Chris-- Re 'theories'-- What if Rod's borrowing of O'Hara's title is meant to compare O'Hara's times with these times? Think of how the word 'feelings' sounded to you before you knew the O'Hara poem. I wasn't alive when the poem was written, so I don't know how the pre-Feliciano environment heard it, but I suspect 'feelings' was a word of dangerous purple. Now. Rod's book (Rod--you want to jump in here?) is titled after a poem, yes? The poem in which Al Gore is conflated with both Paul Simons? And a cheerleader coaxes us to spell out "VLUH!"? I think Rod's goofing on the word 'theories' to make it possible to take that word seriously again. Cough. Really. Or hear it, anyway, as the abused center of our times (inner city of meaning?). It's risky for the reasons you cite and joke about. That kind of risk is interesting, tho, right? --Jd not Kd nor Td nor (e)

↑ Index

408. Tenney Nathanson
but this is Lovely to Think About
Tue 21 May 1996

> Date: Mon, 20 May 1996 11:31:28 -0700
> From: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: fake book
>
> In the few cases when someone does interpret the work of another, there's less leeway than is usually the case for a musician. I mean, if someone asked for, say, Frank O'Hara's "In Memory of My Feelings" they probably wouldn't be satisfied with something that had the broad formal outline > correct, but which had some different words. Even when the words are all correct, there's often a sense that a performance that strays from that of the original poet's is not "right."

↑ Index

409. Carnography
Re: fake book
Tue 21 May 1996

At 8:47 PM 5/20/96, Chris Stroffolinoe typed:

> Dear Herb Levy--
> That you mentioned O'Hara's "In Memory..." as an example for the "interpretation" question (music/poetry analogy) pricked up my ears. I'm genuinely curious about how you perceive the parameters of "interpretation" for surely they are wider than (was it?) Rob Hardin's more strict analogy (where say one poet with a distinctive reading style --say Andrews--"interprets" O'Hara

That was only one of my points, and certainly not one of my own analogies. I was arguing in favor of (as opposed to Herb's argument against) others besides the poet interpreting the poet's work. The subject was more his than mine. If you presumed that guest recitations were the point of my reply, then I hope you'll reexamine what I wrote.

I choose to be open to the idea of interpretation in the context of the work of other poets. If you dislike anyone's interpretation, or version (which can mean any number of compositional/performance techniques) of a particular work, you can always go back to the original poem and poet. And it is unfair to compare all interpretative work suggested by me--aleatoric, satirical, even ultra-rationalist-- with pedestrian interpretation; with a CD of Kevin Costner reading e. e. cummings.

> I think of Pound's "diluters" but also Bloom's idea that the only "strong" criticism or interpretation of a poem must itself be another poet (and of course trying to claim that his form of criticism may BE a poem).

I like Harold Bloom's idea of poetic misreading. But why should I take his word for it and denounce the reader's interpretation as mere undigested influence? I can't presume to know the level of every reader's interpretation.

(Besides, who said we weren't talking primarily about other poets?)

And why shouldn't a poet or reader approach influence and interpretation from any angle that works for him/her on a practical level?

> Thus, there is no end to interpretation. And thus, there is no "original" poem > per se (or the dreaded "lost original" as Shapiro interprets it--or Sappho). And the two senses of interpretation interact in complex ways. From one perspective, poems (ALL POEMS) can not help but be interpretations, yet in being interpretations of interpretations (i.e. conventions), self consciously, as O'Hara's poem-suite is, they attempt to cancel out the hyperontological, mere similacrum, to bring one to the illusion of "the thing itself."

This is a useful idea, certainly. But it would seem to me to be one long footnoted paraphrase of Foucault's essay, "what is an author?" (1969), which is a useful work, but--again--doesn't contain the only useful ideas for a practicing poet. At this point, decon is still important, but it is also familiar news (or seems so to me).

All best always,

Rob Hardin

↑ Index

410. Michael Boughn
Re: rules & conventions
Tue 21 May 1996

Charles:

The essay is called "Literary Institution and Modernization" and it's conncerned to track changes in the the relation of literature to its producers and consumers (and to the social generally) during the transition to modernism. Burger proposes that the production of literature is governed by rules during (and preceding) neo-classicism when the institution of literature is part of a stable social order within which artists peacefully exist.

Within the Enlightenment, the _doctrine classique_ is replaced by the aesthetics of autonomy. "The bourgeois subject, claiming personal autonomy, and being itself a result of modernization, opposes society as an alien object. The critique which has been concerned with traditional residues, such as dogmatic systems of belief, can now turn against modernization itself." Simultaneously, rules give way to conventions as the mode of organizing literary production. Rules are either on or off, whereas conventions evolve and change and become deformed.

So I'm wondering how to characterize our situation now? Are we still, as poets, in a conventional mode? Is this giving way to something new, like, say, procedures? Can we even know that?

Maybe this is boring to people on the list, but it seemed relevant to the discussion that Annie Finch gave rise to.

Gotta run,
Mike

↑ Index

411. Kevin Killian
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

This is Dodie Bellamy.

What a coincidence! I read Sokal's article in _Lingua Franca_ just last night, while eating a burrito in one of San Francisco's many budget-friendly tacquerias, and I found it a camp riot in its haughty scientism, found myself merrily copying down line after line to collage into my own work.

Content isn't everything, you know.

↑ Index

412. Robert Drake
Re: a range life, if I could settle down, I would...
Tue 21 May 1996

---

david--

synaesthetic, c/o alex cigale 178-10 wexford terrace #3d jamaica ny 11432

north american ideophonics
c/o mark nowak 908 franklin terrace, 3rd floor minn. mn 55406

turbulence
david nemeth
po box 40
hockessin de 19707

... i _think_ turbulence folded after their first issue, which was dated oct. 93...

all of these have been reviewed in past issues of TapRoot Reviews; if this kind of material is ov continued interest, you might consider subscribing: $10/4 issues to Burning Press, PO Box 585, Lakewood OH 44107. we're constantly late, but we're constant...

luigi
ed.

↑ Index

413. Poetics List
Re: fake book (fwd)
Tue 21 May 1996

From: Carnography <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: fake book (fwd)
To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS <[redacted]>

Fred E. Maus typed:

> from Michael Morse at York University:
>
> That the use of the book means you are no longer (literally) "faking it" is an intriguing paradox.

An intriguing paradox indeed, and not only to us. Notated chance operations hinge on the paradox mentioned here.

> However, many of the books were so rife with mistakes, especially in terms of harmonic progression, that the performer was still left to their own devices, and obliged to repair the goofs on the fly.

I don't think I've ever peformed in public without finding at least one problem in the score. Aren't textual inaccuracies part of being a performer--indeterminacy in everyday life?

> In that sense, a "fake book" was one which could not be read or used uncritically.

Meaning that the book itself was fake! Touche--nice insight.

> An illustration: when the Bostonian "Real Book"--complete with an arrogant introduction, distancing itself from "fake" books came out in the seventies, it disseminated a whole new series of mistakes and misunderstandings. These quickly led experienced players to ask obvious neophytes if the tune they'd suggested was learned from the Real Book. If the answer was "yes," a hurried conference ensued, correcting the book's gaffes.

Amusingly, I do remember conversations in which Berkeley graduates (not neophytes) attributed biblical authority to the Real Book. To impose pedantry on aural tradition in the middle of a gig has always struck me as a rather impractical activity.

Such second-hand arrogance is one of the reasons I stopped playing jazz in public. Since I grew up playing and composing classical music, I reasoned, let those who truly grew up with the jazz tradition get props for doing it. Hence, people should go to Matthew Shipp to hear jazz piano and not to me. As unpopular as this sounds, I improvise from harmonic/contrapuntal traditions that are primarily European and non-Afrocentric (though of course the lines are blurred) in origin. To do otherwise strikes me as dishonest. I'm not interested in becoming the Vanilla Ice (rather than the 3rd Bass) of swing.

But back to _The Real Book_:

Interestingly, I don't recall the level of error found by Mr. Morse. Pieces by Towner, Methaney, Steve Swallow (and so on) were often transcribed by the composers themselves. But perhaps many of the mistakes of which he speaks had been ironed out by the early eighties, when I came in contact with the book. I never bought it, though, because I was preoccupied with studies at New England C to think about BSM.

Incidentally: Anyone who's read my interview in the cyberpunk issue of Keyboard (May '89) will probably deduce that--merely in terms of knowledge and experience--I'm not a "neophyte." Still, the use of such labels is yet another aspect of the academicized jazz community that disturbs me. I rather enjoy the presence of neophytes in any artistic community. For me, the problem is not the neophyte. It is the instant expert.

In the words of Montaigne, "What do I know?"

I've typed and deleted this question a few times in my last five posts, but now I think it's time to leave it stet.: Is all this music-specific talk germaine to the Poetics discussion group? I worry about dragging other poets off-topic. I'd feel better about this if we could bring our ideas on music notation back to the topic of poetic notation.

But I do find it helpful to interpret poetry as written music and instrumental music in prosodic terms. Here is another paradox: Although it is useful to frame studies of the arts in interdisciplinary contexts, the benefits of such studies can prove idiomatic to either art.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

↑ Index

414. David Baratier

a range life, if I could settle down, I would…

Tue 21 May 1996

I have been trying to find the new addresses of the following publications (or if they are even still publishing)

cyanosis
North American Ideophonics
Syn/aes/the/tic
Turbulence

I also recall a note a while back that either _lyric&_ or _Lower Limit Speech_ had moved. Any information greatly appreciated.

Be Well.

David Baratier

[redacted]

↑ Index

415. Burt Kimmelman

Re: a range life, if I could settle down, I would…

Tue 21 May 1996

Synaesthetic is published by Alex Cigale. His home address is 98 Vanderbilt Ave
Brooklyn, NY 11205

there is a po box for the mag, but i've misplaced it, but anyway alex is doing the mag virtually single handed.

↑ Index

416. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: fake books

Tue 21 May 1996

---

in my role as restater of the obvious, let me remind all of the subtitle of Maxine Hong Kingston's novel, _Tripmaster Monkey: His Fake Book_

a pleasant diversion, easy to hum, great changes

↑ Index

417. David Baratier
A Booglit benefit reading
Tue 21 May 1996

Featured Readers:
Todd Colby
David Baratier
Bill Luoma
Dan Wilcox

Also Chris Stroffolino and Chris Butters are slated.

Booglit will be publishing a number of limited edition chapbooks for the reading, including _Compartments (a short run)_ by David Baratier

@ Luna Park
Friday May 31st @ 7:30 pm
249 Fifth Ave.
Brooklyn, NY
(Between Carroll Street and Garfield Place)

For folks who are unfamiliar with Booglit, the present editorial staff is:

Michael Basinski: Buffalo, NY
David Baratier: Philadelphia, PA
Dan Wilcox: Albany, NY
Rod Smith: Washington, DC
Lee Ann Brown: Boulder, CO
Dan Bouchard: Boston, MA

Booglit is a community focused publication where the editors for the various cities contribute material on area writers and events in each issue. One city is chosen to be the featured city of each issue. A third of the publication space is dedicated to the featured city.

Authors of other chapbooks availiable from Booglit include:

Lee Anne Brown, Laynie Browne, Amiri Baraka,
Bill Shields & Eliot Richmond, Barry Gifford,
Marc Ducharme, Ed Saunders, and many others.

For a full catalog send an SASE to Booglit / PO Box 221 / Oceanside, NY 11572-0221

↑ Index

418. Steven Howard Shoemaker
fake science
Tue 21 May 1996

Given all the discussion of faking it one the list lately, i cldn't resist forwarding this.

steve

"I fake it so real I am beyond fake"--Courtney Love

> Dear All,
>
> The following article from the _Baltimore Sun_ speaks in so many different ways that I had better just let it speak for itself.
>
> "A bold scientist fights the tyranny of reality"
> by Linda Seeback (May 15, 1996)
>
> "Pleasanton, Calif - Physicist Alan Sokal of New York University meticulously observed all the rules of the academic game when he constructed his article on postmodern physics and submitted it to a prestigious journal of cultural studies called _Social Text_.
>
> The people he cites as authorities are the superluminaries of the field, the quotations he uses to illustrate his argument are strictly accurate and the text is bristling with footnotes.
>
> All the rules but one, that is: Dr. Sokal's article is a parody. Under the grandiloquent title "Transgressing the Boundaries: Toward a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity," it appeared in the Spring/Summer 1996 special issue of the magazine, one entirely devoted to "the science wars," as the editors term the tension between peple who actually do science and the critics who merely theorize about it.
>
> Many scientists believe that the emperors of cultural studies have no clothes. Dr. Sokal captured the whole royal court parading in naked ignorance and persuaded the palace chroniclers to publish the portrait as a centerfold.
>
> Once the article was safely in print, he revealed his modest experiment. "Would a leading journal of cultural studies," he wrote in the May/June issue of _Lingua Franca_, "publish an article liberally salted with nonsense of (a) it sounded good and (b) it flattered the editors' ideological preconceptions?" Unfortunately, yes.

Dr. Sokal's deliberate nonsense is anything but subtle. Translated into plain English from the high-flown language he borrowed for the occasion, his first paragraph says that scientists "cling to the dogma" that the external world exists and its properties are independent of what human beings think. But nobody believes that old stuff any more, right? Now we all know that physical reality is "at bottom a social and linguistic construct."...

There are so many red flags planted throughout the paper that even non-scientists "should have spotted at least one and started laughing" Dr. Sokal said last week. "Either this is a parody or the author is off his rocker."

The physicist was prompted into parody by a 1994 book, "Higher Superstition: The Academic Left and Its Quarrels with Science," by Paul Gross and Norman Levitt, which ruffled a lot of postmodernist feathers.

"I'm an academic leftist and I have no quarrel with science," Dr. Sokal said, "so the first thing I did was go to the library and check their references, to see whether (Messrs, Gross and Levitt) were being fair," and they were. In fact, he found even more examples of scientific illiteracy, some of them even worse.

"It would be so boring to refute them," Dr. Sokal said, "I picked the silliest quotes from the most prominent people and I made up an argument for how they were linked together."....

"A liberatory science cannot be complete without a profound revision of the canon of mathematics," he concludes. "We can see hints of (such emancipatory mathematics) in the multidimensional and nonlinear logic of fuzzy systems theory, but this approach is still heavily marked by its origins in the crisis of late-capitalist production relations." He drags in catastrophe theory and chaos theory too.

There is a political point to Dr. Sokal's demonstration, but it's not the right-wing one he's sure will be attributed to him. He's proud to call himself a leftist, and his resume includes a stint teaching mathematics at the National University of Nicaragua under the Sandinistas.

"If you take up crazy philosophies you undermine your ability > to tackle questions of public policy, like ecology," he said.

> "It really matters whether the world is warming up."...

↑ Index

419. Steven Howard Shoemaker fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

And here is Andrew Ross's reply to the Sokaldebacle.

steve

> * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + * + *
>
> Ross:
>
> What were some of the initial responses of the journal's editors when we first learned about Alan Sokal's prank upon Social Text? One suspected that Sokal's "parody" was nothing of the sort, and that his admission represented a change of heart, or a collapse of his intellectual resolve. Another, while willing to accept the story, was less sure that Sokal knew very much about what or whom he thought he was kidding. A third was pleasantly astonished to learn that the journal is taken seriously enough to be considered a threat to anyone, let alone to natural scientists. At least two others were furious at the dubious means by which he chose to make his point. All were concerned that his actions might simply spark off a new round of caricature and thereby perpetuate the climate in which science studies has been subject recently to so much derision from conservatives in science. However varied the responses, we all believe that Sokal took too much for granted in his account of his prank. Indeed, his claim--that our publication of his article proves that something is rotten in the state of cultural studies--may have turned out to be as wacky as the article itself.
>
> First, let me recount the history of the editorial process regarding Sokal's article, in order to provide readers with a framework that Lingua Franca did not seek when they decided to publish his piece. From the first, we considered Sokal's unsolicited article to be a little hokey. It is not every day that we receive a dense philosophical tract from a professional physicist. Not knowing the author or his work, we engaged in some speculation about his intentions, and concluded that this article was the earnest attempt of a professional scientist to seek some kind of affirmation from postmodern philosophy for developments in his field. His adventures in PostmodernLand were not really our cup of tea. Like other journals of our vintage that try to keep abreast of cultural studies, it has been many years since Social Text published contributions to the debate about postmodern theory, and Sokal's article would have been regarded as sophomoric and/or outdated (and therefore unnacceptable to the editors) if it had come from a humanist or social scientist. As the work of a natural scientist it was unusual, and, we thought, plausibly symptomatic of how someone like Sokal might approach the field of postmodern epistemology i.e. awkwardly, assertively, and somewhat aimlessly, with a veritable armada of footnotes to ease his sense of vulnerability. In other words, we read it more as an act of good faith of the sort that might be worth encouraging than as an exercise of the intellect whose scholarly worth had to be judged. On those grounds, the editors considered that it might be of interest to readers as a "document" of that time-honored tradition in which modern physicists have discovered harmonic resonances with their own reasoning in the field of philosophy and metaphysics. Consequently, the article met one of the several criteria for publication which Social Text recognizes. As a non-refereed journal of political opinion and cultural analysis (entirely self-published by an editorial collective until its recent adoption by Duke University Press), Social Text has always seen its lineage in the "little review" tradition of the independent left as much as in the academic domain, and so we often balance diverse editorial criteria when discussing the worth of submissions, whether they be works of fiction, interviews with sex workers, or interventions in postcolonial thought. In other words, this is an editorial milieu with principles and aims quite remote from that of a professional scientific journal.

Having established an interest in Sokal's article, we did ask him informally to revise the piece. We made a general request to him a) to excise a good deal of the philosophical speculation and b) to excise most of his footnotes. Sokal seemed resistant to any general revisions of this sort, and indeed insisted on retaining almost all of his footnotes and bibliographic apparatus on the grounds that his peers, in science, expected extensive documentation of this sort. Judging from his response, it was clear that his article would appear as is, or not at all. At this point, Sokal was admitted to the category of "difficult, uncooperative author," well known to journal editors. His article entered a state of limbo, well known at Social Text at least, as "too much trouble to publish, not yet on the reject pile, and capable of being redeemed if published in the company of related articles."

Some months after this impasse was reached, the editors did indeed decide to assemble a special issue on the topic of science studies. We wanted to gauge how science studies practitioners were responding to the scurrilous attacks of Paul Gross and Norman Levitt, and other conservatives in science. Contributions were solicited from across the field of knowledge; from humanists, social scientists and natural scientists (the final lineup included many of the more significant names in science studies (Sandra Harding, Steve Fuller, Emily Martin, Hilary Rose, Langdon Winner, Dorothy Nelkin, Richard Levins, George Levine, Sharon Traweek, Sarah Franklin, Ruth Hubbard, Joel Kovel, Stanley Aronowitz, and Les Levidow). Most responded directly to the evolving controversy that some were calling the "Science Wars," while others wrote their own accounts of work in their respective fields. Here, we thought, was an appropriate and heterogenous context in which Sokal's article might appear, providing a feasible solution to our editorial dilemma. He expressed some concern when asked if we could publish his piece in this special issue (we assumed he wished to distance himself from the polemical company assembled for the issue), but he reiterated his eagerness to see it in print. Our final decision to include him presumed that readers would see his article in the particular context of the Science Wars issue, as a contribution from someone unknown to the field whose views, however peculiar, might still be thought relevant to the debate. Since his article was not written for that special issue, and bears little resemblance, in tone or substance, to the other commissioned articles, it was not slated to be included in the expanded book version of the issue (with additional articles by Katherine Hayles, Michael Lynch, Roger Hart, and Richard Lewontin) which will be published by Duke University Press in September.

In sum, Sokal's assumption that his "parody" struck a disreputable chord with the woozy editors of Social Text is ill-conceived. Indeed, its status as parody does not alter substantially our initial perception of, and our interest in, the piece itself as a curio, or symptomatic document. Of course, the whole affair may say something about our own conception of how physicists read philosophy, but that seems less important to us than that his prank does not simply lead to a heightening of the hysteria which the Science Wars have induced.

Most of all, what his confession altered was our perception of his own good faith as a self-proclaimed leftist. In the view of our editors, Alan Sokal was now revealed to be either a) a leftist whose self-loathing has been activated by conservative caricatures of the cultural left, or b) a leftist whose genuine sense of commitment led him to a questionable manner of expressing his political point. In either respect, his actions smacked of a temper often attributed to "unreconstructed male leftists." More to the point, the boy stunt pulled by Sokal seemed typical of the professional culture of science education.

Having talked to the (real) Sokal subsequently, we believe that most of the issues he intended to air are, at this point, rather well-known to readers of Social Text and to Lingua Franca. Indeed, they have been going the rounds in the academy since the first postmodern, social constructionist, or anti- foundational critiques of positivism appeared over thirty-five years ago. That many natural scientists have only recently felt the need to respond to these critiques says something about the restricted trade routes through which knowledge is still circulated in the academy, policed, as it is, at every departmental checkpoint by disciplinary passport controls. Nor are these critiques unfamiliar to folks who have long been involved in debates about the direction of the > left, where positivism has had a long and healthy life. At this point in time, we have a vestigial stake in these critiques and debates, but much less of an interest than Sokal supposes. When Sokal discovers that the cultural left he believes he has outsmarted really doesn't give much of a hoot about what Lacan said about topology in his 1966 seminar, then we can talk turkey.

>
> Our main concern is that readers who may be new to the debates engendered by science studies are not persuaded by the Sokal stunt that this is simply an academic turf war between scientists and humanists/social scientists, with one side trying to outsmart the other. More important to us is the gulf of power between experts and lay voices, and the currently shifting relationship between science and the corporate state. Nor are these concerns extrinsic to the practice of science. Prior to deciding whether science intrinsically tells the truth, we must ask, again and again, whether it is possible, or prudent, to isolate facts from values.
>
> Why does science matter so much? Because its power, as a civil religion, as a social and political authority, affects our daily lives and the parlous condition of the natural world more than does any other domain of knowledge. Does it follow that non-scientists should have some say in the decision-making processes that define and shape the work of the professional scientific community? Some scientists (including Sokal presumably) would say yes, and in some countries, non-expert citizens do indeed participate in these processes. All hell breaks loose, however, when the following question is asked. Should non-experts have anything to say about scientific methodology and epistemology? After centuries of scientific racism, scientific sexism, and scientific domination of nature one might have thought this was a pertinent question to ask.
>
> Andrew Ross, Co-Editor, Social Text
>
> [redacted]

↑ Index

420. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: fake book

Tue 21 May 1996

Burt Kimmelman writes:

Well, speaking of parchment, I guess those de/composed fragments of Sappho have served as fake books for improvisations by Pound and others...

steve

> A quasi analog to musical fake books is perhaps the old english manuscripts that showed the full elaboration of a stanza pattern including the refrain and any other repeating features, and then showed the other unique lines of successive stanzas--all done to save parchment that was precious. So how would this be fake? I don't know. Of course, thinking of parchment, one can't help but recall the whole delicious issue of the palimpsest--but now, we are perhaps straying beyond prosody and into purely textual/linguistic and/or philosophical matters.

↑ Index

421. Christopher Reiner
Avec Books offer
Tue 21 May 1996

I am forwarding this for Cydney Chadwick:

AVEC SALE

A special sale for subscribers to the Poetics List...for $14 you will receive:

AVEC #4, containing a translation section of contemporary poetry and prose from France (most of the work is still unpublished in book form and unavailable elsewhere). Also includes work by Michael Palmer, Lyn Hejinian, Clark Coolidge, Laura Moriarty, Leslie Scalapino, an image and text piece by Johanna Drucker, art by Susan Bee, and cover art by New York School painter Norman Bluhm.

AVEC #8. with this issue the journal began featuring longer sections of work per contributor, some of whom are: Elizabeth Willis, Sianne Ngai, Chris Strofolino, Agnes Rouzier, Friederika Mayrocker, Keith Waldrop, Rosmarie Waldrop...also, an award-winning photo-text collboration by Norma Cole and Ben E. Watkins.

A CAST OF TENS by David Bromige. The 29th book by the 1988 winner of the Western States Book Award.

"Bromige is a master at probing the irreducibility of symbolic logic, and his playful yet outrageous equivalencies explode the neat, cut-and-dried tautologies of Wittgenstein:

> The old man is 112 pages long > and so is the sea
> They are deeply symbolic (psychotic).

Bromige's structures are sinuous and mathematic, and they evoke the tonal colors of Schoenberg, Satie, or Cage, successfully evading what Bromige has characterized as iambic pentameter's 'echoic invasions.'"--Taproot Reviews

"Bromige combines the erudite with the dryly humorous."--The Independent

Sale from May 21-July 14th (Bastille Day). Please make checks payable to AVEC: P.O. Box 1059, Penngrove, Ca 94951.

↑ Index

422. David Baratier
Re: formal continuum
Tue 21 May 1996

"Metrical "meaning", according to this theory, is generated through difference within a structure--an obvious reference to Saussure. As I said, it's an interesting way of looking at what certain poets have done in certain circumstances, a different way of reading the meaningfulness of meter."

I fail to see how this is supposed to substitute as a new articulation, theory or hypothesis. Or is the benefit of the word Saussure supposed to single-handedly transpose an un/new-found conveyance upon the sensibilities of the reader? Pick a poem, any poem from, oh say-- Blake's Song of Innocence and Experience and see what the meter does in relation to the "meaningfullness of meter." This is one of them pre-existing ideas (CREATED BY A POET AND CONSEQUENTLY STOLEN I MIGHT ADD) sacked from the cul-de-sac of poetical intention, dressed up in a label of newfangled foppery and subsequently selling itself as "a brand new bag" ala James Brown without a momentary reflection for retention.

Be well.

David Baratier

↑ Index

423. David Baratier
Reading Tonight 5/21
Tue 21 May 1996

Tuesday in Philadelphia

Boulevard presents a reading by James Tate. Border's center city 1727 Walnut Street. @ 7:30

↑ Index

424. Alan Sondheim
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

The reply is incredible if I read it correctly. Social Text would allow a sopomoric article that might be a parody to be printed because it was written by a scientist. We have a new brand of essentialism here. Meanwhile the journal is compromised doubly, not only by the article, but by the dissembling reply by Ross.

Alan

http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Ich war Hamlet. Ich stand an der Kuste und redete mit der Brandung BLABLA, im Rucken die Ruinen von Europe. Heiner Muller

↑ Index

425. Henry Gould
Re: formal continuum
Tue 21 May 1996

David Baratier, On the face of it, your quote from previous post seems a fairly straight- forward replay of Jakobson-type Russian formalist lit crit. I fail to see the motive for your spleen. Was the theory claiming to be new-fangled? Did Blake or some other poet put a patent on metrical effects & how to read them? Sounds like Finch et al. are simply emphasizing an awareness of what metrical rhythms might be doing (as opposed, maybe sometimes, to the "rhythm" of rhetorical effects). Of course poets who try to take this turf from the critics are in danger of quick petrification and de-humidification. That's why we have critics. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

426. Henry Gould
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

There's a long op-ed piece in today's NY Times defending Social Text(by Stanley Fish). Seems to me both sides are talking past each other to side issues; what the imbroglio reveals are unarticulated philosophical assumptions on both sides. Ross et al. claim that "of course there's a real world out there but it's all relative to social constructions of its meaning"; Sokal et al. claim that "the real world reflects a truth that we must constantly adjust our lenses to grasp". That's the nub of the difference, and it gets to the deep issues that Peirce explores in his lifelong contrasting of realism (or ideal-realism) and nominalism.

He would I believe come down on the side of Sokal; truth is not relative to our names for it (nominalism) - our naming is relative to the truth, and requires empirical testing (realism). This is an utter simplification (Hank's demonio reductium!!) but it's the core issue. All the biz about Sokal or Ross's good faith or credentials are the side issues. It's a real dispute about the limits of both science and its sociology. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

427. David Golumbia
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

Can we be filled on where Ross's reply appears? Has it been, or will it be, published somewhere? Or was it meant to be distributed electronically?

And did anyone note with interest (as did I) Ross's statement that SOCIAL TEXT is an "unrefereed" journal?? I realize it may not have a formal referee process, and that most of its contributions are solicited -- but this claim has never, so far as I know, appeared inside the journal itself, let alone near its prominently-featured list of the prominent members of its "Editorial Collective"?? I wonder how many persons have sent contributions to ST believing otherwise? What exactly does ST do with unsoliicted manuscripts, in that case? I'm baffled.

Although I'm ambivalent about Stanley Fish, there's a provocative reply to all of this by him on the OpEd page of today's NY Times.

Which does not mention what for me is the oddest irony: the fact that Sokol's prank is described in the NY Times headline breaking the story as a "deconstruction" of cultural studies -- thus for the first time using the term to mean perhaps the exact opposite of Derrida's uses of it...

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

428. Jordan Davis
Re: formal continuum/computer writing demo
Tue 21 May 1996

Dear Dave,

Is it the word 'saussure' to which you object? The other part of the quote looks pretty intelligent from here, unless of course you don't think poems set up separate structures, or you don't think meaning operates in differences. Mainly it's monotony I object to, as opposed to repetition, which is the basis of music, no? Monotony then would mean repetition without surprise.

Come to Teachers College tomorrow morning for a poetry reading and computer writing demonstration by 6th graders from the Ralph Bunche School. The reading is at 10 a.m. at Room 157 in Thorndike Hall, 525 W 120th St, New York.

Btw, Rob, is it the Foucaldian paraphrase that turns you off? Wasn't Foucault paraphrasing Nietzsche's first 'untimely meditation'? To ask along with Rod Smith, doesn't Chris remind you of Nietzsche, but with more energy? Energy kicks.

Hotcha,
Jordan

PS Dave, should we go to the booglit show or should we go to Philadelphia. (You can tell me where to go :)

PPS Lot of guys writing lately to the list, huh?

↑ Index

429. Tony Green
Re: rules & conventions
Tue 21 May 1996

Apropos Burgeresque historical generalisations: I'd be inclined to check the relations between writers (or other "artists") with their social setup of neoclassicism or pre-neoclassicism. Say, what was the position of Dr Johnson or Piranesi to patronage?! fr'instances. Artists were having problems with patrons way back in the 16th century. The Romantic artists had a tradition to conserve ready for use maybe.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

430. Charles Smith
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

---

hmm.... contra... more to it

(i find it fascinating)

↑ Index

431. Joe Amato
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

like alan, i have doubts about ross's caricature of the editorial decision at _social text_ to accept sokol's piece... i think mebbe ross oughtta just cop to it, and admit that sokol's prank got past the editorial board... like david, i find it somewhat disturbing too that ross should now publicly make the claim for "unrefereed" status, and i'm not a big stanley fish fan, either---at least, not of late (though i'm gonna try to find that op-ed piece)... and like henry, i feel that both sides are in fact talking past the other...

nevertheless, i find mself on the ross side of things in terms of challenging sokol's "leftist" motives, and in terms of what sort of work i find valuable, even as, again, i do think that sokol managed to put one over on _social text_, all naysaying to the contrary...

the society for literature and science (sls), of which i've been a member for some eight years, has in the past couple of years addressed (in its annual conference, and its general discussion) the more conservative attacks on cultural studies work (in fact there is a somewhat dormant e-list, litsci-l (now out of ucla), of which i was once listowner, which one would think would be noisy as hell in light of these recent events)... i for one have found certain claims coming out of cultural studies, relative to science in general, problematic... b/c i don't believe that all empirical inquiry, for example, is intrinsically "positivistic"... and yet i do believe, with ross, that the sites are contested, as well they should be, that they should in fact be even more contested... that is, to put ross's way of putting it in the affirmative, non-experts should have something to say about scientific methodology and epistemology---provided, that is, they go about their own business as expert-ly as possible... i mean, i'm not wedded to the idea that a cultural studies type interrogating a scientific-technological reality becomes, in such methodological terms, a non-expert... but i'll let the latter terminological slippage slide for the moment...

b/c for me the real matter of the moment here has to do with david's question about whether ross's reply was meant for electronic distribution... why is it that this controversy, at least as it's coming down the pike, is taking place over there, in print?... at least among the contenders, i mean---ross, fish, sokol, etc?... why the hell don't we have an electronic forum where sokol, ross, fish and anybody else who's interested can converge to chew over these... discrepancies?... litsci-l could be used for same, for example... or even this forum, poetics, which to its credit is motivated enough to introduce and discuss this issue almost out-of-context (---thanx steve!)... but i mean, why aren't alla these well-known folks busy discussing and dialoguing online?---or if they are (my apologies), where is this happening?...

it seems to me that venues like the ny times are not open to everyone (anymore than are the pages of _social text_) and that in the interest of things democratic it would help immensely if such conversations weren't restricted to print, which seems to me to act as a silent mechanism for silencing those w/o name-status from actively contributing, hence for constructing a certain sort of "public" space... and i regard this not as a consequence of conspiracies, but of institutional orthodoxies... which is to say that, though too many folks still don't have access to emedia, there are many more who can voice their opines in these spaces than are likely to see their names in the ny times... and i mean, like, the folks who're doing all the talking surely have email accounts...

a lot of the hogwash that's likely to emerge from this controversy could probably be addressed and dispensed with in just a few email exchanges... which, of course, is hardly to argue for progress, but which is to make a claim for process, due and otherwise...

joe

↑ Index

432. Fred E. Maus
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

Gee, I really liked Andrew Ross's account of the editorial decision. It sounded completely plausible to me. Maybe that's because my own editing experiences have to do with music publications, and in those settings things are constantly being published because of something about the identity of the author. "Yes it's not very good, but it's interesting that a composer is trying to write about it" or "that this particular composer said that" etc. The statement that they finally printed it because they thought it was interesting documentation of a scientist trying to think through some theoretical things sounds like unvarnished truth to me.

If they say they are "unrefereed" doesn't that just mean the editorial collective makes all the decisions without turning to other readers for evaulations? Why the fuss?

↑ Index

433. Herb Levy
Re: fake book
Tue 21 May 1996

Despite Rob Hardin's reading of what I wrote (taking note of the state of things is not the same as approving of them), I'm very much in favor of people performing poetry by others.

It is usually extremely interesting to hear a piece of music performed by the composer (whether you're talking about Stravinsky conducting his own works, or Pauline Oliveros performing hers), but radically different performances by other performers can illuminate musical works in a way that has rarely been considered in the world of literature (cf John Coltrane's many versions of My Favorite Things, Glenn Gould's Mozart sonatas, etc.).

In literature, the author's own version is often taken as the ONLY way to sound a work out loud. Texts aren't usually treated as scores for performance by others, or they are treated more strictly than is often the case with musical scores. As long as this is true, any kind of tradition of performative interpretation will be rare in poetry.

If authors wish to give up their authority (as unacknowledged, & often unacknowledgeable, authors of traditional works in oral cultures have at least in a de facto way), then maybe there can be a kind of poetry fake book, in the sense of a way to get a quick overview of how to perform a work that you literally may never have known of before.

Until the cultural context of literature changes that radically, I think we can only be concerned about which books are not fake poetry books.

Which I think we'd all agree is a very different issue, though I doubt we'd all agree on which books were which.

Oh, and as an aside to Chris Stroffolino - I only chose the O'Hara poem because when I turned to look at the bookshelf next to me the first thing I saw was the MOMA memorial book of the same title with various artists illuminating various O'Hara poems.

I wasn't thinking (& am not now) in terms of Harold Bloom or any use of the term interpretation in the sense of criticism, but rather (as described by several folks in the context of the fake book thread) performance as interpretation. As perhaps a lounge poet (sic) might say "here's one of my own personal favorites, I hope it's one of yours: my interpretation of "Maximus to Himself." Is the band ready? Ah, one, ah two, one two three four. I've had to learn ... "

Bests,

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

434. Alan Sondheim
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

I read Joe's reply and agree with much of it. I've also been writing a bit about this on the Derrida list and just want to say, briefly, what I said there - that I don't believe cultural studies/decon folks know very much about science, and I understand why scientists (including a number I've known) get angry at them. If you haven't studied mathematica, and, say a course on fundamental particle physics, including the mathematics, experimental apparati and methodologies, all you're doing is attempting to colonize a field you know nothing about, period. In any other cultural area this would be called imperialism, particularly as we look more and more towards 'native' voices for ethnography. But science seems a free- for-all, as if there is a totality called "science" embracing everything from particle physics to geology, geography, etc. Not only is this in- correct, but it's also highly prejudicial.

Too many cultural theorists are too busy theorizing to actually sit down and, say, take that course, or work through the books themselves.

Alan

http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/ Ich war Hamlet. Ich stand an der Kuste und redete mit der Brandung BLABLA, im Rucken die Ruinen von Europe. Heiner Muller

↑ Index

435. Burt Kimmelman
Re: fake book
Tue 21 May 1996

Hey I have been misquoted (disinformationized!). Steve has me saying stuff about Sappho and Pound and is otherwise misleading his readers. I said something about Old English autographs on parchment and the like.

Burt Kimmelman

↑ Index

436. Ursula K Heise
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

I, too, would be interested to know where Ross' reply was printed. I understand that he will publish a reply to Sokal in the next issue of _Lingua Franca_.

As for the account of how ST decided to publish the article: yes, perhaps, as somebody suggested, "unrefereed" just means the editorial collective decided. I still find that disturbing in the case of an issue on science if there are no scientists on the editorial board (I'm not sure whether they are). If one publishes an article from a field that one doesn't have expertise in, I do think there is an obligation to run it by somebody from the field to see if it makes sense in its own discipline. Fish's op-ed piece misses the mark in this respect, I believe: sure, trust is part of the scholarly/scientific enterprise, but so is fact-checking and editing.

I also found Ross' patronizing attitude toward scientists very disturbing. So he accepts a piece that he himself thinks is inferior because those poor physicists don't know how to do better and should be encouraged in their modest efforts to understand literary and cultural theory? I can't help but find that attitude condescending.

Ursula K. Heise

↑ Index

437. Joe Amato
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

fred, i suspect that some of us are feeling/responding to the visibility/reputation of _social text_... that is, to it's being published, whatever its "little review" lineage, by duke up, which itself is a power-broker in the academic world (which is not to suggest that duke up is evil or some such)... hence ross's description of the editorial decision smacks of a certain condescension toward those without proper credentials (read "appropriate institutional identity card")---in this case, a scientist... but in any case, it could be anybody---that is, anybody w/o visibility (note the list he gives of better-known scholars, by way of---is it justification of even-handedness?)... and if one lacks this ostensibly arbitrary but identifible identity status, and is likewise not a scientist (these latter will evidently be allowed to go public on occasion b/c of their 'expert' status---in science, that is), then what does this say about one's chance of publication in such a "nonrefereed" journal?... that is, what is being published by _social text_---or solicited---finally?... identities?...

which is perhaps to state the case contra ross much too harshly... but it is nonetheless to state the case...

still, i'm ultimately on ross's side on this, if i've gotta choose sides, i mean... i don't think he's been disingenuous, i think rather he's merely saturated with his subject position, and is seeping here & there...

joe

↑ Index

438. Stephen L Burt
Re: fake science: reply (long)
Tue 21 May 1996

My 50p on the fake science issue:

If Fish's description in today's NYT of what science studies people, a.k.a. sociologists of science, do is accurate, than Sokal got it wrong, perceived a threat to science where there was none, and created a damaging controversy that will only give the "wrong people" ammunition.

But in defense, not of Sokal's actions but of his reactions to the books he read: it's easy to imagine Sokal reading some badly-written or poorly-thought-out science studies pieces, and coming to the false conclusion that science studies people thought phlogiston was just as real as oxygen. And it would be bad for (e.g.) the global climate if everyone started to believe in phlogiston. Again, if Fish is right, science studies can't possibly pose such a risk; but Sokal probably hadn't been reading Fish.

To generalize: The badly-written pieces in any subfield, especially a subfield that challenges the basic assumptions of the wider culture, do serious damage to that field's attempt to get itself taken seriously outside the subdisciplines in which it's already established. Bad American deconstructionists encouraged people to laugh, unfairly, at something called "deconstruction," and every dull or badly-informed piece of academic writing about popular culture encourages people who don't "do" contemporary popular culture to believe that it's not worth studying, or even to feel threatened by the "growing" study of it. Careful editing is always a good; in a controversial subfield it ought to be a tactical necessity.

An example in a quite different subfield (and one that's unlikely to offend anyone reading this list) is Reynolds and Press' _The Sex Revolts_, a poorly-written, sloppy book applying queer theory to underground rock, and one that's probably done some damage to whatever receptive audience there might have been for a good one down the road.

Re Andrew Ross' defense: it makes sense to me that _Social Text_ would want to publish in an issue devoted to Science Wars the "take" on these issues of somebody trained in physics, especially if they didn't have any other essays reflecting a physics background, and if Sokal essay was more interesting than whatever else _Social Text_ happened to have in the "science" file of their bottom drawer.

What struck me as slightly wacky in Ross' piece was the hint of an assumption that the cultural authority of scientists, because it had often been used to promote sexism and other bad things, therefore _ought_ to be undermined. It's easy to imagine practicing scientists-- especially in some fields with immediate political implications, say climatology-- considering it a matter of some moral urgency that their profession GAIN cultural authority. If Miami's going to be underwater unless we listen more to climatologists (and I'm not saying it is) then climatologists have a good and ethical reason to want to protect certain aspects of their privileged positions.

Finally:

Those who, like me, don't know much about science studies but find it interesting anywaymight want to look at last week's (not this week's) TLS, which had a full-page review of a science studies book out of Edinburgh. There's some blather about the information age in the front, but you can ignore it.

Obligatory poetics-related remark: has anyone else read or enjoyed John Keene's _Annotations_, which I got through last month? It seemed to want to be an African-American rewrite of _My Life_, with the same intricate structure of repetitions & returning lyrical single-sentence moments.

steve pangolin

↑ Index

439. Loss Glazier
Re: Bob Bertholf
Tue 21 May 1996

Yes, indeed.

At 09:12 AM 5/20/96 EST, you wrote:
>loss,
>
>is that michael basinski by any chance?
>
>burt

>
>

↑ Index

440. David Golumbia
Re: fake science: reply
Tue 21 May 1996

---

1. Two persons have now suggested that "unrefereed" means "without external reviewers." They may very well be right; I've never heard the term "unrefereed" before. What I've heard is the term "refereed," as in "you should fill your cv with publications of essays in refereed journals." "Refereed" in this case meaning "peer reviewed." Implying that "unrefereed" means "not peer reviewed." In any meaningful sense of the term "refereed," review of unsolicited manuscripts by ST's Editorial Collective would seem to qualify as "refereed."

I don't know why I should care so much about this, except that I guess that Ross's use of the "u" term struck me as a kind of after-the-fact denial of responsibility. It sounds like he's saying that ST isn't a standard academic journal -- which I very much hope it is, for it until now has done little to explain how it differs from one.

2. The science question, I just can't go on about this, but I disagree witha great deal of what's been said. Science is always a cultural practice, always embedded, standards of objectivity themselves embedded. Ross and Fish give up too much ground in their defense. The crucial place to read about this is less sociology of science, in my opinion, and more feminist critiques of science. The notion that culturla theorists don't "know science" is itself deeply problematic: what is "science"? What is it that an astronomer knows about science that is shared with a molecular biologist? One thesis of cultural theory re: science, as I've said, considers it as cultural practice, integrated into every aspect of our culture (he says, typing on his computer): what puts a "scientist" into a privileged position regarding cultural practices and their theoritization and keeps a cultural theorist away from said privilege? It would be one thing if Ross was trying to tell somebody how to extract DNA from human tissue; but to suggest that the biologist is in a beetter position to "theorize" that pracitce begs the question.

Furthermore, practicing scientists themselves differ just as much as non-scientists in their views -- consider, for example, S.J. Gould, E. F. Keller, & R. Lewontin, all of whom are or were hard-core scientists, all of whom (Keller & Lewontin more than Gould) accept the "cultural practice" view of science.

And experience (and th pages of Scientific American) show that a lot of philosopphers are really bad theorists, thinkers, writesr, about much but their own specific efforts or experiments.

3. The relation of all this to poetics is...

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

441. Christopher J. Beach
Re: fake science: reply (long)
Tue 21 May 1996

Who is John Keene? Sounds interesting.

C Beach

↑ Index

442. Tom Beard
what a scientist knows about science
Tue 21 May 1996

David Golumbia wrote:

> What is > it that an astronomer knows about science that is shared with a molecular biologist?

They both know what it's like to 'do' science - to have to test one's hypotheses against observation. This is something that cultural theorists (and other theorists, eg theoretical physicists) do not have to do. Being a practising scientist is a quick way to lose the illusion that science is about discovering universal truths - it is about formulating useful, falsifiable hypotheses that are tentatively accepted until something better comes along.

They should also both know some physics - new theories of electromagnetism, for example, would affect both spectroscopy and the formation of protein molecules. This is where science gains usefulness over pure empiricism - all its fields are connected, and developments in one area may produce new ideas in another discipline. Reductionism may have a bad name in some circles, but it's an extremely useful tool.

It's sad to see so much anti-science feeling still among people in the arts and humanities. I'd hoped that Snow's 'two cultures' had gone further towards talking to one another. Part of it, I think, comes from a simplistic view of 'Western Thought', and of science's place within it. It's true that much of today's research is tied up with military-industrial power structures, and that some have misused science to promote racism and patriarchy. On the other hand, many see the mind/body duality as part of western thought, but science, and philosophes such as Diderot, have done more to undermine this duality than any amount of deconstruction.

Perhaps it's a question of territory, and the tendency to see everything in terms of one's discipline. A cultural theorist tends to see everything in terms of culture, in the same way that a physicist might reduce everything to physics, or an economist reduce everything to money. I'd like to think that writing poetry is a useful way to understand what our senses tell us, and so is science.

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

443. - Kim Tedrow

what a poet knows about science

Tue 21 May 1996

Tom writes:

>>>>I'd like to think that writing poetry is a useful way to understand what our senses tell us, and so is science.<<<<<

I'm enjoying this thread. I remember that as an undergraduate, I found myself writing more/being more "creative" when I was taking what are thought of as "left brain" courses: Intro to Logic, Astonomy, Biology, Technical writing, etc. I never exactly tried to express why that was, except that I found the ways of thinking and perceiving through a different "discipline" stimulating -- the new vocabulary, a new system of thinking, a whole new set of metaphor and description.

I married a soil scientist who also happens to write pretty decent poems. We had many discussions about how the scientific method is indeed creative, and how frustrating he found the bias in liberal arts against science. Of course, the complementary bias in the sciences exists as well, which he found much more frustrating.

Just my $.02. Thanks Tom.
-Kim

↑ Index

444. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH

Will Alexander's work

Wed 22 May 1996

---

about Will Alexander's work--

Ron,

Eric Dolphy used to talk about trying to hit three or four notes at the same time, & there are other out musicians who have said (theorized & practiced) the same, so I'd begin by connecting it with something like that. Will has an incredible record (LP) collection.

Perpetual fire in language with meaning (everything in there has meaning/ means something: I remember Will saying how he got the biggest dictionary he could, read it all, spending a lot of time writing down every interesting word he found in it -- filling many notebooks, which he uses for content) -- he's a self-proclaimed jock & a surrealist artist (painter as well as writer): going at it on all levels -- sometimes I think of his writing as something like a museum of Bosch paintings -- each piece having everything it has in it in it & everything else too -- symbolism, meaning, spirit, contraries, whatever you see or experience in it. othertimes it is something else. surrealism with meaning?? i don't know about that, but the combination of books he celebrates as sensual in "The Myrmidons of Oblivion" are by Cesaire, Turgenyev, and Rene Leys, if that says anything. Anyway It seems as though all the various things in the _in this_ places are there in Asia, so dark and psychedelic.

"logorheaic excess (a pleonast's plenitude)..." is one thing, & one way to read it. It could also be something like someone who's totally smashed on language & the oppression of people, especially non- white cultures, for a few centuries. Will's work seems like all those things (a wild and relentless unpublicized history). Of course this would be shot down in a workshop! How many students (or teachers) want to (have the time to?) to deal with a poem such as Asia. The "voices" in the poem are the spirits of murdered Tibetan monks who have come back to perform "astral warfare" on the Chinese. It's much more gruesome than "Helter Skelter", & a challenging read. The "we" is artifice, for sure, but I'm willing to allow Will to imagine the voices of slaughtered monks (who probably didn't think the marxists were scaly, but who knows what they were thinking as they were feeling the bullets approaching their skin?) Also, "here was Marx, here was the state" to me implies that the two are seperate, not together, in the "voices" mind, for what it's worth

The footnote on page twelve is refering to a quote from one of the books Will makes multiple references in the poem, listed on p. 138. the quotes in the poem & notes are from these books, not an earlier draft of the poem.

dig it, chris f

↑ Index

445. Tom Beard
what poetry knows about scientists
Wed 22 May 1996

Kim writes:

> I'm enjoying this thread. I remember that as an undergraduate, I found myself writing more/being more "creative" when I was taking what are thought of as "left brain" courses: Intro to Logic, Astonomy, Biology, Technical writing, etc.

I had the same feeling. Mathematics, in particular, I found a highly creative activity, requiring intuitive leaps as well as rigorous logic. Some of group theory and what mathematicians call 'foundations' (the intersection of logic, set theory and number theory) is especially beautiful.

People often talk about the connections between mathematics & music, but the only connection that I found useful at the time was in understanding acoustics and digital sampling. I'll mathematical composition to Xenakis.

> how frustrating he found the bias in liberal arts against science. Of course, the complementary bias in the sciences exists as well,

Yes, and I was as guilty as any. I've no problems now about being a scientist who writes poetry, but my scientific background leads me to bristle at some extremes of post-structuralist theory - for example, the refusal of many cultural theorists to even _consider_ the possibility of biological influences upon human behaviour.

I've rarely tried to involve science in my poetry, and tend to cringe at most attempts to write poems about chaos theory. My career in meteorology has affected my writing - but on the other hand, show me a poet who has never mentioned rain, wind, sunshine or clouds! I find that, contrary to some claims, the more I know about a phenomenon such as thunderstorms, the _more_ they fill me with wonder and awe.

On rare occasions I've written from a persona that uses scientific metaphors:

The Physicist Drinks to Forget

no use in crying over it, Hera's milk spilt across our nights

   that hub that turns around us
the way

she turns around me, turns me around

--

what's the use of laws, the attractions of gravity, electricity?
all it takes is three bodies (sun, earth, that damned cold moon)
and we're lost and I'm caught lying like a star fallen till the dew falls, twinkles

in my lashes, clear as gin

The mathematician defines her space

With time, everything tends to zero.
=> leave her.

You prove existence, but not uniqueness. I am necessary but not sufficient.
=> leave.

This triangle would appall
Euclid -- nothing adds up.
She warps our space.

=> let's begin with new axioms, construct a metric, a way to measure space, the distances between us.

It amuses me now to recall how many of my colleagues really talked like this, using mathematical jargon to describe their personal lives.

There's been some transfer the other way too. Some aspects of theory, in particular hypertext theory, have informed my current work: writing/designing computer-aided learning packages for meteorologists. I've gone away from the standard heirarchical presentation of knowledge (headings, subheadings, sub-subheadings &c) in favour of a dense web of hyperlinked nodes. This, I think, is much closer to the way that the atmosphere actually works.

Cheers &c,

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

446. Marjorie Perloff

Re: POETICS Digest - 20 May 1996 to 21 May 1996

Wed 22 May 1996

Like Ursula Heise, I find Andrew Ross's condescending tone to scientists extremely irritating. As someone married to a scientist (an M.D.) who writes countless articles, I think it should make clear that the purpose of, say, articles in CIRCULATION is to describe new and better ways of treating heart disease, in my husband's case of prolonging the lives of those with congenital heart disease--people who used to die at age 16 or so and with scientific advances, now live to middle age and beyond. The purpose of articles about such disease is to inform other members of the profession as to specific treatments, advances, problems, etc. It's not to be clever or to find essentialist truth, etc etc.

So when Stanley Fish says on today's Op Ed page that--gotcha!--because the poor deluded scientist didn't even realize that the issue was the social construction of science not scientific truth, he is entirely missing the point which was that a non-sociologist of science could produce a spoof which was ACCEPTED FOR PUBLICATION in what is supposedly a classy journal which turns down many articles and essays. On what basis was it accepted?? All of Ross's excuses and Fish's disclaimers won't convince me until they manage to get an article into CIRCULATION or any comparable journal.

The real issue here is : what is the purpose of professional publication? Is it to chat with other like minded humanists about what we think science is? Or is to advance knowledge in some way?

No wonder the public thinks we're a bunch of decadent creeps!

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

447. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Will Alexander's work
Wed 22 May 1996

I don't know if I should be saying this...
And I hope it's not fuel for any severe detractors of Alexander's
For I say it with absolute respect...
But one interesting thing re Will Alexander's "earlier draft"
is that when I was sent the poem ASIA in MS, I marvelled over his vocabulary and also words I considered to be NEOLOGISMS....
I wrote Will about my love of his word "exhile" (which I took as a neologism on exile and exhale) and also
"furnance" ("furnace, finance?)---
and went through explications of such....
Will said, "oh no, they were just typos, spelling errors."
c

↑ Index

448. Eryque Gleason
Re: Will Alexander's neologistic typos
Wed 22 May 1996

i read chrisS's post and realized i didn't really know what neologism meant. definition #2 in mirriam webster's tenth edition: "a meaningless word coined by a psychotic".

"veeeerrrry interesting, but stupid." thought it might be of some relevance/interest here.

eryque

> I don't know if I should be saying this...
> And I hope it's not fuel for any severe detractors of Alexander's
> For I say it with absolute respect...
> But one interesting thing re Will Alexander's "earlier draft"
> is that when I was sent the poem ASIA in MS, I marvelled over > his vocabulary and also words I considered to be NEOLOGISMS....
> I wrote Will about my love of his word "exhile" (which I took as > a neologism on exile and exhale) and also
> "furnance" ("furnace, finance?)---
> and went through explications of such....
> Will said, "oh no, they were just typos, spelling errors."
> c

↑ Index

449. Ron Silliman

Fake editing

Wed 22 May 1996

Fake books, fake science...it's all intriguing.

But I was especially amused at the raised eyebrows over the idea of Social Text (a mag which I've always presumed to imply the term social as in "social mixer" or, better, "social climber"), that form of postmodernism that knows how to dress, should be "unrefereed."

So I thought I would throw my perception that the "referee" process is one of the great hoaxes of academic life. It generally neuters the journal that uses it (why there has never been a really good college literary magazine) and, in critical areas, often tends to permit a lot of ax grinding go on behind the curtains. I've seen good articles rejected because a referee did not want X or Y (including some Xs and Ys on this list) to make a credible argument from an established position that might later compromise his or her forthcoming article(s), or to pay off a grudge on some tenure or step increase decision.

It's no accident that all of the decent magazines over the past 80 years have been the work of single, strong-willed individuals, even ones with whom one might not agree. Editorial committees by their nature seek compromise -- at the Socialist Review, where we had two collectives (one of which, in Boston, tended to "referee" articles and one of which, in the Bay Area, did not), we lost several great articles because they were simply too provocative -- including a great Samuel R. Delaney response to Donna Harraway that is still unpublished. That we managed to print "Manifesto for Cyborgs" (by an editorial majority of 5-4 in which the deciding vote declared that SR ought to publish "anything I can't understand") or Avital Ronell's manifesto for nuclear criticism always amazed me. Leslie Scalapino's response to my own intro to a collection of poetry (which gave rise to the much fuller dialog that later appeared in Poetics Journal) certainly could not make it through the process -- I was the lone vote in favor of publishing it.

So let me add one additional category to this discourse:
refereeing = fake editing

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

450. Henry Gould
Re: fake science
Wed 22 May 1996

Hope you'll all forgive me for harping on my hobbyhorse again, but I'm reading Peirce (that shd be clear by now) & can't get over how relevant it is to the Sokal flap. He sets up a philosophical position that not only grounds the realist/nominalist distinction (as I related to the dispute in earlier post) - he also debunks the arrogance of science (in scientism & positivism) which dominated the "philosophy of science" at the end of the 19th century. He was able to do this because he was one of those rare birds, a real philosopher coming out of a background in experimental science. His explorations in logic led to an architecture of meaning which describes nature's operations as "like a language"; which suggests a cosmic sentience or universal Mind not on theological claims (transcendentalism) but on observation of the workings of logic itself - a creative tripartite structure in which the "chance" subject is linked to a general "predicate" which has meaning in the context of the whole as "coming from the future" (a consensus of truth).

Wish I could be more precise - I know how foggy this all sounds - but what I'm driving at is that Peirce revaluates some of these issues - the social construction of science, the relation of reality to our descriptions of it, and the relations between creative thinking in general both to chance and what can be termed "the true". And he does this in ways that can't be pigeon-holed as conservative, idealistic, positivistic, etc. He took care not to be pigeonholed by those who claimed him as their guide - Wm James & the pragmatists. It almost goes without saying that he was ostracized, attacked & ignored by the academic establishment of the time & died in poverty. There is the possibility of a philosophy of science which recognizes the "fallibilism" (Peirce's term) of socially and politically-textured knowledge without falling into either camp of "nominalist" relativism or its obverse twin, positivist empiricism. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

451. Mark Roberts
AWOL: Inaugural Olympic Sports Poet (forwarded)
Wed 22 May 1996

> The following message has been posted on behalf of Network Tennis Australia. Please address all enquiries to them at the contacts listed below. The AWOL email address should only be used to submit entries which will then be forwarded to NTA.

****

Network tennis Australia (NTA) has launched a new poetry competition, to be awarded annually. In the year of the Olympic Summer Games it shall be known as the 'Olympic Sports Poet' award. In other years it shall be known as the '(Nation) Sports Poet award.

This unique award has been created to celebrate & symbolise the powerful & exhilarating synergy that exists between sport and poetry and entries for the Inaugural Olympic Sports Poet 1996 are now being invited..

Conditions of the Award

Prize allocation is:

Open section 1st prize $400, 2nd prize $200, 3rd prize $100.

Olympic Sports Poet junior section 1st prize $100, 2nd prize $50, 3rd prize $25.

Competition opens 1 May 1996 and closes 30 June 1996. Late entries will not be accepted.

Entries can be submitted in paper copy to:

Mail Network Tennis Australia,
Sports Poet Competition,
210 Annandale Street,
Annandale NSW Australia 2038.

Fax 61 2 5172466.

Entries can also be emailed to: [redacted] or you may submit your entry through the Sports Poet web page http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/sportspoet.html

The theme of the poems entered must be sport

> Entries must be written in English.
>
> The junior section is for poets 13 years or younger at 30 June 1996. Junior entries must be clearly marked and the the poet's date of birth must be included.
>
> Poems must not be under consideration by any publisher. Entrants requiring manuscripts returned or to be notified of the winners should enclose a SSAE . Overseas entrants should enclose an international reply coupon (entrants who submit poems by email will receive a post listing the winners).
>
> Competition judges are Les Wicks and Ron Pretty. The judges decision shall be final and no correspondence shall be entered into. NTA shall make changes to the judges panel in the event of a Judge being unavailable.
>
> The winners shall be announced in July/August 1996 and published in the Poets Union Inc magazine Five Bells soon after.
>
> NTA shall not be responsible for any loss or damage to entries and reserves the right to reproduce the winner's poem and other selected poems.
>
> For further information about these conditions please contact Network Tennis Australia on ph 61 2 [redacted], fax 61 2 [redacted].
>
> AWOL
> Australian Writing On Line
> [redacted]
> http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
> PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
> Phone 61 2 7475667
> Fax 61 2 7472802

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

452. Rod Smith
Ediots
Wed 22 May 1996

yes, ediots.
It's a term who's time has come.

Rod

↑ Index

453. Sheila E. Murphy
Re: Fake editing
Wed 22 May 1996

Ron Silliman wrote:

> So I thought I would throw my perception that the "referee" process is one of the great hoaxes of academic life. It generally neuters the journal that uses it (why there has never been a really good college literary magazine) and, in critical areas, often tends to permit a lot of ax grinding go on behind the curtains.
>
> It's no accident that all of the decent magazines over the past 80 years have been the work of single, strong-willed individuals, even ones with whom one might not agree. Editorial committees by their nature seek compromise --

I second the motion. The erasure of personality has been one of the ungreatest inventions of our time. Have had this same perception about committee (job) interviews, by the way (of less direct interest to this list). Have always felt I could hire more effectively with the benefit of clear, direct thinking on the part of one individual, rather than trying not to offend or threaten certain components of the sprawling decisionmaking vehicle..

Committees and referee groups are inherently intuition bashers when it comes to decisionmaking of this sort. Groups are better for idea development and other things.

Sheila Murphy

↑ Index

454. Daniel Bouchard
Re: Ediots
Wed 22 May 1996

> yes, ediots.
> It's a term who's time has come.

>Rod

_____

I've been enjoying the term "critiots" for a while now.

[redacted]

↑ Index

455. David Golumbia
Re: Ediots
Wed 22 May 1996

I think Ron's account in fact highlights my own unease with Ross's claim. SOCIAL TEXT's editorial process makes it not very different from most other journals. Ross strikes me as dissembling when he uses the term "unrefereed" to imply that ST is somehow less at fault for what happened. The truth is that he and the Editorial Collective screwed up big time -- screwed up in a way that reflects badly on a cause that I for one think is important -- and Ross should have apologized for it. By throwing all the blame (instead of the, say, 50% he deserves) on Sokol, Ross makes himself and the "cause" look even worse.

Did I mention that the rest of the essays in the "Science Wars" issue in fact raise all the points we've been discussing here, often with a great deal of sophistication? Funny how, even in my own mind, the 15 or 16 articles in the issue that aren't by Sokol have just vanished from discussion.

And the truth is? I think Ross et al are too cock-sure to believe they could be fooled -- and thus were fooled. And surely this does show that some more caution and care and attention are needed, at least in halls like those of SOCIAL (-climbing, thanks Ron) TEXT.

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

456. Marjorie Perloff
Re: POETICS Digest - 20 May 1996 to 21 May 1996
Wed 22 May 1996

Some further thoughts on Ross's apologia for the Social Text fiasco:

The crux of what I consider plain bad faith is Ross's sentence, "Sokal's article would have been considered sophomoric and outdated . . . had it come from a humanist or social scientist." But coming from a "scientist" it was deemed acceptable so that Social Text readers could see how "scientists" regard things.

How essentialist can you get? The very people who castigate those who say "Women think X but men think Y," or "Heterosexuals do X but gays do Y" are now assuming that there's an entity called "scientist" that "represents" a fixed point of view. Instead of judging the essay according to its argument, its originality, its interest, and so on, the editorical "collective" (read, board) thought they'd publish the article so that their readers might be exposed to that specimen known as scientist. It's a pretty frightening mode of thought...

Secondly, as to refereed journals. If indeed it is true that all ST essays are commissioned, what sort of "social text" is this? Where is the openness to other points of view? For whom is the journal produced? The silly designation "editorial collective" can't mask the authoritarianism and, yes, political correctness involved in such hokey operations.

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

457. Deirdre Kovac
Big Allis NYC Reading
Wed 22 May 1996

Just a last-minute reminder to those in New York to simultaneously support _Big Allis_ (and the Segue reading series) and hear a stellar string of poetry and more at the benefit/launch for the hot-off-the-press issue #7. Tomorrow.

Thursday 23 May
Segue
303 East 8th Street between B & C
7:30 P.M.
(will-yes-begin on time)
$3 suggested contribution
Big Allis #7 and back issues on hand

The current slate of anticipated readers/presenters: Hannah Weiner, Fiona Templeton, Anne Tardos, Juliana Spahr, Jena Osman (in absentia), Rod Smith, James Sherry, Gail Sher, Peter Seaton, Joan Retallack, Sianne Ngai, Melanie Neilson (reader and gracious host), Jackson Mac Low, Lori Lubeski, Deirdre Kovac, Michael Gottlieb, Elizabeth Fodaski, Jeff Derksen, Dorothy Trujillo Lusk (in absentia), Tina Darragh, Abigail Child, Rachel Careau, and Bruce Andrews.

While I'm here, would also like to plug next week's Segue reading, another not-to-be-missed event:

Heather Ramsdell & Garrett Kalleberg
Thursday 30 May
Segue
303 East 8th Street
7:30 P.M.
Free

This has been my first ever post, so do hope it has come through clear and in time.
Until Thursday,
Deirdre Kovac

↑ Index

458. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: fake book
Wed 22 May 1996

Sorry Burt! The "Burt Kimmelman writes" below was supposed to come after my bit and before Burt's stuff beginning "A quasi analog..."

Guess i faked it without even trying!

steve

> Burt Kimmelman writes:
>
> Well, speaking of parchment, I guess those de/composed fragments of Sappho have served as fake books for improvisations by Pound and others...
>
> steve
>
> A quasi analog to musical fake books is perhaps the old english manuscripts that showed the full elaboration of a stanza pattern including the refrain and any other repeating features, and then showed the other unique lines of successive stanzas--all done to save parchment that was precious.

> So how would this be fake? I don't know. Of course, thinking of parchment, one can't help but recall the whole delicious issue of the palimpsest--but now, we are perhaps straying beyond prosody and into purely textual/linguistic and/or philosophical matters.

↑ Index

459. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: fake science: reply
Wed 22 May 1996

Sorry, folks, i don't know where the Ross reply originally appeared. By the time it got to me the origin was lost in the vagaries of e-mail forwarding.

steve

Ursula Heise writes:

"I, too, would be interested to know where Ross' reply was printed. I understand that he will publish a reply to Sokal in the next issue of _Lingua Franca_."

↑ Index

460. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: fake science
Wed 22 May 1996

Alright Henry, i'll bite. Can you go into a bit more detail about Peirce's take on "the realist/nominalist distinction"?

steve

> Hope you'll all forgive me for harping on my hobbyhorse again, but I'm reading Peirce (that shd be clear by now) & can't get over how relevant it is to the Sokal flap. He sets up a philosophical position that not only grounds the realist/nominalist distinction (as I related to the dispute in earlier post) - he also debunks the arrogance of science (in scientism & positivism) which dominated the "philosophy of science" at the end of the 19th century. He was able to do this because he was one of those rare birds, a real philosopher coming out of a background in experimental science. His explorations in logic led to an architecture of meaning which describes nature's operations as "like a language"; which suggests a cosmic sentience or universal Mind not on theological claims (transcendentalism) but on observation of the workings of logic itself - a creative tripartite structure in which the "chance" subject is linked to a general "predicate" which has meaning in the context of the whole as "coming from the future" (a consensus of truth).

> Wish I could be more precise - I know how foggy this all sounds - but what I'm driving at is that Peirce revaluates some of these issues - the social construction of science, the relation of reality to our descriptions of it, and the relations between creative thinking in general both to chance and what can be termed "the true". And he does this in ways that can't be pigeon-holed as conservative, idealistic, positivistic, etc. He took care not to be pigeonholed by those who claimed him as their guide - Wm James & the pragmatists. It almost goes without saying that he was ostracized, attacked & ignored by the academic establishment of the time & died in poverty. There is the possibility of a philosophy of science which recognizes the "fallibilism" (Peirce's term) of socially and politically-textured knowledge without falling into either camp of "nominalist" relativism or its obverse twin, positivist empiricism. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

461. David Golumbia
Re: steakhouse
Wed 22 May 1996

And DB wrote:

> a faint reminder that before the current conceptualization of science was formed, that poets (yes POETS) were the folks who made the big scientifical discoveries, by expanding the perceptions of their audience through the author's unique linkage with the mysteries of nature.

Yes! Heraclitus was 1) poet or 2) scientist? I'm entranced by not being able to answer...

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

462. David Baratier
fakehaus
Wed 22 May 1996

DG asks what does this have to do with poetry? how bout the creation of a new word, or better yet:

"I'd like to think that writing poetry is a useful way to understand what our senses tell us, and so is science."

a faint reminder that before the current conceptualization of science was formed, that poets (yes POETS) were the folks who made the big scientifical discoveries, by expanding the perceptions of their audience through the author's unique linkage with the mysteries of nature.

David Baratier

↑ Index

463. Joe Amato
fake science...
Wed 22 May 1996

---

i'm really enjoying this thread... again, i wanna reiterate that, as i see it, ross shoulda simply admitted that he and the rest of his editorial board were bamboozled by sokol... i like to attribute good intention where i'm able, so i prefer to read ross's lapse---his convoluted justification (this my opine even after reading marjorie's, david's and ron's glosses on "unreferreed" etc.)---as owing to ross's commitment to cultural studies-ish agenda...

at the same time (as a former practicing engineer, just to authorize my own experience a tad), i feel the need to aver that there is damned good work being done from a cultural studies angle that addresses scientific and technological practice (both contemporary as well as historically remote)... sure, there are debates over same (witness, for example, helen longino's response to donna haraway's notion of "core narratives" from within a phil. of sci. perspective)... and, with alan and tom and ursula k. and ___, i share the view, which again has been debated for years now within sls, that the cultural/literary side of things should know its science ... much as i expect scientists to know their cultural studies...

but this again is where the problem lies: science as an arbiter of truth has a much more programmatic influence in our society (not to mention funding) than the humanities... this may not be what scientists or engineers intend (and for the moment, again, i'll refrain from distinguishing between scientists on the one hand and technological professionals on the other)... but it's painfully evident on my tech. campus who gets to say what, and how, and how much government monies---taxpayer dollars---support this power differential... which suggests that there are some institutional realities that need to be understood aright if one is to go about understanding how science and technology operate in practice...

it's not that american culture, for example, is 'un' or 'non-literary' as a direct result of scientific hegemony, or that scientists are operating, say, in a literary void, are uninfluenced by aesthetics etc... what's at stake here are the various ways that our institutions act to discourage scientific practitioners, as well as much of the public, from understanding just how intimately science and technology are bound up with social and cultural developments... and perhaps there would be some benefit to understanding, as well, the degree to which the humanities (broadly speaking) has often resisted the legislated primacy of more functional (even vocational) studies by sticking its collective heads in the sand...

so those who choose to explore the interconnections among (?) these domains are bound to find themselves in mixed company, so to speak... it's fraught terrain, punctuated by territorial struggles and anxieties... and practical jokes (like sokol's) aside, there's a certain need, as i see it, to try to speak in ways that promote dialogue, not division...

joe

↑ Index

464. henry gould
Re: formal continuum
Wed 22 May 1996

On Wed, 22 May 1996 11:50:10 CST David Baratier said:
>
> HG: I sent some journals to the Poetry Mission, let me know if you > recieved them.

Thank you in advance, David - that's wonderful. I'll be getting back to you when it arrives. And thanks to Jonathan Brannen, Luigi-Bob Drake, Walter Lew, and Tim Wood for your fine donations. I hope I haven't left anyone out. The Mission project is coming together - we added greatly to the library from a discount bksale at the mother of all small press poetry libraries, the Harris Collection at Brown - we are also negotiating with a new gallery in town for steady performance space. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

465. henry gould
Re: fake science
Wed 22 May 1996

Steven, I'm sure there's somebody better qualified on this list, but I'll do what I can re: Peirce & "nominalism/realism". Peirce went deeper into the study of logic & came up with more new insights on it than anyone in his time. He had a huge ambition to build an "architectonic" philosophy on the level of Aristotle or Kant. His studies in logic led him to the disputes of high scholasticism over the status of "universals". Are "universals" (general concepts, like "humanity") real - do they have a real existence beyond our verbal conceptualizations? Or is the universe made up of pure particularities? Realists claimed that our general concepts corresponded to some real general order to reality outside the mind;

nominalists called general concepts artificial "names" by which we order reality. These debates were taken to depths of great subtlety and nuance; as one commentator on Peirce put it, Duns Scotus (realist) and Occam (nominalist) were divided by the width of a hair. Peirce felt these issues pervaded worldviews into our own time; as I tried to summarize in earlier post, to a nominalist truth is relative to human language about it; to a realist our language is relative to the truth and must always be adjusted by experiment & experience. Peirces own "pragmaticist" way began as kind of a middle road between the two: his scientific training gave him a deep respect for "brute fact" and chance which counterbalanced any truth-claims that weren't backed up both by the logic of experiment and by human consensus; while his belief in a reality which corresponded to our abstract conceptions kept him out of both the British empiricist stream of skepticism (Hume et al.) and the scientific positivism which took its place. One of the fascinating things about Peirce is this combination of scientific humility & discipline with philosophical originality: his pragmatic-ideal-realism grew more subtle as he explored the logic of nature as a semiotic system. His final formulations of a definition of "truth" are careful in the extreme & map out the distinctions of which the debates about the social constructions (or constrictions) of knowledge, the limits of science, and the limits of Mind and causation are all taken into account. Peirce was recognized as a prescient thinker who foresaw developments in quantum theory & relativity; some commentators have noted close affinities between his work & that of physicist David Bohm 100 yrs later. In Peirce, the postmodern "social embeddedness" of science is further de-centered by an extremely stringent conception of what real knowledge consists of : it is predicated on meanings ("thirdness") operating on present understanding FROM THE FUTURE. There was no question for him, however, of which side he lands on in the realist/nominalist debate : the order (which includes chaos) of which we are a part exists outside of our present formulations of its meaning. For someone who believed in real general truths, pragmaticism was a way of escaping the pitfalls of both an unscientific idealism (Emerson) and a pseudo-scientific positivism. And it was all built on what he perceived as the creative logic of hypothesis.

The best intro to his bizarre career is by Joseph Brent -
"Charles Sanders Peirce: a life" (Indiana UP, 1993)
- Henry Gould

p.s. someone was talking on this thread about scientists-as-poets: Brent mentions that Peirce revered Poe; he discovers a lot of affinities between Peirce himself and Baudelaire, of all people.

↑ Index

466. Michael Boughn
Re: formal continuum
Wed 22 May 1996

> Henry Gould, Jordan Davis
>
> The word "Saussure" instigated the note. While I no longer have the original post, from memory I can assertain that the word appeared as a substitution and that I was focused on why "metrical meaning" was such an "obvious reference to Saussure" as compared to Blake, Wollstencraft, Pope, and anon previous practitioners. It wasn't the emphasis of metrical rhythm awareness that I found disturbing, but rather the methodology of attributing a particular philosopher with a discovery that an author metrically establishes for any acute reader to find.
>
> Be Well
>
> David Baratier

Just to clarify, the reference to Saussure was in regards to Annie Finch's basic structuralist thesis in _The Ghost of Meter_. It wasn't a "substitution", it was an attempt to indicate her debt to a line of thought that originates in Saussure's structuralist linguistics, especially her notion that metrical meaning arises (again, in some cases) out of differences within a structure, rather than as an identity of some particular rhythm and some particular transcendent meaning.

Peace, love, and good vibes,

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

467. David Baratier
Re: formal continuum
Wed 22 May 1996

Henry Gould, Jordan Davis

The word "Saussure" instigated the note. While I no longer have the original post, from memory I can assertain that the word appeared as a substitution and that I was focused on why "metrical meaning" was such an "obvious reference to Saussure" as compared to Blake, Wollstencraft, Pope, and anon previous practitioners. It wasn't the emphasis of metrical rhythm awareness that I found disturbing, but rather the methodology of attributing a particular philosopher with a discovery that an author metrically establishes for any acute reader to find.

Be Well

David Baratier

HG: I sent some journals to the Poetry Mission, let me know if you recieved them.

JD: I'll be reading for 45 minutes to an hour in Philly, fifteen in Bklyn. Your call. Backchannel me, theres more.

↑ Index

468. Burt Kimmelman
Re: fake book
Wed 22 May 1996

So, Steve, you weren't purposely trying "to fake-book" it in your misquote (misprision?)?

↑ Index

469. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: death in L.A.
Wed 22 May 1996

FYI -- for those who were inquiring about the death of Michael Taylor -- According to an article in yesterday's _LA Times_, both police and Taylor's friends believe that the people who killed Taylor were attempting to steal an expensive piece of radio equipment he had acquired while preparing to start up a micro-broadcasting station. Police suspect there may have been more people involved in the murder than the three suspects who have been arrested.

_____ FYI2 -- same _LA Times_ finally ran an article on the death, in Japan, of Johnny "Guitar" Watson -- took 'em long enough -- maybe they were shamed into by the obit. in New York -- Watson was a central figure in LA music for decades. In contrast, the same paper had a next day article on the death of an actor from the cast of _General Hospital_ --

↑ Index

470. henry gould
summa more peirce
Wed 22 May 1996

One more blip on why I think Sokal et al & Ross talking past each other & why philosopher on level of Bohm or Peirce is useful. Philosophy began with poetry & became a way of talking about cosmos in _everyday terms_ - common knowledge. This is important to remember. Science falls prey to positivism: i.e., "we don't need philosophy - we've got power". Leads to science jargon & techno-elite. If people think Social Text is jargon, try reading any advanced math book. If Sokal bases his judgement on the experimental method alone, he is certainly open to the postmodern critique & rightly so. Yet, on the other hand, I can hear Peirce looking at the whole gamut of postmodernism, post- structuralism, etc. etc. and saying: these are the nominalists of our day. To them, since the real is purely relative, a blank, we will "theorize" to our heart's content, without the messy trouble of evidence, proofs, logic, argument, etc... we'll go on sophistry alone. Note that this strain loves to wrap itself in the mantle of "poetry" - and with friends like this the scar's the delimit.

What's missing here is a philosophy which can make sense of knowing and unknowing, conscious & unconscious, slips and trips, mine & Thou(ght). Poets make nature second nature. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

471. Don Cheney
Re: chax books
Wed 22 May 1996

---------- Forwarded with Changes ----------
From: [redacted] at @UCSD
Date: 5/22/96 3:57PM
*To: [redacted] at @UCSD
Subject: Re: chax books

Carolyn

i was just reading Joko Beck's book "EVERYDAY ZEN" and your Barnes quote (One's life is particularly one's own when one has invented it.") reminded me of a quote from Joko's book (actually, she's quoting an anonymous zen teacher. It's the zen angle on what one's life is):

"Your life is none of your business."

Don
[redacted]

> On Wed, 22 May 1996, Jonathan Brannen wrote:
>
> if you're not already familiar with the work of Karen MacCormack (whose > > work deserves to be more widely known than I suspect it is), _Quirks & >

> Quillets_ is a worthy introduction.
>
> I second that motion. Has she published anything since _Quirks & Quillets_?
>
> Carolyn Guertin
> [redacted]
>
> "One's life is particularly one's own when one has invented it."
> -- Djuna Barnes, Nightwood

↑ Index

472. Jonathan Brannen
Re: chax books
Wed 22 May 1996

This is a product endorsement. The Mac Low, Duncan and Waldrop books are all beautiful examples of fine printing, as well as good reads, and these are bargain basement prices. The trade editions are all excellent. I don't wish to single out any one out of these books at the expense of the others but, if you're not already familiar with the work of Karen MacCormack (whose work deserves to be more widely known than I suspect it is), _Quirks & Quillets_ is a worthy introduction.

Best,
Jonathan

>3. Finally, Poetics List members may choose from the following list any 3 >books for $5 each, a savings of up to $10 per book. a $3 shipping/handling >charge will be added for orders of 3 books; however, no shipping charge will >be added for orders totaling $20 or more, including any combination of >orders from the following list, of the Mac Low book, and of the Duncan pamphlet.
>
>Kathleen Fraser, when new time folds up, 1993 >Norman Fischer, Precisely the Point Being Made, 1993 (co-published with O Books)
>Rosmarie Waldrop, Fan Poem For Deshika, 1993, (hand printed pamphlet) >Beverly Dahlen, A Reading 8 — 10, 1992
>Ron Silliman, Demo to Ink, 1992
>Eli Goldblatt, Sessions 1 — 62, 1991
>Sheila Murphy, Teth, 1991
>Karen Mac Cormack, Quirks & Quillets, 1991
>Charles Alexander, Hopeful Buildings, 1990
>Larry Evers and Felipe S. Molina, Wo’i Bwikam/Coyote Songs, 1990 >bp Nichol, art facts: a book of contexts, 1990

>
>
>
>Once again, please send orders directly to me at [redacted], or to the >address listed in the first part of this message.
>
>and thank you,
>
>Charles Alexander
>Chax Press
>
>

↑ Index

473. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: fake book
Wed 22 May 1996

Well, i dint think i was, but now that you mention it i've been getting more and more fascinated by how much of what we want to call "thinking" (w/ rationalist connotations) is actually unconscious (and this sort of loosely ties in to Henry's latest stuff on Peirce, or at least one small bit of it). So who knows--maybe i somehow meant to fake it all along? And, of course, i can't leave this question without the obligatory nod toward our medium here, and how it blurs both author-ization and intentionality. One tries, sort of, to construct stable entities out of all these floating names and addresses (the personalized "sig" as an attempt to stabilize the flux, carve out a little real estate w/ your name out front?), but it's so hard to remember "who" said what...

steve

"Burt""sez":

> So, Steve, you weren't purposely trying "to fake-book" it in your misquote (misprision?)?

↑ Index

474. c.g. guertin
Re: chax books
Wed 22 May 1996

On Wed, 22 May 1996, Jonathan Brannen wrote:

> if you're not already familiar with the work of Karen MacCormack (whose work deserves to be more widely known than I suspect it is), _Quirks & Quillets_ is a worthy introduction.

I second that motion. Has she published anything since _Quirks & Quillets_?

Carolyn Guertin
[redacted]

"One's life is particularly one's own when one has invented it." -- Djuna Barnes, Nightwood

↑ Index

475. Gabrielle Welford
Kani Xulam faces deportation & death (fwd)
Wed 22 May 1996

More joy in the world. Gab.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 22 May 1996 01:47:50 -1000
From: Berkeley Calif <[redacted]>
To: [redacted], [redacted], [redacted], [redacted], [redacted], [redacted], [redacted]
Subject: Kani Xulam faces deportation & death

AKIN internet administrator and burn.ucsd.edu client Kani Xulam faces deportation and certain execution in Turkey as a result of his effective human rights advocacy and his radical use of electronic media.

burn administrators and other IWW internet workers are extremely concerned about this situation, but our ability to formulate a response strategy is limited by our lack of more current information.

Please mail [redacted] if you know anything we don't.

American Kurdish Information Network (AKIN)

PRESS RELEASE #8

APRIL 16, 1996 - FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

TURKISH GOVERNMENT CONVINCES U.S. TO ARREST KURDISH ACTIVIST IN D.C.

In a bold move, trying to discredit the peaceful efforts of the American Kurdish Information Network (AKIN), the government of Turkey persuaded the U.S. State Department to seek the arrest of Kani Xulam, that group's respected spokesman in Washington, D.C.

Xulam has been advising members of Congress and the Administration of the atrocities perpetrated by Turkish armed forces in their destruction ofover 3,000 Kurdish villages, the murder of tens of thousands of civilians, and the forced relocation of millions. Turkey relies on U.S. military aidto enforce its denial of fundamental human rights to some 20 million Kurds.

Xulam comes from Turkish occupied Kurdistan, where he - as all other Kurds - was forbidden to use his native Kurdish language. Now, on the pretext of "passport fraud", the State Department initiated legal proceedings which resulted in Xulam's arrest last week and his appearance on Monday in U.S. District Court in Washington, D.C.

In an affidavit to the court, the State Department claimed that it had been informed by the government of Turkey that Xulam "may be a member" of a terrorist organization. Based on that allegation by a foreign power that seeks to silence Xulam, the federal magistrate detained him. Apparently, the government is afraid Xulam may flee the country and they want him held so that he can be deported.

Some twenty local human rights activists appeared to speak for Xulam's character and long time commitment to seek peaceful solutions to the present conflict between the Turkish armed forces and the Kurdish people. Among them were Kathryn Cameron Porter, President of Human Rights Alliance and wife of Rep. John Porter (R, IL.), Maryam Elahi of Amnesty International, and Sister Patricia Krommer of the Human Rights Foundation.

Although the AKIN offices in Washington, D.C. were searched and its papers rummaged, it is still operating and will continue to campaign for the rights of Kurds everywhere.

Ralph D. Fertig, Secretary of the Board of Directors of AKIN and a former federal administrative judge for the E.E.O.C. in Los Angeles, commented: "It is clear that these proceedings against Xulam are testimony to his effectiveness in alerting American public officials to the use of U.S. tax dollars to support and equip the Turkish government in its violation of basic human rights of the Kurds. Xulam is a dedicated pacifist, and his efforts have been used in the best American tradition of peacefully petitioning the U.S. government. Neither he nor his cause shall be silenced."

Respectfully,J. Azboy
Director

American Kurdish Information Network (AKIN)
2623 Connecticut Avenue NW #1
Washington, DC 20008-1522

The American Kurdish Information Network (AKIN) provides a public service to foster Kurdish-American understanding and friendship.

Tel: [redacted]
Fax: [redacted]

E-mail: [redacted]
Web: http://burn.ucsd.edu/~akin

↑ Index

476. Daniel Bouchard
Re: Kani Xulam faces deportation & death (fwd)
Wed 22 May 1996

Thanks for this post Gab.

[redacted]

↑ Index

477. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: fake science
Wed 22 May 1996

You've got me pretty damn interested in Peirce here. He's actually someone i've meant to check out for a long time (in the mental cardfile somewhere near Muriel Rukeyser's bio of the similarly crucial-but-neglected physicist Willard Gibbs). Anyway, there's no question these are still live issues. To shift the terms a bit, i sometimes feel everything is about the dialectic of "the ideal" and "concrete." On the latter side, here's something from the neuroscientist (and lucid explicator) Francisco Varela. He starts off by talking about the old-dominant top-down idealist approach to knowledge, then goes on to say:

There are strong indications that among the loose federation of sciences dealing with knowledge and cognition--the cognitive sciences--there is a slowly growing conviction that the picture is upside down, that a radical paradigmatic or epistemic shift is is rapidly developing. At the very center of htis emerging view is the belief that the proper units of knowledge are primarily concrete, embodied, incorporated, lived. This unique, concrete knowledge, its historicity and context, is not "noise" that occludes the brighter pattern to be captured in its true essence, an abstraction, nor is it a step toward something else: it is how we arrive and where we stay."

And another sample:

"There is considerable support for the view that brains are not logical machines, but highly cooperative, nonhomogeneous and distributed networks. The entire system resembles a patchwork of subnetworks assembled by a complicated history of tinkering, rather than an optimized system resulting from some clean unified design."

(from "The Reenchantment of the Concrete," in Zone 6)

Henry writes:

> Steven,
> I'm sure there's somebody better qualified on this list, but I'll do what I can re: Peirce & "nominalism/realism". Peirce went deeper into the study of logic & came up with more new insights on it than anyone in his time. He had a huge ambition to build an "architectonic" philosophy on the level of Aristotle or Kant. His studies in logic led him to the disputes of high scholasticism over the status of "universals". Are "universals" (general concepts, like "humanity") real - do they have a real existence beyond our verbal conceptualizations? Or is the universe made up of pure particularities? Realists claimed that our general concepts corresponded to some real general order to reality outside the mind; nominalists called general concepts artificial "names" by which we order reality. These debates were taken to depths of great subtlety and nuance; as one commentator on Peirce put it, Duns Scotus (realist) and Occam (nominalist) were divided by the width of a hair.
> Peirce felt these issues pervaded world-views into our own time; as I tried to summarize in earlier post, to a nominalist truth is relative to human language about it; to a realist our language is relative to the truth and must always be adjusted by experiment & experience. Peirces own "pragmaticist" way began as kind of a middle road between the two: his scientific training gave him a deep respect for "brute fact" and chance which counterbalanced any truth-claims that weren't backed up both by the logic of experiment and by human consensus; while his belief in a reality which corresponded to our abstract conceptions kept him out of both the British empiricist stream of skepticism (Hume et al.) and the scientific positivism which took its place. One of the fascinating things about Peirce is this combination of scientific humility & discipline with philosophical originality: his pragmatic-ideal-realism grew more subtle as he explored the logic of nature as a semiotic system. His final formulations of a definition of "truth" are careful in the extreme & map out the distinctions of which the debates about the social constructions (or constrictions) of knowledge, the limits of science, and the limits of Mind and causation are all taken into account.

> Peirce was recognized as a prescient thinker who foresaw developments in quantum theory & relativity; some commentators have noted close affinities between his work & that of physicist David Bohm 100 yrs later. In Peirce, the postmodern "social embeddedness" of science is further de-centered by an extremely stringent conception of what real knowledge consists of : it is predicated on meanings ("thirdness") operating on present understanding FROM THE FUTURE. There was no question for him, however, of which side he lands on in the realist/nominalist debate : the order (which includes chaos) of which we are a part exists outside of our present formulations of its meaning. For someone who believed in real general truths, pragmaticism was a way of escaping the pitfalls of both an unscientific idealism (Emerson) and a pseudo-scientific positivism. And it was all built on what he perceived as the creative logic of hypothesis.
>
> The best intro to his bizarre career is by Joseph Brent - "Charles Sanders Peirce: a life" (Indiana UP, 1993)
> - Henry Gould
>
> p.s. someone was talking on this thread about scientists-as-poets: Brent mentions that Peirce revered Poe; he discovers a lot of affinities between Peirce himself and Baudelaire, of all people.

↑ Index

478. Charles Alexander

Re: chax books

Wed 22 May 1996

> On Wed, 22 May 1996, Jonathan Brannen wrote:
>
> if you're not already familiar with the work of Karen MacCormack (whose work deserves to be more widely known than I suspect it is), _Quirks & Quillets_ is a worthy introduction.
>
> I second that motion. Has she published anything since _Quirks & Quillets_?
>
> Carolyn Guertin
> [redacted]

Yes, _Marine Snow_ came out in 1995, from ECW Press, and it's quite marvelous. ECW, I believe, is trying to gain distribution by SPD, but may not have such distribution yet. The address of ECW is 2120 Queen Street East, Toronto, Ontario M4E 1E2, Canada. The price is not printed on the book, so I can't tell you what it costs, Canadian or American.

Chax will be bringing out Karen Mac Cormack's _The Tongue Moves Talk_ in the fall of 1996. I'm sure I'll make some kind of announcement on the Poetics List, although keep in touch, please. We should be moved before that book comes out, so it's possible I won't have email or Poetics List connection for a while in late summer/early fall.

charles alexander
chax press
p.o. box 19178
minneapolis, mn 55417
usa

[redacted]

↑ Index

479. Pierre Joris
Re: chax books
Wed 22 May 1996

Re Karen Mac Cormack: yes, she has published a new book since "Quirks & Quillets," namely "Marine Snow," from ECW Press (1995). Also not to be forgotten are the books preceding Q&Q: "Quill Driver" (Nightwood Editions 1989) & "Straw Cupid" (Nightwood 1987). All of it, I think, lovely, lovely books - she keeps amazing & delighting me. -- Pierre

========== Pierre Joris | "Form fascinates
when one no longer has the force Dept. of English | to understand force from within itself. That SUNY Albany | is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | "Poetry is the promise of a language." email: | -- Friedrich Holderlin [redacted]|
==========

On Wed, 22 May 1996, c.g. guertin wrote:

> On Wed, 22 May 1996, Jonathan Brannen wrote:
>
> if you're not already familiar with the work of Karen MacCormack (whose work deserves to be more widely known than I suspect it is), _Quirks & Quillets_ is a worthy introduction.
>
> I second that motion. Has she published anything since _Quirks & Quillets_?

> Carolyn Guertin
> [redacted]
>
> "One's life is particularly one's own when one has invented it."
> -- Djuna Barnes, Nightwood

↑ Index

480. George Bowering
Re: Orioles
Thu 23 May 1996

> I'm just telling this pointless story to see if there are any other Orioles fans lurking on the elist...
>
> [redacted]

One hates the Orioles. I even hope that Alomar goes into a terrible slump; loved one game last week when I saw him make three bad plays.

.....
"the sunne
a good good mama
a very loud star"
--Anselm Hollo

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

481. Marjorie Perloff
Re Refereed Journals
Thu 23 May 1996

I agree that anonymous submissions (as in PMLA) are obnoxious but Ron, I wonder if you really mean what you're saying. I serve on a lot of editorial boards and, for instance, on CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE I think the process is extremely fair. All "refereed" means is that particular members of the board are sent an article to evaluate and their reports then go to the editors in chief. But I take it that Social Text doesn't even bother with that-- they just commission articles. Which means no one outside the little clique gets in. Do you really think that's optimal?

I think the best and liveliest journals are more open than that.

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

482. Rod Smith
Re: Ediots
Thu 23 May 1996

Just quick to note that I think Andrew Ross is WAY ok. He's the real thing-- & while I wouldn't go quite as far w/ the social constructivist stance as he does (few do)-- I think he has a great deal to say that should be listened to (paricualarly in _Chicago Gangster Theory of Life_ & as ed. of _Universal Abandon_).

The Sokal brooha is a media non-issue as most media issues are, the facile foolishness & complete lack of contextual acumen evinced by the "reporters" is deeply offensive-- whatever mistakes an academic might make at least most don't make the mistake of believing the New York Times (only slightly overstated rhetoric). It's also troubling the degree to which the media control the terms of conversation even here on our little corner of the debate-net.

I'm w/ Mr. Gould for a change on the Bohm/Peirce framing of the question. We cld take it back to Hegel as well, & then fast fwd to have him shake hands w/ Duchamp.

Big Allis publication party tonight (Thursday) at 7:30 Segue Space (303 E 8th, twixt B & C)-- yous New York area folks all com'n I hope.

Rod

↑ Index

483. Rod Smith
Re: Orioles
Thu 23 May 1996

> I'm just telling this pointless story to see if there are any other Orioles fans lurking on the elist...
>
> [redacted]

They're my team. However I will be offering TRADE CAL RIPKEN T-shirts to the list very soon.

R

↑ Index

484. Kevin Killian
Re: death in L.A.
Thu 23 May 1996

This is Kevin Killian speaking.

Aldon N wrote I think rather dismissively about the death of John Beradino--

> FYI2 -- same _LA Times_ finally ran an article on the death, in Japan, of Johnny "Guitar" Watson -- took 'em long enough -- maybe they were shamed into by the obit. in New York -- Watson was a central figure in LA music for decades. In contrast, the same paper had a next day article on the death of an actor from the cast of _General Hospital_ --

IMHO, Beradino was a great star and a figure of major cultural importance. Everyone knew he was in failing health and I'm sure the LA Times had a correspondent with very close connections to Cedar-Sinai where the stars die. He had to leave "General Hospital" in 1993 after thirty years, because he was sick. Soap opera fans and baseball fans all over the world are sad that he has died. Give him the dignity of his name now that he is dead. But Aldon, I understand why the disparity between the reportage of the two entertainers outrages you. Yet soap opera stars receive less respect even than the great guitar players of our day. Why is that? I think because their work is perceived as somehow effeminate, decadent, off the beat. Ephemeral. Unrelated to life.

↑ Index

485. Kevin Killian
Come In Spinner!
Thu 23 May 1996

This is Kevin Killian. This post is especially to our Australian and Kiwi correspondents, but please, I need help from all. Have any of you read "Come In Spinner!" by Dymphna Cusack & Florence James? I am thinking of writing about this book and would appreciate knowing if anyone knows of previous critical studies. I don't want to say what everyone else has already said without knowing it (God, what a sentence, but I hope you know what I mean). Thanks to all. XXX Kevin K.

↑ Index

486. Michael Boughn
Re: chax books
Thu 23 May 1996

> Yes, _Marine Snow_ came out in 1995, from ECW Press, and it's quite marvelous. ECW, I believe, is trying to gain distribution by SPD, but may not have such distribution yet. The address of ECW is 2120 Queen Street East, Toronto, Ontario M4E 1E2, Canada. The price is not printed on the book, so I can't tell you what it costs, Canadian or American.

Its ISBN is 1-55022-258-9 and the price is $12.00 Canadian (which, these days, must be about $3.00 US).

↑ Index

487. Bob Perelman
a)science b) self-promo
Thu 23 May 1996

a)

Can someone forward me Ross's response (or the whole of yesterday's listserv if that's easier)? I want to forward it to Howie Winant, sociologist at Temple, old Socialist Review friend of Ron's.

There are, Howie tells me, already jokes circulating around this issue. I.e.: when the editors realized they'd been had, they opened the twelfth story window, jumped out, and fell up.

The whole issue is fascinating & goes back a long way: Pythagoras, Lucretius, etc. But more 'recently', Wordsworth in one of the original avantgarde manifestos, "Preface to the Lyrical Ballads," makes a big deal about poetry as the more capacious and mobile form for scientific truths. A grandiose defensive hope that poetry will subsume science.

I agree with Marjorie about Ross's condescension & essentializing, which seems pretty clearly to come from defensiveness. Why not just say, "You got us?" and go on to the bigger issue, the huge chasms between the spheres of discourse? If the rhetorical sour notes in Ross's piece are overlooked, he does say some interesting things that point toward that problem, at least as I remember the piece. But the sour notes are sour, and the projection of sophomoric theorizing onto Sokal clearly bounces back onto Social Text: wasn't S's article saying that gravity was a construct?

Like I say, if anyone on the list could forward it to me, I'd appreciate it ([redacted])

b)

And speaking of attempts to unite spheres of discourse: I just got an advance copy of The Marginalization of Poetry: Language Writing and Literary History; they tell me it will be out in about a week. Cloth or paper (nice cover). Contains:

1) "The Marginalization of Poetry"--(revised) genre-cross-dressing poem

2) "Language Writing and Literary History"--group formation; collaboration; individual readings

3) "Here and Now on Paper: The Avant-Garde Particulars of Robert Grenier"--This 1; I HATE SPEECH; the oxymoron of avantgarde narrative; Pieces/Sentences; Transpiring etc

4) "Parataxis and Narrative: The New Sentence in Theory and Practice"--new sentence, Jameson's take, narrative issues, collage, Berrigan; Silliman / Hejinian; new sentence 'novels'

5) "Write the Power: Orthography and Community"--Bernstein; genre-wars; error & textuality; Brathwaite's nation-language

6) "Building a More Powerful Vocabulary: Bruce Andrews and the World (Trade Center)"--Andrews & and the attempt to shatter (literary) capital; identity poetics; Angelou's "Pulse of Morning"/"Pumice of Morons" (Coolidge & Fagin's OULIPO parody)

7) "This Page is My Page, This Page is Your Page: Gender and Mapping"--American male-gaze landscape poem, Frost, Stafford, & derivatives (Sharp-Implement School, in Rae Armantrout's phrase); the political maps of Ginsberg ("Wichita Vortex Sutra") & Ashbery ("Daffy Duck in Hollywood"); Watten's Progress as anti-map; women's non-nominalist maps: Dahlen A Reading, Susan Howe "Thorow", Armantrout Necromance, Harryman, In the Mode Of

8) "An Alphabet of Literary History"--signifying poems of & on literary history

9) "A False Account of Talking with Frank O'Hara and Roland Barthes in Philadelphia"--daily life, mortality, television, desire, poetic language, transcendental dirty jokes; poet & critic discuss these in dream narrative/short story format.

--

Well, this is too long already. But: Princeton wants a list of profs to contact about possible course-adoption. If anyone has any suggestions I'd appreciate it if you'd backchannel them. Thanks.

Bob Perelman

↑ Index

488. Joe Amato
Re: Re Refereed Journals
Thu 23 May 1996

---

i'm intrigued about this particular question of refereed vs. unrefereed... seems to me that, though no review is entirely 'blind,' a publishing enterprise can effect a significant over-the-transom result if it at least attempts some anonymity... i mean, i can't see as how partiality is necessarily wrong, but i also can't see as how impartiality (to whatever extent this is possible) can't be of some use either... depends on the editor(s), no?...

now as to how one goes about making such matters public, or what it means---ethically, say---to violate stated editorial policies---well, these seem to me to be somewhat different, if related, issues...

joe

↑ Index

489. David Kellogg
Re: Re Refereed Journals
Thu 23 May 1996

I have been following this thread with terrific interest. As a poet and critic who is currently teaching science writing and has served as the managing editor for a major scientific journal (the Journal of Neuroscience), I must agree with Marjorie: There's no substitute for a good peer referee process.

What can the humanities learn from the peer review proces in science? In my experience, the following:

For almost all scientific journals at least two written peer reviews are ALWAYS given. These reviews are generally timely (written within a month), extensive, and helpful. The typical form of such reviews is tripartite:

1) A summary of the submitted piece, showing that the reviewer knows what she's talking about;

2) A section of major critiques and suggestions; and

3) A list of minor critiques (reference errors, typos, etc.)

In the journal I worked for, readers were also asked to rate work on its quality and importance. (These numbered ratings were not given to the authors).

This kind of peer reviewing is quite standard in scientific journals: if the review process isn't followed properly, nobody is well served and the history is lost.

My experience with humanities journals is much more mixed. Some essays have been very thoroughly reviewed, which I appreciate. Some reviews have been cursory at best. I have had one essay accepted by a "peer-reviewed" journal over email, with no suggestions for revision at all. I wrote back to the editor saying, didn't somebody have some constructive suggestion? He said no, they just thought it should be published as is. I would like to think this reflected the quality of my argument, but I honestly believe it was more indicative of a shoddy review process.

I must also point out that while the best science journals typically tell authors the disposition of a manuscript WITHIN A MONTH (at J. Neurosci. there were the following possibilities: reject, reject w/ encouragement to resubmit, revise and re-review, revise without re-review, and accept (a virtual impossibility on the first go-round)), even the best humanities journals (excluding house-journals like PMLA -- a different topic) may wait THREE OR FOUR MONTHS before the author hears a peep.

Sorry, I'm griping. But I do think that Sokal -- though he's acted despicably and doesn't understand the cultural study of science -- puts his finger on a real problem in the humanities review process.

One thing the humanities could do is follow science's lead and make peer reviewing one of those things you count for tenure.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

Now there was a man with a conscience, willing to put his learning at the service of the oppressed --

↑ Index

491. John Lavagnino
Re: Re Refereed Journals
Thu 23 May 1996

I wonder how well the peer-review process as it works in science applies to humanities scholarship. We don't have quite the same level of shared assumptions about what any particular field is, what important work is, and how it ought to be expressed. Any well-known scholarly journal in our field has ideas about what they want to publish that go well beyond straightforward questions of field, quality, and importance; or perhaps it's better to say that quality and importance are defined in very different ways by different journals.

When I think of peer-review horror stories I've heard that related to the humanities, they generally have to do with work being dismissed, directly and without supporting argument, as not being serious humanities scholarship. And, in the case of any particular journal, it's certainly easy to think of many approaches, subjects, or writers that just wouldn't be acceptable. (The other main focus of these horror stories is long delays, and generally the slothful rudeness that is so common in the academic humanities, as David Kellogg rightly points out.) Horror stories that have come to me about peer review in the sciences have turned on deliberate obstruction with commercial motivation, and involve cases that ended in lawsuits. (Scientific fields may be more objective, but there are also large amounts of money at stake in some of them.)

We also read humanities journals, we don't just refer to them. We don't have any journals like the Physical Review, which runs to a yard or so of shelf space for one year; nobody reads it, you just glance at the subset of articles covering your own little field. Andrew Ross's account of deliberations at Social Text points out one thing that's true about many humanities journals: you don't just take the top twenty best articles each year, you select articles in part because they fit together.

In the Social Text case, you can certainly question the stated justification for the editors' publication of an article they thought was weak---I also find it condescending; but you can't plausibly claim that these people don't know cultural studies and couldn't judge that aspect of the article. (Everyone talks in the popular press about how the article was obvious nonsense, but most people outside the world of literary studies would have the same reaction to any article that has ever appeared in Social Text.) What opens them to ridicule is publishing something that claims some kind of scientific support or connection for these postmodern themes, when the science in the article was (we're told) bogus. An outside reviewer from the world of physics could have given them some idea of whether the physics made any sense or not, and generally if you're going to publish interdicsiplinary work you really ought to seek advice on fields you don't know anything about.

John Lavagnino
Women Writers Project, Brown University

↑ Index

492. David Golumbia
Re: Re Refereed Journals
Thu 23 May 1996

David Kellogg wrote:

> virtual impossibility on the first go-round)), even the best humanities journals (excluding house-journals like PMLA -- a different topic) may wait THREE OR FOUR MONTHS before the author hears a peep.

I count three or four months as a good response. I can't even count the number of times I've waited six, 8, 12, 18 months, & then had the most bizarre reactions from the journals -- all the way from "we're accepting it and by the way we need the proofs by tomorrow why won't you call us back right away," this more than 2 years after initial submission -- to one-line rejection sentences. One of the least professional parts of "professional" life I've encountered. My favorite thing is the number of times journals lose essays mailed to them -- I count on no better than a 75% chance of a journal actually receiving a piece (& have had them "lost" or "never received" at least six times, including SOCIAL TEXT itself!) -- never had a credit card payment lost in the mail yet though!

And then we could talk about edited volumes (too bad Maria's offline).

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

493. David Golumbia
Re: Re Refereed Journals
Thu 23 May 1996

Come to think of it, David K's suggestion that peer reviewing count toward tenure (but aren't there "peers" who aren't tenure-track professors??) is interesting. But also disturbing. As Steve Fuller hinted in his letter to the Times today, there is a relatively astounding lack of professional standards throughout the humanities. I mean, it'd be nice to reward profs for being reviewers; but it'd be even nicer if they already reviewed in a timely and thoughtful way, considering that it's a relatively clear part of their professional duties (that is, if they've accepted the role as reviewer on a journal in the first place).

Whoops! I'm gripin' too.

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

494. Don Cheney
Re: death in L.A.
Thu 23 May 1996

---------- Forwarded with Changes ----------
From: [redacted] at @UCSD
Date: 5/23/96 8:25AM
*To: [redacted] at @UCSD
Subject: Re: death in L.A.

Here, here, Kevin!

I have an old black and white photo of my mom with John Beradino walking a picket line together (i think in front of ABC-TV, Los Angeles). I always thought he was cool just because of walking the lines in support of what must have been an electrical workers strike (as my dad was vp of the IBEW in Hollywood at that time (late 1960's)).

thanks Kevin, i didn't know that that was who Aldon was referring to.

Don Cheney

This is Kevin Killian speaking.

Aldon N wrote I think rather dismissively about the death of John Beradino--

> FYI2 -- same _LA Times_ finally ran an article on the death, in Japan, of Johnny "Guitar" Watson -- took 'em long enough -- maybe they were shamed into by the obit. in New York -- Watson was a central figure in LA music for decades. In contrast, the same paper had a next day article on the death of an actor from the cast of _General Hospital_ --

IMHO, Beradino was a great star and a figure of major cultural importance. Everyone knew he was in failing health and I'm sure the LA Times had a correspondent with very close connections to Cedar-Sinai where the stars die. He had to leave "General Hospital" in 1993 after thirty years, because he was sick. Soap opera fans and baseball fans all over the world are sad that he has died. Give him the dignity of his name now that he is dead. But Aldon, I understand why the disparity between the reportage of the two entertainers outrages you. Yet soap opera stars receive less respect even than the great guitar players of our day. Why is that? I think because their work is perceived as somehow effeminate, decadent, off the beat. Ephemeral. Unrelated to life.

> -- Saved internet headers (useful for debugging)
> Received: from UCSD.EDU by mail.ucsd.edu; id IAA15393 sendmail 8.6.12/ UCSD-2.2
> Received: from listserv.acsu.buffalo.edu (listserv.acsu.buffalo.edu [128.205.7.
> Received: from listserv.acsu.buffalo.edu (listserv.acsu.buffalo.edu [128.205.7.
> Received: from UBVM.CC.BUFFALO.EDU by UBVM.CC.BUFFALO.EDU (LISTSERV release > Received: from UBVM (NJE origin [redacted]) by UBVM.CC.BUFFALO.EDU (LMail > Received: from moon.sirius.com by UBVM.cc.buffalo.edu (IBM VM SMTP V2R3) with > Received: from [205.134.228.62] (ppp062-sf2.sirius.com [205.134.228.62]) by > X-Sender: [redacted]
> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"
> Message-ID: <v01520d00adc9c140f205@[20
> Date:
> Reply-T
> Sender: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]
> From: Kevin Killian <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: death in L.A.
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS

↑ Index

495. Don Cheney
Here, Kevin!
Thu 23 May 1996

---

sorry kevin

i didn't mean to write "Here, here, Kevin" as if you were a pet or something.

i meant HEAR, HEAR!

don [redacted]

↑ Index

496. David Baratier
Re: refereed
Thu 23 May 1996

DK & DG

In terms of submissions my experience has been similar just goes to show
there is only one thing you can be sure of a literary journal accepting in each submission whether 6 by 9 or business sized large or small checks

David Baratier

↑ Index

497. David Ayre
KSW Events for June, 96
Thu 23 May 1996

```
***********************************
* The Kootenay School of Writing  *
* Vancouver B.C., Canada          *
* EVENTS FOR JUNE 1996            *
*                                 *
* email: [redacted]               *
* www: http://www.wimsey.com/~ksw *
* 112 West Hastings               *
* Vancouver B.C. V6B 2G8          *
* [redacted]                      *
***********************************
```

The Kootenay School of Writing is extremely pleased to host a reading of new work from Vancouver writers:

jam. ismail & Lisa Robertson
June 1st : Saturday : 8:00 pm : Admission $4/$5

jam. ismail is the author of sexions (1984) and co-author with artist Jamelie Hassan of the collaborative bookwork JAMELIE*JAMILA PROJECT (Presentation House Gallery, 1992), She has been featured in the journals Contemporary Verse, Capilano Review and Canadian Literature, the anthology Many-Mouthed Birds: Contemporary Writing by Chinese Canadians (Douglas & McIntyre, 1991) and Ankur magazine. She currently divides her time between Hong Kong and Vancouver.

Poet and art critic Lisa Robertson is the author of XEclogue (Tsunami Editions, 1993), Earth Monies (Lounge, 1995) and The Apothecary (Tsunami Editions). She has been published in West Coast Line, Raddle Moon, Capilano Review and most recently in the feminist journal Tessera and in the British anthology Out of Everywhere: an anthology of linguistically innovative writing from women from the U.K. and North America (Reality Street Editions).

The Kootenay School of Writing is a non-profit artist run center operated collectively by working writers. For 11 years KSW has offered the varied literary communities of B.C. readings, workshops, and talks that challenge and motivate critical enquiry into the ways and means of language.

Visit Our Web site ! ------> http://www.wimsey.com/~ksw
Join our Email mailing list ! --> http://www.wimsey.com/~ksw/maillist.htm

The Kootenay School of Writing
[redacted]
112 WEST HASTINGS
v6b 2g8
Canada

↑ Index

498. David Ayre
KSW Events for June, not May
Thu 23 May 1996

Sorry for any confusion... the subject header of my last message should have read Events for JUNE, and not May....

Lisa Robertson and jam. ismail are reading on June 1st,
Saturday, 8:00 pm at KSW.....

↑ Index

499. George Bowering
Re: Re Refereed Journals
Fri 24 May 1996

I'm sorry, but this is one of those times upon which I have to disagree with Marjorie. Maybe it is because I am more interested in writing than in scholarly criticism, but my experience with literary / critical journals over too many decades to be cheerful about, is that the more interesting writing has come from journals that are cranky, perhaps, run by devotees rather than committees, have an exe to grind, and last a lot shorter time that PMLA. I dont think that Pound's essays, or Williams's, or Stein's, would ever have passed a group of referees. Yet essays full of brain-numbing jargon do so every quarter. When referees read refereed articles (and yes, I have been a referee), they tend to favour something no more interesting than their own articles.

.....
"the sunne
a good good mama
a very loud star"
--Anselm Hollo

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

500. Ron Silliman
Ref them journals
Fri 24 May 1996

Marjorie,

I haven't been as articulate as I would like to have been. I don't think that the issue with journals is or should be one of fairness, but rather one overall of providing the greatest value to the reader -- and that I would argue can only come from a journal that presents a distinct point of view. It almost doesn't matter whether it comes from a clique (as in Social Text, SAQ, or the journal Bill Luoma likes to call Reputations) or a single person (Clayton Eshelman, say, or even Bly in The Fifties and Sixties, or Corman in Origin, or Bernstein & Andrews in L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E or or or...). And, having worked on Socialist Review, it's not that I'm setting myself off as any better than anyone whose worked in a collective editorial process, regardless of the method. But publications like Contemporary Literature are ultimately lowest-common-denominator ventures. It's built into their structure.

I never will buy a magazine because it has just one article that I'm interested in -- and almost by definition, publications like CL never will have two, so I end up never reading them. Give me Mirage #4/Period(ical) any day of the week. I always know that Kevin and Dodie will give me several things worth reading--and often from people whose names I don't know or recognize (yet). In the long term, that's where the value is -- and it's the likes of Kevin and Dodie who should be getting the insitutional subsidies to make their work easier.

But, as a few folks have noted, there is more than a mere discursive difference between cultural publications and ones in the "hard" sciences. I wouldn't want Andrew Ross operating on my heart!!

All best,

Ron

P.S., hey, I like the Orioles, though I think it's time that Cal Jr. think about switching to third or even (a la Ernie Banks) to first. And (to complete the threading of current topics) Johnny Berardino, as he was called when he played in the majors, used to be with the Orioles' predecessor St. Louis Browns. He was their starter from '39 to '42 and then again after he returned from the war in '46. His best year was probably 1940, when he hit 16 home runs and drove in 85 RBI. He was a shortstop in some years, second baseman in others and, after '46, was pretty much a utility player. Batted and threw right handed. Lifetime BA. of .249. I saw one obit that referred to him as "leading the Cleveland Indians to their one World Series victory but he only played 66 games in 1948, batting just .190. Typical "good hands" infielder, sort of what you look for in a surgeon, no?

↑ Index

501. Mark Roberts

AWOL: Leith Morton & Philip Hammial in Japan (fwd)

Fri 24 May 1996

> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Date: Thu, 23 May 1996 11:31:25 +1000
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (awol)
> Subject: AWOL: Leith Morton & Philip Hammial in Japan
>
> The following information has been posted by AWOl on behalf of the organisers of the two readings in Japan. Please address any enquiries to [redacted]. Our thanks to OzLit for the information about these readings.If you haven't visited the OzLit site their URL is http://www.vicnet.net.au/~ozlit/
>
> **********
>
> May 24 & May 30
>
> Poetry readings in English and Japanese by the Sydney poet , Philip Hammial and the Newcastle poet, Leith Morton, will be held in Japan on 24 and 30 May. The first reading will be at the International Research Centre for Japanese Studies (Nichibunken), where Leith Morton is a visiting professor, in Kyoto; while the second reading will be at the Australian Embassy in Tokyo. In addition to the readings, talks will be given at several universites in Japan on contemporary Australian poetry by the two poets. A number of meetings have also been arranged with contemporary Japanese poets to discuss Australian and Japanese poetry. The readings have been organized with the financial assistance of the Literature Fund of the Australia Council for the Arts, Nichibunken and the Australian Embassy in Tokyo. Contact Leith Morton at the email [redacted] for more information.
>
> AWOL
> Australian Writing On Line
> [redacted]

> http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
> PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
> Phone 61 2 7475667
> Fax 61 2 7472802

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

502. Mark Roberts
Re: Come In Spinner!
Fri 24 May 1996

> This is Kevin Killian. This post is especially to our Australian and Kiwi correspondents, but please, I need help from all. Have any of you read "Come In Spinner!" by Dymphna Cusack & Florence James? I am thinking of writing about this book and would appreciate knowing if anyone knows of previous critical studies. I don't want to say what everyone else has already said without knowing it (God, what a sentence, but I hope you know what I mean). Thanks to all. XXX Kevin K.

Kevin

I haven't actually read the book (but I have seen the mini series!!) if you like I could post you enquiry to the Auslit discussion group and forward any responses.

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

503. Navdeep Dhillon
Poetics Mailing List FAQ
Fri 24 May 1996

Does anyone know if there is a FAQ for this list, or another similar list. If so, any information on where it's locate is appreciated.

Thanks in advance,
Navdeep Dhillon

↑ Index

504. Chris Stroffolino
Re: KSW Events for June, 96
Fri 24 May 1996

david ayre----so, do you know whwere lisa robertson's new book LOUNGE can be gotten from? thanks, chris

↑ Index

505. Mark Wallace
refereed, non-refereed?
Fri 24 May 1996

Of course, there's no such thing as a non-refereed journal, there are simply different types and degrees of refereeing. At the very least, SOMEONE had to agree to accept a given piece, even if they didn't read it.

But I don't think the issue is whether one imaginative editor can accept more risky work than a committee, or that a committee allows for more thorough reading of a text. Instead, I think the issue has to do with the POLITICS of contemporary humanities publishing. I think Ron Silliman is right about the value of imaginative editors, given our current environment, at least to the extent that many of the most insightful essays on contemporary poetics will not appear inside a normative academic publishing environment. Why? Charles Bernstein's recent essay "Tone Lock" has the answers to that question, and I hope that he'll forward that essay to the list, or tell people where it's otherwise available.

The essential point of Charles' essay, which he can make more eloquently than I can, is that contemporary "refereed" journals allow, with very few exceptions, for only one kind of critical TONE--that of the dispassionate, objective, scientific "observer"--and this is usually true no matter how much the critic in question would critique any of the above terms. That is, it's not simply that contemporary referreed journals publish "experts," but that there is a language that expertise must speak in order to be considered expertise. As long as that is true, the most interesting articles will be published by journals who can exist outside the "refereed" environment, that is, outside an environment that is not value-free and chooses the most interesting articles, but rather is an environment that determines in advance that one tone, and one tone only, is proper for the expert.

Of course, there are exceptions which make the issue more complicated. Boundary 2 used to publish a variety of interestingly "alternative" format essays until its original editor, the vastly underrated William Spanos, passed it along to the slick and professional emptiness of Paul Bove. Before that, all sorts of things used to happen in Boundary 2. And another area of exceptions is that people like Charles Bernstein, who have acquired enough "cultural capital" that they HAVE to be listened to by people who would prefer to ignore them, often do get to publish alternative format essays in "refereed" (read: TONE LOCKED) journals. But from my own firsthand experience, Charles' work is often not taken seriously as criticism precisely because people look at the alternative format of his work and so "oh, he's just a poet"--i.e. he succeeds in writing against the grain at the cost of being considered an "expert" at all in many normative academic environments.

For my own money, the most interesting poetics essays in recent years have all been published in journals that exist outside the refereed environment--Chain, Talisman, Witz, Poetic Briefs, Lower Limit Speech, Aerial, Taproot, many others. Essays in those journals are often looser and sloppier, I'll admit, than those essays in the standard refereed journals. But in challenging the normative criteria of tone-locked academic journals, they do provide an environment in which criticism can remain engaged on the level of TONE, as well as being not totally chained to the variety of limitations that such tone-lock creates for critical thinking. Of course, there's no doubt that excellent articles on poetics do appear in academic journals, but they nonetheless always seem pretty coercively standardized.

At Poetic Briefs, and with Leave Books, having a group editorial staff never harmed our ability to publish even the most extreme critical texts--we weren't beholden for our money to the current standardized practices of academic criticism.

The Leave Books publication A POETICS OF CRITICISM, still available I believe from SPD, features a variety of critical essays (of varying degrees of success, I'll grant) that do not have the standard form of critical essays and nonetheless are being put forward as criticism. There is almost not a single essay in that collection that could have been published in a refereed journal, which is proof, I think, that more needs to be done to challenge the control that tone lock has over what supposedly constitutes successful critical thinking.

So what's at stake here is not whether one person is better than a committee, but rather the politics of critical practice--that is, the problem of who controls the resources and puts forth the standards for what counts as "acceptable" critical practice.

Mark Wallace

↑ Index

506. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: eniacs
Fri 24 May 1996

I normally would agree with Rid that Andrew does good work, etc. -- BUT, if what he says in the first two paragraphs of his response is an accurate reflection of the real discussion among the editorial board of his journal, then the journal should damn well go out of business -- How can anyone justify publishing an article that they believe is inadequate (meanwhile, I prseume, rejecting any number of quite interesting and well-constructed unsolicited essays [try "presume"] from non-physicists) is beyond me --

On the other hand, I cannot understand why blind editorial review should be considered obnoxious -- If it were not for blind review (the VERY FEW places where the blindness is real, and not an editorial fig leaf) those of us who do not happen to have gone to graduate school with the editors would be out in the cold forever --

Take a gander, by the way, at the list of people who got tenure track jobs in English departments that appears in the back of the same issue of _Lingua Franca_ -- The message this list seems to convey to prospective grad. students is that you'd better go to one of the big power schools like UCLA or Yale if you want to get a job when you graduate --

Rod, sorry about that "Rid" -- and to everybody, sorry about the grammar above -- can't use cursor keys to back up and make corrections -- whoever designed the interface between DOS and MAC applications for e-mail must have been malicious or stupid --

employed and blindly yours,
a.l.nielsen

↑ Index

507. Keith Tuma
Re: Ref them journals
Fri 24 May 1996

I think it's true that journals like Contemporary Literature don't have a distinct point of view--agreeing with Ron Silliman here--but I don't think it's at all true that a lowest common denominator is "built into" their structure. If we consider refereed journals not one at a time but within something like the profession of literary or cultural studies as a whole, it's rather hierarchy or structured conformity that is the end result. Such and so--say our own Alan Golding--will typically be sent articles on contemporary American poetry by the editors of CL, and they will largely defer to his review. Now Alan's own articles--for CL but especially for another journal with a little more so-called prestige (say Critical Inquiry)--will be refereed by somebody else who's been around a little longer, who's a little higher in the academic pecking order. Say our own Marjorie Perloff for instance. (Not that Critical Inquiry cares much for contemporary poetry anymore, or that Marjorie actually reads for them.) By the time you get to Harvard UP there's relatively few people being asked to referee manuscripts. These are the people who've been around longest, have the biggest reputations etc. At the top of the heap there's--oh I don't know, say Harold Bloom or Helen Vendler--sitting behind the screen like the Wizard of Oz. Now this pyramid figure I'm sketching is overly simplistic--there are actually many pyramids and more freedom of circulation and movement within them than such a caricature suggests. And what some might call conformity here (the results of the profession's referee- structure) others would call standards. Distinct or idiosyncratic points of view do tend to have their edge removed by such a power-structure but not because a lowest common denominator rules but rather a particular set of (more or less questionable) standards, methodologies, and interests. Such power structures seek to perpetuate themselves, though they also require contestation and change. It used to be one of the functions of non-professional journals like Sulfur to whack away at these orthodoxies but given the hyper-specialization of the humanities and arts today I'm not sure that that's happening very much, or rather that anyone not already predisposed to read Sulfur (or other similarly-edited journals) is paying much attention. On the other hand we do have people like Marjorie--who must be asked to review a thousand manuscripts a year--moving between zones in a useful way. Sorry--all this could be clearer. I'm sympathetic to Ron's point, but I can't accept this "lowest common denominator" formulation. And in comparing L=A=N=G=U=A=G-E and Contemporary Literature we're also comparing apples and kiwi. Both of 'em necessary in a healthy diet.

banalities for a friday afternoon,
Keith Tuma

↑ Index

508. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: death and the times in LA
Fri 24 May 1996

---

no dismissal intended, sorry if some felt -- All I was getting at was that if one works in television, the LA TIMES will take notice -- whereas should one devote decades to working in the black music community of LA, as opposed, say, to getting paid for def jam, they;ll take their bloody time getting around to you --

↑ Index

509. Jordan Davis
blindness and inside
Fri 24 May 1996

Please forgive me riding my hobby-horse

So then an end
is to include the poem in the poem

Is that possible or even desirable

Are we meant to figure out the criteria for possibility
Or are we arguing out of necessity

Is this side of things about definite v indefinite
as opposed to the popular idea that it is about object v subject

What is it you are saying about this politic

--Jd

↑ Index

510. Bill Luoma
Re: Soaps
Fri 24 May 1996

Kevin,

You are right to point out that baseball players are huge soap fans.

Thank you for your support.

Bill

↑ Index

511. Robert J Wilson

free fall of Social Text/"slick professional b2"

Fri 24 May 1996

A Few Banalities and Animadversions from Hawaii

Some of you may have read the essay by Bruce Robbins in a recent Social Text (45, Winter 1995) called "Some Versions of U.S, Internationalism" in which Bruce Robbins (Andrew Ross's co-editor at the ST "Editorial Collective") tried to map out the cultural-politica differences of globalization/localization tactics ("adversarial internationalism") of four differently situated U.S. cultural studies journals-- Diaspora, boundary 2, Social Text, and Public Culture in that order-- and re-ground these tactics in the US geopolity/state/civil society domains of discourse-production.

Such a push to draw a 'cognitive map'for the emerging collective vision of each journal was helpful and cautionary, especially for one such as myself who has attempted since 1989 as 'advisory editor' to push b2 into "Asia/Pacific" reaches and to pressure the local resistance/local poetics in any globalization visions of capitalist restructuration.

While I found Bruce's overall vision of 'transnational capital' rather appallingly user-friendly and overforgiving, and his reading of the quasi-Marxist globalism of b2 off the mark re what he took to be its Euroamerican rationalism cum 'romanticization of the local' as site of contemporary resistance (thus getting the global/local dialectics of b2 wrong on both counts), I was startled at how he explained and justified (trumping b2 as it were) the cultural politics and commodity-culture rooted populism of Social Text (in its contemporary moment), with one ear tuned to the streets and the other to the capitalist poetics of the corporate board room as he said.

Robbins explained the political edge of the "culturalism" of Social Text in the following terms (p.102): "as one instance of what has been called culturalism, it tries to colonize and assimilatate authoritative discourses that claim not to be culture by identifying them as cultural constructs and revealing the social interests hidden behind them, as the titular notion of the social-as-text suggests." As an embrace of 'popular culture,' furthermore, ST turns against entrenched hierarchies, escpecially of expertise-guarding elites. I have no problem with the latter tactic, but I am startled by the 'colonizing' reach of this ST 'culturalism' into and across all domains of knowledge and into the very subatomic reaches of understanding and the real as such. Do we want such an over-extended "culturalism"? What kinds of practics and values and discourses will such a vision generate: an "antifoundationalism" towards what (neopragmatic/liberal US ends)?

Shaking the foundations of professional expertise at and around ST, Sokol is now accused of having written a sophomoric 'fraud' and having violated the very professional ethics and professional decorums that sustain such expertise knowledge communities (Stanley Fish,predictably, in his Oped take-out so-called Sokol piece); but what the NYU professor of physics has actually written is not so much 'fraud' as a parodic miming of the pomo cult codes (some of his footnotes are pretty hilarious) and a sending up of an over-extended 'culturalism' colonizing domains of reality/history/material production and reproduction where it may just fall apart or become wishy-washy and inadequate.

That ST editors ex post facto can now claim (via AR on WWW) that they knew all along it was a 'sophomoric' piece of cultural studies by a naive scientist; that ST is never 'refereed' (what is the in-house critical collective but a set of primary discrimination makers of the in/out, enacting [sure, informally] the rules for what passes as any "Social Text" text); and that the Sokol essay was going to be dropped from the expanded book edition at Duke UP (this would be an unusual post facto decision to make, as Duke UP usally runs all the essays and whatever else the editors choose to add from its journals "special issues," within space limits of course), sounds like more critical two-step shuffle to me: why not admit to having been deceived and worked from the insights and struggles of that moment? Sure, it's a postmodern black hole now: That a pro-Sandinista physicist can be embraced as an ally by Rush Limbaugh on right-wing talk radio and be stimulated by the "Higher Superstion" faction of anti-pc-construction science to write such a piece just plays into the spectacle of media reductions-- some at b2 have suggested this will only drive up the subscription lists of ST and generate more cultural capital and "science war" discourse for the players (if they don't fall or leap from NYU windows and fall upward, "deconstructing postmodern gravity, slyly") and the press.

Despite this Ross/Sokol fiasco, ST remains an inventive and important cultural studies journal; it has provided timely critiques of 'postcolonial discourse' machine and affiliated itself with domains of popular culture and transnational critique we need to know of in NYC to Seoul. Ross, eg, has done astonishing work on the cooptation of local Pacific culture in Hawaii by the Polynesian Cultural Center (Mormon "culturalism") and the political ambiguities of Hawaiian sovereignty struggle in "Chicago Gangster Theory of Life: Nature's Debt to Society." But Sokol has, I think, caught Ross and the ST "Star Wars" discourse apparatus in an over-extension of their 'culturalism,' miming the codes in devious simulacrous ways that reflect and refract where the journal is philosophically at. As somebody has said, under such pressure, the "subject position" is oozing into "position(s)."

boundary 2 is no set of holy rollers, to be sure, and the "critical collective," post-Spanos, practices its own methods of inclusion/exclusion and discursive maneuverings on US academic turf: I will say that, since the editorship of Paul Bove, each submission is screened initially by him, sent out to another reader on the critical collective, and, if the interest is there given two or three reader's hard-hitting reports to suggest ways to revise and strengthen. Hard stories on rejections/omissions/sins of commission may abound still. But "special issue" prjects (such as forthcoming one to be edited by Charles Bernstein, like one in the past and another by Arif Dirlik on "Postmodernity in China") enact ways to cut across in-house boundaries and knowledge domains of areas/disciplines/ professional expertise.

The b2 editorial collective is not perfect, to be sure, but it remains "Gramscian" at core in the ongoing and multi-sited attempt to forge a counter-hegemony to the injustices and imperfections of capitalism in its colonizing transnational/local reach.

The St fiasco should give us pause on how such journals procede and what, in truth and trope, they finally stand for inside/against US "collective" struggle.

Rob Wilson

↑ Index

512. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: refs
Fri 24 May 1996

Many departments DO, in fact, "count" work as a journal ref., but rather modestly, under the heading of professional service -- I'm not sure I'd want to see it go much farther than that -- do we really want tenure committeess passing judgement on the quality of the work we do passing judgement?

Bigger problem to me is how these groups of refs. are constituted in the first place -- Too often winds up, yet again, being a list of the editors' friends rather than any kind of systematic attempt to convene scholars who are doing important work in whatever field -- This is particularly a problem if the work you do opens up new areas (new only to critics, I hasten to add) -- for example -- when I write about avant garde black poets -- my work is typically sent to some freind of an editor who is "in" African-American literature, but who hasn't read three poems in the last year -- OR to some "specialist" in poetry, who hasn't read any poetry by black writers (perhaps excepting Brathwaite & Brooks?!?) post WWII --

It's NOT that there are too few scholars working with this poetry; it IS that too few editors can trouble themselves to find out who they are --

AND, as radically democratic as I tend to be, I've found the words "editorial collective" to mean, generally, abandon any hope of democratic openness ye who submit here --

↑ Index

513. Steven Howard Shoemaker fake radio
Fri 24 May 1996

If you get to the end of this you'll see that it's written by one Joel Woller at Carnegie Mellon. steve

> All--
>
> For whatever it is worth, I am attaching a copy of my two cents on Sokalmania. I've been travelling, hence my tardiness.
>
> One further brief comment. The issue for us is not realism or any of the other topics which Bhaskar in particular addresses so well. Still less is all of this about Andrew Ross. The question is how how the left, and in particular the academic left, is represented to various publics. That's why I agree entirely with having a second panel on the Sokal adventure, one focused on the left and the media.
>
> ----------
> 22 May 1996
>
> All Things Considered
> National Public Radio
> <[redacted]>
>
> Dear ATC:
>
> Bravo! Encore! Thank you so much for your brilliant critique of the narrow-minded anti-intellectualism of Gross and Levitt~s The Higher Superstition (All Things Considered, May 15). No fan of Derrida and company, I was nevertheless thrilled by your ruthless depiction of those who would, in the name of reason, refuse to engage their writings in a reasonable manner.
>
> Your ~Sokal~ is without doubt the most engaging parody of the reactionary academic type since Saul Bellow~s crotchety classics professor ~Bloom~ appeared on the scene about a decade ago. It is clearly this character, ~Sokal,~ who provides the cutting edge of your Swiftian satirical spoof. His arrogance (~I deal with the real world every day~~as we non-physicists don~t); his pompous demeanor (witness the tone of voice with which he read passages from non-fictional scholars such as Derrida); his self-righteousness (as he declares himself a leftist and feminist, for instance); his naivete (in believing that cooperating in the production of a fluffly ~man bites dog~ type of story somehow advances the causes of science and the left); his ignorance (as if Social Text claimed to be edited in the manner of a science journal, or even to be a juried journal); his disarming simple-mindedness (a well-written 19th century parody of Darwin would not necessarily have been false, after all~even by ~Sokal~s~ own presumed standards of argument)....the details of your characterization are absolutely stunning.

Furthermore, your characterization of ~Sokal~ is remarkably consistent. For instance, his substitution of a flimsy rhetorical question (~What the hell does [Derrida] mean?~) for a carefully-argued position reflects the irrationality of his overall position, since, as he refuses to really argue with his chosen antagonists, ~Sokal~ demonstrates that it is actually he who disrespects reason even as he claims to speak in its name. Thus, you expose the underlying contradiction of the position which rejects critiques of science in sweeping terms: for in defensively mocking those who study or would study the venerable institution of science, ~Sokal~ mystifies science and destroys the critical spirit that true science requires. ~Sokal~s~ commitment is not to the practice of science, which is indeed exemplified especially well in the best critical studies of science, but rather to the unquestioned authority of an idol of science (which, like any deity, is not to be looked at too carefully).

The actor portraying ~Sokal~ certainly brought to life the figure who has filled the pages of Social Text, Lingua Franca, and The New York Times. However, the performance of the actor playing the snickering journalist was just as good, and perhaps even more subtle. For this fictional journalist never even claimed to have attempted to contact the editors of Social Text. In failing to adhere to basic standards of journalistic objectivity as he ~reports~ (in the midst of his own Rush Limbaugh-style laughter) on the lack of objectivity allegedly possessed by social and cultural critics of science, the "journalist" character ironically undermines his own position. Well done!

I do have one concern, however. Since in this case you dropped the ~satire from~ tag that you attach to the work of the likes of Harry Shearer, I suspect that some listeners may have been taken in by your hoax. Unable to appreciate the joke, on the basis of the May 15 show and others like it they may conclude that your programming now more than ever resembles that of the commercially-sponsored corporate media; in particular, they might reason that a piece such as yours serves, in the end, to trivialize the entire debate about science, the institution of the university, and indeed the very notion of truth. Why then aid your underwriters in keeping you on the air? they may ask. Good humor > may not be for all of us, all the time.

>
> Very sincerely yours,
>
> Joel Woller
> Carnegie Mellon University
> Department of English
> Program in Literary and Cultural Theory

↑ Index

514. Lisa Samuels
Sokal responds (fwd)
Fri 24 May 1996

---

more on the matter -- ls

According to Michael Uebel:
> From root Fri May 24 18:26:31 1996
> Date: Fri, 24 May 1996 18:25:41 -0400
> From: Michael Uebel <[redacted]>
> Message-Id: <[redacted]>
> X-Mailer: Mail User's Shell (7.2.5 10/14/92)
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: Sokal responds
>
>
> >From Alan Sokal:
>
> Here's the latest news from the NY Times: After giving > Stanley Fish 38 column inches (not including graphics) to > misrepresent my views, and giving Bruce Robbins and > Andrew Ross an additional 4 column inches to restate their > own views and mildly misrepresent mine, the NYT letters > editor (Kris Wells, [redacted]) has refused to print my > 12-column-inch reply. She said I could have only 7.3 column > inches. Since such drastic compression would make a > travesty of my letter, I refused.
>
> Here, for your interest, is the letter the NYT refused to > print.

> Feel free to distribute it.
>
> Best, Alan Sokal
>
>
> To the editor:
>
> It's not every day that a mere theoretical physicist such as > myself has the honor of being subjected to a half-page > personal attack by the august Stanley Fish ("Professor > Sokal's Bad Joke", May 21). Fortunately, his allegations > can be refuted in far fewer words.
>
> Fish implies that I am opposed to all sociology of science, > and that I fail to understand the elementary distinction > between sociology of science and science. Give me a break!
> I have no objection whatsoever to sociology of science, > which at its best can clarify the important political and > economic issues surrounding science and technology.
> My only objection is to _bad_ sociology of science --- > numerous examples of which are praised (!) in my parody > article in the spring/summer 1996 issue of _Social Text_.
>
> Fish's discourse on the "social construction" of science and > baseball is amusing, but the situation can be stated much > more simply. The laws of nature are not social constructions; > the universe existed long before we did. Our theories about > the laws of nature are social constructions. The goal of > science is for the latter to approximate as closely as > possible the former. Fish seems to agree.
>
> Unfortunately, not everyone in the trendy field of > "cultural studies of science" agrees.
> In a lecture at the New York Academy of Sciences > (February 7, 1996), _Social Text_ co-editor Andrew Ross > said: "I won't deny that there is a law of gravity.
> I would nevertheless argue that there are no laws in > nature, there are only laws in society. Laws are things > that men and women make, and that they can change."
> [verbatim quote in my notes]
>
> What could Ross possibly mean? That the law of gravity > is a social law that men and women can change?

> Anyone who believes _that_ is invited to try changing > the laws of gravity from the windows of my apartment:
> I live on the twenty-first floor.
>
> Now, perhaps all Ross means is that our > _understanding_ of the laws of physics changes over > time; but if that's what he meant, why didn't he say so,
> and what's the big deal?
>
> Granted, not even the _Social Text_ editors would deny > the existence of an external world, or claim that > "physical `reality' \ldots\ is at bottom a social and > linguistic construct." The fact remains that they > published an article saying exactly this > in its first two paragraphs. And despite my repeated > requests during the editorial process for substantive > comments, suggestions and criticisms, none were ever > received, just an acceptance letter.
>
> Concerning my ethics, this issue is treated in detail in > my article in the May/June issue of _Lingua Franca_, so > I won't repeat it here. Suffice it to say that there is a > long and honorable tradition, going back at least to > Jonathan Swift, of truth-telling through satire.
> Doesn't Fish have a sense of humor?
>
> My goals, however, are utterly serious.
> I'm a leftist and a feminist and proud of it;
> I'm angered by a shoddy "scholarship" that claims to be > left-wing but in fact, through its sophistry and > obscurantism, undermines the prospects for progressive > social critique. Like innumerable others from diverse > backgrounds and disciplines, I call for the left to reclaim > its Enlightenment roots.
>
> But let me now shut up:
> far better to give voice to the humanists and social > scientists who have been flooding my e-mail for the > past two weeks, expressing relief that the nakedness > of their local emperors has finally been exposed.
> Let's hear their stories about the debate that is now > opening up.

>
> Sincerely,
>
> Alan Sokal
>
>
>

↑ Index

515. George Bowering
Re: Soaps
Sat 25 May 1996

> Kevin,
>
> You are right to point out that baseball players are huge soap fans.
>
> Thank you for your support.
>
> Bill

And taking my mother as typical (and what else could she be?), I have to point out that she has been watching (I think it is) "The Edge of Night" (either that or "As the World Turns" AND the Montreal Expos on TV for 25 years.

.....
"Stupidity is not my strong point."
--Valery

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

516. Marjorie Perloff
Re: interesting/boring journals
Sat 25 May 1996

I do agree with Ron, of course, that literary journals are much better, livelier, etc. if they have a point of view. But journals like Sulfur, Language, Poetics Journal, Talisman, etc etc. aren't sponsored by university presses, don't pretend to be run by an "editorial collective" and all that. When a journal is a kind of house organ at a particular university (e.g., Critical Inquiry, New Literary History, Diacritics), with a board made up of people both within and without said university, then there's some responsibility to reach out and include unknowns who might just submit a brilliant article. What I objected to was Ross's saying that all the articles in sT are invited, commissioned. That seems to me not Kosher. And when he went on to say that, hey, Alan Sokal was someone "we didn't even know," as if, well, then he must be some suspicious type, I do cringe.

Incidentally, at U-Wash, where I just spent a delightful two days at a Comp Lit colloquium, a grad student finally gave me the Sokal article and I think it's even more amazing than I would have believed. Fabulously done and utterly devastating. He is constantly praising Ross and Aronowitz and subtly working in their statements into his physics rap. It is truly in line with Swift etc.--a brilliant piece of work. Read it!

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

517. Charles Alexander presses in Ireland?
Sat 25 May 1996

Dear Poetics List-ers:

A question came up on a book arts list, wondering about small presses & private presses & related activity in Ireland. If anyone here knows of such activity and where to find it, please post information to me ([redacted]) so I can forward it to that list and help some travelers. This would include small literary & non-literary presses, particularly (but not limited to) any doing letterpress printing, binding, etc.

thank you.

charles alexander
[redacted]

↑ Index

518. george hartley
orono in June?
Sat 25 May 1996

Would someone please send me registration & rooming info for June's poetry conference at Orono? I just heard about it last week. Anyone sharing rooms?

Thanks, George Hartley
[redacted]

↑ Index

519. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: reading Sokal in SoCal
Sat 25 May 1996

---

thanks for reproducing the Sokal letter -- this makes one thing stand out clearly --

Ross says that the ST editors tried to get some changes made in the article, and that the author refused to make such changes --

Sokal says that he asked for editorial advice, but that all he received was an acceptance letter --

One need not adhere to a correspondence theory of truth to recognize that at least one of these letters is wildly misleading -- this much is serious indeed and ought to be aired in public

↑ Index

520. Joel Kuszai
David Wilk
Sat 25 May 1996

Does anyone out there in poeticsLand have any current info on David Wilk: where to reach, if available, & is there a David Wilk and/or Truck archive--

thanks-

↑ Index

521. Charles Alexander
Re: David Wilk
Sat 25 May 1996

> Does anyone out there in poeticsLand have any current info on David Wilk: where to reach, if available, & is there a David Wilk and/or Truck archive--
>
> thanks-

Joel

David Wilk, after Truck and after his stint as head of Literature at the NEA, in about 1982 or 83 founded Inland Books in East Haven, Connecticut. I heard that Inland within the last year has been through one or another stage of bankruptcy proceedings and has been to some degree reconstituted as Inbooks (perhaps spelled InBooks?). As Inland, and continuing as InBooks, they distribute some small press literary books. I didn't have good luck with them for Chax books, and discontinued sending them books several years ago. When I began making books, however, David Wilk was immensely helpful to me, and I wish him very well. I have two addresses, but remember, both of them are some years old, and you might want to find some directory which is more current. But here they are:

P.O. Box 120261
East Haven, CT 06512
[redacted]

and/or

140 Commerce Street
East Haven, CT 06512

As far as any Truck archive goes, I'd certainly suggest asking David Wilk. As a journal, I'm not certain when Truck published its last issue. As a distributor (Truck Distribution), when David Wilk went to the NEA in the late 1970's he sold Truck Distribution (reportedly for a cup of coffee, but perhaps that's apocryphal) to Jim Sitter, who re-named it as Bookslinger. When the ten or so best-selling, largest producing presses pulled out of the non-profit Bookslinger in the late 1980's (my chronology is by memory here) to go with the for-profit Consortium Book Sales & Distribution, which was begun by someone leaving Bookslinger & attracting those presses away, Bookslinger hung on with difficulty only due to the hard-working and much-caring hands of Rod and Hanje Richards, but finally went under in 1993. With the increasing professionalization of distribution for a dozen or so of the biggest small presses in the country, and the nearly simultaneous demise of Bookslinger and Segue Distribution, most small press distribution was left to SPD. And while I like SPD, in general small press distribution was in much better shape 10 or 15 years ago than it is now, except for the very largest of the small presses. There are many reasons for this, including the demise of indepent booksellers, the rise of chain book superstores, the difficulties of funding for distribution, general trends in the economy, and more.

But this is more than you asked for. Good luck tracking down David Wilk.

charles

↑ Index

522. Robert J Wilson
:re: spanos/post-spanos b2
Sun 26 May 1996

Dear Mark Wallace, I am taking the liberty to write to you out of the (internet) blue after I saw your comment on the Buffalo "poetics" list re the way boundary 2 journal, in past ten years post-Spanos, has moved away from experimentation of form/tone/genre/language game in the editorial shift from Spanos to Bove as main editor. You do have a clear-hitting case, and perhaps with C Bernstein editing a special issue of b2 in the near future with an array of interviews and poetic/poem materials, there can be a chance of reclaiming some of this language area. But more more should be done on many fronts re the ongoing reinvention of scholarly/theory/poetics form of discourse in USA outlets. The journal is much too Northeastern/Atlanticist in its problematics as well

When I coedited a special issue of b2 on"Asia/Pacific as Space of Cultural Production," I used some pidgin and indigneous language poems and some Pacific cultural works in nonstandard genres (fiction/"Our Sea of Islands" theory by Hauofa) not only because it reflected key cultural work out in postmodern Pacific but because (invoking the Spanos precedent), we could reclaim and reimagine some of those language territories and moves. The "slick and professional emptiness of Paul Bove" that you indict may be a function of how the collective is constituted now and what it sees as professional and cultural work. The collective has its own tensions and devisions re what constitutes "an international journal of postmodern culture" and literary-critical work.

There seems to be almost little to no interest in poetry there anymore, but there is a really interesting packet of materials in next b2 on the Ho Chi Mih "Prison Diary" poems, showing how cannily critical of Vietnames transnationalization he was, and using translation forms (by Steve Bradbury) that expose the ideology of form ("American free verse") of prior translations (done, for the most part, not from the Chinese but the French).

A lot of the stuff is impossibly repetitive, stale, miming the careerist codes, so I do appreciate your scathing critique re the "tone locked" academic form of the essay even b2 has become reified into. Need to push on that in ways that Bernstein's "A Poetics" inventively, heteroglossically, and courageously opens up even in a deadwood press like Harvard UP american poetics. Take care, Rob Wilson

↑ Index

523. Tony Green
Re: refereed, non-refereed?
Sun 26 May 1996

Good one, Mark Wallace!

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

524. Mark Roberts
Readings/Lit scene in Auckland
Mon 27 May 1996

Dear Poetics people (especially those in New Zealand)

I received the following post to the AWOL address the other day and I was wondering if anyone can help with some information. You can backchannel me at [redacted] or [redacted] with info and I will pass it on. Many thanks

> From: [redacted] (Dennis Schofield)
> Subject: request for info re New Zealand
> X-Sender: [redacted]
> To: [redacted]
> MIME-version: 1.0
>
> Dear Mr Roberts,
> I've just been given AWOL's email address as a group that may be able to provide me with some information regarding Auckland's lit scene. I'm trying to put myself in contact with any groups over there that have regular readings, and wondered if you might know of any, or know of somebody else who might. I'm planning to be in Aukland for a week early in July, and although it isn't something that comes naturally to me, I thought that while I'm over there I should put in a bit of self-promotion. My novel, Slackwire, was published by Fremantle Arts Centre Press last year, and being the smallish press that they are, they don't have much of a promotional budget (they tell me). So I was hoping to get brave and give the book a bit of an airing myself while in Auckland. I haven't yet, though, been able to find anyone who can put me in contact with Auckland's local lit groups. I'm hopeful, then, that you may be able to help me.
> Thanks for your time, and hoping to hear from you,
> Dennis Schofield.
>
> email: [redacted]

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer

Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

525. Poetics List

Welcome Message

Mon 27 May 1996

Rev. 5-16-95

Welcome to the Poetics List

&

The Electronic Poetry Center

sponsored by The Poetics Program, Department of English, Faculty of Art & Letters, of the State University of New York, Buffalo

---

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

_____Contents_____

1. About the Poetics List
2. Subscriptions
3. Who's Subscribed
4. Digest Option
5. When you'll be away
6. The Electronic Poetry Center (EPC)
7. Poetics Archives at EPC
8. Publishers & Editors Read This!

[This document was prepared by Charles Bernstein ([redacted]. edu) and Loss Pequen~o Glazier ([redacted]).]

---

1. About the Poetics List

Please note that this is a private list and information about the list should not be posted to other lists or directories of lists. The idea is to keep the list to those with specific rather than general interests, and also to keep the scale of the list small and the volume manageable. Word-of-mouth (and its electronic equivalents) seems to be working fine.

The "list owner" of Poetics is Charles Bernstein: contact me for further information. As of May, Joel Kuszai is working with me to administer the list. For subscription information contact us at [redacted]

---

2. Subscriptions

line, to:

[redacted]

the one-line message should say:

{or}

(replacing Jill Jillway with your own name; but note: do not use your name to unsub)

We will be sent a notice of all subscription activity.

*

If you are having difficulty unsubscribing, please note:

Sometimes your e-mail address may be changed slightly by your system administrator. If this happens you will not be able to send messages to mail. To avoid this, unsub from the old address and resub from the new address. If you can no longer do this there is a solution if you use Eudora (an e-mail program that is available free at sharewar sites): from the Tools menu select "Options" and then select set-up for "Sending Mail": you can substitute your old address here and send the unsub message.

The most frequent problem with subscriptions is bounced messages. If your system is often down or if you have a low disk quota, Poetics messages may get bounced. Please try avoid having messages from the list returned to us. If the problem is low disk quota, you may wish to request an increase from your system administrator. (You may wish to argue that this subscription is part of your scholarly communication!) You may also wish to consider obtaining a commercial account.

---

3. Who's Subscribed

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

You will be sent within a reasonable amount of time (by return e-mail) a rather long list containing the names and e-mail addresses of Poetics subscribers. This list is alphabetized by server not name.

---

4. Digest Option

The Poetics List can send a large number of individual messages to your account to each day! If you would prefer to receive ONE message each day, which would include all messages posted to the list for that day, you can use the digest option. Send this one-line message (no subject line) to [redacted]

set poetics digest

NOTE:!! Send this message to "listserv" not to Poetics or as a reply to this message!!

You can switch back to individual messages by sending this messagage:

set poetics mail

---

5. When you'll be away

Do not leave your Poetics subscription "active" if you are going to be away for any extended period of time! Your account may become flooded and you may lose not only Poetics messages but other important mail. You can temporarily turn off your Poetics subscription by sending a message:

You can temporarily turn off your mail by sending a message:

set poetics nomail

& turn it on again with: set poetics mail

When you return you can check or download missed postings from the Poetics archive. (See 7 below.)

---

6. What is the Electronic Poetry Center?

our URL is

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center provides access to the burgeoning number of electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the POETICS List archives, an AUTHOR library of electronic poetic texts, and direct connections to numerous related electronic RESOURCES. The Center also provides information about contemporary print little magazines and SMALL PRESSES engaged in poetry and poetics. And we have an extensive collection of soundfiles of poets' reading their work, as well as the archive of LINEbreak, the radio interview series.

The EPC is directed by Loss Pequen~o Glazier.

---

7. Poetics Archives via EPC

Go to the EPC and select Poetics from the opening screen. Follow the links to Poetics Archives. You may browse the archives by month and year or search them for specific information. Your interface will allow you to print or download any of these files.

Or set your browser to go directly to:
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/poetics/archive

---

8. Publishers & Editors Read This!

PUBLISHERS & EDITORS: Our listings of poetry and poetics information is open and available to you. We are trying to make access to printed publications as easy as possible to our users and ENCOURAGE you to participate! Send a list of your press/publications to [redacted] with the words EPC Press Listing in the subject line. You may also send materials on disk. (Write file name, word processing program, and Mac or PC on disk.) Send an e-mail message to the address above to obtain a mailing address to which to send your disk. Though files marked up with html are our goal, ascii files are perfectly acceptable. If your word processor ill save files in Rich Text Format (.rtf) this is also highly desirable

Send us extended information on new publications (including any back cover copy and sample poems) as well as complete catalogs/backlists (including excerpts from reviews, sample poems, etc.). Be sure to include full information for ordering--including prices and addresses and phone numbers both of the press and any distributors.

Initially, you might want to send short anouncements of new publications directly to the Poetics list as subscribers do not always (or ever) check the EPC; in your message please include full information for ordering. If you have a fuller listing at EPC, you might also mention that in any Poetics posts.

Some announcements circulated through Poetics and the EPC have received a noticeable responses; it may be an effective way to promote your publication and we are glad to facilitate information about interesting publications.

END OF POETICS LIST WELCOME

↑ Index

526. Michael Coffey
David Wilk -Reply
Mon 27 May 1996

---

joel kuszai wrote:

Does anyone out there in poeticsLand have any current info on David Wilk: where to reach, if available, & is there a David Wilk and/or Truck archive--

thanks-

david's inland books (a wholesaler of alternative press books), alas, has gone bankrupt, but a small distribution outfil that sprang out of it, inbook, has survived, in that it was purchased by login, a distributor based in chicago, and david, has gone along with it (although i'm not sure if he relocated to chicago or not); login can be reached at Login Brothers Book Co., 1436 Randolph St, Chicago, Ill. 60607; phone [redacted]; and they will put you in contact with david.

if this doesn't turn him up, give me a call and i'll check some publishing industry directories for updated numbers etc.

michael coffey
[redacted]

or [redacted]

↑ Index

527. Michael Coffey presses in Ireland? -Reply
Mon 27 May 1996

---

dear charles alexander:

an introduction to what's happening in ireland can be found in the march issue of American Bookseller, the publication of the american booksellers association; i'm sure they would fax you the article if you called them at [redacted] or ask for Dan Cullen, the managing editor there, who fancies himself an Irishman.

i do a lot of reading in irish poetry; it's a fabulour pasttime for many reasons, but one of which is that the place of poetry in ireland is almost a metaphor for expression in a cultural/historical context: it is a neat metaphor, by which i mean ireland can be grasped, the tradition is small, workable; and continues with a certain focus (there are only 3 million people in ireland); it has an original bardic history (poetry in irish bing perhaps the oldes vernacular spoken art in europe) and has its language of the victor, english, making language a particulary bloody site of cultural conflict. and ireland, being the wessternmost outpust of eurpoean civilication is still (relatively) unchanged racially and culturally (though my no means unchanged).

one way i keep in touch with books irish is through a website from kennys bookshop in galway; they will send you monthly postings of new books and you can order from them.

Please direct all orders/queries to Aine O'Connor at [redacted]

Kennys Bookshop & Art Galleries Ltd., High Street, Galway, Ireland Tel + 353.91.562739 Fax + 353.91.568544 Email [redacted]

Check out the March issue of The Kenny Review, our on-line newsletter at:- http://www.iol.ie/kennys/Review.html

↑ Index

528. Rod Smith
Re: David Wilk
Mon 27 May 1996

I'm almost positive that David Wilk's not to be found at the addresses Charles A. posted. The Inland bankruptcy was completed a few months ago. The new outfit (it actually existed before the ruptcy), InBook, operates through Login publishers-- Wilk may or may not still be connected w/ that. I'll see what I can find out.

Rod

↑ Index

529. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Sokal in SoCal II
Mon 27 May 1996

Today's _L.A. Times_ wieghs in on the _Social Text_ scandal, managing to codescend to all parties at once -- Identifying Stanley Fish as "the publisher" of the journal (apparently because the _N.Y. Times_ identified him as the exec. dir. of Duke U P). Having insulted everybody, they agree with Fish: "The field of cultural studies may be sluggish in making progress, it may need to bone up on Strunk & White's "Elements of Style" and it may have wasted too much energy on such pursuits as studying the genesis of Tupperware. But given the cultural misunderstandings that continue to surround us at home and abroad, surely we can see the importance of its mission as defined by Fish:"

There you have it -- cultural studies as diversity management!

And one can't help but wonder what Strunk and White would have to say about that image of "the field of cultural studies" boning up on their manual -- just how does a field bone up?

To round things out, this editorial is followed by another that concludes: "No one is suggesting that universities make their best reseachers teach intorductory chemistry or physics." Of course, if that did happen, perhaps a few more professors in our field would realize that Pi is not a variable.

↑ Index

530. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Bob Kaufman in SoCal
Mon 27 May 1996

The last session of the American Literature Association conference in San Diego will include a panel on Bob Kaufman -- If you're in San Diego and interested, come on by the Bahia --

Rae -- did you ever get the schedule? If not, call me at [redacted] & I'll give you info. over the phone --

Kaufman session is Sunday morning, by the way --

↑ Index

531. Alan Sondheim
Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Mon 27 May 1996

The Poem of Weeping Ghosts

I wept because I had no shoes until I dreamed a man who had a tree. A rolling tree groped its way past stubbed branches yearning in the night. A stitch in branches sutured the soul to its repeated self. Give them their tired wounds yearning for repetition saving nine. I can be led to runes; I can scoop them up. Runes heal all wounds of selves repeated branches scraping sky. Skies repeat skies as definitions of neurosis you can't tell to stop. The world's neurotic with you; the world's psychotic alone. Beneath the sun, the silent world is all there is. Within the silent world a tree falls silently weeping. Time makes the hearts of trees fall groping. The weeds are always groping on the other side of the fence. There, silently weeping, I sit shoeless on the wrong side of the tracks. There, by Albion, silently being born.

↑ Index

532. Rod Smith
Re: eniacs
Mon 27 May 1996

this is Rid speaking:

My main point, & this is where the defense of Ross comes in-- The "point" of Ross's last book can be summed up thusly-- that corporate culture operates out of the assumption that there isn't enough to go around. It seems more than reasonable to question this assumption. As long as "the game wins" most of us won't. This is what you won't find much, or any discussion of at NYT & co. So given the relative power of Social Text vs the times it's important, I think, to ask why _this_ issue for the Times & not another.

The discussion on this list so far wld not be that different had the Sokal story been on the cover of AWP.

May 24th A.L. wrote:

I normally would agree with Rid that Andrew does good work, etc. -- BUT, if what he says in the first two paragraphs of his response is an accurate reflection of the real discussion among the editorial board of his journal, then the journal should damn well go out of business -- How can anyone justify publishing an article that they believe is inadequate (meanwhile, I prseume, rejecting any number of quite interesting and well-constructed unsolicited essays [try "presume"] from non-physicists) is beyond me --

On the other hand, I cannot understand why blind editorial review should be considered obnoxious -- If it were not for blind review (the VERY FEW places where the blindness is real, and not an editorial fig leaf) those of us who do not happen to have gone to graduate school with the editors would be out in the cold forever --

Take a gander, by the way, at the list of people who got tenure track jobs in English departments that appears in the back of the same issue of _Lingua Franca_ -- The message this list seems to convey to prospective grad. students is that you'd better go to one of the big power schools like UCLA or Yale if you want to get a job when you graduate --

Rod, sorry about that "Rid" -- and to everybody, sorry about the grammar above -- can't use cursor keys to back up and make corrections -- whoever designed the interface between DOS and MAC applications for e-mail must have been malicious or stupid --

employed and blindly yours,
a.l.nielsen

↑ Index

533. Charles Alexander publications & rights
Mon 27 May 1996

---

dear poetics listers:

I received the text of the following message on another list, but thought it might be at least a tangent to the poetics list discussion of refereed/unrefereed journals. Plus i'd be curious -- are academic literary journals and/or anthologies and/or collections these days generally demanding agreements like this message describes?

charles alexander
chax press
[redacted]

> Yesterday (Saturday) I received page proofs for an article which had been requested by the editors of an international journal about the middle ages.
>
> Included was a "Letter of Agreement" from the university press which will publish this journal. Short and too the point, it states:
>
> "The undersigned author hereby grants and assigns to _____ University Press the copyright and all publication and subsidiary rights in his/her contribution to _____, edited by _____ and _____ ."
>
> Absent from the page proofs was the copyright symbol which accompanied the manuscript.
>
> This concerned me. I e-mailed the senior editor that all I was willing to grant was first North American serial rights (meaning that while they may copyright the whole issue, as an issue, I will retain copyright [property right] in my contribution).
>
> The editor is concerned that this may not be negotiable. On Tuesday the press in question should be open for business (!) again and we will see.

> If the terms are not negotiable, neither am I. It's a life.
>
> Jack
>
> Jack C. Thompson
> Thompson Conservation Laboratory
> *The Caber Press * Istor Productions*
> Portland, OR 97217
> 503/[redacted] (voice/fax)
> *[redacted] * [redacted]*
> http://www.teleport.com/~tcl/index.html
>
> "Is a half-wit herbalist only parseley sage?"
> Don Guyot, 1996

↑ Index

534. Michael Heller
Re: San Diego Reading
Mon 27 May 1996

MICHAEL HELLER READING AT PORTER TROUPE GALLERY

301 SPRUCE STREET

SAN DIEGO

SATURDAY, JUNE 1ST AT 2 PM

↑ Index

535. Pierre Joris
query
Tue 28 May 1996

Does anyone on the list have the snail-mail address of Victor Hernandez Cruz? Please backchannel, if possible. Mercy buttercups -- Pierre

========== Pierre Joris | "Form fascinates when one no longer has the force Dept. of English | to understand force from within itself. That SUNY Albany | is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | "Poetry is the promise of a language." email: | -- Friedrich Holderlin [redacted]| ==========

On Mon, 27 May 1996, Charles Alexander wrote:

dear poetics listers:

I received the text of the following message on another list, but thought it might be at least a tangent to the poetics list discussion of refereed/unrefereed journals. Plus i'd be curious -- are academic literary journals and/or anthologies and/or collections these days generally demanding agreements like this message describes?

charles alexander
chax press
[redacted]

Yesterday (Saturday) I received page proofs for an article which had been requested by the editors of an international journal about the middle ages.

Included was a "Letter of Agreement" from the university press which will publish this journal. Short and too the point, it states:

"The undersigned author hereby grants and assigns to _____ University Press the copyright and all publication and subsidiary rights in his/her contribution to _____, edited by _____ and _____ ."

Absent from the page proofs was the copyright symbol which accompanied the manuscript.

This concerned me. I e-mailed the senior editor that all I was willing to grant was first North American serial rights (meaning that while they may copyright the whole issue, as an issue, I will retain copyright [property right] in my contribution).

The editor is concerned that this may not be negotiable. On Tuesday the press in question should be open for business (!) again and we will see.

If the terms are not negotiable, neither am I. It's a life.

Jack

Jack C. Thompson
Thompson Conservation Laboratory
*The Caber Press * Istor Productions*
Portland, OR 97217
503/[redacted] (voice/fax)
[redacted] * [redacted]
http://www.teleport.com/~tcl/index.html

> "Is a half-wit herbalist only parseley sage?"
> Don Guyot, 1996

↑ Index

536. Henry Gould
Re: blindness and inside
Tue 28 May 1996

On Fri, 24 May 1996 12:09:28 -0500 Jordan Davis said:
>Please forgive me riding my hobby-horse

Va bene. Sta bene.
>
>So then an end
>is to include the >poem in the poem

E una relazione etica - veramente concreta e DonJuan Castanedica.
>
>Is that possible or even desirable

Si e possibile ma e troppo difficile per me - scuzi.

> Are we meant to figure out the criteria for possibility
> Or are we arguing out of necessity

E un questione di le due fondazione della realta: la giustizia e il miracolo (o lo scandalo - le due sono uno).

> Is this side of things about definite v indefinite
> as opposed to the popular idea that it is about object v subject

Scuzi - ma il motor-scooter Americanski - c'e a vuoi? E - perche?
>
>What is it you are saying about this politic

La politica e una questione solo per le prigioniere. No - e per tutto - ma le prigioniere provisano il... come sei dice... "the answer" - Enrico Gouldini

↑ Index

537. Annie Finch
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Tue 28 May 1996

If the weeping ghosts poem is a sonnet, then what does sonnet mean? Apparently a poem in 14 lines and/or a poem that its author chooses to call a sonnet. IS it good and useful for poetics as a field to ahve its terminology become SO open in meaning that a term like sonnet ceases to carry much information?

By the way, after much thought, and largely in response to the passioante and fascinating debate we inspired on this list, Kathrine (coeditor) and I have decided we want to open the forms anthology to any experimental forms,not just chants and others that repeat the typical language elements, but any, ANY, so Iv so i reiterate the earlier request for people to edit sections (CONSISTING of a brief intro describing how the form works and several pages (5-6?) of represe ntative examples of the form). PLEASE, contact me to propose such sections on any form you desire to work with. IN response to the previous request, I got three sestinas(!) and nothing else--but we would really like someone(s) to edit sections on forms we haven't thought of before, even forms that may not be formal by the "conspicuous repetition" definition. So please come forward--I'll send you detailed guidelines when I hear from you.

Annie Finch
ph [redacted]

Af maons on ansand fo teh lpes21
wot knesli

↑ Index

538. Steve Carll
Nonset Form
Tue 28 May 1996

At 09:34 AM 5/28/96 -0500, Annie Finch (hi Annie, haven't seen you since New College days!) wrote:

> IS it good and useful for poetics as a field to have its terminology become SO open in meaning that a term like sonnet ceases to carry much information?

Yes, it is. If the term sonnet tells you too much about what to expect in the poem, the poem itself becomes superfluous. Why read another bloody sonnet if it's just going to do exactly the same as all the other sonnets? The word sonnet is always going to carry some information, why not play with that, stretch the boundaries of possibility?

I'm not at all anti-form, but when I work in one, I want the form and myself to TRANSform each other.

Alan, "Weeping Ghosts" is a beautiful poem. Thank you for posting it.

||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||
``````````````````````````````````````````

Steve Carll [redacted]

I listen.
I hear nothing. Only
the cow, the cow
of nothingness, mooing
down the bones.
~~Galway Kinnell
``````````````````````````````````````

||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||

↑ Index

539. David Kellogg
Re: interesting/boring journals
Tue 28 May 1996

---

On Fri, 24 May 1996, Marjorie Perloff wrote:

> journals like Sulfur,
> Language, Poetics Journal, Talisman, etc etc. aren't sponsored by > university presses, don't pretend to be run by an "editorial collective"
> and all that.

Right. The type of journal makes all the difference. The inside cover of Social Text has all the apparatus of a peer-reviewed journal (submit essays in triplicate to such-and-such address in this form), and there's in fact nothing to indicate otherwise. (Nor to indicate that you're probably wasting your time, since everything's solicited anyway).

Seriously now: all of us can tell the difference between Talisman and Contemporary Literature, and the fact that Talisman happens to be livelier doesn't meant that CL should stop being peer-reviewed. With regard to Social Text, Ross's claim that the journal isn't peer reviewed is an obvious attempt to escape responsibilty for publishing an article that nobody on the board (or collective) cared to engage seriously.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

David Kellogg Duke University
[redacted] University Writing Program
[redacted] Durham, NC 27708
FAX [redacted]

> There is some excitement in one corner, > but most of the ghosts are merely shaking their heads.
>
> -- Thomas Kinsella

↑ Index

540. Dan Horne
Sokal
Tue 28 May 1996

---

Lately there's been a lot of emails on the Sokal debate. Unfortunately, it seems I've picked up the threads halfway through, so I'm not even sure what the story is, although it sounds mighty interesting. Can someone please give me a brief summary so that I can follow this apparently juicy subject?

Regards

Dan Horne

---------- Technical Analyst Oracle New Zealand Ltd. [redacted] Level 16, 7 City Rd [redacted] Auckland, New Zealand ---------- Disclaimer: The opinions expressed here are my own, and are not necessarily those of Oracle Corporation.
----------

↑ Index

541. Jonathan Brannen
Re: chax books
Tue 28 May 1996

---

Caroline,

I just picked up a copy of _Marine Snow_ at Talking Leaves bookstore in Buffalo for $12.00 (US). You can order by mail from Talking Leaves. I've misplaced the store's address but maybe somebody in Buffalo can provide it. Of course, it was probably the store's only copy, so you might be better off going directly to the press as Charles suggested.

My copy of MacCormack's _Quill Driver_ (Nightwood Editions, probably available from SPD) has neither a publication date nor a copyright date in it. I think it came out between _Straw Cupid_ and _Quirks & Quillets_, but it might be more recent. If you don't already have them, I highly recommend them also.

I just got back from a camping trip or I would have responded sooner.

Best,
Jonathan Brannen

> On Wed, 22 May 1996, Jonathan Brannen wrote:
>
> if you're not already familiar with the work of Karen MacCormack (whose work deserves to be more widely known than I suspect it is), _Quirks & Quillets_ is a worthy introduction.
>
> I second that motion.  Has she published anything since _Quirks & Quillets_?
>
> Carolyn Guertin
> [redacted]
>
> Yes, _Marine Snow_ came out in 1995, from ECW Press, and it's quite marvelous. ECW, I believe, is trying to gain distribution by SPD, but may not have such distribution yet. The address of ECW is 2120 Queen Street East, Toronto, Ontario M4E 1E2, Canada. The price is not printed on the book, so I can't tell you what it costs, Canadian or American.
>
> Chax will be bringing out Karen Mac Cormack's  _The Tongue Moves Talk_ in the fall of 1996. I'm sure I'll make some kind of announcement on the Poetics List, although keep in touch, please. We should be moved before that book comes out, so it's possible I won't have email or Poetics List connection for a while in late summer/early fall.
>
> charles alexander
> chax press
> p.o. box 19178
> minneapolis, mn  55417
> usa
>
> [redacted]

↑ Index

542. Jordan Davis
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Tue 28 May 1996

---

Counselor Carll having discussed this part--

> IS it good and useful for poetics as a field to ahve its terminology become SO open in meaning that a term like sonnet ceases to carry much information?

--I'd like to look at this part, your honor.

> If the weeping ghosts poem is a sonnet, then what does sonnet mean? Apparently a poem in 14 lines and/or a poem that its author chooses to call a sonnet.

As someone recently excused from a jury panel--having admitted writing poetry, and surviving the discussion of poetry pursuant to that admission--I would ask counsel to supply the hidden parameters in her definition of 'sonnet' to be acknowledged by the clerk--and registered as evidence--for it is this counsel's position that the poem in question, 'poem of weeping ghosts in sonnet form', may or may not be a sonnet, but may never be 'apparently' anything until all parties have produced evidence.

Juridically,
Jd

↑ Index

543. Jordan Davis
scsi fcta
Tue 28 May 1996

---

Henry-- forgive me Laura Riding's Italian-- but-- are you saying-- that the taste of miracle-gro-- is the foundation of realty?-- there is a car-- perched-- beside the motorscooter-- a is next to the--
to the b-- viz David Schubert-- the poetics--
the prison--
is down among the trees-- you want me to come see--
'il duce'-- with thee?-- Jd

↑ Index

544. George Bowering
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Tue 28 May 1996

---

Hey, Anne Finch,

Since when do sonnets have to be 14 lines long? I've seen lots of them that are 11 or 12.

.....
"Stupidity is not my strong point."
--Valery

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

545. Deirdre Kovac
Big Allis Offer
Tue 28 May 1996

---

As noted with the recent reading/launch announcement, Big Allis #7 is hot off the press and in celebration of this the following offers are extended to the poetics list and its environs and acquaintances:

Big Allis #7 / $5 Work by: Jean Donnelly, Laurie Price, Ann Lauterbach, Charles Bernstein, Joan Retallack, Deirdre Kovac, Gail Sher, Anne Tardos, Hannah Weiner, Mark DuCharme, Elizabeth Fodaski, Stephen Ratcliffe, James Sherry, Tom Beckett, Caroline Bergvall, Michael Gottlieb, Stacy Doris, and Rod Smith. And perfect bound, with pictures!

Big Allis Back Issues #1 through #6 / $3 each (Note: Issue #4 may take longer to ship.)

Subscription / $12
Includes two issues (indicate issue to start with) and one back issue of your choice.

All prices include domestic postage. An invoice will be sent with magazines. (Please include full name and mailing address with any order.)

IMPORTANT NOTE: Nothing regarding these offers should be sent to the poetics list.

All orders, queries, etcetera should be sent backchannel, directly to me via e-mail: [redacted] or, if e-mail is not possible, via post:

Big Allis
c/o Deirdre Kovac
20 Douglass Street #3
Brooklyn NY 11231

Thank you in advance. No quote. Deirdre.

↑ Index

546. Robert Drake
AVEC sale (fwd)
Tue 28 May 1996

---

Cydney Chadwick asked me to repost this; apologies if it's a duplicate. Please respond to Cydney (at [redacted]), not to me or to the whole list...

lbd

[begin forwarded message]:

AVEC SALE

A special sale for subscribers to the Poetics List and internet users: for $14 you will receive: AVEC #4, which contains part two of a translation section of contemporary poetry and prose from France (most of the work is still unpublished in book form and unavailable elsewhere). It also includes work by Michael Palmer, Lyn Hejinian, Clark Coolidge, Laura Moriarty, Leslie Scalapino, an image and text piece by Johanna Drucker, art by Susan Bee, and cover art by New York School painter Norman Bluhm.

Also: Avec #8. With this issue the journal began featuring longer sections of work per contributor, some of whom are: Elizabeth Willis, Sianne Ngai, Chris Stroffolino, Agnes Rouzier, Friederika Mayrocker, Kieth & Rosemary Waldrop, and the award-winning photo-text collboration by Norma Cole and Ben E. Watkins.

And finally: A Cast of Tens by David Bromige. The 29th book by the 1988 winner of the Western States Book Award.

"Bromige is a master at probing the irreducibilities of symbolic logic, and his playful yet outrageous equivalencies explode the neat, cut-and-dried tautologies of Wittgenstein: "The old man is 112 pages long / and so is the sea / They are deeply symbolic (psychotic)." Bromige's structures are sinuous and mathematic, and they evoke the tonal colors of Schoenberg, Satie, or Cage, successfully evading what Bromige has characterized as iambic pentameter's "echoic invasions."--Taproot Reviews

"Bromige combines the erudite with the dryly humorous."--The Independent

Sale from May 18-July 14th (Bastille Day). Please make checks payable to AVEC: PO Box 1059, Penngrove, Ca 94951.

e-mail:[redacted]

↑ Index

547. Carnography
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Annie Finch:

> If the weeping ghosts poem is a sonnet, then what does sonnet mean?
> Apparently a poem in 14 lines and/or a poem that its author chooses to call a sonnet.
> IS it good and useful for poetics as a field to ahve its terminology become SO open in meaning that a term like sonnet ceases to carry much information?

