside the prison. Negotiations have been going on all day. The strikers have closed themselves into the chapel. Today as I stood with a group of women (family-members of inmates) across the street from San Pedro, the police came and tried to send the women away. They were threatening and insulting (I heard one offer tell a woman with one eye bandaged over that she needed to see the situation "with both eyes"), but I ran and got some press people who were down the street, and they came with camaras and scared the police away.

I was inside San Pedro yesterday (before any of the ugliness began). I went to mass there, and then met with some of the inmates with whom I work (in theology classes and a Base Christian Community). The men were prepared for the worst. They spoke of a strike "with all the consequences." Last month, when I first heard talk of a strike, a friend said it would be a "Bobby Sands-type" strike, refering to the IRA prisoner who died in a British jail during a hunger strike for prison reforms.
Needless to say, it was difficult to say good-bye to good friends as I left the prison yesterday, and hurt to watch the gate close behind me.
Several situations make this a tough fight for the prisoners. Mainly, the MRTA hostage situation in Lima, Peru. Many of the prisoners to whom the provisional liberty law should apply are political prisoners, charged with terrorism-related crimes. There are even MRTA prisoners here in La Paz. All the groups tend to be lumped together and viewed in the same light as the MRTA, and so no judge or politician is looking to do them any favors while the hostage crisis continues. Also, it is an election year, which makes public perception and misperception, especially regarding terrorism, more important than true justice. I got some insight into the attitudes of the authorities when the judge in charge of the case of one group of political prisoners said that the prisoners themselves were as responsible as anyone for the postponement of their trial because they had requested an investigation into their tortures! So, it looks like a long, hard struggle has begun.
I promised my friends in San Pedro that I would write this message, so that all of you, in Asia, Africa, Europe, North and South America, would know about their strike and their cry for justice. They are not demanding absolution, nor even new laws. Only that the laws already in place to protect their basic rights be excercised. They would very much appreciate your solidarity, in whatever form. Personally, I have decided that, as long as the strike continues, I will fast, "Ramadan style." That is, I will only eat after the sun goes down. For those of you who observe Lent, you might want to consider this or something similar as a Lenten observance and a way to be in communion with the prisoners of the Bolivian penal system.

> You internet masters may look for ways to pressure the Bolivian Government from wherever you are. But most of all, the prisoners would like to know that they are in your thoughts and prayers. Prison is a lonely place, but shut into a room without visits or food, it must be overwhelmingly so. For myself and for them, I thank you.
> Viva La Huelga!
> Peace and Justice,
> Dan
>
> Daniel J. Moriarty
> MMAF Bolivia
>
> ps For any of you who might read this and worry about me, please don't. I will not be entering the prison while things are so tense. I am convinced that the kind of moral/spiritual support I am asking of all of you is the best way that I can help right now, and I do not wish to jeopardize my work in the prisons by getting in any trouble with the police. And as for those of you (MOM) who worry about skinny little Dan deciding to fast, well, the sun has just gone down on day one of the strike, and I am about to prepare myself a heaping batch of Spaggetti Carbonara. The main objective here is mindfulness and solidarity, not self-abuse.
> ---
> Daniel Moriarty
>
> Telefono: - Fax:
> E-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

198. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest is silence golden?
Sun 9 Mar 1997

no messages for two days -- is server down (mine, poetics)? is this silence better than our usual loud chatter?
e
ps
what do people think about the message on umass amherst occupation -- is it for real? is it a necessary stand?
e

↑ Index

199. David R. Israel
Re: is silence golden?
Sun 9 Mar 1997

Sun, 9 Mar 1997 08:03:57, Eliza McGrand asks:
> is silence golden?

good question! Also: is e-chat silvern?

> no messages for two days -- is server down (mine, poetics)? is this silence better than our usual loud chatter?

same deal here -- but now seems the wheels are rollin' again -- seven msgs. lately circulated -- incidentally, though I usually get Poetics in digest form, I find that if I care to go no-digest for a time, presto! the listserv sends me an immediate part-digest of what's appeared since the last digest. Very convenient. But trying that yesterday & even earlier today, nada! nuthin'! -- so I'd say, yep, the Buffalo had wandered to another pasture. Now guess it's back in the proper plot.

Thanks, Burt K., for the further notes re: the current Nation -- will check it out. Just now reading something or other in The New Yorker, the Nation was characteized as a "neoliberal" publication (in contrast to some other mentioned as "neoconservative") -- maybe I've been living in the forest or something, but don't recall seeing this "neoliberal" as a modifier much anywhere before. Perhaps they merely wanted a nice parallelism w/ the long-ballyhooed neocon adjectival.

d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
| "...honk if you believe in geese" |
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\//&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\/////..'

↑ Index

200. Maria Damon
call for papers redux
Sun 9 Mar 1997

hey guyzies, deadline has been pushed back to april 1. i'm getting anxious; not too much cross-cultural stuff's been passing thru my mailbox; please share and circulate to other lists (postcolonial, american studies, cultural studies, af-am, etc)!!!

CALL FOR PAPERS

Conference: Cross-Cultural Poetics
Dates: October 16-19, 1997
Place: University of Minnesota, Minneapolis Campus
Keynote Speakers: Kamau Brathwaite, Diane Glancy, Dennis Tedlock, Kirin Narayan, David Antin

Despite artificial disciplinary barriers, ethnographers & poets have in recent years come to realize how similar their projects are. Cross-Cultural Poetics seeks to address the increasingly untenable boundaries between poetic & ethnographic practices. The conference will focus on the role of poetry in the on-going discourses of multiculturalism, ethnography, and literary theory and practice. While recent years have seen a debate in "how culture is written (about)" and most of these debates make extensive use of the term "poetics," poetic discourse itself has not been foregrounded in these debates. Construing the term "poetry" fairly broadly, we invite poets and scholars working in a broad range of fields -- anthropology, urban studies, ethnic studies, folklore, literature and literary theory, sociology, history, publishing, film, American studies, performance studies, ethnomusicology, cultural studies, etc. -- to propose readings, papers or panels that address the topic of cross-cultural poetics. the following are suggested topics, but you need not feel limited to them:

- Comparative Poetries &/or Poetic Traditions
- Oral/Literate Interfaces or Standoffs
- Anthropological Methodologies Applied to Poetic Texts, Communities, Events, or Individual Poems or Poets
- Ethnography as Poetry/Poetry as Ethnography
- Ethnic, Folkloric & Vernacular Poetries
- Poetry as Cultural & Social Praxis
- Poetry as Cultural & Social Critique
- Constituting Communities through Poetic Activity
- Poetry as Mass Culture
- Poetry & the Public Sphere
-Poetry and Politics
- The Anthropology of Writing & the Writing of Anthropology

- Representing Self/Other
- Issues in Cultural Translation
- "Ethnopoetics": Reappraisals?
- Poetry & Other Media (Song Lyrics, Music, Film, Movement, Visual Arts, etc.)
- Close Readings of &/or Listenings to Ethnographic Documents
- The Poetics of Thick Description
- Ritual, Play, etc. as Elements in Poetic Composition
- The Act of Inscription: Fieldnotes, Notebooks, etc.
- The Cultural Migration of Texts
- Hybridization of Genres & Traditions
-Trans/post/supra national Poetix?

PAPERS (and Writing Samples for people wanting to read) AND PANEL PROPOSALS (a 1-2-page abstract) should be sent by April 1, 1997 to Maria Damon, English Dept., 207 Lind Hall, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis MN 55455.

↑ Index

201. Douglas Barbour

Re: Pogo books?

Sun 9 Mar 1997

I got behind on reading the list, but if anyone is still interested, Dragon Press used to have a bunch of the Gregg Press reprints of Pogo books. You could try them at Dragon Press, PO Box 78, Pleasantville, NY, 10570. There were nine volumes, in hardcover @ $30, or #20 each.

==========
==========

Douglas Barbour
Department of English

University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta T6G 2E5
[redacted] FAX:[redacted]
H: [redacted]

Shakespeare
drag yr mouldy old bones

up these stairs & tell me
what you died of
I think
I've got it
too.
Sharon Thesen

↑ Index

202. Sylvester Pollet
Re: is silence golden?
Sun 9 Mar 1997

Sometimes silence is in the ear of the beholder. That is to say, I've been getting messages--suggest you check the archive to see/hear. (p.s., don't know about the p.s.)

> no messages for two days -- is server down (mine, poetics)? is this > silence better than our usual loud chatter?
> e
> ps
> what do people think about the message on umass amherst occupation -- is > it for real? is it a necessary stand?
> e

↑ Index

203. John Cayley book (not asteroid) from the sky
Sun 9 Mar 1997

> there is a modern Chinese artist (I forget the name) who > creates these wonderful "tianshu" (heavenly or abstruse books) that > consist of line after line of nonexistent characters, all of which could > be real characters, since they are composed out of the regular character
> elements: these works are like inventories of all the words that do > not yet exist in written Chinese.

Strange, I had just been thinking/writing about the 'Book from the Sky'. This is by the excellent Xu Bing (surname Xu), currently resident in NYC and exhibiting widely. Not sure that I agree with 'all the words that do not yet exist in written Chinese', I think they are a bit further out than that (but coming closer so, watch the skies).

I plan to do an essay on Xu Bing's work for a forthcoming book on Chinese literary/artistic culture in the 90s. Here is something I recently wrote about Xu Bing's work and emailed to a well-known colleague of ours:

... Xu Bing, who now lives (mostly) in NYC and has exhibited widely in the States, notably at the Elvehjem Museum of Art, University of Wisconsin-Madison in 1992, when he showed 'Book from the Sky'. I used characters from this book on the cover of the anthology of contemporary Chinese writing which I (Wellsweep) published in 1994, _Under-Sky Underground_. The following is the caption I wrote for the frontispiece of that book:

- "The cover artwork and the above illustration incorporate pages from Xu Bing's _Tian Shu_ or 'Book from the Sky'. This work, comprising a limited edition of a four volume, traditionally bound Chinese book in the style of a bibliographic rarity, was first exhibited in Beijing during October 1988 where it caused a sensation. Xu, a printmaker specializing in woodcuts, had carved the printing blocks for the books himself, entirely of 'characters' which are not found in any Chinese dictionary. His characters look as if they should be legible to someone who reads Chinese - they contain familiar strokes and components - but they are not. Neither is this a Chinese _Finnegans Wake_ - although the visual effect of the text is comparable - there are no construable segments of meaningful language. However, the material cultural forms of the Chinese literary and scholarly tradition are strictly, even lovingly, observed: a striking paradox and eloquent contribution to the continuing debate which rages amongst Chinese intellectuals concerning their relationship with their own tradition." - ? as well as a very interesting piece of applied grammatology.

- Xu Bing's latest project is a set of books describing his so-called 'Square Writing'. This is a method he has devised for writing English words in rectangular arrangements which resemble Chinese characters. There is a code of calligraphic script elements which map to the 26 roman letters, then relatively simple rules for the construction of the square words allow you to write English using Chinese calligraphic principles. As a piece of conceptual ?grammatological art, Xu Bing has composed and published a manual of 'Chinese calligraphy' entirely in these English 'square words' (it looks like a Chinese book, but once the code is learned it is perfectly legible as English) along with a companion volume of calligraphic models for (ink and brush) writing practice. (Books of this type are familiar and common in Chinese educational contexts.)

- > John Cayley / Wellsweep Press
http://www.demon.co.uk/eastfield/ 1 Grove End House 150 Highgate Road London NW5 1PD UK Tel & Fax: ([redacted] Email: [redacted] < -

↑ Index

204. Stephen Vincent
Re: mimeo
Sun 9 Mar 1997

One more miss: Blue Suede Shoes edited by Keith Abbot. Wonderful covers, not afeared of humor, etc. Went through about 20 issues with enough variant numbers to keep collectors/libraries jumping for years. I sometimes suspect that keeping a two page issue in an editon of say five of anything (book or mag) is the small press publishers illusion of a pension fund.

One more techno item not mentioned. My memory of one definition of sixtie's terror was the elecrtric stapler with the three quarter or one inch staples.

(These staplers usually had to found stationary in a printers shop - I forget if the "guns" had been invented yet) The huge seeming machine slam of the staples going through a half inch of stacked paper - and the question of whether or not your fingers might be included in the binding - I always found just plain scary as well as at odds with the contents of what I was publishing. But who said culture isn't built on violence!

↑ Index

205. Aldon L. Nielsen
Conference on Whiteness (fwd)
Sun 9 Mar 1997

---

for any in the Bay area who are interested -- It's free --

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Sat, 8 Mar 1997 11:03:29 -0800 (PST)
From: Helen Cavender <[redacted]>
To: "Aldon L. Nielsen" <[redacted]> Subject: Conference on Whiteness (fwd)
>---------- Forwarded message ----------
>
>PLEASE POST WIDELY!! PLEASE POST WIDELY!! PLEASE POST WIDELY!!
>
>The UC Berkeley Department of Comparative Ethnic Studies is pleased to >announce a conference:
>
>WHAT:The Making and Unmaking of Whiteness
>WHEN: April 11-13, 1997
>WHERE: Lipman Room, 8th floor Barrows Hall, UCB Campus.
>
>THE CONFERENCE IS FREE AND OPEN TO THE PUBLIC!!
>
>Participants include: Norma Alarcon, Allan Berube, Roxanne Dunbar-Ortiz, >Troy Duster, Michelle Fine, Shelley Fisher Fishkin, Neil Foley (pending), >Ruth Frankenberg, Cheryl Harris, John Hartigan, Jr., Saidiya Hartman, >Patricia Penn Hilden, Mike Hill, Aida Hurtado, Noel Ignatiev, Caren Kaplan, >Josh Kun, Eric Lott, Steve Martinot, Cameron McCarthy, Walter Benn
>Michaels, Annalee Newitz, Michael Omi, Sam Otter, Fred Pfeil, John Powell, >Jasbir Puar, David Roediger, Michael Rogin, Jose Saldivar, Alexander
>Saxton, Mab Segrest, Richard Walker, David Wellman, Lois Weis, Howard >Winant, and Yvonne Yarbro-Bejarano.
>
>For more information, see details below, or visit our website:

>
>http://violet.berkeley.edu/~ethnicst/conference/main.html
>
>or email us at: [redacted]
>
>*******
>*******
>CONFERENCE DESCRIPTION:
>
>As a recent articles in _American Quarterly_ and the _Chronicle of >Higher Education_ explain, there is a growing group of scholars who are >working in a new field: the study of whiteness. This field has expanded >over the past decade in part as a result of suggestions by intellectuals >like Toni Morrison, who have long suggested that race studies must include >a critical, self-reflexive body of work about whites >which is both anti-racist and progressive. Thus, the study of whiteness is >both comparative, in that whiteness is understood as one specific race >among others, and critical, in that whiteness is generally viewed as a >socially-constructed identity which has historically helped to perpetuate >social inequalities. Scholars of whiteness represent a very diverse range >of disciplines. Sociologists, historians, anthropologists, as well as >practitioners of ethnic, legal, cultural, and literary studies, are >bringing interdisciplinary methodologies and critical concerns to the study >of whiteness. Additionally, many anti-racist activists have spoken to >issues around whiteness as they appear in community organizing, coalition >building, and other forms of political movement.
>
>Our chief goal is to promote dialogue among scholars of whiteness across >the disciplines and throughout the UC system. Although scholars in the >field read and comment upon each other's work, there has not yet been an >opportunity for the kind of discussions and networking that a full- scale >conference permits. This conference is the first of its kind.
>Rigorously interdisciplinary,"The Making and Unmaking of Whiteness" >features presentations, works-in-progress, and respondents at the graduate >and professorial level. We have chosen a conference format which will be >conducive to discussion among participants. Audience members will be >encouraged to ask questions and given ample time and space to do so.
>_____
>TENTATIVE CONFERENCE SCHEDULE
>
>Friday, April 11
>

>9:00am Welcome Address: Michael Omi & Jose David Saldivar
>
>9:30am-12:00pm Panel 1
>
>Shelley Fisher Fishkin (moderator)
>
>Josh Kun: "The Yiddish are Coming!": Mickey Katz and American Whiteness"
>
>Eric Lott: "Race Traitor, Patriot, Iceman, Pig: The New Discourses of Whiteness"
>
>Annalee Newitz: "On the Whiteness of the Police"
>
>Fred Pfeil: "The Not-So-Great White Way: Some Lessons from the Fantasies of >the American Gulag"
>
>12:00-1:30pm Lunch
>
>1:30-4:00pm Panel 2
>
>Evelyn Nakano Glenn (moderator, pending)
>
>Michelle Fine: "'You're Stealing My Soul!': Preserving Whiteness as Quality >in a Public High School"
>
>Cameron McCarthy: "Reading the American Popular: Suburban Resentment and >the Representation of the Inner-City in Contemporary Film and Television"
>
>Lois Weis: "Re-examining 'A Moment in History': Loss of Privilege Inside >White Working Class Masculinity in the 1990s"
>
>Aida Hurtado: (abstract pending)
>
>4:30-7:00pm Panel 3
>
>Norma Alarcon (moderator)
>
>John Hartigan: "Establishing the Fact of Whiteness"
>
>Walter Benn Michaels: "Whiteness as Social Construct?"
>

>Mike Hill: "After Whiteness Studies"
>
>Cheryl Harris: "Deconstruction and Anti-Essentialism in Legal Discourse: >Reconstructing Whiteness"
>
>Saturday, April 12
>
>9:00-11:30am Panel 1
>
>Patricia Penn Hilden (moderator)
>
>Neil Foley: (pending)
>
>Howard Winant: "White Racial Projects: A Comparative Perspective"
>
>Caren Kaplan: "Whiteness in a Transnational Frame: Commodity Feminism in a >Era of Globalization"
>
>Ruth Frankenberg: "Locating Research on Whiteness"
>
>12:00-1:00pm Lunch
>
>1:30-4:00pm Panel 2
>
>Saidiya Hartman (moderator)
>
>Jasbir Puar: "Transnational Configurations of Desire: The Nation and its >White Closets"
>
>Allan Berube: "How Gay Stays White"
>
>John Powell: "The Fluidity of the Self and the Stability of Race"
>
>Yvonne Yarbro-Bejarano: "Whiteness in the Last Generation: The >'Half-Breed,' the Queer, and the Nation"
>
>
>4:30-7:00pm Panel 3
>
>Michael Rogin (moderator)
>

>Noel Ignatiev: "The New Abolitionism"
>
>Mab Segrest: "The Souls of White Folks"
>
>David Roediger: "Studying Whiteness: An African American Tradition"
>
>David Wellman: "Whiteness as a Site of Contestation"
>
>Sunday, April 13
>
>
>9:00-11:30am Panel 1
>
>Richard Walker (moderator)
>
>Roxanne Dunbar-Ortiz: "The Proof of Whiteness: More Than Skin Color"
>
>Steve Martinot: "Racialized Whiteness: Its Meaning, History, and Politics"
>
>Samuel Otter: "White Jackets"
>
>
>
>Alexander Saxton: "The Dance Macabre of Universalism, White Racism, and >Nationalism"
>
>
>11:30-1:00pm Bag Lunch and Closing Remarks: Troy Duster
>
>_____
>CONFERENCE ORGANIZERS
>
>Eric Klinenberg
>Irene Nexica
>Pamela Perry
>Birgit Rasmussen
>Kellie Stoddart
>Jillian Sandell
>Matt Wray
>
>Faculty Sponsors:
>

>Michael Omi
>Jose David Saldivar
>
>_____
>SPONSORS
>
> The Conference is sponsored by: the University of California Humanities >Research Institute, the Department of Comparative Ethnic Studies, Office >of the Dean of Social Sciences, Berkeley Graduate Assembly, Doreen B.
>Townsend Center for the Humanities, Beatrice Bain Research Group, Critical >Studies in Whiteness Working Group, and the UC Berkeley Departments of >African American Studies, American Cultures Program, American Studies >Program, Anthropology, Comparative Literature, and Geography.
>
>
>==========
>
>
>
Melissa S.K. Ponder
[redacted]
[redacted]
NW Center for Equity and Diversity
EDCC
20000 68th Ave. W.
Lynnwood, WA 98036

↑ Index

206. Toni Simon
Re: mimeo
Sun 9 Mar 1997

I remember asking Ann Waldman one day while she was stapling copies of The World magazine at St Mark's Church (as most of you probably know the home of The Poetry Project) if she had stapled all those copies with that cheesy little stapler and she said yes, and most of them herself (this was in the early 70's). She showed me the callouses on the heels of her hands, and I was so impressed I went out and bought the church a moderately priced one that probably didn't help that much. This was one of those experiences that taught me how much individuals can have an impact on the world of poetry if they are willing- sometimes literally- to take matters into their own, sometimes aching, hands.

↑ Index

207. Toni Simon
Re: mimeo
Sun 9 Mar 1997

Nick Piombino the author of this message this message not Toni SimonOn Sun, 9 Mar 1997, Toni Simon wrote:

> I remember asking Ann Waldman one day while she was stapling copies of The World magazine at St Mark's Church (as most of you probably know the home of The Poetry Project) if she had stapled all those copies with that cheesy little stapler and she said yes, and most of them herself (this was in the early 70's). She showed me the callouses on the heels of her hands, and I was so impressed I went out and bought the church a moderately priced one that probably didn't help that much. This was one of those experiences that taught me how much individuals can have an impact on the world of poetry if they are willing- sometimes literally- to take matters into their own, sometimes aching, hands.

↑ Index

208. Thomas M. Orange
robt kelly
Mon 10 Mar 1997

looking for advice on whether i should pick up a used copy of "the loom" (1975) in a used bookstore here. makes a nice intro into his work does it? better suggestions on volumes to start with? i'm familiar only with the stuff he included in his "controversy of poets" anthology. any decent critical overviews of his work? was fairly active in publishing journals and small presses, incl. some of zukofsky's stuff i understand.

any and all enlightenment appreciated.

tom.

↑ Index

209. KENT JOHNSON
creiner&asteroid
Mon 10 Mar 1997

I've been trying to contact Chris Reiner at [redacted] re: an article that's to appear in Witz, but keep getting it bounced back. Can anyone tell me if I have something wrong with the address? Plese backcahnnel if so and thanks.

It's pleasing that my initial post on the coming asteroid caused so many posts in return! That a first remark on impending, irrevocable catastrophe would refine itself after 40 or so posts into commentaries on a Chinese poet who composes in ethereal, invented characters seems fitting and beautiful, even if I can't say exactly why.

The universe imperceptibly corrects itself every so often without reason or warning. Nothing millenial about it.

Kent

↑ Index

210. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Burt,

I feel I've pissed you off somehow with my comment on the Miller article. Not my intention.

Still, I don't feel any differently about my post. I called Miller's article it a mediocre rant which is not trashing it so much as categorizing it. I did read the other articles, but like to keep my posts to the list brief.

I also follow this subject with great interest. I've learned a lot from reading Michael Parenti, Edward Herman, Ben Bagdikian, Solomon & Cohen of FAIR, etc. Miller's article, for me, illustrated previously made points with fresh examples. As for the world of small presses that we know, Miller seems unaware of its existence.

[redacted]

↑ Index

211. Pierre Joris
Re: perloff on anthologies
Mon 10 Mar 1997

P.Standard Schaefer wrote:
>
> Henry Gould:
>
> A refreshingly honest point of view on the snobbery/prestige issue. Tell me > what you think of > the Rothenberg/Norton Anthology

vass dat?

> though? I think it its > important to set your "school" up against the traditions from which it draws, > an avant garde tradition let's say. Doesn't the problem you outline make a > strong case for increasing student's sense of history in regards to poetry?
> I guess I found your comment about the naivete of the poet a little > flippant, but perhaps you did not intend it to be so.
>
> Standard Schaefer

--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://www.albany.edu/~joris/

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
one language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
it as a conquering assertation. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

↑ Index

212. Christopher Alexander
Re: is silence golden?
Mon 10 Mar 1997

> what do people think about the message on umass amherst > occupation -- is it for real? is it a necessary stand?

well, is it for real is one thing. there are at least a few (what is it) bostonians out there listening - any word?
i forwarded to some folks who oughtta know, but may not hear back for awhile.

took the precaution of writing a short letter of support. even if the event isnt for real, the demands are; in other words, this could be designed as a sort of terrorist attack & not a prank - possibly safer if less publically effective than the seizure of a university office. so id be glad to lend my support to that effort, too.

is it a necessary stand? well, the demands seem reasonable, though i would like to see a more detailed report on the situation surrounding their formulation. as to the means by which they were/are(?)/may be made, well, people dont usually take over offices & issue demands without some kind of provocation. i take it that the action itself indicates a climate of unrest & frustration, though of course only an account of the sequence of actual events could really legitimate that judgement.

so i guess no way to evaluate those claims from here at the moment.

chris

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

213. Christina Fairbank Chirot

Re: robt kelly

Mon 10 Mar 1997

Tom:

Yes--pick up "The Loom"--quite a weave as they say--

There's an excellent essay on "The Loom" by Edward Schelb in Sulfur 36. (Schelb also has a good review of Irby collection in that issue.)

On Mon, 10 Mar 1997, Thomas M. Orange wrote:

> looking for advice on whether i should pick up a used copy of "the loom" (1975) in a used bookstore here. makes a nice intro into his work does it? better suggestions on volumes to start with? i'm familiar only with the stuff he included in his "controversy of poets" anthology. any decent critical overviews of his work? was fairly active in publishing journals and small presses, incl. some of zukofsky's stuff i understand.
>
> any and all enlightenment appreciated.
>
> tom.

↑ Index

214. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Daniel,

No you didn't piss me off but I was looking for some clarification and maybe expansion. Anyway, I bow to your deeper knowledge of this subject. If you have the energy and time, I'd love to have a bibliog from you about this (back channel, hard copy, or maybe others on the list would welcome the same).

Warm wishes,

Burt

↑ Index

215. main
Re: robt kelly
Mon 10 Mar 1997

---

loom, yes.
a road map: _red actions: selected poems, 1960-1993_ (black sparrow).
on earlier kelly, see edward schelb's "'witness cycladic afrodita':
alchemy and the gateway to the tower" in _sulfur_ 36 (sp 95).
interesting interview of kelly by morrow in _conjunctions_, but can't recall #.
best,
dan featherston

↑ Index

216. Henry Gould
perloff on anthologies
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Hi everyone I'm back in digestible form, quiet & reserved, after a few long weeks (days?) of lenten fasting. Re: asteroids - not to worry. I have engaged in lengthy negotiations while I was away with the Space Commissariat division of the Girl Scouts of America. They have developed a new cookie, called the Biosphere Sponge, which both earthlings and asteroids will be able to share and enjoy in a multi- orbital, nondisruptive environment.

Have read M. Perloff's smart critique of toast-mod anthologies (_Who's New American Poetry_, diacritics f/w 1996). I guess it's probably already been chewed over here. Love the way she juxtaposes a Levertov with an Ammons poem to highlight the vagaries of us/them groupings. She points out how the fin-de-siecle non-consensus on what exactly is good poetry leads to both balkanization and pseudo-balkanization - and that they are the SAME THING!! What I'm not sure she succeeds in doing is making a convincing argument that the anthologies she critiques are much different, really, from the yearbook (_Exact Change Yearbook 1995_) she applauds. (None of them include either me or Jack Spandrift, for one thing. That proves it.) Seriously, though, a good guide to all this swimming mass of live fish poetry schools and groups is a prose writer: Proust. An anthology is a kind of crystallization of two kinds of Proustian illusion: the false "prestige" of literature and the snobbery of social groups. America is big and rich enough to contain 3 or 4 levels of insiders and outsiders - each with their own intricate techniques of apprenticeship, acceptance, back-scratching, membership, publication, and credentialism. What holds them all together is self-interest and snobbery. What redeems them is each writer's naive love for a certain style or approach to writing (regional, experimental, traditional in variegated ways). But the snobbery and the prestige are the same, across the board. (Paradoxically, in a survey conducted by Nordstrom Brothers, Jack Spandrift (samisdat) was by far the most popular poet among high school students in Wingdim, Wyo. They're all wearing "Spandrift spurs" on the backs of their necks.)

Little poets swim through the anthology-schools, but nothing substitutes for a lifetime, as Josephine Cliche wrote. It would be worthwhile looking for an approach to poetry which is conceptually deep enough to stretch beyond the borders of visual-surreal, rebel-young-fun, imagist-epical-engage, no-rhyme-anti-establishment-ha-ha, etc. It would be worthwhile looking for the individualist poet (the joke's on you, Club Poesie) like Jack Spandrift, who refuses to be included in ANY anthology, on principle. (Norton begged him for his sequence, "Dream of the Cube Steak" - without success.) - Henry Gould (Henry's new CD, "Why I am Not a Poet", is available from Providence School Fish & Aquarium Supplies, PO Box U-2, Prov RI 0299999. Send fish food only - barter economy in place)

p.s. when a critic at a poetry conference in Russia called poet Ivan Zhdanov "the first Russian postmodernist", Zhdanov broke a plate over his head. What say, Mandel?

↑ Index

217. Christopher Alexander
Re: mimeo revolution
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Ive really been enjoying this thread, having not been around for most of but I also want to put in with Loss on > a mimeo-revolution which, publishing history has shown, was not so much tied > to a particular type of machine but to a sense of how to make writing circulat e.

if it wasnt for photocopy, none of my own work would have appeared in print to date, & the same goes for many poets I know. not self-promotion

but I think some of the best work Ive seen circulates almost unseen in our midst. wasnt going to say anything about it until the project was further along but Ive been working clandestinely on a web site which will be devoted mostly to the circulation of self-published works & presses too small to appear in SPD etc. the idea is to make the work public, available for trade or sale etc. its going to be coupled with an ezine which will deal mostly with the publications resident onsite but really anything else too. what I mostly need now I guess are people who would be interested in participating. Ive got some more work to do on the site but Im fast approaching the point at which it has to be opened up to contributors. that means books etc that people would like to see posted there, work, short essays, reviews. people are welcome to come take a look at the site & then email me with suggestions or material etc. the address is http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/index.html

& you can reach me from there (or here). also Id appreciate it if youd pass this information along to people you know who publish their own work or run very small presses or press collectives (like the recently-announced newly-reconstituted SMALL PRESS COLLECTIVE).

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

218. Christopher Alexander
Re: the blushing power
Mon 10 Mar 1997

---

joseph wwroth:
> I missed the early part of this thread: what was the question no question - daniel registered his low opinion of the recent the Nation big bin publ bus.ness.
havent read it yet myself.
chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

219. Joe Safdie
Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Just a quick note to say that I found the article in question OK (especially when judged in context with the others), but it does suffer from an affliction that plagues a lot of NATION articles -- a kind of "preaching-to-the-converted" laziness, so that one doesn't really know anything new at the end, but already-formed biases and notions get reconfirmed.

But Christopher Hitchens has been spectacular lately; check out his column on Clinton (a month ago now), a masterpiece of invective, and the first two paragraphs of his Mother Theresa column in this issue: it's just politics, of course, but he has what they used to call "high style," and it's very funny.

And David Levi-Strauss, whom some of you might know, has gotten a few reviews published in THE NATION lately, as well, on Michael Palmer's latest book and a book of letters from John Berger to his daughter; the second, especially, I found very fine.

↑ Index

220. P.Standard Schaefer
Re: perloff on anthologies
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Henry Gould:

A refreshingly honest point of view on the snobbery/prestige issue. Tell me what you think of the Rothenberg/Norton Anthology though? I think it its important to set your "school" up against the traditions from which it draws, an avant garde tradition let's say. Doesn't the problem you outline make a strong case for increasing student's sense of history in regards to poetry? I guess I found your comment about the naivete of the poet a little flippant, but perhaps you did not intend it to be so.

Standard Schaefer

↑ Index

221. David Kellogg
Re: perloff on anthologies
Mon 10 Mar 1997

I too found the juxtaposition of Ammons and Levertov in Perloff's essay quite illuminating, though there are differences in vocabulary, stance toward subject, and line break that are not touched upon. There were lots of other wonderful moments in the piece too; as for Exact Change, her claims will be more testable when & if Volume II comes out -- is that going to happen or not?

However, Perloff's discussion of identity politics in that essay (as elsewhere in Majorie's work) I find really quite disturbing. It seems to me that her attitude toward such issues exists in a tense relationship, to put it mildly, with the surface pluralism of the piece. (In this regard it's interesting to find that her piece, for me, confirms some of my criticisms of her work in the same issue of _Diacritics_.)

Anybody else want to juxtapose our respective contributions and see what sparks fly?

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

>even if the event isnt for real, the demands are; in other >words, this could be designed as a sort of terrorist attack >& not a prank - possibly safer if less publically effective >than the seizure of a university office. so id be glad to >lend my support to that effort, too.
>
>is it a necessary stand? well, the demands seem reasonable,
>though i would like to see a more detailed report on the >situation surrounding their formulation. as to the means by >which they were/are(?)/may be made, well, people dont >usually take over offices & issue demands without some >kind of provocation. i take it that the action itself indicates >a climate of unrest & frustration, though of course only an >account of the sequence of actual events could really >legitimate that judgement.
>
>so i guess no way to evaluate those claims from here >at the moment.
>
>chris
>..
>christopher alexander, etc.
>[redacted]
>(Marriott Library Computer Systems)
>
>language code not found. illegal operation error.
>this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be
>lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.
>
>

↑ Index

223. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

Re: perloff on anthologies

Mon 10 Mar 1997

---

your jack spandrift sounds like a compatriot of mine -- missy laPrism. missy has an impressive resume -- she has not been included in the all the most prestigious anthologies around. norton sent flowers for weeks, had them hand-delivered by the handsomest Bright Young Things in the intern department, and even had some Bright Young Females in case they had got her all wrong... and money, i won't even tell you! but missy refused; no, she said, she had to stand up for her principles. she would not be included. where, after all, would her Rebel Outsider stance, her entire "i am uniquely underappreciated" position be? and think of her career, based as it is on papers about the real inside story of Boheme -- if she were anthologized, she would lose all credibility. she might even lose tenure, based, as it is on her distinguished record of non-publication. no, come what may, missy laPrism will not anthologize... e

↑ Index

224. amato
Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
Mon 10 Mar 1997

---

those interested in reading the feature story, discussed here, on the web can find it at http://www.TheNation.com/issue/970317/0317mill.htm

best,

joe

↑ Index

225. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Special Issue of THE NATION on Publishing
Mon 10 Mar 1997

I'll agree with Joe Safdie.

Burt

↑ Index

226. eric pape
Re: asteroid to hit earth
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Bakker in Dinosaur Heresies proved conclusively not only that dinos were not at all reptilian but in fact were not offed by an asteroid. In fact, multiculturalism did them in. It seems there was suddenly a land bridge between the hemispheres and wham bam all these diseases and unsavory miscengenation extincted them. The lesson here of course is to give all your poetry not to stop stuff from outer stuff but to Bennett's fight against the softening of traditional western culture, pure and uncluttered. Thanks, Eric (ps Bakker did write that).

↑ Index

227. simon
19th C Japanese poetics
Mon 10 Mar 1997

From: IPFW::SIMON 10-MAR-1997 17:03:55.60
To: MX%"[redacted]@acsu.buffalo.edu"
CC: SIMON
Subj: 19th C Japanese poetry

Very sorry to run this on the list, but I've lost the name of the sender....

When I queried the list about deixis, would the person who contacted me about 19th C Japanese poetics please contact me again. Thanks!

beth simon

↑ Index

228. Wystan Curnow
Re: robt kelly
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Tom,
buy it, i did.
Wystan

↑ Index

229. KENT JOHNSON
Re: CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String
Mon 10 Mar 1997

Dear Herb:

the CD is fantastic! I am aware that I still owe you for it--it's comeing.
Thanks,

Kent

> Date sent: Mon, 10 Mar 1997 23:23:34 -0800
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
> Subject: CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument
> To: [redacted]
>
> My new company, Periplum, released it's first CD, Suspended Music by Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument, earlier this year. It's a really great CD featuring the combined forces of DLB (Stu Dempster, David Gamper & Pauline Oliveros) & Ellen Fullman's Long String Instrument performing > recent long works by Pauline Oliveros and Ellen Fullman. Other discs to be released this year include the 2nd release by the collaborative group Land (Jeff Greinke, Lesli Dalaba, Dennis Rea, et alia); New Songs commissioned by David Mahler & Ann Obery from eleven US composers; and recordings of interactive computer music by Martin Bartlett, including performances by Peter Hannan, George E Lewis, & Frances-Marie Uitti.

>
> We had a great CD party in Austin a couple of weeks ago with Ellen, and there are more release parties on the way. Hey, wait, here's some now, near where you live:
>
> Friday, March 14, 1997 5-7 pm
>
> The Gallery at Deep Listening Space
> 74 Broadway
> Kingston, NY 12401
>
> Saturday, March 15, 1997 4-7 pm
>
> Roulette
> 228 West Broadway
> New York, NY 10013
>
> Sorry for this impersonal bulk mail, I hope to get a chance to talk to you when I'm in your neck of the woods.
>
> Bests
>
> Herb
>
> Herb Levy
> [redacted]

↑ Index

230. k.a. hehir
londonOnt
Mon 10 Mar 1997

---

poeTrypoetRE:poemsRe:poeTry
Wajdi Jenn Bright
Kate Kenwell
Dr. Hugo Alexander of phuc Tom Orange

an evening of verse navigated by Kevin Angelo Hehir

at the always delicious WHIPPET LOUNGE
Tuesday March 11, 1997 in the Embassy Hotel
732 Dundas St. E
8:30 PM [redacted]

but the white of the snow eats the eyes to the quick Osip Mandelstam

↑ Index

231. Mark Roberts
Re: creiner&asteroid
Mon 10 Mar 1997

---

cute....a post on giant asteriods keeps bouncing.....
.
.
.

>I've been trying to contact Chris Reiner at [redacted] re:
>an article that's to appear in Witz, but keep getting it bounced >back. Can anyone tell me if I have something wrong with the >address? Plese backcahnnel if so and thanks.
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

232. Thomas M. Orange
robt kelly
Tue 11 Mar 1997

---

thanks to stephen, pierre, dave, dan, joe, aldon, and wystan for the advise and guidance with robert kelly. much reading to do now.

cheers,
tom

```
 _____________________________________
| Alle Dinge, an die ich mich gebe |
| werden reich und geben mich aus  |
|            - Rilke -            |
~~~
```

it as a conquering assertation. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

by sarah.albany.edu (8.8.5/8.8.5) with ESMTP id FAA04914
for <[redacted]>; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 05:04:34 -0500 (EST)
(8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk); Tue, 11 Mar 1997 09:10:12 GMT
(8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk) with SMTP; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 09:10:09 GMT
(8.6.12/ for dur.ac.uk) with SMTP; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 08:41:04 GMT
Date: Tue, 11 Mar 1997 08:41:01 +0000 (GMT)
From: R I Caddel <[redacted]>
To: british n irish poets <[redacted]>
Subject: CCCP
to [redacted]

Message from Peter Riley says, Can you put this out on your list thingy, as we're a bit late with publicity this year...

C.C.C.P.

The seventh annual Cambridge Conference of Contemporary Poetry will take place Friday to Sunday April 25th-27th at Kings Colleg Cambridge. For very particular reasons the event this year will emphasise non-British poetry, with poets from Australia (John Tranter, Tracy Ryan), Canada (Karen Mac Cormack, Deanna Ferguson), France (Dominique Grandmont and Emmanuel Hocquard), Belgium (Pierre-Yves Soucy), Sweden (Staffan Soderblum). Also Fiona Templeton, David Chaloner, Grace Lake.

Bookings and information: Ian Patterson, Kings College Cambridge. tel. 01223 576422

Information: Peter Riley, 27 Sturton Street, Cambridge. tel. 01223 576422

----------4447111147FE--

↑ Index

235. Pierre Joris
[Fwd: pig pig offers]
Tue 11 Mar 1997

This is a multi-part message in MIME format.

Can't remember seeing this on the list -- Ric posted it only to the BritPoet list, though it gives US prices too -- excellent little press, go & buy a pig or 2 -- Pierre
--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202

tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://www.albany.edu/~joris/

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
one language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
it as a conquering assertation. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

by sarah.albany.edu (8.8.5/8.8.5) with ESMTP id JAA20347 for <[redacted]>; Mon, 10 Mar 1997 09:46:07 -0500 (EST)
(8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk); Mon, 10 Mar 1997 14:31:49 GMT
(8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk) with SMTP; Mon, 10 Mar 1997 14:31:46 GMT
(8.6.12/ for dur.ac.uk) with SMTP; Mon, 10 Mar 1997 14:31:45 GMT
Date: Mon, 10 Mar 1997 14:31:39 +0000 (GMT)
From: R I Caddel <[redacted]>
To: british n irish poets <[redacted]>
Subject: pig pig offers
to [redacted]

Amazing offers on these Pig titles until after Easter. All prices are in POUNDS STERLING:

Tony Baker : Scrins 5.50
Guy Birchard : Birchard's Garage 5.90
William Corbett : Schedule Rhapsody 2.50
Kelvin Corcoran : TCL 4.00
Robert Creeley : Memories 2.50
George Evans : Nightvision 3.20
Allen Fisher : Stepping Out 5.50
Roy Fisher : It Follows That 2.90
Lee Harwood : Monster Masks 3.90
Alasdair Paterson : The Floating World 3.20
Maurice Scully : The Basic Colours 6.95
Catherine Walsh : Pitch 5.95

UK individuals: 20% off four or more items; post free

UK libraries: 20% off four or more items; post free

US individuals: 20% off four or more items; add a pound per item to cover post, and payment in Sterling only, please (otherwise all titles available through SPD).

Orders to this e-mail address, or by post to: Pig Press, 7 Cross View Terrace, Durham DH1 4JY, quoting "BritPo Offer 1997". Phew.

Richard Caddel
Durham University Library, Stockton Rd., Durham DH1 3LY, UK
E-mail: R.I.Caddel @ durham.ac.uk
Phone: [redacted] Fax: [redacted]
WWW: http://www.dur.ac.uk/~dul0ric

"Words! Pens are too light. Take a chisel to write."
- Basil Bunting

----------1E537FDD7BD9--

↑ Index

236. Herb Levy
CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument
Tue 11 Mar 1997

My new company, Periplum, released it's first CD, Suspended Music by Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument, earlier this year. It's a really great CD featuring the combined forces of DLB (Stu Dempster, David Gamper & Pauline Oliveros) & Ellen Fullman's Long String Instrument performing recent long works by Pauline Oliveros and Ellen Fullman. Other discs to be released this year include the 2nd release by the collaborative group Land (Jeff Greinke, Lesli Dalaba, Dennis Rea, et alia); New Songs commissioned by David Mahler & Ann Obery from eleven US composers; and recordings of interactive computer music by Martin Bartlett, including performances by Peter Hannan, George E Lewis, & Frances-Marie Uitti.

We had a great CD party in Austin a couple of weeks ago with Ellen, and there are more release parties on the way. Hey, wait, here's some now, near where you live:

Friday, March 14, 1997 5-7 pm

The Gallery at Deep Listening Space
74 Broadway
Kingston, NY 12401

Saturday, March 15, 1997 4-7 pm

Roulette
228 West Broadway
New York, NY 10013

Sorry for this impersonal bulk mail, I hope to get a chance to talk to you when I'm in your neck of the woods.

Bests

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

237. Herb Levy
Re: CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument
Tue 11 Mar 1997

Sorry about the message with this header showing up on the list. I've already mentioned these events here enough.

My Eudora nicknames file is more screwed up than I'd thought when my earlier message to Kenny Goldsmith went to the whole list. It turns out more than one person has the list address included as part of their own e-mail address. I think I've got rid of all of this duplication now.

Bests,

H

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

238. KENT JOHNSON
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

This is a realy interesting discussion, and very intelligent on all parts, I'd say. A few years back I tried to articulate some of my own thoughts on similar matters in the Notes section of Sulfur, responding to an essay by Jed Rasula. My attempt was critical of certain early langpo positions, and tho littered with grad school jargon I was excited to spew at the time, I recall it raises soem issues (as does Rasula's essay in his usual brilliant ways) that connect with this new thread. Anyway, should anyone care to look, this is in Sulfur 24. I vote for more people jumping in on this. This is imporatnt, no?

> Date sent: Tue, 11 Mar 1997 14:17:19 -0600
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: [redacted]

Subject: Re: "deeply disturbed"
To: [redacted]

dodie, i see your point... i'm finding it so very difficult to respond to this issue w/o casting stones, as it were... and being my typical long-winded self...

i bring up teaching b/c it's simply one public context in which i often find mself... there are others, sure... let me say it this way: i can see marjorie's point, which i take to be your point --- that it's often difficult as hell even to discuss matters of form, and that, perhaps partly as a result, it's often difficult to be publicly critical of minority/ethnic writers' work on the basis of form... of course this is a function of audience, context...

*but the same could be said for mainstream white guys' writing too... to be critical of a white guy's conservative approach to form will not go over big in many circles... albeit one might not be labeled a racist as a result of such criticism... still, my point here is that it's one thing to concern oneself with problems owing to critical reception (being viewed a racist, say, b/c of one's critical response), it's another to suggest that problems owing to critical reception stem from the formal tendencies of the writing being critiqued... now i'm not saying anybody has said this, but it seems to me that the intimation is present... if 'minority writing' is deemed shallow, say, in terms of identity politics or formal innovation, this doesn't mean that the writing itself is to be held accountable for (as suggested) a certain reticence as to saying so... this reticence is more a function of larger dynamics between communities, in which the writing in question as well as other such writing (white guys' writing) does in fact play a role...*

*so what's at issue here, as i see it, has still to do with the ways different communities---poets and their critics, black white and brown---come to the work... i mean, i still don't see, again, how we can avoid both the matter of cultural work and the matter of aesthetics (which latter we can discuss, as you suggest, in terms of the bias against discussions of form as such)...*

btw, as a white guy who grew up in so many ways in a working class household (like you) i guess i don't mind so much that i should be so associated... but i'd hate to be pigeon-holed as same, whatever this might mean aesthetically (in fact i can't stand the thought of being pigeon-holed aesthetically!)... so i see your point here... i suspect that my more recent work, in fact, being both more conventional, more male-centered, and more working class (and, dare i say it?, more marketable!) is likely down the road to give me some real conniptions, critically... i mean, from critics... it's already given my creative|critical side its share of headaches...

> best,
>
> joe

↑ Index

239. Michael Boughn
Re: perloff on anthologies
Tue 11 Mar 1997

> An anthology is a kind of crystallization of two kinds of Proustian illusion: the false "prestige" of literature and the snobbery of social groups. America is big and rich enough to contain 3 or 4 levels of insiders and outsiders - each with their own intricate techniques of apprenticeship, acceptance, back-scratching, membership, publication, and credentialism. What holds them all together is self-interest and snobbery. What redeems them is each writer's naive love for a certain style or approach to writing (regional, experimental, traditional in variegated ways). But the snobbery and the prestige are the same, across the board.

I don't think I've ever read a better analysis of the anthrpologizing process in the market economy. Thank you, Hankski. Here's a plate on yer head.

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

240. henry gould
anthologies?
Tue 11 Mar 1997

BALLADE LITTERAIRE

I wanted to write. I had it in mind to astonish the world, with a vision quite new.
I memorized all the Great Verse I could find.
I measured, and metered, and rhymed a lot too.
I sent my work sailing to Kalamazoo, and Great Neck and Austin and South Liverwurst... kind Editors wrote back to ask - Who are you?
And one proverb stood by me. Through every reverse.
The first shall be last - the last shall be first.

I saw my subjectivist Ego unwind.
I joined a Collective - they knew what to do.
We wrote for each other. That Postmodern bind of Theory and Action - l'Autre - c'est nu - negativity - nebulous - transfigured - _blue_...

We Hugged and Supported. Each Other we nursed.
Soon voluptuous Fame warbled..._Poetry! ooh!_
and read from a Book - with her lips pertly pursed:
The first shall be last - the last shall be first.

My peers were advising me - scrape through the rind of conventional wisdom. She just wants to screw.
So I went to the doorway. Her boudoir was lined (compacted, in fact) with a jostling crew of suitors... New Critics, Old Masters - Langpo, Beat, Formalist - Outsider, Insider - Cursed-and-Blest - all Frustrated by that monotonous moo glued on every last gallant (from fine-assed to worst) -
The first shall be last - the last shall be first.

I never made love to her. Neither will you.
But I've mastered her mantra. I've often rehearsed.
And if you want a glimpse - you'll whisper it too.
With lips pertly pursed (you should get undressed first).
The first shall be last - the last shall be first.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

241. Tom Mandel
Zhdanov
Tue 11 Mar 1997

> p.s. when a critic at a poetry conference in Russia called poet Ivan Zhdanov "the first Russian postmodernist", Zhdanov broke a plate over his head. What say, Mandel?

Having rubbed bellies with Ivan Zhdanov (literally: we were attempting to move past each other at a very crowded party) I can say from close up that he is much taller than I.

Fortunately we are in agreement on the subject and category called post-modernism. It's a marketing term, like "crunch" or "classless."

Tom

Tom Mandel
****
Screen Porch * [redacted]
4031 University Dr. Suite 200 * vox: [redacted]

Fairfax, VA 22030-3409 * fax: [redacted]
****

↑ Index

242. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

Re: anthologies?

Tue 11 Mar 1997

---

yes there is a clique mentality at work in anthologies, but you know, there is clique mentality at work whenever two or more beings shall gather in any name...

i'll do my usual ambiguous experiential fence-sit here: when i was a kid, about 9, i found a poetry anthology in my brother's books, the laurence perrine Sound and Sense, one of the early ones. i remember liking a few things in it, being fascinated enough to want to read but not having quite the stamina yet. i came back, periodically. the anthology worked perfectly as a vehicle for this, though to be fair, it was a textbook, and that helped in that i got explanations for things and historical notes. i had a few books by individual poets, but couldn't read them -- too much, too confusing. the anthologies gave me a chance to pick at particular poems, get a sense of how poems work in general. around the age of 15, i started being ready for books of poems -- my first were sexton, plath, and dickinson. and there lies the rub: when i went back to the perrine in more of an age of reason, i realized that there were almost no women writers in it. almost no black writers. now, it was an old edition but still...

the norton, the massive compendium of about 1800 pages on thin thin paper, was great in that i could find works that were referred to easily. and i could find work by authors whose names i came across right away, much of the time. BUT, again, BUT, women were grossly underrepresented, and, as has been mentioned by someone else, what you read is the anthologist's idea of a "great" poem. often, with skilled anthologists, when i've gone to complete works, i've agreed with the choices, but there have been exceptions. richard hart lovelace gets anthologized on the basis of lucasta, to althea from prison, occasionally "The Grasshopper," and in a few (norton is one), the gorgeous gorgeous "To Amarantha, that She Would Dishevel Her Hair" ("Every tress must be confessed/ But neatly tangled at the best;/ Like a clue of golden thread,/Most excellently ravelled").

but what almost never gets anthologized, and which, when compared to the well known lines of lucasta "I could not love thee, dear, so much/ loved I not honor more," is "A Loose Saraband." Lucasta was written in lovelace's early years, when he was a beautiful honored young man at court, when Charles I presided with his family, when lovelace's life seemed to open into a halcyon of family, honors, riches, glory... then came the civil war, the massacres right and left, the despoilings, pillages, rapes. it has never been clear whether lovelace ever was a soldier, but he was put in prison twice and his brothers fought. he saw his family impoverished, his future destroyed, his fortune confiscated... and then he wrote "A Loose Saraband." for a description of a country in a firestorm of civil war, try, from the poem entreating a fellow drunk at a tavern to go off and have sex, "See all the world how't staggers,/More ugly drunk than we,/ As if far gone in daggers,/ And blood it seemed to be" and then, in the final couplet, the wrenching (set in biographical/contextual frame) "Now, is there such a trifle/ As Honour, the fool's giant?/ What is there left to rifle,/ When wine makes all parts pliant?/ Let others glory follow,/ In their false riches wallow,/ And with their grief be merry;/ Leave me but love and sherry."

this poem doesn't make it into the anthologies -- i think because everyone is so enamored of the image of the courtly cavalier poet that they don't _see_ or want to see, or want to have as part of the writer, the bitter, disillusioned, agony of the last years, as well as the no longer high flown, but often more compassionate writings. anthologies encourage quick snapshots, easily tagged and sorted "representations." all part of what i hve railed on about before, the desire for Mastery OF All Texts. if you can sort, do quick and dirty and shallow summations of selection, you can say you "Know" all about a writer. i'd have less of Knowing All About X or Y and how it Fits Into the Grand Critical Trend of the Blahblahblah years, and more of a sensitive, deep, perhaps by necessity poet-by-poet, analysis of bodies of text, with allowance given for much more complexity, changes in feeling and opinion, effects of history...

all right, off my dull soapbox...
e

↑ Index

243. Robert Archambeau
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

> *i don't mind saying here, anyway, that it's pretty easy to be misunderstood when one slams the writing of a minority poet, however justifiably... but i don't mind saying here, as well, that i've noted a tendency at times on poetics to be down on more conventional work, even more conventional work that, imnsho, is exemplary*

Joe:

I sympathize with you in both of your conundrums.

Regarding the first dilemma (good politics and bad aesthetics) :

What can you do with writing that is at the same time politically astute or important and also the worst sort of kitsch? Your painstaking process of discussing "both the sociopolitical/cultural work done by the poems . . . and the ways in which the aesthetics work or don't" seems like the only reasonable way to treat the topic, better than an easy dismissiveness based on either political or aesthetic grounds.

Regarding the second (exemplary conventional work):

The issue you raise is important, and deserves extended discussion on this list. Eavan Boland, widely considered to be both conventional and exemplary, and now working among the Bay area's experimental community, put the problem this way in a recent interview (forthcoming in the next Notre Dame Review http://www.nd.edu/~english/ndr/ndr.htm):

"The issue in poetry is not the multiplication of poetries. It's the fact that there isn't yet a language of respect between these poetries."

And the solution she advocates involves a painstaking process like that you advocate for the first of your two dilemmas:

"I think one of the new tasks of workshops everywhere over the next decade is going to be to widen their vocabulary not just to speak about poetry, but to engage with, and develop a language of respect for the energies of other communities and other ideas of craft. The alternative is just sterile division . . ."

This list seems like the right venue for notes toward such a language.

It will be a good interview to check out when it appears in the next issue (and I'm not just saying that because I conducted it).

Robert Archambeau

↑ Index

244. Marjorie Perloff

Re: "deeply disturbed"

Tue 11 Mar 1997

My friendly antagonist David Kellogg is "deeply disturbed" about what I say about identity politics. Sometimes I wonder if David reads what I write.

What I say, for the record, is that, whereas in 1959 Don Allen could put together an anthology of "the" new American poetry, an anthology that pretty accurately pitted the counterculture against the establishment, in the 1990s, there can no longer be ONE counterculture anthology and so attempts to produce one that is "the" avant-garde can't wholly succeed. And I write: "More important: the eightiies witnessed the coming of the minority communites. . . In their inception, many of these poetries were, ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric, and the ontology of the poem were concerned. But counterculture poets and critics couldn't--and still can't--say this out loud because they would have immediately been labeled racist or sexist. And thus the picture has become increasingly clouded. " and then I go on to complain about the absence of all but U.S. poets in most of the new anthologies.

Now David perfectly proves my point by implying I'm somehow making a racist statement. What I meant, of course, is that the mainstream anthologies today like the Norton will include a lot of, say Rita Dove, because she's a black woman when the Norton doesn't even include Zukofsky, Reznikoff etc. not to mention Harryette Mullen, Erica Hunt, Will Alexander, or Charles Bernstein, Susan Howe, Lyn Hejinian--well, the list goes on and on, right? This is where identity politics does indeed cloud the picture because if you object to these inclusions or exclusions you are immediately branded.

I myself am "deeply disturbed" that, at the moment, on this list, people worry so much about what, say, Ed Dorn either said or didn't say and are not deeply disturbed --it seems--by the erosion of all democracy in Washington, where recent events make clear elected office or cabinet appointments that need congressional approval mean less and less, the real power coming only from those who can write a check for $100,000 at the drop of a hat. Clinton's remark that he just loves to listen to people and get good ideas--that was deeply disturbing--since he obviously doesn't listen to 99% of the population that doesn't have that kind of money.

The Left has recently written brilliantly on Clintonism--read Christopher Hitchens, Alexander Cockburn etc. But in the poetry world where post "Reagan-Bush" there seems to be no commentary on anything that goes on in the White House, there has been a curious refusal to criticize. How about Clinton's demand yesterday that the Federal Government hire the welfare people, whose money he cynically took away? And now it turns out there are no entry-level Federal jobs since he downsized the government just last year.

What I'm trying to say, badly probably, because email is not the easiest writing venue, is that, yes, I am opposed to identity politics in its crude form and no, that doesn't make me a racist, and if we want to be political, let's be political and try to do something about what is happening in Washington.

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

245. Daniel Bouchard/College/hmco
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

I agree with so much of what Marjorie Perloff has just said that my first reaction is to NOT post anything that may merely reverberate like an "Aye" (as opposed to a "Nay"). The problem--perhaps "my" problem-- is the dymanics of e-mail interaction, so that when poet Dorn's remarks on race come up in discussion, the "thread" resembles one of those hand-held aerosol canisters that spray some kind of colored polymer goo more than it resembles a pattern, as in a tapestry, etc. The goo is fun but messy. Tapestries are useful and ornamental.

If the list touches upon something like "the erosion of all democracy in Washington" then the discussion, if it flourishes at all, will turn archival and meditative, in diminutive posts, always going back to poets (& what they may or may not have said) coeval with administrations of long ago.

People's sense of protocol differs; what wants to be included in the discussion, disagreements about much. In a sense, the List epitomizes democracy.

But generalizations are useless since most people signed on don't write anything at all.

[redacted]

↑ Index

246. amato
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

i'm struck by what marjorie is saying in her last post... i don't mean to contribute to any vitriole here... but the problem goes back to this question of judgment, as i see it... something that we hammer through on poetix every now and again, but never seem to resolve... in part b/c it can't be resolved for once and for all...

let me step back a moment, to an earlier variant: while it's clear that critics can now ask, fruitfully, what sort of cultural work is done by a poem (or a novel, say, or whatever), it's likewise clear that this doesn't resolve the judgment (quality) issues... i mean, to bracket the political per se for just a second, it's constructive that we should be at odds over our aesthetics per se... this is one aspect of what writers busy themselves with when they're writing, for one... in such terms too---i don't always scrutinize my politics first when i'm looking at my line breaks... which is not to say that my line breaks are apolitical, but that perhaps my aesthetic judgment is what's first and foremost, at times... even ex post facto, for that matter...

at the same time, as a teacher, i find mself in a difficult situation when my white male students bring in their more experimental writing, rife with distended phalli, as exemplary moments in contemporary poetry... and an even more difficult situation, as a white male, when i hear my african-american women students voicing what sound like watered-down versions of maya angelou's "phenomenal woman," a poem that clearly speaks directly to their experience, as they see same... but is what's good for the goose good for the gander?... if i rail against the unsubtle identity gendering of male fantasy driven work, regardless how aesthetically informed, then should i likewise rail against the unsubtle essentializing of experience in the work of african-american women?... whereas the former usually reinforces an existing power relationship, the latter seems on the surface of things to act as a sort of corrective, at least short-term (i set aside the fact that such poetry often positions its subject as an object of male gaze)...

to flip things around, from a more nurturing pedagogical perspective: do i credit the aesthetic in the former, ignoring the more macho dimension?... and do i credit the identity politics of the latter, and ignore the aesthetic dimension?...

clearly, it seems to me, i need to do BOTH, somehow... i need to help students grasp the gendering of the former, the ways the aesthetic at times trivializes same, and the aesthetic simplicity-qua-simple identity of the latter... i need to discuss both the sociopolitical/cultural work done by the poems in varying communities, and the ways in which the aesthetics work or don't in this process of meaning-making, of valuing and revaluing... as contributors to this meaning-making process (along with human beings, i mean), poems can work to produce mean-spirited de- and connotations quite effectively, or well-intended de- and connotations not so effectively (in tech. writing, incidentally, you can supplement "mean-spirited" and "well-intended" with "inaccurate" and "accurate")... but the field of meaning and possibility, the discourse of poetry, is such that one's attention is (or should be) drawn not only to various connotations, but to effectiveness (yeah, i'm slipping & sliding on a form/content dualism here, and i'm using "effectiveness" itself to denote aesthetic efficacy, but i trust i'm making my point)...

in any case, these are fraught waters, in the classroom and in other public spheres... i don't mind saying here, anyway, that it's pretty easy to be misunderstood when one slams the writing of a minority poet, however justifiably... but i don't mind saying here, as well, that i've noted a tendency at times on poetics to be down on more conventional work, even more conventional work that, imnsho, is exemplary... i mean, marketplace dynamics are one thing, aesthetics can be quite another... i can like the best of all worlds, or try to...

incidentally, the new _chronicle_ has, as its back-page "point of view," an article by simon frith, "john keats vs. bob dylan: why value judgments matter"...

best,

joe

↑ Index

247. dbkk
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

At 12:09 PM -0600 3/11/97, [redacted] wrote:

> *at the same time, as a teacher, i find mself in a difficult situation*

Joe, while I think what you say about teaching is very important and interesting, I think you're talking apples and oranges here: critiquing undergraduates' shakey attempts at expression versus what gets included in the Norton anthology (i.e., what is declared serious, important, of lasting value). Like nobody discusses what's included in the Whitney Biennial (or however you spell that B word) in terms of pottery classes going on at community colleges. I get frustrated with the burdens literature has to bear that nobody would place on visual art--or music. I was at an arts administration seminar recently on audience development and marketing, and it started with everybody going around the room describing a particularly memorable reading they'd been to (mine was James Schuyler's reading at the SF Art Institute). After each person talked, the facilitator extracted the essence of what made the reading so memorable: things like intimate, emotional, musical accompaniment, made the audience feel good--even my description of the Schuyler reading was reduced to these terms. When the list was completed with all these touchy-feely things, I rose my hand and said that these things were fine, but that form was left out, that many of my audience comes to readings to experience the formal pleasure of the work. She told me that if I thought form was important I would never develop my audiences. How funny that most of SPT's readings this past year have been packed to capacity!

Most grants that I've seen are steeped in identity politics--like it would be impossible to get any funding if you didn't write about your programming in those terms. There is immense pressure out there to maintain this attitude which I think turns people into cartoons. Like, would you like to be known as Joe Amato, Working Class Writer? Isn't that terribly condescending?

Joan Retallack offers a wonderful, thoughtful, beautifully written critique of identity politics (among other things) in ":RE:THINING:LITERARY:FEMINISM:

(three essays onto shaky grounds)." Unfortunately, I just read it from a xerox, so I don't know where it was published.

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

248. amato
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

---

dodie, i see your point... i'm finding it so very difficult to respond to this issue w/o casting stones, as it were... and being my typical long-winded self...

i bring up teaching b/c it's simply one public context in which i often find mself... there are others, sure... let me say it this way: i can see marjorie's point, which i take to be your point --- that it's often difficult as hell even to discuss matters of form, and that, perhaps partly as a result, it's often difficult to be publicly critical of minority/ethnic writers' work on the basis of form... of course this is a function of audience, context...

but the same could be said for mainstream white guys' writing too... to be critical of a white guy's conservative approach to form will not go over big in many circles... albeit one might not be labeled a racist as a result of such criticism... still, my point here is that it's one thing to concern oneself with problems owing to critical reception (being viewed a racist, say, b/c of one's critical response), it's another to suggest that problems owing to critical reception stem from the formal tendencies of the writing being critiqued... now i'm not saying anybody has said this, but it seems to me that the intimation is present... if 'minority writing' is deemed shallow, say, in terms of identity politics or formal innovation, this doesn't mean that the writing itself is to be held accountable for (as suggested) a certain reticence as to saying so... this reticence is more a function of larger dynamics between communities, in which the writing in question as well as other such writing (white guys' writing) does in fact play a role...

so what's at issue here, as i see it, has still to do with the ways different communities---poets and their critics, black white and brown---come to the work... i mean, i still don't see, again, how we can avoid both the matter of cultural work and the matter of aesthetics (which latter we can discuss, as you suggest, in terms of the bias against discussions of form as such)...

btw, as a white guy who grew up in so many ways in a working class household (like you) i guess i don't mind so much that i should be so associated... but i'd hate to be pigeon-holed as same, whatever this might mean aesthetically (in fact i can't stand the thought of being pigeon-holed aesthetically!)... so i see your point here... i suspect that my more recent work, in fact, being both more conventional, more male-centered, and more working class (and, dare i say it?, more marketable!) is likely down the road to give me some real conniptions, critically... i mean, from critics... it's already given my creative|critical side its share of headaches...

best,

joe

↑ Index

249. Christopher Alexander
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

---

dodie wrtg:
> Joe, while I think what you say about teaching is very important and > interesting, I think you're talking apples and oranges here: critiquing > undergraduates' shakey attempts at expression versus what gets included in > the Norton anthology (i.e., what is declared serious, important, of lasting > value).
on the contrary, I think joe is articulating a very real problem ["difficulty"] here, viz. the unwillingness to separate ["the attempt not to separate"] political, aesthetic, & hortatory practice ["work"]. accepting the sometimes contradictory political claims of a left-guarde ["as opposed to right guard"] modernism (not speaking for joe but for myself)
implies this kind of dilemma in teaching writing, as does, more generally, an interest in the cultural work of different writings. the apples & oranges approach just doesn't make sense to me; it seems to point up the basically
New Critical assumptions that underlie most american creative writing workshops.

best, chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

250. Joseph M Conte
Robert Kelly
Tue 11 Mar 1997

Yes, _The Loom_ is one volume in a very impressive long poem series, from an author who practically defines the term "prolific."

A very good overview essay on Kelly's massive oeuvre is by Patrick Meanor in _Dictionary of Literary Biography: American Poets Since World War II_ vol. 165. It also contains a full primary and secondary bibliography.

Joseph Conte
University at Buffalo

↑ Index

251. Pierre Joris
Re: [Fwd: CCCP]
Tue 11 Mar 1997

Mark Roberts wrote:
>
> pierre
>
> is there a email contact for this conference?
>
> mark
>

Mark -- not that i know of -- Riley is involved but had to ask Ric to mail that info -- you cld try Caddell below & ask him. Patterson in Cambridge must/may have email. -- Pierre

> Thot this of some innerest to the list -- Pierre
> --
> ==========
> pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
> tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
> http://www.albany.edu/~joris/
> ---
> Everything that allows men to become rooted, through > values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
> _one_ language, is the principle of alienation which
> constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
> [...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
> and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose

it as a conquering assertation. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

Received: from naga.mailbase.ac.uk (naga.mailbase.ac.uk [128.240.226.3])
by sarah.albany.edu (8.8.5/8.8.5) with ESMTP id FAA04914
for <[redacted]>; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 05:04:34 -0500 (EST)
Received: by naga.mailbase.ac.uk id <[redacted]>
(8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk); Tue, 11 Mar 1997 09:10:12 GMT
Received: from hermes.dur.ac.uk by naga.mailbase.ac.uk id
<[redacted]>
(8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk) with SMTP; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 09:10:09 GMT
Received: from venus.dur.ac.uk by hermes.dur.ac.uk id
<[redacted]>
(8.6.12/ for dur.ac.uk) with SMTP; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 08:41:04 GMT
Received: from vega by venus.dur.ac.uk id <[redacted]>; Tue,
11 Mar 1997 08:41:02 GMT
Date: Tue, 11 Mar 1997 08:41:01 +0000 (GMT)
From: R I Caddel <[redacted]>
To: british n irish poets <[redacted]>
Subject: CCCP
Message-ID: <[redacted]>
MIME-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII
X-List: [redacted]
X-Unsub: To leave, send text 'leave british-poets'
to [redacted]
Reply-To: R I Caddel <[redacted]>
Sender: [redacted]
Precedence: list

Message from Peter Riley says, Can you put this out on your list thingy, as we're a bit late with publicity this year...

C.C.C.P.

The seventh annual Cambridge Conference of Contemporary Poetry will take place Friday to Sunday April 25th-27th at Kings Colleg Cambridge. For very particular reasons the event this year will emphasise non-British poetry, with poets from Australia (John Tranter, Tracy Ryan), Canada (Karen Mac Cormack, Deanna Ferguson), France (Dominique Grandmont and Emmanuel Hocquard), Belgium (Pierre-Yves Soucy), Sweden (Staffan Soderblum). Also Fiona Templeton, David Chaloner, Grace Lake.

Bookings and information: Ian Patterson, Kings College Cambridge.
tel. 01223 576422

Information: Peter Riley, 27 Sturton Street, Cambridge. tel. 01223 576422

> Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
> SIS Team
> Building G05 Maze Crescent
> University of Sydney
> Phone 61 2 93517710
> Mobile 015063970
> Fax 61 2 93517711

--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://www.albany.edu/~joris/

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
one language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
it as a conquering assertion. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

↑ Index

252. Mark Prejsnar
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

I applaud M. Perloff's post, bringing politix into the mix more directly than it has been for some time on the list....I do feel that it's a problematic challenge..As a socialist activist and a militant in the labor movement since seventh grade (a very, very long time ago) I feel that it's good that people on this list so often have a politix close to mine... (The cultural-historical sociology of how the Left and the non-mainstream poetry world have become intertwined, has yet to be written..)

But...if we address all the questions Marjorie brin gs up, will this become primarily a listserv dealing with left issues? For instance, I could go on for the next eight screens, as to what I think "we," by which I mean "the people of the U.s.", by which I mean the majority, who don't vote for the republicrats, leaving it mainly to the far-right affluent to vote, should do to address the political state of affairs she describes quite well...It has to do with the structure of organizing, with dropping single-issue and defensive struggles, and seriously facing issues of organizational unity and putting forward a critique of the single governmental machine (the Republicrat "party", which is not a party but a voter-registration mechanism, as it is controlled by money and not by a mass membership)...

But, obviously, I do value the list for its concern with poetry issues..At least the other thread was about poets, and how they/we relate to racism and violence (..altho' the latter two thirds of it kind of drifted away from having much direct application to poetry, as things on the list will do..) How we see politics as related to our work as poets or as people concerned with poetry, is of course more germane. That gets so intricate, and so all-inclusive of most of my own day-to-day concerns, that it is almost intimidating..

mark p.

↑ Index

253. David Kellogg
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

Dear Marjorie (and others who may be listening),

If I'm your antagonist, I am indeed a friendly one. I neither intended to nor in fact did imply that you were a racist. I'm happy to read what you wrote, however, though I'd enourage the same from you ;-). I think we can start to talk to (rather than past) each other.

So let's focus on the particulars you quote from your article:

> What I say, for the record, is that, whereas in 1959 Don Allen could put together an anthology of "the" new American poetry, an anthology that pretty accurately pitted the counterculture against the establishment, in the 1990s, there can no longer be ONE counterculture anthology and so attempts to produce one that is "the" avant-garde can't wholly succeed.

OK fine. Here I'm totally in agreement with you (and think the major thrust of your argument quite on target).

> And I write:
> "More important: the eightiies witnessed the coming of the minority communites. . . In their inception, many of these poetries were, ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric, and the ontology of the poem were concerned. But counterculture poets and critics couldn't--and still can't--say this out loud because they would have immediately been labeled racist or sexist. And thus the picture has become increasingly clouded. " and then I go on to complain about the absence of all but U.S. poets in most of the new anthologies.

First: "the eighties witnessed the coming of the minority communities." I honestly don't know what this means; I can't hold it in my head, it just drains out between my skullplates. Are you saying that there weren't minority communities before the eighties? Or just that there weren't minority POETRY communites? Or that these communities hadn't "come" (to maturity, to coalescence, etc.)? None of these interpretations seem to me satisfying, because none of the assertions that result are, so far as I can tell, true. I'm not trying to bait you, honestly; I simply can't see what that sort of generalizaion means, nor what its point is.

Second: "In their inception, many of these [minority community] poetries were, ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric, and the ontology of the poem were concerned. But counterculture poets and critics couldn't -- and still can't -- say that out loud because they would have immediately been labeled racist or sexist." Agreements: that many of these poetries were conservative in the ways you mention. Disagreements: 1) that this formal conservatism is ironic in any sense whatsoever; and 2) that you can't say these poetries are conservative (etc.) without being labeled racist or sexist. I certainly labelled you neither, neither on this list nor in my article.

> Now David perfectly proves my point by implying I'm somehow making a racist statement.

You are reading into (as opposed to "not reading") what I wrote. What I wrote was that the pluralism of your approach is in tension with the exclusivity of your actual critical practice. This seems to me a perfectly reasonable critique to make. Sure I find this disturbing; but not because I think you're a racist (I don't) -- rather, because of the slippage that comes into play in passages like the one that follows:

> What I meant, of course, is that the mainstream anthologies today like the Norton will include a lot of, say Rita Dove, because she's a black woman when the Norton doesn't even include Zukofsky, Reznikoff etc. not to mention Harryette Mullen, Erica Hunt, Will Alexander, or Charles Bernstein, Susan Howe, Lyn Hejinian--well, the list goes on and on, right? This is where identity politics does indeed cloud the picture because if you object to these inclusions or exclusions you are immediately branded.

"Inclusions or exclusions." This is not a symmetrical complaint. The complaint about exclusions is well taken, and I'm wholly on your side in that struggle. The complaint about inclusions is where I think your pluralistic stance conflicts with your practice. Mullen, Hunt, et al. are not excluded because Rita Dove is included. (Nor do I think it fair to say that the Norton includes "a lot of . . . Dove, because she's a black woman," barring evidence to support that assertion.)

Giving Dove less space will do not one damn bit of good in making more space for Zukofsky, Howe, or Bernstein.

> What I'm trying to say, badly probably, because email is not the easiest writing venue, is that, yes, I am opposed to identity politics in its crude form and no, that doesn't make me a racist, and if we want to be political, let's be political and try to do something about what is happening in Washington.

1) identity politics: I do am opposed to "its crude form," but I think such opposition must not be crude either;

2) that doesn't make you a racist. Agreed (never thought otherwise);

3) politics: it's all over the place, both in Washington and in the poetry community etc. But I'd append also: If we want to do something about excluded poetry, let's not act as though the currently included poets are the problem. If we want diversity, let's have diversity, and not some revised Norton.

I don't really have any response to your comments on Dorn, because (except for one moment at its inception) I did not really participate in that thread.

I hope this is helpful in clarifying our disagreements.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

feeling, about how form and politics inter-react; as if situations with students were sharper crystalizations of what many of us are trying to come to grips with, who don't teach.. mark p.

↑ Index

255. Mark Roberts
Re: [Fwd: CCCP]
Tue 11 Mar 1997

---

pierre

is there a email contact for this conference?

mark

>Thot this of some innerest to the list -- Pierre
>--
>==========
>pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
>tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
>http://www.albany.edu/~joris/
>----------
>Everything that allows men to become rooted, through >values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
>_one_ language, is the principle of alienation which >constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
>[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
>and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
>it as a conquering assertion. -- Maurice Blanchot
>==========
>
>Received: from naga.mailbase.ac.uk (naga.mailbase.ac.uk [128.240.226.3])
> by sarah.albany.edu (8.8.5/8.8.5) with ESMTP id FAA04914
> for <[redacted]>; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 05:04:34 -0500 (EST)
>Received: by naga.mailbase.ac.uk id <[redacted]>
> (8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk); Tue, 11 Mar 1997 09:10:12 GMT
>Received: from hermes.dur.ac.uk by naga.mailbase.ac.uk id
<[redacted]>
> (8.7.x for naga.mailbase.ac.uk) with SMTP; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 09:10:09 GMT
>Received: from venus.dur.ac.uk by hermes.dur.ac.uk id
<[redacted]>
> (8.6.12/ for dur.ac.uk) with SMTP; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 08:41:04 GMT
>Received: from vega by venus.dur.ac.uk id <[redacted]>; Tue,
11 Mar 1997 08:41:02 GMT

>Date: Tue, 11 Mar 1997 08:41:01 +0000 (GMT)
>From: R I Caddel <[redacted]>
>To: british n irish poets <[redacted]>
>Subject: CCCP
>Message-ID: <[redacted]>
>MIME-Version: 1.0
>Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII
>X-List: [redacted]
>X-Unsub: To leave, send text 'leave british-poets'
> to [redacted]
>Reply-To: R I Caddel <[redacted]>
>Sender: [redacted]
>Precedence: list
>
>Message from Peter Riley says, Can you put this out on your list thingy, >as we're a bit late with publicity this year...
>
>C.C.C.P.
>
>The seventh annual Cambridge Conference of Contemporary Poetry will take >place Friday to Sunday April 25th-27th at Kings Colleg Cambridge. For very >particular reasons the event this year will emphasise non-British poetry, >with poets from Australia (John Tranter, Tracy Ryan), Canada (Karen Mac >Cormack, Deanna Ferguson), France (Dominique Grandmont and Emmanuel >Hocquard), Belgium (Pierre-Yves Soucy), Sweden (Staffan Soderblum). Also >Fiona Templeton, David Chaloner, Grace Lake.
>
>Bookings and information: Ian Patterson, Kings College Cambridge.
>tel. 01223 576422
>
>Information: Peter Riley, 27 Sturton Street, Cambridge. tel. 01223 576422
>
>
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

256. Mark Roberts

(Fwd) AWOL: New magazines in the bookshop

Tue 11 Mar 1997

>Date: Wed, 12 Mar 1997 07:20:00 +1000
>To: [redacted]
>From: [redacted] (AWOL)
>Subject: AWOL: New magazines in the bookshop
>
>New Magazine Releases from the AWOL Virtual Bookshop
>
>
>It can be difficult keeping up with the latest issue of your favourite >magazine. Now you can order them through AWOL. Here are the latest >magazines available through our online bookshop (for a wider range of >magazines and titles visit or Virtual Small press bookshop at >http:www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/ if you can't find the title you want email >us and we will see what we can do)
>
>
>
>SALT 8 (ISSN 1035-204X) Featuring work by John >Ashbery, Charles Bernstein, MTC Cronin, Andrew Duncan, John Forbes, Alison >Georgeson, Denis Haskel, Coral Hul, Helene Jaccomard, Urs Jaeggi, Kate >Jarman, Wendy Jenkins, SK Kelen, John Kinsella, Carolyn Kizer, August >Kleinzahler, Grace Lake, Rod Mengham, Les Murray, Glen Phillips, Peter >Porter, Ron Pretty, Peter Riley, Mark Reid, Tracy Ryan, Susan M Schultz, >Ron Shapiro, Ron Silliman, Simon Smith, Nicolette Stasko & John >Tranter.
>$10.00
>
>
>AEDON 4.1 (ISSN 1039-8007) Aedon: The Melbourne University Literary Arts
>Review 4.1 contains fiction by Saskia Beudel, Scott Brook, Paul Magee, >Mischa Merz, James Hawthorne. Karen Burns, SJRR & Richard King; Poetry
>by Deborah Staines, Gig Ryan, Julie Hunt, Kevin Murray, Kathryn Hoffman, >John Forbes, Jordi Albiston & Emma Driver. Interviews with Elizabeth >Grosz and McKenzie Wark. Articles include Meaghan Morris on 'Beyond >Assimilation: Aboriginality, Media History and Public Memory, Peter Phipps >on 'Watching Clifford watching Leiris watching himself fall aprt:undoing >anthropology in reply to Klaus Neumann, Christopher Ziguras on 'Paying your >respects to someone else's elders: the western appropriation of Asian and >Indigenous religious discourses', Helene Gronda on 'Why are we watching the >news again mum?: Walter Benjamin, Television and Experience', &; Phil >McCluskey on 'Cold Diffusion'. Reviews include Daniel Ross on Siegfried >Kracauer The Mass Ornament: Weimar Essays, Andrew Smith on Melbourne >graffiti, Dom Pettman on Independence Day Megan Grant on Elspeth Probyn >Outside Belongs. Plus graphics by Louise Forthun, Bridget Kearney, Paul >Dash, Saffron Newey, Jane Brown, Felicity Marks, Joelle Baudet, Alex >Stamboultgis & Greg Defteros.

>$10.00
>
>
>Overland 145 Poetry by Bruce Dawe, john malone, Marguerite Varday, Emma >Lew, Michael Crane, Libby Robin, Phil Ilton, Clive Faust, Graham Rowlands, >Jean Thorton & Kieran Carrol. Anthony Weare on Port Arthur, Brian >Matthews on the Millennium, Julie Lewis on Mary Martin's Bookshop. Plus >fiction, the usual high quality OVERLAND reviews and much much more.
>$8.00
>
>
>
>
>
>Postage
>$3.50 for the first book
>$5.00 for more than one book
>
>
>How to order
>
>Simply print this form, circle the magazines you want, and mail it, >together with you payment (don't forget postage) to:
>AWOL
>PO Box 333
>Concord NSW 2137
>
>Don't forget to include you postal address.
>
>
>

>
>All prices Aust$. Overseas orders please contact us by email first.
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>AWOL
>Australian Writing On Line
>[redacted]
>http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
>PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
>Phone 61 2 7475667, Mobile 015063970
>Fax 61 2 7472802
>
>
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

257. Thomas Lecky
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

Daniel Bouchard wrote:

> But generalizations are useless since most people signed on don't write anything at all.

As one who has written very little here, let me whisper a cheer for Marjorie Perloff's last post in the "deeply disturbing" thread. As Joe Amato also intimated, much of what seems to be happening on this list of late stinks of the worst type of judgment, i.e. self-righteousness. Most of the Dorn/"deeply disturbed" discussion has come down to an unfortunate and ill-conceived creation of binaries: form/content, right/wrong. Marjorie Perloff makes a very apt point: those of us who dissent from "identity politics," or more poetically speaking, from a poetics based only on one's identity (religion, race, gender, etc.) set ourselves up for attack. I can flatly say that Maya Angelou is an incredibly weak poet, on the grounds that her verse is systematic, formulaic, reactionary, sentimental. Am I a racist? As a young member of the list (20s), I've had to choke on these issues throughout my higher education. I left the Stanford graduate program, where Marjorie Perloff teaches, because I knew that if I pursued my chosen field (20th century American poetry, Objectivist, Black Mountain, New York, and Language schools) I (male, white) would greatly restrict the possibilities of employment, i.e. my "identity" did not succeed into the marketplace.

I don't know Dorn, but I respect and admire his poetry. I have no idea if he is a racist or an anti-Semite. I think we had better consider some of the things that are going on in Washington in an administration peppered with absolute base ignorance at best, illegality at worst. I'm not arguing that a discussion of poetry need be political, but when it becomes political it could at least consider larger issues that are critically important to the mechanics of our society, not gossip relating to a poet who, to the larger society, is an unknown.

Yes, I left graduate studies because I saw people (Gil Sorrentino for one) with real convictions about the history and legitimacy of art crushed by the political weight of the academy. Who wants to suffer through it? After all, great art should transcend these things, politics in particular, and become something else. And that "something else" is an irrational commodity.

Thomas Lecky

Thomas Lecky
[redacted]
Qwerty Arts http://www.qwertyarts.com

↑ Index

258. amato
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Tue 11 Mar 1997

---

robert and mark, thanx for your comments... and robert, i'll definitely check out the next notre dame review...

and thanx to backchannel communique, i've been made aware that my example of teaching glosses the sorts of resistance ALL students tend to have to critique of form, and expression... this is true, and this complicates the scenario pedagogically, illustrating the degree to which i exploit what is in essence a stereotype... i like complications, hence i appreciate the backchannel (thanx!)...

still, i don't think this fact alters the issue substantively, insofar as the sorts of concerns i'm raising... i've been in situations where my critical attitude toward both white and minority literatures has been mistaken to mean that i'm opposed to minority literatures... i've also been in situations where simply stating that i like, say, the work of sharon olds (YES, i do) has been taken to mean that i'm opposed to or dislike the work of less mainstream or less orthodox poets...

wrong on both counts... and mea culpa for those occasions that it's been ME doing the "mistaking"...

fact is we're all, all of us, a product of our various institutions, to varying degrees... and i can't imagine how this could not be the case...

best,

joe

↑ Index

259. Steven Marks

Re: "deeply disturbed"

Tue 11 Mar 1997

Let me make my confession since everybody seems to be owning up to what they admire or read. I find Harold Bloom's notion of agon, or the anxiety of influence, hard to resist. I wouldn't put it in quite the Freudian terms that he does, but I think that much of what we call creativity is born in the "intentional" misreading of what has come before and what is around right now. It is what I sometimes try to do with rhyme. I know it's somewhat ridiculous to write couplets, but I am doing so in one poem primarily because of the sense of absurdity it brings. I see the rhyme scheme as some sort of dilapidated grid that tries to force the poem in certain directions. Furthermore, there is an aleatory element to rhyming that I find intriguing. As I list words to rhyme, I find my poem shoved in directions I never anticipated. And sometimes that I don't even quite understand. But damn, they sound good. At least to me! For anybody interested in seeing this poem, it's called Joist and is at the Web address below. I invite all backchannel comment.

Thanks,
Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

260. KENT JOHNSON suspended music
Tue 11 Mar 1997

Just a heartfelt plug for Herb Levy's Periplum CD, Suspended Music. The "long string instrument" is amazing. Totally new.

There used to be a magazine called _Ear_ devoted to new music--is there anything out there comparable?

Kent

↑ Index

261. David Israel
FFCop's story mambo / SA lit workshops?
Tue 11 Mar 1997

Guyzies
[as quoth Maria D, but can I affect such salutation?] -- from So. Asian Lit. listserv, I patch in, for poss. interest (read: ironist apreech?) a note anent Francis Ford Coppola's entry into the literary periodical biz (though likely not xerographic) -- the gent having resolved to cast his attention at litrachure -- this reminds (anecdotally -- & w/o aspersions as to FFCo in particular) of Meredith Monk's remark some number of years ago, amid efforts to deal w/ funding issues in wake of that exceptional film of hers Book of Days (1987), that although she was having a bit of a time recouping expenses, the movie was merely made for the equivalent of "Francis Ford Coppola's pasta budget" (or, peanuts as they say) -- conversely, one assumes the new Zootrope 'zine is now flung into the world at the equivalent of . . . . (? what culinary simile? so-&-so's morel diet, I suppose)

SECONDLY (more particularly), kindly note Prentiss Riddle's inquiry re: So.Asia-focused writing workshops (or any along such lines) -- info re: which could be sent to me (&/or forwarded to Prentiss, or for that matter to Champa Bilwakesh, the original inquirer).

[allowing "workshop" to be oftentimes construed w/o zeal hereabouts, I figure on a level of tolaration]

[the orig. post was responsive, incidentally, to Sasialit group chat w/ Bay Area-based fiction/poetry writer Chitra Bannerjee Divakaruni] cordial-like,

d.i.

1.8b) with spool id 207255 for [redacted]; Tue, 11
Mar 1997 20:35:49 -0600
(8.7.5/8.7.5) with ESMTP id UAA00361 for <[redacted]>; Tue, 11 Mar 1997 20:35:47 -0600 (CST)
Tue, 11 Mar 1997 20:34:38 -0600 (CST)
Date: Tue, 11 Mar 1997 20:34:37 -0600
<[redacted]>
From: Prentiss Riddle <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: Writers' workshops
To: Multiple recipients of list SASIALIT <[redacted]>
11, 97 03:19:39 pm

> From [redacted] Tue Mar 11 14:49:45 1997
> Date: Tue, 11 Mar 1997 15:19:39 -0500
> From: [redacted]
> Subject: Writers' workshops
>
> I often see a writers' workshop advertised in Vermont. It sounds heavenly. There are several others in the east coast and northeast. A fellow would-be writer and friend are considering seriously attending one. Anybody attended one of these? Would you share your experience?

A general catalog of writers' workshops would be beyond the scope of SASIALIT (has anybody found such a catalog online, by the way), but here's one that caught my eye:

Francis Coppola's Zoetrope organization is sponsoring a short story writer's workshop in the mountains of Belize this July 8-15. It sounds like a great junket. Info is available from [redacted].

And I might as well mention where I heard about it. I recently received unsolicited the first issue of a new magazine of short fiction started by Coppola and also named "Zoetrope". It seems to be sort of a vanity project, as Coppola writes in an editorial of the dreariness of reading screenplays and his desire to revive the lost (?) art of the short story. A quick leaf-through of the magazine didn't reveal any stories which grabbed me in particular, but the price is certainly right: subscriptions are free.

If you'd like to receive a sample copy, drop a line to:

Zoetrope Short Stories
126 Fifth Ave. Suite 300
New York, NY 10011-5606

Now, to bring this back to the theme of SASIALIT: are there any writers' workshops specializing in South Asian literature? Or perhaps "postcolonial" literature? Or any good writing programs based in South Asia?

-- Prentiss Riddle ("aprendiz de todo, maestro de nada") [redacted]

↑ Index

262. robert drake
Re: suspended music
Wed 12 Mar 1997

> Just a heartfelt plug for Herb Levy's Periplum CD, Suspended Music.
> The "long string instrument" is amazing. Totally new.
>
> There used to be a magazine called _Ear_ devoted to new music--is > there anything out there comparable?
>
> Kent

a heartfelt plug for MusicWorks magazine: 179 Richmod St West, Toronto ONT Canada M5V 1V3... a tremendous resource; when subscribing be sure to shell out the extra $19 for the accompanying CDs...

lbd

↑ Index

263. Thomas Bell
Re: CD Release Party for Deep Listening Band & Long String Instrument
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

price and availability?

At 11:23 PM 3/10/97 -0800, Herb Levy wrote:
>My new company, Periplum, released it's first CD, Suspended Music by Deep >Listening Band & Long String Instrument, earlier this year. It's a really >great CD featuring the combined forces of DLB (Stu Dempster, David Gamper >Pauline Oliveros) & Ellen Fullman's Long String Instrument performing >recent long works by Pauline Oliveros and Ellen Fullman. Other discs to be >released this year include the 2nd release by the collaborative group Land >(Jeff Greinke, Lesli Dalaba, Dennis Rea, et alia); New Songs commissioned >by David Mahler & Ann Obery from eleven US composers; and recordings of >interactive computer music by Martin Bartlett, including performances by >Peter Hannan, George E Lewis, & Frances-Marie Uitti.
&

>
>We had a great CD party in Austin a couple of weeks ago with Ellen, and >there are more release parties on the way. Hey, wait, here's some now, >near where you live:
>
>
>Friday, March 14, 1997 5-7 pm
>
>The Gallery at Deep Listening Space
>74 Broadway
>Kingston, NY 12401
>
>
>Saturday, March 15, 1997 4-7 pm
>
>Roulette
>228 West Broadway
>New York, NY 10013
>
>
>Sorry for this impersonal bulk mail, I hope to get a chance to talk to you >when I'm in your neck of the woods.
>
>Bests
>
>Herb
>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

264. Jena Osman
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Dodie Bellamy wrote:
>Joan Retallack offers a wonderful, thoughtful, beautifully written critique >of identity politics (among other things) in >":RE:THINING:LITERARY:FEMINISM: (three essays onto shaky grounds)." >Unfortunately, I just read it from a xerox, so I don't know where it was >published.

I agree that this is an excellent essay! It is in a book called _Feminist Measures: Soundings in Poetry and Theory_, edited by Lynn Keller and Cristanne Miller. In the essay, Retallack calls for a "use theory" rather than a "picture theory" of identity as communicated through language--a new poetics to accompany new politics. She writes:

"A use theory of meaning, one that locates the making of meaning in a collaborative engagement with interdynamically developing forms (rather than in the interpretation of a fossil signified), allows exploration of the medium of language itself, and thus the invention of new grammars, where subject-object, master-mater relations can never be presupposed, where nothing ever shrinks and stabilizes into an irresversible 'it.' The picture is the prototypical 'it.'...What once flowed in all directions at 'once' is reduced to the servitude of the inanimate. In the picture all has been isolated in space and stopped in time, reflecting not glorious, multifarious (chaotic) reality, but the vanishing point of the photographer's, painter's, or writer's single-point imagination."

If interested, check out the Keller-Miller book--they did a great job of mixing what could be called "conventional" essays with essays that perform their content, and thus test the limits of the genre. Also includes work by Rachel Blau DuPlessis and M. Nourbese Philip, among others.

Jena Osman
[redacted]

↑ Index

265. Stephen Paul Miller
Re: XEROX REVOLUTION
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Does anyone recall how innovative clean and inexpensive Xerox copy shops were in the seventies? That was part of the premise of THE POETRY MAILING LIST, which I put out with Kenneth Deifik in the mid- seventies. We published a one page poetry magazine. People were still not used to spotless Xeroxes, and it often seemed like a personal letter.

It had an immediate effect. For instance, when I asked Peter Schjeldahl for a poem, he told me that he had not written one for a long, long time. However, that night he found himself writing DEAR ART OF VERSE, and he sent to me. I Xeroxed it and put it in about 300 hundred envelopes with Ken and out it in the return mail. Peter received many calls from people who thought he had personally sent it to them, which I think he liked.

THE POETRY MAILING LIST created an unobstrusive focus on poetry. Other poets and and artists included John Cage, Jackson MacLow, Lucio Pozzi, Kathy Acker, David Shapiro, Beth Anderson, Jill Kroesen, Joel Oppenheimer, and many others.

Stephen Paul Miller

↑ Index

266. henry gould
Re: deeply disturbed
Wed 12 Mar 1997

As a deeply-disturbed former card-carrying food coop community organizer political researcher magnum cum laude left worker student activist genre-jumping wigged-out Keseyian busrider acid head, let me just say...

poetry is not writing

it's an elusive element that sometimes appears here and there

even in Maya Angelou

even in Dr. Seuss

"Without hesitation, I'm happy to say
Dr. Seuss trumps us all in this trite centuray."

On politics, identity, and writing in school: two words of advice - get poor.

(translation: read it back to me, quietly, quietly.)

- Henry Gould (Henry's new CD: "Let's talk Money", is available from DC Yaketeeyak Records, The White House, Lincoln Bedroom, Washington, DC. Checks only, please - make them out to Harold Hughes.)

↑ Index

267. Christopher Alexander
Re: XEROX REVOLUTION
Wed 12 Mar 1997

> Does anyone recall how innovative clean and inexpensive Xerox copy > shops were in the seventies? That was part of the premise of THE > POETRY MAILING LIST, which I put out with Kenneth Deifik in the mid-> seventies. We published a one page poetry magazine. People were > still not used to spotless Xeroxes, and it often seemed like a > personal letter.
remember? I'm still taking advantage of that spotlessness every time I publish a book!

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

268. Hank Lazer
Re: CD
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Here too a BRAVO for Herb Levy's CD. A beautifully different pace and place of listening.....

Hank Lazer

↑ Index

269. Mark Wallace
poetry that sells?
Wed 12 Mar 1997

An article in Publisher's Weekly on March 3 called "The Different Faces of Poetry" estimates the sales of some recent books of poetry:

Jorie Graham's THE DREAM OF A UNIFIED FIELD (Ecco Press, 1995), winner of the Pulitzer Prize: 8500 copies sold.

POETRY LIKE BREAD, an anthology of "leftist multicultural writing" (Curbstone Press, 1993): 9000 copies.

Dave Alvin (rock musician formerly of the Blasters, etc), ANY ROUGH TIMES ARE NOW BEHIND YOU (Incommunicado Press, 1995): 5000 copies.

Charles Berstein's DARK CITY (Sun and Moon, 1995): 4000 copies.

Mark Wallace

↑ Index

270. amato
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

dear thomas (lecky), i do understand your decision to leave stanford (to leave standford... wow!) on the basis of reduced job possibilities...

but please: as a white male het (one having strong sympathies with that olsonian line you mention), i must observe that your problems with the academic job market, or most other job markets for that matter, do not reduce to your identity... statistically speaking, it's other white guyz whom you're losing out to, so to say... much as am i... this much is verifiable...

and you're losing out, too, to a growing tendency to create part admin-part faculty line positions, most with "writing" someplace in the job description... which again is not a function of your, or anybody else's, "identity" per se...

and you're losing out to the continuing, and perhaps growing, practice of hiring adjuncts to teach courses instead of full-time, tenure track faculty...

UNLESS, unless perhaps your field is, say, african-american lit, and you're white?... knowing a few folks who are in this position, job placement is undoubtedly at some level a function of identity politics...

which brings up another point about this thread: i'm finding it difficult as hell to articulate a position which is (please forgive me, marjorie) not exactly marjorie's, but not exactly anti-marjorie's either... not exactly david kellogg's, but not exactly anti-david kellogg's either...

that is, i'm finding it difficult to navigate these waters w/o finding mself in the midst of various binaries, binaries that are themselves a function, in part, of identifying [this or that]... in fact, i take this to be confirmation of the sorts of public tensions raised when one attempts to flush the aesthetic-political tangle...

best,

joe

↑ Index

271. amato
Re: FFCop's story mambo / SA lit workshops?
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

i've read _zoetrope_ mself, and find the idea of coppola getting involved in a literary mag intriguing, what with, e.g., william kennedy on the masthead... i mean, coppola HAS made some great flicks, no?...

i don't necessarily share his desiderata (in that first issue) about the short story, but he claims to be keenly interested in the written word... so what the hell, then --why not?... i mean, for example: in that first issue, they reprint "the wisdom of eve," by mary orr... now this short story was the basis for the film all about eve... personally, i love this latter, and i find it fascinating to read the story and imagine its transformation into film...

so as far as i'm concerned, if more hollywood types want to create more fora that add to the flow, that's fine with me... it may well be -- i assume this will be the case, based on this first issue -- that exposure will be limited to more orthodox work, as is generally the case with more mainstream pubs... but again---if the work published is exceptional, why not?... i can't say that it'll 'squeeze out' in any way less orthodox work, given that it seems to be coppola's money behind the mag... but let's wait and see... and to be a bit crass about it (and i'm not just being provocative here): if they publish something of mine (i have every intention of submitting short fiction), i'm going to find it really difficult to complain...

best,

joe

↑ Index

272. amato
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

oh and yeah, i neglected to write "please forgive me, david" with regard to my last post on this vexed issue... i don't wish to alienate marjorie, OR david... or any of you, for that matter... again, i see this list, this space as one of the few such spaces around for hashing out such issues...

best,

joe

↑ Index

273. Charles Alexander

Re: poetry that sells?

Wed 12 Mar 1997

On what are these estimates based? They seem pretty high to me, but perhaps they are accurate?

charles

At 09:28 AM 3/12/97 -0500, you wrote:
> An article in Publisher's Weekly on March 3 called "The Different >Faces of Poetry" estimates the sales of some recent books of poetry:
>
> Jorie Graham's THE DREAM OF A UNIFIED FIELD (Ecco Press, 1995), >winner of the Pulitzer Prize: 8500 copies sold.
>
> POETRY LIKE BREAD, an anthology of "leftist multicultural >writing" (Curbstone Press, 1993): 9000 copies.
>
> Dave Alvin (rock musician formerly of the Blasters, etc), ANY >ROUGH TIMES ARE NOW BEHIND YOU (Incommunicado Press, 1995): 5000 copies.
>
> Charles Berstein's DARK CITY (Sun and Moon, 1995): 4000 copies.
>
>
>
> Mark Wallace
>
>

Light blue and the same red with purple makes a change. It shows that there is no mistake. Any pink shows that and very likely it is reasonable.
Gertrude Stein, from "A Substance In
A Cushion," in TENDER BUTTONS
Charles Alexander
Chax Press
[redacted]

↑ Index

274. David Kellogg
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Joe,

You've put forward some of the most interesting ideas on this whole thread. Very sensitive and thoughtful -- I have learned a lot.

> which brings up another point about this thread: i'm finding it difficult as hell to articulate a position which is (please forgive me, marjorie) not exactly marjorie's, but not exactly anti-marjorie's either... not exactly david kellogg's, but not exactly anti-david kellogg's either...

You know, so am I ;-). Actually, however, I think I'd take a position close to yours regarding the job market. Like you, I'm W-M-Het committed to formally challenging poetry. Probably among the twenty-one tenure-track jobs I've come close to getting but didn't, some offers were made where the applicant's gender, race, and/or investment in identity politics were at issue. But so what? I guess what I'm trying to say is that it would be easy -- too easy -- to blame this situation on dominance of identity politics. There are a lot of other factors at stake, including the funding of jobs in general, resistance to contemporary work, resistance to the kind of criticism/sociology/theory that I do (esp. with regard to contemporary poetry), etc.

When Marjorie indirectly suggests that I'm too sympathetic to identity politics, that I've somehow bought into the rhetoric of that whole line of thinking, I want to laugh -- she should sit in on some of my interviews.

With regard to binaries, a crude opposition to identity politics that assigns "it" (whatever "it" is) blame for whatever situtation (my lack of a job, certain poets' exclusion from the Norton or some other standard anthology) -- in their binary opposition, both submit to a zero-sum-game view of poetic value. If my poet's in, somebody else has got to leave. There ain't room in this town . . .

Can't we get beyond that?

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

There is no mantle
and it does not descend.
--Thomas Kinsella

↑ Index

275. William Burmeister Prod
Re: poetry that sells?
Wed 12 Mar 1997

The Poets & Writers zine out on the bookstore shelves now has article on the popularity of poetry. Haven't read it yet, but is probably the official verse culture business as usual (Dana Goia is still worried about a downward trend).

Bill B.

↑ Index

276. Joel Felix
Re: suspended music/ EMF.ORG
Wed 12 Mar 1997

> There used to be a magazine called _Ear_ devoted to new music--is there anything out there comparable?
>
> Kent

Hello, snagging this from the fluxlist. Not to imply that only the electronic is new of course.

jfelix

> ELECTRONIC MUSIC FOUNDATION
> ==========
> UPDATE
>
> Contents:
>
> 1. Check The EMF Worldwide Calendar
> 2. Major offerings from CDeMUSIC: CRI and Tellus
> 3. A historical note
> 4. A few words from our sponsors
> 5. Become a Subscriber
> 6. Information available by email
> 7. On or off this list
>
> ==========
> 1. Check The EMF Worldwide Calendar
>
> There's an important need for a single place where an electronic musician or listener can find out what's going on in the world, including concerts and festivals, extraordinary web sites, reports on events, news of people on the road, job opportunities, product announcements, calls for materials, and other items of interest. Some sites and email lists give a partial view responding to specific interests. Our goal for The EMF Worldwide Calendar is to give an overview of the global scene.

The List of Events aims at being comprehensive, with pointers to sources for further information.

http://www.emf.org/cal_eventlist.html

The 'Don't Miss These Events' page focuses your attention on important, unusual, and/or sponsored events. This week, you'll read about the Interpretations Series, the Henry Cowell festival, and other events in New York. You'll find out about the Son-Mu series and IRCAM's presentation of Manoury's new opera in Paris. You'll find out about a theremin festival in Maine in June, not to mention other summer events in New Mexico, France, and everywhere else. And you'll get a glimpse of the fall in Chicago, Thessaloniki, Seoul, New York, and Karlsruhe.

http://www.emf.org/cal_exceptional.html

From our correspondents far and wide, there's news about genetic models for art and mysterious happenings in the Malaysian jungle. There are many many calls for submissions on the Bulletin Board, for festivals, contests, conferences, and publishing. And there's some hot news from our sponsors. E-mu Systems, for example, announces 37 (!) new job openings. Find every calendar item from

http://www.emf.org/cal_frontdoor.html

==========
2. Major offerings from CDeMUSIC: CRI and Tellus

The CRI catalog is in the CDeMUSIC spotlight! Just as a sample, there's a historic recording of women in electronic music in 1977, with music by Johanna Beyer, Annea Lockwood, Pauline Oliveros, Laurie Spiegel, Megan Roberts, Ruth Anderson, and Laurie Anderson. There's Harry Partch's 'The Bewitched'. There's Alvin Curran's 'Schtyx', lyrical, explosive, moving. Lou Harrison's music, some of it with gamelan, some of it for string quartet, is classic. Maro Ajemian's recording of John Cage's 'Sonatas and Interludes for Prepared Piano', as played by in Cage's 1958 retrospective, was the first. There's Morton Feldman, Jerry Hunt, Otto Luening, and more more more. Look at the catalog.

http://www.emf.org/cdcat_cri.html

And take advantage of the Tellus cassette blowout! We're offering 11 Tellus cassettes, with historical text sound compositions, soundart, microcomputer music, Fluxus music, and more, for $5 each.

http://www.emf.org/cdcat_telluscassettes.html

Here's some advice. Don't wait to buy! If you see a CD you want, get it right away, while it's available. We've seen many CDs become unavailable, some temporarily, some forever. To get an overview of all of the fabulous music that's available now, start at the CDeMUSIC home page, browse through the List of Catalogs, look through the Alphabetical List by Composer.

http://www.emf.org/cde_frontdoor.html

Starting in mid-May, we're planning to start a CDHotline as a one-time per month email update, dealing with new releases, recommended compact discs, listener's comments, brief CD reviews, and other items of interest. If you're interested in receiving this, send us a message. Say, "Yes to CDHotline." It's free.

==========
3. A historical note

In the early 1960s, James Beauchamp designed the Harmonic Tone Generator, actually the first additive-synthesis synthesizer at the University of Illinois. He presented a paper on it at the AES Convention in October 1964 in New York, during the same session that Robert Moog gave his talk on voltage-controlled modules. Among the composers that used it were Herbert Brun, Lejaren Hiller, Salvatore Martirano, and Kenneth Gaburo. See the photos on our home page.

http://www.emf.org

==========
4. A few words from our sponsors

One of our most important goals is to provide access to materials. So look at our list of sponsors and follow the links to find out about the most forward-looking companies in the world.

http://www.emf.org/emf_sponsors.html

Some announcements: Big Briar announces that the Series 91 theremins will soon be unavailable. E-mu Systems announces 37 new job opportunities. Link to them from the calendar.

http://www.emf.org/cal_frontdoor.html

Note that we've just opened a Big Briar department in The EMF Store, the better to bring you theremins. Link to it from The EMF Store.

http://www.emf.org/store_frontdoor.html

We'll open other stores soon, with spectacular discounts for Subscribers.

==========
5. Become a Subscriber

As CDeMUSIC expands, as offerings increase in The EMF Store, and as The EMF Calendar reaches more and more people, you may be interested in becoming a Subscriber. There are both professional and consumer benefits, and you may find that your small one-time subscription fee may indeed come back to you manyfold and quickly. See our invitation.

http://www.emf.org/emf_invitation.html

If you can't access the web page, email us and ask for Subscriber information.

==========
6. Information available by email

If you don't have easy access to the web and you'd like to receive catalogs, product notices, or other information as email, just send an email message to [redacted] and tell us what you'd like. We'll do our best to comply.

The 'Pioneers of Electronic Music' catalog, which represents EMF's basic mission, is continually updated and always available by email, as is 'The EMF Store' catalog.

==========
7. On or off this list

We are sending this update to you either because you're already on our list or because we believe you'll be interested in the information we provide. We send an update like this one around the 5th of every month and an email calendar around the 20th of every month. Every now and then, you'll receive an updated catalog or an alert with a particular important message.

If there is any type of message you don't want to receive, just send us a message and say, for example, "I don't want to receive the catalogs," or "I don't want to receive the calendar." If you would rather not receive anything from us, just say, "Please take me off your list."

If this has been forwarded to you by someone else and you would like to receive these notices directly, just send an email message to [redacted] > and say something like "Put me on your list" and we'll put you on our list.

>
> ==========
> EMF, CDeMUSIC, CDHotline, The EMF Store, and The EMF Worldwide Calendar are > trademarks of Electronic Music Foundation, Ltd.
>
> Electronic Music Foundation
> 116 North Lake Avenue
> Albany NY 12206
> USA
>
> [redacted] Voice
> [redacted] Fax
>
> [redacted]
> http://www.emf.org
>
> X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X
> Joseph Nechvatal, Paris, France, Europa
> http://www.cybertheque.fr/galerie/jnech
> X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X_X

↑ Index

277. Maria Damon
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

dkellog rites:

> I guess what I'm trying to say is that it would be easy
> >-- too easy -- to blame this situation on dominance of identity politics.
> >There are a lot of other factors at stake, including the funding of jobs in > >general, resistance to contemporary work, resistance to the kind of > >criticism/sociology/theory that I do (esp. with regard to contemporary > >poetry), etc.

i've been staying out of this one cuz it seemed like same old same old, but i feel the need to ask: were identity politics not a part of what kept women/folks of color out of the job market for so many years? did we invent identity politics? have they not always been a part of determining who gets what? why is it only a "problem" when normative identity's (ie.e straight white male etc) normativity is called into question? and for that matter, why have "identity politics" suddenly become such anathema, as if they were essentialist in nature? compare income levels, education levels, life opportunity levels of people of different "identities" and it seems that there might actually be a need to talk about it.

>
>When Marjorie indirectly suggests that I'm too sympathetic to identity >politics, that I've somehow bought into the rhetoric of that whole line of >thinking, I want to laugh -- she should sit in on some of my interviews.

david i don't see any reason why you should apologize for noticing that there is social stratification in this country based on certain demographic factors, and for thinking it might be not okay. i do see a problem with people's knee jerk reaction to attempts to talk about politics on this list.
>

↑ Index

278. Michael Coffey
Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
Wed 12 Mar 1997

>>> Charles Alexander <[redacted]> 03/12/97 10:35am >>>
On what are these estimates based? They seem pretty high to me, but perhaps they are accurate?

Charles, et al. The figures in Pw about sales of some poetry books were given to us by the publishers, i believe, though douglas messerli could probably say if that isn't so.

What follows is the Publishers Weekly article itself, not quite a final version i believe... it appeared in March 3 issue. And thanks to some of the listfolk who got involved in a discussion with me prior to the writing of this piece; it was written by a woman named Mallay Charters, and I assigned and edited.

THE DIFFERENT FACES OF POETRY "No one listens to poetry," complained the 1950's San Francisco poet Jack Spicer. While it still hasn't stormed the bestseller lists, at least today poetry is enjoying its broadest hearing in recent years. The sales climate is warming, greater numbers of books are being published, and more and more poetry-related events are popping up in the press. Says Bill Wadsworth, the Executive Director for the Academy of American Poets, "Poetry was strong in the culture in the 1960s and 70s, but by the mid-80s it had been eclipsed by commercial art, glitz. Since 1990 there's been a complete turnaround?people started looking for more than junk food."So what kind of poetic fare is in the offing? Certainly, there is something to please most every palate, from the most traditional to the most avant-garde. Poetry in America is a diverse, highly contested field, crowded with a variety of practices and philosophies, none of which lend themselves easily to generalizations. How, for example, to classify Rafael Campo, an acclaimed gay Hispanic poet who writes often in formal verse? Or Allen Ginsberg, still as radical as in the heyday of the Beat movement, but also one of the most famous?and, relatively speaking, wealthiest?poets of his time? As literary critic and Stanford professor Marjorie Perloff points out, "Thirty years ago you had the establishment?Robert Lowell and Elizabeth Bishop?and the counterculture. Now you have endless overlapping, dispersed groups. There is no one movement; rather, there are many movements."The landscape of poetry publishing itself reflects and promotes this heterodoxy. The number of small presses in America has grown precipitously in the last three decades, fueled in part by advances in desktop publishing. The 1,127 volumes of poetry produced in 1996 were the offerings of a staggering 463 publishers, the majority of them independent and small presses. In such a climate, it is not hard to understand why there is no single poetic center of gravity, be it aesthetic, ideological, or even geographical.Buying patterns reveal a corresponding breadth of taste. "The poetry-reading audience has probably never been larger... or more decentralized and fragmented," says Poets House Executive Director Lee Briccetti. The "establishment" poets?those writers championed by the leading critics and literary magazines?predictably sweep the prestigious awards, but their sales that edge on their lower-profile brethren, from the avant-garde to the multicultural, are less dramatic. Where Ecco Press reports sales of 8500 for 1995's The Dream of a Unified Field, the selected poems of Pulitzer Prize-winner Jorie Graham, Curbstone Press can claim sales of 9000 copies of Poetry Like Bread, their 1993 anthology of leftist multicultural writings; Sun & Moon estimates 4000 copies sold of language poet Charles Bernstein's 1995 Dark City; and Incommunicado Press reports 5000 copies sold of punk rock poet Dave Alvin's 1995 Any Rough Times Are Now Behind You. "We're in a period of ferment," says Herb Lebowitz, editor of the poetry journal Parnassus. "There is no dominant voice, there is no dominant school, and in a way that's healthy for poetry."Certainly the relatively level playing field generates some interesting intrapoetry sparring. One of the most controversial movements is experimental poetry, particularly the segment that grew out of the so-called "Language" poetry of the 1970s and 80s. Hailed alternately as the future of poetry and a poetic dead end, Language poetry is dense, quirky, intellectual, and above all politically and stylistically radical, trading in the traditional poetic voice in favor of verbal collages and suggestive sentence fragments."We wanted to keep the language moving, changing and shifting, so it didn't become a dead thing," says Doug Messerli, who became involved with Language poetry while a graduate student in the 1970s and who now runs America's largest publisher of experimental writing, the Los Angeles-based Sun & Moon Press. In June Sun & Moon will bring out Republics of Reality, the latest collection by Charles Bernstein, who, with Bruce Andrews, is considered one of Language poetry's founders (they co-edited the journal L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E, from which the movement derived its name) Other current writers closely associated with Language poetry include Susan Howe, Lyn Hejinian, Ron Silliman, Bob Perelman, and Leslie Scalapino, plus younger experimental writers such as Mark Wallace, Juliana Spahr (editor of the journal Chain), Lee Ann Browne (whose Sun & Moon collection Polyverse is due in May) and Rodrigo Toscano (a Chicano writer whose Sun & Moon collection The Disparities is due in August.)Good samplings of current Language and experimental writing can be found in the anthologies The Other Side of the Century: 1960-1990 (Sun & Moon) and Postmodern American Poetry (Norton). In 1997 Incommunicado plans to publish Tense Present, an anthology of West Coast Language and avant-garde writers.Other experimental presses include Black Sparrow, Roof Books, O Books, Wesleyan and Pittsburgh University presses, and the SPD-distributed Kelsey St., Tender Buttons, Burning Deck and Hanging Loose. Sun & Moon's annual Gertrude Stein Awards in Innovative American Poetry is Messerli's "alternative" to Scribner's more traditional annual, The Best American Poetry. (Says Messerli with cheerful resignation, "Innovative poetry always gets excluded, and that has always been the way.")Language poetry has found a warm reception in academic circles. Says Perloff, "We recently invited Susan Howe to Stanford, and the reception was just wonderful. That really encouraged me, and it seems to me that that's the direction that poetry is going."In other quarters, it has raised hackles. "Language poetry is highly personal, it's highly narcissistic, and it turns its back on the audience," says Robert McDowell, the publisher of Story Line Press. McDowell has conceived a rather radical response to what he sees as contemporary poetry's inaccessibility to the general reader. His press promotes the work of the so-called New Formalists, who use traditional verse forms like rhymed couplets and sonnets and often tell stories in their poems. "Narrative," says McDowell, "allows one to put together all the elements of both poetry and storytelling to create a more extended creative form." Prominent New Formalists include Dana Gioia, Brad Leithauser, and Mary Jo Salter, all of whom are included in Story Line's 1996 anthology Rebel Angels: 25 Poets of the New Formalism, edited by Mark Jarman and David Mason. The New Formalists are also showcased in the Hudson Review, a poetry journal edited by Frederick Morgan. New Formalism itself has not been immune to criticism: says Harvard professor and New Yorker critic Helen Vendler, "It's kind of a red herring?some of our best poets, like James Merrill and Elizabeth Bishop, wrote in both free and formal verse. It's not like it's an article of faith or a dogma."The vigor of the current spoken word/performance poetry scene owes much to Miguel Alarin and Bob Holman's "Poetry Slams" at New York City's Nuyorican Poets' Cafe. The movement has its roots in the theatrically charged 1960?s writings of Allen Ginsberg and African American writers Amiri Baraka andGwendolyn Brooks, and in the 1970s the movement received additional impetus from poet David Antin's creation of the "talk poem." At a Nuyorican slam, poets recite their work and are then rated numerically by randomly selected audience members, although they are warned ahead of time that "the best poet always loses." (The poems are anthologized in Holt's 1994 ABA-winning Aloud: Voices from the Nuyorican Poets' Cafe.) Currently there are slams in over 30 cities advertised in 10 spoken-word newsletters. While the movement's vigorous, in-your-face style has brought poetry to the MTV generation, it receives scant respect in many sectors of the poetry industry. Louise Solano, the owner of the Grolier Bookshop, an all-poetry bookstore in Cambridge, Mass., spoke for many whom PW interviewed when she said that "I consider 'poetry slam' a contradiction in terms. That's not poetry?they're spoken-word performances. True poetry is about language, and it's meant to be read."Holman sees it otherwise. He is currently on leave from hosting slams to work at Mouth Almighty/Mercury Records, which he calls the "world's first poetry label," devoted exclusively to publishing albums of spoken-word performances."What people don't realize is the number of books that have been released through the generation that came through the slam," he says. "I don't see any other generation that has penetrated the publishing or music business the way that this crew has." Nuyorican Poets' Cafe alums include Paul Beattie (published by Penguin and Houghton Mifflin), Willie Perdomo (Norton), Hal Sirowitz (Crown), Dana Bryant (Boulevard) and Holman himself (Holt). Cafe alums with spoken-word CDs include Reg E. Gaines (who also wrote the book for the current Broadway hit Bring in ?Da Noise, Bring in ?Da Funk), Edwin Torres, and Maggie Estep, whose second album, Love Is a Dog from Hell, is due from Mouth Almighty in April. Mouth Almighty also recently released Allen Ginsberg's The Ballad of the Skeletons, which was an MTV Buzz Clip, and the soundtrack to Holman's 1996 PBS series The United States of Poetry (the tie-in book is available from Abrams).The spoken-word movement is closely allied with multicultural poetry. Miguel Alarin himself was a leading figure of the Nuyorican movement of the 1970s, which established a literature of Puerto Rican identity, and is currently an Arte Publico author. The prominent Hispanic poets Jimmy Santiago Baca (published by Curbstone Press) and Victor Hernandez Cruz (Coffee House Press) are also performance poets, as is the African American poet Wanda Coleman (Black Sparrow). The connection is partly an outgrowth of multicultural and spoken-word poetry's shared roots in the radical political tradition of Baraka and Brooks; for certain African American writers, it is also a reflection of the importance of jazz and blues both as artistic heritage and as source of poetic rhythms."In black poetry, we have always been very close to the musicians and the music," says Haki Madhubuti, the publisher of the Chicago-based Third World Press, America's largest African American press, who also plans to begin "publishing" CDs this year. Madhubuti, who founded the press 30 years ago with $400 and a mimeograph machine, is the exclusive publisher of Gwendolyn Brooks, and has also published Gil Scott-Heron and Sonia Sanchez. His poetry titles for 1996 included The Sandman by Sterling Plumpp, whose work was included in The Best American Poetry of 1996. Other African American writers have found homes at a variety of presses, large and small. Reginald Shepherd, a prize-winning gay poet whose work has been singled out for praise by Vendler, published his most recent collection, Angel Interrupted, in 1996 with the University of Pittsburgh Press. Nathaniel Mackey, whose poems draw on African rituals, folk wisdom and jazz rhythms, publishes with Sun & Moon and Coffee House. Former Poet Laureate Rita Dove publishes with Norton. Forthcoming 1997 African American poetry titles include Sonia Sanchez's Does Your House Have Lions (Beacon, Apr.); Maketa Grove's Red Hot on a Silver Note (Curbstone, May); Dark Eros, an anthology edited by Reginald Martin (St. Martin's,Aug.); The Collected Poems of Audre Lord (Norton, Aug.); Last Chance for Tarzan Holler, by MacArthur Award-winning Thylias Moss (Persea Books, Sept.); and From the Devotions, by NBCC Award and Lambda Award finalist Cary Phillips (Graywolf, Nov.).In Hispanic poetry, notable presses include Curbstone Press, Bilingual Press, Arte Publico, and White Pine Press.Curbstone, founded in 1975 by Sandy Taylor and his wife, Judith Doyle, promotes Latino and Chicano writers and publicizes human rights abuses in Central America. Says Taylor, "We publish poetry that is accessible, and deals with human issues in daily life, like poverty and political oppression." Curbstone's authors include NBCC Award-winning Puerto Rican poet Martin Espada (whose fifth collection, Imagine the Angels of Bread, will be published by Norton in April); experimental Latino poet Juan Felipe Herrera; and Daisy Zamora, featured on Bill Moyers's 1995 PBS series, The Language of Life. Set for April publication is Song of the Simple Truth: The Complete Poems of Julia de Burgos.Bilingual Press and Arte Publico are both active in the flourishing Southwestern Chicano literature scene, which began in the 1960s in the context of the Chicano civil rights movement. Says Bilingual Press managing editor Karen Van Hooft, "U.S. Latino poetry is a very active field?there's a lot of publishing going on, and the best-known poets are in a lot of demand for appearances and readings." Bilingual Press published prominent Chicano poet Alurista's Et Tu... Raza? in 1996, and has previously published Espada, Puerto Rican poet Judith Ortiz Cofer and Demetria Martinez, who is included in their popular anthology Three Times a Woman: Chicana Poetry. Arte Publico is home to the experimental Miguel Alarin, and published Rafael Campo's first collection, The Other Man Was Me, winner of the 1993 National Poetry Series' Open Competition. Forthcoming 1997 collections by Hispanic writers at other houses include the paperback edition of Chicana writer Pat Mora's Agua Santa: Holy Water (Beacon Press, May); Chicano poet and National Book Award finalist Gary Soto's Junior College (Chronicle Books, Apr.); and Mexican poet Jose Emilio Pacheco's City of Memory and Other Poems, a bilingual edition from City

Lights (Apr.).A notable independent publishing house with a broadly multicultural list is Minneapolis's Coffee House Press. Says publisher Allan Kornblum, "We still publish as many white writers as ever, but our growth has been in the multicultural area." Coffee House poets include Adrian Castro, an Afro-Cuban writer who came out of performance poetry; Native American writer and NBCC-finalist Linda Hogan; and African American writer and NBCC-finalist Quincy Troupe, whose collection Avalanche appeared last spring. On Coffee House's upcoming publishing schedule is Drawing the Line (Apr.) by Japanese American poet Lawson Fusao Inada, and Sacred Vow, a bilingual collection by Cambodian poet U Sam Oeur. "One of my goals as a publisher is to expand the sense of what we mean when we say 'we,' " says Kornblum.A trend among some ethnic poets is a growing dissatisfaction with the category "multicultural" itself. Reports Sun Young Li, associate editor at the experimental, New York City-based Asian American publishers Kaya Publications: "All of our poets are moving beyond the issue of identity. It's a phase people have to go through, but it's ultimately limiting. The writers at Kaya are much more concerned with aesthetic, literary and political issues." Kaya's 1995 anthology Premonitions included gay and lesbian, Buddhist, Language, Vietnamese American, and Korean American poets, and was intended as a counterpart to Doubleday's more traditional The Open Boat: Poems from Asian America (1993).A similar theme is voiced by certain lesbian and gay writers. Mainstream poets such as Adrienne Rich (who is published by Norton) and Mark Doty (HarperCollins) dominate book sales and literary awards, while their experimental counterparts struggle for reviews and shelf space. "If you're gay and avant-garde, you suffer from a double invisibility," says Eileen Myles, who recently edited The New Fuck You, an anthology of gay and lesbian writing from Semiotext Press. On the other hand, notes Myles, moving beyond the expected has its rewards. "What's really exciting is that we're in this atmosphere of no 'nos.' Who's driving the car of the culture? Me, you? There's such a sea of possibilities."Myles herself is associated with the experimental New York School, which was developed in the 1950s by the poets John Ashbery, Kenneth Koch, James Schuyler and Frank O'Hara. It is identified with a casual, spontaneous style, a foregrounding of personal material and an urbane wit and sophistication. Second-generation New York School writers include the late Ted Berrigan, Ron Padgett, Alice Notley and Bernadette Mayer. (Myles's latest collection, School of Fish, is due from Black Sparrow Press in April.)Upcoming gay and lesbian poetry titles for 1997 include Things Shaped in Passing: More 'Poets for Life' Writing from the AIDS Pandemic, edited by Michael Klein and Richard McCann (Persea Books, Mar.); Telling Things, by Michael J. Rosen (Harcourt Brace, Apr.); Selected Poems: Revised and Enlarged by Robert Duncan, also associated with the Black Mountain School (New Directions, Apr.); Cold River, by Joan Larkin (Painted Leaf, Oct.); and Beautiful Signor, by Cyrus Casselly, winner of the Poetry Society of America's 1994 William

Carlos Williams Award (Copper Canyon, June). Recently published titles include an expanded, bilingual edition of Colombian poet Jaime Manrique's My Night with/Mi Noche Con Federico Garcia Lorca (Painted Leaf).Several major Beat poets are still actively publishing. In May New Directions will bring out A Far Rockaway of the Heart, by Lawrence Ferlinghetti, a follow-up to his 1958 classic, A Coney Island of the Mind, as well as two new selections of the work of Denise Levertov. Black Sparrow will publish Ed Sander's 1968 in June (and, in March, Bone Palace Ballet, a new collection by recently deceased L.A. literary icon Charles Bukowski). In November, Hanging Loose Press presents Hettie Jones's Driver Lover Witness Woman. Prominent 1996 Beat titles included Allen Ginsberg's Selected Poems 1947-1995 (HarperCollins) and Gary Snyder's Mountains and Rivers without End (Counterpoint).America's "establishment" poets have, of course, significantly participated in and contributed to the aesthetic currents animating the other poetic schools.Jorie Graham, for example, writes poetry with some philosophical affinities to the work of John Ashbery. (Ashbery himself, probably America's most celebrated experimental poet, publishes with Farrar, Straus & Giroux, Knopf and Ecco Press.) Knopf's Anne Carson incorporates prose sections into her work, stretching the conventional definition of a poem. And Farrar, Straus & Giroux's August Kleinzahler writes in a direct, colloquial voice that is a far cry from the formal diction and abstruse vocabulary of traditional "high" poetry. What sets mainstream poetry apart from other forms is its reliance on a coherent central viewpoint, or "I"; its largely conventional syntax; and its generally muted political stance. It has also been criticized by poets such as Adrienne Rich for resisting ethnic voices.But Jonathan Galassi, the editor-in- chief of FSG argues that a poet doesn't have to be explicitly "experimental" to be progressive. "You can have new things in old boxes," he says. "Sometimes the poets that seem the most traditional are actually the most innovative."FSG's poetry program includes Nobel Prize Laureates Seamus Heaney, Derek Walcott, Joseph Brodsky, Irish poet Paul Muldoon (whose new collection, Kerry Slides, was published by Dufour Editions in February), Gertrude Schnackenberg, Charles Wright and C. K. Williams. FSG?s 1997 titles include Black Zodiac, by Lenore Marshall Award-winner Charles Wright (Apr.);the paperback of last year?s hardcover editon of The Figured Wheel: New and Collected Poems by Robert Pinsky (Apr.); and Desire, by Frank Bidart (Sept.).Norton boasts the likes of two-time NBA-winner Stanley Kunitz, Gerald Stern, Rita Dove, Stephen Dunn, Martin Espada (see above), A. R. Ammons (whose new long poem Glare is due in July), and Maxine Kumin (whose Selected Poems is due out in May) on its poetry list. Says editor Carol Houk-Smith, "I publish what I love, and I don't think about schools at all." Norton editor Jill Bialosky, whose authors include lesbian writer Marilyn Hacker, Irish writer Eavan Boland, James Lasdun (whose collection Woman Police Officer in Elevator appeared in February), says she is especially pleased to be bringing second books by Janet Sylvester (The Mark of Flesh, June) and Marie Howe (What the Living Do, Nov.) in 1997. "Unlike in fiction, where it is often the first novel that is really exciting, it takes a little bit longer for a poet to establish him or herself," she says. "Usually by the second or third book you begin to see an audience for that poet." (Bialosky is also a poet in her own right; her first collection, The End of Desire, is due from Knopf in March.)Knopf editor Harry Ford finds that author appearances are the best way to promote their poetry books. "We ask poets to read for us as much as possible," he says. "We don't tour them like a big-time author, because we just don't have the money, but there are many cities that welcome poets and have reading series." Knopf's list includes W. S. Merwin, Donald Justice, and Lucie Brock-Broido; in February they published Edgar Bowers's Collected Poems and Marge Piercy's What Are Big Girls Made Of?, and in October they will release The Collected Poems of Amy Clampitt.Ecco Press has a heavily international list?Louise Gluck, Poet LaureateRobert Hass, James Tate, Swedish poet Tomas Transtromer and Czech poet Czeslaw Miloz?to rival that of a major publisher, even though it is an independent press, located in Hopewell, N.J. Publisher and poet Daniel Halpern argues that there are advantages for poets to working with a smaller house: "We try to publish poets continuously, book after book, which is something the bigger houses don't always do." The sentiment is echoed by Sam Hamill, the publisher of Copper Canyon, one of the few presses in America devoted exclusively to poetry. Says Hamill, "In New York publishing, the poetry is at the very bottom of the list. We felt that if we could produce a beautiful edition of something and keep it at a reasonable price, we could keep it in print longer." Copper Canyon's eclectic list includes Hayden Carruth, the Pulitzer Award-winning Carolyn Kizer and Greek poet and Nobel Laureate Odysseas Elytis.Not everyone associated with establishment poetry is defensive when questioned about the relative lack of experimental and ethnic writers in the mainstream. Wadsworth, whose academy administers some of America's biggest poetry prizes, has sometimes been accused of being part of an "official verse culture," but it doesn't bother him. "When the academy was founded [in 1934], the whole point was to take some poets who were not established and establish them," he says. "If we've succeeded in that, we're glad. The misconception is that we're in some kind of competition with people who are not established."Myles, for one, is optimistic that today's open climate will eventually bring poetry's more marginal movements greater recognition. "The big houses are starting to look to the small houses for inspiration," she says. "And that's good news for everyone."

↑ Index

279. F.A. Templeton
Re: [Fwd: CCCP]
Wed 12 Mar 1997

> is there a email contact for this conference?
>
> mark

Mark, I'll get numbers for Ian Patterson and Rod Mengham if they use them. Meanwhile, you can try through me, as I'm partly involved and close by in Cambridge.

Fiona Templeton

↑ Index

280. F.A. Templeton
Re: "deeply disturbed"/Retallack essay
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Jena:

Who are the publishers? Know whre it's available?

Fiona

↑ Index

281. Joseph Zitt
Re: suspended music
Wed 12 Mar 1997

KENT JOHNSON wrote:

> There used to be a magazine called _Ear_ devoted to new music--is there anything out there comparable?

There are a few: I religiously read Musicworks (from Canada), Wire (from England), and various stuff online, such as the ezine Juxtaposition.

I had a few pieces in Ear, long ago; it was a very cool magazine, and I wish it had survived. -- ---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ===== [redacted] ===== Human Systems \||| ||/ Austin, Texas! ========== SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/ http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt == <> <> == Empty Words == ecto \|

↑ Index

282. F.A. Templeton
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

On Tue, 11 Mar 1997 [redacted] wrote:
> at the same time, as a teacher, i find mself in a difficult situation > when my white male students bring in their more experimental writing, rife > with distended phalli, as exemplary moments in contemporary poetry..... if i rail against the unsubtle identity > gendering of male fantasy driven work, regardless how aesthetically > informed, then should i likewise rail against the unsubtle essentializing > of experience in the work of african-american women?... whereas the former > usually reinforces an existing power relationship, the latter seems on the > surface of things to act as a sort of corrective, at least short-term and more with which you qualified this, I know, as below and in later posts, but:

1. to you: "exemplary moments in contemporary poetry" ???

2. in general: Isn't it not just that you have to do both, as you answer yourself, but that the macho dimension you're talking about and/or its converses is actually informing the sense of what experiment is for and is? And that much as we may like messing about in the matter of our art, doesn't "aesthetic" become limited to pretty reshuffle or stylistic look-alike if that poetic matter isn't a vehicle for being able to see anew in all senses? My terms aren't rigorous here either, I just think the question is important.

> to flip things around, from a more nurturing pedagogical perspective: do i credit the aesthetic in the former, ignoring the more macho dimension?... and do i credit the identity politics of the latter, and ignore the aesthetic dimension?...
>
> *clearly, it seems to me, i need to do BOTH, somehow... i need to help students grasp the gendering of the former, the ways the aesthetic at times trivializes same, and the aesthetic simplicity-qua-simple identity of the latter... i need to discuss both the sociopolitical/cultural work done by the poems in varying communities, and the ways in which the aesthetics work or don't in this process of meaning-making, of valuing and revaluing... as contributors to this meaning-making process (along with human beings, i mean), poems can work to produce mean-spirited de- and connotations quite effectively, or well-intended de- and connotations not so effectively (in tech. writing, incidentally, you can supplement "mean-spirited" and "well-intended" with "inaccurate" and "accurate")... but the field of meaning and possibility, the discourse of poetry, is such that one's attention is (or should be) drawn not only to various connotations, but to effectiveness (yeah, i'm slipping & sliding on a form/content dualism here, and i'm using "effectiveness" itself to denote* > aesthetic efficacy, but i trust i'm making my point)...

↑ Index

283. Christina Fairbank Chirot

Joyeux Fetes Jack Kerouac

Wed 12 Mar 1997

HAPPY BIRTHDAY FOR JACK KEROUAC--

No. 75--

Then over the bridge, the flash and Au nom du Pere mystery of oncoming car lights(something a Ma tante Cafiere writer using words can never quite get), the Pistalette de bois sense of old wooden jetties however unphoto-Ainsi soit-il! graphable far below roting in the mud and bushes, the old Potomac into Virginia, the (Visions of Gerard) scene of old Civil War battles, the crossing into the country known as The Wilderness, all a sadness of steel a mile longnow as the waters rollon anyawy, mindless of America's mad invention, photographs,words.
(On the Road to Florida)

WHO WALKS IN HIDDENESS HAS LIGHT TO GUIDE THEM (Chuang Tzu)

river turning edge again fills the road give glance restless heart

sing waiting music journey day feeling sun sang away comes out find cave jukebox shadow walls tell pictures make visible mysteries wind rock grass bright liquid dusk tunes incantations dust snowy away outside road halo

quickened hurry slow film visual words EVERYTHING-
one giant drop ness hands held parted road arrowing waters immensities quartering night sky tree guitar star

(1st three lines words from Han Shan all other words from Emily Dickinson & Jack Kerouac arranged dbc)

"He Honored Life"

↑ Index

284. David Kellogg
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

On Wed, 12 Mar 1997, Maria Damon wrote:

> *i've been staying out of this one cuz it seemed like same old same old, but i feel the need to ask: were identity politics not a part of what kept women/folks of color out of the job market for so many years? did we invent identity politics? have they not always been a part of determining who gets what? why is it only a "problem" when normative identity's (ie.e straight white male etc) normativity is called into question? and for that matter, why have "identity politics" suddenly become such anathema, as if they were essentialist in nature? compare income levels, education levels, life opportunity levels of people of different "identities" and it seems that there might actually be a need to talk about it.*

Oh, absolutely, I'm totally in agreement with you. I guess I was using "identity politics" in the narrower sense that Marjorie put forward, in terms of something that has just emerged ("the coming of the minority communities" etc.). Of course, you're right, this very narrowing, or exclusion of normative identity from the discourse, is part of the political game that's played.

> When Marjorie indirectly suggests that I'm too sympathetic to identity politics, that I've somehow bought into the rhetoric of that whole line of thinking, I want to laugh -- she should sit in on some of my interviews.
>
> *david i don't see any reason why you should apologize for noticing that there is social stratification in this country based on certain demographic factors, and for thinking it might be not okay. i do see a problem with people's knee jerk reaction to attempts to talk about politics on this list.*

I'm not apologizing for that. Fer sure. I was thinking of certain kinds of questions I get in interviews that are difficult to answer because of a difference in vocabulary & critical syntax. Not really worth going into on this list, but -- to put it generally -- the repeated pattern of those questions indicates how my work's failure to adhere to a certain _disourse_ of cultural identity is taken in interviews to indicate resistance to multiculturalism as such. Which couldn't be farther from the case, since my work is (in my estimation) as relativist as they come.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

> modernism (not speaking for joe but for myself)
> implies this kind of dilemma in teaching
> writing, as does, more generally, an interest > in the cultural work of different writings. the
> apples & oranges approach just doesn't make > sense to me; it seems to point up the basically
> New Critical assumptions that underlie most > american creative writing workshops.
>
> best, chris
> ..
> christopher alexander, etc.
> [redacted]
> (Marriott Library Computer Systems)
>
> language code not found. illegal operation error.
> this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be
> lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

286. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

what is Eavan Boland doing among bay area experimental communities: please inform

On Tue, 11 Mar 1997, Robert Archambeau wrote:

> *i don't mind saying here, anyway, that it's pretty easy to be* > misunderstood when one slams the writing of a minority poet, however > *justifiably... but i don't mind saying here, as well, that i've noted a* > tendency at times on poetics to be down on more conventional work, even > more conventional work that, imnsho, is exemplary
>
> Joe:
>
> I sympathize with you in both of your conundrums.
>
> Regarding the first dilemma (good politics and bad aesthetics) :
>
> What can you do with writing that is at the same time politically astute > or important and also the worst sort of kitsch? Your painstaking > *process of discussing "both the sociopolitical/cultural work done by* > *the poems . . . and the ways in which the aesthetics work or don't"* > seems like the only reasonable way to treat the topic, better than an > easy dismissiveness based on either political or aesthetic grounds.

>
> Regarding the second (exemplary conventional work):
>
> The issue you raise is important, and deserves extended discussion on this list. Eavan Boland, widely considered to be both conventional and exemplary, and now working among the Bay area's experimental community, put the problem this way in a recent interview (forthcoming in the next Notre Dame Review http://www.nd.edu/~english/ndr/ndr.htm):
>
> "The issue in poetry is not the multiplication of poetries. It's the fact that there isn't yet a language of respect between these poetries."
>
> And the solution she advocates involves a painstaking process like that you advocate for the first of your two dilemmas:
>
> "I think one of the new tasks of workshops everywhere over the next decade is going to be to widen their vocabulary not just to speak about poetry, but to engage with, and develop a language of respect for the energies of other communities and other ideas of craft. The alternative is just sterile division . . ."
>
> This list seems like the right venue for notes toward such a language.
>
> It will be a good interview to check out when it appears in the next issue (and I'm not just saying that because I conducted it).
>
> Robert Archambeau

↑ Index

287. Jordan Davis
Re: "depply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

hapy typeo -- _disourse_ -- J

↑ Index

288. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

it seems to me that it would be better to do away with the Norton and just work to develop a consensus around demystifying anthologies (there is no one anthology nor should there ever be one or one that pretends to be one) than to fight to get token language poets into the Norton (the old Norton obviously I don't mean Paul Hoover's Norton: I mean it is nostalgic even to worry about some anthology claiming to be central): teachers do tend to want anthologies but it gets less and less likely that they can claim to be covering modern poetry by using any anthology

On Tue, 11 Mar 1997, David Kellogg wrote:

> Dear Marjorie (and others who may be listening),
>
> If I'm your antagonist, I am indeed a friendly one. I neither intended to nor in fact did imply that you were a racist. I'm happy to read what you wrote, however, though I'd enourage the same from you ;-). I think we can start to talk to (rather than past) each other.
>
> So let's focus on the particulars you quote from your article:
>
> What I say, for the record, is that, whereas in 1959 Don Allen could put together an anthology of "the" new American poetry, an anthology that pretty accurately pitted the counterculture against the establishment, in the 1990s, there can no longer be ONE counterculture anthology and so attempts to produce one that is "the" avant-garde can't wholly succeed.
>
> OK fine. Here I'm totally in agreement with you (and think the major thrust of your argument quite on target).
>
> And I write:
> "More important: the eightiies witnessed the coming of the minority communites. . . In their inception, many of these poetries were, ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric, and the ontology of the poem were concerned. But counterculture poets and critics couldn't--and still can't--say this out loud because they would have immediately been labeled racist or sexist. And thus the picture has become increasingly clouded. " and then I go on to complain about the absence of all but U.S. poets in most of the new anthologies.
>
> First: "the eighties witnessed the coming of the minority communities." I honestly don't know what this means; I can't hold it in my head, it just drains out between my skullplates. Are you saying that there weren't minority communities before the eighties? Or just that there weren't minority POETRY communites? Or that these communities hadn't "come" (to maturity, to coalescence, etc.)? None of these interpretations seem to me satisfying, because none of the assertions that result are, so far as I can tell, true. I'm not trying to bait you, honestly; I simply can't see what that sort of generalizaion means, nor what its point is.
>
> Second: "In their inception, many of these [minority community] poetries were, ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric, and the ontology of the poem were concerned. But counterculture poets and critics couldn't -- and still can't -- say that out loud because they would have immediately been labeled racist or sexist." Agreements: that many of these poetries were conservative in the ways you mention. Disagreements: 1) that this formal conservatism is ironic in any sense whatsoever; and 2) that you can't say these poetries are conservative (etc.) without being labeled racist or sexist. I certainly labelled you neither, neither on this list nor in my article.

Now David perfectly proves my point by implying I'm somehow making a racist statement.

You are reading into (as opposed to "not reading") what I wrote. What I wrote was that the pluralism of your approach is in tension with the exclusivity of your actual critical practice. This seems to me a perfectly reasonable critique to make. Sure I find this disturbing; but not because I think you're a racist (I don't) -- rather, because of the slippage that comes into play in passages like the one that follows:

What I meant, of course, is that the mainstream anthologies today like the Norton will include a lot of, say Rita Dove, because she's a black woman when the Norton doesn't even include Zukofsky, Reznikoff etc. not to mention Harryette Mullen, Erica Hunt, Will Alexander, or Charles Bernstein, Susan Howe, Lyn Hejinian--well, the list goes on and on, right? This is where identity politics does indeed cloud the picture because if you object to these inclusions or exclusions you are immediately branded.

"Inclusions or exclusions." This is not a symmetrical complaint. The complaint about exclusions is well taken, and I'm wholly on your side in that struggle. The complaint about inclusions is where I think your pluralistic stance conflicts with your practice. Mullen, Hunt, et al. are not excluded because Rita Dove is included. (Nor do I think it fair to say that the Norton includes "a lot of . . . Dove, because she's a black woman," barring evidence to support that assertion.) Giving Dove less space will do not one damn bit of good in making more space for Zukofsky, Howe, or Bernstein.

What I'm trying to say, badly probably, because email is not the easiest writing venue, is that, yes, I am opposed to identity politics in its crude form and no, that doesn't make me a racist, and if we want to be political, let's be political and try to do something about what is happening in Washington.

1) identity politics: I do am opposed to "its crude form," but I think such opposition must not be crude either;

2) that doesn't make you a racist. Agreed (never thought otherwise);

3) politics: it's all over the place, both in Washington and in the poetry > community etc. But I'd append also: If we want to do something about excluded poetry, let's not act as though the currently included poets are the problem. If we want diversity, let's have diversity, and not some revised Norton.

>
> I don't really have any response to your comments on Dorn, because (except for one moment at its inception) I did not really participate in that thread.