Annie:

1. Just as a metrical pattern can be played against until the pattern becomes almost unrecognizable except in terms of perpetual modulation, so the idea of a particular form can supplant its normal technical demands of the poem--especially after hundreds of years, when said form might well be presumed to be sufficiently in place.

2. Sometimes the word haiku is employed to merely to suggest a succinct poem, often comprised of a single sentence, which makes use of, or parodies, (as in senryu, really a variation, if I recall correctly, of the tanka) stylized concrete observation.

3. Just so, a sonnet can be seen purely in terms of its formal argument, compression, contour, diction, or play on any of these. Likewise, I would argue that any poem devoted to the exploration of any aspect of sonnet form may legitimately be called a sonnet in some sense.

4. Still, none of this is particularly useful to know if you are trying to master Shakepearean, Petrarchan, Miltonian, Keatsean (or Etceterean) sonnet form. I myself like to write what I call parallel sonnets (I can't be the only one who's done this), in which the the metric is syllabic/accentual (rather than the other way around) and the simple rhyme scheme is as follows:

a. abcd abcd efg efg.

b. Here is an example, which I present here to show my technical interest in the sonnet form, a form for which I feel no particular reverence:

---
---

_Parallel Sonnet_

Her tazed remains electrify the lake,
your Gamma rays deface our clientele.
I've eyed the sore through diadems of plasma
like silver bottles made of Plutarch's nerves.

A whiff of midden hypnotized the hick:
his face expanded like a parasol.
The mandibles of corpses belch miasmas,
tinting the wind in which a cinder swerves.

Go home, erased equestrian, tapeless worm.
You tongue the twelve-inch someone wants to type.
To err is Hume, the shell-game is the switch--

or else the verb assasssinates its form.
The glove reverts to thumb, the trill to strip
of chins in pails, that itch to drop in pitch.

(orig. published in Cups Magazine, 1989)

---
---

Hope this helps.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: I've done a ridiculous number of experiments in Greek meter, acrostics using medieval classical/contrapuntal techniques and irregular stanzaic patterns, neo-Campionesque quantitative verse, my own versions of Augenmusik, etc. I'd regard all of these as hopelessly anal if I didn't weren't addicted to the medieval period and its cerebral, almost arbitrary approach to questions of musical form. Thus, I'd love to submit work to your forthcoming anthology of form(al) poetry.

(Tel: 212/[redacted], afternoons)

↑ Index

548. Carnography

Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts (oops--corrected)

Wed 29 May 1996

---

Annie Finch:

> If the weeping ghosts poem is a sonnet, then what does sonnet mean?
> Apparently a poem in 14 lines and/or a poem that its author chooses to call a sonnet.
> IS it good and useful for poetics as a field to ahve its terminology become SO open in meaning that a term like sonnet ceases to carry much information?

Annie:

1. Just as a metrical pattern can be played against until the pattern becomes almost unrecognizable except in terms of perpetual modulation, so the idea of a particular form can supplant its normal technical demands--especially after hundreds of years, when said form might well be presumed to be sufficiently in place.

2. Sometimes the word haiku is employed merely to suggest a succinct poem--often comprised of a single sentence--which makes use of, or parodies, (as in senryu, really a variation, if I recall correctly, of the tanka) stylized concrete observation.

3. Just so, a sonnet can be seen purely in terms of its formal argument, compression, contour, diction, or play on any of these. Likewise, I would argue that any poem devoted to the exploration of any aspect of sonnet form may legitimately be called a sonnet in some sense.

4. Still, none of this is particularly useful to know if you are trying to master Shakepearean, Petrarchan, Miltonian, Keatsean (or Etceterean) sonnet form. I myself like to write what I call parallel sonnets (I can't be the only one who's done this), in which the the metric is syllabic/accentual (rather than the other way around) and the simple rhyme scheme is as follows:

a. abcd abcd efg efg.

b. Here is an example, which I present here to show my technical interest in the sonnet form, a form for which I feel no particular reverence:

---
---

_Parallel Sonnet_

Her tazed remains electrify the lake,
your Gamma rays deface our clientele.
I've eyed the sore through diadems of plasma
like silver bottles made of Plutarch's nerves.

A whiff of midden hypnotized the hick:
his face expanded like a parasol.
The mandibles of corpses belch miasmas,
tinting the wind in which a cinder swerves.

Go home, erased equestrian, tapeless worm.
You tongue the twelve-inch someone wants to type.
To err is Hume, the shell-game is the switch--

or else the verb assasssinates its form.
The glove reverts to thumb, the trill to strip
of chins in pails, that itch to drop in pitch.

(orig. published in Cups Magazine, 1989)

---
---

Hope this helps.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: I've done a ridiculous number of experiments in Greek meter, acrostics using medieval classical/contrapuntal techniques and irregular stanzaic patterns, neo-Campionesque quantitative verse, my own versions of Augenmusik, etc. I'd regard all of these as hopelessly anal if I weren't addicted to the medieval period and its cerebral, almost arbitrary approach to questions of musical form. Thus, I'd love to submit work to your forthcoming anthology of form(al) poetry.

(Tel: 212/[redacted], afternoons)

↑ Index

549. Carnography
Re: Derrida's maxim
Wed 29 May 1996

> "Form fascinates when one no longer has the force to understand force from within itself. That is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida

This is certainly a critic's understanding of form and not a poet's. Even Pound was perversely fascinated with the technicalities of form--let alone those who dogmatically assert that a poet must be "free" of "external" formal constraints.
Such a preoccupation is to formalism what Satanism is to Christianity--belief by the back door.

(Will I get the neither/nor lecture again for using parallelism here?)

To understand from within and from without--surely this must be the best of both worlds.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

↑ Index

550. Joe Tabbi
ebr special issue: visual narratives
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Call for Papers

ebr, the electronic book review <http://www.altx.com/ebr/>, is now soliciting essays, visual projects and reviews for its upcoming issue on the interaction of narrative and image in print and electronic media. We're open to essays in combination with online visual projects that deal with any aspect of narrative (narrative theory, cultural criticism, politics, etc.). We are especially interested in works that perform the ideas they articulate and would most like to see submissions that could do so on-line. Specifics and possible starting points are given below. Please address all correspondence to both guest-editors, Steve Tomasula ([redacted]) and Anne Burdick ([redacted]). Deadline for finished work: November 1, 1996.

Part I, Ars Fabula (Narrative and Image) In this section of the issue, we hope to showcase essays in which the visual component of a narrative is germane to its interpretation. The emphasis should be on narrative; that is, we are not interested in the artist's book that is concerned with purely formal or material considerations: the book itself as art object. However, we are very interested in the artist's book that integrates materials and formal concerns in a narrative, especially as these may influence interpretation or structure specific, alternate "readings." The works under investigation can take a variety of forms, but some examples might be: works that use the grid of the page/screen and typography (in the tradition of Raymond Federman's _Double or Nothing_, Ron Sukenick's _Out_, Derrida's _Glas_ or "The Double Session"); works that integrate images as part of the narration, such as William Gass's _Willie Master's Lonesome Wife_, Rem Koolhaas's _S, M, L, XL_, the Mexican photo-novella, or graphic novels such as Art Spiegelman's _Maus_; works that use images as glosses upon the text or conversely books that actually tell their stories through images' indirect commentary, e.g. Simon Schama's _Dead Certainties_, Carole Maso's _The Art Lover_, Julian Barnes's _History of the World in 10-1/2

Chapters_; signal works in the history of text/image collaboration, by Fluxus, for example, or the Futurists (Russian and Italian).

Essays should deal with some aspect of the interaction of word and image, i.e., not simply the interaction of two kinds of expression, but of two different modes of narration, two languages that are absorbed into a third: the metalanguage of the image/text. How is such work different from other types of narrative? What are its aesthetics? On what terms is it to be discussed, interpreted, critiqued? What are its ramifications? For example, if an analysis of point-of-view can reveal modernist epistemology, what do image-driven text narrations reveal about contemporary culture? Do our values, narative theory, aesthetics, language, ideology inhere in Howard Stern's _Miss America?_

Part II, Ars Electronica (Narrative and Electronic Media) In this section we would like to examine text- and image-driven narration in the environment made possible by new technologies. The above criteria apply to submissions for this category. However, here we are particularly interested in stories that can only be told, and essays whose arguments can only be made, through electronic media. Thus, if the work under discussion could have been done in an older medium, it probably isn't right for this section.

More appropriate are issues of literary narration that might have been sublimated before, or might have been more applicable to the theater, opera, or film. Again, what do narrative elements such as character or plot or organization mean in works of multimedia? What are the poetics of hypertext? What is its rhetoric? What are we to make of the "found art" aesthetic that has entered into fiction? Of issues like indeterminacy and intertextuality? motion, space, time, interactivity? What, if anything, is narration that incorporates contemporary technology working against? Should we reread Wayne Booth? J. Hillis Miller? If book technology placed constraints on narrative, what are the constraints of html or the CD-ROM? Of the computer monitor? How do these constraints manifest themselves in electronic narrative, and what difference does it make? How does all this affect our relationship with the material form.

Essays submitted to ebr should take up some aspect of "reading," but reading in a narrative that is also able to incorporate sound, images, video, hotlinks, interactivity. Emphasis should be on aesthetics or narratology or cultural context: the ramifications of a medium that forces us to rethink poetics. Of course, essays that contextualize or historicize media-driven narratives are also welcome.

III reVIEWS As always, ebr is interested in reviews of art works, graphic novels, hyper novels, performances, recent conferences, or stories that relate to the above two themes.

Who We Are

ebr is an electronic book review, an online forum allowing critical writers to present their work on the Internet. We are committed to reviewing (literally, seeing again) every aspect of book culture--fiction, poetry, criticism, and the arts--in the context of emerging media. At the same time, ebr is a review of electronic books, promoting translations and transformations from print to screen, and covering literary work that can only be read in electronic formats. To facilitate print/screen collaborations, and as a service to writers whose primary domain is print, ebr plans on sharing reviews with various print journals. Our first two issues have appeared as focuses of _The American Book Review_, and particular essays are scheduled to appear in various academic and mainstream journals (including _Harper's Magazine_). We'd be interested in hearing from editors who would like to discuss arrangements for sharing reviews in the future.

Guidelines

For future issues, we are soliciting critical writing not only on, but in hypertext. We are interested especially in exploring narratives whose logic is as much visual as verbal, and we prefer thoughtful overviews, polemics, and review essays to evaluations of single works. Authors are encouraged to mark up their essaysin html and, if possible, to put them up at their own web sites for us to download. Otherwise, you should send us hard copy and a disk (preferably formatted for IBM machines). If you use a Mac, please format the disk for pc use, and save an additional version as a text file.

Essays should follow the general format of the essays and reviews that have appeared in ebrs 1 & 2. While we have no proscriptions against specialized language or scholarly rigor, we request that endnotes be kept to a minimum (or that they should be worked unobtrusively into the design of the screen-page). Since we are not a peer review journal, we discourage reviews that simply verify an author's or the reviewer's credentials. We prefer not to assign novels to novelists, books of poetry to poets, or academic books to professor-critics. Interdisciplinary work is encouraged when attention is paid to the methods, values, and professional protocols of each of the fields under discussion. References to web sites or online books should be accompanied by the appropriate URLs.

↑ Index

551. henry
Re: scsi fcta
Wed 29 May 1996

---

On Tue, 28 May 1996 18:11:21 -0500 Jordan Davis said:
>Henry--

>forgive me Laura Riding's Italian--
>but--
>are you saying-- >that the taste of miracle-gro-- >is the foundation of realty?--
>there is a car--
>perched-- >beside the motorscooter--
>a is next to the--
>to the b-- >viz David Schubert--
>the poetics--
>the prison--
>is down among the trees--
>you want me to come see--
>'il duce'--
>with thee?--

M. Jordan, tu n'est pas loin du Royaume de Dieu.
Mais les dictateurs ne sont plus de fagots pour le feu.
Quand l'Empire des grands fous
Comme Pierre Ott et Gilles Ooze Seront 'ci --
Ma --
Che fai?
Eh?

-- Jacques Grillon

↑ Index

552. henry
russ/american poetry conf report
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Still coming down from as the russkies call it the "yekstasy" of the great Russ-American Poetry Conference in Hoboken. What to say, it was magnifique, magnotic, hypnetic, and kenotic. Even though they smoke like blowfish, walk out of readings (zey do zis in Russia too), drink like like glug glug, they are for real. Dragomoshenko a great clown, a great performance poet. Elena Shvarts in a class by herself - americans have yet to dive into this cosmos of a 4-ft tall Petersburg wonder. Seems appropriate that this get together happens under friendly auspices of many american "EXERPERMENTIL" AND "LINGEWOGE" type poets since pure products of america go crazy and lignuohodge poetry is pure american crazy-talk (another great gift to me was to hear some of them read out loud, Bruce Andrews, Jackson Mac Low, Rod Smith, Leslie Scalp-yr-hindo, many another)... but ironically these russkies are still very representative of their own traditions - branching out from them toward us - and that style is so DIFFERENT from us - as Shvarts told me (she likes to be provocative) Americans spend a long time getting to what they want to say & putting all the prep-work into the poem, whereas the russkies put a kind of finality into their compact poems - one aspect of this is that often it's all memorized (MORE than often) - rhymed, metered, recited - extreme example the incredible Ivan Zhdanov - "force of nature" from the Altai region - very offhand, subdued recital of very densely-packed imagery & concept. Making no value-judgements here. The high-energy Americans I heard were a revelation. But, well, we come from where we come from, and I just happen to be a russian poet. More later maybe - what a storm of interesting purple - endless gratitude to Ed Foster & gang (if there was a gang) - Gyenri Gyould

↑ Index

553. Mark Roberts

AWOL: Next Wave Festival (forwarded)

Wed 29 May 1996

---

> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Date: Tue, 28 May 1996 22:13:18 +1000
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (awol)
> Subject: AWOL: Next Wave Festival
>
> The following information has been posted by AWOL on behalf of the Next Wave Festival. For further details please use the contact details for the Next Wave Festival at the end of the post.
>
> **********
>
> NEXT WAVE WRITERS WEEKEND
>
> Saturday 1 June - Sunday 2 June. Next Wave Writers Weekend will be held in Storey Hall RMIT 360 Swanston Street, Melbourne, Melbourne Co-operative Bookshop, Lounge 243 Swanston Street Melbourne, Budinski's upstairs 380 Lygon Street Carlton & RMIT Bookshop RMIT corner Swanston & La Trobe Streets Melbourne.
>
> Costs: Storey Hall Readings and Forums: session $4 day ticket, $10 weekend ticket $15 (Show'n Tell $8, $6 with weekend ticket). Free entry to Spiels Reading, Electric Words, launches & demonstrations).

Program:

1 June

11am Flesh it Out - writers perform. Seminar Room, Story Hall. Edward Berridge, Anna Kay, Michael Foster, Moira Burke, Claire Murphy.

11.15 Electric Words Antoni Jach's Introduction to CD-Rom literature, Lecture Theatre, Storey Hall (free).

12pm I Started a Fan-zine. Zine-sters discuss their careers. Lecture theatre Storey Hall. Richard Watts, Tracy Grimson, Vicki Shuttleworth, Gerry (Dark Angel). Chaired by Phillippa Byrne.

1pm Physical Mass. Writers Perform. Seminar Room Storey Hall. Edwina Preston, Eric Dando, Jim Buck, Bernadette Taylor, Mark Panozzo.

1.30pm CD-Rom Demonstration RMIT Bookshop Free.

2pm Fear & the Other. Homophobia, misogyny, racism & the writer. Forum, Lecture Theatre, Storey hall. Raimondo Cortese, Leonie Stevens, Christos Tsiolkas, Anna Kay.

3pm In Your Face. Writers Perform. Seminar Room, Storey Hall. Justine Ettler, Kathryn Buck, Rob Walmsley, Tom Ball, Richard Watts.

3.30pm CD-Rom Demonstration RMIT Bookshop Free.

4pm The Journalist as Writer: Journalists discuss their writing. Forum, Lecture Theatre, Storey hall. Matthew Jones (Outrage, Melbourne Star Observer,) Michelle Griffin (freelance), Felicity Lewis (Herald Sun).

8pm Show'n Tell: Speak now or forever hold your piece. Storey hall Auditorium. An evening of spoken word performance from Melbourne artists, live bands and live crosses to New York performers. Featuring Richard Watts, Edwina Preston, Howlings in the Head, Eric Dando & the Bald Men in Sleeping Bags, Tom Ball, Jay Kranz, Neil Boyack, Cecilla Mellis (cost $8 or $6 for day and weekend ticket holders).

2 June

11am Speaking of Spoken Word A global conference of print-medium writers & spoken word practitioners debating the spoken word medium, both in Melbourne & live from New York. Conference, Lecture Theatre Storey hall. Chaired by Kerry Watson. Melbourne speakers: Peter Salmon, PI0,Howlings in the Head. New York speaker: Bob Holman (Nuyorican Poets & United States of Poetry).

12pm. Fictions Writers perform. Seminar Room Storey hall. Leonie Steveens, Lisa Greenaway, Scott Robinson, Karen McKnight, Ken Hew.

12.15pm Electric Words Antoni Jach's Introduction to CD-Rom literature, Lecture Theatre, Storey Hall (free).

1pm What we Talk About When we Talk About Dirty Realism: A literary movement? a genre? or just a dirty word? Forum Lecture Theatre Storey hall. Edward Berridge, Justine Ettler, Neil Boyack.

1.30pm CD-Rom Demonstration RMIT Bookshop Free.

2pm Read My Lips Writers perform. Seminar Room Storey Hall. Barbara Wels, Natasha Cho, Alicia Sometimes, Andy Griffiths, Clare Mendes.

3pm Rock'n Roll Aint Literary Pollution: Rock journalists explore their words. Forum, Lecture Theatre, Storey Hall. Clinton Walker, Tracey Grimson, Paul Stewart, Lauren Zoric. Chaired by James Young.

3.30pm CD-Rom Demonstration RMIT Bookshop Free.

4pm Face the Music: writings about and with music. Seminar Room Storey Hall. Chris Gregory, Clinton Walker, Jay Kranz, Cecillia Mellis, Membrane

5pm Overland launch: Next Wave Overland issue of writers and editors under 30. Storey Hall Auditorium Foyer - free. Featuring guest speaker and performances by contributors

5.30pm Spiels Reading Frank Moorhouse and University of Melbourne Students. Budinski's free (doors open 5pm) Upstairs 380 Lygon Street Carlton.

For further information contact the Next Wave Festival Phone 03 9417 7544, fax 03 9417 7481 or email [redacted]

AWOL
Australian Writing On Line
[redacted]
http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia

> Phone 61 2 7475667
> Fax 61 2 7472802

---

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

554. Mark Roberts

AWOL: OVERLAND 143 & the Next Wave Festival (forwarded)

Wed 29 May 1996

---

> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Date: Wed, 29 May 1996 06:58:55 +1000
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (awol)
> Subject: AWOL: OVERLAND 143 & the Next Wave Festival
>
> The following message has been posted by AWOL on behalf of OVERLAND magazine. OVERLAND 143 will be launched this Saturday as part of the Next Wave Festival Writers' Weekend in Melbourne. It is available now from the AWOL Virtual Bookshop (email us for details or look at our web site). OVERLAND 143 will also be available shortly at the following bookshops: Readings (Hawthorn), Greens Bookshop (Flinders Lane), Avenue Bookshop (Albert Park), Pentimento Bookstore (Balmain), Norton Street Bookstore (Leichhardt), Gleebooks (Glebe), Ariel Booksellers (Paddington), The Bookshop (Darlinghurst & Newtown), The Library Shop (State Library of NSW), Half a Cow (Glebe), University Co-op Bookshop (ANU), National Library Shop (Canberra) and the Friendly Street Reading Bookshop (at their monthly reading in Adelaide). If you favourite/local bookshop doesn't stock OVERLAND they can order it through AWOL.
>
> **********
>
> Next Wave festival meets OVERLAND

> The winter issue of OVERLAND is the result of a unique collaboration between an Australian literary magazine and a festival. The issue forms a part of the literary activities of the 1996 Next Wave Festival, and consists entirely of work by writers under 30 and selected by a group of young editors enrolled in various creative and professional writing courses around Melbourne. The enlarged issue has been specially designed for the festival with new fonts, a new cover, and special layouts by Stephen Banham of The Letterbox.
>
> Work in the issue includes a discussion of relationships by internet, poems on ducks and goannas, a story from the borders of the Roman Empire and a poem of directions for adventurers and dreamers.
>
> Other features deal with the age of grunge and the phenomenon of the zines and their culture. Tony McGowan introduces readers to the world of Sydney Westies and surfies. Mic Smith goes hitching from Tailem Bend to Gellibrand, and tom ball finds love mixed up with everything except capital letters. Eric Dando writes a modern fairy tale of Jack Sprat and the bean stalk. Edwina Preston gives us Parsiphae's view of the bull. & Neil Boyack finds a mother in a bar.
>
> There is also the traditional OVERLAND mix of fiction,,poetry, features and reviews, but all from the perspective of the next wave of writers. These are the authors who are already writing our future.
>
> OVERLAND 143 will be launched during the Next Wave Festival Writers Weekend in Storey hall RMIT on 2 June at 5pm.
>
> OVERLAND is distributed by AWOL and is available for Aust$8 from AWOL's Virtual Bookshop (check out our website http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol or call us for details).
>
> AWOL
> Australian Writing On Line
> [redacted]
> http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
> PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
> Phone 61 2 7475667
> Fax 61 2 7472802

---

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]

PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

555. Daniel Bouchard
Re: russ/american poetry conf
Wed 29 May 1996

I only made it to the Friday night readings but agree with Henry that it was a worthwhile trip. I don't understand Russian so the Russians who read were interesting mostly for sound and inflection and the reactions of people in the room who understood them. (There were some translations: Leslie Scalapino read in English a portion of Dragomonshenko's poems.)

Nathaniel Tarn, Jackson Mac Low, Leslie Scalapino and Simon Pettit all gave excellent readings. Can anyone tell me the name of the second Russian reader--the man who read over a cassette tape of spoken words while drumming into the microphone? I believe he introduced it as a kind of folk song tradition. I wanted to understand the language so much!

The behavior of the Russians during the reading was of interest to all I was with. It seems that whenever a Russian read, all (not all, but most of) the Russians left the room to chat. And when anyone else read the Russians stayed in the room and chatted without a hint of self-consciousness. How do you translate "when in Hoboken, do as the Hobokians" and why didn't they?

Henry wrote: "Dragomoshenko a great clown, a great performance poet." Sometimes, as in this case, I'm not sure what distinguishes the two. He did, even if most didn't understand the language he read in, consistently attract the attention of everyone in the room, even when he was reading. Can anyone explain why he entered the room and shouted "yes" and then walked to the blackboard and wrote "no?"

Well, thanks for the account, Henry. It's always useful to get another perspective of what one saw and heard.

[redacted]

↑ Index

556. Joe Amato
Re: Sokal in SoCal II
Wed 29 May 1996

a few more thoughts re the sokal brouhaha, esp. after reading rob wilson's and others' thoughtful posts:

-- there is a journal---as i recall the title, _the journal of irreproducible results_---that provides a forum for mock-scientific studies of mock phenomena, playing specifically off of scientific jargon and methodology, and playing specifically to scientists and the scientifically-inclined... i mention this by way of indicating that sokal's parody has precedent within scientific discourse communities... of course this sidesteps the tricky issue of accepting a submission on the basis of formal criteria alone (please permit me this form/content dualism for a moment)... but if what sokal did is, as ross calls it, a "boy stunt," it is also connected with the general ethos of scientific discourse, if only on this latter's (lunatic?) fringes... an ethos emerging from a long history of proving, disproving, and, on occasion, offering up false proofs as a challenge, or for a few laughs---whatever the residual positivism or, as some would have it, male-adolescent leanings (haven't many of you seen proofs that 1 does not = 1?)... in any case, i think we oughtta be asking ourselves whether, when discourses collide, there isn't bound to be some friction owing to the assumptions each party makes about the nature of discourse...

-- i'm certain there are unreconstructed marxists out there (and mebbe even a few reconstructed ones) already itching to refer to this hoax as ample evidence that ludic postmodernism (you've heard this term, yes?) is consuming itself... that _social text_ is not materialist enough, is not grounded enough in economic realities, hence is susceptible to the general foolishness of various postmodernisms (btw, i have serious doubts that sokal is familiar with this latter position)... though i'd prefer to read the ny times publicity itself less as evidence of nasty corporate constituencies (which are surely at work) than as the public alignment of right-conservative discourse with american anti-intellectualism in general... which latter, for me anyway, will not be sufficiently explained/analyzed through elaboration of needs-based symbolic practices (i.e., there are always enough words to go around---which i take to mean there are always more than enough intentions to go around)... but my point here is that sokal's stunt is likely to draw even more attention to what constitutes politics per se in leftist discourse, from within related communities... which may or may not be a bad thing...

-- BUT, despite what i've just noted, and contra the good intentions hereabouts re revising our review practices to make them somehow more scrupulous, the worst thing that can happen now is for publishers to get fascist about things (sorry!), for critical journals to be more on their guard, to demand even more "tone lock" (thanx for introducing charles' term, mark)... in fact the failure of _social text_ to read sokal's parody as parody may point to the general success of academic discourse in creating formal/conventional codes that pass, in and of themselves, for critical insight/knowledge... and this is as true of the left as of the right, though the right's tightassedness about idiosyncracy in general will tend to eliminate just about anything out of the orthodox (in more orthodox venues, that is)...

-- the problem in these terms becomes one of finding ways to be even MORE open, while not being exactly susceptible to bullshit... were the _social text_ editors more familiar with or open to alternative discourses, alternative ways of conducting critical/theoretical practice, alternative readings of critical vs. 'creative' discourse, perhaps they would have eliminated sokal's parody b/c it was a parodic failure, b/c it failed to open up any new critical (or even scientific) territory as parody (or isn't this a possibility?)...

-- or perhaps not... perhaps (i haven't read it) sokal's article should be looked at again for what it does tell us about its ostensible topic, mebbe in spite of itself... surely its publication-in-context speaks, however, to the discursive habits of _social text_ and of the left, as well as to scientific ethos, "boy stunts," ETC.... but it may well be that sokal's piece works in ways that neither sokal nor the _social text_ editorial board really understands... or is willing to... just as neither party seems willing to entertain a more loosely-defined notion of what constitutes scholarship (ok---in the humanities)...

-- the general public response on both sides, as i've heard it, amounts to both sides laying claim to higher social ground predicated on a similar, narrowly-defined understanding of what constitutes (good) scholarship (which latter is itself being understood, convolutedly, in terms of intention)... here's the options, as presented by each position:  (1) if sokal sez it's parody, it's mere parody... and b/c they published his parody, _social text_ and journals of its ilk regularly publish false and misleading information ...  (2) whether or not sokal sez it's parody, its a "curio, or symptomatic document" (ross) at best, poor scholarship at worst... and b/c he submitted a parody under the guise of scholarship, scientists (like sokal) are hostile to the notion of cultural critique...

-- there must be more than two options, two positions (and both positions as articulated would seem to argue against what is viewed by opposing parties as a form of intellectual corruption)... it seems to me we oughtta be looking at more than two ways of looking at sokal's parody, not so much in formal terms, but in terms of the sorts of formal (-institutional) constraints implied by its (almost) ipso facto rejection as "good" scholarship---by both parties (albeit one (apparently) a bit belatedly, post-publication)...

-- so it seems to me, in all, that neither party is being sufficiently literary... and i say this with [ahem] no due respect for realpolitik...

(THIS IS NOT A PARODY, i am a human being...)

joe

↑ Index

557. Mary Hilton
primitive publications -- Announcement
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Announcing primitive publications, a new press dedicated to bringing historically based text toward a greater accessibility. This press, which will publish approximately 6 chapbooks a year, will showcase present-day writing based on historical text or subject, as well as essays which deal with modern writing in a historical context (allowing the writing of today to been viewed as historically significant). Manuscript submissions are encouraged, when accompanied by a self-addressed, stamped envelope.

Current titles include:
"A True Relation of the State May Last, 1616" by Mary Hilton
"The Haunted Baronet" by Mark Wallace (upcoming June, 1996)

Cost of one chapbook is $4.00, or $20.00 for six. Please send submissions and orders to the following address:

primitive publications
c/o Mary Hilton
1706 U Street, NW, #102
Washington, DC 20009

or you can drop an e-mail to me at [redacted]
Thank you!

↑ Index

558. Robert J Wilson
(un)becoming "literary" in ST &
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Dear Joe Amato, Your analysis of the ST/NYT/Sokal/Ross/Fish event pushes the oppositions and debates to a trenchant level of anti-intentional lucidity that may prove helpful: I admire your support and application of "the literary" as something that canny and innovative-- to miss this power of form and force would be for Bove/Ross to be asleep at the wheel. I quess you made me feel a bit like an "unreconstructed Marxist" (okay by me at times) barking at the "ludic post-modernity" of discursive flimflam game and careerist miming (here the lapsed Catholic Marxism of Wilson and Bove and Pease et al kicks in, seeing "sins" and "crimes" of omission/commission, deformations of the American subject-ego by professional self-serving capital).

To amp up the moral dimension as such, "Sin" can be a matter of living with and covertly endorsing the deformations and injustices of capital because the "symbolic engineers" (Ross to Sokal, no outside to this, humanities to social science in elite forms) keep winning at this two-tier language game too (b2 is not outside this at all: Duke UP packing more "fetish quality per pound" in their books/journals as the NY Times put it last year in their annual size up the MLA horseshit piece).

I am not surethere is anywhere to go with your oppositions though, except in the same (overdetermined, institutionally constrained) directions? "Sokal in So-cal" gives you some estrangement distance on the event, but that LA Times editorial was not so helpful in its sermon as your discriminating "literary" critique. Regards, Rob Wilson

↑ Index

559. Annie Finch
Re: Nonset Form
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Hi steve! I'm all for stretching sonnets, but if things are stretched too much they sometimes start to show holes.  My feeling is that that is starting to happen with the sonnet. And if it starts falling apart, there will be nothing to stretch anymore.

--Annie

↑ Index

560. Edward Foster
Re: russ/american poetry conf
Wed 29 May 1996

---

the poet at the russian/american conference who read/sang over the tape of spoken words was vadim mesyats. his work has not been widely published yet in english versions, but there will be a volume of his selected works in translation published by talisman this fall. he has a quite substantial reputation in russia, and some of his songs have infiltrated that world so well that they are sung without the singer's necessarily knowing who wrote them. that's true recognition, when the poem is better known than the poet. it's the kind of recognition that any genuine poet obviously must prefer. --ed foster

↑ Index

561. Annie Finch
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Esteemed Jd, right honorable courtiers,

It would be tempting to --it is tempting to --paraphrase Housman and say that i can no more define a sonnet than a terrier can define a r at, but I know one when I see it. But that would be simplistic and begging your honorable question. wq. I guess I would, honestly, define a sonnet as a poem in 14 lines of ip with a such-and-such rhyme scheme  or any variations of it.  Obviously the variations are theoretically infinite and shade off into other kinds of poems taht are not sonnets; I had a very hard time editing a "A FORMAL FEELING COMES for this reason, but I did feel that there was a difference between the poems that were actually doignn something, some variation, WITHIN the sonnet form, and those that were USING the sonnet form for its poignant cultural connotations. I used the "structured by conspicuous repetition" definition as a way of trying to codify that difference at the time; now I am becoming more interested in the philospohical/aesthetic/perhaps even ethical dimensions of the distinction.

"Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form" is a marvellous poem that gets a lot of its marvels from the evocation of the sonnet in the title. Without the title, as in virtually all of Mayer's SONNETS, the only aspect of the poem evocative of the sonnet form is the number of lines. I think the "Poem of Weeping Ghosts" is a poem ABOUT the sonnet, but not a sonnet. My definition of the sonnet is a poem that honestly takes on the technical challenges and lenges and  limitations of the form as it has evolved over the centuries--always in flux, certainly. The poststructuralist use of the form seems to me to make a real technical leap into into a sort of metapoetic use fo the form, in fact a sort of colonization of it from the outside.  To me such poems are not sonnets, however deeply and provocatively they engage with the idea fo the sonnet.

.

, however, s, wher ethe form is a  .

eh aht  This is asking a lot of the title.

sonnets, you oramarguments
 eh soaht .  df nsetMaybe the question of convention versus procedure a wh

↑ Index

562. Louis Cabri

Re: chax books

Wed 29 May 1996

---

On the subject of Karen Mac Cormack's books, the one book of hers not so far mentioned, and unfortunately not to my knowledge available other than second-hand, is her first: Nothing By Mouth, published, I think, in 1984, and not by Chax.

And not to not plug Steve McCaffery's latest book of poetry, it's just out from ECW Press in Toronto: The Cheat of Words. Includes poems some may have seen over the years in excerpted form in West Coast Line, hole, and other mags, and unpublished early pieces.

Louis

↑ Index

563. Steve Carll
Re: Nonset Form
Wed 29 May 1996

---

At 03:23 PM 5/29/96 -0500, you wrote:
>Hi steve!
>I'm all for stretching sonnets, but if things are stretched too much they >sometimes start to show holes.  My feeling is that that is starting to happen >with the sonnet. And if it starts falling apart, there will be nothing to >stretch anymore.
>
>--Annie

I wouldn't worry about it, Annie: everyone in England thought the sonnet form was exhausted in 1595, and it's still with us 401 years later!

||||||

recognition that even if communication itself were 100% communicable, this is no guarantee that we'd be any closer to social justice in any practical sense...

anyway: there's no place to go that's not institutional, no, but that doesn't exactly or entirely speak to why one writes, or how one writes (as you know)... i mean, i might be hallucinating at the moment, just imagining that you're following me hereabouts... or i may very well be forgoing dinner to post you, though admittedly it's doubtful that i'm going w/o food for the night due to lack of pocket money (i would venture that most on poetics are with me here)... nor does the institutional per se speak to the contribution one may be making to one's fictional or actual community (term used advisedly) of readers, if one is or believes oneself to be so endowed ...

which i say by way of saying that there's no one way, no one method, no one aesthetic that works (or that pleases, or that feeds), even if there may well be causes or platforms or positions or programs that are more acceptable given corresponding local and global circumstances... and that, whether utopian or materialist or happy-go-lucky or ?, it may do and do well to consider alterations in our way of speaking talking exchanging (letters or pixels), to consider writing against as well as with whatever grain (incl. the critical), even if doing so does little in in/direct correlative terms to relieve, for example, human suffering in general... am i preaching to the choir here?... so then, i preach to the choir...

in the critical context, writing and reading with a more literary sense of the possibilities attendant to same may contribute to (if not result in) a better social transaction, even a better professional context, provided one is willing to write and read thus with the understanding that "better" means tentative, means local, means circumstantial, is a function of how meaning is made of whatever by whomever; and, yes, may contribute to (if not result in) worse too, worse so delimited... emphasis on may, due allowance made for systemic-discursive (incl. capitalist and professional) evils... and due allowance made for (to trope) the paradox of those artistic practices that speak against any such progress-ive discourse, that hazard appearing out of step completely with the whole critical shebang (mself, i'll bump heads with such writers/artists on occasion, but this is no necessary indication of the quality or usefulness of their writings)...

which i guess is just another way of saying that risks must be taken... and that some we needs to continue to seek and construct ways of developing and maintaining new and various fora that are conducive to taking risks... that the literary---and here my particular plug for diverse poetics, along with diverse publics---that the literary, as a contested site of alphabetic culture that often operates on and at the margins of experience (and all that this means under, to steal from your post, current sociocultural deformations of the subject), may represent not simply a set of institutional/cultural values of one sort or the other, but ways of confronting these values with an eye (ok---i) toward understanding the (often painful) necessity of revaluation...

i mean, for those so inclined...

all best, & w/o sounding too nietzschean, i trust,

joe

↑ Index

565. Wystan Curnow
Re: Nonset Form
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Hi Annie,
look i'm as worried as anyone about things falling apart. But the truth is there's always something to stretch, and an little more stretch in everything. Soak it in milk overnight.
Wystan

↑ Index

566. Gary Hawkins
Re: Nonset Form
Wed 29 May 1996

---

On 5-29-96 Annie Finch wrote:

> Hi steve!
> I'm all for stretching sonnets, but if things are stretched too much they sometimes start to show holes. My feeling is that that is starting to happen with the sonnet. And if it starts falling apart, there will be nothing to stretch anymore.
>
> --Annie

If a thing has holes in it, I think we should know about it. What's called "anomaly" in science is called "rebellion" in poetry-- either way revolutions do happen.

The English dumped the Italian sonnet once they realized it's easier to rhyme in Italian. American rhymes even less.

Besides, once a form's been done, why do it again for anything other than practice, to prove you can do it?

laura c/o [redacted]

↑ Index

567. Annie Finch
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts (oops--corrected)
Wed 29 May 1996

---

Dear Rob,

I am glad to see your lucid and graceful explanation of how the contours, argument, diction, compression, and other less quantifiable aspects of the sonnet form can be "legitimately" engaged (the judicial subtext continues) as a means of extending the sonnet tradition. The argument is persuasive and of course intriguing, tempting in its simplicity: there is no difference, ultimately, in all the different things that "sonnent" means to us; all can be engaged in, with, equally, and the form will still be living. But I have trouble fuzzing the perhaps-too-obvioius distinction between the form as commonly understood and its less tangible attributes.  A poem is an embodied thing, to me, embodied in its actual words, rhythms, stanzas, rhymes, phrases.  It has a spirit too, but to engage with the spirit seems to me a definitely different thing than to engage with th e body, just as to engage with the spirit or idea of a dead or absent person is different than engaging with the actual living body and presence of the person.

I am intaerested in your work on forms and will phone tomorrow probably. Is there a form you would like to edit a section on, since this is a composite anthology of different sections on forms?

--Annie F.

typosoupwehreaarouble .
 qu n the es the tn  fo teh wu

↑ Index

568. Annie Finch
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Dear Steve,

Your feeling that the sonnet will still be around no matter how we treat it reminds me of how people used to feel about the ocean, the ozone, ad the old-growth forests.  A form is a living thing in my book and needs sustainable care.

Annie

 .vagfeole

↑ Index

569. Thomas Bell
Re: Music City sonnet
Thu 30 May 1996

> bantering martians hope for glory
> we committed literary piracy on the high seas
> Al left Billie Joe Cat found the path to > hunger large as scaredy free-throw
> underground stone guitar blue uniformed blow
> mouth on double-cross diploma clue
> a world without nouns is healthy?
> sequined sequels quells
> primacy recency a magnificat its own
> catorziemme and quattrocento etc
> and minnie pearl and conway twitty
> a dirge enough for Solent murk
> too much robing and screeing
> the voice of an angel and the soul of > blue few, grow a garage band
> glue bag a branding fag wagered row
> Sue the crew could count, although

↑ Index

570. William Marsh - 3809183
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

i once had a teacher who defined the sonnet as a "short fat know-it-all"

a genuine pomo sonnet would probably be most concerned with taking that def to task

-- a fellow know-it-all-ateer

bmarsh

↑ Index

571. Jerry Rothenberg
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Thu 30 May 1996

> , however, s, wher ethe form is a

> eh aht  This is asking a lot of the title.
>
> sonnets, you oramarguments
> eh soaht . df nsetMaybe the question of
> convention versus procedure a wh

dear Annie Finch --

I was startled & delighted to see this coming at the end of one of your notes & similar but more condensed constructions at the end of others. Is there a method here too that turns the ordinary into the extraordinary -- something that the machine (in its own way) is trying to tell us?  It is, anyway, a remarkable statement on sonnets, something that wraps it all up.

Jerome Rothenberg
[redacted]

↑ Index

572. Kenneth Goldsmith
Madonna
Thu 30 May 1996

---

> I AM A TIP-TOP STARLET
> In Which Something Is Lost, But Much Is Gained, In The Translation
>
> GARRY TRUDEAU
>
> When the huge Evita production company blew into Budapest last month to rent its ancient architecture, Madonna, the film's star, was much too busy staying in character to meet with the local press. Finally, on the eve of her departure, good manners prevailed, and the pop diva submitted to an interview with the Budapest newspaper Blikk. The questions were posed in Hungarian, then translated into English for Madonna, whose replies were then translated back into Hungarian for the paper's exclusive. Shortly thereafter, at the request of USA Today, Madonna's comments were then retranslated from Hungarian back into English for the benefit of that paper's readers.  To say that something was lost in the process is to be wildly ungrateful for all that was gained. "I am a woman and not a test-mouse!" reads a typical quote. USA Today, presumably pressed for space, published only a few of these gems, leaving the rest to the imagination, whence has sprung the following complete transcript:
>
> Blikk:
>
> Madonna, Budapest says hello with arms that are spread-eagled. Did > you have a visit here that was agreeable?  Are you in good odor? You are the biggest fan of our young people who hear your musical productions and like to move their bodies in response.

>
> Madonna:
>
> Thank you for saying these compliments [holds up hands]. Please stop with taking sensationalist photographs until I have removed my garments for all to see [laughs]. This is a joke I have made.
>
> Blikk:
>
> Madonna, let's cut toward the hunt: Are you a bold hussy-woman that feasts on men who are tops?
>
> Madonna:
>
> Yes, yes, this is certainly something that brings to the surface my longings. In America it is not considered to be mentally ill when a woman advances on her prey in a discotheque setting with hardy cocktails present. And there is a more normal attitude toward leather play-toys that also makes my day.
>
> Blikk:
>
> Is this how you met Carlos, your love-servant who is reputed? Did you know he was heaven-sent right off the stick? Or were you dating many other people in your bed at the same time?
>
> Madonna:
>
> No, he was the only one I was dating in my bed then, so it is a scientific fact that the baby was made in my womb using him. But as regards these questions, enough! I am a woman and not a test-mouse! Carlos is an everyday person who is in the orbit of a star who is being muscle-trained by him, not a sex machine.
>
> Blikk:
>
> May we talk about your other "baby," your movie, then? Please do not be denying that the similarities between you and the real Evita are grounded in basis. Power, money, tasty food, Grammys -- all these > elements are afoot.

>
> Madonna:
>
> What is up in the air with you?  Evita never was winning a Grammy!
>
> Blikk:
>
> Perhaps not. But as to your film, in trying to bring your reputation along a rocky road, can you make people forget the bad explosions of Who's That Girl? and Shanghai Surprise?
>
> Madonna:
>
> I am a tip-top starlet. That is my job that I am paid to do.
>
> Blikk:
>
> O.K., here's a question from left space: What was your book Slut about?
>
> Madonna:
>
> It was called Sex, my book.
>
> Blikk:
>
> Not in Hungary. Here it was called Slut. How did it come to publish? Were you lovemaking with a man-about-town printer? Do you prefer making suggestive literature to fast-selling CDs?
>
> Madonna:
>
> These are different facets to my career highway. I am preferring only to become respected all over the map as a 100% artist.
>
> Blikk:
>
> There is much interest in you from this geographic region, so I must ask this final questions: How many Hungarian men have you dated > in bed? Are they No. 1? How are they comparing to Argentine men, who are famous for being tip-top as well?

>
> Madonna:
>
> Well, to avoid aggravating global tension, I would say it's a tie [laughs]. No, no, I am serious now. See here, I am working like a canine all the way around the clock! I have been too busy even to try the goulash that makes your country one for the record books.
>
> Blikk:
>
> Thank you for your candid chitchat.
>
> Madonna:
>
> No problem, friend who is a girl.

Kenneth Goldsmith
http://wmfu.org/~kennyg

↑ Index

573. Carnography
(un)becoming "literary" in ST &: Is this better?
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Joe:

Forwarded (because they were public) your public ruminations to my esteemed occasional colleague, Colin Raff, and this was his reply.

Personally, I'm beginning to know how dyslexics feel (esp. Mr. Derrida). Will respond to your orig. post as soon as I get Colin's version out of my ears.

Inclusively,

Rob (possibly the wrong Rob, for all I know) Hardin

PS: If you're in NYC this summer, come see "Tableau"--poss. at Jackie 60--a play that Colin and I wrote to illustrate our curriculum for The University for Combating Degenerate Aesthetics. We drive our points home with several aesthetically-rewarding decapitation scenes--all simulated, of course.

A further aesthetic note: At the end of the play, we write I Am Fun across the bellies of students who prove too weak to survive. Such are the charms of deadly Darwinian aesthetics.

Bring your batons, friends. But germ warfare is strictly forbidden.

---

> From: Joe Amato <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: (un)becoming "literary" in ST &
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS <[redacted]>

"Represent" not simply a set of institutional/cultural values of one sort or the other, but ways of confronting these values with an eye (ok---i) toward understanding the (often painful) necessity of revaluation. A contribution one may be making to one's fictional or actual community (term used advisedly) of readers, if one is or believes oneself to be so endowed (academic and other) institutional realities & such like, is not helped at all by the recognition that even if communication itself were 100% communicable, this is no guarantee that we'd be any closer to social justice in any practical sense.

Anyway: there's no place to go that's not institutional, no, but that doesn't exactly or entirely speak to why one writes, or how one writes (as you know)... i mean, i might be hallucinating at the moment, just imagining that you're following me hereabouts... or i might very well be forgoing dinner to post you, though admittedly it's doubtful that i'm going w/o food for the night due to lack of pocket. Dear--how to say this as uncontortedly as possible?--i'm always feeling as though i can't drop my (theoretical) guard when it comes to talking theory & money (i would venture that most are with me here)... nor does the institutional per se speak to the critical context, writing and reading with a more literary sense of the possibilities attendant to same, per se, that may contribute to (if not result in) a better social transaction--

...

--which i say by way of saying that there's no one way, no one method, no one aesthetic, that works (or that pleases, or that feeds), even if there may well be causes or platforms or positions or programs that are more acceptable given corresponding local and global circumstances, whether utopian or materialist of whatever by whomever; and, yes, may contribute to (if not result in) worse too--worse so delimited--emphasis on may, due allowance made, for systemic-discursive or happy-go-lucky or ?

It may do and do well to consider alterations in our way of speaking talking exchanging (letters or pixels), to consider writing against as well as with whatever grain (incl. the critical), even if doing so does little in in/direct correlative terms to relieve, for example, human suffering in general... am i preaching to the choir here?... so then, i preach to the choir...

In the even-better professional context--provided one is willing to write and read that--the literary, as a contested site of alphabetic culture that often operates on and at the margins of experience (and all that this means under, to steal from your post, current sociocultural deformations of the subject), may thus, with the understanding that "better" means tentative, means local, means circumstantial, is a function of how meaning is made (incl. capitalist and professional) evils. Due allowance made, i guess this is just another way of saying that risks must be taken.

Us needs to continue to seek and construct ways of developing and maintaining new and various fora that are conducive to taking risks that the literary---and here's my particular plug for diverse poetics, along with diverse publics---for (to trope) the paradox of those artistic practices that speak against any such progressive discourse, that hazard appearing out of step completely with the whole critical shebang (mself, i'll bump heads with such writers/artists on occasion, but this is no necessary indication of the quality or usefulness of their writings)...

i mean, for those so inclined...

all best, & w/o sounding too joean, i trust,

nietzsche

<toward the end>

<< end of forwarded material >>

↑ Index

574. Carnography
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts (oops--corrected)
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Annie:

> The argument is persuasive and of course intriguing, tempting in its simplicity: there is no difference, ultimately, in all the different things that "sonnent" means to us; all can be engaged in, with, equally, and the form will still be living.

This is good work, Annie, but this is not what I said. There are distinct differences between standard and non-standard sonnets. But there are subtler classifications to be noted beyond those two. Some modern sonnets are really "sonnets" (though pomo has rendered the quotes unnecessary). Much of what is called experimental in the stricter sense is as patterned and marmoreal as any neoclassical Dryden. And much of what was written in the transitional stages of history remains radically experimental to this day.

> But I have trouble fuzzing the perhaps-too-obvioius distinction between the form as commonly understood and its less tangible attributes.

In a Shakespearean sonnet, syntax, diction and compression are demonstrably "tangible." A seventeenth-century sonnet can be analyzed in purely rhetorical terms. Such aspects of the sonnet might not be as commonly understood as its rime-scheme and meter. But that doesn't mean they are too obscure to be understood.

> A poem is an > embodied thing, to me, embodied in its actual words, rhythms, stanzas, rhymes, phrases. It has a spirit too, but to engage with the spirit seems to me a definitely different thing than to engage with th e body, just as to engage with the spirit or idea of a dead or absent person is different than engaging with the actual living body and presence of the person.

Would you say that Kandinsky killed, or failed to maintain, the spirit of representional painting simply because he chose another visual language? And what about Picasso, who systematically distorted the representational? Sonata-allegro form crystalized in the work of Haydn, Mozart and early Beethoven. But what about Beethoven's late sonatas, which were to sonata- allegro form what post-war Nagasaki is to the original city? Should Beethoven's late sonatas have been called something else?

What about the obsessive mosaic sonatas of Robert Schumann?
And what about the Silent Sonata of John Cage?
Should these have been called something else because the old forms didn't apply?

Isn't the best way to revitalize an old form to write in it yourself? Why proscribe newer prosodic definitions--why delimit the do's and better-not's--of sonnet for other poets with other approaches?

A free-verse poet might not want to call a poem by another name than sonnet, just as an abstract painter might choose to refer to a ring of concentric circles and a splotch of paint as _Still Life #17_. I might debate whether or not the connection, the allusion, works in each individual case. But that doesn't mean formally allusive poems are interchangeable with Miltonic sonnets. What it means is this: in modern poetic practice, sonnet does not merely refer to standard rhyme-schemes and forms. If you don't believe me, I suggest you consult _The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics_.

(Literal-minded approaches to form? Somewhere, there is a performance poet who has replaced the sonnet's rhyme-scheme and meter with non- sequitur facial expressions. Someone else has written sonnet-generating software.

Someone else has built a two-room house in the shape of a Petrarchan sonnet. After all, the word stanza is Italian for room.)

I appreciate and respect your arguments in favor of preserving the conventional sonnet. However, I choose to argue in favor of preserving the study of prosody itself rather than some stage of development within the life of a particular form. I thought Rothenberg's joke was pretty astute: The train of type at the end of your post--of leftover cut-and-paste fragments--provided a newer kind of prosody and another variant of critical perception. Such accidents are not interchangeable with the sensibility you're attempting to sharpen. But they are worth looking at. Many might prove to be important--as have the sequences of freer sonneteers like Ted Berrigan.

> I am intaerested in your work on forms and will phone tomorrow probably. Is there a form you would like to edit a section on, since this is a composite anthology of different sections on forms?
>
> --Annie F.

Thanks for your kind offer. I'll be home to take your call after six p.m.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

↑ Index

575. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Palindrome: "Ten No's: A Sonnet"---
Shakespeare wrote at least one 12 line one...
Oh no, some YAHOO just won in Israel (gotta run)

↑ Index

576. Daniel Bouchard
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Annie Finch wrote:

Your feeling that the sonnet will still be around no matter how we treat it reminds me of how people used to feel about the ocean, the ozone, ad the old-growth forests.  A form is a living thing in my book and needs sustainable care.

_____

Annie Finch:

Your analogy that poets who experiment with traditional forms like the sonnet are simliar to some people's reckless attitude towards the environment is in poor taste and flat-out wrong. One is NOT like the other no matter how closely you associate the two. Actually, the statement is more telling about your own uptight attitude where poetry is concerned; a denial of change, innovation and real creativity. (You did not address the point that Steve made.)

A poetic form may be a "living thing" but it is not eligible for the endangered species list. If you are looking to give something "sustainable care" then look into the global danger surrounding frogs and other amphibians. When these die out they are gone forever. When YOUR definition of a sonnet dies out, someone elses' may still be flourishing.

[redacted]

↑ Index

577. Steven Clay
poetry books & magazines
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Granary Books in NewYork has just issued a catalog of some 650 out-of-print literary magazines and poetry books mostly from the 1970's and forward. The prices are very affordable. Some of the writers and magazines listed (to give a general idea) include:

Clark Coolidge, Adventures in Poetry (& Larry Fagin), Charles Bernstein, 'L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E', 'The World', Bernadette Mayer, Vito Acconci, '0 to 9,' Kathy Acker, Jackson Mac Low, 'Roof,' Jerome Rothenberg, 'A Hundred Posters,' 'United Artists,' Alice Notley, Ted Berrigan, 'This,' John Giorno, Ron Padgett among many, many, many others.

Serious readers are welcome to have a copy of the catalog. Please send me an E-mail request with your name and address.

Thank you.

Steve Clay
Granary Books 568 Broadway Suite 403, NYC 10012
[redacted]
[redacted]

↑ Index

578. Joe Amato
Re: (un)becoming "literary" in ST &: Is this better?
Thu 30 May 1996

---

rob, yes, i've got colin's hack in my ears at the moment... i esp. like how theory & money end up so close together in his version...

tell him i sd thanx!...

best,

joe

↑ Index

579. David Baratier
Au pur delice sans chemin (1)
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Henri & Jd

Ses purs ongles tres haut dediant leur onyx,
L'Angoisse, ce minuit, soutient, lampadore,
Maint reve vesperal brule par le Phenix
Que ne recueille pas de cineraire amphore.

Francoise Baratier

↑ Index

580. jms
request for exercises about place
Thu 30 May 1996

---

I have to teach a how-to-teach poetry workshop in a week or so about the theme of place. It is for the Bard L & T program where the emphasis is on experimental writing approaches (a lot of the assignments resemble things on the EPC experiments list).

Does anyone have any ones related to the theme/idea of place in particular that they have heard of/used?

Rod Smith gave me a good one from  Burroughs (?) about having people go out and write down everything they see in a particular color. The lesson being the collage like nature of experiental experience. Am I telling this right?

If anyone has any and they back channel them to me, I can post to list or interested individuals when I compile list.

Also having to teach a fiction workshop next year. Anyone done this? I need ideas and exercises and syllabi. Same thing, if you have, send to me and I will repost or resend.

Thanks lots.

Juliana Spahr

↑ Index

581. Jill A Mccartney
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

just thought Gertrude Stein's "sonnet"--which is embedded in "Patriarchal Poetry"--would be an apt grace note for this discussion.

A SONNET

To the wife of my bosom
All happiness from everything
And her husband.
May he be good and considerate
Gay and cheerful and restful.
And make her the best wife
In the world
The happiest and the most content
With reason.
To the wife of my bosom
Whose transcendent virtues
Are those to be most admired Loved and adored and indeed
Her virtues are all inclusive
Her virtues her beauty and her beauties
Her charms her qualities her joyous nature
All of it makes of her husband
A proud and happy man.

↑ Index

582. David Baratier
Tomorrow, Friday, may 31st
Thu 30 May 1996

---

A booglit benefit reading

Featured Readers:
Todd Colby
David Baratier
Bill Luoma
Dan WIlcox

Also Chris Stroffolino and Chris Butters are slated.

Booglit will be publishing a number of limited edition chapbooks for the reading, including _Compartments (a short run)_ by David Baratier

@ Luna Park
Friday May 31st @ 7:30 pm
249 Fifth Ave.
Brooklyn, NY
(Between Carroll Street and Garfield Place)

For folks who are unfamiliar with Booglit, the present editorial staff is:

Michael Basinski: Buffalo, NY
David Baratier: Philadelphia, PA
Dan Wilcox: Albany, NY
Rod Smith: Washington, DC
Lee Ann Brown: Boulder, CO
Dan Bouchard: Boston, MA

Booglit is a community focused publication where the editors for the various cities contribute material on area writers and events in each issue. One city is chosen to be the featured city of each issue. A third of the publication space is dedicated to the featured city.

Authors of other chapbooks availiable from Booglit include:

Lee Anne Brown, Laynie Browne, Amiri Baraka,
Bill Shields & Eliot Richmond, Barry Gifford,
Marc Ducharme, Ed Saunders, and many others.

For a full catalog send an SASE to Booglit / PO Box 221 / Oceanside, NY 11572-0221

↑ Index

583. David Baratier
nonset environmentally destructive form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

A fabric of slow writhing

My dark quiet hand dreams this house a whisper of the quiet wire circles. In coffee rings around the hallway I wake into night. The disparagement of numbers lingers in the line, as if we all were set down by your receiver in a wood-grain sacrifice.
A stain that morning ago. A violin sound on the telephone where we were years by and a voice comes up hoping it would hear us again, for the briefest instant of re-assurance. Things are well here always have been though the weather is amazing with a wind you wouldn't believe. We miss shaking on the porch to the same elements, the strength of your torso against. In the same way your memory could be sending a nightgown without.

from logodaedalus
One of the series of Compartments

David Baratier

↑ Index

584. Burt Kimmelman
The Twentieth Century
Thu 30 May 1996

---

From: ADMIN::KIMMELMAN "Burt Kimmelman [redacted]" 29-MAY-1996 16:41:01.12
To: MX%"[redacted]"
CC: KIMMELMAN
Subj: The Twentieth Century

I'm writing to ask for help:

I am slated to teach an interdisciplinary course called "The Twentieth Century World"; the course is global in scope, and must contain three areas of intense investigation, three modules. The "modules" i have in mind are: Japan, 1912-1917; England 1939-1945; and, Sub-Saharan Africa from about 1985 or so to the present. I need to start the course with an overview so that each of the modules makes sense in context. The readings for the modules are to be primary materials. I'm wondering if anyone knows of a good, globally oriented, short book or long essay on the 20th Century I could use for the overview. Other suggestions, particularly though not limited to the following would also be welcome: a novel written by someone English during WW II or at least by someone English about WW II; a contemporary novel written by a Sub- Saharan African. I've got Japan pretty much covered but would love to have suggestions there too. The primary readings are not to be limited to "high" literature such as fiction. Government documents or whatever from the relevant period, for instance, are quite acceptable.

Any suggestions, then?

Gratefully,

Burt Kimmelman
[redacted]

↑ Index

585. Steve Carll
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

> Annie Finch wrote:
>
> Your feeling that the sonnet will still be around no matter how we treat it reminds me of how people used to feel about the ocean, the ozone, ad the old-growth forests. A form is a living thing in my book and needs sustainable care.
>
> _____

I have to go with Daniel Bouchard on this one. Annie, you get upset when people equate your literary politics with your social ones, so why resort to a cheap shot like that?

All form is impermanent. Sorry, but everything changes, and especially forms made of language, which is perpetually re-created by millions of people speaking who have different ideas about what's what.

A poem-as-living-thing analogy I could buy, but form doesn't exist by itself, it's always the "form that a poem takes." If the poem wants to change its form, that's evolution at work. If a child is born with 12 toes instead of ten, we don't say it no longer fits the definition of _Homo sapiens_ (at least, I hope no one would say so.)

To me, form is a means to an end, the end being to create a work that can engage the psyche at a deep level and make some contribution to its liberation. A poem whose only end is to fit someone's definition of a form is just showing off. (If I were feeling really pissy, I could draw an analogy between people who overvalue form and people who have lots of plastic surgery, but that would put us back into the inappropriate simile trap.)

**********

Steve Carll
[redacted]

"--A sound of waters bending astride the sky Unceasing with some Word that will not die...!"
--Hart Crane
**********

↑ Index

586. Alan Golding
Michael Ondaatje
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Does anyone have e-mail / snail mail / phone number information for Michael Ondaatje? (Any or all of these would help.) Backchannel is fine.

Thanx in advance,

Alan

↑ Index

587. Rod Smith
Re: request for exercises about place
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Juliana-- It's called "walking on colors"-- have students walk a city block or a country mile paying attention as much as possible to one color of their choosing, & then write about it. Burroghs talks about this somewhere-- one thing it can lead to is a realization that "collage" is the norm, a shared characteristic, a color, is nevertheless diffuse, inconstant, piecemeal. It's also just an attention trick-- to get one to look carefully at the situation(s). I saw a map Bernadette used in a St Mark's workshop which gave a route for students to walk. I think they were supposed to buy something, & come back & give it away. . .

Rod

---
Juliana Spahr wrote:

I have to teach a how-to-teach poetry workshop in a week or so about the theme of place. It is for the Bard L & T program where the emphasis is on experimental writing approaches (a lot of the assignments resemble things on the EPC experiments list).

Does anyone have any ones related to the theme/idea of place in particular that they have heard of/used?

Rod Smith gave me a good one from  Burroughs (?) about having people go out and write down everything they see in a particular color. The lesson being the collage like nature of experiental experience. Am I telling this right?

If anyone has any and they back channel them to me, I can post to list or interested individuals when I compile list.

Also having to teach a fiction workshop next year. Anyone done this? I need ideas and exercises and syllabi. Same thing, if you have, send to me and I will repost or resend.

Thanks lots.

Juliana Spahr

↑ Index

588. Chris Stroffolino
just thought you'd want to see this
Thu 30 May 1996

---

From:  IN%"[redacted]"  "Discussion of Contemporary American Poetry" 30-MAY-1996 13:23:50.36 To:  IN%"[redacted]"  "Multiple recipients of list CAP-L" CC: Subj:  Creeley's Place (fwd)

by cnsvax.albany.edu (PMDF V5.0-7 #8051)
id <[redacted]> for [redacted]; Thu, 30 May 1996 13:23:00 -0400 (EDT) with BSMTP id 5932; Thu, 30 May 1996 12:19:12 -0500 (CDT) with TCP; Thu, 30 May 1996 12:19:11 -0500 (CDT)
30 May 1996 12:20:54 -0500 with spool id 22002 for [redacted]; Thu, 30 May 1996 12:20:53 -0500
30 May 1996 12:20:32 -0500
30 May 1996 12:20:31 -0500
Date: Thu, 30 May 1996 12:20:29 -0500
From: CAP-L <[redacted]>
Subject: Creeley's Place (fwd)
To: Multiple recipients of list CAP-L <[redacted]> Approved-By: CAP-L <[redacted]>

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: 29 May 1996 14:12:52 U
From: GrahamD <[redacted]>
To: CAP-LIST <[redacted]>
Subject: Creeley's Place

Prompted by recent discussion, I've been happily re-reading Creeley and some of the critical responses to his work. One striking fact is that his work has been respectfully attended to by a wide variety of other poets proceeding from very different aesthetic stances--everyone from Robert Bly to Thom Gunn, Donald Hall to Ron Silliman. To be sure, Creeley's aversion to the heroic (noted by Silliman, among others), as well as his notably skeptical intelligence, seem to have helped provoke some penetrating critiques even from admirers.

I find RC's work highly uneven. Many poems are little biting gems (such as the renowned "I Know A Man"), while others strike me as mere finger exercises, opaque or trivial notations. An instance of opacity, which opens the poem "To And":

To and back and forth direction
is a third

or simple fourth of the intention like it goes and goes.

And here's a poem I would call trivial, "A Piece" in its entirety:

One and one, two,
three.

Furthermore, critics have well noted Creeley's tendency to dispense with many traditional elements of poetic appeal, such as figuration, imagery, narrative, concrete diction, and sensuous richness as found in Roethke or Thomas (RC's sound-craft is subtle and elusive on its own terms). Although his work is intensely intimate, he forgoes confessional revelation almost entirely. All these are omissions worth noting with skeptical regard, to my mind.

But so what? The compensating virtues are certainly abundant, and equally worth examination. One possible way into such a discussion is this. Lately I have been pondering RC's affinity with a range of writers beyond the usual Black Mountain suspects. For if as some have argued his work is central to our time, don't we need to look at how he stacks up against poets outside the Pound/Olson/Williams current? Such judgments as I have just leveled above (that many poems are trivial or opaque, e.g.) do presume an intention evidently not acknowledged by RC, for whom the poem seems not so much an artifact as the product of an exploratory process. The poem's aim is improvisation, not just its means.

Putting it in these terms, then, makes me want to connect Creeley's work to that of A.R. Ammons, Adrienne Rich, and William Stafford--all of whom, despite obvious differences, appear to share commitment to an improvisatory poetics. (I see other affinities with poets as distinct as William Bronk and W. S. Graham.) Ammons and Stafford, in particular, have seemed to many readers to commit too many trivial or opaque notations, insufficiently winnowing wheat from chaff. Formally and thematically, all these poets seem to make a central concern the limitations of language to capture or express what we most want it to; and all are very skeptical of heroic rhetoric.

Maybe there is a great divide here, between poets of this stripe and others, such as Lowell, for whom writing a "great" poem is always the object, even in his most improvisatory mode. Creeley, Rich, et al. don't seem to think that great poems can be written, and appear unsure that one should try: they seem to suggest that there are more interesting fish to fry, both emotionally and intellectually. Or at least that notions of greatness need to be examined afresh.

Well, these thoughts are all too rough, and I certainly haven't said much about what I admire in Creeley. But perhaps my notions here may provide some handhold for others to grab and continue the discussion?

David Graham
Ripon College
[redacted]
++++++++++++++++++++++

↑ Index

589. Gabrielle Welford

Re: Music City sonnet

Thu 30 May 1996

---

> bantering martians hope for glory
> we committed literary piracy on the high seas
> Al left Billie Joe Cat found the path to
> hunger large as scaredy free-throw
> underground stone guitar blue uniformed blow
> mouth on double-cross diploma clue
> a world without nouns is healthy?
> sequined sequels quells
> primacy recency a magnificat its own
> catorziemme and quattrocento etc
> and minnie pearl and conway twitty
> a dirge enough for Solent murk
> too much robing and screeing
> the voice of an angel and the soul of

> blue few, grow a garage band
> glue bag a branding fag wagered row
> Sue the crew could count, although > soccer Tolemy semper vivens

↑ Index

590. Emily Lloyd
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

At 10:22 AM 5/30/96 -0700, Steve Carll wrote: >>Annie, you get upset when >people equate your literary politics with your social ones, so why resort to >a cheap shot like that?

Cheap shot or no, the analogy doesn't work because forests are gone, sonnets are not. Shakespeare's on the net and no one's bombed all the libraries yet. No matter how the form is played with, strictly formal sonnets do & will survive, as mummies do. So the question seems to be not whether formal sonnets will survive but whether they'll continue to be written. Hacker, Campo, etc., suggest that they will. I am not especially convinced that it deeply matters if they are not. We've got a lot in & on the books.

Actually--Annie--I think that one way sonnets can survive (as a present or future, not a past thing) is through our engagement & play with them, as in the "Ghost" (sorry, don't have the rest of the title with me) poem. Using the word "sonnet" in the title, and then not writing a formal sonnet, may be a "mockery" of/rebellion against/bending & breaking of the form--but at the same time, making reference to a "sonnet" at all in the title attests to the "importance" or "continual life" of the form, even if that importance is nothing more than that the idea "sonnet" was present when the piece was composed--that a formal sonnet, perhaps, haunts the poem (or the poet). The sonnet, too, as Ghost. "Sonnet" is not yet hackneyed. Here it continues to in/form the poet, poem & audience. What more could an ole' form ask?

> A poem whose only end is to fit someone's definition of a form > is just showing off.

Oh Steve! And you with a heroic couplet for your sig.!

> [redacted]
>
> "--A sound of waters bending astride the sky

> Unceasing with some Word that will not die...!"
> --Hart Crane

Emily

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Emily Lloyd [redacted]
"Fist my mind in your hand"--Rukeyser

↑ Index

591. George Bowering
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

> A form is a living thing in my book and needs sustainable care.
>
> Annie

If it is in your (or anyone's) book is it really living?

.....
"In town we have arguments."
--Stan Persky
George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

592. Joe Amato
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

this is a sonnet a sonnet this is a sonnet is this a sonnet is this
this is a sonnet a sonnet this is
a sonnet is this a sonnet is this
this sonnet is a sonnet this is a
is a this sonnet is a this sonnet
this sonnet is a sonnet this is a
is a this sonnet is a this sonnet
this a sonnet is a sonnet this is
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

is a sonnet this is a sonnet this
this a sonnet is a sonnet this is
is a sonnet this is a sonnet this is this a sonnet is this a sonnet
this is a sonnet this is a sonnet

↑ Index

593. Jordan Davis sonnet quiddity
Thu 30 May 1996

---

Rob Hardin certainly wrote:

A seventeenth-century sonnet can be analyzed in purely rhetorical terms. Such aspects of the sonnet might not be as commonly understood as its rime-scheme and meter. But that doesn't mean they are too obscure to be understood.

Lawrence J. Zillman's piece on the sonnet in the Pinkerton directory of poetry suggests that the 'form' of the petrarcan sonnet causes a 'two-part division of thought' to be 'invited'. Zillman elsewhere notes that Wyatt took an immediate liking to the closing couplet, that Petrarch's 'artificiality of treatment' stemming from 'Platonic love themes' were exported throughout Europe along with the metrical pattern and rhyme scheme, and that in this century the sonnet has seen the gradual phasing out of 'metronomic' iambs and exact rhymes even as the form has been present in poems having 'almost any subject and mood.'

Btw, Charles, is the title 'Tone Lock' a reference to the rapper Tone-Loc?

By all of which I mean to suggest, Rob, that opening the encyclopedia is as exasperating as one imagines.

What is at stake, Maria, I think, is the claim to centrality--not, as some might have it, centrality of group formation based on the relative merits of poets or poems--but of the sensibility (the sense it makes) implied by what one assumes when writing. What is writing about. Some categories of sensibility--idea, form, words. 'Or words.' If you control the central sensibility, then people come to your readings, read your poems, talk about them, etc.

Which they do (or do not) anyway.

It's not simply, Rod, that poets are deluded into thinking there's a restricted economy. It's more like: poets are intolerant. Poetry has so much to do with articulating what one is about--subtler more urgent etc.--that to have to acknowledge work that contradicts one's own--it's a kind of cognitive dissonance that hits most of the poets I know where they fight or fly. Quine suggests a logic that can incorporate contradictions, and he I think cites Whitman. What kind of a poet was Whitman, anyway? What was central for Whitman, I mean. Joe Ross's 'fuzzy logic' series I've gushed about here, too. Bob Holman's cafe gig was described by the new yorker how? Taste brooks no contradictions, though. Apparent conflicts, like loving both gourmet food and jello, aren't contradictions--travelling in tastes you see everything-- or, Jordan, if you make a pact with yourself to ignore your basic need to be rude to people who are making mistakes--then it may be possible for you, individually, to read poetry (spring in) and participate in (this world of) poetry politics (poor mutts) happily. This will to be civil may make you crazy, but it will spare you much embarrassment when your turn comes to be exposed for the fool you certainly are.

Jordan

↑ Index

594. Charles Alexander
Re: Nonset Form
Thu 30 May 1996

> this is a sonnet a sonnet this is
> a sonnet is this a sonnet is this
> this is a sonnet a sonnet this is
> a sonnet is this a sonnet is this
> this sonnet is a sonnet this is a
> is a this sonnet is a this sonnet
> this sonnet is a sonnet this is a
> is a this sonnet is a this sonnet
> this a sonnet is a sonnet this is
> is a sonnet this is a sonnet this
> this a sonnet is a sonnet this is
> is a sonnet this is a sonnet this
> is this a sonnet is this a sonnet
> this is a sonnet this is a sonnet

Nice.

this is a sonnet a a sonnet is a sonnet is this this is a so is a sonnet this a sonnet is this this sonnet is a a is sonnet is a this sonnet this sonnet is a net this is a is a th net

this net is a sonnet this is is this this a sonnet is a sonnet this is is a son net this is this a so this a sonnet et this et

charles

↑ Index

595. Carnography

Careerism

Thu 30 May 1996

---

The following is my contribution--which I may or may not choose to read, depending on which possibility will do the most to enhance my Poetic Career (I'm gonna be rich, my astrologer told me!)--at the Unbearables' Careerism Festival, which will take place on June 2nd, 5pm, at Chez Rollo (37 Avenue B).

---

Parasitologia Hungarica (or Stomp Me That Latin Swing)

(in which an insect biologist renounces academic verse for The Nyorican Poetry Cafe)

Rob Hardin

Her father studied the etiology of necrophilous and slime-gathering stingless bees, filth breeding flies on a Hungarian cattle farm.
Breathing stale must in a shuttered office,
she monitored insect thought to research the effects of popular anti-depressants on worker ants, engendering adult mosquito surveillance for control programs involving larval parasitoid uses.
This is a shameless career move, Father said.
And still she couldn't adjust;
her wig-frizz issued parricidal slivers
in a dense-faceted surface as gray as cerci.

Still stiller trembled the insect genechimes, still still, spittle-spill-reamed the rills of the sills
Muerte, Los Blancos! Muerte, Los Wasperitos!

They call me the Cuban Khlebnikov! The afrocubicentric boy with a surgically-inset Spanish-American dictionary and the ability to PRONOUNCE MACARONIC VERSE SEMI-CORRECTLY WHILE SNORING! HAIL MULTICULTURAL SATAN (or Lyle Menendez)! Do not doubt me, Bob, for I AM THE REAL DEAL!

Oh, yeah, Edwin, swing your notochords, [jazz reference], doo-wee-ooh-wee-ooh-wee...
dwee-dwee, vah-vooooooommmmmmmuhhhh....

And then the latinate-pharmacobiological-arachnid-reference-pace quickened.

Highway tube Speed-bug mood
Flyin' to thuh beaker
With sum speed-bug food
Got-uh hardcore 'scope
N' uh lab-test boll-Weevil-fat-assed-Creole
Uh-slippin'-n'-uh-lippin?
MMMMM!-uh-nuh-nuh-nuh-nuh-nuh
Bug times, yeah!
Bad times, no!
Listen to thuh pistons
N'-uh off uh go
Vroooooom-vroooooommmmmmmmmmmmmmuhhhhhhhhhh....

O Morphine Bug-Daddy, nodding off in the petri dish of Now...

Don't stop displaying or you'll get ridged palms, Mother said, and you'll always live in a cylinder of z-pools.

As the aggregation pheromone of misanthrope hostesses burrowed through nilotic mires pixeled with pathogens in foraging behaviour that provided no solutions to the reliability-detectability problems of late adolescent Oecologia Blowflies, alterations in adult taste responses by chemicals present during the development of Phorma regina sent this pathology inward.

To study the minds of parasites is a worthwhile activity, Ramon, since all property is theft, according to local open-field shoppers. Scatologies are the empires of parents who can't awaken from their sodium tripolyphosphate attachment career decisions.

(I don't believe in endings)

So what do you think, Mr. Courtney? Do I have a shot?

↑ Index

596. Tony Green
Re: Poem of Weeping Ghosts in Sonnet Form
Thu 30 May 1996

---

I second Jerry Rothenberg's remarks on the extraordinary lines at the bottom of Annie Finch's posting. Me, I'm all for students being made to write sonatas to keep The Sonata from being forsaken as an awkward damn  puzzle to solve, and The Sonatina, and the hybrid The Sonnetina. All The Best,

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

597. Laura Moriarty
benefit for New Langton Arts
Thu 30 May 1996

---

One Night Only!

Word X Music

Norman Fischer, Leslie Scalapino, Kit Robinson and Laura Moriarty will be reading with musicians Donald Robinson, James Routhier and Glenn Spearman in what the flyer describes as a "full on jam session" this Saturday June 1 at 8 pm.

Tickests are a suggested donation of $10. Reservations are at [redacted].New Langton Arts is at 1246 Folsom Street between 8th and 9th streets.

↑ Index

598. Thomas Bell
Re: Russian/American sonnet quiddity
Thu 30 May 1996

---

After a desultory time as an English major, I date the beginning of my positive experiences with poetry to the early 60's when I was able to read Russian.  I found the early work of Yevtushenko and Vosnesensky. This led in many directions, but I think the fascination was related to a comment made on this list a few days ago about the Russian poetry festival.  I deleted this (and would appreciate a copy sent) but the general idea was that the difference between American and Russian poetry was that American poetry was a carefully constructed experience (whether formal or experimental) while Russian poetry began with the experience.

This is consistent with my experience even if I or the poster of the comment might not be using words that adequately describe the difference. I feel there is a difference and that the difference is related to the current form discussion. If anyone understands what I am talking about I would appreciate hearing from them either here or offlist.

Thanks
Tom Bell

↑ Index

599. Rod Smith
New Books fer Poetics
Fri 31 May 1996

---

It was suggested to me that I periodically select 5 or 10 new books from Bridge Street Books to offer to the list. Hopefully this will be of use for browsers as well as shoppers, simply as a bit of "what's new." Ordering info follows the list of books. This first list is almost entirely poetry. In the future I will include critical books, fiction, etc. We're expecting Bob Perelman's _Language Writing & Literary History_ soon.

1. _Bleeding Optimist_, Mary Burger, Xurban, $7.00. Some of you may know the excellent magazine _Proliferation_ Burger was (is?) an editor for. "Accidents happen here."

2. _Stone Marmalade_, a play by Kevin Killian & Leslie Scalapino, Singing Horse, $9.50. "This play is our concerted attempt to demolish society." --L.S.

3. _Frame Structures: Early Poems 1974-1979_, Susan Howe, New Directions, $12.95. Reprints 4 early books with a lengthy recent essay.

4. _Symmetry_, Laura Moriarty, Avec, $9.95.
"The one clear night which encompasses the subject forgets everything."

5. _Channel-Surfing the Apocalypse_, Susan Smith Nash, Avec, $11.95. Prose & some drawings. Hey, a blurb by Burroghs (not quite as rare as Pynchon, but close). Titles include: "Knowledge is Lonely and Filled with Sticky Sap" & "My Bulimic Jesus."

6. _Natural Facts_, Melanie Neilson, Potes & Poets, $11.00. Cover is a daguerreotype, 1840s, "Still Life with Pumpkin, Shakespeare, and Sweet Potato." Lauterbach mentions Ives in her blurb, seems right to me. "Will Congress / Canary the canon?"

7. _Clean and Well Lit: Sel Poems 1987-1995_, Tom Raworth, Roof, $10.95. Tom's tops.

8. _The Front Matter, Dead Souls_, Leslie Scalapino, Wesleyan, $10.95. "I'm a scout on the quiet road into it."

9. _In Memory of My Theories_, Rod Smith, O Books, $9.
"No analysand can indent this largesse." Highly recommended.

10. just ask, we may have it.

We also have a limited number of signed copies of Bernstein & Joris books from their recent significant & enlightened performance on our premises. Charles' _Dark City_ ($11.95), _Rough Trades_ ($10.95), _The Sophist_ ($11.95), _Islets/Irritations_ ($9.95), & A Poetics ($14.95). Pierre's _Breccia: Sel Poems: '72-'86_ ($14.95), _Turbulence_ ($8), _The Irritation Ditch_ ($4.50), & _Winnetou Old_ ($5). Also his translation of Celan's _Breathturn_ ($12.95).

Poetics folks receive free shipping on orders of more than $20. Free shipping + 10% discount on orders of more than $30. There are two ways to order. 1. E-mail your order to [redacted] with your address & we will bill you with the books. or 2. via credit card-- you may call us at [redacted] or e-mail [redacted] w/ yr add, order, & card # & we will send a receipt with the books.

Bridge Street Books, 2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW, Wahsington, DC 20007.

↑ Index

600. Charles Bernstein
new M/E/A/N/I/N/G
Fri 31 May 1996

---

Susan Bee and Mira Schor, editors of M/E/A/N/I/N/G
are pleased announce the publication of #19/20,
a special, double, final, 10th-anniversary issue.

Now available.

#19/20 will be an instant collector's item.
It features 120 pages of original artwork by visual artists who have written for past issues.

It also contains a valuable, complete, detailed index to issues #1-20 arranged by subject as well as by author.

This issue is available for $15 for individuals; $20 for institutions.

M/E/A/N/I/N/G #19/20 features: An All Visual Forum with Emma Amos, Douglas Anderson,Suzanne Anker, Ida Applebroog, Lillian Ball, Rudolf Baranik, Susan Bee, Charles Bernstein, Jake Berthot, Jimbo Blachly, Serena Bocchino, Power Booth, Nancy Bowen, Jackie Brookner, Richard Brown, Kathe Burkhart, Jack Butler, Sheila Butler, Rosemarie Castoro, Emily Cheng, Myrel Chernick, Daryl Chin, Maureen Connor, Jordan Crandall, Peggy Cyphers, Kevin deForest, Stephanie DeManuelle, Jane Dickson, Bailey Doogan, Rackstraw Downes, Johanna Drucker, Hermine Ford, Jason Fox, Nicholas Frank, Nancy Fried, Ava Gerber, Jeremy Gilbert-Rolfe, Sharon Gold, Leon Golub, John Goodyear, Mimi Gross, Nancy Grossman, Marcia Hafif, Freya Hansell, Hilary Helfant, Susanna Heller, Lisa Hoke, David Humphrey, Michi Itami, Julia Jacquette, Yvonne Jacquette, Tom Knechtel, Alison Knowles, Komar & Melamid, Joyce Kozloff, L. Brandon Krall, Robert Kuszek, Ellen Lanyon, Lawrence Lipkin, Fern Logan, Pam Longobardi, Medrie MacPhee, Lenore Malen, Ann McCoy, Ann Messner, Melissa Meyer, Michael Mikulay, Holly Miller, John Miller, Curtis Mitchell, Gregory Montreuil, David Moreno, Robert C. Morgan, Portia Munson, Kathryn Myers, Joseph Nechvatal, Diane Neumaier, Paul Pagk, Enoc Pérez, Nancy Pierson, Howardena Pindell, Barbara Pollack, William Pope. L, Lucio Pozzi, Rebecca Quaytman, Aviva Rahmani, David Reed, Trudie Reiss, Jacques Roch, Sal Romano, Erika Rothenberg, Juan Sanchez, Miriam Schapiro, Carolee Schneemann, Mira Schor, Christian Schumann, Arlene Shechet, Kate Shepherd, Pamela Shoemaker, Harriet Shorr, Dena Shottenkirk, Amy Sillman, Joan Snyder, Elke Solomon, Nancy Spero, May Stevens, Robert Storr, Sidney Tillim, Danny Tisdale, Nicola Tyson, Derek Weiler,  Lawrence Weiner, Faith Wilding, Martha Wilson, Michael Windle, Flo Oy Wong, Pamela Wye, Karen Yasinsky, Alexander Zane, Barbara Zucker

Order Information

A very limited number of complete sets of M/E/A/N/I/n/G #1-20 are available for $300.

M/E/A/N/I/N/G #1, 6, 8, 11 are only available as part of these complete sets. Other back issues (except for #19/20) are available at $6 each.  M/E/A/N/I/N/G #19/20  is $15; $20 (institutions)

SHIPPING COSTS
If you wish to order a complete set, please add for shipping:
$10, Domestic; $25 Foreign (air); $15 (Canada)
·Individual issues:  $5 (Foreign); $2.50 (Canada)
·Issue #19/20:  $10 (Foreign); $5 (Canada)
· Foreign orders please pay by international money order in U.S. dollars

All checks should be made payable to Mira Schor.
Send all orders to:

Mira Schor
60 Lispenard Street
New York, NY 10013

**

also available at some bookstores and from SPD

↑ Index

601. henry gould
Re: Nonset Form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

On Wed, 29 May 1996 19:34:06 -0700 Gary Hawkins (or Laura?) said:
>
>If a thing has holes in it, I think we should know about it. What's called >"anomaly" in science is called "rebellion" in poetry-- either way >revolutions do happen.

Isn't it true that in certain periods in English lit. history, adding an extra syllable to the line was making a statement - a flourish, something scandalous, outrageous, flagrant. But the english language has an extraordinar y springiness to it, and in America it sprang all out of meter. Here, now, the anomalous thing is to rein in the springiness with meter.

> The English dumped the Italian sonnet once they realized it's easier to rhyme in Italian. American rhymes even less.

Depends on your definition of rhyme. Off-rhyme, conceptual rhyme, inside-out rhyme - the english vowels are FULL of rhyme.
>
>Besides, once a form's been done, why do it again for anything other than >practice, to prove you can do it?

This attitude, paradoxically, takes form too seriously. It's poets & poetry from long time ago that still haunt us today (I mean literally haunt us). I wrote a poem about Hart Crane the 3rd section of which is a sonnet because I wanted to draw close to Crane's own memorial sonnets (to Dickinson & Melville). The sonnet is not a form but just a way to direct the song. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

602. henry gould
Re: Au pur delice sans chemin (1)
Fri 31 May 1996

---

On Thu, 30 May 1996 09:22:29 CST David Baratier said:
> Ses purs ongles tres haut dediant leur onyx,
> L'Angoisse, ce minuit, soutient, lampadore,
> Maint reve vesperal brule par le Phenix
> Que ne recueille pas de cineraire amphore.

Se Franc Goutier et sa compaigne Helaine
Eussent ceste doulce vie hantee,
D'oignons, civotz, qui causent forte alaine,
N'acontassent une bise tostee.

"If Franc Gontier and his companion Helene had ever led a life as sweet as this, they wouldn't give a damn for scallions or onions which cause bad breath"

Franswayze Villon, trans. Anthony Bonner
-- Henri Goulet

↑ Index

603. Nada Gordon
naropa dates/topics
Fri 31 May 1996

---

Does anyone know the dates and topics for the Naropa summer writing program?

Or if they have something resembling a website?

You can backchannel me at [redacted].

↑ Index

604. henry gould
russ/am po form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

Tom Bell made a comment about differing Russian & American approaches to poetic form. Was it my post you were referring to? I didn't exactly say that Americans build an experience in the poem, while Russians respond to prior experience, though that's close. I was reflecting both on my own take of the readings I heard at the conference and on a remark made to me my Russian poet Elena Shvarts, to the effect that Americans take their time through the poem getting to what they want to say/discover, while the russians impose a kind of finality on the poem through tight forms. This was most evident in Ivan Zhdanov's reading, who reads short intense almost riddle-like lyrics in a kind of flat, resigned way - the manner playing off the intense emotional effect. On the other hand, a poet like Shvarts is very expansive - but within the metrical CHANTING speech of russian poetry and a kind of folklore-witchcraft approach to classic modes & forms (clearly I think in the line of both Akhmatova & Tsvetaeva).

The end result of both approaches for me was that the american langpos like Bruce Andrews get to a kind of dionysian explosive effect through crazy free rant - whereas for the russians the dionysian is definitely there but it takes on a kind of tragic finality. Shvarts also mentioned to me how different russian poetry audiences are - a lot of emotionality, weeping, etc. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

605. Carnography

Re: Careerism, yes; but formal exactitude as well

Fri 31 May 1996

---

Jordan Davis:

> yah but obviously matt cour(t)ney's not the one to ask...

That's certainly to his credit, isn't it-- that he turned his back on the nastier ramifications of self-promotion? I just saw Matthew in the street, en route to his night at Biblio's, and I must say, the man has integrity written on his forehead.

Not coincidentally, when I looked closely at the writing on Matt's forehead, I noticed a certain adherence to Shakepearean sonnet form:

Integrity, integrity inte-
Grity; integrity integrity,
Integrity: integrity inte-
Grity integrity--integrity
Integrity--integrity (Inte-Grity!) integrity integrity
Integrity integrity inte-
Grity integrity integrity.

Integrity integrity inte-
Grity integrity integrity?

Integrity integrity,inte-
Grity, integrity integrity?

Integrity, integrity inte;
Grity integrity, integrity.

(I wonder...do you think...and I mean this, as it were, in the specu/la/tive sense...that we might have belabored this subject? Or is my sentiment too reminiscent of Henry David Thoreau?)

Obviously, Matt is alluding to the early magic realism of Virginia Woolf, who said, simply, "Style is rhythm."
Or perhaps he is merely repeating the words "mug" and "shoe" in an utterly random sequence.

Nothing is more formidable than a degree in composition (except, perhaps, a degree in zither repair).

Looking forward to your thoughts on the relationship between Tourette's Syndrome and agogic accents in the couplets of Snodgrass. Until then, I offer you an extended vacation from my thoughts on any subject.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

↑ Index

606. Herb Levy
Re: naropa dates/topics
Fri 31 May 1996

---

I thought other people might be interested so I didn't back channel the URL for Naropa.

<http://www.naropa.edu/>

is the main page.  The summer programs are described at

<http://www.naropa.edu/summer96.htm>

> Does anyone know the dates and topics for the Naropa summer writing program?
>
> Or if they have something resembling a website?
>
> You can backchannel me at [redacted].

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

607. Peter Jaeger

nonset form

Fri 31 May 1996

---

sonnets are little rooms:

sonnet 2

much to young at heart beat poets are the unacknowledged income will be penalized

sonnet 18

one for all and all for one 2 3 o'clock four o'clock rock talk

sonnet 37

so never say never enough time to go man go go dance class struggle

Peter Jaeger

↑ Index

608. henry
forming at the mouth
Fri 31 May 1996

---

AD HOC SING-SONG SEA SONNET

I heard a tugboat huffing through the fog while standing on a pier in gloom and guano.
I heard it straining like a hunting dog leashed against drowning.  Far below gray breakers, the bored sea-god, a snoring mythological typhoon, dreamed he floated too - sirens surrounding his dais, sun feathering the sea-calm...

I thought - despite these dreary docks and screaming gulls, that dumb sea-god and I are one.  I dreamed his squid-like, salty locks;
he dreamed his air-filled, regal buoyancy;
and neither, throned in dry sandcastles, knows where that turbulent, stubborn tugboat goes.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

609. Daniel Bouchard
Fwd: russ/american poetry conf
Fri 31 May 1996

^^^

"But I like being able to speak acccurately about poetic phenomena,  and I find the technical terms in their original meanings extremely useful."

I know this is being awfully picky of me, but isn't this sense of "original" highly problematic? Who wrote the very first sonnet? Who first used the term sonnet? Is either of these uses the controlling definition of the form (for "speaking accurately" or any other purposes) Annie or anyone wants?

charles alexander

↑ Index

611. Pierre Joris

Re: naropa dates/topics

Fri 31 May 1996

---

The Naropa homepage for the summer program is however a reduced version -- oddly enough for the Jack Kerouac School of Disembodied Poetics's Summer Writing Program it leaves out a number of the visiting writers who will be teaching there this year: week one also has Kenneth Irby,Katie Yates,Mark Amerika & Keith Abbot; week 2, Paul Hoover, Beverly Dahlen & Don Byrd; week 3, Pierre Joris, Will Alexander & Kathleen Fraser.

========== Pierre Joris | "Form fascinates when one no longer has the force Dept. of English | to understand force from within itself. That SUNY Albany | is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | "Poetry is the promise of a language." email: | -- Friedrich Holderlin [redacted]|
==========

On Fri, 31 May 1996, Herb Levy wrote:

> I thought other people might be interested so I didn't back channel the URL for Naropa.
>
> <http://www.naropa.edu/>
>
> is the main page.  The summer programs are described at
>
> <http://www.naropa.edu/summer96.htm>
>
> Does anyone know the dates and topics for the Naropa summer writing program?

> Or if they have something resembling a website?
>
> You can backchannel me at [redacted].
>
> Herb Levy
> [redacted]

↑ Index

612. Annie Finch
Nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

by miavx1.acs.muohio.edu (PMDF V5.0-5 #14024)
id <[redacted]> for
[redacted]; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:13:54 -0500 (EST)
30 May 1996 19:13:53 -0400
id AA49639; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:13:52 -0400
with BSMTP id 3582; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:12:41 -0400 (EDT)
by UBVM.CC.BUFFALO.EDU (LMail V1.2a/1.8a) with BSMTP id 9837; Thu,
30 May 1996 19:12:41 -0400
Date: Thu, 30 May 1996 19:12:41 -0400
From: "L-Soft list server at UBVM (1.8b)" <[redacted]>
Subject: Rejected posting to [redacted]
To: [redacted]

You are not authorized to send mail to the POETICS list from your [redacted] account. You might be authorized to send to the list from another of your accounts, or perhaps when using another mail program which generates slightly different addresses, but LISTSERV has no way to associate this other account or address with yours. If you need assistance or if you have any question regarding the policy of the POETICS list, please contact the list owners: [redacted].

---------- Rejected message (89 lines) ---------- V1.2a/1.8a) with BSMTP id 9265; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:10:16 -0400
with TCP; Thu, 30 May 96 18:56:41 EDT
id AA59247; Thu, 30 May 1996 18:57:42 -0400
Date: Thu, 30 May 1996 18:10:43 -0500
To: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
From: [redacted] (Annie Finch)
Subject: Re: Nonset Form

Emily Lloyd wrote:

> Cheap shot or no, the analogy doesn't work because forests are gone, sonnets are not. . . . So the question seems to be not whether formal sonnets will survive but whether they'll continue to be written.

Thst's what I mean by "survive"--continue to be written (and not only be written--be written by engaged, original poets). "Mummy" forms thataren't being written haven't survived as living forms, only as artifacts.

As you point out, Hacker, Campo etc. can do it, as can some of the women in A Formal Feeling Comes, because their self-consciously marginalized position as gays or women builds an ironic distance into the form.

I am not especially convinced that it >deeply matters if they are not. We've got a lot in & on the books.

You're not convinced, but it clearly matters to some poets such as Hacker/Campo, who get a lot of power from the form. Personally, I am not all that interested in writing sonnets either right now (big surprise to the list, huh?), but I like having many different kinds of forms around.
>
>Actually--Annie--I think that one way sonnets can survive (as a present or >future, not a past thing) is through our engagement & play with them, as in >the "Ghost" (sorry, don't have the rest of the title with me) poem.

I agree completely. I have no desire to prescribe, ossify, define, or limit anyone's play with, the form or any form. But I like being able to speak acccurately about poetic phenomena, and I find the technical terms in their original meanings extremely useful. Can't people play with the form, altering it more or less as they desire, without taking the terminology along with them? Couldn't someone say, my poem is a take on the sonnet, rather than, my poem is a sonnet, if in fact it is not a sonnet as much as another poem is? It's common sense, isn't it--most educated people would know what you meant if you said that one poem was actually a sonnet and another was a poem that, while not really technically a sonnet, alludes to a sonnet through such and such characteristics. My main interest is to increase the number and accuracy of the terms available to us as people who want to discuss poetics. I understand the danger of limiting in some regressive and stifling way the play with a form by saying that such-and-such is not a sonnet and such-and-such is. But on the other hand, if the sonnet is so dead and pointless, then why all the fuss about keeping its name? Why not let the poor ole dead pointless form keep its own name so that those who choose to mess about in its remains, for whatever perverse reasons of their own, can at least know clearly what they are messing about in? Perhaps one reason this idea is so threatening to some on the list is that the technical and critical awareness/terminology to discuss other forms, newer forms, is just being developed; we are just barely able to discuss the poetics/prosody of free verse with any accuracy, thanks to work like Hartmann's, Boughn's, and Holder's (and perhaps my own Ghost of Meter). Maybe as we begin to develop resources to discuss the newer prosodies, it will become clear that there is plenty of room for many kinds of forms and we don't have to be fighting so hard over the stupid ole sonnet.

Thanks, Emily, for your response.

Annie Finch (writing from my office on a decent email program for once, so this time there will be no typo soup of unerasable fragments to follow so deliciously on my leftbrain words. Sorry, Jerry Rothenberg! I'll be back home tomorrow and able to cook up another yummy batch. Aren't they wonderful? I like them too. I'll miss them when the university finally gets it together to give me access to this program at home.)

ANNIE FINCH
DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH
MIAMI UNIVERSITY

↑ Index

613. Annie Finch
nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

by miavx1.acs.muohio.edu (PMDF V5.0-5 #14024)
id <[redacted]> for
[redacted]; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:13:56 -0500 (EST)
30 May 1996 19:13:55 -0400
id AA20460; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:13:53 -0400
with BSMTP id 3583; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:12:42 -0400 (EDT)
by UBVM.CC.BUFFALO.EDU (LMail V1.2a/1.8a) with BSMTP id 9843; Thu,
30 May 1996 19:12:43 -0400
Date: Thu, 30 May 1996 19:12:42 -0400
From: "L-Soft list server at UBVM (1.8b)" <[redacted]>
Subject: Rejected posting to [redacted]
To: [redacted]

You are not authorized to send mail to the POETICS list from your [redacted] account. You might be authorized to send to the list from another of your accounts, or perhaps when using another mail program which generates slightly different addresses, but LISTSERV has no way to associate this other account or address with yours. If you need assistance or if you have any question regarding the policy of the POETICS list, please contact the list owners: [redacted].

---------- Rejected message (35 lines) ---------- V1.2a/1.8a) with BSMTP id 9451; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:11:07 -0400
with TCP; Thu, 30 May 96 18:59:47 EDT
id AA45970; Thu, 30 May 1996 19:00:51 -0400
Date: Thu, 30 May 1996 18:13:52 -0500
To: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
From: [redacted] (Annie Finch)
Subject: Re: Nonset Form

When I wrote,

>> A form is a living thing in my book and needs sustainable >>care.
>
George Bowering wrote,

>If it is in your (or anyone's) book is it really living?
>
Yes, that was my point: That some things in books seem living to me, such as forms, when they are seriously engaged with, and words, when they are not too transparently referential .

ANNIE FINCH
DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH
MIAMI UNIVERSITY

↑ Index

614. Joe Aimone
"A Sonnet" - take two or three
Fri 31 May 1996

---

(with apologies to the other Joe A)

This is "A Sonnet," a sonnet. This is a "sonnet" - - Is this a Sonnet? Is this
This? Is a sonnet a sonnet? This is.
A sonnet is this: a sonnet. Is this
this? Sonnet is. A sonnet, this, is. (A
Is A!) This sonnet is a this. Sonnet
this: sonnet is _a_ sonnet. This. Is a
is a this? Sonnet is a this-sonnet.
This, a sonnet, is a sonnet this is.
Is a sonnet this is a sonnet? This
this a sonnet? Is a sonnet this? Is
is a sonnet this is? A sonnet this is, this, a sonnet, is this, a sonnet.

This is a sonnet: this is a sonnet.
--
Joe Aimone
Department of English
University of California, Davis
[redacted]

↑ Index

615. Annie Finch
Jerry Rothenberg's favorite typo soup
Fri 31 May 1996

By the way, for those who have been wondering if I am possessed by a mischevious pomo imp bent on undermining any dignity I might manage to drag into the aarea of the sonnet's wornout aura, an explanatory postscript follows my the signature of my response to Emily Lloyd .

--Annie F.

(the ion of the nation, as today's imp has it) hantion ion of the nationla

↑ Index

616. Robert Drake
Re: Nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

> I agree completely. I have no desire to prescribe, ossify, define, or limit anyone's play with, the form or any form. But I like being able to speak acccurately about poetic phenomena, and I find the technical terms in their original meanings extremely useful...

i, fr one, have not misunderstood this discussion to be about prescribing what one may or ought do; some of the arguementativeness here seems not to be about what is allowed, as it does about what is useful... praps some have felt that a focus on more traditional forms implies that such forms are worth considering, to the exclusion of work that is bends or breaks those forms?

> ...Can't people play with the form, altering it more or less as they desire, without taking the terminology along with them?

my underlying assumption is that form is a social construct, rather than an objectivly quantifiable, absolute? (praps this puts us on different planets, not talking th same language...)  but from that standpoint, it makes perfect sense for a poet to "take the terminolgy" and use it as a source of cultural meaning/ context for work that, in strict prosidic analysis, doesnt have the physical features of the traditional form.

i used to do a soundpoem performance called "sonnets", no words allowed but w/ traditional rhythmic & "rhyme" schemes made using vocal & non-vocal improvised sound events...

it's interesting to me, that this discussion has pretty consistently refered to sonnet as typical ov formal poetry...  wd offer as contra- example modern haiku--the old 5/7/5 stanza forms and content restrictions have, in many contemporary "schools", largely been dispensed with.  but distinctions are still made & hotly debated about what is or is not a "true" haiku--"formal" distinctions being made on the basis of "content"... dunno how that connects, if at all,w/ yr emphasis in repetition ov elements-- tho it seems that content is the repeated element? in linked forms, where each verse is to echo/refer to th previous verse, but not to the verse before that?

asever
lbd

↑ Index

617. Pierre Joris
Re: naropa dates/topics
Fri 31 May 1996

oops, I forgot week 4, which also has Sean Killian, Bradford Morrow & Lee Ann Brown among its visiting writers

========== Pierre Joris | "Form fascinates when one no longer has the force Dept. of English | to understand force from within itself. That SUNY Albany | is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | "Poetry is the promise of a language." email: | -- Friedrich Holderlin [redacted]|
==========

↑ Index

618. Burt Kimmelman
The Poetics of Authorship
Fri 31 May 1996

---

From: TESLA::KIMMELMAN 31-MAY-1996 11:27:11.25
To: ADMIN::KIMMELMAN
CC:
Subj: The Poetics of Authorship

Announcing my new book (please ask your local and university librarians to buy it--since, at $49.95 plus $3.00 shipping, it's probably too steep for civilians):

THE POETICS OF AUTHORSHIP IN THE LATER
MIDDLE AGES: THE EMERGENCE OF THE MODERN LITERARY PERSONA

New York: Peter Lang Publishing, 275 7th Ave., NYC 10001.

To order: Phone 1-800-770-LANG (5264), or [redacted].
FAX [redacted]

or contact Mary McLaughlin, Director of Marketing, at: [redacted]

or see Peter Lang's web page: http://www.peterlang.com

ABOUT THE BOOK (taken from its back cover):

Literary individualism first manifests in the twelfth century in word puzzles and overt self-naming as well as in discussions about the nature of writing and the role of the poet in the world. Guillem IX, Marcabru, Dante, Chaucer, and Langland, were poets and intellectuals. This engaging study traces their claims of authorship, not to a need for what modernity views as self-promotion, but rather to their interests in contemporary philosophical debates. Yet in their creations of both history and fiction, these poets anticipated modern narrative and its literary persona.

"Kimmelman's work on the poetics of authorship is enlightened, cogent, often exciting--a significant contribution to our understanding of the medieval text as mediator between the collective and the individual. Kimmelman is nuanced, insightful, and always aware of the resonances that involve not only the medieval but the modern: in sum, he has given us an alert, sensitive guidebook to the post-Classical career of ars poetica."
- Allen Mandelbaum, Kenan Professor of Humanities, Wake Forest University

"The task that Kimmelman has set himself, to locate in some of our medieval predecessors the earliest pulse beats of what we understand--almost take for granted--as the poetic persona, demands a rich and deep reading not only of writers like Guillem IX, Marcabru, Dante, Chaucer, and Langland, but also of the shifting intellectual currents that enabled each of them to hold up a mirror to reality that also reflected an image of his individual self. That he rises so well as critic, scholar, and teacher to this challenge, results in an extraordinary opportunity of recognition for his readers; there are moments when Kimmelman's discussions actuate encounters of singular connection with these historic points of poetic self- consciousness and vitality." - George Economou, The University of Oklahoma

Or else, if you are interested, you can contact me:

Burt Kimmelman
[redacted]

Thanks for listening . . . .

↑ Index

619. henry
somnolosonnets
Fri 31 May 1996

---

Tell me if I'm wrong, yea, tell me if I'm wrong-- yet I detect beneath the stout defense of form-breaking and the dizzy spins on that most scandalous word,
"Sonnet"--
a longing, yea,
a longing for a little song,
yea, a little song to call our own?

--Sieur Henri de la Tour de Platitude Altesse

↑ Index

620. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH
PROTO-ANTHOLOGY of HYPERMEDIA POETRY now AVAILABLE
Fri 31 May 1996

---

announcing

the appearance of

a PROTO-ANTHOLOGY of HYPERMEDIA POETRY

edited by Chris Funkhouser

(v.1) featuring

Andrew Stone

Diana Slattery

Christy Sheffield Sanford

Jim Rosenberg

Ted Nelson

Jerome McGann

Bill Luoma

Eduardo Kac

Michael Joyce

Robert Creeley John Cayley

Lee Ann Brown

Jay David Bolter

m a n y o t h e r s

AVAILABLE NOW

free of charge

http://cnsvax.albany.edu/~poetry/hyperpo.html

↑ Index

621. Annie Finch

SONNETS/FORMS

Fri 31 May 1996

---

IÕd like to address at once several of the messages from around May 15 that I was finally able to read yesterday at my ofice--and then take a breather (!).

1. Rob Hardin wrote,

ÒSome modern sonnets are really ÒsonnetsÓ (though pomo has rendered the quotes unnecessary). Ò

Absolutely; I couldnÕt agree more. I would even extend the argument to say that ALL modern sonnets are ÒsonnetsÓ, although the only the more interesting of them seem to be aware of the fact (examples of more and less self-conscious varieties, and various justifications some contemporary poets have for writing them, are available in the infamous A Formal Feeling Comes (AFFC).

ÒMuch of what is called experimental in the stricter sense is as patterned and marmoreal as any neoclassical Dryden.Ó

Again, I agree completely. And again, please propose editing a section on one/some of these experimental forms for the Exaltation of Forms book.

ÒIn a Shakespearean sonnet, syntax, diction, and compression are demonstrably Òtangible.Ó

Yes, but are they demonstrably different from the syntax, diction, and compression in Shakespearean blank verse, or in quatrains? Do they have any terminological ramifications, since all weÕre talking about here really is terminology? ArenÕt the fourpart (English) and the twopart (Italian) argumentative structures, which Paul Oppenheim has brilliantly argued helped to construct the bourgeouis consciousness of an individual self during the Renaissance, the only such aspects of the sonnet that are really unique to the form and thus might have definitional value in discussions of poetics? And even if that is the case, is it really worth it to take such a relatively bland and widespread phenomenon as syllogistic structure as the defining characteristic of the sonnet--thus forfeiting much of the definitional impact of the outrageously complex and infuriating core structures and all their hardwon nonce or established variations, 12-line, 18-line, dactylic, or whatever?

2. Aldon Nielsen wrote: Ògiven the definitions offered, the only work that wd. be recognized as a new form wd. seem to be a work that invented something new to repeat.Ó Yes, that is what the definition was at the time, and it was clearly too limited. ItÕs gone. Maybe the sections on new kinds of forms in the Exaltation of Forms anthology will provide material for those interested in constructing further definitions of form.

3. David Kellogg wrote, ÒWould a poem count [as formal] for you [according to the definition discarded above--AF} if it used Òconspicuous repetition at the alphabetic level? Say the poem is lineated around the principle of Ò3 fÕs per line.Ó ?Ó

Yes, such a poem would definitely have been formal by my conspicuous repetition definition--assuming that the 3 fÕs were perceptible to the naked reading eye. And I love the idea of your friendÕs new letters of the alphabet. What do they look like, what are their names? Dr. SeussÕs are a bit too disappointingly composites of actual letters for me.

4. Tony Green wrote that DickinsonÕs Òformal feelingÓ poem Òdoes not really fit the amazing grace/heartbreak hotel/yellow ribbon of texas/gates of eden pattern-and so I am interested in the co-optation of Dickinson as a formalistÓ

I agree, it does not fit the pattern. In the book The Ghost of Meter: Culture and Prosody in American Free Verse, I spend a chapter discussing how that poem and several others by Dickinson use a dynamic between the folk stanza pattern and the iambic pentameter pattern as their formal principle.

5. Finally, Steve Carll and Tony GreenÕs posts are based on several unexamined assumptions about form, which I will list to get them out in the open:

a. that one ÒtraditionalÓ sonnet is exactly like another; hence you can predict what a poem will be like if you know itÕs in traditional sonnet form (SteveÕs second post)--why should this be true any more than itÕs true that you can predict what one more chant or open-form poem will be like?

b. that the only reason to write a sonnet or any other form is Òto prove that you can do itÓ Ditto--wouldnÕt that be true to the same extent for a projective verse poem or any other kind?

c. that ÒcountingÓ is assumed to be Òa measure of success in writing.Ó Clearly, what KIND of form something is in has nothing to do with its success as writing--except insofar as the text engages more or less dynamically and creatively with its form, whatever the form is. This is about terminology, not about judging the quality of writing.

--Annie F.

↑ Index

622. Annie Finch
"sonnet" in sonnet form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

ENCOUNTER

Lurching across the bus, our faces glide into its core, and back, and then we see
each others' eyes begin and settle them free.
I am the wing struggling in the buses side;
you are the wing that opens when we turn
together to lock our eyes into one bird.
We fly inside, nothing can be heard,
and the first journey ends. Our faces burn with solitude together though we move
as if I travelled separate from you. Child made of the darkness, woman, man, my own remembering, incarnate, opening love,
we look away and leave, grown far more wild
in emptiness, the closer we have grown.

↑ Index

623. Annie Finch
Re: Nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

Dear Charles,
Youa re absolutely right about "original." Very sloppy use fo the word. Well, is there another way to say it?
If not does thaqt mean it's not worth saying?
--Annie

↑ Index

624. Daniel Bouchard
Re: "sonnet" in sonnet form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

This bus is obviously traveling to Pound's Dim Lands of Peace.
Express route, one way.

Annie, if this is a "living thing" isn't it kinder to kill the form?

[redacted]

---

ENCOUNTER

Lurching across the bus, our faces glide
into its core, and back, and then we see
each others' eyes begin and settle them free.
I am the wing struggling in the buses side;
you are the wing that opens when we turn
together to lock our eyes into one  bird.
We fly inside, nothing can be heard,
and the first journey ends.  Our faces burn
with solitude together though we move
as if I travelled separate from you.  Child
made of the darkness, woman, man, my own
remembering, incarnate, opening love,
we look away and leave, grown far more wild
in emptiness, the closer we have grown.

↑ Index

625. David Baratier
non such sonnata forms continuum
Fri 31 May 1996

As a part of a marginalized group in the US, namely, a survivor of the generation which directly experienced the 80's crack epidemic and as a member who actually parlays any attention to words at all,  I quite often use the sonnet as a formulaic methodology of appropriating control for myself, as well as large words. The use of the sonnet as a historically masculinist propaganist tool for reifying the social stature and division between upper crust masters and indentured (poet) servants is aptly suitable for the modern-day low-caste survivalist whose sensibilities are continually extricated with a suburbanite martyrdom founded on television coverage of areas which are so ugly with possession they could not possibly possess a sense of community.

David Baratier

↑ Index

626. Steve Carll
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Fri 31 May 1996

At 12:39 PM 5/31/96 -0500, Annie Finch wrote:

>5.  Finally, Steve Carll and Tony GreenÕs posts are based on several >unexamined assumptions about form, which I will list to get them out  in the >open:
>
>a.  that one ÒtraditionalÓ sonnet is exactly like another; hence you can predict >what a poem will be like if you know itÕs in traditional sonnet form (SteveÕs >second post)--why should this be true any more than itÕs true that you can >predict what one more chant or open-form poem will be like?

I think I have examined this, Annie, and I also think by and large you CAN predict what one more chant or open-form poem will be about.  If form is adhered to too strictly it becomes a parody of itself.  This is what insisting too authoritatively on "precise definition" produces, and it's the danger of what you seem to be advocating.

>b. that the only reason to write a sonnet or any other form is Òto prove that >you can do itÓ Ditto--wouldnÕt that be true to the same extent for a projective >verse poem or any other kind?

Again, most of the time, yes, it would, except, as you say below, when it "engages more or less dynamically and creatively with its form, whatever the form is." What do "dynamic" and "creative" mean? They have to do with energy, force, movement into the new. How can that take place without the TRANSformation I mentioned a couple of days ago? If energy is trapped within a closed room, the room blows up.

>c. that ÒcountingÓ is assumed to be Òa measure of success in writing.Ó Clearly, >what KIND of form something is in has nothing to do with its success as >writing--except insofar as the text engages more or less dynamically and >creatively with its form, whatever the form is. This is about terminology, not >about judging the quality of writing.

Exactly. And I say, overterminologization does violence to the phenomenon being engaged with.

||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||
``````````````````````````````````````````

Steve Carll [redacted]

I listen.
I hear nothing. Only
the cow, the cow
of nothingness, mooing
down the bones.
~~Galway Kinnell
``

||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||

↑ Index

627. Chris Stroffolino

Re: Nonset form

Fri 31 May 1996

Dear Annie Finch-- I have a question in all seriousness that I would be really interested in your answer to. I am currently looking at alot of sonnets by poets who later on in their careers went on to be known for, and celebrated more, for their "experimental" vers libra. For instance, the early sonnets of

Frank O'Hara, Jack Spicer, Laura Riding. Coming from the perspective I do, I tend to want to vindicate these early experiments in form (just as I am interested in Mondrian's "flowers" (etc) and Franz Kline's early railroad landscapes)--as important. Yet, would you be interested in me posting one or two of these. Because it's one thing for a critic like Marjorie Perloff to criticize, say, O'Hara's early sonnets in terms of his later work. But I am curious what you would say about them. I ask this in all humility. Thanks, Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

628. Charles Alexander

Re: Nonset form

Fri 31 May 1996

> Dear Charles,
> Youa re absolutely right about "original." Very sloppy use fo the word. Well,
> is there another way to say it?
> If not does thaqt mean it's not worth saying?
> --Annie

Perhaps what you're looking for is a generally "accepted" definition, rather than an original one. And the discussion on this list generally argues against any such definition being too static & unchanging. Most of your comments seem to me to argue that the tradition of the sonnet gets considerable respect (and not undue respect) in any forthcoming definition. It's been interesting to me that this is a live and, seemingly, rather urgent question to people. Frankly, it hasn't been one to me. I may write a sonnet once in a blue moon, when what I want to say seems to want to occupy that form -- i.e. I can't remember in the last twenty or so years ever trying from a beginning point of composition to write a sonnet, but have found myself, in the midst of the poem, coming to that form or some emendation/challenge of that form. But as far as arguing for the validity of the form, or for any definition of it at all, it's just not an issue for me. So I view this discussion with some interest & curiosity. If this turns into a conversation about how poems find their form, be that sonnet or whatever, I would probably be a more avid reader of the posts in this thread.

Good luck in your anthology. I hope you have lots of takers to edit sections on forms, including evolving forms, experimental forms, etc.

charles alexander

↑ Index

629. George Bowering
Re: nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

> When I wrote,
>
> A form is a living thing in my book and needs sustainable care.
>
> George Bowering wrote,
>
> If it is in your (or anyone's) book is it really living?
>
> Yes, that was my point: That some things in books seem living to me, such as forms, when they are seriously engaged with, and words, when they are not too transparently referential .
>
> ANNIE FINCH
> DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH
> MIAMI UNIVERSITY

Ah, there's a difference betweeen our poetics, I guess. In my experience, or in my practice, the form becomes discernible when the poem is spoken, except for, say, concrete poetry.

.....
"In town we have arguments."
--Stan Persky
George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

630. Annie Finch
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Fri 31 May 1996

Re the reply to Rob H., Aldon N., Steve, Tony, et al: the program I sent this on converted open quotes to R, closed quotes to S, and apostropohes to U. I apologize and would appreciate it if anyone who captures/quotes text convert them to what they should be to avoid the distraction. Doesn't all this, even the typo soup, make you appreciate your own email program?

-Anniedai oahat they sht they 1w t

↑ Index

631. Annie Finch
Re: Nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

Dear Chris,
Yes. I tend to love anything O'Hara does so I might not be too objective, but I've left his Collected in my office and I would like the chance to respond to them in the context of this discussion.
--Annie

j

↑ Index

632. Rod Smith
Re: Nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

---

came across this rereading Creeley's _Autobiography_ (pg. 95)--

". . . When young, I'd written Olson with almost pious exclamation: 'Form is never more than an extension of content.' Now I might say equally, 'Content is never more than an extension of form.' It depends, as they say in New England. Back of it all I hear Williams again, saying all those years ago, 'Why don't we tell them that it's _fun_. . .' "

↑ Index

633. Annie Finch
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Fri 31 May 1996

Dear Steve,
So you cede the point taht one can predict what an open-form poem or chant will be about, or a projective verse poem, as much as one can predict what a sonnet will be about.
Then how can you read at all, if you find such that such predictability precludes reading?
Do you honestly think that every "experimental" poem is in a completely new form? You seem to be painting yourself into a corner.

-Annie

you at

↑ Index

634. Annie Finch
Re: Nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

Dear Charles,

Thanks for your thoughts for the anthology. I hope there will be takers, and this si the time to take, so please let me know, anyone who wants to do a section on a form (still some nonexperimetnal ones left too--anyuone for the ballad stanza? Charles Bernstein--didn't you say you were interested in cowboy poetry--or perhaps anapests, since you're the only other person I know besides myself who seems to appreciate Swinburne?) and any experimental form, repetitive or nonrepetitive.(Women, by the way, would be especially welcome at this point. this point-- Could one possibly imagine why?)oaically I completely share your goal, Charles, of bringing the deiscussion to the point of how poems choose thier forms, sonnet or whatever they may be, and I think the best demonstration of the sonnet's deadness, or poetry's freedom from it, would be if your attitude of what's all the fuss about were to become common. I have no idea why it's such a big deal. My hands were slapped during my apprenticeship if I ever tried to write in form, or to write out of the "Sentimetnal" tradition Pound quashed, so probably it's no surprise that I'm interestd in these things now. But why is it so threatening in the arena of this list? con ? Actually, I don't care why--

Though I would like to make th epoint that if as Mike B. suggested to me backchanneling, this is threattening because of a superficial similarity to neocon attacks , and . I have been surprised by the t k,saeiqkamths for the an.e con attacks on progressive thinking about literature, that is all the more reason to absorb carefully the germ of truth in each attitude towards poetics in order to build a stronger and more wellrounded/balanced/impervious/flexible body of thought about poetics.

--Annie

oi o

↑ Index

635. George Bowering
Re: Nonset form
Fri 31 May 1996

> Who wrote the very first sonnet? Who first used the term sonnet?
> charles alexander

Couple decades ago I was listening to Kenner, cant remember whether it was in the Japanese restaurant or at the lecture, when he posited that the sonnet was accidentally created when some Italian poet, writing eight-line stanzas, quit after doing 6 in his second stanza. Someone else found this and mistook it for a new form, and did another, etc.

Kenner compared this with the post-renaissance European sculptors who found Greek or Roman busts that were just torsi, the heads and limbs broken off, so that they started doing it too, not breaking off liombs, but making sculptures of torsi, and so we got that form.

.....
"In town we have arguments."
--Stan Persky
George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

636. Joe Aimone
take a sonnet, any sonnet (Not)
Fri 31 May 1996

(Since the other Joe A. is so agreeable, let me disagree with myself.)

Not is a sonnet. This sonnet. This not is a Sonnet. This is a Not Sonnet. This is a not-
Not-is. A sonnet, this sonnet, this not, is a Sonnet this is. A not sonnet, this is a not-
Not. "This is a sonnet" - - this "not" "is a sonnet."
Is a sonnet not this? Is a sonnet not this
Not this? (Is a sonnet this not?) "Is a sonnet"
Is a sonnet not this. "Is a sonnet" - - not this,
Not sonnet; this is a sonnet, this not.... Is a

Is a "sonnet?" This not is a sonnet. This not-
Not-sonnet, this is a sonnet. This not is a
Is. (A sonnet this not _is_ a sonnet!) This "not"
Is a "not" sonnet. "This" is a not-sonnet "this."
"Not" is a sonnet, "this" not. Is a sonnet this?
--
Joe Aimone
Department of English
University of California, Davis
[redacted]

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

June 1996

453 messages · Sat 1 Jun 1996 – Sun 30 Jun 1996

On the twenty-fifth of June a truck carrying two tonnes of explosive was parked against the perimeter fence of an apartment block at Khobar in Saudi Arabia, and nineteen American airmen were killed in their beds. The list does not mention it, and I have stopped being surprised by this. June was a quiet month by the room's standards, four hundred and fifty-three letters and no great quarrel, and its two presiding subjects were silence and nothing — Cage named two hundred times, Beckett a hundred — which the room meant, on this occasion, quite literally. What it was actually doing, without announcing it and possibly without noticing, was the one piece of business it had been failing at all spring.

The failing is easily stated. In March the list had spent thirty messages on avant-garde and could not agree the term meant anything; in May it had spent a hundred on the sonnet and could not agree that either. In June, when Ira Lightman asked which British poets engage seriously with language poetry, Ken Edwards answered him generously and then added, from the bottom of his soul, "don't anybody dare start another thread" on what exactly langpo is. The room had lost its appetite. Three months of trying to fix the meaning of words it had used for twenty years had produced nothing but fatigue and jokes about a woman's surname.

Meanwhile the other thing had happened. In April, larking about in the poetry-video argument, Chris Stroffolino had typed the word quertzblatz, which is not a word, addressing the list as seriously quertzblatz guyzies. May took it up — thirteen messages, and Rob Hardin composing a mock lexicon of specimens and usage, numbered in Roman figures of which several are not Roman figures — and one correspondent, Tim wood, put his finger on it exactly: an "empty signifier in a non-existant space". That is what it was. It had no meaning at all, which was the entire joke.

And in June the joke stops. Nobody discusses quertzblatz in June; they use it. J. Beer, opening the month's largest thread with a serious question about Beckett and Cage and the impossibility of big-S Selfhood, remarks in passing that Cage seems to have mattered more to "querzblatian types" — a coinage of a coinage, deployed without gloss, in a subordinate clause, and understood by everybody. Tom Beard, recommending a poet, allows that "she's not querzblatz enough for some". The word now has an adjective and a comparative. It took nine weeks. The sonnet has had seven hundred years and is still being argued about.

What redeems all this from mere farce is the month's other thread, which Jordan Davis opened with five words: "Anybody read any good poems lately?" The answers came for a fortnight — Michael Boughn with Lise Downe, John Kinsella with Rod Mengham, Ken Edwards emptying his active shelf, Carnography with the Dennis Cooper, George Bowering reporting of a New Zealander's poems that "they are really bad" — and somebody posted ECW Press's street address in Toronto, and then somebody else posted it again with the fax. I have set the empty word and the full shelf on either side of one another exactly as June sent them, because a room that could not say what a poem was, and had given up trying, could still tell you without hesitation which one to read, and where to write for it.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 453 in all.

WRITERS

. 439
<[redacted]...., J.V. Kinsella (By Way Of Char... 273
Alexander, Charles 119, 146, 149, 209, 217, 218, 282, 297, 421, 449
Amato, Joe 6, 35, 94, 129, 131, 152, 160, 350, 440
Anderson, Curt 398
Armantrout, Rae 400
Baratier, David 20, 42, 44, 55, 62, 87, 89, 244, 285, 311, 340, 343, 344
Barker, Stephen 225
Beach, Christopher J. 19
Beard, Tom 25, 446, 447
Beer, J. 184
Bernstein, Charles 172, 266, 276, 368
Billitteri, Carla 264
Bouchard, Daniel 203, 310
Boughn, Michael 5, 86, 112
Bowering, George 45, 57, 96, 107, 117, 124, 234, 315, 317, 318, 326, 327, 328, 329
Brannen, Jonathan 24, 211
Cabri, Louis 28, 47, 106, 319, 441
Carl, David 80
Carll, Steve 10, 15, 287, 412, 438
Carnography 30, 31, 56, 122, 123, 125, 127, 159, 164, 186, 200, 245, 246, 249, 256, 293, 296, 298, 333, 334, 337, 405, 430, 450
Cathy 386
Cheek, Cris 4, 75, 78, 224, 230, 235, 280, 288, 291, 303, 312, 347
CHERNOFF, MAXINE 226
CHRISTOPH, FUNKHOUSER 290
Clay, Steven 374
Damon, Maria 417, 418, 419, 425, 448
Davis, Jordan 22, 36, 41, 46, 52, 68, 79, 173, 176, 212, 240, 278, 283, 300, 321, 324, 336, 390, 414, 445
Drake, Robert 71, 97, 111, 137, 231, 294
Edwards, Ken 37, 138, 171, 213, 251, 252, 349
Felix, Joel 453
Filkins, Christopher 384
Finch, Annie 1, 2, 3, 12, 18, 23, 27, 51, 63, 118, 301
Foster, Edward 189
Glazier, Loss 352, 357, 388, 389, 408, 420, 422
Gleason, Eryque 72, 168, 346
Glover, Albert 281
Goldsmith, Kenneth 144
Golumbia, David 61, 187
Gould, Henry 17, 21, 49, 77, 242, 243, 247, 307, 308, 335, 339, 355, 363, 387
Goulding 284
Green, Tony 26, 167, 232, 233, 265, 345, 392, 393
Guertin, C.g. 85, 105
Guest, Eliza McGrand- CVA 130, 147, 241, 451
Hartley, George 358, 371, 375
Hehir, K.a. 48, 142, 143, 145, 169, 330, 332, 372
Heller, Michael 237
Henry 11, 74, 272, 275
Holman, Bob 380
Huk, Romana Christina 220
Izenberg, Oren 53, 67, 227
Joris, Pierre 33, 110, 126, 128, 260, 306, 361, 362, 373, 395
Kellogg, David 183, 369, 410
Killian, Kevin 13, 14, 34, 161, 201, 206, 222, 366, 381, 401
Kimmelman, Burt 8, 157, 274, 323, 365, 378
Kinsella, J.V. 109
Kirschenbaum, Matthew Gary 98
L, McGuire Jerry 255, 341
Lazer, Hank 179, 370, 407
Levin, Jonathan A 210, 302
Levy, Herb 64, 83, 84, 166, 196, 198, 199, 215, 219, 236, 295, 436
LEWIS, JOEL 383, 402, 424
Lightman, Ira 65, 88, 151, 177, 228
List, Poetics 314
Lloyd, Emily 277
Loden, Rachel 331, 406
Luoma, Bill 325, 397, 443
Mandel, Tom 223
Matthias, John E. 433
Maus, Fred E. 136, 322
McVay, Gwyn 50, 76, 90, 148, 304, 313, 382
Moriarty, Laura 180
Muratori, Fred 250, 289, 338
Murphy, Sheila E. 342
Naylor, Paul 367
Nicholls, Peter 351
Nielsen, Aldon L. 39, 60, 81, 108, 113, 134, 154, 155, 156, 178, 207, 257, 286, 404
Northcutt, William 32, 299
Northcutt, William M. 409
Orange, Thomas M. 73, 121, 254
Peters, Carl Lynden 444

Phillips, Lisa Amber 452
Pritchett,Pat 248
Quartermain, Peter 403
Roberts, Mark 204, 205, 376, 396
Rosenberg, Jim 262
Rothenberg, Jerry 165
Saldana, Tristan D. 99
Salmon, Daniel 16, 103, 428
Schuchat 101, 270, 423
Schultz, Susan 95
Seagram, Blair 66
Shoemaker, Steven Howard 411, 413
Silliman, Ron 170, 202, 354, 385, 442
Slaughter, William 431
Smith, Charles 197, 415
Smith, Rod 54, 69, 70, 91, 100, 102, 104, 114, 191, 193, 221, 239, 391, 416, 432
Sondheim, Alan 7, 269
Stadelman, Jeffrey 82, 92
Stroffolino, Chris 43, 116, 132, 135, 150, 162, 174, 175, 182, 194, 208, 214, 216, 263, 271, 279, 348, 353, 356, 359, 364, 426, 427
Tedrow, - Kim 29, 141
Tietz, Ward 258, 259, 305, 429
Tuma, Keith 158, 434, 435
Vishio, Anton 133
Wallace, Mark 38, 40, 59, 181, 229, 253, 377, 379
Welford, Gabrielle 9, 316, 320, 360, 399, 437
Wilson, Robert J 93, 153, 238, 309
Wood, Tim 58, 115, 139, 140, 190, 192, 394
Wystan 163, 188, 195, 267, 268
Zitt, Joseph 120, 185, 261, 292

NAMES MENTIONED

Acker, Kathy 303
Ahern, Tom 211, 225
Albon, George 398
Alferi, Pierre 273
Alice, Mary 201, 202, 225, 401, 409, 438, 450
Allan, Don 30
Altieri, Charles 220, 225
Americans, Asian 213, 225, 290, 297, 316, 433
Anderson, Laurie 126, 191, 303
Andrews, Bruce 151, 208, 213, 225, 230, 236
Antin, David 303, 442
Arbor, Ann 360
Armand, Louis 442
Arnold, Bob 125, 136, 159, 395
Ashberry, John 344
Ashbery, John 30, 172, 186, 194, 228, 251, 348
Ashley, Robert 303
Atkins, Russell 370
Atwood, Margaret 117
Auden, W. H. 30, 248
Austin, Geer 30
Ayre, David 14
Baker, Mary 334
Ballard, Micah 30
Baraka, Amiri 61, 172, 174
Baratier, Dave 348
Barker, Clive 225
Barney, Matthew 56
Baron, Todd 70, 120
Basinski, Michael 452
Bataille, George 31
Bates, Joe 401
Baudelaire, Charles 212, 225
Baudrillard, Jean 191
Baxter, Ted 125, 136, 159, 228
Beach, Christopher J. 19, 23
Beatty, Paul 226
Beckett, Samuel 184, 185, 186, 188, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 201, 202, 208, 225, 230, 253, 272, 292, 295, 326, 327, 329, 403, 415
Beckett, Tom 342
Bee, Susan 66, 144
Behrman, David 126
Belgum, Erik 209, 225, 398
Bellamy, Dodie 13, 34, 161, 201, 202, 206, 222, 225, 366
Benjamin, Walter 126, 133, 409
Benson, Steve 220, 225, 230, 273, 303
Bergvall, Caroline 220, 225, 273, 303
Berkeley, Michael 149, 153, 217, 218, 225, 306
Bernard, George 303
Bernhard, Thomas 30, 223
Bernstein, Emma 151, 208, 225, 230
Berrigan, Anselm 14
Berrigan, Eddie 251
Berrigan, Edmund 14
Berrigan, Ted 252, 374
Beuys, Joseph 191
Blackburn, Paul 62
Blake, William 117, 334
Blaser, Robin 161, 264, 281
Blau, Rachel 353, 369, 401, 406
Bloom, Harold 93, 337, 339
Bolton, Ken 205
Borkhuis, Charles 38
Bouchard, Dan 371
Boulez, Pierre 264
Bowie, David 43
Bromige, David 220, 225
Bronk, William 157
Brook, James 220, 225
Brooks, Gwendolyn 344
Brossard, Nicole 220, 225
Brown, Ann 220, 225, 311, 346
Bruno, Franklin 133

Buckley, Jeff 397
Burns, Gerald 211, 225
Burroughs, William S. 165, 303
Burton, Philip 220, 225, 247, 401
Byrum, John 294
Bök, Christian 220, 225
Caddel, Ric 433, 434
Cage, John 40, 65, 67, 69, 70, 71, 120, 181, 185, 199, 225, 253, 261, 292, 303
Callas, Maria 14
Campbell, Bruce 366
Capen, Samuel P. 172
Carey, Steve 330
Carlos, William 336
Carroll, Lewis 395
Carter, Mike 82, 226
Catlin, Alan 340
Catling, Brian 303
Cayley, John 144, 220, 225
Celan, Paul 138, 149, 153, 382
Ceravolo, Joe 321, 385, 388, 390, 391, 402
Ceravolo, Joseph 379, 383
Ceravolo, Rosemary 321, 379, 383, 385, 390
Cha, Theresa Hak Kyung 149, 153
Chadwick, Lynn 211, 225
Chaloner, David 273
Charters, Ann 401
Chester, Jeff 433
Child, Abigail 220, 225
Clark, Cheryl 90
Clark, Susan 14
Clark, Thomas A. 273
Clark, Tom 374
Clarke, Jack 30, 213, 225, 432
Clinton, Bill 206, 225
Close, Chuck 395
Cobbing, Bob 213, 225, 303
Coleman, Victor 210, 225
Conover, Roger 366, 452
Cook, Peter 228
Coolidge, Clark 90, 151, 166, 197, 225
Cooper, Dennis 30
Cornell, Joseph 30
Cornell, Katherine 172
Corso, Gregory 156
Couani, Anna 205
County, Mike 180
Crane, Lee 27, 51, 56, 62, 63, 81, 93, 95, 122
Creeley, Robert 36, 90, 151, 172, 179, 264, 274, 296, 300, 353, 368, 385
Crosby, Harry 374
Cunningham, Michael 100, 198, 225
Darragh, Tina 230
Davidson, Ian 273
Davidson, Michael 353
Davies, Alan 213, 225
Davies, Kevin 14, 230
Davis, Martin 353, 412, 423, 430, 438, 447, 450
Dennis, Michael 125, 211, 225, 236, 294, 368
Derksen, Jeff 149, 153, 220, 225
Derrida, Jacques 33, 65, 126, 361
Desnos, Robert 30
Dine, Jim 172
Dixon, Bill 330
Dole, Bob 380
Donahue, Joe 401
Drucker, Johanna 144, 398, 449
Duggan, Laurie 173, 176, 204, 205
Duncan, Andrew 180, 273, 376, 434
Duncan, Robert 180
Dunn, Susan 452
Dutton, Paul 220, 225
Edison, Thomas 296
Edmond, Murray 416
Eigner, Larry 179
Einstein, Albert 306
Elena, Maria 77, 355
Eliot, Joe 176, 205
Emerson, Claudia 214, 225, 264
England, Amy 33, 84, 203, 220, 225, 230
Enslin, Ted 413, 419, 420, 424, 442
Epstein, Thomas 355
Estabrook, Michael 340
Evans, Steve 220, 225, 353, 401
Faulkner, Andrew 201, 202, 225
Federman, Ray 368
Felstiner, John 148
Finlay, Ian Hamilton 303
Fisher, Allen 213, 220, 225, 230, 252, 273
Fodaski, Elizabeth 14, 324
France, Peter 81, 93, 126, 433
Frances, Mary 401, 431
Franco, Michael 414
Fraser, Kathleen 213, 220, 225
Freeman, Brad 69
Friedlander, Ben 353
Friedlander, Lee 370, 401
Frym, Gloria 226
Ganick, Peter 211, 225, 294
Gann, Kyle 166
Garland, Judy 166
Gibson, William 126
Gilbert, Roger 398
Gilonis, Harry 138, 151
Ginsberg, Allan 30, 31, 90
Ginsberg, Allen 413
Gizzi, Peter 220, 225, 390
Gladman, Renee 14
Glancy, Diane 226
Glass, Philip 64
Godard, Barbara 220, 225
Goldberg, Ariel 90
Golding, Alan 220, 225, 401, 452

Gould, Glenn 49, 247, 339, 363, 405
Greenwald, Ted 151, 251
Gregory, Jane 337
Grossman, Allen 442
Guertin, Carolyn 85, 105
Guest, Barbara 273
Guitart, Jorge 377
Guston, Philip 236
Halpern, Daniel 383
Halsey, Alan 273
Hamilton, Ann 303
Hampson, Robert 213, 225
Hansen, Jefferson 132, 206, 225
Hardin, Rob 30, 31, 56, 62, 122, 123, 125, 127, 128, 133, 139, 159, 164, 186, 245, 246, 249, 254, 256, 337, 405, 412, 418, 430, 438, 450
Harper, Michael 174
Harryman, Carla 14, 151, 220, 230, 303
Haslam, Michael 138, 273
Hatlen, Burt 220, 225, 365, 378, 401
Hawkins, Ralph 138
Hayden, Robert 353
Haynes, Bob 374
Heidegger, Martin 254, 431
Hejinian, Lyn 151, 213, 225, 226, 230, 250, 289, 338
Henderson, David 431
Henri, Charles 242, 303, 442
Herbert, George 416
Herman, Rachel 401
Herron, Patrick 437
Higgins, Dick 65, 144
Hikmet, Nazim 442
Hill, Crag 294
Hill, Gary 303
Hillman, Brenda 226
Hirsch, Edward 303
Hollander, Ben 101
Hollander, John 250
Hollo, Anselm 226
Holzer, Jenny 303, 395
Hongo, Garrett 153
Hoover, Edgar 81, 93
Hoover, Paul 226
Howard, Richard 250
Howe, Bill 452
Howe, Susan 151, 236, 240, 253, 272, 273, 292, 295, 329, 403
Hughes, Peter 273
Hunt, Erica 156
Hunter, Carrie 334
Indiana, Gary 126
Inman, Peter 191, 230
Irby, Ken 442
Ireland, Lauren 220, 225
Jackson, Jesse 30, 102, 303, 401
Jacob, Max 30
Jaeger, Peter 330
Januzzi, Marisa 210, 225, 452
Jeanne, Sarah 180
Jillway, Jill 314
Johns, Jasper 70, 100, 102, 191, 195, 225
Johnson, Robert 337, 339, 347
Johnson, Thomas 212, 225, 296, 303, 337, 339, 395, 453
Jonas, Stephen 353, 370
Jones, Bob 334, 373
Jordan, June 10, 79, 86, 89, 96, 109, 138, 173, 176, 204, 205, 244, 277, 278, 282, 285, 287, 289, 300, 302, 321, 444, 445, 448
Joseph, Safdie 273, 340, 395
Joyce, James 275, 277, 278, 282, 285, 287, 289, 291, 296, 318
Joyce, Michael 61, 108, 186, 191, 202, 225, 275, 291, 296, 299
Joyce, Trevor 220
Kaufman, Andrew 81, 93, 370
Keats, John 296, 315, 430, 438, 450
Keller, Lynn 220, 225, 370
Kelly, Paul 442
Kelsey, Karla 156, 222
Kendall, Robert 290, 297, 316
Kennedy, David 433
Kennedy, Kit 126
Kenner, Hugh 11
Kerouac, Jack 210, 225
Killian, Sean 340, 348
King, Stephen 401, 436
Kinnell, Galway 10, 287, 438
Kirschenbaum, Matthew G. 98
Knowles, Alison 303
Koch, Kenneth 174
Kostelanetz, Richard 102, 209, 225
Kramer, Scott 452
Kramer, Wendy 452
Kroetsch, Robert 117
Kuhn, Steve 172
Kuhn, Thomas 306
Kuszai, Joel 314, 401
Kyger, Joanne 374
Lacan, Jacques 81, 93, 358
Lacy, Steve 362
Larkin, Maryrose 38
Laurence, Paul 306
Lauterbach, Ann 41
Lederman, Robert 395
Leggott, Michelle 428
Leigh, Mike 401
Lenhart, Gary 22
Leonard, Tom 180, 230
Levy, Andrew 114, 220, 225
Livia, Anna 282
London, Frank 28, 88, 126, 151, 167, 168, 171, 213, 225, 273, 334, 405

Lopez, Tony 220, 225, 273
Louise, Bobbie 57, 96, 107, 117
Lowell, Amy 183, 315
Lynch, Jessica 220, 225
Lyons, Kim 390
Macdonald, Helen 273
Mackey, Nathaniel 324
Madison, James 373, 395
Malcolm, Janet 248
Mallarmé, Stéphane 30, 124, 234
Mandelstam, Osip 247, 272, 355
Marie, Julie 180
Marley, Bob 303
Martin, Chris 368, 431
Martin, Paul 211, 225
Martone, Michael 373
Mason, Chris 230
Mathews, Elizabeth 416
Maus, Fred E. 136, 159, 322
Mayer, Bernadette 13, 34, 37, 416
McCaffery, Steve 158, 220, 303, 368, 416
Mead, Philip 220, 225
Melville, Pierre 401
Mengham, Rod 110, 220, 225, 273
Messerli, Doug 364
Middleton, Christopher 220, 273
Middleton, Peter 213, 225
Miller, Lee 126, 340
Mills, Billy 220, 225, 273
Milne, Drew 273
Milton, John 276
Miriam, Erica 220, 225
Mobilio, Albert 240
Monk, Geraldine 434
Moore, Marianne 81, 93, 108
Moore, Nicholas 93
Morris, Tim 211, 225
Morton, Kathryn A. 92, 196, 212, 225, 236
Moses, Robert 358
Muldoon, Paul 433, 447
Mulford, Wendy 213, 220, 225, 433
Murphy, Michelle 211, 225, 395
Murphy, Sheila E. 211, 225, 342
Murray, Elizabeth 84
Myles, Eileen 172
Nakell, Martin 387
Neilson, Melanie 41, 212, 225
Newton, Keith 306
Nguyen, Hoa 14
Nichols, Travis 220, 225
Niedecker, Lorine 179, 352, 401
Nielsen, Aldon L. 39, 60, 81, 93, 108, 113, 134, 154, 155, 156, 178, 207, 225, 257, 286, 404
Northcutt, William M. 409
Norton, John 130, 141
Notley, Alice 273
Nowak, Mark 209, 225, 413
O'Hara, Frank 353, 401, 435
O'Sullivan, Maggie 213, 225, 273, 432, 433
Olds, Sharon 250
Oliver, Douglas 273
Oliver, Laura 452
Olson, Charles 165, 179, 202, 225, 262, 264, 281, 315, 353, 401, 415, 435, 442
Oppen, George 113, 134, 156, 157, 161, 162, 179
Orange, Thomas M. 73, 82, 121, 254
Osman, Jena 324, 368
Pacific, Asian 153, 309
Padgett, Ron 383
Parker, Charlie 81, 93
Parker, Karl 430, 438, 450
Paterson, William 352
Patterson, Ian 273
Penberthy, Jenny 401
Perelman, Bob 30, 31, 208, 220, 225, 230, 348, 401, 422
Perlman, John 211, 225
Perloff, Marjorie 220, 225, 404
Perril, Simon 273
Perry, David 245, 254, 303
Persky, Stan 45
Phillips, Malcolm 452
Pines, Paul 211, 225
Piombino, Nick 230
Plath, Sylvia 353
Platt, John 144
Pollack, Jackson 395
Pollet, Sylvester 378
Portugal, Anne 273
Pound, Scott 81, 93, 101, 151, 366, 415
Di Prima, Diane 144
Prince, Richard 374
Pritchett, Patrick 248
Prynne, J. H. 273
Prynne, Jeremy 158
Purdy, James 124
Raine, Kathleen 434
Rakosi, Carl 413
Ramsdell, Heather 14
Raworth, Tom 41, 54, 213, 220, 225, 230, 251, 273
Reese, Marshall 374
Reeves, Jennifer 401
Retallack, Joan 65, 191, 199, 220, 225, 324, 370, 399, 401, 404, 413
Reznikoff, Charles 234
Ribot, Marc 338
Rich, Frank 240
Richards, Brian 334, 335, 337, 339
Richter, Karl 126
Ridge, Tom 238
Riding, Laura 30

Riley, Denise 220, 225, 273, 433
Riley, Peter 273
Rilke, Rainer Maria 325, 331
Roberts, Wendy 14
Robertson, Lisa 14, 348
Robins, Maureen 38, 366
Robinson, Elizabeth 226
Robinson, Mary 151, 230
Rodefer, Stephen 151, 228, 273
Rothenberg, Jerome 374, 401
Roubaud, Jacques 273
Roussel, Raymond 30
Saldana, Tristan D. 99, 105
Scalapino, Leslie 14, 149, 153, 220, 225
Schjeldahl, Peter 240
Schmidt, Michael 349
Schultz, Susan M. 211, 225
Schwerner, Armand 424, 429, 442
Scroggins, Mark 59, 370
Selby, Spencer 209, 225, 294, 344
Shakespeare, William 41, 296
Shapiro, David 348
Shapiro, Gary 385
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 303
Sheppard, Robert 213, 225, 432
Sherry, James 213, 225, 230
Simon, Greg 273, 277, 278, 282, 287, 395
Simone, Frank 126
Simpson, Bennett 334
Simpson, Louis 404
Sinclair, John 273, 296
Sloan, Margaret 220, 225
Smith, Dale 14
Smith, Hazel 220, 225, 303, 432
Smith, Tracy K. 303, 324, 433
Smithson, Robert 303
Sokal, Alan 39, 54, 276
Sontag, Susan 85, 99, 100, 102, 105
Sorrentino, Christopher 172
Spahr, Boyd 225
Spahr, Juliana 220, 225, 324
Sparrow, John 380, 390
Spicer, Jack 55, 161, 401
Spinelli, Martin 368
Springsteen, Bruce 240
Squires, Geoffrey 220, 225
Stafford, Jane 159
Stafford, William 159
Stanley, Jared 183
Stanton, Rob 401
Starr, Kenneth 366
Stefans, Kim 324, 442
Stein, Gertrude 254
Stein, Suzanne 151, 254, 389
Stern, Gerald 174
Stevens, Wallace 303
Stewart, Susan 126, 206, 225, 303, 366
Strand, Mark 93
Strang, Brian 14, 138
Strauss, Zoe 240
Sullivan, Gary 217, 225, 398
Sumner, Alaric 303
Sutherland, Keston 273
Taggart, John 370, 413
Tate, James 344
Taylor, Cecil 362
Taylor, Henry 38
Taylor, Jesse 38, 75, 206, 225, 306
Templeton, Fiona 220, 225, 303, 368, 432
Texas, Irving 395
Thesen, Sharon 366
Thomas, Dylan 92, 211, 225, 296, 306, 340, 370
Trevor, Jesse 225
Twain, Mark 309
Union, Poets 396
Upton, Lawrence 213, 225
Vermeersch, Paul 330
Vincent, Gregory 228
Violi, Paul 344, 383
Waldman, Anne 374
Waldman, Ken 90
Waldrop, Rosemary 416
Wallace, Sara 67
Walsh, Catherine 149, 153, 220, 225, 421, 434
Warsh, Lewis 374
Washington, Harold 40, 76, 181, 223, 367
Watson, Scott 14
Watten, Barrett 67, 122, 151, 171, 177, 220, 225, 230, 369, 401, 413, 452
Watts, Charles 14
Watts, Robert 334, 347
Weaver, Rebecca 126
Weiner, Hannah 151, 452
Wendt, Larry 303
Wharton, Samuel 366
Whitman, Walt 30, 55, 56, 62, 63, 122
Wiener, Hannah 258
Wieners, John 30, 203, 225, 401, 406
Wilbur, Richard 309
Wilkinson, John 220, 273
Wilkinson, Joshua 225
Williams, Tony 36, 68, 81, 93, 151, 165, 383
Williamson, Aaron 273, 303
Wilson, Pete 108
Wilson, Rob 93, 153, 238, 309
Winkfield, Trevor 251
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 367
Wolff, Rebecca 69
Woolf, Virginia 254, 401
Wordsworth, William 30
Wright, James 416
Yardley, Jonathan 239

Zelevansky, Paul 442, 449
Zorn, John 416
Zukofsky, Louis 151, 179
Zukofsky, Paul 401
Zurbrugg, Nicholas 191, 220, 225
Zweig, Ellen 303
Žižek, Slavoj 358

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 30, 180, 202, 225, 279, 298, 360, 395
Aesthetics 65, 82, 85, 102, 105, 257, 272, 293, 303, 305, 308, 309, 337, 339, 425
African American poetry 81, 93, 178, 353
Anthologies 6, 18, 19, 81, 93, 103, 159, 174, 180, 202, 209, 213, 225, 240, 251, 273, 294, 424, 429, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 442
Appropriation 53, 74, 75, 248, 303, 395
Archives and libraries 108, 166, 198, 225, 227, 250, 285, 289, 302, 314, 338, 349, 368, 390, 431
Asian American poetry 81, 93
Autobiography 374, 425
Avant-garde 133, 151, 209, 225, 326, 353
Beauty 65, 156, 353
Biography 65, 102, 241, 248, 401, 450
Black Mountain 303
Book announcements 6, 24, 38, 41, 59, 63, 70, 81, 93, 97, 120, 166, 218, 225, 226, 239, 350, 416, 431, 442
Bookstores 14, 97, 98, 141, 146, 218, 225, 226, 373, 397, 400, 401, 436
Cities 230, 268, 395, 442
Class 452
Close reading 182
Conferences and festivals 81, 93, 126, 146, 156, 161, 169, 178, 183, 198, 202, 220, 225, 230, 260, 273, 279, 294, 303, 310, 353, 354, 355, 358, 366, 367, 369, 370, 378, 380, 387, 401, 413, 419, 420, 425, 433, 435, 451, 452
Copyright and permissions 139, 209, 225, 294, 451
Craft 121
Creative writing pedagogy 425
Dada 308
Deconstruction 54, 135, 186, 234, 327
Difficulty 61, 65, 151, 228, 314
Dreams 83, 186, 334, 337, 339, 352
Ecology and ecopoetics 84
Editing 92, 205, 230, 344, 368, 370, 398, 442
Electronic poetry and hypertext 72, 224, 290, 297, 314, 316, 368, 377, 379, 385, 388, 389, 406, 408, 431
Elegy 273, 453
Empire and imperialism 85, 105, 238
Epic 347
Ethics 129, 181, 198, 200, 225, 241, 243, 248, 249, 250, 255, 256, 301, 308
Experimental poetry 10, 209, 225, 294, 344
Fascism 360
Feminism 146, 353, 451, 452
Film 126, 149, 152, 153, 241, 246, 248, 293, 334, 344, 401
Fluxus 258, 303
Formalism 18, 19, 63, 122, 404
Free speech 206, 225, 395
Free verse 125, 159
Futurism 298
Gender 51, 56, 63, 74, 123, 334, 353, 358, 401, 406, 452
Globalization 353
Grants and funding 33, 48, 108, 147, 209, 220, 225, 252, 351, 378, 431
Humour and satire 30, 31, 67, 191, 353, 370, 429, 449
Ideology 28, 249, 255, 257, 339, 358
Improvisation 126, 230
Interviews 65, 88, 91, 279, 292, 314, 373
Jewish poetics 143
Language poetry 19, 49, 122, 138, 151, 158, 171, 177, 213, 216, 225, 228, 230, 231, 251, 252, 263, 274, 379
Latino and Latin American poetry 360, 451
Letters and correspondence 180, 220, 225, 264, 295, 370, 396
List moderation 241, 248, 249, 256, 450
Little magazines 31, 89, 107, 149, 153, 166, 205, 209, 213, 225, 228, 240, 294, 314, 344, 380, 396, 424, 429, 431, 453
Lyric poetry 179, 182, 324, 353, 380, 385, 409
Memory 15, 18, 19, 63, 131, 334, 368, 401, 422, 453
MFA programs 68
Modernism 95, 131, 151, 158, 164, 171, 177, 201, 202, 204, 205, 213, 216, 225, 228, 230, 231, 251, 252, 263, 293, 308, 309, 409, 450
Mourning and loss 5, 7, 200, 220, 225, 314, 352, 356, 357, 359, 365, 366, 370, 385, 388, 389, 396, 401, 404, 408, 420, 422, 425
Multiculturalism 334
Music and poetry 3, 4, 9, 30, 59, 61, 64, 65, 67, 69, 70, 71, 73, 78, 82, 83, 84, 88, 120, 126, 128, 133, 140, 166, 169, 172, 178, 196, 198, 199, 218, 223, 225, 236, 240, 257, 276, 292, 303, 313, 317, 322, 334, 337, 339, 358, 362, 395, 397, 405, 412, 423, 425, 427, 430, 438, 447, 450, 452
Nature 11, 22, 144, 171, 353, 358, 370, 401, 422, 438, 450
Negativity and refusal 53, 301, 358
New Formalism 18, 19

New York School 379
Obituary and memorial 165, 306, 453
Objectivism 413
Ontology 333
Oulipo 315, 416
Performance and the poetry reading 81, 93, 149, 153, 172, 203, 209, 222, 225, 294, 371, 380, 452
Philosophy 14, 19, 186, 306, 327
Place and region 30, 59, 93
Poetics 39, 41, 53, 58, 59, 61, 64, 65, 67, 93, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 153, 163, 165, 206, 209, 210, 211, 225, 237, 238, 248, 253, 268, 272, 281, 290, 294, 297, 314, 323, 330, 344, 352, 368, 377, 382, 386, 402, 410, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 427, 431, 438, 439, 448, 450, 452, 453
Post-structuralism 81, 93, 358
Postmodernism 151, 171, 309
Print vs. digital 5, 33, 92, 141, 146, 149, 153, 165, 191, 199, 219, 220, 225, 241, 248, 249, 255, 301, 306, 331, 381, 382, 404, 409, 449
Prizes and awards 33, 139, 326, 364, 366, 396, 431
Procedural and constraint writing 102, 186, 327
Prose poem 397, 416
Prosody and meter 26, 56, 63, 159, 301, 334, 337, 339, 352, 405, 410, 412, 418, 430, 438, 450
Queer poetics 30, 139, 151, 161, 353, 360, 395
Race and poetry 33, 220, 225, 286, 334, 337, 339, 345, 353, 355, 360, 380, 401
Reading announcements 222, 294, 409, 431
Religion and the sacred 55, 126, 220, 225, 296, 334, 347, 360, 395
Representation 211, 225, 344, 358
Reviewing and criticism 40, 43, 44, 46, 48, 53, 54, 58, 59, 63, 64, 65, 67, 81, 88, 93, 122, 126, 131, 149, 151, 153, 154, 159, 180, 181, 191, 198, 199, 209, 225, 229, 236, 239, 240, 241, 248, 249, 250, 253, 255, 293, 301, 314, 334, 348, 350, 357, 358, 371, 373, 381, 419, 420, 431, 433, 449
Romanticism 18, 19, 159, 171, 177
Science 11, 21, 140, 306, 308, 414
Semiotics 153, 230, 333, 358, 441
Serial poem 218, 225, 383, 431, 442, 453
Sestina 175, 205
Small press publishing 13, 124, 141, 146, 153, 198, 217, 218, 222, 225, 238, 240, 251, 301, 314, 346, 400, 413, 431, 436
Software and code 126, 368, 394
Sonnet 2, 3, 4, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 16, 19, 20, 21, 22, 25, 27, 28, 32, 45, 51, 55, 56, 62, 63, 74, 122, 139, 149, 153, 228, 242, 277, 279, 309, 334, 342
Sound poetry 258
Structuralism 81, 93, 358
Subjectivity 15, 24, 41, 63, 164, 220, 225, 314, 320, 334, 358, 363, 385, 424, 429, 450
Sublime 153, 240, 305, 308, 309
Surrealism 30, 151, 159, 212, 225, 385, 452
Terrorism 360
The academy 82, 85, 89, 94, 98, 101, 105, 108, 129, 155, 160, 166, 183, 198, 204, 205, 218, 220, 225, 241, 248, 250, 255, 256, 289, 306, 310, 314, 334, 338, 352, 353, 355, 367, 368, 369, 376, 390, 396, 410, 413, 429, 431, 433, 451
The body 22, 293, 311, 346, 358
The canon 41, 93, 147, 450
The Holocaust 131, 143, 152, 431
The internet 6, 29, 42, 48, 84, 126, 206, 225, 262, 274, 352, 357, 362, 368, 373, 385, 388, 431
The line 159, 314, 368, 392, 441
The listserv 19, 30, 33, 54, 75, 108, 118, 141, 150, 181, 209, 225, 236, 246, 248, 255, 294, 306, 314, 320, 332, 351, 352, 361, 362, 419, 420, 424, 429, 432, 433, 435, 442, 446, 450
The New Sentence 59, 67, 145, 151, 163, 228, 230
Theatre 126, 146, 149, 153, 172, 198, 199, 209, 225, 326, 358, 395, 431
Translation 55, 91, 92, 138, 214, 225, 233, 245, 254, 265, 290, 297, 316, 331, 355, 359, 425, 431, 433, 442, 449
Vietnam 230, 320
Visual and concrete poetry 144, 209, 290, 294, 297, 316, 429
Visual art 10, 69, 176, 198, 205, 225, 260, 261, 263, 268, 286, 294, 372, 376, 395, 431, 433, 449, 451
Women's writing 213, 225, 411, 417, 421, 428, 432, 433, 434, 437, 446, 451

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 453 in all.

1 JUN 1996

1. Annie Finch — Re: nonset form
2. Annie Finch — Re: SONNETS/FORMS
3. Annie Finch — Re: Nonset form
4. cris cheek — Re: Music City sonnet
5. Michael Boughn — Re: just thought you'd want to see this
6. Joe Amato — Re: PROTO-ANTHOLOGY of HYPERMEDIA POETRY now AVAILABLE
7. Alan Sondheim — --
8. Burt Kimmelman — Re: just thought you'd want to see this
9. Gabrielle Welford — Re: Music City sonnet
10. Steve Carll — Re: SONNETS/FORMS

2 JUN 1996

11. henry — Re: Nonset form
12. Annie Finch — Re: SONNETS/FORMS
13. Kevin Killian — Bernadette Mayer comes to SF--ANNOUNCEMENT
14. Kevin Killian — "Stone Marmalade"
15. Steve Carll — Re: SONNETS/FORMS

3 JUN 1996

16. Daniel Salmon — Re: SONNETS/FORMS
17. Henry Gould — query: Russian residencies
18. Annie Finch — broad view
19. Christopher J. Beach — Re: broad view
20. David Baratier — nonsuch sonnet includes allentois wrench torque
21. henry gould — so not again sonnet
22. Jordan Davis — sonnet preservation society
23. Annie Finch — Re: broad view
24. Jonathan Brannen — Re: chax books
25. Tom Beard — Re: SONNETS/FORMS
26. Tony Green — Re: Nonset form
27. Annie Finch — Re: nonsuch sonnet includes allentois wrench torque
28. Louis Cabri — ode to a colostomy bag
29. - Kim Tedrow — Re: ode to a colostomy bag

4 JUN 1996

30. Carnography — The rin-tin-tintinnabulations that so musically swell--
31. Carnography — Rin-tin-tintinnabulations: erratum
32. William Northcutt — a sonnet
33. Pierre Joris — from IFEX COOMUNIQUE
34. Kevin Killian — Re: Bernadette Mayer
35. Joe Amato — cultural colostomy, pardon moi, s'il vous plait...
36. Jordan Davis — why don't we tell them
37. Ken Edwards — Bernadette Mayer
38. Mark Wallace — Situation #12
39. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: client servile
40. Mark Wallace — mainstream art critic nonsense
41. Jordan Davis — Re: New Books fer Poetics
42. David Baratier — A science project: if anyone is interested
43. Chris Stroffolino — Re: mainstream art critic nonsense
44. David Baratier — mainstream art critic
45. George Bowering — Re: sonnet
46. Jordan Davis — mainstream art critic/apology for commerce

5 JUN 1996

47. Louis Cabri — Re: client servile
48. k.a. hehir — Re: A science project: if anyone is interested
49. henry gould — Re: client servile
50. Gwyn McVay — Re: client servile
51. Annie Finch — Re: client servile
52. Jordan Davis — b b d o
53. Oren Izenberg — Re: mainstream art critic nonsense
54. Rod Smith — Re: criticism's face
55. David Baratier — Re: nonsuch sonnet includes alletois wrench torque
56. Carnography — Re: nonsuch sonnet includes alletois wrench torque
57. George Bowering — Re: client servile

6 JUN 1996

58. Tim wood — Re: A science project: if anyone is interested
59. Mark Wallace — Cage, and information
60. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: alas, eidolon
61. David Golumbia — Re: Cage, and Page informixion
62. David Baratier — nonsuch sonnet impotent lifetime guarantee
63. Annie Finch — Re: nonsuch sonnet includes alletois wrench torque
64. Herb Levy — Re: mainstream art critic
65. Ira Lightman — Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?
66. Blair Seagram — M/E/A/N/I/N/G
67. Oren Izenberg — Re: mainstream art critic
68. Jordan Davis — litmus party
69. Rod Smith — Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?
70. Rod Smith — Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?
71. Robert Drake — Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?

7 JUN 1996

72. Eryque Gleason — proto proto yahoo
73. Thomas M. Orange — dodecaphony as generative grammar
74. henry — Re: hysterical dialiects
75. cris cheek — Post in Performance Writing / Dartington, UK
76. Gwyn McVay — Re: hysterical dialiects
77. henry gould — Re: hysterical dialiects
78. cris cheek — Re: more rattling Cage
79. Jordan Davis — the iliad of hypnotism
80. David Carl — morty
81. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Them That's Got Shall Get
82. Jeffrey Stadelman — Re: dodecaphony as generative grammar
83. Herb Levy — Re: dodecaphony as generative grammar
84. Herb Levy — Re: more rattling Cage
85. c.g. guertin — Re: more rattling Cage
86. Michael Boughn — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
87. David Baratier — reading Monday 6/10
88. Ira Lightman — more rattling Cage
89. David Baratier — Re: the illiad of hypnoism
90. Gwyn McVay — Coolidge and Mark?
91. Rod Smith — Re: morty
92. Jeffrey Stadelman — Re: morty
93. Robert J Wilson — Yale Sublimity Strikes Again
94. Joe Amato — Re: Them That's Got Shall Get
95. Susan Schultz — Re: Them That's Got Shall Get
96. George Bowering — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
97. Robert Drake — new poetry bookstore looking for wares (fwd)

98. Matthew Gary Kirschenbaum — Re: new poetry bookstore looking for wares (fwd)
99. Tristan D. Saldana — Sontag on Cage
100. Rod Smith — Re: Sontag on Cage
101. Schuchat — Re: Them That's Got Shall Get
102. Rod Smith — Re: more rattling Cage
103. Daniel Salmon — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
104. Rod Smith — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
105. c.g. guertin — Re: Sontag on Cage

8 JUN 1996

106. Louis Cabri — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
107. George Bowering — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
108. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: dis n dat
109. J.V. Kinsella — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
110. Pierre Joris — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
111. Robert Drake — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
112. Michael Boughn — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
113. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: signafump
114. Rod Smith — Address change for Andrew Levy
115. Tim wood — Re: A science project: if anyone is interested
116. Chris Stroffolino — Re: signafump
117. George Bowering — Re: Jay
118. Annie Finch — Re: M/E/A/N/I/N/G
119. Charles Alexander — commerce?
120. Joseph Zitt — Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?

9 JUN 1996

121. Thomas M. Orange — dissin dat higher-in thang
122. Carnography — Re: nonsuch sonnet impotent lifetime guarantee
123. Carnography — Re: hysterical dialect, hysterical eidolon
124. George Bowering — Re: commerce?
125. Carnography — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
126. Pierre Joris — EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
127. Carnography — Re: EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
128. Pierre Joris — Re: EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
129. Joe Amato — Re: dissin dat higher-in thang
130. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — the eternal summer reading thing
131. Joe Amato — Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
132. Chris Stroffolino — Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
133. Anton Vishio — Re: EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
134. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: singnafump
135. Chris Stroffolino — Re: singnafump
136. Fred E. Maus — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
137. Robert Drake — Re: the eternal summer reading thing
138. Ken Edwards — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
139. Tim wood — Re: Querzblatz: Specimens and usage
140. Tim wood — Re: what poetry knows about scientists
141. - Kim Tedrow — Re: the eternal summer reading thing

10 JUN 1996

142. k.a. hehir — Re: dissin dat higher-in thang
143. k.a. hehir — Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
144. Kenneth Goldsmith — Visual Poetry Page Gone Mad
145. k.a. hehir — stays fresh longer
146. Charles Alexander — Re: the eternal summer reading thing
147. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — update on meridel lesueur -- good news
148. Gwyn McVay — John Felstiner

149. Charles Alexander — Re: the eternal summer reading thing
150. Chris Stroffolino — no weirdos please (apologies to kevin davies)
151. Ira Lightman — post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
152. Joe Amato — Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
153. Robert J Wilson — Re: the eternal summer reading thing
154. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: hire the higher?
155. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: eeoc/p/etc.
156. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Oppen Sesame
157. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Oppen Sesame
158. Keith Tuma — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
159. Carnography — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
160. Joe Amato — Re: eeoc/p/etc.
161. Kevin Killian — Re: Oppen Sesame
162. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Oppen Sesame
163. wystan — Re: stays fresh longer
164. Carnography — Re: the iliad of hypnotism
165. Jerry Rothenberg — (no subject)
166. Herb Levy — Re: morty

11 JUN 1996

167. Tony Green — Re: proto proto yahoo
168. Eryque Gleason — Re: proto proto yahoo
169. k.a. hehir — a cage rattled
170. Ron Silliman — Passings
171. Ken Edwards — post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
172. Charles Bernstein — [redacted]: A Celebration
173. Jordan Davis — adventures in paradise
174. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Passings
175. Chris Stroffolino — Re: adventures in paradise
176. Jordan Davis — Re: adventures in paradise
177. Ira Lightman — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
178. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Sumerian Reading
179. Hank Lazer — Re: mainestays
180. Laura Moriarty — Re: Passings
181. Mark Wallace — various cages
182. Chris Stroffolino — Re: mainestays
183. David Kellogg — Re: mainestays
184. J. Beer — what matter who's speaking
185. Joseph Zitt — Re: what matter who's speaking
186. Carnography — Re: what matter who's speaking
187. David Golumbia — Re: LANSING TALISMAN!!!
188. wystan — Re: what matter who's speaking
189. Edward Foster — Re: LANSING TALISMAN!!!
190. Tim wood — Re: what matter who's speaking
191. Rod Smith — Re: what matter who's speaking
192. Tim wood — Re: what matter who's speaking

12 JUN 1996

193. Rod Smith — Re: what matter who's speaking
194. Chris Stroffolino — Re: what matter who's speaking
195. wystan — Re: what matter who's speaking
196. Herb Levy — Re: what matter who's speaking
197. Charles Smith — Re: what matter who's speaking
198. Herb Levy — Re: various cages - newspaper reviews
199. Herb Levy — Re: various cages - Europera 5
200. Carnography — Re: various cages
201. Kevin Killian — Re: Miscellaneous stuff

202. Ron Silliman — Miscellaneous stuff
203. Daniel Bouchard — poetry reading
204. Mark Roberts — Re: adventures in paradise
205. Mark Roberts — Re: adventures in paradise
206. Kevin Killian — Communications Decency Act
207. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: summary reading
208. Chris Stroffolino — Re: what matter who's speaking
209. Charles Alexander — readings/twin cities
210. Jonathan A Levin — clamdiggers (fwd)
211. Jonathan Brannen — Standing Stones Press Special Offer
212. Jordan Davis — against summer reading
213. Ken Edwards — post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
214. Chris Stroffolino — Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
215. Herb Levy — Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
216. Chris Stroffolino — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
217. Charles Alexander — Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
218. Charles Alexander — Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
219. Herb Levy — (no subject)
220. Romana Christina Huk — Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives
221. Rod Smith — Re: clamdiggers (fwd)

13 JUN 1996

222. Kevin Killian — SPT--oportunity knocks
223. Tom Mandel — reading / listening to music
224. cris cheek — Re: Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives
225. Stephen Barker — Re: POETICS Digest - 11 Jun 1996 to 12 Jun 1996
226. MAXINE CHERNOFF — NEW AMERICAN WRITING #14
227. Oren Izenberg — research query
228. Ira Lightman — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
229. Mark Wallace — hairs, and dead horses
230. cris cheek — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
231. Robert Drake — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
232. Tony Green — Re: what matter who's speaking
233. Tony Green — Typo

14 JUN 1996

234. George Bowering — Re: singnafump
235. cris cheek — Re: post language 'jip' definitions
236. Herb Levy — dead horse hairs
237. Michael Heller — Re: POETICS Digest - 12 Jun 1996 to 13 Jun 1996
238. Robert J Wilson — Re: POETICS Digest - 12 Jun 1996 to 13 Jun 1996
239. Rod Smith — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
240. Jordan Davis — cultivating good reviewers
241. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences
242. henry gould — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
243. henry gould — Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences
244. David Baratier — voice reviewers
245. Carnography — Re: Typo
246. Carnography — Re: dead horse hairs
247. henry gould — Re: dead horse hairs
248. Pritchett,Pat — Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, con
249. Carnography — Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences
250. Fred Muratori — Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, con
251. Ken Edwards — post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
252. Ken Edwards — post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes

15 JUN 1996

253. Mark Wallace — Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
254. Thomas M. Orange — Freud:Woolf::Heidegger:Stein
255. McGuire Jerry L — query about ethics
256. Carnography — Re: query about ethics

16 JUN 1996

257. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: re-evaluating values
258. Ward Tietz — Re: Performance Writing
259. Ward Tietz — hatchet job
260. Pierre Joris — Gallery Blazes (fwd)
261. Joseph Zitt — Re: Gallery Blazes (fwd)
262. Jim Rosenberg — Handling the Verticals
263. Chris Stroffolino — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
264. Carla Billitteri — Re: Handling the Verticals
265. Tony Green — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs

17 JUN 1996

266. Charles Bernstein — Re: The Twentieth Century
267. wystan — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
268. wystan — Re: The Twentieth Century
269. Alan Sondheim — Paul, Sail On
270. Schuchat — Re: The Twentieth Century
271. Chris Stroffolino — Re: The Twentieth Century
272. henry — Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
273. J.V. Kinsella (by way of Charles Bernstein <[redacted]>)" <[redacted]....
274. Burt Kimmelman — Re: The Twentieth Century
275. Henry — Re: When the real poets come
276. Charles Bernstein — "He's So Heavy, He's My Sokal" (song)
277. Emily Lloyd — Sonnet!: What to Name the 20th-century World-Baby?
278. Jordan Davis — When the real poets come
279. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Sonnet!: What to Name the 20th-century World-Baby?
280. cris cheek — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
281. Glover, Albert — Re: POETICS Digest - 15 Jun 1996 to 16 Jun 1996
282. Charles Alexander — Re: When the real poets come
283. Jordan Davis — pcoet and tlooth
284. Goulding — Re: pcoet and tlooth
285. David Baratier — Re: when the real poets come
286. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: everywhere the obvious was becoming less so
287. Steve Carll — Re: When the real poets come
288. cris cheek — Re: The Twentieth Century
289. Fred Muratori — Re: When the real poets come
290. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH — (no subject)
291. cris cheek — Re: When the real poets come
292. Joseph Zitt — Re: Not exactly Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
293. Carnography — Re: The Twentieth Century
294. Robert Drake — Projectored Verse; event in Cleveland
295. Herb Levy — Not exactly Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
296. Carnography — Re: When the real poets come
297. Charles Alexander — (no subject)
298. Carnography — Tintanicized

18 JUN 1996

299. William Northcutt — Joyce a poet
300. Jordan Davis — the vogue for Turgenev
301. Annie Finch — Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences
302. Jonathan A Levin — Re: the vogue for Turgenev
303. cris cheek — Re: Performance Writing

304. Gwyn McVay — Re: Tintanicized

19 JUN 1996

305. Ward Tietz — of the STRENUOUS TYPE
306. Pierre Joris — DROMO: Thomas Kuhn Dies (fwd)
307. Henry Gould — Re: Performance Writing
308. Henry Gould — Re: of the STRENUOUS TYPE
309. Robert J Wilson — Yes to the Sublime, No to the Beauteous
310. Daniel Bouchard — ORONO
311. David Baratier — fortune cookies
312. cris cheek — Re: performance writers
313. Gwyn McVay — help! must have Nomura
314. Poetics List — How to temp. stop "Poetics" et al
315. George Bowering — Re: nonset form
316. Gabrielle Welford — bp Nichol's electronic poems (fwd)
317. George Bowering — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
318. George Bowering — Re: When the real poets come

20 JUN 1996

319. Louis Cabri — Re: pcoet and tlooth
320. Gabrielle Welford — Fwd: Re: Child Prostitution (fwd)
321. Jordan Davis — oak oak
322. Fred E. Maus — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
323. Burt Kimmelman — Re: How to temp. stop "Poetics" et al
324. Jordan Davis — torque torque
325. Bill Luoma — Rilke
326. George Bowering — Re: what matter who's speaking
327. George Bowering — Re: what matter who's speaking
328. George Bowering — Re: what matter who's speaking
329. George Bowering — Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
330. k.a. hehir — Re: ding
331. Rachel Loden — Re: Rilke
332. k.a. hehir — Re: ding

21 JUN 1996

333. Carnography — Re: of the STRENUOUS TYPE
334. Carnography — Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
335. henry gould — Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
336. Jordan Davis — William Carlos Speedwagon
337. Carnography — Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
338. Fred Muratori — Ribot
339. henry gould — Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
340. David Baratier — Pavement Saw winter 96/97
341. McGuire Jerry L — fortune cookies
342. Sheila E. Murphy — New Publication
343. David Baratier — Re: ribot
344. David Baratier — Painted Bride submissions
345. Tony Green — Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
346. Eryque Gleason — Re: fortune cookies
347. cris cheek — Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers premonitions

22 JUN 1996

348. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Painted Bride submissions

23 JUN 1996

349. Ken Edwards — Carcanet
350. Joe Amato — pmc reviews...

351. Peter Nicholls — Re: Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives
352. Loss Glazier — 50s in Orono - the Reviews
353. Chris Stroffolino — some questions from orono (tentative toe testing)

24 JUN 1996

354. Ron Silliman — Stuff
355. henry gould — Re: some questions from orono (tentative toe testing)
356. Chris Stroffolino — Re: 50s in Orono - the Reviews
357. Loss Glazier — "50s in Orono - the Reviews"
358. george hartley — hailing Barry hailing
359. Chris Stroffolino — Re: "50s in Orono - the Reviews"
360. Gabrielle Welford — KKK in Ann Arbor, MI (fwd)
361. Pierre Joris — Query
362. Pierre Joris — music info on web
363. Henry Gould — Re: hailing Barry hailing
364. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Query
365. Burt Kimmelman — Re: 50s in Orono - the Reviews
366. Kevin Killian — Fashion Report, dateline Orono
367. Paul Naylor — Oronomics
368. [redacted]
369. David Kellogg — my hero barry watten
370. Hank Lazer — Re: Oronomainia

25 JUN 1996

371. george hartley — Boston review
372. k.a. hehir — Re: DING!
373. Pierre Joris — Web Del Sol (fwd)
374. Steven Clay — Granary Books Reception
375. george hartley — oops!
376. Mark Roberts — AWOL: Five Island Press New Poets Series 4 (forwarded)
377. Mark Wallace — Jorge Guitar
378. Burt Kimmelman — orono thanks
379. Mark Wallace — Joseph Ceravolo
380. Bob Holman — Sparrow for President
381. Kevin Killian — Jeremy Reed
382. Gwyn McVay — Susanne Levy

26 JUN 1996

383. JOEL LEWIS — Re: Joseph Ceravolo
384. Christopher Filkins — LSD lsd l s d led sleds
385. Ron Silliman — Joe Ceravolo
386. Cathy — Re: POETICS Digest - 24 Jun 1996 to 25 Jun 1996
387. Henry Gould — Martin Nakell whereabouts
388. Loss Glazier — Re: Joe Ceravolo
389. Loss Glazier — Tender Buttons
390. Jordan Davis — Re: Joe Ceravolo
391. Rod Smith — Re: Joe Ceravolo
392. [redacted]
393. Tony Green — logoparaphernalia

27 JUN 1996

394. Tim wood — Re: LSD lsd l s d led sleds
395. Pierre Joris — Why New York City Arrests Artists (fwd)
396. Mark Roberts — AWOL: Inaugural Olympic Sports Poet 1996 (forwarded)
397. Bill Luoma — NYC Book Party & Reading
398. Curt Anderson — The Runway Calls
399. Gabrielle Welford — Joan Retallack

400. Rae Armantrout — Amazon.com
401. Kevin Killian — General Report, dateline: Orono
402. JOEL LEWIS — Re: Joe Ceravolo (Silliman)
403. Peter Quartermain — Limitations

28 JUN 1996

404. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: blame it on the lossa nova
405. Carnography — Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
406. Rachel Loden — Re: General Report, dateline: Orono
407. Hank Lazer — Re: blame it on the lossa nova
408. Loss Glazier — Re: General Report, dateline: Orono
409. William M. Northcutt — Peter Dale Scott's Jakarta, and ...
410. David Kellogg — Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
411. Steven Howard Shoemaker — british women poets
412. Steve Carll — Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
413. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Orono memories / Enslin poems
414. Jordan Davis — The Grammar of Fantasy by Gianni Rodari
415. Charles Smith — Re: Limitations
416. Rod Smith — new Bernadette & & & @ Bridge Street
417. maria damon — Re: british women poets
418. maria damon — Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
419. maria damon — Re: Orono memories / Enslin poems
420. Loss Glazier — Re: Orono memories / Enslin poems
421. Charles Alexander — Re: british women poets
422. Loss Glazier — Orono Reviews: Bar Harbor
423. Schuchat — Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
424. JOEL LEWIS — Re: Orono memories / Enslin poems
425. maria damon — oh no orono

29 JUN 1996

426. Chris Stroffolino — Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
427. Chris Stroffolino — Re: oh no orono
428. Daniel Salmon — Re: british women poets
429. Ward Tietz — Re: Armand Schwerner
430. Carnography — Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
431. William Slaughter — Announcing Mudlark
432. Rod Smith — Re: british women poets
433. John E. Matthias — British Women Poets
434. Keith Tuma — Re: British Women Poets
435. Keith Tuma — Re: oh no orono
436. Herb Levy — Re: Amazon.com
437. Gabrielle Welford — Re: British Women Poets
438. Steve Carll — Extended Play
439. . — Re: LSD lsd l s d led sleds
440. Joe Amato — Re: Extended Play
441. Louis Cabri — the thing

30 JUN 1996

442. Ron Silliman — Zelevansky
443. Bill Luoma — CS & JC
444. Carl Lynden Peters — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
445. Jordan Davis — of the whole art/spam two generations
446. Tom Beard — Commonwealth women poets
447. Tom Beard — Re: Extended Play
448. maria damon — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
449. Charles Alexander — Re: Zelevansky
450. Carnography — Re: Extended Play

451. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — comments on women today and oppression
452. Lisa Amber Phillips — Orono Others
453. Joel Felix — Ronald Johnson Broadside (ad)

1. Annie Finch
Re: nonset form
Sat 1 Jun 1996

Dear George Bowering, Yes, this is an interesting difference, isn't it? I think one of the reasons I enjoy "predictable" forms or whatever on earth we are calling them now, wherever on earth we are callingthem now, is just because they do seem to be alive o n the page to me. And to you poems are most alive off the page. Are these open form poems / do you notice a difference depending on the level of predictabiliy of the poem in your sense that it's alive off teh page? I guess to mea predictable form seems a transcription of a performance always, since the repetition and the dialectic of expectation I have with it act like a physical voice to me, even when it's just in a book.

--Annie

and t okind of s athey are alive e to t eh ci

↑ Index

2. Annie Finch
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Sat 1 Jun 1996

A thought:
Steve Carll wrote:
"overterminologization does violence to the phenomenon [i.e. the poetic form /deform-AF] being engaged with."

EXACTLY. I don't know about the over, but terminologization does do violence to the phenomenon. And isn't that voilence a good thing for writing? It stops smug following in tracks by clarifying the truth that they ARE tracks, and forces you to be aware, to change your tarcks, to do violence back. That's waht keeps it alive. So terminology can be the frog you have to leap over.

--Annie F.

↑ Index

3. Annie Finch
Re: Nonset form
Sat 1 Jun 1996

Re Charles Alexander's question on the origin of the sonnet,

According to Paul Oppenheimer's fascinating book The Sonnet, it was in-vewnted by a lawyer early in the 13th century, Giacomo da Lentino, who took an existing Sicilian folk song stanza and added the 6 lines, and the "turn," to it--

thus, in Oppenheimer's view, inventing modern poetry by taking poems out ofthe public realm wher e you need an audience and into the arena of self-contained self-ref lection (since the two-part form (actually three-part, since Oppenheimer claims that even int he Italian sonnet the couplet usually has a separate presence) allows the poet to resolve a problem alone, to talk to her/himself.

The term sonnet ws first used by Dante, who ws the one to really popularize the form, fifty years later. Oppenheimer says that it really does NOT mean "little song" and makes much of the fact that the sonnet may have been the first kind of poem NOT meant to be set to music. He claims that sonnet means simply "noise." he also says the strucutre exactly reflects the harmonia mundi, the pythagorean/platonic theory of numbers.o iaionor, la ehrt sea .ri I like this typosoup so much I'm keeping it in the main text. Annie

↑ Index

4. cris cheek

Re: Music City sonnet

Sat 1 Jun 1996

>> > bantering martians hope for glory
>> > we committed literary piracy on the high seas
>> > Al left Billie Joe Cat found the path to >> > hunger large as scaredy free-throw
>> > underground stone guitar blue uniformed blow
>> > mouth on double-cross diploma clue
>> > a world without nouns is healthy?
>> > sequined sequels quells
>> > primacy recency a magnificat its own
>> > catorziemme and quattrocento etc
>> > and minnie pearl and conway twitty
>> > a dirge enough for Solent murk
>> > too much robing and screeing
>> > the voice of an angel and the soul of >> > blue few, grow a garage band
>> > glue bag a branding fag wagered row
>> > Sue the crew could count, although >> > soccer Tolemy semper vivens
ection
>> >
>> >
>>

↑ Index

5. Michael Boughn

Re: just thought you'd want to see this

Sat 1 Jun 1996

Chris, did you post this piece of "academicism" to rile us up? It certainly demonstrates a serious lack of understanding of what's at stake in this writing. Part of the impact and importance of _Pieces_ was the way it undermined the entire notion of the "trivial" poem and it's new critical counterpart, the monumental poem. The metrical ramifications of "A Piece" alone are worthy of extended consideration. In place--that is within the unfolding thinking of the book--the moves this poem makes are crucial. Only a neo-scholastic could miss it. As for opacity--good grief, do we still have to put up with that ridiculous concept? And biting gem? Gimmee a break.

Mike

[redacted]

> I find RC's work highly uneven. Many poems are little biting gems (such as the renowned "I Know A Man"), while others strike me as mere finger exercises, opaque or trivial notations. An instance of opacity, which opens the poem "To And":
>
> To and
> back and forth
> direction
> is a third
>
> or simple fourth
> of the intention
> like it
> goes and goes.
>
> And here's a poem I would call trivial, "A Piece" in its entirety:
>
> One and
> one, two,
> three.

↑ Index

6. Joe Amato

Re: PROTO-ANTHOLOGY of HYPERMEDIA POETRY now AVAILABLE

Sat 1 Jun 1996

kudos! to chris funkhouser for his provocative, linked essay on the web about hypermedia poetry...

again, at

http://cnsvax.albany.edu/~poetry/hyperpo.html

check it out!...

joe

↑ Index

7. Alan Sondheim

--

Sat 1 Jun 1996

When nighttime falls, I crawl the walls,
Miss all that I hold dear;
I drop a tear, my crying stalls,
Because I walk the sphere.
I walk the left, I walk the right;
I walk both far and near.
I am bereft, an ugly sight,
Because I walk the sphere.
The sphere is big, it has no eyes,
It has no ears to hear my cries;
It is a nightmare in disguise -
I walk it in great fear.
I never know where I have been
In spite of mourning and of sin,
Because I walk the sphere.

↑ Index

8. Burt Kimmelman

Re: just thought you'd want to see this

Sat 1 Jun 1996

Chris,

Creeley's poem to WCW I would think provides the rationale / defense for C's "finger exercises.

Burt

↑ Index

9. Gabrielle Welford
Re: Music City sonnet
Sat 1 Jun 1996

> bantering martians hope for glory
> we committed literary piracy on the high seas
> Al left Billie Joe Cat found the path to
> hunger large as scaredy free-throw
> underground stone guitar blue uniformed blow
> mouth on double-cross diploma clue
> a world without nouns is healthy?
> sequined sequels quells
> primacy recency a magnificat its own
> catorziemme and quattrocento etc
> and minnie pearl and conway twitty
> a dirge enough for Solent murk
> too much robing and screeing
> the voice of an angel and the soul of
> blue few, grow a garage band
> glue bag a branding fag wagered row
> Sue the crew could count, although > soccer Tolemy semper vivens
> ection
> noften nifty Nat Nat! shrinking

↑ Index

10. Steve Carll
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Sat 1 Jun 1996

At 03:42 PM 5/31/96 -0500, Annie Finch wrote:
>Dear Steve,
>So you cede the point taht one can predict what an open-form poem or chant will >be about, or a projective verse poem, as much as one can predict what a son-net >will be about.
>Then how can you read at all, if you find such that such predictability >precludes reading?
>Do you honestly think that every "experimental" poem is in a completely new >form? You seem to be painting yourself into a corner.

>
>-Annie

Well, appearances can be deceiving, can't they? :-) In general, this predictability precludes my interest in reading it to exactly the extent that the poem is (unreflectively) "about" staying within the "traditional" confines of the form. Again, it goes back to, is the form being simply used as a template into which one is plugging words in order to manufacture a poem in that form, or is the form itself being honestly engaged with in such a way that it, too, transcends some of the limitations history has imposed on it?

My answer to the last question here depends on how we define "completely new form." You recently posted something to the effect that it's fine for people to experiment in such a way that they change the forms, but they shouldn't drag the terminology with them into the (now-changed) form. If, for the sake of dialogue, I accepted those terms, then I'd have to say that any poem which created such an epiphany of its form would indeed create a "completely" new form. However, I don't believe the terminology needs to be so rigid. No, I don't think every experimental poem is in a completely new form, I think our notion of form itself needs to be more fluid.

Which kind of puzzles me about where you're coming from. You seem to be arguing that we should be more precise in our definitions of various forms, but when Jordan asked what your definition of a sonnet is, you replied you couldn't articulate one, but you knew a sonnet when you saw one. But a lot of people could make a similar claim (heck, I know a sonnet when I see one, too) and yet be seeing a huge range of different things as sonnets that others would never consider sonnets. So we have, it seems to me, two choices at this crossroads:

1) We can stop worrying about the precise boundaries of definition, allowing everybody to exercise (and, not coincidentally, share) their own intuition with regard to the form, or

2) We can try to find some authority for our own definition and exclude everybody else's.

(Of course, now that I say that, a dozen people will post a dozen "third choices" I didn't think of!)

||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||
``````````````````````````````````````````