>
> I hope this is helpful in clarifying our disagreements.
>
> Cheers,
> David
> *~~~

> jobs I've come close to getting but didn't, some offers were made where the applicant's gender, race, and/or investment in identity politics were at issue. But so what? I guess what I'm trying to say is that it would be easy -- too easy -- to blame this situation on dominance of identity politics. There are a lot of other factors at stake, including the funding of jobs in general, resistance to contemporary work, resistance to the kind of criticism/sociology/theory that I do (esp. with regard to contemporary poetry), etc.
>
> When Marjorie indirectly suggests that I'm too sympathetic to identity politics, that I've somehow bought into the rhetoric of that whole line of thinking, I want to laugh -- she should sit in on some of my interviews.
>
> With regard to binaries, a crude opposition to identity politics that assigns "it" (whatever "it" is) blame for whatever situtation (my lack of a job, certain poets' exclusion from the Norton or some other standard anthology) -- in their binary opposition, both submit to a zero-sum-game view of poetic value. If my poet's in, somebody else has got to leave. There ain't room in this town . . .
>
> Can't we get beyond that?
>
> Cheers,
> David
> *~~~

only saying what others have already said. At the same time I think the "deeply disturbed" discussion might suffer from a lack of any agreement on terms. More or less, I think anthologies are extremely useful, only they might be (and often are) compiled for reasons we (you or I) disagree with, and are of course influenced on a more general level by dominant ideologies, which in fact they more reflect than create. I think that multi-culturalism, which is not only dramatized in recent marketing trends concerning the creation of anthologies, and which is also similar to anthologizing on the more profound level of method, is also much too useful to be scorned, but in fact does not provide a very stable support for any view of the world above and beyond immediate political situations: in short, is not very revolutionary in the Marxist sense. I think it is important to try to keep a connection between poetry and politics and have tried to do so when possible.

Eliza McGrand- wrote:

>Lucasta was written in >lovelace's early years, when he was a beautiful honored young man at court, >when Charles I presided with his family, when lovelace's life seemed to >open into a halcyon of family, honors, riches, glory... then came the civil >war, the massacres right and left, the despoilings, pillages, rapes....
[snipped]
>this poem doesn't make it into the anthologies -- i think because everyone >is so enamored of the image of the courtly cavalier poet that they don't >_see_ or want to see, or want to have as part of the writer, the >bitter,disillusioned, agony of the last years, as well as the no longer high >flown, but often more compassionate writings.

Perhaps one reaon for this is that the compilers of these anthologies want to classify thier subjects, and to keep the boundary lines neat. Lovelace, as you describe him, writes during a period of intense political and aesthetic upheavel: the bougeoise coup-de-grace of aristocratic power, a shift in the make-up of the dominant class (perhaps make-up is not a good word, since they all wore so much of it!?) which eventually becomes reflected in poetry in the shift from courtly poetry to Romanticism. If Lovelace was neither particularly progressive (as, say, Arnold or Whitman), or particularly reactionary (as, say, Spenser or Milton), then it becomes very difficult to decide on which side of the aesthetic he is to be placed. Even anthologies claiming to provide an overview of "Literature in English" always feel compelled to enforce certain groupings. Every "chapter" begins with a pity little argument about why they have choosen to start the section about the 1800's in 1789, or etc. Poor L-l. straddles the fence, as it were, and so one half of his ouevre must be lopped-off in order to make him fit without the aesthetic bounds (or at least to keep him from appearing "out of place.")

I remember from college the frustration of trying to understand these groupings in the face of the poetry itself. It would all make sense in the survey class, but back in the dorm I'd wonder: but HOW is this Victorian verse (or what have you)? And it was never easy to pin it down. More than most, Blake causes trouble, since you might pick up those anti-proverbs, for example, and have no great difficulty in determining thier approximate date: if I remember correctly Norton somewhat acknowledged this difficulty by using Blake as the "dividing line" between the two volumnes of their standard collection. In this way, I agree that:

> anthologies encourage quick > snapshots, easily tagged and sorted "representations."

This is indeed the problem I have with them. And I have a similar problem with identity politics, which none the less do much, imo, for equality. However I have a couple thoughts: like anthologies identity politics, as practiced, say, in hiring demographics, assumes a very easy form of representation. One is either male or female, black or white, opressed or un-opressed. This series of opposites arises from a priori categories of sex or race that have been put in place and are still assumed to be "natural." In other words, the fact that your sex is largely determined by societal norms is ignored. Judith Butler, would, I believe, be the most frequently cited source of these ideas. I wish I could remember the name of the essayist and performance artist (and professor, and etc.) who has a video work in the Chicago Contemporary Arts Museum in which she sits at a desk and, looking directly into the camera, addressing "whites", proves step by step that on a scientific, emperical level, regarding blood and genes, they are part black; she then addresses issues of minority hiring ("Why don't you tell that to your boss? Your co-workers? You could get that minority scholarship. Afterall, you are part black. Why deny this fact? Why do you not admit it to yourself?"), etc. The "problem" with identity politics, as I see it, is a matter not of what it does now, which is basically a good thing, but where it leads, what channels of thought it sanctions, which ones it diverts from a public discourse. For example, even though I.P.'s is mostly concerned today with helping people to get jobs, it suggests a view of the world in which people are not viewed in terms of their class-relationships and economic positions, which I think is a dangerous thing to do because it only shifts the burden of the problem--and does not solve the problem itself. It transforms class solidarity into ethnic solidarity--and that is a shame because those two solidarities in no way cancel each other out and might instead be combined for greater effect, as the Black Panthers proved for a little while.

Thank you for reading this far.

Finally, I said in the beginning, "in the Marxist sense" and have tried to carry my crude understanding of these politics on my sleeve through the above--my point now being that anthologies are less offensive when they state what and which and who they intend to represent (many posts have come while I was writing this that have contained versions of this)--then when they claim to represent an over-arching range.

Ultimately this form of representation, ever dividing itself into small and more detailed parts (like Borges book in the Babylonian library, with pages so thin each page is two clinging toghether--into infinity [I've often thought Norton's was after this effect]) leads to a decline in usefullness, since much of that usefullness is in fact based on discrimination, which is obviously a form of representation, and the more detailed representation you get the less discrimination you have. And since anthologies are in point of fact not people, it is acceptable to say of them: at what point do I consider them useless? At what point do they stop being collections are begin to simulate archives? How far will they go on including before I am just as well off reading the individual books?

Perhaps this sounds as though I am suggesting that minorities write less "good" poetry: I in fact belive quite the opposite, as it seems to me that our present historical situation in this country, and in the world, is more attuned to minority representation than before, and that this leads to, on the whole, better representations. However, about THAT whole issue--the connections between clearly defined representation and aesthetic quality--we would need another thread.

Thanks for enduring.

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

291. David Kellogg
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

At 03:05 PM 3/12/97 -0500, Joseph Lease wrote: >it seems to me that it would be better to do away with the Norton and just >work to develop a consensus around demystifying anthologies (there is no >one anthology nor should there ever be one or one that pretends to be one) >than to fight to get token language poets into the Norton (the old Norton >obviously I don't mean Paul Hoover's Norton: I mean it is nostalgic even >to worry about some anthology claiming to be central): teachers do tend to >want anthologies but it gets less and less likely that they can claim to >be covering modern poetry by using any anthology

Right on!

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

293. Mark Prejsnar
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

On Wed, 12 Mar 1997, Joseph Lease wrote:

> it seems to me that it would be better to do away with the Norton and just work to develop a consensus around demystifying anthologies (there is no one anthology nor should there ever be one or one that pretends to be one) than to fight to get token language poets into the Norton (the old Norton obviously I don't mean Paul Hoover's Norton: I mean it is nostalgic even to worry about some anthology claiming to be central): teachers do tend to want anthologies but it gets less and less likely that they can claim to be covering modern poetry by using any anthology

Probably a very useful point to make...Many of us here are clearly involved with small and alternative publishing ventures that direct energy/attention away from large institutional/monumental power-nodes, like The Anthology.....Some of us (like me) tend to continue to think of anthologies, in this large resonant sense, as important because we grew up with NAP and other exemplars..But it is argueable that everyone, including teachers, might usefully turn away from "tomes" to more fugative texts, as a basis for evaluation/debate/struggle over what we want our poetries to become...(On the other hand, I would hate to see a bad financial return for those who have made the effort/gamble to put out alternative anthology projects--Hoover's, but the several major anthologies from Sun & Moon especially, recently...) It would also need to be said that there are anthologies and then there are anthologies...The ongoing Rothenberg project of reconceptualizing the structure, scope and function of the form, is something else again; that is the other approach: not to abandon anthologies but to radically redo their meaning and identity...

mark prejsnar

↑ Index

294. Matthias Regan
Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
Wed 12 Mar 1997

This is some of the "problem" of identity politics I was trying to describe near the tedious end of my last post:

> Poetry in America is a diverse, highly contested field, crowded with a variety of practices and philosophies, none of which lend themselves easily to generalizations.

Absolutely true, or as Joseph Lease says, "Right On!"
But then what is this?

> How, for example, to classify Rafael Campo, an acclaimed gay Hispanic poet who writes often in formal verse?

Is this not classification? Does this sentence not actually read:

How, for example to classify Rafael Campo? --An accalimed gay Hispanic poet who writes often in formal verse.

And the problem then is that the original disguises the actual claim.

Marjorie Perloff points out, "Thirty years ago you had >the establishment?Robert Lowell and Elizabeth Bishop?and the >counterculture. Now you have endless overlapping, dispersed groups.
>There is no one movement; rather, there are many movements.

The reason for this, imo, being not some greater sensitivity or growth in humanistic potential, but the poetry market itself, which has considerably broadened its base. In other words, not:

"The >landscape of poetry publishing itself reflects and promotes this >heterodoxy.

But that it causes this heterodoxy. On the one hand, this is a wonderful thing, leading to greater opportunity for more people to be heard, and in part helping to begin the process of erasing racist, sexist, homophobic aspects of the dominant ideology. On the other hand: more people find more ways to make more money.

The number of small presses in America has grown >precipitously in the last three decades, fueled in part by advances in >desktop publishing.

In the final analysis, the people making the computers are the more people making more money I was thinking of. I do not mean to suggest that more small presses is not a Very Good Thing, only that it didn't come out of nowhere.

Thank you for posting this article!

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

295. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

this is more or less what I did when teaching intermediate poetry writing as an MFA candidate at Brown: obviously one key thing is to get the young poet into the library both for current literary journals and for weird books from the nineteen twenties or the sixteen twenties

On Wed, 12 Mar 1997, Carrie Etter wrote:

> Speaking as a finishing MFA candidate at UC Irvine, all of us teaching the undergraduate introductory poetry writing course usually utilize an anthology _in addition to_ frequent handouts. Another common practice is to put a homemade anthology pieced from magazines, individual books of poetry, and anthologies on reserve and let students copy from that. But we have the freedom to design our own syllabi and to select our own texts; I doubt this is true across the board.
>
> Carrie Etter
>
> On Wed, 12 Mar 1997, Joseph Lease wrote:
>
> it seems to me that it would be better to do away with the Norton and just work to develop a consensus around demystifying anthologies (there is no one anthology nor should there ever be one or one that pretends to be one) than to fight to get token language poets into the Norton (the old Norton obviously I don't mean Paul Hoover's Norton: I mean it is nostalgic even to worry about some anthology claiming to be central): teachers do tend to want anthologies but it gets less and less likely that they can claim to be covering modern poetry by using any anthology

↑ Index

296. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

reply to Mark: yeah of course I like the Hoover and Rothenberg anthologies and Messerli's recent big one all very much: my point is that every time we have to make the old Norton mean what it used to mean (my guess is it never meant that: I mean not in the contexts that inform this one most directly) we give it a big boost: we need to touch just teach our children that anthologies are human institutions like a clubhouse in a tree (or like a Joseph Cornell box in the case of Rothenberg especially)

↑ Index

297. Thomas Lecky
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

[redacted] wrote:
>
> dear thomas (lecky), i do understand your decision to leave stanford (to > leave standford... wow!) on the basis of reduced job possibilities...
>
> but please: as a white male het (one having strong sympathies with that > olsonian line you mention), i must observe that your problems with the > academic job market, or most other job markets for that matter, do not > reduce to your identity... statistically speaking, it's other white guyz > whom you're losing out to, so to say... much as am i... this much is > verifiable...

Absolutely. I was perhaps being a bit reductive: I left not for that reason alone, of course, but because of a host of worries, fears, etc. that surround study. And I think you've really hit on something with your phraseology: "losing out." And I do not exclude myself from the equation; that is the real pity in parts of this discussion, the exclusion of one's own self from the problems we as a species have created. As much as we are all part of the solution, we are all part of the problem. My "identity" (I don't even know what the hell that really means) is a mess. The academy is a mess too; anthologies are a mess; so what? So, I like to read Robert Creeley and I am totally uninterested in Rita Dove. All you on Dove's side attack. All of us on Creeley's side will defend. And? This thread has swirled in and out of politics by way of the thing we cannot name: taste.

There are so many factors at work making things sour that we could continue ad infinitum. I'd rather go read Creeley. It is in his words, among so many others (including, for me, many list members), that we approach the democracy of words Williams recognized as the true source of freedom.

Williams to Creeley: "My own (moral) program can be chiefly stated. I send if for what it may be worth to you: To write badly is an offense to the state since the government can never be more than the government of the words... Bad art is then that which does not serve in the continual service of cleansing the language of all fixations upon dead, stinking dead, usages of the past. Sanitation and hygiene or sanitation that we may have hygienic writing."

And in "A 1 Pound Stein": "It's the words, the words we need to get back to, words washed clean. Until we get the power of thought back through a new minting of the words we are actually sunk. This is a moral question at base, surely but a technical one also and first."

These are the best moral and political positions I can use to defend my own.

Thomas Lecky
--

Thomas Lecky
[redacted]
Qwerty Arts http://www.qwertyarts.com

↑ Index

298. Hugh Steinberg
poetry that sells?
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Those numbers are pretty good (although I wonder what the print runs were). One of the things that makes poetry publishing different is scale. It's not like your average poetry publisher is printing 50,000 copies of any particular book. I work for a very small (about four titles a year) press, Tia Chucha Press, and our print runs are about 1,000 to 2,500. From what I know, runs of that size are typical for books of poetry. We're lucky that we have a stable distributor at Northwestern University Press (our three previous distributors went bankrupt and we lost a lot of money). So long as you don't get megalomaniacal and print too many books, it's not too hard to sell out your printing run. The books sell, some faster than others, but they do sell. Some of our titles are already in their third printings.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

299. William Burmeister Prod
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Thomas Lecky wrote:

> This thread has swirled in and out of politics by way of the thing we > cannot name: taste.
> There are so many factors at work making things sour that we could continue ad > infinitum. I'd rather go read Creeley.

I couldn't agree more. It seems to me (at the risk of perhaps over simplifying a complex issue) that taste or preference is at the heart of many discussions on the value of poetry and the marginalization of this or that poet, or poetry movement. But why isn't taste or preference named as such more often? I do realize that in my position (outside of the universities and colleges) it is easier for me to avoid the identity politics faced by those who teach and those who interview to teach. But at home, do I practice discrimination when I browse the bookstores and pick up, and read, and buy Zukofsky, Bernstein, Stein, etc., but not Rita Dove, Maya Angelou, or Adrienne Rich? In the stict sense of the word yes! Am I a racist or sexist? No. It probably has more to do with what I find engaging, interesting, mind-blowing, etc.

The "Different Faces of Poetry" by Mallay Charters also has:

> Reports Sun Young Li, associate > editor at the experimental, New York City-based Asian American > publishers Kaya Publications: "All of our poets are moving beyond the > issue of identity. It's a phase people have to go through, but it's ultimately > limiting. The writers at Kaya are much more concerned with aesthetic, > literary and political issues."

This makes sense as a goal. Attainable? We'll see. Identity politics as a vehicle for recognition and representation? Definitely. But when do the training wheels come off?

Best,

Bill Burmeister

↑ Index

300. DS

Re: "deeply disturbed"

Wed 12 Mar 1997

> Absolutely. I was perhaps being a bit reductive:

So, I like to read Robert Creeley and I am totally >uninterested in Rita Dove. All you on Dove's side attack. All of us on Creeley's side >will defend.

You 'were' being a bit reductive.

↑ Index

301. David Israel
Re: FFCop's story mambo / SA lit workshops?
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Joe Amato --

your remarks abt. Coppola's new lit-mag read sensibly; as noted, I've not yet seen it, but agree w/ your points (& "let's see!" stance). Further: of course the interface between literature & cinema is an important one culturally. Vital -- but poss. not enought thought about / grappled with / considered. If the "Faces of Eve" instance proves not isolated, but an example of ongoing attention to that borderland, this in itself would do Mr. C. some credit.

Too: readership of the Z zine is apt to include Hollywood-types -- who (depending on editorial bent) might benefit . . . Inshallah, look forward to your work therein (& anon on screen? ;-)).

d.i.

p.s.: speaking of film, I'd meant to mention -- pursuant to now-long-ago thread re: film heroines (don't have the posts right at hand -- but I was the unwise chap [& Poetics newbie] who made mention of Bandit Queen in connection w/ that query) --

So: here's another (I dare say better) suggestion: director Ketan Mehta's Mirch Masala (Hindi), in English circulated under title SPICES.

Remarkable -- beautiful film, w/ a strongly feminist POV, a historical setting (I suppose circa 19th century), excellent use of image, music (folksong), story (something of a morality tale, but told w/ an interesting sense of the archetypal) -- dealing in fact w/ some of the same issues as Bandit Queen endeavored to address, but in a different manner.

Saw it when new -- abt. a doz. years ago at Pacific Film Archive (Berkeley). So happens, San Francisco writer / sound-recordist Shafi Hakim had a part in writing the script. (If the Poetics chap who'd sought such films might be interested in this but has a hard time tracking down a copy, one could check w/ Shafi, I suppose.)

↑ Index

302. DS
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

In the stict sense of the >word yes! Am I a racist or sexist? No. It probably has more to do with what I >find engaging, interesting, mind-blowing, etc.

Or with the way you read? And are taught to read? I'm not defending third rate non-white non-male writers but then i'm not comparing them with the great dead whites either. There are some excellent u.s.w. non-w non-m writers and have been for centuries. It's ridculous comparing Angelou to Creeley. Perhaps to Heaney or Ted Hughes or more popular/accessible 'poets'. And to write off the rest of the world by 'ethnicity' ooops except Baraka (who is okay) is REDUCTIVE in the extreme and to rationalise this in almost Bloomsian terms as not racist but. Well...

I don't know i always try to stay out of discussions like this, but then find myself dragged in. Its like letters to the editor in the local paper (now there is a peculiar poetics) I read & read & get steamed up at least 2 letters out of three & slam the paper down - or leave it on a bus in disgust & very rarely - usually when a whole lot of variables manage to line up - time, convenience, writing implements, the planets, my mood, nothing better to do (there is always something better to do) I write in response.

One of three things happens

1. i don't post it
2. i post they don't print
3. i post they print i regret

Obviously the first option is the best & least frustrating. Today I post knowing it will be published (to the list at least).

So regrets in advance

& love & respect to all...

& more to those who agree with me - if they find i have really said anything at all.

& more to those who disagree

& to those who really disagree - I'd love to step outside, it's sunny & warm in Auckland today.

Oh resevoir,

Dan

↑ Index

303. Charles Bernstein
TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)
Wed 12 Mar 1997

From: Susan Schultz <[redacted]>
Subject: TINFISH! Collectors' Edition!

TINFISH #4 is now available. Each copy has a different full-color cover, featuring palimpsests of Hawai'i travel brochures and other local advertising; the overlays are incredible. The covers are by Gaye Chan and Duncan Dempster of the University of Hawai'i art department. Contributors from Hawai'i, Australia, New Zealand, the continental U.S., and elsewhere, include: Kapulani, Murray Edmond, Adam Aitken, Pam Brown, Yunte Huang, Richard Hamasaki, Rebecca Mays Ernest, Paul Hoover, John Noto, Dan Raphael, Gabrielle Welford, Joshua McKinney, Jorge Guitart, John Kinsella, Susan M. Schultz, Loss Pequeno Glazier, Sue Moss, Dan Featherston, Michelle Murphy, Liz Waldner, Cydney Chadwick, Marie Hara, Joshua Harmon, and Hazel Smith; design by Suzanne Kosanke.

The price is $5 per copy; $13 per 3 issue subscription. TINFISH's address is 1422A Dominis Street, Honolulu, HI 96822, or you can reach me through this email account <[redacted]>.

Susan M. Schultz
Dept. of English
1733 Donaghho Road
University of Hawai'i-Manoa
Honolulu, HI 96822

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/schultz
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/tinfish

↑ Index

304. Carnography
Re: The Twentieth Century
Wed 12 Mar 1997

To all:

> From: ron <[redacted]>
>
> alert! FC2/Black Ice Books is under investigation by a congressional committee trying to shut down NEA. more to follow. letters of support can be faxed to [redacted].

First books targeted:

SM, by Jeffery DeShell, Blood of Mugwump, by Doug Rice, The Mexican Trilogy, by D.N. Stuefloten, and Chick Lit 2, edited by Chris Mazza. It seems my book, Distorture, will probably be the next to be targeted. After that, I'm not certain who's next.

Even if this turns out to be good for individual writers, the fact remains that it's bad news for BIB and for all other literary academic presses. Please write letters of support and do what you can.

Also:

In celebration of two new books:

Distorture

&

Beneath the Empire of the Birds

March 27, 7:00 p.m.

Tower Books

Readings by

Rob Hardin
Darius James
and Carl Watson

383 Lafayette Street
NY, NY 10009
212/[redacted]

There will be posters, wine, beer, an ad in the Voice, a choice pic in The NY Press: The place will be a madhouse.

An aside: All responses to me personally must be emailed to me personally: After getting continuously flamed for punctuation, and then getting flamed for calling a punctuation flame bad netiquette (which it is: I worked for NetBooks for two years and copyedited the Masquerade book on the internet--I use such neologisms accurately), I don't really see much point in perpetuating arguments on listserv. Therefore, I won't be reading the list and won't respond to messages on the list.

Still, Black Ice Books/FC2 is more important than the logistics of any personal exchange. Jeffery DeShell is a great writer and future DeShells deserve to be published. Please support free speech and let's forget about past differences.

All the best always,

Rob Hardin

http://www.users.interport.net/~scrypt/
http://www.horrornet.com/hardin.htm

↑ Index

305. Carnography

BIB targeted by congress/Three monologues for heterogeneous voices and free beer

Wed 12 Mar 1997

To all:

> From: ron <[redacted]>
>
> alert! FC2/Black Ice Books is under investigation by a congressional committee trying to shut down NEA. more to follow. letters of support can be faxed to [redacted].

First books targeted:

SM, by Jeffery DeShell, Blood of Mugwump, by Doug Rice, The Mexican Trilogy, by D.N. Stuefloten, and Chick Lit 2, edited by Chris Mazza. It seems my book, Distorture, will probably be the next to be targeted. After that, I'm not certain who's next.

Even if this turns out to be good for individual writers, the fact remains that it's bad news for BIB and for all other literary academic presses. Please write letters of support and do what you can.

Also:

In celebration of two new books:

Distorture

&

Beneath the Empire of the Birds

March 27, 7:00 p.m.

Tower Books

Readings by

Rob Hardin
Darius James
and Carl Watson

383 Lafayette Street
NY, NY 10009
212/[redacted]

There will be posters, wine, beer, an ad in the Voice, a choice pic in The NY Press: The place will be a madhouse.

An aside: All responses to me should be emailed to me personally. After getting continuously flamed for punctuation, and amassing further flames for calling a punctuation flame bad netiquette (which it is: I worked for NetBooks for two years and copyedited the Masquerade guide to the internet--I use such neologisms accurately), I don't really see much point in perpetuating arguments on listserv. Therefore, I won't be reading the list and won't respond to messages on the list.

Still, Black Ice Books/FC2 is more important than the logistics of any personal exchange. Jeffery DeShell is a great writer and future DeShells deserve to be published. Let's all support free speech and forget about our differences.

All the best always,

Rob Hardin

http://www.users.interport.net/~scrypt/
http://www.horrornet.com/hardin.htm

↑ Index

306. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)
Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries
Wed 12 Mar 1997

---

amen

At 1:04 PM 3/13/97, [redacted] wrote:
>I've read a couple of messages now in which "identity politics" and "job >market" have been spoken in the same pixellated breath, but where the actual >discussion seems to be about the increasing use of adjuncts and so on. I'd >like to hear someone develop the argument about the relationship between >identity politics and jobs, though I promise to be skeptical. Identity >politics has been around a lot longer than the inclusion of some conservative >ethnic (in its labored sense as "non-white") voices in the Norton. And job >woes have been around a lot longer than multiculturalism. I'm not in any way >defending the job market/process as it's now practiced, but I don't want to >see the problems with it racialized--which is not what anyone's meaning to >do, I know, but the language slippeth a bit.
>
>Susan

↑ Index

307. Wendy Battin
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Wed 12 Mar 1997

Thomas Lecky wrote:

> This thread has swirled in and out of politics by way of the thing we cannot name: taste.

"Taste" may be be trivial, but love isn't. Love is just the inadmissable motor that gives energy (however waning) to judgment. Perhaps if we could own up to the poets who woke us we'd be better equipped to hear what wakenings are available elsewhere? Pound & Yeats & Stevens & Bassho & Donne & Blake woke me, and I've had students teach me how Cummings & Bukowski & even god help me Gerald Stern woke them. It's not the same second-hand, but it's not a bad place to start.

Wendy

---------- Wendy Battin (home)
http://camel.conncoll.edu/ccother/wjbat/ (CAPA)
http://shain.lib.conncoll.edu/CAPA/capa.html (Multiple Poetics)
http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Lofts/5471/index.html

↑ Index

308. Tom Vogler
[1]POETICS Digest - 11 Mar
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

[1]POETICS Digest - 11 Mar 1997 to 12 Mar 3/12/97

Sorry. Unavailable by email until April 14, 1997.

↑ Index

309. Dorulet D Ana
Re: Oops
Thu 13 Mar 1997

>You might have sent it to the wrong address because when I made my E-mail >account I might have put the wrong state make sure you sent it to NJ.Sorry.
>From, Filip
>Ps.this is the first time I am using e-mail. I am only nine.I hope I do everything right.
On Wed, 5 Mar 1997 19:33:07 -0800 Herb Levy <[redacted]> writes:
>Kenny,

>
>I found the package of 2 CDs & press release that I thought I'd sent >to you >when I got back today. It's in the mail now & I think you'll have it
>by >Saturday, Monday at the latest. Sorry.
>
>Here's a few URLs that may be of interest to your visual poetry self:
>
><http://www.ims.csuohio.edu/wreyeting/index.html>
>
><http://www.ims.csuohio.edu/selby/casthome.html>
>
><http://www.net22.com/qazingulaza/>
>
>though I'm sure you've seen them all.
>
>Hope to see you at Roulette next Saturday.
>
>Bests,
>
>Herb
>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]
>

↑ Index

310. Dorulet D Ana

Re: Oops

Thu 13 Mar 1997

This is Ana Doina
I am sorry for the previous message. My son thought he was using his e-mail on Juno when in fact he was using mine.
sorry for any inconvenience or confusion his message might have created.
AD

On Wed, 12 Mar 1997 21:38:33 PST Dorulet D Ana <[redacted]> writes:
>>You might have sent it to the wrong address because when I made my >E-mail >account I might have put the wrong state make sure you sent it >to NJ.Sorry.

>>From, Filip
>>Ps.this is the first time I am using e-mail. I am only nine.I hope I >do everything right.
>On Wed, 5 Mar 1997 19:33:07 -0800 Herb Levy <[redacted]> writes:
>>Kenny,
>>
>>I found the package of 2 CDs & press release that I thought I'd sent >>to you >>when I got back today. It's in the mail now & I think you'll have it
>>by >>Saturday, Monday at the latest. Sorry.
>>
>>Here's a few URLs that may be of interest to your visual poetry self:
>>
>><http://www.ims.csuohio.edu/wreyeting/index.html>
>>
>><http://www.ims.csuohio.edu/selby/casthome.html>
>>
>><http://www.net22.com/qazingulaza/>
>>
>>though I'm sure you've seen them all.
>>
>>Hope to see you at Roulette next Saturday.
>>
>>Bests,
>>
>>Herb
>>
>>
>>Herb Levy
>>[redacted]
>>

↑ Index

311. Chris Stroffolino
Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
Thu 13 Mar 1997

I've been watching with much interest (and dare I, at the risk of seeming an irresponsible aesthete, say "with much pleasure) the recent "deeply disturbed" thread and am excited by the possibility of something like a "public sphere"

beyond coterie debates and would like to address a few points that hopefully could be further addressed, etc.---

At one point, Marjorie writes that these mutlicultural poets are "ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric and the ontology of the poem are concerned." Being a reader of Marjorie's work, I know what she means, but it may not be self-evident to many why these forms AND ONTOLOGIES are conservative, or naive, or unreflective, etc. For there IS a valid point to be made that much of what many of us (I'm including myself in a larger interpretative community here, but any one of you may feel free to deny you share these assumptions, in fact I myself do not ALWAYS share these assumptions and who knows what tomorrow will bring) consider to be properly self-conscious, sophisticated, reflexive, recursive, whatever, work may, for many people, actually be a kind of decadent masturbatory work. I find such a dialogue interesting and it is often the subject matter of my work, as well as the work of many writers I admire--but it is NOT a necessary precondition for GOOD POETRY for me (I am, by the way, not saying that anybody on the list has said it was--just trying to raise some questions). And I guess what I would like to see more of is the kind of dialogue, or "coalition building" between some of these rigid factions. In the first place, to speak of identity politics or multicult, whatever, as a recognizable kind of verse, may very well elide the differences between several kinds of modes--i.e. RITA DOVE (as current whipping woman DU JOUR) is very far away from say Sterling Plummp(sic?) or Paul Beatty. Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, and suggested in Marjorie's calling attention to "the erosion of all democracy in washington" and the "refusal to criticize" (at least in any blatant way) on the part of many poets many of these problems, that there may be a UNION of practictioners of "radical formal innovation" and "radical CONTENT innovators" that can be emphasized more than it seems to have been in the past. Even the union of "bohemian" and "avant-garde" is a good-place to start (and certain gestures in Paul Hoover's anthology are to be very applauded for moving in this direction). That a poet can be INTELLECTUALLY or EMOTIONALLY or ETHICALLY radical, or at least challenging (even on a strict word level, as say BRECHT or LANGSTON HUGHES or D.H. LAWRENCE, is, despite the lack of what many would call formal innovation in their work--in ways, admittedly, Angelou or Dove, FOR ME, are not) may "compensate" for the lack of the more purely formal radical qualities in their work. I've said this before, but will again--that there is no necessary connection between FORMALLY innvative and SOCIALLY innovative work. It's great when a poem can be both, but for me if it's at least ONE of these (and if often doesn't matter which one, as long a it's at least one), it passes through my censors and is therefore deemed INTERESTING, etc. What makes certain poets in the ALLEN anthology, for instance, radical is NOT NECESSARILY form, or limited to form, or the formal radicalism may, after 38 years, seem now incidental, more a matter of fashion (see O'Hara's "Mayakovsky" for an example of a "speaker" theatrically aware of the the STRICTURES of the avant-garde as much as say a Lowell would come to feel the strictures of the "mainstream"--and in this light I could call attention to the replacement in the 80's (the period that is largely in questin here) of both Amiri Baraka by Michael Harper and of Kenneth Koch by Gerald Stern in the widely taught Poulin anthology (the latter of which, in both cases, are more benign both FORMALLY and SOCIALLY), or, more generally, the way much black radicalism was replaced in anthologies (definitely the NORTOn--not the Hoover one) by 1) more benign black writers (i.e. Dove again) or 2) other "fashionable" minorities (which in many cases, and probably not accidentally, are also more conservative, I think of Cathy Song, in particular, but there are others)--which has the effect retroactively of calling into question the decisions on the part of the anthologists to publish the more radical writers in the first place (kinda like the way "silly love songs" called into question the motives behind, say, Sgt. Pepper--for those who didn't already suspect SGT. Pepper when it came out--okay, sorry, a strained analogy). So, I would question David (Kellogg's) remark that "MULLEN, HUNT, ET AL., are not excluded because Rita Dove is included...." Sure, I do not want to act as if "the currently included poets are part of the problem" and I hope I will be forgiven for the use I am making of RD (Dove, not Duncan or DuPlessis) here, as a kind of intellectual shorthand, or synechdoche, for a certain style, but sometimes it is important to entertain the possibility of conspiracy (as long as one does not get all ghasthy serious about it) and realize that, YES, the poetry climate as well as the "larger" political climate has indeed gotten much more conservative in the last 20 odd years--but I do think that we should question what we mean by "conservative" in several ways. 1) the rhymes in the work of many slam-type poets (or rap) are not EXACTLY conservative in a new formalist way, as Creeley once told me in a letter "NEVER TOO LATE TO RHYME!" (Bernstein is rhyming alot lately, and Lee Ann Brown....others....). There is a whole set of issues of orality involved, and to say I HATE SPEECH does not necessarily make one a radical these days. Also, conservative and conservation share a similar root, no? What if one says "I am a conservative in exactly the ways that the so-called 'conservatives' are not"? COnservatives are actually some of the most WASTEFUL, final-fronteir, macho, make it newers out there in many FIELDS (clinton's techno "bridge' to the 21st century). Anyway, one can only go SO FAR out, and the urge to be simple can be radical, it needn't implicate one in a reductive sense of "identity politics" or "esentialism" (on this, Maria Damon's point is also, well taken). I'll stop here, because I'll probably be seen as contradicting myself, or confused, or trying to play more than one part in this discursive situation--i definitely have more questions than answers, but, then, if one can not help but define oneself maybe it's okay to define oneself as undefinable.....at least as an opening gambit, in a cultural climate that seems way too rigid (but then rigidity IS rather comic, no?)----Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

312. David Israel
Re: suspended music
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Ken Johnson remarks --

<< Just a heartfelt plug for Herb Levy's Periplum CD, Suspended Music. The "long string instrument" is amazing. Totally new.

There used to be a magazine called _Ear_ devoted to new music--is there anything out there comparable? >>

EAR (NYC-based), alas, bit the dust circa. '91-'92, sheerly for lack of ready money to get through a rough spot. Up till then, it was "growing" in many ways, but hit a snag. (FYI, EAR's latest till-the-end publisher, Carol Tuynman, moved back to Beaufort, South Carolina some years ago.) I had pleasure of writing for (& doing some editing at) EAR in the late '80s et seq. (while some of you'all mayhap were gathered at yonder EAR Inn).

As for other, similar, extant magazines? -- I don't know full scope of what's out there, but one that I know & like is:

MusicWorks
(based on Toronto).

(rather close to the old EAR in several respects)

Editorially savvy, the writing is various, sometimes arcane, typically smart & well-informed. Many of the more obscure & remarkable doings & developments in new music find (sometimes rare) overage in the pages of MusicWorks.

AND they include an accompanying CD w/ each issue, specially cut [if that's the word], coordinated w/ feature articles. (In truth, I gotta re-subscribe.) Last I knew, MusicWorks getting on-line (don't have e-address on hand); by now, bet they may have a website.

d.i.

p.s.: among EAR writers I knew, one bright young bloke, Neil Straus, "graduated" (?) to (still-current) music coverage for the NY Times, btw.

↑ Index

313. David Israel
Re: suspended music (p.p.s.)
Thu 13 Mar 1997

I wrote
>Ken Johnson remarks
but pardon, -- meant Kent

↑ Index

314. Susan Wheeler
Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Thank you, Chris.

> I've been watching with much interest (and dare I, at the risk of seeming an irresponsible aesthete, say "with much pleasure) the recent "deeply disturbed" thread and am excited by the possibility of something like a

etc.
Susan Wheeler
[redacted]

37 Washington Square West #10A
New York, New York 10011
[redacted] phone/fax

↑ Index

315. Jonathan A Levin
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

This topic has been gnawing at me for the last couple of days. I have nothing illuminating to say on it. I feel instead that it reveals something disturbingly (deeply disturbingly) ill-luminated about me, about us (poetics-us, but also U.S. us). I too hate the anthology that sacrifices interesting work for the mundane (though there are ways of making the mundane interesting, and I take both Harriet Davidson's and Bob Perelman's talks at the recent MLA on teaching poetry to be prods in the direction of making us find and profess the interesting where we maybe have deadedned our sensiblities toward it). And I hate the professional impulse to sacrifice interesting minds, with all their lively passions, to an essentialist paradigm that is (and that most everyone in the profession agrees is) hot air. And I can't find a way to make THAT interesting.

It's important to see how the "job market" problem crosses into the "identity politics" problem: the tighter the market, the tighter the pressure will be to think in narrow-reductionist terms. (The scenario: we can only hire one person, so it has to be someone who fits THIS description.) The profession (read students) is the biggest loser: just as we are expanding (in the sense of becoming increasingly open to new kinds of work from new kinds of people), we are also shrinking (fewer jobs, steady conversion to adjunct labor). So: we will invariably lose good people, many of whom a generation back would have found their calling in teaching. It saddens me. It seems our most urgent professional responsibility, those of us who teach in college programs, is to resist the adjunctification of the profession. Let course enrollments grow, let students complain? Enlist the MLA's power of publicity?

↑ Index

316. Maria Damon
Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

yes; let's have some real conversation, but not at the expense of enlarged opportunities for heretofore underrepresented folks, no matter how they write.

At 6:30 AM -0500 3/13/97, Susan Wheeler wrote:
>Thank you, Chris.
>
>>I've been watching with much interest (and dare I, at the risk of seeming an >>irresponsible aesthete, say "with much pleasure) the recent "deeply >>disturbed" thread and am excited by the possibility of something like a
>
>etc.
>Susan Wheeler
>[redacted]
>
>37 Washington Square West #10A
>New York, New York 10011
>[redacted] phone/fax

↑ Index

317. Jordan Davis
More shilly-shallying battle cries
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Just would like to agree completely with Jonathan Levin (and Joseph Lease and David Kellogg and Lisa Jarnot, I think) that the intersection of the 'job market' with 'identity politics' is the center of this particular death star. There is no sound fiscal reason the humanities departments of universities need constrict -- follow the money. Locate the bonuses. Get better at fighting. Are we politically involved yet? Are we talking about an invented need, like office supplies? Lose the administration! Lose the professional development seminars! There is no sound long-term reason that we should accept the short term gains of ... to lose weight Elvis would have a coma induced? Hang the cost-cutters from the rotunda! Before the opening of Depression II! And put your socks in a bad poet's mouth -- Chakras on stun. Jordan (disguised as Henry)

↑ Index

318. Keith Tuma
Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
Thu 13 Mar 1997

"The tradition is more than you can read. It's an entire climate. It has to be total, I mean you can't preclude any department or tendency for any reason. It's the total of what as a poet you belong to and can learn from and contribute to. Some poet might be there because of one line. You can learn from anybody. Poetry's volatile,it can escape through the people who write it. This is very unacademic of me but I believe it. The academics, as I know them, which is the Cambridge tradition, insist on a fewness. It is very, very important to them that in any stretch of literary history there be a few, and their job, the critic's job, is to nominate that few. It's surprising how that attitude permeates to the most outlandish outposts of candle-power and Tinkerbell poetry, but it does. It's very academic. From a creative point of view it's much more important that there be many. It's more important to search, quite assiduously if need be, for the good in someone's work than to recognise the dangers in it, because there are dangers in everybody's work, for others. If you stand up in public like Leavis and insist on your selected few, your discriminations, you just end up a cultural curiosity because your few can only be a temporary historical partiality, an item of enforced waste, and all you've done is try to prevent a large number of writers from being read."

--Peter Riley, _Reality Studios_ 8 (1986), 15.

"I just want to say that I think it's really important to love all kinds of poetry and to realize that for the whole history of the planet there have been all these different kinds of poetry. . . ."

--Bernadette Mayer, _lingo_ (1993), 141.

"Very curious, Hortense, how things keep coming around on your list. What's life like beyond memory, Harry? Who was in the last final four?"

--Keith Tuma, this morning, he thinks, while wondering why nobody picked up on marjorie's point about the parochialism of many uspoetry anthologies and still believing in the importance of evaluation albeit in re-invented critical idioms

↑ Index

319. Mark Prejsnar
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Well put. I couldn't agree more.

mark p.

On Wed, 12 Mar 1997, Joseph Lease wrote:

> reply to Mark: yeah of course I like the Hoover and Rothenberg anthologies and Messerli's recent big one all very much: my point is that every time we have to make the old Norton mean what it used to mean (my guess is it never meant that: I mean not in the contexts that inform this one most directly) we give it a big boost: we need to touch just teach our children that anthologies are human institutions like a clubhouse in a tree (or like a Joseph Cornell box in the case of Rothenberg especially)

↑ Index

320. amato
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

well i've just had the questionable pleasure of wading through sixty posts, most of them from poetics, the order of which was completely scrambled thanx to my system shutting down unexpectedly, and burping them forth in no particular order... so i'll try to respond to various posts, apologies if somebody posted remarks addressed primarily to me and i missed 'em (please just backchannel):

fiona: i think my sarcasm was just too thick for my own good... i was trying to suggest that i generally have some young white guys in my classes who submit work to me that often seems intended to shake up the establishment, when in fact it doesn't do a heck of a lot more than, say, the beats managed---four decades ago... to your observation as to "see[ing] anew in all senses," i'd like simply to say YES... at least, my own reshuffling is geared toward that (whether i succeed or no is another story)... and YES too to wendy battin's remark about loving poetry... and yes too to chris s.'s appropriately parenthetical-ed (?) longish post plumbing the possibilities of talking about radical "content" as well as "form"... long long overdue in these parts, from my pov... i am esp. interested mself in work that broaches the various "literature"-"science" interfaces...

david k: thanx for your note... i know you know (that i know that you know etc) what the job scene is about these days... as academix, we're probably all too wound up on that score to be much good at remaining sangfroid... but at the same time, i sometimes wish that, as academics, we'd get MORE wound up... the job scene is creating some awfully complicated political and economic realities for many of us, and it's difficult as academics to shake the sense that what we do within the educational system as a result has everything to do with how we come to poetry... of course it has something to do with how we come to poetry... i suspect (read "know") non-academics will in general find that we play our institutional card too often, but it has to do with the fact that our institution (-al situation) has become SO visible in the last decade... i would only ask that those who are NOT academics (self-defined, if you like) take account of how their workaday world figures into their writing (an old topic)... perhaps it would behoove us academics, poets and critics, to imagine what effect shifting careers might have on our writing, on our sense of commitment and audience?... i mean, imagine if you didn't teach, and if you didn't have to worry about tenure---how would this affect your writing?... and i'd ask non-academics whether they might feel differently about their writing if they were in a position to teach writing/literature every other day... this is perhaps a bit empathically facile, but i've found such internal rumination to be quite revealing, in my moments of solitude...

and most recently to keith: your final lines... i believe, as do you, that the question of evaluation is not going to go away, not only cultural but aesthetic evaluation (which in fact i take to be your point, and marjorie's point)... for those who posted in about "taste," i would observe only that (like "craft") this denotes something very particular (depending on context, perhaps, but then---here---this one)... i'd rather too that we find new idioms, if you like, in which to discuss our "tastes" (and "craftS")... and it strikes me as revealing that not only should the political be regarded in somewhat kneejerk terms hereabouts (to gloss maria) but that questions pertaining to aesthetics (both content and form) are ALSO regarded in somewhat kneejerk terms in other, academic contexts... as somebody who writes both poetry and criticism (i really DO have some more conventional stuff 'out there') i've often had a HELLuva time discussing my motivations as a writer with folks who write primarily critical stuff for academic audiences... not to 'erect' any barriers here, but just to make sure to indicate that the boundaries cut in multiple directions...

and apologies for denoting all non-academics with the negative, my brain is full at the moment...

best,

joe

↑ Index

321. Matt Kirschenbaum
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

> It seems our most urgent professional responsibility, those of us who teach in college programs, is to resist the adjunctification of the profession. Let course enrollments grow, let students complain? Enlist the MLA's power of publicity?

MLA members will soon have an opportunity to vote on a resolution initiated by the MLA's Graduate Student Caucus and passed almost unanimously by the Delegate Assembly at the recent convention; it's language charges MLA in part to, "take the lead in working with other disciplinary and higher-education groups in encouraging legislative and policy bodies at the national or state level to adopt and fund initiatives which would provide for labor equity in graduate-employee and adjunct work, and provide incentives for higher-education institutions to begin reductions in their reliance upon such labor."

--Matt

========== Matthew G. Kirschenbaum University of Virginia [redacted] Department of English http://faraday.clas.virginia.edu/~mgk3k/ Electronic Text Center

↑ Index

322. William Burmeister Prod
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

I wrote:

In the stict sense of the >word yes! Am I a racist or sexist? No. It probably has more to do with what I >find engaging, interesting, mind-blowing, etc.

Dan wrote:

> Or with the way you read? And are taught to read?

Yes. An essential consideration. How we develop as a reader over time. What directions we take. Or our we being carried along. Since I generally learn by way of the discovery principle, I tend to locate what I read and buy through exhaustive searching. But more and more, I am reading through references from others, or their writing. If I start as a surrealist, I may find myself later on in language and experimental poetry (because I tend toward the subversive perhaps). This would preclude, for example, an interest in a poetry "selected to represent cultural diversity, a poetry that accepts the model of representation assumed by the dominant culture in the first place." Because, as Charles Bernstein writes, "what can be decried as parochial patterns of reading is in fact an essential strategy for survival, to have a deep immersion in a contemporaneity and history that are difficult to locate and need to be championed."

> And to write off the rest of the world by
'ethnicity' ooops except Baraka (who is okay) is REDUCTIVE in the extreme Right on! So is the official verse culture sanctioning, essentializing, and tokenizing of signature styles of cultural difference.

Best,

Bill Burmeister

↑ Index

323. Mark Prejsnar
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Thomas and William et al.:

The bringing up of taste does indeed get at some of the (often unstated or understated) issues that hang around just under the surface on this list...As is my wont, I'm probably about to oversimplify dreadfully, but there are two strong urges in the nonmainstream universe. One is inclusive and recognizes the legitimacy of many different poetries and the preferences for them; the other (often articulated by LangPo theory in its early, heroic days) is less tolerant, and strongly critiques much of the established award/workshop/grant scene for the artistic/ideological bankruptcy of the poetry it produces and rewards...The latter often is associated with theories (Brechtian in lineage) that see more innovative writing as a form of political struggle, in which the reader is active rather than passive and disempowered (or as Perelman somewhat confusingly puts it, the reader is abolished, by which he means readers become active members of a culture/community, become poets, the poet and reader meld into one). In fact the passages from WCW that Thomas quotes (great passages!) read like early formulations of this second, more militant point of view--one which is rather firm about making negative judgments and doesn't foreground taste and preference.

Mark Prejsnar
atlanta

↑ Index

324. Marjorie Perloff
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Dear David (and List):

I've been in Las Vegas lecturing at UNLV where Ming-Qian Ma is now teaching and touring the casinos so my head is still spinning a bit--but let me try to answer your questions:

On Tue, 11 Mar 1997, David Kellogg wrote:

> Dear Marjorie (and others who may be listening),
>
> If I'm your antagonist, I am indeed a friendly one. I neither intended to nor in fact did imply that you were a racist. I'm happy to read what you wrote, however, though I'd enourage the same from you ;-). I think we can start to talk to (rather than past) each other.
>
> So let's focus on the particulars you quote from your article:
>
> What I say, for the record, is that, whereas in 1959 Don Allen could put together an anthology of "the" new American poetry, an anthology that pretty accurately pitted the counterculture against the establishment, in the 1990s, there can no longer be ONE counterculture anthology and so attempts to produce one that is "the" avant-garde can't wholly succeed.
>
> OK fine. Here I'm totally in agreement with you (and think the major thrust of your argument quite on target).
>
> And I write:
> "More important: the eightiies witnessed the coming of the minority communites. . . In their inception, many of these poetries were, ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric, and the ontology of the poem were concerned. But counterculture poets and critics couldn't--and still can't--say this out loud because they would have immediately been labeled racist or sexist. And thus the picture has become increasingly clouded. " and then I go on to complain about the absence of all but U.S. poets in most of the new anthologies.
>
> First: "the eighties witnessed the coming of the minority communities." I honestly don't know what this means; I can't hold it in my head, it just drains out between my skullplates. Are you saying that there weren't minority communities before the eighties? Or just that there weren't minority POETRY communites? Or that these communities hadn't "come" (to maturity, to coalescence, etc.)? None of these interpretations seem to me satisfying, because none of the assertions that result are, so far as I > can tell, true. I'm not trying to bait you, honestly; I simply can't see what that sort of generalizaion means, nor what its point is.

Minority communities in the 80s: I didn't think this needed spelling out. I am referring to simple fact here: namely, check out any anthology or critical study of "contemporary poetry" prior to that time and you'll see that the issue of minority poets is simply ignored. (read, for example, Altieri, J. Breslin, P. Breslin, von Hallberg--you name it). The anthologies may have included, say, Baraka and one or two other black poets but the notion of "Chicano poetics" or "Asian-American poetics" did not yet exist. This isn't a value judgement, just a fact.
> Second: "In their inception, many of these [minority community] poetries > were, ironically, quite conservative so far as form, rhetoric, and the > ontology of the poem were concerned. But counterculture poets and critics > couldn't -- and still can't -- say that out loud because they would have > immediately been labeled racist or sexist." Agreements: that many of > these poetries were conservative in the ways you mention. Disagreements:
> 1) that this formal conservatism is ironic in any sense whatsoever; and 2) > that you can't say these poetries are conservative (etc.) without being > labeled racist or sexist. I certainly labelled you neither, neither on > this list nor in my article.

I didn't say the "formal conservatism" was ironic--I said it is ironic that one kind of oppositionality (early exemplars of minority poetics) were conservative formally. This, incidentally, is now a hot and interesting debate. In the new ALH, James Longenbach slaps me and others on the wrist for assuming that, in the case of Ashbery, his subject, formal innovation and semantic innovation go hand in hand. He says this in making the case against THE TENNIS COURT OATH I totally disagree. For me, form and "content" cannot be separated; it's the point Charles Bernstein makes so beautifully in "Artifice of Absorption." There is no "subject matter" outside form. I've therefore always objected to Adrienne Rich's supposedly radical stance which is presented to us in the received lyric modes--to be that's a contradiction in terms. Therefore--and this is all I meant--the job of putting together an "avant-garde" anthology in the 90s is very different from putting one together in 1960. Don Allen could just choose those poets that satisfied what he took to be the New American Poetry. Today, the anthologist does not have that freedom because --witness what John Yau did to Eliot Weinberger--s/he is under pressure to include X number of poets from this or that grouping. I am optimistic enough to think this phenomenon will pass as there are increasing numbers of, say, Mexican-American poets to choose from. But at the moment it's tricky and so inclusions are often somewhat cynical. So--as I said in the article--the picture is clouded and no anthologist can quite proceed freely as Don Allen could.

> Now David perfectly proves my point by implying I'm somehow making a racist statement.
>
> You are reading into (as opposed to "not reading") what I wrote. What I wrote was that the pluralism of your approach is in tension with the exclusivity of your actual critical practice. This seems to me a perfectly reasonable critique to make. Sure I find this disturbing; but not because I think you're a racist (I don't) -- rather, because of the slippage that comes into play in passages like the one that follows:

The "exclusivity of my actual critical practice"--I don't know what this means. I admire particular poets and those are the ones I write about--yes. If that's "exclusivity" --I plead guilty. I try, on the other hand, to include non U.S. poets so in that sense I believe I'm much more "inclusive" than others. There's only so much time.
> > What I meant, of course, is that the mainstream > > anthologies today like the Norton will include a lot of, say Rita Dove, > > because she's a black woman when the Norton doesn't even include Zukofsky, > > Reznikoff etc. not to mention Harryette Mullen, Erica Hunt, Will > > Alexander, or Charles Bernstein, Susan Howe, Lyn Hejinian--well, the list > > goes on and on, right? This is where identity politics does indeed cloud > > the picture because if you object to these inclusions or exclusions you > > are immediately branded.
>
> "Inclusions or exclusions." This is not a symmetrical complaint. The > complaint about exclusions is well taken, and I'm wholly on your side in > that struggle. The complaint about inclusions is where I think your > pluralistic stance conflicts with your practice. Mullen, Hunt, et al.
> are not excluded because Rita Dove is included. (Nor do I think it fair > to say that the Norton includes "a lot of . . . Dove, because she's a black > woman," barring evidence to support that assertion.) Giving Dove less > space will do not one damn bit of good in making more space for Zukofsky, > Howe, or Bernstein.

I disagree with the last sentence above. I believe it's Charles B who noticed that the Norton, so far as poets born after 1950 goes, includes not a single white man. Our Quals list at Stanford is similar. The list, made up by a faculty committee includes Leslie Marmon Silko Sandra Cisneros but not Charles Olson or John Ashbery or Louis Zukofsky If this isn't identity politics, what is it? You will note, if you study reading lists around the country that this is the case. The post World War II period has been turned into a kind of grievance list.
> >

What I'm trying to say, badly probably, because email is not the easiest > > writing venue, is that, yes, I am opposed to identity politics in its > > crude form and no, that doesn't make me a racist, and if we want to be > > political, let's be political and try to do something about what is > > happening in Washington.
>
> 1) identity politics: I do am opposed to "its crude form," but I think > such opposition must not be crude either;
>
> 2) that doesn't make you a racist. Agreed (never thought otherwise);
>
> 3) politics: it's all over the place, both in Washington and in the poetry > community etc. But I'd append also: If we want to do something about > excluded poetry, let's not act as though the currently included poets are > the problem. If we want diversity, let's have diversity, and not some > revised Norton.
>
The very fact that we have to talk about""" included" and "excluded" poetry is the problem. Which is all I originally said and which you found "deeply disturbing." And the Norton is not to be so easily dismissed, given that 9/10 of Intro. poetry courses use it. The newest edition is virtually worthless so far as I'm concerned. But the compilers get away with it in the name of a spurious radicalism ("Look! 23 people of color, etc. etc.). What this cynical move on the part of the publishing industry is doing does deserve comment, doesn't it. Or--to take a second example--look at Adrienne Rich's recent BEST AMERICAN POEMS of 1996.
She has poems in their by highschool girls "of color" that are not even competent--all in the name of some putative "diversity."
> I don't really have any response to your comments on Dorn, because > (except for one moment at its inception) I did not really participate in > that thread.
>
> I hope this is helpful in clarifying our disagreements.

> Cheers,
> David

Cheers in return,
Marjorie

> ~~~

David Kellogg Duke University
[redacted] University Writing Program
[redacted] Durham, NC 27708
FAX [redacted] http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/

> There is no mantle
> and it does not descend.
>
> -- Thomas Kinsella

↑ Index

325. Mark Prejsnar
Re: TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)
Thu 13 Mar 1997

By the by, since we are addressing identity politics/left politics/non-mainstream writing; on the basis of the one issue I've see, TinFish and Susan should be applauded for a very creative start at precisely the rapprochement people have been (very articulately) arguing for... Awareness of regional/ethnic/political/formal lines, and how they cut across each other... This magazine is to be VERY strongly recommended to anyone who hasn't already seen it, and is a good reference point for the current politics/form discussion here.

Mark Prejsnar
atlanta

↑ Index

326. Jordan Davis
Re: "depply disturbed" II
Thu 13 Mar 1997

hapier tpho tody:

> to be that's a contradiction
> in terms.

↑ Index

327. William Burmeister Prod
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Mark writes:

> The bringing up of taste does indeed get at some of the (often unstated or understated) issues that hang around just under the surface on this list...

and

> In fact the passages from WCW that Thomas quotes (great passages!) read like early formulations of this second, more militant point of view--one which is rather firm about making negative judgments and doesn't foreground taste and preference.

and Joe writes:

> *for those who posted in about "taste," i would observe only that (like "craft") this denotes something very particular (depending on context, perhaps, but then---here---this one)... i'd rather too that we find new idioms, if you like, in which to discuss our "tastes" (and "craftS")*

Accurately said. I used the words "taste" and "preference" for lack of a better idiom with which to discuss my own preferences. The more I think of the word in this context, the more it seems vague or nondescript, a cop-out, or biased. I too "prefer" that we locate a new idiom for our tastes. Wendy used "love" which, if I understand her correcetly, suits me far better (I'm going to run out of synonyms soon).

Best,

Bill Burmeister

↑ Index

328. sschu30844

Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries

Thu 13 Mar 1997

I've read a couple of messages now in which "identity politics" and "job market" have been spoken in the same pixellated breath, but where the actual discussion seems to be about the increasing use of adjuncts and so on. I'd like to hear someone develop the argument about the relationship between identity politics and jobs, though I promise to be skeptical. Identity politics has been around a lot longer than the inclusion of some conservative ethnic (in its labored sense as "non-white") voices in the Norton. And job woes have been around a lot longer than multiculturalism. I'm not in any way defending the job market/process as it's now practiced, but I don't want to see the problems with it racialized--which is not what anyone's meaning to do, I know, but the language slippeth a bit.

Susan

↑ Index

329. sschu30844
Re: TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Thanks much, Mark, for your kind plug.

Susan

↑ Index

330. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

very old fashioned words like love (as in Wendy Battin's usage), tone, style, form, taste can often be extremely useful in the storm created by radical aesthetics meets radical politics: a monster movie edited by Jameson

↑ Index

331. Jordan Davis
Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Susan -- What I was Oblekly suggesting was that the discussion has been mis-cast in precisely this way -- as to allow the Other Professor to be scapegoated when it is clearly the Administration or better the Foundation which ought to be hogtied. Viz Steve Martin, _Cruel Shoes_. -- Jorban

↑ Index

332. amato
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

marjorie, surely in conceptual terms, "form" and "content" are not susceptible to any easy division... but the fact that there are reading communities who insist on seeing these as (at least somewhat) separate, whether one agrees or no that this behooves poetic practice in toto, is itself at issue... i mean, we can argue (as i have mself) that seeing form and content as dissociable permits for a sort of incursion of the technological (there are those in cogsci circles who speak now, formal-ly, of the mind as a technology)... perhaps this is broadly sociocultural, effect-wise...

but in the immediacy often attendant to more political aims---and i would agree with you that poets need not be shy about same---it seems to me that there may be positive cultural work to be had BY maintaining this distinction... for instance, there is work both by w. d. ehrhart and horace coleman that is, on the one hand, not all that formally innovative, but on the other, speaks directly to the experience of vietnam vets... with all that "speaks directly to" implies, both in a positive as well as a negative sense... it's here that, say, my tendency to regard such writing in terms of its cultural work may be viewed---by, say, other readers of these poets---as a kind of aesthetic condescension... that is, i've converted issues of "taste" (note those quotes, puh-leez) into issues of reception...

worth noting too that the political aims of dominant groups often go unchallenged in such terms, simply b/c "identity" as such operates as a tacit given...

i trust i'm being clear here... i guess i'm trying to pinpoint and flesh out what i see as the controversy in your comments---i surely don't mean to intervene for david, even to mediate (though i've got this thing about watching folks argue---)... i think one of the reasons much of your writing appeals to us poets is b/c you bring to the writing a real sensitivity as to formal considerations (which is not to suggest in any way that you don't understand the stakes implicit in "identity politics")... and the tendency of many academics to overlook such considerations---and the evaluations that accompany them---is part of why i often have such a problem talking with colleagues about my more writer-ly motivations...

best,

joe

↑ Index

333. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

when I talk about the usefulness of old fashioned words I am of course assuming that their meanings are context-dependent: for example, there are lots of poetry worlds in which poets who I think are great poets are considered to be bad in the sense of incompetent: so when I use terms of value I mean them with the activist awareness that their meanings are context dependent:

therefore, it seems to me, that poets who love the avant-garde tradition (on the next jenny jones)

are obligated (in order to be intellectually consistent) to at least respect what different lefts define (determine, as in self determination) to be terms of aesthetic excellence

(this in relation to Marjorie Perloff's evalaution of Rich's (granted deeply problematic) anthology) respectfully and tremblingly,

↑ Index

334. amato
Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

michael coffey, question: that piece on poetry publications comes off as so HAPPY!...

but like, what about the small press distribution problems we've been witnessing in the last decade (at least)?... why is there no mention made of same?...

not holding you "accountable" or some such, just wondering why there's so much attention to publishers --- which is great --- and evidently (as i read the piece) so little attention to how books get distributed --- which is not so great...

best,

joe

↑ Index

335. Joseph Lease
Re: poetry that sells? -Reply
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

agreed: the bookstore situation is horrible horrible horrible: PW isn't responsible for that but PW could address it in the interest of supporting innovative work

↑ Index

336. Robert Archambeau
A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Joe Amato wrote:

. i'd rather too that we find new idioms, if you like, in which to discuss our "tastes"

This theme is what most interests me most in the ongoing Perloff-Kellog-"disturbed" threads:

How can we find a way to speak that will allow us to say that Bob Perelman produces excellent work in his idiom (as I believe he does), and that Seamus Heaney produces excellent work in his idiom (as I believe he does)? Okay, there are probably not that many people on this list who admire the work of both poets (that David Antim dictum along the lines of "if what he does is poetry, what I do isn't" seems more prevalent), but _I_ admire both, and I find myself having a hard time articulating a critical language that can find a place for both poets. Boland's call for "a language of respect" between poetries intrigues me, because it admits of the possiblity for a kind of ecumenism that I long for.

Yes, the forms used by a poet like Heaney have political/ontological corollaries about, for example, the nature of the self which I don't subscibe to -- but I refuse to make this grounds for a categorical dismissal of his work -- he does what he does with excellence, and I can understand my own (Perelman-esque) views about the self better by looking to Heaney's work and seeing a fine articulation of something quite "other" to my own convictions. I am suspicious of any attempts to dismiss whole genres of work as valueless, boring, or lifeless (although there are certainly poems, and even poets, that fall into these categories). I will not make an idiom my enemy. But I don't know that there is, at the moment, much by way of a vocabulary in which to articulate an appreciation for many poetries, or to explain an admiration for many poetries. Where is there a poetics of pluralism?

Shouldn't one of the tasks of this list to be to explore such a vocabulary?

Robert Archambeau

It was so long ago, I barely remember it, didn't Keith Tuma quote Bernadette Mayer:

I just want to say that I think it's really important to love all kinds of poetry and to realize that for the whole history of the planet there have been all these different kinds of poetry. . . ."

↑ Index

337. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Chris Stroffolino raises some super-good points in his post (I won't quote because I'd probably end up quoting the whole thing): rhyme is a perfect example (and Creeley's poetics and yes Lee Ann Brown) of ways in which something that once seemed old-fashioned can suddenly become (in a different interpretive context) singing and zinging with pleasure and even corrosive politics: ugliness

(as in Chicago funk art (I'm from Chicago not Harvard)), narrative, stanzaic structures, speech acts, and even (gasp!) a lyric self-in-process (term from Kristeva, I mean to distinguish from confessional unitary self) are also perfect examples of aspects of poetics for which it is never too late:

because after all it could only be too late for a given aspect of poetics if that aspect had only one fixed unitary meaning (Chakras on stun, as Jordan points out)

↑ Index

338. BETH LEE SIMON forum on deixis
Thu 13 Mar 1997

--==========_858290429==_

--==========_858290429==_

CALL FOR ABSTRACTS/PROPOSALS for a two-session forum

STUDIES IN DEIXIS: WORKING THE MARGINS OF PRAGMATICS AND SEMANTICS

for the Midwest Modern Language Association Meeting,
Chicago, November 6-8, 1997, Ramada Congress Hotel

Abstracts are being accepted for "Studies in Deixis: Working the Margins of Pragmatics and Semantics." The multidimensionality of deixis, a linguistic phenomenon at the heart of communication, remains one of the most intriguing aspects of human language. It is impossible to imagine communication that functions without deixis. Deictic elements such as pronouns, demonstrative adjectives, and spatial or temporal adverbs, express a user-centered perspective on time, place and person relationships in the social context of an utterance; simultaneously, they denote formal grammatical functions within an utterance. The aim of the forum is to bring together scholars working on different aspects of deixis--from formal linguistics to stylistics--to discuss the activity that occurs at the intersection of language and reality/structure and function. Publication of the proceedings is planned.

Abstracts/proposals should be a maximum of 150 words in length and must be received by Friday, April 4, 1997.

Send abstracts (e-mail preferred) to:

Beth Lee Simon, Dept. of English and Linguistics
IPFW, Fort Wayne, IN 46805
[redacted]
fax: [redacted]

and/or

Anna Fellegy, Department of English, 207 Lind Hall, #185, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis MN 55455
[redacted]
--==========_858290429==_--

↑ Index

339. Robert Archambeau
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Dodie wrote:

Isn't it traditionally > through dismissing "whole genres of work as valueless, boring, or lifeless" > that many groups and individual poets have generated the energy to go on > and do something interesting/innovative?

Granted some poets may find the dishing of poetics unlike their own to be psychologically ennabling (the ends -- good poetry -- can justify the means -- narrow polemics). But this doesn't help me, as a poet and reader who wants (foolishly?) to understand his own very catholic tastes. We have a critical language that honors LANGUAGE poetry (in fact, much LANGUAGE poetry _is_ a critical language honoring langugae poetry) and we have critical languages honoring other experimentalisms and more traditional kinds of poetry. What I wonder is this: what can the underpinings of a language of respect between poetries be?

Robert Archambeau

Maybe this would make a good sig "I will not make an idiom my enemy"

↑ Index

340. Steve Carll
4 poets, 2 days (S.F., March 8-9)
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Saturday evening at New College in San Francisco there was a benefit reading for _Prosodia_ 7, the New College literary journal. Tricia Roush, one of the editors of this year's issue, started off with a reading from her work _The Books of Danger_, starting with book one, "Danger Is My Business". Some great lines included:

courage is something that keeps logic from working
I am rich and sick in the same moment

the bottom of the sea is my workshop, and I like it I worked so hard I don't remember it needless to say, the shark charmers are now in place everyone was killed; it cannot be otherwise it could have been shot over and over again, but everyone was so astonished

Kit Robinson then read a selection of stuff old and new, including a bit from _Balance Sheet_ and the lines:

it is important to do something meaningless three peacocks strut by. They just say nothing.
it is the hour of the rampant shadow

There was more, and there were people there, but my pen ran out of ink and I didn't get much more. Let's see, who all was there? I remember Kevin Killian, Marina Lazzara, Steven Jones, Laura Moriarty, Nick Robinson, Adam DeGraff, Mary Burger, Alex Cory, Mac from Santa Cruz, Cami Bontiates, Stephanie Baker, Simon Pettet (more about him shortly), Jean Day and family, and was that Margaret Butterfield?

After the reading Adam Mary Alex and I go to David Larson's 27th birthday party in Oakland. David's cooking a turkey (there's quite a spread; since I'm a vegetarian I content myself with gnawing on the hollow white chocolate easter bunny), and there's copies of his "Modern Dewlap Special" sitting out, a collage of writing, drawing, cutting and pasting from David, Jia Ching Chen, Raymond Pettibon and Aaron Sinift.

Sunday there's the Simon Pettet/Kathy Lou Schultz reading at Canessa Park. Avery Burns introduces Kathy Lou Schultz first and she reads from a sonnet sequence, a work called _Tool It Down_, another called _Some Vague Wife_, and yet still another, "Toward Fissures Forming Plots". Her work can be quite funny, to wit:

he set out in the rain in his theory suit and came back damp precipitation bulb and annuals there's something about writers: they're damned hard to re-educate very particular hell over this lemon, late afternoon light, lawn of torso supersensory abstinence your leaving cleaves my (startled? starving?) heart returning is a grand gesture emphasizing departure

Simon Pettet, in from New York, then got up somewhat nervously and read (occasionally then re-reading) some new pieces and a bunch of stuff from the _Selected_:

how fortunate to be alive for just this second I am illegally parked in your heart still life which is endlessly moving the fool is the image of a life chosen the evening jukebox sun goes down so quietly so what do you select?

Witnesses included Adam DeGraff, Edward Berrigan, Yetta, Ed Foster (in town for his own reading this Saturday at New College with Giovanni Singleton), Bill Berkson, Spencer Selby, Mary Margaret Sloan, Jack and Adelle Foley, Brian Lucas, Kevin Killian and Thoreau Lovell.

****

[redacted] Steve Carll
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/mags/antenym
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/antenym

In seed-
sense
the sea stars you out, innermost, forever.

--Paul Celan
****

↑ Index

341. Dan Machlin
MARG.OF POETRY @ SEGUE
Thu 13 Mar 1997

DON'T MISS IT! The New York City Poetics Event of the Season.

We hope to make this an open forum after the panel speaks, so please come and voice your opinions and questions @

THE MARGINALIZATION OF POETRY, An Evening

of responses to Bob Perelman's recent book of that name from Princeton University Press,

with Bob Perelman
Ann Lauterbach
Ron Silliman
Juliana Spahr
Steve Evans
Moderated by Sean Killian
(curated by Sean Killian & Dan Machlin)

SATURDAY, MARCH 22, 1997 @ 7:30 p.m. sharp
The Segue Performance Space, 303 East 8th Street (between A & B)
Buzz 1R
Admission $7.00 (all proceeds go to The Segue Series)
Wine and Cheese Reception will follow

Copies of The Book will be available at a special one-time-only price of $10.00.

This event is co-sponsored by Princeton University Press.
SEGUE FOUNDATION FOR POETRY & THE ARTS
20th Anniversary (1977-1997)

↑ Index

342. Matthias Regan
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Marjorie Perloff writes:

> I believe it's Charles B who > noticed that the Norton, so far as poets born after 1950 goes, includes > not a single white man. Our Quals list at Stanford is similar. The list, > made up by a faculty committee includes Leslie Marmon Silko Sandra > Cisneros but not Charles Olson or John Ashbery or Louis Zukofsky
> If this isn't identity politics, what is it?

An example of the fact that the antholigists are more comfortable with accepting "minority" representation than with accepting white male radicalism. Probably radicalism by anyone: so what are they including in the defintition of radicalism then? The danger lies in then seeing the latter (revolutionary form) as being oppossed to the former (political inclusion), which as this list demonstrates it usually isn't. What if you substitute Doty for Olson, etc.? Can there be one fulcrum for this debate? I think it is frustrating but important to act as though there could be.

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

343. David Kellogg
Re: More shilly-shallying battle cries
Thu 13 Mar 1997

On Thu, 13 Mar 1997, Jordan Davis wrote:

> Susan --
> What I was Oblekly suggesting was that the discussion has been miscast in precisely this way -- as to allow the Other Professor to be scapegoated when it is clearly the Administration or better the Foundation which ought to be hogtied. Viz Steve Martin, _Cruel Shoes_.
> -- Jorban

That was, I thought, my point too: such scapegoating as red herring, a missed opportunity for real debate, both in the job market and in the poetry-anthology discussion. As an adjuct, I feel this issue pretty acutely.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

context? e.g., a context in which specific meaning could be ascertained? or soemthing else that I'm missing?

> therefore, it seems to me, that poets who love the avant-garde tradition (on the next jenny jones)
>
> are obligated (in order to be intellectually consistent) to at least respect what different lefts define (determine, as in self determination) to be terms of aesthetic excellence

yes!

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

345. dbkk
upcoming at Small Press Traffic
Thu 13 Mar 1997

At 12:06 PM -0800 3/13/97, Steve Carll wrote:

> Witnesses included Adam DeGraff, Edward Berrigan, Yetta, Ed Foster (in town for his own reading this Saturday at New College with Giovanni Singleton),

Ed and Giovanni are reading FRIDAY for Small Press Traffic. Though we are located at New College, Small Press Traffic's series is separate from New College's own reading series.

Small Press Traffic presents:

Friday, March 14, 7:30 p.m.
Edward Foster
Giovanni Singleton
New College Cultural Center
766 Valencia Street
$5

Edward Foster wears many hats. He¹s the editor of Talisman, one of the leading U.S. poetry magazines. His critical works include studies of William Saroyan, the Beats, Jack Spicer, and a memoir of his friendship with the poet Ted Berrigan. He¹s the publisher of Talisman House Books and has edited or co-edited the anthologies Postmodern Poetry: The Talisman Interviews and Primary Trouble. He is a controversialist whose essay ³Poetry Has Nothing To Do With Politics² startled many with its insistence that poetry ³precedes intention, choice, and dialogue.[2] His own poetry‹romantic, grand, picaresque‹marvelously moves between personal and world history with painful honesty and hard-won ease.

Giovanni Singleton[1]s work has appeared in Prosodia, Mass Ave., Mirage, No Roses Review, and The Breast Anthology (Global City, 1995). She holds an M.F.A. from the Poetics Program at New College and is currently writing an M.A. thesis on the poet and activist Jayne Cortez. Her writing updates and revises the modernisms of the Harlem Renaissance poets and the Black Arts Movement of the 50s and 60s, as well as African-American modernist film, visual art and music. Her poetry is sensual, exciting, formally radical, like velcro on steel.

↑ Index

346. Henry Gould

Pavement Saw query

Thu 13 Mar 1997

Can anyone backchannel me a current phone or email address for Pavement Saw Press? Thanks - [redacted]

↑ Index

347. Michael Coffey

Re: poetry that sells? -Reply -Reply

Thu 13 Mar 1997

>>> <[redacted]> 03/13/97 01:24pm >>>
michael coffey, question: that piece on poetry publications comes off as so HAPPY!...

but like, what about the small press distribution problems we've been witnessing in the last decade (at least)?... why is there no mention made of same?...

dear joe amato:

the publishers weekly piece tried to focus on the diversity of poetry being published, informing booksellers and others in the trade of that fact, and hopefully giving them a notion of which publishers were doing which kinds of work.

Issues of distribution, consolidation, returns, the plight of the independent booksellers, the inroads of internet bookselling, the expanding reach of warehouse clubs, the costs of paper, the diminishment in arts funding and other developments that imperil all manner of publishing, big and small, poetry and no, were not addressed, although, in the pages of PW, these are regularly monitored.

As for the damnably happy tone: I would say that poetry publishing is pretty vital at the moment, and seems to be on the rise; distribution, which 10 years ago was an absolutely dire situation for small literary presses, has much improved, generally speaking. For new presses, and very small presses that have no distributor, things are, as always, bleak as regards sales in the trade, but no bleaker than in 1970 or 80. Publishers still must find their audience in other ways and get a great deal of contentment out of simply (!) producing a person's work in the venerable form of a book.

One could argue that poetry is marginalized by culture, by commerce, by most people. And that TV isn't. The reasons are clear, and perhaps not to be wished away.

As for sales of poetry, the thorny issue arises as to how much poety poets buy. Lovers of mysteries and romance and scifi read one a week; lovers of fiction with a capital F read a couple a month; how much poetry does a poetry lover buy? For that matter, could a lover of poetry find enough good new poetry to buy and read one a week? I don't think any one's individual tastes are being published to that successfully, clearly. There is a world of backlist to find and read, but do we? Poetry is not consumed quite the way other literatures are, it seems to me. The emphasis is on its production, and I think therefore it might be wrong-headed to fret about its success in the marketplace. It's encouraging to know that it is out there. To mean, perhaps, it simply must be. To sell well, well, perhaps something else is going on. I'm not saying a publisher (or poet) should be happy with a barn full of unsold books but it is not a failure by any means. However, traincars full of unsold book's by Johnnie Cochran, which one large New York publisher was recently in receipt of, very well might be.

↑ Index

348. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

just a quick ps regarding my use of context dependent even the word traditional means very different things to different poets: certainly the word experimental does: likewise the word form

↑ Index

349. Matthias Regan
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

more tomorrow

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

350. Mark Roberts

Re: TINFISH (fwrd from Susan Schultz)

Thu 13 Mar 1997

For anybody outside of the US Tinfish can be ordered through the AWOL (Australian Writing On Line) Virtual Bookshop at http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/

>From: Susan Schultz <[redacted]>
>Subject: TINFISH! Collectors' Edition!
>
> TINFISH #4 is now available. Each copy has a different full-color >cover, featuring palimpsests of Hawai'i travel brochures and other local >advertising; the overlays are incredible. The covers are by Gaye Chan and >Duncan Dempster of the University of Hawai'i art department. Contributors >from Hawai'i, Australia, New Zealand, the continental U.S., and elsewhere, >include: Kapulani, Murray Edmond, Adam Aitken, Pam Brown, Yunte Huang, >Richard Hamasaki, Rebecca Mays Ernest, Paul Hoover, John Noto, Dan
>Raphael, Gabrielle Welford, Joshua McKinney, Jorge Guitart, John Kinsella, >Susan M. Schultz, Loss Pequeno Glazier, Sue Moss, Dan Featherston, >Michelle Murphy, Liz Waldner, Cydney Chadwick, Marie Hara, Joshua Harmon, >and Hazel Smith; design by Suzanne Kosanke.
>
> The price is $5 per copy; $13 per 3 issue subscription. TINFISH's >address is 1422A Dominis Street, Honolulu, HI 96822, or you can reach me >through this email account <[redacted]>.
>
>
>
>_____
>
>
>Susan M. Schultz
>Dept. of English
>1733 Donaghho Road
>University of Hawai'i-Manoa

>Honolulu, HI 96822
>
>http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/schultz
>http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/tinfish
>
>
Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

351. Herb Levy
new music mags
Thu 13 Mar 1997

I concur with all of the various praise heaped upon Musicworks (right down to the need to renew my sub).

But I'd like to add a few other zines that are far less frequently published, which are also quite useful. All three are particularly interesting to me cause they helped me to understand some of the connections between old (60s-80s) new music & some of the more recent stuff that has a slightly younger demographic and more "pop" cachet (by which I mean stuff that might be name checked in Spin magazine).

Unfortunately I don't have addresses with me, Luigi may, but I can supply these if folks are interested early next week. The zines, listed in the order in which I find them most useful, are EST (roughly annual from the UK), Halana also roughly annual, and ND, from Austin with a new issue coming out "real soon now" after about a 2-3 year hiatus.

Bests,

Herb

↑ Index

352. dbkk
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Thu 13 Mar 1997

At 6:35 PM +0000 3/13/97, Robert Archambeau wrote:

> I am suspicious of any attempts > to dismiss whole genres of work as valueless, boring, or lifeless > (although there > are certainly poems, and even poets, that fall into these categories). I > will not > make an idiom my enemy. But I don't know that there is, at the moment, > much by > way of a vocabulary in which to articulate an appreciation for many > poetries, or > to explain an admiration for many poetries. Where is there a poetics of > pluralism?
>
> Shouldn't one of the tasks of this list to be to explore such a vocabulary?

I think that a lot of the discussion on this list is taking place in a liberal dreamscape instead of the "real" world. Isn't it traditionally through dismissing "whole genres of work as valueless, boring, or lifeless" that many groups and individual poets have generated the energy to go on and do something interesting/innovative?

Good-citizen poets, do they also always buckle their seatbelts?

Tom Clark's rantings, which I keep hearing reports of, are starting to sound refreshing to me.

And, Robert, this is no personal attack on you, good god, I just used your quote as jumping off point to bitch.

Dodie

↑ Index

353. DS

Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread

Thu 13 Mar 1997

> I think that a lot of the discussion on this list is taking place in a > liberal dreamscape instead of the "real" world. Isn't it traditionally > through dismissing "whole genres of work as valueless, boring, or lifeless"
> that many groups and individual poets have generated the energy to go on
> and do something interesting/innovative?

Sure, but if the nature of this poetry is so 'exclusive' and assured of its own importance - it merely goes on as part of an elitist poetics history & surely colludes with other power structures, language structures etc to exclude those who perhaps are taking a more roundabout/or conservative 'poetic' route - but who may be fighting the same war. Kind of like the whole spanish franco thing.

Sorry more/war metaphor. Yuck.

Dan

> Good-citizen poets, do they also always buckle their seatbelts?
>
> Tom Clark's rantings, which I keep hearing reports of, are starting to sound refreshing to me.
>
> And, Robert, this is no personal attack on you, good god, I just used your quote as jumping off point to bitch.
>
> Dodie

↑ Index

354. Christopher Alexander

Re: "deeply disturbed"

Thu 13 Mar 1997

Mark P wrt:
> But it is argueable that everyone, including > teachers, might usefully turn away from "tomes" to more fugative texts, as > a basis for evaluation/debate/struggle over what we want our poetries to > become...
yes yes, I think this is a crucial strategy for teaching contemporary poetry. for the cost of most anthologies, you can teach several smaller, entire books (& support several smaller presses). you do lose the possibility of more casual contact - the student who discovers a poet's work by paging through the anthology (it's rumored that this actually happens).
but along with that you lose the authoritative gesture of the Anthology, & its possible to gain
1. a deeper immersion in the work at hand;
2. the students introduction to the small press, where most of contemporary poetry (or most of what I would teach) makes its public appearance;
3. a fleeting glimpse into the "field" of contemporary poetry, its socius - what poets do these days (many of us seem to have become proficient in publishing, organizing reading series, etc), the relation of contemporary poetry to its social situation, to publishing, etc.

all arguably good gains. I'm particularly interested in the possibility of teaching not just poetry ("the same vacuous workshop all over again", or " the workshop in a vacuum all over again") but the conditions of its production as a commodity--I mean the various sorts of books & coterie work out there-- & its reception.

so that when Joseph asks:
> which basically new critical principles underlie most creative writing > workshops where are they are they bad are they bad because when can > compare them to a particular era long gone in lit crit explain please my explanation is precisely the above, & it seems to me, well "bad" if you like, but I'd prefer to say a failing that we tend to teach poetry as if it were socially an other realm--as high art?
to the extent that american creative writing workshops tend exclusively toward an emphasis on the internal, structural unities of the individual poem or isolated self-expression & turn away from social, theoretical, political questions, I'd say that they are distinctly the inheritors of New Criticism. (I'm talking here about the average program, & not Brown--you have to remember that my experience was considerably more conservative than your own).
it seems to me problematic, for instance, that you wouldn't dream of teaching Donne without teaching Early Modern England in seminar, but he'll be dragged into every workshop in america in just that manner. if you believe Marotti, as in fact I do, this kind of treatment, first by critics but sustained here, has lead to a terribly deformed reception of his work. (one could speak similarly of McGann's admirable work on the English Romantic Epoch, but I don't think anybody's actually teaching Byron in workshop). Donne's coterie readers would have understood his work as a part of the social & yes political fabric of their time. & we understand our own, contemporary work as similarly engaged: we understand it in context. my point was simply to applaud those of us (Joe) who make an effort to teach it that way.

chris

..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

355. Christopher Alexander
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

Jonathan wrttr:
> It seems our most urgent professional > responsibility, those of us who teach in college programs, is to resist > the adjunctification of the profession.
absolutely yes, very well said.

> Let course enrollments grow, let > students complain? Enlist the MLA's power of publicity?
or shut down the universities?
with a few hundred experienced union organizers & a few years we could have this problem cleared up.

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

356. Christopher Alexander
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Thu 13 Mar 1997

---

joseph wrt:
> therefore, it seems to me, that poets who love the avant-garde tradition > are obligated (in order to be intellectually consistent) to at least > respect what different lefts define (determine, as in self determination)
> to be terms of aesthetic excellence

tolerance is a virtue yes but respect
does or does not include critique?

I respect the efforts of certain clergy members, past & present, to "better the lot" of wage workers & the poor. but I also think it would be my responsibility to reveal the limitations of any such approach.

chris, so-called because
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

357. Tom Vogler
[1]POETICS Digest - 12 Mar
Fri 14 Mar 1997

---

[1]POETICS Digest - 12 Mar 1997 to 13 Mar 3/13/97

Sorry. Unavailable by email until April 14, 1997.

↑ Index

358. Jocelyn Emerson joining conversation
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Just signing up for this list serve, I have only heard a few of the strands being discussed but wanted to venture an observation or two about adjunct teaching and "identity" politics. I think the issue of adjuncts cannot be separated from other dynamics outside of the literary/academic world, and that this situation of working in the field with little stable material renumeration, advancement, etc. vis a vis having a career with all of the material and ideological capital is intimately tied with other forms of oppression. Women make up the vast majority of adjunct teachers, and it seems crucial to me that we consider the demographics of adjunct teaching as a manifestation of larger oppressions in the cultural matrix.

The other issue about the Norton anthology and identity politics/aesthetics brings to mind, for me, how difficult it is to stand outside of one's own ideologies and bear some deeper than a priori responsibility for the Other and what that might look like in real terms beyond boutique multiculturalism which I agree, is completely cynical and really a desire to appropriate (and contain) hard won struggles for material and cultural leverage in a system designed to render invisible all forms of alterity--discoursively and bodily. One of the things which interests me a great deal is doing much more conscious work on (anglo)whiteness as race, and the discoursive constructions of such whiteness as a method of making partial, or returning to a relational/contingent position, the constructed and equally socially-engineered nature of whiteness as "racelessness"--and therefore the "neutral" racial position.

Jocelyn Emerson

↑ Index

359. Loss Glazier
Zukofsky in April at Buffalo
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Dear Poetics: A note to announce the EPC is currently building a page for the Buffalo Zukofsky conference. As select Poetics subscribers, you are welcome to preview this page by selecting the link from the EPC home page, selecting "Zukofsky" from the author list, or by going directly to: http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/zukofsky/april.html NOTE: This is only the first "draft" of these pages so also check back since these pages will be growing! Most importantly at this point I wanted to invite anyone who might have Zukofsky-related materials that might be interesting to link to - i.e., visuals, papers or other work, or special issues of magazines that might be scanned etc. - to let me know. If so, please drop me a note backchannel! And in any case, here's hoping this info will help if you're planning to come to the conference!

↑ Index

360. Franklin Bruno
(no subject)
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Robt. A writes (in a post to which I am largely sympathetic):

>Yes, the forms used by a poet like Heaney have political/ontological >corollaries about, for example, the nature of the self which I don't subscibe...

And I think herein lies part of the answer to why a "language of understanding between poetics" (or whatever Robert said a few posts later) is so difficult--it's the assumption that the forms HAVE these corrolaries ESSENTIALLY, that they aren't a product of the use to which these forms are put, which I suppose is a function of the complex relationship between the form, the content, the context, the tradition, and who knows what else. The notion that form and content are inseparable in understanding a given poem or poet tends to slide (Marjorie's view, and probably a correct one, or at least one deeply entrenched in our whole understanding of what makes poetry poetry and not something else) into the view that a certain form somehow cannot help expressing a certain content (except perhaps when the form is used ironically). I think this is sort of a 'heroic lang-po' (someone used that phrase here yesterday) article of faith, which can take either the form that there are certain (radical) messages a (conservative) poetics JUST COULDN'T convey by virtue of not enacting them in form, or, conversely, that the use of certain (radical) forms will prevent us from re-enacting a (conservative) content. The pluralist poetics Robert wants (maybe not everyone does) will have to question this. I think that only someone (most of us) with an abiding belief in the importance/power/specialness of poetry would even be tempted to believe that form alone FORCES a content, an ontology, a metaphysics the way that a magician forces a card, which is all to the good, but the idea has its limitations. Much of what I'm saying isn't that different than what Chris S. said earlier. I think there's the start of an explanation here of what makes it so hard for many folks (me included) to get their head around the Pound problem, but it's too late as it is.

Unrelated: I second the recommendation of Halana as far as new music magazines go. The new one includes a CD w/ work by Tony Conrad, Japanese noise artist Keiji Haino, and others. The previous issue, if you can find it, had a rare interview with LaMonte Young. I don't think anyone's mentioned The Wire, an English magazine that is a little too taken with the wonders of techno, drum and bass, etc. for my taste, but which does cover a lot of experimental music.

fjb

↑ Index

361. Marjorie Perloff
Re: form
Fri 14 Mar 1997

This is for Chris S., Joe D'Amato especially-- there's a confusion going on about the word "form." It has nothing to do with whether "rhyme" is or is not a good "form." As someone who wrote her dissertation/first book on "Rhyme and Meaning in the Poetry of Yeats"--I'm actually quite a rhyme addict. Form has nothing to do with technical features as such. It has to do with the connection to meaning, with language use. For instance, I've always disliked Adrienne Rich's "Diving into the Wreck" because the theme--"I am he, I am she"--the transformation, the androgyny, is presented as this (to me) dopey metaphor about deep-sea diving, "First I put on my flippers...." It's so willed. If, as she claims to be saying, human identity is fluid, amormphous, and sexuality open, then what the hell are we doing with these neat stanzas and overriding metaphorical structure--one basic metaphor throughout. The form belies the intended meaning and the tranformation "diving" produces is just too easy to be interesting. Conversely, one can use all the fragments and dislocations around and still not have a good "language poem" if there is no real reason to fragment. This all sounds like English 101 I know, but it bears saying, given the comments about "technically innovative" or "not that technically innovative."

As Hugh Kenner once put it, the avant-garde can be just as boring as anything else.

This has been a great discussion and I've learned a lot from the postings1

Marjorie

↑ Index

362. Joseph Zitt
(no subject)
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Franklin Bruno wrote:

> Unrelated: I second the recommendation of Halana as far as new music magazines go. The new one includes a CD w/ work by Tony Conrad, Japanese noise artist Keiji Haino, and others. The previous issue, if you can find it, had a rare interview with LaMonte Young.

You can still get it, I think -- I got mine a few weeks ago.

More info at:
http://members.aol.com/halanazine/index.htm

↑ Index

363. Robert Archambeau
Franklin Bruno's Post
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Franklin Bruno writes:

> The notion that form and content are inseparable in understanding a given poem or poet tends to slide [. . .] into the view that a certain form somehow cannot help expressing a certain content (except perhaps when the form is used ironically). [. . .] The pluralist poetics Robert wants (maybe not everyone does) will have to question this.

Franklin --

Good point -- I was writing a bit sloppily, and I agree that the work done by a form is entirely contextual (hell, I wrote my dissertation about the different kinds of work that neo-Romantic poetics can do in different postcolonial contexts). This gives us all the more reason to be open to a larger variety of poetries, and to work toward a critical language that can value them.

R.A.

↑ Index

364. Michael Magee
Re: form
Fri 14 Mar 1997

I agree, for what its worth, with Marjorie Perloff's comment about Rich's "Diving into the Wreck." - it's always bugged me, somewhat juvenilly I admit, that friends whose minds and tastes I admire like that poem - compare the gender fluidity that happens in, say, Carla Harryman's there Never was a Rose without a thorn through the blurring of pronouns, the non-specificity of narrators, etc, and...well it isn't much of a comparison, Rich's "fluid" freezes up pretty quick.

-Mike Magee.

↑ Index

365. henry gould
disturbing ant ticks pol
Fri 14 Mar 1997

If poetry is part of larger free-standing art process - like science, as a kind of work, develops a certain autonomy - (I'm talkin in the abstract, youse adjunct cab door openers) - which "helps people live their lives" (W. Stevens) - it can "open the doors of perception" in some ways - encourage people to rethink their habits, expand, grow, feel, think, enjoy reality (no kiddin) -

then on the one hand an expansive, generous critical attitude - not exclusive - rather radical (in Jordan's sense) when it comes to making room for it on campus or elsewhere - is the way to go - but an expansive critical attitude also should be able to absorb a CRITICAL attitude & include it (in Dodie's sense) - strategically, both are important - since the free-standing space for art should be recognized as a subset of free-standing democratic space - where people build political platforms that balance work, property, learning, and justice - and are free from greed, hate, violence, and ignorance - constitutions, in other words - hypotheses - and traditions (there are good things about Anglo-American common law tradition, folks) - capitalism will be curbed and tamed, not transcended - (as I'm sure we ALL agree) - (check the Catholic Bishops' Statement on the Economy - they did their homework) - and the CRITICAL attitude which is a civic attitude - might temper the natural tendency of free-standing art - to become simply self-absorbed self-interest - this is a simple aesthetic - an illustration: has anyone read Valery's "On Poetry and Abstract Thought"? Do any of your hotly-vaunted innovations actually DO what Valery proposes is the basic thing poetry does? and did anybody like my Ballade Litteraire? it has rhymes - it makes fun of you -

- Henry (disguised as Jordan's Uncle Waldo)

↑ Index

366. Susan Wheeler
a branch off the . . .
Fri 14 Mar 1997

To use an example from the excoriated, an (apocryphal?) story has Spender whining over an ace poem he's found by someone else that he envies. Auden shrugs and says "Why envy? More to raid!"

(My contribution to the hegemonized field, banking up the corroding Powers That Be)

Susan Wheeler
[redacted]

37 Washington Square West #10A
New York, New York 10011
[redacted] phone/fax

↑ Index

367. Jordan Davis
Public applause
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Thanks, Dodie, for saying the sane thing.

I think it's mysticism to say that a form forces its message. "The suit makes the person." "A book by its..." Form may lead with its chin, but that's something else, and irony is too general a description to cover the various counter-uses there are for formal writing.

Furthermore, at this point, aren't "earned" uses of fragmentation predictable? Modern, even?

Jordan

↑ Index

368. Jeff Hansen jobs and poetry
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Joe Amato asked how nonacademic jobs affect our writing.

I have two jobs: 1) Prep school teacher and 2) evening child care while my wife works.

The big impact on my writing is that right now (funny pun?) I haven't the time. Next week I'm on vacation and I plan on writing away to my heart's content. But it probably won't work that way: I don't suffer from writer's block. I suffer from writer's excess. I have more ideas, feelings, visceral urges than I have time to write them down. And they all don't lie fallow, some just wither away.

I became a prep school teacher because I wanted a steady job that would not compromise my principles that had time off to write. I am a trained academic, but I figured "who needs the bullshit of spending ten years in part-time work before a chance at full-time finally comes around?" My wife and I found ourselves in the situation where I was the one who had to get the job with benefits.

My child care job truly affects my writing: In November and December I managed to eek out a manuscript length poem-meditiation that swirls around various perspectives on my daughter's moderate autism. Most are from her wordless perspective: I translated her wordless being into words. It feels successful.

School? Well, prep school connnects me with the elite class. I encounter their hang-ups, troubles, insecurities, and drivenness. How does it enter my writing? Sometimes as a position for satire. While I believe in education in principle, I don't believe in it as "style" or badge of social status. But any eductational institution has its watering down point. I'm not complaining.

What impacts my writing more than anything else is my sense of a dumbing down of the culture, of a pervasive lack of memory skills, concentration skills, and discernment skills. I see the work of "innovative" poets as heroic -- I sincerely believe that we as a group are among the few attempting to keep thinking alive amid this insanity.

"Culture" in the old sense is dissolving, and while I welcome the end of bourgeois "we went to the ballet this weekend" braggart culture, I am concerned about what is happening to our brains.

The way I see to address this "dumbing down" is to wade right in, and make serious thought of the very material of the "dumbing down." This can be done in a lot of ways. But poems about seeing a bear outside your cabin don't work for me.

Jeff

↑ Index

369. Andrew Mossin

A branch off the "Disturbed" thread

Fri 14 Mar 1997

Responding late to this segment of the discussion, I would just add (in response to Robert Archambeau's important urging of a "language of respect" between and among otherwise seemingly "opposing" models of poetic practice) that Robert Duncan remains perhaps the best contemporary example we have of such an approach that regards a multiphasic conception of poetic art as central to any real undertaking in the work. Dismissing the conventions of literary "taste" or the currently fashionable attachments of any one school as useful to the apprehension of poetic meaning, Duncan remains exemplary in showing us how, out of communal respect for the practice and activity of poetries, the disparate, dissimilar strands can be woven together: Marianne Moore and Garcia Lorca, Ezra Pound and Edith Sitwell,William Carlos Williams and Mary Butts, etc. "Movement and association are not arbitrary, but arise from an inner need," Duncan writes in "Ideas of the Meaning of Form. "I must study thru, deepen my experience, search out the challenge and salvation of the work."

↑ Index

370. Henry Gould
bk review (medium rare)
Fri 14 Mar 1997

THE PARTS, by Loss Pequeno Glazier
Buffalo: Meow Press, 1995

"I recognize it in myself by this: that all possible objects of the ordinary world, external or internal, beings, events, feelings, and actions, while keeping their usual appearance, are suddenly placed in an indefinable but wonderfully fitting relationship with the modes of our general sensibility. That is to say that these well-known things and beings - or rather the ideas that represent them - somehow change in value. They attract one another, they are connected in ways different from the ordinary; they become (if you will permit the expression) _musicalized_, resonant, and, as it were, musically related. The poetic universe, thus defined, offers extensive analogies with what we can postulate of the dream world... "A poet's function - do not be startled by this remark - is not to experience the poetic state: that is a private affair. His function is to create it in others." - Paul Valery, "Poetry and Abstract Thought"

The whole of which Loss Glazier's THE PARTS is a small, refreshing part is a poetic universe fallen into sin/sign/synecdoche. Charles Olson an early opponent of idle lyricism called for a "middle voice", little knowing that a sober middle voice, neither inspired nor dis-re-despaired, could emerge from the particulated nonspeech verbal medium of <language poetry>. Sober, but funny! There are bits of Olson seeping through these poems:

As with the hundreds of files per dye formulation (but see it's not the _number_ as much as the "patching" - weave as the ply resulting in branches seem to make it find. Sheer exhaustion!

a part of sense of what does pry apart. Until on the "line" other issue of this. It's as if the alert where its brambles from the Fort here and see with you who wrote

'not about bits, bytes, bells or whistles'
. ...

(day in D-town...your words on screen marked as people's next-in-order.

- This is from a poem called "The Com'ns" - with the word INTERNET stamped in bold oddly above the title. Yon book reviewer finds much in this little excerpt to illustrate the "whole". To digress though: many of these poems are wit-sly satires - the opener, called "The Apex", a serious (in the Olson way) send-up of _Apex of the M_ calls for a "transparent" revolutionary poetry - which argues (by example) that poetry's pith, spine, whatever, is to be both opaque-resistant AND responsive-expressive (politically relevant). Glazier's Apex satire though is a subset of the writing throughout the chipbk - which takes apart both utilitarian mechano-chatter and obsolete poetic phrasing from an exact middle-voice midpoint - that zone of Glazier's special position - AS AN EXHAUSTED INFORMATION SUPERHIGHWAY WORKER GRUNT. ("Sheer exhaustion!") (_Poetry does not / gain from mummified speech_. - from the final [title] poem.) There is a real speaker standing paradoxically behind the syntactically rhythmically and typesetfully SHREDDED bits & bytes of these poems - who "places" poetry as a part of computerized "speech" overkill - the worldwide web as a bizarre cocoon or womb drifting with bits of dead speech-food - yet each bit reflecting some origin or history, not devalued or dehumanized but ironized like iron filings not yet translated. Here is the beginning of the prose piece "How I was Attila in a Past Life":

"Losing its words. Take some aegis or exit point where alpha types disperse. The family grows old and leaves without you. There was some hook to holdings how the etzels regenerated. The 'rod and cones' of it. As it was penned, the bull waited to bolt forward but the human cannot wait until sunrise. Hence dismemberment makes a myth of words salving a permuted path."

This last sentence - the image of weaving/dismemberment appears here & there - the archaic or archetypal suddenly showing beneath the techno- jargon. From "Five pieces for Sound File" (a funny little set maybe written in England(?) - pathos of the nowhere bumping against the immemorial):

on the verge - that constituent contact ends - though I'm no diner King - it meant so much and again will break his I - does it falter?

Like the note passed in the row ahead

these men's books are the whole of language

how we navigate only - piecemeal

- there is the shadow of Old Ez visiting Londres here and readying his fractions. Glazier has put together a breathing chaos. As the physicists are starting to repeat ad nauseam, chaos is a species of order, the part is an empty promise of an inescapable whole, the whole of poetry breathing underneath the robotic shim of shunted language-bearers. The Parts, perhaps are part of the fibrillated stone wheel of the mother-demon Coatlicue pulled up from a Mexico City subway excavation, alive, breathing and terrible to behold in her furious dismemberment WHEELING AROUND AND AROUND NOW IN THE MUSE'UM of walk-walk-talk-talk. This is a cool and hilarious little book. Here's the last 2 stanzas:

"Elipsis" is incision point and conversely prolapsed. Whether there's a break for want - strong pull-time passes. Kin to "living" in a period of adapted measure. There should only be one book; texts weave through that.

*

["Dante thought so too" - Uncle Waldo]

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

371. Christopher Alexander
Re: Perloff/Kellogg, et al.
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Chris Stroffolino wrota:
> that there may be a UNION of > practictioners of "radical formal innovation" and "radical CONTENT > innovators" that can be emphasized though I've been more dogmatic about this in the past, this is an issue I've been rethinking of late, & so I just want to agree that Chris raises a very important point here, as did Joseph with "respect". not too long ago, I watched again one of my favorite films, Bunuel's Exterminating Angel (El Angel Exterminador), & since then I'm sort of haunted by this vision (only superficially related to the film) of a group of people, trapped in this parlor, & fighting amongst themselves because they are incapable of collective action. on the other hand, I do think that a critical approach to conservative methods is necessary. as far as an issue like inclusion in the Norton, well, I'd like personally to see us get past the kind of divorce from context that most anthologies represent. but isn't our discussion of the Norton & similar anthologies partly synecdochal for concerns of representation of our left alongside a content-oriented left (aside, of course, from a concern that any left be represented there). I'm reminded ["that boy, always with the films"] of Groucho Marx in Duck Soup: "what if I put out my hand & he [sic] doesn't take it?"

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

372. David R. Israel
(Fwd) New Music on World Instruments
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Po-Listies --

in light of recent q. re: music mags & some references to MusicWorks, I'm forwarding this post from another Buffalo U listserv -- the latter (incidentally) being a list devoted to discussion of Asian-influenced contemp. music. I attach this partly bec. of the convenient MusicWorks URL noted at bottom.

cheers,
d.i.

------- Forwarded Message Follows -------
Date: Fri, 14 Mar 1997 08:07:39 -0800
<[redacted]>
From: Randy Raine-Reusch <[redacted]>
Subject: New Music on World Instruments
To: [redacted]

Thought I would let you all know that Musicworks magazine is currently doing a series on New Music on World Instruments. Last issue Musicworks 66 contained two articles, one which was an overview on the subject and the second was an interview with the Japanese koto phenomenon Kazue Sawai, who was the originator of a lot of New Music for traditional instruments in Japan.

This issue, Musicworks 67, has an interview with Japanese composer Yuji Takahashi who is currently specializing in scores for traditional Japanese instruments, koto, shamisen, gagaku, etc. He talks about writing for how the body moves, as a traditional / contemporary approach!

Next issue will feature an interview with the Tuvan New Music/traditional singer Sainkho Namtchylak. I don't know if you have heard of her yet but she has more sound in her throat than almost anyone I have ever heard, from overtone and undertone, to Innuit throat singing to extended vocals!

If you are interested in Musicworks, contact them and you can receive a free sample issue (unfortunately without the CD that usually accompanies the magazine, you have to subscribe for that or buy it seperately). I don't know if you can request one of these issues, but it is certainly worth a try! It usually is published four times a year and the subscription rates are low!

Contact info is : Musicworks Magazine, [redacted], http://www.musicworks.web.net/sound, 179 Richmond St West, Toronto M5V 1V3, Canada

.
. . .
. . . . .
\ \\\\

| one half of you is woman
| the other utter dream
|
| Tagore, "Manasi" (a la d.i.)
/////////////////////////////////\\\\\/////

↑ Index

373. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Fri 14 Mar 1997

---

tolerance absolutely includes critique

On Thu, 13 Mar 1997, Christopher Alexander wrote:

> joseph wrt:
> therefore, it seems to me, that poets who love the avant-garde tradition
> are obligated (in order to be intellectually consistent) to at least
> respect what different lefts define (determine, as in self determination)
> to be terms of aesthetic excellence
>
> tolerance is a virtue yes but respect
> does or does not include critique?
>
> I respect the efforts of certain clergy members, past & present, > to "better the lot" of wage workers & the poor. but I also think it > would be my responsibility to reveal the limitations of any such > approach.
>
> chris, so-called because
> ..
> christopher alexander, etc.
> [redacted]
> (Marriott Library Computer Systems)
>
> language code not found. illegal operation error.
> this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be
> lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

374. Matthias Regan
Re: form
Fri 14 Mar 1997

At 07:56 AM 3/14/97 -0500, Mike Magee wrote:

> *I agree, for what its worth, with Marjorie Perloff's comment about Rich's "Diving into the Wreck." - it's always bugged me, somewhat juvenilly I admit, that friends whose minds and tastes I admire like that poem - compare the gender fluidity that happens in, say, Carla Harryman's there Never was a Rose without a thorn through the blurring of pronouns, the non-specificity of narrators, etc, and...well it isn't much of a comparison, Rich's "fluid" freezes up pretty quick.*

But why stop the investigation of form & content with accepting the impasse? Why not say that the form does grow out of the content at some other level, not nec. more abstract?

I do not think form and content need "match up", need reflect each other _nec._, : that is to say, not in the manner suggested above: but I think they might both be seen as being formed by a situation in which just that content, just that form was nec. Perhaps to articulate something new it is something nec. to use an old form?

Matthias

(ps Joeseph Lease this is where you ps comes in: what understanding of what form is shall hold sway for any given poem?

↑ Index

375. Joseph Lease
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Fri 14 Mar 1997

I want to praise Robert Archambeau's call for a poetics of pluralism and note Chris Alenxander's point that respect can (and often must) include critique:

I also want to note that maximilism (as David Shapiro has named it) can be more activist than mere liberal pluralism: maximalism can be a starting point for writing and thinking about writing

↑ Index

376. Joseph Lease
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Fri 14 Mar 1997

PS
the quotation from Bernadette Mayer is a wonderful instance of Maximalism

↑ Index

377. Joseph Lease
Re: Franklin Bruno's Post
Fri 14 Mar 1997

I'd like to hear more about postromantic form in postcolonial contexts: also it was the vicious and narrow Yvor Winters who makes the claim that a certain kind of form always has a certain kind of cultural political meaning (Winters among others of course): Jameson reading Perelman is a good example of this problem

On Fri, 14 Mar 1997, Robert Archambeau wrote:

> Franklin Bruno writes:
>
> The
> notion that form and content are inseparable in understanding a given poem or poet tends to slide [. . .] into the view that a certain form somehow cannot help expressing a certain content (except perhaps when the form is used ironically). [. . .] The pluralist poetics Robert wants (maybe not everyone does) will have to question this.
>
> Franklin --
>
> Good point -- I was writing a bit sloppily, and I agree that the work done by a form is entirely contextual (hell, I wrote my dissertation about the different kinds of work that neo-Romantic poetics can do in different postcolonial contexts). This gives us all > the more reason to be open to a larger variety of poetries, and to work toward a critical language that can value them.
>
> R.A.

↑ Index

378. Joseph Lease
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Fri 14 Mar 1997

also: yes Dodie's message is super-useful in reminding us of real state control and other palpable instances of power crashing into aesthetics

↑ Index

379. DS
Re: joining conversation
Fri 14 Mar 1997

You maybe interested in the situation in New Zealand where 'whites' have been called Pakeha for so long it has eventually become accepted by most of the country as a way to describe non-Maori specifically white folk. Although there are still those who are offended & claim them selves to be 'New Zealanders' following the ol' meltin pot theory i guess. Still others are 'European' Recent Asian immigration has spawned use of the term tauiwi - which really means foreigner & it seems this term is becoming used politically to describe 'pakeha' - which many find disconcerting. Pakeha was useful for breaking down the racially neutral position & a hell of a lot of people recently are discovering their irish/scottish/eastern european roots. But I am aware the use of tauiwi seems like a betrayal to those who see themselves as sympathetic to Maori causes. I do not feel strongly about it yet, but admit to certain difficulties with being described as foreigner - tauiwi - whereas had grown up embracing ethnicity Pakeha - cos it's sure as hell to far back for me to realistically find any other national identity - except perhaps a bit of Tasmanian convict.

Yesterday someone wearing a tino rangatiratanga t-shirt (a strong Maori pol. movement) smashed up the 'America's Cup' with a sledge hammer. I don't know how this is relevant - but makes an interesting statement & the newspapers love this sort of thing. Guess i better go get me one,

Hope this reads as a discussion of your point Jocelyn

Dan

> and the discoursive constructions of such whiteness as a method of making partial, or returning to a relational/contingent position, the constructed and equally socially-engineered nature of whiteness as "racelessness"--and therefore the "neutral" racial position.
>
> Jocelyn Emerson

↑ Index

380. DS
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Fri 14 Mar 1997

In voicing a support of Robert Archambeau I wonder if the side of the debate that writes off 'contemporary' non-language (and i use the term loosely - i guess i really mean a tradition from Olson on - judging by this debate) poetries is not just a bit mired in early marxism that managed also to avoid/ignore the fact that there were other people who didn't always want their battles fought by a (and i hate this almost-meaningless word) western elite. I find a great deal to value in the poetry most usually championed on this list and don't really read Heaney - but shitloads of Irish do - internationally and he obviously fills a need. As Robert writes, why this need for a reductive - even manichaen delineation of poetries.

It is easy to become infamous hating things, fundamentalists have been doing it for years, and while i don't preach moderation - & am incredibly opinionated myself - (and am confident my opinions are the TRuTH) - i read Walcott, Rich, Tuwhare, & others who examine a personal human condition without (usually) entering into the language melee (& may have to start reading Heaney just so i can sleep nights) alongside the americans we all know & love, sure I read them in different ways & for different things - but christ if we can still listen to Bob Dylan surely we can read pretty much anybody (except perhaps Rod McKewan (or however his name is spelt).

ANy not wanting to get peoples backs up - just concerned this thread could begin going round in even tighter circles soon & trying to get it off the rails a bit & other cliche metaphor.

Dan

btw like the Messerli anthology - maybe because i like big fat books, probably affects my poetics far more than photocopied zines etc I can see it & it can see me on the shelf & it always says you paid for this read it some more - got to get $$$$ value out of these things - photocopies get lost in office piles. Actually I read it more as from My side of the century - but the other side of the world. Yuck.

↑ Index

381. William Burmeister Prod

Re: joining conversation

Fri 14 Mar 1997

> You maybe interested in the situation in New Zealand where 'whites' have been called Pakeha for so long it has eventually become accepted by most of the country as a way to describe non-Maori specifically white folk. Although there are still those who are offended & claim them selves to be 'New Zealanders' following the ol' meltin pot theory i guess.

Yeah, sort of like a white being called "gringo" in the Americas by some latin american groups (even in the U.S.for that matter).

Bill B.

↑ Index

382. David Israel
Re: joining conversation
Fri 14 Mar 1997

> Yeah, sort of like a white being called "gringo" in the Americas by some latin american groups (even in the U.S.for that matter).
>
> Bill B.

It's interesting how likeable the term "gringo" is (or seems -- or am I wrong?) to the whites who get so dubbed (or maybe it's only when self-dubbing, w/ some pleasant irony, that this somehow playful sense of the term comes into play?)

A comparison, of course, is the Japanese "Gaijin" ("foreign [hu]man" -- the kanji character gai = the Chinese "wai" -- which could be rendered more exactly, or more anciently, as "outside[er]"). So: from what I hear, that term is by no means playful, in general (pervasive) use in Japan.

One thing I didn't quite get from DPSalmon's original post is what a literal meaning (or even, what sort of sense) Pakeha might hold or evoke.

Anecdote:

Coincidentally, today I sent an e-note to a small group of South Asian writers whom I'm joining in a "writer's critique" e-venture (sort of email fiction-writing workshop: just these 8 So.Asians plus now moi, who'm pan-Jewish in ancestral origin [E.Europe / Palestine], Calif. by birth).

The group is dubbed as of "So. Asian writers" -- & I thus found myself tempted to self-describe as the lone (or so to say token) "gringo" in the batch; then mentally edited that to "farenghi" [Hindi = foreigner / european]; then (besides being doubtful abt. the transliteration) felt it just as well to scuttle the whole adjectival issue altogether (rather than seeming to make an issue of what they're liberally construing as a non-issue in my case).

In any case: Rolling into century 21, no doubt there'll increasing emerge ways & contexts wherein we white guys find ourselves (surprisingly) the exception rather than the rule, (even) in America.

↑ Index

383. Charles Alexander praise
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Just a commendation to Jeff Hansen, for extending the notion of the political and of identity in this discussion. So often it seems we discuss ourselves as writers, or our positions within or without the academy, and I really like the way

Jeff put himself as person-in-family in the midst of all of this. Used to be the phrase was "the personal is the political," but now it often seems as if the political is the political and there is no personal at all. Decentered self or not, there is something to be said for beginning from the immediate, and getting wherever we get, around and about.

charles

Light blue and the same red with purple makes a change. It shows that there is no mistake. Any pink shows that and very likely it is reasonable.

Gertrude Stein, from "A Substance In
A Cushion," in TENDER BUTTONS
Charles Alexander
Chax Press
[redacted]

↑ Index

384. Charles Alexander identity
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Also in the midst of this identity discussion, I have been preparing one grant proposal and helping with another, grants which will go before a local (Tucson, Arizona, and Pima County, Arizona) arts council. The categories of people recognized by this council, according to their questions and statistics about boards, audience, and artists, which they require, are only three: white, hispanic, and other minority (not hispanic) strikes me as a limited point of view about diversity

charles

Light blue and the same red with purple makes a change. It shows that there is no mistake. Any pink shows that and very likely it is reasonable.

Gertrude Stein, from "A Substance In
A Cushion," in TENDER BUTTONS
Charles Alexander
Chax Press
[redacted]

↑ Index

385. DS
Re: joining conversation
Fri 14 Mar 1997

At 06:11 PM 3/14/97 -0500, you wrote:
>>Yeah, sort of like a white being called "gringo" in the Americas by some >> latin american groups (even in the U.S.for that matter).
>>
>>Bill B.

tauiwi - is more like gringo - Pakeha has become - an ethnicity - whether some people like it or not. It is different again because of this countries peculiar demographic. I was mentioning it interms of Jocelyn's interest in the study of whiteness.

By literal meaning - you mean direct translation? - well my dictionary says - not Maori/ European - its practical (literal?) defintion is both of these really - non-Maori of European descent. Though reactionary 'white' talkback definitions range from ghosts, carrot and white turnip to other less complimentary things. I hadn't really intended to give a potted rundown of ethnicity-New zealand - I'm sure there are folks with far greater knowledge than me & I am wary of trying to define these terms from my limited lay perspective.

Dan Salmon

> One thing I didn't quite get from DPSalmon's original post is what a literal meaning (or even, what sort of sense) Pakeha might hold or evoke.

↑ Index

386. DS
Re: joining conversation
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Not really because as i said elsewhere it has become an ethnic identity in itself - most white new zealanders (at least publicly) think of themselves/ourselves as Pakeha - Paakehaa

> Yeah, sort of like a white being called "gringo" in the Americas by some latin american groups (even in the U.S.for that matter).
>
> Bill B.

↑ Index

387. Stephen Vincent

Disturb D/re Perloff

Fri 14 Mar 1997

Marjorie Perloff writes in response to David Kellogg: "Minority communities in the 80s: I didn't think this needed spelling out. I am referring to simple fact here: namely, check out any anthology or critical study of "contemporary poetry" prior to that time and you'll see that the issue of minority poets is simply ignored. (read, for example, Altieri, J. Breslin, P. Breslin, von Hallberg--you name it). The anthologies may have included, say, Baraka and one or two other black poets but the notion of "Chicano poetics" or "Asian-American poetics" did not yet exist. This isn't a value judgement, just a fact."

If I'm not misunderstanding Marjorie Perloff's point, I think a number of people would disagree with this assessment of minority writing prior to the eighties. What I think she is actually saying is that other anthologists and critics and she herself(?) were mostly unaware of "minority" writing that began to strongly emerge with the various "liberations" of the late sixties and early seventies (simultaneous with gay and feminist writing, as well) . An obliviousness to the work of Victor Hernadez Cruz, Ntozake Shange, Jessica Hagedorn, Sonia Sanchez, Etheridge Knight among many others who were consistently published in books and periodicals is possibly more a reflection of Town and Gown, "high and low" culture divisions-- unless there is an assumed separation between the poets who make poems, and the critics who create a "poetics" around the work - the latter sometimes not happening until much after the fact. On the other hand, it's still not clear to me, if Marjorie Perloff was familiar with any of the this writing, or whether or not she is dismissing these and other writers out of an aesthetic principle -- which I find a perfectly acceptable thing to do, as long as it's not confused with an exclusive notion of "the one and only principle."

In response to another one of Kellogg's arguments, Perloff goes on to say:

"Therefore--and this is all I meant--the job of putting together an "avant-garde" anthology in the 90s is very different from putting one together in 1960. Don Allen could just choose those poets that satisfied what he took to be the New American Poetry. Today, the anthologist does not have that freedom because --witness what John Yau did to Eliot Weinberger--s/he is under pressure to include X number of poets from this or that grouping. I am optimistic enough to think this phenomenon will pass as there are increasing numbers of, say, Mexican-American poets to choose from. But at the moment it's tricky and so inclusions are often somewhat cynical. So--as I said in the article--the picture is clouded and no anthologist can quite proceed freely as Don Allen could."

I'm again not sure of the point of view being expressed. Is her point that in order to make an ideal avant garde anthology -- one that is not burdened by a rhetoric of gender and ethno-identity issues -- we must wait another generation or so for people of color and women to learn to write in an an acceptable experimental mode? If this is the view, I immediately want to know who is the "who" that is determining what is acceptable here? With all due respect to her reference to Charles Bernstein's criteria of substance and form, might the presence of writers and editors of color, for example, bring other criteria to the table that do not revolve around what Perloff sees limited to issues of "grievance" and "identity," or, to further the net here, what she and others have variously referred to and dismissed as "speech based poetics."

Frankly I have a tough time with the "tongue cutter" character of that phrase -- as if pure text is primary and that which is spoken is disposable, of no significance, or resonance. If I understand what is being stated, cultures that are orally based -- which are often minority ones -- no matter how rigorous the construction of their poems or songs, these groups or cultures are automatically contained in a "less than" category. Personally I don't understand why in a contemporary text that there is not room for voice(s) - I'm daily surrounded by them and they give me great delight! And I am often taken by voice as a textual component of a work. If I'm interpreting her correctly, I think my own discomfort with Perloff's argument stems partly from what appears to be this strict, exclusive notion of text. It seems to me that there is much more room on the playing field -- without implying a return to a "me, voice" centered poem.

But, finally what I find most troubling is Perloff's implied point of view that "we" must wait for minorities and others to catch up with what she values in the way of experiment. I'm much more curious as to what happens when the tables are turned. In particular, how have issues of "grievance" and "identity", for example, impacted on the work of white experimental writers. There has been much talk here of exp. writers not being able to find work on account of issues of race and gender - which well might be true. But I hear little of ways in which these issues -- which are vigorously alive in most of the culture -- have impacted on the making of experimental work. To be quick and speculatively specific, what, by way of example, is the influence of Cecil Taylor on line and structure in the work of Barrett Watten? If so, how does he deal with issues of appropriation from Taylor or any "other" cultural zone. What's the difference between cultural robbery, reciprocation and respect? (This is not to suggest Barry's any one of them). In part I'm wondering to what degree "experimental writers" are compelled to acknowledge the larger cultural context - and what are the aesthetic issues and consequences of that inner-change? ((Has anyone on this list addressed this issue/process??). And, in a progressive English Department, shouldn't a "white male" candidate who has engaged these issues in fresh way be considered of more value than one who has not?

I sometimes think "white" artists/writers feel it is an option to ignore this larger sphere. On the other hand this is not a position with which minorities can very often "privilege" themselves. For example, I was recently thinking, it's impossible to look at the photographs & texts of Carrie Mae Weems and not be totally taken by her awareness and interpretation of a history of both white and black worlds. For her, I don't believe one functions without the other, and this largeness of vision gives her work a major signifcance. In comparison, does the concept of "innovative poetics" (which is the basis of this list) make this awareness -- or is it a vulnerability to "the other(s)" and a willingness to acknowledge, wrestle and change? -- an implicit responsibility of its project?

I guess what I'm hearing in Perloff's view is a mono-centric critical vision of what constitutes a memebership in an avant-garde. Dropping the relatively easy "grievance and identity" herrings, I believe we live in a much more polycentric environment in which the containment of poetic and critical work is a much more elusive task.

Cheers,
Stephen Vincent

I do think Perloff rightly points out that these two criteria for anthologies are cynically seized upon by probably "white" editors as marketable, acceptable criteria. I'm just curious -- in terms of an ideal, advanced anthology -- as to who she sees as the arbiters of what is appropriate. I assume Norton's way of "liberally" dealing with this potential impasse is to give every major group an anthology - including the current ones of Hoover for the experimental, Gates for the Afro-Americans and on an on. (A parallel to this phenomenon is all various Smithsonian museums that are planned up down the Washington Mall - American Indian, Afro-American etc. etc.) All this might look well on paper, but it avoids the issues and great works of art that have occured because the various groups that constitute this country are so historically inter-webbed. Objectively -- especially in terms of making contemporary work -- I think it's silly for anyone to imagine autonomous grounds for any particular group - experimental, "minority" or otherwise. That said, given this country's history it's understandable why many groups will want to secede into their own anthology or museum.

> Now David perfectly proves my point by implying I'm somehow making a racist statement.
>
> You are reading into (as opposed to "not reading") what I wrote. What I wrote was that the pluralism of your approach is in tension with the exclusivity of your actual critical practice. This seems to me a perfectly reasonable critique to make. Sure I find this disturbing; but > not because I think you're a racist (I don't) -- rather, because of the slippage that comes into play in passages like the one that follows:

The "exclusivity of my actual critical practice"--I don't know what this means. I admire particular poets and those are the ones I write about--yes. If that's "exclusivity" --I plead guilty. I try, on the other hand, to include non U.S. poets so in that sense I believe I'm much more "inclusive" than others. There's only so much time.
> > What I meant, of course, is that the mainstream > > anthologies today like the Norton will include a lot of, say Rita Dove, > > because she's a black woman when the Norton doesn't even include Zukofsky, > > Reznikoff etc. not to mention Harryette Mullen, Erica Hunt, Will > > Alexander, or Charles Bernstein, Susan Howe, Lyn Hejinian--well, the list > > goes on and on, right? This is where identity politics does indeed cloud
> > the picture because if you object to these inclusions or exclusions you > > are immediately branded.
>
> "Inclusions or exclusions." This is not a symmetrical complaint. The > complaint about exclusions is well taken, and I'm wholly on your side in > that struggle. The complaint about inclusions is where I think your > pluralistic stance conflicts with your practice. Mullen, Hunt, et al.
> are not excluded because Rita Dove is included. (Nor do I think it fair > to say that the Norton includes "a lot of . . . Dove, because she's a black > woman," barring evidence to support that assertion.) Giving Dove less > space will do not one damn bit of good in making more space for Zukofsky, > Howe, or Bernstein.

I disagree with the last sentence above. I believe it's Charles B who noticed that the Norton, so far as poets born after 1950 goes, includes not a single white man. Our Quals list at Stanford is similar. The list, made up by a faculty committee includes Leslie Marmon Silko Sandra Cisneros but not Charles Olson or John Ashbery or Louis Zukofsky
If this isn't identity politics, what is it? You will note, if you study reading lists around the country that this is the case. The post World War II period has been turned into a kind of grievance list.
> >
What I'm trying to say, badly probably, because email is not the easiest > > writing venue, is that, yes, I am opposed to identity politics in its > > crude form and no, that doesn't make me a racist, and if we want to be > > political, let's be political and try to do something about what is > > happening in Washington.
>

> 1) identity politics: I do am opposed to "its crude form," but I think > such opposition must not be crude either;
>
> 2) that doesn't make you a racist. Agreed (never thought otherwise);
>
> 3) politics: it's all over the place, both in Washington and in the poetry > community etc. But I'd append also: If we want to do something about
> excluded poetry, let's not act as though the currently included poets are > the problem. If we want diversity, let's have diversity, and

↑ Index

388. Hugh Steinberg
Re: jobs and poetry
Fri 14 Mar 1997

Time is what is all about, especially when you don't have one of those cushy situations set up for you. Working 9 to 5 has had a profound impact on my writing. I used to write fairly elaborate collages, involving a good chunk of research. I used to stay up late and write till three in the morning. I can't do those things anymore because I don't have the time. I have to get up early and put on a tie and stare at a computer screen for eight hours.

So I sneak and I steal and I adapt to my environment. Instead of collages, I write couplets (because it's less time consuming to crank out couplets). I revise less and write quickly. I use the photocopier and laser printer at work to prepare manuscripts. I write at home and and rewrite at work, hoping no one's looking over my shoulder. And whenver I can get the energy to go to a reading, or volunteer for Tia Chucha or the Guild complex (a literary org. in Chicago), I do it because I don't know when I'll be able to do it again. That's the way it is for most people, I guess, although probably many have it worse. If practicing your art is a priority, you find a way to get it done regardless of the circumstances.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

389. Demian
Re: jobs and poetry
Fri 14 Mar 1997

> Time is what is all about, especially when you don't have one of those cushy situations set up for you. Working 9 to 5 has had a profound impact on my writing. I used to write fairly elaborate collages, involving a good chunk of research. I used to stay up late and write till three in the > morning. I can't do those things anymore because I don't have the time. I have to get up early and put on a tie and stare at a computer screen for eight hours.

>
> So I sneak and I steal and I adapt to my environment. Instead of collages, I write couplets (because it's less time consuming to crank out couplets). I revise less and write quickly. I use the photocopier and laser printer at work to prepare manuscripts. I write at home and and rewrite at work, hoping no one's looking over my shoulder. And whenver I can get the energy to go to a reading, or volunteer for Tia Chucha or the Guild complex (a literary org. in Chicago), I do it because I don't know when I'll be able to do it again. That's the way it is for most people, I guess, although probably many have it worse. If practicing your art is a priority, you find a way to get it done regardless of the circumstances.
>
> Hugh Steinberg

I empathise re working. What does this do for your writing, or to it? Certaintly you do find a way to get it done. I write on the way to work and on the way home I revise. There is no time to write at work. This means that the way you write is dictated largely by circumstance: It takes me 15 minutes to get home so writing has to fit into fifteen minute blocks. These blocks are separated by reasonable time periods: so the writing takes on a disjointed tone (if what is beng written is more than a few lines).

Writing can take a position in such circumstances (I am loathe to say prioirity because I spend the greater part of most days working), but as such it is a writing which is a victim of cirumstance, and to a certain extent shaped by it.

↑ Index

390. Maria Damon

Re: Disturb D/re Perloff

Fri 14 Mar 1997

At 8:50 PM -0500 3/14/97, Stephen Vincent wrote:
>Marjorie Perloff writes in response to David Kellogg:
>"Minority communities in the 80s: I didn't think this needed spelling out.
>I am referring to simple fact here: namely, check out any anthology or >critical study of "contemporary poetry" prior to that time and you'll see >that the issue of minority poets is simply ignored. (read, for example, >Altieri, J. Breslin, P. Breslin, von Hallberg--you name it). The >anthologies may have included, say, Baraka and one or two other black >poets but the notion of "Chicano poetics" or "Asian-American poetics" did >not yet exist. This isn't a value judgement, just a fact."
>

>If I'm not misunderstanding Marjorie Perloff's point, I think a number of >people would disagree with this assessment of minority writing prior to the >eighties.

yes indeed, thank you stephen vincent.

What I think she is actually saying is that other anthologists and >critics and she herself(?) were mostly unaware of "minority" writing that >began to strongly emerge with the various "liberations" of the late sixties >and early seventies (simultaneous with gay and feminist writing, as well) .
>An obliviousness to the work of Victor Hernadez Cruz, Ntozake Shange, Jessica >Hagedorn, Sonia Sanchez, Etheridge Knight among many others who were >consistently published in books and periodicals is possibly more a reflection >of Town and Gown, "high and low" culture divisions-- unless there is an >assumed separation between the poets who make poems, and the critics who >create a "poetics" around the work - the latter sometimes not happening until >much after the fact. On the other hand, it's still not clear to me, if >Marjorie Perloff was familiar with any of the this writing, or whether or not >she is dismissing these and other writers out of an aesthetic principle -- > which I find a perfectly acceptable thing to do, as long as it's not >confused with an exclusive notion of "the one and only principle."

i wish i'da said this. right on sv, thanks for saying what is obvious to many who are not on this list and who do not need to pretend the emperor has no clothes.
>

↑ Index

391. Alan Jen Sondheim
Jennifer an other weary time
Fri 14 Mar 1997

-

Jennifer's Sonnet of Marbles and Brambles

Brambles have marbles by their bases, glass against knobby bark up towards dark green shoots, lovely white fleshy soles. They're in cahoots, marbles' burbled presence by Jennifer's toes. One among each and each, each other. Jennifer's in throes Of pain and anguish, delirious happenings. The sap drains from Jennifer's waist down to the ground hoisted by the naval beach. We're not going to the beach, to the ocean or the grotty sea. There are no waves. Jennifer shaves her body, slides marble packets in and out. They make rackets, Jennifer shouts with joy, delight, dissolution. Proliferation of cornucopia of confusion, white wire tangling profusion, the marbles are covered with dirt, whole villages of paramecia, stentor, amoeba, nematodia clad and pillaged by Jennifer's souls. We're not going anywhere, Jennifer-in-the-brambles monuments herself in dark white beautiful marble plinth, she's in't.

↑ Index

392. George Bowering
Re: joining conversation
Sat 15 Mar 1997

> Yeah, sort of like a white being called "gringo" in the Americas by some latin american groups (even in the U.S.for that matter).

Have I been wrong all my life? Are Mexican whites called gringos? I always thought that the word was applied to people from north of the U.S.-Mexican border.

George Bowering.

,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

393. Miekal And Re: jobs and poetry
Sat 15 Mar 1997

Havent worked for money for about 7 years but then a novel I wrote in 90 said as its last line, "the next book will contain no recognizable words" & I havent yet come to writing anything since then because I recognize everything I come to.

Miekal

ok, say maybe Ive written a tiny bit.
--
@#
Dreamtime Village website: http://net22.com/dreamtime
QAZINGULAZA: And/Was/Wakest website:

http://net22.com/qazingulaza
e-mail for DT & And/Was: [redacted]

↑ Index

394. Robert Archambeau
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Sat 15 Mar 1997

Michael Magee wrote:

> to > some extent I think his [Heaney's] "formalness" is not passive acceptance but, at least in his mind, an act of intervention: as he writes in "The Ministry of Fear," "Ulster was British, but with no rights on / The English lyric:

This is a great example of the kind of contextually specific work done by poetic forms that Franklin Bruno was posting about -- kudos to Michael.

The only danger in pursuing this kind of speculation (and we haven't fallen into this trap yet by any means) is to end up concluding that only one kind of form can do positive work in any particular context. It would be wrong to argue along the lines of -- "oh, well, traditional form is alright for the Irish, but none of it can ever be any good in America" or the analogous "the Irish ought to stick to traditional form and leave experimentalism to Buffalo and SF" --(I don't mean that Michael has done anything like this, far from it, I just mean that this _could_ be a hazard when thinking through a "contextualist poetics").

[There are, by the way, a number of fascinating Irish experimentalist poets, who very deliberatley choose innovative form as a way to respond to their environment -- Billy Mills, Catherine Walsh, Randolph Healy, and Maurice Scully spring to mind. There is a review of some of them coming out (by yours truly) in the same issue of the Notre Dame Review that has the Boland interview.]

Robert Archambeau

↑ Index

395. Michael Magee
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Sat 15 Mar 1997

Dan wrote: "(& may have to start reading Heaney just so i can sleep nights)"

I always liked Heaney's stuff from the seventies, never gaga over them but they're interesting and often political poems (North especially) - to some extent I think his "formalness" is not passive acceptance but, at least in his mind, an act of intervention: as he writes in "The Ministry of Fear," "Ulster was British, but with no rights on / The English lyric: all around us, though / We hadn't named it, the ministry of fear." In the end of "Punishment" he describes himself, in relation to a waoman's mob-killing, as someone "who would connive / in civilized outrage / yet understand the exact / and tribal, intimate revenge." Perhaps its worth thinking about the idea that the Irish have a different relation to the English metric that Americans (I don't know, I'm just hypothesizing). As someone asked earlier, what's Eavan Bolamd doing in the west coast experimental scene? - actually it makes a fair amount of sense to me having talked to her a couple times - in her own context she's progressive as hell and very involved on the grassroots levelof Irish feminism. So, what am I saying here? Well, I can't think of a single post-ww 2 formal poet who I would list as a "favorite" but certainly several deserve a careful, open minded reading. I said earlier I didn't like "Diving into the Wreck" and its true, I don't, but I've certainly gained by reading Rich over the years, I mean, hell, she's interesting, the way someone you meet might be - the poets we read don't have to be, transcendentally, on "the right path," for me reading's usually more of a scavenging expedition.

-Mike Magee.

↑ Index

396. amato
Re: Disturb D/re Perloff
Sat 15 Mar 1997

---

well i've been away for a day, oversaturating mself again, and return to find all sortsa poetix things to discuss... you folks are great!... thanx esp. to jeff hansen and others for taking me up on my request to elaborate on other-than-academic contexts... i'd like to hear more too on the way this shapes one's writing...

having just been hard at work on another list (litsci-l) a week or so ago arguing that crossing the disciplines of "science" and "literature" (note those quotes, puh-leez) requires both reverence AND irreverence, i'd hate to see robert a's call for "respect" taken as a call for no critique (as joseph l., chris a., and robert himself have indicated)... my point there is equiv. to my point here, and even MORE controversial given that there are great divides between (as among) sci phuds and lit phuds: that being critical of a particularly disciplinary knowledge is not quite the same thing as being critical of a discipline's practitioners... and that the best way to refrain from coming off as holier-than-thou in this regard is to account for one's own institutional moorings...

that said, i might say, again and again, that it don't hurt none to be able to critique poetry in terms of what works and what doesn't aesthetically and culturally... i will be talking at the upcoming denver conference on the problems with

"craft" and "voice" as these are played out in the creative writing classroom, and through a simple twist of fate (thank you bob dylan) i will manage to poke a bit of fun at the way in which robert frost, for example, gets used in popular versions of "the poet" (quotes again)...

now from my pov, IN MY OWN WORK, 'taking account of my critical moorings' has often amounted to enacting my theoretical claims while making same... i'm certain that, if not my product, at least my intentions/motives are likely to be appreciated in this forum... call it poetry, call it criticism, call it neither... but at the same time, arguments twixt those of you who, on the whole, tend to write scholarship in sentences and paragraphs -- whatever the content content (as opposed to formal content---if you'll permit me this slippage) -- might (i say might) be taken to mean that you accept, without a whole lotta critical intervention, your own critical moorings to varying degrees...

i mean, some might observe that marjorie perloff writes in paras, as does stephen vincent, as do i (HERE)... this particular view is not meant as a criticism, but IS offered (by ME) by way of (self-)critique... this is, after all, the primary way of going public in this forum (some here, like dbchirot, write in ways that are not so sequential---thanx david!)... but what happens when you try to "do" theory and not "do it" the customary way?...

we KNOW what happens---it's tough to get published!... or, it's tough to be understood... or---- that's point the first, which i offer, unabashedly, as a wee bit of mediation, intended to knock me and others offa our high hobbyhorses...

point the second cuts in a sort of opposite direction, requires a, well, trip report:

yesterday i was down at u of i at urbana-champaign, where i used to teach, to hang with some friends/acquaintances for a panel forum that was part of their "cyberfest," a celebration of HAL from 2001: a space odyssey (HAL, as i'm sure many of you know, designed and fired up down at uiuc, in 1997 (in the book version))...

anyway, the panelists:

n. katherine hayles -- writes some just incredible lit-sci critical, that crosses multiple disciplines richard powers -- a novelist who's written some, well, incredible novels brad leithauser -- novelist/poet/essayist, i don't know brad's work hans moravec -- perhaps the leading theorist of robot/ai technologies in the world at the moment, at carnegie melon bruno latour -- french sociologist of science, one of the beter known social constructivists writing today

all moderated by michael berube... whose first book was on pynchon and tolson, but who's written some astonishing stuff since on higher learning...

needless to say, a very male-gendered discussion in all, but something interesting turned up along the way, something from leithauser about, in his opine, the current status of the novel, its refusal to really deal with science and technology... i can't say that i entirely agreed with him (for all sortsa reasons i won't detail here---though i was thankful to hear him praise h. g. wells' work) but his point about the novel form is methinks pertinent here: that much if not most scifi in fact, though 'conservative' at the level of the sentence and in terms of structure, nevertheless is radical in many ways in terms of ideas (some scifi does both, of course)... and that the failure to value this latter sort of literary endeavor vis-a-vis what is now called literary fiction results in a hierarchy that perhaps we oughtta take a long hard look at...

but hold!---i mean, i appreciate the need for literary fiction too, and i AM suspicious, as a poet, of 'junk prose,' of pulp... it's just that i've read some damned good scifi on occasion, and LOTS of damned good COMIC BOOKS... gotta come at it all with somewhat altered expectations though, aesthetically and in terms of the cultural work that gets done... and yeah, sure, with critical prophylaxis intact...

making any sense?... too much?...

looking to learn more from this exchange...

best,

joe

↑ Index

397. amato
Re: poetry that sells? -Reply -Reply
Sat 15 Mar 1997

---

michael coffey, thanx for your reply!... you raise some good points...

part of my thing, both as an educator and as somebody who just talks with other writers about writing, has to do with getting a fix on the states of the arts, helping to generate some public recognition about what's going on... i find it tough as hell sometimes to discuss, even with writers (esp. established writers published in the larger publishing venues) the situation in the small press world... the absence of a solid distribution network, save for spd (and the web notwithstanding---heck, i've been making arguments about using the web to promote distribution for five years anyway), is something that needs, as i see it, more press---and i say this regardless of the realities (read numbers) of poetry consumption and production... i can't help but observe that---if ten years ago things were bad, and today things are better---then it would be nice if things got a LOT better!...

for example, to reference my own tiny little woes: i've been unsuccessful in getting seminary co-op down the street from me (one of the best academic bookshops in the nation) to stock my first book... first thing that screwed me up was the collapse of inland... a year later, although i could provide catalogs and samples etc., they were unwilling to contact the publisher... the first response is always, "yes, we stock local authors"... the second response is NOTHING HAPPENS... what it comes down to is whether spd stocks same (i understand now that spd will stock my press's inventory, and i await that material transfer)...

the point here is that there are just not a helluvalotta options... i've taken a few books up to woodland pattern, where the folks there were nice enough to inventory same formally (i'm not looking to make money here)... but in fact many bookstores don't WANT you to give them copies!... and working on consignment---me trying to inventory my own 'stock'---well some of you can speak to same better than me...

anyway... i appreciate your response... i wonder if the audience for _publishers' weekly_ would care to read an article on the current situation?... now i'm not the guy to write same---i just don't have the background... but mebbe somebody in these parts is?...

best,

joe

↑ Index

398. Marjorie Perloff

Re: once more, deeply disturbed

Sat 15 Mar 1997

Two quick points in response to Chris Jenkins, David K and others:

1) I am NOT NOT NOT saying that I hope after things shake out we can once again have THE anthology. That's the antithesis of what I said in the article. My whole point is that you can't and don't want to because there are such varied poetries and not one avant-garde. Moreover, I don't particular want any anthology--I never use one in class if I can avoid it. I go with David Antin's quip that anthologies are to poets like the zoo to animals.

2) However--for those who do want to construct anthologies or reanimate the canon (which has never been my sport--I hate the canon debates and think they're a great distraction from real issues), you might as well be upfront and define your own criteria. Clearly, there is no anthology without a principle of selection. So all this talk of reaching out, opening up, caring about others is slightly specious. Reaching out to whom? why? And why not to a million others?

Enough already!

Marjorie

↑ Index

399. F.A. Templeton
Litsci
Sat 15 Mar 1997

(So what does that make Gramsci?)

No, what I'm asking is, more info on n. Katherine Hayle, and how do I take a look at that litsci list?

Fiona

↑ Index

400. DS
Re: once more, deeply disturbed
Sat 15 Mar 1997

. I go with David Antin's quip that anthologies are to >poets like the zoo to animals.
>

I've been thinking about this. One strong defence of Zoos is educational/ We have just had a simulated underground antarctic open up in this city. Auckland. With live penguins. Many people are upset by the idea of sticking pengies underground although there has been no formal protests. I am uncomfortable with it, but feel there is a necessary trade off. If all the people who go to it went to antarctica the resulting polution would be horrific. And polution is a very real problem down there already. As one of the last still relatively untouched environments on earth i believe very strongly we should attempt to preserve it. Keep out all proposed development, pillage, military shit etc... Having access to the simulated environment and seeing these penguins - as the real penguins are undeniably the ATTRACTION - brings to many casual tourism punters the reality of a place most of the world does not even think about. & particularly the generation of school children who are being introduced to the antarctic as the habitat of these curious & attractive creatures rather than the great conqueable whiteness that ed hillary scott shakleton et al so valiantly tried to CONQUER. Anyway my hope is some good will come of it, given all the obvious problems many of have with captivity. The same argument applies generally to the new generation of zoos as the current trend for recreating environments etc increases the animals health, welfare & comfort.

& anyway there's a bad poetry metaphor here somewhere.

Dan

↑ Index

401. Franklin Bruno flirt?
Sat 15 Mar 1997

Sorry for a not-very-poetic query, but does anyone out there remember what city the second section of Hal Hartley's -Flirt- was set in. The other two were New York and Tokyo. I want to say Berlin, but I'm not sure. Backchannel me to avoid clutter. Thanks.

↑ Index

402. amato
Re: Litsci
Sat 15 Mar 1997

---

fiona and interested others:

to sub to litsci-l, post

[redacted]

with the following message (nothing in subject line):

subscribe litsci-l

(no need to type in your name, and please note the newer form, listSTAR not listSERV.)

you will (should!) receive a blurb back from liststar confirming your subscription etc.

it's been a tres quiet list for most of its history, but it recently erupted (finally!) thanx to a rather controversial keynote at the society for literature and science (sls) annual meeting in atlanta last fall (the list is public, though it serves as the official list for sls)... but this more recent eruption seems to have subsided, at least for the moment... so i don't know what'll happen next---it's nothing like poetics, it's generally not in daily flux...

a couple by hayles:

n. katherine hayles, _the cosmic web: scientific field models and literary strategies in the twentieth century_ (ithaca: cornell up, 1984); _chaos bound: orderly disorder in contemporary literature and science_ (ithaca: cornell up, 1990).

i think she's edited a collection of essays since (can't recall the title at the moment) and she has another book forthcoming this year (again, my mind is failing me as to title/subject)...

best,

joe

↑ Index

403. Hugh Nicoll
Re: Katherine Hayles
Sun 16 Mar 1997

Greetings all,

Katherine Hayles' edited _Chaos and Order, Complex Dynamics in Literature and Science_, which was published by the University of Chicago Press in 1991.

Hugh (mostly lurking) but loving the on-going chaos/grit of this list.

↑ Index

404. Chris Stroffolino
DIVING Into The (Human) Zoo...
Sun 16 Mar 1997

I'd like to address a couple of points re "Rich" (notice how we've gone from Dove to Rich, as if this is the REAL issue "Dove" disguised). Marjorie's point (which is very similar to a point Perelman makes in THE MARGINALIZATION--and by the way, I will once again plug next saturday's event at the SEGUE space ostensibly on Perelman's book, for, as I foresee it, the discussion will not be limited to the book hopefully but to such issues as these, and beyond ((like MUSIC, etc....))I digress)--anyway, Marjorie's objections (echoed by Mike Magee) seem to be twofold here. First, she critiques the poem because "It's so willed". In this, I would agree with Jordan Davis that it very well may be a form of "mysticism to say that form forces its message" in a way more "indeterminate" poetics do not. Or, again, I'd point to the seeming parodox of "you HAVE TO let (as opposed to will) in poetry" assuming that description as a way of becoming injunction, and that the "will" vs. "letting" dualism may be as troublesome as the "mind" vs. "body" dualism (and, no, I am not denying that we may need such dualisms at least strategically, and at least in order to seem to be able to communicate, or even "think"--but of course then there often comes the point where these dualisms go meta and what's "at stake" is the "dualism" between "monism" and "dualism" etc.). In any rate, I do not think that the form of Rich's poem NECESSARILY undercuts its message and I guess this leads me (though not seamlessly) to my second point. The issue of what I will call "metaphysical conceits" in poetry. Mike Magee (and Perelman in the MARGINALIZATION) contrasts Carla Harryman favorably to Rich because the former is more formally fluid while the latter is not. Specifically, Magee mentions "THERE NEVER WAS A ROSE...." Now, I have been more interested and engaged in studying Harryman's work than in RIch's (I am trying to avoid the dogmatism of saying that I like it and will always like it better however) and yes I do believe there's a lot of truth in Magee's statement. However, if one wants the more FLUID Harryman it is, I believe in ANIMAL INSTINCTS and especially VICE....although even in vice she's looking for that "adequate vice to LIMIT the liquid of this voice" (i.e, she's trying to come to terms with WILL, and forms or in Dan Salmon's analogy ZOOS?) and in many of the new pieces in "NEVER WAS..ROSE..." Harryman does, far more than anywhere else in her PUBLISHED ouevre (thinking of the GAME "poems" in particular) employ something that, to me, seems very similar to "a metaphysical conceit"--it may be done more SELF-Consciously than Rich does (though there is, I believe, a way to read rich's poem as an allegory of its own form as well), but it is not SO self-conscious that the conceit shatters before it is constructed. This, in my opinion, is largely the strength of these new works of Harryman's. I do believe that metaphysical conceits are hard to sustain, and I do not WISH to make them into a STANDARD by which we judge poetry (by such a standard of course I'd have to shoot myself in the foot and admit that I'm just not a poet, etc.)--but I do think there is a thrill in constructing and sustaining such an illusion and that it needn't destroy one's allegedly postmodern love of "work that rejects easy closure" etc. Now, maybe Marjorie's (and others') rejection (that may not be the right word) of Rich's poem has more to do with its tight STANZAIC FORM than it has to do with the fact that it employs such conceit(s)--Marjorie, I WOULD appreciate clarification on this point, since they are two DIFFERENT criticisms---and if so, we have to deal with other issues than the issue of "conceit", but I'd like to extend this question of "conceit" beyond Harryman and even towards more seemingly PURE "language poetry", which seems to me to be as "cooked" (raw vs. cooked allusion) as Rich, and that therefore the silliness of Rich's FLIPPERS may be seen as part of its charm and even power. I don't think Rich's poem CAN be as written off as easily as say William Stafford's TRAVELLING THROUGH THE YARD, partially because the former is less conservative on a content level, or at least CAN BE (if we really do believe in THE READER), in a way it seems the stafford poem can not....because, to invert Jordan's claim, it's possible the MESSAGE can force the form without being a form of mysticism..... Well, just some thoughts.... And, thank you Jonathon Levin for the word "adjunctification" and thank you Dan Salmon for the ZOO metaphor ("we're all inmates of the human zoo" or do i mean "the prisonhouse of language" which might as well be "sestina") and thanks Keith Tuma, Franklin Bruno, and Susan Wheeler, and Chris Alexander and Joseph Lease (and others) for interesting posts in this in the last few days. Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

405. Burt Kimmelman

Re: Litsci

Sun 16 Mar 1997

I too would love to know how to get on the litsci list.

Thanks anyone who can help with this.

Burt Kimmelman
Department of Humanities and Social Sciences
New Jersey Institute of Technology, Newark, NJ 07102
Phone: [redacted] Fax: [redacted] Internet: [redacted]
Home phone: [redacted]

↑ Index

406. amato

Re: DIVING Into The (Human) Zoo...

Sun 16 Mar 1997

---

the only thing i would add to chris s's last post, which again i enjoyed, is this: that there are surely poems with teeth that are formally more traditional... i don't mean (though i could mean!) traditional form... it seems to me, as i'll say again and again, that different communities will handle the form/content issues differently (and i've tried to suggest that this happens in different genres---the novel, scifi, etc)...

i mean, there are other poems in _diving into the wreck_ that i find effective ("trying to talk with a man"), but these poems may be viewed as didactic or some such from those who prefer (gross shorthand coming) more nuance... i won't go on here except to say that yes, there are probably more folks in the mainstreams who'll appreciate rich's work than, say, mayer's... and that i'll continue to make the argument --- what i would say amounts to fighting the good fight --- for recognition of aesthetics and formal maneuvers such as mayer's (making that argument, that is to say, in whatever institutions)... but this doesn't stop me from actually "liking," de facto, rich's poetry... in fact what troubles me actually --- just to be a bit personal about it --- is when i'm faced with somebody whose aesthetic i appreciate, but who doesn't appreciate mine!... this is bound to create all sorts of hard feelings... and yes---i've rec'd this treatment in mainstream circles from folks i've met, in some cases from folks i've met who are good writers... but hey -- i've also on occasion experienced this sort of rejection in specifically un-mainstream circles...

anyway, i would like to address, briefly, marjorie's question (and i think she's correct to keep pushing this point of selection) about 'reaching out to whom': from a strictly (and perhaps reductively) critical pov, the issue of critics recuperating particular poetic writing can be viewed in terms of appropriation (and i don't mean this in a 'bad' sense only)... when we select what we write 'about' (speaking as a reductively-defined critic now), we generally have mixed motives... we may find the work really challenging aesthetically, or we may just plain love it and want to write about it... we may find that the various appeals it makes to us, or to others, deserve a more public appraisal (this is the 'function of the critic' in more 'public intellectual' terms)... or any mix really----i'm not trying to be exhaustive here... our motives may have to do with any combination of passion, excitement, curiosity, justice, _____...

so ok: why reach out as a critic to, say, the work of high school students?... i can think of LOTS of reasons -- though if you'll permit me just a bit of nasty sarcasm here, i already have plenty of so-so poems to read from my student-writers! (i say this just to keep in mind that teaching poetry is not the same thing necessarily as teaching writers how to write poetry)... for one, reaching out to high school students in such terms defines the status of poetry in those communities---communities that will one day shape the readership for published poets, as well as the poets themselves... i can imagine all sorts of interesting conclusions one might draw, ethnographically speaking... for another thing, writing by high-school students IS writing, deserves some attention on its own account, and speaks to the cultural status of writing in this society... for another still, i've come across some REALLY GOOD writing in my classes, with no condescension implied or intended and with every aesthetic register in place when i say this...

(some of you can help me out here, this ain't my field...

and the really controversial point: why scrutinize the writing of high school students (please don't take me to mean this latter as a monolith either!) as opposed to the work of more, shall we say, polished or professional poets? (eek, there's that p word applied to poetry again!)... well, even if, as a writer, i am NOT so predisposed, i must observe that, as a writer, there IS something to be gained from listening to and examining writing that isn't so caught up with the various conventions of poetry---i mean mainstream, radical, avant-garde, etc... of course, in writing about such writing, critics will nonetheless be making a selection from among these sample of writing to make whatever points they wish to make... that is, and not to condescend again, there is an aesthetics to consider here as well---which is that 'reach' to which marjorie alludes, finally, coming in, if not the front, then at least the back door (yes, like nature, as i mentioned to a friend backchannel)... and to whom does such a critic write?---well, same answer as 'before': to other critics, other writers, who are so interested...

personally, i've found maria damon's work on teenage women writing (women who live in the projects) to be quite revitalizing (_the dark end of the street_, a book with which i'm sure many of you are familiar)... in fact i need, as a writer, for folks like maria to keep doing what they do even as i need, as a writer, for folks like marjorie to keep doing what they do... and i do not see why such critical work need be treated in terms of the implicit dichotomy through which i've advanced same, either, except as this helps to clarify things (or does it?)...

best,

joe

↑ Index

407. Herb Levy
new music mags redux
Sun 16 Mar 1997

I'm deeply disturbed that I neglected to mention Experimental Musical Instruments in my early posting on this off-topic subject.

It's a very good mag, comes out quarterly, even seems to have reasonable newsstand distribution. Always worth looking at, though I don't buy every issue.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

408. Amittai F. Aviram
Anthologies
Sun 16 Mar 1997

I've been a bad lurker, not having enough time to keep up with the immense volume of learned discourse here, but once in a while I do try ...

Marjorie and others, about anthologies and zoos ...

I've always had a very similar feeling of distaste for anthologies and desire to get students to read _books_. And yet ...

1) I confess that, despite all the obvious problems and flaws, I _vastly_ admire _all_ the Norton anthologies. It's just _great_, especially for poetry _before WWII_--before our time--to be able to _find_ something quickly and have _notes_ to it! Some of the notes are wrong or misleading, but it's nice to have them anyway. And, when it comes to other languages, anthologies can be a real blessing, too--as a way to try to get started, or to find some poem that you know everybody quotes (in French or German or Italian or Latin or Hebrew or Portuguese or whatever).

2) Aren't literary magazines, actually, anthologies? You can see that, here, the boundary is a bit fuzzy, isn't it?

I think Marjorie's last comment really _does_ address point #2 a bit. She'd just as soon have _no_ anthologies, but, if we must have them, let's be up front about our selection criteria. The same could surely be said for magazines. I think we have less of a problem with magazines-- sometimes--because, after a while, you learn the "map" and know what the _implicit_ criteria are for those magazines that don't make them _explicit_ (which is of course the great majority of them and all of the ones with prestige--_Poetry_, _Paris Review_, etc.).

But, insofar as one learns the "map" of magazines, doesn't one do the same with anthologies?

I think Marjorie's initial problem, as I take it, is with what seems to be internal and unspoken conflicts between criteria systems within any given anthology (or magazine, for that matter?)--between the "poetic" or "aesthetic" criteria and the "political" criteria of "inclusion" or "representation."

And I took Marjorie's comment about Mexican-American poets, etc.-- did I mistake you, Marjorie?--as simply meaning that, the more of these poets get published, the more eventually will be available to editors to make decisions _not_ primarily motivated by the desire for "inclusion" but rather some criteria not related to the identity of the author ("aesthetic" criteria). It's a matter of probability, and this is precisely--or was, anyway--the hope of affirmative action to begin with: if we put up with this institutionalized artifice for a while, there will _eventually_ be enough people from various hitherto underrepresented minorities within the pool of applicants (or whatever) so that one can simply make a truly race-blind, sex-blind choice based on truly relevant (job-related, project-related) criteria, because probability would now ensure that representation would occur by default.

In the case of affirmative action, this didn't work because the money wasn't put behind it, in the form of scholarships and fellowships for students (of any ethnic or racial background or sex) who needed the money. And salaries in academics, though nowadays somewhat reasonable if you're lucky to get a tenure track job, do not compete with salaries in business or some of the other professions, which naturally seem more attractive to those minority groups that have been excluded from wealth for generations.

But the same logic _could_ reasonably apply in the field of choosing poets to include in an anthology, it seems to me. And I think, in general, it _has_ been working--the canon _has_ been changing, and, in many cases, the "new" works entering the canon have been quite _good_.

Amittai

↑ Index

409. William Burmeister Prod
Re: joining conversation
Sun 16 Mar 1997

Yo escribi
>Yeah, sort of like a white being called "gringo" in the Americas by some > latin american groups (even in the U.S.for that matter).

David writes:
> It's interesting how likeable the term "gringo" is (or seems -- or am I > wrong?) to the whites who get so dubbed (or maybe it's only when > self-dubbing, w/ some pleasant irony, that this somehow playful sense of > the term comes into play?)

I couldn't resist posting that one, but only as a light aside. I am about to marry an Ecuadorian national, and while she doesn't use the term, others in Ecuador have with me. She explains to me that it's ok--not derogatory--to be so dubbed. To me, it could have been a dubbing or a drubbing depending on how I felt at the time. I explained to her (as a private joke) that we North Americans (thanks George for the clarification) have a bad time with that term because of its ignoble use in the Hollywood (and sphagetti) westerns (which also provided a stereotype of the Mexican man I think).

All of that aside, isn't this thread, in its most general terms, just another instance of Blanchot's principle of alienation?

Bill B.

↑ Index

410. Henry Gould
Blarnes oeuvre
Sun 16 Mar 1997

Has anyone read the poetry (early, especially) of Eric Blarnes? Controversial to say the least - he was born in Belize in 1907, grew up in BENARES (believe it or not) (family old-time colonial Brit) - became Hindu in 1929 - wrote under pseudonym of Pravat Singh. Poetry, for the most part, also Pessoa-like take-offs on Eliot-like criticism of 30s anglo-Indian poets (unknown outside India). Here's a sample:

ELEPHANT SHADOW

Trumpet of the marvelous.
Bellicose traveler, you trample across
deep-chested dreams.

This is from 1923. Blarnes was all of sixteen - completely isolated, living in a convent school for Catholic daughters of (Portuguese, for the most part) merchant families (he worked as a part-time tutor there for 2 years - the Siringarh Convent School of Benares).

I'd be curious if others have come upon this obscure work - Henry Gould p.s. any S. Ray fans out there?

↑ Index

411. Steven Marks

Re: Blarnes oeuvre

Sun 16 Mar 1997

This wouldn't be some of your early St. Paddy's day blarney, now would it?

Shlantih,
Steven

On Sun, 16 Mar 1997, Henry Gould wrote:

> Has anyone read the poetry (early, especially) of Eric Blarnes? Controversial to say the least - he was born in Belize in 1907, grew up in BENARES (believe it or not) (family old-time colonial Brit) - became Hindu in 1929 - wrote under pseudonym of Pravat Singh. Poetry, for the most part, also Pessoa-like take-offs on Eliot-like criticism of 30s anglo-Indian poets (unknown outside India). Here's a sample:
>
> ELEPHANT SHADOW
>
> Trumpet of the marvelous.
> Bellicose traveler, you trample across
> deep-chested dreams.
>
> This is from 1923. Blarnes was all of sixteen - completely isolated, living in a convent school for Catholic daughters of (Portuguese, for the most part) merchant families (he worked as a part-time tutor there for 2 years - the Siringarh Convent School of Benares).

> I'd be curious if others have come upon this obscure work - Henry Gould > p.s. any S. Ray fans out there?

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

412. Louis Cabri
wieners + (alan) davies
Sun 16 Mar 1997

The line is the individual of the social.
The phrase is her habit.
Words? There isn't that kind of hope.
- "Capitalism and Form"
Alan Davies, _Candor_, 1990

JOHN WIENERS reads and launches the publication of his journals (just out from Sun & Moon) in Philadelphia April 11th. Alan Davies, Bob Perelman, Joshua Schuster, others including myself will each speak some words of introduction. ALAN DAVIES reads the following day, Saturday, at noon. Thanks to Laura Moriarty we are broadcasting Robert Duncan's 1975 interview with Wieners during the week prior to the reading. This is at Writers House, University of Pennsylvania. All are invited!

Not to horse a dead beat, but with this event in mind, and having just read recent listserv posts (worst of the worst for months I've been a lapsed lurker) I looked up "John Wieners" in Hoover's Norton. And there he is. Now I could well be mistaken, and/or naive to think otherwise, but little criticism seems to be written on Wieners' work - he is, like many in the Hoover, Nortonized (erstwhile sign of "tradition") sans the legitimacy of a "citational matrix" (its absence the erstwhile sign of "innovation"). - The sign of modernist time is out of joint. Hoover's three paragraphs of introduction to the Wieners selection stands him in the company of the best (only) readers of Wieners' ouevre.

If listmembers know of writing on John Wieners that is unavailable through usual library channels, I would appreciate your posting news of it here (or to me backchannel). Of listmembers, Douglas Messerli wrote a review - I believe so, although I haven't found a copy of it yet - of Behind the State Capitol or Cincinnati Pike in 1976. Bruce Andrews' review came out in 1978.... I might be overlooking chapters of or references/footnotes to JW in books by listmembers

(please forgive this haste) and by others, books that may be well-known - but what I have in mind in addition would be smallpress materials like Charles Shively's review of Behind the State publ the year it came out, 1975 (in Gay Sunshine no. 25; I've yet to get hold of a copy of it).

Which leads me perhaps too unceremoniously and inevitably to ask: what role/influence has Wieners' work had on your own work?

This event that we're doing can't come near to what could be done to properly address Wieners' (life and the context of his) writing. Nevertheless, responses to this listserv query could conceivably be read at the event, or possibly (speaking for myself) cited and incorporated into the presentations for the event, with your permission. At the very least a list of reviews and such, if any, from hard-to-find periodicals might be compiled here for later use. I'd welcome news/opinions/memories of any kind and from anyone.

Thanks in advance,
Louis Cabri

Organizers of this event also include Kristen Gallagher and Shawn Walker

↑ Index

413. KENT JOHNSON
Re: wieners + (alan) davies
Sun 16 Mar 1997

You probably know about this, but there is a recording of Wieners from circa late 60's (?) doing a powerful reading The Hotel Wently Poems and other things. I listened to this at the Univ. of Wisconsin/Milwaukee library years ago and remember being quite moved by it. Or is this a rare tape?

Kent

> Date sent: Sun, 16 Mar 1997 22:14:49 -0500
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Louis Cabri <[redacted]>
> Subject: wieners + (alan) davies
> To: [redacted]
>
> The line is the individual of the social.
> The phrase is her habit.
> Words? There isn't that kind of hope.
> - "Capitalism and Form"
> Alan Davies, _Candor_, 1990
>
> JOHN WIENERS reads and launches the publication of his journals (just out from Sun & Moon) in Philadelphia April 11th. Alan Davies, Bob Perelman, Joshua Schuster, others including myself

will each speak some words of introduction. ALAN DAVIES reads the following day, Saturday, at noon. Thanks to Laura Moriarty we are broadcasting Robert Duncan's 1975 interview with Wieners during the week prior to the reading. This is at Writers House, University of Pennsylvania. All are invited!

Not to horse a dead beat, but with this event in mind, and having just read recent listserv posts (worst of the worst for months I've been a lapsed lurker) I looked up "John Wieners" in Hoover's Norton. And there he is. Now I could well be mistaken, and/or naive to think otherwise, but little criticism seems to be written on Wieners' work - he is, like many in the Hoover, Nortonized (erstwhile sign of "tradition") sans the legitimacy of a "citational matrix" (its absence the erstwhile sign of "innovation"). - The sign of modernist time is out of joint. Hoover's three paragraphs of introduction to the Wieners selection stands him in the company of the best (only) readers of Wieners' ouevre.

If listmembers know of writing on John Wieners that is unavailable through usual library channels, I would appreciate your posting news of it here (or to me backchannel). Of listmembers, Douglas Messerli wrote a review - I believe so, although I haven't found a copy of it yet - of Behind the State Capitol or Cincinnati Pike in 1976. Bruce Andrews' review came out in 1978.... I might be overlooking chapters of or references/footnotes to JW in books by listmembers (please forgive this haste) and by others, books that may be well-known - but what I have in mind in addition would be smallpress materials like Charles Shively's review of Behind the State publ the year it came out, 1975 (in Gay Sunshine no. 25; I've yet to get hold of a copy of it).

Which leads me perhaps too unceremoniously and inevitably to ask: what role/influence has Wieners' work had on your own work?

This event that we're doing can't come near to what could be done to properly address Wieners' (life and the context of his) writing. Nevertheless, responses to this listserv query could conceivably be read at the event, or possibly (speaking for myself) cited and incorporated into the presentations for the event, with your permission. At the very least a list of reviews and such, if any, from hard-to-find periodicals might be compiled here for later use. I'd welcome news/opinions/memories of any kind and from anyone.

Thanks in advance,
Louis Cabri

Organizers of this event also include Kristen Gallagher and Shawn

> Walker

↑ Index

414. David R. Israel
Re: DIVING Into ... / "mysticism"
Sun 16 Mar 1997

Have been reading the dialogue re: Rich & form & suchlike things a bit patchily, tho w/ interest --

Chris Stroffolino's strand in this thread cites the recent (worthy) observation of > . . . . Jordan Davis that it very well may be a form of > "mysticism to say that form forces its message" in a way more > "indeterminate" poetics do not . . .

an observation reminiscent -- jumping from form to notions of word-sounds themselves -- to broader mysticisms in poetry (such as that connecting sound & meaning -- a topic I think O. Paz [to name one] did a good riff on in an old, perhaps well-known essay) --

This here will (I daresay) amount to pulling the strand out of the thread (or, the thread out of the rug?) -- but I felt (on re-greeting Jordan D.'s utterance thus afresh today) that it might not be altogether amiss to propose this notion:

there is (can be) no poetry w/o mysticism

Seems axiomatic from where I sit.
Where (how) might others sit w/ it, I wonder?

d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
| "...honk if you believe in geese" |
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\///&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\///..'

↑ Index

415. AARON SHURIN
Re: Wieners
Sun 16 Mar 1997

In one of its earliest issues/incarnations, before it became #4/Period(ical), Mirage devoted an entire invaluable issue to John Weiners. Contributers included Steve Abbott, Bruce Boone, R. Creeley, Alan Davies, Bob Gluck,Fanny Howe, Kevin Killian, me too, among quite a few others.With Wieners poems. 1985. Beautiful work.

Aaron Shurin

↑ Index

416. George Bowering
Re: once more, deeply disturbed
Sun 16 Mar 1997

> . I go with David Antin's quip that anthologies are to poets like the zoo to animals.
>
> I've been thinking about this. One strong defence of Zoos is educational.

Yes, maybe, but what do the poor creatures learn?

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

417. David R. Israel
Re: once more, deeply disturbed
Sun 16 Mar 1997

Goerge Browning inquires --

> . I go with David Antin's quip that anthologies are to poets like the zoo to animals.
>
> I've been thinking about this. One strong defence of Zoos is > educational.

>
> Yes, maybe, but what do the poor creatures learn?

well that's perhaps where the trope breaks down? -- coincidentally, I spent a nice afternoon w/ friends in the DC Zoo today (thus missing, come to think of it, some avant-garde poets reading locally abt. the same hour) -- the bird house is the best.

d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
|"...sleuthing out all clues, blues & news"|
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\//&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\///..'

↑ Index

418. DS
Re: once more, deeply disturbed
Mon 17 Mar 1997

At 08:34 PM 3/16/97 -0800, you wrote:
>>. I go with David Antin's quip that anthologies are to >>>poets like the zoo to animals.
>>>
>>
>>I've been thinking about this. One strong defence of Zoos is educational.
>
>Yes, maybe, but what do the poor creatures learn?
>
touche...

fencing i think?

↑ Index

419. Carnography

BIB Targeted By Congress/three monologues for heterogeneous voices and free beer

Mon 17 Mar 1997

To all:

> From: ron <[redacted]>
>
> alert! FC2/Black Ice Books is under investigation by a congressional committee trying to shut down NEA. more to follow. letters of support can be faxed to [redacted].

First books targeted:

SM, by Jeffery DeShell, Blood of Mugwump, by Doug Rice, The Mexican Trilogy, by D.N. Stuefloten, and Chick Lit 2, edited by Chris Mazza. It seems my book, Distorture, will probably be the next to be targeted. After that, I'm not certain who's next.

Even if this turns out to be good for individual writers, the fact remains that it's bad news for BIB and for all other literary academic presses. Please write letters of support and do what you can.

Also:

In celebration of two new books:

Distorture

&

Beneath the Empire of the Birds

March 27, 7:00 p.m.

Tower Books

Readings by

Rob Hardin
Darius James
and Carl Watson

383 Lafayette Street
NY, NY 10009
212/[redacted]

There will be posters, wine, beer, an ad in the Voice, a choice pic in The NY Press: The place will be a madhouse.

An aside: All responses to me should be emailed to me personally. After getting continuously flamed for punctuation, and amassing further flames for calling a punctuation flame bad netiquette (which it is: I worked for NetBooks for two years and copyedited the Masquerade guide to the internet--I use such neologisms accurately), I don't really see much point in perpetuating arguments on listserv. Therefore, I won't be reading the list and won't respond to messages on the list.

Still, Black Ice Books/FC2 is more important than the logistics of any personal exchange. Jeffery DeShell is a great writer and future DeShells deserve to be published. Let's all support free speech and forget about our differences.

All the best always,

Rob Hardin

http://www.users.interport.net/~scrypt/
http://www.horrornet.com/hardin.htm

↑ Index

420. Rachel Loden

Wieners , + once more, deeply disturbed

Mon 17 Mar 1997

David R. Israel wrote:

> Goerge Browning inquires --

Um, Goerge Browning--was he married to Elizabeth Barrett Bowering?

And Louis Cabri wrote:

> If listmembers know of writing on John Wieners that is unavailable through usual library channels, I would appreciate your posting news of it here (or to me backchannel).

There's a review of _Ace of Pentacles_ by Kenneth Irby in _Kulchur_ 19, and an interview with Wieners in _Chicago Review_ 26:1.

There's an essay called "To Celebrate this Broken Man: the Poetry of John Wieners" at http://angel-exhaust.offworld.org/html/issue-11/Wieners.html

and an interview with Raymond Foye and David Trinidad (with a few paragraphs on Wieners) at http://www.levity.com/hanuman/inter.html

I'd like to know if the issue of _Mirage_ mentioned by Aaron Shurin is still available.

There's so little.

Rachel L.

↑ Index

421. Henry Gould
Blarnes
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Steve Marks, you win the golden shamrock award. Blarnes was in fact a pseudonym for Irish poet Shamful Mac Harnessey - here's one of his more sober lyrics:

WHACK RA-LOO

Well, I've taken a dram of ye miracle effluent scribbled a line evanescent-fervescent debouched like a leprechaun riding a pheasant and if you believe it, well. I'm having to say: you've swallowed an elephant.

happy St. Paddy's - Friedrich Von Schlosschenteufelwissenschaflichtaube

↑ Index

422. Christopher Alexander
Re: BIB Targeted By Congress/three monologues for heterogeneous
Mon 17 Mar 1997

> >alert! FC2/Black Ice Books is under investigation by a congressional > >committee trying to shut down NEA. more to follow. letters of support can > >be faxed to [redacted].
can we get some more info on this?
exactly what is going on?!
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

423. Joseph Conte
LITSCI-L
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Burt Kimmelman requested subscribe information for the LITSCI-L, currently involved in cross-examination of its cliental and a discussion of the ethics of cloning. Can one clone a literary form? Or as Handel writes in _The Messiah_: "All We Like Sheep."

Send a mail message to [redacted] with the usual subscribe litsci-l (and nothing else, nothing in the subject line).

Apologies to the Poetics-L if Joe Amato et al have already provided the above information.

Joseph Conte

↑ Index

424. Mark Prejsnar
Getting more disturbed
Mon 17 Mar 1997

This is partly bouncing off Robert Archambeau's post...But also he was stating something I've seen now so many times, on the list in the last year, and in printed discussions by pretty nonmainstream folks, that I take it to represent a new emerging consensus.

Which doesn't by a long shot mean everyone agrees with it; but there is an unmistakeable swing in this direction, obviously a corrective to earlier intolerance/militance..

The emerging consensus, a sort of Rodney King line ("can't we all just get along?") is phrased in Robert's post by saying he likes both Perelman and Heaney. Similar dunciations of party-lineism can be found with increasing frequency; in Rasula's fabulous Wax Museum book, someone is quoted in a footnote as stating a similar warning on this listserv. (I have the book next to me, but can't find the reference right now.)

I have great sympathy with this; I also feel that the new consensus is rising to dominance without as much discussion as I'd like...That was why I posted about five days ago, pointing out in very simplistic terms the two (now quite old) contemporary nonmainstream paradigms. The one opposed to get-alongism can be articulated, as I pointed out, in a sharply left-political way, as in classic LangPo theory; i.e. Seamus Heaney (or Amy Clampitt, or Philip Levine, or Adrienne Rich) work with form in such a way as to deaden the sensibility of readers, whereas more challenging formal work can empower by demanding that the reader become an active co-creator of culture, polity, of the world she lives in. I also have great sympathy with this argument, which gets pushed aside without enuff thought if we simply agree to have broad tastes.

And then there's another verison of the intolerant line. This I've oftern heard from friends who were poets or editor/poets. This doesn't drag politics in much, but might be seen as embodying a kind of Blakean "mental fight;" this attitude simply rejects having a lot to do with poetry that is (argueably) too mass-commodified and unchallenging, as being without interest or artistic force in our time. I have sympathy with this impulse as well...

I remain suspended in negative capability. Which in this case may just mean, I possess the negative attribute of being incapable of making up my mind!...But I'm afraid of too easy an agreement to move on to a new consensus, without engaging the harder, more intolerant lines that have had a huge impact, as I see it, on the poetic space many of us now occupy.

Mark Prejsnar
Atlanta

↑ Index

425. Mark Prejsnar
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

On Sat, 15 Mar 1997, DS wrote:

> In voicing a support of Robert Archambeau I wonder if the side of the > debate that writes off 'contemporary' non-language (and i use the term > loosely - i guess i really mean a tradition from Olson on - judging by this > debate) poetries is not just a bit mired in early marxism that managed also > to avoid/ignore the fact that there were other people who didn't always want > their battles fought by a (and i hate this almost-meaningless word) western elite

This brings up losts of interesting stuff....I see some good points to this critique, but...First off, it simply takes it for granted that form need not be discussed; if the militant post-Olson line has even the slightest legitimacy, then some of the formal quesitons are still real, even if there are folks who feel that they do not belong to a white western (male, straight, affluent) elite, and that it shouldn't talk for them; second, the questions of the form of politics, are sometimes being debated to clarify one's own practice as a poet (or editor, or publisher, or reader!) and not necessarily to impose judgments or practices on Others; third, as a revolutionary socialist, I think it muddies things quite a bit to conflate Olson and various more recent practitioners in a vague way with a somewhat fuzzy "early marxism." The various political/poetical formulations at issue here are more carefully worked out, in many cases, than to deserve that!

My own practice on the left, as an activist, for 25 years, makes me VERY wary of folks questioning my beliefs, on the grounds that by being militant I'm forcing my values on some (less empowered) other; that is almost always the argument of the right against the left, in my opinion. My answer, which I feel is accurate, is: this is my struggle, I'm fighting it for me, and for others who I'm in solidarity with; ain't tryng to force anything on anyone;....and mutatis mutanda that applies here.

Mark Prejsnar
Atlanta

↑ Index

426. Mark Prejsnar
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

By the by, since Heaney has been figuring in this cluster of threads....A story in the Sunday NYT yesterday announced that he is considered a serious candidate for next president of the Irish Republic. (Not surprisingly, the republic considers political leadership open to anyone born in the north, as he was.) The story also points out that this is a "largely symbolic" post (guess the overall governmental form is parlimentary...) Is that an ironic wink from history's gods, for all of us who think poetry matters politically?

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

427. Sylvester Pollet
WCW Review
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Donna Hollenberg asked me to pass this call along to the Poetics List:

The William Carlos Williams Review is seeking essays for a special issue on H.D. and Williams to be published in Fall 1999. Essays can take any approach and can be on any aspect of the relationship between H.D. and Williams but they must focus on both writers. Possible topics include their relationship to modernism and to the other arts as well as their personal and/or textual relationships. Send papers, preferably 15-20 pages, double-spaced and in MLA style, to guest editors Glen MacLeod and Donna Hollenberg, Department of English, University of Connecticut, Storrs, CT 06269 by March 1, 1998. Enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope if you want your paper returned.

****

↑ Index

428. amato
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

mark, you're probably already aware of this, but speaking as a teacher (again!), i've seen the unreconstructed left argument (what teresa ebert calls a "pedagogy of critique" over and against a "pedagogy of pleasure") take precisely the dogmatic turn you yourself wish to avoid... i.e., 'in order for my students to learn from me, they must accept this version of the world'... in its worse manifestation, i mean---a sort of conversion process, with the terms of said conversion already worked out (by the instructor-authority)... and of course, this matches rather precisely the old guard connoisseur-driven pedagogy, predicated on students tacitly ceding that certain authors/texts are worth reading (and sometimes worth reading this way, yknow) simply b/c the instructor sez so, goddammit...

just a thought as to how ideology can play itself out in the classroom in undesirable ways... and perhaps in other institutions... the problem, old or new, is that there is insufficient critique of pedagogical authority in the first place... which is not to wish away instructional authority...

btw, i like that you're foregrounding the 'consensus' position in such terms---thanx!... i think, in order to continue to turn these conflicts over & over, we'll probably have to agree that it's not a 'consensus' folks are after exactly, except as to our willingness to turn these conflicts over & over!... i mean, the problem is more that certain positions get drowned out, certain aesthetics go unanswered (and unquestioned), than that we don't "agree" (or even "agree to disagree") about same... so it's really more of a dissensus i'm seeking, anyway---which is to say that some 'we' recognizes that there ARE actually controversies, regardless the direction one turns...

best,

joe

↑ Index

429. eric pape
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Joe: I'm interested in some of the places this thread is going, particularly re: teaching. I think you are quite correct to point out that there has been little if any "critique of pedagogicaly authority" as such, even in some decidedly lefty pedagogical theorists, practitioners, etc. I can think of Graff's teaching the conflicts book some years ago as an example, where I believe that the difference practice of teaching began to be articulated (as far as I know). What strikes me as odd in all this is a kind of elision in any pedagogy in that no one seems to talk about what we think we're doing as teachers. I.e., what the goal of teaching is? This usually gets worked out in terms of a dialectic, unquestioned, of indocrination or improvement. In that those more on the right see teaching as a sort of rite of passage, whereby the student learns "his" culture in order to more properly live as a responsible student within it, such as Bennett's "virtue." Or on the other hand those more on the left see it as some sort of improvement: making better kids, better citizens, better folk in general. The former has at least the benefit of being somewhat practical, but I wonder about the latter. For what, exactly, are we improving them? As O'Hara would ask "for death?" What usually gets taught more than anything else in all this is precisely the pedagogy of authority, which more and more seems to me what the real hidden goal of actually existing teaching. This troubles me, but I wonder what else we can do. In an institutional framework, how do we avoid teaching institutionalization? Just some scattered questions, which ultimately, I think conclude any dialogue re: pedagogy. Thanks, Eric.

↑ Index

430. Christopher Alexander
Re: form
Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

matthias wrttt:
> I do not think form and content need "match up", need reflect each > other _nec._, : that is to say, not in the manner suggested above: but I > think they might both be seen as being formed by a situation in which just > that content, just that form was nec. Perhaps to articulate something new it > is something nec. to use an old form?
well, I'd say yes ok.
I mean clearly there is no paraphrase etc so the form of utterance is doing some kind of work, whatever that form happens to be. sorry if this is totally disjointed, for instance. & as several people (joseph?) have pointed out, a given form can be enlisted to do various kinds of political work in different contexts. so for instance, we both know the argument can be made for derek walcott's work being in a certain kind of dialogue with english colonialism that is differently but not less political than brathwaite (see for ex terry eagleton's review of midsummer); & along those lines would be a sort of adrienne rich or even marilyn hacker as "stealing the language" argu. on the other hand, I think it's appropriate to point up (& I think this is what was being pointed up in previous posts in this & the "disturbed" thread) the shortcomings of those forms, too, particularly as they can persist unquestioned in the work itself or,

that is, to the degree that the relation of the form of utterance to meaning remains unproblematized (form as vessel). ["it's all-natural & packed with goodness"]. which is not to imply that we don't at times see a similar problem in so-called innovative work, nor to say that problematizing that relation means necessarily rehearsing the question in the same way that, for instance,
I (think I) do in my work--a sort of dogmatic etc.
obviously I'm not talking "form" as rhyme & meter etc anymore but something broader. hope this is somewhat coherent-- I'm at work & things keep happening around/to me to pull me away from the pc.

I hear this said a lot round here, & I know, to be forever saying I'm bored is to admit that I have "no inner resources"--but, for what it's worth, one of the problems I have personally with much of this work is the sense of having things served to me on a platter:
identity/assertion/tale du jour served up in a clear glass. whereas, to my mind, thought involves a bit more work than just "yes, yes" or "heavens I know the place" or that (god I hate this) poetry-noise people make at certain readings I get roped into attending from time to time, a kind of semi-orgasmic "oh" that signals "yes, I've been touched" & is sometimes, for maximal effect, emphasized by bringing one hand up to brush the chest...

possibly this is less a matter of critique or even disrespect to the modes in question than disgust with Patrons of the Arts. but though there are greater complexities to some of these works, they do seem to encourage these responses, which bespeak a kind of "goes down smooth" commodifying presentation of their ostensibly political content. too, I have to question [says
"rhetorically"] the rhetoric of visibility & representation that often supports this mode of discourse: whether certain language-forms don't distort what they ostensibly represent by disallowing some forms of expression altogether.
the difference between chi-chi & mexico is palpable. & there is the possibility, isn't there, that arguments for access legitimate the authority of the dominant culture. which isn't of course to say "separatism" or "hold the [party] line, please"--but does explain why a broader acceptance on both sides is necessary. it's not a problem with me if gay couples want to live monogamously in the suburbs--the problem starts when people think gay couples have to live monogamously in the suburbs in order to be "legitimate".

a language of "respect" is fine by me, though I'm not sure what form that would take for many of us, except possibly Absence of Malice.
I suppose that's what we're trying to work out now.
what does it mean to "respect", let alone "support"
writers whose works I don't have any interest to read, even if we all "have an interest in" them?

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc.
[redacted]
(Marriott Library Computer Systems)

language code not found. illegal operation error.
this program will shut down, & all unsaved data will be lost. if problem persists, consult your systems operator.

↑ Index

431. Joseph Lease
Re: jobs and poetry
Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

couplets aren't necessarily any less time consuming than verse paragraphs or tercets or quatrains

↑ Index

432. Joseph Lease
Re: once more, deeply disturbed
Mon 17 Mar 1997

I don't know: there are anthologies where the only honest principle of selection (the only one that can be discenred and sustained) is the fact of the editor(s): and sometimes, in a weird way, those are more honest than the others

On Sat, 15 Mar 1997, Marjorie Perloff wrote:

> Two quick points in response to Chris Jenkins, David K and others:
>
> 1) I am NOT NOT NOT saying that I hope after things shake out we can once again have THE anthology. That's the antithesis of what I said in the article. My whole point is that you can't and don't want to because there are such varied poetries and not one avant-garde.
> Moreover, I don't particular want any anthology--I never use one in class if I can avoid it. I go with David Antin's quip that anthologies are to poets like the zoo to animals.
>
> 2) However--for those who do want to construct anthologies or reanimate the canon (which has never been my sport--I hate the canon debates and think they're a great distraction from real issues), you might as well be upfront and define your own criteria. Clearly, there is no anthology without a principle of selection. So all this talk of reaching out, opening up, caring about others is slightly specious. Reaching out to whom? why? And why not to a million others?

> Enough already!
>
> Marjorie

↑ Index

433. Joseph Lease
Re: once more, deeply disturbed
Mon 17 Mar 1997

PS

my previous post (on the fact of the editor(s)) might sound individualist: I don't think it is (the fact of the editor(s) is cultural and historical thick, specific): probable more honestly aware of materialist cultural critique than most soi-disant principles of selection: that (speaking of the phrase soi-disant, which Ashbery supposedly once used, as in the soi-disant NY School): reminds me of why (apart from that old past/present dichotomy) the NY School often seems more theoretically sophisticated than the langpo discourse

↑ Index

434. michael corbin
Re: once more, deeply disturbed aka 'raised in captivity'
Mon 17 Mar 1997

George Bowering wrote:
>
> >. I go with David Antin's quip that anthologies are to > >>poets like the zoo to animals.
> >>
> >
> >I've been thinking about this. One strong defence of Zoos is educational.
>
> Yes, maybe, but what do the poor creatures learn?

Well they no doubt, along with their zoo-keepers (the reflective ones anyway), contemplate oblivion. Oblivion being that idee-maitresse (not just metaphysical star-dust, mind you) in this one of the single greatest periods of species extinction in the history of the planet. That means now.

So go homo sapiens-sapiens to the zoo and peer side-long into that post-evolutionary abyss.

But then again, I suppose, oblivion is not always pedegogically efficacious; so, indeed, what do the poor creatures (the reflective ones anyway) . . . learn.

mc

↑ Index

435. Joseph Lease
Re: Getting more disturbed
Mon 17 Mar 1997

>
> The emerging consensus, a sort of Rodney King line ("can't we all just get > along?") is phrased in Robert's post by saying he likes both Perelman and > Heaney. Similar dunciations of party-lineism can be found with increasing > frequency; in Rasula's fabulous Wax Museum book, someone is quoted in a > footnote as stating a similar warning on this listserv. (I have the book > next to me, but can't find the reference right now.)
>
> I have great sympathy with this; I also feel that the new consensus is > rising to dominance without as much discussion as I'd like...That was why > I posted about five days ago, pointing out in very simplistic terms the > two (now quite old) contemporary nonmainstream paradigms. The one opposed > to get-alongism can be articulated, as I pointed out, in a sharply > left-political way, as in classic LangPo theory; i.e. Seamus Heaney (or > Amy Clampitt, or Philip Levine, or Adrienne Rich) work with form in such a > way as to deaden the sensibility of readers, whereas more challenging > formal work can empower by demanding that the reader become an active > co-creator of culture, polity, of the world she lives in. I also have > great sympathy with this argument, which gets pushed aside without enuff > thought if we simply agree to have broad tastes.
> >
> Mark Prejsnar
> Atlanta
>
absolutely yes: the above could make a gorgeous manifesto for the activist awareness of form, formal severity, beauty, discovery, play--

↑ Index

436. Ira Lightman
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Is there a term that's the equivalent of literacy for consciousness?

So that an empathetic consciousness, able to play and be open, is "literate", and this "literacy" is more important, more a priority for the kind of moralistic educationalist approach one finds in many postings on this thread (or that is expected in halls of learning)?

Isn't literacy a secondary priority to, for example, raising consciousness that we don't kill each other and hurt each other and needlessly miss our opportunities for synergy with each other (human synergy in action, or what we may call caritas)?

What is the bad that results from literary narrowmindedness, or formal conservatism in writing?

Can formal conservatism, or even illiteracy, sometimes be the lynchpin of a kind person; and to rattle it is to lose the kind person, a destablising which can be like brainwashing?

(:i.e. the person who's been rattled, by one's negative dialectic, can either go back to where they were through amnesia, or to acceeding to the brainwasher's line: don't very few go on to the independence of mind that is assumed as the point of education, yet is rarely achieved?)

Cannot speech be seen as what's trying to come through the writing, and a kind of consciousness-literacy of a speech community be coming though?

Could this consciousness-raising be being impeded by literacy education, our premium on it, and should itself be impeded?

Is the argument against impeding literacy education the need to have information written down where it can be debated, i.e. law, because without writing you could not challenge leaders in a speech community?

Then, has writing helped us challenge leaders?

I chime most with Fiona Templeton's post:

> "And that much as we may like messing about in the > matter of our art, doesn't "aesthetic" become > limited to pretty reshuffle or stylistic > look-alike if that poetic matter isn't a vehicle for > being able to see anew in all senses? My terms > aren't rigorous here either, I just think > the question is important...."

And these were my other questions.

Ira Lightman

↑ Index

437. Mark Prejsnar
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Joe--- Yes, I think what you say below (and in the rest of your post) is very on target...A number of folks have posted comments saying that not rejecting and despising "mainstream" verse does not preclude critiquing it, engaging in qualifications and debate, etc., and I think those points are in the same spirit as your call for a dissensus...

I was beginning to feel impatient for someone to point to a form that such a critique-with-respect might take; I feel that Marjorie and Chris S. kind of began to answer that, by getting very concrete in their debate over "Diving into the Wreck." Lots of kudos are due to them, for a good well-focused debate and for turning our discussion somewhat in a more concrete direction.

Mark Prejsnar
Atlanta

On Mon, 17 Mar 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> btw, i like that you're foregrounding the 'consensus' position in such > terms---thanx!... i think, in order to continue to turn these conflicts > over & over, we'll probably have to agree that it's not a 'consensus' folks > are after exactly, except as to our willingness to turn these conflicts > over & over!... i mean, the problem is more that certain positions get > drowned out, certain aesthetics go unanswered (and unquestioned), than that > we don't "agree" (or even "agree to disagree") about same... so it's really > more of a dissensus i'm seeking, anyway---which is to say that some 'we' > recognizes that there ARE actually controversies, regardless the direction > one turns...

>
> best,
>
> joe

↑ Index

438. Steven Clay
Granary Books reception
Mon 17 Mar 1997

We're having a reception for current Granary Books publications to which I'd like to invite poetics list recipients in the New York City area.
Copy for the announcement follows.
Best,
Steve Clay

_____

Come to Granary and see these new, fairly new and in-progress books:

New
'Kin', text by Anne Waldman & drawings by Susan Rothenberg

'Funagainstawake', Harry Reese's monotypes in dialogue with "The Ten Thunderclaps" from 'Finnegans Wake'

'Mettle', poem by Kimberly Lyons & images by Ed Epping

Fairly New
'Little Orphan Anagram', a collaboration by Susan Bee & Charles Bernstein

'Ligeia', Robert Creeley's first libretto with a set design drawing by Alex Katx

'A Flower Like A Raven', poems by Kurt Schwitters translated by Jerome Rothenberg & drawings by Barbara Fahrner

'The Word Made Flesh', a facsimile edition of an artists' book by Johanna Drucker

'The Book, Spiritual Instrument', a collection of writings, pictures & interviews approaching the "ethnopoetics" of the book, edited by Jerome Rothenberg & David Guss

In-Progress
'Vulva's Morphia', images and writings by Carolee Schneemann

'If It Rained Here', Julie Harrison's digital images & Joe Elliot's modular poems

'Ted Berrigan: An Annotated Checklist', compiled by Aaron Fischer with an introduction by Lewis Warsh. Contains "new work"-seldom seen literary pictures made around 1970 in collaboration with George Schneeman

On display will be all of the above as well as selections from Aaron Fischer's legendary Ted Berrigan collection.
Many (but not all) of the writers and artists will be present.

Friday March 21, 1997 5-7 PM

Granary Books 568 Broadway (corner of Prince) #403
New York, NY 10012 [redacted] / [redacted]

↑ Index

439. by way of BETH LEE SIMON <[redacted]>" <[redacted]>
Call for abs: forum on deixis
Mon 17 Mar 1997

If you were unable to read it before, here it is again--thanks to Charles Bernstein.

CALL FOR ABSTRACTS/PROPOSALS for a two-session forum

STUDIES IN DEIXIS: WORKING THE MARGINS OF PRAGMATICS AND SEMANTICS

for the Midwest Modern Language Association Meeting,
Chicago, November 6-8, 1997, Ramada Congress Hotel

Abstracts are being accepted for "Studies in Deixis: Working the Margins of Pragmatics and Semantics." The multidimensionality of deixis, a linguistic phenomenon at the heart of communication, remains one of the most intriguing aspects of human language. It is impossible to imagine communication that functions without deixis. Deictic elements such as pronouns, demonstrative adjectives, and spatial or temporal adverbs, express a user-centered perspective on time, place and person relationships in the social context of an utterance; simultaneously, they denote formal grammatical functions within an utterance. The aim of the forum is to bring together scholars working on different aspects of deixis--from formal linguistics to stylistics--to discuss the activity that occurs at the intersection of language and reality/structure and function. Publication of the proceedings is planned.

Abstracts/proposals should be a maximum of 150 words in length and must be received by Friday, April 4, 1997.

Send abstracts (e-mail preferred) to:

Beth Lee Simon, Dept. of English and Linguistics
IPFW, Fort Wayne, IN 46805
[redacted]
fax: [redacted]

and/or

Anna Fellegy, Department of English, 207 Lind Hall, #185, University of Minnesota, Minneapolis MN 55455
[redacted]

↑ Index

440. Joe Safdie

Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.

Mon 17 Mar 1997

On Mon, 17 Mar 1997, Mark Prejsnar wrote (in part):

> The emerging consensus, a sort of Rodney King line ("can't we all just get along?") is phrased in Robert's post by saying he likes both Perelman and Heaney. Similar dunciations of party-lineism can be found with increasing frequency; in Rasula's fabulous Wax Museum book, someone is quoted in a footnote as stating a similar warning on this listserv. (I have the book next to me, but can't find the reference right now.)
>
> I have great sympathy with this; I also feel that the new consensus is rising to dominance without as much discussion as I'd like...That was why I posted about five days ago, pointing out in very simplistic terms the two (now quite old) contemporary nonmainstream paradigms. The one opposed to get-alongism can be articulated, as I pointed out, in a sharply left-political way, as in classic LangPo theory; i.e. Seamus Heaney (or Amy Clampitt, or Philip Levine, or Adrienne Rich) work with form in such a way as to deaden the sensibility of readers, whereas more challenging formal work can empower by demanding that the reader become an active co-creator of culture, polity, of the world she lives in. I also have great sympathy with this argument, which gets pushed aside without enuff thought if we simply agree to have broad tastes.

to which Joseph Lease responded:

> absolutely yes: the above could make a gorgeous manifesto for the activist awareness of form, formal severity, beauty, discovery, play--

I've loved reading manifestos ever since I first started getting interested in this biz, which, for me, was William Blake and the English Dept., circa 1971 or so.

Blake, as some of us might remember, thought that a good fight had the great virtue of clearing the air -- "without Contraries there's no Progression" -- and thus provocative positions (ANY provocative positions) might help us think through exactly what we feel about the issue at hand. Shelley's (and Sidney's) "Defense(s) of Poetry," Pound's "Three Don'ts," Olson's "Projective Verse," Silliman's "The New Sentence" -- these are all contentious manifestos, demanding response and articulation, not just a lukewarm "Yes but I like Robert Service too" (fill in the blank). So I applaud Mark's post here, and Dodie's earlier one, to the effect that we can and should be arguing different principles of poetics on this list -- with "respect" of course -- and beware of premature synthesis. I mean, what's a poetics list for? Hopefully poetics informs the work (which, by the way, is the OTHER thing we see too little of here! and thanks to Henry and Alan/Jennifer for that); sometimes it's just a necessary clearing of the ground before the work, sometimes it has nothing to do with the work! But, hopefully it has some kind of wit, style, humor, intelligence, i.e. "value" of its own. So, that said . . .

. . . I have a lot of difficulties with the premise that Mark and Joseph advance above. Apologies in advance to the avant-garde gods -- I certainly wouldn't want to be seen as "conventional" -- but for me, Creeley's ancient dictum that Olson takes up in "Projective Verse" solved a lot of problems. That is, CONTENT (however defined) has to start the process -- something is the world is perceived (or "apperceived," as Whitehead would say) -- and this "thing" then creates its own form, which could be endlessly mutable and random, or could be a sonnet. Starting with an idea of form, for me, trivializes the work -- it brings in too many ancillary considerations, it provides work for academics (!), it ultimately deflects attention from the WORK, itself. We follow, if we do, a poem, or book of poems, through to the end because we're momentarily entranced, we want to know what happens, we feel it's important for our lives, that our lives in fact can't proceed until we finish the poem -- yes, of course we help create the meaning as we read, of course we're active participants, but that doesn't arise as a consequence of FORM, it arises because there's something there that preceded the form, that has demanded to be articulated in (yes) just this form, in just this way. (Was it Duncan that said "out of deep need"?)

In other words, it's not an exercise.

So arguing about traditional forms versus post-modernist forms, Rich versus Harryman, etc., I don't know, I just don't see it. A poem "works" -- or not -- for other reasons.

But of course I welcome critique . . .

↑ Index

441. Joseph Lease
Re: form
Mon 17 Mar 1997

one problem with conversations about form and innovation is the desire for caricature:

it is not precise to say traditional equals conservative:

and:

it is not precise to say traditional does not equal conservative:

so many are suggesting that we start with innovative/traditional with regard to what and why:

and those thick specific descriptions can be starting points:

re: why reach out and to whom?: well, if I may sound Black Mountain (please let me):

the particulars of the poem generate the poet's need to reach out: for example Duncan felt he needed to reach out to George Herbert and what would it have meant to say no that is conservative

↑ Index

442. Robert Archambeau
Disturbed Tree/Contraries
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Joe Safdie wrote (of Pound, Olson, others):

> these are all contentious manifestos, demanding response > and articulation, not just a lukewarm "Yes but I like Robert Service too"

Before I get cast as the Pat Boone of poetic blandness, smiling sweetly in my white bucks, let me say this: what I've said is not that we should appreciate all poetries equally everywhere and always, nor is it that we should simply play nice -- what I've been asking for is an investigation of the plurality of tastes. That is, if someone out there can both assent to Perelman's or Olson's or Pound's dicta, and still say "yes but I like Robert Service too" (a low blow, that, makes me sound unbelievably sniveling) -- what is at work in this person's act of distinction? What work do these (apparently contradictory) aesthetic commitments involve, in a particular context? What I've been asking for is an exploration of this kind.

Dan -- thanks for:

> I think your post Mark, while articulating your position well, misses

> Robert's point. I saw no such pat homile (could be the name of a c&w poet) as 'can't we all just get along'. Rather a discussion of the different values of other less 'experimental' poetries.

Robert Archambeau

↑ Index

443. amato

Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread

Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

eric, i think one way to institutionalize things in constructive ways is to consider turning a certain amount of responsibility over to students... to ask students to take an equal share of responsibility in their own educations... how this plays out in particular classrooms will vary... but in general, when i use a term like "student-centered," i mean instructors learning to let go some... learning to construct courses in which, for example, students have a hand in constructing "assignments"... which, btw, is not what is meant, generally --- as i'm sure you know --- when admins use the term (what they mean is that students are now, as consumers, entitled to "excellence" in education --- entitled, that is, to the sort of education that corporations expect of good consumers)...

i hope this doesn't sound like a dodge on my part, as an instructor... i'm willing to accept responsibility --- i just can't be held completely responsible for a desire to learn... albeit i can be responsible for creating an environment in which such desire --- its absence or presence, its type and degree of presence --- is an accessible, active part of a course (or discourse)...

i have much in sympathy with the left here in general, and not with the right, insofar as what my ultimate agenda is (a sloppy version would be something like 'helping to build a better world' --- which includes the world of education, mself)... but certainly there are abuses of instructional authority on both the left AND the right --- if we take "left" and "right" to mean where our more specific political sympathies lie... once some folks get to lording it over others, they become real dictators --- no matter their party loyalties... of course, "lording it over" varies in terms of amount of institutional sanction rec'd... a "strict" prof is often viewed positively --- esp. by 'advanced' students in the sciences (believe me) --- but if the prof is strict about inculcating the "masterpieces" of "world lit," she will probably face fewer problems from the admin and from students than if she's strict about theorizing the nature of the educational process itself... sad to say, more functional, consumer-oriented types are likely to regard this latter as mere navel-gazing...

best,

joe

↑ Index

444. Joseph Lease

Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.

Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

my whole point is that form is not an exercise: that it must be a discovery and must embody a real need

also I don't think (I'm writing a bit fast this morning) that those were the paragraphs from Mark's post that I included in mine

On Mon, 17 Mar 1997, Joe Safdie wrote:

> On Mon, 17 Mar 1997, Mark Prejsnar wrote (in part):
>
> The emerging consensus, a sort of Rodney King line ("can't we all just get along?") is phrased in Robert's post by saying he likes both Perelman and Heaney. Similar dunciations of party-lineism can be found with increasing frequency; in Rasula's fabulous Wax Museum book, someone is quoted in a footnote as stating a similar warning on this listserv. (I have the book next to me, but can't find the reference right now.)
>
> I have great sympathy with this; I also feel that the new consensus is rising to dominance without as much discussion as I'd like...That was why I posted about five days ago, pointing out in very simplistic terms the two (now quite old) contemporary nonmainstream paradigms. The one opposed to get-alongism can be articulated, as I pointed out, in a sharply left-political way, as in classic LangPo theory; i.e. Seamus Heaney (or Amy Clampitt, or Philip Levine, or Adrienne Rich) work with form in such a way as to deaden the sensibility of readers, whereas more challenging formal work can empower by demanding that the reader become an active co-creator of culture, polity, of the world she lives in. I also have great sympathy with this argument, which gets pushed aside without enuff thought if we simply agree to have broad tastes.
>
> to which Joseph Lease responded:
>
> absolutely yes: the above could make a gorgeous manifesto for the activist awareness of form, formal severity, beauty, discovery, play--
>
> I've loved reading manifestos ever since I first started getting interested in this biz, which, for me, was William Blake and the English Dept., circa 1971 or so. Blake, as some of us might remember, thought that a good fight had the great virtue of clearing the air -- "without Contraries there's no Progression" -- and thus provocative positions (ANY provocative positions) might help us think through exactly what we feel about the issue at hand. Shelley's (and Sidney's) "Defense(s) of Poetry," Pound's "Three Don'ts," Olson's "Projective Verse," Silliman's "The New Sentence" -- these are all contentious manifestos, demanding response and articulation, not just a lukewarm "Yes but I like Robert Service too" (fill in the blank). So I applaud Mark's post here, and Dodie's earlier one, to the effect that we can and should be arguing different principles of poetics on this list -- with "respect" of course -- and beware of premature synthesis. I mean, what's a poetics list for? Hopefully poetics informs the work (which, by the way, is the OTHER thing we see too little of here! and thanks to Henry and Alan/Jennifer for that); sometimes it's just a necessary clearing of the ground before the work, sometimes it has nothing to do with the work! But, hopefully it has some kind of wit, style, humor, intelligence, i.e. "value" of its own. So, that said . . .

. . . I have a lot of difficulties with the premise that Mark and Joseph advance above. Apologies in advance to the avant-garde gods -- I certainly wouldn't want to be seen as "conventional" -- but for me, Creeley's ancient dictum that Olson takes up in "Projective Verse" solved a lot of problems. That is, CONTENT (however defined) has to start the process -- something is the world is perceived (or "apperceived," as Whitehead would say) -- and this "thing" then creates its own form, which could be endlessly mutable and random, or could be a sonnet. Starting with an idea of form, for me, trivializes the work -- it brings in too many ancillary considerations, it provides work for academics (!), it ultimately deflects attention from the WORK, itself. We follow, if we do, a poem, or book of poems, through to the end because we're momentarily entranced, we want to know what happens, we feel it's important for our lives, that our lives in fact can't proceed until we finish the poem -- yes, of course we help create the meaning as we read, of course we're active participants, but that doesn't arise as a consequence of FORM, it arises because there's something there that preceded the form, that has demanded to be articulated in (yes) just this form, in just this way. (Was it Duncan that said "out of deep need"?)

In other words, it's not an exercise.

So arguing about traditional forms versus post-modernist forms, Rich versus Harryman, etc., I don't know, I just don't see it. A poem "works" -- or not -- for other reasons.

But of course I welcome critique . . .

↑ Index

445. David Kellogg
Form/A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

From James Scully, _Line Break: Poetry as Social Practice_ (Seattle: Bay Press, 1988)

"We need a provisional, intramural history of poetic technique: one that may not explicitly engage the subtler extra-poetic conditions of poetic practice, but that will approach technique(s) historically, dialectically, rather than as a succession of devices or still lifes. The absence of this history is disabling. Writers (not stylists, who are locked in synchronicity) do assume a technical history. Yet in our time there has been no serious attempt to theorize that history. When and where a history appears, it is as an encyclopedia of discrete fragments and arbitrary givens: a catalog of forms in space. The reasons why there is no such history are many and complex. For instance, even my generalizations about technique are based on the unarticulated technical history that informs, _and is a consequence of_, my own technical practice. There is no metahistorical source of illumination or (re)construction. I understand and reconstitute past technical practices by the light of my own practice (itself 'born' among untheorized absorptions), but that's all any writer does. The point is, this discussion must take place in a primitive half-light. We haven't even begun to _desire_ a shared understanding of what it is that we have been doing. Or why. There is no Darwin or Marx of poetry. Not even a Lévi-Strauss. Poetic technique, like a de rigueur dead saint, is shrouded in more mist than the relations of (economic) production ever were."

Cheers,
David