Steve Carll [redacted]

I listen.
I hear nothing. Only
the cow, the cow
of nothingness, mooing
``````````````````````````````````````````

down the bones.
~~Galway Kinnell
```
```
||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||||

↑ Index

11. henry
Re: Nonset form
Sun 2 Jun 1996

On Fri, 31 May 1996 17:27:43 -0700 George Bowering said:
>
>Couple decades ago I was listening to Kenner, cant remember whether it was >in the Japanese restaurant or at the lecture, when he posited that the >sonnet was accidentally created when some Italian poet, writing eight-line >stanzas, quit after doing 6 in his second stanza. Someone else found this >and mistook it for a new form, and did another, etc.
>
>Kenner compared this with the post-renaissance European sculptors who found >Greek or Roman busts that were just torsi, the heads and limbs broken off, >so that they started doing it too, not breaking off liombs, but making >sculptures of torsi, and so we got that form.

Critics are full of clever "it". More likely the form of the sonnet corresponds to the basic mathematical ratio of the fibonacci series found both in nature and in a great deal of ancient & modern art. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

12. Annie Finch
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Sun 2 Jun 1996

Dear Steve, It seems to me that your idea of where forms' boundaries go is rather sputtery. On the one hand, you ahve an idea that a poem in a (shall we say predetermined rather than traditional, for the sake of variety) predetermined form is poured into something "rigid," a word that sets my teeth on edge in this context because ANY good poem in a predetermined form naturally changes that form! Form is only rigid in a bad poem, in other words. But, though you don't accept the possibility for fluidity and dynamic engagement within a predetermined form, you do allow for some quasi-mystical point where suddenly the form is being "changed" in a daring and valuable way, by exactly the kinds of technical changes that were futile mechanical exercises while one was "inside" the form. I don't see such a magic point where what had been robotic submission is suddenly transformed into charismatic rebellion. To me there is sa continuum between what happens "inside" the form and what happens outside it. Maybe, paradoxically, that is why I am more interested in trying to speak exactly, in terminology that accords with common sense, about the differences it IS possible to spot along the contiuum.

--Annie

↑ Index

13. Kevin Killian
Bernadette Mayer comes to SF--ANNOUNCEMENT
Sun 2 Jun 1996

This is Dodie Bellamy.

Small Press Traffic is hosting an impromptu reception for Bernadette Mayer Saturday, June 8 at 8 p.m. Any poets (or other interested parties) in the San Francisco Bay Area who'd like to come, backchannel me for details.

Onward!

↑ Index

14. Kevin Killian
"Stone Marmalade"
Sun 2 Jun 1996

Thank you, Rod Smith, for placing "Stone Marmalade" so high up (#2!) in your list of good current books. Now I, Kevin Killian, will bring you all backstage into the mysterious world of "Stone Marmalade," the play I wrote with Leslie Scalapino.

Here's what you do first: if you're not nearby Bridge Street Books, or any other bookstore that carries this item, order directly from publisher:

Singing Horse Press
P O Box 40034
Philadelphia, PA 19106 USA
[redacted]

It's only $9.50 (US), plus add $2.00 for shipping & handling.

Okay, now that THAT's out of the way, and you have your copies in hand, we (Leslie and I) you to play a part in this play when she and I give it this big staging at the San Francisco Art Institute in December. We are in desperate need of poets willing to don cow costumes and travel, submerged under swamp water except for your heads, for the two hours the play lasts. Stone Marmalade, set in Hell, is our version of the old Orpheus and Eurydice story, as seen through the filter of the thought of the Italian philosophy of Giorgio ("Language and Death") Agamben.

A year and a half ago, when this play was a work in progress, we put a little of it on at the Kootenay School in Vancouver. David Ayre was a handsome Orpheus, Charles Watts a quirky, puzzled Agamben, Catriona Strang was very striking as Julia Roberts, and Scott Watson and Susan Clark essayed the malicious, hungry neighbors of Hell. Lisa Robertson strode the stage in full Eurydice grandeur. Excellent work by all! Then this past spring I (Kevin) tried acting another scene from this play, at New College in San Francisco-playing Kathy, the assistant of Eurydice (did I mention that Eurydice is not only queen of hell, but also runs its airport duty-free shop--following Agamben's apercu that the modern day airport duty-free shop is a space outside of juridice?) . . . I was backed by two mighty Greek choruses, one of the Bacchantes (played by Renee Gladman, Carla Harryman, Hoa Nguyen, Alicia Wing) and one of a bunch of puzzled male neighbors (Anselm Berrigan, Edmund Berrigan and Dale Smith). I was like Maria Callas come back to life, only . . . younger I suppose, and I did not have to sing. A month later I brought the same act to New York, at the Segue Foundation space, where Erin Courtney, Elizabeth Fodaski, Deirdre Kovac and Heather Ramsdell played the mad, vicious Bacchantes, and Bruce Andrews, Kevin Davies and Bill Luoma were testosterone personified as the neighbors. I have nothing but praise for all the above "performers."

However in December we need plenty of poets and painters capable of playing the sick, Georgia O'Keeffe-like, soaking wet cattle of hell who fill the inferno with low sick moos. And so report to the casting couch of me (Kevin Killian) or her (Leslie Scalapino) before December 1st, script in hand, available now from Singing Horse Press as above.

Thank you all!

↑ Index

15. Steve Carll
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Sun 2 Jun 1996

At 12:15 AM 6/2/96 -0500, you wrote:
>Dear Steve,
>It seems to me that your idea of where forms' boundaries go is rather sputtery.
>On the one hand, you ahve an idea that a poem in a (shall we say predetermined >rather than traditional, for the sake of variety) predetermined form is poured >into something "rigid," a word that sets my teeth on edge in this context >because ANY good poem in a predetermined form naturally changes that form! Form >is only rigid in a bad poem, in other words.

> But, though you don't accept the possibility for fluidity and dynamic >engagement within a predetermined form, you do allow for some quasi-mystical >point where suddenly the form is being "changed" in a daring and valuable way, >by exactly the kinds of technical changes that were futile mechanical exercises >while one was "inside" the form.
> I don't see such a magic point where what had been robotic submission >is suddenly transformed into charismatic rebellion. To me there is sa continuum >between what happens "inside" the form and what happens outside it.
>Maybe, paradoxically, that is why I am more interested in trying to speak >exactly, in terminology that accords with common sense, about the differences >it IS possible to spot along the contiuum.
>
>--Annie

Well, again, Annie, what seems "sputtery" to you is simply paradoxical to me, and what you describe as paradoxical in your own interest is probably what seems contradictory to me in your position.

I don't agree at all with your summarization of my perspective. It's not true (and to my memory, I've never said) that I don't accept the possibility for fluidity and dynamic engagement within a traditional form. The word you're using as quasi-synonymous, though, "predetermined", that worries me. If the thing is TOO predetermined, the form is really doing the job that the poet should be doing, don't you think so? I haven't argued in terms of any "point", mystical or not, separating "submission" from "rebellion" (which latter term I haven't used; this isn't about rebellion at all but mindfulness, at least from the point of view of the writer.) What I meant was that, as a reader, if I get the sense that the poet has just been facilely plugging in words to fill out a rhyme scheme or a meter, it turns me off. Of course a good poem in a form won't give me this impression; of course a poem in a form invented by the poet shifts me into different questions: how much of this form is content? Is this form itself interesting?

And while I'm on the subject, the "violence" I was referring to by overterminologization (what's the rhetorical term for a word that's an example of what it describes?) is the violence done to the poem when we try to tear it apart analytically and stop listening to what it's saying. Now, I realize that the form it's in is part of what it's saying, but it's only part.

I caught myself wondering yesterday why I'm even involved in this question, since I generally don't give it much bother either, and I realized it was because Alan Sondheim posted a beautiful poem last week, and I felt that your response to it was dismissive; that you were ignoring its content on the basis of what you felt was its specious claim to sonnethood. I saw that as an act of violence against that poem, and no, I don't feel that's a good thing. Later on I saw that you had indeed appreciated it on another level, but of course by that time more ire had been raised. (BTW, Alan, if you're still reading, the one you posted yesterday was--how can I say it?--exceptional.)

All poems take some form; form is nothing other than the structure by which the poem appears in the world. The two extremes of the evolution-of-form question as I see it are these:

On the one hand you could argue to the extremest minutiae of form--every word, punctuation mark and space are part of the form of that poem (an extremely rigid definition of form)--and thus that to change one word, one comma, is to introduce a new form necessitating a new name. True in a certain way, but kind of a time-waster I'm sure everyone would agree.

On the other hand you could argue that there's really only one form a poem can take: poetic form (aka "the form of a poem.") Also true in a certain way, but then we can't talk about interesting patterns that pop up in certain poems and not others.

Somewhere in between these two hands is the question of "traditional" forms and "experimental" forms, and it's a gigantic power struggle, and I think it would be best now to take a really broad view of this situation and not trample on any poems that may have fallen underfoot.

Steve

↑ Index

16. Daniel Salmon
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Mon 3 Jun 1996

At 05:40 PM 2/06/96 -0700, you wrote:

>>--Annie
>
>Somewhere in between these two hands is the question of "traditional" forms >and "experimental" forms, and it's a gigantic power struggle, and I think it >would be best now to take a really broad view of this situation and not >trample on any poems that may have fallen underfoot.

>
>Steve
>

Steve,

As many readers can only glimpse the carpet between books - trampling on poetry is sometimes unavoidable.

Dan

↑ Index

17. Henry Gould
query: Russian residencies
Mon 3 Jun 1996

I would be grateful for any leads regarding possibilities for teaching or writers residencies in St. Petersburg Russia this fall. Please backchannel only to [redacted]. Spasiba, HG

↑ Index

18. Annie Finch broad view
Mon 3 Jun 1996

Dear Steve,

Actually, the more this discussion progresses the more it seems there is just a hair's breadth between the two attitudes in question (wasn't that what someone recently mentioned on this list separated the nominalists and the idealists?) So I too look forward to a broad view. The Exaltation of Forms anthology is gathering poets from this list at a good clip to edit sections on experimental forms, (still room for more, too), and maybe whenit comes out it will help provide such a view. As Lynn Emmanuel pointed out in an essay on "Language Poetrey and New formalism"'," which was I believe critical of both equally, both are very interestd in form and technique as opposed to the extreme prioritization of content that dominates the belated romanticism of mainstreamd poetry. I think that many "post-new-formalists," or whatever one could call the younger generation, would readily admit that their interest in form arises from a desire to make their poems "anti-absorptive," to use Charles Bern stein's term for it. ntms of a tenhl, it. I am still trying to place you exactly from New College days. can you refresh my memory? --Annie

↑ Index

19. Christopher J. Beach

Re: broad view

Mon 3 Jun 1996

I am growing a bit weary of this discussion of poetic form, since it remains on what for me is a frustrating level of generality. Questions such as whether "open form" poems are just as predictable as formal ones, or whether analyzing a poem's form does "violence" to it are simply too vague to engage with, which is why I think many people on the list are turned off by this whole issue. It would be much more interesting, I think, to look at specific poems, whether traditional sonnets, "experimental" sonnets, or non-sonnets, in an attempt to understand how they manipulate form and how they either conform to or defy expectation. It is easy to make generalized claims about the possibilities of the sonnet or of any other form, but it is more difficult, and I think more useful, to discuss them in the hands of a particular writer. I also don't believe these comparisons between "new formalism" and "language poetry" hold much water. They are two entirely different phenomena and have very different critical and institutional histories. To be "critical of both equally" only implies a lack of attention to what either is doing. It may be that some post-new-formalists believe they are trying to use the form to create an "anti-absorptive" poem, but how does this work in practice? Once again, I would like to see the actual poems.

I don;t mean to be dismissive of the issue of form, which I believe is crucial--I just think we need to start nuancing our comments a bit more if it is going to lead to anything but a kind of intellectual mud-slinging or vague philosophizing.

Christopher Beach

On Mon, 3 Jun 1996, Annie Finch wrote:

> Dear Steve,
>
> Actually, the more this discussion progresses the more it seems there is just a hair's breadth between the two attitudes in question (wasn't that what someone recently mentioned on this list separated the nominalists and the idealists?) So I too look forward to a broad view. The Exaltation of Forms anthology is gathering poets from this list at a good clip to edit sections on experimental forms, (still room for more, too), and maybe whenit comes out it will help provide such a view. As Lynn Emmanuel pointed out in an essay on "Language Poetrey and New formalism"'," which was I believe critical of both equally, both are very interestd in form and technique as opposed to the extreme prioritization of content that dominates the belated romanticism of mainstreamd poetry. I think that many "post-new-formalists," or whatever one could call the younger generation, would readily admit that their interest in form arises from a desire to make their poems "anti-absorptive," to use Charles Bern stein's term for it.
> ntms of a tenhl, it.

> I am still trying to place you exactly from New College days. can you refresh my memory?
> --Annie

↑ Index

20. David Baratier

nonsuch sonnet includes allentois wrench torque

Mon 3 Jun 1996

Form is only rigid in a bad poem. There is a mystical point where rigid and rigere split, then the piece (whether sonnet or otherwise) ceases to be an exercise composed of "robotic submission" to the form. These are the ways in which ommon sense is not all that common. Terminology bores me, a named object does not become owned through the naming process in the same way that god is not further revealed to a person who cannot call jwy as such without syllables. There is no continuum except in terms of the overarching or the archetypal, values of written sets of words fluctuate continually. Annie, perhaps this is the difference you believe possible to spot, as if capitalizing IS will give that set of characters more weight in the discussion, or yelling "eidolons" with a megaphone on top of the largest building in a city means that more people are educated about poetry then when grounded handing out flyer's in front of a subway entrance.

David Baratier

↑ Index

21. henry gould

so not again sonnet

Mon 3 Jun 1996

WHERE THE SONNET WENT

Ten thousand feet above the ear plateau and smaller than a sixth of an infinitesimal
the whiskers of a cat were barely visible.
Nevertheless, the physicists (who know about these things) were able to show this feline had a phantom quantum double.

Such heavenly things are figures here below.
The theologians thought the cat was treble.

"Roughen your act," grumbled the singing clown in a cat's voice - "smooth numbers cause trouble.

There were three ravens sitting in a tree,
With a hey, nonny nonny down down down.
They were as black as black could be..."
And he banged on his eardrum in the dry rubble.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

22. Jordan Davis sonnet preservation society
Mon 3 Jun 1996

I believe the following, by Gary Lenhart, is a sonnet.

THE GREAT AWAKENING II

Knowing what we couldn't know before,
Although we were told by almost all,
Today we stand among the many Happy to be pigeon-holed, less than Evangelical about the changed
"Reasons for Being" we bandy
In our abode, but tickled pink to be Near our daughter's sweet nature, even when Exhausted in the pre-dawn. If we Kowtow to earn a smile now and again,
Again and again, must that sour
This dotage with adverse repercussions?
Idiot grins sum us up fine. Though our Eyes are open, we are out of our minds.

(from _Light Heart_, Hanging Loose Press, 1991)

I also believe that this poem, by Edwin Denby, is a sonnet:

THE SHOULDER

The shoulder of a man is shaped like a baby pig.
It terrifies and it bores the observer, the shoulder.
The Greeks, who had slaves, were able to hitch back and rig
The shoulder, so the eye is flattered and feels bolder.

But that's not the case in New York, where a roomer Stands around day and night stupefied with his clothes on
The shoulder, hung from his neck (half orchid, half tumor)
Hangs publicly with a metabolism of its own.

After it has been observed a million times or more
A man hunches it against a pole, a jamb, a bench, Parasite he takes no responsibility for.
He becomes used to it, like to the exhaust stench.

It takes the corrupt, ectoplasmic shape of a prayer
Or money, that connects with a government somewhere.

(from _Complete Poems_, Random House, 1986)

Denby's poem puts the 'tourne' a little sooner than one expects, and Lenhart smudges it, the 'tourne', but these both have that standard fourteen line length, the last two lines reserved for closing remarks. How not to sound unreasonably like one writing a poem. Lenhart, I think, builds up a stilted but pleasant lyricism, which he then pushes over. Denby (who seems a lot like William Burroughs in this poem) allocates a classical grace for some potential shoulder, which grace he slouches away in the second stanza. The poem riffs on some 'enstranged' views of the shoulder, closing with a pretty spectacular connection between the meatiness of the body and one's generally dismal location in the so-called scheme of things. Maybe it does. I dunno. Somebody (Christopher Beach?) said this kind of thing would make the discussion livelier. The opposition to the discussion is probably not unlike in kind the opposition to the form--irritation at an archaism, already readily dismissed by our (we hope) ancestor, W.C.W. At any rate, these are two recent readable postmodern sonnets.

↑ Index

23. Annie Finch
Re: broad view
Mon 3 Jun 1996

Dear Christopher J. Beach,
Hear, hear!
A Finch

↑ Index

24. Jonathan Brannen
Re: chax books
Mon 3 Jun 1996

I haven't read either of these, but I'll support any endorsement of either Mac Cormack's or Steve McCaffery's poetry.

Jonathan Brannen

> On the subject of Karen Mac Cormack's books, the one book of hers not so far mentioned, and unfortunately not to my knowledge > available other than secondhand, is her first: Nothing By Mouth, > published, I think, in 1984, and not by Chax.

>
> And not to not plug Steve McCaffery's latest book of poetry, > it's just out from ECW Press in Toronto: The Cheat of > Words. Includes poems some may have seen over the years in excerpted > form in West Coast Line, hole, and other mags, and unpublished > early pieces.
>
> Louis

↑ Index

25. Tom Beard
Re: SONNETS/FORMS
Mon 3 Jun 1996

---

overterminologization (what's the rhetorical term for a word that's an example of what it describes?)

Autonym (I think), like "noun", "pentasyllabic", "shibboleth", "misspellt", "obfuscatory", "autonym" and "word".

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

26. Tony Green
Re: Nonset form
Mon 3 Jun 1996

Dear Annie,
Your postings are interesting and persuasive. I am searching for, way back, why I abandoned metre-and-rhyme defined forms. Long pause.

However,
having developed practices other than those of writing in metre-and-rhyme, I don't think I now want to return to what I perhaps foolishly perhaps not foolishly abandoned. As you and others note this is a hot topic.

Best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

27. Annie Finch
Re: nonsuch sonnet includes allentois wrench torque
Mon 3 Jun 1996

"god is not further revealed to a person who cannot call joy without syllables." True. and yet naming is one way things can be approached, the repetitions of the tea ceremony do yield moments, some people like to sit in a certain way when they meditate. Isn't this just a matter of temperament or even phase of life?

To say that "there is no continuum except in terms of the overarching and archetypal; values of written sets of words fluctuate continually" is itself a non-fluctuating value claim, perhaps more dangerous because it is may be tempted to forget its own solidity?

--A. R. Crane Finch
"eidolon?"

↑ Index

28. Louis Cabri
ode to a colostomy bag
Mon 3 Jun 1996

I'm going to write a series of sonnets about the various women whom I have been in brief memorable love with, throughout the 1980s, when I've been drunk. Ok? Actually, I've been, structurally speaking, drunk for a long time - ever since our New World slaves first cut down cane, and rum was available to London sonneteers. I admit that to write these boxes these days is somewhat like willful suspension over an ideological overhang, with a hangover. I have to chip away even at the _adjectival_ use of "universal." And I'm on the wagon now, so I've got to be indirect about history - the rum (ie spirit) business, etc. In fact, why not just use a muted symbol, which might get passed off as completely without a referent - e.g. "ebony log"? It's as if the "making up" of poesis has become the make-up required for a pose, true. Please bear with me as I try, as best I can, to manage the contradictions that come with the recursive properties of literary effects.

Make-Up

Sling me the run-again please to not answer in poem poems.
If I could word it through the prism so the text of ourselves is the text of an eye beyond, if I could hold the ebony log straight as it's squashed into two dimensions, if I could ease the half-shell into seas on the lee of engagement, I would put off the accretion of legend and love, for these are sounds forced into a box to elude the prevailing code of thinned-out universe terms.

Gavin Selerie, from _Elizabethan Overhang_ (Cambridge, UK: Spectacular Diseases, 1989)

↑ Index

29. - Kim Tedrow

Re: ode to a colostomy bag

Mon 3 Jun 1996

For a brief moment, I was confused as to whether this post was from the Poetics List or from the Irritable Bowel Disease Support List.

Anything is possible on the internet.

-Kim

↑ Index

30. Carnography

The rin-tin-tintinnabulations that so musically swell--

Tue 4 Jun 1996

As per my vast and prestigious experience playing French Latin lounge versions of Sixties protest songs: a popular request.

A nameless (and you shall remain nameless, ___) listserv subscriber requested that I post a few private comments.
Here they are:

§§§

> What exactly does ____ find less sing-songy, less mannered, than Poe-- > the jingles of Maggie Estep!?

Side-note:

When I dropped by Chez Rollo to deliver my piece (posted here) that made fun of Hal Sirowitz (my pal), Edwin Torres (total stranger), David Huberman (improved my quality of life dramatically) and Bob Holman (yoo-hoo, sailor), among others, who do you think was there but Mr. Torres himself? What an odd coincidence, I thought. Will he enjoy my parody, or take humorless offense, as Allan Ginsberg (unbelievably) has been doing? I never found out; the guy took off before I could decipher his airy expression and airier body language. It just goes to show you:

"You set out to shock others, but in the end, you only succeed in shocking yourself."--Lynne Tillman

(though the point of "parodying" another writer is really to try to figure out what in the hell said writer is doing).

§§§

was forced to create a cryptic mechanism, a code, to delineate his passions and desires. In formulating said code, he created a technique that was invaluable to everyone from the surrealists to Robbes-Grillet.

My question: Though some poets reinvent techniques in order to destroy artifice and return to the language of ordinary speech (Wordsworth, Whitman, Kerouac), don't other poets (Ashbery, Mallarme, Unica Zurn, de Quincey) invent new techniques in order to protect artifice, destroy so-called ordinary speech, and avoid the obvious?

Or are both points of view mere excuses for revelling in the texture of language itself?

Your reveller at reveille,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

31. Carnography
Rin-tin-tintinnabulations: erratum
Tue 4 Jun 1996

> Will he enjoy my parody, > or take humorless offense, as Allan Ginsberg (unbelievably) has been doing?

Yes, yes, I know--that's Allen Ginsberg (1926-?).

> Bob Perelman

Not to mention S.J. Perelman.

> to me, in the "Cadmus of the golden prow" section of Pound's Cantos

Canto IV, to be exact: "Hear me. Cadmus of Golden Prows!"
(First lines: "Palace in smoky light,/Troy but a heap of smoulderinmg boundary stones...")

> Robbes-Grillet

I could easily verify this man's name, but really, why bother?

> Unica Zurn

I can't find her xeroxed poetry, so I leave you with this, from Bataille's poetic journal, _The Little One_:

Pure eroticism:
the crater,

the impossible, rising to the throat with the smell of blood....

To write is to go in search of chance....

By giving chance so wretched an anguish, I felt I was bringing it the thing it lacked.

(Bataille)

See ya

(Hardin, quoting anon and ibid)

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

32. William Northcutt

a sonnet

Tue 4 Jun 1996

Sonnet to one of the following:

--headcounting the senate
--viewing the genitalia of a mutant
--noticing the similarities between headcounting the senate and doing the same to the genitalia of a mutant

right
right right right right right right right right right right right

left left

Chicken House Willie

↑ Index

33. Pierre Joris
from IFEX COOMUNIQUE
Tue 4 Jun 1996

This just in from IFEX COMMUNIQUE # 5-22 & shld be of interest to some on the list -- Pierre

NTERNATIONAL PEN CENTRES HOLD DAY OF ACTION ON TURKEY

WRITER YASAR KEMAL AWARDED HELLMAN\HAMMETT GRANT

Writers around the world held a day of solidarity with their imprisoned and censored colleagues in Turkey on 30 May, reports the Writers in Prison Committee (WiPC) of International PEN. It was "the day before an important challenge to the laws which severely limit Turkish writers' right to freedom of expression." Members of International PEN centres around the world lobbied Turkish authorities, their own governments and Turkish representatives in their countries, "calling for the Turkish laws to be brought into line with international norms protecting freedom of expression."

Last week, Human Rights Watch (HRW) awarded a Hellman/Hammett grant to world-renowned Turkish writer Yasar Kemal, who was tried and convicted in March 1996 on charges of "inciting racial hatred by way of regional and racial discrimination." Kemal, who was given a 20-month suspended sentence, "was warned that if he repeated his crime in the next five years, the sentence would become active." In recognising Kemal, HRW "noted the courage he has shown in defending freedom of expression for himself and the others currently on trial. It is ironic that Turkey, which prides itself on Kemal's place on the short list of candidates for the Nobel Prize, is at the same time harassing him and his colleagues for expressing thoughtful concern." [See IFEX "Communique" #5-11, #4-48, #4-30, #4-19 for background.]

For its day of action, the WiPC notes, many writers and intellectuals in Turkey are being tried in connection with the publication of the book "Freedom of Expression in Turkey", which includes the article by Kemal for which he was charged. "Ninety-nine intellectuals who signed up as responsible editors of the book to challenge the government over freedom of expression restrictions were investigated and charged," says the WiPC, adding, "One, the well-known author Aziz Nesin, has since died and a second trial has been launched against 86 others who were identified after investigations." The 98 intellectuals went to court on 31 May, reports the WiPC. At a recent International PEN meeting in Denmark, writers from 19 countries signed up as responsible editors of "Freedom of Expression in Turkey" as a gesture of solidarity. The writers are from Denmark, Sweden, the United States of America, England, Switzerland, Australia, Canada, Austria, Japan, Mexico, Russia, Kenya, Germany, Norway, Nepal, the Czech Republic, Malawi, Finland and Croatia.

The WiPC reports that, in 1995, "human rights groups concentrated on pressuring the government to amend Article 8 of the Anti-Terror Law," and, in October, this law was slightly amended and several writers released as a result. However, some of these writers have now been sentenced again, says the WiPC, citing Dr. Haluk Gerger, another 1996 Hellman/Hammett grant recipient who was imprisoned from June 1994 until late 1995 under Article 8. He was sentenced for "inciting racism" on 15 May to 20 months in prison for an article on the state of emergency in southeast Turkey. "Turkish human rights groups have identified around 500 laws which can be used to restrict freedom of expression in Turkey," says the WiPC.

The PEN American Center released a "Message of Solidarity to 98 Turkish Writers and Intellectuals Standing Trial in Turkey on 31 May, 1996 from 98 Writers around the Globe", in both English and Turkish.

========== Pierre Joris | "Form fascinates when one no longer has the force Dept. of English | to understand force from within itself. That SUNY Albany | is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | "Poetry is the promise of a language." email: | -- Friedrich Holderlin [redacted]|
==========

↑ Index

34. Kevin Killian

Re: Bernadette Mayer

Tue 4 Jun 1996

At 1:37 PM 6/4/96, Ken Edwards wrote:
>Excellent news about Bernadette Mayer's visit to SF -- does this mean >she's made >good progress in her recovery from her stroke?

Bernadette hasn't arrived in town yet, but the last I heard she was hiking at Big Bear--a place I'd never heard of before, but everyone else around here goes, "Oh, yes, Big Bear."

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

35. Joe Amato

cultural colostomy, pardon moi, s'il vous plait...

Tue 4 Jun 1996

(rant, by default)

I. PRERAMBLE

the pure product placements of the americas go crazy

to wit
poets, moi included
both ends moved to synchronous motion by the mediocrity of mediocrity & hopelessly awash w/portables of one sort & another sit on their virtual potties peeing words into the endless stream of consumable goods (later to be recycled & sold back (to them (as consumable waste wondering what is left to say of any moment of any singularity
of any unrecognizable import or export value
when all would seem so marketable so tributary
so rumored...

let's take a long step back off the screen
& the page
to examine this fucking conditional nightmare:

men & women alike
but clearly not entirely alike or this item you're reading (perusing would not be identifiable as such

men & women alike
well middleclass men & women alike

probably white in fact & perhaps mostly heterosexual

so white heterosexual middleclass men & women alike but again, clearly not entirely alike or etc.

this somehow differentiable group of people i have in mind but i'm a white heterosexual middleclass man middleaged, to boot

ok, let's not take a long step back let's dig right in & try to understand what, if anything

i can say/write (please permit me this coupling for a few moments (as well as this apostrophic address, dear reader about anybody else
around here:

or perhaps i should simply speak/write to my own needs?
& how to articulate the needs of a white heterosexual middleclass middleaged man?

& do i have needs, strictly speaking or mere desires?
in what context?

& what is the basis of my self-identification?
or is this self-indulgence?
self-avowal?
self-aggrandizement?

fear?

& who gives a shit, finally?

or should i address myself instead to the plight of others however defined?

& if not, if this be presumptuous should i just shut-up?

should i just shut-the-fuck-up?
take my hands off the keyboard?
put the pen down?

listen?

for how long?

and then what?

& who gives a shit, finally?
who gives a good shit?

& is all of this all that i've said/writ here ancient history?

no writ of habeus corpus is necessary to incriminate me:

mea culpa.

II. THAT SAID

& due allowance made for critical complicities corresponding to sheer subject positionality let it also be understood to all parties to these presents acting however in good faith that compromise a discourse is & will obligate specific responses which may not but succeed on occasion in coming up empty- or red-handed within the field of hopeful possibilities constituting poetic license

the affairs of such a state or states requiring internal & external investigation

yet demanding also for their proper execution & elucidation a pang of consciousness
a yen for spicy food & depending on the poet
a gentle & specifiable smack either on the lips or upside the head
all remonstrance notwithstanding.

III. TO BE CONTINUED

the time has come & gone to theorize capital
& nobody has a mind too
& nobody has the money too & everything is available everyplace you look except where you refuse too.

IV. CLIFFHANGERS-ON history enters here

locale along with & an overabundance of non-descript details & for good & bad measure a few arbiters of taste
just to keep things overdetermined & interested:

use your imagination, i dare you...

& what insidious form is this i spy permuting my information seeping in & out of to corrupt the relative spontaneity of this heavily revised, carefully packaged item?

a closer look reveals the presence of minute particles of motive ah yes i can see rather clearly now under the microelectroscatoscope
it's the screen resolution & perhaps the hardcopy quality too, ultimately either way what you've got here & there is a terminal relationship between writers & readers & authors & critics & speakers & listeners & voters & non-voters & it's spreading

"like a cancer"
as we used to say & will soon overcome
most of the cultural immuno-prophylacto-electroresistance, or whatever apologies for the somatic metaphor installed & checked
during the last major u.s. trauma
(oil embargo/presidential resignation, c. 1974)

& what you may end up with is pardon the expression

a fucking pile of horseshit
(the likes of which you've never seen.

V. DEGENERATING FURTHER

& in the midst of a global deregulation make-over we end this item with a foray into didactics directed esp. at those of you interested in practicing
what you preach:

fix it, please.

↑ Index

36. Jordan Davis
why don't we tell them
Tue 4 Jun 1996

Poetry Parties--New York--

Birthday party for R Creeley at St Mark's Poetry Project--Wednesday night--he's 70--

End of the year party at Poetry City--Brenda Williams and Rosa Alcala Diaz will be reading--afterwards party--during party--beforehand party--6:30 at 5 Union Sq W, 7th Fl--celebrate

--Jd

↑ Index

37. Ken Edwards
Bernadette Mayer
Tue 4 Jun 1996

Excellent news about Bernadette Mayer's visit to SF -- does this mean she's made good progress in her recovery from her stroke?

And regarding "Stone Marmalade" -- Kevin, are those sickly cattle in hell suffering from BSE? If so, you could recruit some of us Brits to play the parts. Wish I could be there. Moo to all.

↑ Index

38. Mark Wallace
Situation #12
Tue 4 Jun 1996

Situation #12 is now available, featuring the work of Henry Taylor, Hung Q. Tu, Ross Taylor, Maryrose Larkin, M. Magoolaghan, Corinne Robins, Blair Ewing, and Charles Borkhuis.

Subscriptions are $10 for four issues, or $3 for back or single issues. Make checks payable to Mark Wallace.

Situation
10402 Ewell Ave.
Kensington, MD 20895

↑ Index

39. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: client servile
Tue 4 Jun 1996

You are not authorized to send messages to E-Poetics List from this address. We advise that you attempt to be somebody else and post messages from an address that we are willing to recognize. We are, however, willing to foreward the end-rhymes from your message. We are also deleting the materials you have attempted to froward from Dr. Sokal regarding his recent discovery of the Piltdown Man.

you though grown.
true,
blue woe known.
to the boys
we;
toys.
bait,
wait.

↑ Index

40. Mark Wallace
mainstream art critic nonsense
Tue 4 Jun 1996

Well, here's a bit of the latest garbage from the Washington Post. In this case it's reviewer Tim Page, writing on John Cage's "Europera Five."

I'll just give you the choice bits. The rest is just as stupid, only less funny:

"If Cage ever wrote another important piece after 1952, the year of "4'33," I have not heard it. His musical universe grew obsessively inclusive and he spoke often and eloquently, in his gentle manner, about the danger of making any qualitative evaluations whatsoever."

"What did it all mean? Nothing at all, of course. Was that the point? No. There was no point: never underestimate the simple-mindedness of Cage's later aesthetic."

"For this spectator, the only remotely stimulating question of the evening was whether the authors of "Rescue Me" and the old Troggs hit "Love Is All Around"--both played in their entirety during the show---might have the right to sue the Cage estage for their completele incorporation into a work that was supposedly "by" John Cage."

Now, here's where it gets TRULY amazing:

"A ...spirited review of Cage's "Europera 5"... might read something like this. Fourscore and. Wednesday night Spoleto. This. When in the course of. Presented. Stately, plump. Europera. Whrrr. Across the sky. John Cage. Corn syrup, lecithin. Call 1-800. Bzzzzzzzz. One hour. Tweet."

YES, THAT'S RIGHT, there is an absolutely amazing passage of poetry in the one section of this reviewer's foolishness that is actually an attempt to mock John Cage. Who knew he could be so brilliant? Especially when the most interesting question for him is the possibility of suing people he can't understand...

mark wallace

↑ Index

41. Jordan Davis
Re: New Books fer Poetics
Tue 4 Jun 1996

---

send these please?

> 4. _Symmetry_, Laura Moriarty, Avec, $9.95.
> "The one clear night which encompasses the subject forgets everything."

> 6. _Natural Facts_, Melanie Neilson, Potes & Poets, $11.00. Cover is a daguerreotype, 1840s, "Still Life with Pumpkin, Shakespeare, and Sweet Potato." Lauterbach mentions Ives in her blurb, seems right to me. "Will Congress / Canary the canon?"
>
> 7. _Clean and Well Lit: Sel Poems 1987-1995_, Tom Raworth, Roof, $10.95. Tom's tops.
>
> Poetics folks receive free shipping on orders of more than $20. Free shipping + 10% discount on orders of more than $30. There are two ways to order. 1. E-mail your order to [redacted] with your address & we will bill you with the books. or 2. via credit card-- you may call us at [redacted] or e-mail [redacted] w/ yr add, order, & card # & we will send a receipt with the books.
>
> Bridge Street Books, 2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW, Wahsington, DC 20007.

yes? to Jordan Davis
c/o Teachers & Writers (where you're welcome to teach btw)
5 Union Sq W 7th Fl
NYC 10003-3306

Grazie-- Jd

↑ Index

42. David Baratier

A science project: if anyone is interested

Tue 4 Jun 1996

>
>Why not help the kids out?
>----------
>Forwarded message:
>Subj: Re: Stevie and Amanda's grade school science project >Date: 96-05-28 22:53:31 EDT
>From: MNRedwood
>To: [redacted]
>
>
>>---begin fwd---
>>Hi, our names are Stevie and Amanda. We are in the 5th grade at the >>Phillipston Memorial school, Phillipston, Massachusetts, USA. We are >>doing a science project on the Internet. We want to see how many >>responses we can get back in two weeks. (We are only sending out 2 letters). >>

>>Please respond and then send this letter to anyone you communicate with >>on the Internet. Respond to [redacted].
>>
>> 1. Where do you live (state and country)? >> 2. From whom did you get this letter?
>>
>> Thank you,
>> Stevie and Amanda >>
>

↑ Index

43. Chris Stroffolino
Re: mainstream art critic nonsense
Tue 4 Jun 1996

Who wrote "Rescue Me"---Fontella Bass, the singer, was married to Lester Bowie it is written.

↑ Index

44. David Baratier
mainstream art critic
Tue 4 Jun 1996

Mark,

It fits in with something that Nam June Paik (the video artist) said last summer (paraphrase) "Television is exciting therefore we have to make art that is very boring. "

David Baratier

↑ Index

45. George Bowering
Re: sonnet
Tue 4 Jun 1996

Actually, I think the sonnet was created in the 13trh century when it was common to take two weeks to write a poem, one line a day. At the start, sonnets had two stanzas of 7 lines each, but then Alfredo Rizzoli, the poet-monk found that he could not stop after line seven one day, so wrote eight lines in the first week, and then took a day off before starting the next stanza. Soon his acolytes copied him, and so there we are.

.....
"In town we have arguments."
--Stan Persky
George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

46. Jordan Davis
mainstream art critic/apology for commerce
Tue 4 Jun 1996

I think the most amusing thing to say to the Post, Mark, might be something like 'Thank you for printing that beautiful poetry in the middle of your review of _Europera Five_. It's rare that such interesting writing is hidden where everyone can see it.'

As. I missed. My folks. Also happens. Like a lamb. Possibly foppish. Name in Paper. A very sensitive maybe. Review the reviewers. Indubitably. Decontextualizing the left. Why. Mark. Maybe a letter. Page's text and sufficiently brief. The bastards. Lie by! Schtick circa 'Central Park. A given? South in the winter. Colorblind art critic.

By the way, oops re my Rod order back then.

JORD

↑ Index

47. Louis Cabri
Re: client servile
Wed 5 Jun 1996

"Fabrication will produce the banausic mentality"

dented
sands
"banausiacs."
relented,
Brians.
yackety-yack
homologue:

twister,
grog?"
ifster smooth, basement-- moos
grincement.

↑ Index

48. k.a. hehir

Re: A science project: if anyone is interested

Wed 5 Jun 1996

---

from what i know this is as the dutch say a -roos. i received the same message a few weeks ago only to be followed by an appy olly ogy from its sender.

for those with interests in irish lit i receive a post from the irish book review every month. it is sent out by the same people who put together the Irish Emigrant. if you are interested, let me know backchannel and i'll forward you the info to set you up.

cheers,
Caoimhin Oh-Eithir

On Tue, 4 Jun 1996,
David Baratier wrote:

> >
> >Why not help the kids out?
> >----------
> >Forwarded message:
> >Subj: Re: Stevie and Amanda's grade school science project >Date: 96-05-28 22:53:31 EDT
> >From: MNRedwood
> >To: [redacted]
> >
> >
> >>---begin fwd---
> >>Hi, our names are Stevie and Amanda. We are in the 5th grade at the > >>Phillipston Memorial school, Phillipston, Massachusetts, USA. We are > >>doing a science project on the Internet. We want to see how many > >>responses we can get back in two weeks. (We are only sending out 2 letters). >>
> >>Please respond and then send this letter to anyone you communicate with >>on the Internet. Respond to [redacted].
> >>
> >> 1. Where do you live (state and country)? >> 2. From whom > did you get this letter?

> >>
> >> Thank you,
> >> Stevie and Amanda >>
> >

↑ Index

49. henry gould

Re: client servile

Wed 5 Jun 1996

On Tue, 4 Jun 1996 22:44:56 MDT Louis Cabri said:
>"Fabrication will produce the banausic mentality"
>
> dented
> sands
> "banausiacs."
> relented,
> Brians.
> yackety-yack
> homologue:
> twister,
> grog?"
> ifster
> smooth, > basement--
> moos
> _grincement_.

Looks like hysterical dialectics has produced a new Language phenomenon: the "sonnot". c.f. Princeton Cyclonopedia: "The sonnot, a pre-millenial postprandial development within the larger phenomenon of Language Poetry, was by and large an attempt by a number of pre-colonial post-coastal American poets to de-limit the essence of rhyme; the most common means involved a vaporization of between 6-8 syllables per line excluding ultimate & penultimate glossalalia, leaving the right-hand marginal superstructure to stand like the circular ruins, for example, of the Colosseum in Rome, Idaho - a tourist attraction since the late 19th century, famous for the "pigeon perch", a 60-ft lateral embankment jutting out of the Rocky Mountain feldspar producing conditions for dangerous rain on the surging crowd of visitors below." [pp. 1374; by Elwood F. Pederson, Prof. Em. Boise Univ.] - H. Gould

↑ Index

50. Gwyn McVay
Re: client servile
Wed 5 Jun 1996

Annie,

elementary school! elementary school!

Gwyn, still short

↑ Index

51. Annie Finch
Re: client servile
Wed 5 Jun 1996

Dear Henry:

"hysterical dialectic?" I thought we might manage to avoid the gender angle this time, though it's hard to avoid when the sonnet or even the sonnot is in question. As Gwyn McVay has observed, "the sonnet described as a short fat know-it-all? Funny, when I was in high school that's how everyone described me."

-A. Crane Finch aligning thy choiring strings

↑ Index

52. Jordan Davis
b b d o
Wed 5 Jun 1996

Beavis, stop trying to be funny!

↑ Index

53. Oren Izenberg
Re: mainstream art critic nonsense
Wed 5 Jun 1996

Mark,

Why "amazing"? It strikes me that the strong defense of a disjunctive or unconventionally conjunctive or appropriative poetic must entail more than the reflex "now THAT'S poetry" when a skeptical critic tries to make a joke of the enterprise, more than the understandable desire to mock and deride what seems sometimes like a principled refusal to take the experimental seriously. (Although I must say, despite not having seen the review beyond your citation, the critic's distinction between early and later Cage does not seem "know-nothing" or even terribly conservative, nor, to this reader, entirely absurd.)

One hopes (this one, at any rate) not to surrender the ability to ask questions of an "inclusive" poetics. The work, by virtue of its eventual end, remains (despite our fondest wishes) subject to criteria, however they are to be described-- and in the face of criticism, or mere curiosity, or urgent personal need, perhaps the best response would be to describe them, rather than to wink and nudge and congratulate ourselves on their existence and validity.

The alternative, of course, is to write off those who are not immediately interested as those who will never understand, and to make of the "community" of writers and readers a cabal (and surely it is already sufficiently demonized in precisely these terms).

Best wishes,

O.

↑ Index

54. Rod Smith
Re: criticism's face
Wed 5 Jun 1996

re the post review of Cage Oren Izenberg wrote:

> having seen the review beyond your citation, the critic's distinction between early and later Cage does not seem "know-nothing" or even terribly conservative, nor, to this reader, entirely absurd.

There was no attempt by the Post writer to contextualize Cage's later work whatsoever. He merely implies that John went crazy after abt 1952. Not very useful.

O. also wrote:

> The work, by virtue of its eventual end, remains (despite our fondest wishes) >subject to criteria, however they are to be described-- and in the >face of criticism or mere curiosity, or urgent personal need, >perhaps the best response would be to describe them, rather than to >wink and nudge

This is exactly what Cage spent a great deal of time doing. It's not whether the Post reporter likes Cage or not, who cares-- It is the perennial problem of getting the press to acknowledge any context other than their own, which is almost always vapid (This is relevant to the Sokal "debate"). The few times in the article when something like information about Cage is hinted at, it's wrong.

Another point which interests me is implied by the phrase "in the face of criticism"-- I've mentioned this before on the list I believe-- there's a logic of justification there which I suppose one could deconstruct. What I mean to say is, too rarely the attitude is one of respect & discussion-- more often it is "explain yourself sufficiently in _my_ terms"-- which seems to me to work against what art can do, is for. & at times I tend to admire those that refuse explanation as explanation, tho this was certainly never Cage's way.

Rod

"Attitude can be interesting"

"Tell me what this is about"

--Tom Raworth

↑ Index

55. David Baratier

Re: nonsuch sonnet includes alletois wrench torque

Wed 5 Jun 1996

Anne,

I thought a reference to eidolon, a known refrain of a poem by Whitman might be lost on you. Especially considering his work was written under the auspice of an organic form, one which secludes him from this discussion.

I like how you manipulated my original quote to fit your purposes, for a sense of "rightness" perhaps? Here's your version. "god is not further revealed to a person who cannot call joy without syllables." There is a crucial change you made here, the replacement of my word which is the english translation of original hebrew characters for a sexless, faceless, spiritual manifestation with your word"joy" so you could agree: True.

I could call this manipulation. As you said "naming is one way things can be approached" but there are also unnameable vacuities inherent in rhetorical functions when applied rather than etherized about. It's part of the field of language resistance, the natural difference between what is written and what is meant.

At this point you start writing about repetition which, in context of this discussion, has nothing to do with the the laconian identification process. Repetition can be the grinding of a idea into a graspable concept. Jack Spicer said: poems only occur in series which Poe iterated in his writings on Milton's Paradise Lost where he found that a person would have to be a fool if they read the piece as one poem, in one sitting. So when you ask "Isn't this [repetition] just a matter of temperament or even phase of life?" I have to entirely disagree. Unless if you meant in the Yeatsian sense of placing yourself in the 28th phase of the cycle.

When I said "there is no continuum except in terms of the overarching and archetypal; values of written sets of words fluctuate continually" you replied: "[this statement] itself [is] a nonfluctuating value claim, perhaps more dangerous because it is may be tempted to forget its own solidity?" In case you have forgotten the power of the word is always dangerous. The connotational and denotational associative values of my statement are in a state of flux also, as you so rightly point out. Considering the duration this message will survive in e-space, I comfortably assumed a current statement which includes a free lifetime updating.

Be Well.

David Baratier

Here is the sound of a hero outgrowing his confetti.
--Jeffrey McDaniel

[redacted]

↑ Index

56. Carnography

Re: nonsuch sonnet includes alletois wrench torque

Wed 5 Jun 1996

David Baratier typed:

> I thought a reference to eidolon, a known refrain of a poem by Whitman might be lost on you. Especially considering his work was written under the auspice of an organic form, one which secludes him from this discussion.

Though I don't wish to be dragged, citing and signing, back into the sonnet tussle, I do have to say this:

The word eidolon is more than a mere feature of one Whitman refrain. It has been used regularly by several other writers, I'll have you know, including your lonesome. (Indeed, when people speak of cultural icons, I've always felt it would be more accurate for them to speak of cultural eidolons. If Barney is an important cultural icon, then my wetnurse was the Fountain of Youth.)

My first kidly exposure to the word eidolon was in Hart Crane's poem, "Legend" ("Again, the smoking souvenir,/Bleeding Eidolon!"). Galvanized by Crane's energy and metaphysical compression, I immediately wrote a series of wretched imitations with titles like "Eidolon of Love" [sic (ick)]. It never even occurred to me to trace the Bloomlike map of misreading to Whitman and to stop short there. Whitman might be a great poet, but his diction, however characteristic, is not a claim of referent ownership.

You may argue that Crane was making a deliberate ref. to Whitman (especially in light of _The Bridge_ and other Whitman-meets-the-Symbolists-in-a-play-by-Marlowe-esque works). But you're still suggesting that, without an intimate knowledge of Whitman's diction, A.F. is insufficiently literate to be part of this discussion. To which I say: should we write out an idiosyncratic reading test, complete with trick questions, give it to you by means of embedded references, grade you on the test, and bring it up whenever we disagree with one of your points? Knowledge ought to be shared, not hoarded.

Also: Why suggest that a person who speaks passionately of formal verse is ignorant of all other kinds? I, too, am less familiar with Whitman than I ought to be. But that comes from having him quoted to me by an aunt ("I saw a noiseless patient spider, blah blah blah") until I developed a blind spot, not because I disapprove of Whitman's prosody.

> I like how you manipulated my original quote to fit your purposes, for a sense of "rightness" perhaps?

(Suspiciously) I like how you imbedded this ad hominem interpretation of Finch in your letter. A subliminal message meant to activate some Manchurian Candidate, perhaps?

(It's hard enough to understand an opposing point of view without attributing nasty motives to the speaker.)

> I could call this manipulation.

And I could call this ad hominem (see above).

> In case you have forgotten the power of the word is always dangerous.

Or impotent, depending on the reader and the context.

Finally, this is to Annie Finch, who said,

> "hysterical dialectic?"
> I thought we might manage to avoid the gender angle this time, though it's hard to avoid when the sonnet or even the sonnot is in question.

The word hysterical is not sexist unless it is used etymologically. Context, I would think, plays a part in any use of the English language-- which, if you think about it, is embedded with sexist implications. Any writer ought to be free to use any word without taking a political litmus test--even when the word has an ugly etymological past.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

57. George Bowering

Re: client servile

Wed 5 Jun 1996

> Annie,
>
> elementary school! elementary school!
>
> Gwyn, still short

Or as USAmericans pronounce it, "elemenary" school.

.....
"I've enjoyed just about as much of this as I can stand."
--Bobbie Louise hawkins

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

58. Tim wood

Re: A science project: if anyone is interested

Thu 6 Jun 1996

As I found out when I happily went off and not only responded, but forwarded the message, this event is history. Apparently it happened sometime ago and was even picked up by the NY Times. It was discontinued after their service provider overloaded on 10-100 posts a second. Ouch.

Tim Wood

> Subject: Re: A science project: if anyone is interested > Sent: 06/05 12:39 AM
> Received: 06/05 9:44 PM
> From: k.a. hehir, [redacted]
> Reply-To: UB POETICS List, [redacted]
> To: UB POETICS List, [redacted]

> from what i know this is as the dutch say a -roos. i received the same message a few weeks ago only to be followed by an appy olly ogy from its sender.
>
> for those with interests in irish lit i receive a post from the irish book review every month. it is sent out by the same people who put together the Irish Emigrant. if you are interested, let me know backchannel and i'll forward you the info to set you up.
>
> cheers,
> Caoimhin Oh-Eithir
>
> On Tue, 4 Jun 1996,
> David Baratier wrote:
>
> > >
> > >Why not help the kids out?
> > >----------
> > >Forwarded message:
> > >Subj: Re: Stevie and Amanda's grade school science project >Date: 96-05-28 22:53:31 EDT
> > >From: MNRedwood
> > >To: [redacted]
> > >

↑ Index

59. Mark Wallace
Cage, and information
Thu 6 Jun 1996

Re Oren Izenberg's post:

Yikes! I actually thought this poetics list was at least primarily for people who had some awareness about the history of experimental artistic practice, and so I could perhaps pass along what seems to me a pretty obvious joke and others would get it. It seems probably that mostly they have, but for some I guess I'll have to explain myself more fully. Please see Rod Smith's post yesterday for another elucidation of why it is ridiculous to dismiss all of Cage's work after 1952 (and is there anybody on this list other than Mr. Izenberg who thinks such a thing is even a conceivably respectable position? I hope not.)

To take only several points, the idea that Cage's work is about "making no distinctions" is utterly preposterous, and based on no awareness of the absolutely intense distinctions Cage is making about the problem of defining what makes something "music." Whatever his "quiet gentleness" (this Tim Page guy is really a scream) Cage's work, among many others things, is a direct assault on the totally limited context of what constitues "music" in western culture--Cage wants us to hear the sound all around us that is inevitably repressed by the idea that only a certain range of sounds are available for music. Mr. Page, of course (Cage/Page, too much huh?) wants precisely all the trappings of "high" classical music that Cage has no use for and so can't hear him at all.

Secondly, the idea that Cage's later work "has no point" must, I suppose, be based on the idea that the twenty or so books (many more? please help here, Rod) Cage wrote elucidating the incredible complexity of his practice (and which is not just theoretical--it's there in the recordings) must be irrelevant. Or perhaps Page hasn't read them? Now THERE'S a thought! What Page means by "has no point" I guess should really be "calls into question on almost every level each one of my bourgeious presuppositions and eliminates them from further serious intellectual consideration." I'm not actually going to go into great detail on what Cage says about the limited structures of western music and how he intends to go about expanding their limits by incorporating non-melodic, supposedly non-musical sounds into a sound landscape that shows how the sound of a musical performance is inevitably related to the sound that exists beyond the bounds of the performance itself, and how doing such a thing reveals the way in which western artistic culture has often intended to eliminate whole ranges of experience from artistic possibility. Do I really need to go into things on this basic a level on this list?

Of course, I was kidding somewhat in calling Page's short little disjunctive blurb "wonderful poetry." But I did find it somewhat interesting that he actually managed to present a good approximation of disjunctive new sentence prose poem in what is otherwise a massive peon to ignorance. Of course, I'm getting the feeling now that maybe I'm being presumptive in assuming that everybody on this list knows what the New Sentence is (with my apologies to those who do).

I suppose my friend Marc Scroggins is going to tell me I'm being pugnacious again. But geez, Marc, look at what I have to put up with. There would be value in being polite, I suppose, to people who were engaging with experimental work seriously and who, even if uniformed, were asking questions seriously. But the flippant, uninformed sneering dismissal that Page offers in the Post as serious criticism deserves no politeness because it does not intend to be polite, or to engage on any real level with one of the most significant musical and literary artists of this century. And the idea that Mr. Izenberg thinks that such a position is reasonable (and would seem reasonable to people on this list) is pretty much flabbergasting.

Mark Wallace

(and a brief plug for Joan Retallack's new book on Cage, which I hope Rod will talk about in more detail)

↑ Index

60. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: alas, eidolon
Thu 6 Jun 1996

---

my wetnurse achieved cold fusion in the kitchen sink there was no joy in mudville

the world was all that mighty casey struck out

↑ Index

61. David Golumbia
Re: Cage, and Page informixion
Thu 6 Jun 1996

I resent bitterly the accusations being thrown about on POETICS regarding the relative value of works by Messrs. PAGE and CAGE. While I understand various persons' opinion regarding said Cage's infamous short silent "Four Sticks (and Thirty Three Twigs)" I must invariably rate it of intenser value than Page's neo-classical attempts to invigorate Baroquial musiks through use of violin bow apres e-bow electrified bass. Until the death of John Bonham, I appreciated Cage's "quiet gentleness" in the many stadium shows fronting with Joyce mesostics "Sick Again," "Boogie with Stu," "The Lemon Song." The fact that Page has such difficulty with guitar recently was no justification for him to attack his prior ally. Only death of Cage prevented the anticipated "No Quarter-tone" reunion tour, though rumored that Cage & Page forgot David Tudor's phone #. Why such hostility in arts comunity? I have bootleg of A. Baraka doing "Trampled Under Foot" with Cage on triple-neck that will blow all minds, will trade for good quality tapes of Ben Bradlee w/Allman Bros or plain Bros.

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

62. David Baratier
nonsuch sonnet impotent lifetime guarantee
Thu 6 Jun 1996

Rob Hardin,

I sincerely apologize for having irked your ire by not mentioning your own work in the eidolon discussion. Eidolon is more than a mere feature of one Whitman refrain. It has been used regularly by several other writers. While I could bring Hart Crane, yourself, or HP Lovecraft "the putrid, dripping eidolon of unwholesome revelation" into the discussion, I still am unaware of an earlier poetic reference than Whitman and was instructed at an early age to always return to the source.

I will argue that Crane was making a deliberate ref. to Whitman. I am suggesting that without using your arms to open an OED to refute my point (anyone's for that matter), or to find out what any unknown word means, one arrives to the discussion sufficiently lazy enough to speculate on what is being said and offer their opinion, instead of their knowledgable experience.

In answer to your question "Why suggest that a person who speaks passionately of formal verse is ignorant of all other kinds?" It's hard enough to understand an opposing point of view without attributing nasty motives to the speaker.

As I said previously:
In case you have forgotten the power of the word is always dangerous.

To which you responded:

> Or impotent, depending on the reader and the context.

Thank you, this has broadened our discussion this much.

I suggest that if we continue this thread in a manner worth replying to, that we talk about how to determine which strings of words fit into a particular form, what aspects of words (phonemem, morpheme, arragement, connotational value, associative change of these values, etcetera) solidify in our minds which forms are to be used, as charles (chax) mentioned a while back.

Be well,

David Baratier

I'd rather be in Espana pegging pernod through a pajita or yagrelling a luk
jedamput en Jugoslavie, jowels wide & yowels not permitted to emerge--

--Paul Blackburn

↑ Index

63. Annie Finch
Re: nonsuch sonnet includes alletois wrench torque
Thu 6 Jun 1996

Dear Rob,

True, the word hysterical is not always sexist, and perhaps my consciousness of being greatly outnumbered genderwise in recent discussions coupled with my recent thinking about connections between gender and formalism (see intro to A Formal Feeling Comes) led me to jump the pearl-handled pistol on Henry's phrase. It never hurts to remind writers of the etymological unconscious of their language, though, does it? (The day I responded, I had also read a review of a new book on Hysteria pointing out that though the most common hysterical patient in Freud's day was male, Freud omitted any discussion of male hysterics in his work on the subject). David, I'm very sorry about transmuting your word into "joy." It was actually technical wrongness that led me to it, since the program I use at home can't quote text so I was working from memory in quoting you--and also, you may remember I have been prone to typos myself and probably thought I was doing you a favor in changing jwy to joy, though I should have noticed how odd the one apparent typo seemed in an otherwise flawless text. My fawwlt! I've been wanting to tell you how much I liked your "sonnet" from a ways back, by the way. As for eidolon, like Rob I thought of Crane first, and hence responded by dragging out my middle name (no relation). The question mark questioned your characterization of me as shouting eidolon from rooftops. Annie--eidolon shouter? was the purport of my signature. I've spent some time on Whitman and have a chapter on him in The Ghost of Meter, though that prefatory poem is not one of my favorites. I agree with Rob about litmus tests. --A.R.C. Finch

↑ Index

64. Herb Levy
Re: mainstream art critic
Thu 6 Jun 1996

One thing that needs to be made very clear in regard to the Tim Page review of Cage's Europera 5, is that Page is NOT simply a yahoo with no experience with music later than Debussy & Ravel.

As the primary music critic for the Soho Weekly News 15-20 years ago he heard, and reviewed intelligently, LOTS of new music. More recently, he produced a series of CDs for BMGs Catalyst label which, again, while not always to my taste, showed an awareness of a fairly wide range of recent music, some of which I respect & some of which I don't (composers in this se4ries include off the top of my head, Alvin Curran, Philip Glass, Arvo Part, James McMillan, Toby Twining, as well as a selection of Cage's piano music, including at least one piece composed well after 4'33").

In other words, while I haven't always agreed with Page's opinions (& certainly like later Cage more than he appears to), he has a pretty strong background in the field.

There are a couple of things to consider here. First, newspaper articles are not solely written by the signator, copy editors can & do, change things quite a bit. They won't (usually) change the stated opinion of a reviewer (& I assume that Page honestly didn't like Europera 5), but they can & frequently do, change the emphasis & drop supporting arguments in reviews on the theory that people reading newspapers do not want to read criticism in any sense that we might agree on a definition of the term, but rather that newspaper readers simply want to know if they should spend money on going to the show. That's the point of all of those four-five star, thumbs up or downor other rating systems. This is consumer news, not considered, balanced criticism.

The other point to consider here, though, is whether it makes sense to use the work of Cage, or of any artist, as a kind of litmus test.

I can see this both ways, but I'm not the first to note that there is very little, if any, agreement on the relative value of specific poetry among those of us who subscribe to this list. I'm not sure that I can imagine what writers would be ranked most important, most influential, most popular, most likely to succeed, best dressed, most congenial, etc. if all 400 members of poetics were to vote on it. It would be interesting, but useful?

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

65. Ira Lightman
Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?
Thu 6 Jun 1996

Hallo everyone. I've said a few things about John Cage before on POETICS but, since I've just re-joined, and very little of the viewpoint I tried to argue for once before is represented in this new outbreak of Cage discussion...

I wonder what we're defending when we're defending Cage? How many are defending him out of a love of 20th century (or all) music, out of a pleasure in 20th century music, and out of an ongoing wish to stand up for an important human activity, and consciousness?

I myself would be no friend of Mr Page, the, as Mark said, mainstream critic; I'm not presenting a reactionary position, as I'm very keen on many of Cage's contemporaries, who, it seems to me, rarely or never get namechecked, written about, festschrifts to, by the writers on this list, the writers who publish books away from this list, and indeed many poets or writers who think of themselves as, or proclaim themselves as, experimental artists. If we are experimental artists, it seems a fair assumption, that many I read and know make, that we be interested in all experimentation in all arts, and criticism and essays by experimental writers on, for example, music, seem to exude this assumption (eg the Joan Retallack book on Cage, mentioned, and the work on Cage in Marjorie Perloff's excellent - ie for me, great case for the generative power of Cage's aesthetics and example - book, Radical Artifice).

My worry is that these two books start and stop consideration of music with Cage.

That the fact he was, for me, a great writer, an even greater interviewee, as illustrated by memoirs of his conversation in Rod Smith's Aerial on him, in Radical Artifice, in Cage's biography. I love his pre-chance prepared piano sonatas, I love many experimental musicians' use of chance, I don't like Cage's, the many I've heard on disc, just one I heard on radio that (and I do not say this to be trivial, as I am an insomniac) put me into the most blissful sleep as I concentrated on it, waking exactly as the radio programme ended. I hope Cage would be pleased, not trivialised, by this reaction.

My closest composer-friend, Mike Higgins, once said to me, when I told him how sad I was when I heard that John Cage had died, that for him he was sad but sadder still that, the same summer, Olivier Messiaen died. Messiaen was older and, given the upheavals of 1950's new music and, for example, Pierre Boulez' punk-like glee in titling an essay "Schoenberg is dead!" (Boulez' exclamation mark). Boulez' implication was that things had to move faster, that one major upheaval, serialism, was not enough, but it must reach "its" (ie Boulez's assumption) "evolution" in total serialism.

This excites me, as I love the 50s composers most of all.

Then, it seems to me, Cage proposes a further furthering, and proposes that this too evolves the form and makes the earlier work dull or even redundant ie his own work.

My difficulty with this is that Schoenberg made people listen harder, for shape and configuration, and not wallow in a general feeling awaiting beauty, resolution of harmony, the manipulation of a fixed set of possible sequences of notes; this meant having to know an instrument, having to know keys, and thus opening up, afresh, a way of hearing the world away from the concert hall ie having the awful knowledge of key meant that you could then hear that sounds, like cars and birds, were not just noise or sound, but transcribable music (see Messaien's pieces using transcription of bird song played by violin).

Going earlier to go later, one might say that one of the last powers that Debussy rang from the old harmony was to compose long modulating phrases slowly becoming other phrases - something akin to Henry James' prose style - so that the listener went away into the world hearing all the aftermath of each sound, the sine wave of a car revving, approaching, and departing; to make the listener think of sound as, to think of Derrida, not beads with borders on a necklace, but that we think of them that way, hearing only a part or peak of the wave of the whole sound, its geography and history, and classifying it only as a sign for the short peak in which we hear it (or bother to listen for it).

The total serialists, to me, took this up, by focussing on slow sounds building and falling, texture, all the sound of sound.

If that is nasty horrid Western classical music, then it is also the nasty horrid thing that has helped me enrich my senses.

My worry is that a lot of writers like Cage because one doesn't have to do this hard work, this ground work, in listening, and learning an instrument,

like the piano, rather than learning how to riff in the small range of keys available to R&B. Thus, goodbye to nasty horrid (impotent, ignored, widely hated)
Western classical music, goodbye hard work, hallo
an easily graspable principle mastered and you can call yourself musical and a musician. Okay, not all bad as self-empowerment, but not if the self-empowerer
then disempowers, marginalises, and even stigmatises, alternative classical music of the same era, by, in Stockhausen and others' cases, exact contemporaries
to Cage.

Ira Lightman

P.S. I'm partly inspired to write after hearing Steve Reich's Drumming, source for Ron Silliman's Ketjak, which I found similarly dull, easy to get into, compared to Indian classical music or, most wonderful of all for abstract expressionist rhythm, Xenaxis' Plaides.

↑ Index

66. Blair Seagram
M/E/A/N/I/N/G
Thu 6 Jun 1996

I received in the mail last week the The latest edition of M/E/A/N/I/N/G - 19/20 "Special All-Visual Double Issue".

A visual feast full of variety. Congratulations to editors Susan Bee and Mira Schor. If my subscription included only this issue it would have been worth it.

Blair

↑ Index

67. Oren Izenberg
Re: mainstream art critic
Thu 6 Jun 1996

I can assure Mr. Wallace that he need not conduct an introductory tutorial in experimental music or in the New Sentence for my benefit. I give thanks for your expressed (if exasperated) willingness to "put up" with me; no doubt I will limp along without such kindnesses.

Mark Wallace seems to have concluded that the point of my post was primarily to express (or endorse) a preference for early John Cage over late-- apparently this is an outrageous preference and no doubt I should have kept it to myself to avoid offending local orthodoxies. I did not, I acknowledge, offer reasons-- that the opinion was parenthetical may be an insufficient excuse, but it is mine own-- which apparently leads to the conclusion that I can have none because there are none. I certainly did not imply that Mark Wallace or any other member of the poetics list shared such opinions; but I had hoped (and this was the point of my post), was that the expression of an opinion, in the recalcitrant press or on this list, might provoke discussion rather than invective. I did fail to catch the humor of a post that called Mr. Page stupid and uneducated (as I failed-- and no doubt I am somewhat humorless on this score-- to be amused by the one that imputed to me massive ignorance of matters poetical); he is neither, and I doggedly refuse to acknowledge that engaging with "such" people, reiterating and expanding our own understanding in the process, is a pointless exercise. Herb Levy and Ira Lightman, most recently, have eloquently demonstrated otherwise.

In response to Rod Smith-- I (sometimes) share your qualms about explanation qua explanation; since the offending article was a piece of criticism, it was primarily that genre and that forum for discussion I had in mind (although "mere curiosity and urgent need" were meant to suggest other provocations to inquiry, not quite as provoking or "in your face). Not all artists will, or need, explain themselves as well or thoroughly as Cage. Explanation may become a burden to the artist who feels obligated to terms and discourses other than, or parallel to, those of the art; but I do see critical explication as one among the many imperfect forms of acknowledgement; and incidentally, the one most likely to reach the traditionalist or the skeptic. Your Watten issue of Aerial (the most recent I have seen, and on which congratulations) suggests a similar belief; it pursues "explanation" on many fronts, in many forms: critical essay, conversation, "composition"-- to powerful effect.

Best wishes.

O.

↑ Index

68. Jordan Davis
litmus party
Thu 6 Jun 1996

If school had been more about litmus tests, which were almost as exciting to watch as developing polaroids, I would not have dropped out, hitchhiked to alaska, and died eating the wrong kind of berry.

That said, I'd like to invite all of you ex-senators and -lion tamers to a freeforall poetry party at POETRY CITY (5 Union Sq W, NYC) tonight, 6:30, which party will be punctuated by two readings--one by fiction writer Brenda Williams, and the other by poet and recent Brown MFA graduate Rosa Alcala Diaz.

Jordan Davis

↑ Index

69. Rod Smith

Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?

Thu 6 Jun 1996

> My worry is that a lot of writers like Cage because one doesn't have to do this hard work, this >ground work, in listening, and learning an instrument,
>like the piano, rather than learning how to riff in the small range of keys available to R&B. Thus, goodbye
>to nasty horrid (impotent, ignored, widely hated)
Western classical music, goodbye hard work, hallo
>an easily graspable principle mastered and you can call yourself musical and a musician. Okay, not all >bad as self-empowerment, but not if the self-empowerer
then disempowers, marginalises, and even stigmatises,
>alternative classical music of the same era, by, in Stockhausen and others' cases, exact contemporaries
>to Cage.

Ira, thanks for your considerations-- however this last bit makes me wonder how much of the late Cage you've heard. There are a number of pieces for virtuoso which were composed by working closely with musicians to find out what was considered "impossible" on their instrument & then to include that in the score-- John did this, he sd, to demonstrate "the practicality of the impossible." The pieces are _Etudes Australes_ (for piano), _The Freeman Etudes_ (for violin), and _Etudes Boreles_ (for cello). All are long suites which involved a substantial amount of time to compose, & even greater amount of time for performers to master. Seems what you've heard might be some of the quiet number pieces or Ryoanji (not the orchestral version). You might enjoy a late .piece called Quartets I-VIII, which makes astonishing use of, yes, harmony.

I listen to & read Cage precisely because of the genuinely useful complexity of the work-- if his work at times seems "easy" it's for the same reason that Picasso made painting look "easy." I'd also like to note that through Cage I was introduced to a number of composers such as Stockhausen, Wolff, Boulez, Harrison, Feldman, Takemitsu-- so I have no sense of their being marginalized by Cage or anyone else.

↑ Index

70. Rod Smith

Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?

Thu 6 Jun 1996

---

continuing my last post after chance sent it off prematurely.

I agree with you Ira, that there are some missing feschrifts for composers other than Cage. I'd most like to see a good Feldman book, & have toyed with the thought myself. Also, is their anything out there in terms of a good new music publication like _Ear_ used to be. Something that would cover say Frissell, Le Baron, & unkowns? Also, to note, there's a new book on Nancarrow from Cambridge (overpriced hc, but looks very good).

Oren-- yes, explanation. I seem to have a split in my personality that way. I suppose it comes down to, as I said, justification. It seems to me so often that an artist is called upon to explain their right to do something, sorry, I ain't wid that-- whereas explanation is just that, an offering of context to allow further entrance to the work-- Duchamp & Johns come to mind.

Cld go on but have to go to work, erk.

Rod

↑ Index

71. Robert Drake

Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?

Thu 6 Jun 1996

> Also, is their anything out there in terms of a good new music publication like _Ear_ used to be....

Musicworks, out ov toronto. interesting running commentary fr the past few issues on Cage, but much more on emerging composers, as well as a broad spectrum of audio arts... a personal fave.

luigi

↑ Index

72. Eryque Gleason
proto proto yahoo
Fri 7 Jun 1996

scene 1: i've just taken another look at chris funkhouser's essay on hypertext/media. i think it's well worth the visit, it seems to be a good middle ground between high-end thinking about hypertext (that's inaccessible to most folks) and the absurdly reductive stuff i've seen on t.v. i think chris has found a good level for introductory material as well as a good collection of links that won't bore those that have read much hypertext, or much about hypertext.

scene 2: i'm sure many of you eat chinese food, i need fortunes and lots of 'em. they don't even have to be very good ones. i'd prefer them to be mailed to me in the original post-cookie form, taped to a postcard or somesuch, but i'll gladly accept them by email as well.

scene 3: and horoscopes. i need horoscopes too, but preferably only pretty durn good ones.

contributors will recieve a personalized thank you presented on handsome email, suitable for framing.

happy summering, everyone! and remember: chinese food good. u.s. postal service mediocre, but all we've got for now.

thanks,
eryque

Eryque "Just call me Eric" Gleason
817 Myrtle Ave, 2nd floor
Albany, NY 12208-2607

[redacted]

↑ Index

73. Thomas M. Orange
dodecaphony as generative grammar
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Listfolks,

Has anyone heard of a book by Frederick Udahl (sp?) called something like "The Twelve-tone System as Generative Grammar" or "Towards a Generative Grammar from Twelve-Tone Music"?

Thanks,
Tom Orange
[redacted]

↑ Index

74. henry
Re: hysterical dialiects
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Is the word "hysterical" a sexist term? That's news to me, though I'm aware of its sexist usage in such phrases as "hysterical female". I used it in what I assumed was a "gender-neutral" way. It's also slang for "hilarious". I understand Annie was only saying I was inserting "gender" into the sonnet/sonnot discussion. I guess it depends on how you hear that word - and maybe I should be hearing more in it.

"hysterica passio...
...our tongues are quibbled
On a wheel of fire, and tis the upshot of our deeds
Will ring yon neck of our embittered
Rhetorick, dear cuz..." [King Lear, Act VII, scene 43]

Hysterical dialectics is a mode of reasoning based on the principle "utque ante de nomina post factotum" first performed in a diagnostic setting by Averroes in his manual de logica diplodocus et diplomatica (hereafter referred to as Dip & dippy) in 1143 (after a big lunch). The systematics was appropriated by pre-psychologists in the late 18th century to explain the discovery of "galvanized globular life-entities" first discovered by Starbird Leewenhoek using a primitive microscope made of thin slices of Dutch ice-skates under straw matting and windmill batting and attributed to "saliences" on the cranium mapped by the phrenologist Pietter Pepper in 1643 (before breakfast!). The rest is history... - Hank Lear

↑ Index

75. cris cheek
Post in Performance Writing / Dartington, UK
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Hi all, I'm cross posting this job ad to the list.

Particularly appropriate for anyone working with language / text from a Live Art perspective.

---------- Dartington College of Arts is an institution of higher education specialising in contemporary performance arts practices and their relation to changing social and cultural contexts. The College combines undergraduate teaching with research. Taught Masters work is planned. Subject areas are both i) distinct and clearly articulated, leading to designated degree awards and ii) participants in an integrated programme designed to promote inter- and cross-disciplinary practice and enquiry.

September 1994 saw the introduction of a new degree. Planned as an extension to the College's work in the performance arts, the degree in Performance Writing is an approach to writing for performance which is open to a range of possibilities for the way that performance and writing can relate to each other. This approach explores underlying principles, techniques and understandings so that writers and text-practitioners can learn to apply their skills and creativity to a constantly expanding repertoire of performance media. Broad categories of practice include: body-related text performance, word-image work, concrete and performed poetry, radio and audiotape media, site-related writing.

lecturer in performance writing three-year fixed-term appointment.

A new post is required to continue the development of this new and exciting subject area. We are particularly interested in those who develop writing for and through live performance and whose work explores, through theory and practice, the impact and implications of live presence on the practice of writing.

Successful applicants will be expected to contribute to teaching, research, subject development and programme support.

closing date 19 June 1996

Further information from: Kathy Taylor dartington College of Arts. Totnes, Devon TQ9 6EJ
Tel. [redacted]
Fax [redacted]

↑ Index

76. Gwyn McVay
Re: hysterical dialiects
Fri 7 Jun 1996

I think the "sexist etymology" referred to is the word's origin in Gk. "hustera," womb, and the prevailing theories, at the time, that overemotion in women was caused by having their womb unhitch itself and float around loose inside their body. Seems like that would make one awfully itchy indeed. But per your subject line above, are we talking about "hysterical dialectics" or "hysterical dialects," like the strange languages spoken by wimmin poets and cartoon characters? And where do I get the female slave who is supposed to sit between my thighs and burn fragrant incense to entice my womb back into its usual arrangement? Isn't "meretricious" derived from Lat. "meretrix," harlot? Do you sometimes get that not-so-fresh feeling?

Wondering in Washington

↑ Index

77. henry gould
Re: hysterical dialiects
Fri 7 Jun 1996

On Fri, 7 Jun 1996 09:21:36 -0400 Gwyn McVay said: >languages spoken by wimmin poets and cartoon characters? And where do I >get the female slave who is supposed to sit between my thighs and burn >fragrant incense to entice my womb back into its usual arrangement? Isn't >"meretricious" derived from Lat. "meretrix," harlot? Do you sometimes get >that not-so-fresh feeling?

Pregnant thoughts. If I wasn't getting it before I'm getting it now. As Cynthia wrote in her unwritten poems (c.f. Elena Shvarts - fake reference here) -

Rome as I was burning fiddled my thoughts of you and where sweetness was came sour tastelessness but lemon is a cure for scurvy knavery so take these lemons, squire, for your saucy filet before she rots and before my anger cools and I think of a new word to carve in your trunk

- HNVY GILLED

↑ Index

78. cris cheek
Re: more rattling Cage
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Hi all,

so leading questions for the asking:

is the world (i worry about 'the' here) getting more 'noisy' ?

are our worlds becoming more 'musical' ?

is each listener a composer ?

what are 'new' roles for 'composers' ?

then -

given proliferation of language constructs in our worlds, what are roles for 'writers' / 'readers' ?

love and love
cris

↑ Index

79. Jordan Davis
the iliad of hypnotism
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Uh, hey...

Anybody read any good poems lately?

Jordan

↑ Index

80. David Carl morty
Fri 7 Jun 1996

>I agree with you Ira, that there are some missing feschrifts for composers >other than Cage. I'd most like to see a good Feldman book, & have toyed with >the thought myself.

There is a book on/by Feldman I'm aware of, but can't remember the title now. Mostly anecdotes and lectures of his (german/english edition, i seem to remember a complicated story behind the reason for this). Available through Larry Polanski's press (turtle island?) (for more information: http://onyx.dartmouth.edu/~larry/polansky.html)

[redacted]

↑ Index

81. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Them That's Got Shall Get
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Did anybody else fall for the phony ad Yale placed in the _Chronicle_ last Spring announcing a search for a senior position in twentieth-century poetry? I didn't expect anything to come of it, having been told over the years that Yale's attitude is that they shouldn't hire anyone so lowly as to have to apply for a position, but what did surprise me was how many of my colleagues around the country predicted accurately who would be hired.

And here comes official notice, dated May 31, that having searched assiduously across the length and breadth of the land, Yale has hired Langon Hammer. Professor Hammer was no doubt the most highly qualified candidate for this senior position, having published A book (_Hart Crane and Allen Tate_, 1993; now there's a new topic for you).

It must have been quite a search. The MLA directory for this year listed Professor Hammer as an Associate Professor at, hmmmm, Yale. Before that, he was listed as an Assistant Professor at, you guessed it, Yale. Thank god that Yale has resisted the erosion of merit brought upon us by such foolishly egalitarian notions as affirmative action and has insisted upon rigorously seeking out the most obviously qualified candidate for such an elite position.

and yes, that is the aroma of sour grapes you sense rising from this post --

if it weren't for _resentiment_ I wouldn't have no sentiment at all!
(apologies to Albert King)
---

on a more uplifting note,,, Just back from the American Literature Association meeting in San Diego, where the panels on H.D., Marianne Moore, Williams, Pound and Kaufman all went very well indeed -- several folk will reappear at the Orono conference shortly,,,

There is, by the way, now a Marianne Moore Society, for those of you who are interested in such things, along with the H.D. Williams, and Pound societies, which will sponsor panels at each year's conference. The African-American Literature and Culture Society continues to sponsor poetry panels at every year's conference, and is planning a symposium in New Orleans for '98. This year's Asian-American Lit. panel was really good, but we need to see more poetry discussion in that forum -- (especially with Walter's anthology just out) -- better than usual poetry reading by Quincy Troupe at this year's conference --

VERY strange first session on "Criticism against the Grain" by some of our more engrained colleagues -- (did you know that Lacan was a commie fellow traveler, for example??? that's what I'm told by this expert -- haven't heard that kind of overt McCarthyism for many a year -- according to this guy, all theory from France from roughly 48 on is either commie or what J. Edgar Hoover used to call comsymp agitprop -- I know this will come as cold comfort to those on the left who reject poststructuralism as a reactionary movement)

a good time was had by all, and I, for one, learned quite a bit --

here's one connection for you Kaufman readers -- I had been looking at all the mentions of Crispus Attucks in Kaufman's poetry, and now learn, from Mona Lisa Saloy, that Charlie Parker, another in Kaufman's pantheon, attended

Crispus Attucks School -- remember the line in "Ancient Rain" about the immigrants who refuse to attend school with Crispus Attucks --

↑ Index

82. Jeffrey Stadelman

Re: dodecaphony as generative grammar

Fri 7 Jun 1996

Dear Tom,

I think you must be referring to Fred Lerdahl and Ray Jackendoff, _A Generative Theory of Tonal Music_ (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1983). 368 pp. (2nd Edition, 1996)

Actually, Lerdahl's writings have recently been used as a club to attack musics with experimental ambitions, for instance those of 'constructivist' cast (Carter, Babbitt say). And, by implication surely (though I've not yet seen published critiques), they indict experimental work in the Cagean sense.

A good introduction to how Lerdahl views the aesthetically delimiting effects of "the way our minds operate" can be found in an article whose title says it all: "Cognitive Constraints on Compositional Systems," _Contemporary Music Review_, Vol. 6, edited by Paul Moravec and Robert Beaser, Harwood Academic Publishers (1992).

Jeff Stadelman
SUNY at Buffalo

On Fri, 7 Jun 1996, Thomas M. Orange wrote:

> Listfolks,
>
> Has anyone heard of a book by Frederick Udahl (sp?) called something like "The Twelve-tone System as Generative Grammar" or "Towards a Generative Grammar from Twelve-Tone Music"?
>
> Thanks,
> Tom Orange
> [redacted]

↑ Index

83. Herb Levy
Re: dodecaphony as generative grammar
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Tom Orange asks:
>
>Has anyone heard of a book by Frederick Udahl (sp?) called something like
>"The Twelve-tone System as Generative Grammar" or "Towards a Generative >Grammar from Twelve-Tone Music"?
>

I know of a book by Fred Lerdahl & Ray Jackendoff called A Generative Theory of Tonal Music.

I've never read so I don't know if it gets into twelve tone stuff at all.

I'm on my way to a dream date with the lovely & talented Lake Quinault, if the discussion is still cagey when I get back, I guess I'll have plenty to read.

&, to answer Jordan's question: yes.

Bests,

H

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

84. Herb Levy
Re: more rattling Cage
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Ira writes:

I didn't >think, myself, that Cage suitably engaged with Feldman's >upset at, for example, pop music on transistor radios >spoiling the quiet, in this case of the beach. As the >world gets more crassly noisy, and my ears hurt, and >I can't find a quiet house to live in, aren't these >issues?

You should look into the work of R. Murray Shaffer, a Canadian who began a project called the World Soundscape. I don't know what kind of materials are easily available in England. I remember a graph in one of his books labeled "the instruments of the orchestra are changing", that plotted the relative decline of sales of pianos against the growth of sales of lawn mowers, but this is serious work none the less.

You could also check the Web site for World Forum for Acoustic Ecology:

<http://interact.uoregon.edu/MediaLit/WFAEHomePage>

where ther are lots of links to relevant sites.

Really gotta run now. See everyone at the lake.

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

85. c.g. guertin
Re: more rattling Cage
Fri 7 Jun 1996

In Sontag's article "The Aesthetics of Silence," she quotes Cage twice. Once as saying, "There is no such thing as silence. Something is always happening that makes a sound." And: "Every now and then it is possible to have absolutely nothing; the possibility of nothing"

Infuriatingly, Sontag gives no footnotes. Does anyone know what the source of these quotes might be? Could anyone tell me where I might find the best discussion of Cage's aesthetics of silence and/or of 4'33'' (either by him or by others)?

Thanks for your help.
Carolyn

Carolyn Guertin
University of Western Ontario
[redacted]

"My empire is of the imagination."
-- H. Rider Haggard, She

↑ Index

86. Michael Boughn
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Fri 7 Jun 1996

>
> Uh, hey...

>
> Anybody read any good poems lately?
>
> Jordan
>
Yeah, Lise Downe's _A Velvet Increase of Curiosity_ (ECW Press, Toronto, 1993, $12.00 CAN). A stunning book.

Mike

↑ Index

87. David Baratier
reading Monday 6/10
Fri 7 Jun 1996

David Baratier reads from compartments

in it's entirety
in Philadelphia,
7:00pm

at Cafe Santa Maria, 517 S. 5th Street (between South and Lombard)

for the last time before moving to Ohio

↑ Index

88. Ira Lightman
more rattling Cage
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Rod, thanks for those recommendations of late work, they intrigue. Oh, to be in America and follow them up immediately - purchasing disks, anyway. I like the Feldman idea - I'm really intrigued by his ideas and his emphases on slow build and slow fall and quiet - and want to hear more of the music. There was a Feldman concert in London last year which, of course,

I only heard about a day after it took place!

I would like to hear these pieces exploring the not yet done on those instruments, but I still maintain my criticism, which I stress was not really about Cage but about the books by experimental writers and critics that start and stop with Cage - and which, I suspect, would not be much interested in the late pieces you suggest musically; but only theoretically, as "destabilising" nasty western classical music etc. Is that just completely mistaken of me? Do you not sense this habit in experimental writer Cagers from time to time? Not that Cage marginalises the others, esp. not Feldman, given the Radio City interviews etc, but that these books do?

I'm referring to the Radio City interviews that appeared in the Exact Change annual last year. I didn't think, myself, that Cage suitably engaged with Feldman's upset at, for example, pop music on transistor radios spoiling the quiet, in this case of the beach. As the world gets more crassly noisy, and my ears hurt, and I can't find a quiet house to live in, aren't these issues? I sometimes think of Cage's persona as like Paul McCartney's - chipper and happy, but slightly suppressing angered and anguished jeremiads against the down side of the changes (eg in freedom) that they were rightly optimistic about.

↑ Index

89. David Baratier

Re: the illiad of hypnoism

Fri 7 Jun 1996

Jordan,

I don't read poems, I write them, quite often on napkins, and I have found that editors love crayon. One editor in particular sent me back praises on my choice of periwinkle for a poem and regrettably announced they were unable to reproduce that hue for their issue. As an editor myself, I open the small envelopes first, ones which could not possibly contain poems, and then ones addressed in crayon, followed by letters from prisions, ones with academic seals, ones with cartoon stamps, in this order and also opened in order of smallest to largest envelope size. As an added insider tip for getting into our journal, including blank university stationary directly affects the decision making process, as we love to send back rejection notices on these kinds of paper to the unsuspecting rejectee, so far we have letterhead from 13 universities. It's just wacky the responses we get when we reject somebody from Ypsilani with stationary from the same university.

David Baratier

↑ Index

90. Gwyn McVay
Coolidge and Mark?
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Is this a typo? The Zen Mountain Monastery in Mt. Tremper, NY, lists among its previous faculty Ginsberg, Waldman, Creeley, Natalie Goldberg, and one "Clark Strand"--is that a real guy or a case of lang-po meets trad-po in the same body?

Gwyn

↑ Index

91. Rod Smith
Re: morty
Fri 7 Jun 1996

David Carl-- I've not been able to find the Feldman book you refer to, & was told it was out of print. The complicated story was that the original Feldman material in English, there was only one copy, was lost or ediotically disgarded, after it had been translated into German. So, the English is a translation from the German! Cage had a similar thing happen with _For the Birds_, which was interviews, the tapes were "lost" & the English edition is translated from French even though the original interviews were conducted in English.

Rod

D. Carl wrote:

There is a book on/by Feldman I'm aware of, but can't remember the title now. Mostly anecdotes and lectures of his (german/english edition, i seem to remember a complicated story behind the reason for this). Available through Larry Polanski's press (turtle island?) (for more information: http://onyx.dartmouth.edu/~larry/polansky.html)

↑ Index

92. Jeffrey Stadelman
Re: morty
Fri 7 Jun 1996

On Fri, 7 Jun 1996, David Carl wrote:

> There is a book on/by Feldman I'm aware of, but can't remember the title now. Mostly anecdotes and lectures of his (german/english edition, i seem to remember a complicated story behind the reason for this). Available through Larry Polanski's press (turtle island?)
> (for more information: http://onyx.dartmouth.edu/~larry/polansky.html)

Morton Feldman, _Essays_, edited by Walter Zimmermann (Kerpen, Germany: Beginner Press, 1985). This book is, for the most part, bilingual (German/English) though there are a few items which appear only in German. Part of the complicated story mentioned by David Carl may involve the fact that some of the essays had to be translated into German from languages other than English (Italian at least, I seem to recall), with the English originals lost or destroyed. The editorial work on the English-language material is generally poor (misspellings galore), but the book is refreshingly blunt, entertaining and instructive--highly recommended.

For German readers there's _Morton Feldman_, _musik-konzepte_ Vols. 48/49, edited by Heinz-Klaus Metzger and Rainer Riehn (Munich: edition text + kritik, 1984?).

And Thomas DeLio has a book on Feldman out, or coming out, published by Excelsior Press I believe.

Jeff Stadelman
SUNY at Buffalo

↑ Index

93. Robert J Wilson
Yale Sublimity Strikes Again
Fri 7 Jun 1996

'Professor Langon Hammer has been appointed to replace Harold Bloom as Yale Professor of Sublimity,' or was it just the absent presence of Mark Strand as a Merwinesque canon-maker in the vacant 'landscape'-- now you see that trope and now you don't see the natives or nine tenths of social reality school of US poetics? Just wondering about that Yale School of Criticism as a disappearing act of the agrarian poetics into, now, nothing even to contest or offer to the suburbs and provinces of this grand old polity. What else has the fellow written to earn such banishment? Rob Wilson

On Fri, 7 Jun 1996, Aldon L. Nielsen wrote:

Did anybody else fall for the phony ad Yale placed in the _Chronicle_ last Spring announcing a search for a senior position in twentieth-century poetry? I didn't expect anything to come of it, having been told over the years that Yale's attitude is that they shouldn't hire anyone so lowly as to have to apply for a position, but what did surprise me was how many of my colleagues around the country predicted accurately who would be hired.

And here comes official notice, dated May 31, that having searched assiduously across the length and breadth of the land, Yale has hired Langon Hammer. Professor Hammer was no doubt the most highly qualified candidate for this senior position, having published A book (_Hart Crane and Allen Tate_, 1993; now there's a new topic for you).

It must have been quite a search. The MLA directory for this year listed Professor Hammer as an Associate Professor at, hmmmm, Yale. Before that, he was listed as an Assistant Professor at, you guessed it, Yale. Thank god that Yale has resisted the erosion of merit brought upon us by such foolishly egalitarian notions as affirmative action and has insisted upon rigorously seeking out the most obviously qualified candidate for such an elite position.

and yes, that is the aroma of sour grapes you sense rising from this post --

if it weren't for _resentiment_ I wouldn't have no sentiment at all!
(apologies to Albert King)
----

on a more uplifting note,,, Just back from the American Literature Association meeting in San Diego, where the panels on H.D., Marianne Moore, Williams, Pound and Kaufman all went very well indeed -- several folk will reappear at the Orono conference shortly,,,

There is, by the way, now a Marianne Moore Society, for those of you who are interested in such things, along with the H.D. Williams, and Pound societies, which will sponsor panels at each year's conference. The African-American Literature and Culture Society continues to sponsor poetry panels at every year's conference, and is planning a symposium in New Orleans for '98. This year's Asian-American Lit. panel was really good, but we need to see more poetry discussion in that forum -- (especially with Walter's anthology just out) -- better than usual poetry reading by Quincy Troupe at this year's conference --

VERY strange first session on "Criticism against the Grain" by some of our more engrained colleagues -- (did you know that Lacan was a commie fellow traveler, for example??? that's what I'm told by this expert -- > haven't heard that kind of overt McCarthyism for many a year -- according to this guy, all theory from France from roughly 48 on is either commie or what J. Edgar Hoover used to call comsymp agitprop -- I know this will come as cold comfort to those on the left who reject poststructuralism as a reactionary movement)

>
> a good time was had by all, and I, for one, learned quite a bit --
>
> here's one connection for you Kaufman readers -- I had been looking at all the mentions of Crispus Attucks in Kaufman's poetry, and now learn, from Mona Lisa Saloy, that Charlie Parker, another in Kaufman's pantheon, attended Crispus Attucks School -- remember the line in "Ancient Rain" about the immigrants who refuse to attend school with Crispus Attucks --

↑ Index

94. Joe Amato

Re: Them That's Got Shall Get

Fri 7 Jun 1996

& to follow yr albert king sweet & sour grapes one grape further, aldon: if it weren't for insider-games like the one you describe at yale, there wouldn't be no game at all... the "job market" is largely a stacked deck, even with the best of hiring intentions, even when the person hired is from another campus... everybody is qualified on paper, and there are simply too many everybodies... most hiring (by which i mean to include the winnowing process) ends up being accomplished out of regard for a potentially dubious, in some ways arbitrary paper-trail---which latter is measured against criteria developed by---you guessed it!---places like yale...

i've been there, and i can attest to the difficulties in trying to get 'around' the superficialities of vitae information...

not that i'm against, say, a solid publishing record (though as to the threat of perishing over same---)... but i doubt, for example, that a book of poetry would "count" in yale's deliberations over who gets to go to ole new haven to profess the wonders of 20th. century poetry...

i mean, just b/c one writes poetry doesn't mean one knows a damn thing about the history of same, right?...

i'm not joking...

on the other hand, a poet could very well know her history... moreover, when it comes to the poets i know, there's no question that they know their history...

ergo---

then we have the little matter of what constitutes the "right" sort of scholarship... whether yale'd know it when they saw it... etc...

the academic situation has really gone zonkers in so many ways... it's had its past moments of turbulence, but i'm not sure it's ever been quite so vexed...

(((btw, i like it that you posted yr gripe-grapes here...

best,

joe

↑ Index

95. Susan Schultz
Re: Them That's Got Shall Get
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Langdon Hammer's book on modernism (by way of Crane and Tate) is excellent; in fact, it covers a lot of the same ground as Jed Rasula's brilliant _American Poetry Wax Museum_, if in a different manner. I'm sorry other worthies got overlooked, but I'd say he was a very strong candidate for that Yale position. He was a friend of mine in college, so I hate to see him used purely for his symbolic value.

Susan S.

↑ Index

96. George Bowering
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Fri 7 Jun 1996

> Uh, hey...
>
> Anybody read any good poems lately?
>
> Jordan

I have been reading the poems of the new Zealander Sam Hunt, and they are really bad.

.....
"I've enjoyed just about as much of this as I can stand."
--Bobbie Louise hawkins

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

97. Robert Drake
new poetry bookstore looking for wares (fwd)
Fri 7 Jun 1996

hope this may be of interest to some...

[begin forwarded message]:

Message #490 (492 is last):
Date: Fri Jun 7 17:30:49 1996
From: [redacted]
Subject: New Bookstore Seeking Stock

Hello Poets & Publishers,

This is an invitation to send me your catalogues/lists/ what have you's w/Bookstore rates so that I can start setting up. I want to specialize in small & micro press publications and true alternative. You can either e-mail, or snail mail..

cat's Impetuous Books & Stuff 233 1/2 S. Water St.
Kent, Ohio 44240

Thanks,
cat

[end forward]

please direct questions or replies to cheryl (aka cat), not me... lbd

↑ Index

98. Matthew Gary Kirschenbaum
Re: new poetry bookstore looking for wares (fwd)
Fri 7 Jun 1996

Imagine how relieved I was to read the note below after finding the following in my mail queue:

43 Jun 7 Robert Drake (54) new poetry bookstore looking for war

> Hello Poets & Publishers,
>
> This is an invitation to send me your catalogues/lists/ what have you's w/Bookstore rates so that I can start setting up. I want to specialize in > small & micro press publications and true alternative. You can either e-mail, or snail mail..

==========
========== Matthew G. Kirschenbaum University of Virginia [redacted] Department of English http://faraday.clas.virginia.edu/~mgk3k Electronic Text Center

↑ Index

99. Tristan D. Saldana
Sontag on Cage
Fri 7 Jun 1996

I am not aware of Sontag's "article" on Cage. Do you, Carolyn, or anyone else, know where I can find it? You're referring to the 'Susan' Sontag of _Against Interpretation_, right?

I would like to see what she has to say, and what she doesn't.

Tristan

↑ Index

100. Rod Smith
Re: Sontag on Cage
Fri 7 Jun 1996

She wrote the intro for something called _Dancers on a Plane_ which collected works by Cage, Johns, & Cunningham.

Rod

↑ Index

101. Schuchat
Re: Them That's Got Shall Get
Fri 7 Jun 1996

About this Yale professorship thing, I'm confused.

Do any of you think that you would be comfortable as members of that Department? I'm just recalling things Maria Damon posted about the difficulties she experiences in terms of her own Department's receptivity to her areas of interest. I'm pretty sure that Yale's English Department is more conservative than Minnesota. After all, Yale created a separate Literature program to contain (or rechannel) theory, and despite various anomolies such as an interest in Pound ahead of other parts of academe, it is a conservative, traditionalist department. Despite (or maybe it is exemplary) the Yale Younger poets, it has not been much of a place for "writers" as faculty: now it's Hollander, before it was Penn Warren and John Hersey. Bloom was considered to be an oddball, eccentric genius type.

New Haven is okay to live in, but its just another suburb of New York. I suppose the full professorship pays well, and obviously is prestigious, and I guess it would implicitly carry academic power, but even so.

As a non-academic, I hope I am not being too obnoxious by pointing this out.

↑ Index

102. Rod Smith

Re: more rattling Cage

Fri 7 Jun 1996

Re Carolyn Guertin's post:

The first quote you mention: "There is no such thing as silence. Something is always happening that makes a sound." John said this on any number of occasions relative to his aesthetic, & specifically to his visit to the anechoic chamber at Harvard. It's oft repeated but anyway-- he entered this silent chamber & heard two noises, one high one low. He asked the engineer what they were, & the engineer said one is your heart beating & the other is your nervous system in operation-- thus the understanding that there is no silence or that silence "includes" sound. I have no idea where the second quote: "Every now and then it is possible to have absolutely nothing; the possibility of nothing" is from. Actually sounds more like Jasper Johns to me, though John was happy to contradict himself on occasion.

Single best intro to Cage I think is _Conversing with Cage_ ed. Kostelanetz (Limelight $16.95), simply because it includes Cage's views from a number of different times, sources. & of course I recommend Retallack's _MUSICAGE_ -- which incidentally goes into quite some depth on _Europera 5_, the piece Tim Page "reviewed." Re specific discussions of 4'33" -- there's an interesting Q&A on the tape that comes with _I-VI_, though I think it's impossible to seperate his "aesthetics of silence" from other concerns-- indeterminacy, chance operations, zen, etc. I don't recommend the biography titled _The Roaring Silence_. & of course there's Cage's _Silence_, particularly the "Lecture on Nothing." Daniel Charles has written very well on Cage, & Jackson MacLow's article on his writing is excellent.

Geeze, I'm like "Cage Guy" around here lately.

Rod

Carolyn G. wrote:
In Sontag's article "The Aesthetics of Silence," she quotes Cage twice.
Once as saying, "There is no such thing as silence. Something is always happening that makes a sound."
And:
"Every now and then it is possible to have absolutely nothing;
the possibility of nothing"

Infuriatingly, Sontag gives no footnotes. Does anyone know what the source of these quotes might be? Could anyone tell me where I might find the best discussion of Cage's aesthetics of silence and/or of 4'33'' (either by him or by others)?

Thanks for your help.
Carolyn

↑ Index

103. Daniel Salmon
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Fri 7 Jun 1996

At 01:25 PM 7/06/96 -0700, you wrote:

> I have been reading the poems of the new Zealander Sam Hunt, and they are really bad.

In defence of poetry.

I am jubilant raconteur Sam Hunt has moved to new Zealand, perhaps that will leave more space for 'poets' in New Zealand anthologies.

Dan

↑ Index

104. Rod Smith
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Fri 7 Jun 1996

wld somebody please post the address for this ECW outfit?

thanks,

Rod

↑ Index

105. c.g. guertin
Re: Sontag on Cage
Fri 7 Jun 1996

On Fri, 7 Jun 1996, Tristan D. Saldana wrote:
> I am not aware of Sontag's "article" on Cage. Do you, Carolyn, or anyone > else, know where I can find it? You're referring to the 'Susan' Sontag of > _Against Interpretation_, right?
>
> I would like to see what she has to say, and what she doesn't.
>
> Tristan
>
Sorry. Yes, Susan Sontag. I am referring to her article "The Aesthetics of Silence" in her early volume of essays _Styles of Radical Will_. She also refers to Cage in another essay in that volume, "'Thinking Against Oneself': Reflections on Cioran." She doesn't really comment on Cage so much as use his words to backup her argument that there can be no silence without sound...at the risk of oversimplifying.

Cheers.
Carolyn

Carolyn Guertin
University of Western Ontario
[redacted]

"My empire is of the imagination."
- H. Rider Haggard, She

↑ Index

106. Louis Cabri
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sat 8 Jun 1996

---

ecw press
2120 queen street east toronto, ontario canada m4e 1e2

sorry i don't have the fax phone or email

↑ Index

107. George Bowering
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sat 8 Jun 1996

> wld somebody please post the address for this ECW outfit?
>
> thanks,
>
> Rod

This ECW outfit?

The latest no. of the journal is 56.
The number of books is enormous.
The poetry in recent times is terrif. Unfortunately its poetry editor is moving to some place called California.

.....
"I've enjoyed just about as much of this as I can stand."
--Bobbie Louise hawkins

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

108. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: dis n dat
Sat 8 Jun 1996

dissin -- it's not about symbolism (this time) -- nor is it a question of the quality of Professor Hammer's book (though I can think of three on the same topic that top it) -- not is it really a question even of Professor Hammer's qualifications (though again, I can think of several assistant profs. that Yale has refused to tenure over the years who have had considerably more impressive records, as paper as such records might be) --

No, the question is -- why is Yale calling this thing a "search"? why are they pretending that they want to receive applications? and the answer is that they have to create a paper trail of their own -- At my campus (and even San Jose State gets the legendary three hundred applications for a position these days) we would very likely have a lot of explaining to do to a board of judicial inquiry if we pulled such a stunt (even in the California of Pete Wilson!) --

_____
dats --

Gwyn and others -- here's the info. on the Marianne Moore Society -- memberships are $3.00 ("three" -- this is not a typo) -- and the address is The International Marianne Moore Society

c/o Dr. Elizabeth Joyce
Dept. of English
Edinboro University of Pennsylvania
Edinboro, PA 16444

[redacted]

There is a home page in the works -- and a listserv run out of Yale (yes, they are very good for some things, like the LIBRARY!!!)

Subscribors to _Sulfur_, including the San Jose State Library, which I at long last persuaded to get the thing, have recently received word that _Sulfur_ was rejected for an NEA grant and is in big money trouble -- may have to shrink the mag -- etc. -- I know, and we all know, there are many even more deserving mags -- but if you care about Sulfur, think about sending a buck or subscribing, or something -- still raisin grapes in California, aldon

↑ Index

109. J.V. Kinsella
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sat 8 Jun 1996

On Fri, 7 Jun 1996, Jordan Davis wrote:

> Uh, hey...
>
> Anybody read any good poems lately?
>
> Jordan
>
Try Rod Mengham's Unsung: New and Selected Poems [Folio(Salt), 1996, Applecross, Western Australia. $15]

↑ Index

110. Pierre Joris
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sat 8 Jun 1996

> >
> Try Rod Mengham's Unsung: New and Selected Poems [Folio(Salt), 1996, > Applecross, Western Australia. $15]
>
Anyone know if the Mengham book is available here in the States? I've always liked the work & wld love to get ahold of the new one -- Pierre

↑ Index

111. Robert Drake
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sat 8 Jun 1996

ECW Press
2120 Queen St. East
Toronto Ontario M4E 1E2
Canada

lbd

↑ Index

112. Michael Boughn
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sat 8 Jun 1996

> wld somebody please post the address for this ECW outfit?
>
> thanks,
>
> Rod

Rod:

Their books are distrubuted in the States thru InBook, 140 Commerce St. PO Box 120261, East Haven CT 06512, [redacted], FAX [redacted]. I have the info on the Canadian distributor, too, if you want it.

ECW's phone number in Toronto is [redacted], FAX [redacted].

Mike

↑ Index

113. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: signafump
Sat 8 Jun 1996

for those who have not yet spotted it -- on pg. 139 of Paul Muldoon's recent _The Annals of Chile_, George Oppen figures among the red lights around Yale! enjoy it --

↑ Index

114. Rod Smith
Address change for Andrew Levy
Sat 8 Jun 1996

Andrew Levy
75 Poplar St #2M
Brooklyn, NY 11201

↑ Index

115. Tim wood
Re: A science project: if anyone is interested
Sat 8 Jun 1996

from what i know this is as the dutch say a -roos. i received the same message a few weeks ago only to be followed by an appy olly ogy from its sender.

↑ Index

116. Chris Stroffolino
Re: signafump
Sat 8 Jun 1996

when you, aldon, say open as red light at yale, do you mean "STOP SIGN" and thus "COP"--did OPPEN REPRESS MULDOON (at least in MULDOON'S version)? or do you mean red light as in district as in "Roxanne" as in "Red Dress Tonight"? For red is the color that will make me blue.....

↑ Index

117. George Bowering
Re: Jay
Sat 8 Jun 1996

> Are you aware of a poet called Jay McPherson? I just heard she lives in Toronto.Published a selected in 1981. She writes (or did int he 60's--i > ahven't seen more recent work yet) a lot of mythological stuff, which interests me quite a bit.

Jay Macpherson was a celebrated student of Northrop Frye, and several decades ago was hurriedly grouped up here in a kind of threesome with Eli Mandel and James Reaney as Frijian mytho-poets. Mandel decided later in life that he wanted to head more in the direction of poets like Kroetsch and Nichol. But Macpherson, who had early done some nice derivations of Blake songs of Inn. etc.,has not published a great deal over her long life as a poet. She is often cited by Atwood as an early influence on her work.

Born 1931, so she might be retiring, prof. of English at Victoria College, U. of Toronto.

First commercially published book, _The Boatman_ 1957.

.....
"I've enjoyed just about as much of this as I can stand."
--Bobbie Louise hawkins

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

118. Annie Finch
Re: M/E/A/N/I/N/G
Sat 8 Jun 1996

Der Mike, Are you aware of a poet called Jay McPherson? I just heard she lives in Toronto.Published a selected in 1981. She writes (or did int he 60's--i ahven't seen more recent work yet) a lot of mythological stuff, which interests me quite a bit. Just wonderred if you knew her.

The tough job market is really having its effect on the list, isn't it. It
's really too bad.
More later,
Annie

↑ Index

119. Charles Alexander
commerce?
Sat 8 Jun 1996

> First commercially published book, _The Boatman_ 1957.

George -- I'm curious about what you mean when you say this, i.e. "first commercially published book." Is a commercially published book any book which is for sale? Or is it any book from a press which actually lives via profits from book sales (which would actually discount more than just the so-called non-profit presses). Or is it a book published with the intent of making money, as opposed to the intent of simply distributing works of literature? Or what? No axe to grind here, just wondering what this phrase means to you, and others.

charles

↑ Index

120. Joseph Zitt
Re: Is John Cage conceptual art, music, what?
Sat 8 Jun 1996

On 6 Jun 96 at 15:12, Rod Smith wrote:

> Also, is their anything out there in terms of a good new > music publication like _Ear_ used to be. Something that would cover say > Frissell, Le Baron, & unkowns? Also, to note, there's a new book on Nancarrow > from Cambridge (overpriced hc, but looks very good).

Musicworks seems to fit that bill for me, having good articles on a wide variety of musics. Check out http://www.web.net/~sound/ for more info. ---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ==== [redacted] ===== Human Systems \||| ||/ Organizer, SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/<A HREF="http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt/">Joe Zitt's Home Page</A>\|

↑ Index

121. Thomas M. Orange dissin dat higher-in thang
Sun 9 Jun 1996

---

but aldon,

supposin a judiciary body of some sort was to call yale on thr higherin disscision (or san jose state for that matter, altho here is a different matter cuz wr talkin public vs private monies)--what would they say?

"well yr honor, givin the fact that our `job search' (my quotes of course--the defendant from the search committee would be using the phrase in all sincerity) resulted in our conclusion that, altho it may look highly nepotistic, the candidate chosen to receive our highering offer was clearly the most qualified applicant from a pool of highly qualified candidates, and we stand by our decision as a difficult but entirely fair and objective one..."

how can you question that logic or assail that argument? can't really, because it all rests on the appearance of objectivity: whatever admittedly subjective factors a search committee would willingly admit go into a `job search,' ultimately those subjective factors can never be held to any kind of objective accountability. sorry to slip so facilely into the subj-obj paradigm, but when has the university search-and-hire process ever been forced into external, let alone self scrutiny?

the commodity under consideration here of course being particularly slippery: would that knowledge were a craft, that the town carpenter could find an eager and skilled apprentice to take on...

tom orange
[redacted]

↑ Index

122. Carnography
Re: nonsuch sonnet impotent lifetime guarantee
Sun 9 Jun 1996

David:

> Rob Hardin,
>
> I sincerely apologize for having irked your ire by not mentioning your own work in the eidolon discussion.

I've been off-line for three days and this is the best you could do? To accuse me of anger and narcissism when neither were present? Did you really miss the lightness of my response? The response itself had to do with your ad hominem attacks of Annie Finch, with your dismissal of her argument on the basis of a reference to a single word in a Whitman poem, and with your supposition that Whitman's poem remains the most important use of the word eidolon (its meaning an indictment of the triviality of this exchange). I mentioned my own feeble attempts to imitate Crane in a rather self-incriminating tone. For you to have read embarrassed confession as triumphant citation looks breathtakingly unperceptive.

The problem with your ad hominem attacks is that they reflect badly on the attacker and not on the object of the attack. Your indictments say far more about you than they do about my remarks on the word eidolon.

> Eidolon is more than a mere > feature of one Whitman refrain. It has been used regularly by several > other writers.

If you're going to quote me, honey, at least give me my props.

> While I could bring Hart Crane, yourself, or HP
> Lovecraft "the putrid, dripping eidolon of unwholesome revelation" > into the discussion, I still am unaware of an earlier poetic reference > than Whitman and was instructed at an early age to always return to > the source.

Eidolon has been used by many earlier writers and contemporaries of Whitman, such as Scott ("Calling up his eidolon in the hall of his former greatness"), Carlyle ("...living with mere Eidolons"), Poe ("An Eidolon named Night/On a black throne reigns upright"). Your instruction to "look to the source" was obviously not itself a chronological source.

Furthermore, your poinyt about precedents is moot, since I myself answered it in the post you've tried to answer:

> You may argue that Crane was making a deliberate ref. to > Whitman (especially in light of _The Bridge_ and other > Whitman-meets-the-Symbolists-in-a-play-by-Marlowe-esque > works). But you're still suggesting that, without an intimate > knowledge of Whitman's diction, A.F. is insufficiently > literate to be part of this discussion. To which I say:
> should we write out an idiosyncratic reading test, complete > with trick questions, give it to you by means of embedded > references, grade you on the test, and bring it up > whenever we disagree with one of your points? Knowledge > ought to be shared, not hoarded.
>
> > I will argue that Crane was making a deliberate ref. to Whitman. I am > > suggesting that without using your arms to open an OED to refute my > > point (anyone's for that matter),

Are you actually affecting disdain for etymological reference works? What are we to replace them with--your shoddy and unproven suppositions?

I haven't had to open an OED in any previous post. But what if I had? Would that have made my knowledge less genuine--because I acknowledged a legitimate source of information? Or would you rather we renounce all attempts to check our facts?

> or to find out what any unknown word

Eidolon is not an unknown word. If it were, we wouldn't be having this discussion.

> means, one arrives to the discussion sufficiently lazy enough to speculate on what is being said and offer their opinion, instead of their knowledgable experience.

You offered far more than your opinion: You attacked another member of this list for missing your vague ref to a single word in a Whitman poem. You then inferred that missing your reference was a sign of illiteracy. I find it odd that such an exacting critic would now express contempt for etymology and research.

> In answer to your question "Why suggest that a person who speaks passionately of formal verse is ignorant of all other kinds?" [not] It's hard enough to understand an opposing point of view without attributing nasty motives to the speaker.["]

Nice citation, but the closing quote mark ought to have come fourteen words later.

> I suggest that if we continue this thread in a manner worth replying to, that we talk about how to determine which strings of words fit into a particular form, what aspects of words (phonemem, morpheme, arragement, connotational value, associative change of these values, etcetera) solidify in our minds which forms are to be used, as charles (chax) mentioned a while back.

I suggest that, if you truly want to return to a more civil mode of discourse, you thrill us with your self-restraint, and neither accuse Annie Finch of deception and illiteracy, nor me of narcissism and ire. My post to you and to Annie bore the suggestion that we reman civil.

I've also seen brutal remarks about some of the sonnets posted here; I might not like some of them myself, it's true. But I can see no useful purpose in slagging the authors. Besides: as Lynne Emmanuel has pointed out (_After Modernism_), language poets and neo-formalists have more in common than is readily apparent. Aren't both "camps" fairly obsessed with questions of technique? Didn't Barret Watten once write that technique is the most exciting aspect of poetry?

Also: linguistic terms are precise ones for discussing certain aspects of poetry; but in others, only conventional prosodic terms will do. I see no reason to restrict discussions of technique to linguistic terminology. Even Jakobsen did not confine his analyses to grammar and phonology. Even Saintsbury said a few useful things to Jakobsen.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

123. Carnography
Re: hysterical dialect, hysterical eidolon
Sun 9 Jun 1996

Gwyn typed:

> I think the "sexist etymology" referred to is the word's origin in Gk. "hustera," womb, and the prevailing theories, at the time, that overemotion in women was caused by having their womb unhitch itself and float around loose inside their body.

Yes, but should we really be held accountable for the etymological origins of the words we use? What I objected to in Annie's original comment was the suggestion that the term hysterical had lowered the tone of the debate to the level of gender prejudice. What would happen if we all posted in French, and were forced to reduce all classes of nouns to masculine and feminine? Would we all be guilty of etymological sexism?

If we're going to discuss the sexist etymology of the English language, that's one thing. But to invest the user with the sexism of a word's history is uncalled for. At best, the message conjured is confused.

At best, /the mes/sage con/jured is /confused and us/er, et-y-mo-/logi-/cally used

Funny, isn't it? That mere words--like hysterical and eidolon-- have such power to provoke, such histories to invoke?

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

124. George Bowering
Re: commerce?
Sun 9 Jun 1996

> First commercially published book, _The Boatman_ 1957.
>
> George -- I'm curious about what you mean when you say this, i.e. "first commercially published book." Is a commercially published book any book > which is for sale? Or is it any book from a press which actually lives via profits from book sales (which would actually discount more than just the so-called non-profit presses). Or is it a book published with the intent of making money, as opposed to the intent of simply distributing works of literature? Or what? No axe to grind here, just wondering what this phrase means to you, and others.

>
> charles

Oh, I just meant by a commercially-bent publisher. She had published her earlier books under her own imprint and a chapbook by a friend. She published other books under her own imprimateur, too, nice woodblock and handset things by people like Al Purdy, Alden Nowlan.

.....
"Silence, sole luxury after rimes . . ."
--Mallarme

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

125. Carnography
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sun 9 Jun 1996

Jordan Davis typed:

> Uh, hey...
>
> Anybody read any good poems lately?

Do old ones count?

Interestingly, I just read a poem by Charles Baxter ("The Last String Quartet of Arnold Schoenberg") that seems to exemplify everything we tend to renounce: an artless affect, prosaic free verse technique, and lucid narrative.

Similarly, a recent collection of Dennis Cooper's new and unknown poems has just appeared. So far, I love it.

Even though I don't entirely agree with it, Charles Watson's essay-poem on the failure of spontaneous prose is pretty damned interesting.

Everything else I've been reading is ancient--except the diaries of Dennis Nilsen, and Peter Sotos's _Total Abuse_.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

126. Pierre Joris
EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
Sun 9 Jun 1996

---

ouf! now that the wierd sonnett thread seems to have run its course & Cage & music is popping up, lemme forward this summer schedule of music events.(Just a note re early/late Cage: there are years when I prefer early Cage, there are years when I prefer the late Cage, there are other months when I don't listen to Cage at all -- & that goes for all composers, poets & painters; it seems somwhat silly to make sweeping indictments re this or that musician, this or that moment in an artist's career -- or at least worth remembering that as listener/reader/critic one always speaks out of a very relative moment & place oneself from which any generalization is likely to be reductive. But right now what I'm listening to is Messiaen "+concert a quatre" which will be followed by Sulochana Brahaspaqti's "Raga Bilaskhani Todi" & Wilhelm Killmayer's setting of Holderling songs.

Pierre

========== Pierre Joris | "Form fascinates when one no longer has the force Dept. of English | to understand force from within itself. That SUNY Albany | is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | "Poetry is the promise of a language." email: | -- Friedrich Holderlin [redacted]|
==========

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Thu, 6 Jun 1996 11:56:43 -0500
From: Electronic Music Foundation <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: EMF CALENDAR ALERT

EMF CALENDAR ALERT
========== June 6, 1996

EMF CALENDAR is published on the web by Electronic Music Foundation as a selective guide to important events worldwide. Our web site is

http://www.emf.org

This email version of EMF CALENDAR is being sent to you either because you've already asked to be on our list or because we believe you'll be interested in what we have to say.

If you would rather not receive future email messages from us, simply let us know.

If this has been forwarded to you by someone else and you would like to receive these notices directly, just send an email message to [redacted] and say something like "Put me on your list" and we'll put you on our list.

Note: Each monthly email calendar update contains only new material. For a complete picture of the future, save all calendars or check our web site.

CONTENTS:

1. Summer education
2. Summer festivals and conferences
3. Concerts
4. Fall previews
5. To submit listings

========== SUMMER EDUCATION

PHYSICAL MODEL SYNTHESIS WORKSHOP
Friday, June 21
at the Accademia Bartolomeo Cristofori, Florence, Italy

The Centro Tempo Reale of Florence will host a one day workshop which will include lectures and presentations relating to various aspects of physical model synthesis. Participation is free.

[redacted]

***

1996 LES ATELIERS UPIC
June 25 to July 19
Les Ateliers UPIC, Alfortville (near Paris), France

Please note that the dates have changed since last month's emailing. This course in computer music and composition will include lectures, supervised group practice in UPIC studios, individual studio time, visits to new music centers and student presentations at the conclusion of the course. Both English and French will be spoken throughout the course. Housing is available.

For more information:

[redacted]
(33)(1) 4378 80 80 Voice
(33)(1) 4368 25 52 Fax

Les Ateliers UPIC
16-18 Rue Marcelin-Berthelot
94141 Alfortville
FRANCE

***

IRCAM SUMMER ACADEMY
June 24 to June 29
at IRCAM and the Centre Georges-Pompidou, Paris

Workshops in various aspects of computer music such as composition, gestural interfaces for computer control and musical computing. Also, personal demonstrations of software and individual practice work. Instructors inlcude George Benjamin, Marco Stroppa, Michel Waisvisz, Laetitia Sonami and others. Application deadline is May 31.

http://www.ircam.fr/saison/Academie-e.html

========== SUMMER FESTIVALS & CONFERENCES

1996 CROYDON COLOURSCAPE FESTIVAL
June 6, 7, 13 and 14
Central Croydon, London

Concerts include Llorenc Barber's 'City Symphony', the premiere of Lawrence Casserely's 'The Garden of Forking Paths' for guitar and ISPW (played by Richard Durrant, guitar), Simone Rebello's work for Colourscape C, Melvyn Poore's 'Happily Ever After', and several other works.

Contact: [redacted]

***

SON-MU '96
Monday, June 17
at Maison de Radio France, Paris

Two concerts: the music of Benjamin Hertz, Lionel Marchetti and Francis Larvor will be performed at 7 pm; the music of Patrick Ascione, Ilhan Mmaroglu and Michel Chion at 9 pm. Part of the 'Cycle Acousmatique' concert series.

Maison de Radio France
SALLE OLIVIER MESSIAEN
116 ave du Président Kennedy
75016 Paris
FRANCE

========== CONCERTS

DOGS OF DESIRE: MISCELLANEOUS HOWLS
Friday, June 7, 8:00 PM
at The Kitchen, 512 West 19th Street, New York

David Allen Miller conducts an amplified, 20 piece orchestra of the future presenting new works by Michael Daugherty, Kamran Ince, Stewart Copeland and the New York premiere of David Lang's 'Are You Experienced?'. Tickets: $15.

For reservations and information: [redacted]
Email: [redacted]

***

DOGS OF DESIRE
Saturday, June 8, 8:00 PM
at The Kitchen, 512 West 19th Street, New York

Todd Levin's 'Parallel Universe', a song cycle for voice, video and chamber orchestra based on the life of a vagrant, will be performed. A conversation with the artist will follow. Tickets: $15.

For reservations and information: [redacted]
Email: [redacted]

***

BANG ON A CAN-SPIT ORCHESTRA
Friday, June 9, 7 & 9 PM
at The Kitchen, 512 West 19th Street, New York

35 classically trained musicians updates the chamber tradition performing new works which stretch the boundaries of classical music.

For reservations and information: [redacted]
Email: [redacted]

***

PAMELA Z
Friday, June 9, 8:00 PM
at Footworks, San Francisco

Pamela Z will perform a solo set in an evening with Hip Circle, Jon Weaver and Sten Rudstrom as part of San Francisco's Festvial of Improvisers.

For more information call festival organizers: [redacted]
Or Footworks: [redacted]
To contact Pamela Z: [redacted]
http://www.sirius.com/~pamelaz

***

CHRISTOPHER PREISSING: FRAGMENTS
June 13 to 15
at the Indianapolis Repertory Theatre Upperstage, Indiana

Multi-Arts performance featuring electronic music, dance, theatre, video and slides. Tickets: $10.

Contact: [redacted]

***

DAVID BEHRMAN
Friday, June 14, 8:00 PM
at Lotus Music & Dance Studios, 109 West 27th Street, 8th Floor, New York

David Behrman (electronics) will perfom 'Congress of Elders' with Jon Gibson (sax / flute) and "Blue" Jean Tyranny (keyboards). Admission: $8. Reservations are strongly recommended.

Information & Reservations: [redacted]

***

BUN CHING LAM / BERTRAM TURETZKY / MARK DRESSER
Saturday, June 22, 9:00 PM
at The Kitchen, 512 West 19th Street, New York

Lam and Dresser perform in The Kitchen, while Turetzky is audio-visually connected from Santa Monica. They perform an evening of solos, duets and trios on Qin (Chinese 7-string sitar), piano and bass, uniting Eastern and Western traditions. Tickets: $15.

For reservations and information: [redacted]
Email: [redacted]

***

GORDON MONAHAN: MACHINE MODULATION MATRIX
June 27 to 29, 8:00 PM
at The Kitchen, 512 West 19th Street, New York

Monahan returns to The Kitchen as the final stop on his world tour to present the completed work of this installation that he presented as a work-in-progress last summer. Monhan's materials include metal, magnets and steam. Tickets: $15.

For reservations and information: [redacted]
Email: [redacted]

***

PAMELA Z
Friday, June 28
Salt Lake City, Utah

Pamela Z will perform a solo concert as part of the Utah Arts Festival, which includes such diverse acts as Laurie Anderson and the Mormon Tabernacle Choir.

For more information about the festival, call: [redacted]
To contact Pamela Z: [redacted]
http://www.sirius.com/~pamelaz

***

ELECTRONIC MUSIC, NEW FILM AND CHAMBER MUSIC
Saturday, June 29, 8:00 PM
at the Black Box Cinema of Film Museum, Dusseldorf, Germany

Electronic music by Klarenz Barlow, Masahiro Miwa, Frank Schweizer and Christian Banasik, new chamber works by Hanna Kulenty and Jacek Rogala, and silent films by Han Richter, Oskar Fischinger and Wilfried Basse will be presented.

Contact: [redacted]

***

BENOIT MAUBREY / DIE AUDIO GRUPPE
July 10 to 13, 8:00 PM
at The Kitchen, 512 West 19th Street, New York

This performance, entitled 'Audio Ballerinas and Electronic Guys', features electro-acoustic clothing such as audio tutus and smoking jackets, rendering each performer a walking studio, able to record, mix and loop found and prerecorded sound.

For reservations and information: [redacted]
Email: [redacted]

========== FALL PREVIEWS

SONIC CIRCUITS IV ELECTRONIC MUSIC FESTIVAL Begins in September
Several cities in the US and Canada

This international experimental music festival, produced by American Composers' Forum, will take place in Boston, New York, St. Cloud, Minneapolis, Toronto, Winnipeg and others. To find out how to host a leg in your city, and for more information, contact:

[redacted]
http://www.umn.edu/nlhome/m111/compfrm

========== TO SUBMIT LISTINGS

If you'd like to list an event, simply send us the information. The information should contain the date(s), place (venue, city), name of event, type of event (i.e. conference, concert, festival...), description (what's happening, ticket prices... anything relevant), and where to go (contact numbers, email, URL and street address) for further info.

Send your information to us at [redacted]

There is no charge for brief listings. For ads in conjunction with listings, please contact us for rates.

==========
EMF Calendar is a publication of Electronic Music Foundation, Inc.

Electronic Music Foundation
116 North Lake Avenue
Albany NY 12206
USA

[redacted] Voice
[redacted] Fax

[redacted]
http://www.emf.org

##

==========
Electronic Music Foundation
116 N. Lake Ave.
Albany, NY 12206
USA

http://www.emf.org

[redacted] - voice
[redacted] - fax
[redacted] - email

↑ Index

127. Carnography
Re: EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
Sun 9 Jun 1996

Pierre Joris:

Your latest post was unusually wise, restrained, tolerant and perceptive. One question:

> But right now what
> I'm listening to is Messiaen "+concert a quatre" which will be followed
> by Sulochana Brahaspaqti's "Raga Bilaskhani Todi" & Wilhelm Killmayer's
> setting of Holderling songs.

I'm certain we all know Messaien. (Are you speaking of his Quartet for the End of Time?) But I've never heard of the last two composers you mentioned. Can you tell us more about Killmayer's settings of H=F6lderlin (who happens to be one of my favorites)?

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

128. Pierre Joris
Re: EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
Sun 9 Jun 1996

On Sun, 9 Jun 1996, Carnography wrote:

> I'm certain we all know Messaien. (Are you speaking of his Quartet for the > End of Time?) But I've never heard of the last two composers you mentioned.
> Can you tell us more about Killmayer's settings of Hölderlin (who happens > to be one of my favorites)?
>
> All the best,
>
> Rob Hardin

Rob -- the Messiaen is not the "End of time Q" but a late piece (1990-1991) (score completed by his wife Yvonne Loriod after M's death) for flute,oboe, piano & cello. Its world premiere recording by the orchestra of the Bastille opera,

Myung-Whun Chung conductor, can be found on Deutsche Grammophon 445 947-2. Killmayer is a German composer (b. 1927) & his "Holderlin -Lieder" is a large (2 cd) double song cycle using late Holderlin poems set for orchestra & tenor & compsoed between 1982 & 1987. It's a strange, powerful work, ranging from the ethereal-metaphysical to the heavy neo-classical germanic -- but fascinating. The CD is Wergo: WER 6245-2. Sulochana Brahaspati is one of the great traditional ndian vocalists, the raga I mentioned is in the _khyal_ genre & she is accompanied by Sultan Khan (Sarangi) & Anindo Chatterjee (Tabla). [Nimbus CD # NI 5305]

Pierre

↑ Index

129. Joe Amato
Re: dissin dat higher-in thang
Sun 9 Jun 1996

---

i like what---is it simon?---sd about yale... i know it isn't aldon's point, but i rather like the idea of pointing to yale's less attractive aspects... new haven has a shitload of problems, yale has never had a friendly relationship with the town, yale itself has alla the worst, if some of the best, ivy trappings... witness the grad. student unionization effort, and the esteemed faculty's response to same...

let me put it this way: a novelist friend of mine was once offered a job there, and turned it down... and it tickled me to hear this...

would that i might turn down yale, i know...

anyway, one of the reasons that yale must conduct a job search has to do with meeting eeoc/aap hiring guidelines, no?... now before anybody jumps out of their computer monitors at me: i'm in favor of such guidelines in general... but fact is that such guidelines, as well as general policies of academic hiring, require an ostensibly open search (if i'm hinting at something i shouldn't be, somebody please correct me here)... ultimately this ends up costing a lot of us a lot of wasted money... i'm not sure what to do about this... in any case there's a lot of false leads, and this is esp. aggravating in academe, where the job market is tighter than newt gingrich's asshole...

excuse me... i meant bob dole's...

anyway, inside hiring goes on all the time... we've just conducted an ostensibly open search for a dean here on my campus, and ended up hiring the inside man (which is not to say that there wasn't some chance he wouldn't get the job, or that he wasn't the best qualified for the job, but---)... in three job searches in which i've been directly involved, i was absolutely astonished at the capriciousness of the process... at the same time, it's clear to me that who-knows-whom is still a major factor in hiring decisions (and i've cut some folks some favors in this regard mself)... and this, again, is aggravated by the job market... it's simply astonishing to me (i guess i'm easily astonished, no?) that i have some inside dope on just about every hire i hear about in my presumed area(s)---either somebody i know left, or somebody i know was also applying for said job and was under the impression they were going to get it, or i thought i had a good crack at it, or whatever... again, small world...

i like what aldon sd to me a while back: that given the current vagaries, we might all swap positions to determine where we might all feel most comfortable... but as aldon also noted, the "all" here is existing faculty, this doesn't answer a whit to new blood... ergo my wife leaves her visiting so's we don't have to live 1500 miles apart, and here we're limping along on my so-called (tenure-track) salary while she and i consider the ethics of adjuncting (once again---we've both seen that scene)... but a visiting position opens up, natch, at her former institution...

i understand and appreciate that not all of you on this list may be interested in such laments... but just by way of fleshing out the academic backdrop, esp. when you hear that the "avg." professorial salary across all disciplines and all postsecondary institutions has finally cracked $50k (as aaup's mag. _academe_ cover-glossed "our" current salaries, "not so bad")... to give you some idea of just how misleading this number is, how disparate the academic experience can be: at my (tech.) institution, the AVG. assistant prof. makes something like $43k... now our institution ranks 14th. out of 16 tech. institutions in terms of wages (last i checked)---near the bottom, that is (and with no allowance made for the relatively high cost of living here in chicago)... yet nobody in my dept.---a humanities dept. that comprises anguish, falafelsy and mystory, incl. full-tenured profs. with 25 years---nobody is making more than $40k...

both my wife and i had 'careers' in other professions before becoming academics... this wasn't for us a decision that was made w/o first having come to terms with corporate america (in our early and mid-twenties)... we know from first-hand experience that it's tough all over... but at the same time, neither of us anticipated the shell-game we're in the midst of now... which i suppose is why aldon is pissed about the yale situation... i'm pissed too, not at the guy they hired, but at the system we've (ok?) constructed... and as with most systemic pissing and moaning, it's difficult to point a finger in any but an institutional direction...

all best,

joe

↑ Index

130. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest the eternal summer reading thing
Sun 9 Jun 1996

---

re: read anything good yet...

bruce weigl's _Sweet Lorraine_ just came out and WORTH waiting for; carolyn forche's _The Angel of History_ which is getting added, but slightly wierd resonance from being read at the same time as dave smith's _Dream Flights_ (they both even have similar covers...) -- keep getting flicked out of time and into a sense of history as something as palpable as present, i.e. went by a statue of a woman's head, sort of fierce and french liberty-looking, at decordova museum and found myself thinking it could have come from a southern church, or from vienna, or russia, and time went awry for a moment.

and got coaxed into reading peice by meridel lesueur, "Annunciation," short story. WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! WOW! imagine everything glorious about tillie olson (if possible; there is so much) mixed with insinuating sound of judy grahn, then add a particular poignant sweetness and clarity and that is just the beginning of meridel lesueur. piece i found was in Norton Anth. of Lit by Women, and i am having stinker of a time finding anything else. any ideas? e

↑ Index

131. Joe Amato
Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
Sun 9 Jun 1996

---

ok, let's see, my recent "reading," w/capsule commentary:

-- finally got around to part ii of art spiegelman's _maus_... just can't say enough good about this book...

-- primo levi's _the periodic table_... some beautiful insights here, esp. if you're into science/chemistry...

-- erica hunt's _local history_... intriguing, demanding writing... this and c. s. giscombe's _here_ have helped me in my own work on place...

-- (a plug) my wife kass fleisher's novel in manuscript, "blue blazes to dead woman hollow"... a somewhat conventional novelistic plot about life in central pennsylvania (present & past) that gradually reveals itself through assemblage & poetry...

-- _critical inquiry_ winter 96---miriam bratu hansen's piece "schindler's list is not shoah: the second commandment, popular modernism, and public memory"... cogent, useful analysis, esp. if you have any interest at all in theorizing publics...

-- poetic briefs 20... very engaging discussion going on here...

-- chris funk's essay on hypermedia poetry... again, at http://cnsvax.albany.edu/~poetry/hyperpo.html

-- maria damon's _the dark end of the street_... i've read the intro., and the chapters on spicer/duncan and stein... and i'm learning something new on every page...

-- alan golding's _from outlaw to classic_... like ron s. sd a while back, one of the best shorter summaries of the new critics & co... i like too alan's approach to canonicity...

-- (another plug) the electronic book review issue on "the politics of selling out" (incl. a piece by moi, and a newly added "riPOSTe" by michael berube)... at http://www.altx.com/ebr

-- the weather... i'm convinced there's a consipiracy here in chicago to keep me inside, reading...

joe

↑ Index

132. Chris Stroffolino
Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
Sun 9 Jun 1996

Hey---is Jeff Hansen on this list still? If so, I need your back channel address? The one I have (K-12 something) doesn't work..... Chris Stroffolino....

↑ Index

133. Anton Vishio
Re: EMF CALENDAR ALERT (fwd)
Sun 9 Jun 1996

On Sun, 9 Jun 1996, Carnography wrote:

> Pierre Joris:
>
> Your latest post was unusually wise, restrained, tolerant and perceptive.
> One question:
>
> But right now what
> I'm listening to is Messiaen "+concert a quatre" which will be followed
> by Sulochana Brahaspaqti's "Raga Bilaskhani Todi" & Wilhelm Killmayer's

> setting of Holderling songs.
>
> I'm certain we all know Messaien. (Are you speaking of his Quartet for the End of Time?) But I've never heard of the last two composers you mentioned. Can you tell us more about Killmayer's settings of Hölderlin (who happens to be one of my favorites)?
>
> All the best,
>
> Rob Hardin
>
> http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

Thanks also to Pierre Joris for his informative and level-headed posting.

If you're interested in getting to know European music from the last thirty years or so, Holderlin provides an excellent way in. I've been listening recently to the cycle of works composed by Bruno Maderna (1920-1973) around Holderlin's Hyperion poems, in a breathtaking performance by the ASKO ensemble conducted by Peter Eotvos on Disques Montaigne (the number on the the back of the CD set is MO 782014). The music ranges from avant-garde orchestral writing (at which Maderna was particularly skilled) to almost Renaissance-sounding choral writing to vintage late 1950's tape composition - pretty hard to sum up, at least in part because its not clear precisely how Maderna intended all these works - written over ten years - to go together. But I highly recommend it. (There are also readings of Holderlin's poetry by Bruno Ganz.)

Another place to listen would be to Luigi Nono's Fragmente-Stille, An Diotima (Deutsche Gramophon 437 720-2), a work for string quartet written in the late 1970's; the score contains some 40-odd quotations from Holderlin, not to be recited in performance, but to be used as guides to expression for the performers, who "may 'sing' them silently as they experience them - as sounds striving for that 'delicate harmony of the inner life'", which quote from the composer is a pretty good idea of the very rarefied (almost Feldman-esque) soundworld of the piece, and of a lot of Nono's late music.

Also to be recommended is the Scardanelli-cycle by Heinz Holliger, who is not just an oboist who plays all that baroque stuff but a fine composer; I've not been able to get my hands on a copy of the recording (on ECM) as yet, but have heard many glowing comments about it.

In addition to the settings by Killmayer, there are also Holderlin settings by composers of the stature (in Europe, at least) of Gyorgy Kurtag, Gyorgy Ligeti, Hans Werner Henze, and Wolfgang Rihm, not to mention by composers of previous generations such as Paul Hindemith and Benjamin Britten - quite a diverse lot!

Anton J. Vishio
[redacted]

↑ Index

134. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: singnafump
Sun 9 Jun 1996

chris -- Oppen appears in an unlikely remark made by someone who has been stopped by a red light in the district around yale --

↑ Index

135. Chris Stroffolino
Re: singnafump
Sun 9 Jun 1996

When one is stopped by a cop or a deconstructionist around YALE, all one needs do is yell "OPPEN YOU" or "OPPEN SESAME" and this can be quite seedy if novel...

↑ Index

136. Fred E. Maus
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Sun 9 Jun 1996

> Interestingly, I just read a poem by Charles Baxter ("The Last String Quartet of Arnold Schoenberg") that seems to exemplify everything we tend to renounce: an artless affect, prosaic free verse technique, and lucid narrative.

Where does one find this? And what does it have to do with AS's 4th Quartet?

↑ Index

137. Robert Drake
Re: the eternal summer reading thing
Sun 9 Jun 1996

re: Meridel Le Sueur--

i've got 2 slim volumes on the shelf (signed, i was lucky enuf to meet her 'bout 17 years ago):

Women On the Breadlines; 4 shortshort stories which originally appeared in New Masses and The Anvil magazines; West End Press, (Box 697, Cambridge MA 02139). there's a blurb on the inside cover for 4 additional titles.

Rites of Ancient Ripening; more recent poems, plus a bibliography in the back (12 books, frm _Annunciation_ in 1935, thru 1974); Vanilla Press, Minneapolis (no address) 1975.

i prefer the stories, mself, but she was an awe-inspiring individual, and under-appreciated...

luigi

↑ Index

138. Ken Edwards

Re: the iliad of hypnotism

Sun 9 Jun 1996

> Uh, hey...
>
> Anybody read any good poems lately?
>
> Jordan

Try some of these (books), currently on my active shelf ...

- Michael Haslam: A Whole Bauble (Carcanet). In effect, a collected poems (1977-94), but rewritten somewhat, by a neglected, brilliant poet of the Cambridge Diaspora (in his own words, "I think I'm a sort of wayward Prynneite, I suppose, and... etcetera") - Miles Champion: Compositional Bonbons Placate (Carcanet). Excellent first collection. Carcanet is getting quite adventurous for a change. - Paul Celan, tr Pierre Joris: Breathturn (Sun & Moon). - Catriona Strang: Low Fancy (ECW Press)(again). Wild "translations" of the Carmina Burana. - Ralph Hawkins: Flecks (Oasis Books) -- will be hard to obtain for non-UK readers so I quote:

Off Course, A Little

Looking you'll never see what you miss.
You answer my question asking.
The bridge is there and you look hurt.
But that's all it is.
It's gone now.
It's the turn off.
What is this heart shaped town I long for.
We're off the map.
The next roundabout will change the vantage.
Will take us back, together, all.

- Rob MacKenzie: The Tune Kilmarnock (Form Books). Likewise, rather fugitive. Harry Gilonis is the publisher. Post-Language poetry in English, Scots and Gaelic, eg: "suilean uaine over sand / sallow 'hint an fheusag bheag / bumfluff ejaculate 'tis a // quarter bottle balls all / inevitable poetries though / pulling God by's beard an /..."

↑ Index

139. Tim wood

*Re: Querzblatz: Specimens and usage*

Sun 9 Jun 1996

Not to revive a passed thread, but... to confuse a discussion on an empty signifier in a non-existant space... Quertzblatz is a wonderful invention for current (at least thaz my as-sumption) experimental work with the front end hinting of Queer (yes, as in both theory & pracitce) and kitchy (hate that one... never can spell it) advertising (Blatz! the new Beer from Budweiser for you all your BLITZED BLATHERING BUDDIES!! <enter cheerleaders>). We now return you to your regular mailing list...

Tim

> From: Carnography, [redacted]
>
> Rrrr-whaaar, you dear and pungent l'construction workers:
>
> Since neologisms tend to congeal--to become stained by the context in which they are used--I thought I'd blend in my very own (all ideas copyright 1996 by Robert Hardin, professional prosodist: DO NOT PARAPHRASE) examples before the cement hardens and the color scheme goes to the printer.
>
> Microwave your mixed metaphors for faster flavor,
>
> Rob Hardin
>
> (who requires no insurance or medical coverage, since a certain pelagic sonnet by a Pultzer Prize-winning Belgian will allow him to "live forever")
>
> Querzblatz*: Specimens and usage*
>
> *IIII. An exact copy of Kandinsky's Staccato Abstract was tattooed all over the suspect's pulsating, querzblatz hands.*
>
> XV. I can't read the letterhead on account of those roosters and their querzblatz neo-Italian madrigals.
>
> VV. It is no longer querzblatz to read the ingredients aloud while pouring > the [table of] contents on yourself.

>
> *MCCCXXXCIV. Ron Silliman's new manual, Teach Yourself Querzblatz in Fourteen Days, is a must for students and professional prosodists alike.*
>
> *LXDQD. Aphid hail, aphid hail, querzblatz homopterae in the local mail!*

↑ Index

140. Tim wood
Re: what poetry knows about scientists
Sun 9 Jun 1996

> I had the same feeling. Mathematics, in particular, I found a highly creative activity, requiring intuitive leaps as well as rigorous logic. Some of group theory and what mathematicians call 'foundations' (the intersection of logic, set theory and number theory) is especially beautiful.
>
> People often talk about the connections between mathematics & music, but the only connection that I found useful at the time was in understanding acoustics

My undergrad was in physics. What I found most useful was not the "connections" or the creative activty per se, but the (and yes what follows will be considered treasonious in certain P-modern corridors) almost transcendant ideas behind the physics. It's very rare that anything I learned in physics will end up in my work (either creative or scholarly) and often when it does it's nearly subtextual: existing in the structuring and hints of meaning.

> cultural theorists to even _consider_ the possibility of biological influences upon human behaviour.

Seem remarkably close-minded for someone in the humanities. It's not like any of us have found a "conclusive" scientific way to prove our points...

> I've rarely tried to involve science in my poetry, and tend to cringe at most attempts to write poems about chaos theory.

Is it just me or does it seem that too many people using chaos theory do not seem to understand the concept?

> _The mathematician defines her space_
>
> With time, everything tends
> to zero.
> => leave her.
>
> * * * *

> It amuses me now to recall how many of my colleagues really talked like this, using mathematical jargon to describe their personal lives.

Have you shared this with any of your colleagues? I would love to know the reaction.

Tim

↑ Index

141. - Kim Tedrow

Re: the eternal summer reading thing

Sun 9 Jun 1996

<sorry Robert that you are seeing this again, I meant to post it to the list the first time -KT>

Eliza writes:

>>>>imagine everything glorious about tillie olson (if possible; there is so much) mixed with insinuating sound of judy grahn, then add a particular poignant sweetness and clarity and that is just the beginning of meridel lesueur. piece i found was in Norton Anth. of Lit by Women, and i am having stinker of a time finding anything else. any ideas?<<<<

Annunciation is a stunning story -- LeSueur is somewhat of a cult figure in Minnesota (at least she was still alive in her nineties when I left there), so I'd start with this URL (Hungry Mind Bookstore in St. Paul MN):

http://www.winternet.com/~hungrymi/"

If they don't list any of her works, call the Hungry Mind and ask for the numbers of the political/small press bookstores in the Twin Cities, I'm thinking Amazon Books, St. Martin's Table, MayDay books. I've been gone for almost five years, so I don't know that these bookstores are still in business.

The book of stories I have is called "Corn Village", (I don't know if it's still in print, I bought it at a used bookstore), but she has published a fair amount, mostly with small press.

Hope this helps somewhat, sorry I don't have URLs or ph. #s for those other stores, but someone at Hungry Mind would help with them. They're excellent about phone orders, too.

Warmest,
Kim
[redacted]

↑ Index

142. k.a. hehir
Re: dissin dat higher-in thang
Mon 10 Jun 1996

in reply to tom's post.

as an undergrad with hopes of some kind of post grad

i'm now questioning the decision to pursue poetry

maybe bovine psychiatry is the place for me of course many will add moving to the proper london

will cost me less than my shrink bills here in londonOnt.

how will I convince them to lay on leathery couches?

KEVIN

just a posit

↑ Index

143. k.a. hehir
Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
Mon 10 Jun 1996

mr.Amato,

what's a shoah (and i, with the the only house with christmas lights on my block,-- i did play "Chutzpah" as a kid-- but then if if it is not a yiddish term i've offended many people- a round of shibboleths anyone?).

thanks,
kevin

↑ Index

144. Kenneth Goldsmith
Visual Poetry Page Gone Mad
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Folks--

Kenny G's Visual Poetry Page has gone wild. Submissions are being received daily. Please let anyone you know who does Visual/Concrete Poetry that we exist and that we encourage submissions. Currently on view at:

http://wfmu.org/~kennyg/visualpoetry/visualpoetry.html

ViSuAL pOeTry

Susan Bee

from "Talespin" (Granary Books 1995)

- Example 1
- Example 2
- Example 3

Charles Bernstein

from "Veil" (Xeroxial Editions 1987/1976)

- Example 1
- Example 2
- Example 3

from "Language of Boquets" (Hot Bird Mfg, 1991)

- Example 1

John Cayley

Various works selected from the Shadoof Home Page

- Example 1
- Example 2
- Example 3
- Example 4
- Example 5
- Example 6

Henrik Drescher

from "Too Much Bliss" (Granary Books 1992)

- Example 1
- Example 2
- Example 3

Johanna Drucker

from "The HISTORY of the/my WOR L D" (Granary Books 1995)

- Example 1
- Example 2
- Example 3

Kenneth Goldsmith & Joan La Barbara

- 73 Poems

Dick Higgins

i.e., or vice versa
AN ARK

In The Realms of the REAL:
Found Poetry & Writings of the Insane

The Jack Free Ads Series

Bill Luoma

200Hex
Bindfix
Frank Pipes
Volvox

Janan Platt

Internal Nature
True Speech Poems

Blair Seagram

Short Wave
Ante Prima
Alpha B&W
Cry Me A River
Nerve Tree

Ward Tietz

Introduction

buckle bingo calc glug swarm

Jody Zellen

Example 1
Example 2
Example 3
Example 4
Example 5

==========
==========

Kenneth Goldsmith
[redacted] kennyg @wfmu.org
v.[redacted]
611 Broadway, #702
NY NY 10012
work: http://wfmu.org/~kennyg/Ubu/index.html play: http://wfmu.org/~kennyg

Beans Dear?

↑ Index

145. k.a. hehir
stays fresh longer
Mon 10 Jun 1996

This is a sentence.
This is a sentence.
This is a sentence.
Is this a new sentence?
No, just the next sentence.

kev

↑ Index

146. Charles Alexander
Re: the eternal summer reading thing
Mon 10 Jun 1996

> Annunciation is a stunning story -- LeSueur is somewhat of a cult figure in Minnesota (at least she was still alive in her nineties when I left there), so I'd start with this URL (Hungry Mind Bookstore in St. Paul MN):
>
> http://www.winternet.com/~hungrymi/"
>
> If they don't list any of her works, call the Hungry Mind and ask for the numbers of the political/small press bookstores in the Twin Cities, I'm thinking Amazon Books, St. Martin's Table, MayDay books. I've been gone for almost five years, so I don't know that these bookstores are still in business.

A cult figure in Minnesota indeed &, I think, among leftist (working left more than those who come out of political theory, although there's certainly lots of mix & overlap here) literary folk far beyond Minnesota. I would definitely think Hungry Mind would be a help. I would also imagine that some used bookstores in Minneapolis might be, and I would suggest The Book House, whose phone number is [redacted]. I would also imagine Amazon Books (oldest feminist bookstore in the country) in Minneapolis would be helpful. Their phone number is [redacted].

Here are the numbers for the other bookstores Kim Tedrow mentions:
St. Martin's Table: [redacted]
Mayday Bookstore: [redacted]

Several years ago, in its Winter Book series, Minnesota Center for Book Arts published LeSueur's Winter Prairie Woman in a beautiful limited edition, with illustrations from linoleum blocks cut by Sandy Spieler. Sandy is the artistic director of Heart of the Beast Theater, a performance/puppet theater company something in the mold of Bread & Puppet Theater, but with very much its own identity, one of the real treasures of the Twin Cities, particularly with its annual May Day parade & festival.

LeSueur was still alive when I moved here to work at Minn. Center for Book Arts three years ago, and I haven't heard anything about her passing on, but I have wondered if she's still alive. Anyoe know for sure?

charles

↑ Index

147. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

update on meridel lesueur -- good news

Mon 10 Jun 1996

---

since the matter appears to be in question, and i would guess that we all enjoy good news, here it is: meridel lesueur is not only alive, but still writing! physical limitations, however, have made it difficult for her to write as much as she has in the past. she continues to read a fair amount.

i don't know if it is realistic, but be damned to realism: i hope there will be new writing by her published soon.

i arrive at my news of her via the friend who coaxed me into reading her work, jo grant ([redacted]). jo lives near her and visits with her frequently and would be as happy to pass on good wishes and praise for her work as meridel lesueur would be to receive them.

this is not an entirely disinterested message -- "poetics" is clearly a mailing list of numerous effective and successful academicians and scholars. anyone writing about meridel lesueur, or using her work as part of theoretical speculation, will be helping get and keep her writing in print, n'est ce pas? maybe even getting and keeping her in the Canon (if bloom and co. can be got to look the other way while non-DWEM's pass the through the holey-city).

e

↑ Index

148. Gwyn McVay
John Felstiner
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Does anybody in poetics land have a snail address/other best means of getting in touch with John Felstiner? Backchannel is perfectly groovy. w

typo soup is thick today

the line-noise-afflicted

Gwyn

↑ Index

149. Charles Alexander
Re: the eternal summer reading thing
Mon 10 Jun 1996

> re: read anything good yet...

the reading list is piling up, as always.

just completed:

Leslie Scalapino, Defoe (Sun & Moon, 1984). For me, the most exhilarating work by Leslie Scalapino to date. Like learning a new language. A must.

Leslie Scalapino, The Front Matter, Dead Souls (Wesleyan, 1996). Also a treat, although its momentum seems to me more pushed than in Defoe, which is more various in how it moves, from phrase to phrase, part to part. I have a review of this one coming out in the summer issue of Rain Taxi, a Twin Cities review journal which is fairly new.

yet to read:

Issues 5, 6, & 7 of Big Allis. Very fine journal I kept up with on the early issues, but missed some and am now catching up. I note Jessica Grim's departure as an editor, and I am certain she will be missed. I'd love to see more of her work.

Chain 3. Leafing through, some striking visual work included.

Catherine Walsh, Pitch (Pig Press, 1994)

wet roof clear brown beyond buffeted flowers till light changed
shade tone more than grey effectively
impeding adumbration moving lines space (racing point to point)
how many in or out does it take each an anchorage in view of the wind (the sea) marathon
railway line sea side of a lonely night walking dark rocks shift water breaks

Maurice Scully, The Basic Colours (Pig Press, 1994). From this one I'll quote a poem relating to another recent thread on this poetics list -- this is one of several poems in the book beginning "sonnet/" --

sonnet/ reach for the spray paint! the images
were the last layer. the layers cracked & dried. let me see. the box was made of glass, mainly. watching the graph-paper
slowly emerge from where the two worlds
hit as such, let me show you, a hybrid, a raw image, emerging from an instrument,
fascinated by this fragile film, awe-struck,
rooted to the spot etc. they murder you
in the mountains, they beat you in the foothills, in the lowlands, beware: quite an endearing little country. I have precisely what you need. each roll of thunder spreads & fissures, each a different, similar drama-
carpet in the dark. syn. copating flashes.
dauntingly stolid I thought I'd . . . I see.
look at that & tell me what you see. inside
there ar some beautiful verbs; outside there is the outside. peering over the fence at
the outside one evening a gigantic mosquito
swerved past my head & crashed into a tree.
the tree shuddered & a large branch cracked
off. just missed the dog. the cat froze. the mosquito stood elegant & terrible on her high legs. the proboscis could kill a man. what is the name of the noise of the rain?

Paul Celan, Breathturn, trans. by Pierre Joris (Sun & Moon, 1995)

Theresa Hak Kyung Cha, Dictee (Third Woman Press, Berkeley, 1995, originally pub. 1982 by Tanam Press). I know, not new, but it's part of my reading list, and is one of the books on my desk here, still.

Jeff Derksen, Dwell (Talonbooks, 1993)

Jeff Dersen, Down Time (Talonbooks, 1990)

Will Alexander, Asia & Haiti (Sun & Moon, 1995)

Reading other books as well, for work & pleasure. But this is most of the current pile of poetry reading, at least for now.

charles

↑ Index

150. Chris Stroffolino

no weirdos please (apologies to kevin davies)

Mon 10 Jun 1996

Dear poetics List People-- I will be moving on or about July 1st and resigning from the list and am curious if anyone wants to BUY A MODEM. It's a $180 value. A FAX MODEM, they say--though I'm too much of a clutz to figure out the fax part of it. Anyway, if not buy---will trade (or *@!k) for books or something. Please contact me via email if interested. Thanks, Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

151. Ira Lightman

post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes

Mon 10 Jun 1996

On Sun, 9 Jun 1996 18:06:15 EDT Ken Edwards wrote:

> - Rob MacKenzie: The Tune Kilmarnock (Form Books).
Likewise, rather fugitive.
> Harry Gilonis is the publisher. Post-Language poetry in English, Scots and > Gaelic, eg: "suilean uaine over sand / sallow 'hint an fheusag bheag / bumfluff > ejaculate 'tis a // quarter bottle balls all / inevitable poetries though / > pulling God by's beard an /..."
Although I am a fan and friend of Rob's work, the term post-language poetry does not apply to him in anything but the sloppy current sense ie: "poetry that recognizes that there was a movement called language poetry famous (and, as the small number of people who read it before talking about it - usually dismissively - know, best) in the eighties, and that we do not wish to be expected to be language poets ourselves". There is very little engagement with Coolidge, Hejinian, Silliman, Andrews, Bernstein, Howe, Weiner, Harryman, Watten, Robinson, Day, Dreyer, Greenwald, any of the poets of In The American Tree in Rob's work. He doesn't read it, it's not on his bookshelves, he rarely talks to me about any example of it, it's not there in the attitude to language or presence in any number games, paragraph organisation, or relation of page to page, or dual columns, in the way that it is in any of the poets mentioned. Rob's poetic, and I esteem it, seems much more related to creating a painterly effect, of the page as canvas which, at the most, related to Susan Howe. But his poems are very much narrative, spoken by a coherent I, even if (very powerfully) it is a bi-cultural, sometimes bi-lingual, I. This use is much more like the balladeers and mainstream poets which he (and I) like, who don't get much of a look-in in British avant-garde circles.

Thus he is more accurately a post-Cambridge, or post-Subvoicive or post-Writers Forum poet (these last 2 are both London reading circles), in that he by and large ignores most avant-garde British poetry and works with other British "non pc" sources.

At most, his idiom, and often Miles Champion's, another young poet mentioned by Ken, could be called "surreal" - and Harry Gilonis, Rob's publisher, is much more interested in surrealism than in LangPo, he says to me that he only really likes Susan Howe, and again it is for the resonance, the presence, of her placement of words visually. Not, a key LangPo position for many, the arbitrariness, the contigency, the non-I, of the form (isn't this why Silliman, for example, has expressed low interest in Howe on this list in the past?). Rob is more interested in the unconscious babble of automatic "unconscious", which is also presence. The resurgence of such "non-referential" language idiom in late 80s and 90s British poetry is as far as many Brit poets have gone in making a nod to LangPo, but it is, not being contingent but "the unconscious", in my view, inimical to LangPO-

one of the things LangPoets argue against - see Watten's Total Syntax essays. Rob's greatest contact with LangPo was being in a creative writing class run by Stephen Rodefer, who is, at best, a hanger-on of LangPo, anyway, and only uses his links with LangPo to cloud himself in hipper-than-thou avant-gardism with no politics or theory, and to act up the stereotype of LangPoet=Paul De Man= amoralist, which has of course endeared him to Brit avant gardists who hate and fear LangPo and want ammo against it.

I use the "post" prefix here, I believe, in the way Ken does (and I want to stress here that I am Ken himself is a major friend of LangPo, as one of the few British editors at the time, in the 80s, to publish it and review it, and see it reviewed, warmly, this is not an attack on Ken's being informed about LangPo). In other words, Rob is post-Britishavantgarde in the way that Ken says he is post-Langpoetry; ie Rob shows a fleeting courteous interest in the avantgardism of the immediately previous generation but basically rejects it, does not allude with it, does not wrestle with it.

This is, in my opinion, the way a lot of self-designated post-modernism works. It is actually pre-modernist, and makes very little engagement with Pound or the sides of Williams and Zukofsky and Creeley and so on that are difficult (see Ron Silliman's essay Z-Sited Path, in _The New Sentence_). It is often anti-modernist, reactionary, attacking a forebear by using mainstream terms of abuse "mad", "not poetry", "easy", "a clique", and thus trying to win friends among the ignorant - not support the quest to be radical in all groups, just their own, ie not the principle of freedom, but their own freedom.

Whereas the LangPoets use of, for example, Stein, is not anti-modernist (in the way I'm saying that a lot of British avant-garde poetry is, in fact, anti-language poetry) but genuinely post-modernist - not least because in Silliman's case, he is very much, in my view, a Poundian, absorbing and wrestling with a lot of Pound. But his, and many of the other writers' in The Tree, is the best post-modernism: ie, I refuse to take on the paideuma, the canons and exclusions, of the previous groundbreakers; I shall take on equally difficult poetics. That is actually what Pound meant by make it new; renew. There are very few British who have taken on LangPo and bettered it. Not least in the political example of Stein, that sexuality may be both exploratory, queer, and not attached to angry young man's "anti-bourgeois" thuggery, or self-mocking "I'm a camp hairdresser me" harmless kitsch.

Very best,

Ira Lightman

↑ Index

152. Joe Amato
Re: the eternal "summer" reading thing
Mon 10 Jun 1996

yo, i don't know exactly what "shoah" means mself (and i checked when i read bransen's piece to see if i had any reference to it here at home, but no luck)... it's the title of a 1985 film (by claude lanzmann) dealing with the holocaust (which i haven't mself seen), and it's clear from the way bransen uses the term in her piece that it's interchangeable with "the holocaust"... but if anybody knows the derivation of "shoah," i'd love to know mself...

joe

↑ Index

153. Robert J Wilson
Re: the eternal summer reading thing
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Re "Dictee" as 'summer reading,' it is hard to get a hold of but see Walter Lew's very intriguing as well as challenging response text to the dessicated Korean/American sublimity of Cha herself (available at that small press distributor on San Pablo Avenue, Berkeley) and a (rather too caustic) critique of ally/enemey Walter Lew's agon for priority with Cha (and the Cha critical industry as centered in Elaine Kim et al in "Northern California" hegemony over Asian-American professionalization of literature underway) by Rob Wilson in boundary 2 two issues back. And, as many of you know, Walter's "Premonitions" and "Muae" projects have virtually reinvented and reimagined the whole field of Asian American diasporic poetics and politics in one fell swoop, revealing how cyborgian, mixed, and engaged in semiotic/social transformation they had been all along despite the "yellow light" being administered by the not-so-open "Open Boat" poetics of Garrett Hongo et al. Anyway, it is a new day in that field, and Walter has done us all a blessing in the "machinic assemblages" of language work he has put together. So, yes, (re) read the sublime Cha by all means, but do check out Walter Lew's remappings in "Muae" and "Premonitions" and (if you have that boring and empty professional journal around) read "boundary 2" on the side of the sins and crimes of professionalization/careerism/stupidity that mar our days in the republic.

With regards from the Pacific/Asia death of Captain Cook school of poetics (okay, on this language monstrosity, see Susan Schultz's 'postlocal' "Tinfish" journal and chapbook series where else but on the Buffalo electronic center while you are musing around this summer), Rob Wilson

On Mon, 10 Jun 1996, Charles Alexander wrote:

> re: read anything good yet...
>
> the reading list is piling up, as always.
>
> just completed:
>
> Leslie Scalapino, Defoe (Sun & Moon, 1984). For me, the most exhilarating work by Leslie Scalapino to date. Like learning a new language. A must.
>
> Leslie Scalapino, The Front Matter, Dead Souls (Wesleyan, 1996). Also a treat, although its momentum seems to me more pushed than in Defoe, which is more various in how it moves, from phrase to phrase, part to part. I have a review of this one coming out in the summer issue of Rain Taxi, a Twin Cities review journal which is fairly new.
>
> yet to read:
>
> Issues 5, 6, & 7 of Big Allis. Very fine journal I kept up with on the early issues, but missed some and am now catching up. I note Jessica Grim's departure as an editor, and I am certain she will be missed. I'd love to see more of her work.
>
> Chain 3. Leafing through, some striking visual work included.
>
> Catherine Walsh, Pitch (Pig Press, 1994)
>
> > wet roof clear brown beyond
> > buffeted flowers till light changed
> > shade tone more than grey effectively
> > impeding adumbration moving
> > lines space (racing point to point)

how many in or out does it take each an anchorage in view of the wind (the sea) marathon
railway line sea side of a lonely night walking dark rocks shift water
breaks

Maurice Scully, The Basic Colours (Pig Press, 1994). From this one I'll quote a poem relating to another recent thread on this poetics list -- this is one of several poems in the book beginning "sonnet/" --

sonnet/ reach for the spray paint! the images
were the last layer. the layers cracked & dried. let me see. the box was made of glass, mainly. watching the graph-paper
slowly emerge from where the two worlds
hit as such, let me show you, a hybrid, a
raw image, emerging from an instrument,
fascinated by this fragile film, awe-struck,
rooted to the spot etc. they murder you
in the mountains, they beat you in the foothills, in the lowlands, beware: quite an endearing little country. I have precisely what you need. each roll of thunder spreads & fissures, each a different, similar drama-
carpet in the dark. syn. copating flashes.
dauntingly stolid I thought I'd . . . I see.
look at that & tell me what you see. inside
there ar some beautiful verbs; outside there
is the outside. peering over the fence at
the outside one evening a gigantic mosquito
swerved past my head & crashed into a tree.
the tree shuddered & a large branch cracked
off. just missed the dog. the cat froze. the mosquito stood elegant & terrible on her high legs. the proboscis could kill a man. what is the name of the noise of the rain?

Paul Celan, Breathturn, trans. by Pierre Joris (Sun & Moon, 1995)

Theresa Hak Kyung Cha, Dictee (Third Woman Press, Berkeley, 1995, originally pub. 1982 by Tanam Press). I know, not new, but it's part of my reading list, and is one of the books on my desk here, still.

Jeff Derksen, Dwell (Talonbooks, 1993)

Jeff Dersen, Down Time (Talonbooks, 1990)

> Will Alexander, Asia & Haiti (Sun & Moon, 1995)
>
> Reading other books as well, for work & pleasure. But this is most of the current pile of poetry reading, at least for now.
>
> charles

↑ Index

154. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: hire the higher?
Mon 10 Jun 1996

tom -- yes, such things certainly are a bit subjective -- BUT, at least in this here public institution where I work, we DO have to be able to point to certain demonstrable accomplishments when we are asked to justify having hire prof. X over prof. Y, and we are indeed asked to provide such justification regularly -- That is, for example, if we were to hire someone for a senior position who had considerably fewer publications than a large number of the other candidates, or considerably less experience, we would indeed be asked to commit to paper the subjective grounds of our decision that prof. xs one book, for instance, was SO remarkable as to counter prof. Y's many books (which IS, I hasten to add, possible) -- this is not a perfect mechanism, of course -- it may be that the inquiry is conducted by a venal committee set upon rubber-stamping our decision (though this has yet to occur) --

Again, I would never argue that this is the best, or even a good system, but I think it generally a good idea that SOMEBODY looks into these things to see that I don't simply hire all my best buddies from grad. school, or, far more likely to happen in my own case, my wife.

But the real objection I make is to the phoniness of the original search -- A well-known case of this recently took place at a public institution on this coast -- (NOT in English -- this wasn't a job I applied for) -- several people told me independently before the application deadline had arrived who was going to be hired for the position, and they were right -- this meant that several hundred hard-pressed job-seekers, at least a few of whom appeared to be demonstrably more qualified than the successful candidate, went to considerable time and expense delivering materials to the department in question -- and it does take a lot of time and money to do all this --

yes, we can simply remark that such shit happens, but I am foolish enough to believe that we had begun to make some small progress towards more equitable hiring procedures prior to the recent spate of cuts, lacerations, edicts from Governors, etc -- In the system I am tenured in, the chancellor wants to put greater power in the hands of deans when it comes to deciding pay raises -- this is presented under the guise of decentralization, putting power closer to the people affected, etc. -- but it's a pretty transparent move away from the more democratic review procedures we had been developing -- undsoweiter

↑ Index

155. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: eeoc/p/etc.
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Joe -- Not even Yale is "required" to hold a national search in order to promote somebody from Associate to Full professor -=- this IS NOT an eeoc question in this instance -- Yale, an institution that routinely refuses to tenure highly qualified faculty, is up to something quite different here -- and yes, Yale sucks, but just maybe this is one reason that the sucking continues? This "private" institution is heavily subsidized by people like you and me --

↑ Index

156. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Oppen Sesame
Mon 10 Jun 1996

I love that -- a world where the name "Oppen" opens doors -- "Out the window with the window," Corso said in one of his better moments --

ADD TO SUMMER READING

new Kelsey Street book by Erica Hunt -- It's a beauty --

(as Oppen warned us, though, one day the knob comes off in your hand)

Some time has passed and now everyone should know where they're sleeping in Maine -- So how about everybody who's going to Maine for the 50s conference letting everybody else know -- I know there have been schedule changes -- It was a lot of fun at the MLA putting faces and their attendant persons together with names known from this list (((

↑ Index

157. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Oppen Sesame
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Okay Aldonet al.,

I'll be arriving in Orono on Friday afternoon and leaving on Sunday early afternoon, and am staying at the motel near the campus. I'll be chairing the William Bronk session of papers on Saturday and giving my own paper on Bronk and G Oppen on Sunday early morning.

Et tu?

Burt

↑ Index

158. Keith Tuma
Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Thanks to Ira for the post on British readings (or absence of same) in language poetry. A question--for Ira or anybody else--along these lines. There's a longish letter from Jeremy Prynne to Steve McCaffery taking up the matter of language poetry, and I'm wondering if this letter has been published somewhere. Somebody showed me a copy of it once, but I've not been able to learn whether it's been published anywhere yet, or if there's a response from McCaffery etc.

Grateful for any information on this.

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

159. Carnography
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Fred E. Maus typed:

> Interestingly, I just read a poem by Charles Baxter ("The Last String Quartet of Arnold Schoenberg")...
>
> Where does one find this? And what does it have to do with AS's 4th Quartet?

1. One finds the poem in Baxter's collection, Imaginary Paintings and Other Poems (Paris Review Editions).

2. The poem has to do with letters about the quartet written by Schoenberg while in hospital. It seems to be a companion piece to Baxter's poem on Erik Satie, which I've only seen in the early Eighties anthology, Coming Attractions.

Have I mentioned that I quite liked the Schoenberg poem?
For some reason, Baxter's free verse seems to have a formal finish, an attention to line breaks, an irrational openness, that is reminiscent of the Romantics, and possibly of certain poems by James Schyler. I haven't much use for William Stafford's common-sense tone and next-to-absent prosody, yet I've been a fan of Baxter's best work for almost a decade. Yet both appear superficially similar. Why is that?

Also, Baxter embraces history--even European history-- while Stafford seems to affect Hemingway's disdain for literature's so-called preciosity. Stafford maintains a neither-nor approach to surface tension, a Writing Degree Theroux faux lucidity. But Baxter seems attentuated to semantic fields, and modulates diction along with (or against) the rhythm.

****

One's entire literary enterprise is "artificial" in the literal sense, isn't it? So what's the good in denying the artificiality of one's own project? Stafford seems "insufficiently synthetic," as Charles Bernstein once said of the Surrealists. That is, insufficiently idiomatic, insufficiently opaque; unable to a create a resonant sound or rhythm beyond that of the narrative and the procession of pictures it conjures. Stafford reads like Marguerite Duras gone wrong.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: Has anyone noticed that email forces the user to make line-break decisions? Could this be one more reason for the current explosion of online poetry? Even emoticons seem a peculiar notation designed for inter -disciplinary use.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

160. Joe Amato
Re: eeoc/p/etc.
Mon 10 Jun 1996

aldon, yes, i see your point... i failed to grasp that they just up and promoted the guy (perhaps b/c i was passed over for a tenure-track once mself while on a visiting)... it bothers me to make an issue of eeoc in any case.. the yale situation just plain sucks...

the Big 1... or

YES
WE HAVE NO
BA NA NAS///

best,

↑ Index

161. Kevin Killian
Re: Oppen Sesame
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Hi, this is Kevin Killian. Yes, I am going to Orono Conference. Get there on Wednesday late and leave on Sunday, so I am hoping to meet a lot of listservers who I have never laid eyes on, I'll be wearing a big name tag. I'm talking about Jack Spicer on the quote unquote "gay" panel, really bringing up the rear as it is in the very last possible slot. So, everybody please attend!!

Dodie Bellamy is coming too, and we are both curious about what all of you look like. Dodie will be doing the fashion reports just like she did at last year's Blaser Conference, so try to look your best. More later.

Thanks.

↑ Index

162. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Oppen Sesame
Mon 10 Jun 1996

I am arriving Wednesday afternoon (hopefully in time for) my panel and staying to at least saturday AM---and POSSIBLY later. Will be rooming with a Vancourite named Andrew who I've never met. I don't know the people who are going to feed me (F O'H). Look forward to meeting y'all. cs

↑ Index

163. wystan
Re: stays fresh longer
Mon 10 Jun 1996

> Date: Mon, 10 Jun 1996 04:10:35 -0400
> Reply-to: UB Poetics discussion group
> <[redacted]>
> From: "k.a. hehir" <[redacted]>
> Subject: stays fresh longer
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
> <[redacted]>
>
> This is a sentence.
> This is a sentence.
> This is a sentence.
> Is this a new sentence?
> No, just the next sentence.
>
> kev

Come on man

i got parole

w.

↑ Index

164. Carnography
Re: the iliad of hypnotism
Mon 10 Jun 1996

I typed:

> 2. The poem has to do with letters about the quartet written by Schoenberg while in hospital.

To clarify:

The poem cites letters written by Schoenberg while in hospital. The subject is (often ostensibly but always obliquely) his last string quartet. Supposedly, the quartet is all "about" American nurses, an idea which, like a good part-time modernist, I don't particularly like. However, my (and Schoenberg's) postro-mantic side seems slightly more at home with the idea.

Also: Thanks, Tim Wood, for being kind enough to re-cite my querzblatz list. And thanks,too, to the person who invented the term--who was that exactly?

I'd like to remember and acknowledge her (I think she was a her), since the defining act of mediocrity is to refuse to acknowledge good work.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

165. Jerry Rothenberg
(no subject)
Mon 10 Jun 1996

Word came today that Bert Schierbeck, who was one of the truly classy postwar poets, died yesterday at his home in Amsterdam. Anyone who spent any time among the Dutch poets would have known him: a wonderfully present & wonderfully life-affirming man, who broke much new ground in poetry & prose & in the necessary links between them. It was always a great pleasure to drink & talk with him -- talk (really) more than drink -- and though he was ailing & under sentence for the last few years, I hope he kept it going to the end.

What follows is in no sense an obituary but the commentary that Pierre Joris and I wrote for inclusion with several of his poems in the second volume of _Poems for the Millennium .

Signed off, with love.

jr

BERT SCHIERBECK

there comes over us / that awful silence / which we saw in picture books / of animals in that vast sort of space / where they almost didn t exist at all / drifting in the mist of a still / bigger animal that devours us all. (B.S.)

The work emerges from the vortex of the European & Dutch avant- garde (post-World War II), with affiliations to the mixed-means poetics of Cobra (page 000) &, at a greater distance, American poets like Williams, Olson, Burroughs. The defining breakthrough is his creation, circa 1950, of the _compositional novel_, in which the stated aim is the removal of the borderlines of the _I_ and their redistribution -- for him, as others, an act of defiance against imposed, inherited notions of the predetermined Self. Regarding the early means employed he writes (1952): [quote] At that time I wrote down on scraps of paper every conversation I heard, all the words I came across; I saved clippings from newspapers, I traveled through Spain and took notes on what I saw along the road, at the outdoor cafis, all kinds of conversations and forms of life. That can all be recovered in the book. Arranged upon a rhythmic base that was determined by the breath of the people, which we have in common. Everything carefully, typographically divided up to make the whole surveyable.[unquote] Moving from prose to verse -- or holding some rich ground in between -- the resultant form works toward the creation of cross sections of reality where everything rhymes.

His long novel-poems available in English include _Shape of the Voice_, _Cross Roads_, and _Keeping It Up_, along with short works like _The Sun: Day_ presented here.

↑ Index

166. Herb Levy

Re: morty

Mon 10 Jun 1996

> There is a book on/by Feldman I'm aware of, but can't remember the title now. Mostly anecdotes and lectures of his (german/english edition, i seem to remember a complicated story behind the reason for this). Available through Larry Polanski's press (turtle island?)

One or two more things on the Feldman book, which has already been well identified. It's great & very funny. The long final transcription of his Darmstadt talk is hilarious: If only they'd make the tapes available. Oh well. It was available from Frog Peak, Larry Polansky's distribution collective, but I didn't see it on their Web site when I gave it a cursory look just now:

<http://www.sover.net/~frogpeak/>

so it may be out of print as Rod suggests.

However, there are plenty of very good & hard to come by recordings, scores, texts, & tributes at this Web site. Including the wonderful mag Soundings, put out by composer Peter Garland which includes several festschrift-type items: a special issue on Ives, Ruggles & Varese; an ish on James Tenney; most of the early serious writing on Nancarrow.

As an aside here, let me put in a good word for the new book by Kyle Gann on Nancarrow which Rod mentioned - it's expensive, but many academic libraries probably purchased it, so some of us here can probably get a hold of it - it's very, very good. For that matter, if you end up looking for Garland's Soundings in a library, note that it's the journal with the Santa fe address, there are several others with the same name.