~~~
~~~

446. groberts
zoothology
Mon 17 Mar 1997

The zoo-nalogy has never really persuaded me and the more I think about it the more I am troubled by its implicit organicism. On the face of it, the comparison seems to depend on the idea of representativeness: two polar bears, two poems by x. Poems, however, are not individuals but always exist in multiple states, whereas polar bears are both unique entities and members of a reproductive and ecological class. Sure, both poems and polar bears originate in situations which zoos and anthologies cannot hope to replicate; but the being of bears is altered, probably for the worse, and I do not think of poetry as having the kind of ontological status which can be distorted in that way. Of course, anthologies which aim for representativeness carve up a poem, the work of a poet or of a group, in ways which are usually unsatisfactory to those who are devoted to the uncarved texts and contexts. But when Duncan in "Ideas of the Meaning of Forms" appeals to his "immediate concerns in living" and to "inner need" as justifications for Allen's anthology-groups, he dismisses the possibility of reconfiguring the poetry of his contemporaries in ways other than that which is dependent on his private understanding of his own social network. This network colludes with his poetics of forms, and in the context of an anthology substitutes for it. The collusion is ultimately a kind of organicism which like the zoo analogy is nostalgic for the unbroken body and its radiating concentric textual affiliations. Anthologies can do a better or worse job of sampling poets; to repudiate such sampling I think requires more than a clever quip. I think anthologies can help re-frame poems in ways which are responsible to contexts but which do not make essential claims for definitive representation; they can serve the end of promoting poetry when understood as provisional collections, works in progress. They should never serve as an evasion of the work of discovering and questioning principles of selection, but instead should be an invitation to do so, which is only what we have been stating or suggesting. Comparison to zoos rests on questionable premises.

Gary R

↑ Index

447. Demian
Re: form
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Christopher Alexander wrote:
"what does it mean to "respect", let alone "support"

writers whose works I don't have any interest to
read, even if we all "have an interest in" them?"."

"Respect" and "support" of course are completely different things from "like", "admire" or even "advocate".

To respect a work implies an understanding of the poetics which underpins it. If you can understand what impells a poem or poetry, see the logic and agree that the logic is sound, I think you have a degree of respect, and the potential for support; whereas if you see the logic and feel it is flawed in any way, there is unlikely to be any respect and this certaintly precludes support.

You can have a language of respect without liking, admiring or advocating, but I don't believe you can do so without an interest. It should not be a given that it is necessary to respect or support for any given writing, but this doesn't rule out having an open-minded interest to begin with.

↑ Index

448. aerialedge
Stepping Razor by A.L. Nielsen
Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

announcing publication of

Stepping Razor

by A.L.Nielsen

"What Bogart was to crime-flicks, Nielsen is to postmodern poetry--a conscience and a court-jester by turns. Rueful comedy, at once spacey and rigorous, very funny. Read this book if it's the first thing you do." --David Bromige

"The poetry of Aldon Nielsen is marked by rare insight, which penetrates the invisible moments of our daily peregrenations." --Will Alexander

co-published by Edge Books & Upper Limit

64 pages, perfectbound paperback cover art by Laura Wilber

$10 postpaid

Orders to:

Edge Books
POBox 25642
Washington, DC 20007

other Edge Books available, all prices postpaid:
Errata 5uite by Joan Retallack, $8.

Asbestos by Wayne Kline, $6.
the julia set by Jean Donnelly, $4.
Dogs by Phyllis Rosenzweig, $5.
Cusps by Chris Stroffolino, $2.50.
World Prefix by Harrison Fisher, $4.
On Your Knees, Citizen: A Collection of "Prayers" for the "Public" [Schools] ed. Rod Smith, Lee Ann Brown, & Mark Wallace, $6.
Aerial 8: Barrett Watten ed. Rod Smith, $14.95.
Aerial 6/7 featuring John Cage, ed. Rod Smith, $15.

checks payable to Aerial/Edge.

thanks.

↑ Index

449. Miekal And
Re: Disturbance in the Field
Mon 17 Mar 1997

You trust David with your grad students?

Miekal

↑ Index

450. DS
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

> This brings up losts of interesting stuff....I see some good points to this critique, but...First off, it simply takes it for granted that form need not be discussed;

No it doesn't. I believe strongly form should be discussed, but don't expect everyone to have to discuss it before I will talk with them, hell i go to all kinds of movies, but i make a special effort when i feel there is something of quality or groundbreaking (& i don't mean just in special effects) value. I feel the same about poetry.

, I think it muddies things >quite a bit to conflate Olson and various more recent practitioners in a >vague way with a somewhat fuzzy "early marxism." The various >political/poetical formulations at issue here are more carefully worked >out, in many cases, than to deserve that!

I was trying not to do that, my point was more 'in its non-participation with many it is claiming to be political for'...

I am in no way questioning your activism & empathise with your feelings below. Yours,

dan

> My own practice on the left, as an activist, for 25 years, makes me VERY wary of folks questioning my beliefs, on the grounds that by being militant I'm forcing my values on some (less empowered) other; that is almost always the argument of the right against the left, in my opinion. My answer, which I feel is accurate, is: this is my struggle, I'm fighting it for me, and for others who I'm in solidarity with; ain't tryng to force anything on anyone;....and mutatis mutanda that applies here.
>
> Mark Prejsnar
> Atlanta

↑ Index

451. DS

In the disturbed tree

Mon 17 Mar 1997

I think your post Mark, while articulating your position well, misses Robert's point. I saw no such pat homile (could be the name of a c&w poet) as 'can't we all just get along'. Rather a discussion of the different values of other less 'experimental' poetries.

The point i made earlier about old marxist politics - i think is partly reflected in your statement below. My question is - What good left wing politics if the only time you think they are valid in poetry is when linked up with 'language' poetry. Surely politics is about change, and for change you need to reach those people who make change, or pull to gether enough to shout loud enough. So Walcott, Heaney, Rich etc are written off as not adressing adequately questions of language.

So their poetry is not of your taste... I think you can articulate that without dismissing their value to the THOUSANDS of lesser committed poetry participants who glean at least a little political empathy - be that gender, race or colonial issues from their accessible populist art.

I am just aware that many talented, educated non-White poetry readers i have come accross dismiss langpo as WHITE & elitist. While i do not think this a fair accusation & argue my case for langpo frequently, there exists a strong distrust - and you have to admit that on the surface it is a white movement.

I am aware of the necessary value of langpo politics - but what good from sitting on the top of a hill & never going down to drink with other folk & by this action never making them feel welcome in your turf.

Dan Salmon

> two (now quite old) contemporary nonmainstream paradigms. The one opposed to get-alongism can be articulated, as I pointed out, in a sharply left-political way, as in classic LangPo theory;

↑ Index

452. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Joe Safdie--- I hope none of us are quite in favor of "starting with form," so that we have no interest in actual human experience!! But please remember that many a Richard Wilbur fan will look at some of the following and say, there is no real human experience there, it's only about form (I know, because I've had it happen in conversation more than once):

Finnegans Wake
The Kingfishers
Spicer anything by Zukofsky, practically Rene Char
Mac Low
Joe Ceravolo

Now, I can't speak for anyone else, but that's a pretty basic reading-list of some works that have shaped me, and that I don't think anyone should consider beyond the pale, too lacking in contact with human experience. When I speak of nonmainstream wrk, that's the ground level from which I assume we're building....Is that a group of poets and works too preoccupied only with form??!!! Yee gods!

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

453. Susan Wheeler
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

Thanks, Eric, for bringing some of these points back to teaching & its responsibility. There's the rub, eh?

> What strikes me as odd in all this is a kind of elision in any pedagogy in that no one seems to talk about what we think we're doing as teachers. I.e., what the goal of teaching is? This usually gets worked out in terms of a dialectic, unquestioned, of indocrination or improvement.

I can only speak in personal terms, and this trope of improvement is necessary to these terms: I can only hope that they are better for the experience after putting in the hours. But by better I mean that they are considering more alternatives, making more conscious choices, questioning their assumptions, understanding a larger dimension (political/ethical/etc.) in these choices and assumptions.

I try to do this in a workshop by giving them a huge breadth of "poetics" texts (journalism as well as theory, and from throughout the 20th century terrain). Because I feel I'm not much of a talker I have never felt comfortable with holding forth, and I still have not found an adequate way of questioning the entire (learned, albeit invested) approach to poetry on the part of a student. I also always begin discussion of a student poem by asking what operations it's employing, as a way of orienting us to it, rather than vice versa and running the risk of skewing all work just to please my own aesthetic/politics. But by reading all of these questioning texts, students generally begin to raise a lot of the bigger issues, and perhaps 80% of the time begin to question themselves, too, before the other students get the chance. They give each other material on a lot of structure aspects (space, metrics, traditional forms, etc.), and here too I supplement with many sides of various arguments around what appears to them at first glance as cut-and-dry "purely formal" approaches. I'm more like an indulgent mom that I want to admit: I don't ever assign them say a sonnet, but I like them to have the whole array, the whole toy chest, at their disposal. What I do give are a lot of throwaway in-class exercises (chance, etc.) to help melt the deep-freeze both graduate and undergraduate writers can lock into when honing this kind of ambivalence about every "speech act."

In an institutional framework, how do we avoid >teaching institutionalization?

Included in the texts I make them read are a lot of critiques of an academic context for poetry. Students usually come in after reading these impatient with the whole kit&kaboodle, and keen on altering the idea of a workshop. Once again undermining the teacher/writer spell is a big relief to me.

The biggest tangle in this though, privately, is that sometimes I leave a classroom feeling more like a resource room than the kind of critical guide I learned so much from by working against in my own edification. To counteract this, I comment and steer a great deal individually, ever bracketing with my own bias. It often feels ridiculously labyrinthine, this hobbled process o.

Someone noted a week back or so Simon Frith's piece on "value" in the Chronicle of Higher Education 3/14. He wrote that students "should have to think about evaluation and why it matters," but the only example he can offer his participation in a UK jury that awards a music prize and its agreeing that "our decision would be determined not by vote but by persuasion." This conjures articulate defenders of abysmal poems, in the classroom, dissuading other students from their good questions. In truth, I admit, I do judge some poems abysmal, and do my best to explore those good questions.

No doubt this has been discussed ad infinitum in years past on this list and it's been skirted since I signed on (I remember some helpful postings from Dodie), but as someone who went through no MFA mill except now to teach in one, ideas on teaching in an era of etherized value would be much, much appreciated.

Susan W.

↑ Index

454. Christopher Alexander contracted SUNY
Mon 17 Mar 1997

["pause for a brief inquiry"]:
I heard last night that SUNY profs, with all negotiations stalled, have been working 9 months without a contract. is this true?!
I admit that I don't always follow the list so closely, but surely I would have heard about it here?

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc. / nominative press collective
[redacted] / **********

forthcoming in march: _constellation voice_ by linda russo

↑ Index

455. amato
Re: Form/A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

ah david, thanx for that!... how's the rest of that book?...

this is why (and where) the question of poetry opens to that of technology... i would think it impossible to discuss "technique" without reference to what's been going on in history of science/history of technology, and for that matter, without reference to broader sociocultural trends in the workplace and elsewhere (and texts which have plumbed, again, that "lit-sci" interface)... of course poets have, depending on the poet, been more or less attuned to such developments...

best,

joe

↑ Index

456. Tenney Nathanson
for those in the neighborhood (Antin talk piece)
Mon 17 Mar 1997

For those in or around Tucson, or likely to be on the day before Easter:

David Antin is going to be doing a talk piece, "yesterday tomorrow today."

saturday, March 29, at 10 a.m.

In the ahem "Swede" Johnson Building (Foundation/Alumni Building) on NW corner of Speedway & Cherry (1111 N Cherry). In the "Dining Room" (it's a BIG dining room). Free, and free eats (modest).

David will be appearing as part of the Arizona Quarterly Symposium, which runs Th the 27th through Sat the 29th.

Others appearing: Ed Dryden (on Melville), Susan Griffin (on James), Pat O'Donnell (on Mailer), Judith Roof (on "Perverse Viewing: Eve Arden and the Bliss of the Secondary"); Don Pease (on Jack London).

I can post or backchannel a full schedule if anyone is interested.

There's also a big bash on Saturday night.

Hope to see some of you there.

best

Tenney

---

tenney nathanson

[redacted]

http://www.u.arizona.edu/~nathanso/

↑ Index

457. Christopher Alexander

Re: form/"deeply disturbed" (incestuous dub mix)

Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

thanks for a good & serious response, demian.
I like your thoughts on "respect", though honestly
I think the poetic logic which informs some of the work I (& others) mentioned is flawed; & as much sympathy as I may have with the impetus of the work--be that irish nationalism or any of various feminisms or an attempt to increase class consciousness--I am suspicious of much of it on the basis of the subject relations it sets up & the relationship of content to form, which can seem more like language as hand-truck, loaded with pre-determined meaning, than a deep encounter with the medium & its relation to meaning (which, yes, can happen outside of what we here term-- most recently--"innovative" work).

I guess I'm suspicious--though probably not so dismissive as I let on earlier--of a poetry that is primarily attractive to me by means of what it says, the sort of gestalt of political ideas visible through the poem, or which the poem stands for (acts as a representative of), than what the poem itself actually says, i.e., the poem itself as an evolution of meaning as inextricable from form & vice versa. & if I'm not or if I try not to be dismissive of such a poetry, it's more because of my enthusiasm for the kind of social relations of which that poetry partakes-- as with joe amato's mention of poetry that appeals to the experience of vietnam vets, poetry that they can "relate to" directly, or (ever been to a marilyn hacker reading?)--than out of enthusiasm for that poetry. & when I am dismissive, as often I am, it's at least in part because, outside of the immediate social context (i.e., a way of bringing people together physically), I think there's more benefit in reading a good provocative essay or a book which engages those political questions specifically & in detail, than in the usual sort of head-nodding recognition.

I guess, though, that when I asked "what does it mean to respect/support etc", I should have specified that I was thinking in more practical terms, viz., what form, in practice, does this "respect" or "support" take? it's a very fine thing to announce it here ["everybody I love you"], but what is actually being proposed? will we teach these poets? buy their books? read their books? attend their readings? invite them to read with us? I'm not sure I'm willing to do these things. I've read enough of heaney & walcott, for instance, to last me; & enough "hard-hitting" "tell-it-like-it-is" american "poetry of protest" to consider reading more. I own this could be my intolerant streak showing--I do have one. [straight edge = "hate edge"]. but, he asks in a friendly manner, how far, then, or where specifically, do others intend to go?

chris

..
christopher alexander, etc. / nominative press collective
[redacted] / **********

forthcoming in march: _constellation voice_ by linda russo

↑ Index

458. Steven Marks
FC2/BIB funding cuts
Mon 17 Mar 1997

To the list: Publishers Weekly (3/17/97 issue) has a story about how Rep. Pete Hoekstra is calling into question a $25,000 grant to FC2/BIB. He is the chairman of the House Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigation. He says that he is upset by the sexually explicit material which is "an offense to the senses of this Subcomittee and, I would presume, to the taxpayers that have been unwittingly forced to pay for it." (I suppose that explains that curious pain I've been feeling in my shoulder.) He is also questioning a $45,000 grant to the Unit for Contemporary Literature at Illinois State. Seems he is also upset that they are going to use this money to put up a Web site showing their smutty books.

Meanwhile, the university and FC2 have a week to produce requested documentation for the Subcommittee. There goes some of that grant money, but then that's almost certainly the intent.

Story is by Bridget Kinsella. Perhaps Michael Coffey could post the entire article to the list. Not so coincidentally, there is another story on the same page about Wole Soyinka being charged with treason by the Nigerian government. They claim he is connected to a series of bombings of army installations.

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

459. Hugh Steinberg
Re: "deeply disturbed"
Mon 17 Mar 1997

>What is the bad >that results from literary narrowmindedness, or formal >conservatism in writing?
>
Not too much when you just hone in on individual writers writing their individual poems.

But what happens when such narrowminded people sit in positions of authority over other people's writing: editors, teachers, publishers, grant judges, etc. Having experienced more than a few narrowminded editors, teachers, publishers, grant judges, etc., I can say it is wonderful if they like you and you jibe with their tastes, and pretty darn miserable when you don't.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

460. Charles Alexander
in or around tucson?
Mon 17 Mar 1997

At 05:35 PM 3/17/97 -0700, you wrote:
>For those in or around Tucson, or likely to be on the day before Easter:
>
>David Antin is going to be doing a talk piece, "yesterday tomorrow >today."

>
>saturday, March 29, at 10 a.m.

thanks, tenney
and also, for anyone in around or about to visit Tucson:

A POETRY READING & Reception

TOM MANDEL

Sunday, March 23, 7:30 pm
at the Chax Press Studio
101 West Sixth St., no. 6
(enter on west side of warehouse building, the middle of three doors) no admission charge
Call Chax Press at [redacted] for more information

Tom Mandel's book of poetry, Prospect of Release, was recently published by Chax Press.

Tom Mandel was born in Chicago in 1942, the American child of Austrian Jews fleeing Hitler. He was educated in Chicago's public schools and jazz/blues clubs, and at the University of Chicago. He has lived in New York, Paris, and San Francisco, and now resides in Washington DC.

Mandel is the author of ten books of poetry. His first book, Ency (Tuumba, 1978), was a foundational work in th early history of language poetry. Recent books include Four Strange Books (GAZ, 1990), Realism (Burning Deck, 1991), Letters of the Law (Sun & Moon, 1994), Ancestral Cave (Zasterle, 1996), Prospect of Release (Chax, 1996), and, with the late Daniel Davidson, Absence Sensorium (Potes & Poets, 1996).

The poet Ron Silliman says of Prospect of Release, "These are the most intensely felt poems I have ever read."

from Prospect of Release, by Tom Mandel:

Subtle, handsome vanity visits me.
Hands large, fingers long, face modeled and content, a bare spark binding to release, soul dances in the prospect.

Hands drew across his face. None to comfort me but him, and he is gone.
My reverence is modeled on his absence

the absence of his lips and eyes. Dust entered a window behind his head, whirred in a shaft of Autumn light.

Winter light. Silent, a message it did not bear but now suggests, long settled like an issue, election or argument, cleaved rock, or two that never joined.

Light blue and the same red with purple makes a change. It shows that there is no mistake. Any pink shows that and very likely it is reasonable.

Gertrude Stein, from "A Substance In A Cushion," in TENDER BUTTONS
Charles Alexander
Chax Press

[redacted]

↑ Index

461. Charles Alexander
another in tucson
Mon 17 Mar 1997

If you have a chance to be in Tucson on April 12

Saturday, April 12
7pm
Dinnerware Gallery (135 E. Congress in downtown Tucson)

A Reading by

KAREN MAC CORMACK
&
STEVE McCAFFERY

And a celebration of Karen's new book, The Tongue Moves Talk, due out then from Chax Press

Reception in the gallery to follow the reading

This reading will also be taped by KXCI radio and broadcast at a later date. I'll let you know when that will be.

Light blue and the same red with purple makes a change. It shows that there is no mistake. Any pink shows that and very likely it is reasonable.

Gertrude Stein, from "A Substance In A Cushion," in TENDER BUTTONS
Charles Alexander
Chax Press

[redacted]

↑ Index

462. David Kellogg
Re: Form/A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Mon 17 Mar 1997

On Mon, 17 Mar 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> ah david, thanx for that!... how's the rest of that book?...

Damn good, actually. In my view, one of the best books of its kind in recent memory, up there with Silliman's _New Sentence_ tho not nearly so well known. Scully takes his Marxism very seriously, and to good effect. In the essay quoted, he distains what he calls "stylistics" in advocating an approach to form deriving from Macherey and Althusser. Buyt despite that, the prose is never dry.

> this is why (and where) the question of poetry opens to that of technology... i would think it impossible to discuss "technique" without reference to what's been going on in history of science/history of technology, and for that matter, without reference to broader sociocultural trends in the workplace and elsewhere (and texts which have plumbed, again, that "lit-sci" interface)... of course poets have, depending on the poet, been more or less attuned to such developments...

More or less is right.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

meets in Sweeney Hall 348, next to the seventh street garage, at 7:00 P.M. -- If you need directions, call me at [redacted], and leave a number where I can call you back --

also

I'll be in Atlanta for the College Language Association meeting over at Spellman and environs April 16-20 -- Is anybody else on this list headed there this year?

↑ Index

464. shoemakers
Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

re: "the Pat Boone of poetic blandness"--Has anyone else noticed that Pat has undergone some sort of bizarre heavy-metalish makeover? Last time i saw him on the tube he was sporting leather, chest hair, and tattoos (albeit, probably the kind that wash off... steve

↑ Index

465. Christopher Alexander
Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
Mon 17 Mar 1997

> re: "the Pat Boone of poetic blandness"--Has anyone else noticed that > Pat has undergone some sort of bizarre heavy-metalish makeover? Last > time i saw him on the tube he was sporting leather, chest hair, and > tattoos (albeit, probably the kind that wash off...
> steve
mein gott! I miss those smiling white bucks.
chris "spiked with milk" etc
..
christopher alexander, etc. / nominative press collective
[redacted] / **********

forthcoming in march: _constellation voice_ by linda russo

↑ Index

466. clare emily clifford sharon olds.....
Mon 17 Mar 1997

---

i don't think this has been mentioned before but i thought i'd send the news on...

for those interested or in the near area sharon olds will be reading at university of virginia in charlottesville, virginia at one pm on wednesday march 19th and on thursday march 20th at 3pm....

i believe that both readings are going to be the the UVa bookstore...

hope some of you might be able to make it...

smiles,
love and light,
clare emily

'the artist is extremely lucky who is presented with the worst possible ordeal which would not actually kill him...
at that point he's in business...' -john berryman

↑ Index

467. George Bowering

Re: Disturbance in the Field

Tue 18 Mar 1997

> David Bromige will meet with my graduate seminar at San Jose State University on Tuesday night March 18

Glad you alerted us about this. Now, if Bromige claims that I was a co-author of his scabrous unpublished novel _Piccolo Mondo_, I want to go on record as saying I didnt have anything to do with it. In fact, I could not finish reading it. It is not only gratuitously pornographic, but it is also politically insensitive. I wash my hands and declare innocence.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

468. Steven Marks

Re: form/"deeply disturbed" (incestuous dub mix)

Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Mon, 17 Mar 1997, Christopher Alexander wrote:
>
> I guess, though, that when I asked "what does > it mean to respect/support etc", I should have > specified that I was thinking in more practical > terms, viz., what form, in practice, does this > "respect" or "support" take?
> what is actually being proposed?
> will we teach these poets? buy their books?
> read their books? attend their readings? invite > them to read with us?
> he asks in a friendly manner, how far, then, or > where specifically, do others intend to go?
>
A very large question to which I can give only this small answer. As a reviewer of nonmainstream poetry, I try not only to place reviews with the magazines and reviews which serve this group (I know these are all very general terms, but I'm trying to be brief), but with more mainstream journals as well. I only review what I enjoy and fully understand so my reviews are written more from a descriptive than evaluative perspective. This, I think, helps readers unfamiliar with innovative poetry to find a thread which they can follow. I don't how "far" this goes but I hope that it is supportive.

cheers,
Steven (proud winner of the Golden Shamrock Award)

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

469. Jocelyn Emerson

Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries

Tue 18 Mar 1997

> re: "the Pat Boone of poetic blandness"--Has anyone else noticed that Pat has undergone some sort of bizarre heavy-metalish makeover? Last time i saw him on the tube he was sporting leather, chest hair, and > tattoos (albeit, probably the kind that wash off...

> steve

Yes, apparently he did this as a joke for some TV music awards thing, but it got him in a hell of a lot of trouble with his Christian TV audience for his daily sunday program (somewhere) and apparently, in thinking about the censorship he's gotten from that audience, he's rethinking some of his more doctrinal assumptions about appearance vs. reality, and humour. A happy ending.

Jocelyn Emerson

↑ Index

470. F.A. Templeton
Re: Blarnes oeuvre
Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Sun, 16 Mar 1997, Henry Gould wrote:

> Has anyone read the poetry (early, especially) of Eric Blarnes? Controversial

Henry, where is it to be found?

Fiona

↑ Index

471. F.A. Templeton
Re: Blarnes oeuvre
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Henry, You got me. But what else do you know about 30s anglo-indian poets?

Fiona

↑ Index

472. Michael Boughn
Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Joe wrote:

> Apologies in advance to the avant-garde gods -- I certainly > wouldn't want to be seen as "conventional" -- but for me, Creeley's > ancient dictum that Olson takes up in "Projective Verse" solved a lot of > problems. That is, CONTENT (however defined) has to start the process --
>
> . . . Starting with an idea > of form, for me, trivializes the work -- it brings in too many ancillary > considerations, it provides work for academics (!), it ultimately deflects > attention from the WORK, itself. . .

> that doesn't arise as a consequence of FORM, it arises because there's something there that preceded the form, that has demanded to be articulated in (yes) just this form, in just this way. (Was it Duncan that said "out of deep need"?)
>
> A poem "works" -- or not -- for other reasons.

Isn't your "(however defined)" precisely the issue, Joe? You can read the Creeley at least two ways, one of which blurs into a kind of sloppy Platonic dualism, the other of which sees these two domains (of thinking?--is this an ontological problem--or a taxonomic one?) to be immanent each within the other. And it is important to keep in mind (as someone--I think Professor Perloff--pointed out) that form is NOT rhymes and quantities, but--what?--a kind of thinking? (your "work"?).

After reading a hundred books of poems for an omnibus review for University of Tornto Quarterly, I was sharply reminded of what both Olson and Creeley were concerned to get away from--that self-satisfied display of the poet's skill (at doing what's been done). It doesn't really matter, finally, whether the device is the perfect metaphor or the perfect syntagmatic distortion. The YAWN is the same.

YES to the Duncan (tho now I think maybe it's originally Pound), but is there any way to separate that "need" from what you're calling "form"?

Contrarily,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

473. Michael Boughn deep need
Tue 18 Mar 1997

No, what a dummy I am, it's Zukofsky:

> Out of deep need > four trombones
> and the organ in the nave something like that, but definitely Zukofsky. Tho I'll bet Duncan wished he'd said it.

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

474. Henry Gould formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Once again, I find all the talk about "formal innovation" and "challenging the reader" vs. "manipulating the reader" with "conventional rhyme and meter" set in a "political" context of "radical" and "conservative"

to be pure unadulterated

yimmer-yammer &

hogwash.

I refer you all to Baudelaire, Villon, or recent hip-hop "breakthroughs". I refer you to Edgar Poe & Valery. I refer you to Whitman's constancy, his readable expressiveness. I donate you to Emily, if you dare stand in the same room with her.

You are still living among the tombs of John Crowe Ransom & pals, the 1950s and Wilbur's (and Ashbery's, and Lowell's, and Rich's, and Ginsburg's & all dat generation's) SLEEP. And they snore on the veritable edge, the periphery, the surface, the shim, the slag, the nothing, of what poetry is all about. Your idea of "conservative form" is not even THE BEGINNING of what it's about.

I will allow all manner of bravery and daring and innovation - but I will judge by results - the impact of the whole thing. Show me something found and won - not something mumbled and put-over, and justified as "experimental." - Henry Gould

↑ Index

475. Gwyn McVay
Re: Disturbed Tree/Contraries
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Hey. Hey. Let's not stereotype Pat Boone either. His rendition of Alice Cooper's "No More Mr. Nice Guy" on the new album of the same title is, well, really something.

Gwyn

↑ Index

476. Mark Wallace
pre-determined form in the avant garde
Tue 18 Mar 1997

I've been following this mini-thread about form as exploratory or predetermined with some interest, and I did want to point out that there is, in fact, quite a bit of interesting avant garde poetry that works with certain elements of pre-determined form. The non-intentional methods of Jackson Mac Low, for instance, have often used a variety of pre-determined mathematical, computer, and other techniques to shape the form of his poems, and indeed much of his work revolves around such structures. Similar examples--Silliman's use of Fibonacci sequences in, I believe, Tjanting (I'm at work--no books in front of me), Tina Darragh's use of the dictionary. Given time, I could probably come up with more--but I've got no time this morning.

In any case, the relation between exploratory and pre-determined form is quite complex--in some cases, predetermined forms of various types and degrees can certainly be exploratory and about discovery.

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

477. Christopher Alexander
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

henry wrrrr:
> Once again, I find all the talk about "formal innovation" and "challenging > the reader" vs. "manipulating the reader" with "conventional rhyme and meter" > set in a "political" context of "radical" and "conservative" I'd agree with your judgement of these simplistic terms, henry, but are these the terms of the discussion, or an easy dismissal of same? & are the variety of questions raised regarding the subject relations of a poem & so forth really as separate from aesthetic concerns as you seem to imply below?

> I will allow all manner of bravery and daring and innovation - but I will judge by results - the impact of the whole thing.

I sympathize with your lack of patience-- our handling of this re-/current discussion can & does get too sloppy--but then I tire of attempts to grandly sweep away what could be, though again often is not, an important questioning of our own assumptions about art & its political functions (rather than, say, a renumeration of the "views" & "values" that make us a "community").

or maybe I'm just cranky at 9 am.

btw, what are these recent hip-hop breakthroughs?

chris
..
christopher alexander, etc. / nominative press collective
[redacted] / **********

forthcoming in march: _constellation voice_ by linda russo

↑ Index

478. amato
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

henry, the only possible way i can take your more recent provocation is thusly: that we're busy, around here usually, talking about, not actually enacting, poetry (whatever this latter)... and i don't quite understand -- though i trust you have some writing in mind here? -- how our, well, more critical demeanors are going to "measure up" or some such to poetry in poetic terms... or to be a bit provocative mself, how poetry is going to "measure up" or some such to criticism in critical terms...

(if you'll permit me this one archaism) my heart may lie with trying to write a poem... but i'm still not about to dismiss all commentary as merely ex post facto... as a matter of fact, i don't think we're all still barking at the new critical moon, either... so though i believe it's correct to point, say, to hip-hop as apropos of what's happening these days --- the spirit of your post (?) --- i think it's probably not so helpful to dismiss the chatter in these parts as "hogwash"...

seems to me this is a function of how one comes to these regions --- and while i'll allow that there are all sortsa motivations possible, i take it as an article of faith that most of us are here to learn something from one another...

which again is not to suggest that you or i don't have a sense of humor... i know you do, and i do too --- so to return the gesture in kind --- and what i've been trying, in so many words, to say --- is that, dear henry, your post strikes me as, well, balderdash...

best, really

joe

↑ Index

479. henry
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

---

my balderdash is very specifically motivated, Joe. Let me hedge my remarks by acknowledging my limitations. I too am a dweller among the tombs. I'm Gould. I'm ghosted. I'm spooked. In poetry, I face backwards (both faces) and listen. My daily grind in a library only augments that particular narrow strength/limitation. (Not to say libraries face backwards - far from it. But it gives me fuel for my particular aim.) My approach has always been to inhabit & build on past methods. This is inherently conservative (no matter what models you choose).

What most people find innovative & exciting in poetry today builds on the border between poetry per se and other things: music, math, theory, marginality, other cultures, performance, visual art, bizarre language practices, etc. But I say poetry's on a continuum between such things and poetry per se, which is made of words. Words themselves are already so distended, deep, distortable, dimensional, messy, mundane, non-poetic, that adjacent arts - music, visual - are, for me, always just that: adjacent. Poetry per se is, I agree with Mandelstam, a sort of verbal crystal - a stone with an unprepossessing surface and a "terrible density" hidden inside. Poetry is other-textual. Poetry is verbal espionage. Marlowe & Shakespeare understood this VERY well. So did the writers of the Bible. So did Celan.

My quarrel with the "disturbed" discussion is that it really does replay, and play over the surface, of issues of form/cultural politics which end up stereotyping MY particular approach to poetry - without even knowing what formal questions involve. It all boils down to "rhyme & meter", "willed form", "formal innovation", blah blah... meaningless counters in an endless merry-go-round of superficial nonsense. Not to mention politics... it IS a constant echoing of issues more relevant to bubbling blab of 50s new critics and beats. What I said in a previous post still holds: get poor. What does this mean? "Read it back to me - quietly, quietly."

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

480. Mark Prejsnar
Re: zoothology
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Gary's response is excellent, and very helpful...I do feel though that Antin's remark was more than a "clever quip" --to some extent it was a cri de coeur; it reflects a way poets often feel, when dismembered in order to be remembered. It's a reasonably serious feeling in relation to one's work (one's self-construction); it needn't be taken primarily as a snide attack on anthologists; if you place yourself at the existential point of the writer being anthologized, it has some honest resonance (like any real cry from the heart, it's validity doesn't mean that it isn't also a limited point of view; on the contrary of course it emphasizes its partiality as a pserspective!)

Mark Prejsnar

↑ Index

481. Mark Prejsnar
Re: In the disturbed tree
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Dan first sent his post to me privately; since the same text has now been sent to the list, I'm re-posting a copy of my backchannel reply to him..

Mark P.

↑ Index

482. Mark Prejsnar
Re: In the disturbed tree (fwd)
Tue 18 Mar 1997

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Mon, 17 Mar 1997 15:54:26 -0500 (EST)
From: Mark Prejsnar <[redacted]>
To: DS <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: In the disturbed tree

Well, I'm not sure.....Uh, you say I missed soneone else's point, but none of your arguments in your posting to me seem to be replying to positions I've articulated...I explicitly said that the "tolerant" position is one with which I feel a lot of sympathy; the poets you firmly list as ones who may not be to my taste (Walcott, Heaney, Rich)..I haven't been disparaging 'em here (on the Poetix list), I specifically mentioned that I have sympathy with ALL these positions;,,,that's one of the reasons I was trying to get more debate stirred up (--this thread has been very exciting to me; too often the list gets bogged down, in my opinion, in personal chit-chat, or topics very far from its ostensible theme). I've read the 3 poets you accuse me of disliking for 20 years or so, know them well, and have plenty of respect for them. Now what various Black or female etc. poets or readers think about LangPo, I can't precisely help...One of the basic lessons I take from both publishing my work and working on the left since around 1969 (when I was in 7th grade) is, that you can't let anyone else make your choices for you. I think it's very interesting that few people ask jazz musicians/affecianados to justify to working or Black people their love of Ornette Coleman's music! But he occupies a similar place in the universe of musical expression that say Clark Coolidge does in universe of poetry...So no, I don't really give a damn that some people don't like my work or Coolidges..I'm no longer young and there isn't time to be held back by browbeating. I don't identify myself or my work with LangPo, which is a term I believe shd. be used specifically for the folks who used it of themselves and involved themselves with that circle's activities...Meserli, Silliman, Perelman, Hejinian, Harryman, our great list-owner,etc. But I of course think their work has been helpful and empowering. However, I do indeed think that those more establishment-approved poets should be read and responded to; by expressing a hope that we on the list could thresh out these positions (the tolerant vs. the sharp-edged political poetix of someone like Bruce Andrews, say) I meant just that: that I hoped we could have a broader and broader dialogue.

You seem to be implying that I was putting people (and positions) down where I most difintely wasn't, and trying to shut off dialoge, which I most definitely wasn't..

Mark

↑ Index

483. David Kellogg

Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.

Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997, Michael Boughn wrote:

> Isn't your "(however defined)" precisely the issue, Joe? You can read the Creeley at least two ways, one of which blurs into a kind of sloppy Platonic dualism, the other of which sees these two domains (of > thinking?--is this an ontological problem--or a taxonomic one?) to be immanent each within the other. And it is important to keep in mind (as someone--I think Professor Perloff--pointed out) that form is NOT rhymes and quantities, but--what?--a kind of thinking? (your "work"?).

Let me chime in:

Yeah, sure. But in practice talk about poetry seems to keep privileging one over the other; either we talk about content in terms of form (form comes first), or vice versa (the form "fitting" the content). The problem is, reading Creeley's dicta rigorously doesn't necessary last into our reading of actual poems. Besides, this "immanentist" reading actually blurs Creeley's words. Form as an extension of content is NOT the same thing as Content as an extension form. "Extension" suggests temporal and ontological priority. I'm not saying we should not dissolve such priorities; I'm only saying that dissolving them in practice is pretty damn difficult. That was one element of my critique of Perloff in _Diacritics_.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

> re: "the Pat Boone of poetic blandness"--Has anyone else noticed that Pat has undergone some sort of bizarre heavy-metalish makeover? Last time i saw him on the tube he was sporting leather, chest hair, and tattoos (albeit, probably the kind that wash off...
> steve

↑ Index

485. Christopher Alexander
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

---

alright, let me try again-- my server is a bit slow to reach the list in buffalo this morning.

henry wwrtt:
> My quarrel with the "disturbed" discussion is that it really does replay, > and play over the surface, of issues of form/cultural politics which > end up stereotyping MY particular approach to poetry - without even > knowing what formal questions involve. It all boils down to "rhyme & meter", > "willed form", "formal innovation", blah blah... meaningless counters in > an endless merry-go-round of superficial nonsense.

I see your point henry, but again I'd argue that what you're reacting to is an unfortunate slippage, which several participants have tried explicitly to prevent or correct (thanks marjorie et al.), from form as "the relation of language to meaning" to form as "received versus (so-called) innovative form". certainly it hasn't been my intent, & I'm not the only one, to disparage work which is formal in the latter sense. I'd hate as much as you would for this discussion to degenerate into a round of sonnet-bashing, because I don't learn anything from that at all. whereas I am concerned about an easy acceptance, easy both as hastily-made & as non-commital, of a sort of content-oriented left poetry, & I would, like mark, hope to see more discussion in that vein.
..
christopher alexander, etc. / nominative press collective
[redacted] / **********

forthcoming in march: _constellation voice_ by linda russo

↑ Index

486. Mark Prejsnar
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Uhh, do you refer us to any actual living poets??

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997, Henry Gould wrote:

> Once again, I find all the talk about "formal innovation" and "challenging the reader" vs. "manipulating the reader" with "conventional rhyme and meter" set in a "political" context of "radical" and "conservative"
>
> to be
>
> pure
>
> unadulterated
>
> yimmer-yammer &
>
> hogwash.
>
> I refer you all to Baudelaire, Villon, or recent hip-hop "breakthroughs". I refer you to Edgar Poe & Valery. I refer you to Whitman's constancy, his readable expressiveness. I donate you to Emily, if you dare stand in the same room with her.

etc etc.>

↑ Index

487. Ira Lightman
Astrology poetics
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Does anyone know of poetry, music or any other art form influenced by astrology and the zodiac, esp. twentieth century work? I'm currently working creatively on this, and am drawing inspiration from two works especially: Finnegans Wake, and Zodiac, a musical piece by Stockhausen. Is anyone interested, for example, in contemplating the astrological influences on the experimental poets mentioned or contributing to this list? I look them up from time to time because the reference volume,

Contemporary Poets, gives exact birthdays; time of birth is rarely printed, unfortunately....

Any tips from anyone would be truly appreciated.

Ira Lightman

↑ Index

488. Gwyn McVay
Re: Astrology poetics
Tue 18 Mar 1997

There's always Kenneth Anger's /Scorpio Rising./

Gwyn

↑ Index

489. dbkk
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

At 8:43 AM -0500 3/18/97, Henry Gould wrote:

> I refer you all to Baudelaire, Villon, or recent hip-hop "breakthroughs". I refer you to Edgar Poe & Valery. I refer you to Whitman's constancy, his readable expressiveness. I donate you to Emily, if you dare stand in the same room with her.

Don't you think "Emily" deserves a last name like the poet guys have--or is she some kind of maid or dog or something?

Dodie

↑ Index

490. henry gould
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 10:08:27 -0800 <[redacted]> said:
>
>Don't you think "Emily" deserves a last name like the poet guys have--or is >she some kind of maid or dog or something?
>
>Dodie

we're on a first-name basis. She calls me "Dolt".

↑ Index

491. henry gould
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 09:48:53 MDT Christopher Alexander said:
>
>acceptance, easy both as hastily-made & as non-commital,
>of a sort of content-oriented left poetry, & I would, like
>mark, hope to see more discussion in that vein.

In my view there is only poetry. Discussions at this level of generality (left poetry, formal poetry, innovative poetry) somehow miss the poetry. OK I'm being tendentious & vociferous. It's a way of underlining. - Henry G

↑ Index

492. henry gould
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 10:52:48 -0500 Mark Prejsnar said:
>Uhh, do you refer us to any actual living poets??

If I see any I'll let you know. - the Ghoul

ALLEGORY OF THE POETS

The were clustered together in the Crystal Room,
the Poets. Dressed in leather and velvet, and sprawled across the loveseats with carefree insouciance, they spoke in measured sentences
of the coming Reading; of their various accomplishments; their travels near and far;
their books, their audiences, their salaries.
They laughed and winked and nodded and stared like ordinary men and women.

No one
sat in the Chair that faced them, solitary,
at the end of the room. They waited for someone to come, but no one came.
They chatted on, waiting, for hours there...
but I can't remember what they said,
and I forget their names.

↑ Index

493. amato
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

henry, thanx for your last post... i think there's a distinction to be drawn (albeit a subtle one) twixt "conservative" and preservative... esp. given the various political registers one is likely to hit with the former... universities are in general highly preservative institutions...

but by way of answering directly to your sense that more needs to be discussed wrt contemporary poetries, however "innovative," i can only say for my part that i've always assumed that poetry is not just about language --- that in fact i don't see why poetry shouldn't be, among so many other things, a matter of persuasion... albeit there are so many different ways to go about persuading... which is probably as oracular as i'll be hereabouts...

best,

joe

↑ Index

494. Keith Tuma
Re: Astrology poetics
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Ira--

Check out Joseph Gordon Macleod, _The Ecliptic_ (Faber, 1930).

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

495. William Burmeister Prod
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

> I refer you all to Baudelaire, Villon, or recent hip-hop "breakthroughs". I refer you to Edgar Poe & Valery. I refer you to Whitman's constancy, his readable expressiveness. I donate you to Emily, if you dare stand in the same room with her.

I appreciate the roundness of your post. With all due respect to your interests, what hip-hop "breakthroughs" have we seen of late. Is any of it truly "new"? Is anything ever "new"? Are we just dwarves on the backs of the literary giants? (Born at the wrong time I guess). Rilke had as high an estimation of poetry, but we all know that he too could be boring or predictable at times. Breakthroughs as breakaways, break outs, break offs, break ins, breakdowns. Regardless, great verse still gets written.

I do like where all this discussion is going. To me though, this post seems to suggest the death of poetry (?) The endgame as Marjorie suggests in Radical Artifice.

Best to all in a great discussion,

Bill B.

↑ Index

496. Jerry Rothenberg
Re: Astrology poetics
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Ira --

This was never my thing exactly, but there was a time (if I remember right) when poets near and dear to me were exploring older, more recently occulted sciences like astrology & alchemy, etc. I would trace it back to surrealist roots at the very least -- the kind of thing that Artaud denounces Breton for in his great letter & outcry of February 1947 (a surrealist exhibit structured on the 12 houses of the zodiac). I'm sure, once you get started on this, that the examples will be astronomical (not only astrological). But one to look out for -- totally neglected on this list -- is Wakoski, who was at one time into casting charts & who surely has it running through the work -- at least the early work. (Di Prima too, who was otherwise a close student of alchemy & such.) You might also check back into AMERICA A PROPHECY (if available to you) -- the anthology that George Quasha & I committed in the early 70s -- & there you'll find (on p. 239) a "horoscope [with illustrated chart] of a tentative north American republic / born Philadelphia, Pa., 4 July 1776" -- the work credited to "anonymous" but revealed as transmitted "per R.K. Amanuensis" [aka Robert Kelly]. This was also around the time (a few years later) that Richard Grossinger put out an astronomy issue of his magazine IO but including takes on that that would more readily be identified with astrology. And David Antin has a lovely take-off on the reading of constellations in the second section of his poem "The Black Plague" (reprinted in the Sun & Moon Selected). It is all -- as you know and, if I remember, have recently expressed -- an indication of the closeness between poetry (& art) & "mysticism" of all sorts that makes for a lot of current problematics in our practice. It is something that fell out of (or never really got into) the talk around language poetry and has therefore obscured -- to my mind -- a sense of where poetry comes from and (by extension) where it can conceivably go.

And I would also, while I'm at it, want to put in a word about David Antin & anthologies, since David is my oldest & remains one of my dearest friends over all these many years, viz that David's crack about anthologies -- like others about Lowell and the (so-called) sacred and the dreams that he once claimed not to have -- is a very directed remark aimed at something that he wants to get at or around under very particular circumstances. He has therefore been my closest (silent) collaborator on various anthologies, beinning with Technicians of the SACRED about which he knows as much (or more) as anyone around.

I would also be very interested in what your own project is -- to get a better handle on it. But maybe it would be better to continue this, if you want to, by the back channel method.

With all best,

Jerome Rothenberg
[redacted]

↑ Index

497. Matthias Regan
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Chris w0r9ttu2tin49g;a:

> btw, what are these recent hip-hop breakthroughs?

Having just this weekend caught the hip/hop/rap documentary, "Rhyme & Reason" I second this question.
Anyone else seen this?
I thought the docu. itself nothing inspired, but some of what the artists said was interesting--though often the "importance" of the movie's expectations seemed determined to a large part by racist cultural expectations, as Ice-T pointed out regarding the size of his house.

Anyone else see this yet?

Matthias

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University

Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

498. Sylvester Pollet
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Henry--and if I read you right, your School of Providence, the hot seat in the front of the room would be the eclectic chair?

> On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 10:52:48 -0500 Mark Prejsnar said: > Uhh, do you refer us to any actual living poets??
>
> If I see any I'll let you know. - the Ghoul
>
> ALLEGORY OF THE POETS
>
> The were clustered together in the Crystal Room,
> the Poets. Dressed in leather and velvet, and > sprawled across the loveseats with carefree
> insouciance, they spoke in measured sentences
> of the coming Reading; of their various
> accomplishments; their travels near and far;
> their books, their audiences, their salaries.
> They laughed and winked and nodded and stared
> like ordinary men and women.
>
> No one
> sat in the Chair that faced them, solitary,
> at the end of the room. They waited
> for someone to come, but no one came.
> They chatted on, waiting, for hours there...
> but I can't remember what they said,
> and I forget their names.

↑ Index

499. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Re: Tree/formally disturbed/ deep need
Tue 18 Mar 1997

---

from HOW ARE VERSES MADE
by V. MAYAKOVSKY

(Moscow, 1926; London: Jonathan Cape, 1970 translated

G. M Hyde)

Here there is no call to take up the metaphysical question of who is better, Demyn Bedny("an example of a social command for today which has been properly understood") or Kruchonykh("its aim or purpose is to assist future poets"). These are poetcial achievements of very different kinds, on different planes, and each of them can exist without excluding the other and without competing with the other . . .

I am deliberately exagerting because I want to show more strikingly that the essence of modern literary work doesn't lie in the evaluation of this or that ready-made thing from the standpointof literary taste, but in a correct approach to the study of the productive process itself . . .

How are verses made?
Work begins long before one receives or is aware of a social command.
Preliminary work goes on incessantly . . .

A poet regards every meeting, every signpost, every event in whatever circumstances simply as material to be shaped into words(20-21,24).

Mike Boughn made a good point re "this or that ready-made thing"--and expectancy-- incessant preliminary work--study of process--every event-material shaped into words-

Mayakovsky's book was written for a series for schools and such--along with books on" How are . . .s made" (ships, shoes, paste, paper, etc etc)

maybe instead of anthology arguments (and noticed no one has as yet mentioned very good one--Primary Trouble--from Talisman House)-- some how to books---

"Do you want to write, and want to know how it's done . . .You're right to demand of poets that they shouldn't carry with them to the grave the secrets of their skill. "I want to write about poetry not as a pedant, but as a practitioner. My article has no scholarly significance. I write about my work, which by the light of my observations and convictions, I see as differing very little from the work of other professional poets. "Once again I want to insist that I offer no rules to make anyone a poet, by following which he can write poetry. Such rules simply don't exist. A poet is a person who creates these very rules" (12-13)

--dbchirot

↑ Index

500. henry
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 14:48:50 -0500 Sylvester Pollet said: >Henry--and if I read you right, your School of Providence, the hot seat in >the front of the room would be the eclectic chair?

Close, close. Not Providence - Paradise. Dante saw it there with Bea - it was still empty. (They were waiting for Henry to show.)

↑ Index

501. henry
Re: Tree/formally disturbed/ deep need
Tue 18 Mar 1997

To go along with Mayakovsky:

"the poetics of the future will focus on the poetic IMPULSE". (Mandelstam)

↑ Index

502. henry
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 14:11:58 -0500 William Burmeister Prod said:
>
>truly "new"? Is anything ever "new"? Are we just dwarves on the backs of the >literary giants? (Born at the wrong time I guess). Rilke had as high an >estimation of poetry, but we all know that he too could be boring or >predictable at times. Breakthroughs as breakaways, break outs, break offs,

"Unless you do battle with giants, you will remain a dwarf."

- Hrothgar the Troublesome, Jr.
>
>I do like where all this discussion is going. To me though, this post seems to >suggest the death of poetry (?) The endgame as Marjorie suggests in Radical >Artifice.

"Some of it should have died a long time ago."
- Hrothgar the Third Artificer

↑ Index

503. amato
Re: Astrology poetics
Tue 18 Mar 1997

jerry, what i would mself find very useful would be a discussion of the "mystic" (shorthand) as this might be made to resonate with the "social" (more shorthand)... i'm not so interested in classroom practices -- where i'm pretty certain the "mystic" is no less harmful than, say (again) "craft"... i am, though, interested in what to do about more popular, representational biases against poet-madmen/women -- which i find a damaging and problematic mysti-fication on so many fronts... seems to me there's also this issue of social responsibility, however ecstatic one's apprehension (not meaning to raise any eyebrows around here but---)...

all to steal a bit of thunder from a short conference paper i'm busy tweaking...

seems to me that, going back some, whitman is one obvious north american lead-in...

best,

joe

↑ Index

504. oren.izenberg
Re: Astrology poetics
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Ira,

You can always count on Yeats when it comes to such atavistic enthusiasms...astrology figured into his syncretism along with mysticism (various kinds), ceremonial magic (always subject, for Yeats, to empirical verification), alchemy, Theosophy, Rosicrucianism, etc. etc...

Best,
O.

↑ Index

505. Joseph Lease
Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
Tue 18 Mar 1997

for one thing form is never more than an extension of content means that content becomes form and extends form: so the reality of form is integral: experience made actual in a construct of words

↑ Index

506. William Burmeister Prod
Re: formally disturbed
Tue 18 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 14:11:58 -0500 William Burmeister Prod said:
>
>truly "new"? Is anything ever "new"? Are we just dwarves on the backs of the >literary giants? (Born at the wrong time I guess). Rilke had as high an >estimation of poetry, but we all know that he too could be boring or >predictable at times. Breakthroughs as breakaways, break outs, break offs,

> "Unless you do battle with giants, you will remain a dwarf."
>
> - Hrothgar the Troublesome, Jr.
>
> I do like where all this discussion is going. To me though, this post seems to suggest the death of poetry (?) The endgame as Marjorie suggests in Radical Artifice.
>
> "Some of it should have died a long time ago."
> - Hrothgar the Third Artificer

Ok Hrothgar. I can appreciate the "battling with giants" homily for now. Let's say I too am a tomb dweller, but hip-hop? Isn't that going from tomb to Hollywood (by present indications at any rate)? How does today's hip-hop stand in with the symbolists, Whitman, and Dickinson? I wouldn't dare stand in the same room with Ice-T for fear of being riddled by something other than words.

Bill B.

↑ Index

507. Matthias Regan
Contraries will not rest/Mental Fight, etc.
Tue 18 Mar 1997

But the experience might be an experience of experiencing form.

The perfect sentence.

A variation on it.

> for one thing form is never more than an extension of content means that content becomes form and extends form: so the reality of form is integral: experience made actual in a construct of words

ps. I hope experience is conceived to be more than form; that form is imperfect.

Matthias Regan
Northwestern University
Department of Chemistry
Phone: 847/[redacted]

↑ Index

508. Joe Safdie
Re: Contraries will not rest/Mental Fight, etc.
Tue 18 Mar 1997

Okay, I vote that the next post that mentions either "form" OR "content" be relegated to oblivion -- or at least ignored for a few days.

I mean, this can get to be head-hurting stuff, and as a sweeping rejection of that possibility, I salute Henry's exemplary balderdash.

I myself had to go back into the archives (i.e., last week's posts) to try and make sense of what, exactly, we were talking about: one of Joe Amato's earliest posts last week said he was "slipping and sliding on a form/ content dualism here" -- implying that that dualism was really artificial -- and this has since been echoed by many comments, including Ms. Perloff's that, for her, "there is no subject matter outside form" and "form and content can't be separated." Appreciating David Kellogg's latest, that it is in fact almost impossible to talk about poems without separating them, I want to say I AGREE with those who say we should try and keep them together: I was trying to demean empty form without content (and by the way, Mark P., did you know that Pound considered _Finnegans Wake_ "decadent"?), while others have disparaged poems that appear to be just "content" (or poems that come from and speak to various "identity" communities) which don't seem to have "innovative" form.

Of course these are all loaded terms and mean different things to different people. But if there's an issue here for me, it's that, once these terms are separated, or talked about as if they were separate, mischief begins. That is, I agree with Jordan that it's mystification to think that a form can force a message -- I agree with Marjorie that "one can use all the fragments and dislocations around and still not have a good 'langpo' " -- and I CERTAINLY agree with the (perhaps unintended) hilarity contained in this post (sorry, I forgot its author):

" . . . a critical language that honors lang-po -- in fact, much lang-po IS a critical language honoring lang-po"

Is this not form without content?

So it's not an ontological argument, Michael -- it's a phenomenological argument. The "work" of the poem, as it's undertaken -- that "stuff", those (ap)perceptions, that dynamically developing, meaning-making articulation -- creates its own form, the only form that can possibly encompass that meaning. Who would possibly WANT to separate them, except politicians of some order?

Robert A., I look forward to your interview, and it wasn't a low blow or personal attack;

Mark P., glad to see your list of influences, many of whom are in fact problematic for me (even the sainted Zukofsky), but hey, I'm starting to think I'm almost illiterate compared to the denizens of this list; maybe this post is a bit less confusing about what I meant.

and thank you especially Chris S., for your wonderful contributions to this and other issues. I really want to talk about astrology now . . .

↑ Index

509. Louis Cabri far reader
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Robert Mittenthal brilliantly critiques James Scully's book, _Line Break_, starting from the fact that while the book is about the "the social practice of poetry" poetry is hardly ever referred to described or invoked. And Scully didn't even write his book on a listserv! (See Mittenthal's review in _Writing_ 25 [1990].) Of course arguing from out of - from within - poetry does not _garantee_ a better argument either - that is, a truly "deep encounter," for instance, as Christopher Alexander would urge practitioners to experience with their medium. Does close reading even garantee an argument? No longer - yet perhaps if you are reading the Metaphysicals, Chris. Thus it might be necessary in arguing for the "social practice of poetry" to not mention poetry at all. Of course arguing _alongside_ poetry, in paralogue as it were, does not garantee a better argument either - that is, a truly deep encounter with "social practice...." Apart from saying that, I may as well also state that for me there are so many unhelpful contradictions and connotations in the language of the quotation from Scully's book, that I think David Kellogg posted, I don't know where to even begin in pointing them out. Here's one, not necessarily the best: Is he for or against a "metahistorical source of illumination" for poetry? From his own disparaging language, I would say definitely not. Yet I can't figure out from the quotation how he proposes that "shared understanding" would occur elsewise. Share my cropper.

Ira, re: astrology, try Cdn. Gwendolyn MacEwan (b.1941)--

> There is a great unspeakable wheel which keeps > Us slender as myths, and green with sleep.

Warning: This is a general reference in that I have no investment, psychical speculative or otherwise, in MacEwan's work. Force that mystifies a message is form.

I've always liked Steve McCaffery's early concept of the cipheral (he later rejected it) to think about that aspect of language practice which eludes exhaustion by conventions of sense making and contextual reception. Neither "form" nor "innovative form" do the same work as "cipheral" of disclosing the poem as a visual materialized surface and also as a set of devices that jam the codes of sense-making beyond the means of the best close reader, while reaching out, in the same stroke, to other readers: far readers (anybodies, nobodies, other communities, classes, subgroups). "Nonsense," which has been variously used to invoke this sort of poetry, forever indefinable yet concrete, that is "at the edge" "vanguard" "etc," is inadequate - far too taming of the social revolutionary practice of the poem. This does not resolve itself as a tame question of genre, as "nonsense" has suggested it can be - to, for example, Marnie Parsons, and others who have written on Bernstein, Hejinian, Lear, etc. The cipheral aspect of poetry is perhaps its spectral aspect, which has to do with tombs, those that Henry mentions, the dead letter, but not as much with the mystic mists as with the future as mysterious, future readings yet to be articulated. The social practice of the poem would operate on the analogy of Ernesto Laclau's "empty signifier." He is talking of the empty signifier on a macro political scale. For him, for instance, "social" would be an empty signifier, around which rallies a movement for change; and the reason why it's empty for him is that it's meaning is indefinite, and open to multiple, conflicting interpretations by various communities. Until it is realized to have no meaning, at which point it is dropped as valueless.

Chop it off,
Louis Cabri

↑ Index

510. David Israel
Re: astrology poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Re: Ira Lightman's --

<<Does anyone know of poetry, music or any other art form influenced by astrology and the zodiac, esp. twentieth century work? >> here's one stray item:

record album Venus in Cancer by the late Robbie Basho (Tacoma Records, I think was the label) -- Robbie (like the present e-writer) happened to have said planet in said sign; (Basho recorded abt. a dozen albums, till his demise (early 80s); he was a steel-string guitar innovator, sometimes linked with John Fahey & Leo Kotke as a threesome of antecedents to the so-called Windham Hill school of solo guitar); he explained the title Venus in Cancer (as I recall) simply by noting that he'd always had a certain feeling abt. Venus in Cancer, and that same was given expression (I think in an eponymous track). BTW, Robbie was unhappy w/ the absurd cover-art (involving a pair of nubile women, I think) -- not quite his own design; so he would paste-over Indian prints of Meher Baba attired as Krishna (on copies he sold of this album ...)

(& BTW Henry Gould -- this is not apocryphal nor blarney -- I sold copies of same at the Meher Baba Bookstore in Pasadena, circa 1973)

d.i.

↑ Index

511. Pierre Joris
Re: Astrology poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Ira -- Jerry mentioned Robert Kelly's birthchart for the US in IO -- there are many other Kelly works that involve astrology. Check for exampole the ZODIAC CYCLE in _Finding the Measure_ (Black Sparrow 1968)
-- Pierre
--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://www.albany.edu/~joris/

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
one language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
it as a conquering assertion. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

↑ Index

512. Miekal And [Fwd: LitLink news release]
Wed 19 Mar 1997

---

id KAA10469; Wed, 19 Mar 1997 10:58:03 -0600 (CST)
Date: Wed, 19 Mar 1997 10:58:03 -0600 (CST)

To: [redacted]
From: [redacted] (Bob Gale)
Subject: LitLink news release

NEWS RELEASE 3/17/97

=46or Immediate Release -- Please redistribute Contact: [redacted]

LITLINK LITERARY ARTS FESTIVAL, SUNDAY,
APRIL 27, AT CALHOUN SQUARE, MINNEAPOLIS, MN

SECOND ANNUAL NATIONAL POETRY MONTH CELEBRATION
SHOWCASING DIVERSITY OF TWIN CITIES LITERARY ARTS COMMUNITY

LitLink Literary Arts Festival, one of the nation's largest free celebrations of the second annual National Poetry Month of April, is to take place at Calhoun Square, April 27, noon - 6:00 p.m., in Uptown Minneapolis. Spearheaded nationally by The Academy of American Poets, this local festival is created to bring poetry to the broad public making it playful, relevant, and accessible to everyone. Minnesota's top literary arts presses and organizations will participate in this community celebration of literary arts exhibitions and events. Highlights include:

+ Exhibition of 40 small press publishers and literary arts organizations. + Magnetic Poetry Kit=81, makers of one of the world's most successful non-book literary products of all time, will build a 8'x 20' metal wall covered with thousands of Magnetic Poetry words for people to create their own poems. Founder Dave Kapell will make a presentation of the one millionth Kit. + Cabaret by the Cacophony Chorus, the Twin Cities leading spoken word performance series. + Showcase of cutting edge video poetry and spoken word recordings. + Selection of poetry workshops and community forums. + Readings and book signings from top Minnesota authors. + Open stage reading and poetry slam for coffeehouse poets and the general public alike.

This free event is co-sponsored in part by Borders Book Shop-Uptown Minneapolis, Calhoun Square, Coffee House Press, Cowles Foundation, Graywolf Press, The Loft, London Productions, Magnetic Poetry, Milkweed Editions, Minnesota Center for Book Arts, New Rivers Press, S.A.S.E.: The Write Place, and YMCA Writer's Voice Project. To request an exhibitor brochure, please call [redacted] or browse our web site at www.spoken.com/festival for more information.

London Productions
3010 Hennepin Ave S, #245, Minnapolis, MN 55408 USA voice [redacted] fax [redacted] [redacted] http://www.spoken.com =20

↑ Index

513. Kathleen Crown
Re: Astrological poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Ira,

You might be interested in the angelology & mathematics of H.D.'s long poem SAGESSE (1957), in which degrees of an astrological chart become angel-visitants. The poem is in HERMETIC DEFINITION.

Kathy Crown
--

↑ Index

514. Kathleen Crown
Poetry and the Public Sphere
Wed 19 Mar 1997

"POETRY AND THE PUBLIC SPHERE: A CONFERENCE ON CONTEMPORARY POETRY," April 24-27, 1997, at Rutgers University, New Brunswick, New Jersey, now has a website with a complete and up-to-date schedule of events, along with registration forms and useful information about lodging, meals, and travel. You can access the website from a link at the EPC (thanks to Loss Glazier, highly appreciated information superhighway worker).

http://english.rutgers.edu/poetry.html

Readings by Amiri Baraka, Tracie Morris, Willie Perdomo, Aileen Reyes, keith roach, Carl Hancock Rux; Adrienne Rich, Cheryl Clarke, Alicia Ostriker, Robin Pastorio-Newman; Eliot Katz, Ed Roberson, Robert Hass, Sonia Sanchez and others

Keynote Panelists: Meena Alexander, Charles Altieri, Charles Bernstein, Abena Busia, Maria Damon, Cary Nelson, Arnold Rampersad, and Tricia Rose

PARTICIPANTS include Charles Alexander, Amittai Aviram, Michael Bibby, Steve Caton, Michael Davidson, Marianne DeKoven, Rachel Blau DuPlessis, Susan Stanford Friedman, Ed Foster, Alan Golding, Lynn Keller, James Haba, Bob Holman, Walter Kalaidjian, Bob Perelman, Ross Talarico, Michael Taussig; Jan Barry, Regie Cabico, Rafael Campo, Andy Clausen, Enid Dame, Carolyn Forche, Loss Pequen~o Glazier, Lisa Jarnot, Irena Klepfisz, Rachel Hadas, Michael Heller, Albert Mobilio, Burt Kimmelman, Ted Pearson, Robyn Selman, Vijay Seshadri, Grace Schulman, Susan Schultz, Leonard Schwartz, Armand Schwerner, Mary Margaret Sloan, Pamela Sneed, Gerald Stern, Michael Weaver, Susan Wheeler, and others.

Email inquiries to the Conference Coordinators--Harriet Davidson, Kathleen Crown, and Nicholas Yasinski--at [redacted] or leave a phone message at [redacted].

--

↑ Index

515. Michael Boughn
Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Joe, I always think of Valery's proposal of the poem erupting or arising out of the insistence of a specific rhythm that invades the mind. That would seem to anticipate Kristeva. Doesn't the phenomenological return us to some point before the intervention of taxonomy?

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

516. Louis Cabri
angelology
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Michel Serres has a book, _Angels: A Modern Myth_, or close to that, publ. 1995, set, much like Godard set Mary & Joseph at a gas pump, at the Paris airport, where the busy archtectture itself repeats the patterns of "angel-visitants" who come and go from one destination to another as messengers of other worlds. -Louis

↑ Index

517. henry
Re: far reader
Wed 19 Mar 1997

On Wed, 19 Mar 1997 00:11:30 -0500 Louis Cabri said:
>
>I've always liked Steve McCaffery's early concept of the cipheral >(he later rejected it) to think about that aspect of language >practice which eludes exhaustion by conventions of sense making >and contextual reception. Neither "form" nor "innovative form" do >the same work as "cipheral" of disclosing the poem as a visual >materialized surface and also as a set of devices that jam the >codes of sense-making beyond the means of the best close reader, >while reaching out, in the same stroke, to other readers: far >readers (anybodies, nobodies, other communities, classes, >subgroups). "Nonsense," which has been variously used to invoke >this sort of poetry, forever indefinable yet concrete, that is >"at the edge" "vanguard" "etc," is inadequate - far too taming of >the social revolutionary practice of the poem. This does not

I like the term "cipheral" - this is sort of what I was getting at when I said "poetry is verbal espionage". I guess I question the revolutionary potential of it. It's more like subversive - a practice that grows up under repressive state apparati. But for me the political aspect is less interesting than the allegorical literary aspect of sending a very specific secret message.

> who have written on Bernstein, Hejinian, Lear, etc. The cipheral aspect of poetry is perhaps its spectral aspect, which has to do with tombs, those that Henry mentions, the dead letter, but not as much with the mystic mists as with the future as mysterious, future readings yet to be articulated. The social practice of the poem would operate on the analogy of Ernesto Laclau's "empty signifier." He is talking of the empty signifier on a macro

See Mandelstam "On the Interlocutor". The proper audience is the unknown, particular, specific reader in the future. "Yet again I will liken the poem to an Egyptian ship of the dead, in which is stored everything necessary for life." (O.M.) - Henry G.

↑ Index

518. henry
Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
Wed 19 Mar 1997

On Wed, 19 Mar 1997 07:41:13 -0500 Michael Boughn said: >Joe, I always think of Valery's proposal of the poem erupting or >arising out of the insistence of a specific rhythm that invades the >mind. That would seem to anticipate Kristeva. Doesn't the >phenomenological return us to some point before the intervention of >taxonomy?

I'm glad you brought up Valery. I think this whole form/content slosh was best articulated in his essay "Poetry and Abstract Thought" where he differentiates poetry from prose in terms of a pendulum effect. There IS pure form - the hypnotic rhythm/sound/meaning of the actual words - which swings like a pendulum into the reader's mind and sets off its cognitive/emotive effects, enacts its changes. Then the pendulum swings back and the pure form REMAINS - in memory, in culture (2nd life of art). Prose, on the other hand, swings its effects into the mind - and dissolves after completing its work. - Henry G

↑ Index

519. henry
Re: astrology poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

On Wed, 19 Mar 1997 00:31:08 -0500 David Israel said:
>
>(& BTW Henry Gould -- this is not apocryphal nor blarney -- I sold >copies of same at the Meher Baba Bookstore in Pasadena, circa 1973)

Eric Blarnes, at least according to his biographer, Ronald Singh (_Eric Blarnes : a Double Half-Life_, Benares Univ. Press, 1987, pp.53-59), used to carry Leo Kottke's guitar cases for him on tour in the early 70s. This MAY have brought him into the Meher Baba periphery in southern California: my early copies of Pasadena Sun Rock Magazine advertise Kottke performing at Loose Change Coffeehouse & Headshop in July of 1972. Whether this connection is real, or provided some impetus to Windham Hill new age loop-guitar styles - it's too early to tell without further research. I believe Madras Wilson is doing his dissertation on the cultural coding overlap of instrument-holding techniques of 70s guitarists and sitar-players, and his efforts may bear fruit in this regard - worth watching. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

520. Louis Cabri
Re: angelology
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Sittin' at the terminal for ten minutes just watchin'
the messages come in, yeah Beats fountains in Rome Yea

↑ Index

521. Sylvester Pollet
Re: astrology poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

> On Wed, 19 Mar 1997 00:31:08 -0500 David Israel said:
>
> (& BTW Henry Gould -- this is not apocryphal nor blarney -- I sold copies of same at the Meher Baba Bookstore in Pasadena, circa 1973)
>
> Eric Blarnes, at least according to his biographer, Ronald Singh (_Eric Blarnes : a Double Half-Life_, Benares Univ. Press, 1987, pp.53-59), used to carry Leo Kottke's guitar cases for him on tour in the early 70s. This MAY have brought him into the Meher Baba periphery in southern California: my early copies of Pasadena Sun Rock Magazine advertise Kottke performing at Loose Change Coffeehouse & Headshop in July of 1972. Whether this connection is real, or provided some impetus to Windham Hill new age loop-guitar styles - it's too early to tell without further research. I believe Madras Wilson is doing his dissertation on the cultural coding overlap of instrument-holding techniques of 70s guitarists and sitar-players, and his efforts may bear fruit in this regard - worth watching. - Henry Gould

Henry--Thanks for Allegory, and for this fascinating material. I'm happy indeed that we've moved beyond your poet of the laundromat--what was his name, Jack Spindry?

↑ Index

522. Gwyn McVay
Re: Astrological poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

There are passages in John Wieners' journals about the alignment of planets and such. (again, at work, no wonderful bookshelves in front of me)

Gwyn

↑ Index

523. Jordan Davis
Mystery Poetry Theater 3000
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Could there not be a dynamics of form to accomodate such varying practices as Rod Smith's Carolyn Forche's Joan Retallack's and Joe Ross's? Could we not bottle it and call it DC Spring? How long until the cherry blossoms start?

All of this about form and content seems so far from what has been said by reasonable and amusing people about what writing is like (or reading for that matter) that I feel like I'm stuck in the middle period of Joseph Beuys learning about electricity. Or, the IRS as described on NPR the other day: organizational processes from the 50s, technology from the 70s. As opposed to PAP (Postmodern [north]American Poetry) which uses organizational processes from the 60s and technology from the 80s.

Eau de beagle,
Jordan

↑ Index

524. Charles Alexander
Mimeograph/Ditto printing
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Given the conversation not long ago here, I thought I'd forward this message in case anyone might want to check it out.

charles

>
>Those interested in Mimeograph/Ditto printing might want to take a look at >the archives of Exlibris a listserv for the rare books and special >collections community.
>
>The URL is ><http://palimpsest.stanford.edu/byform/mailing-lists/exlibris/1997/03/>.
>
>Pretty interesting stuff for the most part. Richard Minsky had some >interesting comments as well.
>
>Peter
>
>
>>>> I love working in the library. <<<
>>>There is something to be said for working in a place bound in leather.<<
>
>Peter D. Verheyen <wk> [redacted]
>Conservation Librarian <fax>[redacted]
>Syracuse University Library <email>[redacted]
>Syracuse University <www>http://www.dreamscape.com/pdverhey >Syracuse, NY 13244 <Listowner>[redacted]
>
>

Light blue and the same red with purple makes a change. It shows that there is no mistake. Any pink shows that and very likely it is reasonable.

Gertrude Stein, from "A Substance In A Cushion," in TENDER BUTTONS

Charles Alexander
Chax Press
[redacted]

↑ Index

525. Douglas Barbour

Re: pre-determined form in the avant garde

Wed 19 Mar 1997

I have to agree with Mark Wallace:

" In any case, the relation between exploratory and pre-determined form is quite complex--in some cases, predetermined forms of various types and degrees can certainly be exploratory and about discovery."

And Marjorie has written a lot about such things. I do think that Creeley's mantra still works in relation to such. And then, as someone who reads poetry & SF, I think of Samuel R. Delany's somewhat similar statement "Put in opposition to 'style'[form], there is no such thing as 'content'." Which makes clear that the opposition _is_ a false dichotomy, a constructed one. One thing is for sure: setting up some arbitrary formal controls often allows for creative discovery in the writing, & that, if (or when) it works, can create a poem worth reading.

Well, hey, what about all those 'sonnets' in _In the Analogy_ -- a stunningly beautiful book, & one that's going to take a long time to read, but given _From Feathers to Iron_ I know I'm going to find it stunning as poetry too. I do recommend it to all.

========== Douglas Barbour
How long Department of English

University of Alberta it takes for the promise to arrive, Edmonton
Alberta T6G 2E5 shaped as a flirt, a cheating [redacted]
FAX:[redacted] kiss, a whistle, an ambulance. H: [redacted]
John Tranter

↑ Index

526. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Mystery Poetry Theater 3000
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Whew! there sure have been a lot of superior-sounding posts recently..I personally found a lot of the posts on the recent thread very useful and provocative--Several comments by these folks who are apparently much smarter than the rest of us, have characterized the thread as being about form and content..If they're thinking about the same thread I am, it was about a number of poetics issues, not all of which could be so characterized. Maybe these folks, being so much more "reasonable and amusing," actually have some poetics cherry blossoms of their own to contribute??

Mark P.

On Wed, 19 Mar 1997, Jordan Davis wrote:

> Could there not be a dynamics of form to accomodate such varying practices as Rod Smith's Carolyn Forche's Joan Retallack's and Joe Ross's? Could we not bottle it and call it DC Spring? How long until the cherry blossoms start?
>
> All of this about form and content seems so far from what has been said by reasonable and amusing people about what writing is like (or reading for that matter) that I feel like I'm stuck in the middle period of Joseph Beuys learning about electricity. Or, the IRS as described on NPR the other day: organizational processes from the 50s, technology from the 70s. As opposed to PAP (Postmodern [north]American Poetry) which uses organizational processes from the 60s and technology from the 80s.
>
> Eau de beagle,
> Jordan

↑ Index

527. henry gould
Re: formally disturbed
Wed 19 Mar 1997

On Tue, 18 Mar 1997 16:42:36 -0500 William Burmeister Prod said:
>
>Ok Hrothgar. I can appreciate the "battling with giants" homily for now. Let's >say I too am a tomb dweller, but hip-hop? Isn't that going from tomb to >Hollywood (by present indications at any rate)? How does today's hip-hop stand >in with the symbolists, Whitman, and Dickinson? I wouldn't dare stand in the >same room with Ice-T for fear of being riddled by something other than words.

As a library worker, I have some special access. I checked with a Signor Borges, who referred me to certain archives of the future. Under the subject AMERICAN LITERATURE - POETRY - LATE 20th CENTURY, you will find eight titles published between 2012 and 2120, specifically dealing with the rap/langpo dialectic as an index of cultural dissonance in late-20th cent. US culture. You will find 3 books on Rap metrics/rhyme, and an whopping 85 titles on poetry as performance in late millenial caffeine etiquette.
An if you mess wi me
you gonna bookified be
I am the numbala one king
of dis library thing
I say libuububububary bury me
baby inna bubblemath sea - hey
- Henny Ghoul'd

↑ Index

528. dbkk
Astrology poetics/Spicer's "Language"
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Dear Ira, it's Kevin Killian. Here's a piece by Jack Spicer which is an anti-astrology poem, I hope this counts in your survey.

³If you don¹t believe in a god, don¹t quote him,² Valéry once said when he was about ready to give up poetry. The purposefull suspension of disbelief has about the chance of a snowball in hell.
Lamias maybe, or succubi but they are about as real in California as night-crawlers
Gods or stars or totems are not game-animals.
    Snark-hunting is not like discussing baseball.
Against wisdom as such. Such Tired wisdoms as the game-hunters develop Shooting Zeus, Alpha Centauri, wolf with the same toy gun.
It is deadly hard to worship god, star, and totem. Deadly easy
To use them like worn-out condoms spattered by your own gleeful, crass, and unworshiping Wisdom

The Duncan-Spicer crowd was way influenced by astrology--in this poem Spicer is attacking Robert Duncan, George Stanley and Harold Dull for their repetitive use of astrology in their then (1964) current projects . . . aligning himself with Charles Olson who in his 50s essay "Against Wisdom as Such" had warned American readers about San Francisco writing as a school of mages "ominous as Ojai."

This poem is from Spicer's "Love Poems" in his book "Language."

Now I get to repeat my songspiel. A marvelous benefactor has given Small Press Traffic a number of copies of the first edition of Spicer's "Language" allowing us to sell them to benefit the organization. They are in mint condition and you have never seen anything as beautiful as this book, more often now seen in rare book catalogues looking tattered, dirty, and gray and still costing a bomb. She (anonymous benefactor) wants us to make sure they get into what she calls "the right hands" (those of artists and poets) so, a couple months ago, Dodie Bellamy announced this offer through the poetics list to quelle response. There are however still a few copies left, so, if anyone is interested, back channel me or Dodie at [redacted] for more information. And now back to regularly scheduled programming.

↑ Index

529. Wendy Battin
Re: Astrological poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

On Wed, 19 Mar 1997, Kathleen Crown wrote:
> You might be interested in the angelology & mathematics of H.D.'s long poem > SAGESSE (1957), in which degrees of an astrological chart become > angel-visitants. The poem is in HERMETIC DEFINITION.

About 30 years after Marc Edmund Jones' Sabian Symbols, all 360 of them, supposedly "channeled" (canal-ed like Mars?) but quite a poem in itself.

Wendy

↑ Index

530. aerialedge
Re: Mystery Poetry Theater 3000
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Dear Jordan,

I am a tourist with too much of the language.

Reasonable?

Amusing?

You're just mad cause they're not being hermetic enough?
or else cause technology is driving history off of several cliffs at once?
it's important?

"to err is statemental" &

today has already been observed pay our Mr Davis no-mind & tribute for only it is that he yelleth "shower" in _The Norton Anthology of Sick Monks_.

--Rod

↑ Index

531. Maryrose Larkin
Re: Astrology poetics/music
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Has anyone mentioned George Crumb's Makrokosmos? I think both sets are based on the zodiac. The scores are quite lovely.

Maryrose Larkin

↑ Index

532. Jordan Davis
force mouth content
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Sorry. Looked from here like there was a lot about 'force' 'mouth' 'content'. I will try to work up a paraphrase of the findings for the subcommittee.

Jordan

↑ Index

533. dbkk
Re: Spicer's "Language"
Wed 19 Mar 1997

At 10:37 AM +0600 3/19/97, KENT JOHNSON wrote:

> How much?

$32 in the U.S., includes postage. Elsewhere--it's negotiable. (Recently SPT received a $10 check from Canada, in U.S. funds, and the bank charged us $5 to cash it).

Dodie

↑ Index

534. Peter Landers
Re: Astrology poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

There is a composer named Dane Rudyar, I think, who is more conservative than Stockhausen. He has also written several books on astrology. That's all I have. Now if you were doing a study on martyrology ... :-)

Pete Landers
[redacted]

↑ Index

535. Pritchett,Pat
Re: Astrological poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Those symbols, quite fascinating in themselves and a good source for a Zodiac poem of whatever sort, were later collected and given a gloss by Dane Rudhyar.

Patrick Pritchett

From: Wendy Battin
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: Astrological poetics
Date: Wednesday, March 19, 1997 11:23AM

On Wed, 19 Mar 1997, Kathleen Crown wrote:
> You might be interested in the angelology & mathematics of H.D.'s long poem > SAGESSE (1957), in which degrees of an astrological chart become > angel-visitants. The poem is in HERMETIC DEFINITION.

About 30 years after Marc Edmund Jones' Sabian Symbols, all 360 of them, supposedly "channeled" (canal-ed like Mars?) but quite a poem in itself.

Wendy

↑ Index

536. Jordan Davis
Mister Apology
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Ok ok. You got me, Rod. I just mad.

I'd like to go back to Chris Stroffolino's post on Harryman, metaphysics, and whether message forces form. Isn't there an essay by Kleist about puppet theater that warns against this kind of analysis? that the self-consciousness it induces destroys the possibility of formulating the message in a beautiful way? I realize this is exactly the injunction Chris is betting against with most of what he writes. Hyperconsciousness (Bach)? Or, as Steve Evans calls it, the mordantly recursive work of Chris Stroffolino. That is, he worries about the moral life of words and the linguistic activity around the ethics of the person engaged in the pursuit of ordinary unhappiness. Not to make this a discussion of individual writers, but following the work of say Milman Parry on Homer, I'd suggest that there are a number of strategies that a writer uses, a number of 'moves' that are combined, not mechanistically but something like that, kinesthetically. These 'moves' are connected to but different from the writer's 'ideas', which it seems to me are the ways the writer looks at [listens to?] what is written (coordination). The 'moves' are often acquired from the texts of other writers (influence), while the 'ideas' seem to be more closely connected to people talking -- the social lives of upbringing, education, etc etc. Then there are the ongoing biographical entropic/building-up effects on the writing -- the moves and the ideas -- that are legible also in the individual's behavior (okay I'm a mystical Freudian).

The 'amusing and reasonable' statute hasn't been on the books for a hundred years, sorry I tried to prosecute.

Now if you wanna talk about mysticism ...

Jordan

↑ Index

537. Rachel Blau DuPlessis
Re: wieners + (alan) davies
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Louis--I git April 11, John Weiners, Writer's House, Penn. But WHEN (i.e. what time of day) Thanx, RBD across the Schuylkill

↑ Index

538. Laura Moriarty
Re: Astrology poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Ira:

My book Persia (Chance Additions) was written in relation to tarot cards - though not apparent from the work the Roman numerals stand for the cards -

some astrological stuff in there - and there is also mention of such in Symmetry (Avec Books) - even a poem called Astrology - I've alwasy been interested in the detritus of western civ/con game aspect of the pseudo sciences -

Norma Cole's book Mars (Listening Chamber) does have to do with the god of war, Dante etc so that should relate - the cover (by Jess) is an interesting use of that kind of material -

Would be happy to backchannel more thought about this -

Laura Moriarty

↑ Index

539. Douglas
New Sun & Moon titles
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Sun & Moon Press has several new titles, just in.
As in the past, we will give anyone ordering through
E-mail from the poetics list a 20% discount.

UNBOUND: A BOOK OF AIDS
by Aaron Shurin

Witnessing the illnes and death of many of friends from AIDS, San Francisco poet Aaron Shurin began a series of writings that, as he puts it, "are the stations of an elarging question: the question, alarmed, of a cell aroused by invasion, or the yearning curl of a lover's body awake on the vacated sheets."
  The startlingly original and provocative book that resulted was not a project but a process of learning about AIDS and its implications THROUGH the activity of writing itself. It is, in that context, not a book ABOUT AIDS but, growing from Shurin's attempt to understand and reach out to those around him, a book OF AIDS.

Cloth $19.95

SEEKING AIR, by Barbara Guest

Guest's 1978 novel, a truly original and fabulous work, is now reprinted into Sun &
Moon's Classics Series.

Paperback, $12.95

THE BLIND CAT BLACK and ORTHODOXIES
by Ece Ayhan
Translated from the Turkish by Murat
Nemet-Nejat

Wonderfully experimental poetry by the great Turkish poet, Ece Ayhan. Both works printed here take the reader through the dark streets of the Galata district of Istanbul, an area where European minorities lives historically side by side with red light sexual activities. Like a modern-day Rimbaud, Ayhan explores a world of fear, love, and wonderment.

MAY SKY: THERE IS ALWAYS TOMORROW
A History and Anthology of Haiku in
the World War II Interment Camps for Japanese American Citizens
Edited and Translated by Violet Kazue
de Christoforo

Sun & Moon is extremely proud to have published this profoundly moving history of the Japanese Haiku clubs and their continution, along with other artistic activities, in the Internment Camps of World War II. Kazue de Christoforo recounts the background of the California clubs, the painful process of arrest and internment, and translates a large selection of haiku written in the camps. She has tracked down most of the active members of the various haiku clubs and presented biographies of them as well. With maps, photographs, and many other fascinating details.

Cloth $29.95

Order from Sun & Moon Press [redacted]
or directly from our Web Site http://www.sunmoon.com

Douglas Messerli

↑ Index

540. Douglas
Re: New Sun & Moon titles
Wed 19 Mar 1997

I forgot to give the price of the Ayhan book. It's Paperbound at $10.95, in the Sun & Moon Classics series.

Douglas wrote:
>
> Sun & Moon Press has several new titles, just in.
> As in the past, we will give anyone ordering through
> E-mail from the poetics list a 20% discount.
>
> UNBOUND: A BOOK OF AIDS
> by Aaron Shurin
>
> Witnessing the illnes and death of many of friends
> from AIDS, San Francisco poet Aaron Shurin began a > series of writings that, as he puts it, "are the > stations of an elarging question: the question,
> alarmed, of a cell aroused by invasion, or the > yearning curl of a lover's body awake on the vacated > sheets."
> The startlingly original and provocative book
> that resulted was not a project but a process of > learning about AIDS and its implications THROUGH > the activity of writing itself. It is, in that > context, not a book ABOUT AIDS but, growing
> from Shurin's attempt to understand and reach out > to those around him, a book OF AIDS.
>
> Cloth $19.95
>
> SEEKING AIR, by Barbara Guest
>
> Guest's 1978 novel, a truly original and > fabulous work, is now reprinted into Sun &
> Moon's Classics Series.
>
> Paperback, $12.95
>
> THE BLIND CAT BLACK and ORTHODOXIES

> by Ece Ayhan
> Translated from the Turkish by Murat
> Nemet-Nejat
>
> Wonderfully experimental poetry by the > great Turkish poet, Ece Ayhan. Both works > printed here take the reader through the > dark streets of the Galata district of > Istanbul, an area where European minorities > lives historically side by side with red > light sexual activities. Like a modern-day > Rimbaud, Ayhan explores a world of fear, > love, and wonderment.
>
> MAY SKY: THERE IS ALWAYS TOMORROW
> A History and Anthology of Haiku in
> the World War II Interment Camps for > Japanese American Citizens
> Edited and Translated by Violet Kazue
> de Christoforo
>
> Sun & Moon is extremely proud to have > published this profoundly moving history > of the Japanese Haiku clubs and their > continution, along with other artistic > activities, in the Internment Camps of > World War II. Kazue de Christoforo recounts > the background of the California clubs, the > painful process of arrest and internment, and > translates a large selection of haiku written > in the camps. She has tracked down most of > the active members of the various haiku clubs > and presented biographies of them as well. With > maps, photographs, and many other fascinating > details.
>
> Cloth $29.95
>
> Order from Sun & Moon Press [redacted]
> or directly from our Web Site http://www.sunmoon.com
>
> Douglas Messerli

↑ Index

541. Mark Weiss
Re: Astrology poetics/music
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Might as well beg the obvious--Gustave Holst's The Planets is about astrology, not space travel. I think it's garbage, but there it is.

At 11:58 AM 3/19/97 -0500, you wrote:
>Has anyone mentioned George Crumb's Makrokosmos? I think both sets are based >on the zodiac. The scores are quite lovely.
>
>Maryrose Larkin
>
>

↑ Index

542. Mark Weiss
Re: Astrology poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

I'm piggy-backing on others to save time. The zodiac is a common theme in the decoration of medieval and renaissance churches, particularly in Italy, but I forget just where. Should be easy to track down.
At 12:25 PM 3/19/97 -0500, you wrote:
>There is a composer named Dane Rudyar, I think, who is more conservative >than Stockhausen. He has also written several books on astrology. That's >all I have. Now if you were doing a study on martyrology ... :-)
>
>Pete Landers
>[redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

543. William Burmeister Prod
Re: formally disturbed
Wed 19 Mar 1997

What Henry Ghoul'd said:
> Under the subject
> AMERICAN LITERATURE - POETRY - LATE 20th CENTURY, you will find eight > titles published between 2012 and 2120, specifically dealing with the > rap/langpo dialectic as an index of cultural dissonance in late-20th > cent. US culture. You will find 3 books on Rap metrics/rhyme, and an whopping > 85 titles on poetry as performance in late millenial caffeine etiquette.

> An if you mess wi me
> you gonna bookified be
> I am the numbala one king
> of dis library thing
> I say libuububububary bury me
> baby inna bubblemath sea - hey
> - Henny Ghoul'd

Yes but how does all that pulp fit into your own weltanschuuang my dear Herr Ghoul?

Throwing books and dead letters at me eh?. You must be Ghoul'd!

An if you bookified baby gonna say you king
of dis library thing
I say, hey, you's a mess.

"Avant-Garde is revolt and metaphysics"
-Rosenberg

Bill B.

↑ Index

544. dbkk
SPT: Pamela Lu and Ann Verornica Simon
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Small Press Traffic presents

Friday March 21, 7:30 p.m.

Pamela Lu
Ann Veronica Simon

New College Theater
777 Valencia Street
$5

Pamela Lu, from Southern California, received a B.A. in math from U.C. Berkeley, and her groundbreaking work has appeared in Explosive, Prosodia, Chain and Clamour. Lu's writing weaves in and out between poetry and fiction, mixing the theoretical wit and spark of Barthes or Avital Ronell with a bewildered confusion and terror-like some Berkeley-born mutant blend of Gayatri Spivak, Shirley Jackson and Kurt Cobain.

Ann Veronica Simon is originally from Michigan. She received her M.F.A. from Louisiana State University and is currently in the Ph.D. program in Rhetoric at U.C. Berkeley. Her work has appeared in Exquisite Corpse, Trivia, Prosodia, Idiom and is forthcoming in Mirage and Clamour. A brilliant performer, Simon is the Ruth Draper de nos jours. Reading her cool, angular poetry is like following the dance notations of Martha Graham.

This event was programmed by Renee Gladman.

↑ Index

545. Louis Cabri
Re: wieners + (alan) davies
Wed 19 Mar 1997

I'll let you know soon as we do - really hope you can make it! It might be as early as 4pm, and no later than 7pm. Louis

↑ Index

546. Hugh Steinberg
Re: Astrological poetics
Wed 19 Mar 1997

You also might want to look at James Merrill's long poem, The Changing Light at Sandover, structured (and supposedly channeled through) a Ouija Board.

Also Ira, you might want to investigate non-western astrologies. I think Francisco Alarcon did some work using Aztec materials. Leslie Silko's the Almanac of the Dead is another place. I'm sure there's been some interesting stuff using Chinese and other Asian divination resources as well.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

547. eric pape
Re: A branch off the "Disturbed" thread
Wed 19 Mar 1997

Joe and Susan: I tried to send separate posts a day ago but my server somehoww kicked it back to me. Hence the delay. I'm glad to see someone else is willing to face the sloppiness of the idea of teaching as "making a better world." It is sloppy, of course, to say so, and entirely impractical, but it's something I keep abutting against in my own teaching. I think, really, its all the hope I have, at least in the more general pedagogical terms we've been addressing. Of course, there is all the hope in the world on a student by student basis, and perhaps that's the point after all. But at some point, I think, we will have to more rigorously explain what we mean by a better world, but that will have to deal with questionsof revolution, utopia, etc, which can't clearly be addressed here.But this must be the central ideal of any pedagogy. Yes,Susan, this threadhas come up before several times, with some very interesting results. If I remember properly, Gwyn and Carolyn Forche had some particularly important things to say in this context (I hope I'm not putting words in folks's mouths). But I think this is something that will keep coming up not only in poetic situations, since so many poets now teach, but also for "radicals,"since so many radicals also teach. Of course, this is not to say, here on this list more so, that poetry or radical politics has come to find a privileged site in academia. I certainly hope not, since I may soon be leaving the profession. Nevertheless, for those of us caught between, so to speak, it is important we keep talking about this stuff. Finally, I like to think that I too teach my students how to be more critical consumers of culture, questioners, etc. Most of the time, though I think I just entertainthem for awhile and release them to do their own work. I remember how important it was for me to find out that there was a context in which such stuff as poetry mattered, and maybe that's the best thing I can provide them. I just hope, basically, that I don't get in their way. Thanks, Eric.

↑ Index

548. Mark Roberts

(fwd) AWOL: PANIC MORALITY, MEDIA, CULTURE Conference

Thu 20 Mar 1997

In case anyone is passing through Sydney.....

mark

> Date: Wed, 19 Mar 1997 23:58:56 +1000
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (AWOL)
> Subject: AWOL: PANIC MORALITY, MEDIA, CULTURE Conference
>
> The following information has been posted by AWOL for the organisers of the PANIC MORALITY, MEDIA, CULTURE Conference at Artspace. Please address all enquiries to Artspace at the contacts listed below.
>
> **********

PANIC MORALITY, MEDIA, CULTURE
Conference at Artspace

Saturday 12 April 9.30am - 5.30pm

Last year was a year of panics in Australia. The news constantly took us in close to terror and frenzy. Victims and eyewitnesses were coaxed to share their horror. Revelations were made about the sources of the panics, and figures emerged to fear and hate: killers, pedophiles, Asians.

So far this year it's business as usual in the news media: yet another massacre, yet more revelations of abuse... But in 1996, when Australians expressed their nostalgia for home and 'family values', their yearning for belonging and security, fears were unleashed of strange introverts, diplomats, clerics, migrants, street people. Our public places are anonymous and nondescript, yet they house these clever and well-disguised devils. And the news media are obvious culprits in creating the 'threats', with their entertainment values, ritual practices and social control agendas. Can the media do panic differently?

Other fears were more established, and these, curiously, are often about new media: violent video games, Internet porn, even commercial television. A moral crisis is provoked, tough measures are called for and a particularly susceptible target is named: boys, women, Generation X. But whose crisis is this?

In 1972 British sociologist Stanley Cohen published Folk Devils and Moral Panics in response to similar outbreaks of fear and frenzy. There were mods, rockers, muggings and football hooliganism. His terms 'folk devil' and 'moral panic' have become common sense categories in media and cultural studies, so that we don't think of them as connected to a particular theoretical tradition, the study of youth subcultures. What use are the categories when much of that tradition has been superseded?

Speakers:

Paul Jones (Dept of Sociology & Social Anthropology, UNSW) The Role of 'Moral Panic' in the Work of Stuart Hall

Jeannie Martin & Fiona Allon (Faculty of Humanities & Social Sciences, UTS) Panic in the Streets: home, homelessness & public spaces

George Morgan (Centre for Aboriginal Cultural Studies, University of Western Sydney) The Bulletin, Street Crime & the Larrikin Moral Panic in the Late 19th Century

Catharine Lumby (Media & Communication Studies, Macquarie University), author of Bad Girls (Allen & Unwin), Mindless Violence & Loveless Sex:

John Potts (Media & Communi-cation Studies, Macquarie University) The Irrational in Commercial Television News

Philip Bell (Media & Communi-cation Studies, UNSW) Blainey and Hanson: the media "debates"

Lea Redfern (Faculty of Humanities & Social Sciences, UTS) The Pedophile as "folk devil"

Stephen Stockwell (Faculty of Education & the Arts, Griffith University) Childsplay, Racism and Port Arthur

Sally Stockbridge (Network 10) & Tim Dwyer (Aust Broadcasting Authority) Recurring moral panics & new methods of regulation

Clarice Butkus & Mark Evans (Media & Communication Studies, Macquarie University) Regulating the Emergent: traditional media's moral panic

Jason Sternberg (Dept of Journalism, University of Queens-land) Generation X: lifestyle panics & the new generation gap

David Marshall (Media & Cultural Studies Centre, University of Queensland) Technophobia: video-games, computer hacks & cybernetics

Registration: Full Day ($20 full / $15 concession) or Single Sessions - 3 in total (Individual Sessions $8 full / $6 concession)

For full program details and registration, please contact Artspace.

Artspace
The Gunnery
43 - 51 Cowper Wharf Road
Woolloomooloo NSW 2011
Australia

tel [redacted]
fax [redacted]
e-mail [redacted]
URL http://www.culture.com.au/scan/artspace/

****

> AWOL
> Australian Writing On Line
> [redacted]
> http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
> PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
> Phone 61 2 97475667, Mobile 015063970
> Fax 61 2 97472802

Mark Roberts SIS website: http://www.usyd.edu.au/su/sis/
SIS Team
Building G05 Maze Crescent
University of Sydney
Phone 61 2 93517710
Mobile 015063970
Fax 61 2 93517711

↑ Index

549. David Israel

Re: Astrological poetics

Thu 20 Mar 1997

Hugh Steinberg notes --

> ...Also Ira, you might want to investigate non-western astrologies. I think Francisco Alarcon did some work using Aztec materials.

Reminds of Octavio Paz's Puerto del Sol (I think?) -- based (if memory serves) on (or inspired by) the Aztec calendar. Enjoyable translation was done by Elliot Weinberger.

BTW, I recall seeing "new formalist" Dana Gioia's vol. entitled Daily Horoscope (Graywolf Press) --though I somehow doubt it has much to do w/ horoscopes.

As interesting as poetry based on astrological themes might be a study of astrological coordinates of poets. I find myself wondering about some of the classics -- Whitman vs. Dickinsen (Leo vs. Virgo? -- a wild guess); Williams vs. Pound (Taurus vs. Scorpio? -- ditto). (I was never much good w/ guessing sun-sign of conversants at parties, so be gentle w/ me if I've flubbed this one on all counts.)

-- David (sun in Gemini, moon in Libra) Israel

↑ Index

550. George Bowering
Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
Thu 20 Mar 1997

> for one thing form is never more than an extension of content means that content becomes form and extends form: so the reality of form is integral: experience made actual in a construct of words

Yeah, but it is literally true that one loves only form, & form comes into being when the thing is born.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

551. Pierre Joris
Re: Astrology poetics/music
Thu 20 Mar 1997

Ira -- listening right now to John Coltrane's INTERSTELLAR SPACE THE 6 CUTS OF WHICH ARE TITLED: 1. MARS 2. LEO 3.VENUS 4. JUPITER VARIATION 5
JUPITER 6. SATURN -- the music (Coltrane on tenor & bells, Rashied Ali on drums) is instellar, the space, according to the titles, however sub-solar. Trane's last recording. -- Pierre

==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://www.albany.edu/~joris/

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in _one_ language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is, [...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose it as a conquering assertion. -- Maurice Blanchot

==========

↑ Index

552. bat hartman
Re: Astrological poetics
Thu 20 Mar 1997

On Thu, 20 Mar 1997, David Israel wrote:
> the classics -- Whitman vs. Dickinsen (Leo vs. Virgo? -- a wild guess); > Williams vs. Pound (Taurus vs. Scorpio? -- ditto). (I was never much > good w/ guessing sun-sign of conversants at parties, so be gentle w/ me if > I've flubbed this one on all counts.)

You got Pound right--Oct. 30, just shy of All Souls'. Williams is the Virgo, Sept. 17. Whitman, May 31--Gemini, like Yeats & Dylan & Emerson. Dickinson, Dec. 10, Sagittarius. All courtesy of book of days from a student.

↑ Index

553. Jonathan A Levin
Re: force mouth content
Thu 20 Mar 1997

I like Jordan't tag line, so keep it.

I've been wondering much lately myself about form/content, though in a different context. I'm tempted to want to say, in Rorty fashion, that it's a bad metaphor and we're better off just letting go of it. Where does it come from? I can't imagine anyone in a Renaissance context, sonneteers, say, really having any use for it. Poetic practice would simply make the distinction irrelevant, and even impossible to formulate. When is it formulable? After, I think, Goethe and Coleridge, who make a point of saying form is content in order to combat a hyperrationalized scheme governed by analysis, taking things apart, murdering to dissect, etc. Form/Content is a product of the analysis wing of 18th century rationalism. (Frankly, I don't know if I have my history right here: I'm shooting from the hip, but I've been trying to understand the larger contexts of organicism, in order to understand the larger contexts of contemporary holism/ecology metaphors.)

Here's where I'm heading: from an organic point of view, or from the modified organicism that now passes as holism, form is necessarily an expression of content and content is necessarily a manifestation of form. They can't be teased apart. And the effort to keep talking in that language can only reflect our continued abasement before the gods of enlightenment analysis.

I'm still thinking about the practical implications for poetry and "formal" "experiment." "!" This could take a long time.

Jonathan Levin

↑ Index

554. Douglas Barbour
Re: that other thread about teaching
Thu 20 Mar 1997

Joe Safdie makes some good points (although I didnt read his call to arms until I had sent in my previous post with those terms in it). But all this talk about conservative & innovative form/content keeps coming up because it is important & it does have something to do with what many of us do. Hands up: how many of us have to teach poets we dont always admire as much as some of the poets we dont get a good chance to teach?

I taught a 3rd year course on Post-WW2 poetry in the US & the UK: it's a coverage course, so I have to teach such as Larkin, Lowell, those "L"s (both of whom, btw, Marjorie has written extremely interesting recent[last decade anyway] essays on), as well as Creeley, Olson, Levertov, O'Hara. I gave up on the Norton (partly because I even disagreed with its choices of poems by its poets, let alone appalling representation of those I care for (when they're in there). But some students really 'like' Larkin or Lowell or Plath. They find their work 'liberating,' 'moving.' say it 'speaks' to them. Wanting, like Joe, to let them find their own ways (as much as I can do so when I am up front & have all that power), I can certainly alert them to my biases, but also praise them for not just following my lead. Besides, there are interesting things to say about some of these writers' poems, both positive & critical (Larkin is fascinating as a figure of his culture, which so many in that culture 'trust': why?). Rich tends to capture the attention of many young women. Perhaps they will go beyond her & eventually find her writing a problem because it doesnt fully enact the free flow it announces, Perhaps not. There is an argument to be made for the reach of writing that carries a somewhat radical message in a way that allows many readers to connect with it (but there I am somehow falling into that division again; even as I say, everyday, that it is a construct & false, it's hard to teach without invoking it on some level, & then immediately, again, saying, no, no, that's not whatI meant at all...)

All of which is just to say, I've found this thread really interesting & do want to keep thinking the dangers inherent in what goes on when we carry our desires & biases into the classroom, a place where we dont always have complete control over what we teach.

==========

========== Douglas Barbour
How long Department of English

University of Alberta it takes for the promise to arrive, Edmonton
Alberta T6G 2E5 shaped as a flirt, a cheating [redacted]
FAX:[redacted] kiss, a whistle, an ambulance. H: [redacted]
John Tranter

↑ Index

555. Louis Cabri
spicer on f/c
Thu 20 Mar 1997

The idealist concept-philosophy that Jonathan Levin traces for one dichotomy - form/content - of the discursive trade on poetry haunts this list much more than any tomb of a living poet. Actually Spicer's theory, in the quote Kevin Killian posted from _Language_, has been, in the laboratories of the university humanities departments, recently confirmed (much like Einstein's theories were by later empirical observation of the galaxy): for if you trace the history of the condom - materials employed, its link-up with industrial manufacture, embeddedness [literally] in the domestic patriarchal economy, etc etc, and its recent marketing, etc., the whole social-historical works connected with it - you will find it parallels the development of the form/content dichotomy (and/or identity) in poetics.

Louis Cabri

↑ Index

556. oren.izenberg
Re: force mouth content
Thu 20 Mar 1997

---

jonathan,

I don't know when "form" and "content" began to play these particular roles as TERMS, but the concepts are older than you allow-- you _might_ start with Bacon, whose critique of eloquence distinguishes between copia verborum and copia rerum-- so that augmentation, increase, discovery, PROPERLY takes place in relation to things rather than words, which are consigned to poetry. Poetry, for Bacon, marks the outside of the knowledge system...poetry is not error, it is that which is known not to be true.

But the appearance of copia with reference to vernacular English goes back to Puttenham...who annexes the rhetorical taxonomy of figures (in the Arte of English Poesie) on behalf of poetry, making the figuration the essence of poetry and backforming rhetoric into a mode of speech resistant to figuration. Puttenham's kind is account of poetry as the change in the word that MAKES NO DIFFERENCE even as it is different (thus preserving 'innovation' while bracketing its association with factions and violence), is the prior move that allows Bacon to eliminate poetry from counting as knowledge at all.

The Romantics had to "recover" form, not just from the Enlightenment , but from the whole long history of epistemology as such, which depends in large measure on the invention of the difference between words and things--a difference in which poetry was a main antagonist and patsy.

take care,
O.

↑ Index

557. Douglas Barbour

Re: Astrology poetics/Spicer's "Language"

Thu 20 Mar 1997

I'd forgotten that lovely quote from Spicer, but thanks, it reminded me of George Bowering's long poem, _Allophanes_, which begins "The snowball appears in Hell / every morniing at seven." & continues:

Dr. Babel contends about the world's form, striking its prepared strings endlessly, a pleasure moving rings outward thru the universe. All sentences are to be served.

It then keeps its eyes fixed firmly far away from the stars. Probably doesnt fit either, since whatever 'mysticism' it engages it denies with wit -- including astrology. "Fixed" things & ideas: "Drive right past that lady, that's / St. As. Is."

every so often it's worth remembering George writes some damn fine poems, as well as all these fun postings...

========== Douglas Barbour
How long Department of English

University of Alberta
Alberta T6G 2E5

it takes for the promise to arrive, Edmonton shaped as a flirt, a cheating [redacted]

FAX:[redacted] kiss, a whistle, an ambulance. H: [redacted]
John Tranter

↑ Index

558. Lisa Samuels
Re: force mouth content
Thu 20 Mar 1997

---

oren's post strikes me as a very good comment on the f/c business -- as though 'form' and 'content' were easy terms to dismantle! i'd say 'the whole long history of epistemology as such' =is= where we have to 'start' -- whatever it is we propose, exactly, to 'start' doing or changing or overcoming.

one book i have found very useful for these matters is marcia colish's =the mirror of language. a study in the medieval theory of knowledge= (revised edition, nebraska, 1983). she explains that classical philosophers tended to treat words as one type of sign, while augustine and other medieval thinkers tended to view signification as primarily verbal. meanwhile christianity encouraged the notion that knowledge was semiotic; but knowledge of god was inexact and so that encouraged the notion of signs as inexact. while medieval sign theory saw the =aenigma= of language as essential to understanding the content of the world, the development of formal logic (12th-14th centuries) decisively separated reality, thought, and language.

can we have aquinas's '=verbum mentis='? only if language is the whole world. that's why the form/content debate won't go away, i think, though it can be profitably imagined in less binary ways.

-lisa s.

According to [redacted]:
>
> jonathan,
>
> I don't know when "form" and "content" began to play these particular > roles as TERMS, but the concepts are older than you allow-- you _might_ > start with Bacon, whose critique of eloquence distinguishes between copia > verborum and copia rerum-- so that augmentation, increase, discovery, > PROPERLY takes place in relation to things rather than words, which are > consigned to poetry. Poetry, for Bacon, marks the outside of the > knowledge system...poetry is not error, it is that which is known not to > be true.
>
> But the appearance of copia with reference to vernacular English goes > back to Puttenham...who annexes the rhetorical taxonomy of figures (in > the Arte of English Poesie) on behalf of poetry, making the figuration > the essence of poetry and backforming rhetoric into a mode of speech > resistant to figuration. Puttenham's kind is account of poetry as the > change in the word that MAKES NO DIFFERENCE even as it is different (thus > preserving 'innovation' while bracketing its association with factions > and violence), is the prior move that allows Bacon to eliminate poetry from > counting as knowledge at all.

>
> The Romantics had to "recover" form, not just from the Enlightenment , but > from the whole long history of epistemology as such, which depends in > large measure on the invention of the difference between words and > things--a difference in which poetry was a main antagonist and patsy.
>
> take care,
> O.
>

↑ Index

559. Aaron Vidaver

Against Wisdom as Such

Thu 20 Mar 1997

It's delightful that Kevin Killian quotes Spicer, and in particular that poem. The Seminar on Mythos at Runcible Mountain College (here in Vancouver) was discussing the poem in our class just last week.

I'm not clear on how the poem can be seen as aligning itself with Olson contra Duncan. We thought that the poem passed judgement over both of them as false prophets. But also, there's something odd in Spicer's positive conception of the mythic within his own poetry.

Olson's polemic against Duncan charges him with illegitimately dragging in figures external to art and scolds him for not being properly subordinate to the moment of composition.

"I fall back on a difference I am certain the poet at least has to be fierce about: that he is not free to be part of, or to be any, sect; that there are no symbols to him, there are only his own composed forms, and each one soley the issue of the time of the moment of its creation, not any ultimate except what he in his heat and that instant in its solidity yield. That the poet cannot afford to traffick in any other 'sign' that his one, his self, the man or woman he is. Otherwise

God does rush in. And art is washed away, turned into that second force, religion." (Human Universe, 68-9)

Our seminar thought that Spicer's criticism of the arrogance of the poet extended to Olson because of the latter's insistence upon the MOMENT of writing, upon the primacy of the poet IN that moment, and hence the "usability" of anything which may enter the field-- including god, star, totem. But it is odd, too, that Spicer brings in the image of the condom. To what use does one put a spattered, worn-out condom?

More troubling for us, however, was the question of what this thing called belief has to do with poetry. ("If you don't believe in a god, don't quote him"). Doesn't the very idea betray the principle of dictation? What business is it of the poet to be dabbling in epistemology at all?

Also troubling was the question of distinguishing the mythological from the non-mythological within a poem. Why point to the presence of "Zeus" as a problem while "house" remains an understood commonplace, readily assimilated into a readerly unpacking. Is there a clear basis for making the distinction without reverting to some form of scientism ("that which is non-cognitive does not exist")?

I'm curious to hear any replies to these comments, here, or elsewhere.

Aaron Vidaver, on behalf of the Seminar on Mythos
Runcible Mountain College

Here too of import is Duncan's "And a Wisdom as Such."

(Etude from the Fourth Treatise of the _Convivio_, Chapters XVII and XXI)

And a wisdom as such, a loosening of energies and every gain! For good.
A rushing-in place of "God", if it be!

Open out like a rose that can no longer keep its center closed but, practicing for Death, lets go, let's go, littering the ground with petals of its rime,

_"and spreads abroad the last perfume which has been generated within"--_ sweet warning the heart,

the rose hip, knows of how soon the rapturous outpouring speech of self into the silence of the mind comes home, and, even the core dispersed, in darkness of the ground is gone

out from me, the very last of me, till I am rid of every rind and seed into that sweetness, that final giving over, letting go,
that scattering of every nobleness...

_"the seed of blessedness draws near   despatcht by God into the welling soul."

[October 20,1973]

↑ Index

560. Dale Smith
Re: Astrological poetics
Thu 20 Mar 1997

Keats, Dostoevsky, Augustine, Lamantia, Goethe, Musil, Malreaux, Notley, Berrigan, and Kyger, to name a few.

↑ Index

561. Matthias Regan
Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.
Thu 20 Mar 1997

At 12:18 AM 3/20/97 -0800, you wrote:

> for one thing form is never more than an extension of content means that content becomes form and extends form: so the reality of form is integral: experience made actual in a construct of words
>
> Yeah, but it is literally true that one loves only form, & form comes into being when the thing is born.

Form might be very popular now, might have been very popular for the modernists, but I'm not so sure that "one loves _only_ form" would apply to much eng. poetry before 1900. Hopkins makes a pretty good case against love of form in "Kingfishers Catch Fire"; and I think Herbert in _The Temple_ ultimately discards form, a vehicle for this known world only. I make this case to suggest that in at least eng. lit. the love of form and form alone is relatively new and perhaps we shouldn't take it so much for granted. For the modernists the form/content dualism is analagous to, if not another word for, a dualism between individual, different details and abstractions. (This dualism breaks down when the idea of a single right abstraction dissolves, Truth becoming hegemony.) (I'm absolutely NOT advocating some wildly reactionary return to poetry of a Christian God as the above examples, taken alone, might indicate.This is more an effort to describe what people today think when they think about "poetry.") Someone in the astrological poetry thread recently mentioned Merrill: what was form for him? I belive _Changing Light_ makes use of almost every major "poetic form" in eng. (This discussion hasn't been limited to traditional ideas of form, but as a shorthand signifier of poetic form historical rhymes & meters work well.) And of course the whole poem claims it was originally to be a novel. Is the message something other than its form when a Ouji board is used?

Matthias, pondering loudly

↑ Index

562. Matthias Regan
Re: Astrological poetics
Thu 20 Mar 1997

At 08:47 AM 3/20/97 -0500, you wrote:
>
>You got Pound right--Oct. 30, just shy of All Souls'. Williams is the >Virgo, Sept. 17. Whitman, May 31--Gemini, like Yeats & Dylan & Emerson.
>Dickinson, Dec. 10, Sagittarius. All courtesy of book of days from a >student.

What about Scorpios? Who shares signs with me? I remember Sam Shepard from a Calender I used to have...

↑ Index

563. henry gould
form/content? good idea!
Thu 20 Mar 1997

It's not the questions around form/content (which seem to be endless and inherent, whether you're coming from a theoretical/philosophical/historical interest or from a fabricator's perspective) over which I lose my easily- lost temper. It's the other binary - the idea that a poet goes for "traditional" (rhyme/meter) or "innovative" - that loses me. But yes nobody really said that anyway so let's not start that wheel going, Hank...

I liked what Mark Wallace said about people like Mac Low & other "innovators" working from their own "strict" forms. This ground has been plowed many a time but it's worth remembering... & for my book, again Valery's essays are a gold mine of insight on these questions. See "Man and the Seashell" on form & content - and the useless freedom of art-making as its only truly HUMAN characteristic. Such a position should give pause to both philosophical "enemies" of poetry (Bacon?) and philosophical "friends" (all those false friends in the Party of Ideology - are you listening, "Poetry & the Public Sphereoids"? I's bein provocative, I thinks uh hopes) - Henry Gould

↑ Index

564. David Kellogg
Re: far reader
Thu 20 Mar 1997

Thanks, Louis, for the reference to Mittenthal, which I did not know. I'm somewhat mystified by the broad brush of your dismissal, however, as well as its specifics. For example, I don't understand the critique about poetry being "hardly ever referred to described or invoked"; my copy, anyway, invokes poetry in every essay except for the chapter entitled "in defense of ideology." Poets quoted in block form include Auden, Marvell, Blake, Tadeusz Rózewicz, Mahmoud Darwish, Roque Dalton, Erich Fried, Nazim Hikmet, Herberto Padilla, Andrei Voznesensky, Robert Bly, Bob Perelman, and Scully himself.

At 12:11 AM 3/19/97 -0500, Louis Cabri wrote: >Robert Mittenthal brilliantly critiques James Scully's book, >_Line Break_, starting from the fact that while the book is about >the "the social practice of poetry" poetry is hardly ever >referred to described or invoked. And Scully didn't even write >his book on a listserv! (See Mittenthal's review in _Writing_ 25 >[1990].) Of course arguing from out of - from within - poetry >does not _garantee_ a better argument either - that is, a truly >"deep encounter," for instance, as Christopher Alexander would >urge practitioners to experience with their medium. Does close >reading even garantee an argument? No longer - yet perhaps if you are >reading the Metaphysicals, Chris. Thus it might be necessary in >arguing for the "social practice of poetry" to not mention poetry >at all. Of course arguing _alongside_ poetry, in paralogue as it >were, does not garantee a better argument either - that is, a >truly deep encounter with "social practice...." Apart from saying >that, I may as well also state that for me there are so many >unhelpful contradictions and connotations in the language of the >quotation from Scully's book, that I think David Kellogg posted,

>I don't know where to even begin in pointing them out. Here's >one, not necessarily the best: Is he for or against a >"metahistorical source of illumination" for poetry? From his own >disparaging language, I would say definitely not. Yet I can't >figure out from the quotation how he proposes that "shared >understanding" would occur elsewise. Share my cropper.

Again, I guess I'm lost. Of course he's not for such a "metahistorical source of illumination." The point of invoking such a source in order to dismiss it, in my reading, is to qualify his own pronouncements as both provisional and presumptuous, in other words to press up against the limits of the sayable within the discourse of talk (writing) about poetry. The contradictions are in the field itself before they're in Scully's intervention -- not to say they're _not_ in his interventions, which is precisely his point.

Perhaps I blurbed his book too highly. I came across it when I was particularly distressed by the numbingly repeated gestures of most poetry criticism; Scully's book, for me, avoided these gestures, and thus was (and is) a positive event.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

The book was printed up
The words all ran together
The pages black with ink
So the faux po►s used invisible stink

It was a fluke that you were inside of the coffin as they swung it upon their shoulders
Wasn►t it a real nice graveride?
You►re finally inside in (inside)
Real nice graveride riptide....

Woho the death of poetry
Mercifully fast
Only lasted a millenium of two
The art of the past

No mo po get down to bisness Po►s no show
Good riddance

The view was dark/hark/lark/bark/park
The time was passing slo/ e motion
The day was calm and a foggy, cool and a balmy, April is the cruelest/coolest

The creeps were creeping out Shouting eulogymissiles in the street
The word's worth opposite beat
The drummer►s melodizing feet

Typewriters on parade
Walt►n►Emily rolling grave
Nothing left save to save
The Death of Poetry

It was a computer thing
A neuter thing
Belligerent knucklehead
Brat art teeth shred
Flesh word battery nozzle
Fair skin carousal
Itchy mean grouse kiss
Whatta life death is
The Death of Poetry

↑ Index

566. henry gould
Re: The Death of Poetry
Thu 20 Mar 1997

The Dearth of Poetry

Man & a seashell up out of bat hell - was human nature
a double feature?
Have a future?
Nature or Nurture?

Shakespeare a big fish
he made a mish-mash
call it "trod culture"
- neurotic vulture had his ideology made no apology

Make a better fry invent a new pie use our own mix
call it Edge Poetix debunk the old slag corroded lang-wag

Huffa puff po
2000 leagues below
Atlantis deep well
she sell a seashell almost unnatural (poesie after all)

(--you win, Nyupoman)

↑ Index

567. David Israel
for Blarnes scholiasts & such
Thu 20 Mar 1997

Henry et alia,

this just in.... (msg. attached)

best, d.i.

p.s.: further anent Robbie Basho, might interest: I personally typed up his unpublished (& alas, now poss. lost) MS entitled The Divan of Sky Bull. Robbie complained (mildly) that I tinkered w/ his syntax (or poss. diction), shifting the poems in (what he viewed as) China-influenced directions. But I dare say he seemed pleased withal. His anthemic "Bury My Heart at Wonded Knee" still rings in my ears (not in the Divan, which was poetry proper rather than song-lyrics; rather, was on an album called [something or other?] Eagle . . . details fade; blue cover).

1.8c) with spool id 18322 for [redacted]; Thu, 20 Mar 1997
17:16:34 -0500
Thu, 20 Mar 1997 14:06:54 -0800 (PST)
14:06:54 PST

Date: Thu, 20 Mar 1997 14:06:54 -0800
From: Wounded-dog Ken Meherdas Littlebear Ninety
<[redacted]>
Subject: Ram Dass web site
To: [redacted]

Up dated health news plus previous info and some fun grafics can be found on the three Ram Dass home pages beginning at http://www.geocities.com/westhollywood/heights/1143/ramdas.html Hey folks that's what serch engines are for:-) (this from alta vista)

Get Your Web-Based Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

568. amato
The Death of Poetry
Thu 20 Mar 1997

(yet the thread... poof!

↑ Index

569. David Israel
p.s. re: Ram Dass
Thu 20 Mar 1997

pardon, but a URL correction hath been pointed out:

~~~
~~~

>>> Wounded-dog Ken Meherdas Littlebear Ninety <[redacted]> 03/20/97 05:27pm >>> that should be http://www.geocities.com/westhollywood/heights/1143/ramdass.html sorry!
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

[chap could add an r to corection too, but not all so crucial] (shouldn't wish to proffer inauthentic info / pseudo-URLs, ergo this addendum) d.i.
1.8c) with spool id 18322 for [redacted]; Thu, 20 Mar 1997
17:16:34 -0500
Thu, 20 Mar 1997 14:06:54 -0800 (PST)
14:06:54 PST
Date: Thu, 20 Mar 1997 14:06:54 -0800
From: Wounded-dog Ken Meherdas Littlebear Ninety
<[redacted]>
Subject: Ram Dass web site
To: [redacted]

Up dated health news plus previous info and some fun grafics can be found on the three Ram Dass home pages beginning at http://www.geocities.com/westhollywood/heights/1143/ramdas.html Hey folks that's what serch engines are for:-) (this from alta vista)

Get Your Web-Based Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

570. Stephen Cope
Re: Astrology poetics/music
Thu 20 Mar 1997

Trane was very much involved w/ astrology. Bill Cole makes a point about this, if I remember correctly, in his biography. Look into Braxton as well. Graham Lock's book _Forces in Motion_ gives an overview of Braxton's chart...

On angelology (but not astrology): there is of course Henri Corbin, whose work has been applied and/or alluded to by Olson, Duncan, Clarke, and Mackey (among many others I'm sure).

In brief,

Stephen Cope
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

> Ira -- listening right now to John Coltrane's INTERSTELLAR SPACE THE 6
> CUTS OF WHICH ARE TITLED: 1. MARS 2. LEO 3.VENUS 4. JUPITER VARIATION
> 5
> JUPITER 6. SATURN -- the music (Coltrane on tenor & bells, Rashied Ali > on drums) is instellar, the space, according to the titles, however > sub-solar. Trane's last recording. -- Pierre
> ==========
> pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
> tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
> http://www.albany.edu/~joris/
> ---
> Everything that allows men to become rooted, through > values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
> _one_ language, is the principle of alienation which
> constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
> [...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
> and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
> it as a conquering assertion. -- Maurice Blanchot
> ==========

↑ Index

571. P.Standard Schaefer

LA Magazines

Thu 20 Mar 1997

Just wanted to call everyone's attention to two interesting magazines coming out of Los Angeles. The older more established one is Ribot (ree-boe) edited/published by Paul Vangelisti. The sixth issue has a "history" as a theme. A corresponding conference will be held on the island of Catalina in May. Guests will include Ray DiPalma, Douglas Messerli, Dennis Phillips, Kevin Young, and others. The second magazine is called Rhizome and it was started by some younger people, myself included, in order to facilitate a conversation between east coast and west coast writers. Writers included are Cole Swenson, Mac Wellman, Charles Bernstein, Juliana Spahr, Martine Bellen, Martha Ronk, Spencer Selby, Paul Vangelisti, and many others. It is available for $10.00. Checks should be written to Standard Schaefer. 366 S.Mentor Ave. #108, Pasadena, CA 91106. It will also be distributed by Small Press Distributors, Fine Print, Berhard DeBoers in short time. Submissions will accepted through July. Rhizome also carries reviews and should be queried if anyone would like to submit one of those.

Thanks for your time.

↑ Index

572. Louis Cabri
Re: far reader
Fri 21 Mar 1997

I realize only now, David, that I left out one important word in my account--and I have disserviced Mittenthal's critique as a result: Scully does not directly write of _living_ poets (except thirdhand of two besides himself). I would likely not have overlooked this had I a copy of Scully's book at hand--which I don't. Robert Mittenthal says:

> The only reference to living North American writers (save Scully's discussion of his own work) comes to us third hand via an article in the _New York Times Book Review_, by Michael Davidson, which briefly contrasts two paragraphs from Robert Bly and Bob Perelman. That Scully discounts both these writers' works as symptomatic of bourgeois ideology without referring to more than two decontextualized paragraphs in Davidson's article is indicative of just how (in Scully's words) "little curiosity many poets have regarding their own language" (p. 73 [_Line Break_]). In eight essays, two of which are not about poetry at all, Scully tries to make a case for a poetry that would communicate (i.e., convert or commit us to) his political ideals. This idealized poetry, instead of physically embodyting language, would use it as if it had no physical presence.... (_Writing_ 25, p. 87)

That is: as if language has no physical--in the sense of living-- presence. And yet (this is Mittenthal's point, I think) Scully argues for a social practice (of commitment, for/by poetry). It's undoubtfully important to remember that Scully is writing in the 1980s, as is Mittenthal, almost. In a way, Mittenthal's review neatly summarizes Language Writing doxa, and thereby also the larger debate of how the politics of language in the 1980s seemed, for some, to be divided into (not surprisingly) two camps, on one side intralanguage-oriented, and on the other extralanguage-oriented views on politics and the political--Mitttenthal and Scully, respectively. Together with some others including Maria Damon I think you have, in your response to Marjorie Perloff's last post (the one that proposes to narrate a history of the "rise" of a representational politics of poetries) you have alluded to the concept of the field itself in which these two camps lay (in which I have M and S as allegorical figure-generals), and to, therefore, the existence of other camps, which were overlooked, elided by these two camps. But it is precisely the field itself--that is, equal to the field itself--that was in contestation by these two camps. No better proof of how bitter and divisive this contest was, I think, than Erica Hunt's essay in _The Politics of Poetic Form_. That moment, historical, of equivalency to the field itself, has passed, as Steve Evans knows, or is at least no longer recognizable in those terms today, I think. And so now the field looks larger, or large, or horizontal (when before it all seemed verticle and oppressive) and is, besides, changing. Gosh! Where was I...? What about others' views on this history? Meanwhile--or, elsewhere--_Mirage_, in San Francisco, ed. Kevin Killlian, puts out a special on John Wieners in 1985. Some of it is in tension with a getting-ready-to-have-been-"dominant"-subordinate poetics:

> Dear John [Wieners, presumably],
> I'm so tired of being serious now tho the 80s writing scene increasingly demands it. And where's all my fancy French crit vocab gotten me? Into _Poetics Journal_? Fat chance! (Steve Abbott, "Wienerschnitzel," _Mirage_ p. 7)

In any event I will photocopy Mittenthal's review for you, if your library doesn't have _Writing_ 25 (1990)--this is to anyone, I guess.

↑ Index

573. Marjorie Perloff

Re: Form/Content again

Fri 21 Mar 1997

Well, today's postings are so intresting so I think I'll throw in a word or two after a week or so of being too tired to respond to all the deeply disturbing allegations etc.

I've been reading the various new books on Duchamp (the bio by Calvin Tompkins only so-so, but I recommend strongly Jerrold Siegel's new book--a kind of psychobiography that really says new things about the work. It's called THE PRIVATE WORLDS OF MARCEL DUCHAMP (California, 1996). Anyway, Duchamp, who is hardly a "formalist" has in fact an incredible sense of "form" in that the how always surpasses the what--in fact there is no "what." Take, for instance, the care D took to have the urinal photographed by Stieglitz in front of the Mardsen Hartley painting so that the inverted "fountain" matches the shape in Hartley with the Buddha. It's so brilliant and that's how we almost always see "Fountain." So what is "content" here outside form?

In contrast--and here comes content--I'm reading with sick fascination the recently published (thus far only in German) diaries by Victor Klemperer, 1933-45, a best-seller in Germany and reviewed recently in TLS. Klemperer was one of the few Jewish intellectuals (maybe the only one) who stayed in Germany--Dresden, where he was a French prof--throughout the whole Nazi time and his diary, begun the day Hitler became Chancellor and Klemperer sees exactly what goes on day by day as all his friends are fired and stores are shut down and the most vile stuff goes on and yet, for complex set of reasons doesn't try to leave. I shall have nightmares about these diaries no doubt. They are very well written. But I would never read them a second time because there would be no point--I'm absorbing the content. Wheras, as the man said, Poetry is news that stays news."

I know--there's no hard and fast contrast between art and non-art but that, to me, is the difference between poetry and, say, these Klemperer diaries. Poetry is what must be reread--can only be reread. And by that criterion, a lot that passes for "poetry" at the moment just isn't. It's absorbable in a linear way. Five years from now no one will give a damn. And so I don't think we need be so generous that we say, oh great, I love it all! Let's reach out--and all that bla bla. But "form" can never just mean stanza form or generative device. Generative devices can be brilliantly used as in Oulipo, Sorrentino, Silliman, Hejinian, etc etc. but per se no device is either good or bad.

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

574. William Burmeister Prod
Re: Against Wisdom as Such
Fri 21 Mar 1997

Aaron writes:

> More troubling for us, however, was the question of what this thing called belief has to do with poetry. ("If you don't believe in a god, don't quote him"). Doesn't the very idea betray the principle of dictation?

I don't know. What about dictation as inspiration?

&
> Also troubling was the question of distinguishing the mythological > from the non-mythological within a poem. Why point to the presence > of "Zeus" as a problem while "house" remains an understood > commonplace, readily assimilated into a readerly unpacking. Is > there a clear basis for making the distinction without reverting to > some form of scientism ("that which is non-cognitive does not exist")?

I agree that reverting to some form of scientism is not the answer, not in poetry. Outside of poetry, rational-scientific-critical thinking has already killed the god. Inside of poetry, (it's too dark to read) that has always been something to be contained so that it's not so terrifying. As for a "house" (or other thingy for that matter), I hope it never becomes "understood, commonplace, readily assimilated into a readerly unpacking." I don't need poetry to tell me that! No; "make it strange" for me. A search for that unknown something in everyday experience but cannot be merely pointed to or described without being altered or diminished. Lyn Hejinian does this so well when she writes as she thinks and feels. The meditational needn't be purely cognitive per se (perceived as a kind of scientism).

&
> there are only his own composed > forms, and each one soley the issue of the time of the moment of its > creation, not any ultimate except what he in his heat and that > instant in its solidity yield.

> Our seminar thought that Spicer's criticism of the arrogance of the poet extended to Olson because of the latter's insistence upon the MOMENT of writing, upon the primacy of the poet IN that moment, and hence the "usability" of anything which may enter the field-- including god, star, totem.

Intense individualism without the freedom. The poet only the poet of a moment? The moment when you have your mojo working. But I don't think that Olson is advocating chance methods here.

Bill B.

↑ Index

575. Pierre Joris
Guillevic
Fri 21 Mar 1997

Eugene Guillevic, the French or rather the Breton poet who wrote in French, died yesterday in Paris at the age of 89. A terse, sparse poetry that says more than it sings the objects of his scapes. In English there are two "Selected Poems" -- one, translated by Denise Levertov from New Direction (1969), the other translated by teo Savory from Penguin (1974). I don't know if either of them are still in print. -- Pierre

FACE

Country of rubble, country of brush -- rocks
Rasped by drought.

Earth
Like an inflamed throat
Calling for milk,
Woman without man, hill
Like a scaled antheap,

Earth without womb, music of brass:
Judge-face.

(translated by Teo Savary)

ETERNITY...

Eternity
never was lost.

What we did not know

was how to translate it into days, skies, landscapes,

into words for others,
authentic gestures.

But holding on to it for ourselves,
that was not difficult,

and there were moments when it seemed clear to us we ourselves were eternity.

(translated by Denise Levertov)

--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
http://www.albany.edu/~joris/

Everything that allows men to become rooted, through values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
one language, is the principle of alienation which constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
it as a conquering assertion. -- Maurice Blanchot
==========

↑ Index

576. Jonathan A Levin
Re: Form/Content again
Fri 21 Mar 1997

Marjorie--

Your point is well taken, and of course, we do read in this way--I don't store away my newspapers either. But this is of course not to say there is no form in these cases--only that as readers--and as readers (yourself, myself, others like us who would bother to follow these postings on a daily basis) who have developed an interest in form per se--we find it more interesting to read and write about and teach formally innovative (or, as I'd probably prefer to say, playful) works. There is as much form to the Klemperer diaries, I suspect, as there is to journalism, or text-book writing. These forms carry their own meanings (have their own ontologies), and are potentially as interesting as any other forms, depending, ultimately, on one's going interests and standards of evaluation.

We all know people (some of us may be them!) who will always prefer reading books and poems that don't foreground formal issues, who will dislike, say, The English Patient (the book) because it doesn't just tell its love story (I didn't know it was a love story till I finally saw the movie!). People surely have returned to all the great "realist" novelists--just to use one kind of example--despite the relative "bacgrounding" of formal issues. In other words, using the terms I so dislike, content-focus doesn't make a work of only passing interest, even as a work. It all depends on what the content is, how one chooses to frame it with other content issues, and so on. I remember an essay by D. A. Miller some time back in which he commented that he always reads Jane Austen novels when he is laid up sick in bed. Now I'm sure, with Miller, it is hard to disentangle form and content, but that's my point--just when you think you've isolated a content, you're left holding a form.

So: what about the Klemperer, or the newspaper, or the textbook? I suspect you could return to the Klemperer, if you were interested enough in it, if you were working on, say, diaries written by people undergoing traumatic experiences. You might find certain details, tics, interesting, so that the content is illuminated in unusual, interesting ways by the form. I don't think you're going to put it away forever because there is something essentially different about its formal ontology, only that you won't return to it because its particular formal ontology doesn't interest you enough. It's not a form/content distinction, but a difference between two varying form/content matrices.

My point is just that by keeping the boundary between content-works and form-works operative, we lose sight of the way in which writing that is "content-based" is also a formal (and I would add rhetorical, thinking of the old rhetoric/philosophy divide) construction.

Well, best regards, as ever,

Jonathan

↑ Index

577. Mark Prejsnar
Re: force mouth content
Fri 21 Mar 1997

Actually, several posts have agreed with the general point Jonathan makes below; I agree with it too, for sure..

The nub, for me is in Jonathan's last line. I sort of thought most of us who get characterized in this way by others (i.e. as people doing "formally experimental" poetry) were rather strongly in agreement on this point: & that it was the worst end of reflective work-shop verse (as well as much neo-formalist verse) that proceeded on the basis of a sharp perceptible chasm between form and content...

Some of the hectic posts challenging form/content language, when I look back at it, were I think set off by folks who were talking about "form" as a way of addressing questions of technique; technique with regard to self-aware, nonmainstream writing..

Is there anyone on the list who actually wants to DEFEND the idea that form and content are seperate??

Mark P.

On Thu, 20 Mar 1997, Jonathan A Levin wrote:

> I like Jordan't tag line, so keep it.
>
> etc. Form/Content is a product of the analysis wing of 18th century rationalism. (Frankly, I don't know if I have my history right here: I'm shooting from the hip, but I've been trying to understand the larger contexts of organicism, in order to understand the larger contexts of contemporary holism/ecology metaphors.)
>
> Here's where I'm heading: from an organic point of view, or from the modified organicism that now passes as holism, form is necessarily an expression of content and content is necessarily a manifestation of form. They can't be teased apart. And the effort to keep talking in that language can only reflect our continued abasement before the gods of enlightenment analysis.
>
> I'm still thinking about the practical implications for poetry and "formal" "experiment." "!" This could take a long time.
>
> Jonathan Levin

↑ Index

578. Ira Lightman

Astrology poetics post structuralism

Fri 21 Mar 1997

Thanks everyone for a reading list I'm going to chase up in all its details!

My own interest in astrology is a) I seem to be able to guess people's sun, and often moon, signs in up to 3 guesses so there's something in it for me. Plus, I trawl around horoscope columns, and those that seem to match up somewhat with my day (as a sun sign Aries), I go back to, and use as another of those correctives to self and ego: "I thought the meaning of my day was this, but look at it this way too...". Not as what rules my life, though. The more I look into the various columns (in newspapers, in the gay press, in Cosmopolitan etc), the more I see how it's an act of using metaphor to interpret, through topological assumptions, data held in common (i.e. conjunctions of the planets each day), and I find that fascinating. One column will interpret the influence of a water moon on a fire sign as drowning it, another as allowing it emotional space etc, depending on a kind of "chicken and the egg", "what's the ground of your being" analysis; which is also the root of metaphor; refraction through which one can "return" to what's "really" indicated. My take is more all things are a-flowing, sage Heraclitus says, though even that is too much "grounded" in one ideal state: water, not air, not fire, not earth.

I also find the fact that I can guess people quite well indicates (to me) that, like Lacan and Derrida might say, we're genres, with a rising sign genre and moon sign genre grafted onto our sun sign genres. Astrology gives me one way to articulate too my reservation about Lacan (which I think is Derrida's too): that even if the unconscious is structured like a language, that doesn't mean it's rewriteable like computer language; the self is genre collision, from personal and cultural histories, and the chemistry in one from them.

Does that interest anyone (or answer Spicer?)

Ira

↑ Index

579. Jordan Davis
Re: force mouth content
Fri 21 Mar 1997

At 11:45 AM 3/21/97, Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>Is there anyone on the list who actually wants to DEFEND the idea that >form and content are seperate??

And I would like to say 'hi'. I would like to defend the idea that 'form' and 'content' are not categories worth defending at this point -- since we see no useful distinction, or rather since we see no isolable quality of one or the other category, why keep talking about them? Why not try and develop a vocabulary we can think of as valid? Sure, people will think it's odd when they hear us referring to a 'querzblatz' poetics from time to time. Stendhal flipped out at the beginning of _Love_ when he had to introduce the concept of 'crystalization' of affection.

The Joe Brainard show at Tibor de Nagy (nazh -- 724 Fifth Ave, btw 56 & 57). Nancies, portraits, cut-paper works, collages, bead sculptures, paintings on plastic, Porteresque landscapes with dog, catalog with foreword by John Ashbery and essay by Robert Rosenblum. Wow, wow, wow. My particular favorite was "Portrait of Pat, 1971", but "Whippoorwill's World" was the one I laughed at the hardest. I tried to describe some of the cut-paper tall-grasses-and-flowers works to people, but it came out wrong.

All best,
Jordan

↑ Index

580. Dale Smith
Re: Form/Content again
Fri 21 Mar 1997

Ms. Perloff's example of Duchamp is to the point regarding form. Formal composition shapes what Adorno calls the mimetic impulse. Form squeezes out the extraneous elements of creative impulse, thus producing content and giving it the most expedient vehicle of expression. For me, art exhibits a unison of form and content. Form directs, helping content become what it needs to become during the creative act. Duchamp's Fountain is a good example. Like the Shakespeare of Sonnets, Duchamp clearly understood how form determines an economy of expression in art works.

Ms. Perloff is also right when she says that "a lot that passes for 'poetry' at the moment just isn't." Formal experiments can sometimes lead to wonderful art. But without the value content provides, strictly formal experiments provide very little usable substance. Moral conflict, humor, and conflicting human emotional exchanges--found in artists like Tolstoy or Jack Kerouac--are value-laden elements content provides. Form shapes these into compact, expressive art. Too much that is written by contemporary poets denies the power form can provide. Often poets allow form to exist in itself without the complication of aesthetically valuable content, which is focused and expresses something of that original impulse which urges the poet to create in the first place.

Dale Smith

↑ Index

581. Joe Safdie

Re: Astrology poetics post structuralism

Fri 21 Mar 1997

I know Ira originally called for 20th century astrological poetics, but it seems to me that if one is serious about this practice (more than just casual sun sign questions or newspaper column borrowings) we do in fact have to go back to those thrilling days of yesteryear -- which may also shed a little light on medieval language theory. What exactly WAS Spicer talking about with "snark hunting"? To wit:

"Astrology dominated all the natural sciences in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, and even the Church (!) had to compromise with superstition. Pagan gods and heroes became identified with the astral divinities that ruled the cosmos; to this deification of the natural world was added the doctrine of number. Number was the key to _scientia universalis_, and numerical 'correspondences' between things of every class -- seven metals, seven planets, seven virtues, seven sins, seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, seven joys of Mary, seven liberal arts, and so on -- were supplemented by the idea of melothesia, the correspondence of the microcosm and macrocoms, especially the planets. The theory of numerical correspondences was also part and parcel of the Neopythagorean and Neoplatonic philosophies, both of which flourished at the beginning of the Middle Ages, and taught that the universe is made according to geometric forms, abstract relations, and proportions which can be expressed numerically. Each of these proportions corresponded to a musical interval, and altogether, therefore, the universe is a harmony. This idea was usually expressed in the image of the music of the spheres, but all things, not only the spheres, harmonize (or ought to) with everything else. The soul of man was a harmony -- this Platonic idea is familiar -- and so is his body. Moreover, both body and soul are a harmony corresponding to the cosmic harmony . . . the cosmos is a 'book,' whose symbols, which must be 'read,' are made of plant fibres, starlight, fur and feathers." (Patricia Vicari, "Orpheus Among the Christians," in _Orpheus: Metamorphoses of a Myth, ed. John Warden, U. of Toronto).

I love that last sentence best -- but one can see Trane, I think, here -- as well as Giordano Bruno and Frances Yates and all the Warburg Institute folks -- in Robert Kelly's "The Loom" (asked about two weeks ago) Ramon Lull is one of the major personae --

Walter Benjamin also has some provocative things to say about correspondences in his Baudelaire essay as well as an earlier one on mimesis --

"A seminar on mythos" -- god, do you realize how lucky you people are? Is there any distance learning coming out of this seminar?

Sorry for darkening so much of your computer screens this morning . . .

↑ Index

582. George Bowering

Re: Contraries/I will not rest from Mental Fight, etc.

Fri 21 Mar 1997

> Form might be very popular now, might have been very popular for the modernists, but I'm not so sure that "one loves _only_ form" would apply to much eng. poetry before 1900.

I think you might read Olson a little closer, tighter. more literally. I mean he is saying that it is form that makes us love. It is unlikely, for instance, that one will love the content of a person--intestines, bones, shit, etc. One notices her or him make a certain move, sees a light on her/his face, hears her/his voice say things in a certain way, and love starts up again. Similarly, for instance, with a sculpture by Rodin. One doesnt particularly love the chemical makeup of bronze, but loves the way it shines, or the way it is molded. How about the Grecian Urn? Does one love clay? Probably not. More likely the shape left by the hands of the sylvan historian.

Remember this song: "The way you sip your tea, the way you wear your hat...." etc.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

583. Bob Grotjohn
Re: Form/Content again
Fri 21 Mar 1997

Dale Smith wrote:
>
>
> form determines an economy of expression in art works.

> into compact, expressive art.

What do people think about these statements as statements of aesthetic value? To what extent is "expressive" contingent on "compact" (if I am reading the implication correctly, or even if I am not)? How well does Kerouac fit the statements?

↑ Index

584. Wendy Battin
Re: Astrology/post structuralism/Forum & conTent
Fri 21 Mar 1997

This is a nice post to put next to the form/content thread. What does it mean to define form in terms of what makes us love? One indeterminate chasing another. This isn't algebra and I don't want it to be, but to make a charged statement in context into a formula out of context is tricky. It makes me want to say that anything that sparks my love is form, and that's too easy. How is form/content distinguished from mind/body? You think you think when the chemistry goes dead and the body doesn't move (e-motion)?

I suspect metaphor is lurking in the wings here, and that there's a critique of metaphor implicit in these converging threads. I stand by it, myself, since all my experience tells me that the real work doesn't happen in the narrow band of consciousness. But I'd be grateful to anyone who'd fill me in on the other side of this large unsaid.

Wendy

On Fri, 21 Mar 1997, Joe Safdie wrote:

> "Astrology dominated all the natural sciences in the Middle Ages and Renaissance, and even the Church (!) had to compromise with superstition. Pagan gods and heroes became identified with the astral divinities that ruled the cosmos; to this deification of the natural world was added the > doctrine of number. Number was the key to _scientia universalis_, and numerical 'correspondences' between things of every class -- seven metals, seven planets, seven virtues, seven sins, seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, seven joys of Mary, seven liberal arts, and so on -- were supplemented by the idea of melothesia, the correspondence of the microcosm and macrocoms, especially the planets. The theory of numerical correspondences was also part and parcel of the Neopythagorean and Neoplatonic philosophies, both of which flourished at the beginning of the Middle Ages, and taught that the universe is made according to geometric forms, abstract relations, and proportions which can be expressed numerically. Each of these proportions corresponded to a musical interval, and altogether, therefore, the universe is a harmony. This idea was usually expressed in the image of the music of the spheres, but all things, not only the spheres, harmonize (or ought to) with everything else. The soul of man was a harmony -- this Platonic idea is familiar -- and so is his body. Moreover, both body and soul are a harmony corresponding to the cosmic harmony . . . the cosmos is a 'book,' whose symbols, which must be 'read,' are made of plant fibres, starlight, fur and feathers." (Patricia Vicari, "Orpheus Among the Christians," in _Orpheus: Metamorphoses of a Myth, ed. John Warden, U. of Toronto).

>
> I love that last sentence best -- but one can see Trane, I think, here -- as well as Giordano Bruno and Frances Yates and all the Warburg Institute folks -- in Robert Kelly's "The Loom" (asked about two weeks ago) Ramon Lull is one of the major personae --
>
> Walter Benjamin also has some provocative things to say about correspondences in his Baudelaire essay as well as an earlier one on mimesis --
>
> "A seminar on mythos" -- god, do you realize how lucky you people are? Is there any distance learning coming out of this seminar?
>
> Sorry for darkening so much of your computer screens this morning . . .

---------- Wendy Battin (home)
http://camel.conncoll.edu/ccother/wjbat/ (CAPA)
http://shain.lib.conncoll.edu/CAPA/capa.html (Multiple Poetics)
http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Lofts/5471/index.html

↑ Index

585. Hugh Steinberg
Re: Astrology poetics post structuralism
Sat 22 Mar 1997

I hope you don't take it that seriously. I had a friend who used to write the astrology column for the Boston Globe, and although she had a rough guideline for the various signs, she basically made everything up.

↑ Index

586. Elizabeth Mathews Losh
Form/Genre
Sat 22 Mar 1997

Hi All.

I tend to think that talking about the fundamental abstractions of poetry is too theological for me. I'm hardly a literalist, but all this seems too dependent on things that I can't see or hear, like worrying about whether God can make a rock too heavy for Him to lift. In other words, I don't think that poetry can be experienced as a suprasensuous entity without ceasing to be poetry.

That said, I also think that the whole form/content dichotomy is much less interesting than the interplay between form and genre. For example you have things like the ODE that began in English as something defined by its form and ended up as a genre (after the Romantics were through with it!) or things like the VILLANELLE that began as a genre (defined by its pastoral subject) and ended up as a form (oh, those French!).

Maybe I'm too oriented toward the reader-response approach to poetry and not enough oriented toward aesthetics (and all the metaphysics that goes along with it), but form vs. content just doesn't do it for me. I tend to think that content is something to be consumed and that language which is consumed isn't poetry. After all, Bataille said that poetry is language which is consumed (in the sense of used up), but Heidegger said that poetry is language which is never consumed (in the sense of something used as a commodity).

To use an example that keeps coming up, l am much more interested in thinking about how something like the SONNET went through all these formal changes as it moved from its status so close to legal discourse (an entertainment for a bunch of Italian lawyers) to something via Petrarch in which its wordplay became much more about the conversation between self and other. Or to rip off an idea from _The Birth of the Modern Mind_ (not a book which I would necessarily endorse) what does it mean to talk about the form of the sonnet -- not just it's vertical and horizontal orientation on the visual page, but its AURAL symmetries and asymmetries -- when you are talking about a type of poetry which assumed (for the first time since the Roman Empire) that it be read in SILENCE?

With all the "defense of form" nonsense of the past few years I can't help but think that a defense of genre could use more crusaders and mercenaries alike. I wonder how much of contemporary poetry which is attacked for its lack of form suffers much more from its lack of genre.

Liz

↑ Index

587. Elizabeth Mathews Losh
Re: Form/Genre
Sat 22 Mar 1997

P.S.

As though you didn't need more proof that astrology was all made up, I now know, thanks to the poetics list, that I have the same birthday as Ezra Pound.

↑ Index

588. Toni Simon
Re: Form/Genre
Sat 22 Mar 1997

Albeit admittedly one of your typical lurkers, I've been closey following this form/content thread, and, at the risk of beating a wobbling, if not a dead horse, I think the underlying issue here is one of boundaries. It is not form, per se, or content per se, that interests, confronts and so much and effects us poets, but the fact that we can't help but be astonished athow the boundaries between the two are becoming (sic)so blurred. It is also that we poets must study ways of comprehending the energies that so frequently seem to emit from suchsources, and learn to exploit these for our "special effects." Coming near to and being prone to such such energies often make many other folks feel disoriented and threatened (sometimes less obviously a lot of our own folk too,in part, occupational hazard, in part, a spontaneous obsessive inquisitiveness into the effects of certain unusual juxtapositions. The more content we see, the more we sometimes oddly get interested in what this tells us about the underlying forces, and the more we specify those, the more we turn back to the objects of this world within a revisualized and reconstitued set of forms. One question this brings forward for me is- within this reformulated relationship between form and content doesn't there also arise a parallel (if anxiety provoking) reformulation between otherwise clearcut disciplinel like poetry and criticism (two types of professional activity) and, say, psychoanalysis and poetry, poetry and polical activity, writing poetry and and talking, writing poetry and teaching, etc.

Thanks Jordan Davis for mentioning the Joe Brainard show so vividly. I heard it mentioned last night at the Granary Books book art show where some wonderfully boundary-breaking work was on display from Kimberly Lyons and Joe Eppings sumptuous and metaphysically witty Mettle, a compilation of poems and images, to Susan Bee and Charles Bernstein's Little Orphan Anagram, a wise and wise-acre witty poem/painting tap-dance duet, a Kurt Schwitters round translated by Jerome Rothemberg with drawings by Barbara Fahrner, and Kin, a text by Ann Waldman with drawings by (shhh) Susan Rothenberg. Also heard mentioned were the Alice Neel show and the fantastic Hannah Hoch montages at the Modern.

Yours in blurs,

Nick Piombino

↑ Index

589. Bennett M. Sm [Dimpson

Re: Form/Genre

Sat 22 Mar 1997

Elizabeth,

Where does Bataille say this? I've only read things in _Visions of Excess_ and in the _Encyclopedia Acephalica_ which tangentially speak of poetry (as such), but I'm very curious about this idea of poetry as "expenditure." Incidentally, R. Smithson says: "Poetry is always a dying language, but never a dead language." Which is, something becoming "used up," but never totally so.

On Fri, 21 Mar 1997, Elizabeth Mathews Losh wrote:

> I tend to think that content is something to be consumed and that language which is consumed isn't poetry. After all, Bataille said that poetry is language which is consumed (in the sense of used up)

&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.
&c.
Bennett Simpson &c.
[redacted] &c.
&c.
&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.&c.

↑ Index

590. Daniel Zimmerman

Re: Form/Content

Sat 22 Mar 1997

Hi. Having eavesdropped on this thread for a few weeks, I'd like to offer the following: Forms form; form forms--by accretion, by direction, by cascade & interruption [as in embryo: "Eternity is no match for the zygote," Bob Hogg said]. A feedback loop. Freud pointed, in "The Antithetical Sense of Primary Words," to bifurcations, e.g., host/hostile. When not content with the inn's content, host turns bouncer. Otherwise, why reject unsuccessful poems? If only because of their content, change the content. But the form-- extensive from (or at least throughout) and superordinate to content-- resists change more intractably. Otherwise, the inn would assimilate the surly and disruptive guest [losing its form as inn in the process and becoming--what? A drunk tank?]. Not that, on occasion, a gatecrasher can't liven up a party, but until that determination becomes clear, the party metamorphoses from party to polygraph, then either ejects or welcomes the uninvited, then reforms itself as party. If the gatecrasher becomes a guest, the imminent becomes immanent. In his triadic theory of the Parasite, Michel Serres argues the necessity, for communication, of both the presence of the static by which the parasite seeks to disrupt communication between two interlocutors and the need for the interlocutors continually [continuously?] to resist the intrusion, allying themselves to allay the threat. When they stop resisting, communication ends. Does form, parasitizing contents, unify them? Do contents, resisting the imposition, form alliances? "One man's ceiling is another man's floor." Don't you hate it when people finish your sentences for you? Don't you love it when, if they seem about to, you reorient the sentence, leaving them somewhere different from and better than either of your expected destinations? "Because the whole sentence meaning is inherently present in the mind of each person, it is quite possible for the pratibha of the sphota to be grasped by the listener even before the whole sentence has been uttered." --Harold G. Coward, The Sphota Theory of Language. "Farewell, then, Reader, from Montaigne."

Daniel Zimmerman
485 Parsonage Road
Edison, NJ 08837

↑ Index

591. KENT JOHNSON

form is emptiness

Sat 22 Mar 1997

Much of this content/form discussion has been fascinating, very educating, and it's a relief to see that a consensus seems to be "forming" around the idea that the relationship between the two terms is an endless paradox with no hope of resolution. What would we do, actually, if we figured it all out? What poems would be left to write? I for one sure hope that there is much more to this "problem" than an intellectual puzzle to be assembled, as if the form/content conundrum were some kind of "dream of a final theory" waiting to come true.

Isn't it more likely that the mystery and intractability of the form/content paradox constitutes the very essence and life-force of everything poetic? That it's the ground out of which everything in the past along with New Formalist sonnets, Oulipian lipograms, sentimental workshop poems and so on has grown and grows? Weeds and bizarre looking vegetables and sweet smelling flowers (and not that one poet's weed is another poet's flower, but just that there are simply weeds and flowers and that they wouldn't exist, simply, one without the other).

So the fight about what counts as good, I'd offer, takes place very much on the surface of things, where each gardening club has its distinct patches to sow and hoe. Some clubs plant in neat, unvaried rows and spray their plots with chemicals; others use more unconventional methods that actually invite insects and weeds, and the villagers scratch their heads and accuse and whisper and so on. (Some of these experimantal plots wither miserably, but a few give fruit in astounding, mind-boggling ways.) This list is a club that grows weirdly deformed heirlooms, to the point that they don't even qualify for any ofthe contest categories at the State Fair-- and hopefully never will.

In any case, Marjorie Perloff (who, we might remember, started allthis talk) mentioned in a second or third post Duchamp's urinal: "(He) has an incredible sense of"form" in that the how always surpasses the what--in fact there is no "what." Taake for instance the care D took to have the urinal photographed by Stieglitz in front of the Marsden Hartley painting so that the inverted "fountain" matches the shape in Hartley with the Buddha. It's so brillliant and that's how we almost always see "Fountain." So what is "content" here outside form?"

Wasn't Duchamp's urinal one of those great irrigation spouts shooting content all over the planted field of form? (and reverse the syntax.)

And apropos Marjorie's above example, it's interesting that one of the most cherished aphorisms of Buddhism is this (from the Heart Sutra):

> Form is emptiness, emptiness is form.

I might be wrong, but doesn't Buddhism propose here that there is something at bottom that is beyond "figuring out" in the usual way? And can't one attempt to fully set one's practice as an artist within this mystery? Not to figure it out but to make the mystery even more bewildering, wild, and strange. Or as Nick Piombino put it yesterday, to bring forth how "It is not form per se, or content per se, that interests, confronts and so much effects us poets, but the fact that we can't help but be astonished at how the boundaries between the two are becoming (s=i=c) so blurred." Thanks, Nick. You've written twice, I think, and offered everyone a lesson in a few sentences.

A personal anecdote: I studied with Samu Sunim, a Korean teacher at the Zen Buddhist Temple Ann Arbor back in 88 and 89. During what I had taken to be an informal meeting with him he suddenly shouted and gestured in a thrusting way at a poem written by an idiosyncratic Korean monk and old friend of Sunim's (I can't recall his name) who painted and wrote poems with a calligraphy brush tied onto his penis with the hairs of deceased relatives. This artist would--or still does(?)--squat over large sheets of rice-paper and thus create works of powerful and ethereal beauty. The work in question had a line of migrating geese, delicately rendered, though flying vertically upward, beside a line of characters I could not decipher. "Now," Sunim said, "I'd like you to go to this poem and point out its content." I walked over to the poem and put my finger on the cracked glass. "Now," he said, " point to its form." I did so, quite confidently, putting my finger on the same spot. "And now," he said, "point to your own original nature." Though by Zen terms this challenge was quite conventional, my inability to answer impressively inthe manner of an avant-garde poet in-the-know has been haunting me since.

Here's a question: Isn't this list space also a particular form, in essence no different from a sonnet or a villanelle? I can't imagine anyone saying it isn't, especially when you consider (even as new as it is) how deeply rooted its rituals and mechanisms are , and how what we say here--both its content and form--is determined by what we are given to speak within. One could ask: is there a content here separate from the form? Prior to it? After it? Where would one separate? There's no way of doing it.

Emptiness is vast, and for a fleeting moment (before the inevitable asteroid hits to irreversibly erase everything we have done) we assume its form and sit down to write.

Kent

↑ Index

592. Charles Alexander some events
Sat 22 Mar 1997

Some of these upcoming events I've mentioned before, but I'll summarize here once again.

I know it's very late notice, but if anyone's in the Tucson area tomorrow, in the Chax Press studio we're having a reading by poet Tom Mandel at 7:30 pm (101 W. Sixth St., no. 6/ call [redacted] for information). And on Saturday April 12 at 7 pm, a reading by Canadian poets Karen Mac Cormack & Steve McCaffery, with a new book from us by Karen Mac Cormack, at Dinnerware Contemporary Gallery, 135 E. Congress St., in Tucson. This second reading is also something of a celebration of Chax's return to Tucson after a 3-year stay in Minnesota, and a celebration of National Poetry Month. Both events are free. For more of a look at the handmade books we've been making since 1984 in Tucson (and altogether since 1981), come to our open studio as part of our entire warehouse art building's open studio party, Friday, April 12, from 5 until 7 pm, at 101 W. Sixth St. The readings are co-sponsored by POG in Tucson. POG will also sponsor a reading at Dinnerware Gallery on May 17 by David Bromige.

Light blue and the same red with purple makes a change. It shows that there is no mistake. Any pink shows that and very likely it is reasonable.
Gertrude Stein, from "A Substance In A Cushion," in TENDER BUTTONS
Charles Alexander
Chax Press
[redacted]

↑ Index

593. Toni Simon
Re: Granary Books Show Friday 3/21
Sat 22 Mar 1997

In addition to the works mentioned above also presented were Funagainstawake, Harry Reese's monotypes in dialogue with "The Ten Thunderclaps", reprints of The Word Made Flesh by Johanna Drucker and The Book, Spiritual Instrument, the famed collection edited by Jerome Rothenberg and David Guss, a classic in approaching the ethnopoetics of the book; and works in progress, Vulva'a Morphia, by Carolee Schneeman, the beginning stages of Ted Berrigan: An Annotated Checklist (keep your eyes open for the arrival of this one, some choice items will be made available from the Berrigan oevre) and If It Rained

Here, a fascinating mixed media work including video images by Julie Harrison and modular poems by Joe Elliot,also in progress.

Granary Books is fast becoming the most interesting new gallery/bookstore/ showplace for innovative works at the boundaries of all current literary/artistic genres. This is important, because Granary is helping to make happen what I believe to be what has been most missing in contemporary artistic production are the connections, the links between the genres. This, of course, encourages connection between some of the most energetic and productive people in these areas. I've always been fascinated (as have been many others) in the dynamics of the belle epoque, as discussed in The Banquet Years by Shattuck,for example. The interconnections between the arts as seen during that era have led to innovations and artistic "threads" which have continued to date. Check out the Granary at 568 Broadway (corner of Prince) or contact Steve Clay at [redacted]

Nick Piombino

↑ Index

594. henry gould
Re: Form/Content again
Sat 22 Mar 1997

On Thu, 20 Mar 1997 22:35:35 -0800 Marjorie Perloff said: >diaries. Poetry is what must be reread--can only be reread. And by that >criterion, a lot that passes for "poetry" at the moment just isn't. It's >absorbable in a linear way. Five years from now no one will give a damn.
>And so I don't think we need be so generous that we say, oh great, I love >it all! Let's reach out--and all that bla bla. But "form" can never just >mean stanza form or generative device. Generative devices can be >brilliantly used as in Oulipo, Sorrentino, Silliman, Hejinian, etc etc.
>but per se no device is either good or bad.
>
I think this is what Valery meant by the pendulum effect of poetry.
as opposed to prose. - HG

↑ Index

595. henry gould
Re: force mouth content
Sat 22 Mar 1997

On Fri, 21 Mar 1997 11:45:04 -0500 Mark Prejsnar said:
>
>Is there anyone on the list who actually wants to DEFEND the idea that >form and content are seperate??

They are separate to the extent that we have two words for two different aspects of a composition. Separate to the extent that we have the poetry echo-effect as opposed to the prose absorption-effect. Correlated to the extent that we have a particular "work" of art in front of us. - Henry G.

↑ Index

596. henry gould
farm/produce
Sat 22 Mar 1997

Yeah. trouble is with the word: "form". sounds like a kind of envelope, or tax form, a thing you fill out, fill in. "content" too. what the heck. "Please describe the content of MADAME BOVARY, in 25 wrds or less." Whereas what we are calling form is the actuality, the visceral thing itself. The content of a poem is the more formal aspect - the topos, the subject,the directional arrows, the icon, the outline, the set of signals. The farm produces the content. The farm is... the former continent. What ARE the ramifications of incontinence with regard to foam? CONTENT IS FOAM. AND FOAM IS CONTENTMENT. MENTAL FOAM + EARWAX = ODYSSEUS. - Ezra J. Gould Hallelujah addendum: prose is poetry translated by reality into readable French. Poetry came before Proust - and yet, there would be no poetry without Proust! This is Zeno's paradox writ large and illegible!

↑ Index

597. David R. Israel
Re: Form/Content again
Sat 22 Mar 1997

This today from Henry Gould --

> I think this is what Valery meant by the pendulum effect of poetry.
> as opposed to prose.

but one of several interesting recent references to Valery's essays. Can someone recommend a volume (in print)? Every so often I hear V. quoted -- and it's inevitably interesting stuff. How is it that everyone's read Valery, yet one doesn't (or I've not) seen his work (except for one stray volume of poems -- not essays) in bookshops? High time to read this dude.

One such old citation of Paul Valery's ideas was from a character in an Anne Beattie novel (believe it or not) -- I mean, the fellow manages to get around. Is there a standard -- or favored -- book?

thanks,
d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
| "...honk if you believe in geese" |
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\///&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\///..'

↑ Index

598. Pritchett,Pat

Re: Form/Content again

Sat 22 Mar 1997

Ironically, I've always found Valery's prose much more readable than his poetry. His _Collected Works_ is pub. by Princeton UP/Bollingen. _Art of Poetry_, to which Hank alludes, is the place to start.

Patrick Pritchett

From: David R. Israel
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: Form/Content again
Date: Saturday, March 22, 1997 2:18PM

This today from Henry Gould --

> I think this is what Valery meant by the pendulum effect of poetry.
> as opposed to prose.

but one of several interesting recent references to Valery's essays. Can some-one recommend a volume (in print)? Every so often I hear V. quoted -- and it's inevitably interesting stuff. How is it that everyone's read Valery, yet one doesn't (or I've not) seen his work (except for one stray volume of poems -- not essays) in bookshops? High time to read this dude.

One such old citation of Paul Valery's ideas was from a character in an Anne Beattie novel (believe it or not) -- I mean, the fellow manages to get around. Is there a standard -- or favored -- book?

thanks,
d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
| "...honk if you believe in geese" |
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\///&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\///..'

↑ Index

599. Jordan Davis valery
Sat 22 Mar 1997

Bollingen / Princeton did a great 15 vol series of Valery, and almost every volume is worth snapping in two. (Though it may be difficult to care for the plays, and the autobiographical volume Moi.) About seven years ago Princeton reprinted a few volumes of Valery's essays, the best of which volumes were _The Art of Poetry_ and _The Outlook for Intelligence_. Of the non-reprinted [in English] work, _Idee Fixe_ is a wild "novel", a conversation between a narrator whose dialogue sounds very much like Valery's essays, and an intellectual doctor, as the two walk across a beach. The man loved the ocean, there's a description of thinking as attempting to stand on a wet rock. Also unreprinted is _Analects_, a selection from Valery's rather huge and ungodly witty journals.

Before the Boolean, there was a selected Valery from New Directions, and a selected essays titled _Variety_ which has most of the pieces Henry's referred to.

Jordan Davis

↑ Index

600. Alan Jen Sondheim face-violent-defile-you
Sat 22 Mar 1997

<html> <title>cycle of hidden tiny deaths</title> <body>   maya mama murmur world last message to multitudes i multitudes beg you for the means and the ways i am down on my knees i am praying to nothing i am ending the end of it i am the last dawn i am the last dusk i am the meal toilet maya i am the maya mama murmur i am maya mama murmur world beg you for bread for wine beg you for forgiveness bright-light-maya turn stone toward me turn granite toward me stone marble maya murmur world turn death stone cold angles murmur toward world maya turn marble turn marble down maya mama murmur world last message to multitudes i multitudes beg you for the means and the ways i am down on my knees i am praying to nothing i am ending the end of it i am the last dawn i am the last dusk i am the meal toilet maya i am the maya mama murmur i am maya mama murmur world </body> <html>

↑ Index

601. Jocelyn Emerson
small corner of the form/content discussion
Sun 23 Mar 1997

I think Herbert in _The Temple_ultimately discards form, a vehicle for this known world only.

In the form/content conversation I wanted to inquire more about the above statement (sorry--I can't find the original posting) as it seems most puzzling to me; is discarding meant to be read as Fish's sense of a self-consuming artifact. Herbert invented more than 2/3rds of the forms in The Temple, and the forms, more than anything, seem to be a method of measuring (making visible.audible) the distance between this world and the next; the struggle of faith vis a vis the always already completed redemption through Christ's sacrafice (for Herbert); more than anythinng, I read H's poems as a prolonged formal investigation into the exact nature of the distance between the self and other (in H's case, Other), a project which his perfection of form is designed to reveal as ultimately impossible. We could map on to Herbert's terms sign/signified, etc--not necessary to read, linguistically, only within his High Anglican context.

Jocelyn Emerson

↑ Index

602. Peter Jaeger
boredom, poetry, questions
Sun 23 Mar 1997

Can boring poems operate as critique, until a critique of boredom is formulated?

Why do I get bored by poems? But at the same time, why am I most interested in poems that s(t)imulate boredom, making me blank & drain?

If boredom were a commodity, would it be desirable?

And what if a poem is so boring it invites readers to question why they're bored?

Peter Jaeger

↑ Index

603. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Sun 23 Mar 1997

On Sun, 23 Mar 1997, Peter Jaeger wrote:

> Can boring poems operate as critique, until a critique of boredom is formulated?

By whom? For who? Isn't this a question of audience. And how does a poem _operate_? And how does it _operate as_? If it's boring, what would also make it a critique?
>

> Why do I get bored by poems? But at the same time, why am I most > interested in poems that s(t)imulate boredom, making me blank & drain?

Are these questions autobiographical? What poems are boring to you? Do you require psychoanalytical/psychological answers or do you feel there is a philosophical critique (via your first questions) at work?
>
> If boredom were a commodity, would it be desirable?
>
Again, this seems to pertain to audience. Desirable for whom? In other words? Or do you feel there is a general economy of desire, such that this question can be answered sub specie aeternis?

> And what if a poem is so boring it invites readers to question why > they're bored?
>
What if? Do you mean is it still boring?

When I was teaching in artschools, watching painting teachers at work, critiques usually ran along the lines of "this isn't working here" (perhaps pointing to a particular section of the canvas) - instead of "this doesn't work for me" (never mind the need to deconstruct "work"). Audience is replaced by universal, taste becomes transcendent, reified into theoretical position.

So these questions would seem, i.e. "poem _is_ boring" to reference your/ our reading; thus a lot of people are bored by Chaucer, depending on demographics/century/habitus/cultural economies, and so forth.

Alan

> Peter Jaeger

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html MIRROR: http://www.anu.edu.au/english/internet_txt/ +++++++++++++++++ IMAGES: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ TELEPHONE [redacted] CUSEEME: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, BEING ON LINE, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

604. Schuchat Simon dichotomous or not
Sun 23 Mar 1997

I suppose most of us on this list are not content with form as such, or are we?

↑ Index

605. David R. Israel

Re: dichotomous or not

Sun 23 Mar 1997

Schuchat Simon (writing from an avant timezone -- Sun, 23 Mar 1997 19:55:51 +0800) asks:

> I suppose most of us on this list are not content with form as such, or are we?

Can you site an instance of what would represent "form as such"? If so, then (as an instance of those "on this list" -- not to say, as "most" thereof) I could try to consider a more considered reply.

Or, I mean: is it that there's a back of other fools who are content with form as such, whereas we -- a cut above -- are discontent with it? But what is it?

Is there anywhere, in any canon, textbook, notebook, any medium, some poem that exemplifies [mere] "form as such"? --

I am, in a word, doubtful.

best,
d.i.