In other Feldman news, there was a good piece by Clark Coolidge on Feldman a few years back in Sulfur (I think).

& those of you near New York City may want to consider checking out one or more of the four Feldman concerts at Lincoln Center in early August, including a concert with Kronos playing the six-hour single movement (with no interruptions) String Quartet #2. If I can finish enough work on the forthcoming CDs to need to talk with distributors by then, I'm going to try to hear as many of these as I can.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

167. Tony Green
Re: proto proto yahoo
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Eryque, say more abt the horoscopes that you want, most of the NZ ones are syndicated from London someone told me. Do you want really stupid short ones that cd apply to anyone. Or long ones, ditto. There was one kind that always used to end with advice: Be kind. Be wary. Be...etc. I made a collection of these one time. Why not make them up yrself? best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

168. Eryque Gleason
Re: proto proto yahoo
Tue 11 Jun 1996

---

tony, i'm not really looking for anything specific in a horoscope, if you find it amusing or interesting or scarey, anything but boring and uninteresting i'd like a look see. what ultimately comes of this will be made up by me (mostly), but i want something that's not me to start with. one that ends with "be wary" may be perfect, i've been more and more cynical lately. otherwise, all bets are off. maybe the sillier the better, but i won't be too picky at all. all contributions will be much appreciated!

best,
eryque

> Eryque, say more abt the horoscopes that you want, most of the NZ ones are syndicated from London someone told me.

↑ Index

169. k.a. hehir
a cage rattled
Tue 11 Jun 1996

---

i'm sorry if my la\st few posts seemed somewhat fun, but i will add this to the Caged thing. this from an address given before the National Inter-Collegiate Arts Conference, Vassar College, Ploughkeepsie,New York, February 28 -1948.

The whole article or address is quite amazing..

for new desires..."I have fir instance, several new desires (two may seem absurd but I am serious about them):first,to compose a piece of uninterrupteds silence silence and sell it to Muzak Co. It will be 3 or 4 1/2 minutes long - those being standard lengths of "canned music- and its title will be "Silent Prayer". It will open with a single idea which I will attempt to make as seductive as the color and and shape as a flower. The ending will approach imperceptibility."

This is fromMusicworks 49.

ala\ways a great read and even a more wonderful listen as they also send a cd.

most seriously yours,

kevin hehir

↑ Index

170. Ron Silliman
Passings
Tue 11 Jun 1996

An obit yesterday in the Times for A. Poulin, Jr. and last week in the SF Chronicle for Lawrence Hart.

Ron

↑ Index

171. Ken Edwards
post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Apologies to Ira Lightman for my sloppy use of the term "post-language poetry" in connection with the Scottish poet Rob MacKenzie. I only meant something like (bearing in mind the nature of the readership of this list) "if you've engaged with language poetry and its various kinships you may find this work of interest". I don't know Rob personally, have never spoken to him, and know of his work only from hearing him read at SubVoicive in London and reading his extraordinary little pamphlet.

In so far as I understand Ira's argument, though, "post-language" in this instance could be taken to be as accurate as "post-modernist" -- ie it doesn't necessarily imply an allegiance to or even an acquaintance with, what has gone before.

I agree that there is a thread of antagonism in some British avant-gardist circles to langpo, often based on ignorance of the work, or at most on a reading of the theoretical writings (but not the poetry) of Silliman and Watten. This is frequently allied to a posturing, male-ego-centric romanticism, or alternatively to a patrician fastidiousness, both of which eerily echo attitudes otherwise identified with that chimera "the mainstream". On the other hand, there are many here who do engage intelligently with langpo.

Myself, I believe the flight from engagement with what's being done elsewhere leads one -- at best -- to reinvent whole sets of redundant wheels.

Please, please, don't anybody dare start another thread on "what exactly is langpo anyway"...

↑ Index

172. Charles Bernstein
[redacted]: A Celebration

Tue 11 Jun 1996

ROBERT CREELEY: A 70th Birthday Celebration

BUFFALO

October 10th to 12th, 1996

Thursday, October 10

8pm: Hallwalls, Buffalo
Just Buffalo Tribute
Eileen Myles Reading, introduced by Robert Creeley

Friday, 10/11

3-5 Katherine Cornell Theater, SUNY-Buffalo, North Campus
Welcome: UB President William Greiner
Reading: Gil Sorrentino and Amiri Baraka

5-6:30 420 Capen Hall, North Campus
Opening, "Here: Fifty Years of Poetry in Buffalo", Poetry/Rare Books Collection, 420 Capen

8:30-10 Katherine Cornell Theater
Talk by Artist Jim Dine / Conversation with Robert Creeley
Reading by Robert Creeley

Saturday, 10/12

4-5 Katherine Cornell Theater
Poetry reading: John Ashbery
Reception follows, Jane Keeler Room

8:30 Hallwalls
Jazz concert Steve Kuhn and Carol Fredette Reception and party with Mercury Rev

all events free and open to the public program subject to change

↑ Index

173. Jordan Davis
adventures in paradise
Tue 11 Jun 1996

"Adventures in Paradise" by Laurie Duggan seems like a pretty good poem to me. Here is a sample stanza:

The doctor lived on the main street until
he moved around the corner. He thought I was smart.
My grandmother didn't like Picasso - for her
the sole representative of "Modern Art". I wanted to be a veterinary surgeon and fix up animals
and live on a farm like my uncle and aunt.

The poem may be a little 'smart' on the whole, but Duggan has a great light touch.

Just typing,
Jordan

↑ Index

174. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Passings
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Ron--DId you know POULIN?
I remember his intor. to poetry anthology was what my first "hip" teacher used (and the WCW selected) to turn us on to poetry. I think the 3rd edition (it was green). Then each subsequent edition got WORSE. Like take out Baraka and put in Gerald Stern; take out Kenneth Koch and put in Michael Harper. Etc.

Didn't he also do BOA?
Pardon my ignorance, but who's larry hart?cs

↑ Index

175. Chris Stroffolino
Re: adventures in paradise
Tue 11 Jun 1996

---

jordan is that laurie duggan poem a sestina-- UNTIL WANTED, HER ANIMALS SMART AUNT-----cs

↑ Index

176. Jordan Davis
Re: adventures in paradise
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Chris, no, Duggan's poem has the pleasant slightly damaged quality of the sestina without the unfortunate insistence on those dopey end words. Whoops! my politics are showing. Here are another six lines of the poem:

I burst a blood vessel below the brain
and spent two months in the Alfred Hospital
reading the complete works of Ian Fleming which I liked because he could make golf interesting. Then I read Emile Zola
and started writing D.H. Lawrence imitations

in which young men full of spirit flung themselves down upon the earth and felt it breathe
and everything seemed complete. I wanted to be a rock star, then a painter,
then a novelist, but I ended up writing poems
late in 1966, misunderstanding T.S. Eliot.

What the hell - have twelve lines! You'll note, Chris, a decided Kenneth Koch-influence on that last line. Duggan was I believe a big Scripsi conspirator, and an Otis Rusher as well. Any recent Duggan sightings?

Enthusiastically,
Jordan

↑ Index

177. Ira Lightman

Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes

Tue 11 Jun 1996

Thanks to Ken for his engaged response here. I reiterate that he is one of the pioneers of openness to LangPo among the Brits.

Ken, could you detail a few of the poets here, as you say, who engage intelligently with langpo, which books or poems?

Ira

On Tue, 11 Jun 1996 07:03:06 EDT Ken Edwards wrote:

> I agree that there is a thread of antagonism in some British avant-gardist > circles to langpo, often based on ignorance of the work, or at most on a reading > of the theoretical writings (but not the poetry) of Silliman and Watten. This is > frequently allied to a posturing, male-ego-centric romanticism, or alternatively > to a patrician fastidiousness, both of which eerily echo attitudes otherwise > identified with that chimera "the mainstream". On the other hand, there are many > here who do engage intelligently with langpo.
>
> Myself, I believe the flight from engagement with what's being done elsewhere > leads one -- at best -- to reinvent whole sets of redundant wheels.
>
> Please, please, don't anybody dare start another thread on "what exactly is > langpo anyway"...

↑ Index

178. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Sumerian Reading
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Ecco press, which seems in the past few years to have recognized the existence of black writers on the planet, has reissued William Melvin Kelly's beezaar jazz novel, _A Drop of Patience_ -- rec. with caution for all -- fascinating writer who has not been heard from in some time -- arrive Wed. evening STOP stopping at that same off-campus hotel STOP will be there entire conference STOP will nearly fall asleep from quandariness, then attend conference STOP do they still throw lobsters into the ring at poetry slams there?

ORONO --

↑ Index

179. Hank Lazer
Re: mainestays
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Aldon et al--

I'll be at Maine too, arriving Tuesday night, staying until mid-day Sunday. I'll give a talk on Wednesday, Panel 2E. I'm talking about the development in the early 1950s of a short-line resource in poetry, via Zukofsky, Eigner, Creeley, Niedecker, Olson .... part of an ongoing thinking about what Oppen called "the lyric valuables." Also I'll be taking part in group reading, which I think is scheduled for Friday evening.

Looking forward to placing names with faces or vice versa....

Hank Lazer

↑ Index

180. Laura Moriarty
Re: Passings
Tue 11 Jun 1996

---

11 June 96

Chris -

I have not known Lawrence Hart's work myself, but thought the name sounded familiar.I found him in the files here at the Poetry Center. He organized a reading here for the Activists - (Rosalie More, Jeanne McGahey, Marie Graybeal, Fred Ostrander, John Hart and Leonard Horwitz.) The mimeograph from the reading (probably put together by Robert Duncan who was Assistant Director of the Center at the time) gives a short bio of Hart. It is from March 5, 1963.

"Lawrence Hart founded the Activists more than twenty years ago in San Francisco - their objective to work out disciplines for use in so-called experimental techniques. Work of this group has appeared widley in national magazines. The May 1951 issue of Poetry was entirely made up Activist work with Hart as guest editor - followed by a sequel in 1958. His criticism has been published in Poetry, Quarterly Review, Accent and has been reprinted in the British anthology Modern Reading. He is the recent publisher of the Activist anthology, Accent on Barlow, and has just completed a textbook presenting contemporary poetry for 7th and 8th grade and high schools. With the cooperation of Bay District and Marin County schools he has worked with talented children for several years."

There is correspondence with Duncan indicating that the Activists group was underrepresented at the Poetry Center and eagerness from Hart that they be more involved. I believe we have an audiotape of the reading in 1963.

Anyway, to fill you in -

Laura

↑ Index

181. Mark Wallace
various cages
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Chris Stroffolino and anyone else:

Jeff Hansen's e-mail address (for Poetic Briefs also) remains the same, but he does not respond to the list in the summer when he's not at work, so he will not be available via e-mail until the fall.

Re Cage: Certainly there is value in comparing the later with the earlier Cage, and if someone has an interesting set of reasons for preferring the earlier Cage, than that seems reasonable. But as for Tim Page's review (and I appreciate Herb Levy's post on his credentials--it's a shame that they proved so worthless here), no such comparison takes place there. It is, and I've already said this, a hostile, slanderous attack in which he finally suggests that the only intersting thing about Cage's Europera 5 (and indeed ALL of Cage's work since 1952) is whether he can be sued for it. Educated, credentialed, or not, that's a fool's position, just as the idea that Cage's later work "has no point but isn't even about having no point" is simply not a respectable position, but a hostile assault. I may have misunderstood Oren Izenburg's response, if his argument simply is that he finds Cage's earlier work "preferrable." That's fine. But the problem (and it still seems a real one to me) is not that Page PREFERS Cage's earlier work on reasonable grounds, but that he dismisses the later Cage with a bunch of imperious and deeply incorrect statements about what Cage is doing in that later work (i.e. "nothing"). That's the offensive position that it seemed to me that Oren Izenburg was saying was "reasonable," but if it's Mr. Izenburg's position simply that he "prefers" earlier Cage, so be it. And I think my original post, in which I quoted Page saying that Cage's later work has no point, and that it's only interesting to think about whether he can be sued, made what was blatantly stupid about the article clear, and I still don't think that whether the article was a hostile, stupid attack is debatable. It WAS a hostile, stupid attack. It is in fact the STANDARDIZED hostile argument that the American media almost always presents about avant garde work on those rare occasions when it's mentioned.

As to the issue of what can be made a litmus test that Herb Levy raises, that's an interesting question, but I'm not really that interested in making Cage a litmus test here. I think more importantly that the litmus test, in terms of this experimental context, is whether a writer responds to avant garde art and writing in an honest, however questioning, manner, or whether a writer takes blatant advantage of media hostility to artists (and experimental artists in particular) to LIE about such artists in order to be able to sell their articles to media monstrosities like the Washington Post. That's what Tim Page has done (and the fact that he knows Cage makes this only more clear)--nothing he says about Cage has the slightest ring of truth, nor does he intend to have it. I don't know how well known his obvious dislike of Cage is, but I'm also certain that it's quite possible that the Post knew Tim Page hated Cage's experimental work when they asked him to write the review, or agreed to let him submit it. Whether one loves John Cage or has problems with his work or both IS NOT THE POINT. The point, in this case, is the way in which Tim Page has used media hostility to intellectually slander somebody that he apparently once worked with. For me, intellectual slander IS a significant litmus test of whether one deserves respect. I guess what I'm not clear on in Oren Izenburg's post is whether he thinks that slander didn't happen, or whether he simply misread me to be saying that my problem with Tim Page was about artistic differences, when the problem is really about ethics and power.

mark wallace

↑ Index

182. Chris Stroffolino
Re: mainestays
Tue 11 Jun 1996

I'll be "competing" RED LIGHT With Hank Lazer and RED LIGHT doing what RED LIGHT I think is a kind of RED LiGhT "close reading" of RED LIGHT two 1952 RED LIGHT O'Hara POEMS to and or about RED GRACE LIGHT HARTIGAN the lyric invaluables.....cs

↑ Index

183. David Kellogg
Re: mainestays
Tue 11 Jun 1996

I'll be there, too, arriving Wednesday.

Mine's the last panel in the whole damn conference, but my paper's on Stanley Kunitz of all people, so who can blame 'em? The upshot is a reading of the 1959 Selected Poems as a historical document creating an ancestry for Lowell et al., as against the prevailing "neglected genius" reading of that book's sudden laurels. Of course, I've still gotta finish it, and who knows what I'll say when it's over?

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

writing. Particularly, I was struck by the way that "silence" and "nothing" are such central terms at about the same time for Cage and Beckett, but Cage seems to have mattered a lot more for querzblatian types--am I wrong? If not, is the reason something like, they both intuited the impossibility of big-S Selfhood, but what was an opportunity for Cage was an intolerable threat for Beckett, and so he seems rear-guard? Or were they talking about totally different things under the same names? It's fascinating to me how liminal Beckett seems--both totally constructed and always seemingly on the verge of disintegration. But does the construction belie the desperation? Or vice versa?

Thanks,
John

↑ Index

185. Joseph Zitt
Re: what matter who's speaking
Tue 11 Jun 1996

On 11 Jun 96 at 22:50, Tim wood wrote:

> Cage's work is much more detached: there was little/no content to worry about. With Beckett, there was always some amount of content, and pretty damn depressing (& exciting...) content at that. At the same time, I wonder if the lack of content isn't ultimately more depressing.

Well, not for me. I love Beckett (have several settings of Beckett texts for voice and whatever sitting in drawers somewhere), but I don't find the "detached" Cage depressing at all. But then, I've never been much of a content fan (I get this image of the content hitting the...), and I find a lot of Beckett quite funny.

(I get this goofy image of someone a hundred years down the line doing a paper viewing the Thoreau-based pieces that you and I are writing for Question Authority, The in the light of our respective views of Beckett and Cage... Maybe we gotta work Satie in somehow.)
---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ==== [redacted] ===== Human Systems \||| ||/ Organizer, SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/<A HREF="http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt/">Joe Zitt's Home Page</A>\|

↑ Index

186. Carnography
Re: what matter who's speaking
Tue 11 Jun 1996

J. Beer:

> I was > curious to see what sort of a legacy people think that Beckett's had upon contemporary writing.

This is too large a question to be answered off-handedly. It is like asking a Cabalist to explain the significance of the number seven over cocktails. More later. But for now:

Suffice to say that Beckett--especially late Beckett--has had an indelible influence on contemporary poetry. Would Coolidge's _Mine_ read as it does without _How It Is_ and _Company_? Would Ashbery, for that matter? Would any so-called solipsistic text written in the last thirty or forty years? Would Alan Davies's essays read as they do? Would any voice that deconstructs itself reductio ad absurdum do so with a cantabile lilt without _Ill Seen, Ill Said_?

It is difficult to think of a living writer who hasn't been influenced by Beckett.

> Cage seems to have mattered a lot more for querzblatian
> types--am I wrong?

Not for me--not, I think, for Perelman's AKA (though P's here, from what I hear, and can speak for himself).

On the other hand, I believe you might be drawing a false parallel between two distinct philosophical choices. Beckett chose to focus on the individuated voice by stripping it clean; Cage often seemed to regard the voice as an egoic distraction, and performed chance operations, it would seem, to delete it completely.

Re silence: When asked to explain the difference between himself and Joyce, Beckett said: Joyce wants to put everything in, I want to take everything out. In this context, silence is arrived at differently than in Cage's work.

I regard both Cage and Beckett to be hugely important--but in hugely different ways.

Diminuitively,

Rob Hardin

PS:

For those who are interested: Here is one of the four Beckett parodies I wrote and read at The Unbearables' Irish Writers Reading Reading (Shanden Star, last year). It's about a crack whore, of course.

§§§

exsanguine in southwest corner of grime-streaked window? In gradual glow of embers' end, will she lean and dream, or merely drum fingers on sill, each pulse-beat ticking its term of sleep, in paradiddles that trope the see-saw thrusts of clients, of her noonwhite whorelife, abandoned at brothel door, or so she imagines, recalling serrated day on plank of pricks, her sheep-count obliterating apes that crowd old holes, the ghosts of belly-slap and sweat-smear staining this sunset, staining her last inclination to end?

Past slide of horizon, outside that fecal frame, will she lean, slow arc of sun sinking in window's rim, crease upon creak? Will she dream of first love, that doddering werewolf, no charm for her but immunity worn like mascara, eyes memorizing aimless dotard combing last strands and muttering of some insignificant summer? Will she lean even then?

In gradual glow at close of day, will she imagine staring face down in river, wind smoked out of lungs at last, the water below impaled by piers, the surface scarred by water-boatmen and bits of floating wood, multiple exposures of reflection and flesh drifting across the mirrored lens of the water, as twists of bedsheet lasso her limbs like sleep? Will she picture moss tendrils seducing her into wreckage, as twinges of pain awaken her body, flashpoint beams of tiny, parasitical flashlights? Will her attention flicker, and dreams drone softer, as the sky grows deliciously dim?

Never attend her, no succor but staring, no dream but drone, it is always she who dreams, I cannot dream, in a last still stream a stiff hand stands, white-edged in rinse of foam her sodden limbs, I wist she whitens, in river's isinglass poured toward shore, it is she who drifts, I cannot drift, if her head grew heavy with sleep and drooped face-down, would she laugh as she leaned and bubbles rose, or would she sink as now, in afternoon's caul, past slide of horizon, it is not mine to question, whether she feels light fail, it is my fault she fails, my fault the slow suffocation, I cannot lean, it is because of me she leans, into rivers' swirl, into surcease from tears, into ravenous water, afar she imagines the carrion's call, I cannot call, it is because of me she calls, one raven sated, nothing said, no word for breath, stretched vocable a rill derailed, afar she shrieks, afoul I follow, in afternoon's caul, to lean at last, in panic, shriek, in panic, to speak as Peter Kürten killed, each knife-slash ticking its term of sleep, in reddening light, in ruby sunset rime, I say to the tricks, to their drooling pizzles, I say to the toss-ups and crawlers, I say, she bleeds, I say, it is because of me she bleeds

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

187. David Golumbia
Re: LANSING TALISMAN!!!
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Ed -- subscribed earlier this year, received #15, but haven't ever received the "Lansing TALISMAN" -- have I missed it?

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

188. wystan
Re: what matter who's speaking
Tue 11 Jun 1996

Dear John,
I have always assumed Beckett was one of those writers of fiction who was important to poets and poetry; fiction's hardly the word for what he wrote which's part of the reason. For myself he was the writer that got me writing.
Wystan

↑ Index

189. Edward Foster
Re: LANSING TALISMAN!!!
Tue 11 Jun 1996

---

the last mailing went out yesterday. if you don't have a copy within a week, there's trouble with the post office yet again. best wishes, ed

↑ Index

190. Tim wood
Re: what matter who's speaking
Tue 11 Jun 1996

> I have always assumed Beckett was one of those writers of fiction who was important to poets and poetry; fiction's hardly the word for what he wrote which's part of the reason. For myself he was the writer that got me writing.
> Wystan

Wystan,

My agreement on this point. Beckett may have used the framework of "fiction" to cloth his work, but the heart of the work falls into poetry. Any number of passages in the trilogy work with some very intricate cyclings and subtle references and word play are rampant in his work, etc., etc. In one interesting performance I had the joy to experience (if only I could claim the idea!) they took the one passage (test: name work) in which the character goes back and forth between different elements in a bedroom, including the dresser over and over and over and over again. Instead of just "staging" (how would one do that...) or reading the passage, the reading was grabbed by a sampler and echoed back live again and again and again. The extend reverberation/echoing/whatever of the words seemed to pull the audience and the performers into a space seperate from the auditorium. Wonderful.

Tim

↑ Index

191. Rod Smith

Re: what matter who's speaking

Tue 11 Jun 1996

This Beckett/Cage question is interesting. I've often thought of it as Appolonian/Dionysian. Cage found Beckett's work too dark -- on the other hand he got on famously w/ Jasper Johns! Optimism was such an important part of Cage's character (not that he also didn't have a dark side/ dark times), but what he perceived as the complete lack of affirmation in Beckett made him question. I told him he should read _Watt_, the humor, as he loved Joyce so, but I don't think he ever did.

I don't think it's true that Cage is more important to experimental writers than Beckett, he has certainly been of great use to many. P. Inman in particular points to Beckett, as does Retallack.

There's a book by Nicholas Zurbrugg called _The Parameters of Postmodernism_ which works off a dialectic of what he calls "C-effect" vs. "B-effect" -- which opposes Cage, Beuys, Anderson, & others to Beckett, Baudrillard, Bourdieu, etc. (etc?) -- actually he locates "the dawn of the B-effect" in Benjamin's "Work of Art in the Age of Mechanical Reproduction" to which he opposes Cage's radical experimentation, questioning of value judgements, & enthusiam for technology. I'm not doing the book justice here though at times it seems a bit to either/or, as does the Apollonian/Dionysian above, & needs more of an actual dialectic goin' on.

One other thing on Cage & Beckett-- Cage contributed to the Review of Contemporary Fiction issue on Beckett, a beautiful, very spare mesostic on a 5-line Beckett poem. Cage is missing from the contents page, it's pg. 85.

↑ Index

192. Tim wood

Re: what matter who's speaking

Tue 11 Jun 1996

> "silence" and
> "nothing" are such central terms at about the same time for Cage and Beckett, but Cage seems to have mattered a lot more for querzblatian types--am I wrong? If not, is the reason something like, they both intuited the impossibility of big-S Selfhood, but what was an opportunity for Cage was an intolerable threat for Beckett, and so he seems rear-guard? Or were they talking about totally different things under the same names?

Cage's work is much more detached: there was little/no content to worry about. With Beckett, there was always some amount of content, and pretty damn depressing (& exciting...) content at that. At the same time, I wonder if the lack of content isn't ultimately more depressing.

I seem to remember reading that Beckett's shift to plays was because the novels were too personal. Interesting, perhaps the impossibility of Selfhood was too personal <Don't throw that one at a addict of black and white logic>. But, I don't know if that justifies reducing Beckett to the phrase "rear-guard". That term (and please I'm not flaming) seems meaningless for the same reason phrases like "cutting edge" and "innovative" and "original" are so utterly meaningless. What is "rear-guard" at this point? Perhaps its better to look at Beckett/Cage as a contrast of one dealing with/exploring/describing the struggle with that threat vs. one playing in the lack of selfhood. Some of the more romantic on the group might value the heroic antiheroism of the former as more important...

> It's fascinating to me how liminal Beckett seems agreed... see my other post on this thread...

> --both totally > constructed and always seemingly on the verge of disintegration. But does the construction belie the desperation? Or vice versa?

Perhaps it's both... both and neither belieing (word or not that) the other.

Tim Wood

↑ Index

193. Rod Smith
Re: what matter who's speaking
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Tim wrote--
>Cage's work is much more detached: there was little/no content to worry >about. With Beckett, there was always some amount of content, and pretty >damn depressing (& exciting...) content at that. At the same time, I >wonder if the lack of content isn't ultimately more depressing.

Don't know what you mean by lacking content. How cld it be? Do you mean narrative? Also don't understand "playing in lack of selfhood." How cld it be? or not be?

Rod

↑ Index

194. Chris Stroffolino
Re: what matter who's speaking
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Very Good post Rob on Beckett--- I'd like to add that the earlier Beckett (of the trilogy, WATT, even PROUST, etc.) seems to have a bigger influence on, say, Ashbery than the ILL SEEN ILL SAID stuff. more later....

↑ Index

195. wystan
Re: what matter who's speaking
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Dear Rod, Good posts. Your mention of Johns reminds me of the Beckett/Johns collaboration: FOIRADES/FIZZLES. Johns who is clearly creatively comfortable with both Cage and Beckett, can serves as a useful bridge figure here. Since for all three what content is is a question, it is not useful to compare them on the basis of how much any one of them has of it. Although, it is useful to see how putting the question is different depending on the art form in which it is put. And pessimism/optimism aside, the main thing is that putting content in question is a means of restoring the authority of the creative. ... leastways it did that for me. Wystan

↑ Index

196. Herb Levy
Re: what matter who's speaking
Wed 12 Jun 1996

I don't know of any direct connection between Cage's use of silence/nothing & Beckett's, but there is a direct connection between Beckett & Morton Feldman, who has earlier come up in connection with Cage.

One of Beckett's last texts was "Neither" written specifically for Feldman's opera of the same name & in gratitutde for this text, one of Feldman's later pieces, for chamber orchestra, was dedicated, and titled, "For Samuel Beckett."

> Regarding what people are reading, I've been going through Beckett's trilogy (Molloy, Malone Dies (I'm on this), and The Unnameable), and I was curious to see what sort of a legacy people think that Beckett's had upon contemporary writing. Particularly, I was struck by the way that "silence" and "nothing" are such central terms at about the same time for Cage and Beckett, but Cage seems to have mattered a lot more for querzblatian types--am I wrong? If not, is the reason something like, they both intuited the impossibility of big-S Selfhood, but what was an opportunity for Cage was an intolerable threat for Beckett, and so he seems rear-guard? Or were they talking about totally different things under the same names?
> It's fascinating to me how liminal Beckett seems--both totally constructed and always seemingly on the verge of disintegration. But does the construction belie the desperation? Or vice versa?
>
> Thanks,
> John

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

197. Charles Smith
Re: what matter who's speaking
Wed 12 Jun 1996

as to: "I was
curious to see what sort of a legacy people think that Beckett's had upon contemporary writing. "

For one, it's hard for me to imagine the writing of Clark Coolidge without the example & explorations of Beckett.

Charles Smith

↑ Index

198. Herb Levy

Re: various cages - newspaper reviews

Wed 12 Jun 1996

I have a lot of different things to say in response to the ongoing discussion of Cage here. I've split my comments on the Cage discussion into several parts, cause this one got to be pretty long. It's about the value of newspaper reviews.

The following is based not only on my own twelve years producing and presenting concerts of post-Cageian (wait, I think there were two concerts which included works by Cage, so they weren't all literally post-Cageian) new music, but also on my serving as board member of the now defunct New Music America festival for six or seven years & on my reading of the press kits of countless composers and performers of new music, dance, etc. as well.

Also this applies most particularly to the situation in the United States, but in my limited experience it doesn;t seem to be too different in much of the developed world.

Clearly the content, tone, etc. of Page's review were abominable, but it was a review in a daily paper. It isn't an academic or artistic critique of Cage, it's a newspaper review & the rules are very, very different. Newspaper reviews don't really mean anything, it's simply not worth the trouble to take them seriously.

I don't think that experimental writers are used to dealing with newspaper reviews very often, so I guess I can understand wanting to treat it as serious criticism, but it's simply absurd to do so. Newspapers don't carry arts criticism, they have entertainment reviews. If the fact that sometimes these reviews of entertainment are about events that you consider art confuses you, this is your problem & not the problem of the newspaper.

No one (except the uncle who lives in the town in which you are unlikely enough to be reviewed & he just wants to know why you aren't calling your parents more often anyway) remembers newspaper reviews, they are strictly filler that is only useful to the artist if the information about any future events, recordings or publiations is accurate.

Particularly (but not exclusively) when they are about "avant garde" work, EVEN when the review is positive, a newspaper review is almost always just as full of errors of fact as when the review is negative. In virtually all instances where a review is not incorrect, it has been cribbed from the press release & does not reflect the thinking of the reviewer.

People who write reviews of the performing arts for newspapers, many of whom are great people and good writers, are almost never specialists in "experimental" work. Even in the rare cases in which they are familiar with this kind of art, they were hired to write about mainstream movies or classical music or best sellers. So you frequently read reviews of jazz concerts by someone who knows about painting, reviews of paintings by former sports writers, reviews of theater by someone who knows about classical music, etc.

That's the way it is in the newspaper world. The idea is that anyone who is a journalist can write about anything, because they are trained to cover the five W's before the deadline.

Also, in this climate, writers who are supportive of unusual kinds of events are often seen as partisan, and in the wonderful world of journalistic ethics, that often means that they are not objective enough to review something.

Anyway, editors will rarely assign reviews of "experimental" work unless the performance is running for more than one night (as a kind of consumer report for those who might want to go after the opening night) & the editor usually assumes (usually correctly) that most of the "regular" people who read his paper would think that this event was a pile of crap, anyway.

&, even if an experimental event is running for more than one night, an editor will usually only assign a review of work like this if 1) it is being presented by an organization he cannot otherwise ignore, 2) if there are no other arts events that week for a salaried reporter to cover or, 3) there was a preview of the event in a competing paper that he can't ignore.

Is this depressing enough yet?

I don't know of an equivalent resource for Cage, so let me suggest that someone go to the Merce Cunningham Dance Company Web site (<http://www.merce.org/> it's worth looking at anyway) & look up the tour history of the company. Then go to a good research library and look up the reviews in the daily papers for each performance/residency by the company. Count the ones that are factually accurate (don't expect them to be informed as to the aesthtic issues involved in what Cunningham et al are about) & let me know the percentage. I'll be very very surprised if it's higher than 10-15%.

The fact that there's some coverage of the "experimental" performing arts in daily newspapers IS different than the usual case for "experimental" literary arts. But, because there's so little context for the work in the daily lives of most of the people who read these reviews, they are meaningless attempts at filling the space around the department store advertisements, and they are treated as such by most editors and writers.

If you want to bang your head against this wall, you'd better believe that it has almost nothing to do with a despicable review by Tim Page, and everything to do with the general state of culture. The situation is so globally fucked up, that to get a wild hair up your butt about a literally stupid review seems like a misplacement of effort.

The problem isn't that newspapers don't treat the avant garde with respect, it's that newspapers like the rest of the society we live in, don't treat any kind of art with respect, even the popular arts like television.

& that's a whole other letter to the editor.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

199. Herb Levy
Re: various cages - Europera 5
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Mark, have you heard Europera 5, on CD or in performance?

I've heard a LOT of John Cage's music, I've heard the Europera 5 CD by the musicians for whom the work was created, as well as a local performance of the work, & I'd be quite hesitant to spend a lot of time defending the composition. There's plenty to be said about the work, especially in light of it's structural relation to the previous works in the Europera series. Plenty to be said, but, for many people, I doubt this would include "I really want to hear that piece again." I can think of hundreds of things (including hearing/seeing a performance of Europera 1& 2) that I'd rather do than to hear another performance of Europera 5.

The work was made as a sort of small-scale performable version of the earlier incarnations of Europera: 1& 2, a major composition for extremely large forces (full orchestra, 19 singers, complex staging, lighting, etc.) in a very fully equipped theater (many opera houses aren't suited for the work, let alone more general theaters) & 3 & 4, already created for smaller performing ensembles. There's a discussion of the process of creating this piece in Musicage, the book of conversations between Joan Retallack & John Cage, that Rod has often refered to here.

In many ways, Europera 5 is a minor work, & I don't think it's all that successful. Few of Cage's compositions that use other music as source material depend so much on the recognizability of the original for their effect. Even the other Europeras as denser, allowing for the awareness of other textures & structures out of the found material. In making Europera 5 as sparse as it is, Cage was faced with the same problem that many composers who use digital samples of other music face, how to create something that is unrecognizably new, while using source material that is recognizably old. The excerpts in Europera 5 rarely overlap & are so much a part of the works from which they come that comparatively little synergy arises out of the mix. It seems like nothing so much as a poorly received radio station playing excerpts from various operas in sequence.

Does Europera 5 deserve to be brutally & ignorantly savaged in a review, probably not? Does such a review of this work deserve an all-out shrill call to arms in defense against an embattled "avant garde"? Again, probably not.

I really don't think that any stance which must defend all works under the rubric of the "avant garde" against all attacks is a useful one.

In the case of Europera 5, there are simply other fights that are more important and other fights more likely to be won.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

200. Carnography
Re: various cages
Wed 12 Jun 1996

mark wallace typed:

> intellectual slander IS a significant litmus test of whether one deserves respect.

Or rather:

Intellectual slander is the misdemeanor of critics.
Its penalty is the loss of the reader's respect.
The quickest way to regain respect: to acknowledge one's wrong and re-evaluate the object of slander.

(Provisional Ethics 1-1)

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

201. Kevin Killian
Re: Miscellaneous stuff
Wed 12 Jun 1996

At 3:22 AM 6/12/96, Ron Silliman wrote:

> Just finished Carole Maso's Ava, which makes Beckett safe for PBS (that is, to be less snide, she uses the same pallet of devices, but does so to construct a decidedly unified, even romanticized, subjective whole). It brought up for me the whole question of recycled modernism, thinking of Alice Walker's uses of Faulkner in The Color Purple or Ondaatje's

> Hemingway in The English Patient. In each instance, the techniques are used to much more conservative ends than those for which they had originally been elaborated.

Thanks Ron. Now I feel less guilty that I'm reading _House of Mirth_ right now rather than "keeping up."

x,
Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

202. Ron Silliman
Miscellaneous stuff
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Chris,

No, I did not know Poulin, but yes, he did do BOA. The obit in the Times was so cloying, it was hard to fathom (odd for a publication that prides itself in its usual critical distance). Hart published a newsletter out of his home in Marin in the mid-80s that attempted to scold all of us barbarians for failing to understand the true meaning of modernism. By comparison to the fugitives, he was a progressive, but that was always the context the work seemed to seek out. I think I've noted here before that Robert Barlow, the poet-anthropologist who was a fellow traveler with the Activist Poets, was somebody whom Olson mentions trying to seek out while in Mexico, somewhere in the Mayan Letters.

Orono folks,

For those of us (and I suspect we are many on this list) who have, as yet, to see a single word explaining what this conference there might be or be about, we hope you will provide the in-depth coverage we are growing used to here. Details, detail, details!

Summer Reading List...

Just finished Carole Maso's Ava, which makes Beckett safe for PBS (that is, to be less snide, she uses the same pallet of devices, but does so to construct a decidedly unified, even romanticized, subjective whole). It brought up for me the whole question of recycled modernism, thinking of Alice Walker's uses of Faulkner in The Color Purple or Ondaatje's Hemingway in The English Patient. In each instance, the techniques are used to much more conservative ends than those for which they had originally been elaborated.

The whole question of a poet's prose or a poet's fiction makes enormous sense to me, Wystan, from Joyce forward. I think that Primary Trouble is right on target to include Dodie Bellamy in its anthology of poetry. (Great selection too, by the way.)

Next book is Langston Hughes' The Big Sea, which I picked up in SF last month.

All best,

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

203. Daniel Bouchard
poetry reading
Wed 12 Jun 1996

JOHN ASHBERY EATS FIDDLEHEADS

You are invited
to a poetry reading
where five Boston cats* are blowing their poetry
 REAL HARD

Ange Mlinko
Damon Krukowski
Sianne Ngai
Daniel Bouchard
Chris Stroffolino

10 Oxford Street- REAR, Somerville, MASS.

Monday, June 17
8:30 PM

Nothing has been so good since Wieners retired

---

* OK, so Stroffolino is an Albany cat not a Boston cat (and soon to be a Jersey City or Brooklyn cat anyway) but such an opportunity for palimpsest rarely occurs.

On your way to Orono (or just hanging around New England?) and want to start the week off right?

Here's your opportunity to see/hear some real Boston.

Call for details: [redacted].

[redacted]

↑ Index

204. Mark Roberts
Re: adventures in paradise
Wed 12 Jun 1996

> "Adventures in Paradise" by Laurie Duggan seems like a pretty good poem to me. Here is a sample stanza:
>
> The doctor lived on the main street until
> he moved around the corner. He thought I was smart.
> My grandmother didn't like Picasso - for her
> the sole representative of "Modern Art". I wanted > to be a veterinary surgeon and fix up animals
> and live on a farm like my uncle and aunt.
>
> The poem may be a little 'smart' on the whole, but Duggan has a great light touch.
>
> Just typing,
> Jordan

Jordan

I'm just wondering where you came across Laurie? Have you ever read (or better heard Laurie perform) 'do the modernism'?

just hittin' the keys.....

_____
Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

205. Mark Roberts
Re: adventures in paradise
Wed 12 Jun 1996

> Chris, no, Duggan's poem has the pleasant slightly damaged quality of the sestina without the unfortunate insistence on those dopey end words. Whoops! my politics are showing. Here are another six lines of the poem:

> I burst a blood vessel below the brain
> and spent two months in the Alfred Hospital
> reading the complete works of Ian Fleming
> which I liked because he could make golf
> interesting. Then I read Emile Zola
> and started writing D.H. Lawrence imitations
>
> in which young men full of spirit flung > themselves down upon the earth and felt it breathe
> and everything seemed complete. I wanted > to be a rock star, then a painter,
> then a novelist, but I ended up writing poems
> late in 1966, misunderstanding T.S. Eliot.
>
> What the hell - have twelve lines! You'll note, Chris, a decided Kenneth Koch-influence on that last line. Duggan was I believe a big Scripsi conspirator, and an Otis Rusher as well. Any recent Duggan sightings?
>
> Enthusiastically,
> Jordan

I first read Laurie in MAGIC SAM a wonderful magazine put out by Ken Bolton, Anna Couani and others in the late 70s early 80s. (Ken is now editing Otis Rush). Laurie contributed a couple of poems to the first issue of my magazine (P76) - including 'do the modernism'. He remains one of my favourite poets. For a comkplete change of pace try and find a copy of THE ASH RANGE which is a verse history of the east Gippsland area of Victoria

---

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

206. Kevin Killian
Communications Decency Act
Wed 12 Jun 1996

This is Dodie Bellamy. I received the following from another list I'm subscribed to. It's not about poetics, but I thought it might be of interest.

PHILADELPHIA (Reuter) -- In a ground-breaking decision on free-speech rights over the Internet, a special U.S court panel blocked as unconstitutional a new federal law prohibiting indecency on computer networks.

The three-judge panel issued Wednesday a preliminarly injunction blocking enforcement of portions of the Communications Decency Act, signed by President Clinton Feb. 8, which prohibit the distribution to minors of indecent or "patently offensive" materials over computer networks.

The court let stand prohibitions against obscenity and child pornography, types of speech that are not constitutionally protected and were not challenged by the act's opponents.

"The Internet may fairly be regarded as a never-ending worldwide conversation," U.S. District Judge Stewart Dalzell, a member of the panel, said in his opinion accompanying the decision.

"The government may not, through the CDA, interrupt that conversation. As the most participatory form of mass speech yet developed, the Internet deserves the highest protection from governmental intrusion," he said.

Also on the panel were U.S. District Court Judge Ronald Buckwalter and Dolores Sloviter, chief justice of the Third Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.

In its legal conclusion, the court said the blocked portions of the act were unconstitutional on their face.

The injunction was issued in response to a lawsuit against the U.S. Justice Department challenging the act. The challenge was filed by the American Civil Liberties Union and groups representing libraries, publishers and the computer online industry.

A Justice Department spokesman said the agency had no immediate comment on the ruling.

The ruling sets the stage either for a trial on whether the act should be permanently blocked, or a direct appeal of the preliminary injunction to the U.S. Supreme Court under expedited provisions written into it.

"The court has reaffirmed what our founders 200 years ago bequeathed as our greatest liberty, and that's free speech," said Stefan Presser, legal director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, which filed the original suit.

Bruce Taylor, chief counsel for the National Law Center for Children and Families, which supports the act, said of the ruling, "I don't consider this a setback."

The act has already heightened awareness of content unsuitable for minors on the Internet, and prompted development of technology that will make it possible to screen and block material for suitability for minors, he said.

Such technology will undermine arguments by the act's opponents that it is impossible to enforce, he said.

In addition, he said, state laws already on the books can also be used. "The states can do what this ruling said the federal government can't do yet," he said.

The ACLU immediately posted the court's opinion and order, which total 177 pages, on its World Wide Web site, said Christopher Hansen, attorney for the national ACLU. The address of the site is http://www.aclu.org.

In the event of a government appeal, Hansen said, "We'll certainly defend the conclusion vigorously."

↑ Index

207. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: summary reading
Wed 12 Jun 1996

OOOPS! I'm actually getting to Maine Tues. night, as my panel is the next day -- will also be in gang reading Friday night -- maybe we should all wear colors!

and today's reading:

Juan Felipe Herrera -- _The Roots of a Thousand Embraces_ Manic D Press

available from SPD -- it's great --

↑ Index

208. Chris Stroffolino
Re: what matter who's speaking
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Hey Rod--- Is BRECHT part of the B-effect? It would seem that Bernstein in this schema would be more a CHARLES (more C than B) in terms of darkness, while Perelman would be more a BOB (B)--I've been thinking about the BECKETT connection with AKA (who brought that up?). It seems that AKA is less, er, "stream of consciousness" though than more Bruce Andrews-like in the way it reads. By Andrews like I mean, the emphasis is on the sentence (not emotional) rather than paragraph. Beckett's emphasis seems more on the accumulative rush effect. (again, i'm speaking primarily of the trilogy era Beckett... and I haven't read AKA in years....so I think I know what I'm going to read today.....cs

↑ Index

209. Charles Alexander
readings/twin cities
Wed 12 Jun 1996

A POETRY & MULTIMEDIA READING BY SPENCER SELBY & ERIK BELGUM

sponsored by Cross-Cultural Poetics and the College of St. Catherine-Minneapolis

SATURDAY, JUNE 15
ROOM 250
COLLEGE OF
ST. CATHERINE MINNEAPOLIS
1:00 p.m.

SPENCER SELBY Spencer Selby's books of poetry include Instar (SINK Press, 1989), Barricade (Paradigm Press, 1990), House of Before (Potes & Poets Press, 1991), Sound Off (Detour Press, 1993), and No Island (Drogue Press, 1995). His visual poetry includes Stigma (Score, 1990), and Malleable Cast (Generator, 1995). In the middle 1980's Spencer Selby began SINK Press in San Francisco, where he still resides, and he coordinated the Canessa Park Reading Series from 1987 - 1993. In 1993 Selby created The List of Experimental Poetry/Art Magazines, a noncopyrighted, freely circulating document that tracks over 250 publications around the world.

ERIK BELGUM Erik Belgum's experimental fiction has appeared in over two dozen journals since 1985. Most recently he has been seen in literary journals such as Avec, Chicago Review, Red Bass, Central Park, Black Ice, and Caliban. His fiction will appear this year in an anthology of experimental fiction from the publishers of Avec, as well as in upcoming issues of Central Park and Asylum Annual. In his Dictionary of the Avant-Gardes (1993), Richard Kostelanetz called Belgum one of "the best of the younger writers of fiction, let alone experimental fiction." Belgum's literary/audio/soundtext works have been played throughout the United States, in concert, on radio, and also recently on the CD audio magazine Aerial. Recent commissions include spoken word pieces commissioned by the Dale Warland Singers through a Jerome Foundation grant and another by Corn Palace Productions performed at the Southern Theater in Minneapolis.

This reading is FREE and is held at the College of St.
Catherine-Minneapolis, 601 25th Avenue South (two blocks north of the 25th Avenue/Riverside intersection).

Next Reading sponsored by Cross-Cultural Poetics:
June 29, 1:00 pm, Room 250, College of St. Catherine-Minneapolis

DAN FEATHERSTON
&
CHARLES ALEXANDER

For further information about Cross-Cultural Poetics readings and publications, please contact Mark Nowak at [redacted]. Or e-mail him at [redacted]

I hope anyone on the poetics list visiting or living near here will come. I'll post more before the June 29th reading.

charles alexander
chax press
[redacted]

↑ Index

210. Jonathan A Levin
clamdiggers (fwd)
Wed 12 Jun 1996

This one's from Marisa Januzzi, whose machine apparently needs to be fed. JL.

---------- Forwarded message ----------

It's Maine, so we're supposed to wear clam diggers, right Kevin? (Dodie-- can I answer the post in person!?) If I ever finish my grades I will be in Orono too, Kerouac paper, time recently unsettled & rescheduled for undetermined reasons.

(Anyone looking for summer reading-- MEXICO CITY BLUES, SUBTERRANEANS, TRISTESSA, OLD ANGEL MIDNIGHT, and VSIONS OF GERARD... are all truly great, and this from someone who once couldn't read Kerouac for sexism...)

Maybe we should designate a poetics reef & then all go meet on it?

Re: LeSueur-- some of her stuff is available through SPD, including the pamphlets (just got "Women on the Breadlines"). I'd love to hear more about her being alive.

Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected &where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)

Also, has anyone else read Emily Holms Coleman (esp. THE SHUTTER OF SNOW)?

Ciao, & drowning in work, and on notice that my server is down after 10AM tomorrow until Orono..... bleh!

--Marisa Januzzi

↑ Index

211. Jonathan Brannen
Standing Stones Press Special Offer
Wed 12 Jun 1996

SPECIAL OFFER TO POETICS SUBSCRIBER

Standing Stones Press Publications

Tom Ahern, _Skippy Taggart's Wife_
Curt Anderson, _Umbra_
Dennis Barone, _The Masque Resumed_
Jonathan Brannen, _Crunching Numbers_
Gerald Burns, _Probability and Fuzzy Dice_
Cydney Chadwick, _The Gift Horse's Mouth_ o.p.
Mark DuCharme, _Contractng Scale-
Peter Ganick, _IT OR S/HE_
Geof Huth, _To a Small Stream of Water (or Ditch)_
H.T. (Heather Thomas), _Circus Freex_
Stephen-Paul Martin, _Crisis of Representation_
Michelle Murphy, _The Tongue in its Shelf_
Sheila E. Murphy, _Wind Topography_
John Perlman, _Anacoustic_
Susan M. Schultz, _Earthquake Dreams_
Mark Wallace, _In Case of Damage to Life, Limb or
This Elevator_ (forthcoming, June 1996)

All publications are $4.00 or any four for $12.00
(postage included except on foreign orders).

Also available from Standing Stones:
Jonathan Brannen, Thing Is The Anagram Of Night (Texture Press, 1996), $6.00
nothing doing never again (Score Press, 1996), $8.00

SPECIAL OFFER TO POETICS SUBSCRIBERS: $3.00 each or FOUR FOR $10.00 !!! Thing Is The Anagram Of Night (Texture Press, 1996), $4.00 and nothing doing never again (Score Press, 1996), $5.00.

Plus a free copy of Gerald Burns Probability and Fuzzy Dice (upon request and while supplies last) with any order !!! Offer good until July 15, 1996. Very limited quanities of some titles.

Order from [redacted]
(I'll include the bill when I ship the order) or from:

Standing Stones Press
7 Circle Pines
Morris, MN 56267

↑ Index

212. Jordan Davis
against summer reading
Wed 12 Jun 1996

I am leaning to the left against my summer reading:
a very large (1000 pages?) blank book, extraordinarily popular delusions, The Life of Johnson, etc, and what good poems it's making me flee to read--Frank O'Hara's poem up in the subway, contrarian and personist in the best of spirits, Karen Volkman's national poetry series book _Crash's Law_
the presense of which can only mean that Juliana Spahr's NPS book is preparing to knock New York City over like the cardboard diorama
we know it is, oh and god! Laura Moriarty's book _Symmetry_ thank you Rod! for sending it -
I've never seen anybody get knocked out the way
it happens all the time on tv, how does anybody
get any reading done when they own a tv,
someone like Melanie Neilson makes a poem
and the credit card offers, are they nefarious?
Do you find out about yourself when you consume
the endless electrons? It's something you can turn on, the Baudelaire of you, but when you find out the 'off' switch is symbolic at best,
a surrealist at most, a batter in a cage,
is she bored? Not Melanie but the manic imperative, the one up
the street we'll have to go visit when they get here, deferring to the expert light
of some characters we know, Ringo, Paul, John,
Morton, etc. That ought to be something exciting.

↑ Index

213. Ken Edwards

post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes

Wed 12 Jun 1996

Ira Lightman wrote:
Ken, could you detail a few of the poets
here, as you say, who engage intelligently with langpo, which books or poems?

(ie in the UK)

Well, first among them I would place Allen Fisher. He and I have had numerous conversations about langpo type poets since, I think, the early 1980s, and I'm indebted to him and to his vast book collection in this respect.

Cris Cheek (hi Cris!) has had strong transatlantic links for many years, including with langpo.

Tom Raworth is notoriously US- and langpo-friendly -- one of the most open and generous souls around. Maybe one of the few Brits who has actually influenced the langpo scene at source.

Wendy Mulford has corresponded for many years with the grouping of poets around Kathleen Fraser and Susan Gevirtz's How(ever) and is well acquainted with, particularly, the women in the langpo camp and around it.

Maggie O'Sullivan has collaborated on a book with Bruce Andrews and reads avidly in and out of langpo as far as I know. I'm particularly grateful to her for introducing me to the work of current Canadian "experimental" women poets.

A number of the poets associated with the London SubVoicive/Writers Forum crowd are knowledgeable about it. Among these I'd mention Adrian Clarke and Robert Sheppard, who edited the Potes & Poets anthology of London poets "Floating Capital" -- also Johan de Wit, Ulli Freer, Lawrence Upton, and of course Bob Cobbing, also one of the least prejudiced guys around, who published that Maggie/Bruce collaboration.

Peter Middleton is clearly keen on that stuff. So is Miles Champion, I'd say.

Finally Robert Hampson and I were probably the first to publish some of the Americans, even before they were labelled "language", back in the 1970s. Lyn Hejinian, Alan Davies and James Sherry made appearances in our long-dead magazine Alembic.

Sorry to go on. Of course, this list isn't exhaustive. As for "which books or poems", well I wouldn't presume to trace influences that closely -- you'll have to decide.

↑ Index

214. Chris Stroffolino
Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Well--someone told me one should pack a lot of BUG SPRAY for MAINE...
so I might hit someone up for this.
Didn't Emerson say something like
"If one goes for a walk in the woods, one must feed mosquitos"
(which I translate as):
"if one goes for a walk in a city, one must feed quarters to payphones"----cs

↑ Index

215. Herb Levy
Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
Wed 12 Jun 1996

> Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected &where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)

Some large assemblage of Ark (perhaps all of it) is due imminently from University of New Mexico Press. The cook books are great.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

216. Chris Stroffolino
Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Dear ken Edwards--- Could you elaborate on Miles Champion. The little I've seen is interesting and it was good to see your willingness to include him, while Ira, I think, seemed less to.....cs

↑ Index

217. Charles Alexander
Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
Wed 12 Jun 1996

> Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected &where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)

I notice in the new Small Press Distribution Catalog that Gus Blaisdell's Living Batch Press in Albuquerque has brought out the whole (I believe) of Ronald Johnson's ARK. So contact SPD at 1814 San Pablo Ave., Berkeley, CA 94702. And on that SPD catalog check out the drawings of writers on the cover, done by Gary Sullivan. High groove factor, as Gary might say himself.

Ronald Johnson's first southwestern cookbook is a classic. I know that there is a more recent edition of that, and others, but I don't know about them.

↑ Index

218. Charles Alexander
Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
Wed 12 Jun 1996

> Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected &where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)
>
> Some large assemblage of Ark (perhaps all of it) is due imminently from University of New Mexico Press. The cook books are great.

apologies for repeating myself, but I wanted to make it clear. It's not the University of New Mexico Press, it's a new press, LIVING BATCH BOOKS (many of you I am sure know the long-lived Living Batch Bookstore in Albuquerque), run by Gus Blaisdell, which has, according to the announcement in the Small Press Distribution Spring 1996 catalog which just arrived, "just published one of the extraordinary long poems of the past quarter-century in Ronald Johnson's ARK. Early versions of Johnson's great, elegant long poem are all out-of-print. This new book presents the full poem for the first time, a true heir to Louis Zukofsky's "A," Basil Bunting's BRIGGFLATTS, George oppen's and Lorine Niedecker's longer series, and Robert Duncan's PASSAGES and STRUCTURE OF RIME, but with a music and architecture unique in American poetry."

And more complete SPD ordering info:

1814 San Pablo Avenue
Berkeley, CA 94702-1624

tel. [redacted]
fax [redacted]

↑ Index

219. Herb Levy
(no subject)
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Charles,

I'm sure you're right.

The SPD catalog hasn't shown up here yet & when I checked locally after seeing a reference to Ark somewhere (?), the book store came up with it as being from UofNM Pr.

In any case, I'm glad I don't have to wait much longer to read it all.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

220. Romana Christina Huk
Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives
Wed 12 Jun 1996

For those who wish to attend _Assembling Alternatives: An International Poetry Conference/Festival_ (29 Aug.- 2 Sept.) but can't afford the price of accommodation and/or meals, new options have been created that allow for use of a local campsite or, for a more limited number, guest housing with faculty and students in the area. Those who intend to camp and not take meals with the group will only pay $15.00 per day ($60.00 for the whole event); this includes transportation to and from the conference site, and coffee/tea-breaks during the days, but does not include the costs required by the campsite itself. They have given us rates at approx. $18.00 per night per "couple" in a tent (it pays to double-up with someone); the rental of any equipment needed is up to campers. Further details can be retrieved by calling the campsite directly; do so by asking about the "safari site"(!) reserved by Romana Huk at UNH for the poetry conference/festival on the above dates: Lamprey River Campground, 16 Campground Road, LEE, NH 03824; tel.: [redacted]. The grounds have full Facilities (toilets, showers). Tents, however, are hard to find for rent in this area, but Eastern Mountain Sports in the local Fox Run Mall ([redacted]) reports to have enough tents for approx. 30 people camping in sets of two and three; they go for between $25.00 and $30.00 for the full stint. To reserve any of these you must act _soon_.

Those who intend to pay the full $270.00 commuter fee for taking all meals with the group for these 5 days and 4 nights will be up first for placement in people's homes (in order to help reduce their overall costs and relieve our volunteer hosts' anxieties about feeding, etc.).

Anyone interested in either new option must still go through the University Conferences Office to secure a seat at the conference itself (which is very important given our limited space): Univ. Conferences Office, Univ. of NH, 11 Brook Way, Room 121, Durham, NH 03824-3509; tel.: [redacted]; fax: [redacted]. If you wish to pay the commuter fee to take all meals with the group, you will need a registration form from the Office. Those who hope to be placed in guest housing must contact myself, Romana Huk, conference organizer, as soon as possible; I can be reached before 27 June either at this e-mail address or at UNH ([redacted]). After that I leave for six weeks in England, cut off from e-mail, I think (though I'll keep you posted). I can be reached either through the Conferences Office (who can in a pinch fax or call me) or, after the 1st of July, I can be contacted by phoning Gonville & Caius (pronounced "Keyes") College, Cambridge, England (44 1223 332400) and leaving your phone number in a message for me to call you.

The conference/festival is developing beautifully despite funding woes on all our parts. Its schedule begins at 2:00 with registration on the 29th of August;at that time the book exhibit/sales area will be getting set up, and the Great Bay Room (our largest) will, I hope, be hung and otherwise transformed by artworks made in response to these poetries, if we can get artists and the New England Center staff to agree on what can be done to the walls. At 5:00 an informal reception will lead into dinner at 6:00, after which we'll have our first night of performances in the Great Bay Room. I'll be finalizing the readings in the next several days; several of the most well-known will be on that night so it's not one to be missed. The readings will be free and open to the public.

Remember that although our focus is the U.S., U.K., Canada and Ireland, other poetries will be represented and become part of the conversation.

Among those thus far scheduled to give talks or performances are (and this can't be a full list, so I'm about to choose randomly): Charles Bernstein, Karen Mac Cormack, Sean O'hUigin, Tom Raworth, Carla Harryman, Nicole Brossard, Maurice Scully, Allen Fisher, Rae Armantrout, Steve McCaffery, Maggie O'Sullivan, Denise Riley, Joan Retallack, Peter Quartermain, Marjorie Perloff, Peter Middleton, Bob Perelman, Juliana Spahr, Jeff Derksen, Peter Gizzi, Miles Champion, Caroline Bergvall, cris cheek, Catherine Walsh, Steve Evans, Miriam Nichols, Alan Golding, Trevor Joyce, Kathleen Fraser, Rod Mengham, Barrett Watten, Abigail Child, Paul Dutton, Lee Ann Brown, Ken Edwards, John Cayley, Jim Rosenberg, Steve Benson, Wendy Mulford, Leslie Scalapino, Robert Sheppard, Fiona Templeton, Loss Glazier, Louis Cabri, Andrew Levy, Philip Mead, John Kinsella, Barbara Godard, David Bromige, Hazel Smith, Susan Schultz, John Wilkinson, Mary Margaret Sloan, Nicholas Zurbrugg, Billy Mills, Linda Kinnahan, Lynn Keller, Geoffrey Squires, Keith Tuma, Shamoon Zamir, Brian Lynch, Christian Bok, Charles Altieri, David Annwn, Tony Lopez, Donald Wesling, Burton Hatlen, and more.

In general outline, the conversation begins on Friday with discussion of differing contexts and relationships of these poetries to institutions in those contexts. On Saturday issues of poetic politics and imaginings of the subject arise, as well as the relationship between these poetries and their respective "mainstreams";

key problems of gendered and racial difference arise as well. On Sunday new forms of electronic and performance work enter in, and on Monday, our last day, almost all of it comes back in talk about where we stand at the "millennium" (or don't). On Sunday night we take a break from UNH's confines to have our dinner and readings in Portsmouth, the area's cultural center on the water. This will of course happen as part of the full conference fee paid by those taking meals with the group; transportation will be provided for all, even those not eating with the rest.

I hope that's enough information at the moment for those interested. I'm terribly sorry to have to take off for six weeks: but again, after the 27th you should be able to either fetch the details you need from the Conferences Office or reach me overseas. My address there, if you don't want to phone, will be : Romana Huk, Director, UNH Summer Program, Gonville & Caius College, Cambridge CB2 1TA, England. It takes about a week for letters to make it over. Remember to include your phone number in correspondence.

And spread the news about the book exhibit! All presses are welcome to contribute.

Wishing good summers to all of you,

Romana Huk

↑ Index

221. Rod Smith
Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
Wed 12 Jun 1996

Johnson's Ark's out just this week-- it's paperback, $25.00. It's not published by New Mexico, but distributed by them.

Rod

↑ Index

222. Kevin Killian
SPT--oportunity knocks
Thu 13 Jun 1996

This is Dodie Bellamy.

I'm putting together Small Press Traffic's reading series for the coming year, and I am open to suggestions.

I'm planning to continue our Small Press Partners reading series in which we feature readers from targeted small presses. As part of this series books from featured presses are reviewed in _Traffic_, the SPT newsletter. The next issue of _Traffic_, which will be out in August, will feature reviews of O-Books, Kelsey St., and Hard Press books. We are particularly interested in small presses which have published writing by minority writers working in nontraditional forms. Any presses interested in being considered for this series should contact me.

Now that SPT is more firmly settled at New College, I want to return to SPT's long-time (22 year) committment to promoting emerging writers. I, for one, gave my first reading at Small Press Traffic. I'm considering an Introductions reading series in which we pair a more established writer with an up-and-coming writer. Also, I'm planning to re-establish our more intimate Poetry and Prose series, which will serve two purposes: (1) to provide readings for "younger" writers (younger not necessarily referring to age) and (2) to provide a space for arranging more last-minute readings for writers who happen to be coming to San Francisco. A number of writers from out of the area contacted Kevin and me this past year, wanting readings, and, we usually set them up with readings at other locations. Now we will be able to offer them readings at New College as well.

So, any writers planning trips to the West Coast this coming year, and who are interested in a reading while you're here, backchannel me or call SPT: 415/ [redacted].

Thanks.

Dodie

↑ Index

223. Tom Mandel
reading / listening to music
Thu 13 Jun 1996

Has anyone read the Austrian writer Thomas Bernhard?
He's pretty great; I keep seeing his books on remainder tables in english editions that must have their last resort in nw dc.

he is a great writer, really; a destructive constructivist. In his will he forbade any further works of his to be published or printed in Austria or that his estate accept any prizes or honors therefrom -- those who know me will know that to be good enough for me!

Music: I suppose everyone on this list knows the work of john zorn, but I've been listening to his series of CDs with his band, Masada, and they are great. esp. Gimel.

Pierre Joris's list of mostly european music was a gift from this list. In return, let me ask whether -- assuming to head one's ears in a different direction from Cage for a moment -- anyone knows the music of Bohuslav Martinu? Or the recently revived music of Erwin Schulhoff?

I'm preaching to the choir? Let me continue by assuming out loud that many among you know the opera "The Cunning Little Vixen" by Janacek?

The Schubert piano trios? Totally great is Kurtag's "Hommage a R. Sch." (Robert Schumann) collected with some other wonderful chamber pieces of his and of Schumann on ECM 78118-21508-2 (why does it take so many numbers?).

Also Ulstvoldskaya's complete piano sonatas played by Frank Denyer on Conifer 75605 51262 2

Music for clarinet by poulenc or buddy defranco is good too.

Tom Mandel

****
Tom Mandel * 2927 Tilden St. NW
Washington DC 20008 * [redacted]
vox: [redacted] * fax [redacted]
****

↑ Index

224. cris cheek

Re: Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives

Thu 13 Jun 1996

Hi Romana, well this sounds like the option I'm dying for.

Can I pay for the food, therefore eat with everyone and get into the guest housing please?

If you can take me onto that it would help a great deal.

If it's a yes, do I still need to register, being one of your advertised delegates? Do I need to call them. Sorry, but as an indieer-outsider it's a touch confusing. Not your information, but our responsibilities.

Did you get my posts? WOuld you rather I talked about the range e-poetry work? Got the feeling it wasn't what you wanted (although I'b be likely to use slides / computer voice ala Hawking in my intervention) tant pis.

Really looking forward to seeing you.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

225. Stephen Barker

Re: POETICS Digest - 11 Jun 1996 to 12 Jun 1996

Thu 13 Jun 1996

Please de-subscribe me from the list. Nothing personal, just too much. SB

At 12:00 AM 6/13/96 -0400, you wrote:
>There are 26 messages totalling 1015 lines in this issue.
>
>Topics of the day:
>
> 1. what matter who's speaking (6)
> 2. various cages - newspaper reviews
> 3. various cages - Europera 5
> 4. various cages
> 5. Miscellaneous stuff (2)
> 6. poetry reading
> 7. summary reading
> 8. against summer reading
> 9. readings/twin cities
> 10. clamdiggers (fwd) (5)
> 11. Standing Stones Press Special Offer
> 12. post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes (2)
> 13. Communications Decency Act
> 14. <No subject given>
> 15. Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 00:00:32 -0400
>From: Rod Smith <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: what matter who's speaking
>
>Tim wrote--
>>Cage's work is much more detached: there was little/no content to worry >>about. With Beckett, there was always some amount of content, and pretty >>damn depressing (& exciting...) content at that. At the same time, I >>wonder if the lack of content isn't ultimately more depressing.
>
>Don't know what you mean by lacking content. How cld it be? Do you mean >narrative? Also don't understand "playing in lack of selfhood." How cld it >be? or not be?

>
>Rod
>
>------------------------------
>
>Date: Tue, 11 Jun 1996 23:45:51 +0000
>From: Joseph Zitt <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: what matter who's speaking
>
>On 11 Jun 96 at 22:50, Tim wood wrote:
>
>> Cage's work is much more detached: there was little/no content to worry >> about. With Beckett, there was always some amount of content, and pretty >> damn depressing (& exciting...) content at that. At the same time, I >> wonder if the lack of content isn't ultimately more depressing.
>
>Well, not for me. I love Beckett (have several settings of Beckett >texts for voice and whatever sitting in drawers somewhere), but I >don't find the "detached" Cage depressing at all. But then, I've >never been much of a content fan (I get this image of the content >hitting the...), and I find a lot of Beckett quite funny.
>
>(I get this goofy image of someone a hundred years down the line >doing a paper viewing the Thoreau-based pieces that you and I are >writing for Question Authority, The in the light of our respective >views of Beckett and Cage... Maybe we gotta work Satie in somehow.)
>---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1----------
>|||/ Joseph Zitt ==== [redacted] ===== Human Systems \|||
>||/ Organizer, SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \||
>|/<A HREF="http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt/">Joe Zitt's Home Page</A>\|
>
>------------------------------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 17:16:52 GMT+1200
>From: wystan <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: what matter who's speaking
>
>Dear Rod,
> Good posts. Your mention of Johns reminds me of the >Beckett/Johns collaboration: FOIRADES/FIZZLES. Johns who is clearly >creatively comfortable with both Cage and Beckett, can serves as a >useful bridge figure here. Since for all three what content is is a >question, it is not useful to compare them on the basis of how much any >one of them has of it. Although, it is useful to see how putting the >question is different depending on the art form in which it is put.

>And pessimism/optimism aside, the main thing is that putting content in >question is a means of restoring the authority of the creative.
>... leastways it did that for me.
> Wystan
>
>----------
>
>Date: Tue, 11 Jun 1996 23:38:25 -0700
>From: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: what matter who's speaking
>
>I don't know of any direct connection between Cage's use of silence/nothing >& Beckett's, but there is a direct connection between Beckett & Morton >Feldman, who has earlier come up in connection with Cage.
>
>One of Beckett's last texts was "Neither" written specifically for >Feldman's opera of the same name & in gratitutde for this text, one of >Feldman's later pieces, for chamber orchestra, was dedicated, and titled,
>"For Samuel Beckett."
>
>>Regarding what people are reading, I've been going through Beckett's trilogy >>(Molloy, Malone Dies (I'm on this), and The Unnameable), and I was >>curious to see what sort of a legacy people think that Beckett's had upon >>contemporary writing. Particularly, I was struck by the way that "silence" and >>"nothing" are such central terms at about the same time for Cage and >>Beckett, but Cage seems to have mattered a lot more for querzblatian >>types--am I wrong? If not, is the reason something like, they both >>intuited the impossibility of big-S Selfhood, but what was an opportunity >>for Cage was an intolerable threat for Beckett, and so he seems >>rear-guard? Or were they talking about totally different things under the >>same names?
>>It's fascinating to me how liminal Beckett seems--both totally >>constructed and always seemingly on the verge of disintegration. But >>does the construction belie the desperation? Or vice versa?
>>
>>Thanks,

>>John
>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 02:39:04 -0400
>From: Charles Smith <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: what matter who's speaking
>
>as to: "I was >curious to see what sort of a legacy people think that Beckett's had upon >contemporary writing. "
>
>For one, it's hard for me to imagine the writing of Clark Coolidge without >the example & explorations of Beckett.
>
>Charles Smith
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 00:24:50 -0700
>From: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: various cages - newspaper reviews
>
>I have a lot of different things to say in response to the ongoing >discussion of Cage here. I've split my comments on the Cage discussion >into several parts, cause this one got to be pretty long. It's about the >value of newspaper reviews.
>
>The following is based not only on my own twelve years producing and >presenting concerts of post-Cageian (wait, I think there were two concerts >which included works by Cage, so they weren't all literally post-Cageian) >new music, but also on my serving as board member of the now defunct New >Music America festival for six or seven years & on my reading of the press >kits of countless composers and performers of new music, dance, etc. as >well.
>
>Also this applies most particularly to the situation in the United States, >but in my limited experience it doesn;t seem to be too different in much of >the developed world.

>
>Clearly the content, tone, etc. of Page's review were abominable, but it >was a review in a daily paper. It isn't an academic or artistic critique >of Cage, it's a newspaper review & the rules are very, very different.
>Newspaper reviews don't really mean anything, it's simply not worth the >trouble to take them seriously.
>
>I don't think that experimental writers are used to dealing with newspaper >reviews very often, so I guess I can understand wanting to treat it as >serious criticism, but it's simply absurd to do so. Newspapers don't carry >arts criticism, they have entertainment reviews. If the fact that >sometimes these reviews of entertainment are about events that you consider >art confuses you, this is your problem & not the problem of the newspaper.
>
>
>No one (except the uncle who lives in the town in which you are unlikely >enough to be reviewed & he just wants to know why you aren't calling your >parents more often anyway) remembers newspaper reviews, they are strictly >filler that is only useful to the artist if the information about any >future events, recordings or publiations is accurate.
>
>Particularly (but not exclusively) when they are about "avant garde" work, >EVEN when the review is positive, a newspaper review is almost always just >as full of errors of fact as when the review is negative. In virtually all >instances where a review is not incorrect, it has been cribbed from the >press release & does not reflect the thinking of the reviewer.
>
>People who write reviews of the performing arts for newspapers, many of >whom are great people and good writers, are almost never specialists in >"experimental" work. Even in the rare cases in which they are familiar >with this kind of art, they were hired to write about mainstream movies or >classical music or best sellers. So you frequently read reviews of jazz >concerts by someone who knows about painting, reviews of paintings by >former sports writers, reviews of theater by someone who knows about >classical music, etc.
>
>That's the way it is in the newspaper world. The idea is that anyone who >is a journalist can write about anything, because they are trained to cover >the five W's before the deadline.
>
>Also, in this climate, writers who are supportive of unusual kinds of >events are often seen as partisan, and in the wonderful world of >journalistic ethics, that often means that they are not objective enough to >review something.

>
>Anyway, editors will rarely assign reviews of "experimental" work unless >the performance is running for more than one night (as a kind of consumer >report for those who might want to go after the opening night) & the editor >usually assumes (usually correctly) that most of the "regular" people who >read his paper would think that this event was a pile of crap, anyway.
>
>&, even if an experimental event is running for more than one night, an >editor will usually only assign a review of work like this if 1) it is >being presented by an organization he cannot otherwise ignore, 2) if there >are no other arts events that week for a salaried reporter to cover or, 3) >there was a preview of the event in a competing paper that he can't ignore.
>
>
>Is this depressing enough yet?
>
>I don't know of an equivalent resource for Cage, so let me suggest that >someone go to the Merce Cunningham Dance Company Web site >(<http://www.merce.org/> it's worth looking at anyway) & look up the tour >history of the company. Then go to a good research library and look up the >reviews in the daily papers for each performance/residency by the company.
>Count the ones that are factually accurate (don't expect them to be >informed as to the aesthtic issues involved in what Cunningham et al are >about) & let me know the percentage. I'll be very very surprised if it's >higher than 10-15%.
>
>The fact that there's some coverage of the "experimental" performing arts >in daily newspapers IS different than the usual case for "experimental" >literary arts. But, because there's so little context for the work in the >daily lives of most of the people who read these reviews, they are >meaningless attempts at filling the space around the department store >advertisements, and they are treated as such by most editors and writers.
>
>If you want to bang your head against this wall, you'd better believe that >it has almost nothing to do with a despicable review by Tim Page, and >everything to do with the general state of culture. The situation is so >globally fucked up, that to get a wild hair up your butt about a literally >stupid review seems like a misplacement of effort.
>

>The problem isn't that newspapers don't treat the avant garde with respect, >it's that newspapers like the rest of the society we live in, don't treat >any kind of art with respect, even the popular arts like television.
>
>& that's a whole other letter to the editor.
>
>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 00:25:33 -0700
>From: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: various cages - Europera 5
>
>Mark, have you heard Europera 5, on CD or in performance?
>
>I've heard a LOT of John Cage's music, I've heard the Europera 5 CD by the >musicians for whom the work was created, as well as a local performance of >the work, & I'd be quite hesitant to spend a lot of time defending the >composition. There's plenty to be said about the work, especially in light >of it's structural relation to the previous works in the Europera series.
>Plenty to be said, but, for many people, I doubt this would include "I >really want to hear that piece again." I can think of hundreds of things >(including hearing/seeing a performance of Europera 1& 2) that I'd rather >do than to hear another performance of Europera 5.
>
>The work was made as a sort of small-scale performable version of the >earlier incarnations of Europera: 1& 2, a major composition for extremely >large forces (full orchestra, 19 singers, complex staging, lighting, etc.)
>in a very fully equipped theater (many opera houses aren't suited for the >work, let alone more general theaters) & 3 & 4, already created for smaller >performing ensembles. There's a discussion of the process of creating this >piece in Musicage, the book of conversations between Joan Retallack & John >Cage, that Rod has often refered to here.
>
>In many ways, Europera 5 is a minor work, & I don't think it's all that >successful. Few of Cage's compositions that use other music as source >material depend so much on the recognizability of the original for their >effect. Even the other Europeras as denser, allowing for the awareness of >other textures & structures out of the found material. In making Europera >5 as sparse as it is, Cage was faced with the same problem that many >composers who use digital samples of other music face, how to create >something that is unrecognizably new, while using source material that is >recognizably old. The excerpts in Europera 5 rarely overlap & are so much >a part of the works from which they come that comparatively little synergy >arises out of the mix. It seems like nothing so much as a poorly received >radio station playing excerpts from various operas in sequence.

>
>Does Europera 5 deserve to be brutally & ignorantly savaged in a review, >probably not? Does such a review of this work deserve an all-out shrill >call to arms in defense against an embattled "avant garde"? Again, >probably not.
>
>I really don't think that any stance which must defend all works under the >rubric of the "avant garde" against all attacks is a useful one.
>
>In the case of Europera 5, there are simply other fights that are more >important and other fights more likely to be won.
>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 04:10:33 -0400
>From: Carnography <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: various cages
>
>mark wallace typed:
>
>>intellectual slander IS a significant litmus test of whether one >>deserves respect.
>
>Or rather:
>
>Intellectual slander is the misdemeanor of critics.
>Its penalty is the loss of the reader's respect.
>The quickest way to regain respect: to acknowledge >one's wrong and re-evaluate the object of slander.
>

>(Provisional Ethics 1-1)
>
>http://www.interport.net/~scrypt
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 03:22:07 -0700
>From: Ron Silliman <[redacted]>
>Subject: Miscellaneous stuff
>
>Chris,
>
>No, I did not know Poulin, but yes, he did do BOA. The obit in the >Times was so cloying, it was hard to fathom (odd for a publication that >prides itself in its usual critical distance). Hart published a >newsletter out of his home in Marin in the mid-80s that attempted to >scold all of us barbarians for failing to understand the true meaning >of modernism. By comparison to the fugitives, he was a progressive, but >that was always the context the work seemed to seek out. I think I've >noted here before that Robert Barlow, the poet-anthropologist who was a >fellow traveler with the Activist Poets, was somebody whom Olson >mentions trying to seek out while in Mexico, somewhere in the Mayan >Letters.
>
>Orono folks,
>
>For those of us (and I suspect we are many on this list) who have, as >yet, to see a single word explaining what this conference there might >be or be about, we hope you will provide the in-depth coverage we are >growing used to here. Details, detail, details!
>
>
>Summer Reading List...
>
>Just finished Carole Maso's Ava, which makes Beckett safe for PBS (that >is, to be less snide, she uses the same pallet of devices, but does so
>to construct a decidedly unified, even romanticized, subjective whole).
>It brought up for me the whole question of recycled modernism, thinking >of Alice Walker's uses of Faulkner in The Color Purple or Ondaatje's >Hemingway in The English Patient. In each instance, the techniques are >used to much more conservative ends than those for which they had >originally been elaborated.

>
>The whole question of a poet's prose or a poet's fiction makes enormous >sense to me, Wystan, from Joyce forward. I think that Primary Trouble >is right on target to include Dodie Bellamy in its anthology of poetry.
>(Great selection too, by the way.)
>
>Next book is Langston Hughes' The Big Sea, which I picked up in SF last >month.
>
>All best,
>
>Ron Silliman
>[redacted]
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 09:02:18 EDT
>From: Daniel Bouchard <[redacted]>
>Subject: poetry reading
>
>JOHN ASHBERY EATS FIDDLEHEADS
>
>You are invited
>to a poetry reading
>where five Boston cats* are blowing their poetry
> REAL HARD
>
>Ange Mlinko
>Damon Krukowski
>Sianne Ngai
>Daniel Bouchard
>Chris Stroffolino
>
>10 Oxford Street- REAR, Somerville, MASS.
>
>Monday, June 17
>8:30 PM
>
>Nothing has been so good >since Wieners retired
>_____
>

>* OK, so Stroffolino is an Albany cat not a Boston cat (and soon to be a Jersey >City or Brooklyn cat anyway) but such an opportunity for palimpsest rarely >occurs.
>
>On your way to Orono (or just hanging around New England?) and want to start
>the week off right?
>
>Here's your opportunity to see/hear some real Boston.
>
>Call for details: [redacted].
>
>
>[redacted]
>
>-----
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 09:29:42 +0100
>From: Kevin Killian <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: Miscellaneous stuff
>
>At 3:22 AM 6/12/96, Ron Silliman wrote:
>
>>Just finished Carole Maso's Ava, which makes Beckett safe for PBS (that >>is, to be less snide, she uses the same pallet of devices, but does so
>>to construct a decidedly unified, even romanticized, subjective whole).
>>It brought up for me the whole question of recycled modernism, thinking >>of Alice Walker's uses of Faulkner in The Color Purple or Ondaatje's >>Hemingway in The English Patient. In each instance, the techniques are >>used to much more conservative ends than those for which they had >>originally been elaborated.
>
>
>Thanks Ron. Now I feel less guilty that I'm reading _House of Mirth_ right >now rather than "keeping up."
>
>x,
>Dodie Bellamy
>
>-----
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 12:31:12 -0500

>From: Chris Stroffolino <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: what matter who's speaking
>
> Hey Rod---
> Is BRECHT part of the B-effect? It would seem that Bernstein in this > schema would be more a CHARLES (more C than B) in terms of darkness, > while Perelman would be more a BOB (B)--I've been thinking about the > BECKETT connection with AKA (who brought that up?). It seems that > AKA is less, er, "stream of consciousness" though than more Bruce > Andrews-like in the way it reads. By Andrews like I mean, the emphasis > is on the sentence (not emotional) rather than paragraph. Beckett's > emphasis seems more on the accumulative rush effect.
> (again, i'm speaking primarily of the trilogy era Beckett... > and I haven't read AKA in years....so I think I know what I'm going > to read today.....cs
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 09:32:08 -0700
>From: "Aldon L. Nielsen" <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: summary reading
>
>OOOPS! I'm actually getting to Maine Tues. night, as my panel is the next >day -- will also be in gang reading Friday night -- maybe we should all >wear colors!
>
>
>and today's reading:
>
>Juan Felipe Herrera -- _The Roots of a Thousand Embraces_ Manic D Press
>
>available from SPD -- it's great --
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 16:19:56 -0500
>From: Jordan Davis <[redacted]>
>Subject: against summer reading
>
>I am leaning to the left against my summer reading:
>a very large (1000 pages?) blank book, extraordinarily >popular delusions, The Life of Johnson, etc, and

>what good poems it's making me flee to read--Frank >O'Hara's poem up in the subway, contrarian and >personist in the best of spirits, Karen Volkman's
>national poetry series book _Crash's Law_
>the presense of which can only mean
>that Juliana Spahr's NPS book is preparing >to knock New York City over like the cardboard diorama
>we know it is, oh and god! Laura Moriarty's >book _Symmetry_ thank you Rod! for sending it -
>I've never seen anybody get knocked out the way
>it happens all the time on tv, how does anybody
>get any reading done when they own a tv,
>someone like Melanie Neilson makes a poem
>and the credit card offers, are they nefarious?
>Do you find out about yourself when you consume
>the endless electrons? It's something you can >turn on, the Baudelaire of you, but when you
>find out the 'off' switch is symbolic at best,
>a surrealist at most, a batter in a cage,
>is she bored? Not Melanie but
>the manic imperative, the one up
>the street we'll have to go visit when they get >here, deferring to the expert light
>of some characters we know, Ringo, Paul, John,
>Morton, etc. That ought to be something exciting.
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 15:33:37 -0500
>From: Charles Alexander <[redacted]>
>Subject: readings/twin cities
>
>A POETRY & MULTIMEDIA READING BY SPENCER SELBY & ERIK BELGUM
>
>sponsored by Cross-Cultural Poetics and the College of St.
Catherine-Minneapolis
>
>
>SATURDAY, JUNE 15
>ROOM 250
>COLLEGE OF
>ST. CATHERINE

>MINNEAPOLIS
>1:00 p.m.
>
>
>
>
>
>SPENCER SELBY
>Spencer Selby's books of poetry include Instar (SINK Press, 1989), Barricade >(Paradigm Press, 1990), House of Before (Potes & Poets Press, 1991), Sound >Off (Detour Press, 1993), and No Island (Drogue Press, 1995). His visual >poetry includes Stigma (Score, 1990), and Malleable Cast (Generator, 1995).
>In the middle 1980's Spencer Selby began SINK Press in San Francisco, where >he still resides, and he coordinated the Canessa Park Reading Series from >1987 - 1993. In 1993 Selby created The List of Experimental Poetry/Art >Magazines, a noncopyrighted, freely circulating document that tracks over >250 publications around the world.
>
>ERIK BELGUM
>Erik Belgum's experimental fiction has appeared in over two dozen journals >since 1985. Most recently he has been seen in literary journals such as >Avec, Chicago Review, Red Bass, Central Park, Black Ice, and Caliban. His >fiction will appear this year in an anthology of experimental fiction from >the publishers of Avec, as well as in upcoming issues of Central Park and >Asylum Annual. In his Dictionary of the Avant-Gardes (1993), Richard >Kostelanetz called Belgum one of "the best of the younger writers of >fiction, let alone experimental fiction." Belgum's literary/audio/soundtext >works have been played throughout the United States, in concert, on radio, >and also recently on the CD audio magazine Aerial. Recent commissions >include spoken word pieces commissioned by the Dale Warland Singers through >a Jerome Foundation grant and another by Corn Palace Productions performed >at the Southern Theater in Minneapolis.
>
>
>This reading is FREE and is held at the College of St.
>Catherine-Minneapolis, 601 25th Avenue South (two blocks north of the 25th >Avenue/Riverside intersection).
>
>

>Next Reading sponsored by Cross-Cultural Poetics:
>June 29, 1:00 pm, Room 250, College of St. Catherine-Minneapolis
>
> DAN FEATHERSTON
> &
> CHARLES ALEXANDER
>
>
>For further information about Cross-Cultural Poetics readings and >publications, please contact Mark Nowak at [redacted]. Or e-mail him at >[redacted]
>
>I hope anyone on the poetics list visiting or living near here will come.
>I'll post more before the June 29th reading.
>
>
>charles alexander
>chax press
>[redacted]
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 16:50:28 -0400
>From: Jonathan A Levin <[redacted]>
>Subject: clamdiggers (fwd)
>
>This one's from Marisa Januzzi, whose machine apparently needs to be fed.
>JL.
>
>---------- Forwarded message ----------
>
>It's Maine, so we're supposed to wear clam diggers, right Kevin?
>(Dodie-- can I answer the post in person!?) If I ever finish my grades
>I will be in Orono too, Kerouac paper, time recently unsettled & >rescheduled for undetermined reasons.
>
>(Anyone looking for summer reading-- MEXICO CITY BLUES, SUBTERRANEANS, >TRISTESSA, OLD ANGEL MIDNIGHT, and VSIONS OF GERARD... are all truly >great, and this from someone who once couldn't read Kerouac for sexism...)
>

>Maybe we should designate a poetics reef & then all go meet on it?
>
>Re: LeSueur-- some of her stuff is available through SPD, including the >pamphlets (just got "Women on the Breadlines"). I'd love to hear more >about her being alive.
>
>Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected >&where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)
>
>Also, has anyone else read Emily Holms Coleman (esp. THE SHUTTER OF >SNOW)?
>
>Ciao, & drowning in work, and on notice that my server is down after 10AM >tomorrow until Orono..... bleh!
>
>--Marisa Januzzi
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 15:57:01 -0500
>From: Jonathan Brannen <[redacted]>
>Subject: Standing Stones Press Special Offer
>
>SPECIAL OFFER TO POETICS SUBSCRIBER
>
>Standing Stones Press Publications
>
>Tom Ahern, _Skippy Taggart's Wife_
>Curt Anderson, _Umbra_
>Dennis Barone, _The Masque Resumed_
>Jonathan Brannen, _Crunching Numbers_
>Gerald Burns, _Probability and Fuzzy Dice_
>Cydney Chadwick, _The Gift Horse's Mouth_ o.p.
>Mark DuCharme, _Contractng Scale-
>Peter Ganick, _IT OR S/HE_
>Geof Huth, _To a Small Stream of Water (or Ditch)_
>H.T. (Heather Thomas), _Circus Freex_
>Stephen-Paul Martin, _Crisis of Representation_
>Michelle Murphy, _The Tongue in its Shelf_
>Sheila E. Murphy, _Wind Topography_
>John Perlman, _Anacoustic_
>Susan M. Schultz, _Earthquake Dreams_

>Mark Wallace, _In Case of Damage to Life, Limb or
> This Elevator_ (forthcoming, June 1996)
>
>All publications are $4.00 or any four for $12.00
>(postage included except on foreign orders).
>
>Also available from Standing Stones:
>Jonathan Brannen, Thing Is The Anagram Of Night (Texture Press, 1996), $6.00 > nothing doing never again (Score Press, 1996), $8.00
>
>SPECIAL OFFER TO POETICS SUBSCRIBERS: $3.00 each or FOUR FOR $10.00 !!!
>Thing Is The Anagram Of Night (Texture Press, 1996), $4.00 and nothing doing >never again (Score Press, 1996), $5.00.
>
>Plus a free copy of Gerald Burns Probability and Fuzzy Dice (upon request >and while supplies last) with any order !!! Offer good until July 15, 1996.
>Very limited quanities of some titles.
>
>Order from [redacted]
>(I'll include the bill when I ship the order) or from:
>
>Standing Stones Press
>7 Circle Pines
>Morris, MN 56267
>
>-----
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 17:01:33 -0500
>From: Chris Stroffolino <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
>
> Well--someone told me one should pack a lot of BUG SPRAY for MAINE...
> so I might hit someone up for this.
> Didn't Emerson say something like
> "If one goes for a walk in the woods, one must feed mosquitos"
> (which I translate as):
> "if one goes for a walk in a city, one must feed quarters to > payphones"----cs
>

>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 17:32:28 EDT
>From: Ken Edwards <[redacted]>
>Subject: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
>
>Ira Lightman wrote:
>Ken, could you detail a few of the poets
>here, as you say, who engage intelligently with >langpo, which books or poems?
>
>(ie in the UK)
>
>
>Well, first among them I would place Allen Fisher. He and I have had numerous >conversations about langpo type poets since, I think, the early 1980s, and I'm >indebted to him and to his vast book collection in this respect.
>
>Cris Cheek (hi Cris!) has had strong transatlantic links for many years, >including with langpo.
>
>Tom Raworth is notoriously US- and langpo-friendly -- one of the most open
and >generous souls around. Maybe one of the few Brits who has actually influenced
>the langpo scene at source.
>
>Wendy Mulford has corresponded for many years with the grouping of poets around >Kathleen Fraser and Susan Gevirtz's How(ever) and is well acquainted with, >particularly, the women in the langpo camp and around it.
>
>Maggie O'Sullivan has collaborated on a book with Bruce Andrews and reads avidly >in and out of langpo as far as I know. I'm particularly grateful to her for >introducing me to the work of current Canadian "experimental" women poets.
>
>A number of the poets associated with the London SubVoicive/Writers Forum crowd >are knowledgeable about it. Among these I'd mention Adrian Clarke and Robert

>Sheppard, who edited the Potes & Poets anthology of London poets "Floating >Capital" -- also Johan de Wit, Ulli Freer, Lawrence Upton, and of course Bob >Cobbing, also one of the least prejudiced guys around, who published that >Maggie/Bruce collaboration.
>
>Peter Middleton is clearly keen on that stuff. So is Miles Champion, I'd say.
>
>Finally Robert Hampson and I were probably the first to publish some of the >Americans, even before they were labelled "language", back in the 1970s. Lyn >Hejinian, Alan Davies and James Sherry made appearances in our long-dead >magazine Alembic.
>
>Sorry to go on. Of course, this list isn't exhaustive. As for "which books or >poems", well I wouldn't presume to trace influences that closely -- you'll have >to decide.
>
>-----
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 18:45:29 -0500
>From: Chris Stroffolino <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
>
> Dear ken Edwards---
> Could you elaborate on Miles Champion. The little I've seen is interesting > and it was good to see your willingness to include him, while Ira, I > think, seemed less to.....cs
>
>-----
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 16:42:21 -0700
>From: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
>
>>Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected >>&where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)
>
>Some large assemblage of Ark (perhaps all of it) is due imminently from >University of New Mexico Press. The cook books are great.
>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]

>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 17:28:42 +0100
>From: Kevin Killian <[redacted]>
>Subject: Communications Decency Act
>
>This is Dodie Bellamy. I received the following from another list I'm >subscribed to. It's not about poetics, but I thought it might be of >interest.
>
>PHILADELPHIA (Reuter) -- In a ground-breaking decision on free-speech >rights over the Internet, a special U.S court panel blocked as >unconstitutional a new federal law prohibiting indecency on computer >networks.
>
> The three-judge panel issued Wednesday a preliminarly injunction blocking >enforcement of portions of the Communications Decency Act, signed by >President Clinton Feb. 8, which prohibit the distribution to minors of >indecent or "patently offensive" materials over computer networks.
>
>The court let stand prohibitions against obscenity and child pornography, >types of speech that are not constitutionally protected and were not >challenged by the act's opponents.
>
>"The Internet may fairly be regarded as a never-ending worldwide >conversation," U.S. District Judge Stewart Dalzell, a member of the panel, >said in his opinion accompanying the decision.
>
>"The government may not, through the CDA, interrupt that conversation. As >the most participatory form of mass speech yet developed, the Internet >deserves the highest protection from governmental intrusion," he said.
>
> Also on the panel were U.S. District Court Judge Ronald Buckwalter and >Dolores Sloviter, chief justice of the Third Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals.
>
>
>In its legal conclusion, the court said the blocked portions of the act >were unconstitutional on their face.
>
>The injunction was issued in response to a lawsuit against the U.S. Justice >Department challenging the act. The challenge was filed by the American >Civil Liberties Union and groups representing libraries, publishers and the >computer on-line industry.

>
>A Justice Department spokesman said the agency had no immediate comment on >the ruling.
>
>The ruling sets the stage either for a trial on whether the act should be >permanently blocked, or a direct appeal of the preliminary injunction to >the U.S. Supreme Court under expedited provisions written into it.
>
>"The court has reaffirmed what our founders 200 years ago bequeathed as our >greatest liberty, and that's free speech," said Stefan Presser, legal >director of the ACLU of Pennsylvania, which filed the original suit.
>
>Bruce Taylor, chief counsel for the National Law Center for Children and >Families, which supports the act, said of the ruling, "I don't consider >this a setback."
>
>The act has already heightened awareness of content unsuitable for minors >on the Internet, and prompted development of technology that will make it >possible to screen and block material for suitability for minors, he said.
>
>Such technology will undermine arguments by the act's opponents that it is >impossible to enforce, he said.
>
>In addition, he said, state laws already on the books can also be used.
>"The states can do what this ruling said the federal government can't do >yet," he said.
>
>The ACLU immediately posted the court's opinion and order, which total 177 >pages, on its World Wide Web site, said Christopher Hansen, attorney for >the national ACLU. The address of the site is http://www.aclu.org.
>
>In the event of a government appeal, Hansen said, "We'll certainly defend >the conclusion vigorously."
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 19:57:54 -0500
>From: Charles Alexander <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: clamdiggers (fwd)

>
>>Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected >>&where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)
>
>
>I notice in the new Small Press Distribution Catalog that Gus Blaisdell's >Living Batch Press in Albuquerque has brought out the whole (I believe) of >Ronald Johnson's ARK. So contact SPD at 1814 San Pablo Ave., Berkeley, CA >94702. And on that SPD catalog check out the drawings of writers on the >cover, done by Gary Sullivan. High groove factor, as Gary might say himself.
>
>Ronald Johnson's first southwestern cookbook is a classic. I know that there >is a more recent edition of that, and others, but I don't know about them.
>
>-----
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 20:10:53 -0500
>From: Charles Alexander <[redacted]>
>Subject: Re: clamdiggers (fwd)
>
>>>Does anyone know how much of Ronald Johnson's ARK has been collected >>>&where, besides PRIMARY TROUBLE? (&are his cookbooks as rich?)
>>
>>Some large assemblage of Ark (perhaps all of it) is due imminently from >>University of New Mexico Press. The cook books are great.
>
>
>apologies for repeating myself, but I wanted to make it clear. It's not the >University of New Mexico Press, it's a new press, LIVING BATCH BOOKS (many >of you I am sure know the long-lived Living Batch Bookstore in Albuquerque), >run by Gus Blaisdell, which has, according to the announcement in the Small >Press Distribution Spring 1996 catalog which just arrived, "just published >one of the extraordinary long poems of the past quarter-century in Ronald >Johnson's ARK. Early versions of Johnson's great, elegant long poem are all >out-of-print. This new book presents the full poem for the first time, a >true heir to Louis Zukofsky's "A," Basil Bunting's BRIGGFLATTS, George >oppen's and Lorine Niedecker's longer series, and Robert Duncan's PASSAGES >and STRUCTURE OF RIME, but with a music and architecture unique in American >poetry."

>
>And more complete SPD ordering info:
>
>1814 San Pablo Avenue
>Berkeley, CA 94702-1624
>
>tel. [redacted]
>fax [redacted]
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 19:28:21 -0700
>From: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
>Subject: <No subject given>
>
>Charles,
>
>I'm sure you're right.
>
>The SPD catalog hasn't shown up here yet & when I checked locally after >seeing a reference to Ark somewhere (?), the book store came up with it as >being from UofNM Pr.
>
>In any case, I'm glad I don't have to wait much longer to read it all.
>
>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]
>
>----------
>
>Date: Wed, 12 Jun 1996 23:12:27 -0400
>From: Romana Christina Huk <[redacted]>
>Subject: Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives
>
>For those who wish to attend _Assembling Alternatives: An International >Poetry Conference/Festival_ (29 Aug.- 2 Sept.) but can't afford the price >of accommodation and/or meals, new options have been created that allow >for use of a local campsite or, for a more limited number, guest housing >with faculty and students in the area. Those who intend to camp and not >take meals with the group will only pay $15.00 per day ($60.00 for the >whole event); this includes transportation to and from the conference >site, and coffee/tea-breaks during the days, but does not include the >costs required by the campsite itself. They have given us rates at >approx. $18.00 per night per "couple" in a tent (it pays to double-up >with someone); the rental of any equipment needed is up to campers.

>Further details can be retrieved by calling the campsite directly; do so >by asking about the "safari site"(!) reserved by Romana Huk at UNH for >the poetry conference/festival on the above dates: Lamprey River >Campground, 16 Campground Road, LEE, NH 03824; tel.: [redacted]. The >grounds have full Facilities (toilets, showers). Tents, however, are >hard to find for rent in this area, but Eastern Mountain Sports in the >local Fox Run Mall ([redacted]) reports to have enough tents for >approx. 30 people camping in sets of two and three; they go for between >$25.00 and $30.00 for the full stint. To reserve any of these you must >act _soon_.
>
>Those who intend to pay the full $270.00 commuter fee for taking all >meals with the group for these 5 days and 4 nights will be up first for >placement in people's homes (in order to help reduce their overall costs >and relieve our volunteer hosts' anxieties about feeding, etc.).
>
>Anyone interested in either new option must still go through the >University Conferences Office to secure a seat at the conference itself >(which is very important given our limited space): Univ. Conferences >Office, Univ. of NH, 11 Brook Way, Room 121, Durham, NH 03824-3509; tel.:
>[redacted]; fax: [redacted]. If you wish to pay the commuter fee >to take all meals with the group, you will need a registration form from >the Office. Those who hope to be placed in guest housing must contact >myself, Romana Huk, conference organizer, as soon as possible; I can be >reached before 27 June either at this e-mail address or at UNH (603 862 >3992). After that I leave for six weeks in England, cut off from e-mail, >I think (though I'll keep you posted). I can be reached either through >the Conferences Office (who can in a pinch fax or call me) or, after the >1st of July, I can be contacted by phoning Gonville & Caius (pronounced >"Keyes") College, Cambridge, England (44 1223 332400) and leaving your >phone number in a message for me to call you.
>
>The conference/festival is developing beautifully despite funding woes on >all our parts. Its schedule begins at 2:00 with registration on the 29th >of August;at that time the book exhibit/sales area will be getting set >up, and the Great Bay Room (our largest) will, I hope, be hung and >otherwise transformed by artworks made in response to these poetries, if >we can get artists and the New England Center staff to agree on what >can be done to the walls. At 5:00 an informal reception will lead into >dinner at 6:00, after which we'll have our first night of performances in >the Great Bay Room. I'll be finalizing the readings in the next several >days; several of the most well-known will be on that night so it's not >one to be missed. The readings will be free and open to the public.

>
>Remember that although our focus is the U.S., U.K., Canada and Ireland, >other poetries will be represented and become part of the conversation.
>
>Among those thus far scheduled to give talks or performances are (and >this can't be a full list, so I'm about to choose randomly): Charles >Bernstein, Karen Mac Cormack, Sean O'hUigin, Tom Raworth, Carla Harry-
man,
>Nicole Brossard, Maurice Scully, Allen Fisher, Rae Armantrout, Steve >McCaffery, Maggie O'Sullivan, Denise Riley, Joan Retallack, Peter >Quartermain, Marjorie Perloff, Peter Middleton, Bob Perelman, Juliana >Spahr, Jeff Derksen, Peter Gizzi, Miles Champion, Caroline Bergvall, cris >cheek, Catherine Walsh, Steve Evans, Miriam Nichols, Alan Golding, Trevor >Joyce, Kathleen Fraser, Rod Mengham, Barrett Watten, Abigail Child, Paul >Dutton, Lee Ann Brown, Ken Edwards, John Cayley, Jim Rosenberg, Steve >Benson, Wendy Mulford, Leslie Scalapino, Robert Sheppard, Fiona >Templeton, Loss Glazier, Louis Cabri, Andrew Levy, Philip Mead, John >Kinsella, Barbara Godard, David Bromige, Hazel Smith, Susan Schultz, John >Wilkinson, Mary Margaret Sloan, Nicholas Zurbrugg, Billy Mills, Linda >Kinnahan, Lynn Keller, Geoffrey Squires, Keith Tuma, Shamoon Zamir, Brian >Lynch, Christian Bok, Charles Altieri, David Annwn, Tony Lopez, Donald >Wesling, Burton Hatlen, and more.
>
>In general outline, the conversation begins on Friday with discussion of >differing contexts and relationships of these poetries to institutions in >those contexts. On Saturday issues of poetic politics and imaginings of >the subject arise, as well as the relationship between these poetries and >their respective "mainstreams"; key problems of gendered and racial >difference arise as well. On Sunday new forms of electronic and >performance work enter in, and on Monday, our last day, almost all of it >comes back in talk about where we stand at the "millennium" (or don't).
>On Sunday night we take a break from UNH's confines to have our dinner >and readings in Portsmouth, the area's cultural center on the water. This >will of course happen as part of the full conference fee paid by those >taking meals with the group; transportation will be provided for all, >even those not eating with the rest.

>
>I hope that's enough information at the moment for those interested. I'm >terribly sorry to have to take off for six weeks: but again, after >the 27th you should be able to either fetch the details you need from the >Conferences Office or reach me overseas. My address there, if you don't >want to phone, will be : Romana Huk, Director, UNH Summer Program, >Gonville & Caius College, Cambridge CB2 1TA, England. It takes about a >week for letters to make it over. Remember to include your phone number >in correspondence.
>
>And spread the news about the book exhibit! All presses are >welcome to contribute.
>
>Wishing good summers to all of you,
>
>Romana Huk
>
>----------
>
>End of POETICS Digest - 11 Jun 1996
>*******
>
>

==========
Stephen Barker
Associate Dean and Interim Chair of the Department of Studio Art School of the Arts
[redacted]
==========

↑ Index

226. MAXINE CHERNOFF
NEW AMERICAN WRITING #14
Thu 13 Jun 1996

NEW AMERICAN WRITING #14 is now available. The issue contains long sections with commentary by Paul Beatty, Charles Bernstein, Gabrielle Glancy, Lyn Hejinian, Brenda Hillman, Anselm Hollo, Paul Hoover, Art Lange, Ann Lauterbach, Elizabeth Robinson, Susan Schultz, and Gustaf Sobin--poetry.

Stories by Gloria Frym, Michelle Carter, and Wendell Mayo.

Cover by Kenward Elmslie.

Order for $8 from NAW, 369 Molino Avenue, Mill Valley CA 94941, or get it at your local bookstore.

Thanks,
PH and MC

↑ Index

227. Oren Izenberg
research query
Thu 13 Jun 1996

Can anyone help me get my hands on an issue of, I believe, Occident, with a number of readings/reviews of Michael Palmer's SUN?

I would be happy to purchase it-- or pay for xeroxing, or simply borrow it. Interlibrary loan is no help, and even the Library of Congress has left me in the lurch.

Backchannel is fine-- I appreciate the help.

O.

↑ Index

228. Ira Lightman
Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Thu 13 Jun 1996

Ken, thanks for your rollcall of names, I'm extremely grateful. Could I add to Chris' request, and probe a little further: I will cease to push for books or poems but could you specify a little how the British poets you've cited and their American friends, beyond mutual encouragement and citing of each other to interested parties, have shown LangPo qualities in their own work, along the lines I mentioned in my original post:

"the attitude to language or presence, in any number games, paragraph organisation, or relation of page to page, or dual columns, in the way that it is in any of the poets mentioned" (eg, I mean, that the pastiche of a voice of an Other actually bleeds into and could be the voice of the poet)

Do any of them, for example, in your view, write the New Sentence?

Chris, by the way, I would like to say that I am impressed by the way that Miles Champion borrows models from LangPo, his book "Sore Models" was borrowed from Kit Robinson's Ice Cubes, for example. My worry is that his work reminds me of several New Zealand poets' use of the sonnet, eg James Baxter or Vincent O'Sullivan, in that what seems to me to be is happening is a kind of stand-up comedian Woody Allen nebbishy, or Peter Cook cod-Shakesperean, voiceover draped over the form. Whereas, Shakespeare's sonnets, and Robinson's Ice Cubes, seem to me to hang on ideas about which the poet is really anxious, upon which the poet's sanity and life seem to rest, questions like "am I a man unable to give in to the real martyrdom of love" or "do my silly relationship problems distract me from action to improve my world" where this is felt as a paradox of two conflicting, equally *pressing" problems.
My personal difficulty with Miles' work is that, unlike Rob McKenzie's (and I should stress here that Rob is a keen fan of Miles, so this my beef only), he seems to have the "postmodern" embarrassed thus flip take on earnestness about love (it's a cliche, an overused word etc), and rarely seems to be serious about anything. I don't even find that in the great clown Ashbery.
I just worry that the general atmosphere of send-up in Miles' work is what genuinely endears him to Brits who hate and avoid LangPo, who think that Miles, like Rodefer, is using LangPo only to send it up - and I know that isn't Miles' attitude, as his estimable magazine that he edits does sterling work presenting LangPo; so maybe I worry for him, that he faces trauma ahead in having to either junk LangPo or offend some of his friends (not Ken, not Chris, and not, incidentally, me).

Very best,

Ira

On Wed, 12 Jun 1996 18:45:29 -0500 Chris Stroffolino wrote:

>
> Dear ken Edwards--- > Could you elaborate on Miles Champion. The little I've seen is interesting > and it was good to see your willingness to include him, while Ira, I > think, seemed less to.....cs

↑ Index

229. Mark Wallace hairs, and dead horses
Thu 13 Jun 1996

Dear herb Levy:

Thanks for your post about the way reviewing on newspapers works. I myself have worked on newspapers for about a decade, and the situation you describe seems pretty accurate to me.

Of course, the circumstances are somewhat different when a musician and art critic (like Tim Page, I understand?) who supposedly has some respect outside the newspaper environment you describe decides to take advantage of the environment you're speaking about in order to assault someone's work. That's not a fucked-up and unchangeable world press situation--that's someone who should know better acting like a jerk.

Of course, I wasn't really all that "angry" about it to begin with--I just presented some rather choice paragraphs from that foolishness. Then it seemed to me (and I may have misread intentions here, so for that I would apologize) that at least one person seemed to suggest that the review actually was a reasonable and well-considered critical position, and not the piece of bogus entertainment assault on art that you have clearly said it was.

But I wonder--and here's my question for you--at what point do we write off such things as irrelevant nonsense, and ignore them? That is, do we only respond to people who speak about arts who are in the arts environment, or do we make some attempt, however limited, to assert in other contexts that such behavior is unacceptable, whether anybody's listening or not? I think letters to the editor are in some cases actually a good idea--there may be someone who does see that letter who learns something they otherwise might not. For instance, I've published several letters to the editor in the past year, and have had students and even several administrators at the places where I work (people who would otherwise never read my work) not only tell me "way to go etc etc" but also that they hadn't quite realized what the position of "the other side" might be.

I think it's actually a good idea to take on ignorance when one encounters it, even in the newspapers, because in fact you never know who might be listening. While I certainly enjoy the discussions of various informed people on this list, I also feel something of an inclination to try to spread that information around, whenever possible.

As to whether Europera 5 is a great Cage piece or not, the point actually seems moot to me. I haven't heard it, but a number of people who have have written me to say how much they like it. I didn't write a letter to an editor this time around (the debate has actually all been here), but if somebody had, there is a possibility that someone else would have seen that letter and thought there was perhaps some reason for going to see the performance. They then could have decided for themselves.

mark wallace

↑ Index

230. cris cheek

Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes

Thu 13 Jun 1996

Hi, firstly apologies for my dirty conference washing being fenced through this line. That's the downside of simply punching the reply button. See some of you in New Hamshire then.

I've not wanted to get involved here on this topic. The framing of movements gives me jip enough. So the 'lang-po' (still that intrepid band of brigands from the water margins who came to the aid of the oppressed with their deadly martial skills) is a possibly useful short-hand beyond which specific differences come into play. I tend more towards the account of exchange and interaction between poetries operating in very different political, social and cultural contexts in the cases of UK and US. In that sense I agree with Ken, there has been a liberal smattering of interaction between these poetries. I also agree with the drift of Ira's push, the real pith behind which lies a getting at different practices.

Ken's focii of connection aside, the overall reaction towards writers such as Watten, Silliman, Harryman, Benson, Hejinian, Bernstein, Andrews, di Palma, McCaffery, Ward, Robinson, Perelman, Darragh, Inman, Seaton, Sherry, Davies, Mason, Piombino (those who i first had any contact with and read during the later 1970s) that i've experienced in England, has been a mixture of suspicion coupled with denial, gradually mellowing to grudging acceptance without tangible enthusiasm. Fairly typical British retentive states. I'm not aware, on the qeustion of 'fakes' that there are poets in the UK who claim to be writing, or to have written, 'language' poetry ever.

For me, rather than specifically the Vietnam War, a defining cultural politics was 1976 punk and reggae, (when i started publishing in a kind of DIY fervour and incidentally first met Charles Bernstein) and the election of Margaret Thatcher's Conservatives in 1979 (when, effectively - after a period of intense collaboration in the US around Baltimore - I published a biggish collection 'a present' and then basically stopped publishing; what tiny things have been in the past couple of years are a refurbishment of hope).

'a present' is a book that bears hallmarks of the interaction with 'language'poetry. There is a splice column piece, for example, dedicated to Steve Benson to whose work I was drawn and felt close through aspects of syntax of improvised speech in performance and swerves of intimacy and distance in realtion to personalised everyday perceptual materials as much as anything else. In fact Steve, Allen Fisher and myself did a performance together in July 1984 'Assumptions Table' (it's published in full in Sulfur 18).

I'm quoting from that piece deidicated to Benson in 'a present' (Bluff Books,1980) - 'fume basic':

'fan in the rhythm of the fan dancing, dorsal tenacious too obscure, finis. i ought explain. make out. lob. naked. fish pass under grass reflection, into major traffic. does oppose. some would. welcome laurel. have a smoke. come closer than. save 10 cents. and, what color are the. be possible. . . .

pulse out. pulse, skin. the somewhat breakwater form from ocean lapping both, either. mean the leaves were bruising each other and the smell was coming into the house. my quivering n erves in my direction turn, face - to the washing up. as yet, as though we shave the different parts of each day are unglued. the bonding lips kiss table. or waters that fire imaginations'

There are here, elements of north american diction - some of the twists of that vernacular, filtered through an english heart. I would agree with Ira, no 'new sentence'. But then Ron identified, correctly in my opinion, that 'new sentence' as being a Bay area phenomenon.

In the absence of twentieth century British models for performance writing / poetic practice that really turned me on (aside from Ivor Cutler, Samuel Beckett, Tom Raworth, Tom Leonard, Allen Fisher) in the mid 1970s, it was refreshing to find a concern with the micro-politics of language, the de-constructive powers of syntax, the re-generative humours of rangey and interrogative thought, that did not have an overbearing tyranny of 'knowledge' as central to its project.

Contrary to what might be received opinion, it's been my pleasurable experience to find that Language writers are some of the most humane and funny and rigorously perceptive people that i know.

The work in UK writing is different. Issues of urban collapse, neo and post-colonialism, 'centralisation' as parochialism, cultural 'editing', everyday 'composition', re-integrating (navigating) beyond the over-fetishised fragments of the over-binarised post-modern. Signifier and signified simply won't do any more. Performance Writing is what's happening here for me, for others that will not be so - difference continues to be manufactured.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

231. Robert Drake

Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes

Thu 13 Jun 1996

> The framing of movements gives me jip enough...

likewise, i think... my british slang dictionary lists, under "jip": "india ink" (yep, that fits), also "energy" (australian, not as close but still)... care to help me update th entry?

lbd

↑ Index

232. Tony Green
Re: what matter who's speaking
Thu 13 Jun 1996

Seeing W for Godot at Royal Court while still plagued with adolescent acne is still memorable -- partly because I wanted to leave em to it, let em wait, I wanted to walk out, about three-quarters of the way thru. Cdn't handle it.
Realised that was significant but took a while for it to register on me. Perhaps that's why I liked Coolidge's work immediately on encountering it.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

233. Tony Green
Typo
Thu 13 Jun 1996

Rod Smith mentioning Joan Retalack reminds me I found 3rd impression of Strachey's translation of Freud's Traumdeutung (1957?)

p.207
".....to a remark I had de in which....."

&

p.209
" .....opposition journalists made okes over Count Thun's name....."

best , and perhaps Rod or someone cd pass this on to Joan R.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

234. George Bowering
Re: singnafump
Fri 14 Jun 1996

> When one is stopped by a cop or a deconstructionist around YALE, > all one needs do is yell "OPPEN YOU" or "OPPEN SESAME" and this > can be quite seedy if novel...

Odd, the cultural differences. I just came back from Seattle (saw games 3 and 4), and heard a taxi driver shout at a civilian driver "Reznikoff you, pal!"

.....
"Silence, sole luxury after rimes . . ."
--Mallarme

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

235. cris cheek
Re: post language 'jip' definitions
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Hi Bob, re - 'jip',

if you've got a tendency in your back muscles for postural punishment and every so often , or some days rather than others your back feels like it's playing up you might say 'my back's giving me jip'.

I've heard the term used more in connection with physical problems or procedural functions (my printer is giving me jip' than with interhuman communication. But i guess, although I haven't heard this - other brits here might testify - it's possible to say 'my boss is giving me jip'. I've avoided the boss scenarios most of my life and don't intend to restart now.

Certainly if you were using a nibbed pen with india ink and (as has been my experience with nibbed pens from time to time) you were subjected to uninvited blotting due to some malfunctioning aspects between the pen and yourself, you might well say 'this pen's giving me jip'.

So in terms of the slang dictionary definitions that you offer - it would be something like:

jip - adjectival noun. Non-exquisite interference, or niggling awareness of energetic displacement, somewhat like an unintentional ink blot (should such a thing exist). An irritating tending to focus away from intention.

Not very satisfactory i know. Maybe others can add.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

236. Herb Levy
dead horse hairs
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Mark -

> But I wonder--and here's my question for you--at what point do we write off such things as irrelevant nonsense, and ignore them? That is, do we only respond to people who speak about arts who are in the arts environment, or do we make some attempt, however limited, to assert in other contexts that > such behavior is unacceptable, whether anybody's listening or not?

It's not a matter of only speaking with the converted (which in the context of Cage, or most any other "experimental" artist, is a very, very small subset of "those who are in the arts environment"). There are simply more productive ways to make a public space for the work we want to see and read and hear, than getting your underwear in a knot about bad press. Most readers won't remember a bad review they saw a week ago, especially if it was about something they've never heard, read, or seen. They simply have no reference point.

The people who are motivated one way or another by newspaper reviews are usually those people who already have an idea what they think. Nobody's mind gets changed, & to most people it looks like an insular catfight about some esoterica, that isn't a tenth as important as where Dennis Rodman will get his next piercing when the Bulls beat the Sonics, or, if it's Wednesday, what's on sale at the supermarket.

It's much better to get actual new work in front of new audiences, people who don't know if they'll like it. Performances in unusual public areas, posting broadsides around town, getting things seen or heard on local tv & radio, etc. Everyone exposed to new work in this way WON'T like it, let's not kid ourselves, but some of them will and those folks may come back for more & they'll pay for it.

To paraphrase something Ron Silliman has written several times to the list and elsewhere, you build an audience one person at a time. & more than anything it's the work itself that's going to build that audience, not reviews, whether they're positive or negative.

I don't see much value in beating up on someone for having a different opinion than you do. I don't agree with him, you don't agree with him, but you're very unlikely to change Page's mind on this. He's an adult and he's quite possibly heard lots more of Cage's music than you have, and no matter how wrong you think he is, he has a right to his opinion.

Mark, you must know that Page is not the only person out there who does not like most of Cage's music. These people are not all idiots, they just don't like what they've heard. Hell, there are still people who think Stravinksy's music is too weird, just as there are people, who otherwise seem rational and intelligent, who think that Finnegans Wake, or Ulysses, for that matter, are mistakes by a pretty good realistic writer, or that Pop Art was nothig more than a wishy-washy sellout after the heroic vigor of Abstract Expressionism, or that the early Beatles were better than the early Rolling Stones.

I mean, I hope it's not news to you that not everyone on this list is totally sold on the work of, say, Susan Howe or Bruce Andrews. I'm just not ready to put these folks into re-education camps until they see the error of their ways.

Rather than writing cranky letters to the editor (really far more than a full time job, anyway), complaining about the reviewers who are already in place, it makes more sense to me to try to cultivate writers or editors to produce a context for alternative work. It's much more important to find someone to give the work some kind of support than to get into a hissy fit with the writers who dis it. Probably this can't be done in the Post, but maybe there's someone at the Reader who'd be more open to the work on a ongoing basis.

Besides, there are few newspaper reviewers that are hardline about this kind of thing & you may find Page an unexpected ally later on, if you don't piss him off. There's one reviewer in Seattle who had said almost nothing positive about ANY music written in the last seventy-five years, until she wrote a rave review of a performance of Morton Feldman's For Philip Guston (four and a half hours of shimmering, rotating mobiles of melody), a concert that I was surprised she even bothered to come to, let alone that she'd love it.

So go figure.

Bests

Herb Levy

[redacted]

↑ Index

237. Michael Heller

Re: POETICS Digest - 12 Jun 1996 to 13 Jun 1996

Fri 14 Jun 1996

If some one has Rob Wilson's e-mail address, or if Rob is tuning in, please post it to me.

Michael Heller

[redacted]

↑ Index

238. Robert J Wilson
Re: POETICS Digest - 12 Jun 1996 to 13 Jun 1996
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Michael, Yes, I am out here in a lifeboat at and around and off Bamboo Ridge, working to deform US cultural poetics inside a sovereign Hawaiian nation inside the postcoldwar empire of the sign. Just in case you were wondering, and the 'Dante boy' poetics is nowhere to be found. Send me an email missive at: [redacted] to keep me posted on NYC developments and your latest forays.

Susan Schultz and the Tinfish gang (as we work amping up Tinfish #3 for global [www] and local [sexy little chapbook, with new cover by HR editor Sean MacBeth] call it the Death Of Captain Cook School of Global/Local Poetics or, more simply, the PostLocal Local.

Hope you are doing well, Rob Sean Wilson

On Fri, 14 Jun 1996, Michael Heller wrote:

> If some one has Rob Wilson's e-mail address, or if Rob is tuning in, please post it to me.
>
> Michael Heller
>
> [redacted]

↑ Index

239. Rod Smith
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Fri 14 Jun 1996

NOW HERB, the early Beatles WERE better than the early Stones, read a good review the other day making just that point...

> I don't see much value in beating up on someone for having a different opinion than you do.

Yes, I'll go along with this.

>Rather than writing cranky letters to the editor (really far more than a >full time job, anyway), complaining about the reviewers who are already in >place, it makes more sense to me to try to cultivate >writers or editors to produce a context for alternative work.

It seems to me part of the work of creating an audience IS writing cranky letters to the editors. A better example than Page of the extremely conservative views on the arts forthcoming from the Post is book reviewer Jonathan Yardley. Sure, he has a right to his views, however noone with opposing views (i.e. noone as far left as he is right-- & in some ways this IS quantifiable) has any of the cultural capital this bloke's accrued. Unfortunately, he does have an impact, which goes unchallenged, & if it's unquestioned, people believe it-- just like the NYT version(s) of "history." Obviously, it's not ok. I will agree with you that the most effective way to change this is by going around them, "one person at a time." Yet, I do think they have an impact on what people think. They make the work of building an audience much harder.

Rod

↑ Index

240. Jordan Davis
cultivating good reviewers
Fri 14 Jun 1996

I'm a fan of Neil Strauss's music reviews for the New York Times. Strauss, editor of the sublime _Radiotext(e)_ anthology (check out especially "Frequency Modulation or Fallen Man", a tribute to the inventor of FM), covers everything from the local pirate radio to bhangra to Bruce Springsteen, without resorting to cribs from the press release or even a momentary waver from his calm intelligent enthusiasm for both the old and great and the new and great. Strauss's prose is exceptional considering the rate at which for most reviewers there tha Times' requisite cool slopes into dorkiness, middling prose, and received ideas (torpor)--the retired Frank Rich being the big exception. Rich's review of Sting in Three Penny Opera is my standard for meanness; it begins like this--

'Returning home from the new staging of TPO, the theatergoer rushes to put the original (1950s) cast soundtrack on the turntable. Not to relive the evening's high points--there aren't any--but to reassure oneself that one is among the living.'

What I would really enjoy is to encourage a very good book reviewer working at a high circulation newspaper to read and write about poetry. All I do now is glare at my Voice whenever Peter Schjeldahl uses the word 'poetry' (triggering his subroutine about poetry being over) to talk about some new catastrophe in art.

Jordan Davis

(That reminds me. I can think of a couple people who write in more public places very well if only occasionally about poetry--Albert Mobilio and Geoffrey O'Brien. O'Brien's piece on Susan Howe in the Voice six years ago was responsible for building more audience for her work in New York than anything that side of the Susan Howe issue of Talisman. And Mobilio's much-missed magazine columns in the VLS were the most reliable way to find out when Hambone was about to arrive--it's difficult to imagine the VLS under its current benighted regime deigning to print anything about poetry not written by or about poets published by the major houses--by which I mean those famous poets Newhouse and Murdoch. So much for independence!)

↑ Index

241. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences

Fri 14 Jun 1996

---

i've been watching the thread about a harsh review, and wrestling with a review i have to write a book of poetry (though not, jordan, for a major venue!) for some time, and it finally occurred to me that this list might be a good place to put the ethics and questions of the problem out for discussion.

imagine you were given a bad book to review, the book of a writer (poetry and academic) who has, heretofore, produced somewhat interesting though not stellar work. imagine this writer teaches creative writing, and has produced a "How-To" text (with someone else) on writing although the writer's credentials are not strong. further, the book to be reviewed has poems which even venture to lecture, for example, on the importance of technique while the lack of same has plagued every poem. the badness of the writing is such that you knew, before you read the biographical sketch, that the writer must teach creative writing to beginners because there are so many "ok everyone i'm going to be creative here" lines, poems that make a great big overwritten fuss about nothing, and overused and even trite phrases and images.

but the writer also comes from a much under-represented sector of writers (though none of the experience arising from that context is explicitly present in the current book). further, the writer's publisher is a small, underfunded press which has taken on a very worthy publishing venture, one you wish to support and most off the problems might have been cleared away had the book a bang-up editor (which the press does not have the money to hire).

does one write the scathing blast which seems to work it's way into every sentence (despite efforts to be moderate)? is there something unendurabaly prissy about condemning another writer for not trying hard enough and publishing a very very poor book while there exists great writers under all sorts of pressure who don't publish until they have work that is really worthwhile, silent sometimes until their death.

imagine you are new to reviewing, aware that you might have the overzealousness common to the fresh and idealistic, and almost certainly are in a vulnerable position professionally -- is honesty really important or effective here? does someone have to stand up and say when something is really awful? should that someone be not well-known writer? or, in retrospect, is one (at that stage) usually happier about those chapters in which one is moderate, merciful, and/or discreet? should david engage goliath, especially without an omnipotent fixer?

i find myself thinking, on the one hand, of a writer's story of a workshop where someone gave out a perfectly awful poem for discussion. the group sat around for about ten minutes trying to give very careful, serious, and ultimately not very direct suggestions on how to improve the poem. finally a woman who had been silent the entire time exploded, saying something like "i can't believe you all -- for ten minutes you have been treating this poem as if it were really good. but it is terrible, and it is an insult to this writer to patronize him by not saying so."

but i also think of friends whose professional discretion make them an incredible asset to any committee or group or project, aboutut the strong reaction here to the negative article. and about herb's feeling that reviews are not, ultimately, going to alter anyone's opinion or guide them (though i disagree -- if a trustworthy source pans a movie, depending on the direction of the critique, i might well not go to it without some other strong motivation). there is also his point that reviewers essentially are preaching to the converted, if they are heard at all. what aboutthe possibility of reviews being stained by reviewer's preferences -- what is a yardstick for knowing when our distaste for something comes from distorting theoretical loyalties rather than fundamental principles and basics of art?

have you ever strongly panned a text? if so, did you regret it later? or did you feel a negative review was best? did it have unpleasant consequences? if so, could you or would you have done anything to mitigate them? so you wish you had tried? if there were no unpleasant consequences from the negative review, was there anything you did that might have helped avert them?

does any of it really matter -- are these reviews tempests in teapots and not to be taken seriously?

e

↑ Index

242. henry gould
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Fri 14 Jun 1996

On Fri, 14 Jun 1996 11:32:02 -0400 Rod Smith said:
>
>It seems to me part of the work of creating an audience IS writing cranky >letters to the editors.

Crank 'em out, fellas. BUILD them audience muscles!

> opposing views (i.e. noone as far left as he is right-- & in some ways this IS quantifiable) has any of the cultural capital this bloke's accrued. Unfortunately, he does have an impact, which goes unchallenged, & if it's unquestioned, people believe it-- just like the NYT version(s) of "history." Obviously, it's not ok. I will agree with you that the most effective way to change this is by going around them, "one person at a time." Yet, I do think they have an impact on what people think. They make the work of building an audience much harder.

Come here, you. I said YOU.
Gonna read you this sonnet - you, audience!
Listen up! Hey!
Come back here!

This art biz is righteous work, leftover!
You gotta rhyme it EVERY day in EVERY way!
DAmn the torpid newsbuzzers! Full beats ahood!
Hey - that's part a my poem! Get back here!

Gonna free your mind with my Venetian blind....yeah (c.f. early Trashmen) -
Henri leGoulash

↑ Index

243. henry gould
Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences
Fri 14 Jun 1996

My advice
if you want the truth is just shake the dice
outa both sides of yr mouth thumbs down to some thumbs up to the dumb and if you think that's terrible go check out a parable

- Hank the rank Think-Tank

↑ Index

244. David Baratier voice reviewers
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Jordan,

Perhaps the deterioration is because the Voice is free now from currency and hasn't been spotted since late April in Manhattan

David Baratier

↑ Index

245. Carnography
Re: Typo
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Tony Green typed:

> Rod Smith mentioning Joan Retalack reminds me I found 3rd impression of Strachey's translation of Freud's Traumdeutung (1957?)
>
> p.207
> ".....to a remark I had de in which....."
>
> p.209
> " .....opposition journalists made okes over Count Thun's name....."

You know, Perry Meisel often compares Strachey's translations of Freud to _Mrs. Dalloway_ and now I know why. I don't know about Joan R., but you have managed to forward this to Mr. Rothenberg.

Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

246. Carnography
Re: dead horse hairs
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Herb Levy typed:

> To paraphrase something Ron Silliman has written several times to the list and elsewhere, you build an audience one person at a time. & more than > anything it's the work itself that's going to build that audience, not reviews, whether they're positive or negative.

Lynne Tillman likes to talk about the pleasure she derives from people who speak of their "audience"--of a pre-existing group of people who are thought to gather for some new work of hers. A publisher says, "but your audience!" She replies, "Before I publish a book, my audience doesn't exist!" She also loves it when a colossal Hollywood sequel flops and film people, who had thought that the film already had an audience, are mystified.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

247. henry gould
Re: dead horse hairs
Fri 14 Jun 1996

On Fri, 14 Jun 1996 15:07:07 -0400 Carnography said:
>Lynne Tillman likes to talk about the pleasure she derives from people >who speak of their "audience"--of a pre-existing group of people who >are thought to gather for some new work of hers. A publisher says, >"but your audience!" She replies, "Before I publish a book, my >audience doesn't exist!"

Maybe this is relevant:

Schubert on the water, Mozart in birds' clatter, and Goethe whistling on a winding path,
and Hamlet meditating with anxious steps,
all counted the crowd's pulse, believed the crowd.
Maybe, before there were lips, there was a whisper, and before there were trees there were leaves whirling,
and those to whom we dedicate this our experiment,
before the experiment, have accumulated eyes and noses and mouths.

O. Mandelstam, trans.Burton Raffel {though I like James Greene's better) - H. Gould

↑ Index

248. Pritchett,Pat

Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, con

Fri 14 Jun 1996

Hello everyone. I'm new to the List and will here venture a response to Eliza's very pertinent query.

As a reviewer for various papers and mags, most recently the American Book Review, for some years now, I will emphatically say that yes it does matter; whatever the faults of the system, reviewing plays an important role in the publishing/reading world as a whole which we can't seem to get along without. Most of the time, as with the NYTBR, it seems like little more than an adjunct (not to the Muse's diadem) but to the PR depts. of Random House, S&S, et al. But intelligent, thoughtful reviews can boost sales of a little known book and moreover, can mean a lot to a writer who has labored in obscurity and feels rather isolated from things.

I try to keep in mind what Malcolm Cowley once told some students of his at Stanford: Always remember that it takes as much hard work to write a bad book as it does a good one. I have panned books in the past, sometimes savagely (e.g. Bob Shacocis' "Swimming in the Volcano"). I feel it's something I've grown out of. I no longer need the sense of vindication that seems to be the natural response to a book which arouses genuine indignation. Taking a tip from Auden, I no longer review books I don't like. There's plenty of good ones which need all the support they can get. And while this will probably strike some as corny and decidedly ante-postmodern, I find that sincerity can make up for a plethora of other faults, while no amount of artifice can take the place of honest intentions. Which opens up another can of worms entirely about how we assess intentionality vis-a-vis literary personas, etc.

You mention the intentions of the publisher: I find that to be irrelevant. A work should be judged on its own merit. There are of course mitigating factors and these can and should be mentioned to "soften the blow," if it feels appropriate. What counts is the end result, though. Otherwise, there'd be no end of "masterpieces", my own included.

It's the job of a reviewer to praise what he or she feels to be good and to say what is bad, inferior or just doesn't work. DHL said all good criticism is subjective. I would not shirk from calling a bad book bad. I just don't go out of my way looking for them. Fortunately my various editors let me pick and choose. The worst response I got from a bad review - it was a mixed negative of Ginsberg's last book - was a crisp letter from a highly respected poet which gave me serious food for thought. We have since become friends. So go figure... Best advice: Reviewing is highly political, in one sense, but should be practiced as though it isn't. It's a rare book that is completely bad; somewhere there's bound to be at least the suggestion of an interesing if poorly expressed idea, though not always. Find that and use it. In the end, pulling punches does you no good and is a disservice to writers everywhere. ---------- From: Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS Subject: reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences Date: Friday, June 14, 1996 12:16PM

i've been watching the thread about a harsh review, and wrestling with a review i have to write a book of poetry (though not, jordan, for a major venue!) for some time, and it finally occurred to me that this list might be a good place to put the ethics and questions of the problem out for discussion.

imagine you were given a bad book to review, the book of a writer (poetry and academic) who has, heretofore, produced somewhat interesting though not stellar work. imagine this writer teaches creative writing, and has produced a "How-To" text (with someone else) on writing although the writer's credentials are not strong. further, the book to be reviewed has poems which even venture to lecture, for example, on the importance of technique while the lack of same has plagued every poem. the badness of the writing is such that you knew, before you read the biographical sketch, that the writer must teach creative writing to beginners because there are so many "ok everyone i'm going to be creative here" lines, poems that make a great big overwritten fuss about nothing, and overused and even trite phrases and images.

but the writer also comes from a much under-represented sector of writers (though none of the experience arising from that context is explicitly present in the current book). further, the writer's publisher is a small, underfunded press which has taken on a very worthy publishing venture, one you wish to support and most off the problems might have been cleared away had the book a bang-up editor (which the press does not have the money to hire).

does one write the scathing blast which seems to work it's way into every sentence (despite efforts to be moderate)? is there something unendurabaly prissy about condemning another writer for not trying hard enough and publishing a very very poor book while there exists great writers under all sorts of pressure who don't publish until they have work that is really worthwhile, silent sometimes until their death.

imagine you are new to reviewing, aware that you might have the overzealousness common to the fresh and idealistic, and almost certainly are in a vulnerable position professionally -- is honesty really important or effective here? does someone have to stand up and say when something is really awful? should that someone be not well-known writer? or, in retrospect, is one (at that stage) usually happier about those chapters in which one is moderate, merciful, and/or discreet? should david engage goliath, especially without an omnipotent fixer?

i find myself thinking, on the one hand, of a writer's story of a workshop where someone gave out a perfectly awful poem for discussion. the group sat around for about ten minutes trying to give very careful, serious, and ultimately not very direct suggestions on how to improve the poem. finally a woman who had been silent the entire time exploded, saying something like "i can't believe you all -- for ten minutes you have been treating this poem as if it were really good. but it is terrible, and it is an insult to this writer to patronize him by not saying so."

but i also think of friends whose professional discretion make them an incredible asset to any committee or group or project, aboutut the strong reaction here to the negative article. and about herb's feeling that reviews are not, ultimately, going to alter anyone's opinion or guide them (though i disagree -- if a trustworthy source pans a movie, depending on the direction of the critique, i might well not go to it without some other strong motivation). there is also his point that reviewers essentially are preaching to the converted, if they are heard at all. what aboutthe possibility of reviews being stained by reviewer's preferences -- what is a yardstick for knowing when our distaste for something comes from distorting theoretical loyalties rather than fundamental principles and basics of art?

have you ever strongly panned a text? if so, did you regret it later? or did you feel a negative review was best? did it have unpleasant consequences? if so, could you or would you have done anything to mitigate them? so you wish you had tried? if there were no unpleasant consequences from the negative review, was there anything you did that might have helped avert them?

does any of it really matter -- are these reviews tempests in teapots and not to be taken seriously?

e

↑ Index

249. Carnography

Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences

Fri 14 Jun 1996

Eliza:

> does one write the scathing blast which seems to work its way into every sentence (despite efforts to be moderate)?

I try not to blast a writer who is doing anything even remotely ambitious. I also consider the books that might be written after the book I dislike--after the book I don't want said writer to choke on first.

Best, I think, to save your harshest criticisms for private conversations. Editors love harsh reviews and controversy, but that's because they aren't signing their own names to such reviews. Anger can give you amazingly clear vision, but your vision won't necessarily be balanced. Personally, I still wince at the harshest criticisms I've made in public. I hate discouraging people over trifles. After all, in the words of Montaigne's medallion, "What do I know?"

> is there something > unendurabaly prissy about condemning another writer for not trying > hard enough and publishing a very very poor book while there exists > great writers under all sorts of pressure who don't publish until they > have work that is really worthwhile, silent sometimes until their > death.

Not prissy, just misguided. Since the book is already published, slamming it won't do anything for yet-unpublished books. You'd have to be an editor at a publishing house for this sort of reasoning to apply.

> is honesty > really important or effective here? does someone have to stand up and > say when something is really awful?

Honesty is important. Tactlessness isn't.

> have you ever strongly panned a text? if so, did you regret it later?
> or did you feel a negative review was best? did it have unpleasant > consequences?

See above.

if so, could you or would you have done anything to > mitigate them? so you wish you had tried? if there were no > unpleasant consequences from the negative review, was there anything > you did that might have helped avert them?

Bottom line: I don't believe in discouraging other artists. I do offer concrete criticisms and suggestions where I think they might be helpful. But I don't believe I've ever said or written, "_....._ sucks" unless it was partly an ideological/sociological matter.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

250. Fred Muratori

Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, con

Fri 14 Jun 1996

From: Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

> have you ever strongly panned a text? if so, did you regret it later? or did you feel a negative review was best? did it have unpleasant consequences? if so, could you or would you have done anything to mitigate them? so you wish you had tried? if there were no unpleasant consequences from the negative review, was there anything you did that might have helped avert them?
>
> does any of it really matter -- are these reviews tempests in teapots and not to be taken seriously?
>
> e

I've been reviewing poetry for various venues now for about 15 years, and negative reviews are always harder to write than positive ones. They are, however, in some cases necessary. What do I mean by "in some cases?" Well, while I don't see the point in demolishing a first book by a new writer, (I've seen some good -- if not spectacular -- fledgling poets get royally whomped in big-name journals by big-name poets/critics, and it can really hurt their future reception, no matter how good their subsequent work becomes), there are lots of naked emperors out there, and I'd really like to see reviewers give them a bit more in the way of honest criticism than they're getting. In other words -- they should pick on poets their own size. It's easy to trash Mr. or Ms. Whothehellizzat with a first book from Cleveland State, but a Sharon Olds or a John Hollander or a Richard Howard? Gulp. Forget about someday seeing your own work in _Paris Review_ (or whatever mag the criticized or friend-of-the-criticized poet edits) if you do. That's part of the problem: many reviewers are themselves poets, and feel that they have to be careful about whose tree they shake. What I'd like to see -- up front -- are admissions that the reviewer was a poet's student (or teacher), or spouse, or departmental colleague, etc. When I see best buddies reviewing each other's books, I'm inclined to take the review just a little less seriously -- as little more than an extended blurb -- which is why I return review copies of books by people I'm more than only marginally acquainted with, even if I like the work.

Still, reviews -- even mixed or less-than-favorable ones -- are very important for any poet; they're part of the paper trail of existence, confirmation that someone at least noticed another's attempt to contribute to the culture.

P.S. One negative review I wrote was never printed. Turned out that the editor of the mag was having lunch with the publisher, and inadvertently let the person eyeball the review. He made such a row that the mag scrapped the piece to appease him, even though the editor professed that the review was civil and fair, and that she agreed with it. What's even more ironic -- the author was dead and the press was really little more than a vanity outfit. Go figure.

****

Fred Muratori "Certain themes are incurable."

([redacted])
Reference Services Division - Lyn Hejinian
Olin * Kroch * Uris Libraries
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853
WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html
****

↑ Index

251. Ken Edwards
post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Chris Stroffolino wrote:

Dear ken Edwards--- Could you elaborate on Miles Champion. The little I've seen is interesting and it was good to see your willingness to include him, while Ira, I think, seemed less to.....cs

Miles' book from Carcanet is, as I posted before, called _Compositional Bonbons Placate_. Great cover by Trevor Winkfield. Don't know how easy it is for you to get Carcanet books over there -- probably SPD is the place. Miles also has a chapbook from Cris Cheek's press Sound & Language, _Sore Models_. Later this year, he will be included in a mini-anthology of four poets from my own press, Reality Street Editions, probably to be titled _Sleight of Foot_.

Miles is an enthusiast for the work of Teds Berrigan and Greenwald, as well as Raworth, Ashbery et al, all of whose influences I think can be discerned in his work, which is oblique, fast-moving, amusing, uneven but definitely sparky.

↑ Index

252. Ken Edwards
post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Fri 14 Jun 1996

Amen to Cris' post. I couldn't agree more. When I spoke of "intelligent engagement" with language poetry by British poets, Ira, I did not mean slavish imitation -- that wouldn't be very intelligent. Like Cris, I can think of none of us who imitates language poetry or could be accurately described as a language poet. But some are more open to foreign models than others. Also some of the traits you discern in language poetry are independently discernible in some of the poetry being originated here.

(eg quote "the attitude to language or presence, in any number games, paragraph organisation, or relation of page to page, or dual columns, in the way that it is in any of the poets
mentioned" -- well, see Allen Fisher, passim)

Ira, I don't agree with your assessment of Miles Champion, that he is being flip or embarrassed: rather I see in him an (engagingly boyish?) enthusiasm for life and letters. He does imitate the objects of his enthusiasm from time to time, I'll grant you, but that's no bad thing necessarily, as Ted Berrigan has pointed out.

↑ Index

253. Mark Wallace
Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
Sat 15 Jun 1996

Dear Herb Levy:

Well, actually it seems to me that the value of the work of Susan Howe or Samuel Beckett (or many others, maybe) is not only obvious, but something that it would be pretty hard to argue against very successfully. One can, I suppose, have reasonable questions about the limitations of their work, but as to dismissing it entirely, I'm still under the impression that that's an opinion I don't really have to respect too much.

It's quite possible not to like John Cage's work, but to blatantly and obviously misrepresent it seems to me is another matter. Whether one likes Cage's work or not, to come to the conclusion that he's doing "nothing" when he spent years elaborating what he's doing does not seem a matter of opinion to me--I suppose one has the right to be of any "opinion" one wants, but if it's blatantly and purposefully disinformational, that's not an opinion that counts for much. Disagree with Cage, sure, that's fine. But pretend as if it's okay to act as if he never said anything at all? No way. I think I'll continue to be as angry about that as I want to be.

Actually, I appreciate your recent comments, because it gives me the wonderful opportunity to be a hard-liner again. One of the early virtues of this poetics list was that it was a forum where one didn't have to endlessly justify the basic value of avant garde poetry. Whatever the limits and problems of that poetry, at least on this list one didn't have to spend a lot of time stating obvious things like "well you know Susan Howe's actually a pretty good writer"--one could assume that the poetics forum was a place where something as obvious as that would be a given. Perhaps you're right, and this poetics list is not such a place any longer, but nonetheless I think I'm going to act as if it is.

I'm interested, I suppose, in all sorts of discussion about poetry, but the underlying assumption that I see emerging, which is that the value of this work has to be endlessly justified to others even when they refuse to engage it seriously, as Tim Page has, seems to me so much hogwash. I think I'm going to continue to assume that the importance of John Cage's work is blatant and obvious, and if someone else doesn't understand that, tough. A work of art can't defend itself, I suppose, but actually it seems to me much more reasonable to suggest that people on this list would justify themselves in the face of Cage's work, or Beckett's. Does this make me an authoritarian postmodern hard-line anti-relativist? With any luck it does. Newspapers, publishing houses (and their reviewers and art critics, most of them anyway) need to justify themselves in the face of works of art that have demolished their most basic assumptions. That such entities ignore and, when questioned, deny that they have this obligation is tantamount to an admission that they have no defence, and that they should end their own existence as quickly as possible. They won't, I know, choose to end themselves, but morally, there seems to be no question that they SHOULD. Such a position on my part is not only completely REASONABLE, but the fact that it may not seem reasonable suggests instantly the level of confusion and corruption that marks the world I live in.

So (and this has been a lot of fun), anyone who thinks that Susan Howwe, or Samuel Beckett, or John Cage, have not done significant work, are WRONG and deeply confused, and obviously need me to tell them so.

"I have not yet begun to be an extremist"

Mark Wallace

↑ Index

254. Thomas M. Orange
Freud:Woolf::Heidegger:Stein
Sat 15 Jun 1996

Funny, cuz I was reading Heidegger's "Letter on Humanism" the other night and got the distinct impression that it was really Gertrude Stein speaking:

> Thinking acts insofar as it thinks....But all working or > effecting lies in Being and is directed towards beings.
> Thinking, in contrast, lets itself be claimed by Being so that it can say the truth of Being. Thinking accomplishes this letting.

(tr. Capuzzi/Gray, _Basic Writings_ 1977 ed., 193-94)

Tom Orange
[redacted]

On Sat, 15 Jun 1996, Hardin wrote:

> Tony Green typed:
>
> Rod Smith mentioning Joan Retalack reminds me I found 3rd impression of Strachey's translation of Freud's Traumdeutung (1957?)
>
> p.207
> ".....to a remark I had de
> in which....."
>
> p.209
> " .....opposition journalists made > okes over Count Thun's name....."
>
> You know, Perry Meisel often compares Strachey's translations of Freud to _Mrs. Dalloway_ and now I know why....

↑ Index

255. McGuire Jerry L
query about ethics
Sat 15 Jun 1996

Hi, folks. Jerry McGuire, new to the list. I've been lurking for a few days to get the feel of the thing--it's like just before the inkling-moment of a new love affair, no?--and am hauled in by the thoughtful responses to Eliza McGrand's questions about writing a negative review. My first feeling was that these were generally so sharp that the topic was quickly tied off. But here are just a couple more observations:

Eliza's predicament is so _specific_--a "bad" How-To book (is there any other kind?) co-authored by a poet/academic whose prior work she evaluates as "somewhat interesting though not stellar" (so from the outset we're situated with reference not to an equal, but to a mediocrity); much of the offensiveness is metapoetic biz about "technique" that seems self-evidently knuckleheaded. And then there are the complications: the writer is identified as belonging to "a much underrepresented sector of writers" (I'm not sure what E.M. means by "sector" here, and it may matter), and the book comes from a non-hegemonic press. Furthermore, Eliza says she's herself as "new to reviewing" and professionally "vulnerable." Any of these observations might lead a reviewer into trails of inquiry that would be worth anyone's time.

It seems to me there's a contradiction between Eliza's atypical willingness to ask these questions in the first place and her desire for the clarity felt by her exemplary workshop assassin, who unambiguously declares an awful poem not worth anyone else's time. (If I read Pat Pritchett and Rob Hardin's responses properly, I'd say that they have both written hostile reviews about which they've had some second, and possibly painful second, thoughts, and so have I.)

All this points up the variety of motivations that enter into reviewing. Some respondents think of it as a service performed for writers; but clearly there are cultural, psychological, and professional gains at issue, too. One reason to write a review is that it's more lasting, more respectable, and more profitable (though not by much) than flaming. The review seems to me a relatively _little_ thing caught in a web of institutional motivations linking individual creative artists, the publishing industry, and the academy, both in its management of culture and in its maintenance of internal hierarchies of power. That Eliza claims to be (and no doubt is) "vulnerable" is evidence that more than absolute declarations of objective worth are at stake--and probably invite her nostalgia for tough talk. But the review that is worth one's work is the one that sets aside the easy brutalities of the institutional workshop (isn't it?) as well as evaluation, understood as any kind of simple matter whatsoever, and that attempts instead to discuss the text in relation to the contexts in which it's entangled. E.M. doesn't need more clarity, she requires a determination to take her self- reflection further, into institutional analysis. I think she needs to resist the evaluative tendency, and her own hostile feelings, entirely. Unless it really is just enemies' lists we're constructing in our reviews. (I think that if she plugs the proper names from her review into the set of questions she posted to this list, she'd be well on the way to writing a better review than most of those we see or write).

I'm sorry I've gone on at such length--I'll try to be briefer from now on. But one other thing I wanted to mention. Concerning Rob Hardin's claim that "Editors love harsh reviews and controversy, but that's because they aren't signing their own names to such reviews," I'm sure that's true for some. But when I was processing (fond term) reviews for _College Literature_, I and everyone else reading them were aware that hostility almost always coincides with a slackening of precision, a strutting of careless assumptions, and generally a bunch of ego-building exercises quite detached from the task of exploring a text and committing oneself to a reasoned position on it that others might respond to. And while we were nearly as agreeable to negative reviews as positive, we always discouraged hostility for its own sake, or for mere ideological and rhetorical advantage.

All best--

Jerry McGuire [redacted]

↑ Index

256. Carnography
Re: query about ethics
Sat 15 Jun 1996

Jerry McGuire typed:

> Concerning Rob Hardin's claim that
> "Editors love harsh reviews and controversy, but that's because they aren't signing their own names to such reviews," I'm sure that's true for some.

Spec:

1. Iconclastic academic magazines--here nameless because some of you write for the same ones I do and I'd rather not argue about them in public--and

2. Mainstream crossover magazines, such as _Spin_ and the _Village Voice_--which, antithetically to _The Nation_, _The Baffler_ and _Z Magazine_, torch individual artists while leaving commercial bureaucracies and conglomerates unscathed. While there is always an interest in being factually accurate and in avoiding lawsuits, the eds I've known are usually interested in generating controversy and sales without alienating their audience. The reviewee who suffers is usually the last one who should: a moderately-known writer with a certain degree of so-called underground success, or a new writer who has published a first novel.

Often, writers get trashed in the service of fashion: the reviewer has heard/read too much about a writer and therefore feels said writer is due for a drubbing. Thus, the writer gets dissed for the same reason that people once wore and stopped wearing green Levi's.

I'm not denying that editors discourage flaming, ie, mindless vicious attacks. But in my experience, they do like rude dismissals of writers who deserve far better. That is because most established would-be downtown magazines like _The Voice_ endorse mediocrity no matter what their politics might seem to suggest. And as I've said before, the defining act of mediocrity is to refuse to acknowledge good work.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

257. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: re-evaluating values
Sun 16 Jun 1996

One part of Mark's post caught my eye immediately -- I agree that howe etc. are wonderful writers, I agree that writers should not be dismissed out of hand without serious consideration, and I agree that it's not a good thing to misrepresent someone's work --

BUT I'm intrigues at the idea of Howe's value, for instance, being "obvious." I think any number of presuppositions have to be in place all ready to bring that obviousness into view -- and I think one of the problems in a writer like Page is his unwillingness to examine his own presuppositions -- Ideology is that which is taken for granted as "obvious," as non-ideological, etc. -- intrigued, actually -- not intrigues at all -- already -- and despite what you may read in the _Washington Post_, one need not be an absolute relativist to think this way --

But Mark, what really intrigues me is disagreements among people who, at first blush, might appear to share several aesthetic assumptions --

what of the people, and there are some, who, say, think Cage's writing is just hunky-dory, but who don't think it so obvious that Howe is a wonderful poet -- (my own inclination is in the opposite directions, by the way -- though I love Cage's music --) how do we go about negotiating conflicts over the terrain of the obvious?

↑ Index

258. Ward Tietz
Re: Performance Writing
Sun 16 Jun 1996

On Thursday, June 13, cris creek wrote,

"Performance Writing is what's happening here for me, for others that will not be so - difference continues to be manufactured."

chris,

Could you elaborate on your understanding of performance writing and how it relates to contemporary British work? I've gotten a sense tangentially from some of your previous posts, but I'd be interested in knowing more.

It seems to me that the context and history of performance writing is quite different if we compare, say American with European practice. In continental Europe the link back to sound poetry and even for some, Fluxus-type actions, of the '60s and earlier (I'm thinking here of the Wiener Gruppe, Doc(k)s related artists etc.) is still more or less intact, while in the U.S. the notion of performance is more strongly connected to performance art as it emerged and developed in the '60s and '70s.

Does anyone else have any thoughts on this?

Ward Tietz

↑ Index

259. Ward Tietz
hatchet job
Sun 16 Jun 1996

Dear cris cheek,

I'm very sorry for the hatchet job on your name in my previous post. I somehow got the h's and the r's all mixed up.

Yours,

Ward Tietz

↑ Index

260. Pierre Joris
Gallery Blazes (fwd)
Sun 16 Jun 1996

Thot the attached of some interest -- Pierre

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Sat, 15 Jun 1996 20:35:20 -0700 (PDT)
From: { brad brace } <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: Gallery Blazes (fwd)

DALLAS - Three women were arrested Monday for questioning in connection with the burning of at least one of two Art Galleries set ablaze overnight, officials said. The New Gallery of Art and the Gallery of the Living Curator were set on fire in the town of Whiteville, about 40 miles east of Dallas, the latest in a long string of blazes at art-galleries across the country. Fire chief George Wood said police arrested three artists and were questioning them about at least one of the fires. They were arrested on an unrelated traffic offense at around 1 a.m. and their car matched the description of witnesses who said they saw it parked outside the New Gallery of Art shortly before it went up in flames at around midnight. The blaze at the nearby Gallery of the Living Curator was reported at around 3 a.m., after the three women were arrested, but foul play is also suspected there. ``Both fires are considered to be acts of local vandalism,'' Wood told a news conference. He said he hoped they were not linked to the arson attacks against about 30 art institutions and galleries across the nation in the last 18 months. Gallery curators met with U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno on Sunday to demand greater priority be placed on the investigation into the fires. Neither of the two Whiteville galleries was totally destroyed in the latest blazes and nobody was hurt but the buildings suffered serious damage. Residents told reporters they saw two young women running away from the scene of the first fire.

—

↑ Index

261. Joseph Zitt
Re: Gallery Blazes (fwd)
Sun 16 Jun 1996

I have a feeling that this may be a gag. I live in Dallas, and hadn't heard of this, or of the supposed town of Whiteville. I think it's an adaptation of news reports about the recent torching of churches in Greenville (which is where the article says Whiteville is).

But quite possibly either everyone knew this, or I missed a real news report. ---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ===== [redacted] ===== Human Systems \||| ||/ Organizer, SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/<A HREF="http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt/">Joe Zitt's Home Page</A>\|

↑ Index

262. Jim Rosenberg
Handling the Verticals
Sun 16 Jun 1996

Today I find the following line in Blaser's poem "Mappa Mundi":

"Olson once said he wished he could learn how to handle verticals from Boulez ..."

If anyone can help me locate the source of this in Olson somewhere I would be much obliged.

--
Jim Rosenberg http://www.well.com/user/jer/
CIS: 71515,124

WELL: jer
Internet: [redacted]

↑ Index

263. Chris Stroffolino
Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Sun 16 Jun 1996

Pierre---
GALLERY OF THE LIVING CURATOR? (in CHRIST?)
is zitts right? it seems joke....

↑ Index

264. Carla Billitteri
Re: Handling the Verticals
Sun 16 Jun 1996

> Today I find the following line in Blaser's poem "Mappa Mundi":
>
> "Olson once said he wished he could learn how to handle verticals from Boulez ..."
>
> If anyone can help me locate the source of this in Olson somewhere I would be much obliged.

No doubt Olson said this to Blaser in person, or in a letter, but see also Olson's 22 August 1951 letter to Creeley (vol. 7 of the correspondence, p. 120):

When I go horizontal--literally fall, lacking, the standing- up--
If I could once more write as vertical as I take it Boulez has, in, that 2nd Sonata--as, indeed, I take it I did In Cold Hell--which, by God, if I don't write that poem, I'll inscribe (when somebody else but that prick Emerson prints it) "to Pierre Boulez, for, his 2nd Sonata"

↑ Index

265. Tony Green
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Sun 16 Jun 1996

Stones vs Beatles (early) and an afterthot or 2: It was jus that The Beatles new LP wd always come out 1 week earlier than the Stones new LP, mid 60's, Christmas time year after year. The Stones sounded raw, and looked nice and ugly, and beat, while the Beatles were so clean and tidy, ready to meet showbiz of the time half way, it seemed. The STones maybe gave an impression of being more dangerous (rightly or wrongly). The Strachey translation was 1954, not 1957. And I wonder whether jip, as in giving one pain shouldn't be sperllt "gyp". I never saw it written down. Best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

266. Charles Bernstein
Re: The Twentieth Century
Mon 17 Jun 1996

At 11:51 AM 5/30/96 EST, Burt Kimmelman wrote:

> I am slated to teach an interdisciplinary course called "The Twentieth Century World"; the course is global in scope.

I realize how fashionable it is to focus on the modern and the postmodern, but I have to question if there is enough material here to sustain an entire semester's course.

↑ Index

267. wystan
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Dear Tony,
Had the same thought re-the spelling: is it JIP or GYP? I recall the word as a verb: the bastard gyped me!! That is ripped me off. And as a noun: he gave me THE gyp. But not as an adjective.
Wystan

↑ Index

268. wystan
Re: The Twentieth Century
Mon 17 Jun 1996

> Date: Mon, 17 Jun 1996 00:27:23 -0400
> Reply-to: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Charles Bernstein <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: The Twentieth Century
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS <[redacted]>
>
> At 11:51 AM 5/30/96 EST, Burt Kimmelman wrote:

> I am slated to teach an interdisciplinary course called "The Twentieth Century World"; the course is global in scope.
>
> I realize how fashionable it is to focus on the modern and the postmodern,
> but I have to question if there is enough material here to sustain an entire > semester's course.

O Charles, it's not like you to be so negative ...give the boy his head. Burt, i've just curated this exhibition called THE WORLD OVER.Art in the Age of Globalisation. If you are in the Southern hemisphere, get over to Wellington--its on at the City Gallery there until August 11, and for the Northern hemisphere folks, it opens on June 28th in Amsterdam, at the Stedelijk Museum. And if you can't get to either, the website should be up soon. I'll post it later.

Wystan, The Worldlywise.

↑ Index

269. Alan Sondheim

Paul, Sail On

Mon 17 Jun 1996

-

Paul, Sail On

If I gather up, will you bury me, will you bury me if I gather up Your ambergris, your bronze helmet, your amber, your bronze Swollen by river's wake by cavern opening cavern awakened by the river's swell Motivated by gutted reeds cut stuttered clay, read in gorgeous monuments gone motivated If I lie with you, will you lie with me, if I lay with you will you lay with me Near the pregnant cow near the gutted horse near the emptied house by the coward's prayer Through the dim dark night by the knight's despair by the armor there If I wash for you by the river's edge and I wash for you by the same edge of the river Where down the river there is a gathering of knights and women, I think they are celebrating Telipinu at the moment

Yes, I will lie with you, I will lay with you, I will sacrifice, you will sacrifice
Your horse, your cow, yourself, against my golden hair, my eyes of blue Sparkling in the waters pooling by the marshes, waters sprinkled with blood, swollen with whitened
Bones you have slaughtered, your bones you have slaughtered

While I, while I
  I'm leaving for Telipinu.

↑ Index

270. Schuchat
Re: The Twentieth Century
Mon 17 Jun 1996

On Mon, 17 Jun 1996, Charles Bernstein wrote:

> At 11:51 AM 5/30/96 EST, Burt Kimmelman wrote:
>
> >I am slated to teach an interdisciplinary course called "The Twentieth > >Century World"; the course is global in scope.
>
> I realize how fashionable it is to focus on the modern and the postmodern,
> but I have to question if there is enough material here to sustain an entire > semester's course.
>
I presume, of course, that you will have to spend at least 60% of the time covering the 19th century, in order to establish the context for properly understanding the twentieth.

↑ Index

271. Chris Stroffolino
Re: The Twentieth Century
Mon 17 Jun 1996

"enough material"---- too much is definitely not enough.....
when i lack self-esteem, a self to confide in that ' is not JUST a brick wall, i wish i was better at generalizations.... ah, ubi sunt WCW's "universality of the local" when one needs it....
sew what

↑ Index

272. henry
Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
Mon 17 Jun 1996

On Sat, 15 Jun 1996 11:03:36 -0400 Mark Wallace said:
>
> Actually, I appreciate your recent comments, because it gives me >the wonderful opportunity to be a hard-liner again. One of the early >virtues of this poetics list was that it was a forum where one didn't >have to endlessly justify the basic value of avant garde poetry. Whatever >the limits and problems of that poetry, at least on this list one didn't >have to spend a lot of time stating obvious things like "well you know >Susan Howe's actually a pretty good writer"--one could assume that the >poetics forum was a place where something as obvious as that would be a >given. Perhaps you're right, and this poetics list is not such a place >any longer, but nonetheless I think I'm going to act as if it is.

You mean it's too bad it's not a cozy little nest anymore, where you can pat each other on the back & not have to justify yourselves, like those nasty newspapermen should?
>
A work of art can't defend >itself, I suppose, but actually it seems to me much more reasonable to >suggest that people on this list would justify themselves in the face of >Cage's work, or Beckett's. Does this make me an authoritarian postmodern >hard-line anti-relativist? With any luck it does. Newspapers, publishing >houses (and their reviewers and art critics, most of them anyway) need to >justify themselves in the face of works of art that have demolished their >most basic assumptions. That such entities ignore and, when questioned, >deny that they have this obligation is tantamount to an admission that >they have no defence, and that they should end their own existence as >quickly as >possible. They won't, I know, choose to end themselves, but morally, >there seems to be no question that they SHOULD. Such a position on my >part is not only completely REASONABLE, but the fact that it may not seem >reasonable suggests instantly the level of confusion and corruption that >marks the world I live in.

The world is corrupt because it doesn't seem as reasonable as you are? That doesn't follow. I have followed this thread with one eye open. It seems to me that you are perfectly correct to respond angrily & publicly to misrepresentations of an artist's work; also, to beg to differ publicly with reviews or evaluations you think miss the mark. What bores me is this eternal yeast of embattled-artist-selfrighteousness, that would rather efface all newspapers from the earth than admit to the contingency of culture-at-large. The FACT is, all you glorious "audience-builders" out there have absolutely no control over free aesthetic response - and that's ALL TO THE GOOD. You will never solve the problems of debased & tamed cultural atmosphere; but then again, maybe audiences should have to work a little to achieve the experimentalist's heights; maybe masterpieces NEED to hide themselves; and maybe art doesn't need so many so-called defenders - it just needs searchers & finders. These opinions emanate from one who understands very well the overwhelming dead weight of our corporate sponsors. When the real poets come, you will think you've entered a laughter-tornado, until you begin to weep.

The poem is a stone fallen from heaven;
no one will judge it. [O. Mandelstam]

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

273. J.V. Kinsella (by way of Charles Bernstein <[redacted]>)" <[redacted]>

Equipage (UK) catalogue

Mon 17 Jun 1996

EQUIPAGE / Microbrigade
a series of pamphlets of contemporary poetry

Prices include p&p if ordered direct

TO ORDER FROM EQUIPAGE:
cheques payable to Equipage
C/- Rod Mengham, Jesus College, Cambridge CB5 8BL

24 April 1992
House Breaking Apart in Slow Motion by Geoff Ward
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

31 May 1992
The Nile by John Wilkinson
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

3 August 1992
Lative by D.S. Marriott
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

31 August 1992
Stair Spirit by Denise Riley
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

15 September 1992
Blue Screen by Tom Raworth
A5, 20pp, price 2 pounds

28 September 1992
Sliverfish Macronix by Out To Lunch
A5, 32pp, price 2 pounds

9 October 1992
Leaving by Stephen Rodefer
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

27 November 1992
Sand Poles by Ulli Freer
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

30 December 1992
Reasonable Distance by Alan Halsey
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

31 December 1992
Feuds by Rod Mengham
A5, 20pp, price 2 pounds
(The Equofinality book re-set, with new cover)

28 January 1993
Not-You by J.H. Prynne
A5, 32pp, price 2 pounds

19 February 1993
Satyrs and Mephitic Angels by Drew Milne
A5, 20pp, price 2 pounds

23 April 1993
Tense Fodder by Ian Patterson
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

23 April 1993
Alien Skies by Andrew Duncan
A5, 32pp, price 2 pounds

23 April 1993 C.C.C.P. 3 Programme & examples of current work by participants in the Third Cambridge Conference of Contemporary Poetry. Poems by Thomas A. Clark, Ian Davidson, Andrew Duncan, Allen Fisher, Ulli Freer, Barbara Guest, Susan Howe, Billy Mills, Drew Milne, Alice Notley, Douglas Oliver, Stephen Rodefer, John Wilkinson, Silvia Ziranek. Drawing by Stephen Rodefer. Cover by Helen Macdonald. A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

24 July 1993
Strange Passage by Caroline Bergvall
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

29 August 1993
Four Poems by Michael Haslam
A5, 36pp, price 2 pounds

5 October 1993
The Edge by David Chaloner
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

13 November 1993
Lecture by Peter Riley
(poems)
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

26 November 1993
Viola Tricolor by Grace Lake
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

23 February 1994
Torn Off a Strip by John Wilkinson
A5, 36pp, price 2 pounds

25 February 1994
Survival by Tom Raworth
A5, 20pp, price 2 pounds

4 March 1994
Milk of Late anthology edited by Antonio Bellotti
Five poems by Stephen Rodefer; five poems by Tony Lopez; five pages of 'TM' by Ulli Freer; 'The Hungry Form' (study) by Caroline Bergvall; 'Kobro' by Rod Mengham; three poems by Christopher Cook; five poems by Antonio Bellotti; cover by Gale Lickfold.
A5, 60pp, price 2 pounds

21 April 1994
Erasers by Stephen Rodefer
A5, 40pp, price 2 pounds

22 April 1994 C.C.C.P. 4 Programme & examples of current work by participants in the Fourth Cambridge Conference of Contemporary Poetry. Poems & texts by Pierre Alferi, Derek Bailey, Olivier Cadiot, David Chaloner, Simon Fell, Barbara Guest, Michael Haslam, Peter Hughes, Fanny Howe, Grace Lake, R.F. Langley, D.S. Marriott, Peter Riley, Jacques Roubaud, Iain Sinclair, Ben Watson. Cover by Grace Lake. A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

20 May 1994
Her Weasels Wild Returning by J.H. Prynne
A5, 12pp, price 2 pounds

17 June 1994
How Peace Came by Drew Milne
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

29 November 1994
BLVD.S by Ulli Freer
A5, 32pp, price 2 pounds

29 November 1994
Turnpike Ruler by Out To Lunch
A5, 32pp, price 2 pounds

17 March 1995
Negative Equity by Tony Lopez
A5, 40pp, price 2 pounds

28 April 1995
C.C.C.P. 5
Programme & examples of current work by participants in the Fifth Cambridge Conference of Contemporary Poetry. Poems & texts by Pierre Alferi, John Beck, Steve Benson, Miles Champion, Joseph Guglielmi, John Kinsella, Tony Lopez, Richard Makin, Rod Mengham, Christopher Middleton, Maggie O'Sullivan, Anne Portugal, Geoff Ward.
A5, 28pp, price 2 pounds

28 April 1995
Bernache Nonnette by Grace Lake
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

28 April 1995
f):w3:d by Richard Makin
A5, 48pp, price 2 pound

1 May 1995
Psyche in the Gargano by Peter Hughes
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

1 November 1995
Pearl by Barry MacSweeney
A4, 28pp, price 3 (three) pounds

9 December 1995
Paul Klee's Diary by Peter Hughes
A5, 32pp, price 2 pounds

2 February 1996
Agile by Mas Abe
A5, 12pp, price 2 pounds

23 February 1996
The Radnoti Poems by John Kinsella
A5, 56pp, price 2 pounds

29 March 1996
Rilke's Duino Elegies
'barbarously recast' by Geoff Ward
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

27 April 1996
Prag by Keston Sutherland
A5, 12pp, price 2 pounds

27 April 1996
Spirit Level by Simon Perril
A5, 20pp, price 2 pounds

C.C.C.P.6
Programme & work by participants at the Sixth Cambridge Conference of Contemporary Poetry
A5, 24pp, price 2 pounds

****

Microbrigade

Publications in Print:
Chris Cheek, Cloud Eyes
Ulli Freer, Run the Disinfectant
Rod Mengham, Take A Bite
Aaron Williamson, Malediction

These publications are priced at 1 pound 25 pence (inc. inland p&p)

Equipage & Microbrigade Audio Editions
01 Tom Raworth, Big Slippers On (fourteen poems)
02 Rod Mengham, Speaking Tackle (nine poems)

c30 chrome tape 3 pounds inc. inland p&p

TO ORDER FROM MICROBRIGADE:
cheques payable to Microbrigade
C/- Ulli Freer, 7 Highwood Avenue, London N12 8QL United Kingdom

TO ORDER FROM EQUIPAGE:
cheques payable to Equipage
C/- Rod Mengham, Jesus College, Cambridge CB5 8BL

end of catalogue

↑ Index

274. Burt Kimmelman
Re: The Twentieth Century
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Wystan,

Sounds great, but I'll have to settle for the web site, alas. As for Charles, I guess his comment is the height of postmodernity or something. Charles, you are kidding, of course, but then one has to ask why you bothered to say anything of this sort, that is, that not enough has happened in the twentieth century to warrant a substantial investigation of it. this is what happens when we start to talk seriously about uncertainty, chaos theory, langpo, hi-tech ethnic cleansing, and the like. To quote Creeley, "and and becomes just so"

Burt
(mr. enigmatic)

↑ Index

275. Henry
Re: When the real poets come
Mon 17 Jun 1996

On Mon, 17 Jun 1996 09:47:38 -0500 Jordan Davis said:
>Is James Joyce really a great writer?

Well, a number of people have thought so, especially in the 20th century, paradoxically. Nevertheless, Mr. Joyce himself always felt, and likewise said, to many friends and acquaintances, and I quote: "Life and labor bring their many and varied rewards as we journey on its highways and quaint byways -- but the greatest aim in my life has been simply this: to be a decent humming bean." - J-squared

↑ Index

276. Charles Bernstein
"He's So Heavy, He's My Sokal" (song)
Mon 17 Jun 1996

HE’S SO HEAVY, HE’S MY SOKAL

after Danny Kaye and Milton Schafer

Please, please don’t Sokal me
Sokal the baby, Sokal the priest
But don’t, don’t Sokal me
I’m laughing so hard I could cry

If I Sokaled you
You wouldn’t like it
You wouldn’t approve
If I Sokaled you
You’d Sokal so hard you would split

O, O let go of my ‘no’
It isn’t so funny you goof
Oh, no I’ve misplaced the sunny
Stop or I’ll fall up through the roof

But please, please don’t Sokal me
Sokal the baby, Sokal the priest
Sokal your mother, Sokal your brother,
Sokal some other guy
But don’t, don’t Sokal me
I’m laughing so hard I could sigh

Cut it out now, cut it out now!
I’m historicized, I can’t take it anymore!
Come on, beat it, get out of here!
You’re symtomizing me!
I’m practically reified!

Wait until I get you, you piece of ….
Cut it out ’cause I’m getting sore

And please, please don’t Sokal me
Sokal the baby, Sokal the priest
Sokal your father, Sokal your sister,
Sokal some other guy
But don’t, don’t Sokal me
I’m laughing so hard I could cry

© 1996 by Poets’ Ludicrously Aimless Yearning (PLAY)

↑ Index

277. Emily Lloyd
Sonnet!: What to Name the 20th-century World-Baby?
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Mark, Herny, Chas, C(h)ris, Steve, Marisa, Ann, Deirdre, Herb, Wystan, Joe, Carla, Tan, Jeff, Bob, Simon, Pierre, Burt, Maria, Ed, Rod, Larry, Bill, Juliana, Louis, Kenny, Garrett, Alan, Joe, Tom, Rob, Ken, Jorge, Fred, Ron, Jerry, Dan, Dodie, Kevin, Marjorie, Michael, George, Tony, Ira, Romana, Andrew, Jonathan, Ursula, Charles, David, Laura, Aldon, Daniel, Keith, Eliza, Emily, Mike, Dave, Annie, James Joyce Jordan

_____
or,

early Stones > early Beatles > James Joyce