```
 .
 . . .
 .  .  .  .  .
\ \\\\
```

606. henry gould
Re: dichotomous or not
Sun 23 Mar 1997

On Sun, 23 Mar 1997 19:55:51 +0800 Schuchat Simon said:
>I suppose most of us on this list are not content with form as such, or >are we?

I'm presently working through L. Turco's Book of Forms. And no I'm not a new formalist or an old formalist. I hate formalisms. formalities always make me nervous. Have written a sestina, a villanelle, a roundel, a madrigal, a large ode, a sonnet, four ballades, and a chant royal. The occasion, for me, is mysterious. I feel lucky to have the time/space to be doing this right now. But the impulse behind the individual poems is not the ambition to "do the forms". No, I am not content with the forms. In fact, the impulse for each poem and for the series as a whole (from my blinkered perspective, at least) is the CONTENT. The best way I can put it is: just as in those social formalities which make us nervous, we nevertheless somehow to some faltering extent RISE TO THE OCCASION, so these forms seem to me to be attaching themselves like barnacles to the OCCASION of the general impulse (content, thought) behind them. The fact that I have a lot of practice behind me & can DO the forms is a considerable factor. The fact that (in my blinkered view) the content & the style JUSTIFY the forms - that is, make them actually possible and not workshop run-throughs or antiquated anachronisms - makes it worth doing. Because I find it exciting to do something in the teeth of the zeitgeist (i.e. postmodern barnacle-poems, neo-archaic barnacle-poems, neo-Beat barnacle-poems, neo-fifties formalist barnacle-poems, eterno- experimento barnacle-poems, etc. etc.). Because my philosophy differs from the reigning postmodernist zeitgeist. I will outline my philosophy yet again in Poetics List Henry Posting #1345708, due out in 3 weeks or so. - Henry Ego Et Fries In Arcadia

↑ Index

607. Henry
Henry Philosophy in Small Nutshell
Sun 23 Mar 1997

Modern philosophy began with Descartes, who created the Mind/External Reality dichotomy. Postmodernism, confronted with the 20th century techno- police state-dead universe positivist worldview of the triumphant Modern, countered with this dichotomy: Mind/No External Reality (or its variable: No Mind/No Reality). (see Nietzsche, etc.) Henry thinks postmodernism is a dialectical coin-flip. He goeth back to the pre-modern. Not to the irrational archaic, nor to Heraclitus' dialectical yin-yang of united-opposing forces. He goes to Heraclitus' philosophical interlocutor: Philo. According to Philo, the opposites in reality are not united in eternal war. They are help apart-together by the supernatural dividing Word, the ineffable which keeps opposites in balance. Cosmos is thus not a dichotomy but a trichotomy: Humankind/Supernatural/Nature. This olden worldview has been a resource for poetry before: for me, a little academic treatise by Sanford Burdick - a study of Milton, called _Dividing Muse_ (Yale U.P., 1985) is a very important little book. Humankind as ANALOGY, as IMAGO DEI, for a transcendent HEART-SPIRIT - the ancient imago displayed very forcefully in the Byzantium exhibit in NY right now at the Met (which I would love to see) - well, it ain't dead yet, ye philosophes. Reality is a text, yes - but Nietzsche/Derrida's only chapter 13. Wait til you get to Chapt. 24. - Henri Gould de l'Ecole de Providence provocative p.s.: Where are ye then, ye academic barnacles of postmodern style? And where are ye, archao-huffapuffers of the new primitif? And ye also, fussy neo-formalistes? The physics of postmodernism is irrel- evant, compared to the chemistry-biology of social criticism (see issue one of Tim Woods' NEGATIONS magazine to see what I mean)...let us descend through style into the interstices of the soup kitchen, sistren & brethren... perhaps there our poems will be remembered...in the echo-chamber of real world... (hear dat ghoul a-callin?) (whew, dassa ghost-voice, man)

↑ Index

608. David R. Israel

Re: dichotomous or not

Sun 23 Mar 1997

Sayeth Henry --

> . . . . Because I find it > exciting to do something in the teeth of the zeitgeist (i.e.
> postmodern barnacle-poems, neo-archaic barnacle-poems, neo-Beat > barnacle-poems, neo-fifties formalist barnacle-poems, eterno- > experimento barnacle-poems, etc. etc.). Because my philosophy > differs from the reigning postmodernist zeitgeist. I will outline > my philosophy yet again in Poetics List Henry Posting #1345708, due > out in 3 weeks or so.

I look forward to that w/ informal anticipation.

Speakin' btw of zeitgeist, this past week's New Yorker carries an amazing bit of chutzpa in the form of a brazen specimen of theory-mongering (clearly satirical, in a way, but successful not merely as satire, but rather, in the theory it alleges to espouse) anent the nature of the zeitgeist / popular-culture-wise. The essay concerns a supposed "Iron Law of Stardom" which boils down to the proposition that a Star (film, music, politics, whatever) experiences proper & true Stardom for a specific limited term of 3 years (or, in certain, carefully explained exceptions, 6 years -- where there's been a re-make of identity . . .) -- don't have the mag on hand, and I didn't even take note of the author's name (pardon to be so non-attentive) -- but whoever the chap is, he wrote a memorable item.

The final-paragraph theory self-destruct mechanism was, in a word, awesome. I venture to recommend this mass-culture moiety to the august theoreticals here gathered.

best,
d.i.

p.s.: Mr. Gould -- also do look forward to your spectrum-spanning formalities, at whatever-such point as done & available. I went thru a villannelle phase myself, abt. a year ago last summer -- lasted for a couple months, and I really enjoyed it. When one's in that sort of groove, it can be groovy.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}
| "...honk if you believe in geese" |
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\\/\//&\\\/\/////////\\\\\\///..'

↑ Index

609. henry gould
roundel for D. Israel
Sun 23 Mar 1997

Here's a roundel. It was written after a long meeting of the Poetry Mission, in Cranston, a litte ways from Ted Berrigan's b-place (this old-fashiooned poem will sound like sacrilege to many). The "pioneers' are them forthright compagnards making a non-institutional civic poetry space.

NOCTURNE

_in Pawtuxet, with the "pioneers"

The night air is soft, the trees hold their places,
the meeting's adjourned, we emerge from the loft.
The streetlight illuminates (diverted faces).
The night air is soft.

Words, words, tarred with a treacherous weft...
heart's treason, scars. Posthumous traces you'll replicate later--when no one's left.

Soul... death will bear your disgraces.
Friend... let this river be--raft.
Soon, soon--the deep gulf will displace us. And the night air is soft.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

610. Henry Gould
BRIEF 3rd thought
Sun 23 Mar 1997

The weak point of recent harangue, as many will note & should emphasize, is the leninist/totalitarian postscript. Art needs no social justification. It is what it is, and let its makers always thrive in blessed obscurity and irrelevance and innocence & joy & creativity & freedom & originality & idiosyncrasy & poverty & criminality & shame & degradation & happiness & sex too. - Pope Hank da Turd (modernist in disguise?????? wha!!)

↑ Index

611. Carl Lynden Peters
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Sun 23 Mar 1997

> When I was teaching in artschools, watching painting teachers at work, critiques usually ran along the lines of "this isn't working here" (perhaps pointing to a particular section of the canvas) - instead of "this doesn't work for me" (never mind the need to deconstruct "work"). Audience is replaced by universal, taste becomes transcendent, reified into theoretical position.

those art teachers, if they were any good, knew what they were saying.

c.

↑ Index

612. raea100900
Marginalization
Sun 23 Mar 1997

Dear Listees,

Has the Segue space discussion of Perelman's Marginalization of Poetry happened yet? If so, I'd like read an account of it. Anybody else?

R.A.

↑ Index

613. Alan Jen Sondheim
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Sun 23 Mar 1997

They weren't.

On Sun, 23 Mar 1997, Carl Lynden Peters wrote:

> When I was teaching in artschools, watching painting teachers at work, critiques usually ran along the lines of "this isn't working here" (perhaps pointing to a particular section of the canvas) - instead of "this doesn't work for me" (never mind the need to deconstruct "work"). Audience is replaced by universal, taste becomes transcendent, reified into theoretical position.
>
> those art teachers, if they were any good, knew what they were saying.
>
> c.

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html MIRROR: http://www.anu.edu.au/english/internet_txt/ +++++++++++++++++ IMAGES: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ TELEPHONE [redacted] CUSEEME: 166.84.250.149 +++++ Editor, BEING ON LINE, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

614. David R. Israel
Re: roundel for D. Israel
Sun 23 Mar 1997

------- Forwarded Message Follows -------
From: Self <Single-user mode>
To: henry gould <[redacted]>

Subject: Re: roundel for D. Israel
Date: Sun, 23 Mar 1997 13:59:48 -0500

Henry --

"nice ring, Pope" (as a friend of mine remarked, when, as a kid, he had an audience w/ the actual [now, the late] Roman Catholic gent -- or if not an "audience" at least a ceremonialish meeting w/ Catholic kids I guess; the deal being, the Pope extends his hand so the lads can kiss the ruby [prob.?] ring, vestigal from monarchical days) or, in other words:

thanks for that (the likeable roundel) - the language is of a quality, of a kind that I will admit to favoring, thus feels rather close (in fact) to things I've assayed (if I my presume to so claim) -- will have to (nods to Perloff &c) re-read no doubt -- will reciprocate in not-quite-kind (but a formal somethin',-- e.g. one of the mentioned villannelles [I figure, when in doubt, double-letter-it w/ that word]) when I'm back at my other (office) computer, where I've got old MSS stashed away.

> Words, words, tarred with a treacherous weft...
> heart's treason, scars. Posthumous traces
> you'll replicate later--when no one's left.

asks some thought, yes .... the eternal cycle of obscurity / posthumous fame / et alia how about "elegiac realism" ? -- (a new school ! (?))

here at century-end anon again a trend (or if no trend it prove at least a lyric friend)

d.i.

.
,
.....,
1....., \\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\\/\0/\/////////////////////...'
.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o.o....'
///\\\\\\\/////////\/\\\o///\/\\\\\\\\\\/////\\\...'
.David.....Raphael.....Israel...'
<[redacted]>
[&/[redacted]]
{telephonic.location.202/[redacted]}

|"...sleuthing out all clues, blues & news"|
\\\/////\\\\\\\\\/\/\//&\\\/\/////////\\\\\/\///..'

↑ Index

615. David R. Israel
Re: Marginalization
Sun 23 Mar 1997

> Has the Segue space discussion of Perelman's Marginalization of Poetry happened yet? If so, I'd like read an account of it. Anybody else?

yes of course, very much so . . . In particular (or fer instance), what mght the estimable Ann Lauterbach have had to say, I wonder?

d.i.

↑ Index

616. Maria Damon
Re: Astrology poetics/music
Sun 23 Mar 1997

---

though sun ra was heavily space and planet oriented, it was not so much from an interest in astrology (as i understand it) as from a feeling that he and other Black people were not welcome on Earth, and would in fact prefer to live elsewhere (saturn in particular) given the current state of the earth. about a year ago we had a discussion on this list about how gay writers etc often used tropes of otherworldliness (angels, outerspace etc) not so much out of a graviation twoard systems of esoterica as an articulation of otherness and a sense that "somewhere a place for us...". etc., so i hesitated to suggest his name in connection with this thread until pierre posted the below.

At 9:42 AM +0000 3/20/97, Pierre Joris wrote:
>Ira -- listening right now to John Coltrane's INTERSTELLAR SPACE THE 6
>CUTS OF WHICH ARE TITLED: 1. MARS 2. LEO 3.VENUS 4. JUPITER VARIATION 5
>JUPITER 6. SATURN -- the music (Coltrane on tenor & bells, Rashied Ali >on drums) is instellar, the space, according to the titles, however >sub-solar. Trane's last recording. -- Pierre
>==========
>pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
>tel/fax [redacted] email:[redacted]
>http://www.albany.edu/~joris/
>----------
>Everything that allows men to become rooted, through

>values or sentiments, in _one_ time, in _one_ history, in
>_one_ language, is the principle of alienation which >constitutes man as privileged in so far as he is what he is,
>[...] imprisoning him in contentment with his own reality
>and encouraging him to offer it as an example or impose
>it as a conquering assertion. -- Maurice Blanchot
>==========

↑ Index

617. Hugh Steinberg
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Sun 23 Mar 1997

>If boredom were a commodity, would it be desirable?
>
Boredom, like talk, is cheap.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

618. Kathrine Varnes
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Sun 23 Mar 1997

On Sun, 23 Mar 1997, henry gould wrote:

> On Sun, 23 Mar 1997 19:55:51 +0800 Schuchat Simon said:
> I suppose most of us on this list are not content with form as such, or are we?
>
> I'm presently working through L. Turco's Book of Forms. And no I'm not a new formalist or an old formalist.

I've done this too, (but about 12 years ago with Turco's old Book of Forms -- the thin red one -- is that the same one you're using or is it the new one, the thick black one?) I think how HG articulated his interest is not that different than how most people who try these things feel, even if they can't say it as well. I wonder if there's a way this discussion obliges that second sentence in counter to the "guilty" confession. Well, I won't do it, and besides I have no idea what "form as such" might be. But I'm curious. Has anyone else on this list worked through this or other books, or other ideas on form, as a way to something else?

Kathrine Varnes

↑ Index

619. Louis Cabri
howard mccord
Sun 23 Mar 1997

Ron Silliman has on another listserve mentioned Howard McCord--a forgotten poet of the times, for Ron, and I'm sure lots, but hopefully not all, of us.

Invoking McCord's name here might interestingly allow a perception to form in outline--in the stars, if you like--of what until now might appear on this listerve as just a nameless pattern (i.e., the pattern itself is nameless) of subjects/posts in listserve-space to do with astrology, angelology, form/content (and the history of), lists like this one I'm writing and the one we're on, Spicer and Duncan and Olson on wisdom, and institutional versus community memory and praxis.

Last year I picked up, in Calgary, secondhand, a 1971 Sand Dollar (Berkeley) chapbook by McCord, Gnomonology: A Handbook of Systems and gifted it to Fred Wah, figuring, rightly as it turned out, that Fred would know who this interesting-seeming poet is. I would like to hear from others on his work and context--and to pose the question: how might McCord's project be recognizexd today as one of constituting a reading-horizon for a community out of and to which new poetry is written? This question relates directly to the status of "knowledge" in the work, in the community. (In asking this question via McCord of today, the heroic individualism endemic to the New American moment would have to be revised and "community" substituted for "individual" as a constitutive pregiven--or would it.)

Perhaps the title of this post--playing on Howard's last name--should be: "Synthesis in the age of MacDonald's." "Synthesis" as being, of course, something that poetry might propose to do--and that McCord's poetics has a specific approach to, one that is a form of "direct action" where action is verbal.

From my cursory knowledge of McCord, it seems that his "handbook" grows from Olson's well-known etymological seed-injunction to poets to take history as they (should) take themselves, since "history" derives from "'istorin," to find out for oneself. McCord's handbook, then, follows Olson. It's a synthesis of books, maps, worldviews, prioritizing the local grounded, literally, in the land. But "land" turns out to be as much as code-word for context that comprises a reading-horizon. Indexically it's got, as would be expected in Olson's line, a singular range-- from Wittgenstein to Sauer, Foucault to Yi-Fu Tuan.

I find the utopic hope thrusting McCord's singular synthesis forward and outward to be articulated five years later by Ed Sanders, who also belongs, for a time, to this same Olsonian impulse (that itself has a history predating Olson), in his notion of an "investigative poetry," whose chapbook by that name is dedicated to the memory of Olson:

> Investigative poesy is freed from capitalism, churchism, and other totalitarianisms; free from racisms, free from allegiance to napalm-dropping military police states--a poetry adequate to discharge from its verse-grids the undefiled high energy purely-distilled verse-frags, using every bardic skill and meter and method of the last 5 or 6 generations, in order to describe every aspect (no more secret governments!) of the historical present, while aiding the future, even placing bard-babble once again into a role as shaper of the future. (Ed Sanders, Investigative Poetry, City Lights, 1976, p. 11)

The gist and grist of such a poetics stance is encapsulated in the McCord statement: "I take the lyric as an epistemic form."

Knowledge and poetry, knowing and writing, how does that jointure take place where.

This post sent to the list, instead of my harddrive under "doodles."

↑ Index

620. henry

Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms

Sun 23 Mar 1997

I'm using the old Turco, thin red, which is heavy on obscure Welsh forms. Just finished a Portuguese riff, the "glose". Like an enlarged carol. - HG

↑ Index

621. David R. Israel

Re: boredom, poetry, questions

Sun 23 Mar 1997

> If boredom were a commodity, would it be desirable?
>
> Boredom, like talk, is cheap.

Boredom & desire are opposites.
Or rather: there's desire & antipathy (w/ boredom at the fulcrum)?

Reverse the rhetoric, invert the formulation:
If desire were a commodity, would it be boring?

One can only commodify needful things (if the need is real, imagined, pre-existent, or insta-manufactured -- those are secondary issues)

I'd say some more abt. this, but hesitate (for reasons you can perhaps imagine . . .)

;-) d.i.

↑ Index

622. Maria Damon (Maria Damon)
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Sun 23 Mar 1997

---

yes indeed.

At 10:59 AM 3/24/97, Pritchett,Pat @Silverplume wrote:
>Maria, I think you're right that boredom often does mask some emotional >state that's gone willfully unrecognized. But there's another sense in which >I think writers deliberately attempt to cultivate bordeom as a means with >which to "break out/into" a fresh line on things. Perhaps cultivate is the >wrong word. But when boredom comes, it ought not to be eschewed as it can >lead to a new avenue. Which links to Jordan's remarks about anxiety and >Cage.
>
>Patrick Pritchett
> ----------
>From: Maria Damon
>To: POETICS
>Subject: Re: boredom, poetry, questions
>Date: Monday, March 24, 1997 10:48AM
>
>
>i thinkk boredom is like depression, a cover up for something else, like >anger or loneliness. nothing is inherently boring, so the gaze should go >inward to find out why. so if a poem is boring to you it can still teach >you stuff, if only more about your own desires. i like this thread of >theorizing boredom, it seems far more fruitful than the old form/content >treadmill.--md

↑ Index

623. Peter Jaeger
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Sun, 23 Mar 1997, Alan Jen Sondheim wrote:

> When I was teaching in artschools, watching painting teachers at work, critiques usually ran along the lines of "this isn't working here" (perhaps pointing to a particular section of the canvas) - instead of "this doesn't work for me" (never mind the need to deconstruct "work"). Audience is replaced by universal, taste becomes transcendent, reified into theoretical position.

Alan,

When I was painting in artschools, I often had a hard time figuring out what my teachers meant by "this works" and "this doesn't work" too.

I realize my questions last night were de-historicized, and not at all rigourously framed. To be more specific, but not entirely specific, I'm thinking of the contemporary use value of easy to access excitement/entertainment, as opposed to waste, boredom, expenditure, general economy etc.

Imagine a virtual sub-culture who invert the excitement / boredom binary, and who organize their enjoyment on wasting time (anti-time=money). Their existence as a sub-culture is based on their enjoyment of boredom. At the same time, they see this boredom as a critique of the commodification of excitement--after all, they are revolutionaries, and poets too. The question is whether their criticism actually reaches and impacts on the world of entertainment, or whether it merely serves as a focus for maintaining their own social coherency as a sub-group. To my mind, the potential of their critique outweighs the limitations (the foreclosure) of reducing their boredom to a mere site for structuring enjoyment.

Is it better to bore large than excite small?

Peter

↑ Index

624. KENT JOHNSON
Jung Kwang
Mon 24 Mar 1997

In a posting the other day I mentioned an astounding contemporary Korean zen monk and artist who paints and composes poems by tying a calligraphy brush to his penis. There is published work on him, though the only thing I've seen is a beautiful catalog from an exhibit some years ago, but I can't remember what museum. I remember the essay there as referring to him as the "Jackson Pollock of Zen," though many of his works are "representational," somewhat in the manner of sumi-e. In any case, for those who might be interested in pursuing information on this incredible person, his name is Jung Kwang. I can also provide address to those interested of his good friend, Samu Sunim who makes his "home" between Ann Arbor, Chicago, and Toronto. Sunim also has a number of his works. Just backchannel if so.

Kent

↑ Index

625. Alan Jen Sondheim

Re: boredom, poetry, questions

Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Peter Jaeger wrote:

> Imagine a virtual sub-culture who invert the excitement / boredom binary, and who organize their enjoyment on wasting time (anti-time=money). Their existence as a sub-culture is based on their enjoyment of boredom. At the same time, they see this boredom as a critique of the commodification of excitement--after all, they are revolutionaries, and poets too. The question is whether their criticism actually reaches and impacts on the world of entertainment, or whether it merely serves as a focus for maintaining their own social coherency as a sub-group. To my mind, the potential of their critique outweighs the limitations (the foreclosure) of reducing their boredom to a mere site for structuring enjoyment.

This sounds very much like Situationism - you might look into the work of Guy Debord and the others - and their thinking did impact (for example, detournement, flaneurship, etc. that was a kind of drifting related to, but not equilvalent to, boredom) in a lot of areas, particularly around May '68 - but they were also critically tuned into the culture at that point.

There is also a lassitude in a lot of Bataille...

As far as impact, I doubt it would have any whatsoever today; there is a combination of boredom and skittering in Websurfing (something related to a concept I developed, "defuge," described in my texts) that would simply short-circuit or bypass the site. There was also enormous attention devoted to the aesthetics of boredom vis-a-vis Warhol; it was, as I remember, Laurie Anderson who first, for example, promoted the idea of entertainment to combat a kind of boring structuralism that had taken over a lot of performance art at one point. (I'm too tired, sorry, for citations here.)

>

> Is it better to bore large than excite small?
>
> Peter
>
Ask Madonna in both categories...

Alan

_____ URL: http://jefferson.village.virginia..edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html MIRROR: http://www.anu.edu.au/english/internet_txt/ +++++++++++++++++ IMAGES: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ TELEPHONE [redacted] CUSEEME: 166.84.250.149 ++++++ Editor, BEING ON LINE, Lusitania, 1997

↑ Index

626. Hugh Steinberg

Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms

Mon 24 Mar 1997

It strikes me that among the ways we talk about form two stand out: one as product (this is a sonnet, that's a rondel); another as process (I am writing a sonnet, I am working on a rondel).

Having studied as an undergraduate with genuine unreconstructed new formalists, I remember being ordered to write in iambic pentameter, and the profs would pick my poem apart either at the points where the scansion broke down, or I had used an easy fix to work my way out. I kept Miller Williams, John Hollander and Dacey and Jauss's anthology _Strong Measures_ on my desk beside the dictionary. I learned a lot, but I often felt like a six year old forced to take piano lessons because it would make me more cultured.

But with a few years behind this experience, I think I understand why they acted the way they did.

I think it's a lot easier to talk about poems, especially in the workshop environment, by only engaging with the formal/technical aspects of the work at hand. This is often why so many workshop poems look and sound alike. An ideal form is assumed, which is then used as a yardstick to which the poems on the worksheet are compared. Issues of content, what the poem is about, are seldom broached because workshops are social as well as pedagogical beasts, and one of the rules seems to be that because authors have the right to write about anything they please, no person's content should be privileged over another's. This makes sure everyone plays nice. It also guarantees a certain sloppiness in the ideas of the poem, in much the same way as a person's ideas become sloppy when no one disagrees with them.

I think my profs were operating under the assumption that if you imposed a formal strictness or rectitude upon the poem, the content would also have to straighten up.

I don't agree with this. It's just as easy to write a bad poem that scans as one that doesn't.

One of the reasons why traditional forms (I would also throw traditional free verse such as the so-called Iowa poem into this category) are often treated with a certain degree of animosity is because they occupy a priviliged position. They're like the aristocracy of poetry, they have long pedigrees and insist on a certain amount of deferrence (which is assumed but seldom earned).

Yet despite this critical/historical baggage, I think these forms and the language used to analyze the formal aspects of a poem are useful for the act of reading and writing poems. Not good. Not bad. Just useful.

Much like finally learning how to play the piano.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

627. David R. Israel

Re: boredom, poetry, questions

Mon 24 Mar 1997

Peter Jaeger elaborates:

> Imagine a virtual sub-culture who invert the excitement / boredom binary, and who organize their enjoyment on wasting time (anti-time=money). Their existence as a sub-culture is based on their enjoyment of boredom. At the same time, they see this boredom as a critique of the commodification of excitement . . . (etc.)

I think what you're fishing for, Peter, is sort of interesting -- but have a feeling there's a problem with use of the word "boredom."

There are surely many levels & types of enjoyment, involvement, attention, engagement, interest, awareness, consciousness, etc., which are dissimilar to & far from industrial-strength "excitement" (especially as mass-culturally purveyed & cultivated -- or as you say, "commodified").

A problem with your notion & proposition abt. "boredom" as a culturally fruitful principle involves the fact that boredom seems (in most common senses of the term) to suggest a mere falling off of attention & interest. Perhaps there could be nuances of meaning & feeling huddled under that clunky catch-all moniker "boredom" -- but to proceed in general terms here, I find it hard to see boredom per se as the basis of anything very vital or interesting -- or I dare say, all that worthwhile.

Boredom, however, is in the brain of the beholder. You speak of "the enjoyment of boredom." I say: if it's enjoyment, is it really boredom?

Many of us have -- at various times, in various ways -- experienced the paradoxical response you described: being most interested in poetry that seemingly articulates an experience of boredom. I can't say I've had that exact experience -- but memories of (e.g.) concerts from the likes of the estimable John Cage do come to mind -- in which one must sometimes work (or be willing to work, if need be) to be fully attentive to what's happening. The challenge is to find the interesting side(s) of what might at first blush seem uninteresting. The payoff is in the finding of such. If it were strictly boring -- if it always failed to engage -- it would be something very different from what (in my view, & that of many) it is.

If one succeeds & manages to be attentive -- & further discovers something worth attending to -- presto! one is involved in a process transcending boredom. Boredom might be one phase or aspect or (initial) gambit of the overall process, but the whole hardly fits under the B rubric.If one attends to the work -- ipso facto, one is not properly bored.

Boredom is (isn't it?) the waning of attention & interest. Out of knee-jerk antipathy for boredom, the pop-culturites try (as we all know) to turn up the volume & knock the socks off, playing the excitement game for fun & profit. There's a fear of boredom behind this (partly); but the fear is somewhat purile. Serious (or for that matter playful) interest in (so to say) the secrets of the mundane can short-circuit the boredom phobia, -- and much of 20th century art has (arguably) sprung from practitioners who've walked that path.

There are a few thoughts on this -- I think it's a complex topic; the above is (at best) an imprecise precis.

d.i.

p.s.: boredom is one thing, but bland (say) is another.

Ni Tsan -- painter & poet of Yuan-dynasty China -- was, like many of his insoucient chums, fond of the term "bland" (tan, I think, is the Chinese). It became, in fact, a term of high critical praise.

Another comparative reference that comes to mind is the remarkable opening text in Chogyam Trungpa's little introductory volume about meditation entitled The Path is the Goal (Shambhala Books). He characterizes meditation as "wasting time" -- a very worthwhile wasting of time, in his view. This likely has something to do with what you're endeavoring to get at here.