~~~
~~~

the kinks? animals? etc. blow up the BINARY pretty much or the zombies.
susan howe would not be dusty springfield in such a context (neither would fanny)--but nor would she be charlie rich-- the pre-smaltzy famous charlie rich which is actually suprisingly good on my tapedeck now and really challenging my prejudices and making me redraw my mental conceptual map at least as much as the world-baby ODORONO conference which I am off to now will (in fact, just found out I MAY be able to see Hank Lazer's panel now and that JOHN SHOPTAW cancelled out---which points me on a

↑ Index

280. cris cheek
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Mon 17 Jun 1996

And I wonder whether jip, as >in giving one pain shouldn't be sperllt "gyp". I never saw it >written down. Best
>
>
>Tony Green,

Gyp it is Tony, indeed. I worry about that spelling though, it having a common with gypsy - and since one dictionary def. of gyp gives cheat and swindler there seems to be heavy prejudice there. Hence the 'jip'.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

281. Glover, Albert
Re: POETICS Digest - 15 Jun 1996 to 16 Jun 1996
Mon 17 Jun 1996

I agree with Carla Billitteri's post about Olson's remark to Robin. Anyone interested in the Olson/Blaser/Boulez 2nd Sonata confluence might be interested in Robin's Bach's Belief, #10 of A Curriculum of the Soul, available for $10 from Glover Publishing, RI 203 / SLU, Canton, NY 13617

Looking forward to Orono reports.

Al Glover
[redacted]

↑ Index

282. Charles Alexander

Re: When the real poets come

Mon 17 Jun 1996

> Mark, Herny, Chas, C(h)ris, Steve, Marisa, Ann, Deirdre, Herb, Wystan, Joe, Carla, Tan, Jeff, Bob, Simon, Pierre, Burt, Maria, Ed, Rod, Larry, Bill, Juliana, Louis, Kenny, Garrett, Alan, Joe, Tom, Rob, Ken, Jorge, Fred, Ron, Jerry, Dan, Dodie, Kevin, Marjorie, Michael, George, Tony, Ira, Romana, Andrew, Jonathan, Ursula, Charles, David, Laura, Aldon, Daniel, Keith, Eliza, Emily, Mike, Dave, Annie,
> Is James Joyce really a great writer?
> Jordan

is he?

O tell me all about Anna Livia! I want to hear all about Anna Livia. Well, you know Anna Livia? Yes, of course, we all know Anna Livia. Tell me all. Tell me now. You'll die when you hear. Well, you know, when the old cheb went furt and did what you know. Yes, I know, go on. Wash quit and don't be dabbling. Tuck up your sleeves and loosen your talktapes. And don't butt me -- hike! -- when you bend. Or whatever it was they threed to make out he thried to two in the Fiendish park. He's an awful old reppe. Look at the shirt of him! Look at the dirt of it! He has all my water black on me. And it steeping and stuping since this time last wik. How many goes is it I wonder I washed it? I know by heart the places he likes to saale, duddurty devil! Scorching my hand and starving my famine to make his private linen public. Wallop it well with your battle and clean it. My wrists are wrusty rubbing the mouldaw stains. And the dneepers of wet and the gangres of sin in it! What was it he did a tail at all on Animal Sendia? And how long was he under loch and neagh? It was put in the newses what he did, nicies and priers, the King fierceas Humphrey, with illysus distilling, exploits and all. But toms will till. I know he well. Temp untamed will hist for no man. As you spring so shall you neap. O, the roughty old rappe! Minxing marrage and making loof. . . .

---

yes, i think so. at least, to me, he's great fun to read, and more

charles

↑ Index

283. Jordan Davis
pcoet and tlooth
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Pcoet an Tlooth wer waking don th' stree. Pcoet sad t' Tlooth, 'Come th' rev'lution, w'll b seing th' ral pots.' Tlooth, sd, sad t' Pcoet, 'Bt hard laugter torndo ccompanies r'volution. Don' th't scar yu?' 'Na! Jus wee litle.'

↑ Index

284. Goulding
Re: pcoet and tlooth
Mon 17 Jun 1996

On Mon, 17 Jun 1996 11:22:10 -0500 Jordan Davis said:
>Pcoet an Tlooth wer waking don th' stree. Pcoet sad t' Tlooth, 'Come th' >rev'lution, w'll b seing th' ral pots.' Tlooth, sd, sad t' Pcoet, 'Bt hard >laugter torndo ccompanies r'volution. Don' th't scar yu?' 'Na! Jus wee >litle.'

Twas a way lighter wee doom the trialfather Pcoat duffered so: "Torn ala nudo! Wheelye yon bakers, dozin in the ray! Spanner that spindial, yeh spokeyed spoffer!" Beetred and bettered, Tlooth did sigh: "Quizzical meat? Wrother bothy thy forktong and wed a buffalo tune!" Sodalitassled, they onword dallied into the fernbread corn. - Hailie Goulding

↑ Index

285. David Baratier
Re: when the real poets come
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Jordan

Is James Joyce really a great writer?

In answer, yesterday I not only was allowed a glimpse of his magnitude as a literary technician but also finally understood his grasp of the oral tradition through the aged patrons of the Rosenbach Library in Philly (which houses the original manuscript of Ulyssess) who sat around most of bloomsday drinking free harp, guiness and delivering Ulysses in 10 minute speaker, singer, mutterer, change-ups. To contain such a multiplicity of voices within the reading of one text, now I fully comprehend what you weirdo big-city avant-guardists are talking about.

David Baratier

↑ Index

286. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: everywhere the obvious was becoming less so
Mon 17 Jun 1996

One couldn't ask for better illustration of the points I was making -- what has to be in place for the "obviousness" of the gallery fires gag to be apparent? For how many readers will the report of initical arrests of artists as suspects track with the FBI's investigations of the congregants of the churches burned? ("initial," not "initical etc. for all "obvious" errors to follow) --

When the "authorities," having arrested people who have burned black churches comment that they are not sure that racial motives were in play, why is it not obvious to them that most white people (even in the South) would probably have found a white church more readily at hand for burning if simple vandalism were the intent? The L.A. Times this morning carries a short follow-up on the obviously distrubed thirteen-year-old girl who was arrested for one of the fires -- In the first line of the story they report that the girl expresses anti-religious sentiments. They mention that the authorities doubt that the girl was racially motivated, and they report doubts that the girl knew that black people attended the church. THEN they report that the girl also expresses strong anti-black beliefs.

If racism is not the motive in these fires, wouldn't we expect a considerably larger number of white churches to be burning? Why is it not obvious to most "authorities" and the press that this is so?

A troubling, but effective gag, that gallery story -- meanwhile, I'm off to Maine -- check in again with everybody in about a week --

↑ Index

287. Steve Carll
Re: When the real poets come
Mon 17 Jun 1996

At 09:47 AM 6/17/96 -0500, you wrote:
>Mark, Herny, Chas, C(h)ris, Steve, Marisa, Ann, Deirdre, Herb, Wystan, Joe, >Carla, Tan, Jeff, Bob, Simon, Pierre, Burt, Maria, Ed, Rod, Larry, Bill, >Juliana, Louis, Kenny, Garrett, Alan, Joe, Tom, Rob, Ken, Jorge, Fred, Ron, >Jerry, Dan, Dodie, Kevin, Marjorie, Michael, George, Tony, Ira, Romana, >Andrew, Jonathan, Ursula, Charles, David, Laura, Aldon, Daniel, Keith, >Eliza, Emily, Mike, Dave, Annie,
>Is James Joyce really a great writer?
>Jordan

Jordan:

Yes.

||||||

WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html
****

↑ Index

290. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH
(no subject)
Mon 17 Jun 1996

dear poetics:

Robert Kendall recently posted this to another list--

> Readers of this list may be interested to know of the recent publication of the late bp Nichol's collection of kinetic visual poems, "First Screening." These aren't hypertext, but some of them are decidedly nonlinear. The poems where written during the early1980s in BASIC on an Apple II and translated into Hypercard by the editors.
>
> Nichol was well-known in his native Canada, though most Americans don't know his work. These poems are witty and entertaining and it's astonishing that they were written so long ago. I wonder what else will creep out of the woodwork of the early days of personal computing.
>
> The publisher is:
>
> Red Deer College Press
> 56 Ave. and 32nd Street
> Box 5005
> Red Deer, Alberta
> Canada T4N 5H5

↑ Index

291. cris cheek
Re: When the real poets come
Mon 17 Jun 1996

> On Mon, 17 Jun 1996 09:47:38 -0500 Jordan Davis said:
> Is James Joyce really a great writer?
>
> Well, a number of people have thought so, especially in the 20th century, paradoxically.

People in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries thought that Joyce was pretty terrific too - but that's just hearsay, ain't it?

love and love
cris

↑ Index

292. Joseph Zitt
Re: Not exactly Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
Mon 17 Jun 1996

On 17 Jun 96 at 19:08, Herb Levy wrote:

> In any case, let me suggest a different tack to take with Tim Page, that may be the most effective in the long run. Call him at the Post, explain that you disagreed with some aspects of his Cage piece & ask him to coffee or a drink to discuss it. I think there are better than even odds that he would take you up on it. Moreover, if you hung out for a while, you'd probably find that you had more interests in common & that he probably isn't an overall schmuck.

To chime in in agreement: Tim Page is responsible for turning me on to a lot of New Music in the early eighties (I think -- my timesense is lousy) through his broadcasts on WNYC. I also have a tape of a very good radio interview he did with Cage back then, some of which is transcribed in his book "Music from the Road" which has shown up on remainder racks all over the place in the past few weeks. He's also, if I recall, in charge of the Catalyst record label, which has released several very good CDs of contemporary music (even if he did try to tag his Cage disc as newage!). ---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ==== [redacted] ===== Human Systems \||| ||/ Organizer, SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/<A HREF="http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt/">Joe Zitt's Home Page</A>\|

↑ Index

293. Carnography
Re: The Twentieth Century
Mon 17 Jun 1996

> At 11:51 AM 5/30/96 EST, Burt Kimmelman wrote:
>
> I am slated to teach an interdisciplinary course called "The Twentieth Century World"...

At 12:27 AM 6/17/96, Charles Bernstein typed:

> ...I have to question if there is enough material here to sustain an entire semester's course.

Do any of you recall an old film called _The Twentieth Century_? It was about a deluxe railroad train called, of course, The Twentieth Century. The train was meant to exemplify progress and perspective: in the characters' view, the world had reached its apex, and technology and aesthetics had resulted in a perfect marriage of hedonism and efficiency. And everytime something went wrong with the Tintanicized train, someone would say:

"This can't be happening! This is the Twentieth Century!"

This is, of course, the usual criticism of the modernist's flawed, cold future--though done amusingly well in this case. But I love thinking of this film when people make sweeping statements about art in the Twentieth Century.

§§§

1991), Sound Off (Detour Press, 1993), and No Island (Drogue Press, 1995). His visual poetry includes Stigma (Score, 1990), and Malleable Cast (Generator, 1995). In the middle 1980's Spencer Selby began SINK Press in San Francisco, where he still resides, and he coordinated the Canessa Park Reading Series from 1987 - 1993. In 1993 Selby created The List of Experimental Poetry/Art Magazines, a noncopyrighted, freely circulating document that tracks over 250 publications around the world.

JOHN BYRUM John Byrum's most recent books include Utter (with Arleen Hartman; Potes & Poets, 1995), Orange (Generator, 1995), Black Fire (Burning Press 1995), and Interalia (Leave Books). He has also appeared in numerous magazines & anthologies; The Art Of Practice (Dennis Barone & Peter Ganick eds., Potes & Poets Press) and Writing From The New Coast (O*blek magazine) among them. He was a featured artist in the show Visible Language at the Sandusky Cultural Arts Center eariler this year. He edited (with Crag Hill) the 1993 CORE: Symposium on Contemporary Visual Poetry, and has published numerous books under the Generator Press imprint, as well as Generator Magazine (issue #7, in 2 volumes, "whydoyoudowhatyoudo?", is the most recent).

This reading is FREE

For further information, please contact the William Busta Gallery at [redacted], or luigi-bob drake at [redacted] (or e-mail, [redacted]).

I hope anyone on the poetics list visiting or living near here will come, likewise those not on the list, and those nowhere near Cleveland, living or...

lbd
Burning Press/TapRoot Reviews

↑ Index

295. Herb Levy
Not exactly Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Dear Mark Wallace,

Our differences seem to arise when we consider how this work is received in the larger cultural community. I am able to imagine readers of poetry who are serious about what they read (& others with similarly limited interests in other forms of art), for whom the merits of experimental innovation are far from obvious. You seem to discount this possibility.

In any case, let me suggest a different tack to take with Tim Page, that may be the most effective in the long run. Call him at the Post, explain that you disagreed with some aspects of his Cage piece & ask him to coffee or a drink to discuss it. I think there are better than even odds that he would take you up on it. Moreover, if you hung out for a while, you'd probably find that you had more interests in common & that he probably isn't an overall schmuck.

Looking back on our correspondence here (after a few days with my server down), I think it may have been better if I had begun with whatever the cyber-equivalent of such an approach might be.

Bests

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

296. Carnography
Re: When the real poets come
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Jordan Davis typed:

> Is James Joyce really a great writer?

1) Jordan Davis, you carcinogenic node on the cords of Irish Lit. How dare you insinuate that your question is open to question? There is a kind of ineffable greatness lent to the work of anyone who is published widely and continuously for decades. This is like asking whether or not Syndney Sheldon is a great writer: damned straight he is.

I pray you'll stop wasting your time with such counterproductive, go-nowhere questions and develop a taste for the Impressionists. I say this not because I'm angry (I forgive you, darling) but because I am worried about your spiritual and economic future. From the looks of your comments, I'd say you were unhappy, confused, honey-blonde, 5'8" with a mole on your right shin, wearing a baseball cap with the motto, Don't even think about it written across the brim, and given to long, expensive tirades in that corner Seven-Eleven in Bend, Oregon, where your comments suggest you may or may not exist.

2) Joyce? Yeah, _Chamber Music_....the old blind guy could sure crank out the quatrains, huh? I mean, when when he was young and all.... Yeah, he's great, like all those dudes were: Joyce, Flann O'Brien, Dickenson, Keats, Thomas Jefferson, Synge, that guy Shakespeare, Thomas Edison, Rikki Lake, Paul McCartney, Stockhausen, Lionel Johnson, Jeremy Irons, Bunny Shane, that blonde guy in Soul Coughing, Robert Creeley, Alicia Silverstone...

3) Thanks for your query, _[Jordan Davis]_. Our researchers are still working on the possible toxicity of pollutants in the novels of Upton Sinclair, but we'll get back to you as soon as we possibly can. Your question is very important to us

[Jordan Davis]. Please be patient and stay on the line. (Sound of baroque music and line-static merging)

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

297. Charles Alexander
(no subject)
Mon 17 Jun 1996

As a friend and publisher of bp's work, I know he's not entirely unkown in the States. He's Chax's best-selling author thus far, although it's true that many of those sales have been in Canada.

Just a note to know that First Screening is only available for the Macintosh computer.

charles alexander

> dear poetics:
>
> Robert Kendall recently posted this to another list--
>
> Readers of this list may be interested to know of the recent publication of the late bp Nichol's collection of kinetic visual poems, "First Screening." These aren't hypertext, but some of them are decidedly nonlinear. The poems where written during the early1980s in BASIC on an Apple II and translated into Hypercard by the editors.
>
> Nichol was well-known in his native Canada, though most Americans don't know his work. These poems are witty and entertaining and it's astonishing that they were written so long ago. I wonder what else will creep out of the woodwork of the early days of personal computing.
>
> The publisher is:
>
> Red Deer College Press
> 56 Ave. and 32nd Street
> Box 5005
> Red Deer, Alberta
> Canada T4N 5H5

↑ Index

298. Carnography
Tintanicized
Mon 17 Jun 1996

Tintanic (*adj8) (Amer.: Titanic, Teutonic, Rin-Tin-Tin) 1. Any failed Twentieth Century technological eidolon that is meant to be futuristic, superior and friendly. 2. Any technologically-based public demonstration of power that fails. Tintanicize (vt) 3. To be made ade part of the iconography of the Second World War, or of the iconography of consumer/war technology in the Nineteen-Forties.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

299. William Northcutt
Joyce a poet
Tue 18 Jun 1996

Dear Chris:

Joyce is not early Beatles.

He is acid-blot Beatles.

And he rules.

William Northcutt

↑ Index

300. Jordan Davis
the vogue for Turgenev
Tue 18 Jun 1996

Can anybody explain (contradict? support?) the recent vogue for Turgenev? W. Alexander cites T. as an influence, I'm told, and R. Creeley has also famously taken to T.
Curious in Hood River,
Jordan

↑ Index

301. Annie Finch
Re: reviews -- a query about ethics, contexts, and consequences
Tue 18 Jun 1996

Dear Eliza,

Re the question of how to review work you don't think very good, I offer two points to steer between:

1. It is necessary to be absolutely honest; probably it's even better for the book's attention quotient if it gets an intelligently censurious review as opposed to a generically approving one, and better for the small press as well. If you can find a few things you like (perhaps only to say you wish the writer had done more of them),t he press can always pull those out to quote if they need blurbs. No point writing it if you can't be honest.

2. Undue negativity, out of proportion to the book's weight and impact (for instance, bitter condemnation directed towards a young and unestablished writer) is irresponsible and may very likely come back to haunt you.

If this seems a paradoxical couple of tenets, I'd suggest moving attention quickly away from the book in question and towards the larger evils it embodies for you. In this case, it seems that the book exemplifies some fo the worst tics of the creative writing establishment in your view. Why not focus on those, thus deflecting attention from the poor writer, who is perhaps as much a victim as a perpetrator?

I just received a copy of the new American Book Review wherein I quite seriously criticized a book on prosody, but largely by drawing attention to the way the book's shortcomings reflect widespread misunderstandings. So far, I haven't regretted it . . . . .

Good luck.

Annie Finch

↑ Index

302. Jonathan A Levin
Re: the vogue for Turgenev
Tue 18 Jun 1996

Jordan,

Nothing to say about the Turgenev wave, such as it is, but I do recommend Henry James's marvellous spate of essays on him, especially the last, published in 1896 in the Library of the World's Best Literature (reprinted all over the place). I think James liked Turgenev more than any other writer, pound for pound. He also enjoyed his company a good deal.

Best--

Jonathan

↑ Index

303. cris cheek
Re: Performance Writing
Tue 18 Jun 1996

Hi Ward and all,

this question feels like it's got a large skid under it before i even start delving.

My own sense of Performance Writing, shared broadly with those few practitioners here with whom i have almost regular contact, is of very much an emergent interdisciplinarity. Much like the gradual highlighting of Performance Studies in Cultural Studies.

One of the difficult and delightful (simultaneously) aspects of working in such a field, both as teacher and student, lies in the magpie activity of grafting on influences and role models.

My sense of context and history in the UK, at present, is of being grounded in a discourse of mainland European - north American - and Carribean approaches, but far from exclusively so. There's a 'pick 'n' mix' possible for the would-be. That includes the sound-text-sound, poesie sonore practitioners, yes the Fluxus (and let's not forget Fluxshoe) activity, and that which emerged, in the US (via the '52 Black Mountain nonmatrixed event) into Happenings and Judson Church, while in the UK becoming the Destruction in Art Symposium, John Bull Puncture Repair Kit etc and Performance Art. Then there are the lettriste / situationist strands and the Guy Debord - Asger Jorn 'derives' leeching into Doc(k)s (and the work out of de Appel in Amsterdam in the 1970s, I'm thinking of Ulysses Carrion and Michael Gibbs and Maurricio Nannucci, who amongst others brought politicised conceptual art approaches to language) where Julien Blaine and Ben Possett and the Italian nexus around Scassi mingled. Then there are US performance or Live Art models, although you're right Ward, they seem less interesting (from the point of writing - perhaps being too embroiled in sometimes simplistic narration of nation and identity, although with reason) than some of the European and Carribean influences. Of course there's a host of rapping, as well as mapping, figures to take on board.

Having said all of which, the obvious practitioners here at present (including Brian Catling, Caroline Bergvall, Aaron Williamson, Gary Stevens, Tim Etchells, Jools Gilson-Ellis, Orphan Drift, Stewart Home, Donna Rutherford, Sticksman, Keith Jafrate, Jean Breeze, Linton Kwesi Johnson, Bob Cobbing, Alaric Sumner) are mostly coming from a background in poetry. There are some influences of LSD phase Wooster Group (now being worked here by Goat Island from Chicago, who seem to be appreciated here more than in the US). There is some revival of the Arte Povera aesthetic going on now as i write (or we speak). But many of those working in Performance WRiting have at least practical understandings of other art forms. Music and Visual Performance would be the most obvious shared art forms (highly appropriate for language, don't you feel?).

Let's name names of those whose work is in the pot: - Sophie Calle, Jackson MacLow, Annette Messager, Ann Hamilton, Gary Hill, John Cage, Coco Fusco, Michael Smith, Marcel Broodthers, Steve Benson, Alison Knowles, Bernard Heidsieck, Yves Daoust, Carla Harryman, David Antin, bp nicol, Steve McCaffery, Jean 'binta' Breeze, The Fabulous Troubadours, Henri Chopin, Ellen Zweig, Eric Belgum, Spalding Gray, Gil Scott-Heron, Fiona Templeton, Lee 'Scratch' Perry, Karen Finlay, Kathy Acker, William Burroughs, Monique Wittig, Samuel Beckett, Laurie Anderson, Patty Smith, Bengt Emil-Johnson, Larry Wendt, Pierre Schaeffer, Robert Ashley, Robert Smithson, Jenny Holzer, Hazel Smith, Bob Marley, Shelley Hirsch and many more . . . these are simply some pointers. A performance writing practice can work a wonderfully broad pallette at present.

Sonic traditions and anti-traditions - visual traditions and anti-traditions (i still like something of the parallel tradition suggested in a lengthy exchange between Ron Silliman and Alfred Corn on CAP-L last year) - performance traditions and anti-traditions - uses and abuses of technological potentials.

ok - now we can go to the next stage.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

304. Gwyn McVay
Re: Tintanicized
Tue 18 Jun 1996

Tintinicized: to be made into a Belgian boy reporter with plus-fours and socks and a cowlick that never fall down.

↑ Index

305. Ward Tietz
of the STRENUOUS TYPE
Wed 19 Jun 1996

I came across this in Kant and thought it might apply to some of the more recent polemics.

"Every affectation of the STRENUOUS TYPE (such that is, as excites the consciousness of our power of overcoming every resistance ('animus strenuus')) is

'aesthetically sublime,' e. g. anger, even desperation (the 'rage of forlorn hope,' but not 'faint-hearted' despair)" (Kant in part I of the "Critique of Aesthetic Judgement").

This seems to account for the appeal of a lot of "difficult" work, perhaps preferably with the notion of "difficult" applying to the entire social context of a work and not just its immediately apprehensible aesthetic.

I recognize that "a politics of form" is supposed to be able to absorb a transcendent function into its own formulation of action and thought, but what if this absorption has over-ramified, stalled, or is otherwise indigestible to a larger society? Can we use the sublime to reconfigure a more inclusive explanation?

Ward Tietz

↑ Index

306. Pierre Joris

DROMO: Thomas Kuhn Dies (fwd)

Wed 19 Jun 1996

Thot this wld inetrest the list -- Pierre

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 19 Jun 1996 10:15:23 GMT
From: John Young <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Cc: [redacted],
[redacted], [redacted]
Subject: DROMO: Thomas Kuhn Dies

The New York Times, June 19, 1996, p. B7.

Thomas Kuhn, 73; Devised Science Paradigm [Obituary]

By Lawrence Van Gelder

Thomas S. Kuhn, whose theory of sclentific revolution became a profoundly influential landmark of 20th-century intellectual history, died on Monday at his home in Cambridge, Mass. He was 73.

Robert Dilorio, associate director of the news office at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, said the scholar, who held the title of professor emeritus at M.I.T., had been ill with cancer in recent years.

"The Structure of Scientific RevoIutions," was conceived while Protessor Kuhn was a graduate student in theoretical physics and published as a monograph in the International Encyclopedia of Unified Science before the University of Chicago Press issued it as a 180-page book in 1962. The work punctured the widely held notion that scientific change was a strictly rational process.

Professor's Kuhn's treatise influenced not only scientists but also economists, historians, sociologists and philosophers, touching off considerable debate. It has sold about one million copies in 16 languages and remains required reading in many basic courses in the history and philosophy of science.

Dr. Kuhn, a professor of philosophy and history of science at M.I.T. from 1979 to 1983 and the Laurence S. Rockefeller Professor of Philosophy there from 1983 until 1991, was the author or co-author of five books and scores of articles on the philosophy and history of science. But Dr. Kuhn remained best known for "The Structure of Scientific Revolutions."

His thesis was that science was not a steady, cumulative acquisition of knowledge. Instead, he wrote, it is "a series of peaceful interludes punctuated by intellectually violent revolutions." And in those revolutions, he wrote, "one conceptual world view is replaced by another."

Thus, Einstein's theory of relativity could challenge Newton's concepts of physics. Lavoisier's discovery of oxygen could sweep away earlier ideas about phlogiston, the imaginary element believed to cause combustion. Galileo's supposed experiments with wood and lead balls dropped from the Leaning Tower of Pisa could banish the Aristotelian theory that bodies fell at a speed proportional to their weight. And Darwin's theory of natural selection could overthrow theories of a world governed by design.

Professor Kuhn argued in the book that the typical scientist was not an objective, free thinker and skeptic. Rather, he was a somewhat conservative individual who accepted what he was taught and appiied his knowledge to solving the problems that came before him.

In so doing, Professor Kuhn maintained, these scientists accepted a paradigm, an archetypal solution to a problem, like Ptolemy's theory that the Sun revolves around the Earth. Generally conservative, scientists would tend to solve problems in ways that extended the scope of the paradigm.

In such periods, he maintained, scientists tend to resist research that might signal the development of a new paradigm, like the work of the astronomer Aristarchus, who theorized in the third century B.C. that the planets revolve around the Sun. But, Professor Kuhn said, situations arose that the paradigm could not account for or that contradicted it.

And then, he said, a revolutionary would appear, a Lavoisier or an Einstein, often a young scientist not indoctrinated in the accepted theories, and sweep the old paradigm away.

These revolutions, he said, came only after long periods of tradition-bound normal science. "Frameworks must be lived with and explored before they can be broken," Professor Kuhn said.

The new paradigm cannot build on the one that precedes it, he maintained. It can only supplant it. The two, he said, were "incommensurable."

Some critics said Professor Kuhn was arguing that scieace was little more than mob rule. He replied, "Look, I think that's nonsense, and I'm prepared to argue that."

The word paradigm appeared so frequently in Professor's Kuhn's "Structures" and with so many possible meanings prompting debate that he was credited with popularizing the word and inspiring a 1974 cartoon in The New Yorker. In. it, a woman tells a man: "Dynamite, Mr. Gerston! You're the first person I ever heard use 'paradigm' in real life."

Professor Kuhn traced the origin of his thesis to a moment in 1947 when he was working toward a doctorate in physics at Harvard. James B. Conant, the chemist who was the president of the university, had asked him to teach a class in science for undergraduates majoring in the humanities. The focus was to be historical case studies.

Until then, Professor Kuhn said later, "I'd never read an old document in science." As he looked through Aristotle's "Physics" and realized how astonishingly unlike Newton's were its concepts of motion and matter, he concluded that Aristotle's physics were not "bad Newton" but simply different.

Professor Kuhn received a doctorate in physics, but not long afterward he switched to the history of science exploring the mechanisms that lead to scientific change.

"I sweated blood and blood and blood, and finally I had a breakthrough," he said.

Thomas Samuel Kuhn, the son of Samuel L. Kuhn, an industrial engineer, and the former Annette Stroock, was born on July 18, 1922, in Cincinnati.

In 1943, he graduated summa cum laude from Harvard with a bachelor's degree in physics.

During World War II, he served as a civilian employee at Harvard and in Europe with the Office of Scientific Research and Development.

He received master's and doctoral degrees in physics from Harvard in 1946 and 1949. From 1948 to 1956, he held various posts at Harvard, rising to an assistant professorship in general education and the history of science.

He then joined the faculty of the University of California at Berkeley, where he was named a professor of history of science in 1961. In 1964, he joined the faculty at Princeton, where he was the M. Taylor Pyne Professor of Philosophy and History of Science until 1979, when he joined the faculty of M.I.T.

Professor Kuhn was a Guggenheim Fellow in 1954-55, the winner of the George Sarton Medal in the History of Science in 1982, and the holder of honorary degrees from many institutions, among them the University of Notre Dame, Columbia University, the University of Chicago the University of Padua and the University of Athens.

He is survived by his wife, Jehane and three children, Sarah Kuhn of Framingham, Mass., Elizabeth Kuhn of Los Angeles and Nathaniel Kuhn of Arlington, Mass.

[Photo] Thomas S. Kuhn

[End]

↑ Index

307. Henry Gould
Re: Performance Writing
Wed 19 Jun 1996

Re "performance poyets" you left out Lev Rubenstein of Russia, one of the earliest, best, & most original. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

308. Henry Gould
Re: of the STRENUOUS TYPE
Wed 19 Jun 1996

On Wed, 19 Jun 1996 01:24:13 EDT Ward Tietz said:
>
>This seems to account for the appeal of a lot of "difficult" work, perhaps >preferably with the notion of "difficult" applying to the entire social context >of a work and not just its immediately apprehensible aesthetic.
>
>I recognize that "a politics of form" is supposed to be able to absorb a >transcendent function into its own formulation of action and thought, but what >if this absorption has over-ramified, stalled, or is otherwise indigestible to >a >larger society? Can we use the sublime to reconfigure a more inclusive >explanation?

Maybe it's a way of getting a different angle on politically-loaded aesthetics. Not for the purpose of de-politicizing but for seeing the art/world situation more clearly. But if you're going to "use the sublime" it would seemingly have to be done within a larger frame of achievable form in art. Is the sublime in "difficult art" a kind of dead-end self-destruct situation? Or can it be allied with an implicit "coherence", a humane life-order or life-process? I think, believe it or not, that there is something valid in the Coleridgean idea of organic form - that art & biology share asymmetrical symmetries understood in some way since the Egyptians at least. The sublime in this case would correspond to the human awareness of death and the change in ethics and metaphysics which this entails - & what distinguishes moral human consciousness from instinctual drives & the vegetation per se. If art is an asymmetrical life-process - not crystalline, not purely symmetrical - aiming for coherences - well, maybe this brings back a different concept of imagination than has reigned since modernism. Style is a matter of emphasis - Dada throws the huge art cabbage out the window; Klee plants it in the back of his head. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

309. Robert J Wilson
Yes to the Sublime, No to the Beauteous
Wed 19 Jun 1996

Dear Ward Tietz, Say yes to the aesthetics and politics of the/a (deformed) sublime, and "no to the beautiful" (beauteous) sonnets of, say, Richard Lord Wilbur. I could not agree more, nor less, with your "strenuous type" politics and aesthetics of the deformed, de-bounded and de-legislated play of form, from multi-centers and trajectories, not just (Emanuel) Kant or (postmodernism explained to infants) Lyotard as ground of such languaging activity. Regards from "that loveliest fleet of islands [Hawaii to Mark Twain as "tourist-author"] that lies [lies?] achored in any ocean [as in, say, Pearl Harbor as a work of the American sublime as nuclearized Pacific?], Rob Wilson

On Tue, 18 Jun 1996, Ward Tietz wrote:

> I came across this in Kant and thought it might apply to some of the more recent polemics.
>
> "Every affectation of the STRENUOUS TYPE (such that is, as excites the consciousness of our power of overcoming every resistance ('animus strenuus')) is 'aesthetically sublime,' e. g. anger, even desperation (the 'rage of forlorn hope,' but not 'faint-hearted' despair)" (Kant in part I of the "Critique of Aesthetic Judgement").
>
> This seems to account for the appeal of a lot of "difficult" work, perhaps preferably with the notion of "difficult" applying to the entire social context of a work and not just its immediately apprehensible aesthetic.
>
> I recognize that "a politics of form" is supposed to be able to absorb a transcendent function into its own formulation of action and thought, but what if this absorption has over-ramified, stalled, or is otherwise indigestible to a larger society? Can we use the sublime to reconfigure a more inclusive explanation?
>
> Ward Tietz

↑ Index

310. Daniel Bouchard
ORONO
Wed 19 Jun 1996

I waved goodbye this morning to Chris Stroffolino and George Hartley as they began negotiating Boston's commuter traffic on their way to the conference in Maine. I waited for the trolley to work, feeling really silly that my job makes an academic conference look like an adventure.

What's the Orono conference all about anyway? I guess that most people attending won't read this post for several days but I do hope there is some significant reportage and details about the goings-on and readings that the rest of us won't see or hear.

Why has the discussion slowed down so much recently? What are people doing-- WORKING?!?

[redacted]

↑ Index

311. David Baratier
fortune cookies
Wed 19 Jun 1996

There was a post a while back where somebody wanted some FC Sayings. I have found alternate possibilites for the same type of messages. A friend returned from Italy and brought back Perugina chocolates, which come with sayings in four different languages, centered around ideas of love, sensuality and the body. The packaging for illegal drugs, such as crack vials and heroin bags, quite often has prophetic sayings printed on them: "happy days are here again," or "FPW unite." Caps of Coca-cola often have: "sorry, try again" I offer these possibilites to add to the work cause I would hate to see someone dredging up a tired "fortune cookie" poem series after following O'Hara, Stroffolino, Lee Ann Brown, etcetera.

David Baratier

↑ Index

312. cris cheek
Re: performance writers
Wed 19 Jun 1996

Hi Henry,

you're right about Lev Rubenstein, of course. Prigov's pretty good as a live act also. But the names weren't intended to be inclusive (think i flagged that up). Just a smattering to get discussion going further.

The range of practice available for differing assemblages of influence is what's striking.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

313. Gwyn McVay
help! must have Nomura
Wed 19 Jun 1996

Does anyone know whether "the 'moon' score" by Hitoshi Nomura is available on CD, or if, for that matter, any of his other music is available?

Gwyn McVay
[redacted]

↑ Index

314. Poetics List
How to temp. stop "Poetics" et al
Wed 19 Jun 1996

---

at the risk of repeating this message for those who have it ...

Rev. 5-16-95

Welcome to the Poetics List

&

The Electronic Poetry Center

sponsored by The Poetics Program, Department of English, Faculty of Art & Letters, of the State University of New York, Buffalo

---

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

_____Contents_____

1. About the Poetics List
2. Subscriptions
3. Who's Subscribed

4. Digest Option
5. When you'll be away
6. The Electronic Poetry Center (EPC)
7. Poetics Archives at EPC
8. Publishers & Editors Read This!

[This document was prepared by Charles Bernstein ([redacted]. edu) and Loss Pequen~o Glazier ([redacted]).]

---

1. About the Poetics List

Please note that this is a private list and information about the list should not be posted to other lists or directories of lists. The idea is to keep the list to those with specific rather than general interests, and also to keep the scale of the list small and the volume manageable. Word-of-mouth (and its electronic equivalents) seems to be working fine.

The "list owner" of Poetics is Charles Bernstein: contact me for further information. As of May, Joel Kuszai is working with me to administer the list. For subscription information contact us at [redacted]

---

2. Subscriptions

line, to:

[redacted]

the one-line message should say:

{or}

(replacing Jill Jillway with your own name; but note: do not use your name to unsub)

We will be sent a notice of all subscription activity.

*

If you are having difficulty unsubscribing, please note:

Sometimes your e-mail address may be changed slightly by your system administrator. If this happens you will not be able to send messages to mail. To avoid this, unsub from the old address and resub from the new address. If you can no longer do this there is a solution if you use Eudora (an e-mail program that is available free at sharewar sites): from the Tools menu select "Options" and then select set-up for "Sending Mail": you can substitute your old address here and send the unsub message.

The most frequent problem with subscriptions is bounced messages. If your system is often down or if you have a low disk quota, Poetics messages may get bounced. Please try avoid having messages from the list returned to us. If the problem is low disk quota, you may wish to request an increase from your system administrator. (You may wish to argue that this subscription is part of your scholarly communication!) You may also wish to consider obtaining a commercial account.

---

3. Who's Subscribed

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

You will be sent within a reasonable amount of time (by return e-mail) a rather long list containing the names and e-mail addresses of Poetics subscribers. This list is alphabetized by server not name.

---

4. Digest Option

The Poetics List can send a large number of individual messages to your account to each day! If you would prefer to receive ONE message each day, which would include all messages posted to the list for that day, you can use the digest option. Send this one-line message (no subject line) to

[redacted]

set poetics digest

NOTE:!! Send this message to "listserv" not to Poetics or as a reply to this message!!

You can switch back to individual messages by sending this messagage:

set poetics mail

---

5. When you'll be away

Do not leave your Poetics subscription "active" if you are going to be away for any extended period of time! Your account may become flooded and you may lose not only Poetics messages but other important mail. You can temporarily turn off your Poetics subscription by sending a message:

You can temporarily turn off your mail by sending a message:

set poetics nomail

& turn it on again with: set poetics mail

When you return you can check or download missed postings from the Poetics archive. (See 7 below.)

---

6. What is the Electronic Poetry Center?

our URL is

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center provides access to the burgeoning number of electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the POETICS List archives, an AUTHOR library of electronic poetic texts, and direct connections to numerous related electronic RESOURCES. The Center also provides information about contemporary print little magazines and SMALL PRESSES engaged in poetry and poetics. And we have an extensive collection of soundfiles of poets' reading their work, as well as the archive of LINEbreak, the radio interview series.

The EPC is directed by Loss Pequen~o Glazier.

---

7. Poetics Archives via EPC

Go to the EPC and select Poetics from the opening screen. Follow the links to Poetics Archives. You may browse the archives by month and year or search them for specific information. Your interface will allow you to print or download any of these files.

Or set your browser to go directly to:
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/poetics/archive

---

8. Publishers & Editors Read This!

PUBLISHERS & EDITORS: Our listings of poetry and poetics information is open and available to you. We are trying to make access to printed publications as easy as possible to our users and ENCOURAGE you to participate! Send a list of your press/publications to [redacted] with the words EPC Press Listing in the subject line. You may also send materials on disk. (Write file name, word processing program, and Mac or PC on disk.) Send an e-mail message to the address above to obtain a mailing address to which to send your disk. Though files marked up with html are our goal, ascii files are perfectly acceptable. If your word processor ill save files in Rich Text Format (.rtf) this is also highly desirable

Send us extended information on new publications (including any back cover copy and sample poems) as well as complete catalogs/backlists (including excerpts from reviews, sample poems, etc.). Be sure to include full information for ordering--including prices and addresses and phone numbers both of the press and any distributors.

Initially, you might want to send short anouncements of new publications directly to the Poetics list as subscribers do not always (or ever) check the EPC; in your message please include full information for ordering. If you have a fuller listing at EPC, you might also mention that in any Poetics posts.

Some announcements circulated through Poetics and the EPC have received a noticeable responses; it may be an effective way to promote your publication and we are glad to facilitate information about interesting publications.

END OF POETICS LIST WELCOME

↑ Index

315. George Bowering
Re: nonset form
Wed 19 Jun 1996

Interesting point you made about the predictable form seeming to you a remnant of performance, etc. Actually, though I used to be a real open form guy, and of course prefer Olson to Lowell, I am more into predictable forms now, but not traditional ones. I always set up, a la Oulipo, I guess, a frame and try to work out of it. More so in fiction thatn in poetry, or really in other ways. But for instance, one of my better poems took a Keats poem and made a 14-section longish poem of it, eaCh line turned into a section made of one sentence but three stanzas. I love it. Now I am shrinking "Adonais." for unstance.

Haver also done silly things with acrostics, etc.

.....
"Lifting belly is such an incident in one's life."
--G.S.

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

316. Gabrielle Welford
bp Nichol's electronic poems (fwd)
Wed 19 Jun 1996

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: Robert Kendall <[redacted]>
To: ht_lit <[redacted]>

Readers of this list may be interested to know of the recent publication of the late bp Nichol's collection of kinetic visual poems, "First Screening." These aren't hypertext, but some of them are decidedly nonlinear. The poems where written during the early 1980s in BASIC on an Apple II and translated into Hypercard by the editors.

Nichol was well-known in his native Canada, though most Americans don't know his work. These poems are witty and entertaining and it's astonishing that they were written so long ago. I wonder what else will creep out of the woodwork of the early days of personal computing.

The publisher is:

Red Deer College Press
56 Ave. and 32nd Street
Box 5005
Red Deer, Alberta
Canada T4N 5H5

--Robert Kendall
http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/rkendall

↑ Index

317. George Bowering
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Wed 19 Jun 1996

> The
> Stones sounded raw, and looked nice and ugly, and beat, while the Beatles > were so clean and tidy, ready > to meet showbiz of the time half way, it seemed. The STones maybe > gave an impression of being more dangerous (rightly or wrongly)

In those days I always thought the Stones sounded like white English guys trying to play music that came from Black USA, but not being able to stay off the DOWNbeat, like a kind of electric marching band. They have got a little better at it in their dotage.

.....
"Lifting belly is such an incident in one's life."
--G.S.

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

318. George Bowering
Re: When the real poets come
Wed 19 Jun 1996

> Is James Joyce really a great writer?

That subject is thoroughly discussed and answered in Flann O'Brien's _The Dalkey Archive_.

.....
"Lifting belly is such an incident in one's life."
--G.S.

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

319. Louis Cabri
Re: pcoet and tlooth
Thu 20 Jun 1996

"Owing to inclement weather the social revolution occured in poetry."

(adapted from Tucholsky)

↑ Index

320. Gabrielle Welford

Fwd: Re: Child Prostitution (fwd)

Thu 20 Jun 1996

This note is a telling reminder of how we continue to exploit the children. The recent case of the Australian diplomats in Thailand and the German Nationals who were trading in Thai children was a horrible situation. But we Asians do exploit our own too, in an equal grotesque manner.

Kim

>
> Hi everybody,
>
> This is a general message going out to all the Indians I know who are on > the Net. As you can see, the list is pretty short so PLEASE PASS IT ON to > other people, especially, but not necessarily limited to, other Indians.
> Now on with the message...
>
> There is a petition on the Net right now to stop child prostitution in > India (Goa specifically). I don't know how many of you are aware of this > problem, but I have done some reading on the subject and I can tell you > that Child Prostitution is a huge problem in Thailand and Vietnam etc. > and it is growing at an alarming rate in India as well. I could tell you > many stories about it but I am trying to keep this message short so I'll > leave out the details (If you really want to know more just e-mail me > personally). Lets just say the situation is so bad that 6-year olds are > being sold into prostitution for the equivalent of $2.50!!!!!!!!!!!!
> Kinda puts all our problems in perspective, doesn't it?? I think it is > our duty to do what little we can to stop this inhumane brutality and > suffering inflicted on children. I know you all are super-busy and stuff > but what I am asking you to do will take less than 5 mins! (Actually it > takes less than 1 min. speaking from personal experience!) I think you > all can spare that much for a worthy cause...just watch 5 mins less of > TV, eat lunch a little bit quicker, or heck, just walk a little faster > from one class to the next! All right...enough preaching...here is what you > can do to help:
>
> 1. Use Netscape or Mosaic to access www.goa.com
>
> 2. When there, click on "What is new" line (it will be flashing).
>
> 3. Read the screen. Sign the petition.
>

> 4. Sleep a little better knowing that you have done at least one > good thing today!! :)
>
>
>
> If you don't have access to Netscape/Mosaic, or just don't want to deal > with figuring it out, PLEASE let me know. I'll find a way to send you the > petition.
>
> And please PASS THIS MSG on, at least to other Indians (to others too if > you can. Many non-Indians have signed the petition which of course how it > should be since injustice is injusticce, and no matter who is sufering, > we should all be concerned). Thank you for your time. Hopefully this > wasn't any inconvenience. Please e-mail me directly if you have any > questions/comments/info.
>
>
>
> Bobby Singh
>

_
>
>
>
>
>

↑ Index

321. Jordan Davis

oak oak

Thu 20 Jun 1996

Owing to inclement weather, I found (in Yahoo) the following urls:

http://www.csam.montclair.edu/~ceravolo/

and

http://www.intac.com/~ceravolo/

These are web sites by respectively Joe Ceravolo's son Jim and his wife Rosemary. Ceravolo, who died in 1988, was a great poet. Texts from all of Ceravolo's books, including the scarce _Wild Flowers Out of Gas_ and _Fits of Dawn_, are available at the Montclair site.

Okay!
Jordan

↑ Index

322. Fred E. Maus
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Thu 20 Jun 1996

> In those days I always thought the Stones sounded like white English guys trying to play music that came from Black USA, but not being able to stay off the DOWNbeat, like a kind of electric marching band. They have got a little better at it in their dotage.

I think this is really astute.

↑ Index

323. Burt Kimmelman
Re: How to temp. stop "Poetics" et al
Thu 20 Jun 1996

You do mean etc. and not et al>, don't you?

↑ Index

324. Jordan Davis
torque torque
Thu 20 Jun 1996

While everyone's set to nomail, there's new mags aplenty--

Torque (ed. Liz Fodaski) is now perfect-bound--meaning meaning--and shining new. Much non-transcendental post-lang lyric, good solid stuff, esp D Kovacs, B Luoma's 'Auto Gobbler'. Arras (ed. Brian Kim Stefans) is number three'd, N Mackey J Retallack R Smith and a calmly blow you away segment of R Fitterman's Metropolis not to mention C Cantalupo and co. Chain (eds. Juliana Spahr & Jena Osman) is split in two, a defence of poetry by W Alexander, a genre rant (th' whole thing's on genreblur) by M Damon, fun. Cool. Makes you wonder what the previous gang meant by the 'what's this new gang doing?' thing.

and of course Situation (ed. Mark Wallace), the most original thing out there, consensus be damned. Looking forward to Happy Genius and MASS AVE later this summer. (Shoot--I forgot to get a copy of Big Allis 7. More later.)

JD

↑ Index

325. Bill Luoma
Rilke
Thu 20 Jun 1996

Howdy folks,

I'm looking for the title & book of a poem by Rilke that begins something like this:

"I am all too alone in the world . . . "

and ends something like this:

"like a ship that carries me safely there ,,, the night."

???

much,

Bill Luoma
[redacted]

↑ Index

326. George Bowering
Re: what matter who's speaking
Thu 20 Jun 1996

Seems to me that in literature at least, Beckett has had a lot bigger impact than has Cage. Cage is still in the space that he picked out, the severe avantgarde, while Beckett won the Nobel Prize. I am talking about breadth of reception here, not necessarily "influence" on composers of whatever.

There are, in drama, and fiction made into drama, lots and lots of Beckett productions onstage all over the world every night. Conferences on beckett the playwright or Beckett the novelist, all over the world.

Curiously, they both wrote poetry, and curiouslt the poets who derive from them, do not extend the stuff they did as poetry, but look on the poetry as something they did on the side, as Picasso, for instance, did poetry on the side.

.....
"Lifting belly is such an incident in one's life."
--G.S.

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,

Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

327. George Bowering
Re: what matter who's speaking
Thu 20 Jun 1996

> Would any voice that deconstructs itself > reductio ad absurdum do so with a cantabile lilt without _Ill > Seen, Ill Said_?

Exactly. Or a number of other texts, starting with _The Unnamable_, and thru things like the various monologues.
 types--am I wrong?

> On the other hand, I believe you might be drawing a false parallel between two distinct philosophical choices. Beckett chose to focus on the individuated voice by stripping it clean; Cage often seemed to regard the voice as an egoic distraction, and performed chance operations, it would seem, to delete it completely.

Good reply. Remember when _The Unnamable_ came out? And we said okay, that's it for the novel. Beckett has got rid at last of setting, character, etc. Brings us to a voice so alone and so present in opur heads that we cannot distinguyish it from our own, We hear a voice in our heads and it must be our voice, because there are none of fiction's ways of distancing it, onto a "character" or whatever. Then we notice that we cant stop it. We cant go on, we think, but we go on, cant not, till death, and then someone else has the voice in her head anyway.
t is because of me she bleeds
>

.....
"Lifting belly is such an incident in one's life."
--G.S.

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

328. George Bowering
Re: what matter who's speaking
Thu 20 Jun 1996

> I seem to remember reading that Beckett's shift to plays was because the novels were too personal.

Yes, and then the producers keep taking his late fictions and putting them on stage. There comes a point at which it is not useful to set up a difference. Sometimes when I watch a fistion that is put on the stage, I close my eyes and imagine that I am reading. Hmm. But then things such as _Quad_ go in the other direction and create pure mathematiucal stage stuff with narrative refused.

.....
"Lifting belly is such an incident in one's life."
--G.S.

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

329. George Bowering
Re: Susan Howe and Samuel Beckett
Thu 20 Jun 1996

Well, without Samuel Beckett there would be no Susan Howe, eh?

.....
"Lifting belly is such an incident in one's life."
--G.S.

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

330. k.a. hehir
Re: ding
Thu 20 Jun 1996

Hello thomas,
you don't know me but i am an undergrad here at western and noticed your name on the poetics list.

i would like to invite you to a reading this coming monday here in town that i'm putting on. it is the first of what i hope will become a series. the line up is --

Skot, Peter Jaeger, J.D. Crosato, Jason Dixon, Me, Carey Weinberg, Sydney janet, and Paul Vermeersch.

The venue is The Brass Door Irish Pub, In the King's Inn. on King street between Clarence and Richmond. There will be a sign.

Also Niniam Mellamphy will give an introductory note to get things going.

Game time is 8 thirty.

Hope you can make it.

Kevin Hehir

p.s.
would you happen to have Carolyn Guertin's eddress?

-- check the office door of ann mayer or sarah king for more info

↑ Index

331. Rachel Loden
Re: Rilke
Thu 20 Jun 1996

Bill,

This is from THE BOOK OF HOURS (1905). As far as I know it doesn't have a title other than the first line (something like "I am too alone in the world, and not alone enough..").

Let me know if you'd like the whole (inadequately translated) poem.

Rachel Loden

You wrote:
>
>Howdy folks,
>
>I'm looking for the title & book of a poem by Rilke that begins something >like this:

>
>"I am all too alone in the world . . . "
>
>and ends something like this:
>
>"like a ship that carries me safely there ,,, the night."
>
>???
>
>much,
>
>Bill Luoma
>[redacted]
>

↑ Index

332. k.a. hehir
Re: ding
Thu 20 Jun 1996

oops sorry, that was just supposed to go to Tom Orange but due to inclement weather ended up on the list.

wish me luck.

with all this bad weather and everybody being away i expect the Cat in the Hat to pop in any moment.

kevin

↑ Index

333. Carnography
Re: of the STRENUOUS TYPE
Fri 21 Jun 1996

I came across this in Kant Generator Pro (I might have co-written the module, but Mark Pilgim wrote the program) and thought it might apply to some of the more recent citations vis a vis polemics.

"By means of forcible braying before a blindfolded hod-pustule, the ontological tusks of Yahweh would thereby be made to eschew our genital stems, but the ad hominem retchings (and I guess we'll never know why this is the case) have nothing to do with our flamelets. Because of the relation between our accrued idiocy and the signified, the intelligible polysemous man-gas in Dubuke yesterday would thereby be stuffed into the head-box of, as I have elsewhere shown, jellied air, yet my painful rash stands in need of abstraction. As is evident upon vigorous manipulation of the steam-glands, our a posteriori craws can never, as a whole, furnish a true and demonstrated science, because, like boredom, they constitute the whole content for corrosive principles. (In national theology, let us suppose that the exploded whoreshead, that is to say, Hegel, is the mere result of the power of pure suppurating, a blind but indispensable function of the Slaw.) No gimp could possibly deny that, in accordance with the principles of our discorporate queries, the decussation of toes of human reason depends on, in natural theology, our discorporate queries. The guys should be careful to observe that worms in air-pores (and let us suppose that this is the case) would thereby be stuffed into the head-box of worms in air-pores, by means of forcible braying before a blindfolded hod-pustule. On this matter, what has been said already should in any case fend for itself. "Since knowledge of the ad hominem belchings of human reason is a priori, boredom, that is to say, gluttony, constitutes the whole content for an acorn-snuffling scab. S. Ewing tells us that, uh, so far as I figure, our flamelets, that is to say, tenets, occupy part of the sphere of uselessness concerning the existence of the signified in general. What we alone have noticed in that Cutesy's hell-hole is that the roots of our undoing are just as necessary as our discorporate queries; therefore, our discorporate queries (and it's pretty obvious that this is the case) constitute the whole content for the dead beauties outside our loos. Our indeterminacies would thereby be stuffed into the head-box of, on the other hand, the abscesses. The insistent dents, even as this relates to our a priori accrued idiocy, would be falsified. Has it ever been suggested that, as is shown in the writings of Cher, the guys should be careful to observe that there is no relation between our indeterminacies and a stressful situation? In natural theology, our discorporate queries are just as necessary as the infinite resources of Ro', because of our painstaking ignorance of the conditions. Since knowledge of the ad hominem belchings is a posteriori, the insertion of the ad hominem belchings of human reason (and no gimp could possibly deny that this is true) constitutes the whole content for insistent dentures, but the Vitreous Humours would thereby be made to contradict, indeed, the signified. "We thus have a pure potpourri of snails, but this need not worry Schmeer. In my present remarks I am referring to the infinite resources of Providence only in so far as it is pestered by shapely principles. This could not be passed over in a complete system of insects, but in a merely critical essay the simple mention of earwigs may suffice."

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

334. Carnography
Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
Fri 21 Jun 1996

Boy, I really hate sending this to a group of literate poets and academics, but here goes:

> Disclaimer: If pedantic discussions of ancient pop music bother you as much as they bother me, then skip this missive.

Fred typed:

> In those days I always thought the Stones sounded like white English guys trying to play music that came from Black USA, but not being able to stay off the DOWNbeat, like a kind of electric marching band. They have got a little better at it in their dotage.

I didn't want to get into this, because I don't particularly like the Stones or the Beatles--the entire debate seems to frame boomer self-importance. (It isn't as if perishable pop bands actually matter unless you're trying to explore a decade via its superficial soundtrack.) But as someone who has had to play exact versions of Strawberry Fields, In My Life, She Comes In Colors and Paint It Black on Karoake laserdisks, and as a white musician who has played on way too many rock sessions, as well as in classical competitions, recitals, and "more legit gigs than there are names for Satan" (as Christian X. Hunter says about my tenure in NYC), I feel I might be able to provide a unique perspective on this horrible, disgusting comparison.

> I think this is really astute.

Really? I think that anyone who misses the characteristic feel of Stones recordings in general, and of R & B-inflected Brit Rock in particular, is probably "whiter" (ie, more suburban) than Keith Richards will ever be.

I, too, grew up having little respect for the Stones. In the early eighties, I played with James Brown's ex-trumpet player, Thara Memory, and learned P-funk almost as often as classical pieces. I thought people like the Stones just couldn't play. But then, from 1988-91, I was forced to learn every note, every timbre, every retardando and accelerando, of every single keyboard part in every pop song I was assigned by Daichi Kosho.

(And so was every other New York studio musician who needed the money.)

Most of the music was unendurable pablum: Ashford and Simpson, hellish 70's hits I'd managed to avoid hearing--those of Barry Manilow, for example. (Forty grand a year? It doesn't matter. Kill me.) Some of it was instructional, such as learning the feel of roots country (melody is always behind the beat) and the ad libs of Sam Cooke. But the music that I noticed most, oddly, was that of the Stones. Theirs was the only chart-friendly soundworld sufficiently dissonant, sufficiently random, not to leave me feeling ill.

(An aside on the subject of sonnets: Have you ever noticed that Honky-Tonk Women is in iambic pentameter? Check it out:

I met a gin-soaked barroom queen in Memphis
She tried to take me upstairs for a ride (etc, etc)

This is the kind of detail one could only notice while replicating Jagger's inflections with a pitch-wheel on a Synclavier as Freddy Hubbard's bassist asked about the phrasing and a stern man from Tokyo scowled and checked his Swatch.)

I'd always thought Jagger couldn't sing worth shit, and that the Stones didn't know how to work together. But now, faced with nothing but Stones, Beatles and Al Green for a period of months, I grasped the secret of BritRock as opposed to straight R & B:

In straight R & B, musicians attempt to play together as tightly as possible. Drums and bass function as one instrument, one thrust. In fusion and lite tech-head jazz (as well as in obsessive metal), this can go too far and lose the feel in hyper-quantized exactitude. (Sometimes this is fun--as in early Metallica, where the frustration of the listener comes from not being able to find the downbeat in an asymmetrical pattern played horribly well by impatient wind-up toys.)

But in R & B-inflected Brit Rock from the Sixties and Seventies, the feel of a band comes not from everyone playing in the same pocket, but from each different musician having his/her own pocket which rubs against the feel of the other musicians. Mere inefficiency? It would seem so at first; but upon closer examination, I learned otherwise. If you try to play rock with funk exactitude, it will just sound wrong.

All of these time-pockets are what create the sound of a brit-R & B inflected band like the Stones or, for that matter, Led Zeppelin, or even Traffic (whose song, "Empty Pages," I had the pleasure of hearing for the first time and teaching to an eighteen-year-old who brought me the recording to transcribe last month. (Yes, I'm making him learn Bach and Bartok.)).

I learned other stuff as well. For one thing, the tuneless, whiny Jagger turned out to be a master of phrasing. Even his tone-deaf sprechstimme rubbed against the band in an effective, resonant way. Like Watts's drag-ass time chafed Wyman's stiff-riffs, like Richard's inspired slop cut into whichever relatively accomplished musician, Jones or Ronson, provided a backdrop of silk to slash, so Jagger's out-of-tune phrases gave a further edge to the sound of the band.

Additional notes:

1. Watts is the laziest drummer in the world--God forbid that he should play an extra fill.

2. Richards is the sloppiest professional guitarist in the business, but there's a reason he sounds as good as he does. Strangely, an engineer friend of mine played me takes of Richards playing on an Expensive Winos track before (stiff and pedestrian) and after (loose, dissonant, and all over the place: redefining rhythm guitar) he shot up: it was one of the best arguments for drug abuse I've ever heard.

§§§

musicians based on skin color, gender, education, lack of education, name-the-irrelevant D. H. Lawrentian class-anxiety-based category.

Recently, an incredibly stupid Village Voice critic named Toure tried to insist that Darius James's brilliant _That's Blaxploitation_ was mediocre because James was middle-class and, supposedly, great African- American art can only come from the lower classes. Needless to say, Toure was blinded by his own suburban self-hatred. I've been to James's neighborhood in Conneticuit, and it looks like the neighborhood in John Singleton's first film--lower class--than the suburb I grew up in. On the other hand, Toure himself is as middle-class as I am, hence his projection of mediocrity onto Darius.

Friends, there is nothing wrong with being from a suburb. There is nothing wrong with an education and a lawn. Escaping one's roots is not nearly as important as embracing them.

4. But that doesn't mean I intend to embrace ex-Beatles or ex-Stones. Especially after a recording--when they probably stink to high heaven.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

335. henry gould
Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
Fri 21 Jun 1996

On Fri, 21 Jun 1996 07:03:41 -0400 Carnography said:
>But in R & B-inflected Brit Rock from the Sixties and Seventies, the feel >of a band comes not from everyone playing in the same pocket, but from each >different musician having his/her own pocket which rubs against the feel of >the other musicians. Mere inefficiency? It would seem so at first; but upon >closer examination, I learned otherwise. If you try to play rock with funk >exactitude,
>it will just sound wrong.

You're saying the Brits invented this? The Stones got it from early blues, which is still looser & off-beat (or idiosyncratic) than anything they did. And I have to agree with the first post on this, that rock in general, including the Stones, added a more heavy-handed pounding on the beat. Who's better than who... [sigh]. I applied for Mick Taylor's slot and found Keith Richards a friendly guy to deal with. But I guess they found a better guitar player, for them...

Sorry folks. Enough. Back to the nosenet.
- Henry Gould

↑ Index

336. Jordan Davis
William Carlos Speedwagon
Fri 21 Jun 1996

If you try to play rock with funk
exactitude,
it will just sound wrong, it will just sound wrong, it will just sound wrong.

↑ Index

337. Carnography
Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
Fri 21 Jun 1996

henry gould typed:

> You're saying the Brits invented this? The Stones got it from early blues, which is still looser & off-beat (or idiosyncratic) than anything they did.

Early blues is utterly different from what the Stones did. The Stones wanted to be like early blues (not R & B) musicians, but what they actually did involved inspired mishearing, as Harold Bloom might have called it.

I totally disagree with you, and my opinion is based on weird professional exactitude rather than speculation. I had to play Stones and Muddy Waters verbatim--I mean microscopically--for absurdly anal Japanese producers. They had the CD on one side and us on the other--"us" including bassist James Gregory, who was in Richards's band at the time. Jimmy had never had to examine Richards's playing on the level we did when we were covering the Stones repertoire. Muddy Waters' rhythm section on "You Need Lovin'" was cleaner than hell compared to the Stones.

Most jazz musicians understand Lightnin' Hopkins, Son House and all of that. They never understand the Stones--and that's because the feel and sound are utterly different. They don't understand a vocalist who can't sing and a drummer who misses the beat. Listen to rhythm guitar intro of "Gimme Shelter" and tell me that Richards sounds like a poor man's version of Robert Johnson. The truth is, he sounds like Richards and nobody else.

"Getting it wrong" is a saving grace of popular music and don't kid yourself. House music from the early eighties gets its aggressive polytonality from dj's mixing album parts together by bpm and forgetting utterly about harmony. You can say it's disco gone wrong, but that's missing the point. Disco was never as ugly, as aggressive, as early four-on-the-floor house.

With all due respect, I challenge the entire conservative construct of your so-called ""original blues": who are you to say that the Brits were doing it badly and incorrectly? I don't hear you complaining that the origins of reggae are in an idiosyncratic interpretation of American music, that the entire feel of reggae comes from Jamaican musicians "getting it wrong." With all due respect, if you didn't understand the difference between Stones feel and that of Robert Johnson (whom Richards dreams of being but, luckily, isn't), then I'm not at all surprised you didn't get the gig with the Stones. Failing to get a gig like that doesn't mean you're a bad musician, but it probably means you didn't understand the musical core, the secret, of the band for whom you were trying out.

It's completely cliche to talk about white musicians being stiff. If it makes you feel like less of a whiteboy to do it, fine. But don't obscure purely musical observations with a race/class perspective. Have you ever had to cop Jagger, Billy Preston, Nicky Hopkins et al with such precision that you can't even flam with the track and satisfy the producer? I had to do it for years. I never wanted to be an expert on sixties feel, but they paid me to become one. You might say you notice the (lack of) difference between Stones and Johnson, but if the feel weren't different, then why would you be making a distinction? Aesthetically, and in several other ways, the sloppiness and sonics are as different from Johnson as the Stones are from Sonic Youth. Led Zeppelin were much more faithful to the blues they copped than the Stones were. Simply put, the Stones weren't good enough to cop Johnson, which is what made them better.

I say, if you're going to wax adamant about feel, then back up your opinion with concrete examples. That's what I did in my earlier post. That's the least you'd do if we were talking about prosody.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: The Stones and the Beatles were just sixties pop musicians. They did what they did well enough, but they don't deserve this much time and space for praise or scorn. All they deserve is to be acknowledged for what they did well.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

338. Fred Muratori
Ribot
Fri 21 Jun 1996

Anyone know if _Ribot_ is still being published? Thanks.

****
Fred Muratori "Certain themes are incurable."

([redacted])
Reference Services Division - Lyn Hejinian
Olin * Kroch * Uris Libraries
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853
WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html
****

↑ Index

339. henry gould
Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
Fri 21 Jun 1996

On Fri, 21 Jun 1996 11:40:42 -0400 Carnography said:
>Early blues is utterly different from what the Stones did. The Stones >wanted to be like early blues (not R & B) musicians, but what they >actually did involved inspired mishearing, as Harold Bloom might have >called it.

Seems like you're reading a lot into what I said. Basically you're saying what I said: the Stones, among other things, were into early country blues - which has a lot of variation in the rhythms, partly because it doesn't have a drum section, which to my un-microscopically-attuned ears, tends in a lot of cases to tighten the rhythm into a simpler dance format. I never said they weren't as good as their "originals", whether they changed it through mishearing or whatever.

> I totally disagree with you, and my opinion is based on weird professional exactitude rather than speculation.

Let's get exact about our vocabulary. Speculation? I've been playing and listening to both musics for 30 years, in about 8 different bands.
>
>"Getting it wrong" is a saving grace of popular music and don't kid yourself.

Kid myself? When or how did I raise this issue?
>
>With all due respect, I challenge the entire conservative construct >of your so-called ""original blues": who are you to say that the Brits >were doing it badly and incorrectly?

I don't disagree with you! Just don't remember saying anything of the kind.

With all due respect, if you didn't understand the difference >between Stones feel and that of Robert Johnson (whom Richards dreams of >being but, luckily, isn't), then I'm not at all surprised you didn't get >the gig with the Stones. Failing to get a gig like that doesn't mean >you're a bad musician, but it probably means you didn't understand the >musical core, the secret, of the band for whom you were trying out.

With "all due respect", you're just being snide for the fun of it, and don't deny it - because it IS fun. Yeah, too bad I didn't have the Japanese microtraining of the earknobs. Actually, it was a matter of ideology - Keith and I disagreed about theological issues. Ask him about "Johnny-b-good" from 1975 - if his fried cells remember that far back.
>
>It's completely cliche to talk about white musicians being stiff. If it makes you feel less like a whiteboy... etc.... >purely musical observations with a race/class perspective. Have you ever >had to cop Jagger, Billy Preston, Nicky Hopkins et al with such precision >that you can't even flam with the track and satisfy the producer? I had to >do it for years. I never wanted to be an expert on sixties feel, but >they paid me to become one. You might say you notice the (lack of) >difference between Stones and Johnson, but if the feel weren't different, >then why >would you be making a distinction? Aesthetically, and in several other >ways, the sloppiness and sonics are as different from Johnson as the Stones >are from Sonic Youth. Led Zeppelin were much more faithful to the blues >they copped than the Stones were. Simply put, the Stones weren't good >enough to cop Johnson, which is what made them better.

I'll be looking forward to your dissertation. But don't pin your own rehash of cliches on me.
>
>I say, if you're going to wax adamant about feel, then back up your opinion >with concrete examples. That's what I did in my earlier post. That's the >least you'd do if we were talking about prosody.

Who's waxing adamant here? Hey, you may be right, since you've done all the subatomic research. My pure speculation was that the Stones may have sounded looser because that's what they heard in the people they listened to, and it wasn't a totally new thing out of the head of Queen Victoria. I said that in spite of that, the Stones & rock in general still sounds "tighter" than SOME rhythmically varied early country blues.

Have I cleared that up?
>
>PS: The Stones and the Beatles were just sixties pop musicians. They did >what they did well enough, but they don't deserve this much time and space >for praise or scorn. All they deserve is to be acknowledged for what they >did well.

I couldn't agree more. Let's throw some more money at them too. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

340. David Baratier
Pavement Saw winter 96/97
Fri 21 Jun 1996

Pavement Saw #3 still has a few slots open for publication before we pack it in & publish.
We devote a third of each issue to extremely short fiction and prose. Send some work. The line-up at present is as follows:

Featured writer: Sean Killian (extended poems which were discussed in the maximus/minimalist panel at NYU talks

And new work by: Timothy Russell, Mark Wallace, Tracy Philpot, Marck L. Beggs, Janet Bowden, Errol Miller, Michael Estabrook, R. Kimm, Thomas Michael McDade, Joseph Semenovich, Daniel Green, Alan Catlin, and many others...

Send 5 pieces or pages

Pavement Saw Press / 7 James Street / Scotia, NY 12302 or if you want the issue it's 3.50 for individuals, $6 subscription, $10 subscription for libraries and institutions.

↑ Index

341. McGuire Jerry L
fortune cookies
Fri 21 Jun 1996

David Baratier mentioned yesterday that someone had queried for fortune cookie text, if that's the word. I've been saving them for ages for an exercise I do with my students, and will be happy to send my collection along to whoever it was wanted them. Just buzz me back at

[redacted]

Yrs,

Jerry

↑ Index

342. Sheila E. Murphy
New Publication
Fri 21 Jun 1996

Glad to report a new publication:

Way #2: THREE WORKS by Sheila E. Murphy including

- Letters to Unfinished J # 66 - 80 (prose pieces)
- Watching Thorns (Meditation on the Work of Kevin Irvin)
- For the Loaded Funds and Gardens (16 pp. sonnet sequence)

Edited by Tom Beckett

Available for $6.00:

Tom Beckett
131 North Pearl Street
Kent, OH 44240

↑ Index

343. David Baratier
Re: ribot
Fri 21 Jun 1996

They are still around, Paul sent me issue #3, & a recent note said that he was expecting #4 in September

David Baratier

↑ Index

344. David Baratier
Painted Bride submissions
Fri 21 Jun 1996

The editors of Pavement Saw Press, Tara Pauliny and David Baratier, would like to extend a cordial invite to any one on the poetics list who would like to submit work to the Painted Bride Quarterly. We will be guest editing a "film" issue (not our choice, yeah we know about B-city) for submissions recieved up until July 31st, 1996. As further clarification, we funderstand the concept of film to be linked to a cinematic process of writing, NOT on poems about films. Letters should be addressed to:

Painted Bride Quarterly
230 Vine Street
Philadelphia, PA 19106
Attn: Tara Pauliny and David Baratier

For folks unfamiliar with PBQ the journal has been around for well over 20 years and has recently published Gwendolyn Brooks, John Ashberry, James Tate, Charles Rafferty, Gary Fincke, Paul Violi, and other major & minor publisher names. As a journal that hardly ever offers representation of what Spencer Selby calls"experimental writing" or others label "avant-guard" this should be worthwhile, albeit rare, opportunity.

↑ Index

345. Tony Green
Re: wild wild dead horse hairs
Fri 21 Jun 1996

Hi, Cris Cheek, I had a backchannel conversation with Wystan abt the jip/gyp spellings yesterday and came to the same conclusion, racist, short for "gypsy". dyincu best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

346. Eryque Gleason
Re: fortune cookies
Fri 21 Jun 1996

---

david, 'twas me what requested fortune cookies. thanks for the suggestions. i unnerstand yr concerns about more "tired poems", which is why i tend to take naps before trying to write, need all the energy i can get!

what i've got in mind isn't really another fortune cookie poem, or even a horoscope series (chris s. has a chapbook of such that i rather like). if i'd wanted to do a series of fortune cookie's i'd prolly make my own cookies to go with the fortune (and then agonize over whether or not to eat the damn things). i'm just using those for raw material.

of course, what i've got in mind isn't really in mind yet as the weather conditions in albany and economic conditions in my pocket are ripe for aviating.

happy landings! (and stoops and lawns, etc.)
eryque

> There was a post a while back where somebody wanted some FC Sayings. I have found alternate possibilites for the same type of messages. A friend returned from Italy and brought back Perugina chocolates, which come with sayings in four different languages, centered around ideas of love, sensuality and the body. The packaging for illegal drugs, such as crack vials and heroin bags, quite often has prophetic sayings printed on them: "happy days are here again," or "FPW unite." Caps of Coca-cola often have: "sorry, try again" I offer these possibilites to add to the work cause I would hate to see someone dredging up a tired "fortune cookie" poem series after following O'Hara, Stroffolino, Lee Ann Brown, etcetera.
>
> David Baratier

↑ Index

347. cris cheek
Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers premonitions
Fri 21 Jun 1996

So, hey hey hang on. I'm lost.

These extended metaphors have got me butch, close to riveting.

Doesn't most writing miss, as in re-embody, the beat of the previous feel's embodiment, period - manufacture difference?

Don't the Stones (yeah Watts was as great as the underated Ringo as the dead pan duo of master minimalist drummers) employ that classic teleology of avant-garde strategies - reference, deference, difference?

Isn't that the crux for quertzblatz? The reference is easy but in itself tricky, the deference gets stuck in the craw of the reference and the difference is already scuppered?

Forget Speedway, name tells all. For topical lyrical and typical textures, arguable here now, try Pulp (Jarvis Cocker was taken to the bosom of the teen nation for upstaging Michael Jackson's Christian TV pomp and 'I Spy' in bitter english tang from the runt of Thatcher's litter), and Tricky (both 'Maxinquaye' and his new one under Nearly God - 'Heaven').

Yes yes to those quirky out crunch deranged harmonies of early house. And then Robert Johnson comes along, hears Tricky and makes a record which reminds somebody of Muddy Waters. Shame he couldn't learn to reproduce the Tricky sound, correctly. But then Jim Hendrix never died, he hid out in south-west Madagascar, I saw him only yesterday.

You might not consider this to be contemporary petry, but I can assure you that in the pubs of Clapham this is what everybody is doing and calling poetry. At least for the past week anyways. They talk epic chord progressions for days.

'80. (CM.1.) 5.0 p.m. In Picadilly, crossing-sweepers have already got the refuse into heaps - carpenters inside Simpson's are taking down seats - there is a pile of dismantled barriers in a side street. Two ex-servicemen with a barrel organ covered in a Union Jack are giving a superb performance with spoons and plates in the middle of the road. The queue for the Picadilly tube is four deep as far as the Popular Cafe'

(May 12th, 1937) from 'Mass-Observation Day-Survey'

love and love
cris

↑ Index

348. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Painted Bride submissions
Sat 22 Jun 1996

Good luck, Dave Baratier, with PBQ---I do, however, would like to call attention to an earlier issue I "ghost" edited of same mag. in 1992. Which DID publish many people who'd be familiar on this list (Ashbery, Perelman, Retallack, Sean Killian, David Shapiro, Yau, my review of Lisa Robertson, etc.). I think it's still available for sale (issue #46)--If not, I think i got some extra copies in a box somewhere. BE GOOD, Chris S.

↑ Index

349. Ken Edwards
Carcanet
Sun 23 Jun 1996

I recently recommended a couple of Carcanet Press titles. Today I read that their office was at the epicentre of the IRA bomb blast in Manchester last Saturday. It appears that much of the 30-year archive has been destroyed. Carcanet boss Michael Schmidt was quoted in the press saying laconically "We have had crises before -- this certainly is a change from cash-flow problems."

↑ Index

350. Joe Amato
pmc reviews...
Sun 23 Jun 1996

---

all: just a note to say that my review of jed rasula's _the american poetry wax museum_ is now available at _postmodern culture_... here's the url:

http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/pmc/issue.596/contents.596.html

my review is alongside ken sherwood's review of jerry r. and pierre j.'s _poems for the millennium_... so i guess it's a poetry fest...

best,

joe

↑ Index

351. Peter Nicholls
Re: Alternative Accommodations for Assembling Alternatives
Sun 23 Jun 1996

---

dear Romana: i've been holding to see whether the funding situation will change here, but no hope, I'm afraid. But maybe we can meet up when you're at Caius. I'm away for the last couple of weeks of July and a few days in early August, but we may be able to connect if you have time. mh home number is 01273-323526, and work 01273-678374. The list of participants is staggering. You have done an amazing job, and if I don't see you in August the very best of luck with it. And thanks for thinking about my funding problems. best wishes, Peter.

↑ Index

352. Loss Glazier
50s in Orono - the Reviews
Sun 23 Jun 1996

H O W L A N D

I saw the best minds of my generation, deployed by mini-vans, coffeeless, hysterical, rained on, dragging themselves through the forested lanes at all hours looking for 101 Neville,
angelheaded readers burning for the fifties heavenly connection to the dripping dynamo in the machinery of rain, who lost meal tickets and many-panelled and saying hi sat up smoking in the supernatural darkness of cold watery dorms floating across the tops of trees contemplating Sagetrieb, who bared their brains to slideshows in the Aud and saw Mohammedan angels staggering in NPF hallways illuminated,

who passed through the university with radiant cool eyes hallucinating Poetics and Blake-light ecstasy among the scholars of Tolson, Niedecker, O'Hara, & endles bunches o' guys, who were expelled from their own academies for crazy & publishing articles where certain words had equal signs between their letters, who cowered in unshaven rooms in long underwear, burning their money on meal tickets and listening to the SLAMS of doors thru the wall, who got busted for genderism returning through Laredo with a belt of hubris for New York, who ate danish in academic corridors or drank turpentine coffee in Hilltop, behind schedule, or purgatoried reading abstracts into night, with dreams, with speeches, with waking nightmare references to rhyme and meter and peter and endless halls, packs, and simpsons, INCOMPARABLE great streets of shuddering words and lightning wit in the mind leaping toward poles of Canada & Paterson & Liberia, illuminating all the motionless world of the Web between, Listserv soliloquies of halls, backyard green tree campus dawns, staggering bleary-eyed for bone dawn rituals of eggs and toast ...

COMING to a listerv near you.

↑ Index

353. Chris Stroffolino

some questions from orono (tentative toe testing)

Sun 23 Jun 1996

Though I can not offer a full report of even the fraction of the official activity I witnessed and to some extent participated in at the 50's poetry conference, I want to try to make sense here of some of my impressions. In the first place, it was absolutely great to meet y'all in person as it were. Unofficial events were really fun. Fie on the rumours that academics are dry personalities! (I'll elaborate on this later). As for content of the panels, some of the issues that are "hottest" and most volatile in my mind at present would include the RACE question. Aldon Nielsen chaired a very good panel on Stephen Jonas, Russell Adkins (atkins?) and Melvin Tolson. Very informative and provoking. It seemed the most sensitive issues surrounding "race" however were tied in with discussions on Frank O'Hara. Nick Lawrence (who i didn't see) and Katherine M. Davis, Steve Evans and Ben Friedlander all dealt extensively with the race politics involved in O'Hara's work. Though I do not want to generalize about these three papers---which took different positions on race and theorized O'hara's position to race quite differently--after the smoke of intensity cleared I found myself asking about the relation of the EROTIC to the question of RACE POLITICS. In fact, the relation of the erotic to POLITICS in its "broader" concerns became a large question that seemed to loom over the conference as a whole and for the most part seemed to be answered or theorized unsatisfactorily for me. Of the papers and speeches I saw, with the notable exception of Rachel Blau Duplessis's excellant talk about the sexual politics that informed Olson, Creeley and others, most of the papers seemed to invert the old "THE PERSONAL IS THE POLITICAL" battle cry. Perhaps invert is the wrong word. By "invert" I mean that the personal address in the lyric poems of O'Hara and Creeley etc was often read as a thinly veiled allegory of the artist's struggle with the repressive climate of the 50's (Michael Davidson here, but others). Thus THE PERSONAL IS POLITICAL, but it's not POLITICAL as PERSONAL. In such formulations, the "personal" becomes marginalized and is "revealed" to be an introjection of the "political." Basically, there is no "personal" in such a formulation. The RELATIONAL sphere-- "the only reality is face to face" (or body to body, etc.), and the erotic sphere can only PROPERLY be called POLITICAL if read in terms of "larger" sputnitbeatnickcivilrightsafricanliberationidentitypolitics (etc.) Perhaps this is the NATURE of a conference that is based around an HISTORICAL ERA. I do not mean to absolutely INVALIDATE such modes of thought. I was very provoked by these papers, but to open up a question of race, specifically on O'hara, again (echoing a discussion Aldon and I had a few months ago), I have a hard time seeing the value in GLOBALIZING or generalizing from such erotic fantasies of race relations (or racial fantasies of erotic relations) especially when the questions of SEXUAL POLITICS (whether hetero or homo) seem to be not touched on at all. The question of the politics of eros too easily gets obscured. Furthermore, I sensed at times, a kind of moralism (whether by apologists for O'hara's views on race as progressive for his time or by more critical stances towards such views) that marginalizes the specifically amoral (extra-moral qualities) that O'hara's poetry so blatantly announces itself as (the thing about the "tight pants" as a kind of Shellyean INTELLECTUAL BEAUTY or Stevensian "jar"). What does moralizing a blatantly amoral poet do? (such questions are not specific to O'hara--nor is O'hara ALWAYS amoral--just USUALLY). What assumptions inform an academic urge to "EXPOSE" one's sexual preference--one's "object choices." I am genuinely curious here. Also worried about what I see is POSSIBLY an academic urge for REVENGE against, er, "poetic license"--the "freedom of the poet" etc--Revenge through creating a climate of critique that if taken TOO SERIOUSLY by poets (realizing that "theory" does not always "follow" "practice"--and that certain poets write a certain way BECAUSE of the theoretical climate, and the "war" between "poetry" and "theory" which I believe is still "not over") can become a TABOO as if one shouldn't write about sex or love AT ALL anymore except in the most goody-goody of ways and not dare saying anything that might be perceived as racist or sexist etc. What IS racist, or sexist? The fact that less than 1% of the people who gave papers at ORONO were black (african-american) may have been the MOST RACIST thing about the conference--at least as racist as the mostly DEAD POETS being discussed (we can't change the past, but we CAN change the present). When we're dealing with the subtlety of O'hara can a white person really determine what is racist? Or what IS the point? The Gender question, however, is different---1) because there were more women at the conference (though still far less than men) and 2) because the poets of the 50's--again as DuPlessis shows--or at least many of the male poets of that period-- did not seem to problematize gender very much at all----in fact, a poem that was read from the Rothenberg Joris anotholgy became a hot site of contention among many women in a conversation I witnessed. It was a poem that it seemd was picked for its "humour" value--but the assumptions that poem seemed to make about "little ladies" did not seem to be questioned AT ALL. Yet, why do I consder the feminist critiques to be more valuable than the race-based ones? Perhaps because WOMEN made the former while WHITES made the latter. Well, surely that would never hold up in an academic court. But, as the court jester, let me throw it out and hope it will be taken seriously. Also, becase the feminist critique PERSONALIZES the political in a way the racial critique doesn't. In terms of O'hara (the poet for wom the strongest racial critiques seemed to be made), I think as much can be learned (if academically analyze we must!) from contextually race in terms of sexual politics. Because he was gay, the feminist strategy of the MALE DOUBLE STANDARD in terms of objectfying woman can not be levied as much. But how does QUEER THEORY deal with a man objectifying another man? An open question... And what ever happened to the "separate spheres"? I.e.--in one's "political" poems, a very different attitude may present itself than in one's "amoral, sexual" poems. Why does such an attitude seem so discredited. I was talking to Paul Naylor about this seemingly MARKET demand for "theoretical consistency" and its discontents. I thought that Robert Von Hallberg actually made an interesting gesture in this respect that can actually be quite revolutionary. He did a reading of ROBERT HAYDEN'S "aspiration to universality." And read some poems by Hayden that can be seen as, if not ENTIRELY ahistorical, at least not entirely race based (though I would argue that even "those winter sundays" is CLASS based. Yet, he also read some poems by HAYDEN that were quite specifically UN-UNIVERSAL.

Showing that hayden spoke from, as, different "subject positions." The idea that a poet can speak as a "human" at one time, speak as a "BLACK man" another time and as a black MAN" another time--to name just three overlapping ones. It seems each poem demands a different way of reading it. Of course, I'm just fostering my own agenda that privileges poetry over theory as such. ---- _____ This has gone on way too long (joe amato-esque), and barely scratched the surface--but I hope some of these questions will be taken seriously. (even if you gotta ASSASINATE ME BORROWED ORCHARDS). I also have notes about Perelman's and Altieri's (to my mind) somewhat parrellel attempts to question the cult of the avant-garde hip-straight division by arguing that Rich and Plath respectively need to be taken at least as seriously as Olson and Creeley and O'Hara. That's part of how I read their papers anyway.....(chris stroffolino

↑ Index

354. Ron Silliman

Stuff

Mon 24 Jun 1996

Ken,

Are you suggesting that Carcanet was the intended object of the IRA bomb? Or merely incidental?

Are any of the Oronians out there ready yet to report on the conference?

All best,

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

355. henry gould

Re: some questions from orono (tentative toe testing)

Mon 24 Jun 1996

On Sun, 23 Jun 1996 22:59:42 -0400 Chris Stroffolino said:
Also worried about what I see is POSSIBLY > an academic urge for REVENGE against, er, "poetic license"--the "freedom > of the poet" etc--Revenge through creating a climate of critique that > if taken TOO SERIOUSLY by poets (realizing that "theory" does not > always "follow" "practice"--and that certain poets write a certain > way BECAUSE of the theoretical climate, and the "war" between "poetry" > and "theory" which I believe is still "not over") can become a TABOO > as if one shouldn't write about sex or love AT ALL anymore except in > the most goody-goody of ways and not dare saying anything that might > be perceived as racist or sexist etc.

This reminds me of something someone mentioned to me at another conference (the Hoboken Russ-Amer conference). Elena Shvarts (loosely translated for me by Tom Epstein) was saying she was interested in the concept of scandal as the motive force of change in life. Her example was a very traditional authoritative one : Jesus (the Master) washing the feet of his students. People are scandalized by the immoral - but also by the threatening, the different. And the two become confused. And so we have the scandal of the scandalized (the main engine of literary canonization). Mandelstam wrote that there are 2 kinds of literature - the official and the unofficial; the first is trash - the second, stolen air. This is the 3rd level - the scandal of officialization (or scandofishingfortroublization) - Henry Gould

↑ Index

356. Chris Stroffolino

Re: 50s in Orono - the Reviews

Mon 24 Jun 1996

---

loss----
i love "contemplating Sagetrieb"!----

↑ Index

357. Loss Glazier

"50s in Orono - the Reviews"

Mon 24 Jun 1996

ANNOUNCEMENT: "50s in Orono - the Reviews" ---------- Maria Damon and I are soliciting reviews of this event. Post your review! (Thank you Chris!) In addition, we've contacted a number of our best writers in the field who will be filing reviews. There are some treats in store. Reviews posted here also to become part of a web-based book (even a photo or two). These will be something to look forward to... Stay tuned for more! (Simply post your contribution! If you have questions or etc. about the web book please contact us: ([redacted]) and Maria Damon ([redacted]). More soon ...

↑ Index

358. george hartley
hailing Barry hailing
Mon 24 Jun 1996

I have so much I want to say & respond to and congratulate regarding the Maine conference, but I'll just start here with a response to Barry Watten's now infamous presentation on hailing in the fifties. I think a lot of things got lost in the characterizations of his talk that I heard.

1. NUDIES: Barry's talk was about interpellation, not about nudie pin-up girls. How did the pin-up industry as it existed in the fifties work as an interpellation process, & how was it related to other such processes? And was it possible for the pin-up girl herself to stage her image in a strategic way? This, it seems to me, was Barry's point.

2. AGENCY: Even if we discount the Betty-Page-as-performance-artist element, we are still faced with the agency of the pin-up image as the point of interpellation, as the locus of the gaze of the Other, as the command to the viewer to accept a certain subject-position in relation to the image. I am not suggesting in any way that this command (this call, this hailing) is the same for everyone. Gender, generation, class, education, and such will have complicated the particular "call" each of us hears and either accepts or not.

3. IT'S NOT ME: the interesting thing about Barry's presentation was that it forced the audience into the very point of being-hailed that he was discussing. To take myself as an example, I was made uncomfortable because I was being hailed as a male heterosexual voyeur at the same time that I was being hailed as an intellectual at a poetry conference for whom such images are calling me in a very different way. It was the tension between the extremes of these simultaneous and conflicting calls that I found interesting. And I'm sure we could multiply the various complex of calls as we examine the reaction of each member of the audience. I was called on to take on a certain identity in relation to the image--the image hystericized me, made me ask of it, "Why me? What is it in me that makes me what you say I am?"

4. HYSTERIA PRECEDES INTERPELLATION: This is where I want to intervene (at great length) in Barry's presentation and add that, contra Althusser, the effect of interpellation is not the subject but the subject-position; that is, interpellation is not a process of subjectivity but of subjectivization (the two moments must be kept distinct from one another). Since I have already written on this topic at length (in a discussion of Zizek's distinction between Althusser and Lacan) just two months ago, I'll paste that earlier discussion here as two extended footnotes.

EXTENDED FOOTNOTE 1: The Subject versus Subjectivization

Representation is a material practice whereby ideology is endowed with a material existence. According to the usual ("ideological") conception of the relationship between belief and practice, belief precedes practice. We kneel in church because we believe in God. In such a view every subject is endowed with a consciousness, believes in certain ideas and not in others, and freely acts according to his or her ideas. But Althusser is on this question Pascalian: we believe because we kneel. This ritual of kneeling is one of many which make up the material practice of what Althusser refers to as an ideological apparatus. In this way "ideas" have disappeared as a thing of the beyond while "their existence is inscribed in the actions of practices governed by rituals defined in the last instance by an ideological apparatus" (LP 170). Here is one way of elaborating on the claim that ideas are already on the side of representation: there is no ideology (representation) without the category of the subject:

I say: the category of the subject is constitutive of all ideology, but at the same time and immediately I add that the category of the subject is constitutive of all ideology insofar as all ideology has the function (which defines it) of "constituting" concrete individuals as subjects. In the interaction of this double constitution exists the functioning of all ideology, ideology being nothing but its functioning in the material forms of existence of that functioning. (LP 171)

Althusser fails to develop the full nature of this "double constitution," however, as he presents his theory of interpellation. According to his theory, subjects are produced through interpellation, which is precisely the function of ideology: the injunction for us to take upon ourselves our symbolic mandate, to assume the subject-position provided for us by the ideological call. Representation (the material practice of ideology) constitutes the representing subject; that is, representation represents the subject as the representing subject. Althusser describes this ideological hailing of the subject as follows:

I shall then suggest that ideology "acts" or "functions" in such a way that it "recruits" subjects among the individuals (it recruits them all), or "transforms" the individuals into subjects (it transforms them all) by that very precise operation which I have called interpellation or hailing, and which can be imagined along the lines of the most commonplace everyday police (or other) hailing: "Hey, you there!" Assuming that the theoretical scene I have imagined takes place in the street, the hailed individual will turn round. By this mere one-hundred-and-eighty-degree physical conversion, he becomes a subject. Why? Because he has recognized that the hail was "really" addressed to him, and that "it was really him who was hailed" (and not someone else). Experience shows that the practical telecommunication of hailings is such that they hardly ever miss their man: verbal call or whistle, the one hailed always recognizes that it is really him who is being hailed. And yet it is a strange phenomenon, and one which cannot be explained solely by "guilt feelings," despite the large numbers who "have something on their consciences." Naturally for the convenience and clarity of my theoretical theater1 I have had to present things in the form of a sequence, with a before and an after, and thus in the form of a temporal succession. (LP 174)

Rather than a temporal succession, however, interpellation, Althusser contends, has always-already produced us as subjects: "Before its birth, the child is therefore always-already a subject, appointed as a subject in and by the specific ideological configuration in which it is 'expected' once it has been conceived" (LP 176). But how is this interpellation into subjects, this allotting of subject-positions, maintained? Through what Althusser refers to as a "duplicate mirror-system." We are subjects only through our subjection to the Subject-the Unique, Absolute, Other Subject, what Lacan refers to as the Master Signifier. Without this radically contingent externalized Other excluded from the round of subjectivity, the subjects cannot be "subjectivized." What Althusser doesn't recognize here, however, is that this excluded Subject is nothing but a stupid, senseless thing filling the crack of the social, the radical negativity of the split internal to Substance. Althusser describes the Subject in the following terms: "God thus defines himself as the Subject par excellence, he who is through himself and for himself ('I am that I am'), and he who interpellates the subject, the individual subjected to him by this very interpellation" (LP 179). The subject-Subject relationship is a double-mirror relationship, according to Althusser, in the sense that the subject needs the Subject (interpellation occurs through the Subject, Moses is called by God to do His bidding, Moses recognizes himself as "Moses" through this call) and the Subject needs the subjects (people were made in the image of God, even in their debauchery when they function as the "terrible inversion of his image in them"-the subjects are the Subject's reflections). What Althusser does not acknowledge is the Hegelian inflection of the Subject's self-relation in the claim "I am that I am." What we have here in this Fichtean Subject (I = I) is the tautological relationship of what Hegel refers to as the infinite judgment: this statement of pure identity folds in on itself and opens up the abyss, the radical negativity that characterizes the (Hegelian) subject, for the reduplication of the I as subject in the I as predicate illustrates that this Fichtean identity is nonidentical in that it cannot be both subject and its opposite, predicate. I = I becomes I = not-I through this very proposition of identity. The empty name of the subject is fleshed out with nothing but its own empty name as its predicate. The Subject as such, then, can never function as the point of self-reflection for the subjects, for they can only become subjectivized-reflected (take up their subject-positions) when the Subject-position is filled with some excluded, stupid object (the king's body, for example, the broken body of Christ, or the commodity functioning as the money-form). Thus Althusser's conception of interpellation gives us a theory of subjectivization, but not of its prior moment as subject-as-radical-negativity. Subjectivization-interpellation is nothing but the attempt to cover over the traumatic recognition of the abyss of subjectivity as such. The Subject is thus identical in form to the infinite judgment or speculative proposition, "I am that I am," but precisely through the nonidentity which constitutes both.

As Zizek points out, the subject's congruency with the speculative proposition is also behind Lacan's conception of the subject, a conception which distinguishes Lacan from the post-structuralist notion of the subject-position, whereby in the latter the "subject" is an effect of a nonsubjective process. For Lacan, on the other hand, the subject is the empty place to be filled by subjectivization:

To put it simply: if we make an abstraction, if we subtract all the richness of the different modes of subjectivization, all the fullness of experience present in the way the individuals are "living" their subject-positions, what remains is an empty place which was filled out with this richness; this original void, this lack of symbolic structure, is the subject, the subject of the signifier. The subject is therefore to be strictly opposed to the effect of subjectivization: what the subjectivization masks is not a pre- or trans-subjective process of writing but a lack in the structure, a lack which is the subject. (SOI 175)

What cannot be accounted for in Althusser's account of interpellation is the failure of subjectivization. This failure is not just absolute failure in the sense of individuals who refuse to heed the interpellative call (Althusser's "bad subjects" who provoke the intervention of the Repressive State Apparatus when the Ideological State Apparatuses fail); even in the seemingly successful examples of interpellated subjects there remains a traumatic, antagonistic kernel which resists symbolization. The point is not that this failure refutes the theory of interpellation; quite the opposite, this failure, this little leftover of the Real is interpellation's condition of possibility. This failure is thus a necessary failure, for without this point of negativity in the midst of the symbolic, the space for the subject-position could never open up. This negativity, this radical split of the social-symbolic is subjectivity itself. The subject, then, opens up the space for subjectivization. The surplus object resisting symbolization is the materialization of the abyss of subjectivity, the subject which is internally split in relation to its own incommensurable surplus object (the formula for which is Lacan's $×a). This surplus is the hook upon which the symbolic fastens itself in the process of identification or interpellation. "The process of interpellation-subjectivization is precisely an attempt to avoid this traumatic kernel through identification: in assuming a symbolic mandate, in recognizing himself in the interpellation, the subject evades the dimension of the Thing" (SOI 181). Without this little piece of the Real, that thing in me more than me, the symbolic is desubjectivized: thrown into the abyss of subjectivity, caught in the vicious circle of radical negativity.

EXTENDED FOOTNOTE 2: Successful interpellation indicates that we have accepted our symbolic mandate: we have taken on the identity presented to us by the big Other. What is passed over in Althusser's theory, however, is the hystericization of the subject which is at one and the same time the necessary condition for and the reminder of the impossibility of interpellation or subjectivization. The hysteric is both the precondition for and the resistance to successful interpellation.

The initial moment of hystericization is the provocation of the feeling of guilt. The symbolic order, the big Other, poses the questions, "What were you doing?" "What is the meaning of this?" "Who is responsible for this?" The response of the addressee of these questions is guilt and shame for, even though the individual may be "innocent" and "ignorant," the form of the question itself produces the scene of guilt. We are guilty even if we have done nothing; in fact, we are guilty precisely because we can do nothing. The question from the Other, then, is basically obscene in the way it exposes the degree to which such questions are unanswerable. Such is the real purpose of such questions: not to elicit a "true" answer but to reveal the impossibility in the subject in relation to the Other as interrogator. The only answer to these questions is the subject itself, the subject as "the void of the impossibility of answering the question of the Other" (SOI 178). The subject does not have the answer; the subject is the answer to this questioning-the answer of the Real. The question points to that object within the subject, that innermost point of intimacy which Lacan refers to as objet petit a. The question confronts us with the Thing inside us, the object to which the big Other draws our attention but which can never be symbolized, the object to which the Other draws our attention because it cannot be symbolized, because the object itself is nothing but the remainder or leftover of the signifying process itself, the horrifying object which embodies our jouissance and thus both attracts us and repels us at the same time, thereby producing guilt. This attraction/repulsion relationship to the object inside us splits us: such is the constitution of the split subject of desire as the answer of the Real to the question of the Other:

The question as such produces in its addressee an effect of shame and guilt, it divides, it hystericizes him, and this hystericization is the constitution of the subject: the status of the subject as such is hysterical. The subject is constituted through his own division, splitting, as to the object in him; this object, this traumatic kernel, is the dimension that we have already named as that of a "death drive," of a traumatic imbalance, a rooting out. Man as such is "nature sick unto death," derailed, run off the rails through a fascination with a lethal Thing. (SOI 180-81)

This confrontation with the traumatic Thing is the subject as such. Interpellation, on the other hand, is the attempt to avoid exactly this confrontation. This is the difference between subject and subjectivization: the subject is constituted by the negativity of the traumatic Thing which is the remainder of symbolization; subjectivization-interpellation is the avoidance mechanism in response to this Thing of the Real, the attempt to outstrip our guilt. Interpellation functions as the identification of the subject with the Law as symbolic order, the superego function which maintains the illusion of social cohesion; hystericization functions as the identification with the obscene side of the superego, the side which demands that we "Enjoy!" and which constitutes both subjectivization as such (as the avoidance of just this impossible demand) and the impossibility of subjectivization (as the irreducible kernel of the Real at the heart of the Symbolic which frustrates the illusion of symbolic totalization).1

The hysteric, as we have then seen, is the subject constitutive of interpellation. But the hysteric who remains despite this subjectivization is the one who refuses this symbolic mandate, who refuses to be subjectivized or interpellated. The hysteric, above all, seeks to maintain his or her desire by continually deferring its satisfaction (at which point it would no longer be desire). The hysterical response to any potential solution to the deadlock of the subject caught between the attraction to and repulsion from the Thing is to say, "No, that is not it!" The symbolic mandate conferred on the hysteric would be such a resolution and must, therefore, be resisted in deference to the object within, which this mandate seeks to displace from view. As the inverse of the symbolic mandate, however, the hysteric's act remains tied to the Symbolic (unlike the psychotic whose total lack of identification dissolves any tie with the Symbolic whatsoever).

The hysteric's basic act is the transformation or conversion of this deadlock into its own embodiment, the symptom. The hysteric thus stages what Zizek refers to as "hysterical theater": the hysterical symptom gives body to the deadlock which cannot be symbolized. That which cannot be spoken is converted into body language-just think of a nervous twitch or an inexplicable paralysis whereby an unacknowledged psychic deadlock seeks resolution through this body language: "What we have here is quite literally a 'conversion': the figuration ('acting out') of a theoretical impasse (of the 'unthought' of a theoretical position) and at the same time the inversion best rendered by one of Hegel's constant rhetorical figures: when, for example Hegel deals with the ascetic's position, he says that the ascetic converts the denial of the body into the embodied denial" (FTK 143). Zizek explains the drive behind this inversion as follows:

According to Lacan, the fundamental experience of man qua being-of-language is that his desire is impeded, constitutively dissatisfied: he "doesn't know what he really wants." What the hysterical "conversion" accomplishes is precisely an inversion of this impediment: by means of it, the impeded desire converts into a desire for impediment; the unsatisfied desire converts into a desire for unsatisfaction; a desire to keep our desire "open"; the fact that we "don't know what we really want"-what to desire-converts into a desire not to know, a desire for ignorance . . . . Therein consists the basic paradox of the hysteric's desire: what he desires is above all that his desire itself should remain unsatisfied, hindered-in other words: alive as a desire. (FTK 143-44)

The hysterical subject who "does not know what he wants" desires the desire of the Other. That is, the hysteric identifies with the gaze of the Other, the point in the symbolic order from which the hysteric sees himself as desirable. The hysteric does not identify with a subject-position in the sense of taking on that particular symbolic mandate as the point of his own desire (subjectivization) but as the point of the Other's desire. The job of ideology criticism, then, is to identify the position in the Other which functions as the desire which the hysteric desires to please.

↑ Index

359. Chris Stroffolino

Re: "50s in Orono - the Reviews"

Mon 24 Jun 1996

Colloboration POEM composed on BUS 210 en route to the Heaths of Cadillac Mountain ("methinks the ground is flat"---KING LEAR) by, I think, every bus member and read by Nathalie and Michael Bassinski-- (loss, i think you should publish this in your website too!)

EMPHASIZED BY GREEN IN THE POST-CONFESSIONAL CONSTRUCTIVIST RAIN anthem for doomed youth like a truck stop siren but she bought four burps and a bitch so they decided simply to shut up and do it oh, the flight of the candor cantor canteen pass water
I have boring bees she sd.
and then came up from seeds prune the main roads into wet curls
please don't sit on the waterbed of roses

Sometimes I look up and smile for a satellite photo from the spiky (+++++++ untranslatable) of peg's toil to the lathe booo mooose, buffy, now stuck in the zoo green hat blue noise.

What whiteness like this whiteness,
what candor?
Bar harbor. Bah humbug!

Every toenail throbs like a sparkler.
Poems aren't found they are MADE
The first point is the nation from which the demon(?) dawn may be seen the hive that is a mummy's mask but only when viewed by a mummy
what thou lovest well in Maine?
lordly women to heaven overgiven
"I'll trade you a winter for two summers" until the wall waits to window childlike departures
I myself am smell/well/fell/dell/George spilling its ashes(?) of jam at the MLA convention (ALMS) and, with a scream, collecting coke bottles, the armless cowboy ignites a marshmellow and mosies away
"old people should be forced to watch"
But what?
----------(i don't know all the authors names)

↑ Index

360. Gabrielle Welford
KKK in Ann Arbor, MI (fwd)
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Anyone was there? Gab.

The following is the text of a June 23, 1996 letter sent to the Ann Arbor News from Ann Arbor Organizing Against the Klan (A2 OAK)
-=-

To the Editor:

Media coverage of the June 22 Ann Arbor counter-demonstration against a Ku Klux Klan rally was both distorted and omitted almost all mention of the widespread police brutality that took place against counter-demonstrators. Ann Arbor Organizing Against the Klan (A2 OAK), a community coalition of sixteen local groups and many individuals, wishes to set the record straight.

There were numerous incidents of unprovoked police violence against not only the 600 or more assembled counter-demonstrators, but also bystanders and passersby. Tear gas was randomly shot into the crowd with no order to disperse ever given. Protesters who did nothing illegal were randomly maced. Several of the eight people arrested were beaten and maced while they were already handcuffed and in police custody and were offering absolutely no resistance at that time. One passerby who did not even participate in the counter-demonstration was maced apparently for questioning a police officer. Police maced a man holding a baby. A puppy belonging to a counter-demonstrator was repeatedly and deliberately kicked and maced. A woman organizer for A2 OAK was maced after the rally was over as she was walking to her car; the police stopped their car, rolled down the window and sprayed mace in her face. These are but a few of the instances of police brutality that took place that day. In reality, it was this widespread use of police violence that provoked counter-demonstrators to anger, not the other way around.

In a highly revealing view of racism in the criminal justice system, of the six white and two Black people arrested, all the white arrestees were released on personal recognizance; the Black arrestees were forced to post bond!

All told, 200 cops from several different police departments were deployed to protect the KKK, a group whose history of murder and racist terror are well-known. This deployment consisted of tens of thousands of tax dollars spent on erecting fences around City Hall, blocking and re-routing traffic, paying for overtime for the police, providing transportation for the KKK to and from the rally site, and allowing the KKK access to the second floor terrace of City Hall as a staging area for their rally. Apparently one has to advocate genocide in order to be afforded these amenities. This goes way beyond any issue of "free speech." The police did everything possible to ensure that the Klan had a successful rally. However, despite the unprecedented display of police protection for these advocates of mass murder, including police statements prior to the event calling on local citizens to avoid the anti-racist demonstration, 600 plus people were able to successfully drown out the message of hatred of the Klan and outnumber these fascists by over 30 to 1.

Furthermore, the Ann Arbor News inaccurately reported that "protest groups" had been threatening violence "all week" before the rally. This is patently false. As a broad-based community and campus ad hoc coalition of diverse groups and individuals - Black, white, Latino, Asian, gay, straight, religious, non-religious, young and old - A2 OAK encompassed a variety of political and tactical opinions. Our plan was for a massive anti-fascist demonstration to be held at the same place prior to the appearance of the Klan so that these proponents of lynching and the torching of Black churches would think twice about organizing for racial terrorism in our city. That would have been the least violent of all the alternatives. Instead, the police thwarted this by militarily blockading City Hall with fences and 200 cops menacing anti-racist protesters, issuing provocative statements designed to scare potential counter-demonstrators, and brutalizing protesters who courageously resisted these police threats and stood up against a group organizing for political power based on a program of genocide.

In view of this display of police brutality in Ann Arbor on June 22, A2 OAK demands the following:

1. Drop all charges against the eight people arrested.
2. The immediate unpaid suspension of those police officers involved in brutalizing counter-demonstrators and passersby.
3. An independent investigation of overall police conduct and tactics on June 22.

In addition, A2 OAK urges all member of the community to picket and pack the preliminary examination hearing of the Ann Arbor 8 on July 3 at 12:30pm outside of 14-A District Court at Washtenaw and Hogback in Ann Arbor.

Paul Lefrak
Barbara Pliskow,
for Ann Arbor Organizing Against the Klan (A2 OAK)

↑ Index

361. Pierre Joris
Query
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Does anybody on the list have Robnert Haas' snail mail address. If so please contact me backchannel. Thanks -- Pierre

========== Pierre Joris | "Form fascinates when one no longer has the force Dept. of English | to understand force from within itself. That SUNY Albany | is, to create." -- Jacques Derrida Albany NY 12222 | tel&fax:[redacted] | "Poetry is the promise of a language." email: | -- Friedrich Holderlin [redacted]|
==========

↑ Index

362. Pierre Joris
music info on web
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Thot some on the list may be interested in the following www addresses which a friend just sent me:

[stuff cut out].... these are URL's for Steve Lacy. The second one is his discography.

http://www.imaginet.fr/~senators/

http://www.nwu.edu/WNUR/jazz/artists/lacy.steve/discog.html

This is the URL for the European Free Improv. page:

http://www.shef.ac.uk/misc/rec/ps/efi/ehome.html

Cadence also has a listing (albeit somewhat dated) on the web at:

http://www.nwu.edu/jazz/cadence/

"To feel is perhaps the most terrifying thing in this society" Cecil Taylor 1975

↑ Index

363. Henry Gould
Re: hailing Barry hailing
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Hail, stupid, senseless Thing!
Hail, I-O-U big Unknown Idiotallergy!
Hail, obscene confusion of the Two into the One!
Hail, repro-constriction of the thrown Throat of the Subject!
Hail, lil a of the petty Fours!
Hail, Ex-plained Village of the Plains!
Hail, hysterias of the heterohomo Cities of the Plain old Scandal Histories!
Hail, and Farewell! Hello Again!!

- Henry Hale Gould

p.s.
Hail, word-mongers of the invio-labile!
Hail, droning of the Girlie Pics sad leftover feeling of Know-it-All Geritol!
Hail, Time Burp of the Latter Hailstorms!
Hail... Hail... Barristers of Barratrocious Bare-it-Alls!
Hail, snail mail - I'm coming!! Slow but Subjective!!

↑ Index

364. Chris Stroffolino
Re: Query
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Another QUERY---
Is Doug Messerli still on this list?
If he's not does anybody know his backchannel address?

And when are those GERTRUDE STEIN AWARD 1994-95 books coming out?
Chris Stroffolino

↑ Index

365. Burt Kimmelman
Re: 50s in Orono - the Reviews
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Loss,

Admirably summed up! Will you see to it that Burt Hatlen et al. get a copy of it?

Burt

↑ Index

366. Kevin Killian
Fashion Report, dateline Orono
Mon 24 Jun 1996

This is Kevin Killian speaking. I know I was assigned to write the fashion news of the Orono Conference, and Dodie Bellamy was going to assist, but I'm sorry, Loss . . . there's too little to report. This was not the event to send the designers of Milan and New York scurrying for another profession. Everybody looked okay, but the weather was too hot, then too cold, so what could we do? It was so cold I saw all these people formerly with good sense descend on the Student Union and buy these terrible oversized sweatshirts and sweat pants, etc., then they wore them in public, and I couldn't blame them.

The only person who kept a style throughout was the mysterious Starr Black, who kept appearing in one variation after another of an essentialist Starr Blackness. Even if you didn't know her name, you know exactly who I'm talking about and the kind of Ralph Lauren meets Alexandra Neel outfits she wore. Those green mossy skirts and heather Fair Isle sweaters and the pins and cameras. As far as I'm concerned she was the fashion triumph of the week.

Runners-up: Roger Conover, resplendent in emerald green, his fringe of hair tied back a la Hal Robins from the Church of the Sub Genius; Nick Lawrence, dapper as a villain in an Edith Wharton novel; Sharon Thesen, who arrived in the middle of the night in a slinky cocktail number from Vicky Tiel.

Here's Mr. Blackwell's final category: The Fabulous Fashion Independents. This prize we award to two unidentified men seen one night at the dorm cash bar extravaganza animated in complementary patchwork madras-plaid jackets. Does anyone out there know where these jackets are popular or indeed manufactured? I want one! E.T. call home! Speaking of origin, does anybody know why those ethno-poetic guys all carry the same hippy bags? Jerome Rothenberg, you're on this list, did those bags come with a gamelan inside?

Fashion disaster? No question about it: the official conference T shirt which, I see, has already been alluded to several times in previous posts. On the front it says, you know, "National Poetry Foundation/conference/American Poetry of the 1950s/June 19-23, 1996/Orono Maine" and on the back it has a list of the twenty or so soi-disant "plenary speakers"-no, not a list, a constellation, for each name mounts or falls on its separate diagonal, all in this revoltingly un-designed plain serif typeface, italics galore. From the moment I saw those T-shirts neatly stacked on a long deal table, all folded in a variety of Maine colors-Martha Stewart colors-I knew I had to have one. When you see it you will rub your eyes thinking, "It had to happen!" Clever Bruce Campbell was spotted wearing a T-shirt from a previous conference, must have been on Pound, that said "Make It New" tempered with a line of bold Chinese ideograms.

More later on more "heady" topics.

↑ Index

367. Paul Naylor
Oronomics
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Just thought I'd chime in on the Orono conference, which was, for me, the best academic conference I've attended. Most conferences make me think seriously about returning to my career in auto part sales -- they typically seem to be more about networking than connecting. Orono struck me as more about the latter than the former: connections between generations (at least three, maybe four, says Keith Tuma) and traditions (connecting not via some essence but, as Wittgenstein would say, via family resemblances), between ways of writing and reading and disseminating, etc. Since I don't live in or near a poetry hotbed like Buffalo or San Francisco or Washington D.C., experiencing some of those connections was as nourishing as it was exhausting.

My only suggestion is that next time we sell official conference underwear with the names of the non-plenarians emblazoned thereon.

Paul Naylor
MAIL
SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

↑ Index

368. Charles Bernstein
[redacted]
Mon 24 Jun 1996

Martin Spinelli has been putting up on the EPC the first of the series of LINE-break radio programs that we made together over the past year. These 30-minute shows include readings as well as discussion. Already up are interviews with Robert Creeley, Jena Osman, Ray Federman, Ron Silliman, Cecilia Vicuna, Dennis Tedlock, Steve McCaffery, and Fiona Templeton. Another twenty or so are in the works. I believe that sound files on the web will fundamentally change access to the archive of poets' reading their work. At this time, we realize we are using formats that many of you will not yet have easy access to. But we feel it is necessary to get this material in place for the time when playing digital sound files will be more accessible. (Some time in the future, we plan to distribute the program via audio cassette; however, cassettes are not available at this time.) Our first choice, radio, is limited by the culturally benighted attitude toward that medium by most commercial and noncommercial radio operators.) Martin has insisted that our first priority be to make available the best quality sound possible. This he has done. The sound files take up a lot of memory and take a long time to download. However, once you have done this, you will have sound that is good as any recorded poetry I have ever heard. Soon, it will also be possible to play our sound files with RealAudio; that allows immediate playing at roughly telephone quality. I think in the end this will be the most appealing way for most people to play these files, but it would not be satisfactory as the only way to have them available.
The world of sound files can be quite confusing. First off, you need to have a sound card installed in your computer; that is, if it didn't come with the computer, as it does on Macs and many PCs. You also need to have speakers; most internal computer speakers are of course not going to be as good as plugging in better speakers (I plugged my sound card into the same mini speakers I use for my stereo system). (Martin notes that you'll need to download the speaker driver (speak.exe) from our info page if you want to use your internal speaker.)

The next problem is that sound files come in different and incompatible formats (most commonly .wav and .au and .mpeg); that means you have to have several different sound or media players: (NAPplayer comes with Netscape (and plays .au files) and windows PCs come with a "Media Player" (for .wav files). LINEbreak files are mostly in .MPEG and that requires that you download a player for that, though the ones we recommend for that will play some of the other formats as well. Finally, you have to tell Netscape or your web browser what to do when you click on a sound file: download to your hardrive or play as soon it loads up in your RAM. We recommend that you download our sound files, as it may take four hours to download a full 30-minute show (with a fast modem). But we have also put up short files, mostly of single poems, and those take condiderably less time. In any case, if you download to your hard drive, you can easily play the file over again, don't have to stay on-line, and can more easily record it on a tape. If you don't download it to your hard drive, you get to play it just while you are on-line (and have to pay attention to when it finishes dowloading to RAM). Martin has written very clear, step-by-step instructions on how to use our sound files. These instructions are far more helpful that those provided by the software manufactures. You will find these, and the programs, at http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/linebreak

One more thought about access. While few will have access to the technology that makes these sound files available, our commitment here, is, nonetheless, to creating at the greatest possible public access to these sound files. We expect that schools at all levels, from lower schools to universities, as well as public libraries, will acquire the technology to gain access to such files (due to the increased commercializing of the Web, not because material such as ours is available!). And we are committed to making all these files, indeed all the material on the EPC, free and unrestricted. This is a public space, even if only a small portion of the public is able to enter into it. Nonetheless, given the scale of poetry in North American, our collection of poets' voices promises to make such material far more accessible than it has been in the past. This activity is only possible because it is supported by a public university and, perhaps more crucially, produced through the unpaid labor of people committed to making poetry available in the newly emerging public spaces of the Internet. (It helps, as with so many projects in the Poetics Progam at UB, that we have small amounts for seed money and to cover some cash outlays.) Martin Spinelli – who is not a poet, but a radio producer and a graduate student at UB working on utopian thinking starting in the 19th century in the UK – has put in hundreds and hundreds of hours into engineering, editing, distributing LINEbreak; he has also taken in upon himself to learn about the possibilities of sound on the net.

Please let Martin and me know what you think about LINEbreak – the shows or the technology we are using to make them available.

↑ Index

369. David Kellogg
my hero barry watten
Mon 24 Jun 1996

You know it's time to change your .sig when someone you've only met over email quotes it EXACTLY the first time he meets you. Well Chris Strofollino was furrier than I thought, and the drinking was fine. Some excellent papers, but some, including my own, indifferent or underthought. Thank God nobody was there, the spouse of the other presented taking furious notes. But the papers were not the point. The intellectual and other conversation that surrounded them will sustain me for many weeks, perhaps months. Hence my title. I wasn't at his talk so I can't comment directly but the tone of the reponse by those who were offended seemed astonishingly narrow. Thanks to George H. for his post. OKAY, well the thing about the conference was Barrett Watten was always and everywhere "on," ready to talk, and that's why he's my model for intellectual engagement. It's not pro wrestling; it's the news. We'll see how long that lasts. High point for me: Rachel Blau DuPlessis's excellent talk, which I will abstract when I have more time. Also Bob Perelman's revealing summary of Louis Martz's talk in conversation, which made me doubly glad I didn't go. And meeting all of you, each of whom I adore.

Negative effect of the conference being sleep depletion, which I mean now to correct. More elaborations later.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

370. Hank Lazer
Re: Oronomainia
Mon 24 Jun 1996

I second Paul Naylor's sense of the conference. I too found it to be one of the best I've ever attended. Extremely high quality papers being read. Listening to Sharon Thesen's paper on the Olson-Boldereff correspondence, I sat there certain that I was hearing about research that would fundamentally alter the way we read Olson's early work, especially the development of the Maximus poems. A brilliant paper. As one plenary speaker (one of the T-shirted Elect) remarked to me, the session papers were usually much better than the plenary addresses.

For me, Ted Enslin's reading was extraordinary. I have lots to learn from Ted's intricate musicality--a beautiful continuity of Zukfosky's micro-musics and the current work of John Taggart. Many many other gems at the conference--any naming will be incomplete, idiosyncratic, etc. I too was moved to see that a number of younger poet/critics have dedicated themselves to working with some older folks to keep the writing alive, edited, in print--for me, most movingly, Joel Kuszai's work with Mac Low's archives (of the 1940s and 1950s) and Mark Nowak's work with Ted Enslin's poetry. Mark is editing Ted's poems for a _Selected Poems_ from the National POetry Foundation. (There are over 1800 pages of Ted's poems in print, not counting his long works....)

Like Paul Naylor, I live in the hinterlands, so the learning at events sustains me for many months. It also felt like Poetry Camp. Breakfast at 7AM; last session or reading usually ending around 11:30, followed by the cash bar. Long days. So many high quality talks it was impossible to be at all of them, even if one chose to panel-hop to Lynn Keller on Guest, Joan Retallack on Mac Low, Ben Friedlander on O'Hara, Aldon on Russell Atkins, Mark Scroggins on Jonas, Maria Damon on Kaufman, Lorenzo Thomas on Tolson (surely one of us can be effective in bringing Tolson's work back into print!), and on and on. I certainly reached times when I could no longer follow sentences, so went for a walk or took a nap. Ah, the dorm rooms: the ceiling of mine adorned with glowing planets and stars and comets.

In the aftermath of the Friday night group reading, a big snapshot of writing now, I find myself mulling over the place, nature, and preponderance of humor & satire in current poetry.

And the cold weather, the rain, the fog.... Now back in muggy Tuscaloosa, heat index over 100, written interrogatories to do for a pending lawsuit, lots of office correspondence, and a lobster-fueled desire to read, read, write, read, write.

Oh yes, one interesting materialistic note: chief sponsor of the event? Stephen King. I sure hope Loss's photo of King & Dorn turns out....

Lots more to add, so, others, please do....

Hank Lazer

↑ Index

371. george hartley
Boston review
Tue 25 Jun 1996

I just want to thank Dan Bouchard for posting the announcement for the Boston poetry reading of two weeks ago. I was in Massachusetts visting family before driving up to Maine, & was delighted to go to my first reading in my hometown (I wasn't active in poetry until grad school in New Mexico). The Torras hosted the event in their house, & I so enjoyed their hospitality & sense of Boston poetry history (and artwork on the walls). The poets varied in style but were each charged and refreshing: Ange Mlinko, Damon Krokowski, Sianne Ngai, Dan Bouchard, and a new good friend of mine, Chris Straffolino (soon of Jersey City). Thanks, Boston! --George

↑ Index

372. k.a. hehir
Re: DING!
Tue 25 Jun 1996

---

just returned from the first of what will now become a series of readings. a hat-full of of ales on my head. poetry is alive and well in londonOnt.(George the Spasms just filled the Gallery and I think they may be a fitting house band).
,

We can only hope to be soo fresh so often.

a callow good-bye,

kevin hehir

↑ Index

373. Pierre Joris
Web Del Sol (fwd)
Tue 25 Jun 1996

Haven't had time to check this one out myself, but thought it would be of interest to this list -- Pierre

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Tue, 25 Jun 1996 01:06:44 -0400
From: Diem Jones <[redacted]>

To: [redacted]
Subject: Web Del Sol

>WEB DEL SOL
>
>The literary arts now have a locus on the World Wide Web at Web Del Sol, the only Internet site dedicated to offering the best new American and international writing from both individual authors and established literary publications. The site also serves as a resource providing a comprehensive link to the range of literary activities and information available on the Web.
>
>Web Del Sol seeks out experimental, literary, mainstream works from throughout the world. Included at the site are poems, short stories, prose poems, novel excerpts, essays, and interviews. The Web Del Sol project was begun in November, 1995, posting only two or three short stories. In less than six months it has expanded into an independent Web literary publication and resource site to bring a wide variety of new and distinguished prose and poetry to the Internet. Publishing collections of works by featured writers such as Ilan Stavans, Michael Martone, Ben Marcus, Kristy Nielsen, and Madison Smartt Bell, Web Del Sol includes background information that allows the reader to learn more of the life behind the words.
>
>Web Del Sol also plays host to some of the world's finest literary publications, including AGNI, The Literary Review, Artful Dodge, Conjunctions, and Zyzzyva, creating home pages that give them a distinct presence on the WWW to promote the writers and poets they have discovered. In addition, WDS serves as a master one-stop jump for all other superior quality literary arts publications on the WWW, among them Mississippi Review, Ploughshares, Hootenanny, Missouri Review, Cream City Review, Postmodern Culture, Creative Nonfiction, and Sycamore Review.
>
>As a comprehensive writer resource site, Web Del Sol provides links to writing labs, writing programs, writer newsgroups, online bookstores, references, an extensive list of news sources, and a complex of the latest on-screen search engine forms including MetaCrawler and Snoopie.
>
>Web Del Sol will continue to stay in touch with the latest literary developments on the Internet and elsewhere, culling out the best Web sites, material, and writers for inclusion while striving to bring the literary arts to the widest possible audience through promotion on the Internet.
>
The Web Del Sol address on the Internet (World Wide Web) is

http://www.cais.net/aesir/fiction
>
>Note: the site is best viewed with Netscape 2.0+
>
>
>
==========
WEB DEL SOL
http://www.cais.net/aesir/fiction
LOCUS OF LITERARY ART ON THE WWW

↑ Index

374. Steven Clay
Granary Books Reception
Tue 25 Jun 1996

If you happen to be in New York City Thursday June 27 you are invited to attend a publication party for 5 new works published by Granary Books. Please note that the reception is NOT at Granary but at EXIT ART - be sure to use the 88 Crosby Street entrance (between Prince and Spring.) The reception is from 6-8 and a good many of the artists & writers noted below will be present. The books being celebrated are:

Holton Rower - NON
An artist's book in the abstract - materials run amok

Jerome Rothenberg & David Rathman - PICTURES OF THE CRUCIFIXION - New poems with drawings by Minneapolis based artist David Rathman

Lewis Warsh - BUSTIN'S ISLAND '68 - Warsh's memoir of the summer of '68 . . . and after. Wonderful black and white photographs of Ted Berrigan, Anne Waldman, Warsh, Tom Clark, Joanne Kyger . . .

Ric Haynes - REJECTED FROM MARS
- psychological cartoon/nightmare - handpainted linocuts - 3 years in the making

Ligorano/Reese - THE CORONA PALIMPSEST
- based on their video installation-Walt Disney & R. Crumb meet Dan Rather

See you there.
See the Granary Books web site:
www.granarybooks.com

↑ Index

375. george hartley
oops!
Tue 25 Jun 1996

Sorry, Chris! I meant Straffaluna. I shouldn't type so late at night. --George

↑ Index

376. Mark Roberts
AWOL: Five Island Press New Poets Series 4 (forwarded)
Tue 25 Jun 1996

NB all prices are Aust dollars. enquiries/orders to [redacted]

> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Date: Tue, 25 Jun 1996 06:57:28 +1000
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (awol)
> Subject: AWOL: Five Island Press New Poets Series 4
>
> The following information has been posted by AWOL for Five Islands Press.
> Please address any enquiries to the contact number listed below.
>
> **********
>
> You are invited to the launch of scarp & five islands press NEW POETS PUBLISHING PROGRAM 1996 - SERIES 4.
>
> Susan Bower Factory joker
> Lis Hoffmann Libido
> Peter Kirkpartrick Wish you were here
> Lorraine Marwood Skinprint
> Mark O'Flynn The too bright sun
> Duncan Richardson Aim at morning
>
> SYDNEY 6pm Thursday 27 June Gleebooks (upstairs) 49 Glebe Point Road Glebe.
> MELBOURNE 2pm Saturday 29 June La Mama 205 Faraday Street Carlton
> BRISBANE 7pm Friday 2 August Universal Joint Gallery, 11 Doggett Street Teneriffe
>
> For further information contact Five Island Press PO Box U34 Wollongong University 2500, Phone 042 213867, Fax 042 213301
>
> FIVE ISLAND PRESS titles are distributed by AWOL. If your local bookshop does not stock these titles they can be ordered through AWOL's smalll press distribution service.
>
> These titles are also avaialble through AWOL's Virtual Bookshop for $7.50.

> (set of 6 books $30.00, bound volume of all six titles $20.00). email AWOL for details
>
> AWOL
> Australian Writing On Line
> [redacted]
> http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
> PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
> Phone 61 2 7475667
> Fax 61 2 7472802

_____
Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

377. Mark Wallace
Jorge Guitar
Tue 25 Jun 1996

Will Jorge Guitart please contact me backchannel, or will someone who knows his e-mail address send it to me? I tried to find him on the poetics address list, but his name is not there, and I'm wondering if he's signed off.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

378. Burt Kimmelman
orono thanks
Tue 25 Jun 1996

It occurs to me to mention (at the risk of stating the obvious, perhaps) that the overwhelmingly positive responses to the Orono conference being posted here should also be duplicated in hard copy, with letter-head when possible, and sent to Burt Hatlen and Sylvester Pollet so they have a record for when they need to explain themselves to their administration, grant funding agencies, etc.

Now, let me also take this opportunity to say electronically that the conference for me (unfortunately I did not get there till friday afternoon) was utterly thrilling and nurturing. I found the quality of the work presented to be at the highest level all around, and getting to meet so many people in the flesh was fantastic. Overall--and here I must say that this seems typical of NPF--it is a real feat to be able to have a conference that is warm and generally on a human scale and yet that is criticaly rigorous. I only feel bad that I missed so very many things that I wanted so much to catch, and that I did NOT get to meet some of us on this list. But then, this is an embarrassment of riches, and ultimately to be hoped for.

Burt Kimmelman

↑ Index

379. Mark Wallace
Joseph Ceravolo
Tue 25 Jun 1996

Jordan Davis pointed out several days ago that a new Joseph Ceravolo website has gone up, courtesy of his wife and his son. The samples there are very interesting, and I can only wish that more was available. I would have wanted to download the whole thing!

I'm wondering about other takes on Ceravolo's work. Although I think of him mainly in a New York school context, the syntax of his work seems more odd and torqued than is usual in that context, except perhaps for O'Hara at his most wonderfully frantic. But Ceravolo's syntax seems more distorted, although only at key instants--it seems almost a language poetry-like attempt to foreground syntax in a way that disrupts what appears to be a straightforward and simple meditation. Those distortions add a new element to the quiet meditation that his work often presents--one can't quite get back of the language to the world out there, and the notion of meditation itself therefore gets called into question.

Most of his books are long out of print--an under construction section of the website says it will later feature locations at which all of Ceravolo's work can be found. Anybody have any further input on where those long-lost books can be found?

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

380. Bob Holman
Sparrow for President
Tue 25 Jun 1996

...and in the Elections column, Bob Holman passes along:

POET ANNOUNCES HIS CANDIDACY FOR REPUBLICAN PRESIDENTIAL NOMINATION "Revive the Party of Lincoln in the Revolutionary Spirit of Lincoln!" Cries Sparrow Mouth Almighty/Mercury Records Web Site to Monitor Campaign's Progress

The poet Sparrow, one of the stars of The United States of Poetry, will formally announce his bid for the Republican presidential nomination at noon on Thursday, June 27 at a press conference to be held at the base of the statue of Atlas in front of the International Building at 630 Fifth Avenue between 50th and 51st Streets. Sparrow's announcement, cast into verse and available as audio, will also appear in three parts for three consecutive weeks starting on Thursday, June 27. Every Thursday, you can find the new verse at http://www.mercuryrecords.com/poets. Sparrow is the first in a series of poets speaking out on topics inspired by the events of the election year. Citing Percy Bysshe Shelley's assertion that poets are "the unacknowledged legislators of the world," Sparrow has decided to run for the Republican nomination out of his abiding affection for Abraham Lincoln, the party's most illustrious member. "Lincoln was a Republican who loved the working man," Sparrow notes. He cites a speech written by then Congressman-Elect Lincoln in 1847: "Inasmuch as most good things are produced by labor, it follows that all such things of right belong to those whose labor has produced them. But it has so happened in all ages of the world, that some have labored, and others have, without labor, enjoyed a large proportion of the fruits. This is wrong and should not continue. To secure to each laborer the whole product of his labor...is a most worthy object of any good government." Sizing up Bob Dole, the Republican's presumptive nominee, Sparrow asks, "Who is the more Lincolnesque, Bob Dole or

I? Who is lanky, bearded, eccentric, humorous, wise, Biblical, literary, radical and self-taught, and who is a vicious imposter from Kansas?" As the only poet in the race, Sparrow is demanding equal time on television with the other candidates. "All the other poets are speaking prose--vast, uninterrupted, listless, prosaic prose," he notes. "Only I am speaking a flowing, lyric, olive-colored poetry." His platform? It begins with "the near-abolition of money" and proceeds with the declaration of a Jubilee Year, "a year when all debts are forgiven and all slaves are freed." Sparrow is represented by "Testimonial" on The United States of Poetry, the widely-acclaimed soundtrack to the PBS tv series and the first release on Mouth Almighty, Mercury's spoken word imprint. He created a sensation last year when he picketed The New Yorker magazine, holding a placard reading, "My poetry is as bad as yours." His work has since been published in that august journal.

For more information, please contact Mercury Records, Media & Artist Relations or Mouth Almighty Records:

Carrie Ross Bill Adler Mercury Records Mouth Almighty Records [redacted]
[redacted]

↑ Index

381. Kevin Killian

Jeremy Reed

Tue 25 Jun 1996

This is Kevin Killian speaking. Listen, I have to review a book "Bitter Blue" by Jeremy Reed, it says on the back of the book he is a British poet with 8 volumes of poetry. I wonder if any British pals on this list-serv can tell me anything about his poetry and or career or any strictly "back channel" information about, well, you know.

This book is a mixed genre account of his drug intoxification and also withdrawal and includes plenty of scoop on Anna Kavan as well.

Thanks in advance from,

An ignorant US reader

↑ Index

382. Gwyn McVay
Susanne Levy
Tue 25 Jun 1996

Does anyone out there in Poetics-land know the work of--or know personally--Pierre?--the poet and artist Susanne Levy? According to what little I could find in the files at the Nat'l Museum of Women in the Arts, she was born in Basel in 1921 and now lives in Arnsbach. The work of hers on display was /Toene der Stille/, a book of her poems with design embossed into pure white handmade cotton paper. There are at least two scholarly monographs about her, both published by Verlag Zuerich; she has had tons of exhibits, both alone and with groups, all over Europe, but seems to be pretty unheard of in the Benighted States. Her poems are extremely reminiscent of later Celan, in the Breathturn/Atemwende time.

There's also an exhibit of 20th-century art there that includes Theresa Hak Kyung Cha's Passages/Paysages and Nancy Spero's Codex Artaud.

Gwyn

↑ Index

383. JOEL LEWIS
Re: Joseph Ceravolo
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Actually a number of Ceravolo books are availible & in print. Gotham Books certainly has copies of Millennium Dust, Transmigration Solo can still be had from Coffeehouse, INRI is still availible from Swollen Magpie (which Charles North, Paul Violi,etc) and, possibly, Spring in this World of Poor Mutts can be obtaoined thru Ron Padgett(he was giving away copies at Joe's St. mark's memorial. Only the very early chabooks are hard to find.

I knew Joe for a number of years and he strikes me as the great religous poet of our time. The NY School connection is accidental. There is still much in manuscript & a great long poem called Hell Gate of which there is a tape of Joe reading it. I'm amazed that there are about 800 hits on his web site -- I don't think any of his books sold that many copies. I still remember him at a festivak honoring Williams, reading after Daniel Halpern. He read each poem twice "to help you understand it", he said, but he could have read them 60 times to an audience anticiapting more mewling melodramas of the singular self.

↑ Index

384. Christopher Filkins
LSD lsd l s d led sleds
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Looks much better justified.
> >
> > > I
> > > had > > > heard > > > from my > > > co-worker
> > > about a big > > > problem today.
> > > It seems my kid
> > > and your kid, all
> > > of our kids have to > > > worry about evil drug > > > dealers giving out fake > > > tattoos with acid in them.
> > > This is not a joke or rumor.
> > > This is a serious threat that > > > must not be taken lightly. They > > > have a blue star on them, but not > > > all - some have cartoons or such on > > > them. You must be very careful with a > > > blue star tattoo because the strychnine
> > > can be absorbed into your blood from just > > > handling the paper. This horrible thing has > > > a reason to it - the dealers want LSD addicts
> > > to buy more after they are hooked. Symptoms you > > > should watch for are: hallucinations, mood swings,
> > > uncontrolled laughter, drop in body temperature,
> > > dizziness or disorientation, severely dilated > > > pupils, and severe vomiting. Some time - up > > > to an hour, can pass between contact with > > > the drug and onset of symptoms. If your > > > child has fell victim to this heinous > > > crime, you must take him quickly to > > > a hospital. Children hare already > > > died from this, LSD overdose is > > > easy. If you see a suspicious > > > person giving tattoos, foil > > > wrapped especially, phone

> > > your police immediately.
> > > This is a real danger
> > > and is growing much > > > faster than I can > > > spread warnings
> > > alone. Thanks > > > for reading
> > > this that
> > > I wrote > > > about
> > > LSD
> > > !

↑ Index

385. Ron Silliman
Joe Ceravolo
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Mark (et al),

The web is a perfect tool for the project that Joe Ceravolo's son seems to be putting together--making an essentially "hard-to-find" poet's work available to any and all. There had only been a few hundred hits when I visited the other day, but I recommend it to everyone on this list heartily (and, Loss, if it hasn't been done, set up a link from the author's index at EPC forthwith).

http://www.csam.montclair.edu/~ceravolo/

There's a link from there to the site done by Ceravolo's wife, which includes a short bio definitely worth reading. And Jim (the son) responds quickly to email.

I've never seen Ceravolo's work in any context that wasn't clearly associated with the NY School (with the exceptions of the two talks I've given myself that focus in part on his work). Tho I never met the man, I was told (by David Shapiro or Joel Lewis? Probably the latter, tho I don't recall exactly) that Ceravolo was "puzzled" by "Migratory Meaning" when it first came out in print.

You're quite right that his work does things that nobody else involved with the NY School has done--the base seems very much to have been surrealism and there's also a distinct zen air (tho whether that's simply intuitive on his part, or whether he was interested in non-western conceptions of life and art I can't say). To my knowledge he never wrote or spoke critically on the subject of his writing -- I'd love to discover otherwise. And it seems obvious that his reputation "suffered" because he didn't hustle his work and generally fell into the trap that befalls too many lyric writers -- virtually all of the major critical writing post WW2 about the "parallel tradition" tends to focus elsewhere (the notable exceptions being O'Hara and Creeley).

Now that the selected poems has gotten an excellent response, I suppose we can hope for a collected.

All best,

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

386. Cathy
Re: POETICS Digest - 24 Jun 1996 to 25 Jun 1996
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Mark Wallace wrote:
> Most of his books are long out of print--an under construction section of > the website says it will later feature locations at which all of > Ceravolo's work can be found. Anybody have any further input on where > those long-lost books can be found?
>
> mark wallace

I ordered Spring In This World of Poor Mutts and Transmigration Solo by Ceravolo at a little local bookshop here--came up with a sweet hardcover of Spring. Also got Transmigration Solo by Toothpaste Press, a first edition. 100 were signed and numbered--I got number 9--this was at Xmas. A friend just got the signed number 30. I think these have been sitting around in the basement at Coffee House.

↑ Index

387. Henry Gould
Martin Nakell whereabouts
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Does anyone have an email or street address for Martin Nakell, who attended the Hoboken conference? Please backchannel only to [redacted]. Thanks - Henry

↑ Index

388. Loss Glazier
Re: Joe Ceravolo
Wed 26 Jun 1996

At 03:08 AM 6/26/96 -0700, you wrote:
>
>The web is a perfect tool for the project that Joe Ceravolo's son seems >to be putting together--making an essentially "hard-to-find" poet's >work available to any and all. There had only been a few hundred hits >when I visited the other day, but I recommend it to everyone on this >list heartily (and, Loss, if it hasn't been done, set up a link from >the author's index at EPC forthwith).
>
>http://www.csam.montclair.edu/~ceravolo/

Ron and others,

Yes, this link is under way. Thanks!

I was a little disappointed that more of the work was not there. It gives you a sense or flavor, of course, and that's good. It's always more thrilling to see complete works - or complete texts of specific books.

I mean, let us really read the work ... that would be a true appreciation of the work ...

(I also don't think it would cut into potential book sales.)

Loss

↑ Index

389. Loss Glazier
Tender Buttons
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Speaking of full text check out the Stein link at the epc

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/stein/

Loss

↑ Index

390. Jordan Davis
Re: Joe Ceravolo
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Re Ceravolo and the NY School:

Kenneth Koch's _Poems 1952-1953_ from Black Sparrow (selections from which appear in _On the Great Atlantic Rainway_, the 1994 selected) and Ashbery's _Tennis Court Oath_ are some obvious antecedents. A complete collected Ceravolo would run thousands of pages--maybe a collected Books of would be better. Peter Gizzi published in O-blek some poems from _Mad Angels_, Ceravolo's last manuscript. It should be noted that the Coffee House book is drawn mainly from _Spring in this World of Poor Mutts_, actually a fairly difficult book to find--I bought Columbia University Press's in-house library copy a few years ago. Someone who seems to have inherited Ceravolo's feelings about syntax is Kim Lyons; her book _In Padua_ is available from SPD.

Jordan Davis

↑ Index

391. Rod Smith
Re: Joe Ceravolo
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Spring In This World of Poor Mutts can still be had in hardcover for $17.95. The pb is out o' print. Believe we have one at Bridge St tho I'm at home so can't say right now. SPD should have some left.

Rod

↑ Index

392. Tony Green
Re: [redacted]
Wed 26 Jun 1996

Hi Charles, LINEbreak Sounds a Great idea.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

393. Tony Green
logoparaphernalia
Wed 26 Jun 1996

I been reading art history exams, wh reminds me of last year's words:

ursury remanscent collaspe ambigious connosoir golden hew beuorgois a composto effect divinity & debuchary preportions

Cistene chapel polasters prolificity harminous Madonna

they have fleed Bacchus & Ariande illusionistical descrepencies lumonious Bacchus & Andriane indomiateable Sistern chapel ceerubs timbricity his pynchon for detail stripped pants highten deciple deliminate confusement encaptilated luxioarious howevery illuminous fictictious pilgramers anthrometomorphes diadactic to illicit vagurities Baachus & Ariadne Tinterotto & Titan glimp cherbs Cruixifcation cinemagraphic monumentous delevopment scense guesture boldging muscles optonimoised caterogise grandeoise tranistory incoroparte swrill Bacillica atopped fascial transcience fushion this story contains a story one in which is sad perceptionally virtuosic sillouettes origonaly bueatiful decripitude folliage exaburate a line of figs stretched out across the picture plane Farasee the upmost importance foilage porportion deapth best wishes to all

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

394. Tim wood
Re: LSD lsd l s d led sleds
Thu 27 Jun 1996

Christopher... the diamond (because my reader is designed to show forwarded text in that color) actually showed up blue on my end... subversive software I think. If this ever gets published, push for the blue ink, most definately...

> I
> had > heard
> from my
> co-worker
> about a big
> problem today.
> It seems my kid
> and your kid, all

of our kids have to worry about evil drug dealers giving out fake
tattoos with acid in them.
This is not a joke or rumor.
This is a serious threat that must not be taken lightly. They have a blue star on them, but not all - some have cartoons or such on them. You must be very careful with a blue star tattoo because the strychnine
can be absorbed into your blood from just handling the paper. This horrible thing has a reason to it - the dealers want LSD addicts
to buy more after they are hooked. Symptoms you should watch for are: hallucinations, mood swings,
uncontrolled laughter, drop in body temperature,
dizziness or disorientation, severely dilated
pupils, and severe vomiting. Some time - up
to an hour, can pass between contact with the drug and onset of symptoms. If your child has fell victim to this heinous crime, you must take him quickly to a hospital. Children hare already died from this, LSD overdose is easy. If you see a suspicious person giving tattoos, foil
wrapped especially, phone
your police immediately.
This is a real danger
and is growing much faster than I can spread warnings
alone. Thanks for reading
this that I wrote about
LSD
!

↑ Index

395. Pierre Joris

Why New York City Arrests Artists (fwd)

Thu 27 Jun 1996

Somethiing I thought could be of inetrest to this list too -- Pierre

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 26 Jun 1996 08:33:24 -0700 (PDT)
From: { brad brace } <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Cc: [redacted]
Subject: Why New York City Arrests Artists (fwd)

Why New York City Arrests Artists
  Robert Lederman 1996

New York City is in the midst of a social transformation in which the City's "image" has become the deciding factor in all governmental decisions. So-called "quality of life" is the new goal of City Hall's policies.

Unfortunately, it's not the average person's life quality the present administration is trying to improve. Concerns about individual rights, small scale free enterprise and public space have been replaced by a cozy partnership between corporate clients and City government. Corporations and real estate interests are now viewed as the actual proprietors of our public sidewalks, parks and streets. These interests see sidewalk displays of paintings, and street culture of any kind, as an ugly blemish damaging the exclusive appeal and market value of their properties and businesses.

Real estate associations and corporations desiring to gain absolute control over public spaces have formed their own independent governments or B.I.D.'s (Business Improvement Districts). These organizations act as an unelected and unaccountable shadow government running key areas of the City. They are authorized to collect special taxes ($42 million last year), have their own police (often paid less than the minimum wage) and are attempting to set up their own court system. The Fifth Avenue and Times Square B.I.D.s, which dominate the entire B.I.D. scheme, financed and built their own Community Court on 54th Street to handle quality of life crimes committed in their vicinity more "efficiently". B.I.D.s have been accused of "hiring goon squads" [see 1995 City Council Investigation on B.I.D.s] to force homeless people off the streets. Distinctions between business, police, and the court system blur as they become one continuous enterprise.

Sidewalk art displays have been described by B.I.D. directors as magnets for prostitution, pickpockets and crime. Artists are demonized as "parasites" in order to justify eliminating them from the streets. Previous to this new policy, artists' displays were seen as non-threatening or as a cultural asset. New York City actually advertised the presence of street artists in travel magazines. The police were instructed not to arrest artists and that a visual artist selling his or her own signed art didn't require a license, based on the First Amendment.

In 1993, when the City's B.I.D.s, led by the Fifth Avenue Association, attempted to eliminate all sidewalk vending, artist displays were reclassified as vending and a license became a requirement. Since the City Council had previously frozen the total number of general vending licenses at the 853 then in effect, a license was, in the City's own words, "impossible for artists to obtain". Artists throughout the City were then handcuffed and arrested and had their art confiscated for the "crime" of not having a license. There is now a closed waiting list of over 5,000 applicants for a vending license; in some years, not one license has been issued.

Fearing that an independent-minded judge might find such an unreasonable licensing requirement for First Amendment protected expression unconstitutional, the City has meticulously avoided prosecuting a single artists' case in Criminal Court. None of the more than 300 artists arrested since 1993 have been found guilty of a crime. While not found guilty, artists rarely recover their confiscated paintings, which the City illegally sells at a monthly Police Department auction or destroys.

When artists brought a Federal lawsuit against the City, representatives of the B.I.D.s appeared in court and convinced a judge to rule, contradicting 50 years of Supreme, Appellate and State Court rulings, that visual art is not protected by the First Amendment. That decision is being appealed.

The B.I.D.s view sidewalk art displays as a key legal obstacle to this overall "cleansing" process. Successfully eliminating constitutionally protected activities will set the stage to eliminate or substantially restrict all street culture, public space and non-corporate expression. In arguments before the 2nd Circuit Appeals Court the City claimed that, "protection of business interests" was a prime reason for preventing artists from showing art on the street. In fact, that is their only "reason". Genuine First Amendment freedom is seen by many business interests and landlords as a threat. If the average person is allowed to use traditionally public spaces to communicate, advertise or sell their creations, it threatens the business communities monopoly on these basic activities. While politicians and corporations pay lip service to the ideas of free enterprise, freedom of speech and equal opportunity, they are trying to deny these same rights to the public.

City officials have made a concerted effort to suppress media coverage about these arrests. Reporters researching this issue have been told that their access to Police Department sources would be cut off if they continued to cover the artists' story. Protest signs and petitions have been confiscated from artist activists, and artists have been arrested for handing out literature about the arrests.

Can New York City violate the constitutional rights of an entire class of individuals and prohibit an entire medium of communication on public property, simply because it pleases big business? While the number of individuals directly affected by these arrests is small (there are fewer than 200 artists selling their own paintings, photographs or limited-edition prints on New York's streets) the social signifigance is large.

The outcome of this issue will affect legal policies in U.S. cities for years to come. At stake is free expression and the right of the public as well as artists, to use city streets for communication. The following court cases directly relate to this issue:

Piarowski v. Illinois Community College, 759 F.2d 625, 628 (7th Cir.) -"The freedom of speech and of the press protected by the First Amendment has been interpreted to embrace purely artistic as well as political expression.". cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1007 (1985).

Serra v. United States Gen. Servs. Admin., 847 F.2d 1045, 1048 (2d Cir.1988)"...artistic expression constitutes speech for First Amendment purposes...".

Texas v. Johnson, 491 U.S. 397, 404 (1989)"We have long recognized that its protection [the First Amendment's] does not end at the spoken or written word."

414 Theater Corp. v. Murphy, 499 F.2d 1155 (2d Cir. 1974), [A case that cooresponds to the licensing issue in this case.] "The forced discontinuance of a first amendment right pending a protracted license determination is itself a prior restraint, and involves irreparable injury to the public's as well as the appellee's first amendment rights."

People v. Milbry, 530 N.Y.S.2d 928, 929 (N.Y. Crim. Ct. 1988) "Pictorial artwork, as a form of self-expression, is certainly covered by the guarantee of freedom of speech contained in both Federal and New York State Constitutions."

People v. Lessin Rodriguez, 94NO58171 N.Y.Crim.Ct. 8/8/94 [a case of an unlicensed general vending charge against a fine artist] "...because it's not a crime...it is dismissed. The First Amendment protects it."

People v. Krebs 282 N.Y.S. 2d. 996 "Purpose and the thrust of the peddler license ordinance...was not intended to strike down First Amendment rights or subject proper exercise of free speech to municipal regulations or police dictation."

["Speech" need not be in the form of words to be protected nor does it need to be "political" or even have a specific message.]

Hurley v.Irish-American Gay and Lesbian Bisexual Group, No. 94-749, 1995 WL 360192 (S. Ct. June 19, 1995) The Constitution looks beyond written or spoken words as mediums of expression...as some of these examples show, a narrow, succinctly articulable message is not a condition of constitutional protection, which if confined to expressions conveying a "particularized message" would never reach the unquestionably shielded painting of Jackson Pollack, music of Arnold Schonberg or Jabberwocky verse of Lewis Carroll".

[Selling the tangible manifestations of speech in no way invalidates its First Amendment protection.]

Virginia State Bd. of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748, 761 (1976) "Speech is protected even though it is a form that is sold for profit, and even though it may involve a solicitation to purchase or otherwise pay or contribute money."

United States v. National Treasury Employees Union No. 93-1170, 1995 WL 68442 (S. Ct. February 22, 1995) A ban on recieving honoraria, "...unquestionably imposes a significant burden on expressive activity...The honoraria ban imposes the kind of burden that abridges speech under the First Amendment."

Joseph Burstyn, Inc, v. Wilson 343 U.S. 495 (1952) "That books, newspapers and magazines are published and sold for profit does not prevent them from being a form of expression whose liberty is safeguarded by the First Amendment."

[Public streets are an appropriate forum for First Amendment protected activities and have consistently been found to be the traditional locale of free expression.]

See: Burson, 112 S. Ct. at 1850 ("Quintessential public forums" are "parks, streets, and sidewalks."); Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474, 481 (1988) (residential street is a public forum); United States v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 176 (1983) (public sidewalks forming perimeter of the Supreme Court grounds are public forum for First Amendment purposes).

Loper v. New York City Police Dep't, 999 F.2d 699, 704 (2d Cir. 1993), The sidewalks of New York City constitute a public forum because they "...fall into the category of public property traditionally held open to the public for expressive activity."

Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939) "Whenever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public...Such use of the streets and public places has, from ancient times, been a part of the privileges, immunites, rights and liberties of citizens. The privilege of a citizen of the United States to use the streets and parks for communication...must not, in the guise of regulation, be abridged or denied."

Therefore, one must conclude that whatever exemptions, privileges or special considerations given other First Amendment protected materials being displayed, sold or given away on New York City streets must be similarly afforded artists and their fine art. It can hardly be constitutional or rational to arbitrarily deny First Amendment protection to one expressive medium (visual fine art), while granting it to another medium (books, baseball cards, used magazines and postcards, i.e. written art is exempted from the licensing requirement).

We recently discovered that in 1982, the original wording of the licensing exemption for book vendors was clearly and conspicuously attributed to the First Amendment and free speech. In subsequent editions of the law, the City Council's lawyers removed all mention of free speech as a way of denying artists and other protected individuals the same exemption. Here's the original wording which is only to be found in 1982 editions:

Local Laws of the City of New York For The Year 1982. #33 section 1: Legislative declaration. The council hereby finds and declares that it is consistent with the principles of free speech and freedom of the press to eliminate as many restrictions on the vending of written matter as is consistent with the public health, safety and welfare.

A note on the artists' Federal suit..... Joining the artists in their Federal suit [Lederman v. City of New York 94 civ. 7216 (MGC) by filing amicus briefs were The Museum of Modern Art, The Whitney Museum, The ACLU, Volunteer Lawyers for the Arts, The College Arts Association, the N.Y.C. Arts Coalition, The N.Y. Foundation for the Arts, art dealer Ronald Feldman, art historians Irving Sandler and Simon Schama, and artists Claes Oldenburg, Chuck Close, Jenny Holzer, Hans Haacke and David Hammons.

David Ross, the Director of the Whitney Museum of American Art, stated in connection with this lawsuit, "We stand firmly behind the idea that art is equal to other forms of expression and is as protected as speech". [Christian Science Monitor 2/14/96, pg. 11] {also see Art In America, March 96 pg 128, "New Allies for Street Artists"; N.Y. Times Metro sec. 1/24/96 pg.B1 "Street Art: Free Speech or Just Stuff?"]

The real estate and business organizations forcing the City to arrest artists filed their own brief in Federal Court co- signed by The Fifth Avenue Association, The SoHo Alliance, The Alliance for Downtown New York, The Grand Central Partnership, The 34th Street Partnership and the Madison Avenue Business Improvement District. The 30 page brief compares public displays of fine art to, "...graffiti, litter and petty street crime..." It goes on to state, "The sale of artwork does not involve communication of thoughts or ideas" and warns of, "the dangers...of allowing visual art full First Amendment protection". It sums up its position by claiming that, "An artists' freedom of expression is not compromised by regulating his ability to merchandise his artwork", and, "..the sale of paintings and other artwork does not reach this high level of expression (guaranteeing First Amendment protection)..."

Robert Lederman is president of A.R.T.I.S.T. (Artists' Response To Illegal State Tactics) For information, to make a donation or to join A.R.T.I.S.T. call: (718) 3692111 e-mail [redacted] or visit our web site at: http://www.openair.org/alerts/artist/nyc.html Photos of arrests, art confiscations and demonstrations are available for publication. We welcome all artists to join us in the street and to help protect First Amendment rights.

—

↑ Index

396. Mark Roberts

AWOL: Inaugural Olympic Sports Poet 1996 (forwarded)

Thu 27 Jun 1996

Mime-Version: 1.0
Date: Thu, 27 Jun 1996 06:38:53 +1000
To: [redacted]
From: [redacted] (awol)
Subject: AWOL: Inaugural Olympic Sports Poet 1996

The following message has been posted on behalf of Network Tennis Australia. Please address all enquiries to them at the contacts listed below. The AWOL email address should only be used to submit entries which will then be forwarded to NTA.

You only have a few more days to enter!!!!!!!!

****

Network tennis Australia (NTA) has launched a new poetry competition, to be awarded annually. In the year of the Olympic Summer Games it shall be known as the 'Olympic Sports Poet' award. In other years it shall be known as the '(Nation) Sports Poet award.

This unique award has been created to celebrate & symbolise the powerful & exhilarating synergy that exists between sport and poetry and entries for the Inaugural Olympic Sports Poet 1996 are now being invited..

Conditions of the Award

Prize allocation is:

Open section 1st prize $400, 2nd prize $200, 3rd prize $100.

Olympic Sports Poet junior section 1st prize $100, 2nd prize $50, 3rd prize $25.

Competition opens 1 May 1996 and closes 30 June 1996. Late entries will not be accepted.

Entries can be submitted in paper copy to:

Mail Network Tennis Australia,
Sports Poet Competition,
210 Annandale Street,
Annandale NSW Australia 2038.

Fax 61 2 5172466.

Entries can also be emailed to: [redacted] or you may submit your entry through the Sports Poet web page http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol/sportspoet.html

The theme of the poems entered must be sport

Entries must be written in English.

The junior section is for poets 13 years or younger at 30 June 1996. Junior entries must be clearly marked and the the poet's date of birth must be included.

Poems must not be under consideration by any publisher. Entrants requiring manuscripts returned or to be notified of the winners should enclose a SSAE . Overseas entrants should enclose an international reply coupon (entrants who submit poems by email will receive a post listing the winners).

Competition judges are Les Wicks and Ron Pretty. The judges decision shall be final and no correspondence shall be entered into. NTA shall make changes to the judges panel in the event of a Judge being unavailable.

> The winners shall be announced in July/August 1996 and published in the Poets Union Inc magazine Five Bells soon after.
>
> NTA shall not be responsible for any loss or damage to entries and reserves the right to reproduce the winner's poem and other selected poems.
>
> For further information about these conditions please contact Network Tennis Australia on ph 61 2 [redacted], fax 61 2 [redacted].
>
> AWOL
> Australian Writing On Line
> [redacted]
> http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
> PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
> Phone 61 2 7475667
> Fax 61 2 7472802

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

397. Bill Luoma
NYC Book Party & Reading
Thu 27 Jun 1996

Listheads,

You are cordially invited to a book party hosted by Situations Press at Biblios on Sunday Jun 30 @ 5:00pm for Lisa Jarnot's Sea Lyrics and Bill Luoma's Western Love. Both books will be available at the party along with Food & Drink.

Jarnot's Sea Lyrics are set as a series of smartian prose poems about Jack London Square, Alameda, and buying jam in the early morning. I am is the refrain. As much music as you can handle. "I am aimless and have several new tattoos."

Luoma's Western Love is another series set as short lyrics spoken by cowboys, jack rabbits, and saloon girls. Images by Charles Buckley. With a touch of lesbos. "I played with the fur trappers while you were on the trail."

Biblios Bookstore
317 Church St.
NYC, 1blk below canal
[redacted]

Hope to see you there.

Ordering information to follow.

↑ Index

398. Curt Anderson
The Runway Calls
Thu 27 Jun 1996

I know a few of the subscribers to this list are also subscribers to Exile, a hopefully humorous little newsletter out of Minneapolis/St. Paul that I edit with the help of Gary Sullivan and Marta Deike. I've decided to give up editing Exile to work on some other projects -- for instance, my lifelong ambition to become a leggy supermodel. This may or may not spell the end of Exile. Gary and Marta may continue it at a later date. Thanks to all those who supported us for, yikes, almost four years, especially contributors David Gilbert, Jonathan Brannen, George Albon, Eric Malone, Anthony Schlagel, Erik Belgum and Johanna Drucker. Finally, thanks to our subscribers. Good-bye and good books.

Curt Anderson
Curt Anderson
[redacted]

↑ Index

399. Gabrielle Welford
Joan Retallack
Thu 27 Jun 1996

Does anyone who went to Orono (or anyone) have a phone number for Joan Retallack or a quick and easy way to get ahold of her? Gab.

↑ Index

400. Rae Armantrout
Amazon.com
Thu 27 Jun 1996

I just made the interesting (to me) discovery that this huge online bookstore at http://amazon.com actually has small press poetry books! But maybe you already knew that.

R.

↑ Index

401. Kevin Killian
General Report, dateline: Orono
Thu 27 Jun 1996

This is Kevin Killian speaking. Hope my previous fashion report didn't scare anyone off, but why else have there been so few reports from the Orono Conference? Anyhow, I thought of some more things to say.

I wasn't spending all my time gazing rapturously at the scenery. I actually did get to some panels, believe it or not. The most exciting one was the panel on Frank O'Hara, in which this fellow from Penn, whose name I did not write down, but who was very smart, spoke about O'Hara and Larry Rivers and one being the ventriloquist for the other and how 6 weeks in 1959 were quite jam packed ones for O'Hara, and either the best time of his life, or merely quite typical for any six weeks in his life. This talk made me get into the idea of trying to figure out which six weeks of my own life future critics will think was the most exciting, and I came to the conclusion that they hadn't occurred yet. Then Ben Friedlander spoke about O'Hara and the "race question," followed closely by Steven Evans on the same topic-they built up the panel, moment by moment, into this tremendously thrilling event like a horse race of ideas. Ben Friedlander can write up a storm. Every sentence he spoke was like a poem. Listening him speak I had the same feelings of awe with which I imagine Oscar Wilde would regard Lord Alfred Douglas in their early days of first knowing each other. I had simply never thought of O'Hara's work in this light and now I am convinced. It was a stunning moment.

Dodie went to the panel where Joan Retallack rehearsed Jackson Mac Low's "Virginia Woolf Poems," a reading through The Waves. I was not there but heard plenty about this later and how great it was. Joel Kuszai gave a rare look at Jackson Mac Low's early career, long before Kuszai was born. Or Dodie either, practically speaking.

Amateur entertainment winners, Chris Stroffolino's barrelhouse piano with Alan Golding and Joe Donahue singing, or shrieking, Lou Reed's "Walk on the Wild Side," with Geoffrey O'Brien chirping in at the cue about "the colored girls sing." It was this terribly Frank O'Hara masquerade of values and atonality.

An Oscar to Rachel Blau Du Plessis's plenary talk about gender relations in the 1950s, esp. her daring use of John Wieners' later "Woman" as the exemplum of everything that went wrong with poetry's challenges as a result of the social stratification of the period. The room went deadly silent when she got to this part, a reaction I suppose to her daring to question the all-male cast of John Clarke's plan for the "Curriculum of the Soul." There, all of a sudden, en plein air, was this really weird fact that no one had ever, I suppose, tried to make sense of before. In this paper, Wieners came off very seedy, whereas in Michael Davidson's beautiful talk given on a previous evening, he was the culture hero I have admired for so many years.

Another plenary people were talking about was Alicia Ostriker's talk on Ginsberg and Lamentations. I saw men and women coming out the hall, heads shaking with admiration. I liked the Ann Charters talk a little, tho' I do not think she should have named it "Charles Olson/Ann Charters/Herman Melville." It just sounds silly.

The Niedecker panel I attended was very fine. Jenny Penberthy told us all about the "For Paul" poems, which she kept calling the "For Pauls," in my seat I was thinking, sounds like the Beatles. Those For Paul poems, JP kept saying, are Niedecker's worst poems and they are horrible (she said). Made me want to read them! How bad could they be? Susan Dunn's paper was good, too, tho' like most of us she bit off more than she could chew! And then Glenna Breslin spoke. Because I have been writing a biography, and because, as Chris Stroffolino noted earlier, this was kind of a personality-based conference, some of the very best papers were given by biographers, and this was one of them. Breslin went to Fort Atkinson or Blackhawk Island and tracked down this man, Aeneas McAllister, who had known Niedecker as a young handsome sensitive stud. "He was young, dark-haired, slim-hipped, with a sexy smile," said Breslin, studying a photo of Aeneas, and I don't mind saying, I just about swooned. He and his family lived next to LN in 1954 . . . she was fifty, he was 27 . . . nature took its course . . . When Breslin's biography is published Hollywood should make a film of this chapter with Jessica Lange as Lorine Niedecker, and maybe Keanu Reeves as Aeneas, except I don't know if Keanu Reeves can play the piano, because one night Aeneas was playing Beethoven on the only piano on Blackhawk Island, and Lorine came to the door at midnight, tipsy, blonde, disheveled, and said, "You play?" Maybe in 1954 these parts could have been played--hell, WERE played--by Vivien Leigh and Marlon Brando. Aeneas also described to Glenna Breslin the visit of Louis, Celia and Paul Zukofsky to Wisconsin and how Lorine was subdued, and Aeneas took Paul on a kayak trip and Louis & Celia came running out of the cabin and started hollering, "Paul! Your hands! Your hands!" thereby spoiling the fun of the young boy prodigy violinist. Louis: Harry Dean Stanton. Celia: Kate Nelligan. Paul: Macaulay Culkin. Anyhow it was a great talk.

I didn't go to Sharon Thesen's talk but sure heard plenty about it, for she, Thesen, is writing the life of Frances Boldereff, the mysterious woman who befriended the youngish Charles Olson and influenced, understatement, Olson's thought. And who is still alive, in Illinois or somewhere.

I did go to Barrett's talk. (For me a great thing about the conference was its reunion aspect; I mean no one enjoys meeting strangers more than I do, but I certainly enjoyed seeing my homeboys Watten, Friedlander, Perelman, etc after long separation). At first I misunderstood the comcept of "hailing." I thought Hailing, or Heyling, was some kind of contemporary of Althusser, and being "Heyl"ed was an affectionate diminutive. Now I see I was just plain dead wrong. Gee, do I feel dumb! Anyhow one woman got up from her seat and said, "There is no 'moment of incest,'" and also she thought that BW had committed a terrible wrong against all women and all conference attendees. It was very dramatic and kind of sweat-making. And this was because Barrett showed about thirty stills of the 50s model Betty Page, in provocative 50s poses, often nude or in sexy bondage outfits, meanwhile telling us with a more or less straight face that she, Page, was in charge of her destiny and in control of her own sexuality. I don't see why Page was freer from the objectifying gaze than any other photographed woman of the 1950s. She just looks like she's enjoying herself, she doesn't look terrified. So? However, the material about the elephant, the sardine can, the family photo album of televised images of Duke Ellington, and Joe McCarthy, put all this sex material into a certain context which made it all make sense, at least on a poetic level. But how else can Lacan be read, except as a great 1950s poet of the fractured thought and image?

Okay, so how about when I looked up from the cocktail party and crossing the room, seeming to head exactly in my direction, I saw Stephen King, and my heart stood still, but luckily circulation restored quickly and I got out my pen and copies of two of his books and pestered Burton Hatlen until he introduced us! I didn't want to say, "Mr King, I'm your greatest fan," because of the way Kathy Bates had made that innocent enough and very true line into some kind of evil meconnaissance of obeisance in the film of King's own book, "Misery." So I just, like, kowtowed and tried to hold my own with Steve, as I call him now. You know, one on one, I'm a novelist, you're a novelist--that kind of thing. Smooth as silk. Lucky the van driver who picked us up from the airport had hinted he might be coming to this banquet, and so, while everyone else was seeing the scenic glories of Bar Harbor, I sneaked into the local bookstore and bought these books, so I could say, "Oh, wow, I was just reading this on the plane" (a white lie if ever I spoke one--or, a premonition, since I did read them on the way home!) But I must have been a nightmare to him. There he was trying to eat his lobster and I came up, dragging Dodie, and said to Steve, "Now that you've signed my book, we're friends and here is Loss and he can take our picture all together!" Then later he was trying to hobnob with Diane and Jerome Rothenberg, and this time I dragged Peter O'Leary with me as I said, "Look, Steve, I found another book by you that you haven't autographed!" The sickly grin on his face turned white, then purple, like a cicatrix, but he obliged. Everyone else at the entire conference acted like this happened to them every day, as though daily they were always rubbing elbows with the most talented thriller writer of all time. Well, I don't think so and I'll be the first to say so.

I am sure I am leaving a lot out, but one more thing I wanted to say was, a) it was great meeting all my net pals face to face, and b) thank you to all who helped me get through the ordeal of my own paper. I couldn't really think while I was there, I was so fretful, like the White Rabbit in Alice, always feeling I was running late, and indeed I was, but everything was all right on the night, altho' who would have thought that my 7 page paper was far too long for the 20 minutes I had to cram it all in, but I think I made too many jokes to try to alleviate for all the terror my subject inspired in me, the misogyny and sexual anxiety of Jack Spicer, and the Frankenstein-like stitches that hold together his 1958 poem, "For Joe."

I'm leaving so much out. I just wanted to write some of it down before my memory takes it away from me, like a message in a bottle that might float back to California someday. I had a great time, wish you were there!

↑ Index

402. JOEL LEWIS
Re: Joe Ceravolo (Silliman)
Thu 27 Jun 1996

In my many phonecalls to Joe C. we seemed to never really talk about poetry. Although he didi say once that he loved Leopardi. He also disclaimed the Chinese poets as a source (as picked up on by the back cover of Spring....) of his poetics.

His departure from the NYC scene seems to have something to do w/ performance pieces he & his wife did at PoProject in early 70's-- I was too yung for that, but folks told me that it involved the burning of incense & heavy Catholic mysticism. To other friens he had long phone conversations on the bible. He was really unaware of the "scene" in his later years & REALLY loved Ron's essay on his work as it was the first kind of notice in many years.

Joel Lewis

↑ Index

403. Peter Quartermain
Limitations
Thu 27 Jun 1996

This is from quite a while back, but it's been nagging away at the back of my mind for a week or more so I've decided to ask. On 15 June Mark Wallace wrote in the course of the Susan Howe / Samuel Beckett thread:

"it seems to me that the value of the work of Susan Howe and Samel Beckett (or many others, maybe) is not only obvious, but something that it would be pretty hard to argue against very successfully. One can, I suppose, have reasonable questions about the limitations of their work, but as to dismissing it entirely, I'm still under the impression that that's an opinion I don't really have to respect too much."

I'm sorry to quote at such length, but I want to keep the context pertty clear. What I'm curious about is the concept of "limitations" -- what did you have in mind, Mark, can you remember? what sort of assumptions underlie the choice of that really interesting word? Is there some sort of model of "perfection" that underlies this notion of limitation? or of political or social "effectiveness"? or what? In the context it strikes me as an odd word to use, since I would have though any argument "dismissing" their work would invoke this sort of vocabulary. What do you think? Can you, Mark (or anyone else for that matter) please enlighten me?

I know I'm just asking, but this is a prertty serious issue I think.

Peter

+ + + +

It is 12:20 in Orono a Saturday three days after Burt's greeting, yes it is 1996 and I go get a lobster because I will get off bus 320 in Bar Harbor at 5:15 and then go straight to dinner and I don't know the people I will feed with

I walk up the muggy street beginning to rain and have a hamburger and a malted (Loss ate my lobster) and buy an ugly FORMALIST to see what the "poets" in "America" are doing these days
                I go back to the bunk and Ms. Perloff (first name Marjorie I once heard) is so bored by the speaker that she doesn't even look up for once in her life and in NEVILLE I go to a little session featuring Maria with a diatribe by von Hallbeg although I do think of "_____:____," trans. Joan Retallack or Enslin's new sequence or "Moonscapes" or "The Edge of Time" of Foster, but I don't, I stick with Maria after practically going to sleep with quandariness and for Loss I just stroll into Boardman Hall and ask for "AD VALOREM CAGLI" and then I go back where I came from to 402 Neville and the student at the book table and casually ask for _Niedecker: Woman and Poet_ and a copy of Ronald Johnson's _Ark_, and a hurt book with his face on it and I am sweating a lot now and thinking of leaning on the john door on the first floor while he recited endlessly from inside a stall to the long-suffering Hank Lazer and everyone and I stopped breathing

↑ Index

405. Carnography

Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers

Fri 28 Jun 1996

I've refrained from sending my response to Mr. Gould for three reasons:

1. Mainstream sixties bands aren't worth this much commentary, esp not on a prosody list.

2. I wanted to reread my response to see if I'd been unfair.

3. Even though I wanted to respond to every point, I wasn't anxious to quibble with a fellow musician (especially one who also cares about prosody). Contrary to emphatic opinion--

> With "all due respect", you're just being snide for the fun of it, > and don't deny it - because it IS fun.

--there is no pleasure to be had from taking a fellow musician down a notch. The motivation for my first response was to defend other musicians. Someone had claimed that 60's Brits were merely weak imitations of African- American R & B. I don't like to insult musicians and I don't like it when musicians are insulted.

(Speaking of which: Sidebar to Chris Creek, who said:

> Forget Speedway, name tells all. For topical lyrical and typical textures, > arguable here now, try Pulp

Since this is musical texture we're talking about, the name tells nothing. We've all heard Pulp, but you've never heard Speedway (unless you live in London: they won't be recording their first album until mid-August). Be patient--listen to one Speedway song before you relegate them to obscurity.

Otherwise, I agreed with your other comments.)

Therefore, I'm backchanneling my response to Mr. Gould alone. I feel rueful enough doing this at all, let alone in public.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

---

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

406. Rachel Loden
Re: General Report, dateline: Orono
Fri 28 Jun 1996

Kevin Killian wrote:

> An Oscar to Rachel Blau Du Plessis's plenary talk about gender relations in > the 1950s, esp. her daring use of John Wieners' later "Woman" as the > exemplum of everything that went wrong with poetry's challenges as a result > of the social stratification of the period. The room went deadly silent > when she got to this part, a reaction I suppose to her daring to question > the all-male cast of John Clarke's plan for the "Curriculum of the Soul."
> There, all of a sudden, en plein air, was this really weird fact that no > one had ever, I suppose, tried to make sense of before. In this paper, Wieners came off very seedy, whereas in Michael Davidson's beautiful talk given on a previous evening, he was the culture hero I have admired for so many years.

Any chance that these papers will be at the EPC? Or elsewhere? Thanks to Kevin K. for the juicy report.

Rachel Loden

↑ Index

407. Hank Lazer
Re: blame it on the lossa nova
Fri 28 Jun 1996

Aldon--

Bravo!

Hank

↑ Index

408. Loss Glazier
Re: General Report, dateline: Orono
Fri 28 Jun 1996

>Any chance that these papers will be at the EPC? Or elsewhere?
>Thanks to Kevin K. for the juicy report.

Dear Rachel,

We are preparing an online "book" with reviews of Orono (also photos too I hope).

No plans were made for the actual papers partly because my sense is that many/some of these are committed elsewhere.

But I do extend an invitation to any who are willing to put up their paper to contact me. We're always interested in helping to circulate such works.

Loss

↑ Index

409. William M. Northcutt
Peter Dale Scott's Jakarta, and ...
Fri 28 Jun 1996

I've had Peter Dale Scott's Coming to Jakarta for a while, but I'm just getting to it in my stack. First impression is that it's a pretty incredible poem, a pretty incredible book. I'd be interested to hear what any of you think about it, old news as the book may be. Poetically, I suppose it's as non-adventurous as poetry can get, but it's subject matter seems quite powerful to me...

Meanwhile, I'm a bibliography addict, and I'd be interested in seeing lists somewhat similar to the ones we did a while back, the bed-side reading lists, maybe with a twist: perhaps we could post a list of 5-10 books that we're either damned excited about, that we're reading at the moment, or that we're trying desperately to get at:

My list:

Peter Dale Scott--Coming to Jakarta
Peter Nicholls--Modernisms
Alice Notley--the descent of Alette
Bob Perelman--The Trouble with Genius
David Lodge--Nice Work
Hugh MacDiarmid--Collected I
Ron Silliman--N/O
Djuna Barnes--Book of Repulsive Women (my students loved this little book)
Breton--Nadja

Mostly old news (that remains news).

Also, have any of you read Timothy Bahti's Ends of the Lyric??? Worth a read?

Nuff said.

William Northcutt

Walter Benjamin: "Only a redeemed mankind receives the fullness of its past."

William Northcutt
Anglistik I
Universitaet Bayreuth
95440 Bayreuth
email: [redacted]
Tel: 49 921 980612
Fax: 49 921 553641

↑ Index

410. David Kellogg
Re: Wildflower dead horse-hair-triggers
Fri 28 Jun 1996

On Fri, 28 Jun 1996, Carnography wrote:

> 1. Mainstream sixties bands aren't worth this much commentary, esp not on a prosody list.

I didn't follow the earlier part of the discussion, but I had to ask: POETICS is a "prosody list"?

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

Wouldn't it be kind of insulting to a band (of musicians, presumably) to dismiss them as not worthy of commentary? Not to mention reducing the Beatles and the Stones to the status of "mainstream sixties bands" when both have obvious importance outside those rather tiny confines. I left the sixties when I was three and discovered the Beatles in 1978. Their music has been a big influence on my person and my writing, and I'm sure that's true for some other people on this list, which probably explains why the topic came up at all. As for the Stones, they were making records not only in the sixties, but also the seventies, eighties and nineties. Does anyone call Miles Davis a "fifties jazz musician"? What criteria go into this label? When the band started? The Beatles had their core (John/Paul/George) together in '58, although they weren't yet calling themselves "Beatles". When the band were making their best work? What about _Some Girls_ ('78), _Exile on Main Street_ ('72), and _Sticky Fingers_ ('71)?

****

Steve Carll

[redacted]

"Heard melodies are sweet, but those unheard Are sweeter; therefore, ye soft pipes, play on"
--Keatsy

****

↑ Index

413. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Orono memories / Enslin poems

Fri 28 Jun 1996

Reading all this Orono reportage fills me with a mix of envy for what I've missed and nostalgia for the Orono conference of, i think, '93, on American poetry of the Thirties. That one had lots of great panels on the Objectivists, as well as many others. I cld never reproduce all the highlights but judging from recent posts the general air of conviviality, intelligence, and exhaustion was the same at both conferences. It was my very first conference, and only now, having weathered several MLAs can i appreciate how wonderful it really was, especially the lively mix of poets and critics, academics and "non-affiliated" enthusiasts etc. Hell, my father even dropped by to hear my talk and some of the readings and had a good time. And those readings were fantastic--Carl Rakosi, Allen Ginsberg, Charles Bernstein, Barrett Watten, Joan Retallack and many others. I'm really sorry to have missed the current round, which brings me to Ted Enslin...

Hank Lazer's praise for Enslin's reading reminds of how stunning his performance was when I brought him and Taggart to read here at the University of Virginial in April 95'. I've long wanted to plug his work on this list, so will take this chance to mention the two wonderful sequences, "Autumnal Rime" and "Scriptural" that appeared across various issues of Talisman and First Intensity over the last year or two. Tremendous stuff, i think, and their high quality helps to clinch Enslin's status as one of the most ridiculously neglected figures in American writing. I'd also highly recommend a recent chapbook in his more conventional mode, called Songs in the Key of C. I can't lay my hands on this right at the moment but it's very handsomely done by, i think, Bloody Twins press.

Thanks and praise to Mark Nowak for undertaking the Selected.

steve

↑ Index

414. Jordan Davis
The Grammar of Fantasy by Gianni Rodari
Fri 28 Jun 1996

---

from the Contents

Introduction: Gianni Rodari, Devil's Advocate as Patron Saint of Children by Jack Zipes

Preface
2. The Word Hi
3. The Fantastic Binominal
4. "Light" and "Shoes"
5. What Would Happen If...
7. The Arbitrary Prefix
8. The Creative Error
9. Old Games
13. Making Mistakes in the Story
14. Little Red Riding Hood in a Helicopter
19. The Cards of Propp
20. Changing the Cards into a Fairy Tale with Franco Passatore
21. Fairy Tales in the "Obligatory Key"
22. The Analysis of La Befana
26. Stories at the Table
27. A Journey around My House
30. "Taboo" Stories
34. The Mathematics of Stories
39. When Grandfather Becomes a Cat
41. Imagination, Creativity, School

The Grammar of Fantasy by Gianni Rodari, tr. Jack Zipes, will be available soon from Teachers & Writers Collaborative. In the meantime, there's www.twc.org.

Jordan Davis

↑ Index

415. Charles Smith
Re: Limitations
Fri 28 Jun 1996

Peter,

I thought Mark Wallace's reference to the "limitations" of the work of Beckett & Howe was nothing more than an acknowledgement that all writing exists within some sort of limit, no matter how wide ranging. It might be in terms of literary/social issues engaged, subject matter, form or technique. Even the "totalizing" gestures of Pound & Olson move within perceptible limits, don't they? Olson's 'limits are what we are all inside of' acknowledges this, yes?

Mark?

Charles Smith

↑ Index

416. Rod Smith
new Bernadette & & & @ Bridge Street
Fri 28 Jun 1996

Here's another list of new stuff from Bridge Street Books. Thanks for all those orders from the last one. Bernadette Mayer's _Proper Name_ just out from New Directions: YES. Also those ECW McCaffrey & MacCormack.

1._The Little Book of Unsuspected Subversion_ by Edmond Jabes, trans. Rosmarie Waldrop, Stanford Univ Press, $12.95. "For living as for dying, we will have used the same bobbin."

2. _Marine Snow_ by Karen Mac Cormack, ECW Press, $12.00. "This cut won't heal these revolutions without you."

3. _Proper Name_ by Bernadette Mayer, New Directions, $13.95. I've had about two weeks with an advance copy of this, it's a terrific book. Collection of stories, prose poems, & poems. "I am not hynopompic list theorists." Bernadette at her inventive bestest.

4. _The Cheat of Words_ by Steve McCaffery, ECW, $12.00.
"The crack is the heart gag / of consumer logic"

5. _Oulipo Laboratory_, texts from the Bibliotheque Oulipienne by Queneau, Calvino, Fournel, Jouet, Berge, & Mathews. Trans. Mathews & White. Atlas, $15.99. "The truth is that the Quarrel of the Ancients and Moderns is permanent."

6. _Over-Sensitivity_ by Jalal Toufic, Sun & Moon, $13.95. "_This is the shit._" --John Zorn. Toufic's a terrific essayist, as yous may know from _Distracted_ &/or _(Vampires): An Uneasy Essay on the Undead in Film_.

7. _Information Inequality: The Deepening Social Crisis in America_ by Herbert Schiller, Routledge, $16.95. "The picture is as clear as it troubling." --Neil Postman. The other side(s) of this debate cld be represented by Negroponte's _Being Digital_, Vintage, $12.00. Both books are quite engaging.

8. _Tremble_ by C.D.Wright, Ecco, $20.00 hardcover.
"The public is in ecstacy."

Poetics folks receive free shipping on orders of more than $20. Free shipping + 10% discount on orders of more than $30. There are two ways to order. 1. E-mail your order to [redacted] with your address & we will bill you with the books. or 2. via credit card-- you may call us at [redacted] or e-mail [redacted] w/ yr add, order, & card # & we will send a receipt with the books.

Bridge Street Books, 2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW, Wahsington, DC 20007.

↑ Index

417. maria damon
Re: british women poets
Fri 28 Jun 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
> A friend of mine is looking for suggestions of British or Commonwealth > women poets of the 20thC to teach in an upcoming course, and i was rather > embarassed at how few names i cld summon off the top o' the noggin. Any > suggestions, for my own edification, and my friend's?
>
> thanks, steve

lillian allen; louise bennett; jean "binta" breeze; ...etc--md

↑ Index

418. maria damon
Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
Fri 28 Jun 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion
group writes:
> At 01:20 AM 6/28/96 -0400, Rob Hardin wrote:
>
> >1. Mainstream sixties bands aren't worth this much commentary, esp not > > on a prosody list.

is this a prosody list?--md

↑ Index

419. maria damon
Re: Orono memories / Enslin poems
Fri 28 Jun 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
> Reading all this Orono reportage fills me with a mix of envy for what I've > missed and nostalgia for the Orono conference of, i think, '93, on > American poetry of the Thirties. ...

i missed the reportage, cuz i just subbed on again. i''ve tried getting the june log from the listserv but it's too big for my machinery. cd someone post me the relevant posts? then i'll add my own review/ bests, maria d

↑ Index

420. Loss Glazier
Re: Orono memories / Enslin poems
Fri 28 Jun 1996

Dear Maria, I'm hoping to have the online book of reviews up very soon! If others need to catch up they can... Loss
---
At 03:13 PM 6/28/96 -0500, you wrote:
>In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
>discussion group writes:
>> Reading all this Orono reportage fills me with a mix of envy for what I've >> missed and nostalgia for the Orono conference of, i think, '93, on >> American poetry of the Thirties. ...
>
>i missed the reportage, cuz i just subbed on again. i''ve tried getting the >june log from the listserv but it's too big for my machinery. cd someone post >me the relevant posts? then i'll add my own review/ bests, maria d

>
>

↑ Index

421. Charles Alexander
Re: british women poets
Fri 28 Jun 1996

> In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> A friend of mine is looking for suggestions of British or Commonwealth women poets of the 20thC to teach in an upcoming course, and i was rather embarassed at how few names i cld summon off the top o' the noggin. Any suggestions, for my own edification, and my friend's?
>
> thanks, steve
>
> lillian allen; louise bennett; jean "binta" breeze; ...etc--md

Just from very recent reading I would absolutely recommend Michele Leggot (New Zealand) & Catherine Walsh (Britain). Good luck. -- charles

↑ Index

422. Loss Glazier
Orono Reviews: Bar Harbor
Fri 28 Jun 1996

HARBOR LOBSTER BAR NONE

For that waif of a plane to please make it to Bangor,
I promised not to hiss at New Critics but I said nothing about table manners. In other senses, it’s the place that is material for example where’s the moose and why am I on this bus heading east? "Nature!" I spy and he points to one’s chest & thumps. We’ve never been on a trip like this the bus driver asking if it’s really a bus full of poets.
Who knows? But I can assure you we talk plenty and that it’s part and parcel of the field trip medium to have no idea where we’re going, how long it’s for, or even what to do once we get there. Voila! We all know there’s momentum just being on a bus! Hail Aldon's patience with camera lenses strewn on the seat. And the group conversation that gets us to Mount Desert Island. I kept calling it a magical mist tree tour and how true! smack dab on top of old Cadillac Mountain with Jerry past mutinous rocks in a spitting hissy blind fog bank hiking on & on as if it goes somewhere other than more fog until we're dripping, cold and, glasses steamed, he turns to me and asks,

"(he says) vot em I doink here." It's cold, it's wet, but we make it back and are sitting in the council section of the bus (which we have named in order to advise the driver whether to stop at the tourist information center) & watch frigid poets tramping from foaming mist emerging Lordy Shakespeare-like with occluded views of the island tucked like severed heads under dripping elbows. Alas!
Back in & down the mountain we go. Bar Harbor not bad for hilling around its musical instrument shop though the town might more properly be named not Bar Harbor but "Lobster Bar and Gift Shops". But here's a question for the grammarian of gastronomic plights. Why is only ONE of these red, lovely crustaceans supposed to satisfy you?
Is it an unwritten rule? Is that what it means to be "civilized"? (Is this related to poems that rhyme?)
It's a question that's haunted me for years and I lean towards Bob Perelman with this question and he says 'go for it' so … (even the waiter does a double-take & says 'TWO'??) & the next half hour (Maria reading the Bangor newspaper account of the Ph.D. bearing invaders of the poetic state) all I experience is the internal hiss of epicurean bliss. "Lobster be mine - a Lobster for all time - Hell who needs a variable foot when there are red claws like this to be cracked?
Somehow in my memory of it, these lines all rhymed.

↑ Index

423. Schuchat

Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones

Fri 28 Jun 1996

I thought the 60s didn't end until 1974, with Nixon's resignation.

Miles Davis is a 50's jazz musician.

You are tagged with when you become famous (enter the media stream).

Centuries and decades are inexact, e.g., the 20th century began in August 1914 and ended in December 1992.

↑ Index

424. JOEL LEWIS
Re: Orono memories / Enslin poems
Fri 28 Jun 1996

Thanks for interesting report on Orono.

RE: your comments on Enslinn, I'd like to throw out a question to the list. Enslinn, along w/ Armand Schwerner & Nathaniel tarn were all considerered to be major figuires in the New Amercican Poetry, the subject of Special Magazine Numbers, etc., etc. 25 years later, none of them are represented in amy of the major NAP revison anthologies, in Silliman's words, "disappeared poets" -- I'm not up on Tarn & Enslinn, but I know Schwerner's recent work & it is still strong & interesting. What is the change. Has there been a paradigm shift in taste, reading???

Puzzled in Hoboken, Joel Lewis

↑ Index

425. maria damon
oh no orono
Fri 28 Jun 1996

yes it's all true, the conference was fantabulous. someone mentioned the preponderance of males; yes the testosterroneous level was tres gratifying, i got more male attention than i have in a while, and some of the other chicks felt the same way (alicia tickled that the alter cockers thought she was "really on to something" with her ginsberg stuff). had fun processing "the barry thing" with many, including the watt himself, on a long bus ride in the mist, the cruel wind and the rain. jumped up and down on top of mt cadillac thinking of bruce springsteen. learish, very. loved hanging out w/ aldon, bob p, barry, michael davidson, was thrilled by lorenzo thomas's talk and embarrassed by the paucity of a presence of folks of color (yes i nailed burton on the way out and stressed the crowded room's collective enthusiasm for a reprint of tolson, thanks for the hot tip aldon), was blown away by the whaples/friedlander/evans o'hara panel. must admit when i saw the author-based program my heart sank, but after that, getting to the conference, was a steady climb to apotheosis; what a way to cap off a sabbatical. Also grooved on hanging with armand schwerner, seeing marky mark nowak again (he and hs wife carolyn are the best thing about the twin cities), snapping pix of lossy loss and his double lobsters, camping for barry's camera happy as a clothed clam, seeing rachel bdp again, and alicia, grooved totally on the jewish american panel, twas funfunfun and full of yakking folks tho i take exception to the separation of aesthetics from cultural studies that emerged...enjoyed meeting those panelists too, maeera and steve fredman and eric salinger...got a lot of needlepointing done. enjoyed also the groovicious company of ronna johnson my roommate, kerouac scholar and womens studies heavy, lily phillips, kathy crown, charlie "squeaky" altieri, ADORED joan retallack's reading and her paper on mac low, asking the pedagogically useful q "what do we do with an indeterminate text?" so basic, but so reassuring to students (and me) that it is, after all, a legitimate question. am profoundly gratified by marjorie perloff's apparent leftening up --stanford's influence? that pernicious "cultural studies" ambience insidiously making her smarter and smarter and even smarter? twas trippish meeting kevin and dodie, my e-comrades, and david kellogg, my cult-stud ally on this here list. good to see walterkalaidjian, i'm glad he's finally out of st cloud and at a real place, tho we didn't get to talk in any depth about his work on trauma theory and the armenian genocide. always good to see bob von hallberg who despite his self-inflicted role as the voice of the liberal conscience is an extremely good guy, in my experience. The coffee was EXECRABLE, burt, tho everything else was pretty swell to fab. Real whipped cream in the salad/dessert bar, can't beat that. and good, rich, fruit shortcake desserts. lobster was great, even got as much green stuff as i wanted/could handle. showed victoria rosenthal how to eat a lobster, thus i hope redeeming myself in ml's eyes (i had inadvertently insulted him within his hearing at an earlier mla and was mortified). as i drove back down to boston, the rothenbergs (diane at the wheel) passed me doing at least 80 mph on rte 95 in their spiffy little white rented mustang. loved jerry's "toiteen liddle ol' ladies" routine. and had never heard dante read aloud in translation--only knew of the prose translations, sinclair and singleton --thank you armand, paolo and francesca and then brunetto latini, all those old favorites from the days when i was smart... by the end of the conference, even the poundians from my department were talking to me --no mean feat to create an atmosphere of such conviviality that that could happen. what else...lyn keller and i shared a delicious "sole marency" or something weird-sounding like that in bar harbor, everyone else ate lobster except aldon who ate rum and coke, enjoyed seeing my old grad school jack-spicer-robert- duncan-special-collections-at-berkeley researching friend joe conte, and confessing to him after all these years that as a chick i'd felt excluded from the poetry clique...like the guys felt it would be indecorous to include me or something...but we shared greenstuff and redstuff at the banquet, or at least said we were going to, which is just as good. chaired a good session on duncan, yum yum. let's see what else...oh yeah, as i told barry, i don't think people objected to his talk because he showed girlie pix, but because there was a way that the mastery, complexity and "rigor" (a word he used repeatedly) --which is what made it a compelling talk --also seemed to hold at arms' length and function as a disclaimer for the more charged elements of his talk --the autobiographical cynicism, the mention of sexual trauma, the insistence on "agency" (tho i don't think he actually used that clumsy word) --all seemed to add up to something that was a brilliant performance but troubled in a way that put the burden of "troubledness" on the audience, so that he was the cool, in-control white male authority and those of us who felt troubled or questioned the performance were hysterics. (not that this is what he said or even implied, it was more of a dynamic that threatened to duplicate much power stuff that cleearly and rightly troubled everyone including bw --kinda like lacan?). so, i admired the performance and got much frm it but also felt it was incomplete, not in the sense that an unmediated confession would make it complete, but somehow --constituting his belief in betty page's power as itsself (the belief, not the power) an object of inquiry might have made the presentation more even, richer, more balanced...?... anyway...it was a charged event, and one that was useful to process in the ensuing daze. in the bus someone (barry? michael?) said there shd have been some attention to song lyrics, and that we shd make a point of this at the next conference (presumably on the 60s). george lipsitz wd be fun to hear on that subject. all in all, it was dreamy, esp the whipped cream. sorry if i've left someone out... so here i am back in mpls, it's 102 degrees out, why'd i come back? oh well, it's kinda a nice laid back city, you can wear any old thing and people accept it...esp in this heat... love to all adored camaradoes and camaradas...md

↑ Index

426. Chris Stroffolino

Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones

Sat 29 Jun 1996

I've heard that one---the 60's started in 11-22-63 when kennedy died and "i wanna hold your hand" was released in u.k. and the fifties didn't start until 1955. but the difference between the fourties and the fifties is minor in comparison unless the fourties started BEFORE and/or at PEARL HARBOUR rather than when the boys came home and tvs. etc. pushed women back into domesticity becoming suburban and the car began ruining things.....

and the 70's--b--1974. d 1979 (when jimmy carter decided to part his hair to the right rather than left?) or perhaps died when phil ochs did--i.e. when carter got elected ("oatmeal man" gil scott heron) but what were the 70s? the 80s were clearly the 80s all throughout and they spilled over into 1992--and thne there was that brief euphoria on the pumice of morons when GUITARS started dominating rock and roll again and visions of canadian style health car plans danced in the amerikan head.....brief, briefheart, cap n crunch.... ---------- c

↑ Index

427. Chris Stroffolino
Re: oh no orono
Sat 29 Jun 1996

yes, maria, song lyrics would be fun.....

_____

okay, this is probably going to be my last posting on the poetics list for awhile (unless INSOMNIA tonight turns me to the comfort of the electron screen and the "immediate gratification" a prose fiction writer accused "us" poets of recently that this forum allows....
thank you all for a 20 month "virtual" community (virtual vitriol?)
and if anyone wants to stay in touch i will be at:
464 Monmouth St. #6, Jersey City, NJ. 07302....
[redacted]....
haven't figured out if it spells anything yet.....
love to all, chris s.

↑ Index

428. Daniel Salmon
Re: british women poets
Sat 29 Jun 1996

Michelle Leggott, Roma Potiki
New Zealand

At 01:57 PM 28/06/96 -0400, you wrote:
>A friend of mine is looking for suggestions of British or Commonwealth >women poets of the 20thC to teach in an upcoming course, and i was rather >embarassed at how few names i cld summon off the top o' the noggin. Any >suggestions, for my own edification, and my friend's?
>
>thanks, steve
>
>
Daniel Salmon

↑ Index

429. Ward Tietz
Re: Armand Schwerner
Sat 29 Jun 1996

On Friday, June 28, Joel Lewis wrote,

"Thanks for interesting report on Orono.

RE: your comments on Enslinn, I'd like to throw out a question to the list. Enslinn, along w/ Armand Schwerner & Nathaniel tarn were all considerered to be major figuires in the New Amercican Poetry, the subject of Special Magazine Numbers, etc., etc. 25 years later, none of them are represented in amy of the major NAP revison anthologies, in Silliman's words, "disappeared poets" -- I'm not up on Tarn & Enslinn, but I know Schwerner's recent work & it is still strong & interesting. What is the change. Has there been a paradigm shift in taste, reading???

Puzzled in Hoboken, Joel Lewis".

I only became familiar with Armand Schwerner's work a few years ago, so I can't say much about his reception of 10 or 20 years ago, but I think one of the things that probably contributes to his having been "disappeared," is that his more recent work, at least initially, is just plain confusing. If you stay with it this confusion becomes a richness, but my guess is that a lot of people don't get that far.

Even when you realize that you are reading within a tradition of academic/literary satire there are still quite a lot of elements that cannot be gathered under that rubric. You begin to wonder after a while why such a categorization was necessary in the first place, and I think that by itself, can lead to a feeling of uneasiness.

The iconic material in the work is also difficult to place. The staging of it, which relies on an unusual mix of satire, erudition and inventiveness, confounds classification as "visual poetry," or "visual fiction." I think these categories are becoming less and less useful anyway, but again placement within a tradition becomes somewhat difficult.

Still I think Schwerner later work is not that anomalous. I think there are considerable parallels to be drawn with Paul Zelevansky's work, say, and others who are combining somewhat disparate material.

Ward Tietz

↑ Index

430. Carnography
Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
Sat 29 Jun 1996

At 11:29 AM 6/28/96, Steve Carll is rumored to have typed:

> At 01:20 AM 6/28/96 -0400, Rob Hardin wrote:
>
> 1. Mainstream sixties bands aren't worth this much commentary, esp not on a prosody list.
>
> Then he wrote:
>
> I don't like to insult musicians and I don't like it when musicians are insulted.
>
> Wouldn't it be kind of insulting to a band (of musicians, presumably) to dismiss them as not worthy of commentary?

Apparently, you haven't been following this thread. The two bands whose musicianship I defended were the Beatles and the Stones. Since I opined that they were not worth discussing on a prosody list even as I defended them, you would do well to notice the context of the word worth before presuming insult.

In the context of this discussion, my "not worth this much commentary, esp. on a prosody list" is vastly different from your "not worthy of comment."

Also: by saying they were not worth discussing, I was politely suggesting that I was not interested in being dragged into further discussions about the Beatles and the Stones. (Someday, perhaps, my request will be honored.)

As to the context of "not worth this much commentary": The overexposed are less worth commenting on than the underpromoted precisely because we have been sufficiently buried in commentary. Every moment spent talking about the overexposed is a moment spent ignoring the underpromoted (those who are most in need of discussion and support).

This is a list devoted to discussing poetry, and poets are the least exposed artists of all. And yes, sixties pop music can be relevant, but Jesus Christ--you can discuss the Beatles with anyone anywhere.

> Not to mention reducing the Beatles and the Stones to the status of "mainstream sixties bands"

No one's "reducing" anyone's talent or influence. The Beatles and Stones are mainstream sixties bands in the sense that 22 Brides, whom I've recorded with, are an obscure nineties band, and PIL, whom I've played with, was a conspicuous underground eighties band that crossed over. The era in which a band breaks, the generation to which a band belongs, is what defines it chronologically. Its popularity (or lack of it) is what secures its niche.

> when both
> have obvious importance outside those rather tiny confines.

Keats, whom you quote, has an importance beyond his status as a Lake Poet and a poet of the Romantic period. Would you say that history is incorrect in calling him a poet of the Romantic Period? If so, then how does his importance contradict the "tiny confines" of history?

> I left the > sixties when I was three and discovered the Beatles in 1978....Their music > has been a big influence on my person and my writing...and I'm sure that's > true for some other people on this list, which probably explains why the > topic came up at all.

Actually, the topic came up because people who span two generations were talking about it. I was born in the sixties; another gentleman who was posting mentioned having played in bands for three decades, if I'm not mistaken. If you really feel that your generation (ie, mine, since we were both born in the sixties) and the people on this list are the last source of fresh insights on a well-explored subject, then it would seem that boomers aren't the only generation that is guilty of self-importance.

> Does anyone call Miles Davis a "fifties jazz musician"?

Miles was recording with Parker before the fifties. However, the Miles Davis Quintet was a fifties ensemble (even though their recordings stretched into the sixties).

> When the band started?

No, when the band made their first important mark via recordings and public performance, and what generation the band members actually belonged to.

The Beatles were certainly a part of the sixties generation. To conclude that they were incapable of musical development beyond the peak point of their generation--let alone that their musical influence is insignificant--is your own supposition and does not follow logically from anything that I've said.

Furthermore, I would argue that we should talk about other artists precisely because the influence of mainstream sixties bands is so pervasive. Oasis, probably the least interesting band of the nineties, is an example of what comes from obsessing over the Beatles for perhaps the billionth time. There comes a time when dominating presences, however good, become dead ends: at this point, it's safe to say that Elvis has left the building.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: To everyone who asked, "Is this a prosody list?" I'd have to answer, for me, it is. That's how it was introduced to me by Charles Bernstein when I first met him: we spoke about prosody and musical notation (a subject I'm far more interested in discussing than sixties bands). He then said that I might be interested in this list.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

431. William Slaughter
Announcing Mudlark
Sat 29 Jun 1996

ANNOUNCING MUDLARK

I have been a silent partner to the POETICS discussion for more than a year now. My reason for breaking that silence is MUDLARK.

MUDLARK is an electronic journal of poetry & poetics that I edit and publish. It is available (free) on the World Wide Web at http://www.unf.edu/mudlark and by e-mail from [redacted]. It can also be found in the E-Text Archive at the University of Michigan and is linked to the Electronic Poetry Center at SUNY-Buffalo.

MUDLARK No. 3, just out, is a 48-49 poem sequence called ARS POETICA by Gerald Fleming whose work has appeared, for example, in THE AMERICAS REVIEW, FIVE FINGERS REVIEW, INDIANA REVIEW, MICHIGAN QUARTERLY REVIEW, NEW LETTERS, PEQUOD and PUERTO DEL SOL. Fleming edits BARNABE MOUNTAIN REVIEW. He lives in Lagunitas, California.

MUDLARK, its readers tell me, is worth the time it takes. I'm hoping that you will have a look at it. More than that, I'm hoping that you will read it.

MUDLARK NO. 4 will issue itself in early fall 1996. "A Conversation with Martin Heidegger," a long poem by Van K. Brock in English and a translation of it by Josef Pesch into German will constitute the whole of it. Van Brock is a Professor of English at Florida State University, editor of INTERNATIONAL QUARTERLY, and author, most recently, of UNSPEAKABLE STRANGERS (Anhinga 1995), a collection of poems related to the Holocaust. Josef Pesch teaches at Heidegger's own University of Freiburg.

MUDLARK NO. 5 will be made up of poems and essays from many different hands...and is still open. I quote, and why not, myself:

As our full name, MUDLARK: AN ELECTRONIC JOURNAL OF POETRY & POETICS, suggests, we will consider accomplished work that locates itself anywhere on the spectrum of contemporary practice. We want poems, of course, but we want essays, too, that make us read poems (and write them?) differently somehow. Although we are not innocent, we do imagine ourselves capable of surprise. We read and answer our mail.

In Mudlark poetry is free. Our authors give us their work and we, in turn, give it to our readers. What is the coin of poetry's realm? Poetry is a gift economy. One of the things we can do at Mudlark to "pay" our authors for their work is point to it here and there, wherever else it is. We can tell our readers how to find it, how to subscribe to it, and how to buy it...if it is for sale. Toward that end, we will maintain A-NOTES (on the Authors) we publish. We will call attention to their work. _____

MUDLARK No. 2 (1996)

THE RAPE POEMS by Frances Driscoll

Frances Driscoll's poems have been in MASSACHUSETTS REVIEW, NEGATIVE CAPABILITY, PLOUGHSHARES, and WILLOW SPRINGS, among other places. Gillian Conoley published "Island of the Raped Women" in VOLT and nominated it for a Pushcart Prize. It won and Bill Henderson included it in PUSHCART PRIZE ANTHOLOGY XIX (1995). "Wild Ribbons" originally appeared in VOLT, too, and "Difficult Word" in 13th MOON. Black River Press did a chapbook of Driscoll's poems, TALK TO ME, in 1987. She has an M.F.A. from the University of Massachusetts, Amherst. In a poem called "Subsidies," Driscoll writes: "Sometimes return is all anyone wants."

MUDLARK No. 1 (1995)

TWELVE OF ONE by Valerie Anthony and A DOZEN OF THE OTHER by David Swoyer

Valerie Anthony is a playwright as well as a poet. She received an Individual Artist's Grant for playwriting from the Florida Arts Council, 1994. Her play, LAND OF THE DOUBLEWIDES, was produced at the Florida Studio Theatre in Sarasota, 1995. She is presently a University Fellow in the English Department at Florida State University. Anthony writes fiction too. From "Lash," one of her stories: "There is only her breath and mine now, hanging in the air. Saying things." The TWELVE Anthony poems, hanging in the air in MUDLARK No. 1, have that same doubled breathing in them. "Saying things." ("Lash" is in the current, No. 57, issue of EXQUISITE CORPSE.)

David Swoyer is a painter as well as a poet. His paintings hang in both private and museum collections. For twenty-five years he has been a museum curator and presently works in that capacity at the Museum of Arts and Sciences (MOAS) in Daytona Beach, Florida. Swoyer is a Viet Nam veteran, "whose disability has not made him independently wealthy but has given him a higher regard for excursions to Canada." From "A Glitch in the Parable," a poem Swoyer has not abandoned: "The time that remains depends / on the distance left to fall." The DOZEN poems Swoyer has abandoned in MUDLARK No. 1 have their language lives in that remaining time.

William Slaughter, MUDLARK

↑ Index

432. Rod Smith
Re: british women poets
Sat 29 Jun 1996

Maggie O'Sullivan!!!

There's _Floating Capital: New Poets from London_ ed. Clarke & Sheppard, Potes & Poets, '91. Terrific book includes fewer women than other people, however Virginia Firnberg, Val Pancucci, & Hazel Smith, as well as O'Sullivan are there.

There's also a more recent anthology of British & American women sperimentalists twas announced on the list a bit ago-- Fiona Templeton had a copy at the Big Allis benefit, very snappy-- can't remember the pub. was it Stride? Anyway, SPD & possibly other distributors are still waiting for it, once it's here, we'll all be happy.

Rod

↑ Index

433. John E. Matthias
British Women Poets
Sat 29 Jun 1996

Steven Shoemaker:

You ask about British women poets. There's a lot of good work now where there used to be very little. When I edited _23 Modern British Poets_ in the early 1970s it was not possible to include any women at all. That seems amazing. Anyway, in practical terms, if this is to be a course taught at an American university, availability of texts becomes something of an issue. For mainstream poets, you might look at Linda France's _Sixty Women Poets_ published by Bloodaxe. Bloodaxe also published Jeni Couzyn's _the Bloodaxe Book of Contemporary Women Poets_, Carol Rumens's _New Women Poets_, and some other anthologies, but the France book would be the most useful at this point. It is available in this country from Dufour as are most other Bloodaxe titles (and many other volumes from British and Irish publishers: everyone should have a copy of their catalogue). The France anthology, which includes Irish poets, begins with poems published after 1971, the year Stevie Smith died. It ranges from very well known poets like Eavan Boland to poets born in the late 1950s and early 60s who are not known here at all. Some of the poets you (or your friend) might want to consider are: Sujata Bhatt, Eilean Ni Chuilleanain, Carol Ann Duffy, Lavinia Greenlaw, Selima Hill, Kathleen Jamie, Liz Lochhead, Mebdh Mcguckian, Ruth Padel, Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill, and Pauline Stainer. A few of these poets also appear in Neil Astley's _Poetry With an Edge_ and the anthology edited by Michael Hulse, David Kennedy and David Morley called _The New Poetry_. I have written a longish review of these and related books in my column on recent British poetry in _Another Chicago Magazine_ (No. 29, Spring 1995).

The problem with these Bloodaxe books, however, is that they pretty much exclude experimental or linguistically innovative poetry by British and Irish women. The recent anthology from Reality Street Editions (and Ken Edwards should probably say a word at this point), _Out of Everywhere_, includes work by Maggie O'Sullivan, Wendy Mulford, and Denise Riley, but there are also a good number of Americans. A recent issue of _West Coast Review_ (No 17, Fall 1995),edited by Peter Quartermain, contains some of the same poets represented by different poems. And I believe there will be new women poets in a special issue of _Talisman_ being edited by Ric Caddel. The Brits on the list will have, I'm sure, other recommendations. But maybe this is a start. Single volumes by British and Irish women that I've been reading or re-reading recently include Magie Hannan's _Liar,Jones_ (Bloodaxe), Denise Riley's _Mop Mop Georgette_ (Reality Street), Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill's _The Astrakhan Cloak_ (with translations from the Irish by Paul Muldoon) (Gallery Books), Pauline Stainer's, _The Ice-Pilot Speaks_ (Bloodaxe),and Sujata Bhatt's, _Monkey Shadows_ (Carcanet). Anyway, there's a lot of activity & there's not much attention being paid to it all over here. Romana Huk's conference/festival at the University of New Hampshire should help things out. Are there any British or Irish women poets on this list? If so, we don't hear from them. The Dufour catalogue, by the way, is available from Dufour Editions, P.O. box 7, Chester Springs, PA 19425.

John Matthias

↑ Index

434. Keith Tuma
Re: British Women Poets
Sat 29 Jun 1996

To the lists of British women poets offered by Charles, Rod, Maria, John, and others, I'd add Geraldine Monk and Elaine Randell--two of the best, I think.

Don't know how far back you all want to go--does anyone still read (as Duncan did) Kathleen Raine? Mina Loy counts as British in some books.

Don't know too how the Irish poets (e.g., Catherine Walsh) feel about being located next to the British poets in courses and anthologies. Perhaps Peter Quartermain or Ric Caddel would know this.

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

435. Keith Tuma
Re: oh no orono
Sat 29 Jun 1996

Well everybody's cheering about the Orono conference, and for good reason--lots of excellent papers, seeing old friends, making new ones, attaching faces to pixels, etc. etc. No one's mentioned Jerky the Moose yet, which many laughed at and then proceeded to excoriate in conversation afterwards--"It's Saturday Night Live" a poet-theorist said to me. But Dorn had already proleptically remarked at dinner the night before--"It's about time somebody killed modern poetry"--or some such, I can't remember exactly, and who knows if he was serious.

My favorite moment was Henry Weinfield's remarking after the panel on the New American Poetry anthology that well, really, Frank O'Hara had only three or four poems worth remembering. It's not that I agree, but by that point in the conference it was clear to me that part of what we were about was cheerleading in the woods. Remarkable how much consensus--in poetic and political values, in emergent canons--was in place at the conference. Whole realms of 50s poetic production were written off as a joke--condescension that is, finally, self-defeating. These are generalizations of course;there were exceptions; Bob von Hallberg is one (he's not here on the list to respond to ex cathedra pronouncements). Curious, too, how little the American poetry of the 1950s was set in international contexts, at least in the papers I attended. Jerry Rothenberg's plenary talk was an exception here. We are that provincial? (I know, it was a conference on American poetry, but boosterism is boosterism.) Maria D. has already remarked on the limits of the predominant author-focus.

I guess the best parties are populated mainly by friends--perhaps that explains some of the misty ethos. Nevertheless, it was entertaining too to hear Barry and Marjorie rehearsing political squabbles they've had before (I think) at the cash bar after Dorn's reading. And no doubt productive disagreements were and are ongoing. Would that they were more often out in the open, or not impossible because the NPF tends to attract people like you and me, who mostly agree as we take Olson down a notch or two and elevate Frank O'Hara a little.

Don't get me wrong--I liked many of the papers too (I won't discuss them here) and learned a lot. And it was a blast not only to see old friends but to get to experience for the first time the dignity of Kevin K. and Dodie B., the unassuming earnestness of Paul Naylor, the laughter of you and you and you.

It's boiling here today too--this is my cold dip in the pool.

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

436. Herb Levy
Re: Amazon.com
Sat 29 Jun 1996

Rae Armantrout writes:

> I just made the interesting (to me) discovery that this huge online bookstore at http://amazon.com actually has small press poetry books! But maybe you already knew that.

While it is amazing to search the Amazon catalog & find listings for many in print & some forthcoming books that you've never seen on the shelves of a general book store, they only have the biggest best sellers in stock. They don't have a store, they've simply put a lot of catalogs online.

If you order something esoteric (not by Stephen King) from them they order it from the publisher or distributor & send it to you when they get it in, just like a "real" book store. But Amazon adds a few handling charges that I've never seen at a "real" store, though.

Maybe the convenience is worth it for folks in towns with hopeless book stores & maybe it'll get some business from people who've never heard of SPD, etc.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

437. Gabrielle Welford
Re: British Women Poets
Sat 29 Jun 1996

Madge Herron is another. She appears (only place I've seen her) in a volume called _Love Poems By Women_ which is very precious to me. Gab.

I never did find out if she's still alive, by the way, if anyone has a way of discovering.

↑ Index

438. Steve Carll
Extended Play
Sat 29 Jun 1996

At 09:23 AM 6/29/96 -0400, Rob Hardin wrote:
>At 11:29 AM 6/28/96, Steve Carll is rumored to have typed:
>
>> At 01:20 AM 6/28/96 -0400, Rob Hardin wrote:
>>
>> >1. Mainstream sixties bands aren't worth this much commentary, esp not >> > on a prosody list.
>>
>> Then he wrote:
>>
>> > I don't like to insult musicians and I don't like it when >> >musicians are insulted.
>>
>> Wouldn't it be kind of insulting to a band (of musicians, presumably) to >> dismiss them as not worthy of commentary?
>
>Apparently, you haven't been following this thread.

That's a mistaken assumption on your part, not to mention unnecessarily insulting. You can make a point without being so arrogant, can't you?

> The two bands > whose musicianship I defended were the Beatles and the Stones. Since > I opined that they were not worth discussing on a prosody list even > *as I defended them, you would do well to notice the context* > *of the word worth before presuming insult.*

I'm fully aware of the context, and it still seems like an insult to me. It is possible to insult someone you're trying to defend, ya know.

> *In the context of this discussion, my "not worth this much commentary, esp. on a prosody list" is vastly different from your "not worthy of comment."*

I think "vastly" is a bit hyperbolic, Rob.

> Also: by saying they were not worth discussing, I was politely suggesting that I was not interested in being dragged into further discussions about the Beatles and the Stones. (Someday, perhaps, my request will be honored.)

This is e-mail. Nobody can drag you anywhere you don't want to go. You just have to keep your finger off that "Queue" key (or maybe you have one that says "Send." Whatever.)

> As to the context of "not worth this much commentary":
> *The overexposed are less worth commenting on than the underpromoted precisely because we have been sufficiently buried in commentary.*
> Every moment spent talking about the overexposed is a moment spent ignoring the underpromoted (those who are most in need of discussion and support).
>
> This is a list devoted to discussing poetry, and poets are the least exposed artists of all. And yes, sixties pop music can be relevant, but Jesus Christ--you can discuss the Beatles with anyone anywhere.

That's what I thought I was doing. Plenty of moments to go around, too.

> Not to mention reducing the > Beatles and the Stones to the status of "mainstream sixties bands"
>
> No one's "reducing" anyone's talent or influence. The Beatles and Stones are mainstream sixties bands in the sense that 22 Brides, whom I've recorded with, are an obscure nineties band, and PIL, whom I've played with, was a conspicuous underground eighties band that crossed over. The era in which a band breaks, the generation to which a band belongs, is what defines it chronologically. Its popularity (or lack of it) is what secures its niche.
>
> when both
> have obvious importance outside those rather tiny confines.
>
> Keats, whom you quote, has an importance beyond his status as a Lake Poet and a poet of the Romantic period. Would you say that history is incorrect in calling him a poet of the Romantic Period? If so, then how does his importance contradict the "tiny confines" of history?

History is inadequate in calling Keats a poet of the Romantic era. A summation like that is a fine starting point for a further exploration of Keats' work, etc., but when a phrase like that gets used as if nothing more need be said about them, I would say it's reductive.

> I left the
> sixties when I was three and discovered the Beatles in 1978....Their music has been a big influence on my person and my writing...and I'm sure that's true for some other people on this list, which probably explains why the topic came up at all.
>
> Actually, the topic came up because people who span two generations were talking about it. I was born in the sixties; another gentleman who was posting mentioned having played in bands for three decades, if I'm not mistaken. If you really feel that your generation (ie, mine, since we were both born in the sixties) and the people on this list are the last source of fresh insights on a well-explored subject, then it would seem that boomers aren't the only generation that is guilty of self-importance.

As I said, I remember how the topic came up, and your version of it doesn't contradict mine. But I didn't say "our" generation was the "last source of fresh insights" on anything. We're all capable of fresh insights, even on so-called "well-explored" subjects, not because of what generation we belong to but because we're human beings and we have minds that keep turning things over. Some might characterize that last statement as indicating a sense of self-importance, but let's at least be accurate about its nature. But the reason I brought this point up is that the Beatles, and the psychedelic pop song form they helped create, informs the poetics of at least one person on this list (that I know of), thus validating their discussion in POETICS.

> Does anyone call Miles Davis a "fifties jazz musician"?
>
> Miles was recording with Parker before the fifties. However, the Miles Davis Quintet was a fifties ensemble (even though their recordings stretched into the sixties).

But here again, Miles recorded a lot of stuff post-Quintet. Many people who don't like the cool stuff but go wild for "Bitches Brew" might consider Miles a sixties jazz musician. I think both these factions miss the big picture.

> When the band started?
>
> No, when the band made their first important mark via recordings and public performance, and what generation the band members actually belonged to.

And who decides these things? Or is there some natural consensus that I've missed out on in my naivete? I might point out that according to these criteria, PiL would be a seventies band, not an eighties one, since Lydon and Levene were part of the English punk rock movement (roughly '76-'78), and PiL's first two albums (1978 and '79) would seem to have to be considered as important marks defining a "postpunk" approach. I think these criteria are a highly suspect and not ultimately very helpful shorthand.

> The Beatles were certainly a part of the sixties generation. To conclude that they were incapable of musical development beyond the peak point of their generation--let alone that their musical influence is insignificant--is your own supposition and does not follow logically from anything that I've said.

So when you told Henry Gould that mainstream sixties bands are only interesting in a cultural study of that era, it was way out of left field for me to conclude that you were asserting that they're uninteresting in any context other than a cultural study of that era?

> Furthermore, I would argue that we should talk about other artists precisely because the influence of mainstream sixties bands is so pervasive. Oasis, probably the least interesting band of the nineties, is an example of what comes from obsessing over the Beatles for perhaps the billionth time. There comes a time when dominating presences, however good, become dead ends: at this point, it's safe to say that Elvis has left the building.

I agree with you about dead ends, but you know what? I kind of like Oasis. Their first album was derivative and bland; but _(What's the Story) Morning Glory?_ shows a vast improvement in their ability to write pop songs with nerve and verve. You and I both know that there are hundreds of less interesting bands neither of us will ever hear of for precisely that reason, and even in the realm of stuff that gets some exposure, what about Alice in Chains, Toad the Wet Sprocket, and Counting Crows?

||||||

From: Christopher Filkins[SMTP:[redacted]]
Sent: Wednesday, June 26, 1996 2:47 AM
To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
Subject: LSD lsd l s d led sleds

Looks much better justified.
> >
> > > I
> > > had > > > heard > > > from my > > > co-worker
> > > about a big > > > problem today.
> > > It seems my kid
> > > and your kid, all
> > > of our kids have to > > > worry about evil drug
> > > dealers giving out fake
> > > tattoos with acid in them.
> > > This is not a joke or rumor.
> > > This is a serious threat that > > > must not be taken lightly. They > > > have a blue star on them, but not > > > all - some have cartoons or such on > > > them. You must be very careful with a > > > blue star tattoo because the strychnine
> > > can be absorbed into your blood from just > > > handling the paper. This horrible thing has > > > a reason to it - the dealers want LSD addicts
> > > to buy more after they are hooked. Symptoms you > > > should watch for are: hallucinations, mood swings,
> > > uncontrolled laughter, drop in body temperature,
> > > dizziness or disorientation, severely dilated
> > > pupils, and severe vomiting. Some time - up > > > to an hour, can pass between contact with > > > the drug and onset of symptoms. If your > > > child has fell victim to this heinous > > > crime, you must take him quickly to > > > a hospital. Children hare already > > > died from this, LSD overdose is > > > easy. If you see a suspicious > > > person giving tattoos, foil > > > wrapped especially, phone

> > > your police immediately.
> > > This is a real danger
> > > and is growing much > > > faster than I can > > > spread warnings
> > > alone. Thanks
> > > for reading
> > > this that > > > I wrote > > > about
> > > LSD
> > > !

↑ Index

440. Joe Amato
Re: Extended Play
Sat 29 Jun 1996

hey steve, rob h., henry, you guyz: i don't know what in hell you're all talking about sometimes, musicologically undisabused as i am, but i just thought i'd stick my beak in here and observe that there's really no need for you guys to be at one another... it happens that i've enjoyed the facts you've been slinging at each other even while you've been slinging... why not just riff?... i mean, i enjoy what you've each brought to the conversation by way of insight...

and hey, i still like listening to foreigner for godsakes, so i'm not coming from anyplace particularly snooty...

'for what its worth'//

best,

joe

↑ Index

441. Louis Cabri
the thing
Sat 29 Jun 1996

Following, obliquely, & in too general terms, on Peter Quartermain's post, it seems to me that the point of taking "radical" poetry to theory (thinking of it that way as C.B. has argued, rather than the other way around as seems the obvious & usual) is to want to find continuously new ways of showing how and why poetry is political and inherently social (but why this must be constantly shown says a lot about one's 'location', too); in other words to keep that problem of the political open and alive (complex) as an issue of form, to show poetry as at once a fully "citational" & yet underdetermined matrix in relation to the political. This seems more of a challenge, & even more necessary, than to either assert repeatedly that poetry's radicality is in some way obviously political, or conversely to argue empirically that poetry's claims in each instance fail to become politically revolutionary, Actual, so (goes the implication) why bother thinking politically or revolutionarily. I wrote this on screen; these "linebreaks" are deletions & changes... Oh, for those who read Ernesto Laclau, I've just found this interesting article, haven't read it yet, but intriguing title - "Why do empty signifiers matter to politics?"

↑ Index

442. Ron Silliman
Zelevansky
Sun 30 Jun 1996

Ward,

I'm always interested in the idea of people joining disparate materials together, but I don't know the work of Paul Zelevansky. Can you get me the 100,000 foot overview?

In a similar vein, there's a poem by one Haki Pok at the beginning of the 3rd issue of Arras, just out (and a terrific mag, cover to cover), but no mention of him/her either among the contributor's notes or even on the list thereof on the back cover. Presuming that this is not a pseudonym for the editor, Brian Kim Stefans (Hockey Puck?), can somebody tell me more about this poet?

Re the disappearance, to whatever degree, of Enslin (please spell that name right), Tarn, Schwerner et al, I would think this is a sign that, say, Sulfur and its predecessor Caterpillar have not had the lasting impact on the scene that its editor imagines. All of these are interesting poets, but their relation to Olson et al is at some distance (Armand really is part of the scene around NYC that originally led to Caterpillar--he, Antin, Rothenberg, Kelly et al either "too young" or too non-projective to get into the Allen anthology). In the case of Tarn and Enslin, they've lived at some distance from those key urban centers and really don't hustle their work as much as they might.

Nathaniel was in Hoboken the other week for the big Russ/American thang and looked and sounded fine. His work with Grossman/Cape Goliard, which originally brought out the Mayan Letters, Mayakovsky's How are Verse Made, the first English translations of Victor Segalen and Nazim Hikmet, LZ's "A" 22/23, Henri Lefebvre's Dialectical Materialism, was one of the most intensely great editing projects of the past 40 years. It's impact is still vibrating through the culture.

My favorite Enslin book is an early one: New Sharon's Prospect and Journals. The long poems seemed too much to me to be exercises on the line, fine for a hundred pages, but ultimately fading into a restricted range of possibility. For pure studies of the ear, my own preference has been, say, for Ken Irby, whose work does so much WITHIN the individual line.

All best,

Ron

↑ Index

443. Bill Luoma
CS & JC
Sun 30 Jun 1996

Chris Stroffolino posted an error in his phone number. These are the true specs below:

464 Monmouth St. #6, Jersey City, NJ. 07302....
[redacted]....

↑ Index

444. Carl Lynden Peters
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Sun 30 Jun 1996

> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan

jordan, -- what eliot was so afraid of

c.

↑ Index

445. Jordan Davis
of the whole art/spam two generations
Sun 30 Jun 1996

Hi. What's the unconscious?

Jordan

↑ Index

446. Tom Beard
Commonwealth women poets
Sun 30 Jun 1996

Hi all,

I'd just like to second (third?) the recommendations of Michele Leggott's work. Another NZer whose work I find essential is Dinah Hawken, especially "Small Stories of Devotion" - maybe she's not querzblatz enough for some, but I find her poetry innovative and exciting nonetheless.

After mentioning Dinah, perhaps I should put in a word for the Canadian Phyllis Webb - I know her chiefly for her influence on Dinah, but I assume she's well known to the list.

Cheers &c,

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

447. Tom Beard
Re: Extended Play
Sun 30 Jun 1996

> But here again, Miles recorded a lot of stuff post-Quintet. Many people who don't like the cool stuff but go wild for "Bitches Brew" might consider Miles a sixties jazz musician. I think both these factions miss the big picture.
>
> I might point out that according to these criteria, PiL would be a seventies band, not an eighties one, since Lydon and Levene were part of the English punk rock movement (roughly '76-'78), and PiL's first two albums (1978 and '79) would seem to have to be considered as important marks defining a "postpunk" approach.

There are some of us who know Davis best via "Tutu" & "Doo-bop", or Lydon best through "Open Up" with Leftfield. Does this make them 80s or 90s musicians? The whole idea of nailing a musician or band down to what someone considers their most "influential" decade seems silly. And does one count this by the time that they recorded their most influential music, or the time upon which that music had most influence? If the latter, then Kraftwerk would be an 80s or 90s band, although they did most of their recording in the 70s.

Someone said that the 80s ended in December 1992 - what was the event that caused this death? Is it something US-specific? Maybe in NZ we jumped from the 50s to the 80s in mid-84 with the end of Muldoon. A lot of it seems tied to personal life changes - my 80s must have started in about '91, when I got a job and was able to afford Armani, whereas everyone else was starting to wear grunge. Maybe I'm still stuck in the 80s - I still prefer Frankie Goes to Hollywood to Smashing Pumpkins, Versace to Stussy, and Bolly to Spirulina. Maybe my 90s will start if I get made redundant.

Cheers &c,

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

448. maria damon
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Sun 30 Jun 1996

In message <v01520d05adfc9de976f2@[166.84.199.56]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan

freud made it up, but it works for me i pay it well.

↑ Index

449. Charles Alexander
Re: Zelevansky
Sun 30 Jun 1996

> Ward,
>
> I'm always interested in the idea of people joining disparate materials together, but I don't know the work of Paul Zelevansky. Can you get me the 100,000 foot overview?

Ward will probably do this better, but I can give a little background or overview. Paul Zelevansky comes out of the visual art/visual book field. His most well-known work is The Case for the Burial of Ancestors, which indeed invents a visual language, using what look like xeroxed & clip-art images to make a somewhat readable visual text. There at least two and perhaps three books in this series by now, and Zelevansky has made other visual books as well. I think what he is doing is making glyphs, which is something entirely different than Schwerner, who is translating invented glyphs. But the comparison still made some sense to me, at least in part, as a reading of either of them needs an openness to visual/literary invention and to a good sense of humor. I believe that a few years ago American Book Review did a two-issue special feature on visual literature which was co-edited by Zelevansky and Johanna Drucker. Let me quote from Drucker's The Century of Artists' Books (Granary Books, 1995):

"Not all uses of the book as a self-contained conceptual system are as abstract or analytic as the works just discussed. An interesting contrast to these are the books of Paul Zelevansky, The Book of Takes (Zartscorp, 1976), The Case for the Burial of Ancestors (Zartscorp and Visual Studies Workshop Press, 1981), Shadow Architecture at the Crossroads (CNC, 1988). Zelevansky's works contain an entire universe of references, forms, narratives, codes, and information. The three works are intimately related, though each is distinct in form and functions independently. Offset printed from originals made with rubber stamps, presstype, typewriter, and other low-tech graphic items, the books make striking use of the potential of these media to translate into tones of black and white. Zelevansky also exploits the structures and conventions of book form to their fullest: the momentum of the narrative is interrupted and fleshed out with other information, visual material, jokes, puns, a rich array of graphic elements which continually expand the world which Zelevansky is creating in the book. One the one hand, these are closed systems, ones in which the significance and meaning of the elements, is generated entirely from their relations to each other. On the other hand, as Zelevansky says of his work, "the edges of the page" are "the proscenium which contains the play" but "the screen is porous between us." There's more in Drucker's book, and she knows Zelevansky's work far better than I do. But from what I know I would recommend a look to anyone. Zelevansky is one of the pioneers in book arts/artists' books -- who has influenced many people in useful ways. His language, which I see as influenced by the lettriste movement as well as by rubber stamps and xerox art and mail art, is a wonder. My own sense of Zelevansky's rather lengthy forays into books which are, as Drucker says, "parallel universes structured according to the rules of a symbolic language," is parallel to that of Silliman's sense of Enslin's longer poems, that the books ultimately fade "into a restricted range of possibility." But then, as someone recently pointed out about limits or limitations, just about everybody's work has some limits.

charles

↑ Index

450. Carnography
Re: Extended Play
Sun 30 Jun 1996

I'm going to say this one more time: If you wish to continue this, I'd appreciate it if you'd backchannel your comments to me personally. There is no reason for people in UB P to be subjected to mere off-topic quarreling. My final post to Henry was a notice that I wouldn't be responding to previous posts in public out of courtesy. If you'd like to attack me personally, ("arrogant," "insulting," etc) I suggest you take it to email.

This current thread is a petty, impolite flame-war. Ethically, whomever wins has already lost.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

Steve Carll typed:

> Then he wrote:
>
> I don't like to insult musicians and I don't like it when musicians are insulted.
>
> Wouldn't it be kind of insulting to a band (of musicians, presumably) to dismiss them as not worthy of commentary?
>
> Apparently, you haven't been following this thread.
>
> That's a mistaken assumption on your part, not to mention unnecessarily insulting. You can make a point without being so arrogant, can't you?

That you've misunderstood the context my remark suggests that you haven't been following the thread. This is a charitable supposition on my part and suggests no insult to you. However, your attribution of arrogance to me is "insulting." What is more, it is ad hominem and does not address the facts or anything else.

> *The two bands whose musicianship I defended were the Beatles and the Stones. Since I opined that they were not worth discussing on a prosody list even as I defended them, you would do well to notice the context of the word worth before presuming insult.*
>
> I'm fully aware of the context, and it still seems like an insult to me. It is possible to insult someone you're trying to defend, ya know.

Since you've failed to explain what "seems" like an insult to you, it is impossible to take your inference seriously. Your use of the words "you," "the" and "fully" might "seem" insulting to me with as much justification or proof.

What is more, the "possibility" of insulting someone while defending them is very different from tangible proof of insult.

> *In the context of this discussion, my "not worth this much commentary, esp. on a prosody list" is vastly different from your "not worthy of comment."*
>
> I think "vastly" is a bit hyperbolic, Rob.

Vastly is not at all hyperbolic, because the very idea of dismissing a musician's inherent value (which is what you've accused me of) is vastly different from saying they are not worth discussing in a particular context. Even if you have only a passing interest in semantics, you should recognize this.

Also, your own accusations have, for the most part, been "hyperbolic" or exaggerate: reading "insult" and "arrogance," for example, into flat reponses is to resort to exaggeration instead of answering my point.

> Also: by saying they were not worth discussing, I was politely suggesting that I was not interested in being dragged into further discussions about the Beatles and the Stones. (Someday, perhaps, my request will be honored.)
>
> This is e-mail. Nobody can drag you anywhere you don't want to go. You just have to keep your finger off that "Queue" key (or maybe you have one that says "Send." Whatever.)

1.) No, this is not merely email. This is a public listserv that goes out to hundreds of people. Effectively speaking, you're addressing me in public.

Also, people who write public posts and responses can, have, and do drag others into pointless skirmishes. They do it by addressing others personally and by consistently misinterpreting their statements and intentions. Your posts are examples of that uncivil phemomenon.

2.) Also, the post in which you called me insulting was to a response to a post in which I did not wish to fight with Henry in public, and that I would backchannel my response to Henry for that very reason. For you to have picked a fight with me over that very post is unconstructive and pointlessly antagonistic.

> As to the context of "not worth this much commentary":
> *The overexposed are less worth commenting on than the underpromoted precisely because we have been sufficiently buried in commentary.*
> Every moment spent talking about the overexposed is a moment spent ignoring the underpromoted (those who are most in need of discussion and support).
>
> This is a list devoted to discussing poetry, and poets are the least exposed artists of all. And yes, sixties pop music can be relevant, but Jesus Christ--you can discuss the Beatles with anyone anywhere.
>
> That's what I thought I was doing. Plenty of moments to go around, too.

Actually, you were defending the Beatles (to someone who had already defended them)--hardly the terrain of the underdog. By the time the Beatles are underexposed, we'll both be dead from old age.

> Keats, whom you quote, has an importance beyond his status as a Lake Poet and a poet of the Romantic period. Would you say that history is incorrect in calling him a poet of the Romantic Period? If so, then how does his importance contradict the "tiny confines" of history?
>
> History is inadequate in calling Keats a poet of the Romantic era.

(By the way, your use of the phrase "inadequate in calling" is illiterate.)

> summation like that is a fine starting point for a further exploration of Keats' work, etc., but when a phrase like that gets used as if nothing more need be said about them, I would say it's reductive.

My use of the phrase "mainstream sixties artist" did not imply that "nothing more need be said" about the Beatles in other contexts. The use of the word "mainstream," ie, known and discussed, and "sixties," as in sufficiently documented, are not "reductive" (do not over-simplify the subject). There was a point in the Nineteenth Century at which very little that was new was going to be said about Lord Byron--not for two or three more generations. At that point, people might have said his poetry was "not worth" endless commentary on a mailing list devoted to watercolors.

This does not mean that someone on that list who referred to him as a "popular Romantic poet" would be oversimplifying. It means that the relevance of the discussion was being questioned.

Furthermore, I was not giving UB Poetics some sort of ultimatim about the subjects it may or may not address. I spoke of its relevance while explaining why I did not wish to speak of it anymore. Your paraphrase is yet another example of your persistent misunderstanding of my motives and intentions.

> I left the sixties when I was three and discovered the Beatles in 1978....Their music has been a big influence on my person and my writing...and I'm sure that's true for some other people on this list, which probably explains why the topic came up at all.
>
> Actually, the topic came up because people who span two generations were talking about it. I was born in the sixties; another gentleman who was posting mentioned having played in bands for three decades, if I'm not mistaken. If you really feel that your generation (ie, mine, since we were both born in the sixties) and the people on this list are the last source of fresh insights on a well-explored subject, then it would seem that boomers aren't the only generation that is guilty of self-importance.

> As I said, I remember how the topic came up, and your version of it doesn't contradict mine.

You said, but you did not prove. Therefore your suppositions say nothing.

> But I didn't say "our" generation was the "last source of fresh insights" on anything. We're all capable of fresh insights, even on so-called "well-explored" subjects, not because of what generation we belong to but because we're human beings and we have minds that keep turning things over.

Keep believing that, Steve, and you'll never say anything new. What is it exactly about being "human beings" and "having minds" that makes us a priori original?

> Some might characterize that last statement as indicating a sense of self-importance, but let's at least be accurate about its nature. But the reason I brought this point up is that the Beatles, and the psychedelic pop song form they helped create, informs the poetics of at least one person on this list (that I know of), thus validating their discussion in POETICS.

See above and above and above. No one forbade you to post on any subject, no one called for a vote on topics that ought to be banned, thus no "validation" is required. I merely explained why I, personally, was not publicly responding to Henry and why I did not choose to argue at length over this subject. That you missed the context and responded publically is one more proof that the meaning was lost on you.

> Does anyone call Miles Davis a "fifties jazz musician"?
>
> Miles was recording with Parker before the fifties. However, the Miles Davis Quintet was a fifties ensemble (even though their recordings stretched into the sixties).
>
> But here again, Miles recorded a lot of stuff post-Quintet. Many people who don't like the cool stuff but go wild for "Bitches Brew" might consider Miles a sixties jazz musician. I think both these factions miss the big picture.

So far, this is the most interesting thing you've said.

But I didn't characterize Miles Davis himself as a fifties musician (though that label is far more accurate than "sixties"). I characterized the quintet as a fifties ensemble, which is more specific.

It's an interesting question to ask about individual composers, isn't it? Yet the discussion becomes a kind of etymological error detection when applied to convenient historical appellations. It is usually considered acceptible to refer to Stravinsky as a neo-classical modernist composer despite his Russian Nationalist ballets, despite his later experiments with dodecaphony. It is very possible that, at some point, the neo- classical label will shift, as the significance of Woolf's _Orlando_ became, not a minor psychological fairy tale, as it was viewed by earlier critics, but the early example of Magic Realism. This deferred memory shifting of the canon is important and exciting. But earlier references to her as a Bloomsbury psychological novelist were not reductive in the context of general identification. Earlier critics had no way of understanding or predicting magic realism. They only wanted a way to identify Virginia Woolf's work.

A venomous attack over what, in your opinion, is an incorrect critical term, seems venom misapplied.

> When the band started?
>
> No, when the band made their first important mark via recordings and public performance, and what generation the band members actually belonged to.
>
> And who decides these things? Or is there some natural consensus that I've missed out on in my naivete?

There is in fact a critical consensus at work. The Beatles are generally referred to as a sixties phenomenon, Elvis as a fifties phenomenon, and so on. If you wish to contest this, there is no point in shooting the messenger.

> I might point out that according to these criteria, PiL would be a seventies band, not an eighties one, since Lydon and Levene were part of the English punk rock movement (roughly '76-'78),

The earlier activities of the musicians in PIL are not what define the band chronologically. It is the period of the activity of the band itself. The musicians, who were of varying ages, would be a second consideration in this case.

Once again, have you never read a biography or book about such bands? Their generations are constantly defined along these lines. What would you ask biographers and historians to use in place of such terms and why? How would the terms that you offered, whatever they might be, prove less "reductive" than the ones used now?

> and PiL's first two albums (1978 and '79) would seem to have to be considered as important marks defining a "postpunk" approach.

This is a valid point, since PIL's first album and public performance occurred in 78. Also, I regard their first two albums as the most historically important ones (though Flowers of Romance is my favorite). However, I'd argue that the focal point of their activity (78-93), and of postpunk as a musical phemomenon, pivots on the early eighties. My brief work with PIL occurred in 1985, after _This is What You Want... This is What You Get_, so I'm probably myopic about PIL's history.

> I think these > criteria are a highly suspect and not ultimately very helpful shorthand.

Literally speaking, all criteria are "suspect." But to attack the use of historical criteria in general is less helpful and more "suspect" than instances of such criteria.

> The Beatles were certainly a part of the sixties generation. To conclude that they were incapable of musical development beyond the peak point of their generation--let alone that their musical influence is insignificant--is your own supposition and does not follow logically from anything that I've said.
>
> So when you told Henry Gould that mainstream sixties bands are only interesting in a cultural study of that era, it was way out of left field for me to conclude that you were asserting that they're uninteresting in any context other than a cultural study of that era?

1. You're paraphrasing a post that predates this discussion. What's more, you're expecting me to address your hearsay as if it were a quote.

2. A discussion of the musical worth of pop music in general is not the same as a discussion of one pop musician's influence on other pop musicians. Even as you paraphrase irrelevant posts, you manage to confuse one category of comparison for another.

> Furthermore, I would argue that we should talk about other artists precisely because the influence of mainstream sixties bands is so pervasive. Oasis, probably the least interesting band of the nineties, is an example of what comes from obsessing over the Beatles for perhaps the billionth time. There comes a time when dominating presences, however good, become dead ends: at this point, it's safe to say that Elvis has left the building.
>
> I agree with you about dead ends, but you know what? I kind of like Oasis. Their first album was derivative and bland; but _(What's the Story) Morning Glory?_ shows a vast improvement in their ability to write pop songs with nerve and verve.

I consider Oasis's second album to be musically and lyrically meaningless. If that's songwriting nerve, then late Paul McCartney is shocking.

Competent songwriting and production? That I concede. But _Maybe_ (and other songs on the album) is one of the most derivative Beatle cops I've ever heard.

> You and I both know that there are hundreds of less > interesting bands neither of us will ever hear of for precisely that reason

On the contrary: there are hundreds of bands we'll never hear on the radio because they show more nerve and verve than bands like Oasis.

> and even in the realm of stuff that gets some exposure, what about Alice in Chains, Toad the Wet Sprocket, and Counting Crows?

What about them? You haven't said whether you consider these bands to be examples of what is examplary or uninteresting.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

451. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

comments on women today and oppression

Sun 30 Jun 1996

---

re ms. phillip's dismay about a conference attendee's comments that women today do not realize that they are oppressed and that white middle class women are the last to realize they are oppressed, i can very easily see much that might have motivated those comments and agree. i have seen entirely too many anti-feminist slings recently, as if one is being somehow radical and brave to trash all those dingy feminists. and i can easily, only too easily imagine losing my temper if i thought i heard yet another pseudo-daring slam on feminists.

people have been slamming feminists for hundreds of years -- white master-owners; male husbands enjoying such privileges as beating a wife with anything smaller than the circumfrance of their thumb, being the only one in the partnership who can own or inherit land, being the only partner who have a bank account or vote; men who can vote, own land, have a bank account, work at any number of professions while women cannot; men being asked to desist from disenfranchising women; academics (male and female) who profess, as dale spender has pointedly put it, that "you don't have to read women's literature to know it isn't any good" in her book on sexism in literature; academics who refuse to hire women in tenure track positions; academics who consistently give lower marks and bad reviews to work by women, while giving accolades to work of comparable quality by men; etcetera, etcetera. it isn't, after all, so very new to slam feminists and those who do so certainly aren't the sort of company i would like to keep. perhaps mr. howe meant nothing disrespectful toward women. but with the comments as reported, i have only too many painful experiences which lead me to agree.

in other words, i can't say how many times i have heard some younger woman tell me, often with a placating smile (as if being, publically, a "good girl"), that SHE is certainly not oppressed and doesn't feel women are oppressed anymore. she tells me this while she is typing, filing, and scurrying away at a shit job for lower pay than men her age and ability. she has also, often, just told me about the job(s) she left because she was sexually harrassed, the boyfriend she lives with who expects her to wash all the dishes, do the laundry, cook, and clean, the same boyfriend who has perhaps just left her for a younger prettier woman. she leaves work to paint one more painting that will not get exhibited in a museum because although over half of the people in art classes are women, less than a tenth of exhibited or reviewed artists are women (and this situation exists for women writers, in large measure as well -- have you ever noticed how in anonymous entry contests, the winners are half or over half women, but in contests where names are used, 1/5 to 1/3 of the winners are women?). and we watch while a black or latino woman cleans the building around us and tells us, if we ask, how she was an accountant at home, or how her husband doesn't let her go home alone so she will have to stay here and wait for him, or one of us in the room struggles to hide the bruises from being beaten by an abusive partner while the residents of rooms on all sides of us shut their ears since "he's her boyfriend" so that makes it all right.

i am sick of hearing that women are not oppressed. i am sick of hearing the very feminists whose damned hard work has gotten women the right to vote, to hold about 3/4 more sorts of jobs than they used to, the right to start a bank account without their husband's signature to give them permission, and so on and so on jeered at, disowned, and dismissed as they take on yet another painful, difficult battle for the very women who will not stand with them, yet benefit by their labor.

from this ground, such seeds as the comments you report seem only too understandable.

and while i'm on my soapbox, i have found myself distanced and pained by the numerous readings listed with no women writers, by the numerous lists of admired writers with at best only one woman for every eight men, and by the books and book lists with almost no women. the thread on british women poets has been, to say the least, a delight and i'd love to see more of the same.

women write too.
e

↑ Index

452. Lisa Amber Phillips
Orono Others
Sun 30 Jun 1996

This is my inaugural message to the POETICS list, but I feel as if much of what I will say is actually a continuation of many of the amazing conversations I had while at Orono. I'm not much of a rah-rah type, but I was reeeeeelly blown away by the quality of the conference (no mean feat to sustain that for five days), the high concentration of people doing original research in their subjects, and the warm atmosphere of camaraderie that was inclusive of a relative stranger like myself. I don't know if anyone else had this experience, but for me, coming from a small department where, as one of my profs so astutely said, "few people are mad for poetry," the conference experience was a heady combination of banquet and boot camp. All this last week I've felt like Oliver with his bowl pleading, "Please, sir, I want more." Instant community.

On to a few more utopic remembrances: meeting Kevin Killian and Dodie Bellamy (again), meeting Roger Conover and Keith Tuma smoking outside the stairwell while talking about theatrical suicides (I still don't quite get it how Arthur Cravan is supposed to be a "metaphorical" suicide. Keith, any insight?), meeting Michael Basinski, whose work I have admired for a while, a post-cash bar beer and pistachio fest w/George Hartley, Chris Stroffolino, Barret Watten, Al Golding, Star Black, Wendy Kramer, et al (with Wendy punctuating the conversation with her amusing remarks about pinup girls), staying up til 4a.m. chain-smoking and arguing with Dave Kellogg, Chris Stroffolino and Wendy Kramer (I think I slept maybe 20 hours altogether the whole time I was in Orono), receiving the gift of "Jhon the Animal Song" from Natalie Basinski (ringing in my head STILL one week later), going to plenary sessions and listening to the voices of people whose work I've read and admired for some years now, going to poetry readings and being moved by the performances of people who I've only ever experienced in print (or never read or heard of at all), spending most of the Bar Harbor afternoon drinking beer in The Thirsty Whale (and then only having ten minutes to eat our lobster at that nifty '50s restaurant), not to mention meeting a battery of people doing work on Mina Loy, such as Josh Weiner, Susan Dunn and Marisa Januzzi (I know there were more, but I only met so many), and of course, Keith Tuma and Roger Conover.

There were some sour notes, of course, but it doesn't reduce the wonder of the experience for me; rather it gave me more to think about after I left. For example, I wasn't at the Barrett Watten talk on Betty Page, but I, too, was disturbed by what sounded like a knee-jerk response from some feminist attendees, and particularly bothered by someone's efforts to bring about some kind of "punishment" for Watten (demanding the NPF give 'im a spanking or something). And, of course, the commons food was execrable, which made me glad I brought my big cooler of food instead of buying all those tickets. The insistence of the bus drivers that we stop at that Visitor's Center and the topof Cadillac Mountain (?) seemed pointless (although it appealed to my surrealist sensibilities) on our Bar Harbor trip, and all the more annoying since we only had a couple of hours in Bar Harbor because of it.

I also wanted to bring up another small brouhaha from the Cage/Mac Low panel on the last day of the conference, mostly because it's been sticking in my craw all week. Someone made a comment about the Trillings (re: the "Thrilling the Trillings" paper that was delivered at the beginning of tha panel), and I believe

Bill Howe responded with an observation or opinion about Diana Trilling, which caused one of the other attendees to tell him his view was "contemptible" (while smiling at him and saying "no offense". No offense? Come on.) and that it was easy for him to say, sitting there enjoying his "white male privilege" etc. etc. This person then went on to say that it is white middle class women who are the last to realize their oppression (as if this makes them more oppressed and more victimized than non-white women of poverty or the working class), AND that before the sixties women didn't realize they were oppressed, AND that "young women of today" don't realize they are oppressed: "They think they are free." This of course places women like this particular person in the small happy category of women from the sixties and seventies who DO realize their oppression and are soooooo convinced that they are the only ones with the 20/20 gender-vision. I was too stunned to respond at the time (I had accumulated few hours of sleep in the last several days, remember), but I can now, in a word: BULLSHIT. I would be interested to hear responses from others who attended that panel--some other perspectives would be valuable as I further sort out my complicated feelings about it.

Anyhow, thanks to all the folks I met for their friendliness and willingness to share their ideas. I should sign off now--I'm not a big-bandwidth person ordinarily. I'd also like to wave in the general direction of any Creative Studies alumni who might be on this list (you know who you are) and ask, wuzzup?

Lisa Amber Phillips

↑ Index

453. Joel Felix
Ronald Johnson Broadside (ad)
Sun 30 Jun 1996

Poetics listers: your indulgence--

LVNG magazine inaugurates its Supplementals Series with a broadside of Ronald Johnson's monument _in memoriam_ AIDS. (Sidebar: Ronald Johnson celebrates this year the complete publication of his long poem ARK, from Living Batch Press.)

****

BLOCKS TO BE ARRANGED IN A PYRAMID

Then with a sweep blindly eradicate perception itself
afire with egress

pale stampede into the darkness caught at the throat Chase remorseless yield redbird perch grayest tombstone assembled Holy Ghost chrysanthemumed

****

The poem, comprised of 66 quatrains, or blocks, is printed in the shape of a pyramid on a 19" by 25" broadside, in an edition of 366. 66 are signed and numbered by the poet.

Printed June 1996
$10 per copy; $15 signed

The poet says of the poem: "When these short quatrains began (sometimes swiftly) to come, it took long months to understands this must be my Journal of the Plague Years. That time AIDS began to kill more brave young, in a generation, than any other war. It was an elegy, an In Memoriam in effect, long bottled up...I came to imagine these as blocks of incised stone, which would be placed--as they seemed to be about death resurrection, first and last things--in a circle. Insistent they were, but not necessarily connected. Then one day they seemed to crystallize into a pyramid: even more fitting. A set of blocks anyone could assemble as an act of remembrance."

Backchannel orders to

[redacted]

or,

LVNG
PO Box 3865
Chicago, IL 60654-0865

or call

[redacted]

Thanks, and a throaty cheer for Poetics.

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

July 1996

695 messages · Mon 1 Jul 1996 – Wed 31 Jul 1996

It is not true that the list ignored the news that July. It kept a different ledger. A jetliner came apart over Long Island on the seventeenth with two hundred and thirty aboard, and a pipe bomb went off in the Olympic park at Atlanta on the twenty-seventh, and neither appears in six hundred and ninety-five letters; but on the sixteenth Michael Boughn posted under the heading Bad news, and the room went into mourning for a week. Coach House Press was closing after thirty-one years — Blaser, Bowering, Ondaatje, Thesen — and Boughn knew whom to blame: “Chalk up another victory for the New York bankers”. That was July’s catastrophe, and the room grieved it properly, while doing the least defensible thing it did all year.

For the month’s largest business, some forty letters under List wars and List-personship, was the list discussing its own conduct. The occasion was a panel at Orono: Aldon Nielsen had said something, Robert von Hallberg had disputed it, Keith Tuma had forwarded Nielsen’s remarks to von Hallberg, who was not a member, and von Hallberg had replied to a list he had not joined. From this the room extracted a fortnight of procedure — whether the forwarding was permissible, whether the reply was, whether he ought now to subscribe — with a subsidiary quarrel over lurkers, whom Herb Levy had characterised in terms Daniel Bouchard quoted back at him before asking, reasonably, “Who can blame lurkers for keeping silent?”

It took Marjorie Perloff to say what the month was. She found the controversy slightly absurd, and gave her reason: Lorenzo Thomas, “a Live Black Poet and the only one present” at Orono, had given a moving talk on Melville Tolson, had not been asked to read, and was being discussed by nobody — while the question of who forwarded what to whom was on its fourth day. And here is the part I cannot get past: maria damon, who wrote fifty-two times that July and had made this point already, replied only that “this is exactly what i was trying to point out”. She had said it. It became audible when Perloff said it.

The month’s other thread asked what a poem in extremity is worth, and got an answer nobody wanted. Victim art had been discussed for a week in the abstract when Dan Horne wrote from New Zealand to say it had happened to him: a nurse had asked him to read the poems of a teenage patient recently dead of cancer, and say whether an editor might take them. He read them. He told her "the poems didn't align themselves with the ideologies" of the journals he knew, and felt worse for saying it, and said so. Elsewhere the list, doing the thing it is actually good at, assembled a shelf — Blackburn's journals, Curnow's daybook, Helene Davis, Pekar and Brabner — for anyone who wanted to read the illness rather than adjudicate it.

And in Toronto the premier of Ontario, asked about the press his government had cut by seventy-four per cent, told reporters that the company's blaming the province "probably speaks to their management capabilities". Boughn printed it from that morning's Globe without comment, which was the correct handling. Charles Alexander wrote the epitaph and did not know it: "One good thing come to an end. Bless it." I have set the etiquette and the elegy where July put them, four days apart, because this is the month the room spent forty letters establishing who was entitled to speak to it, while a press that had printed thirty-one years of poems went under, a living poet's talk went undiscussed, and a dead girl's poems were weighed against the ideologies of the journals and found not to fit.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 695 in all.

WRITERS

3809183, William Marsh - 78
Alexander, Charles 86, 93, 94, 152, 181, 191, 215, 216, 315, 330, 364, 373, 397, 414, 441, 469, 470, 471, 472, 478, 485, 492, 497, 501, 502, 503, 518, 527, 581, 590, 607, 620, 686
Amato, Joe 87, 106, 128, 136, 149, 178, 185, 193, 251, 358
Anderson, Curt 566
Baratier, David 19, 43, 146, 154, 205, 207, 301, 447, 482, 504, 511, 512, 615, 671
Beck, Douglis 623, 680
Bell, Thomas 235, 539, 556, 557, 631, 637, 656
Bernstein, Charles 410
Bouchard, Daniel 20, 188, 196, 498
Boughn, Michael 465, 499, 500
Bowering, George 284, 285, 317, 331, 367, 368, 369, 370, 372, 413, 421, 422, 424, 425, 460, 488, 489, 490, 510, 532, 533, 534, 549, 550, 633, 634, 692
Brook, James 34, 95, 137, 165, 308, 374, 415
Cabri, Louis 62, 508, 558
Caddel, R I 5, 291
Carll, Steve 12, 360, 430, 514, 521, 522
Carnography 171, 173, 229, 231, 289, 327, 329, 393, 394, 395, 396, 407, 433, 435, 461, 462, 474, 475, 561, 584, 591, 595, 606, 638, 641
Cayley, John 30
Cheek, Cris 21, 463
Cheney, Don 51, 190
CHERNOFF, MAXINE 513, 551
Chirot, Christina Fairbank 66, 80, 206, 323, 342, 344, 565, 685
CHRISTOPH, FUNKHOUSER 663
Clark, Susan 391
Coffey, Michael 246, 642
Damon, Maria 6, 27, 47, 52, 72, 76, 82, 83, 109, 110, 111, 126, 133, 142, 145, 164, 180, 182, 183, 184, 201, 213, 250, 253, 269, 270, 278, 280, 300, 365, 382, 383, 449, 450, 451, 467, 481, 515, 519, 571, 572, 575, 576, 604, 625, 628, 648, 652, 670, 673, 674, 681, 682, 687, 691
Davidson, Michael 309
Davis, Jordan 9, 22, 25, 198, 259, 261, 263, 305, 306, 325, 328, 333, 338, 353
Drake, Robert 53, 81, 103, 143, 384, 495, 543, 563, 586, 603, 640, 664, 669, 683
Dworkin, Craig Douglas 632
Edwards, Ken 29
Evans, Steve 32, 33
Faherty, Michael 4
Farrah, Gjoseph 516
Filch 28, 84, 334, 366, 411, 440, 444
Filkins, Christopher 138
Foster, Edward 40, 41, 42
FOUST, GRAHAM W. 523
Gale, Bob 665, 666, 677
Geraets, John 635, 667
Glazier, Loss 31, 38, 57, 160, 161, 162, 211, 244, 245, 282, 520
Gleason, Eryque 288, 426
Golumbia, David 64, 524
Gordon, Nada 55, 248, 249, 579, 582, 583
Gould, Henry 8, 17, 23, 127, 139, 243, 257, 297, 299, 596, 613
Green, Tony 67, 114, 428, 432, 452, 454, 455, 456, 529, 530, 592, 593, 617, 619, 622, 624, 626, 659
Guertin, C.g. 135, 491
Guest, Eliza McGrand- CVA 150, 217, 335, 536, 540, 548, 630, 650, 657, 672
Von Hallberg, Robert 408, 409
Harrison, Robert A 204, 267, 310, 525
Hartley, George 695
Hehir, K.a. 347, 348, 349
Hen 194
Henry 37, 195, 294, 295, 312, 319, 351, 352, 361, 381, 618
Hilton, Mary 24, 179
Hnry 346
Holman, Bob 658, 675
Horne, Dan 594
Jarnot, Lisa 636
Jms 403
Joris, Pierre 298, 646
Joyce, Elisabeth W. 144
Kellogg, David 212, 273, 274, 275
Killian, Kevin 3, 10, 18, 26, 121, 174, 175, 176, 225, 277, 343, 345, 371, 464, 477, 505, 506, 507, 541, 542, 559, 585, 588, 598, 599, 601, 602, 605
Kimmelman, Burt 7, 88, 104, 107, 130, 221, 224, 252, 265, 268, 332, 357, 375, 376, 377, 660
Kuszai, Joel 68, 401
L, McGuire Jerry 404
Lazer, Hank 187, 326
Leddy, Michael 653
Levin, Jonathan A 122, 438, 621

Levy, Herb 79, 90, 117, 186, 480, 546, 547, 552, 564, 608, 609
LEWIS, JOEL 119, 679
List, Poetics 69, 337
Lloyd, Emily 163, 210, 286, 304, 569, 627
Loden, Rachel 560
Luoma, Bill 531, 544, 545
Luoma/Vanstar, Bill 202, 293
Malcolm, Bruce 223
Malone, Tom 240
Marsh, William 318, 354, 379, 380, 509, 612
McVay, Gwyn 74, 125, 247, 496, 535, 647
Miller, Andrew John 236
Mittenthal, Robert 423
Moriarty, Laura 688
Muratori, Fred 192
Nagahata, Akitoshi 431, 600
Nathanson, Tenney 98, 494
Naylor, Paul 85, 203, 385
Nicholls, Peter 105
Nielsen, Aldon L. 2, 13, 16, 59, 60, 61, 99, 100, 120, 166, 167, 238, 276, 279, 290, 314, 339, 340, 341, 390, 417, 418, 419, 458, 645, 654, 655, 661, 676, 684
Norris, Ken 528
Orange, Thomas M. 402, 493
Pereira, Sam 405
Perloff, Marjorie 168, 239, 255, 434
Peters, Carl Lynden 416
Phillips, Lisa Amber 468
Pollet, Sylvester 678
Price, Larry 296, 350
Pritchett,Pat 39, 151, 264, 554, 649, 668
Prone, T-Bone 610, 693
Quartermain, Peter 1, 169, 170, 389, 453
Reiner, Christopher 129
Roberts, Mark 46, 177
Roberts, Michelle 96, 219, 220, 222, 228, 230
Roitman, Judy 73, 140, 155, 260, 272, 313, 322, 445, 473, 573, 574, 614
Rothenberg, Jerry 113, 214, 443
Roy, Megana Camille 589
Ruggles, Trace S. 457
Saldana, Tristan D. 15, 388, 538, 553, 690
Salmon, Daniel 35, 172, 241, 484, 537
Sam 427
Samuels, Lisa 157, 439
Schmid, Julie Marie 689
Schuchat 56, 242, 378, 398, 399, 412
Schultz, Susan 662
Shoemaker, Steven Howard 48, 49, 50, 91, 92, 108, 112, 131
Shreiber, Maerra Yaffa 587
Silliman, Ron 36, 54, 63, 118, 292, 400, 437, 562
Smith, Charles 65, 321, 324, 483
Smith, Rod 58, 132, 134, 197, 232, 237, 256, 258, 262, 311, 316, 320, 355, 359, 386, 387, 442, 446, 517, 568
Sondheim, Alan 392, 466
Stein, Julia 597
Taciuch, Dean 124, 141, 227, 302, 303
Tangney, Shaunanne 189, 254
Taylor, Brigham 526
Tietz, Ward 11, 89, 356
Tuma, Keith 14, 44, 75, 77
Varnes, Kathrine 209, 570
Wallace, Mark 45, 70, 71, 271, 307, 448, 476, 479, 567, 611
Walsh, William F. 406
Ward, Diane Marie 287
Welford, Gabrielle 97, 115, 116, 147, 148, 156, 199, 200, 208, 218, 266, 336, 362, 363, 420, 459, 486, 487, 577, 580, 616, 629, 639, 643, 644, 651
Whipple, Christopher K. 101, 436
Wilson, Ian 694
Wilson, Robert J 102, 123, 283, 578
Wystan 158, 159, 226, 233, 234
Zitt, Joseph 153, 281, 429, 555

NAMES MENTIONED

Abel, David 469, 475, 485
Abrams, Jen 311, 320, 322
Acker, Kathy 171, 394
Adamo, Ralph 287
Adorno, Theodor 45
Ahearn, Joe 632
Aitken, Adam 46
Alice, Mary 609
Allison, Dorothy 287
Altieri, Charles 508
Americans, Asian 276, 295, 298, 408, 644
Amram, David 287
Anderson, Beth 32, 37
Anderson, Erik 32
Andre, Michael 197
Andrews, Bruce 7, 118, 211, 213, 423, 508
Antin, David 49, 50
Apollinaire, Guillaume 34
Armand, Louis 49, 50
Armantrout, Rae 474
Arnold, Bob 327, 346, 404
Ashbery, John 197, 307, 431, 513, 588, 608
Atkins, Russell 2, 676
Atkins, Tim 2, 676
Auster, Paul 39
Austin, Geer 497
Austin, Mary 497
Avison, Margaret 369
Baker, Lori 478, 596
Baker, Mark 554, 557
Baker, Peter 197, 243
Baldwin, Mary 643
Baptiste, David 206

Baraka, Amiri 56, 187, 239, 287
Barker, Andrew 554, 557
Barnes, Diane 431, 587, 642
Barnett, Anthony 62
Barthes, Roland 327, 433, 562
Basinski, Michael 401
Baudelaire, Charles 270, 278
Baudrillard, Jean 118
Beckett, Tom 45, 58
Beckman, Joshua 88
Bellamy, Dodie 3, 27, 121, 145, 174, 201, 225, 234, 277, 345, 371, 380, 541
Belle, Cecelia 546
Benjamin, Walter 56, 397, 415
Bergvall, Caroline 1, 5, 21, 29
Berkeley, Michael 26, 36, 39, 118, 497
Berkson, Bill 305, 343
Berman, Tosh 343
Bernard, Kenneth 298
Bernstein, Emma 327, 354, 395, 399, 615, 668
Berrigan, Anselm 26, 39
Berrigan, Edmund 521
Berrigan, Ted 649
Berryman, John 396
Bishop, Elizabeth 75, 76
Blackburn, Paul 43, 309
Blackman, Nicole 287
Blake, William 102
Blanchot, Maurice 423
Blaser, Robin 437, 465, 467, 468, 471, 472, 491
Blau, Rachel 3, 27, 169, 197, 315, 345, 380, 543
Bloom, Harold 113, 123
Bly, Robert 431
Borges, Millicent 242, 554, 557
Boughn, Mike 493
Bourdieu, Pierre 508
BpNichol 471, 491
Brainard, Joe 305, 309
Braxton, Anthony 654
Brazil, David 282
Bringhurst, Robert 692
Brodey, Jim 26, 39, 658
Brodsky, Joseph 431
Brodsky, Nicole 242
Bromige, David 290, 348, 390, 533
Brooks, Gwendolyn 13, 100, 276
Brossard, Nicole 197, 466, 491
Broughton, James 653
Brown, Ann 197
Brownstein, Michael 305
Bryant, Dana 117, 546
Buckley, Jeff 636
Bukowski, Charles 480, 513
Bunting, Basil 170, 321
Burke, Carolyn 345, 517, 585, 587
Burke, Edmund 380
Burke, Kenneth 375, 382
Burroughs, William S. 45, 287, 474, 588
Butler, Judith 476
Byrd, Don 342
Byrum, John 63
Caddel, Richard 5, 291
Cage, John 45, 70, 124, 134, 153, 429, 609
Campbell, Jeremy 30, 35, 62
Carlos, William 644, 689, 691
Carson, Anne 573
Casey, Sean 287
Cather, Willa 352, 353
Celan, Paul 242, 430, 501, 514, 521, 522, 597, 693
Ceravolo, Joseph 39, 305
Cha, Theresa Hak Kyung 247
Chapman, Lee 272, 321, 552
Chaucer, Geoffrey 280
Cherry, Don 80, 92
Child, Abigail 26, 39, 517
Chomsky, Noam 387, 398, 517
Cigale, Alex 88
Claire, Barbara 29, 85
Clampitt, Amy 543
Clark, Emilie 26, 39, 56
Clausen, Andy 588
Clinton, Bill 643, 644
Coalition, Christian 228
Cobain, Kurt 591
Cobbing, Bob 21
Colby, Todd 287
Coleridge, Samuel Taylor 394
Collins, Martha 21, 30
Collom, Jack 668
Columbus, Christopher 521
Conner, Bruce 324, 343
Conrad, Tony 35
Cook, Albert 197
Cook, James 35
Coolidge, Clark 197, 475, 508
Corman, Roger 588
Corso, Gregory 588
Crane, Lee 684
Crane, Margaret 343
Crawford, Robert 644
Creeley, Bob 170
Creeley, Robert 114, 140, 151, 170, 197, 211, 213, 287, 305, 327, 404, 508, 543, 588, 653
Cunningham, John 644
Curtis, Dana 546
Dalachinsky, Steve 287
Daniels, Chris 521
Davenport, Steve 401
Davies, Alan 78, 79, 83
Davies, Kevin 22, 395, 636

Davis, Martin 13, 85, 324, 541
Dawson, Nancy 482
Debrot, Jacques 521
Deguy, Michel 137
Deleuze, Gilles 118
Dennis, Carl 287
Derksen, Jeff 508, 545
Derrida, Jacques 39, 118, 137, 222, 243, 327, 359, 558, 592, 610, 646, 693
Dewdney, Christopher 685, 692
Dickens, Charles 171
Dickinson, Mark 296, 297, 319, 642
Donne, John 404
Doris, Stacy 326
Doud, Patrick 85
Doyle, Kirby 32
Duncan, Robert 45, 321, 324, 480, 503, 513, 588, 606
Durand, Marcella 22, 636
Eigner, Larry 73, 140, 144, 151, 155, 260, 272, 313, 322, 438, 445, 473, 573, 574, 614
Elena, Maria 295, 350
Eliot, Joe 75, 76, 131, 327, 346, 352, 353, 561, 684
Elliot, Joe 636
Elliott, George 22, 287
Ellis, Stephen 202, 321
Ellroy, James 35
Emerson, Claudia 171, 350, 644
Empson, William 327
England, Amy 30, 62, 266
Enslin, Ted 14, 49, 50, 85, 211, 213, 344
Eshleman, Clayton 92, 113, 123, 309
Espada, Martin 152, 404
Evers, Larry 86, 172
Fagin, Larry 305
Federman, Ray 211, 213
Felix, Joel 62
Felver, Chris 287
Ferlinghetti, Lawrence 287
Fielding, Kent 287, 482
Finlay, Ian Hamilton 1
Fitterman, Rob 22
Fodaski, Elizabeth 62
Forche, Carolyn 197
Foucault, Michel 212, 236
France, Peter 4, 21, 115, 282
Frances, Mary 1, 21, 345, 380
Franco, James 34, 308
Fraser, Ian 30
Fraser, Kathleen 345, 380
Fraser, Simon 495
Friedlander, Ben 2, 36, 54, 55, 57, 198, 238, 321
Friedman, David M. 56
Frost, Corey 239, 404
Frost, Robert 239
Fullman, Ellen 117
Gallup, Dick 305
Gander, Forrest 85
Gardner, Drew 22
Gartung, Karl 565
Gevirtz, Susan 345, 380
Gilbert, Jack 207
Gilbert, Susan 118
Ginsberg, Allen 13, 31, 43, 588
Gizzi, Peter 197
Glück, Robert 395
Godfrey, John 305
Golding, Alan 26, 39, 314, 337
Goldstein, Mark 64
Gould, Glenn 139, 297, 596
Graham, Jorie 612, 614
Graham, Lea 67, 287, 523, 524, 538, 644
Greenwald, Ted 305
Gregory, Dick 78, 79, 83
Grenier, Bob 504
Grenier, Robert 482, 504
Griffin, Tim 22
Griffiths, Bill 291
Grossman, Pam 49, 50
Grumman, Bob 596
Guertin, Carolyn 491
Guest, Barbara 211, 213
Gunn, Thom 617
Hall, Donald 621
Hamill, Sam 468, 472
Hardin, Rob 171, 173, 229, 231, 327, 329, 393, 394, 395, 407, 433, 435, 436, 452, 461, 462, 474, 475, 561, 569, 577, 584, 591, 611, 616, 638, 641
Hardy, Thomas 408
Harris, Kaplan 26, 39, 85, 287, 305, 499
Harryman, Carla 463, 529
Harvey, James 664
Hawkins, Jeremy 500
Hayden, Robert 75, 76, 100, 182, 239, 341
Hayden, Tom 13, 75, 76, 100, 164, 168, 187, 212, 238, 239, 326, 337, 341
Hayes, Jared 400
Hayes, Jonathan 521
Heaney, Seamus 653
Heath, Jennifer 39, 100
Hefner, Hugh 62
Heidegger, Martin 588
Hejinian, Lyn 39, 152, 192, 197, 211, 213, 309, 321
Helms, Jesse 640
Heman, Bob 521
Henri, Charles 34, 49, 50
Herbert, George 391
Herman, Rachel 513, 608
Herms, George 343
Heron, Patrick 21

Hicks, Sue 287
Higgins, Dick 418, 658
Hill, Lindsay 668
Hogue, Cynthia 287
Hollo, Anselm 421, 422, 424, 425, 460, 475
Holmes, Michael 588
Hoover, Edgar 321
Horowitz, David 21
Howard, Richard 118
Howe, Susan 211, 213, 318, 345, 380
Hughes, Langston 2, 75, 76, 239, 352, 353
Hughes, Peter 13, 75, 76, 100, 187, 276, 408, 591, 606
Hughes, Ted 591, 617
Huk, Romana 1
Hunter, Robert 546
Indiana, Robert 108
Irby, Ken 39, 49, 50, 246, 321, 323, 342, 344, 498
Ireland, Lauren 400, 406
Israel, David 282
Jackson, Jesse 120, 309
Jameson, Fred 118, 327, 395, 567
Januzzi, Marisa 438
Jillway, Jill 69
Johns, Jasper 609
Johnson, Kent 552, 615
Johnson, Robert 36, 65, 287, 476, 615
Johnson, Ron 321
Jonas, Stephen 2
Jonas, Steve 2
Jones, Brian 56, 187, 287
Jones, David 101
Jordan, June 12, 15, 19, 22, 259, 287, 306, 338, 350, 352, 356, 370, 388, 413, 414, 416, 421, 442, 447, 449, 456, 459, 460
Joyce, Trevor 144, 147, 170, 171, 400, 412, 543, 664
Kalleberg, Garrett 22
Katz, Alex 517
Kaufman, Bob 2, 75, 76, 83, 174, 201, 280
Kaufman, Erica 75, 76, 174, 201, 276, 408
Keats, John 170, 242, 397, 635
Kellog, David 236
Kelly, Patrick 49, 50, 287
Kennedy, David 524
Kenner, Hugh 35
Keppler, Joseph 546
Kerouac, Jack 287, 588
Kerry, John 287
King, Stephen 26, 39
Kinnell, Galway 12, 524
Kinsella, Thomas 212, 274
Klein, Lucas 306
Kocik, Robert 33
Kramer, Wendy 401
Kristeva, Julia 222, 395, 397
Kyger, Joanne 309
Lacan, Jacques 222, 433
Lacy, Steve 653
Lang, Peter 197, 243, 294
Laureate, Poets 358
Laurence, Paul 314, 337
Leggott, Michelle 5, 67
Leigh, Mike 30
Leonard, Tom 2, 56, 187, 287
Levertov, Denise 578
Levinas, Emmanuel 621
Lightman, Ira 26, 39
London, Frank 1, 30, 298, 408, 508, 546, 559, 591, 617, 665, 666, 668, 670, 677
London, Jack 636
Loney, Alan 67
Lorde, Audre 13, 187
Mac Low, Jackson 211, 213
Lowell, Amy 35, 36, 75, 76, 352, 591, 655
Lowell, Robert 598
Lunberry, Clark 583
Lundquist, Sara 148
Macdonald, Helen 1
Mackey, Nathaniel 85, 478, 503, 668
Malcolm, Janet 62, 223
Mallarmé, Stéphane 394
Mandel, Tom 478, 501
Mandelstam, Osip 242, 257
Marie, Anne 287
Markotic, Nicole 508
Martin, Camille 62, 287
Martinez, Michael 644
Marvin, Lee 93
Mason, Janet 117, 546
Mathews, Elizabeth 197
Mathews, Harry 197, 517
Matthews, Harry 39
Maxwell, Andrew 117, 546
Mayer, Bernadette 197, 305
McCaffery, Steve 211, 213, 508
Melville, Nicky 168, 182, 435
Menendez, Didi 289
Meredith, William 389, 401
Merrill, James 305, 653
Merwin, W. S. 578
Mesmer, Sharon 588
Messerli, Doug 321
Miller, Jane 612
Miller, Paul D. 236, 273, 287
Milne, Drew 298
Milton, John 280, 352, 353
Minton, Jonathan 287
Miriam, Erica 53
Mitchell, Joan 21, 148
Monk, Geraldine 5, 21, 29
Monroe, Harriet 26, 39
Moore, Allison 75, 76, 640

Moore, Frank 640
Moore, Marianne 588
Morgan, Robin 30
Moritz, John 85, 321
Morrison, Bill 588
Morse, Jesse 596
Morton, Kathryn A. 609
Moxley, Jennifer 32
Mulford, Wendy 1, 5, 29
Mullen, Harryette 494, 495, 508
Murphy, Sheila 518
Myles, Eileen 588
Napora, Joe 85
Nauman, Bruce 226
Neruda, Pablo 308
Newton, Keith 108
Nichols, Travis 4
Nicole, Anna 197
Niedecker, Lorine 344, 438
Nielsen, Aldon L. 2, 13, 16, 59, 60, 61, 99, 100, 120, 166, 167, 168, 182, 238, 276, 279, 290, 314, 337, 339, 340, 341, 390, 417, 418, 419, 448, 458, 645, 649, 654, 655, 661, 676, 684
Noble, Joseph 521
Norman, Peter 30
Northcutt, William 26, 39
Norton, John 100, 517
Notley, Alice 39, 56, 305, 438
Nowak, Mark 687
Nufer, Doug 546
O'Hara, Frank 31
O'Sullivan, Maggie 1, 5, 21, 29
Obenzinger, Hilton 305
Oliver, Douglas 40
Oliver, John 35
Olsen, Lance 395
Olson, John 521, 546
Olson, Kirby 31, 36, 49, 50, 258, 296, 302, 303, 350, 351, 508, 546
Ondaatje, Michael 465, 467, 471, 491
Oppen, George 36, 309, 316, 319, 326, 578
Orange, Thomas M. 402, 493
Orwell, George 287, 298, 308
Osman, Jena 94, 98, 403
Ostriker, Alicia 3, 27
Owen, Maureen 305
Pacific, Asian 123, 172, 214, 283, 497
Paige, Abby 21
Palmer, Michael 197, 287, 395
Paterson, Don 560
Patterson, Ian 85
Patton, Julie 83
Peirce, Kathleen 139, 243
Perchik, Simon 43, 61, 146, 154, 167
Perelman, Bob 197, 517
Persky, Stan 437
Pessoa, Fernando 521
Peterson, Katie 596
Phillips, Beth 90, 93, 468, 472, 474
Phillips, Patrick 33
Pinkwater, Daniel 284, 285, 317, 331, 367, 368, 369, 370, 372, 413
Piombino, Nick 695
Plath, Sylvia 242, 541, 559, 561, 570, 591, 598, 607, 616, 621, 622, 633
Portugal, Anne 282
Pound, Ezra 2, 35, 44, 75, 76, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 119, 122, 125, 126, 127, 131, 243, 256, 276, 308, 321, 327, 346, 397, 399, 408, 480, 508, 513, 561, 588, 675
Powell, Ren 287
Prevallet, Kristen 307
Di Prima, Diane 287
Prince, Richard 26, 39
Pritchett, Patrick 39, 151, 264, 554, 557, 649, 668
Quixote, Don 546
Rakosi, Carl 549, 550, 633, 634
Ramsdell, Heather 22
Randall, Karen 238, 287, 546
Raphael, Dan 521
Rasula, Jed 544
Rattray, David 475
Raven, Francis 394
Raworth, Tom 34
Reagan, Nancy 308
Reese, Marshall 287
Reeves, Jennifer 163, 287
Rehm, Pam 307
Retallack, Joan 27, 197, 320
Rexroth, Kenneth 398
Reynolds, Rebecca 56
Reznikoff, Charles 309
Rice, Doug 474
Ridge, Cedar 123, 214, 283, 578
Riding, Laura 62
Riley, Denise 1, 21, 29
Rilke, Rainer Maria 242
Rimbaud, Dee 242, 338, 588
Rivera, Alex 343
Robbins, Bruce 64
Roberts, Gary 96, 219, 228, 230
Robertson, Lisa 1, 117, 401
Robinson, Elizabeth 16, 32, 37, 287, 358, 400, 521
Robinson, Kit 305
Rodefer, Stephen 197, 305
Rosenberg, Jim 101
Rosenfield, Kim 22
Rosenthal, Chuck 653
Ross, Andrew 118, 562
Rotenberg, Tina 521
Rothenberg, Jerome 100, 113, 123, 309, 443, 588

Rothschild, Doug 22
Saldana, Tristan D. 15, 388, 538, 553, 690, 693, 694
Sanders, Jay 287
Sappho 296, 297
Sartre, Paul 2
Scalapino, Leslie 41, 152, 343
Schjeldahl, Peter 305
Schuyler, James 309
Schwerner, Armand 11, 49, 50
Scroggins, Mark 2, 131, 187
Selby, Spencer 85
Sexton, Anne 541, 544, 561, 570, 585, 591, 607
Shakespeare, William 170, 280, 316, 319, 351, 501, 635, 682
Shaviro, Steve 546
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 170, 242, 327, 346
Shurin, Aaron 541
Silverman, Oren 287
Simmons, Diane 287
Simon, Greg 61, 63, 154, 223, 305
Simpson, Louis 13, 100, 172, 489
Sinclair, John 287
Smith, Harry 30, 287, 343, 350, 508, 546, 588, 643, 691
Smith, Jack 622
Smith, Marc 689
Smith, Patricia 689, 691
Snyder, Gary 434, 443, 588
Snyder, Rick 431
Sokal, Alan 64, 568
Solnit, Rebecca 343
Sorrentino, Christopher 118
Spahr, Juliana 22, 94, 98, 307, 403
Sparrow, John 480, 513, 596
Spender, Stephen 298
Spicer, Jack 26, 39, 564
Spicer, John 26, 39, 102, 423, 501, 562, 568, 578, 615
Stafford, William 524
Stanford, Frank 292
Stanley, George 437
Stein, Gertrude 45, 112, 125, 126, 131, 163, 197, 210, 286, 304, 420, 431, 552
Stevens, Wallace 45, 146, 259, 404, 511
Stevenson, Matt 30
Stewart, Jon 1, 30, 692
Strand, Mark 239
Strang, Brian 1
Stroffolino, Chris 615
Studies, Asian 63
Taggart, John 197, 309
Tarlo, Harriet 1
Tarn, Nathaniel 668
Templeton, Fiona 21, 29, 211, 213
Texas, Irving 96, 219, 228, 230, 281, 292, 340, 429, 517, 555
Thesen, Sharon 1, 465, 467, 468, 471
Thilleman, Tod 521
Thomas, Dylan 16, 35, 101, 168, 170, 182, 204, 206, 238, 255, 292, 317, 340, 398, 412, 561, 617, 682, 684
Thompson, George 287
Thomson, Stephen 1
Towle, Tony 305
Trevor, Jesse 646
Tribune, Chicago 298
Tucker, Aaron 218
Turner, Victor 287
Tyler, Richard 588
Tysh, Chris 345, 380
Tyson, Ian 90, 93
Union, Poets 46
Valentine, Jean 287
Valery, Paul 151
Vassilakis, Nico 117, 546
Vaughan, Sarah 1
Veitch, Tom 305
Vendler, Helen 311, 312, 316, 319, 352
Vermont, Charlie 197, 305
Veronica, Angela 1, 533
Wagner, Catherine 58
Waldman, Anne 305
Waldrop, Keith 32, 37, 475
Waldrop, Rosemary 543
Waldrop, Rosmarie 197
Walker, Laura 523, 524
Wallace, Nicole 18, 24, 259, 343
Walsh, Catherine 1, 5, 21, 29, 291, 406, 641
Warsh, Lewis 22, 305
Washington, George 22, 24, 179, 197, 386, 387, 408, 479, 641
Waters, John 506
Watten, Barrett 31, 197, 338, 463, 508, 529, 558, 695
Webster, Noah 170
Weinberger, Eliot 321
Weinstein, Eric 64
Welch, Lew 26, 39
Wellman, Donald 100
Welsh, Lawrence 1
Whalen, Philip 588
Wharton, Samuel 18, 541
Whitehead, Ron 287
Whiting, John 298
Whitman, Walt 140, 151, 321, 352, 419, 642
Wieners, John 498, 508
Wilbur, Richard 75, 76
Williams, Paul O. 16, 114, 140, 151, 170, 287, 355, 404, 513, 584, 588, 608, 644
Williams, William Carlos 588
Williamson, Lindz 336
Willis, Elizabeth 39
Wilson, Karen 85, 102, 123, 283, 287, 578

Wilson, Rob 102, 113, 123, 214, 283, 578
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 256, 257, 262, 295, 302, 303, 311, 312, 313, 320, 350, 356, 359, 445
Wolsak, Melissa 1
Woolf, Virginia 397, 505, 534
Wright, C. D. 197
Wyatt, Thomas 390
Young, Karl 118, 565
Zelevansky, Paul 11
Zukofsky, Louis 131, 197, 243, 321, 508, 653
Zurbrugg, Nicholas 93

CONCEPTS

Activism and protest 26, 39, 137, 210, 217, 279, 329, 408, 558, 643 Aesthetics 13, 43, 76, 88, 100, 148, 178, 184, 197, 251, 257, 276, 302, 448, 505, 513, 566, 575, 578, 579, 580, 581, 583, 591, 594, 604, 608
Affect 43
Afghanistan 39
African American poetry 76, 100, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 119, 122, 125, 126, 127, 131, 164, 168, 182, 187, 188, 190, 196, 238, 239, 408, 417
Anthologies 4, 13, 21, 29, 49, 50, 75, 76, 99, 100, 102, 112, 125, 126, 131, 169, 172, 178, 197, 198, 218, 243, 257, 276, 311, 312, 321, 400, 408, 517, 546, 547, 588, 604, 607, 674
Anti-Semitism 126, 131, 289, 298
Appropriation 58, 100, 108, 123, 139, 170, 171, 223, 336, 404, 511, 538, 560, 566, 575, 589, 619, 621, 627, 645, 649
Archives and libraries 2, 62, 69, 71, 167, 192, 197, 218, 221, 240, 244, 282, 300, 309, 340, 402, 478, 497, 508, 523, 538, 561, 600, 635, 646
Asian American poetry 2, 568
Autobiography 34, 173, 197, 461, 536, 543, 591
Avant-garde 58, 242, 312, 511, 541, 567
Beat generation 588
Biography 6, 35, 108, 146, 185, 269, 298, 412, 508, 536, 573, 585, 587, 615, 662
Book announcements 18, 20, 22, 24, 30, 46, 122, 129, 161, 260, 282, 291, 372, 401, 478, 503, 547, 636
Bookstores 30, 47, 62, 115, 207, 283, 438, 444, 469, 472, 473, 475, 478, 482, 485, 488, 642, 645, 649, 672, 673, 679, 681
Calls for submissions 486, 687
Capitalism 62, 123, 567, 584, 682
Censorship 474, 551, 562, 565
Cities 21, 34, 49, 50, 75, 76, 178, 287, 292, 689, 691
Class 62, 358, 622
Close reading 2, 58, 100, 187, 408, 417, 448, 568, 695
Collage and montage 100, 197, 341, 343, 503
Conferences and festivals 2, 3, 6, 13, 26, 27, 31, 36, 39, 66, 75, 76, 120, 145, 162, 188, 190, 196, 211, 213, 239, 266, 267, 276, 279, 280, 284, 287, 295, 358, 400, 408, 412, 505, 534, 559, 593, 633, 682, 684, 687
Confessional poetry 591, 598
Copyright and permissions 66, 77, 82, 87, 99, 100, 161, 165, 224, 245, 280, 335, 523, 615, 643, 682
Craft 108, 197, 207, 229, 346, 382, 394, 497, 561, 591
Creative writing pedagogy 149, 164, 170, 178, 218, 245, 348, 480, 513
Dada 267
Deconstruction 3, 27, 150, 197, 243, 327, 623, 690, 693, 694, 695
Difficulty 69, 137, 174, 201, 253, 405, 406, 408, 411, 475, 561, 571, 589, 597
Disability 47, 525, 604, 607
Dreams 76, 127, 261, 287, 538, 554, 557, 623, 635, 644
Ecology and ecopoetics 260, 268, 269, 322, 499, 505
Editing 32, 49, 50, 85, 94, 98, 113, 123, 266, 474, 540, 556, 604, 607
Ekphrasis 148
Electronic poetry and hypertext 45, 57, 69, 70, 71, 76, 77, 160, 245, 271, 282, 292, 307, 430, 448, 476, 479, 514, 521, 522, 555, 567, 611
Elegy 321
Empire and imperialism 23, 25, 76, 115, 123, 298, 308
Epic 257
Epistemology 33
Erasure 174, 201
Ethics 77, 82, 96, 164, 197, 220, 243, 552, 584, 615
Experimental poetry 93, 464, 476, 489, 491, 608
Fascism 111, 308, 424, 559, 561, 591
Feminism 3, 6, 10, 27, 47, 66, 184, 266, 343, 345, 380, 382, 604, 607, 643, 674, 682
Film 18, 22, 26, 30, 39, 266, 298, 300, 306, 308, 324, 336, 338, 482, 558, 582, 635, 640, 684
Fluxus 118
Formalism 327, 508
Free speech 36, 644
Futurism 338
Gender 6, 94, 98, 178, 187, 239, 329, 476, 561, 575, 643, 682
Globalization 682

Grants and funding 6, 118, 197, 243, 307, 358, 447, 464, 468, 472, 474, 481, 482, 489, 491, 492, 499, 505, 513, 526, 540, 556, 608, 630
Haiku 552, 555, 568, 600, 685
Hermeneutics 350
Humour and satire 30, 59, 173, 203, 251, 289, 329, 334, 431, 550, 591, 655, 659
Identity politics 2, 75, 76, 100, 476, 494
Ideology 2, 13, 43, 102, 123, 197, 242, 243, 312, 447, 482, 584, 594, 604
Improvisation 80, 83, 92
Indigenous and Native poetics 73, 86, 123, 172, 187, 289, 431, 644
Interviews 30, 62, 69, 85, 90, 93, 124, 156, 187, 194, 197, 326, 342, 508, 588, 634
Israel and Palestine 97, 115, 282
Jewish poetics 39, 112, 125, 126, 131
Language poetry 96, 197, 243, 307, 321, 395, 435, 463, 517, 529, 690, 693, 694, 695
Latino and Latin American poetry 2, 13, 66, 178, 517
Letters and correspondence 34, 81, 408, 674
List moderation 115, 171, 186, 240, 298, 315, 358, 461, 621
Little magazines 13, 30, 56, 67, 69, 71, 85, 88, 90, 93, 94, 98, 115, 118, 129, 137, 161, 179, 187, 224, 238, 242, 254, 268, 287, 315, 317, 321, 326, 339, 358, 400, 447, 448, 474, 482, 502, 508, 513, 521, 528, 564, 578, 583, 588, 604, 607, 608, 617, 640
Lyric poetry 123, 173, 273, 591
Marxism 164, 251, 448
Materiality of the text 379, 396
Memory 56, 140, 151, 350, 372, 411, 417, 453, 470, 484, 501, 516, 519, 520, 542, 551, 554, 557, 598, 643
MFA programs 197, 358, 541
Modernism 3, 27, 96, 109, 112, 119, 122, 123, 125, 126, 131, 164, 184, 197, 242, 243, 327, 408, 417, 567, 575, 579, 581, 584, 679, 684
Mourning and loss 2, 31, 36, 38, 57, 63, 69, 129, 154, 160, 161, 162, 165, 211, 213, 221, 224, 238, 244, 245, 251, 282, 433, 443, 480, 501, 513, 520
Multiculturalism 526, 561, 578
Music and poetry 13, 34, 45, 49, 50, 58, 75, 76, 80, 90, 92, 93, 115, 117, 124, 134, 137, 150, 157, 173, 199, 236, 287, 321, 323, 352, 353, 364, 367, 394, 400, 457, 487, 526, 575, 581, 591, 596, 608, 636, 646, 654, 658, 662, 666, 668, 670
Nationalism 62, 298, 400
Nature 30, 36, 70, 134, 146, 172, 197, 259, 273, 276, 318, 322, 358, 428, 429, 517, 547, 578, 599, 630, 643
Negativity and refusal 207, 217, 644
New York School 198
Obituary and memorial 431, 653
Objectivism 107, 112, 125, 126, 131, 169, 243, 478
Ontology 251, 508
Oulipo 197
Performance and the poetry reading 31, 118, 150, 168, 182, 207, 229, 461, 464, 479, 603, 640, 665, 666, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 676, 677, 683, 689, 691
Phenomenology 260
Philosophy 2, 34, 137, 146, 171, 197, 243, 322, 354, 378, 395, 397, 400, 432, 448, 486, 592, 610
Place and region 447
Poetics 2, 22, 27, 33, 35, 39, 47, 62, 69, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 87, 92, 100, 102, 109, 111, 121, 123, 126, 128, 129, 131, 142, 145, 151, 153, 164, 168, 169, 182, 186, 188, 190, 191, 196, 197, 201, 203, 212, 213, 226, 236, 240, 241, 242, 243, 252, 253, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 262, 264, 268, 269, 271, 276, 282, 290, 295, 296, 297, 303, 307, 311, 312, 313, 316, 319, 320, 322, 327, 329, 337, 346, 350, 354, 377, 395, 408, 438, 449, 461, 462, 467, 474, 478, 501, 502, 503, 517, 552, 554, 557, 587, 609, 622, 628, 632, 648, 649, 652, 655, 668, 670, 680, 681, 682, 686, 687, 690, 691, 693, 694, 695
Poets Against the War 468, 472
Politics and poetry 558
Post-structuralism 501
Postmodernism 3, 27, 567, 584
Print vs. digital 13, 22, 29, 43, 61, 62, 122, 146, 154, 164, 167, 169, 207, 238, 321, 323, 350, 364, 367, 487, 497, 502, 503, 527, 543, 546, 554, 557, 612, 653, 689, 691
Prizes and awards 31, 146, 238, 261, 314, 358, 391, 419, 464, 489, 491, 523, 524, 538, 640, 642
Prose poem 636, 663
Prosody and meter 173, 327, 338, 346, 395, 435, 606
Psychoanalysis 99, 137, 174, 201, 222
Queer poetics 10, 47, 149, 164, 180, 266, 476, 559, 561, 682
Race and poetry 2, 3, 13, 21, 27, 28, 31, 62, 75, 76, 99, 100, 108, 109, 110, 111, 115, 121, 133, 136, 142, 145, 158, 163, 166, 172, 174, 178, 183, 201, 210, 231, 239, 251, 253, 266, 274, 275, 279, 286, 289, 329, 334, 337, 408, 417, 543
Reading announcements 22, 26, 39, 382
Religion and the sacred 45, 91, 173, 197, 228, 242, 243, 256, 262, 295, 298, 302, 313, 320, 375, 588

Representation 66, 75, 76, 148, 163, 174, 183, 201, 231, 276, 408, 417, 432, 508, 690, 693, 694, 695
Reviewing and criticism 2, 13, 26, 30, 36, 39, 45, 62, 69, 75, 76, 89, 90, 93, 94, 98, 99, 100, 108, 113, 118, 121, 123, 129, 133, 136, 137, 142, 145, 146, 155, 161, 167, 168, 178, 182, 187, 212, 217, 220, 238, 239, 266, 268, 270, 271, 273, 278, 279, 280, 292, 294, 298, 307, 311, 312, 314, 315, 318, 321, 323, 326, 327, 335, 337, 340, 342, 346, 348, 354, 358, 378, 379, 385, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 404, 408, 432, 433, 435, 443, 447, 448, 486, 513, 539, 540, 547, 556, 561, 584, 588, 591, 608, 615, 621, 646, 653, 666, 668, 670, 684, 690, 693, 694, 695
Revision 196, 207, 229, 439, 441, 615
Science 79, 359, 542, 551, 554, 557, 632
Semiotics 354, 395, 433, 545, 584
Serial poem 13, 49, 50, 85, 292, 323, 508
Small press publishing 24, 26, 32, 37, 39, 45, 69, 146, 246, 309, 321, 343, 468, 472, 474, 480, 481, 482, 492, 513, 583, 585, 636, 640, 642, 662, 689, 691
Software and code 464, 525
Sonnet 139, 291, 501, 511
Structuralism 327, 415, 501
Subjectivity 2, 21, 45, 48, 69, 110, 171, 183, 197, 267, 279, 329, 340, 395, 447, 461, 508, 523, 524, 566, 623, 682
Sublime 123, 283, 685
Surrealism 197, 588, 658
The academy 2, 6, 29, 31, 46, 47, 48, 66, 69, 73, 75, 76, 85, 86, 96, 97, 106, 115, 121, 127, 133, 140, 145, 148, 151, 155, 168, 172, 174, 177, 181, 182, 184, 188, 190, 192, 196, 201, 207, 212, 219, 228, 229, 230, 236, 240, 251, 253, 260, 269, 272, 274, 280, 287, 292, 300, 309, 313, 315, 322, 341, 348, 351, 352, 358, 383, 385, 391, 398, 400, 412, 420, 431, 433, 443, 445, 447, 448, 462, 473, 480, 486, 495, 513, 523, 556, 558, 573, 574, 588, 604, 607, 608, 614, 617, 635, 642, 663, 682, 692, 694
The body 318, 322, 439, 457
The canon 26, 39, 67, 81, 91, 164, 174, 178, 201, 240, 279
The Gulf War 174, 201, 217, 251, 277, 281, 536, 558
The Holocaust 559, 575, 591, 597, 598, 638, 650, 652
The internet 115, 329, 336, 436, 470, 520, 682
The line 36, 69, 163, 282
The listserv 1, 13, 22, 31, 34, 36, 44, 58, 68, 69, 77, 87, 99, 100, 117, 118, 120, 130, 144, 145, 153, 158, 161, 163, 164, 165, 168, 169, 172, 177, 182, 183, 186, 188, 190, 196, 201, 205, 216, 220, 224, 226, 240, 241, 253, 255, 267, 280, 290, 291, 292, 298, 336, 337, 358, 385, 389, 391, 419, 423, 494, 508, 515, 527, 547, 566, 569, 630, 639, 646, 654, 655
The New Sentence 44, 96, 219, 568
Theatre 18, 101, 137, 170, 173, 287, 312, 316, 319, 343, 436, 463, 589
Translation 8, 17, 34, 43, 49, 50, 51, 53, 60, 80, 84, 92, 95, 137, 150, 155, 197, 243, 298, 356, 359, 400, 412, 423, 431, 433, 434, 438, 439, 441, 466, 499, 517, 615, 645, 649, 654
Vietnam 398
Visual and concrete poetry 471
Visual art 22, 26, 30, 37, 39, 62, 66, 90, 93, 146, 148, 179, 248, 261, 280, 324, 439, 441, 442, 464, 489, 521, 526, 581, 583, 608, 609, 679
Women's writing 1, 4, 10, 21, 29, 47, 48, 66, 67, 150, 218, 242, 368, 369, 373, 382

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 695 in all.

1 JUL 1996

1. Peter Quartermain — Re: british women poets
2. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Jacquee la Mousse
3. Kevin Killian — Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc
4. Michael Faherty — Re: British Women Poets
5. R I Caddel — brit.wom.po's
6. maria damon — Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc
7. Burt Kimmelman — Bruce Andrews
8. henry gould — John High email
9. Jordan Davis — O the glassy towns are
10. Kevin Killian — Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc
11. Ward Tietz — Re: Paul Zelevansky
12. Steve Carll — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
13. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Race 'round Orono II
14. Keith Tuma — Re: Zelevansky
15. Tristan D. Saldana — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
16. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: last days and time
17. Henry Gould — unconscious
18. Kevin Killian — haunted
19. David Baratier — unconscious
20. Daniel Bouchard — books, books, books
21. cris cheek — Re: British Women Poets
22. Jordan Davis — I'll iterate
23. Henry Gould — Re: unconscious geography
24. Mary Hilton — "The Haunted Baronet" by Mark Wallace (ad)
25. Jordan Davis — Re: unconscious geography
26. Kevin Killian — my stack
27. Maria Damon — Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc
28. filch — Peeing
29. Ken Edwards — British Women Poets
30. John Cayley — Engaged Issue Four - the tinned issue
31. Loss Glazier — Postmortems on Orono (Perloff)
32. Steve Evans — Re: chapbook 2 (North, Robinson, Ngai)
33. Steve Evans — Robert Kocik/Andrew Levy Reading

2 JUL 1996

34. James Brook — my stack, 2
35. Daniel Salmon — Not a stack
36. Ron Silliman — Irby's ear
37. Henry — Re: chapbook 2 (North, Robinson, Ngai)
38. Loss Glazier — Re: my stack
39. Pritchett,Pat — Re: my stack
40. Edward Foster — NEW DOUG OLIVER BOOK
41. Edward Foster — NEW LESLIE SCALAPINO BOOK
42. Edward Foster — NEW GEOFFREY O'BRIEN BOOK
43. David Baratier — orno for pyros (aside
44. Keith Tuma — Re: Irby's ear
45. Mark Wallace — Quartermain, Cage, Beckett
46. Mark Roberts — AWOL: Poetry Stand at the Australian Book Fair (forwarded)
47. maria damon — Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc
48. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: British Women Poets
49. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Enslin

50. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Enslin
51. Don Cheney — and i thought my translations were out at third base
52. maria damon — Re: perloff-watten
53. Robert Drake — Re: and i thought my translations were out at third base

3 JUL 1996

54. Ron Silliman — Ben Friedlander email address?
55. Nada Gordon — Re: Ben Friedlander email address?
56. Schuchat — Re: my stack
57. Loss Glazier — Re: Friedlander email + Note
58. Rod Smith — Re: Quartermain, Cage, Beckett, Severity
59. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: pee pee
60. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Irby Matters
61. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Perchik

4 JUL 1996

62. Louis Cabri — Re: my stack
63. Ron Silliman — More addresses
64. David Golumbia — Skoal Chaw
65. Charles Smith — Re: Ronald Johnson Broadside (ad)
66. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Re: comments on women today and oppression
67. Tony Green — Teaching women poets

5 JUL 1996

68. Joel Kuszai — e-mail address
69. Poetics List — Welcome Message
70. Mark Wallace — rod smith and john cage
71. Mark Wallace — ghost stories
72. maria damon — felicitous misprisions
73. Judy Roitman — Another ethnic group
74. Gwyn McVay — Re: felicitous misprisions
75. Keith Tuma — Orono
76. maria damon — Re: Orono
77. Keith Tuma — Re: Orono
78. William Marsh - 3809183 — Re: stochastic
79. Herb Levy — Re: stochastic
80. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Re: stochastic
81. Robert Drake — Re: Stochastics

6 JUL 1996

82. maria damon — Re: Orono
83. maria damon — Re: stochastic
84. filch — agitprop
85. Paul Naylor — The Disappeared
86. Charles Alexander — Re: Another ethnic group
87. Joe Amato — Re: Orono
88. Burt Kimmelman — New Magazine
89. Ward Tietz — A Humument
90. Herb Levy — Re: A Humument
91. Steven Howard Shoemaker — age of speleological reproduction
92. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: stochastic
93. Charles Alexander — Re: A Humument
94. Charles Alexander — journal praise
95. James Brook — jakob van hoddis?
96. Michelle Roberts — Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
97. Gabrielle Welford — Ougarit (fwd)

7 JUL 1996

98. Tenney Nathanson — Chain unchained?
99. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: here's another fine mess . . .
100. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Orono (fwd)
101. Christopher K. Whipple — poetry performance
102. Robert J Wilson — Covering Cherub
103. Robert Drake — Re: Chain unchained?
104. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Orono
105. Peter Nicholls — Re: oppen
106. Joe Amato — Re: Orono
107. Burt Kimmelman — Re: oppen
108. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Tate/Pound/African-Americans
109. maria damon — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
110. maria damon — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
111. maria damon — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
112. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
113. Jerry Rothenberg — Re: Covering Cherub
114. Tony Green — Re: poetry performance
115. Gabrielle Welford — Ougarit (suite) (english/french) (fwd)
116. Gabrielle Welford — Re: poetry performance
117. Herb Levy — Subtext Readings for July & August, solicitation for Fall readers
118. Ron Silliman — Listpersonship

8 JUL 1996

119. JOEL LEWIS — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
120. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Tate
121. Kevin Killian — Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
122. Jonathan A Levin — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
123. Robert J Wilson — Re: Covering Cherub
124. Dean Taciuch — Re: poetry performance
125. Gwyn McVay — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
126. maria damon — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
127. Henry Gould — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
128. Joe Amato — Re: Listpersonship
129. Christopher Reiner — Witz Announcement
130. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Listpersonship
131. Steven Howard Shoemaker — Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
132. Rod Smith — Re: Listpersonship
133. maria damon — Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
134. Rod Smith — Re: and john cage and car sickness
135. c.g. guertin — Re: Listpersonship
136. Joe Amato — Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
137. James Brook — Re: poetry performance
138. Christopher Filkins — Re: poetry performance
139. Henry Gould — Re: in defense of parasites
140. Judy Roitman — Re: poetry performance
141. Dean Taciuch — Re: poetry performance
142. maria damon — Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
143. Robert Drake — Re: Listpersonship
144. Elisabeth W. Joyce — in defense of parasites
145. maria damon — Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
146. David Baratier — Chapbook Contest
147. Gabrielle Welford — Re: in defense of parasites
148. Gabrielle Welford — Ekphrastic Poetry by Women (9/15/96; NEMLA 4/4-4/5) (fwd)
149. Joe Amato — Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
150. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
151. Pritchett,Pat — Re: poetry performance

152. Charles Alexander — Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
153. Joseph Zitt — Re: Listpersonship
154. David Baratier — Re: Perchik
155. Judy Roitman — Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
156. Gabrielle Welford — think of meeee!
157. Lisa Samuels — Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
158. wystan — Re: in defense of parasites
159. wystan — Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
160. Loss Glazier — Server failures
161. Loss Glazier — Private List/Public Space
162. Loss Glazier — !Orono Online!
163. Emily Lloyd — maria--/& performance
164. maria damon — Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
165. James Brook — Re: Private List/Public Space

9 JUL 1996

166. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: " . . . : . . . "
167. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Perchik
168. Marjorie Perloff — Re: List wars
169. Peter Quartermain — Re: oppen
170. Peter Quartermain — Re: poetry performance
171. Carnography — Re: paradigms in defense of parasites
172. Daniel Salmon — Re: Another ethnic group
173. Carnography — Re: poetry enormance
174. Kevin Killian — Re: List wars
175. Kevin Killian — Re: List wars
176. Kevin Killian — Re: List wars
177. Mark Roberts — Re: Listpersonship
178. Joe Amato — Re: List wars
179. Mary Hilton — Submissions for "Political Diction"
180. maria damon — Re: " . . . : . . . "
181. Charles Alexander — Re: poetry enormance
182. maria damon — Re: List wars
183. maria damon — Re: maria--/& performance
184. maria damon — Re: List wars
185. Joe Amato — Re: " . . . : . . . "
186. Herb Levy — List, person, ship
187. Hank Lazer — Re: List wars
188. Daniel Bouchard — Re: List wars
189. Shaunanne Tangney — Re: poetry performance
190. Don Cheney — List wars: 100 Years, Star,...
191. Charles Alexander — Re: List wars
192. Fred Muratori — Re: List wars
193. Joe Amato — Re: List wars
194. hen — Re: think of meeee!
195. henry — Re: think of meeee!
196. Daniel Bouchard — Re(vision): List wars
197. Rod Smith — Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
198. Jordan Davis — amusing and depressing
199. Gabrielle Welford — Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
200. Gabrielle Welford — thanks
201. Maria Damon — Re: List wars
202. Bill Luoma/Vanstar — Re: tonight's HRs
203. Paul Naylor — Re: List wars
204. Robert A Harrison — L. Thomas
205. David Baratier — Re: List wars

206. Christina Fairbank Chirot — posters
207. David Baratier — poetry parfornir
208. Gabrielle Welford — herb levy's scum
209. Kathrine Varnes — Re: poetry performance
210. Emily Lloyd — Re: List wars
211. Loss Glazier — Orono papers & other authors
212. David Kellogg — Re: List wars
213. maria damon — Re: Orono papers & other authors
214. Jerry Rothenberg — Re: Covering Cherub
215. Charles Alexander — Re: Orono papers & other authors
216. Charles Alexander — Re: Orono papers & other authors
217. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — the guy and the gulf war
218. Gabrielle Welford — Collaborator on M.E.T. Lambert article, 19th c poet (fwd)
219. Michelle Roberts — Re: bumb bunny
220. Michelle Roberts — Re: Listpersonship
221. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Private List/Public Space
222. Michelle Roberts — Re: poetry performance
223. Bruce Malcolm — (no subject)
224. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Private List/Public Space
225. Kevin Killian — Re: List wars
226. wystan — Re: List wars
227. Dean Taciuch — (no subject)
228. Michelle Roberts — Re: List, person, ship
229. Carnography — Re: poetry parfornir
230. Michelle Roberts — Re: herb levy's scum
231. Carnography — Re: maria--/& performance

10 JUL 1996

232. Rod Smith — Re: amusing and depressing
233. wystan — Re: Orono papers & other authors
234. wystan — Re: List wars
235. Thomas Bell — Re: Listpersonship
236. Andrew John Miller — Value Judgments and Sociology (was Re: List wars)
237. Rod Smith — trolling for newbies
238. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: in which will be found what is set forth therein
239. Marjorie Perloff — Re: List Wars
240. Tom Malone — A Closer Reading
241. Daniel Salmon — Re: List, person, ship
242. Schuchat — Cult of poetry in China
243. henry gould — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
244. Loss Glazier — Re: Private List/Public Space
245. Loss Glazier — Re: Orono papers & other authors
246. Michael Coffey — Re: Irby Matters -Reply
247. Gwyn McVay — Re: Orono papers & other authors
248. Nada Gordon — poetry performance
249. Nada Gordon — Re: Listpersonship
250. maria damon — Re: List wars
251. Joe Amato — Re: the guy and the gulf war
252. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
253. maria damon — Re: List wars
254. Shaunanne Tangney — Re: Cult of poetry in China
255. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Lorenzo Thomas
256. Rod Smith — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
257. Henry Gould — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
258. Rod Smith — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
259. Jordan Davis — sports and wine

260. Judy Roitman — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
261. Jordan Davis — past tense mope dream
262. Rod Smith — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
263. Jordan Davis — mis/guide
264. Pritchett,Pat — (no subject)
265. Burt Kimmelman — peter quartermain
266. Gabrielle Welford — two film reviews (fwd)
267. Robert A Harrison — onward: +
268. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
269. maria damon — Re: Value Judgments and Sociology (was Re: List wars)
270. maria damon — Re: Value Judgments and Sociology (was Re: List wars)
271. Mark Wallace — e-mail politics
272. Judy Roitman — First Intensity
273. David Kellogg — Re: List Wars
274. David Kellogg — Re: List Wars
275. David Kellogg — Re: List Wars
276. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: why is "bad" poet a silly category, but not "great" poet? (fwd)
277. Kevin Killian — Re: the guy and the gulf war
278. maria damon — sociopoetic poetry/lyrical critique
279. Aldon L. Nielsen — been there done that (fwd)
280. maria damon — Re: e-mail politics
281. Joseph Zitt — Re: the guy and the gulf war
282. Loss Glazier — EPC - Connecting
283. Robert J Wilson — Re: Covering Cherub
284. George Bowering — Re: tonight's HRs
285. George Bowering — Re: List wars

11 JUL 1996

286. Emily Lloyd — Re: maria--/& performance
287. Diane Marie Ward — Fwd: New Orleans Performer List (fwd)
288. Eryque Gleason — Re: maria--/& performance
289. Carnography — Re: maria--/& performance
290. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: riposte
291. R I Caddel — Invisible books
292. Ron Silliman — The List
293. Bill Luoma/Vanstar — Poets, Critics, and Computrix
294. henry — Re: e-mail politics
295. henry — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
296. Larry Price — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
297. henry gould — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
298. Pierre Joris — George Orwell, informer (fwd)
299. henry gould — Onward: Contemporary etc.
300. maria damon — white rose
301. David Baratier — Re[2]: List wars
302. Dean Taciuch — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry
303. Dean Taciuch — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
304. Emily Lloyd — Re: maria/&performance
305. Jordan Davis — Loesser NY sch pts
306. Jordan Davis — W's fly, lppl's ground
307. Mark Wallace — critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
308. James Brook — Re: George Orwell, informer (fwd)
309. Michael Davidson — research stipends at ANP
310. Robert A Harrison — Re(2): maria--/& performance
311. Rod Smith — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
312. henry — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
313. Judy Roitman — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics

314. Aldon L. Nielsen — door prize --
315. Charles Alexander — poecrititry
316. Rod Smith — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
317. George Bowering — Re: Thomas
318. william marsh — Re: e-mail politics
319. Henry — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
320. Rod Smith — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
321. Charles Smith — Ken Irby
322. Judy Roitman — Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
323. Christina Fairbank Chirot — re Irby reviews
324. Charles Smith — Re: white rose
325. Jordan Davis — The High Points
326. Hank Lazer — Re: Aldon, Hayden, "American Journal"
327. Carnography — Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
328. Jordan Davis — oh
329. Carnography — Re: maria/&performance
330. Charles Alexander — Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
331. George Bowering — Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
332. Burt Kimmelman — Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
333. Jordan Davis — trouble in river
334. filch — satire #2
335. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — word, thing narrative.
336. Gabrielle Welford — ANNC: Literature resource list and publication opportunity (fwd)
337. Poetics List — To a Captious Critic (fwd)

12 JUL 1996

338. Jordan Davis — summer reruns (amphetamine use of the gods...)
339. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: The Clarify Brothers
340. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Ur Irby and others
341. Aldon L. Nielsen — hidden Hayden
342. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Ken Irby
343. Kevin Killian — Re: white rose
344. Christina Fairbank Chirot — Ken Irby
345. Kevin Killian — Re: e-mail politics
346. hnry — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
347. k.a. hehir — the loveliest of all
348. k.a. hehir — Pe: rformance
349. k.a. hehir — Pe :rformance
350. Larry Price — Onward
351. henry — Re: Onward
352. henry — Re: barnacle a (onward)
353. Jordan Davis — barnacle a (onward)
354. william marsh — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic ...
355. Rod Smith — Re: barnacle a (onward)
356. Ward Tietz — Re: Onward
357. Burt Kimmelman — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic tech-niq...
358. Joe Amato — fyi...
359. Rod Smith — Re: Onward
360. Steve Carll — Re: barnacle a (onward)
361. henry — Re: Onward
362. Gabrielle Welford — Re: barnacle a (onward)
363. Gabrielle Welford — text/language
364. Charles Alexander — Re: text/language
365. maria damon — Re: white rose
366. filch — Re: barnacle a (onward)

367. George Bowering — Re: text/language
368. George Bowering — Re: british women poets
369. George Bowering — Re: British Women Poets
370. George Bowering — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
371. Kevin Killian — Re: white rose
372. George Bowering — Re: my stack
373. Charles Alexander — Re: british women poets
374. James Brook — Re: text/language
375. Burt Kimmelman — Re: text/language
376. Burt Kimmelman — Re: text/language
377. Burt Kimmelman — nomail
378. Schuchat — As for poets and critics
379. william marsh — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic tech-niqu…
380. william marsh — Re: e-mail politics
381. henry — travelin
382. maria damon — Re: text/language
383. maria damon — Re: PUI
384. Robert Drake — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of

13 JUL 1996

385. Paul Naylor — PUI
386. Rod Smith — Re: As for poets and critics
387. Rod Smith — Re: As for poets and critics
388. Tristan D. Saldana — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
389. Peter Quartermain — DON'T call me!
390. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: To Max Douglas
391. Susan Clark — Peter Quartermain call
392. Alan Sondheim — cath
393. Carnography — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
394. Carnography — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
395. Carnography — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
396. Carnography — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
397. Charles Alexander — Re: As for poets and critics
398. Schuchat — Re: As for poets and critics
399. Schuchat — Re: As for poets and critics
400. Ron Silliman — Joyce Conference
401. Joel Kuszai — Meow Press Reading in Toronto
402. Thomas M. Orange — credences
403. jms — order chain
404. McGuire Jerry L — poetry performance
405. Sam Pereira — A Warning Re: The Decisiveness Of Glitches
406. William F. Walsh — Re: A Warning Re: The Decisiveness Of Glitches
407. Carnography — Re: The Decisiveness Of Glitches: poss solution
408. robert von hallberg — Orono 2
409. robert von hallberg — re orono 2
410. Charles Bernstein — [redacted]
411. filch — Eudora
412. Schuchat — Re: Joyce Conference
413. George Bowering — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
414. Charles Alexander — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
415. James Brook — Re: text/language
416. Carl Lynden Peters — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations

14 JUL 1996

417. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: OrOno release 2.3
418. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Having now resigned from professional wrestling, I ask

419. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: You May Already Have Won
420. Gabrielle Welford — Re: text/language
421. George Bowering — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
422. George Bowering — Re: text/language
423. Robert Mittenthal — The Parasite Rules!
424. George Bowering — Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
425. [redacted]
426. Eryque Gleason — Re: Eudora
427. Sam — Re: Eudora
428. Tony Green — O sole cism
429. Joseph Zitt — Re: O sole cism
430. Steve Carll — Re: Eudora
431. Akitoshi Nagahata — Hisao Kanaseki
432. Tony Green — Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)

15 JUL 1996

433. Carnography — Re: Hisao Kanaseki
434. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Akitoshi's note
435. Carnography — Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
436. Christopher K. Whipple — Thank you for your responses
437. Ron Silliman — Two from Bowering, one for Rob
438. Jonathan A Levin — Re: text/language (fwd)
439. Lisa Samuels — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic
440. filch — Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
441. Charles Alexander — Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic
442. Rod Smith — Re: The High Points
443. Jerry Rothenberg — Re: Hisao Kanaseki
444. filch — BookStore
445. Judy Roitman — Wittgenstein
446. [redacted]
447. David Baratier — tag teamsters local 354 (poet vs critic)
448. Mark Wallace — poetry and criticism as the same
449. maria damon — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
450. maria damon — Re: text/language
451. [redacted]
452. Tony Green — Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
453. Peter Quartermain — eudora crash
454. Tony Green — listwars&ironeey
455. Tony Green — summer?
456. Tony Green — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
457. trace s. ruggles — Re: the texture of poetry

16 JUL 1996

458. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Kweisi he calls me
459. Gabrielle Welford — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
460. George Bowering — Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
461. Carnography — Re: text/language
462. Carnography — Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
463. cris cheek — Carla Harryman and Barrett Watten
464. Kevin Killian — Re: press survival
465. Michael Boughn — Bad news
466. Alan Sondheim — Coach House
467. maria damon — Re: Bad news
468. Lisa Amber Phillips — Re: Coach House (re-post due to delivery failure)
469. Charles Alexander — Re: BookStore
470. Charles Alexander — Re: eudora crash
471. Charles Alexander — Re: Bad news

472. Charles Alexander — press survival
473. Judy Roitman — Re: press survival
474. Carnography — Re: Coach House (re-post due to delivery failure)
475. Carnography — Re: BookStore
476. Mark Wallace — experiments and identities
477. Kevin Killian — Re: press survival
478. Charles Alexander — Re: press survival
479. Mark Wallace — readings in Washington, D.C.
480. Herb Levy — Re: Bad news
481. maria damon — Re: Coach House (re-post due to delivery failure)
482. David Baratier — press haus
483. Charles Smith — Re: press survival
484. Daniel Salmon — Re: Marsh
485. Charles Alexander — Re: BookStore
486. Gabrielle Welford — Language in Contemporary American Poetry (9/15; NEMLA) (fwd)
487. Gabrielle Welford — Re: text/language
488. George Bowering — Re: BookStore
489. George Bowering — Re: press survival
490. [redacted]
491. c.g. guertin — Re: Bad news/Coach House
492. Charles Alexander — Re: press survival

17 JUL 1996

493. Thomas M. Orange — Bad News
494. Tenney Nathanson — Mullen piece?
495. Robert Drake — Re: Mullen piece?
496. [redacted]
497. Charles Alexander — Opening of the San Francisco Center for the Book
498. Daniel Bouchard — Boston reading
499. Michael Boughn — Re: Bad News
500. Michael Boughn — New H.D. Stories
501. Charles Alexander — chax books number one
502. Charles Alexander — chax books number two
503. Charles Alexander — chax press books number three
504. David Baratier — r h y m m s by Robert Grenier
505. Kevin Killian — Re: Bad news
506. Kevin Killian — Re: press survival
507. Kevin Killian — Re: press survival
508. Louis Cabri — my slack
509. william marsh — Re: "Marsh"crash/sorries
510. [redacted]
511. David Baratier — Vanguard
512. [redacted]
513. MAXINE CHERNOFF — Re: Bad news
514. Steve Carll — Re: "Marsh"crash/sorries
515. maria damon — Re: Bad news and good
516. Gjoseph Farrah — monthly posting
517. Rod Smith — New Perelman, Loys, Jarnot etc @ Bridge Street
518. Charles Alexander — Re: Bad news and good
519. maria damon — Re: monthly posting

18 JUL 1996

520. Loss Glazier — Re: eudora crash
521. Steve Carll — Antenym 10 publication and celebration
522. Steve Carll — Re: eudora crash
523. GRAHAM W. FOUST — Proles vs. the Pulitzer
524. David Golumbia — Re: Proles vs. the Pulitzer

525. Robert A Harrison — Re(2): eudora crash
526. Brigham Taylor — Poetry Funding
527. Charles Alexander — Jewish women artists
528. Ken Norris — Somewhere Across the Border #3
529. Tony Green — Re: Carla Harryman and Barrett Watten
530. Tony Green — Re: poetry performance
531. Bill Luoma — growlie
532. [redacted]
533. George Bowering — Re: press survival
534. George Bowering — Re: Bad news
535. [redacted]
536. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
537. Daniel Salmon — Re: eudora crash
538. Tristan D. Saldana — Re: Proles vs. the Pulitzer
539. Thomas Bell — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget

19 JUL 1996

540. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
541. Kevin Killian — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
542. Kevin Killian — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
543. Robert Drake — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
544. Bill Luoma — Anne Sexton's shrink
545. Bill Luoma — Bromige & nonose
546. Herb Levy — clear-cut
547. Herb Levy — Another "Yasusada" Sighting
548. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: Another "Yasusada" Sighting
549. [redacted]
550. George Bowering — Re: Bromige & nonose
551. MAXINE CHERNOFF — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
552. Herb Levy — Re: Another "Yasusada" Sighting
553. Tristan D. Saldana — Re: Another "Yasusada" Sighting
554. Pritchett,Pat — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feeling
555. Joseph Zitt — Murmurings from the Renga Pits
556. Thomas Bell — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
557. Thomas Bell — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feeling

20 JUL 1996

558. Louis Cabri — si
559. Kevin Killian — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
560. Rachel Loden — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
561. Carnography — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
562. Ron Silliman — Hoaxification
563. Robert Drake — Re: Hoaxification
564. Herb Levy — Re: Hoaxification
565. Christina Fairbank Chirot — poetry and nuclear war
566. Curt Anderson — Re: Hoaxification
567. Mark Wallace — avant garde as production network
568. Rod Smith — Re: Hoaxification
569. Emily Lloyd — like a big pizza pie, that's Eudora...
570. Kathrine Varnes — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
571. maria damon — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
572. maria damon — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
573. Judy Roitman — Re: Hoaxification
574. Judy Roitman — Re: feelingth & hoaxification
575. maria damon — Re: catching up
576. maria damon — Re: Hoaxification
577. Gabrielle Welford — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget

578. Robert J Wilson — Yasu/Sada
579. Nada Gordon — roughness
580. Gabrielle Welford — Re: roughness

21 JUL 1996

581. Charles Alexander — Re: roughness
582. Nada Gordon — Re: Yasu/Sada
583. Nada Gordon — Re: roughness
584. Carnography — Re: avant garde as production network
585. Kevin Killian — Re: Loy readings
586. Robert Drake — Re: roughness
587. Maerra Yaffa Shreiber — Re: Loy readings
588. Kevin Killian — A plea for Ginny
589. Megana Camille Roy — poetry & performance (plays)
590. Charles Alexander — Re: roughness
591. Carnography — Re: pathos, nothing more than bathos
592. Tony Green — philosophers & poets
593. Tony Green — Re: Bad news
594. Dan Horne — Victim Art
595. Carnography — Pastiche for Charles
596. Henry Gould — My Vacation in Minnesota

22 JUL 1996

597. Julia Stein — Re: victim art
598. Kevin Killian — Re: pathos, nothing more than bathos
599. Kevin Killian — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
600. Akitoshi Nagahata — "Araki Yasusada"
601. Kevin Killian — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
602. Kevin Killian — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
603. Robert Drake — Re: poetry & performance (plays)
604. maria damon — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
605. Kevin Killian — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
606. Carnography — Pastiche for Ted
607. Charles Alexander — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
608. Herb Levy — Re: Bad news
609. Herb Levy — Re: A plea for Ginny (& Alice)
610. T-Bone Prone — Re: philosophers & poets
611. Mark Wallace — avant garde as production network
612. william marsh — Re: Jorie Graham
613. henry gould — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
614. Judy Roitman — Re: Jorie Graham
615. David Baratier — Yasusada
616. Gabrielle Welford — Re: pathos, nothing more than bathos
617. Tony Green — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
618. henry — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
619. Tony Green — Re: roughness
620. Charles Alexander — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
621. Jonathan A Levin — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
622. Tony Green — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
623. Douglis Beck — _Yasusada_ on the move...
624. Tony Green — Re: roughness
625. maria damon — Re: Victim Art: the girl w/ cancer
626. Tony Green — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
627. Emily Lloyd — Re: roughness
628. maria damon — Re: roughness
629. Gabrielle Welford — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
630. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — on the interpretation of posts, or, Good Reasons To Lurk

23 JUL 1996

631. Thomas Bell — Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
632. Craig Douglas Dworkin — Re: POETICS Digest - 21 Jul 1996 to 22 Jul 1996
633. George Bowering — Re: Bad news
634. George Bowering — Re: A plea for Ginny
635. John Geraets — Re: roughness

24 JUL 1996

636. Lisa Jarnot — new books/soho letter press
637. Thomas Bell — Re: comparative suffering
638. Carnography — Re: feelingth/holocaust
639. Gabrielle Welford — Re: comparative suffering

25 JUL 1996

640. Robert Drake — seattle in sept. (forwarded message)
641. Carnography — Susan Walsh reported missing, 7/16/96
642. Michael Coffey — poetry month, as reported in pw
643. Gabrielle Welford — Schlafly letter (fwd)
644. Gabrielle Welford — English-only Update -- VI (fwd)

26 JUL 1996

645. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: indigestible?
646. Pierre Joris — EMF GENERAL ALERT (fwd)
647. Gwyn McVay — Re: English-only Update -- VI (fwd)
648. maria damon — Re: comparative suffering
649. Pritchett,Pat — Re: indigestible?
650. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: feelingth/holocaust
651. Gabrielle Welford — Re: English-only Update -- VI (fwd)
652. Maria Damon — Re: feelingth/holocaust
653. Michael Leddy — Lacy and Creeley et al.

27 JUL 1996

654. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Jazz/Text alert
655. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: this crime to the writing fraternity (fwd)
656. Thomas Bell — cancer poetry
657. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: cancer poetry

28 JUL 1996

658. Bob Holman — Gloria Tropp
659. Tony Green — Re: cancer poetry
660. Burt Kimmelman — Re: cancer poetry

29 JUL 1996

661. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: dp
662. Susan Schultz — Tinfish Net\work announcement
663. FUNKHOUSER CHRISTOPH — cancer poetry
664. Robert Drake — Re: cancer poetry
665. Bob Gale — Line Break
666. Bob Gale — spoken word recordings
667. John Geraets — Re: cancer poetry
668. Pritchett,Pat — Re: spoken word recordings
669. Robert Drake — Re: spoken word recordings
670. maria damon — Re: spoken word recordings
671. David Baratier — Re: Spoken Word recordings
672. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest — Re: spoken word recordings
673. maria damon — Re: spoken word recordings
674. maria damon — bargain books, mpls
675. Bob Holman — Amygism

30 JUL 1996

676. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: spoken word
677. Bob Gale — (no subject)
678. Sylvester Pollet — cancer poems
679. JOEL LEWIS — melvin tolson
680. Douglis Beck — Re: POETICS Digest - 28 Jul 1996 to 29 Jul 1996
681. maria damon — Re: POETICS Digest - 28 Jul 1996 to 29 Jul 1996
682. maria damon — Re: conference fwd
683. Robert Drake — Re: bargain books, mpls

31 JUL 1996

684. Aldon L. Nielsen — Re: Tolson
685. Christina Fairbank Chirot — address for Christopher Dewdney
686. Charles Alexander — gone
687. maria damon — conference
688. Laura Moriarty — Re: cancer poems
689. Julie Marie Schmid — Re: bargain books, mpls
690. Tristan D. Saldana — Language Poetry; Deconstruction; New Criticism
691. maria damon — Re: bargain books, mpls
692. George Bowering — Re: address for Christopher Dewdney
693. T-Bone Prone — Re: Language Poetry; Deconstruction; New Criticism
694. Ian Wilson — Re: Language Poetry; Deconstruction; New Criticism
695. george hartley — Re: Language Poetry; Deconstruction; New Criticism

1. Peter Quartermain

Re: british women poets

Mon 1 Jul 1996

There's an astonishing number of really good women poets around. To the list of British and Commonwealth women poets alreadty listed by Maria Charles Daniel Rod John Keith and others, let me add: Catherine Walsh is Irish, and as Keith hinted, would be deeply insulted by being called British; among Brits not mentioned yet (but let me too add a plug for Maggie O'Sullivan,. Geraldine Monk, Wendy Mulford, Denise Riley) Bridget Penney, Caroline Bergvall, Frances Presley, Harriet Tarlo, Grace Lake, Vittoria Vaughan, Maggie Helwig (Canadian, living in London), Helen Macdonald and Jennifer Chalmers; if you want to step back a little in time don't forget writers like Veronica Forrest-Thomson or even Frances Horovitz... . . In Canada there's -- in more or less random order -- besides the much neglected Phyllis Webb already mentioned, M. Nourbese Philip, Catriona Strang, Melissa Wolsak, Sharon Thesen, Daphne Marlatt, Karen Mac Cormack, Lola Lemire Tostevin, Lisa Robertson, Christine Stewart, Julia Steele, Hilary Peach, and Karlyn Koh. The list goes on and on -- there's gazillions of others, all so-called "experimental." Alternative might be a better word. I don't know the Scottish and Welsh scene at all, someone should chip in here -- maybe Romana Huk? Eck Finlay if he's around? (As soon as I send this I'll no doubt think of lots of others). Good reading!

At 01:57 PM 6/28/96 -0400, Steve wrote:
>A friend of mine is looking for suggestions of British or Commonwealth >women poets of the 20thC to teach in an upcoming course, and i was rather >embarassed at how few names i cld summon off the top o' the noggin. Any >suggestions, for my own edification, and my friend's?
>
>thanks, steve
>
>

+ + + +

2. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Jacquee la Mousse
Mon 1 Jul 1996

I was ASSIGNED by Loss to report back from Orono on the subject of race & ethnicity -- I didn't get a chance to ask if he meant that I was to review the gathered complexions or the complexities of the papers, or if perhaps I was to examine the demographics of Orono itself -- as if that were not enough confusion, our email system has been returning everything I've attempted to post on this or any other subject ever since I sent in that execrable poem --

but I'll see what I can get in before the whole shebang (and are there any hebangs?) collapses again -- if interrupted, there will be a part two -- "Of the approximately 231 papers delivered at this conference, about 14 were devoted to the writings of minority poets." This observation was part of my introduction to a panel on Langston Hughes and Bob Kaufman. This sentence was also singled out by Robert von Hallberg at the beginning of a five minute long denunciation of the panel which exhausted the discussion time remaining for the session. In the course of his comments, Robert accused the panelists, including me, of "doing the sociology thing," which is reductive, of lending ourselves to identity politics. He said that what should be done instead is close readings of interesting poets, but that the poets discussed here weren't worth that sort of close reading because they were "bad" poets.

Now . . . this is a pretty old hat to those of us who have been studying issues of race and ethnicity in literature longer than two weeks -- But what I want first to mention is that, repeating strategies of the oldest of new critics, these comments required a complete decontextualization (and an evasion of close reading, I might add) of what had in fact been presented. In the interests of saving time, I will only use the example of my opening remarks. The numbers that I noted were offered in response to repeated accusations from many quarters (I used the example of Carol Iannone) to the effect that academic critics had in recent years entirely abandoned "true" critical criteria and were instead simply promoting authors on the basis of an "ethnic agenda." I introduced my numbers with the remark: "Let's see how the ethnic agenda is doing." My point was to offer a simple refutation. The large number of critics gathered at Orono had in fact produced a remarkably small number of papers concerning minority authors. Iy looks to me as if the profession is some distance still from being dominated by an ethnic agenda. This point is truly sociological, but hardly pointless. (Might add that at least two of us there on the panel have devoted considerable efforts to criticisms of identity politics.)

At any rate, I could say much more on this topic, but that's not what I was asked to do -- so --

The first day included a panel on Stephen Jonas, Melvin Tolson and Russell Atkins, where could be heard (gasp) close readings of truly interesting black poets. Mark Scroggins advanced an interesting view of the ever-problematic Jonas, Keith Leonard (one among a stream of Stanford presenters -- Stanford and Buffallo seem to be the hotbeds of poetry criticism now) set up parameters for thinking about Tolson that were later fleshed out in Lorenzo Thomas's talk, and I spoke about the critical theories of poet Russell Atkins (check your library for his old selected from Cleveland State, about the only easily available volume)

On Friday morning I discovered the amazing discussions of O'Hara and race that were already in progress at the conference. Ben Friedlander followed some intriguing wrinkles (already mentioned on this list by others) and Steve Evans followed with exactly the type of scholarly and philosophically informed exploration that some of us have been hoping for for years -- Steve has done what any good Pound scholar would do -- finding himself in a poem to the "French Negro Poets," Steve went and read them (now there's a novel approach folks --) also reading the requisite Sartre etc. -- Steve's paper asks questions about the ideologies of race and their relationships to poetics that have long needed looking into --

The one question I left with (there wasn't time to ask it) is why so many white critics think that desegregating the sex act is a politically radical move -- Tell that one to Walter White -- ooops, have to relinquish the keyboard -- will be back in about 24 hours with rest of my homework assignment -- bottom line is that there were great papers all around on these topics, though there were few of them -- and there really might have been at least one African-American or Asian-American or Latino or American Inian poet reading poems, huh???

but back with the GOOD stuff in 24 hrs -- love to all,

aldon

↑ Index

3. Kevin Killian

Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc

Mon 1 Jul 1996

This is Dodie Bellamy speaking.

Maria,

One thing you didn't point out in your last post was that the Orono conference had much more to offer to women than acceptance by a male elite that we could kind of "bask in." Rachel Blau du Plessis' and Joan Retallack's talks were the best moments of the conference for me. Rachel's talk reminded me that if it weren't for women like Rachel who promoted a specifically female approach to post-modernism, I wouldn't exist. I also found it great to just watch Margorie Perloff, her energy, her awesome confidence.

I think you should do a bit of deconstruction on your post--in your complaints about the conference the men are treated as troublesome boys who do things out of line, but--usually with your guidance--apologize and get their shit together. The only unredeemable characters in your post are the covertly racist female plenary speakers in the front row. Funny, I was in the third row (sitting next to Rachel, who was quiet as a mouse) and I didn't hear any loud whisperings. What female plenary speakers are left? Margorie Perloff? Alicia Ostriker? Couldn't these female plenary speakers be considered a female elite whose acceptance a young scholar would want to bask in?

One thing that stuck me about Lisa Amber Phillips' presence at the conference was how clearly she liked women and how much time she spent talking with other women--rather than chasing "testosterone," as you put it in an earlier post. There should more to feminism than demanding materialistic equality.

↑ Index

4. Michael Faherty
Re: British Women Poets
Mon 1 Jul 1996

It's always fascinated me that poets, like comedians, don't seem to travel very well and that, by all appearances, very few contemporary British poets are known in the States and, likewise, only a handful of young American poets are read here.

As far as contemporary women writers go, I would second the recommendations of Carol Ann Duffy, Pauline Stainer and Sujata Bhatt. Bhatt, by the way, actually grew up in the States and attended the Iowa Writers Workshop, where she met her German husband and moved back home to Bremen with him, but she's still often listed as a "British" poet.

I would also suggest that Helen Dunmore, Lavinia Greenlaw, Kathleen Jamie, Liz Lochhead, Sarah Maguire, Paula Meehan, Grace Nichols and, especially, Jo Shapcott are worth a look. And for Irish writers, of course, you can't miss Eilean Ni Chuilleanain, Nuala Ni Dhomhnaill and Medbh McGuckian.

If I were putting a course together, I would use the France anthology since it includes many of the above and more.

↑ Index

5. R I Caddel

brit.wom.po's

Mon 1 Jul 1996

Blimey, you go away for a wet weekend and a whole discussion about the british poetry scene zips past you. This is to endorse John Matthias' plug for OUT OF EVERYWHERE (Reality Street Editions, 1996) and the individual plugs for Maggie O'Sullivan, Elaine Randell, Catherine Walsh (Irish), Michelle Leggott (NZ), and add special mention for Wendy Mulford and Geraldine Monk (both in OOE) and add Caroline Bergvall, Carlyle Reedy (also both in OOE) and Harriet Tarlo (forthcoming in Talisman, amongst others).

RC

↑ Index

6. maria damon

Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc

Mon 1 Jul 1996

---

as long as we're complaining now about our recent love fest, let me say that at this conference i saw something i didn't like --a coupla times, senior, well-established, famous folks excoriating or picking on grad students who were giving their first papers in public. after one such instance i put my arm around louis simpson, took him aside and sd look, louie (for some reason this conference, or maybe it was the sabbatical, being out of the hierarchic loop for a year, has made me less fearful) this kid is never gonna get a job, he's just a student in some third rate graduate program, give him a break. he was reasonably contrite, and hoped he hadnt been too harsh (unlike r von h, he hadn't been). also, two other plenary speakers whispered loudly and passed notes throughout most of lorenzo thomas's talk, right there in the front row. he kept looking over at them but they didn't stop until they decided he was actually saying something (about 3/4 of the way thru). i was embarrassed, cuz these were ladies i expected more from. also, at banquet, ml rosenthal started baiting us younger scholars on "what is 'discourse analysis' anyway and what does it do other than state the obbvious in unnecessarily convoluted terms?" but then he apologized. i never use that phrase discourse analysis anyway and neither to my knowledge did any of the other folks (all women) there either.

as for lisa amber philips' comments on feminist turf-establishing, there was something very retro about the conference, as i sd in my earlier post. i myself had fun with it because i felt accepted by the male elite, and kinda basked in it, but let's not get carried away with nostalgia for an earlier era when white males could attack accomplished, intelligent women as symbols of the establishment, with no consciousness of their own gender privilege. lisa, you know nothing about what that woman who made the comment about another comment's being "contemptible" has been through professionally, personally, etc, what her struggles with sexism in the academy have been, how these social dynamics have affected her health, her standard of living, her life chances, etc. I don't know where you're at in your career, but i myself never took sexism seriously as something that affected my material well-being (of course i was aware of paternalism and the occasional patronizing comment from a male professor, but i just ascribed that to his stupidity, and it didn't affect my life) until i entered the workforce. as a student i was very protected. now, i routinely see my white male colleagues get outrageous raises for --not mediocre, but --NO scholarly accomplishment, i see white guys with no publications deciding who does and doesnt get raises, fellowships, jobs, etc ...it's the lowpaid and overworked women in my dept who get offers frm elsewhere for endowed chairs, huge salary increases, reduced teaching loads, invitations to give seminars at harvard etc, while at home its the white guys who've never written a word past their disserations 30 years ago who make sure these women don't get a break, and who promote those in their own image. i never would have believed it was that blatant. i know i sound maternalistic myself now, pulling the rank of "older and wiser," and i apologize for that. i could be totally off in my assumptions about where you're coming from. and i know it's not academically "rigorous" (to invoke a word i'm not too fond of) to suggest that knowing the larger context of a particular utterance may nuance our reception of it --that is, a biographical understanding of why this woman said what she did may take it out of the realm of facile post/feminist theorizing and give it some substance. so, i'm sorry if i'm intervening from left field. nonetheless, i think one of the things that made the conference so good, in spite of our complaints, was the relative openness and acceptance. paradoxically, in light of the strictly retro demographics. perhpas, and i hope not, this was due to the relatively homogenous population --that is, social differences were underrepresented, so there was less overt tension and conflict...? if so, and its possible, i can easily relate to how diana trilling must have felt seduced by being a token in the white male literary establishment --i had a great time BECAUSE i wasn't really a threat...?xo, md

↑ Index

7. Burt Kimmelman
Bruce Andrews
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Anyone have an e-mail address for Bruce Andrews?

thanks,

Burt Kimmelman
[redacted]

↑ Index

8. henry gould
John High email
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Does anyone have an email address for poet/translator John High? I have his street address. Please backchannel - thanks - Henry Gould [redacted]

↑ Index

9. Jordan Davis
O the glassy towns are
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Which four poems by O'Hara are you (is someone) saving? I am a speculator and would like all the rest, thank you. Please send to:

Jordan Davis

↑ Index

10. Kevin Killian
Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Okay, Maria, thanks for listening and not chewing me out. To add a note of compassion, I for one certainly would never be able to survive the hell of academic politics--and I think any woman with the strength to make it in that world deserves--I don't know what: admiration? Awe? But I'm sympathetic to Lisa Amber Philips' complaints. These blanket statements about what White Middle Class Women do and do not know are highly problematic. Also statements about young women. There are lots of young women poets (many of them black, asian, and lesbian) on the scene here in San Francisco, and, from what I've seen, they have a wide range of response to the question of whether or not they're oppressed as women in our "post"-feminist era. I'm particularly close to my intern who's 27, and her frustration over the position of women in the young hip world she operates in is a frequent topic of discussion-- particularly in terms of her acting out her sexual desires.

Dodie

↑ Index

11. Ward Tietz
Re: Paul Zelevansky
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Thanks Charles for the overview of Paul Zelevansky's work. Yours is far more detailed and cohesive than anything I could have done.

To pick up on this idea of the glyph, I think it's the narrative use of glyphs that perhaps sets Zelevansky's work apart, for me anyway. It's true Schwerner uses a very different system of support for his glyphs and the effects are in many ways more conventionally literary, but I would say in contrast that Zelevansky's use of them is probably more synthetic and sustained in terms of their function with text.

What interests me especially about Zelevansky's work is the development of an iconic/symbolic narrative that begins, in time, to function very much in a literary way. How this occurs is difficult to articulate, but in my experience it seemed to be a result of a slow but steady accumulation, a re-cognition of the material that was very analogous to learning how to read. This can be done by means of images, but I think the entire process is enhanced by the use of glyphs.

The useful thing, I think, about a glyph is that it functions very differently from an image or a mark. It's iconic, in C. S. Peirce's use of the term, in the sense that it is a sign that refers by way of similarity back to its referent, but it is also symbolic, and in that sense its use as a sign is similar to text.

I've begun to think about forms of this sort as investigating a certain "presentational" potential of literary form, in contrast to more conventional discursive form, but I still haven't worked it all out. In any case I think Zelevansky's books are some of the most ambitious and successful examples of hybrid literary form in book format of the last 20 years or so.

There's a new piece of Zelevansky's, by the way, in Chain 3, vol. 1.

Ward Tietz

↑ Index

12. Steve Carll

Re: of the whole art/spam two generations

Mon 1 Jul 1996

At 04:12 PM 6/30/96 -0500, Jordan wrote:

> Hi. What's the unconscious?

Federal regulations require this label when the product contains less than 4% caffeine.

||||||

I'm afraid I missed the papers on Audre Lorde and Gwendolyn Brooks, but perhaps somebody else on the list heard them & can fill us in? Lorde needs to be seen in the fuller context of the avant garde set she was part of in her early years; and Brooks was perfect for a conference at which Louis Simpson appeared. Simpson, for those of you who have not read ALL his reviews, authored a notrious review of Brooks back in the day in which he opined that until she could write poetry without making "us" aware that she is a "Negro" she will never be an important poet --

Saturday included the panel I have already mentioned -- Joe Lockard gave a quick summary of his attempts to lay out a parallel between the racialized social space of 50s America and the racialized space of literary anthologizing, criticism, etc., using the reception of Hughes as an example -- John Millet gave a reading of Hughes's blues lyrics as a form of "projective" community, and Maria Damon, working around a fine reading of Bob Kaufman's "Bagel Shop Jazz," broadened our understandings of the Beat orbits -- if you haven't already read her "Beat Occlusions" essay in the Whitney Beat catalogue, that's a good place to start to pick up Maria's direction -- and that was pretty much it -- no papers, for example, on Chicano poets, though Tino Villanueva's landmark antho. appears in the 50s -- but want to mention too Marjorie Perloff's talk -- As Michael Davidson had started us off by examining the trope of containment as it extended from foreigh policy throughout American culture, Marjorie's paper touched in one respect on issues of race and containment -- I can't go into it all here,,, but in the expectation of this paper's one day appearing in print, let me mention that she offered a brilliant reading of the differing ideologies and aesthetics in two widely circulated collections of photographs -- the infamous "Family of Man" exhibit (the book of which was given even to me as a birthday present still in print in the next decade -- and Robert Frank's (name right?) collection of American photos published by Grove press -- Professor Perloff, now semiretired but hardly slowing down, "read" individual photos as well as the reception of the volumes as context against which to read Ginsberg, O'Hara and that ole gem "Love Calls Us to the Things of this World" -- This kind of paper is really exciting to me -- not an attempt to read the cultural past as a transparently available and stable entity, but looking at, how else to say it, what everyone was then looking at, as a means of deepening our discussions of the, hate to say it, poems themselves -- One of the best fast tours of "AStep Away from Them" that I've heard -- (off the track, but another question -- has any O'Hara critic EVER bothered to read the contemporaneous accounts of the night the police beat up Miles Davis, which episode figures in a lunch poem? This was a major topic in all the black newspapers of the day -- One of the speakers on O'Hara panel No. IV commented that there's nothing wrong with thinking of O'Hara as a poet of surfaces so long as we recognize those surfaces as quicksand -- this poem, I think, offers a good example of that --) so, in the end there wasn't all that much discussion of race among the papers, but what did appear was worth attending to -- next time, perhaps, we could expect conference notices to go, early, to MELUS, African American Review, Callaloo, CLA Journal, ethnic studies programs, etc.???

and despite what Chris said here a few days ago, and despite my dread of the coming rush of anthologies on the construction of whiteness, I still think that "critics who are regarded as white people" still need to lead a struggle, among "white" people," against racilaist ideology, but there I go being sociological again -- forgive me, love to all,

aldon

↑ Index

14. Keith Tuma
Re: Zelevansky
Mon 1 Jul 1996

I'm wondering if you have time, Ron, to say a little more about what it is that you like about Ken Irby's work within the line. Examples would help. I don't know the work except by reputation; KI seems to me far more disappeared than Tarn or Enslin et. al.

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

15. Tristan D. Saldana
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Mon 1 Jul 1996

On Sun, 30 Jun 1996, Carl Lynden Peters wrote:

> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan
>
> jordan, -- what eliot was so afraid of
>
> c.

And what he so effectively demonstrated in his poetry . . .

Tristan

↑ Index

16. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: last days and time
Mon 1 Jul 1996

---

got shoved off system before I could insert my final paragraph on the final key-note at Orono -- so here, quickly, before I'm shoved again

The final hangers-around at Orono were privileged to hear a quite good presentation by Lorenzo Thomas on Melvin B. Tolson's major 50s work, _Libretto for the Republic of Liberia_. Thomas did an excellent job of building on the works of earlier Tolson scholars (Farnsworth, Robinson, Woodson, Pinson, Berube, etc) and adding new details to our understanding of Tolson's relationships to his sources -- Particularly useful, though brief due to time constraints, was Thomas's look at the changes Tolson made in his poem between the time a part of it appeared in _Poetry_ (where Williams saw it, to great effect!) and the time of hte book appearance of the poem -- thanks to the great audience response to Thomas's talk, it appears that the Natinal Poetry Foundation will probably see to it that at least some of Tolson's out-of-print work is again made available --

Now that's the kind of reader response I like to encourage -- see y'all

↑ Index

17. Henry Gould
unconscious
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Jordan Davis asks, what's the unconscious?

While perusing a moldy volume of pharaonic lore I discovered the following glyph, partially effaced, found tattooed in t-bird ink on an indentation in Tuthankhamen's ritually bashed-in skull:

!! @ ~~~~~ ## $ % $ ~~~~~ !!!

Roughly translated from the Akkadian (or is it Rebokkian?):

"The Divine Simulacrum rules the Right Hand;
The Unconscious Trace rules the Left Hand;
You, O Pharaoh, must be a Switch Hitter;
Live Forever in the Hereafter... O [effaced]"

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

18. Kevin Killian haunted
Mon 1 Jul 1996

This is Dodie.

At 4:19 PM 7/1/96, Mary Hilton wrote:
>Now available from primitive publications -- "The Haunted Baronet," by >Mark Wallace, inspired by Sheridan Le Fanu#s ghost story of the same >title. According to Wallace, "The seventeen poems here are a way of >taking the vocabulary of #The Haunted Baronet# and seeing what it says >now." The result is stunning, mysterious, and haunting in its own right.

This just came in the mail today. It looks luscious. Just yesterday Kevin was pondering the world's enduring interest in ghost stories--due to our channel-surfing late the night before and landing on a schlocky ghost movie staring the ever-talent-free Allie Sheedey (or however you spell her name).

Le Fanu has never been a favorite of mine, but he will always hold a warm place in my heart due to the Hammer Studios "adaptations" and re-adaptations and re-adaptations of his Carmilla story--cleverly in each remake they simply re-arrange the letters in Carmilla--and voila Mircalla emerges from the grave! Oh those bare-breasted lascivious vampire women--I can never get enough of them.

Recently I read a collection of ghost stories by Edith Wharton and was delighted to see how many of Wharton's ghosts write letters. (The handwriting of ghosts is very faint). A writer writing about ghosts who write--does anybody smell a psycho-drama here?

↑ Index

19. David Baratier
unconscious
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Jordan

How bout Eryque's version of "what is the unconscious"

of course, what i've got in mind isn't really in mind yet as the weather conditions in albany and economic conditions in my pocket are ripe for aviating

riper than an faux (foh) ode to joy in Philly,

David Baratier

↑ Index

20. Daniel Bouchard
books, books, books
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Bill Luoma,

You said, in reference to new books by yourself and Lisa Jarnot, that ordering info. was forthcoming. I may have missed it. Could you post it again?

[redacted]

↑ Index

21. cris cheek
Re: British Women Poets
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Hi, seconding the multiple branch listings of - and then beginning to ask questions as to the increasingly inclusive lists of 'British Women Poets' cropping up here. The borders of 'nationality' and of 'poetry' are inscribed by processes of dis/emi/nation (to use a Bhabha-ish breakdown), and as has already been mentioned in this context Catherine Walsh would be unhappy being described as British. So, the subject immediately becomes more complex. I'd list Fiona Templeton, who's been mostly in Stateside for best part of 15 years, who's 'English' and whose 'You - The City' is in my view a major piece of work. Then there are Paige Mitchell and Carlyle Reedy, both U.S. born but living here for the past 25 and more - both very engaging writers. Keith Tuma's placing of Mina Loy in his list is equally problematic under such origins and migrations and exiles and

Is this proposed course on women poets . or is there a more focussed agenda? (yes, there are a couple of terrible puns there).

There are very many women poets among these islands, thankfully, and I can see the advocacy for a course presenting a range of such practices. There's a considered distance between Carol Ann Duffy (for example) and Maggie O'Sullivan though. I'd echo cheers for Reality Street's 'Out of Everywhere' anthology, edited by O'Sullivan and the Linda France collection from Bloodaxe.

Then I'd teach specific books, and this isn't meant to be an inclusive list (I've also tried, as much as possible, to limit the number of presses you might need to contact to get a fair collection together) :

Jean 'Binta' Breeze - ('Riddym Ravings', in 'The New British Poetry' anthology and from Race Today)
Caroline Bergvall - ('Strange Passage', Equipage - 'Eclats', forthcoming Sound & language)
Catherine Walsh - ('Pitch', Pig Press)
Grace Lake - ('Viola Tricolor', Equipage)
Elaine Randell - ('Beyond All Other', Pig Press)
Merle Collins - ('Rotten Pomerack', Virago)
Frances Horowitz - ('Snow Light, Water Light', Bloodaxe)
Geraldine Monk - ('Interregnum', Creation Press - 'Quaquaversals', Writers Forum)
Fiona Templeton - ('You - The City' - Roof Books)
Elaine Feinstein - (Selected Poems' - Carcanet)
Jackie Kay - ('The Adoption Papers', Bloodaxe)
Maggie O'Sullivan - ('Unofficial Word', Galloping Dog - 'In The House of the Shaman', Reality Street')
Denise Riley - ('Mop Mop Georgette', Reality Street)
Jo Shapcott - ('Electroplating the Baby', Bloodaxe)
Maighread Medbh - ('The Making of A Pagan', Blackstaff Press)

finally a note on Madge Heron. Gab, I haven't seen her for about 18 years, since I heard her read in various motley company's with bill bissett and Bob Cobbing. She was a riotous presence, and I too hope she's well somewhere.

love and love
cris

↑ Index

22. Jordan Davis
I'll iterate
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Put down the gun.

Yesterday afternoon two new books of poetry came out. Joe Elliott, sultan of Situations Press, brought _Sea Lyrics_ by Lisa Jarnot and _Western Love_ by Bill Luoma in bulk to Biblios where he semi-secretly presides as master of puppets. These are very good books which will only increase in value. Readers of the poetics list may remember a few mentions of _Sea Lyrics_ around last February when Jarnot read at the Ichor Gallery. It was referred to then as 'something about California.' Also there was a brief mention of Luoma's _Western Love_ in connection with his reading at Ruthless Grip in Washington. Yesterday Luoma read the book in its entirety to a cheerful and noshing crowd. I enjoyed it significantly more than I did the first time I heard parts of it, there in Washington, sitting directly in front of my grandmother. It is a loping study of double intention and rewired vocabulary, with the good natured sexual hijinks familiar to readers of Luoma's love poems in The Impercipient and the Poetry Project Newsletter. When will there be a big perfect bound book of Bill's poems? There was a big perfect bound book of Lisa's poems on the table, too. _Some Other Kind of Mission_, a Burning Deck book, contains much of the collaged and looped work Jarnot published in Lingo and other places, and the exciting static of it suggests the purity of first feedback, you know, rock and roll, not that rock and roll ordinarily has anything to do with poetics, but it ought to, not that depressing rockist fetishization of the stage, the band line up, but getting the noise to do the work too. I suppose a good cellist would argue a different necessity of noise: overtone. Well there's that in _Sea Lyrics_ which is curiously more like a studio album than the perfect book, handsome typography by Joe, and god I hope I'm not embarrassing the authors who are after all reading the list. Probably I will be able to get some copies to offer to the readers of the list for not too much sometime soon. So yes in a way this should be read as a movie minute produced by Buena Vista.

Who was there. A clean shaven Drew Gardner (who looked for a second just like Tim Griffin! imagine), Lewis Warsh, Juliana Spahr and Charles, Rob Fitterman and Kim Rosenfield, Marcella Durand and Rich, Kevin Davies, Deirdre Kovac, Garrett Kalleberg and Heather Ramsdell, Douglass Rothschild, the Mitch Highfill, Mark Cheney, Joe and Leo of course, Sophie Warsh, and Max Warsh, geez, I'm leaving out a lot of people. Drew is playing at the Knitting Factory on the 9th of July. Poetry's sort of quieting down for the summer, bang.

Jordan

↑ Index

23. Henry Gould

Re: unconscious geography

Mon 1 Jul 1996

On Mon, 1 Jul 1996 15:20:57 -0500 Jordan Davis said:
>
>>"The Divine Simulacrum rules the Right Hand;
>>The Unconscious Trace rules the Left Hand;
>>You, O Pharaoh, must be a Switch Hitter;
>>Live Forever in the Hereafter... O [effaced]"
>
>Which I think gets to it. Why is half the brain marked X? (Half my brain >anyway. And keep your smart remarks to yourself, as they say at the state >line of Rhode Island on a t-shirt a camp mate wore once ten summers ago.)

>'new world' or 'terra incognita.' is this so much imperialism of the >unknown

If I might add a brief scholarly addendum to this presentation: I adhere to the school of Hermann Nautical of Liebfraumilch Univ., who interprets this "glyph" in a strictly political sense. If "Pharaoh", in the regal sense of Person, looks to the "Right", politically, she finds a "simulacrum" of the divine - those traditional orders of the Good she is enjoined to obey. If Pharaoh looks to the "Left", politically, she finds the upwelling trace of the repressed, to which she is enjoined to submit. They are, in a sense, mirror images. Both demand obedience of the Person to a higher (or lower) authority. Where, then, in Chaadevian terms, is moral freedom? Where is - the po commodified Person? She or he flourishes in a realm of freely chosen commitment to... the glyph.... the [effaced]... if indeed shuhee exuhists...

- Heinricvh Gcvld

↑ Index

24. Mary Hilton
"The Haunted Baronet" by Mark Wallace (ad)
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Now available from primitive publications -- "The Haunted Baronet," by Mark Wallace, inspired by Sheridan Le Fanu#s ghost story of the same title. According to Wallace, "The seventeen poems here are a way of taking the vocabulary of #The Haunted Baronet# and seeing what it says now." The result is stunning, mysterious, and haunting in its own right.

primitive publications produces approximately six chapbooks a year, focusing on present-day writing based on historical text, language or subject. Cost of one chapbook is $4.00, or $20.00 for six. All checks may be made payable to Mary Hilton and mailed to:

primitive publications
c/o M. Hilton
1706 U Street, NW, #102
Washington, DC 20009

Inquiries, or requests to be included on the mailing list, may be e-mailed to [redacted]
Thank you.

↑ Index

25. Jordan Davis
Re: unconscious geography
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Henry, funny, wrote:

> "The Divine Simulacrum rules the Right Hand;
> The Unconscious Trace rules the Left Hand;
> You, O Pharaoh, must be a Switch Hitter;
> Live Forever in the Hereafter... O [effaced]"

Which I think gets to it. Why is half the brain marked X? (Half my brain anyway. And keep your smart remarks to yourself, as they say at the state line of Rhode Island on a t-shirt a camp mate wore once ten summers ago.) 'new world' or 'terra incognita.' is this so much imperialism of the unknown

J

↑ Index

26. Kevin Killian
my stack
Mon 1 Jul 1996

William Northcutt, you had a good idea. Here's what I've been reading.

1. Bitter Blue by Jeremy Reed. Incidentally, thanks to all who backchannel me with info on Reed, especially Pierre Joris, Ira Lightman, Joel Lewis, Romana Huk, and Ken Edwards.

2. Portrait of a Lady by Henry James.

3. Autotoxaemia by Latif Harris. About six weeks ago Eddy Berrigan was looking for a job here in San Francisco and told me he went into this one store & the owner gave him a test, and it turned out it was the "questionnaire" Jack Spicer asked his students to fill out to apply to his 1957 "Magic" Workshop (it's printed in the back of the "Collected Books" of Spicer). Following up I went into the store and demanded to see the owner. That's how I met Latif Harris, and he gave me one of his books. Turns out he is the missing witness I've been seeking for all these years, the man who drove Jack Spicer to his last poetry reading at the Berkeley Conference (1965) and had the nerve to bundle him up in the car with the man JS hated, Lew Welch. P.S., good book! PSS>, Eddy did not get the job!

4. The Green Mile, by Stephen King. One of Steve's best.

5. Abigail Child, "Scatter Matrix." Thanks to the people at Segue for sending this to me (or was it to Small Press Traffic????)

6. "Heart of the Breath," by Jim Brodey. I'm supposed to write a review of this one, and it is so long. (Quite a bargain.)

7. "The Prince, the Showgirl and Me," by Colin Clark. At age 19 Colin Clark was the 3rd assistant director on the set of the Olivier/Marilyn Monroe film "The Prince and the Showgirl." This is his diary of the period.

8. "Sunshine Muse," by Peter Plagens (1974). Out of date by lots, but an interesting art history of California during the Cold War. Who was it recommended this book to me as a good place to get more information about Jay De Feo, the San Francisco painter whose life I am dramatizing as we speak?

9. From Outlaw to Classic, by Alan Golding. I have read this book before, but I wanted to read it again to see if I have anything to add to Golding's Laws of Canon Formation.

10. Angry Women in Rock, ed. Andrea Juno, this is the first book of a new press formed by one of the editors of the defunct ReSEARCH.

11. Learned and Leaved: a Tribute to Rosalie Moore-Moore was one of the Bay Area activist poets, like Lawrence Hart, whose death a few months ago inspired a bit of discussion here on this list. These Activist people really had a program, didn't they? A program, and a destiny. Alan Golding, how do they fit in to your ideas about Canon Formation?

--Kevin Killian

↑ Index

27. Maria Damon

Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc

Mon 1 Jul 1996

---

ok dodie. there were wonderful women-generated moments; i too loved rachel's talk, esp the alphabet device, and retallack as well. i guess i was trying to be self-critical cuz i had such a good time --thanks for calling me on my puritanical side. who other than louis simpson did i chastise? are you referring to barry? i didn't chastise him but told him what i thought. i didn't convert him or bring him into the fold. we had a conversation. sorry if i sound self-serving. i didn't, nor did anyone else i saw, chase testosterone. i enjoyed male attention. perhaps i shd be less self-disclosing. the comment was intended not to cast aspersions on the men present, most of whom i like and admire a great deal and have been inspired by, but to question my own sexual politics. as for materialistic equality, i agree that there should be more to feminism, but it would certainly be an obvious place to begin. as for the thomas/tolson whisperers, why should i not feel uncomfortable and critical. i was so not because they were women but because i liked them and they were doing something i didn't like. the truth is, i know the woman who made the comment on diana trilling and i felt the need to come to her defense. md

In message <v01520d00adfd4912da0a@[205.134.228.68]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> This is Dodie Bellamy speaking.
>
> Maria,
>
> One thing you didn't point out in your last post was that the Orono > conference had much more to offer to women than acceptance by a male elite > that we could kind of "bask in." Rachel Blau du Plessis' and Joan > Retallack's talks were the best moments of the conference for me.
> Rachel's talk reminded me that if it weren't for women like Rachel who > promoted a specifically female approach to post-modernism, I wouldn't > exist. I also found it great to just watch Margorie Perloff, her energy, > her awesome confidence.
>
> I think you should do a bit of deconstruction on your post--in your > complaints about the conference the men are treated as troublesome boys who > do things out of line, but--usually with your guidance--apologize and get > their shit together. The only unredeemable characters in your post are the > covertly racist female plenary speakers in the front row. Funny, I was in > the third row (sitting next to Rachel, who was quiet as a mouse) and I > didn't hear any loud whisperings. What female plenary speakers are left?
> Margorie Perloff? Alicia Ostriker? Couldn't these female plenary speakers > be considered a female elite whose acceptance a young scholar would want > to bask in?
>
> One thing that stuck me about Lisa Amber Phillips' presence at the > conference was how clearly she liked women and how much time she spent > talking with other women--rather than chasing "testosterone," as you put it > in an earlier post. There should more to feminism than demanding > materialistic equality.

↑ Index

28. filch
Peeing
Mon 1 Jul 1996

Studies have shown the incidence of peeing in pools to be larger, by far, among members of the adult male population.

Subsequent studies will show whether this figure can be broken down by race, socioeconomic status, and/or sexual orientation.

If you would be interested in participating in such a study please contact me at your earliest convenience.

↑ Index

29. Ken Edwards
British Women Poets
Mon 1 Jul 1996

I'm a little late responding to this, as I've only just downloaded several days' worth of digests, but...

Out of Everywhere, the anthology John Matthias mentioned, is published by Reality Street Editions, the press I run in conjunction with Wendy Mulford. I've mentioned it several times before on this list. Among the thirty contributors there are eight who are UK-based: Maggie O'Sullivan (who edited the book), Wendy herself, who also contributes an afterword, Caroline Bergvall, Paula Claire, Grace Lake, Geraldine Monk, Carlyle Reedy and Denise Riley. Another contributor, Fiona Templeton, is Scottish but has lived in New York for the past few years. The 21 others are American and Canadian.

The book has been out since March in the UK, is a 256pp paperback and costs 9 pounds. Until recently I was under the impression that copies would be available by now at SPD, and at Marginal Distribution in Canada. However, I have been badly let down by people who promised to ship them over; it transpires that Marginal will only now be receiving copies and the copies which SPD should have had weeks ago have apparently still not arrived; I shall be following this up urgently. (I'm sorry: I'm in an "if you want anything done you've got to do it yourself" mood.)

I know many people are eagerly awaiting copies. Please be patient, I'll sort this out soon.

Those who are going to the University of New Hampshire shindig in August/September will get a chance to hear some of the above in person: Maggie, Wendy, Denise. Also Catherine Walsh, who's Irish, not in the anthology but very good. I shall be coming over too, as well as a number of other like-minded poets of the male persuasion.

↑ Index

30. John Cayley
Engaged Issue Four - the tinned issue
Mon 1 Jul 1996

NOW AVAILABLE - ENGAGED Issue Four - the tinned issue.

Issue Four is dedicated to Pop and Found art.

The featured work of ten artists and the additional content, which includes seven ounces of potential poetry, are sealed within a standard supermarket tin.

Artists featured in # 4:
Patricia Collins - Fragile
Andrea Draper - Pickled Madonnas
Alberto Duman - Seduced Item
Maria Fusco - Questionnaire
Medium Sliced - Mobile Phone
Michael Leigh - Curious Thing
Stewart Life - Easy
Alyson Morgan - Untitled
Norman Sherfield - Mona Lisa
Kate Smith - Chilli Lid and more.

"a magazine like no other, and not even like itself" - Creative Review

"Tip for the top" - Time Out

ENGAGED is an arts magazine that aims to be experimental, challenging conventional ideas about publishing. Each issue appears in a different medium in an attempt to let artists publish work in the way it was intended to be experienced.

FUTURE ISSUES Issue Five - video issue for film-makers and animators Issue Six - radio issue for poets, musicians, sound-artists... Issue Seven - Comic/Cartoon strip issue

All work welcomed. SAE for return of work.
Work published in ENGAGED is selected on merit and the magazine works towards equal opportunities for all artists.

FEED BACK
1.Do you have any suggestions regarding a medium in which you think ENGAGED should publish?

2.Would you like to place a free ad. with a view to initiating a collaboration with another artist/writer etc.?
3.Do you have any suggestions of new outlets for ENGAGED?

ENGAGED is available on subscription
PRICE: UK-Ten Pounds, Europe-Thirteen Pounds, World-Fifteen Pounds (all include p&p).
Please make cheques payable to ENGAGED MAGAZINE, and if paying from abroad then please make out a cheque for the equivalent amount in your currency.

or from selected bookstores:
Dillons, Long Acre, London
Tate Gallery , London
ICA, The Mall, London
Serpentine, Hyde Pk, London
Arnolfini, Narrow Key, Bristol
Ormeau Baths, Belfast
Collective Gallery, Edinburgh
CCA, Glasgow
Zone Gallery, Newcastle
Athenium, Amsterdam and others

This issue has been funded by London Arts Board

ENGAGED, 334a Kennington Road, London, SE11 4LD
[redacted]
0[redacted]

ENGAGED Issue Three is still available from the ENGAGED address It is published on cross platform CD ROM and features:

"well-wrought and funny" Esquire

ART - ARTISTS COLLAGES - a collaborative piece by Oona Campbell and Paul Ramsay who combine random sound and image to create an unfixed, living collage. GEOFF STOCKER's animations - pure, abstract, computer generated art. KATH MOONAN - seven stills taken from 'Prime site', a campaign that set out to question the politics driving the development of mass media communication. S.O.S - by Tony Patrickson, uses sound, film and animation to create an impression of a world in which technological developments lead to an emotionally barren existence SKIN - by Carl Stevenson, a responsive and sensual piece dealing with corporeality in a medium that is, by its nature, virtual. SELBSTPORTRAIT - by Claudia Herbst - four animations centred around the female body, giving abstract impressions of form and identity. BOOK UNBOUND - by John Cayley - an interactive textual/poetic work - 'when you open "Book Unbound" you will change it irreversibly.'(This is available only on Mac Platform) A PORTRAIT OF PERSONALITY - by Katie Waters - a lively animation comically portraying various aspects of the personality of the artist. This piece has an introduction written by Martha Ladley of Real World Studios. ICY-ICY - by Ronald Fraser Munro - a series that sets off imagery against poetry creating a striking and disturbing piece of work. THIS WORLD - by Martha Aitchison - a still in which text is built up, layer upon layer, to create a pictorial account of the language.

IN ADDITION
A FEATURE ON STRIKE, a fine arts project based in London.
AN INTERVIEW with featured artists Paul Ramsay and Oona Campbell.
THE LONELY ARTS COLUMN, artists advertise for others to collaborate with.
A GRAFFITI CUBICLE where readers are encourage to get involved and pick up a spray can.
LETTERS AND OTHER MESSAGES EXHIBITION DATES

All this can be found within the virtual walls of a three-d rendered public lavatory.

PRICE: UK-Ten Pounds, Europe-Thirteen Pounds, World-Fifteen Pounds (all include p&p)

Please make cheques payable to ENGAGED MAGAZINE, and if paying from abroad them please make out a cheque for the equivalent amount in your currency. (if you have already subscribed, for fifteen pounds, the difference will be sent out with this issue)

This issue was funded by The Arts Council of England, Cimex and PDO

ENGAGED, 334a Kennington Road, London, SE11 4LD
[redacted]
0[redacted]

↑ Index

31. Loss Glazier

Postmortems on Orono (Perloff)

Mon 1 Jul 1996

To All,

Marjorie Perloff was kind enough to send an Orono report for the online book. I wanted to share this in advance with the list!

My thanks to Marjorie,

Loss

>
>Postmortems on Orono:
>
>In some ways, this conference was not as exciting for me as the 30s one a >few years back because we're in many ways still "in" the fifties and so >they're harder to assess and it was painful to have appraisals like Louis >Martz's that assumed nothing had changed in forty years and we could still >talk about the giant breakthrough of FOR THE UNION DEAD for chrissake.
>
>The highlight (for me) was the attention now paid to Frank O'Hara, our new >hero, as it were. It's been 20 years since I wrote my O'Hara book; in the >midseventies, I was reprimanded by Don Allen and others for referring to >Joe LeSueur as O'Hara's "lover"; the correct word then was "friend." As >for race issues--so fascinating at this conference, especially Steve >Evans's and Ben Friedlander's analyses--in the seventies, it was all one >could do to get people to accept that these texts were passable as poems, >much less discuss O'Hara on race. So I was delighted to hear these talks >and delighted that the 50s are no longer considered "The Age of Olson" as >they once were....
>
>I wish there had been more time for discussion--so many issues were simply >left HANGING. After each and every talk I had dozens of questions as I'm >sure we all did and so for future reference, I think it would be great to >forget having keynoters at all and have fewer sessions, each with an hour >of built in discussion. That's how you learn, I think.
>
>Again, poetry readings shouldn't be sandwiched in at 10.30 PM as a sort of >afterthought. Either have them or not but if so, give them some >prominence.
>
>A larger question I've discussed with Burt is the diversity issue. Are >all poets of the 50s of equal interest? Do we make choices and have a >point of view? Does anyone get to give readings just because he/she wrote >poetry during the fifties? It can be argued either way but I did feel >that to have Jerry Rothenberg's account of the making of POEMS FOR THE >MILLENIUM followed by Louis Martz's talk which implied that the issues
>Jerry was discussing didn't so much as exist created a strange empty >space. Burt's argument is that this diversity of points of view is >valuable. I'd be curious to know how others felt about this.
>
>All in all, despite the horrible weather, awful food, lousy facilities and >problems getting back and forth for those of us at the Bangor Inn, I >thought it was a fabulous time, including the fabled argument I had with >Barrett Watten at the latenight cash bar. We've got to keep arguing and >not be too polite. That means not being so hyperpolite to dead poets >either. Or in making even Allen Ginsberg a prophet.

>
>Finally: Kevin's fashion report was WONDERFUL. I was one of the few >people present who knows Star Black well--she's a really old friend via >Paul Monette and Roger Horwitz. Kevin's right: she absolutely won the >fashion award and was also like a breath of fresh air in this sometimes >hyperacademicized world. Star makes a living as a professional >photographer; has covered lots of stories and made artist's books; she's >now writing more poetry and is passionate about it. It was also great to >have Geoff O'Brien, another non-academic, really fine writer around. And >I loved Star's responses to >things--you should get her to write them up.
>
>Ciao!
>
>Marjorie
>
>
>

↑ Index

32. Steve Evans

Re: chapbook 2 (North, Robinson, Ngai)

Mon 1 Jul 1996

Editor Beth Anderson has brought out another beautifully designed chapbook in her fledgling reference: press series.

The idea behind this terrific series is to bring together work by three poets who are at different stages in their careers, from just emerging to firmly established.

re: chapbook 2 publishes new poems by Charles North, Elizabeth Robinson, and Sianne Ngai. There is also a striking cover drawing by artist Renee Anderson.

Some of you no doubt saw re: chapbook 1 (1995), featuring Keith Waldrop, Jennifer Moxley, and Angela Littwin, also with a graphic by Renee Anderson.

This is an editorial project worth keeping up with!

Make out a check for $5.00 to BETH ANDERSON

and mail it to reference: press
154 Doyle Avenue
Providence RI 02906

↑ Index

33. Steve Evans

Robert Kocik/Andrew Levy Reading

Mon 1 Jul 1996

For those of you in or near or willing to drive like wild to get to Providence, this Bastille Day's eve...

Don't miss

Robert Kocik and Andrew Levy

on Saturday, 13 July at 8 p.m.

at the wonderful new loft space of Patrick Phillips, 320 Lafayette Street on the Providence / Pawtucket line

Both these writers are newly returned to the New York area after extended sojourns, Kocik in Paris and Levy in Chicago.

Both are poets engaged in prodigious poetic and epistemological projects, recent glimpses of which can be caught in Kocik's AUKSO (GAIN)--published as OBJECT 4 (Spring/Summer 1995)--and Levy's CURVE (O Books 1994).

Come for the poetry, stay for the poetics (party).

More information, including directions, backchannel or call [redacted]

r i a t n m u
a t s u o o o s

↑ Index

34. James Brook
my stack, 2
Tue 2 Jul 1996

New to the list, old to books, I confess to reading the following in fits, starts, and restarts (thanks to Kevin Killian for inspiring me to click Reply):

Apollinaire, Lettres a Lou (one side of the correspondence--only a few of her letters survive--rich in poetry, emotion, and naughty bits)

Jens August Schade, People Meet and Sweet Music Fills the Heart (a great lyrical novel by a Danish poet woefully undertranslated into English-- there's only a small book of poems from Curbstone; this novel was translated for Dell in 1969 because it served as the basis for what appears to be a cheesey Dano-Porno flick of the era: it's compared to I Am Curious)

The indexing chapter in the Chicago Manual of Style (with snooze alarm)

Tom Raworth, Clean & Well Lit (which includes a lovely song to dedicated to Franco Beltrametti)

Henri Lefebvre, La Somme et le reste (autobiographical/philosophical/poetical reflections published in 1959)

A pile of books on San Francisco and California (research for a book on what we around here call The City, a place susceptible to smug alerts)

Please direct all questions about indexing elsewhere. . . .

Regards from afar,

James Brook

↑ Index

35. Daniel Salmon
Not a stack
Tue 2 Jul 1996

Jumping on the reading list band wagon - these are what I'm bogged down in at present.

Alastair Campbell 'Sidewinder'Never read his fiction before & i am quite enjoying it as a late night book. He is a Cook Island/New Zealand Poet/novelist.
Judith Binney 'Redemption Songs' Biography of Te Kooti (bloody hard work but it pays off)
J C Beaglehole 'The Life of Captain James Cook'
Hugh Kenner 'The Pound Era'
Conrad 'Nigger of the Narcissus'
From the Other Side of the Century (Bought through poetics - at last a way to supplement limited choice auckland bookshops.

Beekeeping books & Japanese history.
& 2 books by Lowell Thomas 'The Sea Devil' & 'Raiders of the Deep' for a poetry project.
In the Penguin 60's Classics - for the next time i am stuck in a cafe without a paer or company Henry James' 'The Lesson of the Master'
For light relief in all the non-fiction i just finished Mao II -Don de Lilo & American Tabloid - James Ellroy, don't think I'll be visiting either of them again - still better than sitting through Tarantino or Oliver Stone movies.
& Listening to the Iliad on talking book on long drives in the car.

Daniel.
Daniel Salmon

↑ Index

36. Ron Silliman
Irby's ear
Tue 2 Jul 1996

Keith,

The best way I know to demonstrate Irby's ear is by example. These are the opening lines (first section) of "Heredom," the first poem in Orexis (Station Hill, 1981):

lobe of opalescent glass broken in the irreplaceable lampshade out of the shoulder, the corridor down the street the kids from junior high come by in t-shirts for the warmth of February pigeons overhead

    stamp and cry in their sleep gathered, the branch of acacia fused through the green swirled Egyptian thorn milk waters raised, itself, of the lost and gathered body of mastery or all the highschool years again, unslept, review the annual faces [over and over till they run green in the movies after the eyes are closed and still as distant as they were in person

        the society of the ordinary highschool days, never left, will it?

against the society of the widow's son, those who on the elephant's back be freed?

the generation of mourning doves' cries is from twilight in the mind releasing and attracting us

I hope your screen reader doesn't muck with the line breaks (I had to insert one "[" myself).

Just following the progression of the 'l's 'o's 's's etc from the first two lines makes me dizzy with pleasure, noticing how "lampshade" sets up "stamp" later, all the way to the contrast in the final line between the liquid consonants of "releasing" versus the hard "tt" and "ct" in "attracting" (not even wanting to make a case, though I think there's one to be made, for the way that line mimics the cooing and feather settling sound of doves). I don't think anybody's done a better job than Kenneth at understanding how Olson used to the caesura in his breath defined line (and these lines seem to me not an instance of the projective in that simplistic organic metaphor, but rather each is a construct). I find "gathered, the branch of acacia" to be breathtaking in how that comma works. I've been reading the poem maybe twice a year now for 15 years and it never gets old.