```
 .
 .....
 .............
 \\\\
```

↑ Index

629. Stephen Cope
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

George Oppen saw boredom (or "the knowledge of boredom"), following Heidegger, as a means to knowledge - an instrument of clarity (see the first poem, in his first book). His sense, tho, is obviously not of the kind of boredom referred to here. The Heidegger passage makes this clear:

Real boredom is still far off when this book or that play, this activity or that stretch of idelness merely bores us. Real boredom comes when "one is bored." This profound boredom, drifting hither and thither in the abysses of existence like a mute fog, draws all things, all men and oneself along with them, together in a queer kind of indifference. This boredom reveals what-is in totality.

In Oppen, it is quite literally "what-is:" "the world, weather-swept, with which/ one shares the century," that boredom reveals. It becomes a common theme Oppen, especially in _Of Being Numerous_...

Stephen Cope

> Can boring poems operate as critique, until a critique of boredom is formulated?
>
> Why do I get bored by poems? But at the same time, why am I most interested in poems that s(t)imulate boredom, making me blank & drain?
>
> If boredom were a commodity, would it be desirable?
>
> And what if a poem is so boring it invites readers to question why they're bored?
>
> Peter Jaeger

↑ Index

630. Michael Boughn
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

"Boredom is part of the Logos too."

--Jack Spicer

↑ Index

631. henry gould
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997 00:38:27 -0600 Hugh Steinberg said:
>
>I think it's a lot easier to talk about poems, especially in the workshop >environment, by only engaging with the formal/technical aspects of the work >at hand. This is often why so many workshop poems look and sound alike. An >ideal form is assumed, which is then used as a yardstick to which the poems

I agree with Hugh here completely, except I would go so far as to argue that meter & rhyme & form (sonnet, etc.) are not even the formal aspects. In my own writing work, it seems to me that unless these are treated as almost trivial scaffolding - there to be bent and twisted & fooled around with in whatever way you please - you'll never get out of the straitjecket.
These formalist workshop teachers (sounds like a nightmare) have got it backwards. 30 years practice, let's say, at my own speeds & lineations etc.
make these forms malleable. Piano playing - scales - free verse or metered, it comes to the same thing. & if it don't swing to begin with...
>
>I don't agree with this. It's just as easy to write a bad poem that scans >as one that doesn't.

Easier, according to Auden. No doubt about it, according to me. 99% are bad for you. Better to go down the street & have a donut dunked in whiskey.
>
>Yet despite this critical/historical baggage, I think these forms and the >language used to analyze the formal aspects of a poem are useful for the >act of reading and writing poems. Not good. Not bad. Just useful.

Again I go back to the point Mark Wallace raised about U.S. experimentalists who set their own formal parameters & see what develops. I see no difference between this and what the forms do. A lot of the forms actually WORK (at least in my dumb lowbrow workshop). I did a "glose" last night (no, it's not a drug - it's a Portuguese form). You start with a 4-line rhymed "text" - then each line is the refrain, in order, of a ten-line stanza, rhymed or whatever any way you like.
It works - it underlines the text, sets up an echo-chamber. - Henry G.

↑ Index

632. DEAN F. TACIUCH

Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms

Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Hugh Steinberg wrote:

[cut]

> I think it's a lot easier to talk about poems, especially in the workshop environment, by only engaging with the formal/technical aspects of the work at hand. This is often why so many workshop poems look and sound alike. An ideal form is assumed, which is then used as a yardstick to which the poems on the worksheet are compared. Issues of content, what the poem is about, are seldom broached because workshops are social as well as pedagogical beasts, and one of the rules seems to be that because authors have the right to write about anything they please, no person's content should be privileged over another's. This makes sure everyone plays nice. It also guarantees a certain sloppiness in the ideas of the poem, in much the same way as a person's ideas become sloppy when no one disagrees with them.
>
> I think my profs were operating under the assumption that if you imposed a formal strictness or rectitude upon the poem, the content would also have to straighten up.
>
> I don't agree with this. It's just as easy to write a bad poem that scans as one that doesn't.

True, but as one who teaches Undergraduate Creative Writing courses, and who doesn't spend much time on sonnets and the like, I find that it is not only easier but more useful to talk about matters of form than to discuss "content"--the latter discussion often breaks down into "What did you mean here?" (which then turns into the even less productive "What _I_ was trying to say here. . .")

True, this retreat to easy questions and answers can happen with formal discussions, too, it's not nearly as often. By form, since I'm not a "formalist," I take to be the actual use of the words--I concentrate on sound patterns (though I discourage end rhyme since its just too easy to write simplistically in that mode) and heavily on lineation. I ask them to justify each line break (a task I wonder if I myself could perform convincingly). So the questions from the class are more along the lines of "why did you do this _here_?" rather than "why'd you say that?" At least that's what I hope for. Often, just to get a discussion of form going in a beginning writing class is a victory.

Presenting form as ubiquitous (that everything they write is formed) is, I hope, a means to begin questioning constructions of all kinds.

Dean

↑ Index

633. Catherine Elizabeth Paul
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

I, too, had undergrad creative writing profs who emphasized form at the expense of content, but their reason, and as I get older I agree (read: become more stodgey?), was that the purpose of such a class was to teach tools so that when we finally had something to say, those tools would be at our disposal--very much like piano lessons, indeed.

Catherine Paul University of Michigan
[redacted]

↑ Index

634. Jordan Davis
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

In regard to boredom: didn't Freud say something about boredom being a form of anxiety? Didn't John Cage say, if something is boring, keep going for half an hour; if it's still boring, keep going for an hour?

The first few years I went to poetry readings I logged a lot of boredom. This had a lot to do with not knowing how to hear the work, sure, but it may have had to do with the work being read being not totally great. At any rate, ten years later I am seldom _bored_ at readings within the social circle of poetry downtown New York. Uptown, well, I don't know the people.

When my students report that they're bored, I decode this as meaning that I haven't made the project at hand available to them.

When I notice my mind wandering when I'm reading, I go as far as I can in that other direction, then I come back.

Jordan Davis

↑ Index

635. Mark Prejsnar
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

The famous myth (I mean I'm pretty sure it is factually true, but a bit of mythologizing too), wherein Pound wrote that he had written a sonnet a day for a year, then burnt them all, was very impressive to me in my teens (long ago). The idea of formal frames (form in the prosodic sense) is still to be really clarified for us at this historical moment...Just what is the relation between the two impulses...The one represented by working (partly "to learn") with older forms, as mentioned by Henry and Katherine; and the other impulse represented by more innovative "formal exercises" --the B.Mayer list of St. Marks ideas, the spinoff used by CB in teaching, which is on the Web...?? Are we thinking about "form" very differently in the two different instances? or is the one just an "updated" version of trying sonnets and terza rima? (I personally do get a lot out of playing with such form ideas; I have one rather long poem which I attempted to make consist of nothing but verbs; which I rather like; most such things get tossed tho'.....And as for my own provisional sense of the answer to my question: I think the two impulses are related, but crucially different, not just versions of the same thing..But haven't yet thought it thru....)

Henry's roundel was wonderful...

Mark P.

> be. But I'm curious. Has anyone else on this list worked through this or other books, or other ideas on form, as a way to something else?
>
> Kathrine Varnes

↑ Index

636. Miekal And
Re: Jung Kwang
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Mark Weiss wrote:
>
> My god (goddess)! What do women paint with?
>
> Which raises a couple more questions abt Master Kwang:
>
> Does he do nudes?
>
> Is his stroke different erect or flaccid?

Now, this is why I joined the poetic list. Forget form & content & boredom.

Sounds very Gutai to me.

Miekal

↑ Index

637. Pritchett,Pat
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

That is a wonderful quote! I like Stephen Cope's post on Oppen/Heidegger, too, and wld just add that bordeom is a writer's best friend. To be stripped of the usual objects or purposes of desire is to be compelled to create new ones. So I wld disagree with the good David Israel's remark that boredom and desire are opposites. I see them working very much in tandem. Bordeom fuels desire. But does desire lead to boredom? I wld guess it does.

Patrick Pritchett

From: Michael Boughn
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Date: Monday, March 24, 1997 6:33AM

"Boredom is part of the Logos too."

--Jack Spicer

↑ Index

638. Maria Damon
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

At 11:11 PM -0500 3/23/97, henry wrote:
>I'm using the old Turco, thin red, which is heavy on obscure Welsh forms.
>Just finished a Portuguese riff, the "glose". Like an enlarged carol.
>- HG

i was on a panel w/ turco a few yrs ago, i talked about jack spicer and camp as subaltern wit; he looked mortified (bright red apoplectic furious) to be on a panel where someone was talking about queers, later he said that women were taking jobs away from men in the academy these days (a bit like our recent discussion about "identity politics"?) ...that was my intro to the "new formalism." hank, i respect and enjoy your eclecticism in matters poetic, but turco? nein danke.

↑ Index

639. A. Morris
Steve Abbott on Kaufman
Mon 24 Mar 1997

A plea for help with a reference. Steve Abbott called Bob Kaufman "the hidden master of the Beats" somewhere, maybe in a 1986 issue of Poetry Flash, though I'm not sure. If anyone knows the source, please backchannel me with a specific citation.

Thanks a lot--

Dee Morris

↑ Index

640. Maria Damon
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

At 11:31 PM -0500 3/23/97, David R. Israel wrote:
>> >If boredom were a commodity, would it be desirable?
>> >
>> Boredom, like talk, is cheap.
>
>Boredom & desire are opposites.
>Or rather: there's desire & antipathy (w/ boredom at the fulcrum)?
>
i thinkk boredom is like depression, a cover up for something else, like anger or loneliness. nothing is inherently boring, so the gaze should go inward to find out why. so if a poem is boring to you it can still teach you stuff, if only more about your own desires. i like this thread of theorizing boredom, it seems far more fruitful than the old form/content treadmill.--md

↑ Index

641. henry
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

---

my first reaction to Mark's interesting post is probably an obvious one (I'm famous for being obvious). The main difference between "working through the old forms" and doing more experimental work is that the two paths are usually aimed-at and responded-to by different audiences. There is a contemporary art world, with which experimental poetry has a (more or less) close relationship. Experiment, to some degree, MEANS autonomy or liberation from these traditional forms, studied (are they still?) in academia, read by old fogies, trudged through in formalist "writing workshops", published in strange anthologies, etc. etc. And the whole thing has been "politicized" forever & ever by Pound & Williams, especially, along with Eliot, etc. Wallace Stevens was different - he basically said in various ways & times that the whole form question is a bore. (Agreed, Wally.)

But the question for the maker is, do I need to be bound by these dialectics? When I get down into the subatomic level of form & creation, do they even exist? I see a fabric, a verbal fabric. Someone at a meeting the other day read Hart Crane's "Chaplinesque" out loud, & very well. She displayed just at what depth of performance & innuendo this amazing poet (who played across all kinds of trad/experimental lines) was working. Ed Honig was there - he said he was around when Chaplin was flourishing - & that Crane was verbally mimicking Chaplin's mannerisms in a number of ways. Yet this is only one level on which that poem works. Now that's an example of technique which blows your meter/rhyme/form-as-technique claptrap (workshop-lingo) out of the water.

- Henry G.

↑ Index

642. henry
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

"Love in an animal sense is an illness, but a necessity which one has to overcome. Politics is an odd game, not without danger I have been told, but certainly sometimes amusing. To eat and drink are habits not to be despised but often connected with unfortunate consequences. To sail around the earth in 91 hours must be very strenuous, like racing in cars or splitting the atoms. But the most exhausting thing of all--is boredom. "So let me take part in your boredom and in your dreams while you take part in mine which may be yours as well."

- Max Beckmann

(who fell dead one day on the streets of Chicago)

↑ Index

643. Pritchett,Pat
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Maria, I think you're right that boredom often does mask some emotional state that's gone willfully unrecognized. But there's another sense in which I think writers deliberately attempt to cultivate bordeom as a means with which to "break out/into" a fresh line on things. Perhaps cultivate is the wrong word. But when boredom comes, it ought not to be eschewed as it can lead to a new avenue. Which links to Jordan's remarks about anxiety and Cage.

Patrick Pritchett

From: Maria Damon
To: POETICS
Subject: Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Date: Monday, March 24, 1997 10:48AM

i thinkk boredom is like depression, a cover up for something else, like anger or loneliness. nothing is inherently boring, so the gaze should go inward to find out why. so if a poem is boring to you it can still teach you stuff, if only more about your own desires. i like this thread of theorizing boredom, it seems far more fruitful than the old form/content treadmill.--md

↑ Index

644. Ira Lightman
Re: Astrology poetics/music
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Stockhausen has said that he has had visions that tell him he has been reincarnated from Sirius (see his piece Sirius, drawing on musical themes based on Capricorn, Aries, Cancer and Libra), and that he is sometimes "channels" music from Sirius.

Ira

On Sun, 23 Mar 1997 23:58:46 -0800 Stephen Cope wrote:

> From: Stephen Cope <[redacted]>
> Date: Sun, 23 Mar 1997 23:58:46 -0800
> Subject: Re: Astrology poetics/music
> To: [redacted]
>
> >though sun ra was heavily space and planet oriented, it was not so much > >from an interest in astrology (as i understand it) as from a feeling that > >he and other Black people were not welcome on Earth, and would in fact > >prefer to live elsewhere (saturn in particular) given the current state of > >the earth. about a year ago we had a discussion on this list about how gay > >writers etc often used tropes of otherworldliness (angels, outerspace etc) > >not so much out of a graviation twoard systems of esoterica as an > >articulation of otherness and a sense that "somewhere a place for us...".

> >etc.,
>
>
> Yes, very much so (Ra, of course, was both black and gay).
I would want to > add, however, that Sun Ra's reputedly vast knowledge of astrology (along > with many other 'esotoric' systems) was based in a belief, however ironic,
> that such a 'somehwere' did in fact exist, and was related to the stars, > planets, etc. (as with Coltrane, or certainly Braxton). I think of Duncan's
> 'Atlantis' here - a place which ultimately becomes very 'real' in the > poetry ("a made place" etc.) as much as it stands as a figure for loss. Or > - specifically in relation to music - the sense I get in Nate Mackey's work > of New World African religious and cosmological practice being carried out > _not only_ as critique of the current state of affairs, but as continuation > of (or participation in) models of thought the 'otherness' of which has > caused them to suffer a marginalization at the hands of imperializing > discourse which itself warrants redress. I think, that is to say, that Ra's > thought does call attention to the latter as well as the former...
>

>
> Stephen Cope

↑ Index

645. Kathrine Varnes
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Maria Damon wrote:
> i was on a panel w/ turco a few yrs ago, i talked about jack spicer and > camp as subaltern wit; he looked mortified (bright red apoplectic furious)
> to be on a panel where someone was talking about queers, later he said that > women were taking jobs away from men in the academy these days (a bit like > our recent discussion about "identity politics"?) ...that was my intro to > the "new formalism." hank, i respect and enjoy your eclecticism in matters > poetic, but turco? nein danke.

Technically, Turco is not "new" but old formalist. That red book was published in 67, I think, and he just last year retired from SUNY. The women taking jobs away from men thing is infuriating, but this baloney is ubiquitous (which is not to say that i don't fight it). But I've heard marxists and medievalists and, yes, postmodernists say the same thing and then hire five white men in succession in a predominantly male department. ain't no movement owns that lame position. I've written about the troubled politics in new formalism, so please don't mistake _my_ position, but I'm not sure this characterization of Turco is fair. Did he _say_ he had this problem with queers? Or did he have a problem with your argument about queers? There is a difference.

Kathrine Varnes

↑ Index

646. Steven Marks
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Maria Damon wrote:

> i thinkk boredom is like depression, a cover up for something else, like anger or loneliness. nothing is inherently boring, so the gaze should go inward to find out why. so if a poem is boring to you it can still teach you stuff, if only more about your own desires. i like this thread of theorizing boredom, it seems far more fruitful than the old form/content treadmill.--md

yes, yes, yes. I had an editor at a newspaper some time ago who overheard a fellow reporter whining about a boring story. "There are no boring stories, only boring writers." And to prove his point, he went on a drive through the town which the reporter covered and came up with about a dozen fascinating stories. He hated reporters who never left the office and rounded up the usual "sup-sects" on the telephone to use for quotes in a story. Talk about writing to an already conceived form!

Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

647. Joseph Lease

Re: boredom, poetry, questions

Mon 24 Mar 1997

boredom can be a form of anger: there's an intuitive connection between Warhol works such as sleep and Robert Wilson trace works and a readymade or Hemmings Ball jamming at the Cabaret Voltaire: boredom can be anger

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Jordan Davis wrote:

> In regard to boredom: didn't Freud say something about boredom being a form of anxiety? Didn't John Cage say, if something is boring, keep going for half an hour; if it's still boring, keep going for an hour?
>
> The first few years I went to poetry readings I logged a lot of boredom. This had a lot to do with not knowing how to hear the work, sure, but it may have had to do with the work being read being not totally great. At any rate, ten years later I am seldom _bored_ at readings within the social circle of poetry downtown New York. Uptown, well, I don't know the people.
>
> When my students report that they're bored, I decode this as meaning that I haven't made the project at hand available to them.
>
> When I notice my mind wandering when I'm reading, I go as far as I can in that other direction, then I come back.
>
> Jordan Davis

↑ Index

648. Joseph Lease
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Maria Damon wrote:

> At 11:31 PM -0500 3/23/97, David R. Israel wrote:
> If boredom were a commodity, would it be desirable?
>
> Boredom, like talk, is cheap.
>
> Boredom & desire are opposites.
> Or rather: there's desire & antipathy (w/ boredom at the fulcrum)?
>
> i thinkk boredom is like depression, a cover up for something else, like > anger or loneliness.

agree!: absolutely and it's a key point: there should be a post on the way about boredom and Warhol and Dada

nothing is inherently boring, so the gaze should go > inward to find out why. so if a poem is boring to you it can still teach > you stuff, if only more about your own desires.

often people defend against scary ideas by saying oh that old thing that's boring we've heard that before (that's we construction in relation to boredom): Warhol did it to Neruda: may tried to do it to Ashbery:

but surely we can learn from the old farts: I mean imagine a poem that actually combines what's long and weird and heterogeneous in say (name a language poet) with the versions of long and weird and heterogeneous in (name a narrative poet from the twenties or thirties): that wouldn't bore me

i like this thread of > theorizing boredom, it seems far more fruitful than the old form/content > treadmill.--md
>

↑ Index

649. henry
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997 09:56:14 -0600 Maria Damon said:
>the "new formalism." hank, i respect and enjoy your eclecticism in matters
>poetic, but turco? nein danke.

I don't know much about the politics of phone book publishers (maybe I should) but I just go ahead and use it. And this is the 2nd time I've been noted for "eclecticism" on this list. I will not be smeared with that popcorn butter! Wilbur Delaze Potato, my lawyer, is documenting these accusations.

As i sayed to Joe Amato, I have my own narrow motivations, & these machine-gun blabs of mine have probably distorted, once again, the "big picture". The EPOCH-MAKING BREAKTHROUGH of 20th cent HAS been the breakdown of trad formalisms in poetry. It has ushered in an explosion of just plain "writing" and "performance" which is powerful/authentic/original art in ways far beyond the 19th cent or previous could imagine. This goes back to as M.Perloff mentioned, Duchamp & his frames. You put a frame around it - even an invisible, surreal/ironic frame - and it says something new. The question is whether by now these frames haven't gotten awful heavy, clunky, expensive, and recherche. (i.e. boring????) But the question for anybody working in "forms" - trad. poetry forms - is whether they really CAN be authentic/original/new & interesting to any degree comparable with the experiments. I don't know the answer to this - may be one reason I'm doing them (at the moment).

I am not a formalist and I am not eclectic. If you look on the underside of the paper on which each and every one of my poems is written, down on the lower left corner, you'll see a small fingerprint in green ink. That is MY PERSONAL TRADEMARK which runs like a motif through ALL my work. I AM NOT GOING TO TELL YOU which finger it represents. Eclectic, pish. - Hankovitch (I am not a crook, neither)

↑ Index

650. Joseph Lease

Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms

Mon 24 Mar 1997

---

right: you can't tar Adrienne Rich or Elizabeth Bishop with Turco

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Kathrine Varnes wrote:

> On Mon, 24 Mar 1997, Maria Damon wrote:
> i was on a panel w/ turco a few yrs ago, i talked about jack spicer and camp as subaltern wit; he looked mortified (bright red apoplectic furious) to be on a panel where someone was talking about queers, later he said that women were taking jobs away from men in the academy these days (a bit like our recent discussion about "identity politics"?) ...that was my intro to the "new formalism." hank, i respect and enjoy your eclecticism in matters poetic, but turco? nein danke.
>
> Technically, Turco is not "new" but old formalist. That red book was published in 67, I think, and he just last year retired from SUNY.

> The women taking jobs away from men thing is infuriating, but this baloney is ubiquitous (which is not to say that i don't fight it). But I've heard marxists and medievalists and, yes, postmodernists say the same thing and then hire five white men in succession in a predominantly male department. ain't no movement owns that lame position. I've written about the troubled politics in new formalism, so please don't mistake _my_ position, but I'm not sure this characterization of Turco is fair. Did he _say_ he had this problem with queers? Or did he have a problem with your argument about queers? There is a difference.
>
> Kathrine Varnes

↑ Index

651. dbkk
Dodie Bellamy takes L.A.
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Hi, this is Dodie. FYI all you Southern California folks: I'll be reading this Friday night at Beyond Baroque with visual artist Raymond Pettibon. I hear Raymond is going to show slides. Saturday, Raymond and I will be teaching a workshop, "Dialoging with Images and Text."

↑ Index

652. henry
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Mon, 24 Mar 1997 13:02:20 -0500 Joseph Lease said:
>right: you can't tar Adrienne Rich or Elizabeth Bishop with Turco

this is being forwarded from another list:
** * * * * * * * * * * *
* * * * * ** * * * * * *

POLICE BREAK UP ACADEMIC O.F. RING

South Liverwurst, NY (ap). After a tip-off from Prof. Dendra Smothaird and campus police, Liverwurst authorities were able to penetrate and arrest 5 members of an Old Formalist ring they said had been "active" for years in the upstate NY area. "We don't know why they chose Buffalo," said Luongo Frim, chief detective. "It looks like a very professional operation. These guys - if you can believe it - were operating under a front, a punk rock band called Angry Young Dandruff - most of them are in their sixties, seventies! Writing sonnets & stuff. I don't know - upstate NY used to be a nice, clean, progressive experimental area..." Lois Mechanique, owner of Lois's Lo-Fat Diner, said - "And I used to serve them coffee. I shoulda known - these were eggs-over-hard guys. Every morning - and they'd be mumblin over their coffee - like, rhymes and stuff." The five men, who's names have been withheld (they have tenure), are being held without bail in the Louisville Lock-Up, for some reason. 3.24.97

↑ Index

653. Mark Weiss
Re: Jung Kwang
Mon 24 Mar 1997

This technique should be a real advantage in doing watercolors.

Do you think there are gender connotations here?

At 11:26 AM 3/24/97 +0600, you wrote:
>In a posting the other day I mentioned an astounding contemporary >Korean zen monk and artist who paints and composes poems by tying a >calligraphy brush to his penis. There is published work on him, >though the only thing I've seen is a beautiful catalog from an >exhibit some years ago, but I can't remember what museum. I remember >the essay there as referring to him as the "Jackson Pollock of Zen," >though many of his works are "representational," somewhat in the >manner of sumi-e. In any case, for those who might be interested in >pursuing information on this incredible person, his name is Jung >Kwang. I can also provide address to those interested of his good >friend, Samu Sunim who makes his "home" between Ann Arbor, Chicago, >and Toronto. Sunim also has a number of his works. Just backchannel >if so.
>
>Kent
>
>

↑ Index

654. Gwyn McVay
Re: Jung Kwang
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Mark, do you mean to tell me that all male artists don't paint this way?

Gwyn ;)

↑ Index

655. Joseph Lease
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Mon 24 Mar 1997

I just want to apologize for an aspect of one of my posts earlier today: I hadn't really read all of the post about Turco when I hit the reply and include buttons:

all I really wanted to say was: it doesn't make sense to use Turco against Rich or Bishop

↑ Index

656. simon
Re: Jung Kwang
Mon 24 Mar 1997

The prosthetic aesthetic.

beth simon

↑ Index

657. Daniel Zimmerman
Re: Form/Content again
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Hi. I posted the following to the listserv a few days ago, but didn't use the reply function [my first time posting], so I believe it may not have gone out to everyone. Here goes again:

Having eavesdropped on this thread for a few weeks, I'd like to offer the following: Forms form; form forms--by accretion, by direction, by cascade & interruption [as in embryo: "Eternity is no match for the zygote," Bob Hogg said]. A feedback loop. Freud pointed, in "The Antithetical Sense of Primary Words," to bifurcations, e.g., host/hostile. When not content with the inn's content, host turns bouncer. Otherwise, why reject unsuccessful poems? If only because of their content, change the content. But the form-- extensive from (or at least throughout) and superordinate to content-- resists change more intractably. Otherwise, the inn would assimilate the surly and disruptive guest [losing its form as inn in the process and becoming--what? A drunk tank?]. Not that, on occasion, a gatecrasher can't liven up a party, but until that determination becomes clear, the party metamorphoses from party to polygraph, then either ejects or welcomes the uninvited, then reforms itself as party. If the gatecrasher becomes a guest, the imminent becomes immanent. In his triadic theory of the Parasite, Michel Serres argues the necessity, for communication, of both the presence of the static by which the parasite seeks to disrupt communication between two interlocutors and the need for the interlocutors continually [continuously?] to resist the intrusion, allying themselves to allay the threat. When they stop resisting, communication ends. Does form, parasitizing contents, unify them? Do contents, resisting the imposition, form alliances? "One man's ceiing is another man's floor." Don't you hate it when people finish your sentences for you? Don't you love it when, if they seem about to, you reorient the sentence, leaving them (and yourself) somewhere different from and better than either of your expected or intended destinations? "Because the whole sentence meaning is inherently present in the mind of each person, it is quite possible for the pratibha of the sphota to be grasped by the listener even before the whole sentence has been uttered." --Harold G. Coward, The Sphota Theory of Language. "Farewell, then, Reader, from Montaigne."

Daniel Zimmerman
485 Parsonage Road
Edison, NJ 08837

↑ Index

658. Steve Carll

Antenym 12 publication and April readings

Mon 24 Mar 1997

(Apologies to anyone who gets this message more than once)

announcing the imminent publication of Antenym 12 Pluto in Sagittarius, Sun and Co. in Aries, 1997 (that s April) featuring work from George Albon (San Francisco), David Baratier (Columbus, OH), Steve Carll (San Francisco), Stephen Collis (Victoria, B.C.), Jordan Davis (New York City), Darin De Stefano (San Francisco), William Fuller (Winnetka, IL), Robert Hale (San Francisco), Jonathan Hayes (Berkeley, CA), John High (San Francisco), John Lowther (Atlanta, GA), William Marsh (San Diego, CA), Fernando Pessoa as Ricardo Reis (Lisbon, Portugal 1888-1935) translated by Chris Daniels (Berkeley, CA), Mark Peters (Cheektowaga, NY), Larry Price (Summit, NJ), Meredith Quartermain (Vancouver, B.C.), Stephen Ratcliffe (Bolinas, CA), Elizabeth Robinson (Berkeley, CA), Douglas Rothschild (Brooklyn, NY), Spencer Selby (San Francisco), and Rod Smith (Washington, D.C.)

Three dollars (plus $1.50 postage per copy). Published three times annually by Bathysphere Press. Ed. Steve Carll. Please address all correspondence to 106 Fair Oaks St. #3, San Francisco, CA 94110-2951, or e-mail: <[redacted]> Subscription rate: $13.50 per year (includes postage; checks payable to Steve Carll). All rights revert to authors upon publication. Also available in the S.F. Bay Area at City Lights, Modern Times, and Cody s Bookstores. Back issues available by e-mail; samples may be viewed at <http:// writing.upenn.edu/epc/ ezines/antenym> & <http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ mags/antenym>

Issue 12 will be celebrated with a reading mini-series to take place on Saturdays at 1:00 pm in the Redwood Trail area of Strybing Arboretum in Golden Gate Park in San Francisco, if it s not rainy or cold.

April 5: Darin De Stefano, Elizabeth Robinson, Chris Daniels April 12: George Albon, Robert Hale, Douglas Powell

Enter the Park at 9th Ave. and Lincoln Ave. Turn left at the gate just past the County Fair Building into Strybing Arboretum. Continue walking straight, bearing to the left of the fountain, through the "Asia" and "California" environments of the arboretum, and bearing right past the nursery buildings to the Redwood Trail. Enter the Redwood Trail and look for markers #17, 18 and 19. There's a little enclosed clearing there with benches and a podium. This is where the reading is.

A donation of $2.00 will be requested. Come out for some fresh air, sunshine, and poetic meditations!

Bathysphere Press
"It's Deep!"

Antenym, a xeroxed 8 and a half by 11 stapled magazine, invites submissions of poetry, fiction, critical and/or philosophical essays, visual art, and other varieties of work on the theme "Ontological Activism and its possibilities" to which issue #13 of the magazine will be dedicated. Submissions may be emailed to <[redacted]> or analog-mailed to Steve Carll at 106 Fair Oaks St. #3, San Francisco, CA 94110-2951, with an SASE for reply (and return of mss. if desired). Deadline is June 15, 1997.

On Ontological Activism:

It's often pointed to as the oldest and most fundamental complex of questions to occur in human consciousness: "Who am I, and what am I doing here?" Questions of this type, along with the resources needed to ask them and give them adequate reflection, are increasingly proscribed by the conditions currently structuring much of our daily experience, which ultimately threatens that human consciousness that makes such questioning possible and even necessary.

The phrase "ontological activism" announces itself as the public asking of the questions of being, transforming the individual "who am I?" through reintegration with the communal--"who are we?" in such a way that the opening up of personal perspectives may continually transform the communal as well, by offering examples of investigative strategies. In this way, the question becomes, "Do we as human beings wish to continue being, and if so, how?"

↑ Index

659. Mark Weiss
Re: Jung Kwang
Mon 24 Mar 1997

My god (goddess)! What do women paint with?

Which raises a couple more questions abt Master Kwang:

Does he do nudes?

Is his stroke different erect or flaccid?

At 02:45 PM 3/24/97 -0500, you wrote:
>Mark, do you mean to tell me that all male artists don't paint this way?
>
>Gwyn ;)
>
>

↑ Index

660. F.A. Templeton
Re: howard mccord
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Dear Louis,

Examples?

Fiona

↑ Index

661. F.A. Templeton
Re: Marginalization
Mon 24 Mar 1997

On Sun, 23 Mar 1997 [redacted] wrote:

> Dear Listees,
>
> Has the Segue space discussion of Perelman's Marginalization of Poetry happened yet? If so, I'd like read an account of it. Anybody else?

Yes, please, centralize.

Fiona

↑ Index

662. William Burmeister Prod
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

> Didn't John Cage say, if something is boring, keep going for half an hour; if it's still boring, keep going for an hour?

...and if you keep at it, it will no longer be boring to you. I think that Gertrude Stein had a good handle on this. Reading Stein may force one to have to redefine one's own definition of boredom.

> i thinkk boredom is like depression, a cover up for something else, like anger or loneliness. nothing is inherently boring, so the gaze should go inward to find out why. so if a poem is boring to you it can still teach you stuff, if only more about your own desires. i like this thread of theorizing boredom, it seems far more fruitful than the old form/content treadmill.--md

Wonderful and insightful comments from md. I found that boredom (as opposed to entertaining) was most often an excuse on my part. When that feeling occurs, I go back to reread the poem with renewed vigor since I may actually be missing something. In this negatively capable manner, I have been able to expand my own interests to include poets that I never considered before.

BB

↑ Index

663. Hugh Steinberg
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Mon 24 Mar 1997

About eight years ago I used to hang on the periphery of this group of writers who published under the name of Apathy Press (I still have their t-shirt, which consists of an anatomically acurate brain with swans' wings attached). Anyhow, the origin of the name of the press, according to Tom DiVenti, was the idea that it is only out of a state of apathy can anything start.

Boredom strikes me as a particularly negative energy source, much like a black hole or drug addiction. The trick is to come close enough so that you slingshot out into something fresh. The risk is that you fall in, perhaps forever.

Personally, I find I have more than enough boredom at my job that I need to seek out other experiences to bore me as well. It's not like boredom is ever a scarce commodity.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

664. David Bromige

what am I doing wrong? in response to the attached, i wrote to "[redacted]", only to be told that I ought to write to "[redacted]" ! how many times do I have to go around this corner, please?

Mon 24 Mar 1997

> Date: Mon, 24 Mar 1997 21:11:09 -0500
> From: "L-Soft list server at University at Buffalo (1.8c)"
> <[redacted]>
> Subject: Output of your job "dcmb"
> To: David Bromige <[redacted]>
>
> join [redacted] david bromige
> There is no LISTSERV server at LISTSERV. The syntax of LISTSERV commands does not usually require you to give the name of the site where the list is located. You may want to try again with just the name of the list (POETICS).
>
> Summary of resource utilization
> ----------
> CPU time: 0.010 sec
> Overhead CPU: 0.000 sec
> CPU model: SPARCstation-20 (384M)

↑ Index

665. Hugh Steinberg

Re: boredom, poetry, questions

Mon 24 Mar 1997

It also strikes me that this discussion of boredom is linked with either flight or transformation: either one runs from what is boring towards what is not boring, or one sticks with what is boring until it is no longer boring.

>> Didn't John Cage say, if something is boring, keep going for >> half an hour; if it's still boring, keep going for an hour?
>
>
>...and if you keep at it, it will no longer be boring to you. I think that >Gertrude Stein had a good handle on this. Reading Stein may force one to have >to redefine one's own definition of boredom.
>
>

What if it's boring for years? What if it will always be boring? When is it time to quit? After you receive the gold watch?

I guess I have an impatience with boredom.

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

666. CHRIS MANN
Re: Marginalization
Mon 24 Mar 1997

Existentialism and the bad picnic

After 'The Marginalization of Poetry, An Evening of responses to Bob Perelman's recent book from Princeton University Press' I was asked by one of the respondents what question I would like to have asked. I thought later that it would have been something along the lines of whether the panel and discussion would have been any differently constituted if the work being dealt with had been a poem. This I sent as an observation to someone who replied 'But some of the work in that book IS poetry...'

around and about marginalia:

Identity politics is only and inevitably ironic*.

Yes, fault was found in the work's not being something else (evidenced by the author's polite stammering, an eloquent mea cupla so long as you didn't pay attention to the words), however the discussion was generally overshadowed by the I-know-coz-I-was-there school of inanity represented (and I use the word advisedly) by the academic trope of 'about'. 'Aboutness' was evidently the topic under discussion. However 'aboutness' has no logical intersection with change. It is a decorative form of identity which yields to description and is indulgently pathetic. And as to the politics of ancestor snatching (semantics), we already knew that it's easier to be embarrassed by our friends - enemies at least have the moral integrity of not being right for the wrong reasons. They at least have no confusion of form and content, no 'about'. And no blame. They at least are blessed with the possibility (decadence) of changing they're minds.

* It in no way requires a me to be understood. In it, I has the exclusively romantic status of a victim.

 'I am' is the blessing of stupidity - write your own fucking book.

↑ Index

667. Dave Zauhar
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms (Turco)
Mon 24 Mar 1997

> At 11:11 PM -0500 3/23/97, henry wrote:
> I'm using the old Turco, thin red, which is heavy on obscure Welsh forms.
> Just finished a Portuguese riff, the "glose". Like an enlarged carol.
> - HG
>
> i was on a panel w/ turco a few yrs ago, i talked about jack spicer and
> camp as subaltern wit; he looked mortified (bright red apoplectic furious)
> to be on a panel where someone was talking about queers, later he said that > women were taking jobs away from men in the academy these days (a bit like > our recent discussion about "identity politics"?) ...that was my intro to > the "new formalism." hank, i respect and enjoy your eclecticism in matters
> poetic, but turco? nein danke.

Hey, I was in the audience for this (was it MMLA or MLA? Chicago or Washington? Anyway) if I remember correctly Diane Wakowski was the third panelist, and she also apparently got on his nerves, because within a year he published a hissy-fit disguised as an essay attacking her views on the politics of form (which are open to criticism, but you could tell by the ferocity of his "essay" that she got under his skin). Mercifully, I missed the wounded white guy screed.

Dave Zauhar

↑ Index

668. Louis Cabri
John Wieners (fwd)
Mon 24 Mar 1997

This for the list, from Victor Coleman in Toronto:

> Although I never actually published Wieners, I > almost did, and I had a fairly long association with him, beginning with a > meeting in Detroit (of wch I have a snapshot [as does UCSD Library Spec.
> Coll.]), and continuing in Buffalo when he was a (grad?) student there at > the behest of Olson & Creeley.My soon to be 2nd wife, Sarah Miller & I > acted as kind of "care-givers" to John in various stages of need and tried > to salve his general paranoia as best we could. I also hung out a fair > amount with John & Bill Hutton when Billy was running Billy Zeigfeld's > Heaven, wch is mentioned in my 'first' book "one/eye/love" (also in > CORRECTIONS) KENKYUSHA: Day 22 -- "John is on the bed/with Billy > Holiday/humming her melody". At one point Island Press was going to reprint > all of the extant issues of MEASURE; but John held it up with the intent of > doing a 'last' issue, wch I think had something to do with Charles Boer's > translations of the Homeric Hymns, wch eventually came out in 1970 & was > reprinted as recently as 1987--but Wieners was looking for it in 1965. John came to Toronto, I think in 1977, with Charlie Shively, to read at A Space when I was running it, and we had a good visit then. I can remember sitting with Ron Caplan at the Coach House lunchtable on Bathurst Street in 1966 and impressing Stan Bevington w/ both of us writing down the name of the writer we were most excited about at that time, just to see if we really had something in common. Wieners it was. So yes he was a huge influence on me. I haven't seen him since then & am glad he's still alive.

>
> Victor
>
> Coach House Books is Canada's oldest (and newest) small press. Visit our website at http://www.chbooks.com - bookmark it because it changes practically everyday. To get in touch with us otherwise... 401 Huron Street (rear) on bpNichol Lane, Toronto, Ontario, M5S 2G5
> fax: [redacted] email: [redacted] phone: [redacted] or > outside the Toronto calling area [redacted]

↑ Index

669. clare emily clifford confidence, fire, birth.....
Mon 24 Mar 1997

---

dean f.tacuich <[redacted]> said:
>True, but as one who teaches Undergraduate Creative Writing courses, and >who doesn't spend much time on sonnets and the like, I find that it is not >only easier but more useful to talk about matters of form than to discuss >"content"--the latter discussion often breaks down into "What did you mean >here?" (which then turns into the even less productive "What _I_ was >trying to say here. . .")
>
>True, this retreat to easy questions and answers can happen with formal >discussions, too, it's not nearly as often. By form, since I'm not a >"formalist," I take to be the actual use of the words--I concentrate on >sound patterns (though I discourage end rhyme since its just too easy to write >simplistically in that mode) and heavily on lineation. I ask them to >justify each line break (a task I wonder if I myself could perform >convincingly). So the questions from the class are more along the lines >of "why did you do this _here_?" rather than "why'd you say that?" At >least that's what I hope for. Often, just to get a discussion of form >going in a beginning writing class is a victory.

and catherine paul <[redacted]> said:
>I, too, had undergrad creative writing profs who emphasized form at the >expense of content, but their reason, and as I get older I agree (read:
>become more stodgey?), was that the purpose of such a class was to teach >tools so that when we finally had something to say, those tools would be >at our disposal--very much like piano lessons, indeed.

the hardest part, when working with budding writers, is initially to instill the confidence in them that what they have to say is worthwhile. doesn't the molding of the craft _then_ come after? i mean... with dedication comes the venturing to explore different forms and styles which will best bestow the voice with a resonant clarity, but the first step,
i think, is the initiation of breathing into those words, and then with the discipline of form and texture of language comes the compression and necessity of each aspect of the piece (ie: why _this_ word, does _this_ form best illustrate the sanctity of the piece as a whole?)

working with a jorie graham-esque aspect of language (the invisible stitches being just as essential to the working whole as the stitches that you can see), and as the students engage not only in the exploration of their own writing, but the analytical study of other poets, they can decipher the methodology which best suits the content of their piece.

the words on the page are just as essential as the precise placement of the white space that remains _around_ those words. they all work as a whole to bring the language to life.
call this all form, if you will.

basically what i think a lot of this comes down to,
is that with experience you begin to utilize the tools of your trade. intro creative writing poetry courses are the most intimidating place for the little freshman/sophomore undergraduate to be when they're still struggling with the intimacy of their writing. the crafting comes with experience.

that's when the tools (ie: more confining forms, more confining topics, etc) will become generative for them.

jordan davis <[redacted]>
>When my students report that they're bored, I decode this as meaning that I >haven't made the project at hand available to them.

its' all about illuminating that spark and letting it start a brush fire in their minds, eh?

but isn't that what teaching is supposed to be about?

which leads us to henry's statement of:

henry <[redacted]> > Experiment, to some degree, MEANS >autonomy or liberation from these traditional forms, studied (are they >still?) in academia, read by old fogies, trudged through in formalist

how many classes teach traditional form in present day academia?

wow. think about that one. do any of you offer classes that focus on the specialized use of what some would call more 'traditional' form?
i think that this would be wonderful in aiding many students today.... kids are _screaming_ for opportunities to mold their craft... they're doing excersizes on their own in writing cantos, sestinas, villanella's, etc, if only to _impose_ a form upon themselves in order to explore the boundaries of language and see what is hiding in the 'narrw diary of [their] mind' (sexton).

but what it comes down to, is that if they're doing this work on their own, they are obviously starving for the opportunity to engage in this 'mental foreplay' in a classroom setting. they're raging on challenges. we can't underestimate their passion.

Hugh Steinberg <[redacted]> said:
>Boredom strikes me as a particularly negative energy source, much like a >black hole or drug addiction. The trick is to come close enough so that >you slingshot out into something fresh. The risk is that you fall in, >perhaps forever.

in 'education of the poet'
 louise gluck said,
"Periodically, in those seven years [of psychotherapy], I'd turn to my doctor
with the old accusation:
 he'd make me so well, so whole,
 I'd never write again.
 Finally he silenced me;
the world, he told me, will give you sorrow enough," therecan be something generative hiding in that darkness. and i do agree that it can slide destructively out of hand.... one great book on this topic is

a. alvarez' 'the savage god'...

just a little babble from my corner....

love and light,
clare emily

'the artist is extremely lucky who is presented with the worst possible ordeal which would not actually kill him...
at that point he's in business...' -john berryman

↑ Index

670. David Bromige
derusticating
Tue 25 Mar 1997

David Bromige here, I'm back on the list, so careful what you are seen saying about me if anybody does. Apart from George.

I understand Bowering has for the third time renounced his good work in _Piccolo Mondo_ . How about if I post some bits of George's chapters, and let listmembers gauge whether my parodic powers could possibly reach that far?

Guage??

Gauage???

Gauauge????

Looking forward to spelling with you-all for a spell.

db

↑ Index

671. aerialedge
A New Circle -- April 4 & 5 NYC
Tue 25 Mar 1997

A New Circle: Communities of Poetry 1997

April 4th & 5th
2 Days of Readings & Open Discussion

All events at Ireland House, One Washington Mews (entrance on 5th ave. south of 8th st.)

Friday, April 4th

6:00-7:00 p.m.
Opening Reception/Book Sales

7:00-9:00 Readings:
Ruth Danon
Michael Heller
Erica Hunt
Pierre Joris
Andrew Levy
Maureen Seaton
Rod Smith

Saturday April 5th

11 am -- 12:30 pm Panel 1:
Ruth Danon
Ben Friedlander
Michael Heller
Andrew Levy
Maureen Seaton
Rod Smith
Karen Volkman

12:30 -- 2:00 pm Panel 2:
Stacy Doris
Rob Fitterman
Erica Hunt
Pierre Joris
Hermine Meinhard

Hugh Seidman
Paul Violi

2:00 -- 5:00 pm Lunch Break

5:00 -- 6:00 Reception/Book Sales

6:00 -- 8:00 Readings:
Stacy Doris
Rob Fitterman
Ben Friedlander
Hermine Meinhard
Hugh Seidman
Paul Violi
Karen Volkman

Sponsered by New York University and SCE Writer's Community.
Organized by Ruth Danon & Rob Fitterman.
With thanks to Deans Gerald A. Heeger, Steve Curry, and Bill Cipolla.

It's free.

↑ Index

672. Franklin Bruno four melismas
Tue 25 Mar 1997

---

1) Clare Emily Clifford wrote:

> working with a jorie graham-esque aspect of language (the invisible stitches being just as essential to the working whole as the stitches that you can see)...

Not that familiar w/ Graham's work, but this notion sounds a lot like something I contended about music in something I just wrote. (What's important to me is that the invisible stiches are, in fact, still stiches.) Where would I find Graham discussing this?

2) Someone mentioned a few days ago that 'a consensus' seemed to be forming around the form/content discussion, to the general effect that they're inextricable from one another. But isn't this where we started? And, though I understand the -form- of the consensus, I don't think I've quite gotten its -content-. Someone else said that this listserv was a form, and rhetorically asked if it had a content separable from it. Well, if not, then this list has the same content as, say, the white-power-music list that has been mentioned (as something to vote against the existence of, though I'm not clear on the details). This seems an odd conclusion. "I love the Mets," "I hate the Mets," and "I misuse the olive fork" all have the same grammatical form, but might be said in -some- sense to have different contents. Now that sounds like the kind of banality John Searle might perpetrate, but I'd like to know -specifically- how we are to go beyond it. Is the sense in which these have the same (I'd just say similar--nothing's ever the same) content just the sense in which they all make certain assumptions about the relation of subject to object? What else can be said? (I'm not being rhetorical -at all- here, I want to know what people will say--and I realize that I'm treating the sentences above as linguistic abstractions, divorced from any particular utterance or use, as in a poem. Still...)

3) Recent discussions about teaching form boil down, for me, to this question: Why couldn't "Write a sonnet in strict iambic pentameter" be an entry on Bernadette Mayer's or Charles Bernstein's experiments lists? I think the answer has to do w/ breaking the hold of the cultural capital such forms possess. At Pomona College, the main creative writing teacher was Robert Mezey, the ex-"Naked Poetry" editor who recanted at became, at least when I encountered him, an arch-formalist. I remember being in a workshop with a talented student who gave him a sestina that the student had, I gathered, worked over a number of times. The gist of his comments was something like, "It's getting there, but it's not there yet." To me, this is an indicator of how -mystified- (in something like the John Berger sense) the Unity-of-Form-and-Content can be for a certain sort of teacher. All Mezey seemed to be saying was: Go back and revise and revise this until it is 'perfected' according to some standard that does not admit of analysis, but can only be apprehended by pure artistic intuition. Then, my son, you'll be a poet. In a word, feh. (Jed Rasula was a visiting prof my senior year, and that loosened things up a bit.)

4) Could Maria (or anyone) tell me where to look for info on Sun Ra's gayness? I've never encountered this in print, even (unless I've forgotten) in John Corbett's excellent -Extended Play-, which has a great chapter on alien-ness in Sun Ra and George Clinton.

5) This was from a few days ago, but: Plato would be surprised to learn that the medievals invented the difference between words and things. (I'd like to be quoting the -Cratylus- in this regard, but I don't have a copy here.)

heterogenously,
fjb

↑ Index

673. Chris Stroffolino

THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)

Tue 25 Mar 1997

Dear to whom it may concern:

Although I've been suspicious about what "call" it is that I am exactly responding to, I will try to "suspend" (or at least diffuse) such suspicions and try to address some of what for me seemed the issues that were (and were not discussed) at the MARGINALIZATION event.....

Perhaps the best place to begin would be at the "ending...." (in real time) The last question asked at the event was by Jackson Maclow (who, earlier that day, had given one of the best readings I'd seen him give--despite that damn ear inn perennial p.a. problem), and it was a question that, had it been asked earlier, may have changed the whole discussion. It was something to the effect of---(warning: all following 'quotes' are paraphrases and if I misrepresent anyone PLEASE let me know) "I came here thinking that this was going to be a talk about THE MARGINALIZATION OF POETRY, and it turned out it was a talk about a particular book called "The Marginalization of Poetry" and...." Jackson apologized for his ignorance and naivete, on a "face value" level, but also addressed, although in his rather childlike zen-master way, a question that in some ways was "very near the surface (or the heart)" of what seemed to be Silliman's challenge (which I'll address shortly) to Perelman's project here. The question, for me, and that seemed to get lost in the discussion that night, might be phrased in terms of Steve Carll's "ontological activism" (why am I here? etc or how do do we position ourselves viz-a-viz certain questions). Marginalization is a LOADED term and perhaps (as Steve Evans and others pointed out) a cliche by now--and its meaning (like the "sublime object") depends on its context, and WHAT WAS the context of the event? Was there a context? Can there be a context? Maybe it hasn't been constructed yet and of course I can not construct it here, but only in questoning....

Jackson's question elicited from Bob the response and REMINDER that the book's title grew out of the essay/poem (or whatever you wanna call it) that he wrote for a very specifically academic context in response to a call for papers from Marjorie Perloff (see book for details). Had this REMINDER been made at the beginning of the event, I think the discussion would have gone quite differently. For, IN ACADEMIC DISCOURSE (as Jonathon Levin and others), and in English Departments, poetry is marginalized viz-a-viz novels, cultural studies, etc (again, take a look at the latest MLA call for papers, etc.) in a way it might not have been in previous eras (I'm not going to get into that one here though....). Marginalized in general, and there is perhaps a desire amongst poets who work in the academy to DEFEND poetry against such a status (there is even a desire, for understandable reasons, of teachers of poetry to do so)--this is perhaps as true of champions of "the western canon" as much as it is of champions of "language" or "new york school" etc. etc. writing

Yet, when we take Perelman's book OUT of this particular context, and bring it to the SEGUE space, suddenly it becomes a DIFFERENT book. Suddenly we see a Professor at an Ivy League school on the defensive because the audience (and perhaps the fellow panellists) was mostly people who see themselves as MORE MARGINALIZED than Perelman as poets, and one could imagine the satiric scenario depicted in Kenneth Koch's "FRESH AIR" being updated, and instead of the "you make me sick with your talk of swans and candy hearts" etc of that poem, there was "Free Bob Perelman" stickers and whispers in the wings of him, from both the linguistic left (as a native informer), the social left (as an unmarginalized white middle-to-upper class male) (which may be seen as a "linguistic right" though I that's why I objected to what I saw as Marjorie's distinction a few weeks back although I certainly agree that poems that CAN'T STAND UP AMONG REPEATED READINGS are 99% of the time boring and dull) and others. The point I'm trying to centralize here is that, as far as I could tell, THERE WASN'T ANYBODY MORE ACADEMIC THAN BOB in the audience (or on the panel) and this certainly informed the tone of the event and seemed to ironize the book and at least its title in ways that could have been made clearer BEFORE Jackson's pointed question. Ron Silliman's paper (which began the event, after a pointed introduction by moderator Sean Killian in which he lamented the lack of intellectual forums in NYC and hoped this event would begin to change what he perceives as the rather anti-intellectual bent of the "downtown" NYC poetry scene and after a recital of the poem by Bob about being abducted by (academic?) aliens he posted to this list) did seem to make many of these points about Bob's book as he pointed out that it was primarily addressed TO ACADEMICS rather than to poets and considered that the primary FAULT of the book---that the distortions of the kind of NORMATIVE ACADEMIC DISCOURSE Bp is working in here simply CAN NOT do justice to what, for ROn, is the most exciting and interesting strains and achievements of LP (Hannah Weiner and Bob Grenier) and centered on BP's reading of Grenier as an example of this method. Ron made a conceptual distinction between "critical" and "academic" writing (as if the latter is always already more corrupted) and found Bob's attempt to create a NARRATIVE for Grenier's poetry as well as for his PLACE in "poetry" (canon, etc.) deeply disturbing, as if narratve is always more corrupt than poetry that "is not ABOUT" or "about the nanosecond before choice itself occurs" (and as I digression I wonder about what the implications of Ron's seeming preference of Grenier's project to Bob's--especially considering Ron's problems with the "Burning Deck" or "French minimalism" thing, which to me seems to have much more in common with Grenier than it does with Perelman in terms of this "nanosecond" standard Ron is setting...but this is another topic) Ann Lauterbach took a different tactic. Not needing to SPEAK FOR THE HEART AND SOUL of LANGUAGE POETRY as Ron's argument with Bob seemed to, she dealt more with what she perceived as Bob's ghettoization of emotions and the personal. One of the high moments of her talk in this connection was her reading of Bob's reading of a Creeley poem aout him having sex with another woman as his wife drives the kids to school or something. I think she did a very interesting job of pointing out an aporetic hedging on Bp's part as he tried to disclaim the importance of content in a writer who write "form is nothing but an extention....". She also addressed some gender questions--for instance, why THEORISTS are gendered male and PRACTICTIONERS are gendered female in this book. Of course, Lauterbach concluded, PRACTICE subsumes theory, and BP was not necessarily claiming a hierarchical privilege of one over the other--but, then, he doesn't really devote that much page space to the women writers he addresses and that might be telling (again, this may be a severe misrepresentation of the thrust of Lauterbach's paper)....

This is going on too long (I think I understand Joe Amato).... but Juliana SPahr was next and spoke about what she perceived as Bob's COASTAL bias, and (as if NEW YORK is the NEW COAST) focussed on what for me seemed to be a defense of Bruce A. and Charles B. against what she perceived as Perelman's neglect. She claimed that, in contrast to BP's assertion, that these writers CAN be taught... Then Steve Evans did a long and funny (and almost dada-like) performance of a reading of a Bunuel movie, and claimed to have DIRECT EVIDENCE of how academia dulls people and used some VERY interesting DOWNSTREAM metaphor in which I would like to cast myself as the missing SALMON swimming upstream.... But, all these discussions (and most of the Q and A session afterwards) stayed within the confines of the agenda the book set up. In the Q and A session, bp was primarily on the defensive, as i said before. It would have been interesting had THE MARGINALIZATION oF POETRY (the issue as much as the book) in SOCIETY as well as in the academy had been addressed...It would have been at least interesting not to single out Bob but to ask what role the L poets have played in marginalizing poetry? Did they willfully marginalize it? (with their own networks of publishing and not needing to make certain compromises in the beginning that other, perhaps pooer (economically speaking) poets, must, at least at the beginning? And in this light, can this vindicate Bob for at least trying to break out of a small, perhaps too self-satisfied coterie, and fight certain academic battles? Or is poetry marginalized through no fault of poets? Is it one of the exigencies of heavy "LITE CAPITALISM" (who said that?) that poets are helpless against, and in such a light are the strategies the L poets adopted (I'm talking about "circulation of texts" as much as the actual writing of them) seen as at least NOT making matters worse in the increasing rifts and poetry wars? Or has poetry ALWAYS been marginalized and is it perhaps okay that it is best so? (always best so, or at least sometimes, as in Evans' quoting Auden's "poetry makes nothing happen" and stressing the positive side of such a formulation--as if this "nothing" is kind of like Silliman's "nanosecond before choice is made" and CLASS IS SUSPENDED)? These questions, as well as why are so many poets deciding to go back to school later in life (not just bob, but myself and Ben Friedlander come to mind)--after already publishing at least one book, are interesting questions, as are the questions of the workplace and race and class that were attempted to be discussed in the Q and A session.....(hope this helps Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

674. Chris Stroffolino
In Other News....
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Just wanted to say that earlier this month I saw readings by Thomas Sayers Ellis and Tom Breydenbach (sic) in NYC. Both excellant writers circa 30 years old and both excellant readings. Names to look out for,
as is Joe Ross, whose FUZZY LOGIC SERIES has just been been published by Texture Press). I consider it to be one of his best (along with GUARDS OF THE HEART), though I may be biased, because the work does seem EXTREMELY similar to some of my own....(mordantly recursive?) and Jordan, I will respond to your post soon, for which I thank you, but I don't want to HOG up too much space in one day on the listserv.....Chris

↑ Index

675. KENT JOHNSON
bp/bob
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Chris:

In your fantaastic long post (which I have to still go back to digest), you refer to Bob Perleman as "bp." May I ask that you don't do so any more? This confuses him with a poet that I suspect Bob Perelman would agree is bound to be (if justice is to be done) of more historical import than he: bp nichol. Let's keep bp as bp and Bob Perleman as Bob Perleman, or Ivy Bob, or just Bob P., or whatever.

thanks, Kent

↑ Index

676. KENT JOHNSON

Re: Jung Kwang

Tue 25 Mar 1997

> Date sent: Mon, 24 Mar 1997 11:21:00 -0800
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Mark Weiss <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: Jung Kwang
> To: [redacted]

On 24 March, Mark Weiss wrote in rerference to my post on Jung Kwang, a Korean monk, who paints beautiful works with a brush attached with the hairs of deceased relatives to his penis:

> This technique should be a real advantage in doing watercolors.
>
> Do you think there are gender connotations here?

Geez, Mark, I'm not sure. Why don't you ask the Zen teacher closest to you?

Kent

↑ Index

677. hen

Re: THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)

Tue 25 Mar 1997

---

thanks Chris for the thorough report from the frontlines of Edg.Po. Some off-the-cuff widgets:

1. WHO WILL ARISE and write the good definitive popular academic book about me & my poetry friends and tell it like it is? Back, sharks...

2. If poetry has circled the wagons & has only academics left to handle the winchesters... well, I wouldn't bet on it. Hey, they care. Take care. Let's think about it. Baby sharks have mothers too.

3. Maybe part of the problem - maybe this is what Mac Low was getting at? Is the draining struggle to approach poetry as if it were a political campaign or a community organization? WHO SPEAKS FOR US TODAY? HERE!! READ THIS PROSE POEM!! (It's easy to criticize from the easy critical chair though... I'm a member of the ECC organization (Easy Critics Club))

- Henry Gould (Old Fumblist)

↑ Index

678. KENT JOHNSON
Re: Jung Kwang
Tue 25 Mar 1997

> Date sent: Mon, 24 Mar 1997 15:21:31 EST
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: [redacted]
> Subject: Re: Jung Kwang
> To: [redacted]
>
> The prosthetic aesthetic.
>
> beth simon

As in a pencil or pen or typewriter or computer attached to our "aesthetic" hands? Where does the prosthetic for you end and the aesthetic begin?

Kent

↑ Index

679. KENT JOHNSON
Re: Jung Kwang
Tue 25 Mar 1997

> Date sent: Mon, 24 Mar 1997 13:53:39 -0800
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Mark Weiss <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: Jung Kwang
> To: [redacted]

On 24 March, Mark Weiss wrote in regard to the Korean master Jung Kwang:

> My god (goddess)! What do women paint with?
>
> Which raises a couple more questions abt Master Kwang:
>
> Does he do nudes?
>
> Is his stroke different erect or flaccid?
>
> At 02:45 PM 3/24/97 -0500, you wrote:
> *Mark, do you mean to tell me that all male artists don't paint this way?*
>
> Gwyn ;)

1) Actually, Mark, there is a Tibetan nun who composes traditional calligraphy with a brush inserted into her vagina. Why do you assume that this is less viable a mode of artistic composition than a man attaching a brush to his penis?

2) I've never seen "nude" works by Kwang, though after seeing his work, you might feel embarrassed by asking such a "skin-deep" question.

3) Flaccid or erect? In the photos I've seen, his beautiful, creative cock is flaccid.

Kent

↑ Index

680. KENT JOHNSON

Re: bp/bob

Tue 25 Mar 1997

> Date sent: Tue, 25 Mar 1997 20:28:22 -0500
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Matt Kirschenbaum <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: bp/bob
> To: [redacted]
>
> Chris:
>
> In your fantaastic long post (which I have to still go back to digest), you refer to Bob Perleman as "bp." May I ask that you don't do so any more? This confuses him with a poet that I suspect Bob Perelman would agree is bound to be (if justice is to be done) of more historical import than he: bp nichol. Let's keep bp as bp and Bob Perleman as Bob Perleman, or Ivy Bob, or just Bob P., or whatever.
>
> thanks, Kent
>
> Is this a joke, or is that asteroid closer than we think?
>
> --Matt
>
> ==========
> Matthew G. Kirschenbaum University of Virginia > [redacted] Department of English
> http://faraday.clas.virginia.edu/~mgk3k/ Electronic Text Center

Joke? That bp nichol is a writer light years beyond what Bob Perelman or nearly all of us could aspire to? No, Matt (pat on the head) Kirschenbaum. Is Bob P. on your dissertation committee? Hurry up and defend your thesis, 'cause the big one is on its way!

Kent

↑ Index

681. KENT JOHNSON
bpNichol
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Matt:

Yes, pat me on the head here. bp would love this fair jousting over his name. But you got me on this round. I'm in the dust. Where's the "H" where you need him or her? I'll be looking up your thesis!

Kent

↑ Index

682. Sylvester Pollet
Re: THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Thanks for that report, Chris. And don't worry about hogging time/space when you're providing info/analysis that many have called for! Now, could you, or anyone, give me some events/readings happening March 27-30? I'll be in NYC, & plan to visit Granary, etc. Missed that party, The margerine thing, and the NYU too late for me. The Marginalization of Maine. I must say, the list really helps. & Welcome back Bromige! Sylvester

↑ Index

683. Jordan Davis
Re: In Other News....
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Just wanted to second Chris's nod to Joe Ross's passionate and droll _Fuzzy Logic Series_ from Texture Press, a sort of self-portrait in a _concave_ oh man I won't put you all through that. "An old woman walks in the rain, homeless but with an umbrella passed bars of driving lightning..." .. Jordan

↑ Index

684. William Burmeister Prod
Re: boredom, poetry, questions
Tue 25 Mar 1997

> It also strikes me that this discussion of boredom is linked with either flight or transformation: either one runs from what is boring towards what is not boring, or one sticks with what is boring until it is no longer boring.
> What if it's boring for years? What if it will always be boring? When is it time to quit? After you receive the gold watch?

The words flight and transportation make a nice addition to the vocabulary of this thread.

It's possible to deceive oneself for a reason. I would only say that everything has its limits, and besides, we will all eventually run out of time.

BB

↑ Index

685. Jordan Davis
NYC EVENTS MAR 27-30 for S Pollet
Tue 25 Mar 1997

March 27

LYN HEJINIAN and TRAVIS ORTIZ at POETRY CITY
7 p.m. at Teachers & Writers, 5 Union Sq W, NYC (free)

followed immediately by

TENDER BUTTONS BENEFIT PARTY
8:30 p.m. at Segue, 303 E 8th St NYC

We will be shuttling people from T&W to Segue via the secret ski lift .. you can make both events! Sylvester, I do hope that we'll get to see you at both.

As for the rest of you, tell everyone you know that there's a new starting time for Lee Ann's party, and make sure to tell people you don't know about the Hejinian/Ortiz reading.

All best,
Jordan

↑ Index

686. KENT JOHNSON
Re: FC2 vs. Hoekstra
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Hugh:

Good point. I just received two mailings from a former colleague who currently teaches at U or Kent/Salem with Doug Rice, the author of _Blood of Mugwump_, the work under investigation, and a book that is, no question, pushing the edge. Actually, the book makes me want to puke. But I suppose that's the whole issue here. If something is truly out there, and is out there no matter how out there (and here we are talking about CONTENT in the first instance folks--check it out), what do we do when it is threatened with censorship by the state? I have copies of the letters written by the Christian Coalition Congressional Representatives in question who are trying to use this as an issue to permanently erase all government funding for the arts--I'll post more info when I get these from home and give addresses, etc. But isn't this an urgent thing to consider on this list? As Hugh points out, who's next?

Kent

> Date sent: Tue, 25 Mar 1997 20:28:29 -0600
> Send reply to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Hugh Steinberg <[redacted]>
> Subject: FC2 vs. Hoekstra
> To: [redacted]
>
> Has anything happened recently with Rep. Hoekstra, the NEA, and the investigation of FC2/Black Ice?
>
> The whole thing raises my hackles. If they go after them, it won't be long before they come after us.
>
> Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

687. Maria Damon

Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms (Turco)

Tue 25 Mar 1997

At 9:18 PM -0500 3/24/97, Dave Zauhar wrote:
>>At 11:11 PM -0500 3/23/97, henry wrote:
>>>I'm using the old Turco, thin red, which is heavy on obscure Welsh forms.
>>>Just finished a Portuguese riff, the "glose". Like an enlarged carol.
>>>- HG
>>
>>i was on a panel w/ turco a few yrs ago, i talked about jack spicer and
>>camp as subaltern wit; he looked mortified (bright red apoplectic furious)
>>to be on a panel where someone was talking about queers, later he said that >>women were taking jobs away from men in the academy these days (a bit like >>our recent discussion about "identity politics"?) ...that was my intro to >>the "new formalism." hank, i respect and enjoy your eclecticism in matters >>poetic, but turco? nein danke.
>
>Hey, I was in the audience for this (was it MMLA or MLA? Chicago or >Washington? Anyway) if I remember correctly Diane Wakowski was the third >panelist, and she also apparently got on his nerves, because within a year >he published a hissy-fit disguised as an essay attacking her views on the >politics of form (which are open to criticism, but you could tell by the >ferocity of his "essay" that she got under his skin). Mercifully, I missed >the wounded white guy screed.

>
>Dave Zauhar

yeah, wakoski was one of the four of us. she also insisted that spicer's only interest was "poetry" (i.e. stay away from those queer politix, little girl --as if there's such a thing as "only poetry") but at least she wasn't turco, and didn't add insult to injury by implying that women were responsible for the job shortage.

↑ Index

688. hen
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms (Turco)
Tue 25 Mar 1997

On Tue, 25 Mar 1997 08:55:34 -0600 Maria Damon said: >girl --as if there's such a thing as "only poetry") but at least she wasn't

There is such a thing as only poetry. It's just hard to write disses on it these days unless you relate it to something else. I'm starting a new school of poetry, folks, for those of you for whom Providence School is too heavy on heaven. It's called Edg.po - here are the guidelines for joining THIS new school:

1. Ephebes will have to make a good-faith effort to write only poetry for a while.

2. Ephebes will through trial and error & exploration over the millenia try to infuse either the whippoorwill-effect (Russians), the mockingbird- effect (Ghould), the pendulum-effect (Valery), and/or the boomerang-effect (Edgar Poe) into their poetic compositions.

3. Each member of the Edg.po school will NOT be required to write a lengthy treatise or compile an anthology illustrating one or more of the above modes of Edg.poetics. This will be done by the grad students - not to worry.

4. Edg.poets will wear little black string ties, shoes that are too small for them, and walk around with a pained look most of the time. They will remain for long periods in their place of residence and will not attend conferences or ham it up with their compadres - no shop talk allowed. They will correspond in longhand with their readers at large - that is IT, folks.

- Henry Gould, Edg.poet (today I will take a walk down Benefit St, where Eddie had maybe his last (& most famous) photo taken (the one with the pained look), drunkenly wooed the demure Helen Whitman, and got ready to die.) a.k.a. the Ghoulish Raven of the Revenge of the Scriptor

↑ Index

689. Maria Damon
Re: four melismas
Tue 25 Mar 1997

At 12:17 AM -0800 3/25/97, Franklin Bruno wrote:

> 4) Could Maria (or anyone) tell me where to look for info on Sun Ra's gayness? I've never encountered this in print, even (unless I've forgotten) in John Corbett's excellent -Extended Play-, which has a great chapter on alien-ness in Sun Ra and George Clinton.

thanks for the citation! i'm working on bob kaufman's poem "THE POET" as, among other things, an expression of this identity-related (but not identity- determined, so don't all you anti-identitarians jump all over me!) sense of alien-ness and/or mission, and this essay shd help. apparently there is debate about sun ra's sexuality. my info came second-hand, from a coupla friends who follow the sun ra list (i haven't signed up yet). one member of the band claims to have had sex w/ sun ra, but others say he was not gay but simply not sexually active due to some kind of problem w/ his genitals (herniated testicle???). again, this is not definitive reportage on my part. xo, md

↑ Index

690. Loss Glazier
National Poetry Month Disccusion area for Librarians (fwd)
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Please send suggestions to these folks.

> ---------- Forwarded message ----------
> Date: Mon, 24 Mar 1997 08:16:45 -0500 (EST)
> From: Tom Bevan <[redacted]>
> To: Library and Information Technology Association List
> <[redacted]>
> Subject: National Poetry Month Disccusion area for Librarians
>
> I hope this doesn't junk up anyone's mailbox with materials they don't want, but I'd like to tell as many librarians as possible about a forum we've created on our web site (http://www.poets.org) where librarians can share their ideas about how to participate effectively in National Poetry Month.
>
> Some ALA people we work with suggested that librarians would really welcome the opportunity to share National Poetry Month ideas with each other, if we would only create a place where they could do it.

> We've created such a place, but unfortunately it doesn't seem to be getting much use. I'm hoping it's just a matter of librarians being unaware of its existence.
>
> Thus, I'd like to invite you to visit www.poets.org and look under the heading of "National Poetry Month" for an area called "Forums". If you know a lot about poetry already, we hope you will go there to provide advice to those librarians who don't. And, if you'd like to get ideas about things you can do, we hope you'll post your questions there as well.
>
> Thanks to all of you.
>
> Kindly,
>
> Tom Bevan
> National Poetry Month Coordinator
>
> P.S. You'll find that, with the help of Poets House in New York, and ALA, we've provided some tips to get you started, in the "Resources" area of the site.

↑ Index

691. Sylvester Pollet

Re: NYC EVENTS MAR 27-30 for S Pollet

Tue 25 Mar 1997

Jordan, thanks, that's perfect! I'm pretty sure I'll be able to make both--have to check with my othered significant (who, on another thread, manages to paint just fine without one of those appendages).

> March 27
>
> LYN HEJINIAN and TRAVIS ORTIZ at POETRY CITY
> 7 p.m. at Teachers & Writers, 5 Union Sq W, NYC (free)
>
> followed immediately by
>
> TENDER BUTTONS BENEFIT PARTY
> 8:30 p.m. at Segue, 303 E 8th St NYC
>
> We will be shuttling people from T&W to Segue via the secret ski lift .. you can make both events! Sylvester, I do hope that we'll get to see you at both.
>
> As for the rest of you, tell everyone you know that there's a new starting > time for Lee Ann's party, and make sure to tell people you don't know about the Hejinian/Ortiz reading.

>
> All best,
> Jordan

↑ Index

692. henry gould
edg.po add.endum
Tue 25 Mar 1997

---

just to forstall any grad student queries out there:

"Nedge" is a math term, shorthand for "number of edges"

- HG, edg.po

↑ Index

693. Douglas Barbour
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Tue 25 Mar 1997

"With regard to 'Neo-Formalism': ever since I studied linguistics when I was a kid, it's bothered me that the word 'Formalist' has been used to talk about exactly the opposite people from those whom I think of as Formalists, to talk about people who would never question ideas of form, but are only interested in what they call content, and are really happy to use whatever Edward Arlington Robinson used in their versification. What is called Formalism displays no interest in Formalism at all. That's not what is meant by Formalism in talking about European painters of the early twentieth century. If they had not been Formalists they would have been doing Poussin." George Bowering, on a panel in Ottawa, 1986. I've always liked this statement, & I tend to think it's on the nose.

Have to admit that in my classes I tend to be as specific as I can about formal aspects of the students' poems, & try to get them to ask questions along those lines, not specifically about 'content' (?) as such. But setting some formal challenges can help them to see that working on the challenge often frees new content into being. bpNichol always talked about that: he sought new forms in order to free up possible statments he might not otherwise make, especially if he stuck with the way of saying things he already knew too well.

========== Douglas Barbour
How long Department of English

University of Alberta it takes for the promise to arrive, Edmonton
Alberta T6G 2E5 shaped as a flirt, a cheating [redacted]
FAX:[redacted] kiss, a whistle, an ambulance. H: [redacted]
John Tranter

↑ Index

694. Robert Hale
NY READINGS
Tue 25 Mar 1997

SATURDAY APRIL 5TH 8:00PM

SEGUE 303 E.8th Street

GOLDEN BOOKS BLOW OUT

Jordan Davis
Robert Hale
Sam Truitt

SUNDAY APRIL 6TH 4:00PM

EDUCATIONAL ALLIANCE 197 East Broadway

Robert Hale
Sam Truitt

↑ Index

695. Pritchett,Pat
Re: Is there a National Poetry Month?
Tue 25 Mar 1997

The idea of a National Poetry Month was recently attacked by Richard Howard in a speech reprinted in the latest Harpers. Basically, he says that the idea of such a "celebration" ghettoizes poetry, reducing it from something lofty and "millennial" to something commodified and sanitized, on a par with National Secretary's Week.

Of course this is "the logic of late capitalism" and while I'm inclined to agree with him in a way, his denunciation begs the question of the relationship between poets and the public: who is the audience for poetry and isn't that audience in fact not one but many? Poetry, I've often thought, needs all the press it can get and yet - writing poetry is also a wager that the poem will eventually "find" its reader, thus obviating the need for "crass" promotionalism. Ultimately, gestures like National Poetry Month wld seem lost on its intended recipients. But if it leads just a few people to pick up some poetry books, well then, why not?

That's as far as I can think this morning.

Still dreaming of Juliette Binoche,
Patrick Pritchett

↑ Index

696. linda v. russo
Retallack essay
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Fiona, dodie, Jena etal.

I see I'm jumping in a bit late here to put in my plug for Joan Retallack's amazing :RE:THINKING:LITERARY:FEMINISM:

but _Feminist Measures_ is pub'd by U of Mich.Press. I'm sure it's still in print.
--
linda v. russo
[redacted]

↑ Index

697. David Bromige
what am i doing wrong
Tue 25 Mar 1997

I hadnt expected quite so many people to know the answer to my question.

Thanks folks, all is clear now. I hadnt unsubbd, I had merely stopmailed. db

↑ Index

698. David Bromige
formalism
Tue 25 Mar 1997

I found myself agreeing enthusiastically with the comments relayed by Douglas Barbour today, and I believed they were his. "Right on, Douglas!" I was saying, "I myself always say 'the trouble with the Neo-Formalists is that they're not nearly Formalist enough.'" Imagine, then, with what chagrin I found he had led me into agreeing with a comment (and a decade-old comment at that) by George Bowering.

"How is the poem built up?" Is what I always ask students, just that it's what i always wonder. "What keeps one reading?" is potentially handy, also. Think of _Malone Dies_ .

******

Having thoroughly enjoyed Stroffolino's assessment of something that happened in NYC lately, what a joy to receive his Dogberry essay in today's mail. Am still reading with grateful pleasure Steve Evans kickoff essay in this new series. And this, while reading with the same emotions Jennifer Moxley's _Imagination Verses_ . I know this book has been praised to the list (by the list) before, but what harm in praising it again?

db

↑ Index

699. Joe Safdie

Re: Is history dead?

Tue 25 Mar 1997

Juliette Binoche was really classy, wasn't she -- except for that rather ghoulish (sorry, Henry) dress. I think she was the best thing about "The English Patient," which I found rather empty at the core -- the movie, I mean, not the book.

BUT -- Pat's mention of the latest Harper's makes me wonder if anyone here is interested in responding to Lewis Lapham's challenge -- in an extended three-part essay, the first two of which have now been published -- of the impossibility of writing (historical) narrative in a culture organized solely around media images. Here's some quotes:

"The sensibility shaped by the electronic media over the last forty-odd years has by now acquired a distinctive form--impatient, easily bored, geared to increasingly short bursts of attention, intuitive, musical, tuned to abrupt changes of mood and scene. Most importantly, it is a senbsibility bereft of memory."

"Three years ago at Yale I taught a course of English composition and found only four of twelve students capable of writing a well-arranged paragraph -- not because they weren't intelligent but because they had never acquired the habit of reading. Familiar with a vast archive of visual images, they could easily recall scenes and fragments of scenes from {he mentions several movies and TV shows here} but books were grim tasks instead of pleasant diversions, foreign objects, unfamiliar and vaguely ominous, meant to be studied as if they were cancer cells . . ."

And, finally, he quotes the historian Bernard DeVoto (his _1846: Year of Decision_ is a great book on American history, recommended by Pound and Olson, among others) on Gertrude Stein:

". . . but how do we write history in a language like Gertrude Stein's, one that floats freely 'in a medium of pure caprice sustained by nothing except its awareness of its own inner wondrousness' ".

As I say, he's talking mainly about the writing of history, but I think his remarks can be extended to all narrative writing -- I was just wondering if anyone who's read it had any response.

↑ Index

700. David Israel
edg.po
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Henry (et alia)--

Am interested in your new-school notes, partly bec. the "Ephebes" admonishments remind (not irrelevantly?) of Wally Stevens (whom I admit to liking) & partly for other reasons not yet much investigated.

Now, in re: Poe's (?) "boomerang effect" -- quoth you,

<< 2. Ephebes will through trial and error & exploration over the millenia try to infuse either the whippoorwill-effect (Russians), the mockingbird- effect (Ghould), the pendulum-effect (Valery), and/or the boomerang-effect (Edgar Poe) into their poetic compositions. >>

f.y.i., a few years ago, I invented (so I thought) a form of poem which I styled the "boomerang poem" -- actually, I borrowed same from some medieval Chinese sources (not now sure who'all; I've seen a couple in translation somewhere, but others I was saw in untranslated books while browsing the hundreds, nay thousands such hidden volumes away on upper levels of the East Asiatic Library at UC Berkeley [where I worked shelving books, circa '79]) . . . anyway, here's one specimen of a boomerang poem (from an early '90s summer) [better to illustrate than merely to laboring out a description):

| this is where the meeting oft' convenes
| this is where the circus plants the tent
| through this window watch the limpid scenes
| by this river hear the soft lament
| fragrant flowers gather here their scent
| leafage here attains the coolest greens
| in this box a myriad dreams are pent
| this is where the meeting oft' convenes

[boomerang, here, signifying final line = first line, ergo boomerang; & rhyme-form being ABAB BABA (or alternatively, ABAB CACA)]

My problem w/ your new school though, Henry, mainly involves dictum #1. Epheebe though I be, I'll not presently swear off no-po writing. (Specially not now when I'm just getting going with some such.)

Thanks anyway, will be interested in developments withal.

d.i.

↑ Index

701. DS
Re: THEY WANNA COVER US WITH MARGARINE(alization)
Tue 25 Mar 1997

DIRECT
>EVIDENCE of how academia dulls people and used some VERY interesting >DOWNSTREAM metaphor in which I would like to cast myself as the missing >SALMON swimming upstream....

sorry mate - role taken,

dan S.

↑ Index

702. henry gould
Re: dichotomous/Bk of Forms
Tue 25 Mar 1997

---

right on, Doug. But then some of the greatest painters & poets of this century (Max Beckmann, W. Stevens) specifically repudiated formalism al- together. Maybe because they were grappling with a more basic art issue: finding a connection, a bridge, a continuum, between the general and the specific, the symbolic and everyday experience, the tradition of art and the real. There is no quick fix or ornamental flavor to their work, no form for utility's sake. Has to be lived & felt (at least vicariously). Art as search for truth &authenticity, not display of mastery. (But forms - CAN be made to feel & speak - transcend their formalities. And maybe making old forms work again is a way of saying - all formalisms are equal.) & right on, George. -HG edg.po

↑ Index

703. henry gould
Re: edg.po
Tue 25 Mar 1997

David, thanks for poem & scholarly interest in Poe's boomerang. In my book a great generator of the boomerang effect is the Malayan form the pantoum

(abab bcbc cdcd etc. until xaxa). The pantoum echoes twice but if the poem has any momentum it has a dizzying vibration-effect - like you're hearing MORE than one echo. Now as to Poe's boomerang effect. This has a couple of meanings. On the ur-cult-ur-ologic-ur-l level, it simply refers to the fact that a dead American Poet became a live French Symbolist. I'm trying out this effect over in Russia, as we speak. Now specifically on the comp-o-sition-ur-l level (which is related to the other): Valery's pendulum-effect is in effect a miniaturized, highly calibrated/refined version of the boomerang-effect; in fact Poe satirized this situation ahead of time in his story (prose!) _The Pit and the Pendulum_, which is about how cutting edge continental writing emerged from the pits of Baltimore & New York - it has to do with that edgy Angoisse du Neant, so popular among decadent symbolists - Poe would have laughed his head off (not literally). - HG edg.po

↑ Index

704. maz881

don't know. just requested to wear my hat.

Tue 25 Mar 1997

---

this pilfered from harris schiff's web site $lavery, a maclow piece read at St Marks during the conference on content last year.

http://soho.ios.com/~harris4

Content

Content or content
What is this about
The words speak for themselves or do they

Wherever there are words there's content
What is the subject of this poem
Are you content with what the words say

Writing is not talking Poems are not freight cars
What are you getting at

I do not understand your poem's form
Some say form is extension of content
The other way around seems just as likely

Are the words the content
Many say the meaning is the content
Do they mean meaning or meanings

What about the poems
Where one word has led to another
And the meaning is enacted by perceivers

And the other kind of poem
Where the poet has one thing to say
And says it

No wonder there are poetry wars

Some poems are made by invented procedures
The poet faithfully carries out Neutral as a referee

Other poems seem to come Directly from the mind of the poet
What was in the mind's what's on the page

Many poems come to be Between the mind and the mouth and the page
Or both in the mind and the mouth and on the page

Many poets are partisans
Only one way of writing is right
Others are wrong

For other poets one way of writing
Is right for making some poems
Other ways for other poems

Some want only what they mean to say
To be conveyed
To readers and hearers

Others welcome many Among a multitude of meanings
But not all of them

A very few let the poems
Mean whatever they mean
To whomever they reach

They are content
With the meanings that come to be
As the words are seen or heard

Many believe one kind of meaning
Is far more important than others
And deplore the absence of that kind

The catchword is privilege
Some privilege political meanings
Others religion or morality or the real

And a few poets privilege private meanings
Ones that are theirs and no one else's
That never would have come to be without them

Some write poems
Only to get such a privileged meaning Across

Some want poems to cause actions
Others seek changes in consciousness
Many want themselves to come across

And a few desire chiefly
That the poems come to be More than makers they are midwives

The coming-to-be of the poems
That each poem becomes itself
Contents the midwife poet

But that contentment never lasts
So poets' midwifery
Proliferates new poems

And soon the poems of all the kinds of poets
May proliferate and interpenetrate
Throughout our space and time

Will this end the poetry wars

Jackson Mac Low
New York: 29-30 April, 2-4 May 1996

↑ Index

705. Mark Weiss
Re: Is history dead?
Tue 25 Mar 1997

The question isn't how to write history in Gertrude Steinese, but why? A fork is good for what it's made for, but it's a lousy shovel. I agree that Juliette Binoche would have looked better if she hadn't been wearing a dress.

At 11:20 AM 3/25/97 -0800, you wrote:
>Juliette Binoche was really classy, wasn't she -- except for that rather >ghoulish (sorry, Henry) dress. I think she was the best thing about "The >English Patient," which I found rather empty at the core -- the movie, I >mean, not the book.
>
>BUT -- Pat's mention of the latest Harper's makes me wonder if anyone >here is interested in responding to Lewis Lapham's challenge -- in an >extended three-part essay, the first two of which have now been published
>-- of the impossibility of writing (historical) narrative in a culture >organized solely around media images. Here's some quotes:
>
>"The sensibility shaped by the electronic media over the last forty-odd >years has by now acquired a distinctive form--impatient, easily bored, >geared to increasingly short bursts of attention, intuitive, musical, >tuned to abrupt changes of mood and scene. Most importantly, it is a >senbsibility bereft of memory."
>
>"Three years ago at Yale I taught a course of English composition and >found only four of twelve students capable of writing a well-arranged >paragraph -- not because they weren't intelligent but because they had >never acquired the habit of reading. Familiar with a vast archive of >visual images, they could easily recall scenes and fragments of scenes >from {he mentions several movies and TV shows here} but books were grim >tasks instead of pleasant diversions, foreign objects, unfamiliar and >vaguely ominous, meant to be studied as if they were cancer cells . . ."
>
>And, finally, he quotes the historian Bernard DeVoto (his _1846: Year of >Decision_ is a great book on American history, recommended by Pound and >Olson, among others) on Gertrude Stein:
>
>". . . but how do we write history in a language like Gertrude Stein's, >one that floats freely 'in a medium of pure caprice sustained by nothing >except its awareness of its own inner wondrousness' ".
>
>As I say, he's talking mainly about the writing of history, but I think >his remarks can be extended to all narrative writing -- I was just >wondering if anyone who's read it had any response.
>
>

↑ Index

706. David Israel
Re: edg.po / pantoum
Tue 25 Mar 1997

---

ah the great pantoum pantaloon -- have seen 2 instances (& liked 'em both, esp. the 1st):

*John Ashbery's admirable "Hotel Latraemont" [pardon spelling?], which appeared in The New Yorker in '90 -- (I snatched it up for appropriation of lines into paintings); later JA so titled his next collection-book (i.e., eponymously); also

*Agha Shahid Ali read a good-sounding one (but it whizzed by bit to quick to absorb it)

yep, a likeable form. You write,

<< Now as to Poe's boomerang effect. This has a couple of meanings. On the ur-cult-ur-ologic-ur-l level, it simply refers to the fact that a dead American Poet became a live French Symbolist. >> perhaps I shd. do homework rather than pestering w/ questions -- but, um, what might that mean, one wonders? Does this refer to posthumous critical reception / appraisal of Poe in France? (was he the Jerry Lewis of his century?) . . .

<< I'm trying out this effect over in Russia, as we speak. >> meaning: introducing Poe there? -- or ?

Henry, it's only as I start reading your explication as regards

<< Valery's pendulum-effect . . . in fact Poe satirized this situation ahead of time in his story (prose!) _The Pit and the Pendulum_, which is about how cutting edge continental writing emerged from the pits of Baltimore & New York . . . >> that it slowly dawns on me I'm taking you as credulously seriously, here, as I lately took your report concerning Blarnes Sahib --

(slow learner, as they say)

did you know, btw, that Edgar A. found special resonance among certain fallen aristocratic literati of antebellum neoHellenic Atlanta GA & thereabouts, -- albeit their increasingly penurious & hapless descendants (Poe white trash, so-called) did but little to salvage the old legacy . . .

(me po' attempt at following in auguster footsteps)

d.i.

↑ Index

707. Stephen Cope
Re: four melismas
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Franklin, Maria, and others:

That Sun Ra was gay is a "rumour" that seems to have taken the leap from that staus to the status of "truth" among those who would whisper. I've often heard it mentioned in conversation as if it was common knowledge. I know of no books which deal with it explicitly (Val Wilmer's _As Serious As Your Life_ might make breif mention). It was a ridiculous point of contention on the Sun Ra list a while back (maybe a year), prompting an alarming flurry of homophobic responses, and finally prompting my own signoff. One thing that I know can be gleaned from Wilmer's book is that Sun Ra was most definitely a misogynist (he was apparently very vocal about his desire to exclude women from membership in Bill Dixon's Jazz Composer's Guild, among other things). How much these two aspects of Ra are connected I don't know. Nor do I know the extent to which they influenced his music. Some informed speculation about the latter would certainly be welcome considering the dearth of gender/sexuality-related critical work in music studies (If anyone, by the way, knows of books on this topic, let me know either here or backchannel - thanks). In a less (and more) related vein: Sun Ra was also a poet who produced a large body of lyrical work, where his cosmological views are often very apparent...

ok, best to all,

Stephen Cope

ps - I second the Corbett book. I'd consider him one of the more interesting theorists of music working...

↑ Index

708. F.A. Templeton
The Margaretization
Tue 25 Mar 1997

Dear Chris Stroffolino:

Thank you for taking the trouble to write that report on the discussion of the papers on the book of the poem entitled the m of p in relation to the academy.

Dear Chris Mann,