You are right about Kenneth having been disappeared likewise. A little like Enslin, it has had to do with the fact that sometime around 1980 or so little magazines that sought to carry forward some sense of the Olsonian project just stopped cold, combined with Kenneth's return to Lawrence, KS, to take care of his mother (the widow of the above poem) during her last years and his own very reticent nature about putting his work forward. I spoke with him last about two years ago, when the veterans of the Free Speech Movement were searching out folks who had been active in the FSM at Berkeley in 1964 and Lowell Levant, a Berkeley poet of those years and friend of Irby's (and now a truck driver out of Union City), was on the list. Kenneth said he'd seen and talked to Ronald Johnson just once since his own return to Kansas, so it would appear that Kansas is a state one can indeed get lost in (Mr. Dole, please follow suit).

Station Hill/Tansy did a big collection of the late '70s poems, Call Steps: Plains, Camps, Statioins, Consistories, in 1992. Orexis is reprinted there. It's probably still available from SPD and I recommend it heartily.

Further note to the Oronians: it is very intriguing seeing the comments about, in particular, the talks given by Steve Evans and Ben Friedlander, but for the life of me, I cannot divine from any of the comments what was actually said.

(And Von Hallberg pulled that same stunt at an Oppen conference at UC San Diego about 10 years ago, declaring Oppen to be a "tedious" poet with onerous politics on a panel.)

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

37. Henry
Re: chapbook 2 (North, Robinson, Ngai)
Tue 2 Jul 1996

On Mon, 1 Jul 1996 22:14:43 -0400 Steve Evans said:
>Editor Beth Anderson has brought out another beautifully >designed chapbook in her fledgling reference: press series.

Speaking of Beth Anderson: she'll be reading with Keith Waldrop at Native Gallery in Providence on August 15th, time to be announced (probably around 8 pm). Native Gallery is a new big space at 367 Charles St. Sponsored by the Poetry Mission. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

38. Loss Glazier
Re: my stack
Tue 2 Jul 1996

At 10:43 PM 7/1/96 +0100, you wrote:

Kevin, your annotations are just wooooooooooooonderful! -- Loss

↑ Index

39. Pritchett,Pat
Re: my stack
Tue 2 Jul 1996

Patrick Pritchett here:

Capital idea. My own list includes the following; which are being read in no particular order, or rather with Dr. Johnson's notion in mind of "read what you like:"

1. Descent of Alette - Alice Notley (Penguin)

2. The Human Abstract - Elizabeth Willis (Penguin)

3. The Green Lake Is Awake - Joseph Ceravolo (Coffee House). Many thanks to Joel Lewis and others who initiated discussion of Mr. C. and led me to him. He's marvelous!

4. Call Steps - Ken Irby (Station Hill). Met Ken recently here in Boulder. Very nice man. The work is pure delight.

5. Moon Palace - Paul Auster (Penguin)

6. A House White With Sorrow - Jennifer Heath (Rodent Press). Great new novel on Afghanistan.

7. The Cold of Poetry - Lyn Hejinian (Sun & Moon)

8. On The Name - Derrida (Stanford UP)

9. A History of the Arab Peoples - Albert Hourani (Belknap Harvard)

10. Skywatch - A book on clouds, storms, weather...

11. Ice Time - Re: climatology

12. The Kabbalah Unveiled - S.L. MacGregor Matthews (sic)

From: Kevin Killian
To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
Subject: my stack
Date: Tuesday, July 02, 1996 12:47AM

<<File Attachment: HEADERS.TXT>>

William Northcutt, you had a good idea. Here's what I've been reading.

1. Bitter Blue by Jeremy Reed. Incidentally, thanks to all who backchannel me with info on Reed, especially Pierre Joris, Ira Lightman, Joel Lewis, Romana Huk, and Ken Edwards.

2. Portrait of a Lady by Henry James.

3. Autotoxaemia by Latif Harris. About six weeks ago Eddy Berrigan was looking for a job here in San Francisco and told me he went into this one store & the owner gave him a test, and it turned out it was the "questionnaire" Jack Spicer asked his students to fill out to apply to his 1957 "Magic" Workshop (it's printed in the back of the "Collected Books" of Spicer). Following up I went into the store and demanded to see the owner. That's how I met Latif Harris, and he gave me one of his books. Turns out he is the missing witness I've been seeking for all these years, the man who drove Jack Spicer to his last poetry reading at the Berkeley Conference (1965) and had the nerve to bundle him up in the car with the man JS hated, Lew Welch. P.S., good book! PSS>, Eddy did not get the job!

4. The Green Mile, by Stephen King. One of Steve's best.

5. Abigail Child, "Scatter Matrix." Thanks to the people at Segue for sending this to me (or was it to Small Press Traffic????)

6. "Heart of the Breath," by Jim Brodey. I'm supposed to write a review of this one, and it is so long. (Quite a bargain.)

7. "The Prince, the Showgirl and Me," by Colin Clark. At age 19 Colin Clark was the 3rd assistant director on the set of the Olivier/Marilyn Monroe film "The Prince and the Showgirl." This is his diary of the period.

8. "Sunshine Muse," by Peter Plagens (1974). Out of date by lots, but an interesting art history of California during the Cold War. Who was it recommended this book to me as a good place to get more information about Jay De Feo, the San Francisco painter whose life I am dramatizing as we speak?

9. From Outlaw to Classic, by Alan Golding. I have read this book before, but I wanted to read it again to see if I have anything to add to Golding's Laws of Canon Formation.

10. Angry Women in Rock, ed. Andrea Juno, this is the first book of a new press formed by one of the editors of the defunct ReSEARCH.

11. Learned and Leaved: a Tribute to Rosalie Moore-Moore was one of the Bay Area activist poets, like Lawrence Hart, whose death a few months ago inspired a bit of discussion here on this list. These Activist people really had a program, didn't they? A program, and a destiny. Alan Golding, how do they fit in to your ideas about Canon Formation?

--Kevin Killian

↑ Index

40. Edward Foster
NEW DOUG OLIVER BOOK
Tue 2 Jul 1996

New from Talisman:

Douglas Oliver's Selected Poems

ISBN: 1-883689-38-4, $10.50

Visa/Mastercard orders: [redacted]

↑ Index

41. Edward Foster
NEW LESLIE SCALAPINO BOOK
Tue 2 Jul 1996

New from Talisman:

Leslie Scalapino's Green and Black: Selected Writings

ISBN: 1-883689-36-8, $10.50

Visa/Mastercard: [redacted]

↑ Index

42. Edward Foster
NEW GEOFFREY O'BRIEN BOOK
Tue 2 Jul 1996

New from Talisman:

Geoffrey O'Brien's Floating City: Selected Poems

ISBN: 1-883689-38-4, $10.50
Visa/Mastercard orders: [redacted]

↑ Index

43. David Baratier
orno for pyros (aside
Tue 2 Jul 1996

Aldon mentioned that Marjorie "offered a brilliant reading of the differing ideologies and aesthetics in two widely circulated collections of photographs -- the infamous "Family of Man" exhibit and Robert Frank's collection of American photos published by Grove press -- Professor Perloff, "read" individual photos as well as the reception of the volumes as context against which to read Ginsberg, O'Hara and that ole gem "Love Calls Us to the Things of this World" -- This kind of paper is really exciting to me -- not an attempt to read the cultural past as a transparently available and stable entity, but looking at, how else to say it, what everyone was then looking at, as a means of deepening our discussions of the, hate to say it, poems themselves --" There are various books of poetry by Simon Perchik that brilliantly "read" these same exact photo's into poems which might be of interest. The Snowcat Poems (1981) work on Robert Frank's photos. The Gandolf Poems (1986) (and the book after, I forget the name) do a superb translation of the "Family of Man" set. The wild thing is the translation itself, how the punctuation is used as a codification process without direct (as Frye would say "radical" or copular) metaphor but rather a connatative associtional value that Perchik builds throughout each poem to guide a readers understanding of the culmative affective utilization of the punctuation. For some reason, few folks seems aware of his work with constructing an intricate set (through series) of "unit values" for various typographical signs, "Family of Man" works,or even of his connection with Blackburn in the late 40's. I can get more publisher info if anyone is interested. Be well.

David Baratier

↑ Index

44. Keith Tuma

Re: Irby's ear

Tue 2 Jul 1996

A public thanks to Ron Silliman for the example of and commentary on Ken Irby's work. I'm sometimes surprised that we don't get more of this on the list, what with all the poets subscribed. More micro-analysis of technique, that is. It's one way to make the disappeared reappear. One test of value in a poetic mode is its possibilities for refinement and extension, no? I'm thinking of Basil Bunting's remarks about Pound having provided a box of tools, making it possible to go on, and not by simple mimicry or imitation. Similarly, I'm thinking right now about the ways it might be possible to speak of "the new sentence" in Harryette Mullen's _Muse & Drudge_, what it means that she's crossed the new sentence with idioms and stanzas derived from the blues, r&b, etc, forced thoughtfulness about the stanza as unit back onto formal practices identified and explored by RS and others (if I'm right about this). (The stanza/strophe of Toner or Xing is not at all Mullen's, it seems to me.)

Anyway, I for one would be grateful for more discussion of technique--and thanks again to Ron.

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

45. Mark Wallace

Quartermain, Cage, Beckett

Tue 2 Jul 1996

Dear Peter Quartermain:

Thanks very much for your interesting query about Cage and Beckett from several days ago. I'm only on e-mail about twice a week, so I'm sorry I couldn't get back to you sooner. In that particular post of mine that you quote, I think I was using the word "limitations" exactly as Charles Smith suggests I was (thanks, Charles), that is simply the unavoidable fact of having a consciousness that can imagine a limited number of concerns, etc. Olson's quote has always seemed important to me--in my own new Haunted Baronet chapbook I echo it, somewhat more darkly as befits the contents of the chapbook, as "The form of limitations is history." But I agree with you, also, that "limitations" is a problematic word if understood in other ways--often, the "limitations" of a writer turn out, in critical work, simply to be the extent to which the poet is not doing what the evaluator wishes the poet was doing, i.e. the "limitations" are just as likely to be that of the critical evaluator as they are that of the work itself. In that sense I greatly enjoyed Louis Cabri's remark about bringing poetry to theory, rather than the other way around--that poetic practice can often enact a scathing criticism of the "limits" of literary theory is something that is often missed. But I still believe in the value of critical response, however limited most such responses turn out to be, and I take also your point that such critical response might find the word "limitations" to be itself limiting. Perhaps I would say that it would be better to talk about the "problems" (or "issues," perhaps) that a given writer creates in the mind of a reader, with the recognition that both the critic and the poet (and they can be one and the same!) speak from the perspective of their own "limits" in the Olsonian sense.

If I were to talk about the "problems" that Cage's work present for me, I think I would focus right now on the issue of what might be called "the dark side" in Cage's work. It's possible to argue that Cage is one of the most "optimistic" artists of the 20th century, yet what exactly would one mean by such an argument? Simply that from the perspective of his Buddhism, "worry" is a transitory, ego-ridden phenonmena. But is that really where Cage would land on such a problem? I don't think so, really. Rod Smith, who knew Cage and is certainly more of an expert on his work than I am, has often told me about Cage's reticence to talk about the "darkest" periods of his life, such as the 1940s, and I wonder about the significance of that possible "resistance" to darkness. According also to Rod, Cage did not like Beckett's work, because it was too relentlessly "dark." Yet I think the surface "optimism" of Cage's work is deceiving--one has only to think of Cage's almost total rejection of western music to recognize how much of the world he disliked--hated even--and how vehemently he hated it. It turns out that Cage's surface "acceptance" of any phenomena (any noise as music, etc) turns out to include a rejection of western cultural hierarchies in every conceivable guise, which means quite literally that he must have loathed almost everything around him, however "quietly" or "gently" (two cliched phrases about Cage that I can't stand--the man's work seems amazingly fierce and insistent, frankly). Indeed some things that he rejected perhaps seem insufficiently considered--is it in SILENCE that he speaks against jazz as simply repeating the same foreground/background (melody/harmony) as western classical structures (I don't have books here with me, and I certainly haven't read everything he might have said about jazz)? In any case, even if his rejections seem in most cases valid to me, it's hard to imagine that a man who has spent so much time throwing off the burden of his whole culture does not understand what having a "dark side" would be. I'm tempted to echo Robert Duncan here and say "I prefer to take my John Cage dark."

When it comes to Beckett, the problem his work most presents for me is the same problem that the work of William Burroughs presented for me when I was writing my dissertation on it--how is one to read the relation between the fictional world created in the books and the world outside it that we all know to exist? Too many critics of Burroughs simply wanted to reduce his work to a representational description of human life, and then to dismiss it on the grounds that it was exaggerated (i.e. how does one take the Burroughs phrase "communication must become total before we can stop it"? literally? some other way?). A social realist critic like Lukacs would have read Beckett simply as the decadent expression of a "subjectivity," whereas Adorno, perhaps, would have seen in Beckett a series of social symptoms created by class consciousness, i.e. would have seen Beckett as successful on the grounds of his social criticism. But what's the truth of this really? That is, do we really read Beckett as social critic, or as limited subjectivity? Do we read the circular frustration his texts enact as existentialist comment on human absurdity irrespective of any social context? I think it's possible to say that all these things are legitimate possibilities arising from Beckett's work, and that all of them are potentially valuable, and that, finally, the genius of Beckett's work is the multiplicity of context to which it is responsive.

Another "problem" I find interesting in the work of both writers is the extent to which a dominant paradigm does or does not control the work which they produced. There is some level of theoretical sameness to all of what Cage does, and all of what Beckett does--their work, like say Wallace Stevens, seems to operate on modulations within dominant paradigms, whereas someone like Gertrude Stein seems much more comfortable operating in multiple paradigms. I think Cage has a greater level of multiple approaches than Beckett--he's both a musician and poet, so there's at least two approaches there at the very least (though Beckett wrote fiction and plays, etc). But I wonder the extent to which their artistic goals remain similar accross pieces, and the extent to which they differ, and the extent to which achieving such similarity or difference across a lifetime of production reveals to us the "limits" (Olsonian sense again) of various creative minds. Not a question I could possibly answer here.

But all this is more or less off the top of my head, as e-mail encourages, and perhaps has gone on too long already.

Mark Wallace /----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

46. Mark Roberts

AWOL: Poetry Stand at the Australian Book Fair (forwarded)

Tue 2 Jul 1996

> Mime-Version: 1.0
> Date: Tue, 2 Jul 1996 07:02:17 +1000
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (awol)
> Subject: AWOL: Poetry Stand at the Australian Book Fair
>
> Poetry Stand at the Australian Book Fair
>
> This year The Poetry Stand will, for the first time, appear at the Australian Book Fair (4-7 July, Darling Harbour Sydney). The Poetry Stand represents a world first initiative. This co-operative adventure will place emphasis on poetry and independent poetry publishers from NSW. The venture has been sponsored by the NSW Ministry for the Arts.
>
> The Poetry Stand will provide a showcase for poetry and highlight the quality and diversity of poetry published in NSW. It highlights the significance of poetry in a growing market and will bring poetry more attention from distributors, librarians, educators, curriculum advisers and the general public.
>
> As a special event one of Australia's brightest poets, Adam Aitken, will be launching his new book IN ONE HOUSE (A&R in association with Paper Bark Press).
>
> Publishers and organisations taking part include A&R in association with Paper Bark Press, AWOL, Hale & Iremonger, Five Islands Press, Heat, Hobo, Scarp, Southerly and many others
>
> For further details contact Heather Cam at Hale & Iremonger ph (02) 565 1955 or email the Poets Union Inc at [redacted].
>
> AWOL
> Australian Writing On Line
> [redacted]

> http://www.ozemail.com.au/~awol
> PO Box 333 Concord NSW 2137 Australia
> Phone 61 2 7475667
> Fax 61 2 7472802

Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

47. maria damon

Re: Jacquee la Mousse, ono etc

Tue 2 Jul 1996

okay, dodie, all points well taken. it's true, all generalizations are kind of odious (except for blanket staements about minnesota; actually, now that i'm back, one day at a time it's not terrible). i for my part admire anyone who has the presence of mind to live outside of institutional life...i cd never, for example, run a small business although i'd love to, say, do a cafe/bookstore or something. if i weren't an academic i'd probably be on disability or otherwise scraping by on govt benificence (sp?). can't deal w/ too many unknowns, too much responsibility, etc.

In message <v01520d00adfd9339a523@[205.134.228.103]> UB Poetics discussion
group writes:
> Okay, Maria, thanks for listening and not chewing me out. To add a note of > compassion, I for one certainly would never be able to survive the hell of > academic politics--and I think any woman with the strength to make it in > that world deserves--I don't know what: admiration? Awe? But I'm > sympathetic to Lisa Amber Philips' complaints. These blanket statements > about what White Middle Class Women do and do not know are highly > problematic. Also statements about young women. There are lots of young > women poets (many of them black, asian, and lesbian) on the scene here in > San Francisco, and, from what I've seen, they have a wide range of response > to the question of whether or not they're oppressed as women in our > "post"-feminist era. I'm particularly close to my intern who's 27, and her > frustration over the position of women in the young hip world she operates > in is a frequent topic of discussion-- particularly in terms of her acting > out her sexual desires.

>
> Dodie

↑ Index

48. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: British Women Poets
Tue 2 Jul 1996

Just back in town after a long weekend and it will take me a while to catch up, but many thanks for all those fab suggestions. I've forwarded them all to my friend and she's wishing she had a whole course to devote to the subject rather than the lit intro. she'll be teaching. I wldn't be surprised if those intriguing names and titles eventually drive one of use to teach such a course. Oh, and at the risk of "boosterism" (Yo Keith), i can't resist relaying how impressed my friend has been w/ the knowledge and enthusiasm present in this forum. A similar call went out to the ModBrit list (more academic, and also, by default, fiction-oriented) and garnered pretty much no result at all. I've been thinking about the dangers of easy "consensus" Keith wrote about, but still, for myself, finding a lot of breadth and variety under the "alternative" umbrella when it comes to questions of who and what people are reading.

steve

↑ Index

49. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Enslin
Tue 2 Jul 1996

Ron Silliman wrote:

I'll be on the lookout, as it were, for New Sharon's Prospect, which I don't know. And I agree that Enslin's neglect has much to do with his decision not to "hustle" his work. In fact, he seems almost a limit case in that regard, and interesting as such. From what I've seen his life in small town on the Maine coast is an impressively Thoreauvian one. Gathers mussels, clams and other fruits de mer, feasts on veggies from his meticulously tended garden, and pays very little attention to the mechanisms of literary fame.

But I have to say my experience of reading Enlin's longer work differs from Ron's. I'm about 350 pages into the 2 vol. Ranger without yet marking its "fading" into an excessively "restricted range of possibility."

That book wld be difficult to excerpt here for exemplary purposes, and I don't have time to type out a section from the "Autumnal Rime" sequence I mentioned earlier (but wld refer everyone to the Enslin number of Talisman). So I'll have to content myself w/ one of the small domestic poems from Music in the Key of C. (Behind the title is Schoenberg's remark that there is much good music still to be composed in that key.)

Where?

Buy I'll not take you home
unless we have been somewhere or met and asked each other where? There is the chance that something like this happens
every day on streets impossible
in clutter where? the faceless angels intersect suppose they do
and where the home is bound to labyrinth so many threads
an asking noise of traffic desperate to cease and darkens lightens
as a voice that sharpens
through it where?

To my ear at least this is very fine, and quite precise "musically," for lack of a better word (Enslin was trained as a composer). And since Ron mentions Irby's caesurae, I might point here to Enslin's use of an Oppen-derived "gap syntax" that I've tried to reproduce here (the exact spacing, that is) as far as my editing program will permit.

steve

> Re the disappearance, to whatever degree, of Enslin (please spell that name right), Tarn, Schwerner et al, I would think this is a sign that, say, Sulfur and its predecessor Caterpillar have not had the lasting impact on the scene that its editor imagines. All of these are interesting poets, but their relation to Olson et al is at some distance (Armand really is part of the scene around NYC that originally led to Caterpillar--he, Antin, Rothenberg, Kelly et al either "too young" or too non-projective to get into the Allen anthology). In the case of Tarn and Enslin, they've lived at some distance from those key urban centers and really don't hustle their work as much as they might.
>
> Nathaniel was in Hoboken the other week for the big Russ/American thang and looked and sounded fine. His work with Grossman/Cape Goliard, which originally brought out the Mayan Letters, Mayakovsky's How are Verse

> Made, the first English translations of Victor Segalen and Nazim Hikmet, LZ's "A" 22/23, Henri Lefebvre's Dialectical Materialism, was one of the most intensely great editing projects of the past 40 years. It's impact is still vibrating through the culture.
>
> My favorite Enslin book is an early one: New Sharon's Prospect and Journals. The long poems seemed too much to me to be exercises on the line, fine for a hundred pages, but ultimately fading into a restricted range of possibility. For pure studies of the ear, my own preference has been, say, for Ken Irby, whose work does so much WITHIN the individual line.
>
> All best,
>
> Ron

↑ Index

50. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: Enslin

Tue 2 Jul 1996

Dammit! I just did the same thing to Ron Silliman that I did to Burt K. another time. I wrote the stuff below, not Ron. His post is quoted after the "Steve" signoff. Sorry for the tangle.

steve

> Ron Silliman wrote:
>
> I'll be on the lookout, as it were, for New Sharon's Prospect, which I don't know. And I agree that Enslin's neglect has much to do with his decision not to "hustle" his work. In fact, he seems almost a limit case in that regard, and interesting as such. From what I've seen his life in small town on the Maine coast is an impressively Thoreauvian one. Gathers mussels, clams and other fruits de mer, feasts on veggies from his meticulously tended garden, and pays very little attention to the mechanisms of literary fame.
>
> *But I have to say my experience of reading Enlin's longer work differs from Ron's. I'm about 350 pages into the 2 vol. Ranger without yet marking its "fading" into an excessively "restricted range of possibility."*
>
> That book wld be difficult to excerpt here for exemplary purposes, and I don't have time to type out a section from the "Autumnal Rime" sequence I mentioned earlier (but wld refer everyone to the Enslin number of Talisman). So I'll have to content myself w/ one of the small domestic poems from Music in the Key of C. (Behind the title is Schoenberg's remark that there is much good music still to be composed in that key.)

Where?

Buy I'll not take you home
unless we have been somewhere
or met and asked each other
where? There is the chance that something like this happens
every day on streets impossible
in clutter where? the faceless
angels intersect suppose they do
and where the home is bound to labyrinth so many threads
an asking noise of traffic desperate
to cease and darkens lightens
as a voice that sharpens
through it where?

To my ear at least this is very fine, and quite precise "musically," for lack of a better word (Enslin was trained as a composer). And since Ron mentions Irby's caesurae, I might point here to Enslin's use of an Oppen-derived "gap syntax" that I've tried to reproduce here (the exact spacing, that is) as far as my editing program will permit.

steve

Re the disappearance, to whatever degree, of Enslin (please spell that name right), Tarn, Schwerner et al, I would think this is a sign that, say, Sulfur and its predecessor Caterpillar have not had the lasting impact on the scene that its editor imagines. All of these are interesting poets, but their relation to Olson et al is at some distance (Armand really is part of the scene around NYC that originally led to Caterpillar--he, Antin, Rothenberg, Kelly et al either "too young" or too non-projective to get into the Allen anthology). In the case of Tarn and Enslin, they've lived at some distance from those key urban centers and really don't hustle their work as much as they might.

Nathaniel was in Hoboken the other week for the big Russ/American thang and looked and sounded fine. His work with Grossman/Cape Goliard, which originally brought out the Mayan Letters, Mayakovsky's How are Verse Made, the first English translations of Victor Segalen and Nazim > Hikmet, LZ's "A" 22/23, Henri Lefebvre's Dialectical Materialism, was one of the most intensely great editing projects of the past 40 years. It's impact is still vibrating through the culture.

>
> My favorite Enslin book is an early one: New Sharon's Prospect and Journals. The long poems seemed too much to me to be exercises on the line, fine for a hundred pages, but ultimately fading into a restricted range of possibility. For pure studies of the ear, my own preference has been, say, for Ken Irby, whose work does so much WITHIN the individual line.
>
> All best,
>
> Ron

↑ Index

51. Don Cheney
and i thought my translations were out at third base
Tue 2 Jul 1996

I found a tiny book titled, "Modismos - Familiar English-Spanish Expressions" by Mrs. Anness & Mr. Boughton published in Mexico w/no publishing date (my guess is 1950's -- so probably 1961!).

Anyway, I love the English expressions that are used, such as:

"This cigar smells like a ten-center."

or

"I'd like to lick the stuffing out of him."

but the translation for

"He stormed around mad at everything and everybody."

as

"Parecio que habia fumado marihuana.
"Estaba engrifado."

makes me believe that it was published in the 50's and makes me wonder if the authors were Monty Python fans.

Don "Dinsdale" Cheney
[redacted]

(i didn't use diacritical marks as i didn't know how everybody's email browsers would handle them)

↑ Index

52. maria damon
Re: perloff-watten
Tue 2 Jul 1996

i for one heard nothing about an impolite, engaged argument between perloff and watten. please recap, somebody, as it evidently concerns poetry and poetix. bests, maria d

↑ Index

53. Robert Drake
Re: and i thought my translations were out at third base
Tue 2 Jul 1996

such are landmines fr raw poetic ore... i recently found a copy ov "200 Colourful Expressions in English Language" by Sr. Miriam Azode (Onaivi Publishing, Nigeria), with such jems as:

"I never saw him as a _shrinking velvet_"
"The big row he had with Udo's family _unearthed the skeleton in the cupboard_"
"I invented that statement _to save_ his force"
"If they do not _take time by the forelock_, they will miss their luck"

lbd

↑ Index

54. Ron Silliman
Ben Friedlander email address?
Wed 3 Jul 1996

Does anyone have a current email address for Ben Friedlander (Ben, are you reading this?)? The one I had bounced back as "user unknown."

Thanks,

Ron

↑ Index

55. Nada Gordon
Re: Ben Friedlander email address?
Wed 3 Jul 1996

> Does anyone have a current email address for Ben Friedlander (Ben, are you reading this?)? The one I had bounced back as "user unknown."

> Thanks,
>
> Ron

You can try this one: [redacted]. It worked sometime around last Hannukah.

:-) Nada (Gordon)

↑ Index

56. Schuchat
Re: my stack
Wed 3 Jul 1996

---

1. CONINGSBY, Benjamin Disraeli

2. ST.PETERSBURG, CRUCIBLE OF CULTURAL REVOLUTION, Katerina Clark

3. TRANSBLUENCY, Jones/Baraka

4. IN MEMORY OF MY THEORIES, Rod Smith

5. WALT WHITMAN'S AMERICA, David S. Reynolds

6. NEGOTIATING COOPERATION: THE UNITED STATES AND CHINA 1969-1989, Robert Ross

7. CLOSE TO ME & CLOSER...(THE LANGUAGE OF HEAVEN) and DESAMERE, Alice Notley

8. MAO & MATISSE, Ed Friedman

9. PRONTO, Elmore Leonard

10. DISCOURSES OF THE VANISHING, Marilyn Ivy (modern Japanese culture, pub by U of Chicago)

also, for those of you with access to libraries that would have it, I very strongly recommend Michelle Yeh's article THE "CULT OF POETRY" IN CONTEMPORARY CHINA which you can find in THE JOURNAL OF ASIAN STUDIES 55, no 1. (FEbruary 1996), an excellent account of what is going on "post-Misty school."

↑ Index

57. Loss Glazier
Re: Friedlander email + Note
Wed 3 Jul 1996

Actually, that address should be:
[redacted]

Note also: the UB machines have been spittin vinegar lately (I believe that's the technical term for malfunctioning nodes). Sometimes they will say things don't exist just because they're messed up. (This also occurs in other discourses.) Often it's good to try a couple of times over a few days if you're having trouble getting to the EPC or otherwise accessing our gleaming towers of silicon.

At 09:13 PM 7/3/96 +0900, you wrote: >>Does anyone have a current email address for Ben Friedlander (Ben, are >>you reading this?)? The one I had bounced back as "user unknown."
>>
>>Thanks,
>>
>>Ron
>
>You can try this one: [redacted]. It worked sometime >around last Hannukah.
>
>:-) Nada (Gordon)
>
>

↑ Index

58. Rod Smith

Re: Quartermain, Cage, Beckett, Severity

Wed 3 Jul 1996

Mark Wallace wrote: "It turns out that Cage's surface "acceptance" of any phenomena (any noise as music, etc) turns out to include a rejection of western cultural hierarchies in every conceivable guise, which means quite literally that he must have loathed almost everything around him, however "quietly" or "gently"..."

Well, loathe, is much too strong I think. Cage loved Satie, & thought highly of Mozart, particularly Don Giovani. He listened to Bach & Beehtoven a great deal in his teens & twenties, & studied with Schoenberg. Seems more appropriate to me to say that at a certain point he just didn't need that tradition anymore, or only _very_ selectively. It just wasn't useful to him, & that in part accounts for the usefulness of his work to so many, I think. He was forced on occasion, or very often, to address it of course. There's that great story he told of the African prince that saw a program of music from Bach to Wagner, & when asked what he thought of the concert he replied "very nice, but why did they keep playing the same tune over and over."

But on another note, in the spirit of Peter Q's "limiatations" question-- somebody, maybe it was George Bowering, used the term "severe avant-garde" in a post, I believe comparing Beckett to Cage-- the implication being Beckett wasn't, Cage was. Not to get stuck on that particular comparison, but just to put the question to the list-- whatsa "severe avant-garde" anywho? Cld be the basis for a new movement-- _Expurgationism_? Also, if anyone would volunteer a close reading of Charles B's "An Afternoon on the Jetee" from _Arras 3_ (does anyone have a tape?). . . I would be quite curious . . .

Rod

↑ Index

59. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: pee pee

Wed 3 Jul 1996

---

well now we seem to have hit a "low" --

look "filch" -- your survey wd either have to rely upon self-reporting, in which case it's useless, ot on direct observation, in which case that must have been you that was kicked out of the pool for peeking at people peeing -- surely we can come up with a better satire than this --

↑ Index

60. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: Irby Matters

Wed 3 Jul 1996

Keith -- you might look for the Station Hill volume _Call Steps_, copies of which may still float about -- I suspect the Tansy Irbys are long gone -- Did you know that his brother is an important translator of Spanish works? particularly of Jose Lezama Lima's fantastic Cuban novel _Paraiso_

↑ Index

61. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: Perchik

Wed 3 Jul 1996

David -- I had been aware of that via the old Perchik _Selected_; but the book as a whole had left a bad feeling in me that kept mt from returning to it -- Now, I'd like to take a look at the fuller sequences (the Frank series in the selected appears to be less than half the sequence?) Will give Simon a second try on your advice --

↑ Index

62. Louis Cabri
Re: my stack
Thu 4 Jul 1996

some hits of bed/floor/deskside reading over the last indefinite while - at 1pm & 4am; caffeinated, ginsenged or cigared; from usedbookstore purchases to gifts & library loans; all 100-watt bulbed; in no special order

1. Primitivism and Decadence by Yvor Winters, where I found "The Experimental School in American Poetry," a descriptive catalogue of literary devices & to me a very uncanny read - templating a poetics which seems to haunt the logos of discursive prose itself. That, next to Artifice of Absorption, is boondoggling - & recommended for formal change fetishists & their detractors. What other catalogues are out there?

2. Laura Riding's The World and Ourselves (1938). She leaves Spain in the nick of Franco's razor & writes, i guess from England, a "personal letter" circulated by meanderment to 400 people, asking how should those she singularily terms "inside people" respond to the changes in the world of "the outside"? "International affairs are too much with us, they are eating into our personal lives and labours...." The book collects 100 responses into an extraorganized format - divided into a section of responses by women and a section by men, then two further sections, "the realistic approach" and the approach "beginning from the inside." Riding provides allover narrative that further strings each leter to her own. Much of her narrative responds to the letters, and explains - wen required - her use of terms like "inside." Is this a protoypical version of the poetics survey?

3. George Bowering's early seventies poetry sequence, At War With the US, loaned from friend & returned else I'd quote some contusional lines. Chequer le livre out, taberwit!

4. Torque #4 (Spring 1996), ed. Elizabeth Fodaski. 21 E Second St #12, NYC 10003. We're talkin' propellant - at torque 4, the blade's curve is d-base .25 & the windcut jigs the meters but good, so you reach "Fifi La Labial Nana Fofana" in about four minutes. Leather bag not supplied.

5. Dick Gregory's first book, of one-liners & short para sequences, From the Back of the Bus, published & intro by... Hugh Hefner, that would be in 62. I had to pack this in a box a few days ago, but it's got some great lines & black&white photos on race matters (Little Rock figures prominantly) - who says the "groundlessness" of permanent irony can only display glibness, despair & cynicism?

6. The Cool Crazy Committed World of the Sixties: 21 Television Interviews from The Pierre Berton Show, 1966. Journalist Berton is an icon of Cdn cultural nationalism, & WASP - so he interviewsd all that is Not He, for an audience comforted by a then wellfunded public broadcaster. Apparently the last interview w/ Malcolm X. Interview with "Mrs Ian Fleming." Interview with "a single parent," "a gate crasher" (over 26 Beatles concerts), etc, & w/ Lenny Bruce, Phil Specter... only in Canada, eh?

7. A book by James Campbell on Montreal abstract painter Claude Toussignant. Professional art critic "doing the professional," and swings his hardy boy sloop into Michael Fried's dramascope, then to litcrit harbour for a poke in the weeds of what T Eagleton tried to satirize in 1986 as RLM - the Reader's Liberation Movement. Campbell until now has mostly written monographs for gallery shows of artists like Barnett Newman and Ron Martin.

8. Collected writings of another (same gen) Montreal abstract painter, Guido Molinari, who has mostly gone it alone as they say ("I am a UFO & loving it"), though at one time, in wake of a preponderant influence of Automatism on the Montreal scene, associated himself by signature with a selfdeclared NeoPlasticist manifesto. He has various phases. He painted a series blindfolded in the early 50s.

9. Derrida's The SelfPortrait and Other Ruins. Exhibition catalogue of 17-19 c. French paintings/drawings of/on blind subjects, which he curated for the Louvre, plus booklength essay. One more argument I suppose, this time perceptual, for the impossibility of pure "identity." The perceptual geometry holding together artist, canvas, mirror or subject, and viewer, is such that the artist cannot literally see, D argues, the action of painting, even, and especially, a selfportrait. There's a blindness at the "origin" of the act of drawing.

10. Essays in Felix Guattari's Molecular Revolution, an early book. Seems that in one sentence from 1966 he sums up Fredric Jameson's entire generalist's project in The Political Unconscious, and moreover in the specific context of a description of French labour history in this century: "It is the revolutionary vanguard's failure to understand the unconscious processes that emerge as socioeconomic determinisms that has left the working class defenceless in the face of capitalism's modern mechanisms of alienation" (p. 199).

↑ Index

63. Ron Silliman
More addresses
Thu 4 Jul 1996

Thanks to Gordon & Loss for their help in getting in touch w/ Ben.

I need two additional addresses for folks whose missives bounced back this past week:

John Byrum
Joel Kuszai

Email and snail mail needed.

Simon,

Since the Valley Forge area is not awash with Asian Studies (unreconstructed xenophobia is the local mode), can you sketch out what Michelle Yeh says in that article on the cult of poetry? I'd love to know and I'll bet I'm not alone,

All best,

Ron

↑ Index

64. David Golumbia
Skoal Chaw
Thu 4 Jul 1996

In case anybody's (remotely) (still) interested, there's a far beter response to the Sokal thing than Ross's (& to media response to Sokal), by ST co-editor Bruce Robbins, in July 8/21 edition of IN THESE TIMES (&, mild self-promo, two letters in defense of cultural studies, one by yrs truly, the other, a really nice missive by Phil Goldstein, with Tom Frank response). "In Defense of Cultural Studies" runs the banner across the top of front cover. I'm surprised, but glad, to find out the Jim Weinstein is willing to listen to those of us who find it worth defending.

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

65. Charles Smith
Re: Ronald Johnson Broadside (ad)
Thu 4 Jul 1996

Joel,

I wd like one of the unsigned RJ braodsides for $10.00.

Charles Smith
2135 Irvin Way
Sacramento, CA 95822
[redacted]

thanks

↑ Index

66. Christina Fairbank Chirot

Re: comments on women today and oppression

Thu 4 Jul 1996

On Sun, 30 Jun 1996, Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest wrote:

> re ms. phillip's dismay about a conference attendee's comments that > women today do not realize that they are oppressed and that white > middle class women are the last to realize they are oppressed, i can > very easily see much that might have motivated those comments and > agree. i have seen entirely too many anti-feminist slings recently, > as if one is being somehow radical and brave to trash all those dingy > feminists. and i can easily, only too easily imagine losing my temper > if i thought i heard yet another pseudo-daring slam on feminists.
>
> people have been slamming feminists for hundreds of years -- white > master-owners; male husbands enjoying such privileges as beating a > wife with anything smaller than the circumfrance of their thumb, being > the only one in the partnership who can own or inherit land, being the > only partner who have a bank account or vote; men who can vote, own > land, have a bank account, work at any number of professions while > women cannot; men being asked to desist from disenfranchising women; > academics (male and female) who profess, as dale spender has pointedly > put it, that "you don't have to read women's literature to know it > isn't any good" in her book on sexism in literature; academics who > refuse to hire women in tenure track positions; academics who > consistently give lower marks and bad reviews to work by women, while > giving accolades to work of comparable quality by men; etcetera, > etcetera. it isn't, after all, so very new to slam feminists and > those who do so certainly aren't the sort of company i would like to > keep. perhaps mr. howe meant nothing disrespectful toward women. but > with the comments as reported, i have only too many painful > experiences which lead me to agree.
>
> in other words, i can't say how many times i have heard some younger > woman tell me, often with a placating smile (as if being, publically, > a "good girl"), that SHE is certainly not oppressed and doesn't feel > women are oppressed anymore. she tells me this while she is typing, > filing, and scurrying away at a shit job for lower pay than men her > age and ability. she has also, often, just told me about the job(s)

> she left because she was sexually harrassed, the boyfriend she lives > with who expects her to wash all the dishes, do the laundry, cook, and > clean, the same boyfriend who has perhaps just left her for a younger > prettier woman. she leaves work to paint one more painting that will > not get exhibited in a museum because although over half of the people > in art classes are women, less than a tenth of exhibited or reviewed > artists are women (and this situation exists for women writers, in > large measure as well -- have you ever noticed how in anonymous entry > contests, the winners are half or over half women, but in contests > where names are used, 1/5 to 1/3 of the winners are women?). and we > watch while a black or latino woman cleans the building around us and > tells us, if we ask, how she was an accountant at home, or how her > husband doesn't let her go home alone so she will have to stay here > and wait for him, or one of us in the room struggles to hide the > bruises from being beaten by an abusive partner while the residents of > rooms on all sides of us shut their ears since "he's her boyfriend" so > that makes it all right.
>
> i am sick of hearing that women are not oppressed. i am sick of > hearing the very feminists whose damned hard work has gotten women the > right to vote, to hold about 3/4 more sorts of jobs than they used to, > the right to start a bank account without their husband's signature to > give them permission, and so on and so on jeered at, disowned, and > dismissed as they take on yet another painful, difficult battle for > the very women who will not stand with them, yet benefit by their > labor.
>
> from this ground, such seeds as the comments you report seem only too > understandable.
>
> and while i'm on my soapbox, i have found myself distanced and pained > by the numerous readings listed with no women writers, by the numerous > lists of admired writers with at best only one woman for every eight > men, and by the books and book lists with almost no women. the thread > on british women poets has been, to say the least, a delight and i'd > love to see more of the same.
>
> women write too.
> e
>
YES, YES, YES! And you've only mentioned a bit of the daily pressure/oppression. Backlash is pervasive. "Chicks" is not chic.

Reviews of the Orono conference manifest underrepresentation of women there, as elsewhere. Here's an other woman's voice supporting y/our position.
T in a c.

↑ Index

67. Tony Green
Teaching women poets
Thu 4 Jul 1996

I'd like to pick up an old thread. Teachability is closely linked with publicationability. New Zealand with a population of 3,600,000 does not support publication of quertzblatz writing except in minute quantities. There is a "mainstream" of writing which fares better, though the rate of publication does not match that for U.S. writing. There are few magazines. Sustaining anything in that way for the kind of quertzblatz interests of many people on this list is damn near impossible. Attempts to get public money for it have not proved successful lately. The only magazine at present serving this interest is in some trouble financially and that is a xerox magazine stapled through, no cover, edited by Alan Loney and called A Brief Description of the Whole World. He also edited Parallax for 3 issues in the early 80's. This was the successor to a short-lived magazine edited by Graham Lindsay "Morepork". In the early 80's there were two xerox magazines, AND and SPLASH, neither lasted long. Meanwhile the mainstream carries on happily enough. Singling out Michele Leggott as teachable woman NZ poet is just fine. Good luck to her. But I must point out that there are perhaps more challenging poets who are not going to be teachable because they do not get books in print and because they do not necessarily appear in anthologies. A reader of the magazines I've named will know what I mean. Can we rely on the "teaching" of Michele Leggott knowing anything of this context? I guess the answer is a very big NO. In which case that teaching, probably unintentionally,,or even, with the very best of intentions, tends to be an "outside" interference in the canon, which can make the situation for those poets who NEVER fit the mainstream magazines at all, more difficult. This is not meant to indicate any kind of dislike of Michele or of her writing, far from it. But before a liberal-minded extension includes that which is available, to suit its liberality, it should be very careful about the effect it can have within the immediate environment within which availability has occurred. In short, I would trust this kind of foraging around for names to put into a plausible list of "representative" NZ women poets for a U.S.college course, only where the library resources could establish that context I've referred to, e.g Buffalo, where most of the magazine material is available. Best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

68. Joel Kuszai
e-mail address
Fri 5 Jul 1996

sorry to blast this over the public channel but my address is now

[redacted]

I've been off the list for a couple weeks and have been spying it in a digest form.

At some point I'll post my maine response and also some more junk mail about Meow Press summer publications.

↑ Index

69. Poetics List
Welcome Message
Fri 5 Jul 1996

Rev. 5-16-95

Welcome to the Poetics List

&

The Electronic Poetry Center

sponsored by The Poetics Program, Department of English, Faculty of Art & Letters, of the State University of New York, Buffalo

---

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

_____Contents_____

1. About the Poetics List
2. Subscriptions
3. Who's Subscribed
4. Digest Option
5. When you'll be away
6. The Electronic Poetry Center (EPC)

7. Poetics Archives at EPC
8. Publishers & Editors Read This!

[This document was prepared by Charles Bernstein ([redacted]. edu) and Loss Pequen~o Glazier ([redacted]).]

---

1. About the Poetics List

Please note that this is a private list and information about the list should not be posted to other lists or directories of lists. The idea is to keep the list to those with specific rather than general interests, and also to keep the scale of the list small and the volume manageable. Word-of-mouth (and its electronic equivalents) seems to be working fine.

The "list owner" of Poetics is Charles Bernstein: contact me for further information. As of May, Joel Kuszai is working with me to administer the list. For subscription information contact us at [redacted]

---

2. Subscriptions

line, to:

[redacted]

the one-line message should say:

{or}

(replacing Jill Jillway with your own name; but note: do not use your name to unsub)

We will be sent a notice of all subscription activity.

*

If you are having difficulty unsubscribing, please note:

Sometimes your e-mail address may be changed slightly by your system administrator. If this happens you will not be able to send messages to mail. To avoid this, unsub from the old address and resub from the new address. If you can no longer do this there is a solution if you use Eudora (an e-mail program that is available free at sharewar sites): from the Tools menu select "Options" and then select set-up for "Sending Mail": you can substitute your old address here and send the unsub message.

The most frequent problem with subscriptions is bounced messages. If your system is often down or if you have a low disk quota, Poetics messages may get bounced. Please try avoid having messages from the list returned to us. If the problem is low disk quota, you may wish to request an increase from your system administrator. (You may wish to argue that this subscription is part of your scholarly communication!) You may also wish to consider obtaining a commercial account.

---

3. Who's Subscribed

To see who is subscribed to Poetics, send an e-mail message to blank. In the body of your e-mail message type:

review poetics

You will be sent within a reasonable amount of time (by return e-mail) a rather long list containing the names and e-mail addresses of Poetics subscribers. This list is alphabetized by server not name.

---

4. Digest Option

The Poetics List can send a large number of individual messages to your account to each day! If you would prefer to receive ONE message each day, which would include all messages posted to the list for that day, you can use the digest option. Send this one-line message (no subject line) to [redacted]

set poetics digest

NOTE:!! Send this message to "listserv" not to Poetics or as a reply to this message!!

You can switch back to individual messages by sending this messagage:

set poetics mail

---

5. When you'll be away

Do not leave your Poetics subscription "active" if you are going to be away for any extended period of time! Your account may become flooded and you may lose not only Poetics messages but other important mail. You can temporarily turn off your Poetics subscription by sending a message:

You can temporarily turn off your mail by sending a message:

set poetics nomail

& turn it on again with: set poetics mail

When you return you can check or download missed postings from the Poetics archive. (See 7 below.)

---

6. What is the Electronic Poetry Center?

our URL is

http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

The mission of this World-Wide Web based electronic poetry center is to serve as a hypertextual gateway to the extraordinary range of activity in formally innovative writing in the United States and the world. The Center provides access to the burgeoning number of electronic resources in the new poetries including RIF/T and other electronic poetry journals, the POETICS List archives, an AUTHOR library of electronic poetic texts, and direct connections to numerous related electronic RESOURCES. The Center also provides information about contemporary print little magazines and SMALL PRESSES engaged in poetry and poetics. And we have an extensive collection of soundfiles of poets' reading their work, as well as the archive of LINEbreak, the radio interview series.

The EPC is directed by Loss Pequen~o Glazier.

---

7. Poetics Archives via EPC

Go to the EPC and select Poetics from the opening screen. Follow the links to Poetics Archives. You may browse the archives by month and year or search them for specific information. Your interface will allow you to print or download any of these files.

Or set your browser to go directly to:
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/poetics/archive

---

8. Publishers & Editors Read This!

PUBLISHERS & EDITORS: Our listings of poetry and poetics information is open and available to you. We are trying to make access to printed publications as easy as possible to our users and ENCOURAGE you to participate! Send a list of your press/publications to [redacted] with the words EPC Press Listing in the subject line. You may also send materials on disk. (Write file name, word processing program, and Mac or PC on disk.) Send an e-mail message to the address above to obtain a mailing address to which to send your disk. Though files marked up with html are our goal, ascii files are perfectly acceptable. If your word processor ill save files in Rich Text Format (.rtf) this is also highly desirable

Send us extended information on new publications (including any back cover copy and sample poems) as well as complete catalogs/backlists (including excerpts from reviews, sample poems, etc.). Be sure to include full information for ordering--including prices and addresses and phone numbers both of the press and any distributors.

Initially, you might want to send short anouncements of new publications directly to the Poetics list as subscribers do not always (or ever) check the EPC; in your message please include full information for ordering. If you have a fuller listing at EPC, you might also mention that in any Poetics posts.

Some announcements circulated through Poetics and the EPC have received a noticeable responses; it may be an effective way to promote your publication and we are glad to facilitate information about interesting publications.

END OF POETICS LIST WELCOME

↑ Index

70. Mark Wallace
rod smith and john cage
Fri 5 Jul 1996

Hey Rod:

Thanks for the clarification on my earlier remarks relative to John Cage and his feelings towards the musical traditions he leaves behind. But your post leaves me with a question I'd like to hear more from you about. When you say that "at a certain point, Cage simply didn't need that tradition anymore" (I'm paraphrasing), are you implying that he left it behind without antagonism, just decided it could be ignored? Or, if he continued to have reactions towards it, what were the nature of those reactions? Loathe is, I can see, probably too strong. But what, from your understanding, would be the proper way to characterize his feelings towards the tradition he leaves behind? There's something about your post that seems almost to be characterizing his reaction as strangely unemotional--i.e., oh there it is, I don't need that, it really doesn't bother me and let's talk about something else. That seems to me a little bit hard to believe--you're trained in a whole tradition, work in it for many years, and then one day decide it's not significant, and leave it without much feeling either way? I'm just curious as to whether you could try to characterize more fully his reaction to what he left behind.

mark

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:

| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

71. Mark Wallace
ghost stories
Fri 5 Jul 1996

Dear Dodie (and whoever else):

Ever read anything by the 19th century British ghost story writer Mrs. Riddell? After seeing bits and pieces of her work, I finally tracked down two weeks ago a complete collection of her ghost stories that had been published by Dover about twenty years ago, and has long been out of print. She wrote several supernatural novels also--the one I'm most familiar with is THE UNINHABITED HOUSE, which I also read in a Dover edition now out of print. Her stories are not always fully developed--she wrote too fast, for money, according to E.F. Bleier--but they have some genuinely frightening moments, and she does quite a good job with character. A real strangeness runs through the best of what she does.

Sheridan Le Fanu's novels are almost all long out of print, with the exception of UNCLE SILAS and two collections of his stories, all still in print I think from Dover. There's a 1977 hardback series from Arno that republished all of his novels, many their first re-publication since they originally appeared in the 1860s and 70s. The Arno can be hard to find, but interlibrary loan will usually pick them up somewhere.

I myself spent several days one summer at the Library of Congress tracking down the original serial publications of Le Fanu's novels in various British periodicals, including the Dublin Magazine which Le Fanu himself ran for many years. I even discovered several stories from the 1840s that had never been republished since their original serialization, including several early versions of stories he would later turn into novels. My own sense has always been that of all the British ghost story writers, Le Fanu's novels are most in tune to the economic realities of 19th century British life. His characterizations of women are certainly often problematic, tending towards views of them as sweet and moral but fairly helpless, although there are significant exceptions, like the struggle between strong mother and daughter characters in THE ROSE AND THE KEY, which also features one of the scariest 19th century descriptions of an insane asylum that I'm aware of.

mark

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

72. maria damon
felicitous misprisions
Fri 5 Jul 1996

---

along the lines of shrinking velvets, the liner notes to Alemayehu Eshete("the james brown of ethiopia")'s Addis Ababa album refers to his heart-rendering ballads. render my heart like butter, baby, and i'll lard you with poems.

↑ Index

73. Judy Roitman
Another ethnic group
Fri 5 Jul 1996

If one were so foolish as to try to describe contemporary Native American poetries briefly, what would that description be, and what names would be attached?

No, I'm not giving a course, and do have other sources (Haskell Indian Nations University is down the road a short piece), but I'm curious what members of this list would say.

Thanks.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

74. Gwyn McVay
Re: felicitous misprisions
Fri 5 Jul 1996

If they haven't changed the dessert menu at the Westin William Penn in Pittsburgh, see it; it was obviously compiled by a non-native speaker, and is chock full of inexplicabilities. The banana something I ordered was described as being "attacked by a banana liquoir." In the heading to "cappuccino mousse," someone had struck an accidental carriage return, so it now read:

Cappucci
no mousse

which may be a found pome?

Gwyn

↑ Index

75. Keith Tuma
Orono
Fri 5 Jul 1996

Several days ago I forwarded to Robert von Hallberg the comments made about his comments in Orono. I did so because I think it's important that people be allowed to respond to the charges made against them in what is after all a public forum, however circumscribed. I now forward von Hallberg's response to Aldon, having been asked to do so.

I expect that conversation will ensue. Unfortunately, I'm leaving for the East Coast for a week on Sunday, and thus will be unable either to participate or to forward messages. Perhaps someone might take care of the latter for me.

best to all,
Keith Tuma
----------Original message----------
>To: [redacted]
>From: [redacted] (robert von hallberg)
>Subject: Orono
>Cc:
>Bcc:
>X-Attachments:
>
>5 July 1996 Friday.
>
>Dear Aldon,
>
> Keith Tuma was good enough to forward to me your remarks about my contribution to your Langston Hughes, Bob Kaufman session at Orono; I might otherwise not have known of your representation of what I said to that gathering. I want to reply first to you directly, then I will post this so that others can consider the matter further, if they wish.

>
> Why is it that after all the rhetorical and intellectual training that people like you and I receive, we tend so often to want to reduce intellectual differences until our opponents seem wholly negligible? I have felt this pull in my own writing, and friends have stopped me and reminded me that the issues that divide people are not ridiculous, that it is important to get right what our adversaries are advocating or claiming. And of course I recognize this pull in your representation of my remarks at your Hughes/Kaufman panel.
> 1. I did not claim that Hughes and Kaufman are "bad" poets, as you allege. This is simply a factual error on your part. I claimed instead that our job as literary scholars is to sort out the best writings of the poets we claim are being wrongly neglected and present them along with principled evaluative arguments to such audiences as the one gathered at Orono.
> 2. This relates to your quotation of my saying in an accusatory manner that you and the other panelists were "doing the sociology thing." My objection is not at all to the use of sociology or sociological analysis in literary history or criticism; my own work is heavily indebted--as is clear to my readers--to the work of sociologists of American intellectuals, and my most recent book is a sociology-of-art study of East German intellectuals. My objection was then explicitly to simplistic sociology. The example I gave in Orono, you will recall, was not your remark about the number of papers on minority poets, but instead the listing by the first presenter, whose name is not before me now, of the various postwar anthologies and the tabulation of the number of African American poets included: "One" or "none" were the scores repeated a number of times. This sort of sociological analysis is limited because it does not get beyond the obvious point that is not in contention: that African American writers have consistently been poorly represented in mainstream anthologies. I think the word I used to characterize this analysis was "simple." I said that as an intellectual endeavor, this sort of analysis is superficial and not worth doing.
> Once one observes, before an audience of teachers and scholars of contemporary poetry, that African American poets are not being discussed enough in conferences, not being published often enough in anthologies, etc., one should go on to the next step: the making of an argument for the teaching, study, or appreciation of particular poems by particular poets. If one does not take that step, one implies that the teaching, study, or appreciation of one African American poet is as desirable as the teaching, study, or appreciation of another. That is, one is refusing to take the poets with full seriousness by not examining their best work in detail. And, yes, at this point I do feel that identity politics misleads literary critics into thinking that any form of commentary on underrepresented poets is itself a good thing and often even a sufficient thing. These poets existed; they were rarely published in mainstream anthologies; document their existence in the future--this is an elementary sort of literary critical project. The training that we have as literary scholars and critics enables us to go much further in the intellectual analysis of poetry. Why should we be timid about subjecting poems by Hughes, for example, to the most rigorous critical scrutiny of which we are capable?

> 3. One answer that is commonly given to this question is that the methods of critical analysis that are commonly used to scrutinize poems by Eliot, say, or Pound, or Moore, will not get at the full achievement of African American poets. That may be the case. If so, we need to know exactly where it is so, at what point in analysis the critical categories fail to serve the poets well. That is very interesting and worth knowing in detail, through patient analysis. Once we see just where the critical categories come up empty we can begin to define alternative categories that will serve the poetry better and we can theorize the significance of these categories.
> I did claim, apropos of your misrepresentation of my statements (cited above as item #1) that the poems quoted by Hughes in the first paper were not on the face of things impressive, and that the analysis presented there did not take them beyond the face of things.
> I will relate an anecdote here. Later in the day, after your session, another conferee told me that I just did not understand Hughes. She told me that her husband and she had known him and came to learn of his craftiness. Her husband once remarked to Hughes that he would love to hear Hughes talk about the blues, because he was sure that Hughes would have a different understanding of them than he did (being white). Hughes said, yes, they would have to have that talk, and that maybe they could talk about Schubert at the same time, because Hughes would like to know the white man's understanding of Schubert too. The woman telling me the story said that she wasn't sure her husband took the point of the rebuke right away. Then she told me that what I failed to understand about Hughes was that he was writing for an uneducated, large [black] urban audience, and that of course poems addressed to such an audience would not sound impressive to me. Her point was that Hughes was crafty, knew what he was doing, etc. I asked her if she didn't see any similarity between her claim about Hughes writing simply for simple folk and her husband's presumption that black people have a distinct, circumscribed view of music. She saw no resemblance there. But I think that she and her husband were condescending to Hughes in both instances. Not to subject Hughes's poetry to close analysis and developed evaluative argumentation is to refuse to give him as an artist just what we are trained to give to the work of Eliot, Pound, Wilbur, Lowell, Bishop, Moore, et al.

> 4. After you misrepresent me by alleging that I said Hughes and Kaufman were "bad poets," you say: "Now ... this is pretty old hat to those of us who have been studying issues of race and ethnicity in literature longer than two weeks."
> Let me say forthrightly here what I said to you in Orono: I benefited from your book on intertextuality and race, esp. (as I told you) from your discussion of Robert Hayden's "Middle Passage." You have been working for years on race and ethnicity, and my paper on Hayden at the conference is the very beginning of my effort now to write about African American poetry, as I mentioned. I am a novice, maybe even an interloper, in your field, and I respect the feelings that are expressed by your remark about the two weeks. You are a professional in this area and you are entitled to feel a somewhat proprietary sense toward this academic specialty, African American poetry.
> My own view is that outsiders sometimes manage to bring something distinctive and unsettling to academic specialties. For this reason, I repeatedly argue that the writing of poet-critics is of special value to us now that literary scholarship has become thoroughly dominated by academic criticism and interpretation, and I hope that my engagement as an American with East German literary and intellectual culture will be off the beaten track of the straight disciplines that have custodial and proprietary claims to the study of East German literature and culture.
> But it is not the case that my advocacy of evaluative argument and close analysis of particular poems is properly characterized as the "strategies of the oldest of new critics," as you claim. The authority of New Criticism has been discredited, but not all close analysis and not all sustained evaluative argument have been discredited at the same time. I am not advocating that the arguments for the poets you admire be conducted by New Critical criteria--analysis of irony, tone, imagery, etc. My claim is rather that advocates of poets excluded from anthologies need to put on the table the evidence of poetic achievement and argue, in whatever terms work best for those poems, for the understanding and evaluation of those poems. Not to do this when an audience is gathered that can make a difference to the dissemination of such poets seems to me intellectually timid.
>
> Yours,
>
> Robert von Hallberg
>

↑ Index

76. maria damon
Re: Orono
Fri 5 Jul 1996

hi keith! did you also let aldon know you were going to forward his remarks? it is not at all clear to me that this list is a "public" one, and i have had the experience of having a formal grievance brought against me by members of another list i made reference to on poetix, believing that, tho this is to be sure a conversation, it is a "private" conversation. this is not a rebuke but a reminder --to all, in fact --that there is some uncertainty about exactly what the boundaries of the list in fact are. i guess it's good to assume, as you do, that anything CAN be made public, and that anyone can reach our files thru EPC after all, anyway. i'll respond to von h at some length later. as i've said, i have had very good interactions with him and consider him a warm, supportive colleague, but i see sometimes the adoption of a persona --the LIBERAL conscience of "what we do" --and the invocation of categories many of us have come to dismiss (he would argue that we're throwing the baby out w/ the proverbial bathwater) --can be startling. he has, tho, written one of the best (and first) of what i would consider cultural studies/poetry texts around, choosing to argue --again, not an argument i make, but a worthy one --that poetry has played a very centrist role in consolidating the American empire. that he does not go on to criticise this role is where i part with him, but i think it important that someone is making an argument different from the common assumption that poetry is necessarily a vanguard discourse. his and my work could be seen in point-counterpoint dialogue, in fact, and i think it matters a lot who it is we choose to study to buttress our respective positions. i do not, for example, think that qualitative evaluation is why we study poetry, or that we should only teach what is the "best." the kaufman poem i discussed ("bagel shop jazz") has, to be sure, some real clinkers in in ("doomed to see their coffee dreams/ Crushed on the floors of time" --for example --i like coffee dreams but anything "of time" sounds soupy to me) but it illustrates a "scene" that is rich, complex, and sociologically compelling to me, which is why i wrote about it. i agree that listing anthologies and saying how many Black poets were or weren't included is not sufficient as analysis, but i also don't think it can be said often enough as a starting point. i have seen some essays on hughes, for example, that don't attend to his social location and his circumstances, that completely fall flat and end up sounding very bad-faith and just plain inaccurate; for example, rather than looking on his importation of popular Black culture into print-"Poetry" as an intellectual/aesthetic achievement, it was seen as an example how skillfully he "marketed" himself. the critic was clearly trying to get beyond what s/he considered a simplistic boosterish analysis, but the result was, to my mind, disastrous. i think it is possible to be both analytically sophisticated AND advocacy-oriented, as Aldon's, CLR James's,

Stuart Hall's, and George Lipsitz's work show. I think also the o'hara/race sessions instanciated this blend of skillful critique/analysis and sympathy. i do think that marjorie has a point about getting rid of plenary sessions, because it sets up a class system, so that Bob can give what he himself describes as a "neophyte" effort at a plenary, while Aldon, to whose work he graciously describes himself as indebted, is in the position of appearing to take on a "heavy" from the sidelines, as it were. well i guess I have responded to Bob's post here/now after all.

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion
group writes:
> Several days ago I forwarded to Robert von Hallberg the comments made about > his comments in Orono. I did so because I think it's important that people > be > allowed to respond to the charges made against them in what is after all a > public forum, however circumscribed. I now forward von Hallberg's response
> to > Aldon, having been asked to do so.
>
> I expect that conversation will ensue. Unfortunately, I'm leaving for the > East Coast for a week on Sunday, and thus will be unable either to > participate > or to forward messages. Perhaps someone might take care of the latter for > me.
>
> best to all,
> Keith Tuma
> ----------Original message----------
> >To: [redacted]
> >From: [redacted] (robert von hallberg)
> >Subject: Orono
> >Cc:
> >Bcc:
> >X-Attachments:
> >
> >5 July 1996 Friday.
> >
> >Dear Aldon,
> >
> > Keith Tuma was good enough to forward to me your remarks about my > contribution to your Langston Hughes, Bob Kaufman session at Orono; I might > otherwise not have known of your representation of what I said to that > gathering. I want to reply first to you directly, then I will post this so > that others can consider the matter further, if they wish.

> >
> > Why is it that after all the rhetorical and intellectual training that > people like you and I receive, we tend so often to want to reduce > intellectual differences until our opponents seem wholly negligible? I have > felt this pull in my own writing, and friends have stopped me and reminded > me that the issues that divide people are not ridiculous, that it is > important to get right what our adversaries are advocating or claiming. And > of course I recognize this pull in your representation of my remarks at your > Hughes/Kaufman panel.
> > 1. I did not claim that Hughes and Kaufman are "bad" poets, as you > allege. This is simply a factual error on your part. I claimed instead > that our job as literary scholars is to sort out the best writings of the > poets we claim are being wrongly neglected and present them along with > principled evaluative arguments to such audiences as the one gathered at > Orono.
> > 2. This relates to your quotation of my saying in an accusatory manner > that you and the other panelists were "doing the sociology thing." My > objection is not at all to the use of sociology or sociological analysis in > literary history or criticism; my own work is heavily indebted--as is clear > to my readers--to the work of sociologists of American intellectuals, and my > most recent book is a sociology-of-art study of East German intellectuals.
> My objection was then explicitly to simplistic sociology. The example I > gave in Orono, you will recall, was not your remark about the number of > papers on minority poets, but instead the listing by the first presenter, > whose name is not before me now, of the various postwar anthologies and the > tabulation of the number of African American poets included: "One" or "none" > were the scores repeated a number of times. This sort of sociological > analysis is limited because it does not get beyond the obvious point that is > not in contention: that African American writers have consistently been > poorly represented in mainstream anthologies. I think the word I used to > characterize this analysis was "simple." I said that as an intellectual > endeavor, this sort of analysis is superficial and not worth doing.
> > Once one observes, before an audience of teachers and scholars of > contemporary poetry, that African American poets are not being discussed > enough in conferences, not being published often enough in anthologies, > etc., one should go on to the next step: the making of an argument for the > teaching, study, or appreciation of particular poems by particular poets.
> If one does not take that step, one implies that the teaching, study, or > appreciation of one African American poet is as desirable as the teaching, > study, or appreciation of another. That is, one is refusing to take the > poets with full seriousness by not examining their best work in detail.

> And, yes, at this point I do feel that identity politics misleads literary > critics into thinking that any form of commentary on underrepresented poets > is itself a good thing and often even a sufficient thing. These poets > existed; they were rarely published in mainstream anthologies; document > their existence in the future--this is an elementary sort of literary > critical project. The training that we have as literary scholars and > critics enables us to go much further in the intellectual analysis of > poetry. Why should we be timid about subjecting poems by Hughes, for > example, to the most rigorous critical scrutiny of which we are capable?
> > 3. One answer that is commonly given to this question is that the > methods of critical analysis that are commonly used to scrutinize poems by > Eliot, say, or Pound, or Moore, will not get at the full achievement of > African American poets. That may be the case. If so, we need to know > exactly where it is so, at what point in analysis the critical categories > fail to serve the poets well. That is very interesting and worth knowing in > detail, through patient analysis. Once we see just where the critical > categories come up empty we can begin to define alternative categories that > will serve the poetry better and we can theorize the significance of these > categories.
> > I did claim, apropos of your misrepresentation of my statements (cited > above as item #1) that the poems quoted by Hughes in the first paper were > not on the face of things impressive, and that the analysis presented there > did not take them beyond the face of things.
> > I will relate an anecdote here. Later in the day, after your session, > another conferee told me that I just did not understand Hughes. She told me > that her husband and she had known him and came to learn of his craftiness.
> Her husband once remarked to Hughes that he would love to hear Hughes
talk > about the blues, because he was sure that Hughes would have a different > understanding of them than he did (being white). Hughes said, yes, they > would have to have that talk, and that maybe they could talk about Schubert > at the same time, because Hughes would like to know the white man's > understanding of Schubert too. The woman telling me the story said that she > wasn't sure her husband took the point of the rebuke right away. Then she > told me that what I failed to understand about Hughes was that he was > writing for an uneducated, large [black] urban audience, and that of course > poems addressed to such an audience would not sound impressive to me.
Her > point was that Hughes was crafty, knew what he was doing, etc. I asked her > if she didn't see any similarity between her claim about Hughes writing > simply for simple folk and her husband's presumption that black people have > a distinct, circumscribed view of music. She saw no resemblance there. But > I think that she and her husband were condescending to Hughes in both > instances. Not to subject Hughes's poetry to close analysis and developed > evaluative argumentation is to refuse to give him as an artist just what we > are trained to give to the work of Eliot, Pound, Wilbur, Lowell, Bishop, > Moore, et al.

> > 4. After you misrepresent me by alleging that I said Hughes and Kaufman > were "bad poets," you say: "Now ... this is pretty old hat to those of us > who have been studying issues of race and ethnicity in literature longer > than two weeks."
> > Let me say forthrightly here what I said to you in Orono: I benefited > from your book on intertextuality and race, esp. (as I told you) from your > discussion of Robert Hayden's "Middle Passage." You have been working for > years on race and ethnicity, and my paper on Hayden at the conference is the > very beginning of my effort now to write about African American poetry, as I > mentioned. I am a novice, maybe even an interloper, in your field, and I > respect the feelings that are expressed by your remark about the two weeks.
> You are a professional in this area and you are entitled to feel a somewhat > proprietary sense toward this academic specialty, African American poetry.
> > My own view is that outsiders sometimes manage to bring something > distinctive and unsettling to academic specialties. For this reason, I > repeatedly argue that the writing of poet-critics is of special value to us > now that literary scholarship has become thoroughly dominated by academic > criticism and interpretation, and I hope that my engagement as an American > with East German literary and intellectual culture will be off the beaten > track of the straight disciplines that have custodial and proprietary claims > to the study of East German literature and culture.
> > But it is not the case that my advocacy of evaluative argument and close > analysis of particular poems is properly characterized as the "strategies of > the oldest of new critics," as you claim. The authority of New Criticism > has been discredited, but not all close analysis and not all sustained > evaluative argument have been discredited at the same time. I am not > advocating that the arguments for the poets you admire be conducted by New > Critical criteria--analysis of irony, tone, imagery, etc. My claim is > rather that advocates of poets excluded from anthologies need to put on the > table the evidence of poetic achievement and argue, in whatever terms work > best for those poems, for the understanding and evaluation of those poems.
> Not to do this when an audience is gathered that can make a difference to > the dissemination of such poets seems to me intellectually timid.

> >
> > Yours,
> >
> > Robert von > Hallberg
> >

↑ Index

77. Keith Tuma
Re: Orono
Fri 5 Jul 1996

No, Maria, I hadn't asked Aldon if I might forward his comments. This is perhaps a lapse in list ethics on my part--if so, I apologize. Like many on this list, I've learned from Aldon, had useful exchanges private and otherwise with him, find him one of the best, friendliest folks in po-biz. So, sorry, Aldon, if you mind. But I expected that the exchange would be productive, and surely wouldn't send just any remark or a remark by just anybody (somebody I didn't or wouldn't necessarily expect to be willing to take on a particular conversation) to a person not a part of the list. And I would never send on a remark of the sort you allude to re your own situation. I know von Hallberg well-enough to know that he would respond to Aldon's commentary in a manner which would raise questions. What happened to you is regretful.

Nevertheless, I do think that some clarification of the parameters of our conversation here is needed--or perhaps I've missed them. The EPC archives are of course available to all interested computer users, and increasingly comments made on poetics are cited in various print venues. (A poetics note of mine, for instance, is cited in Jed Rasula's book; and I have no problem with that, though I was not asked for permission and I'm betting neither was the listowner.) I guess I take it that "private" applies first and foremost to the matter of informing people of the existence of this list. And that there, as elsewhere, some common sense and taste must factor into the decision to "spread the word." Beyond that I'm not sure how this list can be altogether private, but if i'm missing something I'll be happy to be clued in.

all best,
keith

↑ Index

78. William Marsh - 3809183
Re: stochastic
Fri 5 Jul 1996

I'm hunting down references to the term "stochastic" and wonder if anyone out there has come across it recently, especially in specific reference to writing/poetics. I came across it myself in an essay by Alan Davies, who evidently got it from Gregory Bateson's _Mind and Nature_ -- a stochastic sequence is one which "combines a random component with a selective process so that only certain outcomes of the random are allowed to endure."

Has anyone seen the term defined/applied more extensively?

Appreciate the help.

Bill Marsh
[redacted]

↑ Index

79. Herb Levy
Re: stochastic
Fri 5 Jul 1996

In the mid & late sixties, the composers Iannis Xenakis & James Tenney used the term stochastic to describe works in which they set up a range of parameters about pitch, rhythm, relative density, etc. and then allowed a computer program to select the details. In this way they could control the overall texture of a piece, while allowing various random processes to fill in the details.

The term stochastic comes from a Greek root that has (I think) something to do with arrows or archery. The model here is that an archer tries to get a bull's eye each time, and over time, depending on the archer's skill, most arrows will be near the center of a target, but the actual trajectory & landing point of any specific arrow is not as clearly defined.

I don't know if either Tenney or Xenakis coined the expression, or if it had previous use in the fields of mathematics, cybernetics, etc.

Bests

H

> I'm hunting down references to the term "stochastic" and wonder if anyone out there has come across it recently, especially in specific reference to writing/poetics. I came across it myself in an essay by Alan Davies, who evidently got it from Gregory Bateson's _Mind and Nature_ -- a stochastic sequence is one which "combines a random component with a selective process so that only certain outcomes of the random are allowed to > endure."

>
> Has anyone seen the term defined/applied more extensively?
>
> Appreciate the help.
>
> Bill Marsh
> [redacted]

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

80. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Re: stochastic
Fri 5 Jul 1996

According to the OED, stochastic comes from the Greek, means "to aim at a mark, guess". "Pertaining to conjecture" The following from Ilya Prigine and Isabelle Stenger's Order Out of Chaos makes a conjunction of poetics with the stochastic--and if one thinks in terms of the relation of cave paintings, rock art and heiroglyphs to poetics in terms of "objects" and "sounds"and "images" in/out of time is most useful: It is hard to avoid the impression that the distinction between what exists in time, what is irreversible, and, on the other hand, what is outside of time, what is eternal, is at the origin of human symbolic activity. Indeed, one aspect of the transformation of a natural object, a stone, to an object of art is closely related to our impact on matter. Artistic activity breaks the temporal symmetry of the object. It leaves a mark that translates our temporal dissymmetry into the temporal dissymmetry of the object. Out of the reversible, nearly cyclic noise level in which we live arises music that is both stochastic and time-oriented (312). Highly recommend this book & appreciate connection made to music in previous note-- dave baptiste chirot (susan howe: "articulation of sound forms in time"--from schoenberg--but improvisation in Free jazz--check out New York Contemporary Five lps--Archie Shepp and Don Cherry--way to approach understanding chance in relation to form can be quite different when thought of in terms of collective improvisation--and so of "harmony of the spheres"--in relation to "chaos")(Don Cherry wrote "Relativity Suite")

↑ Index

81. Robert Drake

Re: Stochastics

Fri 5 Jul 1996

Stochastic Languages

A stochastic language is a collection of strings with a probability distribution defined on the set of strings...

For a stochastic language it is required that the sum of weights for all strings equals 1, making p a probability function. Stochastic languages with strings which has no upper limit on their length constitute a special situation since the strings will have a very small weight...

For infinite languages it is not feasible to check whether the sum of probabilities equals one, simply by adding the weights, since there will always be strings of greater length representing a small part of the total probability mass. In such a situation it is required to obtain a model for the generation process and perform a test equivalent to evaluate its behaviour in the limit as the processing time goes to infinity...

Stochastic languages are typically specified by a stochastic automaton or a stochastic grammar. For a given stochastic language there is a one-to-one correspondence between the strings accepted by the automaton and the strings generated by the grammar meaning that both models can accept/generate the same strings with identical probabilities. Any string in a language can be modelled correctly concerning its syntactic structure by the corresponding automata/grammar but probabilities might be assigned to a string in such a way that none of the models can reproduce strings with the correct probability...

Theorem: There are stochastic languages for which no stochastic grammar or stochastic automata can reproduce the correct probability for all the individual strings in the language.

There are several explanations for this. As stated [through the pumping lemmas loops...] the derivation process can result in strings differing from each other only on the number of repetitions of a substring. The probabilities of such strings will be dependent on each other, and they therefore cannot take any arbitrarily probability. Furthermore a string is the result of a sequence of derivation steps, each with a predefined fixed probability.
Therefore the probabilities assigned to generated strings, come from a discrete set of probabilities, and this fact can conflict with the fact that a string
... can be assigned any value...

Due to the inference mechanism creating the grammar the problem... is of no real concern when using stochastic languages for syntactic pattern recognition, and most other applications. The grammar is typically inferred from a finite set of learning samples, in such a way that it is capable of generating a set of strings of greater cardinality (possible countable infinite) having identical syntactic structure. In such a situation it is not relevant to maintain the exact probability of individual strings in the learning samples.

after Jesper Gravgaard Jensen

for automaton read "poet" for grammar read "poetics" for string read "poem"
for stochastic language read "canon"

↑ Index

82. maria damon

Re: Orono

Sat 6 Jul 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion
group writes:
> No, Maria, I hadn't asked Aldon if I might forward his comments. This is > perhaps a lapse in list ethics on my part--if so, I apologize. Like many on > this list, I've learned from Aldon, had useful exchanges private and
>...etc

okay keith, cool. good points all. i didn't realize we cd be cited in books w/out our permission. i'll have to start watching my tongue, my back, my mind and my fingers. bests, maria d

↑ Index

83. maria damon
Re: stochastic
Sat 6 Jul 1996

---

i heard the term "stochastic"" used by Julie Patton in her intro to her and Janice Loeb (sp?)'s performance at the Bob Kaufman celebration at the st mark's poetry projecct in april. she gave me the impression that there was an element of sound involved --what you mention below applied specifically to combining sounds. she and janice l read a kaufman poem --sang it, improvised it, playing off each other, simultaneously AND alternating. it was quite wonderfl and i wrote down the word "stochastic" as a result.--md

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion group
writes:
> I'm hunting down references to the term "stochastic" and wonder if anyone > out there has come across it recently, especially in specific reference to > writing/poetics. I came across it myself in an essay by Alan Davies, who > evidently got it from Gregory Bateson's _Mind and Nature_ -- a stochastic > sequence is one which "combines a random component with a selective > process so that only certain outcomes of the random are allowed to > endure."
>
> Has anyone seen the term defined/applied more extensively?
>
> Appreciate the help.
>
> Bill Marsh
> [redacted]

↑ Index

84. filch
agitprop
Sat 6 Jul 1996

---

defined / applied combines a random component with a selective process so that only certain outcomes of the random are allowed to endure

stochastic

a mark that translates our temporal dissymmetry into the temporal dissymmetry of the object

(possible countable infinite)

↑ Index

85. Paul Naylor
The Disappeared
Sat 6 Jul 1996

SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

This is a somewhat late response to the comments about the "disappearance" of Irby, Enslin, and Tarn. For those interested in their recent work, you should check out Lee Chapman's journal, _First Intensity_. All three of those writers serve as editorial correspondents (along with Michael Boughn, Patrick Doud, Forrest Gander, John Moritz, Joe Napora, Susan Smith Nash, and Spencer Selby). Subscriptions are $17 for two issues, and you can contact Lee at P.O. Box 140713, Staten Island, New York, 10314-0713.

While I'm in the plugging mode, the new issue of _River City_ is out and about. The special topic this time is "The Caribbean: South of the South." Contents include a beautiful address by Kamau Brathwaite, "Note(s) on Caribbean Cosmology," new poems and an interview with M. Nourbese Philip, Wilson Harris' "Apprenticeship to the Furies," Aldon Nielsen on C.L.R. James, a section on women poets in the Caribbean. Also, Nathaniel Mackey on Miles Davis, and poems and fiction by Hank Lazer, Aldon Nielsen, Omar Castaneda, Claire Harris (a stunning long poem entitled "WOEMAN WOMB PRISONED"), etc. _River City_ sells for $7 per issue or $12 for two. Make checks out to The University of Memphis and send to:

River City
Department of English
463 Patterson Bldg.
The University of Memphis
Memphis, TN 38152

I'd also like to announce that our next issue, Winter 1997, will focus on the topic of Engendering Culture; submissions on that topic -- whether poetry, fiction, critical writing -- can be sent to the same address.

Paul Naylor
SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

↑ Index

86. Charles Alexander
Re: Another ethnic group
Sat 6 Jul 1996

> If one were so foolish as to try to describe contemporary Native American poetries briefly, what would that description be, and what names would be attached?
>
> No, I'm not giving a course, and do have other sources (Haskell Indian Nations University is down the road a short piece), but I'm curious what members of this list would say.

Mostly I wouldn't be so foolish. But one thing I would be careful about is that adjective "contemporary." For me, it would have to include works from the oral tradition, which are still living, therefore "contemporary." And many of these works are subject to contemporary variations. Too often (although I think this has changed somewhat in the last couple of decades) the oral traditions have been treated as past, as relics. In many cultures they are decidedly not so. Some of the primary work in this regard has been done by Larry Evers through the Sun Tracks series at the University of Arizona Press, and to my mind some of the very best of that is the work with Yaqui oral traditions Evers has done in collaboration with Felipe S. Molina, himself a Yaqui singer.

But this is just one part of a huge story.

good luck,

charles

↑ Index

87. Joe Amato
Re: Orono
Sat 6 Jul 1996

ok, i guess i have to add something here, grinch-like, that is not intended primarily as a rebuke to anybody per se, but is essentially a comment about how this list stuff works:

i don't like it that keith had to forward comments to the list from robert von hallberg... that is, i'm sure keith was willing to do so, and it's a settled issue as i see it at the level of propriety... but i'm talking instead about relative visibilities, and about how lists work... and my carp here has to do, for one, with why robert von hallberg (and others who occupy a visible, even 'senior' position in our profession) are generally not to be found in these regions...

sure, we on poetics enjoy the presence of some folks who are well-known---kudos to these latter for their willingness to mix it up (i won't name names for fear of not naming all the names)... but for some years now, i've noticed the online absence of some of the better-known academics, all of whom have done quite well in print, many of whom are continually referenced in online discussion... that is, part of the explanation has always seemed to me to have to do with why bother? logic... or i don't have the time logic b/c i'm already getting published in print logic... or the real debate is over there logic so (again) why bother? logic...

things are changing, to be sure... yet i'd still argue this absence is felt...

in short: though there is, as has been discussed, nothing at all wrong with forwarding comments hither & thither (with due allowance made for variations between public and private and permissions pertaining thereto), i would nonetheless like to go on record here (and anybody who wishes to, btw, can quote anything i say anywhere, but please do let me know if you do so) as saying that we need not only more access for folks without access, but we need our senior folks, or at least our more visible folks, to take the plunge...

to wit: i'd like to think that robert von hallberg is now subbed to poetics... and if he doesn't know how to, i'd like to think he's asking somebody... b/c i don't think his outsider-insider status (at this moment, anyway, wrt this list) is a good place from which to enter into discussion with this network community, or one of its members...

he can of course, like all of us, unsub at any time... but it's fair to ask him, and others, to sub to the list if they'd like to be part of the discussion (assuming they have the technical capabilities to do so)... otherwise, i'm left feeling as though i'm 'witnessing' an exchange w/o really being invited to contribute to same (which is decidedly not what lurking is about, either), with one participant offering tidbits from over yonder someplace while he goes about his 'real' business... which is, i understand, not at all intended, but which is nonetheless one effect this sort of forwarding/distancing can produce... and since most on this list know just how talky i can be, most will understand me when i say that i'm feeling a bit uncomfortable at the moment...

best,

joe

↑ Index

88. Burt Kimmelman
New Magazine
Sat 6 Jul 1996

I have been sent a really lovely and rich magazine called "Object Lesson." How to describe it? It is multi-media pre-electronic: art and all kinds of verse (multi-textual I guess) including many insets of smaller "books" and envelopes full of all kinds of juicy things.

The editor, Joshua Beckman, was put on to me by Alex Cigale, and some of you may know his terrific magazine Synaesthetic (based on the found art/poem concept). Beckman writes about his planned next issue: "the next issue will include essays on poetry machines. Everyting from Bob Brown's Readies to personal essays on typewriters and tape recorders [yes, believe or not, folks, Beckman does not have e-mail and one might guess from this above remark that he might not own a computer--but i urge you not to be put off by this!]. The idea being to awaken the notions of mechanics that are embedded in the creation of poetry and to broaden the definition of what a machine can be, especially to a writer. I want to have the essays on everything from 'the corporate machine' to 'the influencing machine', so that the idea of the typewriter and the author end up too confused to untangle. At the same time, I hope to have work that simply praises the different tools of the trade and inspires a curiosity towards the reader's poetry and poetry machines."

Now, I would think that if you of, say, the Chris Funkhauserian persuasion, then you might want to think about sending Beckman something anyway.

Send to:
Joshua Saul Beckman, Editor
OBJECT LESSON
630 Wickenden St.
Providence, RI 02903
(401) 453 - 5146

↑ Index

89. Ward Tietz
A Humument
Sat 6 Jul 1996

Does anybody know of any criticism written on Tom Phillips' "A Humument"?

Thanks,

Ward Tietz

↑ Index

90. Herb Levy
Re: A Humument
Sat 6 Jul 1996

Ward Tietz writes:

> Does anybody know of any criticism written on Tom Phillips' "A Humument"?

There was a very good special issue of the Canadian magazine Open Letters entitled "Between Poetry & Painting" that focused on Joe Tilson, Ian Tyson, & Tom Phillips. It was fourth series, #1&2, Summer 1978. This includes lots of good stuff: an interview by Kevin Powers (who interviewed each of the featured artists) & articles by Phillips, composer Gavin Bryars, David Bindman, Nicholas Zurbrugg, David Bindman, & others.

There's also a piece in Heather McHugh's book of essays Broken English about the work.

I'd love to know of any other things people know about too.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

91. Steven Howard Shoemaker age of speleological reproduction
Sat 6 Jul 1996

I've just read an account in the latest Discover about some tablets that have just been found in caves near Beijing. Apparently, around 605 A.D. a Buddhist monk named Jingwan decided that the only way to save the the Buddhist scriptures from hostile Chinese emperors was to chisel them in stone. Over generations, the monks of the Yunju monastery carried out the project, bringing it to completion a millenium later, around 1644, having used 14,278 tablets. They hid the tablets in nine caves, and only the locals knew about them until recently, when a farmer showed them to Josef Guter, a German China specialist. Guter says: "The most important aspect of this discovery is that we have on stone the whole canon of Buddhism in 35 million Chinese characters written over 1,039, and that it has survived WW II and the Cultural Revolution. Its study will be in the hands of generations of men and women in many disciplines of cultural history."

What a textual project! Fascinating to me along many lines, one of them being that it is probably the ultimate example of the potential for atom-based textual preservation--making words as solid as possible. At at the other extreme, one might undertake the bit-based strategem of digitizing a text and then distributing it as widely or carefully as possible, making it nearly immaterial but pervasive? And actually, that question is directly relevant: what will happen to the texts now? Paradoxically, as soon as they are discovered, as soon as they have readers, they are endangered... steve

↑ Index

92. Steven Howard Shoemaker

Re: stochastic

Sat 6 Jul 1996

Strangely, when i made my post about speleological reproduction, I hadn't yet read Christina's post below. Interesting synchronicity.

I wonder if Clayton Eshleman has his tickets booked for Beijing yet?

steve

> According to the OED, stochastic comes from the Greek, means "to aim at a mark, guess". "Pertaining to conjecture"
>
> The following from Ilya Prigine and Isabelle Stenger's Order Out of Chaos makes a conjunction of poetics with the stochastic--and if one thinks in terms of the relation of cave paintings, rock art and heiroglyphs to poetics in terms of "objects" and "sounds"and "images" in/out of time is most useful:
>
> It is hard to avoid the impression that the distinction between what exists in time, what is irreversible, and, on the other hand, what is outside of time, what is eternal, is at the origin of human symbolic activity. Indeed, one aspect of the transformation of a natural object, a stone, to an object of art is closely related to our impact on matter. Artistic activity breaks the temporal symmetry of the object. It leaves a mark that translates our temporal dissymmetry into the temporal dissymmetry of the object. Out of the reversible, nearly cyclic noise level in which we live arises music that is both stochastic and time-oriented (312).
>
> Highly recommend this book & appreciate connection made to music in previous note--
>
> dave baptiste chirot
>
> (susan howe: "articulation of sound forms in time"--from schoenberg--but improvisation in Free jazz--check out New York Contemporary Five lps--Archie Shepp and Don Cherry--way to approach understanding chance in relation to form can be quite different when thought of in terms of collective improvisation--and so of "harmony of the spheres"--in relation to "chaos")(Don Cherry wrote "Relativity Suite")

↑ Index

93. Charles Alexander
Re: A Humument
Sat 6 Jul 1996

I would also be interested in the answer to this. I once curated an exhibition at Minnesota Center for Book Arts in which some of the original page/paintings of A Humument were included, borrowed from the Ruth & Marvin Sackner Archive for Concrete & Experimental Poetry. Perhaps Ruth or Marvin Sackner would know the answer, but I don't think either is on this list. I will forward the question to a book arts list and see if it stirs up any answers there.

charles

> Ward Tietz writes:
>
> Does anybody know of any criticism written on Tom Phillips' "A Humument"?
>
> There was a very good special issue of the Canadian magazine Open Letters entitled "Between Poetry & Painting" that focused on Joe Tilson, Ian Tyson, & Tom Phillips. It was fourth series, #1&2, Summer 1978. This includes lots of good stuff: an interview by Kevin Powers (who interviewed each of the featured artists) & articles by Phillips, composer Gavin Bryars, David Bindman, Nicholas Zurbrugg, David Bindman, & others.
>
> There's also a piece in Heather McHugh's book of essays Broken English about the work.
>
> I'd love to know of any other things people know about too.
>
> Herb Levy
> [redacted]

↑ Index

94. Charles Alexander journal praise
Sat 6 Jul 1996

Seeing the interest in criticism of Tom Phillips's, and thinking of works in which literature becomes physical (visual & otherwise) made me want to put in a word of praise for the new issue of Chain (vol. 3, part 1, I believe). There are many genre- & some gender-bending works, and enough of works which extend the literary into an other space (conceptual, visual, etc.) as to not make of such works "the exception." It's the first journal in a long time (despite several other fine ones) I have read cover to cover and continually been amazed by. Already I find myself planning activities or works or publication projects partly influenced by works therein.

Thanks very much to Juliana Spahr & Jena Osman for the fine editorial work.

charles

↑ Index

95. James Brook
jakob van hoddis?
Sat 6 Jul 1996

Anyone know of translations of the poems and other writings by Jakob Van Hoddis, an early German Expressionist? Or articles about him, especially with biographical information? The only thing I've found in English is a brief entry in Twentieth-Century German Verse edited by Patrick Bridgewater (Penguin 1968) and two poems.

Thanks,

James Brook

↑ Index

96. Michelle Roberts
Re: post language poetry, post modernist poetry, fakes
Sat 6 Jul 1996

This is me being a bumb bunny, but could any one offer me a quick definition of "the new sentence'? I read it a post on this thread and would like to get a grip on the concept.

Any hints appreciated,
Meaghan

Meaghan Roberts
Ph.D. Candidate - Ethics and Literature
The University of Texas at Dallas
[redacted]

↑ Index

97. Gabrielle Welford
Ougarit (fwd)
Sat 6 Jul 1996

Thought someone must be interested in seeing this. Gab.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Ce courrier que j'ai recopié intégralement était joint au premier exemplaire de la revue Ougarit éditée en Palestine et que je vous laisse découvrir :

Madame, monsieur,

Nous avons le plaisir de vous présenter la revue litéraire et artistique 'Ougarit', réalisée par un groupe de jeunes artistes de différentes disciplines (littérature, arts graphiques, cinéma, théatre, musique) et publiée à Ramallah (Palestine).

Pourquoi cette revue? Tout d'abord parceque nous sommes convaincus qu'il est essentiel aujourd'hui de créer un espace pour un dialogue artistique interdisciplinaire, un lieu d'échange où puissent se rencontrer et confronter les nouveaux courants et les nouvelles visions artistiques et intellectuelles à l'oeuvre dans la société palestinienne.

En effet, les nouvelles réalités que nous vivons actuellement ont ammené un boulversement des anciennes cartes intellectuelles et mentales qui, en se redistribuant et se redéfinissant, cèdent la place à de nouvelles cartes, à de nouveaux horizons. Cette période "troublée" est en même temps le foyer d'un bouillonnement culturel et artistique dont témoigne l'émergence, dans différents domaines, d'oeuvres de grande qualité, même si certainesen sont encore à un stade "expérimental".

Aussi sentons-nous l'urgence de créer un/ des forum/s pour que ces nouvelles visions en mouvement puissent se rencontrer, se rassembler, mais aussi être fertilisées par un plus grand contact avec des courants qui se développent à l'étranger et desquels nous avons si longtemps étés coupés.

C'est pourquoi le comité de rédaction, composé de jeunes artistes impliqués activement dans la création d'une nouvelle culture palestinienne, espère par cet envoi initier un échange fructueux avec ceux qui, d'une rive à l'autre de la méditerranée, ainsi que dans d'autres régions du Monde, souhaitent entamer un dialogue culturel autour de leur vision de l'art, de sa place et de son rôle. Nous serons heureux d'accueillir les articles, travaux littéraires, recherches etc... d'intellectuels désireux d'apporter leur contribution en partageant une vision novatrice.

Nous espérons une édition semestrielle, la présentation en sera améliorée, la forme actuelle (en particulier l'absence de table des matières et le désordre de certains textes) n'étant certes pas due à notre volontée mais aux conséquences du bouclage imposé aux territoires palestinniens pendant la période de son impressio.

En vous souhaitant une bonne lecture, nous vous prions d'agréer Madame, Monsieur, l'expression de nos sentiments chaleureux.

Le comité de rédaction.

Ougarit
c/o Hussein BARGHOUTHI
Cultural Studies Department
Bir Zeit University
P.O.BOX 14 - Bir Zeit
Palestine
fax : (972 2) 995 78 10 ou (972 2) 995 76 56

↑ Index

98. Tenney Nathanson
Chain unchained?
Sun 7 Jul 1996

> Date: Sat, 6 Jul 1996 16:39:19 -0500
> From: Charles Alexander <[redacted]>
> Subject: journal praise
>
> Seeing the interest in criticism of Tom Phillips's, and thinking of works in which literature becomes physical (visual & otherwise) made me want to put in a word of praise for the new issue of Chain (vol. 3, part 1, I believe). There are many genre- & some gender-bending works, and enough of works which extend the literary into an other space (conceptual, visual, etc.) as to not make of such works "the exception." It's the first journal in a long time (despite several other fine ones) I have read cover to cover and continually been amazed by. Already I find myself planning activities or works or publication projects partly influenced by works therein.
>
> Thanks very much to Juliana Spahr & Jena Osman for the fine editorial work.
>
> charles

could Juliana or someone post an order-from address for this issue? Plus how-to (email? snailmail? etc) hi Charles!

get ready, it's HOT here!

Tenney

↑ Index

99. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: here's another fine mess . . .

Sun 7 Jul 1996

Keith did not ask my permission to forward my report to Robert, nor do I feel in any way that permission was required. But now some slippage has happened that does bother me. As you will note at the beginning of Robert's message, addressed to me, he says that he is sending it directly to me prior to posting elsewhere. I believed that this meant we were to have some discussion between ourselves. I posted a quick response to Robert and requested that, should he decide to place his message in a public place, my response go along with it and thqat I be informed where it went. I also offered to continue the discussion in private.

It may be that Keith misunderstood the timing and forwarded the post too soon, or it could be that what I took to be a direct post to me was already posted in public. I will copy this to Robert in hopes of getting an answer.

When I get a chance I will also forward my initial response to this list. In the meantime I want to point out a few things that I think bear rather directly on Robert's reasonable sounding message.

There is a tape recording of the panel to which Robert responded. The tape is available to Robert on his request. I do not believe that I in fact have misrepresented his comments at the panel (though perhaps "tirade" was a little strong on my part) and there are any number of people on the list who were also at the session and may recall the conversation.

Here is one example. In Robert's message, after complaining that I have misrepresented his comments, he writes: "My objection is not at all to the use of sociology or sociological analysis un literary history or criticism . . ." In his recorded comments he said, "When we do the sociology thing it comes out real simple." I will leave it to you to decide which of us has represented the facts of the discussion more accurately.

This is important to me because, you may recall, one of my complaints about Robert's commentary was that he had decontextualized the papers to which he was responding. In this way he wound up, in response to a paper that argued that poets had been excluded BECAUSE of their racial identity from anthologies etc., stating that the paper argued for including poets based upon their representation of identity formations.

I will confess to having been angered, and I will cop to having gone a bit overboard in my subsequent comments about sociology. However, the fact that a good portion of Robert's message responds to arguments that were not made by me, and that were not part of my original post, should prompt a certain caution here.

And that is not a Freudian typo up there -- Robert said "in" not "un" literary . . .

As I said, I will forward this to Robert, and I will post here the reponse I sent to him that has not accompanied his message. After that it's pretty much up to Robert if there is any more on this subject --

↑ Index

100. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Orono (fwd)
Sun 7 Jul 1996

Here is my response to Robert's message, made before I knew that his message was already on the poetics list. Only note I would add here is that it was Don Wellman who first raises the issue of performative criteria, not Hank Lazer -- Hank raised the issue as a question as we were standing around the podium afterwards --

Have now also read Joe Amato's note on this -- I know that Joe is out of town now, but I want everybody else to feel perfectly free to jump in on the issues involved -- Since Robert felt that I had misrepresented his remarks, I thought it important first of all to state that I had reviewed his remarks carefully -- I am now more than ready to move on to possibly useful discussions of some of the other issues raised in this episode --

And by the way, if anybody on the list whose paper or comments I described in my report feels I have been inaacurate about anything, let me hear about it --

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Sat, 6 Jul 1996 11:02:24 -0700 (PDT)
From: Aldon L. Nielsen <[redacted]>
To: robert von hallberg <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: Orono

I will respond at greater length later (am on my way to family meetings at the moment) but here are a few VERY quick comments --

First of all, I would be careful about stating that I have misrepresented your remarks. (excuse the oddness of that sentence please; I, of course, would not have made the remarks) You did in fact include a reference to my opening comments about the number of papers at the beginning of your commentary. Perhaps you did not notice the tape recorder that was on the table in front of you. I responded directly to that comment as I felt I could appropriately speak of that which had been directed to my own remarks. If it becomes necessary in the course of public discussions, I will ask your permission to post a transcription of the commentary and will supply you with a copy of the tape. The remark about "badness" is off the tape. As we discussed these issues after the panel broke up, you did in fact say to me that the poems discussed were "bad poems." You will perhaps remember that I told you I would not argue with you then and there over the particular qualities of the poems cited for the simple reason that, in the case of "Montage," I didn't happen to like the poem all that much anyway. My arguments with you were not so much about the value of individual poems as about your mode of address (and the amount of the time it took.)

Now for a few quick matters that are more important to me, but have less to do with what one or the other of us actually did or did not say. (Again, I will gladly supply you with the tape if you wish to be certain about quotations.)

It is true that some people argue that a different mode of critique is required for poems such as "Montage," and I would agree with you that IF that is the case, then we should get down to the business of laying out what we think such an aesthetic might entail. However, please recall that I made no such argument to you on the day in question. Hank Lazer and, I believe, Jerome Rothenberg made a few comments on the need for a "performative" mode of critique as we were standing around debating afterwards. But as we go on with ouur own disucssions, please bear in mind that this is not an argument that I make. I believe that "performative" modes of critique are appropriate for forms of performance. I think it condescending to argue that Hughes has to be read by some other criteria of performance (when we're talking about poems on the page at least) than, say, Hayden.

When I refer in my posts to strategies of the old New critics, I am not speaking of their techniques of close reading, which I continue to use. I was speaking of the strategies used to dismiss black poets in the 403, 50s and 60s. In my other telegraphic reports of Orono (Did Keith in fact send you all of it, or just the part about that panel?) I mentioned an infamous review of Brooks by Simpson. Better examples might be Tate's various responses to African-American poets. What I was getting at in my all too short hand (and perhaps even short sighted) way was that a thorough and close reading of the history of American criticism of African-American poets turns up numerous instances of this same set of remarks being directed to similar panels and critical efforts. I in fact not only welcome close readings of black poets, I produce them from time to time. Mu complaint about your complaint was that you seemed to be ruling out other efforts that I feel are worthwhile and needed --

For example, if I agreed with what you said about the first paper (and I have much to dislike about that paper on entirely other grounds) I would be hard pressed to see much use in Alan Goldings work on anthologies, work that I find useful. If we did not make such arguments, the Heath and Norton would probably not have changed much at all. I believe they have not changed enough, and so I continue to make such arguments.

The word "interloper" does not in any way represent my view. I do indeed believe that any field of criticism is likely to benefit from interventions from well-informed critics who have worked primarily in other fields. I'm not sure what the term "outside" would even mean in this context. BUT, I have to admit amazement at part of our post-session (and therefore post-tape) exchange. When we were discussing the fact that numerous conferences, articles, books etc. were devoted to precisely the sorts of readings you called for, you indicated to me that you did not read journals such as _CLA_, _Callaloo_, _AAR_ etc., because, as you put it, you "can't be an expert in every field." Now, I hardly expect such expertise from anybody, including myself, but I found that a renarkable statement to come from somebody who had just delivered a keynote address on Robert Hayden. I wouldn;t put too much weight on this part of our exchange, as it's not part of the issues you have raised in your post to me, but I am trying to communicate something to you about how certain of your remarks must sound to people, perhaps without your meaning to sound objectionable.

(by the way, I am away from my office for an extended period, and the machine I am using does not allow me to back up and correct typographical errors. I am no typist, so please be forgiving of oddities of spelling, punctuation, spacing etc.)

Again, there is much else we could argue about. (For instance, the phrase "sociology thing" is yours, not mine. -- And I remain puzzled by your remarks about the importance (or lack thereof) of looking at Pound's contacts with black culture (doesn't all that Frobenious weigh on your mind for something?)

It's probably never a good thing to put too much weight upon post-panel discussions. The reason that I tape panels I am a part of is that I hope to get suggestions for further research, new abgles to explore, etc. What angered me that day (and I suppose I am still a bit angry about it) is that you did not ask a question, nor did you offer your comments in a way directed specifically to elements of the papers that might help their authors (or even me) to improve the work in hand. You did tell the panel that they were being reductive, that they were lending themselves to identity politics, etc. If I might take a cue from your own comments, I think you would be far more likely to achieve the result you seem to have aimed at by engaging directly with an element of the readings about which one might argue prodcutively. I suspect that any of us who present a paper of 20 minutes on such topics (or even an address of 40 minutes?) might accurately be accused of being reductive. On the other hand, I do not believe it truly is reductive to examine the history of race and anthologizing or race & criticism -- You appeared to me to go past arguing that the papers had failed in a specific way in the tasks they had undertaken to argue that the tasks they had undertaken shouldn't be undertaken. If I am misreading you on that point, I'm ready to be set straight.

I hope you will remember too that as we left the room I said to you that I felt comfortable having such an argument with you because I thought we could listen to one another (perhaps even mishear one another) and still get somewhere -- whereas I feel there is simply no point in my having such an argument with Louis Simpson. I do not mean by this that I believe you will eventually see things my way, but that I have much to learn from arguing these points with you.

But, as I keep telling my graduate students, we have to look at the same text before we can argue about our interpretations of it.

I am responding directly to you, in private, to the extent that any email is private. If you decide to post your message to me in any public place, please post this with it and let me know where it went. I have much more to say if we are going to debate in public. I have more to say, but perhaps in a happier tone, if we discuss this between ourselves.

↑ Index

101. Christopher K. Whipple
poetry performance
Sun 7 Jul 1996

I am hoping for some help from this group.

I am putting together a season of performed poetry.

The premise is that there is a superabundance of miraculous poetry out there; but for some reason it's not read publicly. My idea is to have trained actors read this great poetry. Who better to bring out the pacing, movement, and prosodic effects of these taught language dramas?

The performances will fall somewhere between reading and theater. The season will be a four part sequence of themes, running 1) Soviet Poetry; 2)Poets of WWI; 3) Victorian Dramatic Monologues, and 4) Contemporary Poetry.

I am going to use public (coffee house) readings as a rehearsal/development process for the fully staged perfomances.

I'm most interested in getting help on the WWI poets right now. The poets I have so far are Wilfred Owen (of course), Seigfreid Sassoon, Ivor Gurney, Isaac Rosenberg, e.e. cummings, Ernest Hemingway, Rupert Brooke, Edward Thomas and David Jones. Am I missing anyone? Can anyone lead me to some lesser known poets I might otherwise overlook (or lesser known poems from established poets not usually associated with this theme)?

Does anyone have any ideas on why coffee house readings are so often lame and depressing; why do these horrible people have a monopoly on the espresso circuit, while so much that is delicious is abandoned to a half-life in academia?

Does anyone have any ideas on how poetry can be successfully performed? Has anyone seen examples, even failed ones?

I look forward to your responses.

Chris Whipple

↑ Index

102. Robert J Wilson
Covering Cherub
Sun 7 Jul 1996

There's a critical concept/category from Blake that I think is still useful in trying to negotiate the blocked vision and pseudo-pluralism of the US poetry scene, even as worked out in the tender terrain of those panels in Maine-- it's called the Covering Cherub, which I take to be a figure for occluded vision pretending to be open to the past and future, pretending to be benignly liberal and political, pretending to do cultural critique while, at the same time (as in the New Yorker poem, or, for that matter, the poems in Nation or New Republic) bracketing out nine-tenths of social reality and twenty two thousand five hundred and sixty six alternative visions and voices and "outside" (Spicer on Mag Verse genres) languages. The Covering Cherub sits in some middle class heaven, in an Englsh Department of the soul, and he can talk about Language Poetry and AfroAmerican poetics and shaman poets an pidgin poets, he (or she can edit an anthology for Harvard UP too) just makes it possible that what Gramsci called (doing cultural studies in prison for his vision) "good sense" will never break through the "common sense" of ideological sonambulence and formalist reifications and "the big lie of the personal voice." But Covering Cherubs should be heard on language poet panels too, and they should get on poetry lists too and talk and talk and talk the talk, this is called 'cheery American poetry' and that is why, still, 'creativity takes place along a line of flight.' and I want out from that 'dialogue.' Regards to Joe Amato for blasting through so much of the American bullshit, it is an American as apple pie and critical inquiry, Rob Wilson

↑ Index

103. Robert Drake
Re: Chain unchained?
Sun 7 Jul 1996

---

i'll second earlier enthusiasms for Chain--i'm lookin forward to pt 2...

Chain
107 14th St.
Buffalo NY 14213

$10 for 1 issue, $18 for 2
checks to UB Foundation...

lbd

↑ Index

104. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Orono
Sun 7 Jul 1996

Joe,
I understand your frustration, but I don't want to see our possibilotoe possibilities of discourse circumscribed. We're in a wierd techno-leap moment and maybe that accounts in part at least for why people like van hallberg aren't on our list; maybe we should draft a letter to newt gingrich to send some of those lap tops he promised to all the inner city kids of america to senior profs, that is, along with a subsciption to the net.

burt

↑ Index

105. Peter Nicholls
Re: oppen
Sun 7 Jul 1996

Dear Peter: just wondering whether there is any news from California about Objectivist Nexus....Will you be coming to the UK this summer? Let me know if you are. All best wishes, Peter.

↑ Index

106. Joe Amato
Re: Orono
Sun 7 Jul 1996

burt, yeah... my little rant has been brewing for a while, b/c it's become obvious to me over time how specific discourses operate with personnel in absentia, as it were... i mean to say that, while it's arguable that online exchange is not for all tastes, it's not arguable that such exchange (nevermind electronic publication) is becoming a vital part of academic communities, esp. b/c it presents possibilities for academics to learn from non-academics, for both groups to learn from one another---not least, to learn how to speak to one another... interestingly, too, there's also the little-big question of what "counts" in academic circles as professional service, and as you suggest, sometimes the old guard, or the new old guard (pardon moi), is culpable on the count of not taking this stuff too seriously... perhaps due to sheer lack of electronic exposure (academics can be so very anemic), perhaps b/c things can be so comfy post-tenure... not a blanket statement---there are plenty of tenured, visible, full-blooded folks on this list who for me are the exception proves the rule...

anyway, mebbe i only imagine (as i just posted to another list member backchannel) mebbe i only imagine a certain nonchalance when a legible name begins speaking from the margins, as it were, or from above... as much as i wish to behave w/o rancor, i just get steamed-up a bit when i sense that sort of intrusion (besides, it's hot and humid today in chicago)... and i mean this w/o finger-pointing at keith, and really by way of saying to robert von hallberg, a bit unfairly---

HELLOOOOO---YOU OUT THERE YET, ROBERT???--c'mon into the pool and join the fun!... you may get splashed a bit, either way...

all best,

joe

↑ Index

107. Burt Kimmelman
Re: oppen
Sun 7 Jul 1996

I guess I must have missed something. Peter, could you say more about California and the Objectivist Nexus?

Burt

↑ Index

108. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Sun 7 Jul 1996

Aldon's recent reference to Tate's and Pound's views of African-Americans moves me to put forward an odd bit of business I've been somewhat puzzled lately. In a review of Pound's How to Read published in Poetry, Tate uses a racially and ethnically charged image to make a point about what he sees as Pound's shortcomings. The review acknowledges Pound as someon who "understands, as no other living man...the craftsmanship of verse," but also points to a "logical confusion of his [Pound's] intellect when it is not performing the task which is specifically his own, that task being poetry." (So far, this is an argument that seems to have some merit.) From there Tate takes extended exception to a comment of Pound's to the effect that when one is studying great inventors (like Newton or Dante) one shld be allowed to extract the gist of their discoveries without being bothered about "laundry bills" (i.e. an unnecessary clutter of biographical data). Tate sees poetry not as a science, with inventions and discoveries, but as a craft. As such, "It is the product of innumerable factors--of the relations among language, church and society, between fathers and mothers, butchers and bakers, between the poet and what society thinks of him." Accordingly: "the laundry bills of Dante should be zealously studied, by somebody like Mr. Pound who would know why he is studying them."

So what we have is a plea for an historically informed understanding of poetry and the poet's role in society. Not all that far from the the Oppens' criticism that Pound wld have been better off if he had spent some time in a factory before developing a theory of economics. But then comes Tate's final criticism of Pound: "Finally, I should like to intimate that Pound's own laundry bills might be studied with profit, for they are fuddling his logic. They would make an interesting collection, beginning with Idaho and Indiana, and ending up with the banks of the Susquehanna and the 'banks o' Italie.' There is Mr. Pound sitting in his heap of miscellaneous laundry bills, so confused outside the moment of his craft (which is the most lucid of our time), that he thinks the laundry bills did the washing: what Mr. Pound needs is just an ordinary Irish or colored washerwoman. To look an honest African wench in the face is better than a column of figures, and a fine cure for the belief that a poet can get along without having any laundry done at all.

As I see it, Tate is suggesting that what an appropriate historical grounding (i.e. looking an honest African wench in the face) will tell you is the absolute necessity of the current forms of racial and political oppression (somebody's gotta do the laundry and it's not gonna be Tate). The analysis is like the Oppens', but with an exactly opposed political valence. Also interesting because I have been trying to think about Pound's racism, but what happens here is that Tate's own form of racism seems (in Tate's reading) to cancel out Pound's. For Tate, Pound is a "dyed-in-the-wool revolutionist" who wld abolish the social hierarchies.

So that's my reading, but the problem is that I don't know much at all about Tate and his other expressions of his views on race. Can anyone (perhaps Aldon) give me some more context here?

Sorry this is so long,
steve

↑ Index

109. maria damon
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Sun 7 Jul 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
>...
> So that's my reading, but the problem is that I don't know much at all > about Tate and his other expressions of his views on race. Can anyone > (perhaps Aldon) give me some more context here?
>
> Sorry this is so long,
> steve

walter kalaidjian has an extended analysis of the "New Critics" and Agrarian poets and critics on race. it's in a book forthcoming i think from michigan? edited by Stephen Watt and someone else??? and entitled something like "Marketing Modernisms." if you can't find that book, i'm sure walt will share his essay w/ you; he's in the the english dept at emory. bests, maria d

↑ Index

110. maria damon
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Sun 7 Jul 1996

.
> So that's my reading, but the problem is that I don't know much at all > about Tate and his other expressions of his views on race. Can anyone > (perhaps Aldon) give me some more context here?
>
> Sorry this is so long,
> steve

ps. tate taught in the dept i now teach in, and he is known to have been rather retro in the fifties by his then colleagues. i've heard him thus characterized by leo marx, who was in the american studies program, who sd that, much as these english dept new-critics were admirable intellectual colleagues and congenial conversants, "I suspect that were the subject to have turned to politics we would have had little to say to each other." folks like marx lived in terror of the mccarthyite shadow, while folks like tate WERE that shadow.--md

↑ Index

111. maria damon
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Sun 7 Jul 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
>...
> So that's my reading, but the problem is that I don't know much at all > about Tate and his other expressions of his views on race. Can anyone > (perhaps Aldon) give me some more context here?
>
> Sorry this is so long,
> steve

3rd installment: i think that while tate and others were embarrassed by pound's fanaticism, which they saw as indecorous, basically they shared, if not his out-right fascism which was, after all, unpatriotic, a horror of Jews, Blacks and other Others who could not quite conform to their standards of rational --en-lightenment --humanity.

↑ Index

112. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Sun 7 Jul 1996

Thanks for responding Maria. I'm trying right now to apply some of your in-sights from the Stein chapter in the dark end of the street to a reading of a piece of "Yiddish" doggerel that was Pound's contribution to *An "Objectivists" Anthology. Trying to think about what happens when an "in-between language" is staked out for use by a representative of the white, male, gentile modernist establishment rather by a member of the "minority" culture...

steve

↑ Index

113. Jerry Rothenberg
Re: Covering Cherub
Sun 7 Jul 1996

For Rob Wilson, if it's of any interest.

In the second issue of SULFUR (1981, altho it doesn't seem to me that long ago) I had an attack piece vis a vis Harold Bloom called "The Critic As Exterminating Angel" -- at the end of which I go into a few pages about the Covering Cherub ("who in one tradition may be the Exterminating Angel himself, the [Hebrew] Malakh ha-Mavat" and who "guards the Tree of Life & blocks the return of fallen man to Paradise.") Bloom writes on this in considerably more detail and I'm in fact turning it on him, polemically, for reasons explained in the essay. Eshleman, who was editing Sulfur then as now, was very good on this matter, although I don't know off hand where -- if anywhere -- he has it in writing.

In that context, I think, Covering Cherubs are much more foreboding than what you're suggesting -- what I thought of at the time as that which "not only keeps the poet from the paradise of poetry but from a natural relation- ship to all those poets who inhabit it." I pin the label on Bloom in that one, tho there's clearly more to it than that.

Jerome Rothenberg
[redacted]

ps. If you're in Hawaii when I get there in September, maybe we can meet & talk about this & related matters.

↑ Index

114. Tony Green
Re: poetry performance
Sun 7 Jul 1996

Hi Christopher Whipple. Response to your notion abt actors. Distaste for actors reading poetry for me goes with the felt difference between stand-ups and actors. "Stand-ups can't act" is a way of noticing that stand-ups do not seem to know they are assuming a role (even though, of course, they are). Actors always assume roles. Rather than actors you want really good poet-readers. Last year I had the pleasure of hearing Robert Creeley reading Williams et al. You want something like that: no putting on a special voice or tone, no change from Creeley-voice reading Creeley that I could identify, but a real intelligent sense of what the text was doing at any point. That was really engrossing. To turn up the volume, to turn up the decor, to turn up the video-presentation, may do something for people who don't actually like poetry, but there is a danger in that of a deceptive kind of substitution. I guess I feel the poetry is damaged, more or less seriously by what you are thinking of.

best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

115. Gabrielle Welford
Ougarit (suite) (english/french) (fwd)
Sun 7 Jul 1996

More on this mag. Gab.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Sun, 7 Jul 1996 08:01:45 -1000
From: J-C Helary <[redacted]>
To: Multiple recipients of <[redacted]>
Subject: Ougarit (suite) (english/french)

Happy to see that although I posted in french, some people replied. It makes me wonder about (so called ?) progressists on a moderated news group criticizing a french contributor who complained because his french posts were never sent. It was about cultural imperialism. He was replied (more or less) that it was really a joke that french criticize anglo-saxons for cultural imperialism and anyway, english was a lingua franca on this ng and throughout usenet so he would just have to cope with it...

Good to see it's not like this here.

==========

for GDGoodman ([redacted]) :

I'll try to make a summary of my previous post.

I'm working in a book shop specialized in the arab world, in Paris, an we received last week the first issue of a palestinian art magazine edited in Ramallah, in the occupied territories. I just decided to reproduce their presentation letter with their fax number so that interested people could get in touch with them. They don't seem to have Internet access (like most people on the world...).

The magazine is supposed to become an interdisciplinary art forum (which probably sounds quite pompous on our side of the world but might mean different things there), a place were they can share new visions and be in touch with currents developed abroad from which they had been cut off for a long time.

They say that the troubled times they live are the source of a cultural and artistic renewal that leads to high quality creations.

This letter, and the joined issue is supposed to be a bridge across mediterranee (?) to places beyond. They hope to be able to publish this magazine twice a year, depending on local conditions.

En vous souhaitant une bonne lecture, nous vous prions d'agréer Madame, Monsieur, l'expression de nos sentiments chaleureux. (sincerly yours,)

Le comité de rédaction.

Ougarit
c/o Hussein BARGHOUTHI
Cultural Studies Department
Bir Zeit University
P.O.BOX 14 - Bir Zeit
Palestine
fax : (972 2) 995 78 10 ou (972 2) 995 76 56

==========

for Neil ([redacted] (esperanto))

Je m'appelle Jean-Christophe, Jean-Claude c'est mon père mais je ne crois pas que tu le connaisse.

La revue est bilingue, une partie française, une partie arabe. Je n'ai pas pris le temps de la lire (je ne connais pas encore assez bien l'arabe pour commenter la deuxième partie anyway).

Je suis mal placé pour parler de la langue des colons mais il me semble que toutes les langues majeures (du point de vue de la quantité de locuteurs) le sont parcequ'elles ont été la langue d'un peuple en position de supériorité à un moment de l'histoire. Donc on peut considerer une langue comme un média privilégié dans une aire culturelle donnée. A toi de choisir ton public.

Quant à leur utilisation du Français, je ne trouve pas ça bizarre vu "l'importance" qu'a eu la France dans cette région à une certaine époque. Peut-être que leur niveau de conscience n'est pas encore parvenu à la critique de l'impérialisme culturel... Mais je pense que le multilinguisme est quelque chose d'autre que ça (I mean l'absence de critique de l'impérialisme culturel). Le multilinguisme est une situation 'normale', c'est la standardisation unilingue qui ne l'est pas (IMHO).

==========

Amicalement,

Jean-Christophe.

==========

Stand up, all victims of oppression
For the tyrants fear your might Don't cling so hard to your possessions
For you have nothing, if you have no rights
Let racist ignorance be ended
For respect makes empires fall
Freedom is merely privilege extended Unless enjoyed by one and all

So come brothers and sisters
For the struggle carries on The Internationale
Unites the world in song
So comrades come rally
For this is the time and place
The internationale ideal
Unites the human race

↑ Index

116. Gabrielle Welford
Re: poetry performance
Sun 7 Jul 1996

nHi Christopher. My question is where are the women? Mina Loy began publishing around 1914. And other _Others_ folks. And and and.. gab.

↑ Index

117. Herb Levy
Subtext Readings for July & August, solicitation for Fall readers
Sun 7 Jul 1996

I don't think that the last two Subtext readings curated by Nico Vassilakis have been posted yet, so here they are:

July 18th
Noemie Maxwell & (from Vancouver) Lisa Robertson (followed by a short, uncurated performance by visiting composer Ellen Fullman)

August 15th
Bryant Mason & (from Oregon) F A Nettelbeck (who will perform some collaborations with Seattle-area composer/performer Wayne Horvitz)

All readings start at 7:30 pm on the third Thursday of each month, at the Speakeasy Cafe, in Seattle's Belltown district.

See you there.

If any writers on the list know that they'll be in the Northwest this fall, please let me know via e-mail (address below). There's still some spaces available.

Bests

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

118. Ron Silliman
Listpersonship
Sun 7 Jul 1996

This will sort of be all over the place, but I got piqued by the discussion about von Hallberg's participation(and by extension, of others in a similar position).

My personal guess with regards to Bob not belonging to this (or any other) list is simply that he imagines himself as having better things to do with his time/energy. Ultimately, I think it falls outside our own ability to judge another's intentions. It's like suggesting that, say, Bruce Andrews is politically incorrect because he doesn't choose to own a computer.

There is also a certain hubris in suggesting that this list, as distinct from CAP-L, Wr-eye-tings, The Sixties, the Derrida, Deleuze, Baudrillard, Fluxus, High Tech Marketing or any other list is or is not at the center of the information universe.

But beyond those two very big caveats, the question is not a bad one. There is a very distinct phenomenon on many campuses of people, some of them "senior critical" or even directly poetry heavyweights, who do not participate in whatever avenues the scene in their vicinity takes. I recall being amazed that James E.B. Breslin, a favorite professor of mine at Cal, who could speak passionately about post-WW poetry and sympathetically read a wide range of it, never seemed to think to actually attend a poetry reading in Berkeley, let alone San Francisco. It was as if there was a total disconnect. Similarly, students and faculty at Stanford (with the notable exception of Marjorie Perloff) seem to find San Francisco impossibly far away. And I've met one person connected with the Stanford writing scene for over a decade who claims (facetiously?) never to have physically laid eyes on Gilbert Sorrentino. I suspect the examples with regards to NYC are at least as mind boggling.

It is, as I think everyone of us knows all too well, very possible for people to be "professionally engaged" with contemporary literature without ever connecting to it as an active social phenomenon, something going on in their town. Sometimes that's just a reclusive personality (hermetic types from Anne-Marie Albiach to Karl Young are legion). I once knew a poet, someone who published several books in the 1970s, edited a magazine and published a few terrific books of other peoples, who hated to meet writers, because they were never the perfect beings he envisioned from their poems. I've also known others who had a seriously ill child, partner or parent, who were equally removed.

But what may be situational or neurotic can also be utilized cynically, and I think that was the question being suggested by someone like Bob having to have his inputs "forwarded" to the list. It suggests both that he's not so out of touch as to not know about its existence, but somehow too something (fill in your paranoia here) to be bothered to participate directly.

Of course, the day this list becomes the transparent medium of all poetry (or even of all post-New American poetry), it will be far too unwieldy to have any further value. It's value consists precisely through the work of people who do participate. And, frankly, it matters much more what somebody who actively participates on this list thinks than it does some distant critic who's not clued in. Why not badger Fred Jameson? Or Andrew Ross? Or, or, or?

How does von Hallberg's response, detailed and serious as it was (I can't tell if Aldon misrepresented him or not, although knowing the two of them I'm inclined to buy Nielson's account), differ from, say, Catherine Stimpson saying in the NY Times on the day that the MacArthur Foundation (whose fellowship process she directs) awarded a grant to Richard Howard that the fellowships were being given to those who are "pushing the envelope"? von Hallberg at least knows what the issues are.

It seems to me that a much closer and more tangible form of "passive aggressive" relation to any list like this one (including this one) comes from those people who function as "pure lurkers," who actively want to get some of the value produced by this collective mind (to use Marc Andreeson's definition of the internet) without wanting to contribute themselves. This one-way relationship falls somewhere between pure consumption and parasitism proper. If I were feeling intemperate (and I have my moments), I'd be inclined to suggest a rule on the order of deleting anyone who doesn't contribute to the discussion, say, once per month.

Now that's a modest proposal...

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

119. JOEL LEWIS
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Mon 8 Jul 1996

---

memorey is hazy.... but Tate does write the intro to Melvin Tolson's Libretto for the Republic of Liberia (??) in th 50's, remember the intro as serving as the official New Crit blessing on the African_american Modernist.

Joel Lewis

↑ Index

120. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Tate
Mon 8 Jul 1996

By all means read Walter's essay, and tell him to send me a copy!

meanwhile, read Tate in I"ll Take My Stand, his novel, The Fathers, his collected poetry reviews, his bio. of Stonewall Jackson, the intro. to Tolson that Lorenzo spoke about so effectively at the Maine conference --

AND it wdn't hurt to read the poems again --

I've been away from studying Tate too long to know what's been done just recently -- so fill me in, via the list, on anything further you come across --

↑ Index

121. Kevin Killian
Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
Mon 8 Jul 1996

At 12:19 PM 7/8/96, maria damon wrote:
>i'm somewhat struck by how a discussion about race, sociology and literary >criticism has turned into a discussion of list etiquette. this is indeed
>one of >the problems i think rob wilson touches on in his scathing "covering cherub" >posts. volatile issues of materialist criticism get watered down into an >internicene critique of our own teensy weensy little hierarchy of >poetry-critics

Poetry-critics? Am I naive in my assumption that the poetics list was at least originally intended as a place for the discussion of poetics by poets?

> this not to say that any one remark about list-politics and academic politics is trivial or ill-directed, but the cumulative effect of what draws discussion and what dies in silence is noteworthy. likewise, chris s's query last week about erotics and race, or aldon's challenge to the view that interracial sex is > politicallly radical both got no pick-up.

Again, this is a poetics list. I'm sorry, but I find this holier-than-though attitude of your post very offensive, this accusing of 400 people of racism because no once picked up on threads that you found important.

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

122. Jonathan A Levin
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Just a footnote to Maria Damon's first note--

Marketing Modernisms (I think that title is correct) is forthcoming from Michigan, and is edited by Stephen Watt and Kevin J.H. Dettmar. I know the editors just received final proofs, so maybe the book will appear later this year.

Jonathan Levin

↑ Index

123. Robert J Wilson
Re: Covering Cherub
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Dear Jerry Rothenberg, Thanks for the return of the uncanny Covering Cherub as a critical cateogry/weapon to be used against those who would depoliticize and/or monopolize the sublime of vision in a narrow, lyric solipsism kind of way (HB). And one can only appreciate and applaud the detailed and painstaking and broadhearted way you have fought to keep this 'return to paradise' open to diverse traditions and contenders that the northeast hegemony has never heard of reckoning. All I meant, in this devious context of American liberalist poetics, that a third and mediating level (the state and its ideological agents, complicit, unconscious, sleepwalking and otherwise) has to be thought through, because when somebody tells me (arguing on a large scale, absorbing diverse poets left and write) that American poets work 'to consolidate empire at home and abroad' etc, then I day, let us blast that Covering Cherub out of the line of vision so that a non-imperialist poetics and a more trenchantly politicized vision of what trans/US poetics could and should be-- to invite such people as 'keynote' speakers at Orono or otherwise seems to me a derelection of duty and vision.

When you know the details on what books, projects, essays etc such people have deviously rejected "anonymously," then I say let us take those people out and off the scene so that some poetic deep thinking can begin "In the Middle of [Reified] Modernism in the Middle of [Late] Capitalism on the Outskirts of New York [Chicago]." I am tired of crossing a desert of dead vision even if it means, for me or for some, that in visionary terms I can 'enter the paradise of Blakean heaven." That such people read and appropriate all the emergent energies of counter-poetics makes it all the more devious and urgent to get some agon going by which to overturn the temples of the moneylenders and their market-friendly babble.

And of course I look forward to your visit to Hawaii where you can enter into the Tinfish/Bamboo Ridge/redflea indigenous poetics of the local in some helpful way. The president of HLAC (Hawaii Lit Arts Council), Gabriel Welford, urged me to send you some essays and works on and around local/Pacific poetics, and I just remembered I will do so. The Covering Cherub is out here too, and it may (at times) be me. take care, Rob Wilson

On Sun, 7 Jul 1996, Jerry Rothenberg wrote:

> For Rob Wilson, if it's of any interest.
>
> In the second issue of SULFUR (1981, altho it doesn't seem to me that long ago) I had an attack piece vis a vis Harold Bloom called "The Critic As Exterminating Angel" -- at the end of which I go into a few pages about the Covering Cherub ("who in one tradition may be the Exterminating Angel himself, the [Hebrew] Malakh ha-Mavat" and who "guards the Tree of Life & blocks the return of fallen man to Paradise.") Bloom writes on this in considerably more detail and I'm in fact turning it on him, polemically, for reasons explained in the essay. Eshleman, who was editing Sulfur then as now, was very good on this matter, although I don't know off hand where -- if anywhere -- he has it in writing.
>
> In that context, I think, Covering Cherubs are much more foreboding than what you're suggesting -- what I thought of at the time as that which "not only keeps the poet from the paradise of poetry but from a natural relationship to all those poets who inhabit it." I pin the label on Bloom in that one, tho there's clearly more to it than that.
>
> Jerome Rothenberg
> [redacted]
>
> ps. If you're in Hawaii when I get there in September, maybe we can meet & talk about this & related matters.

↑ Index

124. Dean Taciuch
Re: poetry performance
Mon 8 Jul 1996

I agree with Tony Green's position on actors performing the poetry--best to have other poets reading the works. The readers need to be concerned with the medium itself--the language. I don't think actors generally would do this--their concern would be with the meaning, the emotions, of the poem. The temptation would be, I think, to render "dramatic" readings of the poems, which would damage them in the same way as using, say "dramatic" lighting to make sure the audience "got the point." In Joan Retallack's recent book of interviews with John Cage, Cage had a similar problem with using Julliard musicians to perform his compositions--they try to emote, rather than allowing the music to occur. Same with the poetry, I think--actors would tend to force meanings out, rather than allowing them to occur in the langauge.

Dean Taciuch
[redacted]

↑ Index

125. Gwyn McVay
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Steve, in the same vein, what about Berryman's Henry Pussycat?

On Sun, 7 Jul 1996, Steven Howard Shoemaker wrote:

> *Thanks for responding Maria. I'm trying right now to apply some of your insights from the Stein chapter in the dark end of the street to a reading of a piece of "Yiddish" doggerel that was Pound's contribution to An "Objectivists" Anthology. Trying to think about what happens when an "in-between language" is staked out for use by a representative of the white, male, gentile modernist establishment rather by a member of the "minority" culture...
>
> steve

↑ Index

126. maria damon
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Mon 8 Jul 1996

steve: fascinating! could you send me that piece by pound. i shudder to think what the objectivists made of this. it seems that in this case, you are dealing with something more charged than a "white male gentile modernist" but someone who dedicated much of his life and risked his national standing to participate in the war on the Jews,,, in other words, a confirmed anti-Semite of the unsubtle kind.--md

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
discussion group writes:
> Thanks for responding Maria. I'm trying right now to apply some of your > insights from the Stein chapter in the dark end of the street to a > reading of a piece of "Yiddish" doggerel that was Pound's contribution to > *An "Objectivists" Anthology. Trying to think about what happens when > an "in-between language" is staked out for use by a representative of > the white, male, gentile modernist establishment rather by a member of > the "minority" culture...
>
> steve

↑ Index

127. Henry Gould
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Mon 8 Jul 1996

On Mon, 8 Jul 1996 09:44:41 -0400 Gwyn McVay said:
>Steve, in the same vein, what about Berryman's Henry Pussycat?

See Miao Filene's monograph, "Catty Gossip, Anemic Cad : Berryman's Pseudo-Animalism in _The Dream Songs_", Manx University & Veterinarian Institute Press, 1995. A good critique of Berryman's uncrritical presumtive style, employing an analysis of his use of CATalepsis and DOGberryisms in ahistorical and super-humanist frames (or, as she calls them, "c-oops"). - Henry Gould >..<

↑ Index

128. Joe Amato
Re: Listpersonship
Mon 8 Jul 1996

---

ron, yo, i'm over here man...

hey: i can only imagine, again, what subject position someone is writing from who feels free to have his post forwarded (this latter construction the most lenient i can manage) to a list of some 400 plus folks, many or most of whom he doesn't know... i would never, never do this mself, and i've been hanging around online for some time now, here and there... which means either (1) robert von hallberg has no working knowledge of list communities, and doesn't see this as a cheeky move or (2) he really doesn't care if this is seen as a cheeky move... let's be nice and go with (1)... which feeds my hunches about how senior folks in our profession, on the avg., have a print-based sense of themselves... i won't get into all of the various twists and turns of this latter assertion at this point... but von hallberg clearly has a critical rep. at stake, yes, and all's i'm asking that he do is subscribe to poetics formally to address what he takes as a challenge to same from aldon...

as to whether we can talk "about" anybody who's not on this list: well as you say, this ain't the center of the poetics world or anything... but again, me talking about, say, andrew ross is not quite the same thing as me talking about robert von hallberg... i mean, look at the dynamic that's developed: from now on, any time i write "robert von hallberg" i feel his absent presence... mebbe it's just me, but it's like i'm talking at once behind and in front of his back... and I DON'T KNOW THE MAN, and this is not my way... and this all b/c he stuck only his Big toe into the pool to test its temperature, as it were... whereas ross hasn't done so, except to the extent that his public post about the sokal affair (thankfully) ended up here (and if you wanna know what i think about ross's little stunt, just ask and i'll send you a 45kb draft of a piece i'm finishing up for _ebr_ on why the sokal situation shoulda been electronic from the get-go)...

so intentions and such aside, fact is that this list dynamic has been altered for me wrt
r-o-b-e-r-t v-o-n h-a-l-l-b-e-r-g... and i expect for a few others anyway...

now, as to "pure lurkers": ain't really no such thing, is there?... i mean, this presumes that there are some folks who will never leave lurk mode... granted, there may be many who rarely do... but at least we can imagine them, say, listening to some of what's being espoused by mouthier types like you and me and _____(i assume they're not merely processing the messages into oblivion)... and listening is worth something, ron... now as i see it we should be working, all of us, to try to pull more folks out of lurk, make for more comfortable regions hereabouts... and it happens: there have been a number of folks who've waited quite some time, by their own accounts, to enter into the public discussion (i suspect in fact your remarks may provoke same, as i'm sure you're aware)... and this takes time, and it's time that allows these spaces to mutate, to register, say, different sorts of conversational possibilities---which is to say different gendering, different cultural potentials, and such like... so your "modest proposal" (setting aside how easy it would be to defeat same functionally) gives exceedingly short-shrift to the possibility of helping this space accommodate---if not all tastes, predispositions, what have you---at least a somewhat broader range of interests and motivations than you and i and _____ can hope to represent...

and again, i'm preaching to the choir now---you know this already...

ok?... just so's we're talking to each other, yknow...

peace//

joe

↑ Index

129. Christopher Reiner
Witz Announcement
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Hi everyone,

Can this count as my once-a-month message?.....

WITZ: A Journal of Contemporary Poetics

Essays * Criticism * Reviews

NOW AVAILABLE

ISSUE 4.2 - SUMMER 1996

CONTENTS:

Towards A Free Multiplicity of Form
By Mark Wallace

"...In a free multiplicity of form, all forms of writing are possibilities that may or may not lead to a particular form of cultural life. In such circumstances, use of a poetic form does not become the equivalent of a manifesto-like assertion of one's values, but instead becomes a matter of exploration..."

"'Our Words Were The Form We Entered': Towards A Theory of the Net"
By Loss Pequeno Glazier

"...The cultural dimensions of technologies occur once they escape their original definition, subsequently undertaking vast production and reproduction of these alternative subjects. At this point, the purpose of the technology no longer holds court. Rather, control of its rapidly diversifying subjects becomes the focus of attention..."

ALSO:

CHRIS STROFFOLINO ON NYU POETRY TALKS
CRAG HILL ON bpNICHOL
STEPHEN ELLIS ON TOD THILLEMAN

40pp, 5" x 8-1/2"
Individual issues: $4 (US)
Subscriptions (3 issues, 1 year) $10
Institutional Subscriptions: $30 (3 issues)

Please make checks out to Christopher Reiner.

WITZ
12071 Woodbridge Street
Studio City, CA 91604

[redacted]

↑ Index

130. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Listpersonship
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Ron,

I agree with you except for your suggestion that each list member have to say SOMETHING to the list at least once a month; then there'd be a lot of meaningless chatter, I fear, which demeans all the good talk that often also takes place. No, the list is fine as it is, terribly unfair at times, perhaps, but also incredibly free (or at least as free as we want to be since we may be worried about having what we say on the list repeated elsewhere; of course, again (as I said the other day--and this is no news to you but I'll say it anyway here), we're in a techno-warp and questions about copy righting, patenting, authored (single and multiple) and authorless texts (even linearity?) are not to be resolved easily. I know I'm saying the obvious here but perhaps it needs saying and then maybe we can all move on to other matters?

Burt

↑ Index

131. Steven Howard Shoemaker
Re: Tate/Pound/African-Americans
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Maria, Yes, I treat him as a "confirmed anti-Semite" throughout, and have already written about his anti-Semitism and how it affects his relations with Zukofsky in a piece that will be in the collection on Zuk edited by Scroggins, and due out anytime, i guess, from U of Alabama Press (any word, Mark?). What makes things complicated is that, unlike an anti-Semite like Eliot (whose public pronouncements are actually much less virulent), here is Pound in the early '30s working with all these Jews! And, as Casillo shows and I am seeing as well, there is a thread of admiration, and competition, running thru the anti-Semitism. The point is not that this admiration mitigates the anti-Semitism but that it is weirdly part of it... and that ties into Pound's need to "try on" the Yiddish... steve

Maria wrote:
>
> steve: fascinating! could you send me that piece by pound. i shudder to think > what the objectivists made of this. it seems that in this case, you are dealing > with something more charged than a "white male gentile modernist" but someone > who dedicated much of his life and risked his national standing to participate > in the war on the Jews,,, in other words, a confirmed anti-Semite of the > unsubtle kind.--md
>
> In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics
> discussion group writes:
> > Thanks for responding Maria. I'm trying right now to apply some of your > > insights from the Stein chapter in the dark end of the street to a > > reading of a piece of "Yiddish" doggerel that was Pound's contribution to > > *An "Objectivists" Anthology. Trying to think about what happens when > > an "in-between language" is staked out for use by a representative of > > the white, male, gentile modernist establishment rather by a member of > > the "minority" culture...
> >
> > steve
>

↑ Index

132. Rod Smith
Re: Listpersonship
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Ron wrote:
>If I were feeling intemperate (and I have my moments), I'd be inclined to >suggest a rule on the order of deleting anyone who doesn't contribute >to the discussion, say, once per month.

Ron, do we really want that many posts! My mailbox is always already stuffed.

Rod

↑ Index

133. maria damon
Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
Mon 8 Jul 1996

i'm somewhat struck by how a discussion about race, sociology and literary criticism has turned into a discussion of list etiquette. this is indeed one of the problems i think rob wilson touches on in his scathing "covering cherub" posts. volatile issues of materialist criticism get watered down into an internicene critique of our own teensy weensy little hierarchy of poetry-critics this not to say that any one remark about list-politics and academic politics is trivial or ill-directed, but the cumulative effect of what draws discussion and what dies in silence is noteworthy. likewise, chris s's query last week about erotics and race, or aldon's challenge to the view that interracial sex is politicallly radical both got no pick-up. md

↑ Index

134. Rod Smith
Re: and john cage and car sickness
Mon 8 Jul 1996

In response to Mark's post of a few days ago. I think Cage's relationship to "the western tradition" was complex & highly contextual. & of course he could get angry on occasion. The maddest I ever saw him was at a concert at the Philips Collection, the pianist had chosen the program to be performed, which included Ives, Crumb, Cage, &, I believe he had wanted to play a longish piece by Liszt (clue, clue) which was turned down, or maybe he did play it, don't remember. Any case he played one of Cage's pieces from the fifties very badly. The pianist told us he had only read the score the day before. At the intermission he said to the curator, in a very congenial manner, "thank the pianist for me, and ask him never to play my music again" and we left.

By the time I knew him, his work, & that of many artists he felt kinship with, was internationally acclaimed. So his energy was consumed by doing the work rather than railing against a tradition. Also, I'm not sure it's accurate to say he left the or a tradition-- rather that he & others played a part in changing it.

Rod

Mark Wallace wrote:

Hey Rod:

Thanks for the clarification on my earlier remarks relative to John Cage and his feelings towards the musical traditions he leaves behind. But your post leaves me with a question I'd like to hear more from you about. When you say that "at a certain point, Cage simply didn't need that tradition anymore" (I'm paraphrasing), are you implying that he left it behind without antagonism, just decided it could be ignored? Or, if he continued to have reactions towards it, what were the nature of those reactions? Loathe is, I can see, probably too strong. But what, from your understanding, would be the proper way to characterize his feelings towards the tradition he leaves behind? There's something about your post that seems almost to be characterizing his reaction as strangely unemotional--i.e., oh there it is, I don't need that, it really doesn't bother me and let's talk about something else. That seems to me a little bit hard to believe--you're trained in a whole tradition, work in it for many years, and then one day decide it's not significant, and leave it without much feeling either way? I'm just curious as to whether you could try to characterize more fully his reaction to what he left behind.

mark

↑ Index

135. c.g. guertin
Re: Listpersonship
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Lurker equals/does not equal listener? Is this a 'bad' moral equation? Silence is evil or simply undesirable?

cg

↑ Index

136. Joe Amato
Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
Mon 8 Jul 1996

---

but maria, isn't this just IT?... i mean isn't it exactly the case, exactly---that list politics, intentionally or otherwise, reflect the ongoing silencing of Other politics?... ergo attending to list politics, however one (which is to say, e.g., me) goes about same, is not merely an exercise in formal maneuvers, but a very (forgive me) real attempt not to be dismissive of such political undercurrents?... isn't it the case that issues of 'race, sociology and literary criticism' are over there (and where else could there be but print?) and over here?... i mean, if there's a there there, is there no here here?...

best,

joe

↑ Index

137. James Brook
Re: poetry performance
Mon 8 Jul 1996

A case study of actors performing poetry:

Last fall in Paris I had the opportunity of hearing Bei Dao read at the new Maison de la Poesie at the recently renovated Theatre Moliere, sponsored by Covering Cherub Enterprises. Admission was 50 francs--about $10--which seemed a little high. But we had to pay twice: the young woman at the counter wanted to know whether we had "reservations." No, we didn't. She made a big show of consulting her list, shaking her head, and making discouraging sounds--before turning back to us and declaring that she might be able to get us in. We paid, got tickets, and were ushered to our numbered seats in the half-empty theater.

Exactly on time the curtain(!) was raised to reveal the backlit silhouettes of five people seated on stage: an actor (Michael Lonsdale), a presenter, a critic, an interpreter (not Bei Dao's translator), and, off to the side, the poet himself. I guess they were all getting paid out of the ticket price. . . .

At least there was no dramatic music. . . .

The presenter presented in a vaguely presentational way. The actor moved up to the podium and gave his idea of a "poetic" delivery of the French translation of a short poem. Bei Dao was asked to read it in Chinese. And then the critic jumped in and harassed the poet with a series of profound questions in the form of retarded little essays about "the difficulty" of Bei Dao's poetry and its "problematic condensation." These stupid remarks were interpreted for an annoyed-looking Bei Dao, who replied brusquely to the effect that poetry tended to be "difficult" and "condensed." And so on for two hours.

In the course of the evening we heard no more than a dozen poems--massacred by the actor, whose dramatic and strictly-from-wardrobe-romantic air contrasted sharply with Bei Dao's seriousness and intensity. But it was the critic who really monopolized the stage--the large mouth in a small frame couldn't contain itself. But of course the French have a horror of poetry, a horror expressed in curious ways: they elevate it into a spectacle for the culturati, they encapsulate it as part of "the national heritage," and they carefully wrap it in criticism. They prefer the package to the contents. Like so many people.

Progressing a few months in time while digressing just a little in topic, I should also report on another "performance" at the Maison de la Poesie at the Theatre Moliere sponsored by Songs of Experience et Cie: Michel Deguy in Conversation with Jacques Derrida. This event was billed as a meeting between Poetry and Philosophy. I assure you that Philosophy won the match. Michel Deguy began by introducing himself and his "friend Jacques" and outlining their program: to engage in a dialogue on the reciprocal relations between their disciplines. Ever courteous and by his own admission a little unprepared for the occasion, Deguy asked Derrida to go first. Deguy was surprised to see Derrida pull a sheaf of papers several inches thick from his briefcase and begin reading--and reading and reading and reading and reading. In fact, Derrida read for almost an hour straight as he went through all the problems posed by the first words of one of Deguy's poems, which was written in the form of a love letter addressed to "Ma chair" [My flesh] instead of the more usual "Ma chere" [My dear]. There was no attempt at dialogue; Deguy was never questioned or given an opening. He just sat there in evident discomfort and astonishment, crossing and uncrossing his legs, unsure of where to put his hands. . . . I don't think that Derrida noticed the other obvious pun: "Ma chaire" [My pulpit, rostrum, university position]. When Derrida finally relented, Deguy said he didn't at all know how to reply to such a demonstration and so he finished the evening by reading a few unrelated journal entries and taking a few even less related questions from the audience.

Now, do I have to stress that my remarks are not an "attack" on actors, critics, or philosophers? They have their uses. But what I saw at these two events was a hatred for poetry that masqueraded as a love for poetry, a love that wished to consume its object, to become its object, to take the place of its object (Freudian references intended).

Your reporter,

James Brook

↑ Index

138. Christopher Filkins
Re: poetry performance
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Dean & Tony's positions are misinformed. An actor emotes or doesn't emote according to the direction they receive. There is a reason why we have directors after all. The virtue of actors is their ability to chameleon anyone who comes their way. Do not slam actors as emoting fools when they can do so much more.

Christopher Filkins

↑ Index

139. Henry Gould
Re: in defense of parasites
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Lurkers win my admiration for their self control. Now as I was saying about Charles S. Peirce...

Perhaps John Milton's classic SONNET (yall hear that? I said S*O*n*n*e*t) is appropriate here:

Thine e-air, Lord, doth buzz with eerie speed
Postings innumerable from fair and noir;
Oft over snail mail doth thine angels soar,
Froward to advance, or staunch impede Eelecteronic eels athwart thy deep-- Yea, over hill and dale and chip and bleep
They fling their witty bits, or, bootless, weep;
Thus many a mungy wolf turn eep-eep sheep.

Yet I, gone blind from staring at yon screen,
Will not despair, nor call o'duty shirk;
These keys annoy not I; my fingers keen Tap yet, yon delphic "Ode on a String Bean".
- Technohysterical, tis true - and yet - 'twill work!
They also serve, who only sit and lurk.

- Henry "Johnny B. Milt" Gould

↑ Index

140. Judy Roitman
Re: poetry performance
Mon 8 Jul 1996

> Hi Christopher Whipple. Response to your notion abt actors. Distaste for actors reading poetry for me goes with the felt difference between stand-ups and actors. "Stand-ups can't act" is a way of noticing that stand-ups do not seem to know they are assuming a role (even though, of course, they are). Actors always assume roles. Rather than actors you want really good poet-readers. Last year I had the pleasure of hearing Robert Creeley reading Williams et al.

Amen. There was also the radio reading of Whitman with the Prairie Home Companion guy, the Deliverance guy (is my memory correct?) and Allen Ginsberg. The first two were self-conscious and silly, but AG's reading was tremendously illuminating. He inhabited Whitman's line is if it were his true home (why not? since it is). No change (to parallel Tony Green) from AG reading AG, but, as Tony put it, "a real intelligent sense of what the text was doing at any point."

Worth finding if anyone knows how to find it.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

141. Dean Taciuch
Re: poetry performance
Mon 8 Jul 1996

> Dean & Tony's positions are misinformed.

Not speaking for Tony Green, but I may in fact be uninformed rather than mis-informed (I'm not actor, never studied acting, etc). But it is the actor's "abilty to chameleon" that may be the problem. I'm not saying they are "emoting fools"; the question is one of focus--an actor looks for a character to get into. Yes, actors have directors--but poets don't, you see. Would an actor assume the character of the poet whose work is being read? That misses the point, doesn't it? So would, I fear, any attempt to "act" a poem out--it places the focus elsewhere (on character, emotion, story) rather than on the language. It shows, I think, a distrust of the audience as well--the idea that poetry needs to be a bit predigested (by the actor or director), already worked out so that the masses can more easily absorb it. So I'm not knocking actors--but performing poetry is not acting. . .

Dean Taciuch

↑ Index

142. maria damon
Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
Mon 8 Jul 1996

In message <[redacted]> joe a writes:
> but maria, isn't this just IT?... i mean isn't it exactly the case, > exactly---that list politics, intentionally or otherwise, reflect the > ongoing silencing of Other politics?... ergo attending to list politics, > however one (which is to say, e.g., me) goes about same, is not merely an > exercise in formal maneuvers, but a very (forgive me) real attempt not to > be dismissive of such political undercurrents?... isn't it the case that > issues of 'race, sociology and literary criticism' are over there (and > where else could there be but print?) and over here?... i mean, if > there's a there there, is there no here here?...

>
>
With all due respect, joe, for your politics and the sophistication thereof, no, i don't think the discussion of whether or not bob von hallberg signs onto POETIX is the same as a discussion of how to do responsible, anti-racist scholarship in poetry and poetics. I was hoping for a discussion of the latter, not the former.
so, how DO we respond, in our scholarship, to the challenges posed by both Bob and Aldon in their point counterpoint, regardless of who is quoting whom more accurately?
md

↑ Index

143. Robert Drake
Re: Listpersonship
Mon 8 Jul 1996

> ... a modest proposal

that wouldnt be a Litterary ILLusion, would it? there, my post fr th month, and only 8 days into it...

lbd

↑ Index

144. Elisabeth W. Joyce
in defense of parasites
Mon 8 Jul 1996

In Defense of Parasites

As a silent lurker on this list, I find a need to respond to Ron Silliman's remarks about lurkers as parasites. Yes, I am a parasite, but not in the sense that I want to kill the list, to suck out of it all of its essences. Instead, I think of myself in terms of the food which the list offers me and which I digest in thoughtful silence. I recall scoffing at silent members of classes in graduate school, thinking that they were not effectively immersed in their pursuits, but in retrospect perhaps I misjudged them. I am not on the cutting edge of the field, nor will I ever be, but I am deeply invested in it and in what it means to me. I teach a heavy load of courses and have two small children. I live in relative isolation. The poetics list is a lifeline for me, composed of active intellectuals engaged in response to social and political effects on literature (poetry!). I payattention to what you say; I am learning here. I sift through your endless reams of material fo r the more often than not superlative assessments of awide range of topics. I am inspired by your reading lists. I am even moved by you (to tears even) as when you eulogized Larry Eigner, bringing in his life, his personality, and as always, his poetry. I am a reasonably active scholar, but I can't speak right now--perhaps later when my life is less strapped--but this doesn't mean that parasites are a negative force on this list. Rather, I would suggest, we are an everpresent supportive force, tha t audience which poetry often fears it lacks.

Lisa Joyce ([redacted])

↑ Index

145. maria damon
Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh
Mon 8 Jul 1996

In message <v01520d00ae069d8574ae@[205.134.228.153]> UB Poetics discussion
group writes:
> At 12:19 PM 7/8/96, maria damon wrote:
> >i'm somewhat struck by how a discussion about race, sociology and literary > >criticism has turned into a discussion of list etiquette. this is indeed
> >one of > >the problems i think rob wilson touches on in his scathing "covering cherub"
> >posts. volatile issues of materialist criticism get watered down into an > >internicene critique of our own teensy weensy little hierarchy of > >poetry-critics
>
> Poetry-critics? Am I naive in my assumption that the poetics list was at > least originally intended as a place for the discussion of poetics by > poets?
>
> > this not to say that any one remark about list-politics and academic > > politics > >is trivial or ill-directed, but the cumulative effect of what draws > discussion
> >and what dies in silence is noteworthy. likewise, chris s's query last week > >about erotics and race, or aldon's challenge to the view that interracial > >sex is > >politicallly radical both got no pick-up.
>

> Again, this is a poetics list. I'm sorry, but I find this > holier-than-though attitude of your post very offensive, this accusing of > 400 people of racism because no once picked up on threads that you found > important.
>
> Dodie Bellamy

i'm puzzled. this is the second time since the conference that you've come down on me for holier than thouness; both times, i've felt misrepresented in the way you characterize my posts. i have not accused anyone of racism, nor in general would i, since i find that kind of personal judgement to be counterproductive and not too meaningful. i'm saying i was disappointed at the way the discussion went. in my reference to poetry-critics, i was referring specifically to the discussion of robert von hallberg's presence and/or absence on the list and what it means. he is a critic rather than a poet; aldon too is a subject in this discussion, and it is true that he is a poet, but it was his work as a critic that was being discussed. i think "senior scholars" is the term joe used. bests, md

↑ Index

146. David Baratier
Chapbook Contest
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Pavement Saw Press 1996/1997 chapbook contest

$500 and 25 copies of the winning chapbook will be awarded for the finest collection of poetry received. The judge will be announced in an upcoming issue of AWP and Poet's and Writer's. Submit up to 32 pages of poetry. Include a cover letter with your name, address, phone number, poem titles, publication credits, and a brief biography. Do not enclude your name anywhere on the manuscript. Entry fee: $7. Make all checks payable to _Pavement Saw Press_. All entries must be postmarked by December 20, 1996, for consideration in this year's contest. Each entrant will receive a copy of the winning chapbook provided a 6 1/2 by 9 1/2 SASE with $1.01 in postage is included. All manuscripts will be recycled. Send all entries to:

Pavement Saw Press
Chapbook Contest
7 James Street
Scotia, NY 12302

About last years winner:

Pavement Saw Press
proudly announces the winner of our 1995-1996 chapbook award:

Permutations of the Gallery
by Joshua McKinney

Poems from this collection first appeared in publications such as the Columbia Poetry Review, Denver Quarterly, Situation, Santa Barbara Review, and Willow Springs.

Publication, a prize of five hundred dollars and ten percent of the book run are awarded to the winner of the annual prize. Permutations of the Gallery was selected by Naton Leslie as the 1996 winner of the Pavement Saw Poetry Chapbook Award.

About the book:

Permutations of the Gallery is an ambitious collection, even if recklessly so. Joshua McKinney's poems struggle against the confines of syntax and literal sense, in order to arrive at a uniquely clear grasp of the truces we must maintain with time and spacial existence. To attempt to paraphrase these knotty and paradoxical poems would be akin to stating that Wallace Stevens wrote about the weather. Don't search for narrative threads here, poems about Queen Anne's Lace or cicadas, or paeans for our humdrum, domestic lives. And don't expect to read this book once. Naton Leslie Joshua McKinney knows that philosophy is not an abstract matter, nor in anyway separate from our everyday lives. His poems show that to engage the world intimately, we need to _think_ it in the most particular ways. In Permutations of the Gallery family friends, nature, and a troubling social world are not givens, but rather questions by which we explore the twisting, disruptive, estatic, sometimes even annihilating terms of our existence.

Mark Wallace

A poetry held taut, that revels in economy and clarity, is filled with insights and syntactical compassion. I highly recommend Permutations of the Gallery. Simon Perchik

Published in a limited edition of 250 copies, perfect bound, 6 by 9 size

Price $5.00, includes postage & handling. Checks payable to:

Pavement Saw Press
7 James Street
Scotia, NY 12302

Thanks

↑ Index

147. Gabrielle Welford
Re: in defense of parasites
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Just wanted to thank Elizabeth Joyce for her heartfelt message about lurking. Me too, small kids, lots of work and lots of learning. Also occasional bleeps. Ron, you can't have meant US!! :-) What sort of creature were you thinking of? gab.

↑ Index

148. Gabrielle Welford
Ekphrastic Poetry by Women (9/15/96; NEMLA 4/4-4/5) (fwd)
Mon 8 Jul 1996

North East Modern Language Association
April 4-5, 1997
Philadelphia, PA

Session: Image and Text Topic: Ekphrastic Poetry by Women There has been considerable interest recently in the genre of ekphrastic poetry, that is, in A.J. Heffernan's useful phrase, poems which are "verbal representations of visual representations." W.J.T. Mitchell has discussed the tendency of poems in the ekphrastic tradition to treat the image as a "female other." The genre, he writes, "tends to describe an object of visual pleasure and fascination from a masculine perspective, often to an audience understood to be masculine as well." Somewhat offhandedly, he con- tinues: "All this would look quite different, of course, if my emphasis had been on ekphrastic poetry by women." The session seeks papers which put the emphasis exaclty there, papers which discuss poetry in which the speaking and seeing subject of the text is a woman. Can a "female gaze" be characterized? What does it mean when a woman is in the position of viewer, respondent, "envoicer," maker of the poetic meaning. How do ekphrastic poems written by women complicate current theories of ekphrasis? Other critical questions that arise in this context: why this painting, and why now? What does it reveal about the poet's temperament, her character, her situation in time and place? what does it reveal about her sense of self as artist, her aesthetic, political and moral position vis-a-vis her chosen painter? Papers are invited about all historical periods.

Prospective panelists need not be members of NEMLA to submit a proposal; but selected panelists must be members of NEMLA by November 1, 1996 in order to have their names included in the convention program. Send a brief abstract of your paper, postmarked no later than September 15, 1996 to the following address or email. Selected panelists will be notified no later than October 15,[redacted].

Sara Lundquist
Department of English
University of Toledo Toledo, OH 43606
email: [redacted]

↑ Index

149. Joe Amato

Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh

Mon 8 Jul 1996

---

maria, listen: let me set my own record straight here, or gay, or whatever, and w/o any rancor (really!): i find a certain degree of discomfort---aside from my intentionally (there i go again ron, shit!) provocative remarks addressed 'at' my neighbor, robert von hallberg---who, as i say, i've never met, but who teaches right down the street from me---i find a certain degree of discomfort in debating 'about' the point-counterpoint discussion twixt aldon and robert, w/o robert being t/here...

you wanna know what i think?... for one, i found robert von hallberg's remarks to be--- but you see, whereas i might backchannel my response to you and others with whom i feel a certain affinity---friendship, trust---and have over time owing to our online interaction, to go public with my opines given robert's 'entrance' on this list just doesn't feel right to me, i can't help it... this is a feeling i get, and i think it's justified... and so i'm stuck with examining why i feel so, and how this is a function of how this list discussion works...

and of course, were robert to make a formal entrance, i think you know me well enough to know that i wouldn't be shy about agreeing or disagreeing etc...

that said, i think i can offer this much as a relative rule-of-thumb from my pov: i tend to measure comments that have to do with minority and ethnic textual representation in terms of how well these latter play to my idea of good pedagogy, and good curricula... i mean to say that, aside from issues of canonicity per se, there are issues here having to do with WHO the students are who are being taught, of what their needs are, of where they're coming from, and of what we think we should be teaching them and how this plays off against their needs...

maria, just imagine what i think of certain comments made wrt this latter tendency of mine to measure same against pedagogy and curricula...

best,

joe

↑ Index

150. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"

Mon 8 Jul 1996

---

i don't think it is a matter of actor/non-actor/poet reading as it is the way the poetry is read, the experience of the reader with poetry reading and audience, the dynamics of the situation.

i have heard more than anyone's share of poets reading badly. one all too common and painful scenario is the Dramatic Reader. acting and dramatic reading is, as one might expect, a highly skilled art, not to be embarked upon by the extravagantly undertalented. too often, a new writer will write a shaky melodramatic paraphrase of all the shaky melodramatic works written since the dawn of time. the ethos of reading for such work is an earnest, admonitory expression, lots of william shatner pauses, and a speeded-up pace whose only virtue is that it ends the exhibition more quickly. the melodramatic pauses and sudden shreiked words, no doubt inserted at the urging of some would-be instructor or other to "make it interesting," have all the lethal quality of high school plays.

on the other hand, i have, myself, succumbed to the I Am A Poet Reading Poetry style -- monotone, odd pronounciation, rhythm subsumed to a throaty growl, eyes glued to the page. i don't know why i succumb to this; can only guess that one sees it at enough respectable readings to make it the default.

the finest readers i've heard -- grace paley, galway kinnel, adrienne rich, martin espada, alicia ostriker, tim o'brien and larry heineman (prose), maxine kumin, carolyn forche, [doubtless more but i want to get on with this] -- tend to 1) read very slowly; poetry is compressed, tight, and requires much more work to parse, so if it is read too fast, it deconstructs into a blur of nothing; 2) seem, as larry heinemann has put it, to "see/hear/feel" the images as they read them. in other words, as the reader reads, they too are experiencing the writing. it lingers where a listener needs time to hear, speeds up where a listener is eager to hear more; 3) have enough confidence in the material not to need to jazz it up with shatnerian excesses (ala flannery o'connor quote in someone's signature ~ 'i've had as much of this pleasure as i can stand').

one reading comes to mind particularly -- martin espada reading with a jazz band. it sounds as if it would be horrible and i wasn't expecting much but it was one of the most extraordinary experiences of poetry i've ever had. martin has a deep basso voice, flexible, burred, resonant. he waited, took in the rhythm of the jazz peice, then entered combining rhythm of poem and rhythm of music. paused. listened. let the music make itself part of the sound in a compelling way.

if i were putting together a collection of performed work, i'd listen for non-hoakey readings (dylan thomas' "child's christmas in wales" is a gorgeous antithesis of hoakey -- really lovely, resonant, hypnotic). and only use people i'd heard reading the peice. no room for surprises. and emphasize slowness, respect and tenderness for the words rather than efforts to make them more exciting.

for WWI poets, MUST BE SLOW. poems are extraordinary stories, and if not paused over, heard, then becomes a jumble of rhymes.

also, i don't see any women writers in there and i also wish i did. norton anthology of literature by women, as well as magazines of the time, are good source material. i've always wanted to hear more of how women of that time experienced WWI. i had a teacher in high school who lost her two shining older brothers, her lover, her cousins -- an entire generation of british men were wiped out in that ghastly mess. she went to germany after wwII to the camps, part of her committment after WWI to not glorifying military, and translated for DP's. of camps, she has said only "i'll never forget the smell as i went through the gate that first day. never." and first women nurses were going over with nightingale in wwI. i think there must be some extrardinary women's writing from them.

↑ Index

151. Pritchett,Pat
Re: poetry performance
Mon 8 Jul 1996

I would just add that the moment anyone "stands up" in front of someone else to speak that moment "becomes" theatrical and those who ignore this do so at their (and their audience's) peril. Actors can enhance a text; they can also make a hash of it. The key (as someone mentioned) is the presence of a director.

All of this begs the question, Is the poet always and necessarily the best reader of his/her own work? Usually, yes. But not always. I've heard some real botches, generally from people with a very poor notion of the intrinsic theatricality of even the most perfunctory spoken exchange. To assume that just standing there and "telling the truth" as James Cagney once described acting can result in readings that are painfully bad in their naivete. And also very powerful.

I think readings are both theatrical and anti-theatrical. That is, the encounter between the reader and the audience creates ipso facto a theatrical experience, but one which is anti-theatrical in that it forces our attention away from the expectations usually aroused by the idea of a performance.

Valery said the best way to read a poem is very plainly and without any adornment. Well, yes and no.

Patrick Pritchett

From: Judy Roitman
To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
Subject: Re: poetry performance
Date: Monday, July 08, 1996 2:57PM

<<File Attachment: HEADERS.TXT>>

> Hi Christopher Whipple. Response to your notion abt actors. Distaste for actors reading poetry for me goes with the felt difference between stand-ups and actors. "Stand-ups can't act" is a way of noticing that stand-ups do not seem to know they are assuming a role (even though, of course, they are). Actors always assume roles. Rather than actors you want really good poet-readers. Last year I had the pleasure of hearing Robert Creeley reading Williams et al.

Amen. There was also the radio reading of Whitman with the Prairie Home Companion guy, the Deliverance guy (is my memory correct?) and Allen Ginsberg. The first two were self-conscious and silly, but AG's reading was tremendously illuminating. He inhabited Whitman's line is if it were his true home (why not? since it is). No change (to parallel Tony Green) from AG reading AG, but, as Tony put it, "a real intelligent sense of what the text was doing at any point."

Worth finding if anyone knows how to find it.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

152. Charles Alexander
Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
Mon 8 Jul 1996

> i don't think it is a matter of actor/non-actor/poet reading as it is the way the poetry is read, the experience of the reader with poetry reading and audience, the dynamics of the situation.

absolutely. And more, too, a kind of tuning, reader to what is read to audience. For often so much depends on this syllable with that, move to a particular kind of liquid consonant, or fricative, and echoing that two or three lines later with something else which one wants to be heard but which one doesn't want to stress too much. this is attention to the language at hand, having possibly nothing to do with "character." Yet there is also a personality projected in a reading. Lyn Hejinian does it very well; Mei-mei Berssenbrugge is extraordinary; Leslie Scalapino is captivating. And others. I like to think that great work is easy to read well -- it actually helps the reader. But still it may require some unusual attentions. Attentions which may not be at all easy for any actor, and which the writer may embody differently on different occasions, to more or less success.

Glad to hear of the success of a Martin Espada reading -- I heard him a couple of times early on, when he was a student, and then it seemed over-dramatized to the point that I didn't want to listen. But then bp Nichol's readings/sound poetry performances were extremely animated, and they are about the best I have ever heard.

charles

↑ Index

153. Joseph Zitt
Re: Listpersonship
Mon 8 Jul 1996

On 7 Jul 96 at 20:15, Ron Silliman wrote:

> If I were feeling intemperate (and I have my moments), I'd be inclined to suggest a rule on the order of deleting anyone who doesn't contribute to the discussion, say, once per month.

Hmm... I'd much rather see those of us who have little to say remain active listeners rather than speaking just to be heard. I'm a newbie to poetics, and am learning a lot reading the list. When I have something to say, I do so, but I try not to when I don't. ---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ==== [redacted] ===== Human Systems \||| ||/ Organizer,

SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/<A HREF="http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt/">Joe Zitt's Home Page</A>\|

↑ Index

154. David Baratier
Re: Perchik
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Aldon

Perchik's selected poems have a number of textual problems which lead me to recommend the originals, if possible. The poems are manically compressed onto the page space in such a fashion that renders them either inadequately represented (through the loss of a readers eye) or unfathomable without extensive page flipping. The editors of this series decided to clump the work together as close as possible, instead of the full-page-per-poem demands of a syntax driven syndoche. Be well.

David Baratier

---- David -- I had been aware of that via the old Perchik _Selected_; but the book as a whole had left a bad feeling in me that kept mt from returning to it -- Now, I'd like to take a look at the fuller sequences (the Frank series in the selected appears to be less than half the sequence?) Will give Simon a second try on your advice --

↑ Index

155. Judy Roitman
Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
Mon 8 Jul 1996

> i'd listen
> for non-hoakey readings (dylan thomas' "child's christmas in wales" is > a gorgeous antithesis of hoakey

Interesting. That reading defines hokey for me.

My husband (Stan Lombardo) recently gave a selected reading from his forthcoming translation of the Iliad (publ: Hackett), working with a director and a percussionist. It was great, and I'm a very tough critic of Stan's readings. The director definitely did something good. But he was working with a poet, not an actor, and was sympathetic to the difference.

---- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things

Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

156. Gabrielle Welford
think of meeee!
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Going for an interview at a community college for a lit teaching job this afternoon (my first serious interview) so please send blessings this way at 3 p.m my time (3 hours behind SF), oh good people. gab.

↑ Index

157. Lisa Samuels
Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
Mon 8 Jul 1996

---

for poetry performance: i still want to see someone at least begin a reading from behind an opaque black (or whatever) curtain
-or-put an enormous mirror in front of the curtain so the audience sees only itself for a while (small venue and large mirror required)
-or/and-
position mirrors on either side of the stage so
the audience can see the poet from the sides only,
still behind the curtain

something along those lines

and for eliza mcgrand --
as for #3, i prefer the phrasing of a country song:
'I've enjoyed as much of this as I can stand'

my month's worth,

lisa samuels

↑ Index

158. wystan
Re: in defense of parasites
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Dear lisa,
good work. you can stay on the list for another month.

seriously though, ron didn't mean it. i who never mean it could add modest proposals of my own and so trivialise discussions of race, sex and class even further... think up rules specific to specific people. like if ron really loses his temper that's it, he's out. the list citizenship of boomers debating the merits of beatles and stones is already in question i understand ...

hope to hear from you more

wystan

↑ Index

159. wystan
Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
Mon 8 Jul 1996

---

dear eliza, i don't think poets read badly or well. (thinking back to the post which kicked this off, everyone responded to the actor's do it better bit, but what about Mr Whipple's abhorrence for coffee house readings upon the preference was predicated? for myself coffeehouses, or bars, disused churches, stinking holes in the wall ... are where I hear poetry. Actors read poems on stages, in school assembly halls, well appointed community centres... places i don't go. but where i really want to read myself next is in this great indoor rock-climbing place) poets have good days and bad days, but in my experience they read their work as they mean it to be heard and if it doesn't sound good to you then its poetry you don't like. wystan

↑ Index

160. Loss Glazier
Server failures
Mon 8 Jul 1996

If you have trouble retrieving files or otherwise accessing the EPC, please keep trying intermittently. The hardware folks are having some problems with the machines so things that are really there at the EPC sometimes give you 'do not exist' error messages. Hopefully, these problems will be resolved soon!

↑ Index

161. Loss Glazier
Private List/Public Space
Mon 8 Jul 1996

>okay keith, cool. good points all. i didn't realize we cd be cited in books
>w/out our permission. i'll have to start watching my tongue, my back, my mind >and my fingers. bests, maria d

My 'read' on how this list is private is that the attempt is to keep it small in size. (A list in general is many things but most tend towards enormous sizes, fantasy-tinged anonymity, and a climate where hit-and-run incidents of spamming and flaming are considered, just like having a tv blaring in the room, normal.)
I think the goal here is to aim for a size where we can know each other as much as would be possible in a non-virtual world (if there could be that many jobs in one place).

As for being cited, this is how I'd think of it. In contrast to conversation, where one is rarely cited, a post to the list is like a post on a bulletin board in the hallway. It is a comment made in public. Though not considered 'formal' writing, I think some things get cited because the informality that nurtures them also gives them a liveliness that says more than is said elsewhere. (Well, ok. In addition, messages are also archived.)

And let's face it. In certain areas such as the discussion of new books and reports on conferences (crucial nutrients for many of our interests!) the print medium has long abandoned us. (As such we may be cited the way a comment in a _good_ book review is occasionally cited) A list such as this can be a 'journal' in a truer sense that 'The Journal of ...'.

↑ Index

162. Loss Glazier
!Orono Online!
Mon 8 Jul 1996

50s in Orono: the Reviews an online 'book' collecting reviews and comments upon the Orono conference will soon be announced as an active URL. If you were at the conference and were thinking of posting your reactions, please do so soon!

↑ Index

163. Emily Lloyd
maria--/& performance
Mon 8 Jul 1996

Maria--didn't find your post offensive at all & think that yes, which threads do and don't get picked up merits observation, mention, critical examination etc., & thank you for boldly calling attention to it. I myself kept Chris S.'s post in my in-box for days, challenged & wanting to respond, & eventually giving up because I just didn't feel qualified to. I've been studying race and representation for years, & the more I study, the less qualified I feel to speak. Mostly I got worried & a little nauseated at the prospect of a predominantly-white-membered list discussing "race & erotics," esp. in the assertive and "I know what I'm talking about" voice many conversations here seem to take, even as I also get worried & perhaps more than a little nauseated at the prospect of same list skirting those issues. This is why I didn't respond. I personally couldn't care less about whether or not R V H signs on to the list, so I could post about it (although I won't) all day. It is not because I didn't care about the issues raised in CS's post that I didn't respond, but because I cared too much to respond quickly & maybe at all. & yes I'm aware this might sound sappy or irresponsible. But because I was worried & unsure how/if to proceed, holding off the procession seemed most "responsible" at the time. I'm not sure it was and--this sounds facetious but is meant sincerely--I'm sorry for not knowing, not being sure. It may be that others felt similarly-- ? --emily

On performance-- Wystan, I can't agree that all poets read their work the way they mean it to be heard. There's that nerves thing: some folks just can't read in front of others. I've got a friend who, in front of a group: tongue death, stuttering, accidental automatic reading of earlier drafts, self-corrections in medias res, etc. It's painful to watch him--especially, I think, because he is such an interesting poet--when he reads, you'd hardly know. On the other hand, some poets who are great readers read not "as they mean [the poem] to be heard," but as they mean it to be read (on the page, in the reader's head)--meaning, the reading is captivating but it just ain't there on the page. I know that when I began reading my live linebreaks were rarely the same as my page linebreaks--I was so into the rhythm that when I looked on the page I saw the one I was reading out loud, but nobody else would. Since fixed, but always a challenge for me. That said, best of luck in getting to read in the indoor rock-climbing place--that sounds fabulous--& I wonder if fake cliffs cause echoes--

Eliza--I think it was you who brought up "poetry voice"---that monotone thing so many seem to slip into? <laughing> I think I would rather hear Sally Field read than someone afflicted with poetry voice, all misplaced accents & drones. In less patient days, when that started to happen at readings, I'd get up and read "I...am at a PO-e-TRY...READ-ING...and ALL...of the PO-ETS...have FOUND...their VOICE...and it ALL..SOUNDS....like THIS" etc. Like it wasn't enough to sit through Keanu Reeves playing Siddhartha.

~~~~~~

Emily Lloyd [redacted]
"Emily said Emily said, Emily
is admittedly Emily." --G. Stein

↑ Index

164. maria damon

Re: Listpersonship/aldon/rvh

Mon 8 Jul 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion
group writes:
> maria, listen: let me set my own record straight here, or gay, or > whatever, and w/o any rancor (really!): i find a certain degree of > discomfort---aside from my intentionally (there i go again ron, shit!) > provocative remarks addressed 'at' my neighbor, robert von hallberg---who, > as i say, i've never met, but who teaches right down the street from me---i > find a certain degree of discomfort in debating 'about' the > point-counterpoint discussion twixt aldon and robert, w/o robert being > t/here...
>
> you wanna know what i think?... for one, i found robert von hallberg's > remarks to be---
>
..etc

joe: listen, (no rancor detected in your comments, none intended in mine) it makes perfect sense to me that you'd want someone to be present when his comments were being discussed. i get it; it's ethical. it's just that i thought some of the issues raised by aldon and robert were really interesting --pedagogically (tho i hate that word), in terms of how we go about doing our scholarship and presenting it, etc... and i was disappointed to see those go unresponded to. for example, as i sd in my longish post, i don't consider my primary responsibility to be canon-building; thus i don't weigh "merit" in terms of modernist aesthetic values when i decide what to teach or write on. i do, though, have definite tastes, which are, willy-nilly, shaped by those values --heck, that's what i learned in school. the issue of what r von h considers condescension is also interesting to me. i don't see "universality" per se --if there is a per se --to be what writers should necessarily strive for (as few "shoulds" as possible) and i don't think the criterion for great writing should be its "universal" appeal. but there is a movement currently away from particularism in favor of SOME kind of universalism, tho that is constantly in tension with our sense of how vexed that term is. i've been interested to see folks i wouldn't have expected come to some kind of appeal to "universalism" in a way that would have been hard to imagine 15 years ago. at the same time, people seem to be qualifying it: "Jewish universalism", "marxist universalism" etc. I'm not sure quite what this means either, except that it announces the point of view from which everything is universalized (i think). From what i could gather of Bob's talk on Hayden, as well as his comments at the end of that panel (i was there, and i remember hearing it as aldon reported, tho i was not especially troubled by it --it just seemed like business as usual), he was not interrogating the category of universalism, or inflecting it in any way that moved it out of the vexed presumption-of-normative-values critical category; i'd like him to be on the list so we could find out if he really means that pound, eliot, etc set a standard other writers shd meet or if he means something different --perhaps more like what blurbs on bookcovers of books by writers of color appeal to the book's "universal appeal" --i.e. this is n't "just" an African-American book, etc. Both uses of the term are problematic, but is this really what he meant? I was touched by his reply because it was about ideas and a desire to be understood; though as i have sd, we come from very different places critically.
~~~~~~

so, joe, what kinds of things do you consider when preparing to teach or write "ethnic" or "Other" materials?

↑ Index

165. James Brook

Re: Private List/Public Space

Mon 8 Jul 1996

Loss, I appreciate your comments regarding keeping the list intimate--which in this case means about 300 people, I believe. This does help promote productive discussion and develop the bases of a critical public with common interests.

On the other hand, I'm uncomfortable with the idea that anything anyone writes here is available for citation elsewhere. I feel that if a comment is citable, then it must be a text--and subject to the same protections as any other text. No, I'm not particularly invoking copyright protection--but I do think that the citer should go ahead and ask the cited for permission. That's mere courtesy. Besides, if we feel that our words are subject to such reuse, then there's bound to be a chilling effect on discussion: fewer people willing to participate and the remaining participants under greater constraint.

James Brook

Loss Glazier wrote:
>

> I think the goal here is to aim for a size where we can know each other as much as would be possible in a non-virtual world (if there could be that many jobs in one place).
>
> As for being cited, this is how I'd think of it. In contrast to conversation, where one is rarely cited, a post to the list is like a post on a bulletin board in the hallway. It is a comment made in public. Though not considered 'formal' writing, I think some things get cited because the informality that nurtures them also gives them a liveliness that says more than is said elsewhere. (Well, ok. In addition, messages are also archived.)

↑ Index

166. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: " . . . : . . . "
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Dodie -- whatever else Maria's post might have been doing, it didn't seem to me to be accusing anyone of racism -- and despite my question, I don't suppose that if two interracial radicals have sex with one another they are any less radical -- It's just that there is, after all, quite a long history of reactionaries desegregating the sex act, on their own terms --

↑ Index

167. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Perchik
Tue 9 Jul 1996

David -- Thanks for that info -- I wish I had known some of that back when I wrote that negative review of the book -- will make a habit in future of comparing ANY selected I get for review to samples from the original -- will be looking up those earlier books next time I have library card

↑ Index

168. Marjorie Perloff
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Here's what strikes me as slightly absurd in the recent controversy re: Aldon Nielsen and Bob von Hallberg and Bob's non-membership on this list etc etc. Lorenzo Thomas, a Live Black Poet and the only one present in Orono gave a very interesting and moving talk about Melville Tolson. I knew almost nothing about Tolson and I learned a lot, also from Keith Leonard's paper. Lorenzo T is a fine poet but didn't get to give a poetry reading because he only came the last day? I'm not sure why. At any rate, instead of discussing this actual living poet-critic, we are now busy discussing the following: 1) Who was right about the Nielsen panel, Aldon or Bob? I am very fond of both and admire both very much; I wasn't there so I can't tell what really happened but I suspect there was less difference of opinion than appeared from Bob's and Aldon's letters. 2) Was it Ok for Keith Tuma to send on Aldon's remarks to a non-list member? 3) Was Bob von H within his rights in responding to the List? 4) Should Bob join the list asap?? 5) Should lurkers have to contribute to the list (as Ron suggested)?

and so on and so forth. Thus it is that an important (to me) issue gets wholly lost in the shuffle. And thus it is that instead of talking about the black poet who was in our midst (Lorenzo)--as a poet, not just because he's black--we end up, academic-style, arguing about what white men (Aldon and Bob) are supposed to say about black poets.

The whole thing strikes me as wonderfully silly. As Dodie said, I thought this was supposed to be a POETICS list. And what I want to know--since Bob's paper, fine as it was, doesn't convince me of the case is: why should I read Robert Hayden at all? I find his poems very boring and status quo? Why should I read him rather than such "forgotten white poets" as Archibald MacLeish or Babette Deutsch? Hadn't we better begin with such questions? Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

169. Peter Quartermain

Re: oppen

Tue 9 Jul 1996

Burt:

I'm not sure whether it's me or Peter Nicholls you had in mind, Burt, but you didn't miss anything, actually. Peter Nicholls ooopsed in sending to the List a message to me. So I might as well answer the question for everybody, if they don't already know. Over the last couple of years Rachel Blau DuPlessis and I have been assembling an anthology of critical essays on Objectivist poetics, with a fairly substantial Introduction which we drafted in April, entitled _The_Objectivist_Nexus_. The book is not yet quite complete, but the manuscript is currently under consideration.

Peter

At 03:00 PM 7/7/96 EST, you wrote:
>I guess I must have missed something. Peter, could you say more about >California and the Objectivist Nexus?

>
>Burt [Kimmelman]
>
>
+ +

Peter Quartermain
128 East 23rd Avenue
Vancouver
B.C.
Canada V5V 1X2
Voice and fax: [redacted]

+ +

↑ Index

170. Peter Quartermain

Re: poetry performance

Tue 9 Jul 1996

I must say I'm inclined to agree with Tony -- actors tend, reading poetry in performance (I don't mean in a theatre so much as on disk or on tape) to draw attention to the singular voice of the speaker, and tend as a result to close down possible meanings that a reader like Bob Creeley might well leave open (and usually does). But there are nevertheless of course some amazing and wonderful readings by actors -- witness Siobhan McKenna's reading of Joyce, for instance. But it's worth remembering, too, that there are distinct fashions in reading poetry aloud -- Dylan Thomas' readings (for instance and especially from King Lear and The Duchess of Malfi -- CaedmonTC1158] always struck me as being over the top but) were extremely popular (as these sorts of things go) in the late 50s and 60s (the Shakespeare/Webster recording was made in 1952 but not released until 62) and of course Thomas himself had an enormous influence not only on the fact of reading poetry aloud but on the manner of doing so. One offshoot -- again which enjoyed great popularity -- is the really quite astonishing and to my ear utterly inappropriate and wrong-eared reading of Keats and Shelley by Theodore Marcuse ("The Poetry of Keats and Shelley" Lexington 7505 -- I don't know the date). Reading "Nightingale" Marcuse sounds very like Thomas in the first stanza, but soon starts milking it for all possible dramatic worth, sometimes prolonging not only a syllable but a consonant for as much as two or three seconds (and believe me, that's a long time indeed) with extreme pitch and volume shifts -- "F-a-a-a-a-a-de far away" in ever increasing treble tremolo diminuendo, "and QUITE FORGET!!!" pretty loud and vehement. Utterly absurd, utterly risible. But he played to packed houses for a (happily brief) while.

But then, Thomas and Marcuse were playing to the house, and reading poems familiar to the hearer. How would they have fared, I wonder, with a poem unknown and possibly unperformed (in public, at any rate) before that one occasion. Basil Bunting used to say the only place to read poetry aloud was the pub. I'm inclined to agree. The classroom is a loathsome thing, god wot, but it too might be a place where people learn how to turn that inner silent voice into the outward actual one, reading a poem. Better readings? worse readings? Everything -- or so much at any rate -- depends on the circumstance, the context, the poem.

At 11:34 AM 7/8/96 GMT+1200, Tony Green wrote:
>Hi Christopher Whipple. Response to your notion abt actors. Distaste >for actors reading poetry for me goes with the felt difference >between stand-ups and actors. "Stand-ups can't act" is a way of > noticing that stand-ups do not seem to know they are assuming > a role (even though, of course, they are). Actors always assume > roles. Rather than actors you want really good poet-readers. Last >year I had the pleasure of hearing Robert Creeley reading Williams et >al. You want something like that: no putting on a special voice or >tone, no change from Creeley-voice reading Creeley that I could >identify, but a real intelligent sense of what the text was doing at >any point. That was really engrossing. To turn up the volume, to turn > up the decor, to turn up the video-presentation, may do something for > people who don't actually like poetry, but there is a danger in that of a >deceptive kind of substitution. I guess I feel the poetry is damaged, >more or less seriously by what you are thinking of.
>

+ + + +

171. Carnography

Re: paradigms in defense of parasites

Tue 9 Jul 1996

To regard lurkers as parasites, I would have to long for a debate that has no audience. I do not long, and have never longed, for such a debate.

Sometimes it is more parasitic to react than it is to pause and reflect. Who hasn't entered a conversation impulsively, only to learn that the subject was not what it seemed, or to realize, too late, that one has played Socrates in reverse; that one knew little and spoke at gaseous length?

Yet sometimes the glitches and hiccups of impulse lead to discovery, to investigations of error that lead to invention. That is why lurkers and posters are almost of equal importance--even when either proves novice (or renunciate).

One sometimes has time enough to post but not to reply to subsequent posts. This might be another reason why lurkers choose silence over expression.

(All of this is so general that I feel I'm paraphrasing Dryden or Emerson, or possibly Napoleon Hill.)

§§§

(As when usenet poster Brian Bulkowski said, of a manic depressive's affair with a borderline personality: "He failed to fail, which was a failure in itself.")

§§§

"The urge to silence penetrated every corner"
- Glen Simpson

>>
>>No, I'm not giving a course, and do have other sources (Haskell Indian >>Nations University is down the road a short piece), but I'm curious what >>members of this list would say.
>
>
>Mostly I wouldn't be so foolish. But one thing I would be careful about is >that adjective "contemporary." For me, it would have to include works from >the oral tradition, which are still living, therefore "contemporary." And >many of these works are subject to contemporary variations. Too often >(although I think this has changed somewhat in the last couple of decades) >the oral traditions have been treated as past, as relics. In many cultures >they are decidedly not so. Some of the primary work in this regard has been >done by Larry Evers through the Sun Tracks series at the University of >Arizona Press, and to my mind some of the very best of that is the work with >Yaqui oral traditions Evers has done in collaboration with Felipe S. Molina, >himself a Yaqui singer.
>
>But this is just one part of a huge story.
>
>good luck,
>
>charles
>
>
Daniel Salmon

↑ Index

173. Carnography
Re: poetry enormance
Tue 9 Jul 1996

And then there are those who post when they ought to be lurking (And I don't mean Mr. Whipple).

Christopher K. Whipple typed:

> Does anyone have any ideas on why coffee house readings are so often lame and depressing; why do these horrible people have a monopoly on the espresso circuit, while so much that is delicious is abandoned to a half-life in academia?

XV. The coffee-house is not simply a generic site for poetry. It carries with it overtones of beat-poetry, which, for the unimaginative, conjure a kind of Fred Flinstone version of a "poetry scene": pseudo-scat-singing, faux lyricism (doo-bee-doo-wah sound-patterns), comic-book-Picasso pastiches of abstract verse ("that blue/...now"), and even the notion that poetry ought to be autobiographical ("I [lived/hated] [X kind of downtown] life and I [loved/despised] it.") or preachy [I'm here to educate you by railing at the teachers I hate].

2. Careerism on the part of readers and organizers does much to kill the encouragement of individual talent. Also: mere poetry, and thoughtful performance, prove irrelevant to various cliques and clots of paradoxical careerists who proffer bios instead of brio and lyrics instead of the lyric.

> Careerism is an invitation to mediocrity; to paraphrase Cicero, > the insistence of those who shout is often a hindrance to > those who wish to listen.

c. There's altogether too much self-aggrandizement in much contemporary poetry. Writers like Sapphire and Dael Orlandersmith are certainly worthy of interest, but the entire slant of merely autobiographical writing is responsible, I think, for providing even more impetus to the profoundly self-congratulatory. It was his exasperation at the plethora of musical cliches masquerading as emotion that led Stravinsky to say, "Music doesn't have the power to express anything." Also: when the writer is not vigilant, autobiographical detail can become an excuse for narcissism. I tend to think that the trick of autobiographical writing is not to be self-absorbed.

Iv. The dumbing of poetic audiences is also responsible for the blinding tedium of many performances. Organizers have forgotten that poetry can function on difficult levels and still communicate in the basic sense. (Hindemith's Gebrauchmuzik is as common as it is chiseled.) Paradoxically, it is often the populist and not the cryptographer who obscures poetic meaning.

4. Many publicized poetic events are well-meaning attempts to assault high culture that result, inevitably, in more mere low culture.

> Does anyone have any ideas on how poetry can be successfully performed?
> Has anyone seen examples, even failed ones?

I would like to see performances that combined music and words but didn't overuse popular cadences or stress-patterns, such as Nyorican cadences ("I saw/that/man, that/high-handed/Mosh-pit/religion of/lint/gone/lyric) I'd like to see (or rather, hear) performances in which sound and poetry are explored more closely, with textures as involved as those of chamber music. I'd be also be interested in readings that excluded overt autobiography.

More plays: the emergence of poetic theater, of plays in which, as in absolute music, texture, modulation and other abstract elements, were the primary source of tension and release rather than the narrative. I'd like to see performances and plays in which devices like simultaneous monologue and tergiversation functioned as dramatically as textured dynamics in baroque Concerto Grossi.

with props to Annie & Jerry:

readikns ik iknu khk, thy enormoranges ih? dhh, ips op/errant, scansion p'll ear-wheel ego deeno quagnum eensy ernst

Al Iz Blesteraht,

Rob Hardin

(According to Cankerian analysis)

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

174. Kevin Killian
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

At 10:00 PM 7/8/96, Emily Lloyd wrote:
>yes, which
>threads do and don't get picked up merits observation, mention, critical >examination etc.

The is Dodie Bellamy.

On the surface, Emily, this sounds just great--but serveral issues come up for me. First of all, this list is not going to change the world, it's a bunch of mostly-white middle class people shooting the breeze. It's a place of priviledge and leisure--the priviledge to have access to a computer hook-up, the luxury of all this time to shoot the breeze. Let me get this clear, I am not against anybody discussing race issues and/or teaching--even though for us non-academics, issues of teaching are rather boring--and academic approaches to literature and to poets themselves are something many poets I speak with find problematic. For instance I do not think M. Damon's erasure of poets in her original post was merely an oversight--perhaps a Freudian slip? As Ron pointed out, for many academics living breathing poets are not part of the picture. Furthermore--this isn't the 50s, no one that I know of, and few (if any) people on this list would challenge the need for representation of non-"white-middle-class" writers wherever writers are represented.

But creating a hierarchy of what's acceptable or more acceptable on this list is something I find highly problematic. It is that process of hierarchization which excluded non-"white-middle-class" writers and women from the literary canon in the first place. There is no god-given hierarchy of importance. It is this mindframe, for instance that has often disparaged conversation by women as "chatter." I have much difficulty when white middle class liberals use the issues of "oppressed" groups to guilt trip other white middle class liberals--and I think some of that has been going on here. Let me give an example from outside the list. Several years ago here in San Francisco there was a poet who became "engulfed" in the Gulf War. He marched against the Gulf War, did performance art against the Gulf War, wrote poems about the Gulf War, wore buttons. So, at least a year after the Gulf War ended he gave a reading--of course it was all poems about the Gulf War. During the course of the reading he took the opportunity to brow beat the audience by saying we're all here listening to poetry--but there was THE GULF WAR--in other words he posed himself as this messianic figure concerned with human suffering, and the audience was cast as a bunch of superficials listening to Poetry. I have problems with the colonizing of another group's oppression and and wearing it as a badge. I am skeptical when someone makes an academic career out of Bob Kaufman then makes jokes about his "clunkers" on this list. This is not treating Kaufman with the dignity he deserves.

To conclude, I think the Beatles and list politics are just as valid topics of discussion here as anything else.

↑ Index

175. Kevin Killian
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Maria, you criticized a population I was a member of--the people on this list. I was defending that population.

Dodie

↑ Index

176. Kevin Killian
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

At 3:47 PM 7/9/96, Emily Lloyd wrote:

> But I think the point was that there wasn't...certain issues were dropped like potatoes, for whatever reason (and I admit, yes, to an interest/concern in that reason). I'm not interested in falling into the "why are we talking > *about this when we could/should be talking about THIS?" trap; on the other hand, I think "why aren't we talking about this?" is a valid question. emily*

I agree with you Emily. But my point is that the "why are we talking about this when we could/should be talking about THIS?" trap was evoked--and that is what I was criticizing.

Dodie

↑ Index

177. Mark Roberts
Re: Listpersonship
Tue 9 Jul 1996

One of the advantages of being on this list is that it gives those of us outside of the 'centre(s)' a chance to have some input etc. In many cases we may not post for months, but one learn much from lurking and reading about US or UK based discussions. While encouraging people to contribute to the list is a good idea it could also be counter productive in driving away those 'marginal' list members who occassionally may have something important to say.....

anyway that's my 20c worth...and should keep me on the list for another month!! :)

_____
Mark Roberts
Student Systems Project Officer
Information Systems
University of Sydney NSW 2006 Australia
[redacted]
PH:(02)[redacted]
FAX:(02)[redacted]

↑ Index

178. Joe Amato
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

maria, emily, marjorie, all:

((((and sorry folks for the little tirade i initiated re rvh's forwarded post (if in fact i initiated it) but i did say that it bugged me and i was feeling "grinch-like" and so what the hell i said so---again and again!))))

my primary problem as a white guy addressing at times black and latino/a students is that, to put it as simply as possible, i don't come from where they're coming from... i can generally relate along class-lines, given my own history, but i don't feel the same urgencies or necessities to validate my own racial or ethnic construction or gender construction (and combinations of same)... and even when i do feel this pull as a poet, i don't tend to come to it in the same terms... and this leads to all sortsa problems in the classroom...

for example (and aldon, you've already heard some a this) i don't particularly care for maya angelou's or niki giovanni's poetry... i prefer, for lotsa reasons, ntozake shange's or erica hunt's or audre lorde's or rita dove's or wanda coleman's (which is not to say that i whole-heartedly embrace all work by these latter poets, either)... but maya angelou, for example, is extremely popular with black women in my classes these days... and she's popular in part, from what my students tell me, b/c her voice is one that they can relate to (an easily accessible identity formation)...

and here i come with all of my [cough] c-c-c-critical sophistication, talking about voice as a set of conventions, asking them (after folks like patricia hill collins) what are they gonna DO with their voices once they 'find' them? etc... kinda pulling the rug out from under...

of course, one could argue that the answer here is to work teaching in stages, developmentally... but for me this can all too often constitute indoctrination in a given stage (read 'aesthetic')... and besides, work that i like more, in order to appreciate it, already for me works at an advanced stage... uhm---no, not 'advanced,' i take that back---just more complex in the terms i indicate...

so what i then have to do is find a way to promote dialogue among my students (and me at times)---which i think i'm never too good at, no matter how hard i try, mebbe b/c i'm so wedded to my own dialogic or monologic tendencies---to see if i can't get them to talk about the voice complexities i believe need airing... but thing is, many times the majority of the students are white students... so i end up at times trying to 'fill in,' trying to provide some leverage for my black and latino/a students as a white guy...

i'm sure you can see the problem here... christ i've been through it over and over, and in my professional writing courses especially (which i teach many more of than lit. or creative writing courses, and which i teach in terms of institutional issues)... i'm lucky to have a mix of students in my classes, teaching on an urban campus as i do... but this is itself problematic to the extent that i don't have any humanities majors---all science, business, engineering...

anyway, that's a start i s'pose... ysee, when it comes to who should be canonized, and comments about owing it to---posterity?---to safeguard the 'quality' of work that's passed along, well---whose aesthetic is at (the) stake here?... who passes what along to whom?... i too am culpable on the count of simple 'liking' or 'valuing' that is no doubt rooted in an aesthetic of whiteness... how, i'm not always certain, but i've no doubt this is true... at the same time, as a poet, i've simply got to be able to take my best guess at times as to work that doesn't, well, work!---incl. my own...i mean, I CAN BE VERY OPINIONATED (under-statement of the month)... and even with peer review in a classroom, sooner or later an instructor gets involved in questions of evaluation, and in any case i evaluate all the damned time...

and whatever the thorniness of these problems, i can't quite imagine entering into a discussion of who gets anthologized, say, w/o recognizing that anthologies, for better and for worse, are classroom tools... and anthologizing is one measure of canonicity... so for me the question of 'condescending' to such & such poets had better begin by considering who speaks, and to whom... i think the various what's will tend to emerge with greater clarity this way...

best,

joe

↑ Index

179. Mary Hilton
Submissions for "Political Diction"
Tue 9 Jul 1996

In the spirit of July 4th (albeit 5 days late), submissions are now being accepted for "Political Diction 96," a magazine devoted to the electoral process, politics, government, and most specifically to the election year 1996. A multi-partisan magazine distributed each election year, it is hoped that "PD" will allow various views and thoughts about the democratic process to be expressed.

Innovative essays, poetry, short stories and visual art are welcome. Submission deadline is August 15, and the mag will be distributed in Sept/Oct. Please send to:

Political Diction 96 c/o Mary Hilton
1706 U Street, NW, #102
Washington, DC 20009

or send e-mail inquiries to [redacted]
Thanks!

↑ Index

180. maria damon
Re: " . . . : . . . "
Tue 9 Jul 1996

aldon rites:
> and despite my question, I don't suppose that if two interracial radicals > have sex with one another they are any less radical -- It's just that > there is, after all, quite a long history of reactionaries desegregating > the sex act, on their own terms -- okay, of course, i see. thanks for the clarification. still, i was thinking of folks like o'hara, who in the fifties was having gay sex w/ black men...a double taboo, though the taboo against miscegenation not so strong in his case since the fear of same was mostly due to the purported horrors of having "mixed" kids...i guess people can have radical practices (like gertrude stein) without necessarily having politically radical consciousnesses...and the reverse as well -- etc....maria d

↑ Index

181. Charles Alexander
Re: poetry enormance
Tue 9 Jul 1996

> Christopher K. Whipple typed:
>
> Does anyone have any ideas on why coffee house readings are so often lame and depressing; why do these horrible people have a monopoly on the espresso circuit, while so much that is delicious is abandoned to a half-life in academia?

I think this is overstating the case. For example, a lot of good readings, including by people on this list or talked about on this list, have taken place in coffee houses & bars, such as the Ear Inn in NY. My guess is that the ratio of "delicious" to "lame and depressing" in coffee houses & bars is somewhere near the same ratio in publications, academic departments, or anywhere. And I think there's a lot of work that's far from delicious which also has a life or half-life in academia.

charles

↑ Index

182. maria damon

Re: List wars

Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

thank you, marjorie, this is exactly what i was trying to point out.--maria d

In message <[redacted]> UB
Poetics discussion group writes:
> Here's what strikes me as slightly absurd in the recent controversy re:
> Aldon Nielsen and Bob von Hallberg and Bob's non-membership on this list > etc etc.
> Lorenzo Thomas, a Live Black Poet and the only one present in Orono gave a > very interesting and moving talk about Melville Tolson. I knew almost > nothing about Tolson and I learned a lot, also from Keith Leonard's paper.
> Lorenzo T is a fine poet but didn't get to give a poetry reading because > he only came the last day? I'm not sure why. At any rate, instead of > discussing this actual living poet-critic, we are now busy discussing the > following:
> 1) Who was right about the Nielsen panel, Aldon or Bob? I am very fond of > both and admire both very much; I wasn't there so I can't tell what really > happened but I suspect there was less difference of opinion than appeared > from Bob's and Aldon's letters.
> 2) Was it Ok for Keith Tuma to send on Aldon's remarks to a > non-list member?
> 3) Was Bob von H within his rights in responding to the List?
> 4) Should Bob join the list asap??
> 5) Should lurkers have to contribute to the list (as Ron suggested)?
>
> and so on and so forth.
> Thus it is that an important (to me) issue gets wholly lost in the > shuffle. And thus it is that instead of talking about the black poet who > was in our midst (Lorenzo)--as a poet, not just because he's black--we end > up, academic-style, arguing about what white men (Aldon and Bob) are > supposed to say about black poets.
>
> The whole thing strikes me as wonderfully silly. As Dodie said, I thought > this was supposed to be a POETICS list. And what I want to know--since > Bob's paper, fine as it was, doesn't convince me of the case is: why > should I read Robert Hayden at all? I find his poems very boring and > status quo? Why should I read him rather than such "forgotten white > poets" as Archibald MacLeish or Babette Deutsch? Hadn't we better begin > with such questions?
> Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

183. maria damon
Re: maria--/& performance
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

emily rites:
> Maria--didn't find your post offensive at all & think that yes, which > threads do and don't get picked up merits observation, mention, critical > examination etc., & thank you for boldly calling attention to it. I myself > kept Chris S.'s post in my in-box for days, challenged & wanting to respond, > & eventually giving up because I just didn't feel qualified to. I've been > studying race and representation for years, & the more I study, the less > qualified I feel to speak. Mostly I got worried & a little nauseated at the > prospect of a predominantly-white-membered list discussing "race & erotics," > esp. in the assertive and "I know what I'm talking about" voice many > conversations here seem to take, even as I also get worried & perhaps more > than a little nauseated at the prospect of same list skirting those issues.
> This is why I didn't respond. I personally couldn't care less about whether > or not R V H signs on to the list, so I could post about it (although I > won't) all day. It is not because I didn't care about the issues raised in > CS's post that I didn't respond, but because I cared too much to respond > quickly & maybe at all. & yes I'm aware this might sound sappy or > irresponsible. But because I was worried & unsure how/if to proceed, > holding off the procession seemed most "responsible" at the time. I'm not > sure it was and--this sounds facetious but is meant sincerely--I'm sorry for > not knowing, not being sure. It may be that others felt similarly-- ?
> --emily

yes, i see; e-mail is indeed a hard medium in which to have serious sustained inquiries about matters that require a lot of thought. this is certainly true; i often find myself fading out just when a big juicy issue that i really care about comes up, as if, as you say, i'm aware that the medium is working against me and a kind of pre-emptive weariness sets in. and no, you don't sound sappy and irresponsible in the least (to me), and yes, the prospect of mostly white folks holding forth confidently on the subject of race and eros is indeed a bit peculiar. but... i learned a lot from aldon's 4-line post clarifying his statement about un-radical desegregations of the sex act,that i wouldn't have learned if i'd just let it go. it was hard for me to ask for that clarification, cuz i had that inertia-feeling: "do i really want to open up this can o' words?" but i'm glad i did. i most emphatically did not mean to call anyone on the carpet --i really dislike this ad hominem/feminam stuff --but to point out, as marjorie has since, the way charged issues often get watered down.

i think you may be right tht it's a function of the medium.--xo, md
>

↑ Index

184. maria damon
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

joe: thanks for your considered reply. i myself tend not to teach stuff i don't feel i can get behind. once or twice i've taught adrienne rich and audre lorde --which was interesting for the class but boring for me, and problematic, because i don't want to be put in a role that could be construed as anti-feminist, but i also need to feel free to criticise work that doesn't excite me, tho i can appreciate its skill. sometimes, with rich, w/ undergrads, i take the opportunity to talk about the academic tradition and how someone can be part of it, trying to break out, and succeeding in some ways, but being reinscribed in it...that usually works --to talk about "radical politics" v. "radical style" etc. i don't know, joe, if there is a "white aesthetic" --that term seems to encode something more? i.e. new critical? modernist? etc. bests, md

↑ Index

185. Joe Amato
Re: " . . . : . . . "
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

about this question of radical-ness (i got four days left hereabouts and then i'm away from my machine for three weeks, so i may as well post like hell): anecdotally speaking, some of the more radical poets i've known have led conservative lives---i'll let 'conservative' stand for mainstream living arrangements (by which i don't quite mean values), and i mean by 'conservative' at least as conservative as mine---whereas i can think of a few formal poets i've known who've been all over the charts in terms of how they've lived... i mean, i don't see any necessary connection, necessarily, twixt radical writing and radical living, though i do at times see connections... and i suppose necessity here is a function of what community one is a part of... so i guess what this means for biographically or culturally-based work is that it's best not to assume from the get-go such correspondences by way of 'explanation'?... love to hear more here...

joe

↑ Index

186. Herb Levy
List, person, ship
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Mr Silliman's proposal does not adequately address the pernicious issue of the lurker slime on this e-mail list.

Requiring a single post per month from each list member would likely result in cutesy, off-topic messages about the weather (it's been warm & sunny here in Seattle, but there are early morning clouds today) or irrelevant "me-too" posts in ongoing threads. As several people have already noted, this will result in too much empty traffic, further allowing the vampiric lurkers in our midst to stay on for another month of reading the collected wisdom of others at no cost to themselves.

To actively combat these lurker vermin, we must require full participation by all list members in every current thread. After all, it is really not too much to ask that list members participate in the activities of the group.

To start with, we could allow brief (less than a hundred words) responses to be made within forty-eight hours of the intiation of any new topic.

However, to achieve the goal of total active participation, we would have to move quickly toward the more reasonable requirement that all list members respond within one hour to each post to the list (including their own) with a closely reasoned 250-500 word statement. To make it easier to follow the advanced discourse that would likely result under this new system, each list member would also have to provide a shorter abstract of their arguments.

This simple change in policy would most certainly cut down on the number of non-participating lurker scum on poetics list and we would soon arrive at the kind of total and immediate participatory democracy that one usually sees in only a few of the more progressive-thinking Usenet newsgroups.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

187. Hank Lazer
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Marjorie asked why should she/we read Hayden, stating that she was unconvinced by Robt's plenary session paper. I have been reading Hayden rather carefully for about ten years, and my argument may overlap with a slightly different question: why teach Hayden's poetry. I suppose in some ways I read and enjoy Hayden for reasons similar to the pleasure I take in re-reading Robert Frost--there is a subtle but serious self-criticism in their work, an undermining and ironizing, in Hayden's case a beautiful use of an occasional odd word in the poem (to my ear, similar to such a gesture in Oppen's work, though Robt's paper gave me a different and convincing way of hearing the indulgence in that savored single word in Hayden's poetry). Marjorie might even enjoy looking at Hayden's last poem, "American Journal," which, on the page, looks remarkably like David Antin's talk-poems. I teach Hayden in contemporary poetry classes, in part, for reasons that Robt discussed--to complicate and question certain assumptions about ethnic identity and to counteract a tendency to state what "the" African-American poet says etc. I generally teach Hayden (Collected Poems) along with a big unit on Baraka (I had been using The LeRoi Jones/Amirir Baraka Reader), discussing the many different positions taken by Baraka on Afro-centrism and on socialism, and putting Hayden's universalist pronouncements (which I read as somewhat in conflict with his actual poetic practice, reading that universalism as a "wish" rather than an actuality), then moving to considerations of gender as well in Audre Lorde's poetry and essays. In all three cases, I am making use of essays and poetry and interviews, trying to consider all these expressions as part of a single thinking, as part of a cultural critique, as part of a poet's activity as an intellectual. Also, I live and teach in Alabama, and Hayden's poems often push us into important and local considerations, including the complex intersections of Native American and African American culture here.

Before Marjorie (or Robt) or others accuse me of offering merely sociological reasons for reading Hayden, let me add that I consider his poetry GOOD. Which poems? Here's a partial list--The Diver, Electrical Storm, The Rabbi, "Night, Death, Mississippi," "Incense of the Lucky Virgin," The Whipping, Those Winter Sundays, Middle Passage, and I'm only on page 48 of the collected. Hayden, to my ear, has an extraordinary ear, writes beautiful sounding poems. In little snippets, as in "so sibling innuendoes all aver--" or "His pain/ our anguish and anodyne" or in entire poems. I also admire the complex and shifting sympathies of Hayden's poems--something which Robt argued for as well.

I don't think that my own enthusiasm for Hayden (and for Baraka and Lorde) will necessarily persuade others. I can vouch for the fact that re-reading Hayden's poetry over a number of years has been a pleasant experience, a re-reading that has re-paid the sustained attention. At any rate, on the way to the office, such are my quick notes to Marjorie (and others) about Hayden.

A quick note too on the exchange between Aldon and Robert. I was there. Yes, I did argue for seeking and articulating different modes of reading, interpreting, evaluating in relation to Hughes (whose early poetry can be read and appreciated in a way that is not merely an analysis of "themes" when juxtaposed with some of the blues recordings he was listening to). (By the way, Hughes' "Theme for English B" raises interesting questions about ethnic identity vs. universalism in poetry....) It seemed to me that Robt came on a bit insulting and heavy-handed, though that was not, I think, his intention. Ultimately, I heard him arguing for a different balance (than he heard in this one panel) between sociological perspectives and close reading. He wanted more of the latter, as a means to defend or articulate the value and excellence of particular poems. Aldon explained that there were other panels (including the one done by him, Mark Scroggins, and Stephen Leonard, which I also attended, and which was excellent and informative and DID involve close readings of specific poems) that did precisely that, and that Robert should consider attending the CLA if he really wanted more information and to connect with what scholarship was being done. To my ears, some of the tension in their exchange has to do with issues of professional stature and the politics of the profession. Robert was ignorant of the CLA & indicated that he only attended (or mostly?) conferences where he was invited to speak. Aldon suggested that if Robt really was developing an interest in AFrican American poetries that he should attend CLA conferences and join the CLA. I drifted away from the conversation at that point, trying to ask Aldon and Robt to continue to talk to one another. I know and like both of them, and believe that a sustained conversation between both would be of value.

De-lurked, and having said enough for July & August both,

Hank Lazer

↑ Index

188. Daniel Bouchard

Re: List wars

Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

and so on and so forth. Thus it is that an important (to me) issue gets wholly lost in the shuffle. And thus it is that instead of talking about the black poet who was in our midst (Lorenzo)--as a poet, not just because he's black--we end up, academic-style, arguing about what white men (Aldon and Bob) are supposed to say about black poets. The whole thing strikes me as wonderfully silly. As Dodie said, I thought this was supposed to be a POETICS list.

Who can blame lurkers for keeping silent? ["vermin, scum, slime," says Herb Levy referring to lurkers.]

I'm pleased that Ron's post prompted at least one person to write in and say who she was, what she does, and why she's silent on the list. There's nothing wrong with keeping quiet in a discussion. On the other hand, it's better to type something in once in a while (even if you're unsure of yourself, or going out on a limb. There's few instances of flaming here, if any, my perception of the list over the past year has been one of general friendliness).

Here are some other Herb Levy gems:

"allowing the vampiric lurkers in our midst to stay on for another month of reading the collected wisdom of others at no cost to themselves." "To actively combat these lurker vermin, we must require full participation" "This simple change in policy would most certainly cut down on the number of non-participating lurker scum on poetics list and we would soon arrive at the kind of total and immediate participatory democracy"

Democracy for you, Herb, is an elimination of the "scum?" Can the unfortunates help themselves if they (we) do not possess your "wisdom?" But I don't want to dwell on your post, I'm sure you have some vitriol headed your way.

Something struck me about M. Perloff's post: the way the terms were set, as in "the black poet in OUR midst." What does "our" refer to? The members of the list who also attended the conference? I'm not clear as to whether Lorenzo's attendance at Orono was important to you because he is a poet, or because he is a black poet. Also, could you clarify "academic-style" as a form of argument and maybe propose an alternative? I've seldom seen any other kind of argument on this list (Lurkers, speak up!)

[redacted]

↑ Index

189. Shaunanne Tangney

Re: poetry performance

Tue 9 Jul 1996

On Mon, 8 Jul 1996, Pritchett,Pat @Silverplume wrote:

> I would just add that the moment anyone "stands up" in front of someone else to speak that moment "becomes" theatrical and those who ignore this do so at their (and their audience's) peril. Actors can enhance a text; they can also make a hash of it. The key (as someone mentioned) is the presence of a director.

i have long argued that all art is ultimately performative because it ultimately requires an audience to be "complete."

> All of this begs the question, Is the poet always and necessarily the best reader of his/her own work? Usually, yes. But not always. I've heard some real botches, generally from people with a very poor notion of the intrinsic theatricality of even the most perfunctory spoken exchange. To assume that > just standing there and "telling the truth" as James Cagney once described acting can result in readings that are painfully bad in their naivete. And also very powerful.

even if all art is ultimately performative, it does not mean that all artists are ultimately good performers. it takes practice, and an attention to details other than those that went into the poem, and into the writing of the poem.

> I think readings are both theatrical and anti-theatrical. That is, the encounter between the reader and the audience creates ipso facto a theatrical experience, but one which is anti-theatrical in that it forces our attention away from the expectations usually aroused by the idea of a performance.

i suspect this also depends quite a bit on the poem, the way the poet wrote it. by this i mean that i tend to write more for the ear than the eye, because i think poetry is, finally, and oral medium. but there are many who would disagree with me, and so not write their poems with an ear for performance.

best,
shaunanne

↑ Index

190. Don Cheney
List wars: 100 Years, Star,...
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

while i don't consider my SELF a lurker on this list i also don't consider my self a big time contributor. i do think that Herb's post that Daniel quotes is a sort of hyperbole or maybe just a "hyper text" but i think he went out of his way to make sure we all knew he was kidding. no?

don cheney
[redacted]

Daniel Bouchard writes:

and so on and so forth. Thus it is that an important (to me) issue gets wholly lost in the shuffle. And thus it is that instead of talking about the black poet who was in our midst (Lorenzo)--as a poet, not just because he's black--we end up, academic-style, arguing about what white men (Aldon and Bob) are supposed to say about black poets. The whole thing strikes me as wonderfully silly. As Dodie said, I thought this was supposed to be a POETICS list.

Who can blame lurkers for keeping silent? ["vermin, scum, slime," says Herb Levy referring to lurkers.]

I'm pleased that Ron's post prompted at least one person to write in and say who she was, what she does, and why she's silent on the list. There's nothing wrong with keeping quiet in a discussion. On the other hand, it's better to type something in once in a while (even if you're unsure of yourself, or going out on a limb. There's few instances of flaming here, if any, my perception of the list over the past year has been one of general friendliness).

Here are some other Herb Levy gems:

"allowing the vampiric lurkers in our midst to stay on for another month of reading the collected wisdom of others at no cost to themselves." "To actively combat these lurker vermin, we must require full participation" "This simple change in policy would most certainly cut down on the number of non-participating lurker scum on poetics list and we would soon arrive at the kind of total and immediate participatory democracy"

Democracy for you, Herb, is an elimination of the "scum?" Can the unfortunates help themselves if they (we) do not possess your "wisdom?" But I don't want to dwell on your post, I'm sure you have some vitriol headed your way.

Something struck me about M. Perloff's post: the way the terms were set, as in "the black poet in OUR midst." What does "our" refer to? The members of the list who also attended the conference? I'm not clear as to whether Lorenzo's attendance at Orono was important to you because he is a poet, or because he is a black poet. Also, could you clarify "academic-style" as a form of argument and maybe propose an alternative? I've seldom seen any other kind of argument on this list (Lurkers, speak up!)

[redacted]

↑ Index

191. Charles Alexander

Re: List wars

Tue 9 Jul 1996

> Who can blame lurkers for keeping silent? ["vermin, scum, slime," says Herb Levy referring to lurkers.]
>
> Here are some other Herb Levy gems:
>
> "allowing the vampiric lurkers in our midst to stay on for another month of reading the collected > wisdom of others at no cost to themselves."
> "To actively combat these lurker vermin, we must require full participation"

> "This simple change in policy would most certainly cut down on the number of non-participating lurker scum on poetics list and we would soon arrive at the kind of total and immediate participatory democracy"
>
> Democracy for you, Herb, is an elimination of the "scum?" Can the unfortunates help themselves if they (we) do not possess your "wisdom?" But I don't want to dwell on your post, I'm sure you have some vitriol headed your way.

I know it's said that one can't read tone in email messages, but I had no problem being absolutely convinced that Herb's post was tongue-in-cheek.

charles

↑ Index

192. Fred Muratori
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Re:

> Democracy for you, Herb, is an elimination of the "scum?" Can the unfortunates help themselves if they (we) do not possess your "wisdom?" But I don't want to dwell on your post, I'm sure you have some vitriol headed your way.
>
> [redacted]

Damn, I knew I was too naive and culture-bound to subscribe to this list. I thought Herb Levy's post was meant to be satiric. This means that now I'll have to re-read everything I've ever read to correct all my earlier mis-frissonings. Where will I find the time?

****

Fred Muratori "Certain themes are incurable."

([redacted])
Reference Services Division - Lyn Hejinian
Olin * Kroch * Uris Libraries
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853
WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html
****

↑ Index

193. Joe Amato
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

yes, ditto on herb's tongue-in-cheeky-ness...

joe

↑ Index

194. hen
Re: think of meeee!
Tue 9 Jul 1996

> Going for an interview at a community college for a lit teaching job this afternoon (my first serious interview) so please send blessings this way at 3 p.m my time (3 hours behind SF), oh good people. gab.

the vibes are with you. just emitted them - should be arriving gently in Hawaii around that time. Aloha. - Henry

↑ Index

195. henry
Re: think of meeee!
Tue 9 Jul 1996

SORRY FOLKS...hit the dern reply button. All of you now, focus those stray vibes toward Hawaii. No Darren, that's not a volcano. - hg

↑ Index

196. Daniel Bouchard
Re(vision): List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

So my server's getting drowned in messages to me saying "Herb Levy was just kidding." Yeah sure, so was Jonathan Swift-- that murderous bastard! So I retract my previous post, and offer this revision (this is what happens when you try and engage in a discussion for fifteen second intervals during work).

I remain undaunted though. I don't "get" those Leslie Neilsen spoof movies either.

[redacted]

Marjorie Perloff wrote:

and so on and so forth. Thus it is that an important (to me) issue gets wholly lost in the shuffle. And thus it is that instead of talking about the black poet who was in our midst (Lorenzo)--as a poet, not just because he's black--we end up, academic-style, arguing about what white men (Aldon and Bob) are supposed to say about black poets. The whole thing strikes me as wonderfully silly.

As Dodie said, I thought this was supposed to be a POETICS list.

Who can blame lurkers for keeping silent?

I'm pleased that Ron's post prompted at least one person to write in and say who she was, what she does, and why she's silent on the list. There's nothing wrong with keeping quiet in a discussion. On the other hand, it's better to type something in once in a while (even if you're unsure of yourself, or going out on a limb. There's few instances of flaming here, if any, my perception of the list over the past year has been one of general friendliness).

Something struck me about M. Perloff's post: the way the terms were set, as in "the black poet in OUR midst." What does "our" refer to? The members of the list who also attended the conference? I'm not clear as to whether Lorenzo's attendance at Orono was important to you because he is a poet, or because he is a black poet. Also, could you clarify "academic-style" as a form of argument and maybe propose an alternative? I've seldom seen any other kind of argument on this list (Lurkers, speak up!)

[redacted]

↑ Index

197. Rod Smith
Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Tue 9 Jul 1996

This is the Contents and Introduction for the forthcoming anthology _Onward: Contemporary Poetry and Poetics_ ed. Peter Baker, Peter Lang Pub., $28 pb, 440 pgs. due out Sept '96. Peter is off line traveling and asked me to send it to the listwar. "The Rejection of Closure" is a revised and extended version.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

I.
Bernadette Mayer Twenty Questions about Form or New Forms / Poems
Lyn Hejinian The Rejection of Closure / Poems from The Cell
Charles Bernstein The Parts Are Greater than the Sum of the Whole Rosmarie Waldrop Thinking of Follows / Inserting the Mirror
Harry Mathews Dormouse Poem
David Bergman Staying in the Lines
John Taggart Were You: Notes & A Poem for Michael Palmer
Rachel Blau DuPlessis On Drafts: A Memorandum of Understanding / Draft 11: Schwa
C. D. Wright Provisional Remarks... / Op Ed / the box this comes in/

Poems from Tremble
Albert Cook Poetic Purposes / Syllabic Margin / Poems

II.
Robert Creeley Was That a Real Poem or Did You Just Make It up Yourself? / Nothing New / Four Days in Vermont
Stephen Rodefer Preface to Four Lectures / Prologue to Language Doubling / Enclosure of Elk / The Library of Label / Poems
Clark Coolidge from Notebooks / Letters / Poems Michael Palmer Active Boundaries / Autobiography / Far Away Near Joan Retallack The Poethical Wager / AUTOBIOGRAPHIALITTERARIA II / The Woman in the Chinese Room
Nicole Brossard Fluid Arguments
Carolyn Forche On Subjectivity / Poems
Bob Perelman Statement /The Marginalization of Poetry /
The Manchurian Candidate: A Remake
Barrett Watten Nonnarrative/History / Bad History I John Ashbery PN Interview / Poems from Houseboat Days

poeanth.pb (Introduction)

Poetics is a vast, ancient, yet understudied field. Except, of course, for poets. Yet many if not most poets would probably assent to the proposition that one's poetics can be deduced from the poem. A statement on poetics presents immediate difficulties within such an aesthetic, because it risks being seen as ancillary to the production of the poem, and may, in fact, misrepresent the implicit poetics in the poet's work. Given these risks, many poets choose reticence as their primary mode of statement, with the limit of reticence approaching silence, often accompanied by an attitude of active disdain. Belief in an implicit poetics can be seen to derive from an immanentist theory of language, or the idea that words bear direct relation to what they represent, even carrying a little bit of the essence of the thing in the word. Such immanentist theories deriving from the religious tradition ("and the word was with God and the word was God") drove William of Occam, in the twelfth century, to propose the complete separation of word and referent, in his philosophy of nominalism. Jacques Derrida is often thought to represent such a nominalist viewpoint in his philosophy of deconstruction (see my Deconstruction and the Ethical Turn). Ezra Pound's language theory is explicitly immanentist, as when he instructs his Italian translator of The Cantos: "Don't worry about the meaning of the poem. Translate accurately line by line. The meaning is inherent in the material." Pound's poetics in The Cantos thus demonstrates what I call (in Obdurate Brilliance) the "myth of transparency," or the ideology of direct apprehension of the surrounding context from the text of the poem. Without worrying too much (right now) about the accuracy of labels, much of what is called mainstream poetry today operates either knowingly, or usually unknowingly, out of this model of transparency. Anthologies of poetics by mainstream poets are thus usually concerned with craft and techniqueaehow the poem is put togetheraewhen the poet is not discussing where he or she went on his/her last vacation or MacArthur grant to gather material. The poem's meaning is either inherent in the material (themes) or what it represents (nature). This view of poetics as purely practical and personal both derives from and sustains the poetic practice variously termed workshop or MFA verse, and can be found exemplified in every issue of the AWP Chronicle. In the past twenty-five or so years vibrant alternatives in the theory and practice of poetry have risen out of the movement known as Language poetry. Following the "radical modernism" of Stein, Zukofsky and others, in Charles Bernstein's appellation, or what Marjorie Perloff has called "the other tradition," this practice has as one explicit goal, quoting Zukofsky, "to stop the gaze on words as things." By now, Language poetry has been around long enough that, like deconstruction or Mt. Pinatubo, it no longer exists, but its practitioners, many of them represented here, are still very active and its effects, as John Ashbery indicates in his interview, may be even more interesting than the initial productions of those associated with the movement. Literary history (which H. R. Jauss terms "conceivably the worst medium through which to display the historicity of literature") is already at work deriving a genealogy to explain the transition between the "radical modernism" of Stein, Zukofsky and others, and the Language poets. Materials for such a genealogy are generously represented here in the selections by John Ashbery and Robert Creeley, as well as those of Clark Coolidge and Bernadette Mayer. There is no raw material. So Harry Mathews begins his contribution. Mathews, a member of the Ourvoir de litterature potentielle, or OULIPO group, brings impeccable credentials to his theorizing, or non-theorizing, of the production of the poem. As with Lyn Hejinian's already-classic essay, "Against Closure" (revised and expanded for publication here), Mathews' statement is a kind of manifesto, reminiscent of the radical modernism of Andre Breton and early surrealism. Manifestos are less concerned with explanation than with demonstration; they attempt not to analyze, but rather to make manifest artistic practices and attitudes. Looking at the materials assembled here, I have been struck that there are two clear poles, or limits, or borders, to their expressive strategies. If the manifesto is one such border, the other is collage. Some of these collage assemblages, such as those of Charles Bernstein and Nicole Brossard, were created or at least shaped explicitly for this collection. Others are the results of collaborations between the poets and/or the editor and/or the editor's friends, notably Rod Smith, Lee Ann Brown, and Peter Gizzi. The relation of poetics to poetry always to some extent resists explanation. Yet we are drawn to explore it as part of a life commitment to poetry, a commitment those in the present volume recognize under the sign of necessity, Beckett's "all that I can, more than I could." Each poet's approach also necessarily involves questions of individual history and practice while somehow managing to ground the communities of poets and artists actively committed to the creative imagination. This volume emerges from these multiple communities and hopefully will serve as a resource for those already involved in the work and those yet to come. Or, as Bernadette Mayer likes to say, "Onward."

Peter Baker
Washington D.C., 1996

↑ Index

198. Jordan Davis
amusing and depressing
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Hey, who sent me that little golden book of lesser New York School poets? It's amusing. Thanks. Is that really a reprint of some previous anthology?

I suppose silence is a topic. Ford Madox Ford writes about reading with some surprise mid 19th c numbers of popular american periodicals filled with letters to the editor not about the fine moral shadings of the tales published in the magazines, but questions about the technique of short story writing. Isn't it funny that none of the poets here talks much about technique? Whatever that is. I guess I bring it up because I found it amusing and depressing, as I usually find Ford. The satires on lurking and on cross posting are also amusing and depressing. Bummer! And then I remember Bill Luoma's injunction not to write without having some feeling to send across, otherwise one produces a dull brown feeling in the reader. Why is that. What is the emotional reading that obtains to even a torn scrap of paper lying the street, that makes us accountable for the tone of our writing in ways we spend all our grace to avoid acknowledging? Heh? Eh? J

PS It was Ben Friedlander who wrote that, about it being all right to think of O'Hara's poems as fascinated with surface, as long as one acknowledges that the surface is quicksand..

↑ Index

199. Gabrielle Welford
Re: performance & poetry: "measure carefully, can be toxic"
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Sounds like Edith Sitwell... gab.

On Mon, 8 Jul 1996, Lisa Samuels wrote:

> for poetry performance: i still want to see someone
> *at least begin a reading from behind an opaque*
> black (or whatever) curtain
> -or-
> put an enormous mirror in front of the curtain so the
> audience sees only itself for a while (small venue
> and large mirror required)
> -or/and-
> position mirrors on either side of the stage so
> the audience can see the poet from the sides only,
> still behind the curtain
>
> something along those lines
>
> and for eliza mcgrand --
> as for #3, i prefer the phrasing of a country song:
> 'I've enjoyed as much of this as I can stand'
>
> my month's worth,
>
> lisa samuels

↑ Index

200. Gabrielle Welford
thanks
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

to all for well wishes. All the traffic lights on the way there were green, I made it in time, the committee smiled a lot. I had fun teaching them for 10 minutes. Now, back to area exams... Don't stop wishing. You guys are good. gab.

↑ Index

201. Maria Damon
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

dodie: this is the third time you have attacked my person, my character, and my motives in a public conversation. what's going on? i have admired and respected your work as a writer and editor and contributor to the list. you know this. we have had a very warm (i thought) working relationship. now, everytime i utter a sentence, it seems, i get targeted for being holier-than-thou, careerist, making "freudian slips", etc -- my words are being twisted around, caricatured, and then ridiculed, with unsavory motives ascribed to these inaccurate representations. clearly something's up. if i have offended you personally in any way (and your remarks seem clearly personally directed), please let me know, back channel, how i have done so. This is extremely painful to me and i would like it to stop maria d.

In message <v01520d01ae07d1e76e81@[205.134.228.72]> UB Poetics discussion group
writes:
> At 10:00 PM 7/8/96, Emily Lloyd wrote:
> >yes, which
> >threads do and don't get picked up merits observation, mention, critical > >examination etc.
>
> The is Dodie Bellamy.
>
> On the surface, Emily, this sounds just great--but serveral issues come up > for me. First of all, this list is not going to change the world, it's a > bunch of mostly-white middle class people shooting the breeze. It's a > place of priviledge and leisure--the priviledge to have access to a > computer hook-up, the luxury of all this time to shoot the breeze. Let me > get this clear, I am not against anybody discussing race issues and/or > teaching--even though for us non-academics, issues of teaching are rather > boring--and academic approaches to literature and to poets themselves are > something many poets I speak with find problematic. For instance I do not > think M. Damon's erasure of poets in her original post was merely an > oversight--perhaps a Freudian slip? As Ron pointed out, for many academics > living breathing poets are not part of the picture. Furthermore--this > isn't the 50s, no one that I know of, and few (if any) people on this list > would challenge the need for representation of non-"white-middle-class" > writers wherever writers are represented.
>
> But creating a hierarchy of what's acceptable or more acceptable on this > list is something I find highly problematic. It is that process of > hierarchization which excluded non-"white-middle-class" writers and women > from the literary canon in the first place. There is no god-given > hierarchy of importance. It is this mindframe, for instance that has often > disparaged conversation by women as "chatter." I have much difficulty when > white middle class liberals use the issues of "oppressed" groups to guilt > trip other white middle class liberals--and I think some of that has been > going on here. Let me give an example from outside the list. Several > years ago here in San Francisco there was a poet who became "engulfed" in > the Gulf War. He marched against the Gulf War, did performance art against > the Gulf War, wrote poems about the Gulf War, wore buttons. So, at least a > year after the Gulf War ended he gave a reading--of course it was all poems > about the Gulf War. During the course of the reading he took the > opportunity to brow beat the audience by saying we're all here listening to > poetry--but there was THE GULF WAR--in other words he posed himself as this > messianic figure concerned with human suffering, and the audience was cast > as a bunch of superficials listening to Poetry. I have problems with the > colonizing of another group's oppression and and wearing it as a badge. I > am skeptical when someone makes an academic career out of Bob Kaufman then > makes jokes about his "clunkers" on this list. This is not treating > Kaufman with the dignity he deserves.

>
> To conclude, I think the Beatles and list politics are just as valid topics > of discussion here as anything else.

↑ Index

202. Bill Luoma/Vanstar
Re: tonight's HRs
Tue 9 Jul 1996

C har,

I wanted biggio and there's no more permanent billy ripken.
so NL goes: chipper, hundley, larkin.
AL: knoblauch, anderson, carter.

with a wiff

To: bluoma @ vanstar.com @ VSMAIL
cc:
From: LancerLeg @ aol.com @ VSMAIL
Date: 07/09/96 05:32:42 PM PDT
Subject: tonight's HRs

National League: Bagwell, Ellis Burks, Biggio American League: R.Alomar, Pudge Rodriguez, Buhner pitch to maz ... gawn

↑ Index

203. Paul Naylor
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

I'm with Charles on this one. I think Ron's allusion to Swift's "A Modest Proposal" and Herb's allusion to Ron's allusion suggests that a satire is coming or has come our way.

Paul Naylor
MAIL
SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

SEND

in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

>From: IN%"[redacted]" "UB Poetics discussion group" 9-JUL-1996 12:23:08.59
>Subj: RE: List wars
>
>>
>>Who can blame lurkers for keeping silent? ["vermin, scum, slime," says Herb >>Levy referring to lurkers.]
>>
>
>>
>>Here are some other Herb Levy gems:
>>
>> "allowing the vampiric lurkers in our midst to stay on for another month of >>reading the collected >>wisdom of others at no cost to themselves."
>>"To actively combat these lurker vermin, we must require full participation"
>>"This simple change in policy would most certainly cut down on the number of >>non-participating lurker scum on poetics list and we would soon arrive at >>the kind of total and immediate participatory democracy"
>>
>>Democracy for you, Herb, is an elimination of the "scum?" Can the unfortunates >>help themselves if they (we) do not possess your "wisdom?" But I don't want to >>dwell on your post, I'm sure you have some vitriol headed your way.

>
>
>I know it's said that one can't read tone in email messages, but I had no >problem being absolutely convinced that Herb's post was tongue-in-cheek.
>
>charles
SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

↑ Index

204. Robert A Harrison
L. Thomas
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Has anyone mentioned that Lorenzo is not only black, but Hispanic? He's Panamanian-American, a non-native speaker of English. Haven't been able to keep up with all the details of the conversation, I'm at work ... so if this is old news, then...

I happened to be looking for his current address before this discussion started. Does anyone have it?

Bob Harrison
[redacted]

↑ Index

205. David Baratier
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Dear owners of the list,

Do advertisements count?

David Baratier

↑ Index

206. Christina Fairbank Chirot posters
Tue 9 Jul 1996

---

interesting to scroll down the screen and read alternating messages: "poetry performance"/"list wars".

Remember that poster, "What if they held a war and nobody came?"

Thanks to Bob Harrison for his message regarding Lorenzo Thomas.

Dave Baptiste Chirot

↑ Index

207. David Baratier
poetry parfornir
Tue 9 Jul 1996

> Christopher K. Whipple typed:

`Does anyone have any ideas on why coffee house readings are so often lame and depressing; why do these horrible people have a monopoly on the espresso circuit, while so much that is delicious is abandoned to a half-life in academia?

The tension between the academic and the street (or spoken word) poets have created the coffee-house lameness in most cities I've lived in. The problem is two-fold: many academics believe that poetry worth reading is to be institutionalized and therefore works outside of this sphere are improperly crafted or have a lower unit value, while many of the street poets believe that reading other's poems or revising their own are both unecessary aspects of the craft. One of the few reading series I have chanced upon with a full mixture and a successful open mike, was sponsored by an independent bookstore in Philly (now out of business) which actively sought out both university and non-university readers willing to take smaller (guaranteed) amounts of money. For this reason, plus the owner's stable of consistent readers he supported, out of a crowd of twenty readers, at least a fourth, and usually more, were excellent.

Does anyone have any ideas on how poetry can be successfully performed?

Joy Harjo uses a slow reading style with bursts of animation and/or inflection to add to the lyrical scenery. A good sample can be found on the _Woman who fell from the sky_ cassette which accompanies the book. But a more representative example (not so over produced and the like) can be found on an earlier tape (I think it's called _Furious Light_.

Jack Gilbert is a contemporary master of silence. Of how silences can be manipulated to fit the reading space for the most impact in relation to the poem. His use of rhetorical questions followed by long pauses fell entire audiences into thought, tense with answer. One keeps waiting for an escape, the brilliance is his refusal to withdral, to slacken the question.

Michelle Boisseau the length of her poems accumulate in an audiences head in such a way as to bring the weight of the poem upon the ending. For one who listens intently during the entire piece, the ending is a miraculous articulation of associative values built upon throughout the piece.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

208. Gabrielle Welford
herb levy's scum
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Hey daniel, I have an eensy feeling herb's modest proposal was a little tongue in cheek. But I'm looking forward to the 200-500 wd responses from 300 people with abstracts attached. I think we should all take this very seriously wink wink nudge nudge gab.

↑ Index

209. Kathrine Varnes
Re: poetry performance
Tue 9 Jul 1996

As far as I'm concerned, a good performance is a good interpretation, or at least an interesting one. (The reverse is also true.) A bad performance is one that has no interpretation, or at least not a complete one. This re-states some of what folks have already said, except I'd also add that what kills poetry for me (which is often what happens when actors are reading) is when the reader has already decided what the perfect reading is and tries to create it -- some static idea -- instead of actively interpreting while reading. Better to be imperfect and lean on the words.

Kathrine Varnes

↑ Index

210. Emily Lloyd
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Ok, Dodie. I see your point clearly w/the example of the Gulf guy, although I'm not sure that Maria's etc. posts were coming on in that way. Having attended 2 of the most supposedly "leftist" and "activism-oriented" undergrad schools I can think of, I'm all-too-aware of the kind of unconstructive self-righteousness you describe, & tend to respond to Gulf-guy types by holding out my hand, slapping it, and crying "bad little activist." I just didn't read the post that way. And I pretty much agree that there should be no "godgiven hierarchy of importance" as to what will be discussed here (although perhaps that part of your post should be addressed to Marjorie's last, and not Maria's?). I'd hope there was a place for Beatles & teaching & race & list politics (after all, we're "mostly-white middleclass people shooting the breeze"--we've got the time) But I think the point was that there wasn't...certain issues were dropped like potatoes, for whatever reason (and I admit, yes, to an interest/concern in that reason). I'm not interested in falling into the "why are we talking about this when we could/ should be talking about THIS?" trap; on the other hand, I think "why aren't we talking about this?" is a valid question. emily

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Emily Lloyd [redacted]
"Emily said Emily said, Emily
is admittedly Emily." --G. Stein

↑ Index

211. Loss Glazier

Orono papers & other authors

Tue 9 Jul 1996

--> An update on a topic that arose on this list. I've had a couple of people offer to give me Orono papers so I will be making a small number of papers a part of the online Orono book. If you have a paper from the conference to put online, you are very much encouraged to get in touch with me via individual e-mail.

--> For their home pages, I'd also be very interested in essays/works on:

Enslin
Ceravalo
Irby
Robert Creeley
Ray Federman
Steve McCaffery
Fiona Templeton
Cecilia Vicun~a
Lyn Hejinian
Barbara Guest
Bruce Andrews
Jackson Mac Low
Susan Howe

If you have writing on any of these authors you'd like to make available online, please let me know.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

--> I'm interested in putting papers about other authors online also. So please let me know if you have other papers too!

↑ Index

212. David Kellogg
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Marjorie has made an important point about the dominance in these here threads of silly issues. She also points out that a lot of energy is expended on peripherals when more important issues are staring us in the face.

But I don't think it's easy to separate the central from the peripheral. To wit:

On Tue, 9 Jul 1996, Hank Lazer wrote:

> Before Marjorie (or Robt) or others accuse me of offering merely sociological reasons for reading Hayden, let me add that I consider his poetry GOOD.

Now, why does Hank feel a need to say this? What the hell's the matter with reading a poet for sociological reasons, or for reasons other than that poet's value? Why the obvious debasement of "mere" sociology? What's wrong with sociology? Bob von H stated the assumption explicitly, somewhere in his response to Aldon, that the goal of scholarship should be, more or less, to separate the wheat from the chaff. Marjorie in her post assumes something similar, and now Hank has to make an obligatory nod to that belief.

Well that's not MY goal, or not most of the time, and I don't see why it should be. From the posts of those critics who are on this list, it seems to me that the world (or at least the Net) is filled with people yakking about why such-and-such a poet is good, and another is bad. The last thing I want or need is another tastemaker. Save that, as Foucault might say, for the police.

I'm not trying to exclude considerations of value. We have to evaluate all the time anyway. But prior definitions of the proper job of the critic or poet are a lot sillier than examinations of net-politics.

When people talk about "mere" sociology, or slag critics as somehow less credible than poets (thank you Dodie), or talk about the proper role of poetry, or criticism, or whatever, I get alternately bored or angry. Mainly, though, I think that if sociology draws this much uncontested ire and obvious anxiety, there must be something to it. A "pure" poetics outside of sociology doesn't exist, and if it did I wouldn't want it.

Cheers,
David

~~~
~~~

> If you have writing on any of these authors you'd like to make > available online, please let me know.
>
> --> I'm interested in putting papers about other authors online > also. So please let me know if you have other papers too!

↑ Index

214. Jerry Rothenberg
Re: Covering Cherub
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Dear Rob Wilson --

Thanks for yours, & please feel free to send any essays/works etc. concerning local & Pacific matters. We'll be arriving there on the 4th of September & I understand from Gab Welford that there's a big Bamboo Ridge reading on the 5th, so certainly we'll plan to get to that one. I have an interest in all of that, so looking forward very much to this particular visit. Tell me if you have any ideas or suggestions, and in the meantime

all good wishes

JERRY

↑ Index

215. Charles Alexander
Re: Orono papers & other authors
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Dear Maria:

Welcome back to town. I'm very swamped this week, but I'd love to see you sometime soon. Perhaps next week, even on a weekday, you could come over to our house for coffee/tea, meet my wife Cynthia, talk a bit? so very lovely yes yes

And I'm sorry Dodie is giving you such a hard time. To these eyes it's not apparent why she's giving you a hard time. I've always had a good time with Dodie in email conversations, have met her a couple of times at San Francisco readings I've given, but I don't know her very well.

Hope it passes.

love,

charles

↑ Index

216. Charles Alexander
Re: Orono papers & other authors
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Well now I feel embarassed having goofed with the reply button and passed on a personal message to the list. Sorry to all.

charles

↑ Index

217. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest the guy and the gulf war
Tue 9 Jul 1996

a year or so ago, the dance critic from the new yorker (arlene croce? i know i am blanking on the name here) had an extraordinary essay on victim art. she took an extreme position against it, refusing to attend bill t. jones' latest dance peice, about death and dying, because she felt it was a category she defined as "victim art" -- work written about hardship that causes the creator to be evaluated as a victim, rather than as an artist.

her refusal to even go to the concert was extreme, certainly, and her essay sparked much protest in artistic sectors. but the point was valid. there is a tendency to evaluate art about hardship not as art but as a test of audience compassion, liberalism, etc. your gulf-war fellow was just another remove of this.

i am working on a book about domestic violence and it has been very difficult for me to evaluate the writing, to decide whether it should be public or not. i think putting victimhood out in writing, submitting the writing to forums as writing, and then complaining, if it doesn't go over well, that the critics are being as abusive as the initial source of hardship is, to say the least, being a bad sport. but on the other hand, the source of a terrifying amount of art (can't, for gods sake, we write/draw/sing/compose about anything but pain i ask myself sometimes in frustration) IS pain. and art works can bring the audience into a close understanding of what a hardship is, and does, as very little else can.

all of this is old ground, covered by the new yorker essay and numerous responses to it... and the gulf war poet is yet another wrinkle. do we admire someone for at least caring about a painful issue and taking on the burden of making art about it? on the other hand, to harangue an audience for being an audience, instead of performing some undefined activist task, seems absurd, almost sartre... when does a work become too personal and too painful to be evaluated as art? e

↑ Index

218. Gabrielle Welford
Collaborator on M.E.T. Lambert article, 19th c poet (fwd)
Tue 9 Jul 1996

I am seeking possible collaborators for an article on 19th-c American woman poet Mary Eliza (Perine) Tucker Lambert, whose works are included in _Black Women's Poetry_ from the Oxford UP series, the Schomburg Library of 19th-c Black Women Writers, and excerpted in Cheryl Walker's anthology of 19th-c American women poets. An important component of the article will be reception of the poem in classrooms, so that any classroom experience with her works would be a valuable asset for a collaboration.

Janet Gray
[redacted]

↑ Index

219. Michelle Roberts
Re: bumb bunny
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Thanks all for the responses to my inquiry. It turns out that the essay on teh new sentence was in file in my cabinet, and I'd read it four years ago while getting my masters -- somehow, and don't take this personally, Ron -- I just forgot it!! And I was reading lots of L-poetry at the time. Sheez. Again thanks, I'll be re-reading now.

M

Meaghan Roberts-Jones Our exchanges? An engendering Ph.D. Candidate - Humanities-Lit.&Ideas through rare and always The University of Texas at Dallas infinte fortune. [redacted] -- L. Irigaray

↑ Index

220. Michelle Roberts
Re: Listpersonship
Tue 9 Jul 1996

On Mon, 8 Jul 1996, c.g. guertin wrote:

> Lurker equals/does not equal listener? Is this a 'bad' moral equation?
> Silence is evil or simply undesirable?
>
> cg
>

Actually, Ron made some excellent points. Devoloving is no fun. And as to the ethics and morality of lurking: 95% of the time I lurk on this list because y'all are already a community, some it appears were before the list existed, and I'm not going to shoot off my mouth and mess up the party -- also, the level of thinking here is simply smore sophisitcated than mine at present and y'all serve as a good model (for lots of reasons, some contradictory) of what this little poet-critic could aspire to. Combine those, and I'm quiet cuz I'm not silly. I know when I'm being taught, that's all. And thanks for being good at what you do.

Yours in gazing,
m

↑ Index

221. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Private List/Public Space
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Loss,

yes, but how often do one's notes tacked onto a bulletin board get taken down and shipped off to some archive; archiving (electronic or otherwise) seems to legitimize the mere missives, no? And then they get quoted perhaps, and so on.

Burt

↑ Index

222. Michelle Roberts
Re: poetry performance
Tue 9 Jul 1996

> that wished to consume its object, to become its object, to take the place of its object (Freudian references intended).

James, that sounds more like Lacan. I wish we could get over him. And I wish Derrida would quit demolishing people, and I wish poetry or poets would defend themselves. Or at least quit ..... why is poetry on the side of the feminine in dynamic?? Actually, I've read my Kristeva, so I have an answer for that. pffft.

M>

↑ Index

223. Bruce Malcolm
(no subject)
Tue 9 Jul 1996

PLEASE HELP!

Date: 09 Jul 1996 07:43:47
From: [redacted]
Subject: KEY SENATE BURMA VOTE: THURSDAY, JULY 11
To: Recipients of burmanet-l <[redacted]> Lines: 65

From: [redacted] (Simon Billenness)
Subject: KEY SENATE BURMA VOTE: THURSDAY, JULY 11

SENATE MAY VOTE ON BURMA SANCTIONS THURSDAY, JULY 11

BUMRA SANCTIONS UNDER THREAT! CALL YOUR SENATORS TODAY!

July 9, 1996

The news from Senator McConnell's office is that the Foreign Aid Bill, containing an amendment section 569) by Senators McConnell and Moynihan imposing economic sanctions on Burma, may come up for a vote on Thursday, July 11.

Section 569 is under severe threat. One or more Senators will attempt to remove the sanctions on Burma through a floor amendment.

It is vital that we each call our Senators and urge them to keep the sanctions on Burma (section 569) in the Foreign Aid Bill.

CALL YOUR SENATORS TOLL-FREE AT [redacted]

1. Ask for the staff person responsible for foreign policy issues.

2. Stress that you want your Senator to support the economic sanctions on Burma contained in Section 569 of the Froeign Aid Bill.

3. Ask your friends, family and co-workers to call too.

MAKE SURE YOU CALL BY 5PM, WEDNESDAY, JULY 9!!

Simon Billenness
Franklin Research & Development
[redacted] x 225
[redacted] fax
[redacted]

SECTION 569 OF THE FOREIGN AID BILL & CURRENT TEXT OF THE "BURMA FREEDOM AND DEMOCRACY ACT" (S.1511).

1. LIMITATION ON FUNDS FOR BURMA
2. Sec. 569. Until such time as the President determines
3. and certifies to the Committees on Appropriations that an
4. elected government of Burma has been allowed to take office,
5. the following sanctions shall be imposed on Burma:
6. (1) No national of the United States shall make
7. any investment in Burma;
8. (2) United States assistance to Burma is prohib-
9. ited;
10. (3) The Secretary of the Treasury shall instruct
11. the United States executive director of each inter-
12. national financial institution to vote against any
13. loan or other utilization of the funds of the respective
14. bank to or for Burma; and
15. (4) Except as required by Treaty obligations,
16. any Burmese national who formulates, implements,
17. or benefits from policies which hinder the transition
18. of Burma to a democratic country shall be ineligible
19. to receive a visa and shall be exclude from admission
20. to the United States.

DON'T DELAY! CALL TODAY!

[redacted]

↑ Index

224. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Private List/Public Space
Tue 9 Jul 1996

James (and Loss et al.),

I guess we should simply acknowledge that the list is as public as potential citationers make it. If you give a talk somewhere, does every scholar in the audience need to ask your permission before quoting/citing you? Of course not. But a reader will understand the level of formality of the discourse, and perhaps thereby its seriousness, when the reader finds out that this was a talk you were giving and not, say, a paper published in a button down refereed journal or whatever.

burt

↑ Index

225. Kevin Killian
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

At 6:41 PM 7/10/96, wystan wrote:
>Dear Dodie,
> I am sorry Charles is saying those things about you. (said in >a personal, feeling, tone of voice) But seriously, Ms. Bellamy despite >the fact unlike Mr. Alexander I don't know you at all, your motives >seem clear and above board to me.

Wystan,

I'm fine with Charles.

> I observe some kind of comprehensive confusion about 'the personal' developing here. What's to be done?

I think the line between the personal and non-personal is always messy--and I wouldn't want it any other way. I think I, at least, should move on to new topics. If I'm getting tired of this one, I can only imagine what the poor lurkers are going through.

Dodie

↑ Index

226. wystan
Re: List wars
Tue 9 Jul 1996

Dear David, The matter with reading poetry for sociological reasons is the kind of closure it applies to response/interpretation. Of course, if culture=the real, then there's no validity to my objection, but I don't happen to think it is. For you sociology subsumes poetics, for me poetics subsumes sociology. But I agree with you, if there are lots of people on the list who find sociology nauseating and don't say why, then we should get a discussion going. So I've offered two, or is it one? reason. Can we have some more? Does anyone recall the text of the Bruce Nauman piece at the last DOCUMENTA which begins: Anthropology, sociology ....?? Wystan

↑ Index

227. Dean Taciuch
(no subject)
Tue 9 Jul 1996

On Tue, 9 Jul 1996, Kathrine Varnes wrote:

> As far as I'm concerned, a good performance is a good interpretation, or > at least an interesting one. (The reverse is also true.)
. . .
> what kills poetry for me (which is often what happens when > actors are reading) is when the reader has already decided what the > perfect reading is and tries to create it -- some static idea -- instead > of actively interpreting while reading. Better to be imperfect and lean > on the words.
>
> Kathrine Varnes
>

OK, but how to offer an interpretation without having an interpretation in mind? This is a serious question..I wonder this myself when reading--do I try to express an ambiguous line break verbally (and how?) or do I collapse the distinction, choose a reading, and present that?

I think the key is "static"--the performance should not be a single thing, or at least not the same single thing to everyone.

Also, I don't mean to knock actors/acting. It certainly is possible for an actor to give a good reading of a poem, just as it is obviously possible for a poet to give a bad reading.

Dean Taciuch

↑ Index

228. Michelle Roberts
Re: List, person, ship
Tue 9 Jul 1996

As regards Herb's post on "lurker vermin:" Dude, I do seriously hope you were kidding. Your system would require a life lived on line what with the pace of discussion on this list. Some of us "vermin" are sincerely listening, not ripping y'all's posts to use in our papers or poems, not interested in damaging a valuable source of expansion for our our own sad little minds -- and some of us are busy! I regret that you feel that way, but your democracy sounds facsist, a little to Texas Christian Coalition uspurps the REpublican party for me. But thanks for the in-put, we son't mean to bug you.

Meaghan Roberts-Jones Candidate - Humanities-Lit.&Ideas of Texas at Dallas

Our exchanges? An engendering Ph.D. through rare and always The University infinte fortune. [redacted] -- L. Irigaray

↑ Index

229. Carnography
Re: poetry parfornir
Tue 9 Jul 1996

David Baratier typed:

> The tension between the academic and the street (or spoken word) poets have created the coffee-house lameness in most cities I've lived in. The problem is two-fold: many academics believe that poetry worth reading is to be institutionalized and therefore works outside of this sphere are improperly crafted or have a lower unit value, while many of the street poets believe that reading other's poems or revising their own are both unecessary aspects of the craft.

I cite this paragraph baldly because it is breathtakingly apt. This is one of the deepest, most problematic schisms in NYC's poetic mileau. It is also why brilliant autodidacts fall through the cracks--only to be discovered generations later.

Nice one (as the singer in Speedway says).

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

230. Michelle Roberts
Re: herb levy's scum
Tue 9 Jul 1996

(blush) see what happens when the unitiated go blabbing? Excuse me, Herb -- you were kidding. Cool. Very funny, might have enjoyed the post, shucks.

Meaghan Roberts-Jones Candidate - Humanities-Lit.&Ideas of Texas at Dallas

Our exchanges? An engendering Ph.D. through rare and always The University infinte fortune. [redacted] -- L. Irigaray

↑ Index

231. Carnography
Re: maria--/& performance
Tue 9 Jul 1996

emily writes:

> I've been > studying race and representation for years, & the more I study, the less

> Mostly I got worried & a little nauseated at the > prospect of a predominantly-white-membered list discussing "race & erotics"
> esp. in the assertive and "I know what I'm talking about" voice

I can understand your frustration. But:

The best way to involve more women and people of color in this group is to invite them here, don't you think? Why slam others for being white or male, why transfer the abuse from patriarch to matriarch, why pass racism back and forth, like any dysfunctional family? Let's involve more voices, let's encourage more people to speak. But let's not show disrespect for the voices that have spoken.

I'm not being contentious or smug. What I'm saying is difficult, not easy. It would be easy to agree with you and to rail at the villain I resemble. Yet I can't do that, because the supposition makes me ethically *un*easy.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

232. Rod Smith
Re: amusing and depressing
Wed 10 Jul 1996

J--
Who's in that lesser known NY poets anth. I've heared tell of its existence.
Howe bout a quick contents.

"war is other people"

--rrpfet

↑ Index

233. wystan
Re: Orono papers & other authors
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Dear Charles,

Was that a goof-on-purpose, or an honest-to-goodness-goof?

Wystan

↑ Index

234. wystan
Re: List wars
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Dear Dodie, I am sorry Charles is saying those things about you. (said in a personal, feeling, tone of voice) But seriously, Ms. Bellamy despite the fact unlike Mr. Alexander I don't know you at all, your motives seem clear and above board to me.

I observe some kind of comprehensive confusion about 'the personal' developing here. What's to be done?

Wystan.

↑ Index

235. Thomas Bell
Re: Listpersonship
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

can i stay if i promise to close my ears?

tom

↑ Index

236. Andrew John Miller
Value Judgments and Sociology (was Re: List wars)
Wed 10 Jul 1996

David Kellog wrote (among many other things):

> From the posts of those critics who are on this list, it seems to > me that the world (or at least the Net) is filled with people > yakking about why such-and-such a poet is good, and another is bad.
> The last thing I want or need is another tastemaker. Save that, > as Foucault might say, for the police. [...] A "pure" poetics > outside of sociology doesn't exist, and if it did I wouldn't want > it.
>

David:

I agree with the general tenor of your remarks. Poetic value is contingent and contextual; it is circulated and produced under conditions that are mediated by forces of the sort that we have been taught to describe as social, economic, and/or cultural. I strongly disagree, however, with your contention that an entity called "sociology" forms an essential and necessary part of our understanding of poetry and poetics.

Sociology is an academic discipline, one that has its own rules, traditions, procedures, and sacred texts. Like most academic disciplines, it is marked by a broad array of disagreements over its basic aims and methods; even the question of what does or does not qualify as "social" remains open to considerable debate. Those of us who define ourselves as literary critics and scholars can derive considerable benefit from reading the work of sociologists; we can even, much of the time, make effective use of that work. So long, however, as we continue to define ourselves--institutionally, professionally, and/or personally--as literary critics and scholars, we will be doing something that is not "sociology" in any precise or specific sense. We will find ourselves compelled, moreover, to deal with rules, traditions, procedures, and sacred texts that are profoundly different from those favored by sociologists. Of course, we can attempt to persuade our colleagues to think more like sociologists--an enterprise in which you, among others, have enjoyed at least some degree of success. I believe, however, that it would be a serious mistake to proceed as if sociology somehow provided us with a higher level discourse by means of which we could loftily point out the errors of those (supposedly) primitive and unenlightened colleagues who continue to approach literature in other ways.

While I'm at it, I might as well confess that I see nothing wrong with the production of value judgments, poetic or otherwise, provided that those judgments are forthrightly presented as judgments and are not cloaked in the aura of some pseudo-objective theory of poetics, society, history, etc. For me, one of the most helpful things about this list has been the opportunity to hear intelligent and informed people describe their poetic likes and dislikes. I personally feel that, if anything, there has not been enough of this sort of discussion. I greatly appreciate it when friends share with me their value judgments about wines, restaurants, movies, music, and cars. Why should poetry be any different?

--Andrew John Miller
Department of English
Duke University
Durham NC 27701

↑ Index

237. Rod Smith
trolling for newbies
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Ochre yo to obtain "exactitude" a substituted herb splash he devoted to from childhood atmospherization

I like it vertical to infinity

Sokal's a landscapism of the Cubist
overleaf

drop your right ear in fault tone

imp carnivore
of the mechanical ample in us by us

analogues

↑ Index

238. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: in which will be found what is set forth therein
Wed 10 Jul 1996

-- thanks for identifying Ben Friedlander as the author of that wonderful liner about the quickenbing sands of O'Hara's poems -- should have been IDed in my post, but I didn't have a tape of that session!

--Bob, I have an address for Lorenzo somewhere in my apartment -- backchannel me next chance you get & I will try to find it in the meantime --

--Loss -- want some pages on Lorenzo Thomas for that set of author pages? can excerpt from forthcoming book if you want --

--DOOR PRIZE -- I will send a book (NOT by me!) to the first person who identifies the author of these lines:

To a Captious Critic

Dear critic, who my lightness so deplores,
Would I might study to be prince of bores,
Right wisely would I rule that dull estate--
But, sir, I may not, till you abdicate.

--Mangled quote of the week --

I don't have the book with me, but here is an approximation of a poem by Dudley Randall:

Black Poet / White Critic

A critic advised me to use images that appeal to the universal,
like a white unicorn.

A white unicorn?

--Hank: whenever you feel you have the time, I'd be interested in hearing more of your take on "American Journal" -- That's a poem I've never been able to enjoy, and I'd like to hear from somebody who has worked with it more than I have -- I talked with Hayden any number of times about the poem, but it seemed a stretch to me -- I always thought it was the occasional poem he felt he had to write as Poetry Consultant -- but I suspect there's more to it than that --

↑ Index

239. Marjorie Perloff
Re: List Wars
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Thanks, Hank, for that marvelous posting: I really learned a lot and you really make me want to read more Hayden. Daniel Bouchard asked me a few questions I want to answer. "In our midst" meant literally there at Orono, at the conference. The fact that Lorenzo is black (and also Hispanic as someone else has reminded me) is important insofar as at this particular conference there was much interest (naturally, given the time) in questions of race. More, interestingly, than in gender at this point. So--this being the big topic of discussion and of the argument between Aldon and Bob von H, I just meant that I was surprised no one was even discussing Lorenzo's own poetry or even his talk but was busy determining how to judge Langston Hughes. I said it badly, but anyway... As for David Kellogg's point that Marjorie is assuming that one can separate the wheat from the chaff, an idea David rejects out of hand, I want to say I plead guilty. Absolutely. If criticism doesn't at least in part do that, what are we writing for? Moreover, David, you too separate the wheat from the chaff. Everyone does everyone he/she makes a choice as to what to read, what to teach, what to write about. Right now I'm rereading MAN WITHOUT QUALITIES, for me one of the great novels-ever. It's very long. In the amount of time it takes to read Musil, I could read all of Robert Hayden or, for that matter, Robert Frost, to whom Hank compares Hayden. So whom to pick? David, don't you think some critical methodologies are better than others? Isn't that separating the wheat from the chaff? Why don't you base your critical writing on F. R. Leavis? Or on Arthur Quiller-Couch? Don't you believe certain articles you read in scholarly journals are better than others? Why, then, can't we, heaven forbid, think some poets are better than ours? Why is there so much discussion of O'Hara (or Baraka) on this list and so little of Mark Strand? No value judgements involved?

The question, I think, is not whether or not we make value judgments--because all of us do--but what we do with them? I agree with the people who wrote in "What's wrong with sociological criteria?" Nothing at all, as long as you know they're your criteria. But since no one can read everything, we all make choices. So I was amused when Hank said Robert Hayden was good in the way Robert Frost is good. In all my years of teaching modern poetry, I've never yet taught Robert Frost. If I have 10 weeks (a quarter at Stanford) or even 15 (a semester), there are just poets I'd rather be teaching and I figure Frost gets taught enough anyway. That doesn't mean my criteria should be yours. But I'm just trying to say that if someone is going to convince me that X is worth a lot of discussion, I want to know why. Aldon, who's a good friend, has gone a long way in alerting me to African-American poets he feels are especially interesting and he makes a case for those poets--but not just for any poet who happens to be black. In fact, he's down on quite a few of the above. Wheat from the chaff, why not??? No hard and fast binary divisions of course. But how do you make actual practical choices??

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

240. Tom Malone
A Closer Reading
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Date: Tue, 9 Jul 1996 08:42:13 -0700
NOT FROM: Herb Levy <[redacted]>
Subject: List, person, ship

Mr Silliman's proposal does not adequately address the pernicious issue of the Academic slime on this e-mail list.

Requiring a single, coherent post once per month from each Academic list member would likely result in cutesy, off-topic messages about the Von H. Affair or other irrelevant "me-too" posts ("I'm delivering a paper on The Canon vs. More of the Same." "No way! Me too!!") in ongoing threads. As not enough people have noted, this will result in too much Academic traffic, further allowing the vampiric Academics in our midst to stay on for another month of reading the collected wisdom of others.

To actively combat these Academic vermin, we must NOT require full participation by all list members in every current thread. After all, is it really too much to ask that Academic members refrain from participating in the activities of the group.

To achieve the goal of total Non-Academic participation, we would have to move quickly toward the more reasonable requirement that all Academic members respond within one hour to each post to the list (including their own) with a closely reasoned 250-500 word statement outlining the many ways univerities perpetuate socio-economic distinctions of class. To make it easier to follow the incoherent discourse that would likely result under this new system, each Academic member would also have to provide a shorter abstract of their denials.

This simple change in policy would most certainly cut down on the number of Academic scum on poetics list and we would soon arrive at the kind of total and immediate Revolution that one usually sees in only a few of the more progressive-thinking Usenet newsgroups.

Tom Malone
[redacted]

As an aside: At the very least it is a misguided notion to say the poetics list is private. ANYONE can (and do) read, download, and forward posts from the p-list archive at the Poetics Website.

↑ Index

241. Daniel Salmon
Re: List, person, ship
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13a 13b 13c 14 15

At 08:42 AM 9/07/96 -0700, you wrote:

>To start with, we could allow brief (less than a hundred words) responses >to be made within forty-eight hours of the intiation of any new topic.
>
>However, to achieve the goal of total active participation, we would have >to move quickly toward the more reasonable requirement that all list >members respond within one hour to each post to the list (including their >own) with a closely reasoned 250-500 word statement. To make it easier to >follow the advanced discourse that would likely result under this new >system, each list member would also have to provide a shorter abstract of >their arguments.
>
>This simple change in policy would most certainly cut down on the number of >non-participating lurker scum on poetics list and we would soon arrive at >the kind of total and immediate participatory democracy that one usually >sees in only a few of the more progressive-thinking Usenet newsgroups.

>
>
>Herb Levy
>[redacted]
>
>
Daniel Salmon

↑ Index

242. Schuchat
Cult of poetry in China
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---------- Forwarded message --------

Since Ron asks, here follows some precis and quotes from the Michelle Yeh article in THE JOURNAL OF ASIAN STUDIES which I had mentioned in an earlier post. My apologies for the length of this post, (its hard to do justice to a 30 page essay in an email) and also for my numerous typos, spelling errors and transcription errors. I hope it is of interest.

The article deals with the "avant garde/experimental" poetry scene in post-Mao China, which is unofficial though not necessarily "illegal."

"By 'cult of poetry' I am referring to the phenonemon and the concomitant discourse in the 1980s and 1990s that bestows poetry with religious significance and cultivates the image of the poet as the high priest of poetry. The word cult has no exact equivalent in Chinese and is used here as an approximate tanslation for 'worship' or chongbai with strong religious connotations. The 'cult of poetry' thus denotes a religious poetics that is based on the worship of poetry and that inspires a religious-like devotion among poets."

The late 80s/90s generation of experimental Chinese poets, according to Yeh, are alienated both from the traditional Communist orthodoxy and also from the rising commodity/westernizing/pop culture environment around them. Both of these options do not particularly value the poet or poetry:

"Most of the avant-garde poets who choose to continue to write, however, tend to be in the lower echelon of the current economic structure, holding low-paying state-assigned jobs or no jobs at all."

A quote from poem by Zhou Lunyou, "A cofounder and editor of the long-running Sichuan-based poetry journal Feifei, Zhou spent seven months in a prison in Xichang before he wassentenced to three years in a labor reform camp on Mount Emei for "counter-revolutionary incitement":

To prove through my writing: to be alive is important
What is food? What is Sarte?
The blows of commodities are more gentle, more direct than violence,
More cruel too, pushing the spirit toward total collapse."

"The image of the poet as someone who chooses a lfe of wandering and poverty in order to follow the sacred calling of art, who rejects the dehumanizing system and vulgar society with courage and defiance, finds a vivid expression in the folllwong description of the poet Hei Dachun (b. 1960). Nicknamed "the Drunkard of Yuanmingyuan," Hei is a central figure in a group of poets, artists and rock-and-roll singers who live a bohemian life near the ruins of the leisure palace from China's last dynasty: 'Much of his food and clothes are gifts from his friends. Seeing his religious spirit of dedication, his friends feel that they should do something for art. The worship of art and the eternal need of humans for art makes him believe firmly in the art of poetry which he engages in. He will not waste his energy and life on things he dislikes just in order to lead a normal life; therefore, he does not work, does not bow to the leadership, does not sell his life which belongs to art. He'd rather drift about, embrace death.'"

Yeh discusses several highly-publicized suicides among avant garde Chinese poets, including Gu Cheng, who hung himself after murdering his wife. She notes that "many reminiscenes and memorial essaysd that appeared after the tragedy held a rather understanding, if not forgiving, attitude toward Gu. Referring almost always to his precious poetic talent and occassionally also to his previous attempts at suicide...they tend to see in his a romantic genius beyond the laws of this world, who consequently perhaps should not be judged in accordance with the "normal" criteria of right and wrong."

Discussing the current Chinese avant gardes self-admitted forebears, after several Chinese poets including the early 20th century modernist Zhu Xiang, the pre-Han Qu Yuan and Tang dynasty's Li Bai (Li Po), she notes that "some of the most frequently mentioned names in the poetry and prose discussions are" Holderin, Rilke, Borges, Tsvetayeya, Mandelstam, Rimbaud, Plath, Pasternak, Brodsky, Celan, Keats, Shelley and Dante.....what the majority of the poets on the above list have in common is personal tragedy."

"Perhaps a ready-made explanation for the 'cult of poetry' is this: it is a response of poets to the spiritual vacumn in the wake of the Cultural Revolution in the post-Mao era. In view of the destruction of traditional Chinese values and mores, coupled with the widespread disaffection amontg the intellectuals with the Communist party in the post-Mao era, it is understandable how poets seek to redefine themselves beyond the pale of official ideology. The "cult of poetry' represents a search for an alternative value system, a new identity of the self in contradistinction from, and in defiance of, that dictated by the Party."

"When the poet is held as more important than the poetry, death -- especially self-imposed death--becomes the ultimate poem, the poem to end all poems."

"Whatis porobably most problematic about the overwhelming interest in the poet rather than the poetry is its ambivalent relation to the mentality underlying the culture of an earlier era -- the personality cult of Mao. ...The deification of poetry and the canonization of the poet reveal an absolutist, Utopian frame of mind that at least implicitly excludes other approaches to poetry both in theory and practice. Are alienation and the sense of crisis the necessary driving force behind the creation of poetry? Why is the poetry that emphasizes suffering and sacrifice regarded nobler or better than the poetry that does not? Why does the poet have to be perceived in heroic terms?"

"Throughout the dsicussion thus far I have used male personal pronouns whenever I refer to Chinese avant-garde poets as a group. Rather than committing a sexist oversight, I mean to make a point about another significant aspect of the discourse of the "cult" ....few women poets can be found actively participating or involved in the discourse [ofthe cult of poetry]. It is true that a number of women poets have achieved a national, even international reputation in post-Mao China, most notably Shu Ting and Wang Xiaoni in the early 1980s and Zhai Yongming and Lu Yimin since the mid-1980s. However, none of them have played a significant role in the discourse of the cult..."

"In the final analysis, the ;cult of poetry' in post-mao China is a paradox. It advocates creative freedom and individuality, however, in elevating poetry to the status of a supreme religion, it imposes arbitrary limits on poetry. It defies the official ideology, yet is unable to escape entirely the absolutist, Utopian mentality in its worship of the poet and deification of poetry. It resists and detests consumerism, yet it is by no means immune from itself becoming a commodity. When it is perceived by the outside world as "dissent literature" in a totalitarian regime, Chinese avant-garde poetry can easily be turned -- or some may say, has already been turned -- into a commodity in the international (especially Western) cultural market. These contradictions and pitfalls--artistic, ideological and economic--point to the intrinsic limitations of the "cult of poetry," and we can already see "anti-cult" reactions coming from various perspectives in recent years..."

* again, my apologies for lacunae etc. It is not easy to do justice to a 30 page essay in this post, especially one that presupposes some knowledge of recent Chinese history and literature. Anyway, I hope the above quotes are interesting, and of course, following up with the article itself from the Journalof Asian STudies will give a better sense than my excerpts.

Ta ta

↑ Index

243. henry gould
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

On Tue, 9 Jul 1996 14:07:31 -0400 Rod Smith said:
>This is the Contents and Introduction for the forthcoming anthology _Onward:
>Contemporary Poetry and Poetics_ ed. Peter Baker, Peter Lang Pub., $28 pb, >440 pgs. due out Sept '96. Peter is off line traveling and asked me to send >it to the listwar. "The Rejection of Closure" is a revised and extended >version.

Peter Baker's preview of the new anthology is interesting - is it just me, or is there really a kind of response in his intro to some list discussions (am I being too "immanentist"?). PB draws up a new genealogy specifically contrasting Pound (the immanentist) with Zukofsky (the nominalist) and lining up contemporary & language poets with Zukofsky. This is not really new but it seems to take things from both the dreaded Blasing discussion from months back & the Peirce harangue from weeks back, & turn them on their heads. (Ie. the language poets, contra Blasing's pantheon, are the true purveyors of the split between assumed reality & the word - in terms of Scholasticism!) Here's what sounds familiar to me:

> Belief in an implicit poetics can be seen to derive from an immanentist theory of language, or the idea that words bear direct relation to what they represent, even carrying a little bit of the essence of the thing in the word. Such immanentist theories deriving from the religious tradition ("and the word was with God and the word was God") drove William of Occam, in the twelfth century, to propose the complete separation of word and referent, in his philosophy of nominalism. Jacques Derrida is often thought to represent such a nominalist viewpoint in his philosophy of deconstruction (see my Deconstruction and the Ethical Turn). Ezra Pound's language theory is explicitly immanentist, as when he instructs his Italian translator of The Cantos: "Don't worry about the meaning of the poem. Translate accurately line by line. The meaning is inherent in the material." Pound's poetics in The Cantos thus demonstrates what I call (in Obdurate Brilliance) the "myth of transparency," or the ideology of direct apprehension of the surrounding context from the text of the poem. Without worrying too much (right now)

I don't see how the concluding few sentences above follow logically. Pound's saying the meaning is inherent in the material certainly does not "demonstrate" a belief in language's transparency, though I'd grant that Pound certainly did have a kind of idealist-realist faith in the access of poetry to the real. Pound's statement above, though, that the meaning is inherent in the material, would hold as true for Objectivism as for high modernism. The differences, real or imagined, between the poetics of Pound and those of the anthologized poets perhaps hinge less on their approaches to language than on the status of meaning & belief. Language, as I see it, though changing and evolving, is something of a constant in comparison with the astonishing pressures of ideology, history & the zeitgeist on culture's idea of what is artistically necessary or important. These pressures, of course, influence trends in the philosophy of language (exhibited clearly both in the Scholastics and in the above intro), but poetry operates, hopefully, by digging toward the permanent functions of language, which persist THROUGH the "zeitgeist". - Henry Gould

↑ Index

244. Loss Glazier
Re: Private List/Public Space
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Burt, Yes, true. But some of the great literary archives consist of just these sorts of notes (and letters) that some kind soul just happened to save... Loss

At 05:54 PM 7/9/96 EST, you wrote:
>Loss,
>
>yes, but how often do one's notes tacked onto a bulletin board get >taken down and shipped off to some archive; archiving (electronic or >otherwise) seems to legitimize the mere missives, no? And then they >get quoted perhaps, and so on.
>
>Burt
>
>

↑ Index

245. Loss Glazier
Re: Orono papers & other authors
Wed 10 Jul 1996

At 03:02 PM 7/9/96 -0500, you wrote:
>loss --if our papers are being published somewhere, what are the print-copyright >politics of sending them also to you; wd it be seen as undercutting the >print-publisher's market? i don't wanna do anything "wrong."--md

Maria, If a piece will be published in print, it's courteous to ask the publisher if it's ok if it's also available online. Some publishers are barbaric enough to think of online space as a threat. (Of course, if the online paper is a different version somehow, it makes it less of a threat!)* If the publishers says no then maybe they'd let the piece go online say six months after serial publication in print (tho not as timely, this might also work). I know people have valid reasons to prefer print publication, but if making the ideas public is what writing is about, there are few (maybe no?) journals that can circulate so widely. I know from handling the mail here that these pieces are getting read. (Also the statistics reinforce this.) (Studies I've seen actually show that online versions actually help sales of print publications.) But I think also of pedagogical uses. How many libraries don't have subscriptions to most magazines I adore - and will students or others be willing to use ILL (interlibrary loan) if it is even available via ILL, etc. etc. I have people request permission to use EPC materials for courses and I always say OK enthusiastically! But I do of course understand that sometimes people just can't make their work available. Best, Loss ---------- *In this case you might think of how your paper would be without certain constraints. It can be longer. With some knowlege of html, you can have color graphics/ illustrations, etc.)

↑ Index

246. Michael Coffey

Re: Irby Matters -Reply

Wed 10 Jul 1996

More on the availability of Ken Irby's work; last week Ron Silliman enthusiastically parsed a section for Irby's Orexis, listfolk may recall.

Kenneth Irby, CALL STEPS: PLAINS, CAMPS, STATIONS, CONSISTORIES, 154 pgs,
$12.95, ISBN 0-88268-090-0, Station Hill Press, in association with Tansy
Press, Distributed to the trade by The Talman Company, but available from Small Press Distribution and other wholesalers. Direct from Station Hill, Barrytown, NY 12507, $3.00 shipping & handling. (This volume contains all of the long-poem Orexis)

OREXIS is still available for $10, ISBN 0-9930794-17-6. Same as above (minus the Tansy association).

↑ Index

247. Gwyn McVay
Re: Orono papers & other authors
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Related to which--

The National Museum of Women in the Arts is currently devoting a whole floor to an exhibit of 20th-century women artists, including Theresa Hak Kyung Cha, whose "Passages/Paysages" is installed, and a new column/yarn setup by Cecilia Vicu~na that is deeply moving to look at. The catalogue, pleasantly enough, is well-researched, highly informative, and chocked with bibliographical refs, so if you're going to be in DC, hit 12th and New York, and go there, and see the concurrent artists' books exhibit there too.

Gwyn

↑ Index

248. Nada Gordon
poetry performance
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Since readings are embodied voicings,
I'm happy to see readers who remember their bodies
instead of keeping most of their ki upwards of their necks

I also like to notice eye contact and verbal contact with the audience, comprehension (grokking?) checking even a page poem can live without a gloss but a read poem doesn't need to

When I read here it's true I have to rely on all kinds of gimmicks -- the only real venue is a faux-British pub of mostly non-poets -- but I find if I crawl on the floor, sing acappella and gaze into people's eyes I can read the subtle stuff once I get the audience's attention

It's a far cry from the well-lit gallery spaces of my salad days, full of folding chairs and captive fellow-writers, yet there's a feeling of challenge here, albeit hoop-jumping

Tokyo is having a typhoon now after three days of solid rain. And how are you?

↑ Index

249. Nada Gordon
Re: Listpersonship
Wed 10 Jul 1996

'twas the voice of the flea, I heard it declare. . .

While it may be true I use this list as a kind of highbrow entertainment, it keeps me away from the quiz shows and samurai dramas

--nada

↑ Index

250. maria damon
Re: List wars
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

db rites: I think I, at least, should move on to > new topics. If I'm getting tired of this one, I can only imagine what > the poor lurkers are going through.
>

hear hear.
md

↑ Index

251. Joe Amato
Re: the guy and the gulf war
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

e, yr point about victimhood well-taken... it can be an aesthetic dilemma if one is simply exhibiting pain... how to get around, or better, through this?...

for one, i think what's necessary, and this pace dodie's hammering on the white middleclass, is to pull apart some of these categories we rely on... already there's humor on this list to suggest intervention in the seeming rift between academic/non-academic... there may be more overlap here than is customarily (publicly) allowed (in fact i'm sure there is)... and though half the income-earners in this country are below $21k, you're called "middleclass" at $30k, and you're called "middleclass" at $70k... you're called middleclass if you own a four bedroom house, and you're called middleclass if you rent a one bedroom apartment... you're called middleclass if you're going to inherit property, and you're called middleclass if you have no inheritance...

lotsa room here to debate about what "middleclass" means... one thing it does not mean is that there's no grief or urgency or despair in this so-defined group... class is shifty, b/c one can shift in and out of different class structures... but speaking personally, my memories remain intact, thank you... in any case, the point would be not to negate or trivialize experience w/o first (somehow) coming to terms with what that experience is... i can feel more for the poverty-stricken than for the wealthy, sure, but this at the level of economic circumstance... and b/c of who i am i might relate a lot more to the former (and sometimes err accordingly)... but as an artist/poet, part of what i'm about is not mistaking the truth of my experience for the truth of my art (however i construe both sorts of truth)...

i wouldn't want, for example, to fall into that (current) marxist trap of arguing against any discourse that isn't specifically needs-based, on the grounds that non-needs-based discourse (if we could identify such a beast) does not address global-economic realities or some such (and regarding which rob wilson's cherub is a downright illuminating construction)... also, i'm reminded of a line from a zappa tune, where he sez something like "yknow something people? i'm not black but there's a whole lotta times i wish i weren't white, either"... yeah, 'sixties liberal white guy,' but at least i hear in this an inkling of an attempt (in a pop-cultural space) to confront one's own advantage (if not quite privilege)---social/ontological issues relating to skin color---from the inside... it's important to examine racial discourse from the point of view of the other, but i'll still hold to the value of addressing, each of us, our own position and status in our institutional systems---and yeah, as a matter of fact, our own complicity, without getting whiny about it... and i don't find that it helps much to constantly defer to real anguish on another part of the planet (though i'm all for recognizing real anguish on other parts of the planet)...

there's always enough grief to go around... mebbe, to create meaningful art that attends to our grief, mebbe we need to attend to the ways we tend to categorize social experience???...

best,

joe

↑ Index

252. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

William of Ockham in the 12th century!?! Not by a long shot. COMPLETE separation of word and object--hardly, and anyway this is a terrible over-simplification, and I suspect this kind of sloppiness informs the the Pound-Zuk split. Anyway, this is a big discussion and as many of us know a long ongoing one, i guess. I do like what I see when I read about "the status of meaning and belief" and, yes, NOW one can return to Ockham for some help.

Pardon this perhaps non-sequiturial and willy-nilly grouchiness.

Burt

↑ Index

253. maria damon
Re: List wars
Wed 10 Jul 1996

In message <v01520d00ae07ff2f56d8@[205.134.228.78]> UB Poetics discussion group
writes:
> Maria, you criticized a population I was a member of--the people on this > list. I was defending that population.
>
> Dodie

It was not my intention to criticize a population of which i've been a very happy, active part. I'm sorry for any distress I might have caused you or any other individuals who felt as you did. in my view, inspired by rob wilson's "covering cherub" posts (sorry if i'm quoting you out of context, rob, but this is what i got from it), i made some observations about what seemed to me the difficulty of discussing certain issues --primarily race -- on the list, and as emily helped me to see, this is a difficult medium for volatile topics, in part because the possibilities of misunderstanding are so high, as the recent herb-levy-lurker flurry instanciated. i most emphatically was not, as others have also pointed out, setting out to be an arbiter of pc-ness or list content. i was not invoking any "shoulds," nor do i see myself as any kind of "expert" on the topics i was calling attention to. this is the only list i'm on, and perhaps it's unrealistic to think it can address all my intellectual community needs; on the other hand, my larger project has to do precisely with bringing cultural studies and poetry/poetics to bear on each other, and i'd like to feel that i can explore this perspective on this list, rather than having to compartmentalize (as the academy does) my intellectual life. md

↑ Index

254. Shaunanne Tangney
Re: Cult of poetry in China
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

m/m schuchat--

i seem to have missed your earlier post--could you please send me the issue/date of the journal of aisan studies to which you refer in yr post?
i am v. interested in chinese poetry--
thanks,
shaunanne

↑ Index

255. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Lorenzo Thomas
Wed 10 Jul 1996

I owe Bob Harrison an apology. He's the one who alerted the list to the fact that Thomas is Hispanic (Panamian-American) as well as black. I referred to Harrison as "someone"--inexcusable but it happens sometimes when the list gets as long as it got last night and when it comes as a listserv and when it's midnight...

But herewith apologies to Bob!

Marjorie

↑ Index

256. Rod Smith
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

HG wrote:
>but poetry operates, hopefully, by digging toward the permanent >functions of language, which persist THROUGH the "zeitgeist".

Henry, what does this mean? I see raising questions re Peter's distinctions, but this seems even less explanatory-- a kind of social-constructivist mysticism. "Permanent functions of language"? What are we talking some kinda deep structure metaphor? Seems we don't have a handle on these issues, which leads many toward religiosity & others toward skepticism. I tend to prefer eastern ideas, which, I think, rest in an acceptance of immanent transparencies-- to torque the classification a bit. Rather than talking about Pound/Zuk perhaps Peter should have talked about Pound/Wittgenstein.

The "meaning & belief" question reminds me of Carla Harryman's "Both belief and denial throw existence into question." Perhaps the "schism," if there is one, is at the level of practice-- between those that are self-reflexive (Wittgenstein) & those that aren't. One cld talk about Olson's "from where the poet got it over to the audience" (sic)-- someone taking what I would call an eastern or Wittgensteinian approach wldn't trust that sort of formulation, however many APR folks seem to see meaning operating in just that way, i.e. as a package to be delivered.

Rod

↑ Index

257. Henry Gould

Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics

Wed 10 Jul 1996

On Wed, 10 Jul 1996 12:40:30 -0400 Rod Smith said:
>HG wrote:
>>but poetry operates, hopefully, by digging toward the permanent >>functions of language, which persist THROUGH the "zeitgeist".
>
>Henry, what does this mean? I see raising questions re Peter's distinctions, >but this seems even less explanatory-- a kind of social-constructivist >mysticism.

If it's mysticism, it's a kind of aesthetic idol-worship. It's a fascination from a proto-Acmeist carpenter's perspective. What makes something built to last? Why do some artworks still grip us while others seem hackneyed by timebound blinders? It's language talking through the obsessions and neuroses & sleepwalking and timeserving of an era - not denying it, but mastering it & throwing light on it - and in the process gripping us with real experience, on the scent of truth.
>
>The "meaning & belief" question reminds me of Carla Harryman's "Both belief >and denial throw existence into question." Perhaps the "schism," if there is >one, is at the level of practice-- between those that are self-reflexive >(Wittgenstein) & those that aren't. One cld talk about Olson's "from where >the poet got it over to the audience" (sic)-- someone taking what I would >call an eastern or Wittgensteinian approach wldn't trust that sort of >formulation, however many APR folks seem to see meaning operating in just >that way, i.e. as a package to be delivered.

I think we're all roaring with hunger for those very packages, & that's why packaged truth, & poetry, & anthologies, are so winning... What I meant by the "status of meaning & belief" was the idea that the forces shaping a historical era also pressure various groups' energy level & sense of breakthrough - so that Pound's "epic quest" fulfills demands and expectations in a truth-oddyssey at a level or in a way that has dissipated or grown more obscure or latent at a later period (waiting for the next explosion). Later on we invent our genealogies & ascribe organized styles or differentiations.

- Henry Gould

"Classicism is revolution" - O. Mandelstam

↑ Index

258. Rod Smith
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

P.S.-- yes, I know it wasn't that simple for Olson.

↑ Index

259. Jordan Davis
sports and wine
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Why value judgments about poetry are different from consumer judgments about wine, food, cars, etc. Not as easy a question as it seems. How to live. The development of a poetics runs parallel to the life one lives, right? It's like a second allegedly intelligent childhood, you learn things, it's like choosing (Wallace Stevens thought it _was_ choosing.. so he went into business), but with this difference--you meet it. That is, the car one drives, one's consumer profile, is at a remove from this. Which is something like a soul, or a mind. This and that. Sports and wine.

Once more, from the top. A poetics can only be individuated from any other poetics if it can manage to persist in its idiosyncratic diplomacies. These may consist of: willful good nature, perverse sarcasm, topiary artifice, technical foul, cranberry juice, ectopia broadband arsenio fallout, rodeo maser, let's go, pinball. I like pinball, because of its simultaneously centrality and diffuse irrelevance--its harmonization of chance and teleology--I guess they used to call it peripeteia.

Also I like a cuvee from Cain vineyards in california, and I have a Jordan chardonnay in my fridge.

↑ Index

260. Judy Roitman
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

>HG wrote:
>>but poetry operates, hopefully, by digging toward the permanent
>>functions of language, which persist THROUGH the "zeitgeist".
Rod Smith writes of "an eastern or Wittgensteinian approach" to language and semantics.

Could you unpack that a little?

Related to this discussion is a new book, "The Spell of the Sensuous," by David Abram. It's touted as a book on ecology from a phenomenological perspective, but (but?) much of it is rooted in issues of language and also in David's experience as a master sleight-of-hand magician hanging out with shamans in traditional cultures. It's Poundian in more ways than one: the alphabet is seen as distorting perception. Fun to read and I've been looking for an excuse to tell you all about it.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

261. Jordan Davis
past tense mope dream
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Oops! simultaneous.

Also, ain't no prize for persisting in your idiosyncratic diplomacy, either, unless you're a painter and can sell x hundred near-identical instances of said diplomacy, which is actually paint, and not language, and not the same. Except that x thousand years later, people will say, oh yeah, that kind of poetry. Got to be redundant to make it in poetry.

J

↑ Index

262. Rod Smith
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Well, an eastern or Wittgensteinian approach wld be a contextual approach-- an understanding of context as multiply & complexly constitutive. The emphasis being not only on what we can "compute" but also upon acknowledgement that any given context is more complexly constituted than one can apprehend--which is why intuition is such a powerful & real aspect of our experience & also why it is so individualized.

Seems to me both Wittgenstein & aspects of buddhist & taoist thought share a concern with pointing out limits of apprehension & using them. One cld also talk about Duchamp in these terms.

↑ Index

263. Jordan Davis
mis/guide
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

to the extent that we participate in the terms of someone else's debate--the sumerians, the greeks, the cherokees, the democrats--we're what, learning? except that information, poetic information, is located at once in the capitol and the kitchen, we've been lured into 'the zone' and we've been talking, we need these common terms, and that's it, that's all, inscribe it and if you can 'say it without saying it', all the better, all the best, save a lull, pause, take a breath. No stride like the strident, eschew the received phrase, find file, hey. only music is information? J

↑ Index

264. Pritchett,Pat
(no subject)
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Dean raises a good point. I think the way we must finally come to understand "how to read a poem" to an audience is that, for most poets (and most poems), a reading only constitutes 50% (or so, it varies, naturally) of the poem's quiddity (gotta love that word!). For Shaunanne, it would seem to constitute a greater percentage. Any reading is, of course, an interpretation, i.e. it presents a particular profile of the poem at a particular moment. If you go to the same play on two different nights, that play will vary in minute particulars per performance. But it's still the same text. Which implies that the poem itself, silent on the page, occupies some kind of Platonic/Ur-dimension from which it "descends" when invoked/pronounced by the speaker. A dubious notion, perhaps, but intriguing.

As for how to get across ambiguous line breaks: maybe read the same line more than once, each time differently to stress its multiple weights/meanings/emphases...

Patrick Pritchett

From: Dean Taciuch
To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
Date: Tuesday, July 09, 1996 11:39PM

<<File Attachment: HEADERS.TXT>>

On Tue, 9 Jul 1996, Kathrine Varnes wrote:

> As far as I'm concerned, a good performance is a good interpretation, or > at least an interesting one. (The reverse is also true.)
. . .
> what kills poetry for me (which is often what happens when > actors are reading) is when the reader has already decided what the > perfect reading is and tries to create it -- some static idea -- instead > of actively interpreting while reading. Better to be imperfect and lean > on the words.
>
> Kathrine Varnes
>

OK, but how to offer an interpretation without having an interpretation in mind? This is a serious question..I wonder this myself when reading--do I try to express an ambiguous line break verbally (and how?) or do I collapse the distinction, choose a reading, and present that?

I think the key is "static"--the performance should not be a single thing, or at least not the same single thing to everyone.

Also, I don't mean to knock actors/acting. It certainly is possible for an actor to give a good reading of a poem, just as it is obviously possible for a poet to give a bad reading.

Dean Taciuch

↑ Index

265. Burt Kimmelman
peter quartermain
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Peter Quartermain,
I've been trying to email you and have had my mail spit back to me.
could you let me know where you are and how to reach you?

thanks,
burt kimmelman
[redacted]

↑ Index

266. Gabrielle Welford
two film reviews (fwd)
Wed 10 Jul 1996

After the mention of interracial sex, I couldn't resist this forward. gab.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 10 Jul 1996 08:15:34 -1000
From: Julian Samuel <[redacted]>

Two Film Reviews

by

Julian Samuel

Bhaji on the Beach,
A film by Gurinder Chadha, 1994, 100 minutes

reviewed by Julian Samuel

Bhaji on the Beach is an energetic, race-and-sex-relations comedy that is a must see for anyone who thinks that putting these issues-of-the epoch in the mass media is a nice way to deal with the traumas plaguing South Asian women.

Community orientated films are a superb way to dramatize, confront, and to come to terms with interracial sex and pregnancies, and other configurations that are a source of endless trouble for South Asian parents who just can't forget India, Pakistan, Kenya, Uganda etc.

Bhaji follows hot on the heels of but does not go beyond other "Black" British masterpieces such as Hanif Kureshi's My Beautiful Laundrette, The Bhudda of Suburbia; and Isaac Julien's gay landmark, Young Soul Rebels.

Bhaji's plot does not strain the imagination. Here's a part of it: a Southall Black Sisters type South Asian community leader takes an all-ages-all-classes group of South Asian women to Blackpool. In the old days, before we all got to England and improved the English diet it was a white holidaying spot. But UK immigration changed all that.

The insertion of these splendiferously dressed women on the beach include a battered wife who during the trip makes up her mind to leave her husband forever; a teenage couple who, one gets the impression, are sexually involved; a shilvar kamees clad granny who is mechanical scripted in to contrast old-world values with "English" ones. Chastity, obedience to Gods, and a reverent respect for the family bread-winner are up for gentle feminist review. The granny stereotype has to act shocked most of the time. Boring. The biggest shock for her is the pregnancy of one of the young Asian women by her black boyfriend. This dilemma is elegantly solved, as the rest of the group drive back to town, with a tender lingering kiss during a interracial sun-set. Thank god this scene will bother some Asians.

At Blackpool, sexually explorative members of the outing meet English cowboys who work at a hot-dog stand. One of the women gets into a bit of interracial necking, but before anything exciting happens her protective about-to-de-cloak lesbian friend pulls her back into the virginal harem of the Asian community.

The acting is earnest cardboard stereotyping au maximum. No one evolves, everyone stays in the same charactival rut, and the story is as tense as watching Rajiv Gandhi have tea and biscuits at a press conference on the Tibet question. However, it is stereotyping with a huge difference: its brown stereotyping.

Bhaji is more than mundane; check this for excellence: "I just needed you to be there" says the pregnant woman. And there are hundreds of lines like this. But even at that, Bhaji is saved by being more or less a first of its kind, and it does not grind on inexorably. It is ultra light race-sensitive entertainment, for the lily-livered.

Notwithstanding the simplistic editing -- there is not one unpredictable cut -- this film is brilliant even if the South Asian in-jokes will pass over the heads of both white Canadian tribes. British audiences, however, are hip to all this post-colonial modernity, so they will get most of the culturally anchored funnies.

Bhaji is better than most films made in Canada in the last five years. Quebec films don't even come close, and of course, Quebec lives in mortal fear of black actors, artists, intellectuals and directors and therefore does not encourage them. Director Gurinder Chadha is lucky to have generous film funders who take her so very seriously.

Imagine the National Film Board or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation putting bucks into such a film without getting utterly terrorized by the racegender questions. Forget it. Canada will not catch-up, not even by the time Hong Kong slips into Beijing control.

A warning: there are hectares of songs and dances: You can take the Asian out of Asia but you can't take the Bollywood out of the Asian. end Julian Samuel

Bandit Queen directed by Shekhar Kapur

reviewed by Julian Samuel

Bandit Queen is based on the true life story of a peasant woman who established an earth-shattering reputation throughout India for having fought against her oppressors.

Her story is tragic: a forced marriage to someone centuries older than her -- she was about 10 at the time. After a few rapes she escapes her "husband" and, a few years later joins a band of country-side highway men who engage in various nasty activities. She is caught by rival forces and is raped by scores of men. She escapes and the same thing happens: she is caught again, raped, and again takes revenge. Finally, she politicizes the entire Indian country-side and attempts to besiege Delhi capital of the "largest democracy in the world." Well no not exactly: the filmmaker has made an exaggerated and simplistic account of her life.

The real Bandit Queen (Poolan Devi) in fact wanted to stop the distribution of this film because she thought that it did injustice to cause. She is right: The film should have been pulled out of distribution not because it did an injustice but because it is repetitive to the point of making the viewer suicidal and as inelegant as Benazir Bhutto attempting to defuse the civil war now raging in Karachi.

Her narrative is important for those who want to learn about political struggles with the bazaar rituals of Mother India. However, this film is maligantly marred by gun shots in every scene and screechy rape scene after rape scene. You'll only be able to sit through it if you're a masochist or if you've taken sleeping pills with your cholesterol loaded popcorn.

Julian Samuel

↑ Index

267. Robert A Harrison
onward: +
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Thanks for the apology and the acknowledgment, Marjorie.

Glad to see there're a bunch of other threads going on now. Not to hold those up, wanted to send the list a quote and a coupla references. Here's a quote from one of Lorenzo Thomas' recent talks ("... first presented as part of "Revolutionary Poetry: Directions for Further Investigation," the concluding panel of the Poetry Project's 1994 Symposium,....")

from Nothing Slow and Careful About It

"In the past couple of days I think we've heard some very interesting and nice rhetoric: the principle of "continual revolution"; a return to the '60s via a "counterculture." Lots of individualistic and ethnocentric expressions. The Yenan forum revisited. And so on and so forth. What bothers me is that much of what we heard was flawed by unsystematic thinking and I think that might have something to do with the fact that we're poets. Y'know, "We cool like that we write like that we think like that." Anyway, I was suffering from all the cybernetic stuff that I was hearing and I finally came down with something like Dada overload....."

hmm

published in

The World #51
The Poetry Project
St. Mark's in-the-Bowery
131 East 10th St
NYC, NY 10003

Some of Lorenzo's early work is in "None of the Above," Michael Lally's anthology, 1976.

There is also a "comprehensive collection" called "The Bathers." Published in 1981 by

I. Reed Books
isbn #0-918408-18-0

ok. ONWARD!! As the the subject says!

↑ Index

268. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Hey Judy Roitman and anyone else interested in poetry/lang phil/ecology: Abram's book sounds like territory covered by my colleague David Rothenberg's new journal Terra Nova; maybe someone would want to review "The Smell of the Sensuous" for it. David can be reached at [redacted].

burt

↑ Index

269. maria damon
Re: Value Judgments and Sociology (was Re: List wars)
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

andrew miller wwrites a longish post on sociology that you've all seen;

andrew: i agree with you that the category "sociology" is a scientistic, academic discipline and an ugly rubric under which to classify something as broad as, say, "attention to social, biographical, historical context." i think it's crucial not to, to use the language of one of the New Zealanders (tony green? wystan?i've deleted the actual post, so can't quote specifically, sorry) said, "subsume" "poetics" into/under "sociology" or vice versa --this is why a project that would treat text and its surrounding environment as one continuous --"ecological" system as it were --is dear to my heart. in order to talk to people in my world, that is, the academy, i use the terms "poetics" and "cultural studies", which shouldn't, but are, segregated and seen as mutually inhospitable terrains of inquiry. i was thrilled to see, in the papers at Orono, the degree to which this kind of treatment is becoming acceptable and even respected, though there is still, in most cases, a leaning toward one or the other poles of the false binary.

↑ Index

270. maria damon
Re: Value Judgments and Sociology (was Re: List wars)
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

ps to my post to andrew miller --and david kellogg, indirectly -- on "sociology": i also like it when a "critical" text aspires to or achieves the poetic. that's why i come back again and again to walter benjamin; not just cuz he's one of the current gods of cult studs, but because he language and insights are so inspired, so...well, poetic. no one could call his essay on some motifs in Baudelaire "mere" sociology, though it has a strong component of social concern and sociological observation. to me this is a kind of "texte ideal." (it teaches great with o'hara's lunch poems, btw). susan stewart, who is "also" a poet, is another writer/"critic" whose essays embody a lovely poesis of their own. others, y'all? rachel bdp's talk at orono was in that realm. bests, maria d

↑ Index

271. Mark Wallace
e-mail politics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Of course, since this poetics list involves more than one person, it will be by definition "political"--that is, not only will different people be on it for different reasons, but it's also quite possible that those reasons will conflict, and that everybody here will not get along. Many of us have different senses of what this poetics e-mail "virtual community" should be--and indeed the word "community" is wholly inadequate for the complexity of the environment itself. Perhaps "network" would be better--although that implies something perhaps less intimate than e-mail often is (and, among many other characteristics, I think poetics e-mail does have an odd intimacy). Still, we don't all "get along" here, and there are instances when we shouldn't get along.

It's interesting, for instance, that it might be easy to assume on this list that people who primarily write poetry and people who primarily write poetry criticism would get along--after all, it's theoretically simple, at this point, to undermine any notion of the distinction as absolute, i.e. each poem has a critical element, and (perhaps, but I'm not convinced) each piece of criticism has some poetic element. So one might think that the historical relation between poets and critics, often antagonistic, would not be antagonistic here. But is that really the case. While I agree with the person (help with names here please, I'm getting so many messages) who said he's bored by "tastemakers," or by people who dislike all poetry criticism by definitio, on the other hand it's true that the cultural and institutional situations of poetry and poetry criticism are NOT THE SAME, and in fact those differences can and do lead to conflict. So what? Some level of conflict is good for discussion--I applaud your (whoever) right to disagree with me. On the other hand, if I think your wrong I'm going to say so.

All that fairness aside, though, I find myself inevitably siding with poetry and poets, even as I know that poetry criticism is unavoidable (and I right enough of it myself, even). So I sympathize with Dodie Bellamy's recent frustration about this list. Here's what I'm wondering--is this list equally divided between poets and poetry critics? Does one group do more posting than another, and what does that say about the POLITICAL dynamic of this list? I have some sympathy for Ron Silliman's post too, although I have sympathy also for the ENGAGED lurkers who spoke up in their own defense--I think what Ron was getting at was something that a lot of poets feel, that is, that a lot of people get to stand around pointing out our faults while never putting themselves through the ringer of creating a poem.

So, here's my riddle. I'll bet if you said "poetry and poetry criticism" have a fundamentally generative and symbiotic relation, a larger proportion of those people who write criticism mainly would agree, whereas a lesser number of people who mainly write poetry would agree. In fact I bet it would make some poets actively annoyed. I'd love responses to this riddle: is what I'm saying true, or not? If it is true, why?

I once referred to Anthony Easthope's POETRY AND DISCOURSE as "Poetry as primitive culture" because it seemed to view poetry and poets as an odd aberration that needed to be further studied by the sensible.

A truly active criticism engages its own fear of writing.

mark wallace

(please excuse--or celebrate!--any typos. I'm working on an old-fashioned moden today)

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

272. Judy Roitman
First Intensity
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Lee Chapman asked me to inform this list that the new address of First Intensity is PO Box 665, Lawrence, KS 66044.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

273. David Kellogg
Re: List Wars
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Marjorie,

Much of what you have said is all fine, and wonderful, but it DOES NOT ADDRESS what I said. For example, I never said that one can't separate the wheat from the chaff, but only that the a priori assumption that that's what critics must do is a little silly. To take a point you've made many times, it's like limiting poetry to the free-verse lyric.

Of course we all evaluate every time we make a choice (and, I would add, every time we decide not to choose). I never said otherwise -- I would argue that you're confusing a relativist stance with a subjective one. The idea that a relativist stance on value precludes choice is a red herring.

I've very happy that you're reading A MAN WITHOUT QUALITIES; bully for you.

But that experience doesn't answer at all the question of what to read, much less what to teach. I imagine that your experience in teaching is much like mine: my estimate of "the value" of work for me enters into a rough equation that includes such things as the possible value of the work for students, what I've taught recently, the points I'm trying to make in the course, my mood, what I ate, and a couple hundred other factors. What is "the value" of the work in such a context? How can I dare fix it? It changes for me all the time. One way it changes is by reading this list, and that's a "good" thing -- i.e., something I value.

Marjorie, I have no doubt you would object to someone who defined "the role of the poet" up front; such roles usually, though not always, exclude many of the folks you and I find most interesting. Yet you write that "If criticism doesn't at least in part do that [separate the wheat from the chaff], what are we writing for?" Imagine substituting "poetry for "criticism" and some feature of much, but not all poetry for separating wheat from chaff, and you'll see the nature of my objection. It's not to evaluation -- it's to the installation of evaluation as the telos of prose about poetry.

Cheers,
David

First addendum: I'd like to apologize for my loose use of the term "sociological," for which Andrew Miller has rightly criticized me. The fact that I was mainly extending the already loose use of the term as it was thrown around on the list doesn't let me off the hook.

Second addendum, for Wystan: neither poetry nor the social subsumes the other; but neither does either escape the other.

↑ Index

274. David Kellogg
Re: List Wars
Wed 10 Jul 1996

As an addition to the debate, this from Ron Silliman's introduction to In the American Tree (which I've been rereading having bought a new copy at Orono after my first copy fell apart -- why is this book so poorly bound?):

"It is now plain that any debate over who is, or is not, a better writer, or what is, or is not, a more legitimate writing is, for the most part, a surrogate social struggle. The more pertinent questions are what is the community being addressed in the writing, how does the writing participate in the constitution of this audience, and so on." (xxi)

Since this thread really started with the question of race and community at Orono and in the papers there, I thought this little passage might get us back to more important matters.

Cheers,
David

~~~
~~~

276. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: why is "bad" poet a silly category, but not "great" poet? (fwd)

Wed 10 Jul 1996

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 10 Jul 1996 15:21:12 -0700 (PDT)
From: Aldon L. Nielsen <[redacted]>
To: robert von hallberg <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: why is "bad" poet a silly category, but not "great" poet?

Given my understanding of your procedure now, I will post this to the Poetics list immediately after I post it to you.

I can appreciate your desire to have your views represented accurately in public. However, I am startled by the divergence between even the statements that you have posted in public. You now speak of "one" factual discrepancy, and you select the one that is not on the tape. Go back and read your first message to me. You do in fact claim more than one misrepresentation.

In my last post about this I pointed to one of these. As you did in your first message, you now make a distinction between worthwhile sociological pproaches and "simplistic" approaches. That distinction is difficult to locate in your original remarks. You said, and I will send the tape as soon as I have duplicated it: "When we do the sociology thing it comes out real simple."

Another example -- In your first message to me you state: "The example I gave in Orono, you will recall, was not your own remark about the number of papers on minority poets, but instead the listing by the first presenter . . ." In fact, as you will hear on the tape, the very first thing that you mention is the set of numbers I gave in my opening remarks.

Please compare your first message carefully to your second, and then compare both to the tape when it arrives. Meanwhile, I will ask the Poetics list members to note that while you raise a number of supposed misrepresentations in your first message, you now say that you only raise one factual question. Your own messages indicate that this is not the case.

Now, because the other remarks are not on the tape, I am willing to admit the possibility of some misunderstanding. It may be that you did not mean to include Kaufman in the remarks that you made at the podium, and if that is so I am sorry to have misunderstood you. On the other hand, since on that day you not only did not indicate any poem by Hughes that you thought was good (I'm trying to follow through on your distinction between a bad poet and a good, great, whatever poet who has authored some, or many ,bad poems), I am not so sure I didn't hear you correctly. You can clear this up for me now by letting me know which of these things you did mean to convey to the four of us you were speaking to at that moment. Do you believe that Hughes is simply the author of some bad poems (the poems that were read & discussed in the papers I suppose), and if so, what are the not so bad Hughes poems in your opinion?

Now, I do not have time to go into each and every matter you raise beyond the remarks themseleves, though perhaps we can at a future meeting or in future email exchanges when I'm not in the process of moving -- But please keep in mind that one of my clearest objections to your remarks was the divergence between what you said and what the presenters had in fact presented. I began with your use of my numbers, because I felt that I could speak with assurance about your response to my own words. Your first message attempts to deny that you used this number as an example, but goes on to make certain remarks about the percentage of papers on minority poets. Here is what you said at the panel: "a bunch of white people gather to have a conference and they want to talk mainly about white people. What's the problem, if what we're doing here is talking about literature as sociological reproduction and as identity formation?"

Some quick observations --

Talking about sociological reproduction and talking about identity formation are not exactly the same thing --

I realize there is a danger in responding to any question as rhetorical as your is, but I think there would be a problem even if what we were doing was sociological reproduction and identity formation -- unless what you mean really is that this would be a great way to find out how white people keep themselves white? but I don't think that's what you had in mind -- Please explain to me why this would not be a problem --

Elsewhere on the tape you say "When it's sociological it's real simple." Now, as I think about your remarks as a whole, I find it difficult to square them with what you've been saying, much more agreeably, in your messages. Your conference remarks sya that when it's sociological it's simple, and that when we do the sociology thing it comes out real simple. And you ask why it's a problem, if we're doing sociological reproduction, if a bunch of white peoplem at a conference choose to talk about mostly white poets.

Now, this string of statements would seem to indicate that a) doing sociological literary work comes out simple -- b) there's no problem, really, if white people doing sociology at a literature conference want to talk about mostly white people

That would seem to indicate that the result will be a bunch of white people doing sociology and being simplistic mostly about white poets --

I don't know about you, but that does not sound like an appealing prospect to me --

Lastly, because I have to meet an estimator from Bekins, let me address quickly your remarks on Pound --

I would certainly agree that, as you put it at Orono, Pound's other is not my other (though you were looking at Joe as you said this). I would also agree that attention, close attention, has to be paid to Pound's constructions of Italian-America -- BUT, this evades a few important points.

a) Pound makes ref. to black people early, middle and late - b) your remark, again, elides one of the points in the paper you are dismissing -- While I would not agree that Pound's self-exile is a matter of "white flight," the fact that his "other" was at times Italian is not an objection to that claim. As Joe pointed out in his paper, many powerful Americans, including any number of those making immigration policy and testing "intelligence," did not think of Italians as white people at the time in question. Joe is not saying that Italians and African-Americans are the same -- he is, though, saying that Italian immigrants were often part of that which whight flight flew from. To my mind, this is another instance of your having mashed the papers you didn't like into a shape that fit the remarks you wanted to make.

There is much more of this nature, but in sum

--your second message misrepresents the contents of your first message; You did claim more than one factual misrepresentation, and you seem now to have dropped those which are on the tape in favor of the one that is not

--I will here beofre the entire Poetics list admit that I cannot now be sure that you meant to convey to me that Kaufman was a bad poet -- I will even go so far as to add that you may indeed have meant only to tell me that Hughes was the author, so far as you knew, of only bad poems, not that he is a bad poet. Again, if I'm wrong here set me straight at once

--Please tell me why it would not be a problem, if we're doing sociological reproduction, for white people to want to talk mainly about white people -- You appear to have gone beyond a mere statistical note here and addressed a matter of desire -- also, "mostly" could have been 51% as easily as the 94% you invoke -- this seems to admit of degrees, no?

and I suppose I should give at least one example of what I might consdier a more direct critical engagement with Joe's paper -- Joe built many of his comments around the absence of Hughes and Brooks from the Donald Allen anthology -- I believe Hughes would fall outside the scope of Allen's collection on the basis of the chronology he was working with, and I believe that Brooks's aesthetics would make her a more likely candidate for the Hall anthology than for Allen's -- In my own closing remark I was gently suggesting that this line of inquiry might more profitably look at the absence of poets who shared the aesthetics that seemed to link the varied groups in Allen's volume -- and Hughes, as it happens, did just that,

"ask your mama." pp 472-531
don't neglect the "liner notes"

here's some identity formation for you

"WHERE IS LOTTE LENYA
AND WHO IS MACK THE KNIFE AND WAS PORGY EVER MARRIED BEFORE TAKING BESS TO WIFE AND WHY WOULD MAI (NOT MAY) BECOME JEWISH
THE HARD WAY?

↑ Index

277. Kevin Killian
Re: the guy and the gulf war
Wed 10 Jul 1996

At 1:28 AM 7/11/96, Joseph Zitt wrote:
>On 10 Jul 96 at 9:22, Joe Amato wrote:
>
>> for one, i think what's necessary, and this pace dodie's hammering on the >> white middleclass, is to pull apart some of these categories we rely on...
>
>The way I hear it (from lotsa nonrigorous eavesdropping), the >middleclass tend to be those whose incomes are in a range from >slightly below the speaker's to slightly above. It's kind of the way >that people think that "the Rich" who should be heavily taxed are >those who earn more than a little more than they do.
>
>I've bounced ridiculously among economic brackets in recent years, >but have always felt middle class. But friends of mine who live in >hovels with intermittent electricity, as well as those who live in >mansions with lotsa household help think of themselves as >middleclass, too.

This is Dodie Bellamy speaking.

I think that you two Joes are equating class with money, which is, I think, a rather narrow definition. I was raised in a background where not being on welfare was social climbing. My father, who quit school in the 7th grade, got into the carpenter's union and was very proud of never being on welfare--unlike his sibblings. He made more money probably than either of you two, but our family never approached being middle class--the middle class was this alien world whose members we called Mr. and Mrs., but we were called by our first names.

↑ Index

278. maria damon
sociopoetic poetry/lyrical critique
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---

sorry if this is redundant, but my computer's doing annoying things that make it hard for me to know if this was actually bounced back to me or got sent:

ps to my post to andrew miller --and david kellogg, indirectly -- on "sociology": i also like it when a "critical" text aspires to or achieves the poetic. that's why i come back again and again to walter benjamin; not just cuz he's one of the current gods of cult studs, but because he language and insights are so inspired, so...well, poetic. no one could call his essay on some motifs in Baudelaire "mere" sociology, though it has a strong component of social concern and sociological observation. to me this is a kind of "texte ideal." (it teaches great with o'hara's lunch poems, btw). susan stewart, who is "also" a poet, is another writer/"critic" whose essays embody a lovely poesis of their own. others, y'all? rachel bdp's talk at orono was in that realm. bests, maria d

↑ Index

279. Aldon L. Nielsen been there done that (fwd)
Wed 10 Jul 1996

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 10 Jul 1996 15:54:00 -0700 (PDT)
From: Aldon L. Nielsen <[redacted]>
To: robert von hallberg <[redacted]>
Subject: been there done that Turned out that was not the Bekins person yet -- so here's one more quick note --

You say, with regard to the numbers that I cited, that it is not surprising to learn that only 6% of the papers were on race or minority writers -- Again, please look back at my report & listen to the tape -- I did not include papers "about race" in the tabulation, for one thing. (The percentage swells appreciably if we add in all those good O'Hara presentations.) More significantly, you have once again elided the point I made with those numbers, as you did at the conference. My point was that if certain conservative critics are to be believed, this number should surprise us very much indeed -- My point, therefore, was that thse critics are not to be believed --

Secondly -- you remark that the demonstration of the influence of racism in the construction of literary canons has been done cogently --

Quickly now, name five books for me on the subject of racism and canon formation in the area of poetry --

More importantly (I suppose one could argue that the few articles, comments, conference papers etc. that exist were so cogent that we don't need whole books on the subject [at least in poetry studies]), to tell me that the demonstration has been done cogently is not to tell me that it need not be done again. In fact, had the job been done so cogently, perhaps we should have been very surprised to find a percentage as low as 6% in 1996.

And further in this regard, the "sifting" you call for is going on -- The fact that you do not agree with the critics you responded to about the poems they discussed hardly suffices as proof that we are neglecting the important work of calling attention to those really important poems out there -- I'm not at all sure that "sifting" is my primary task as a critic or an historian, but I will admit that I do my share of it -- to be as blunt as I can, and still be remotely logical, the fact that you say the poems discussed in the first two papers were "bad," and you appear to agree that you at least said that much, and the fact that you said the first presenter didn't do anything very interesting with the poems (you will recall this is when I broke in and said that you were being insulting) is not a demonstration of either point. There clearly was not time at the session for anybody to even attempt to convince you otherwise, but you didn't seem even to feel that any demonstration was required on your side.

↑ Index

280. maria damon
Re: e-mail politics
Wed 10 Jul 1996

mark wallace writes at some length abt poets/poetry critics you've all read it and i cant excerpt meaningfully:

mark: interesting points. i know that poets often feel colonized by those of us who write "about" poetry and i can understand why. that's one reason why the "arbiter of taste" role is so not to my liking; on the other hand, one could argue that for me to disavow this role is disingenuous: i.e. like it or not, that's what i do. one thing that's been marvelous about this list has been the opportunity to meet, cyberly and personally, people who are practicing poets. i have felt, with the exception of the last coupla days, extraordinarily welcome, to the degree that i naively started to think that this world was less ugly and contentious than the academy. what i have found on the list happily confounded the cliches one hears on both sides. the poets here are extremely critically and theoretically up to date and sophisticated, overturning the dumb academic assumption that "creative" folks are blindly instinctual, "feeling rather than thinking" etc. --the "poetry as primitive culture" model (nice phrase). conversely, some critics are close-minded and scared, hostile to any developments that threaten an earlier model of teaching/writing/thinking that they learned. many of the critics here are also very supportive of poets, contrary to their image as destroyers of spontaneity, joy and inventiveness. both parties can play the aggrieved and underappreciated, both parties can claim importance. many people on the list are both poets and critics, and publishers, and editors, and visual artists, etc. that's been manna from heaven, for someone who daily faces a workplace that separates not only "crative writing" from "language and literature", but "practical criticism" from "theory," and has not taken my work seriously (because it was on Bob Kaufman rather than Chaucer, Milton or Shakespeare --boy do i feel vindicated with the Beat Show and Cranial Guitar, despite my difficulties with the latter).

as for myself, i had no idea that this list was intended primarily for one or the other group of writers --in fact, just a few days ago there was some flurry because a prominent critic, bob von hallberg, was not on the list. i was signed on to the list (with my permission of course) by charles bernstein whom i met at a conference --predictably enough, he was a featured "creative" writer, I was a "critic." and i've never felt unwelcome because of my status as "primarily a critic" (though thanks to this list and some of its offshoots, i've ventured into the waters of more unabashedly "creative" collaborative enterprises) until recently. however, i don't think you're suggesting, mark, that critics get off the list. md

↑ Index

281. Joseph Zitt

Re: the guy and the gulf war

Wed 10 Jul 1996

On 10 Jul 96 at 9:22, Joe Amato wrote:

> for one, i think what's necessary, and this pace dodie's hammering on the white middleclass, is to pull apart some of these categories we rely on...

The way I hear it (from lotsa nonrigorous eavesdropping), the middleclass tend to be those whose incomes are in a range from slightly below the speaker's to slightly above. It's kind of the way that people think that "the Rich" who should be heavily taxed are those who earn more than a little more than they do.

I've bounced ridiculously among economic brackets in recent years, but have always felt middle class. But friends of mine who live in hovels with intermittent electricity, as well as those who live in mansions with lotsa household help think of themselves as middleclass, too.

But this probably isn't news to anyone.
---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ===== [redacted] ===== Dallas, Texas \||| ||/ Question Authority, The == SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/ http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt == <> <> == The Data Wranglers! \|

↑ Index

282. Loss Glazier
EPC - Connecting
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Some interesting stats just out re: EPC. Here's some contextualization:

> Avg. transactions per day 1,347
>
> or another way to look at it
>
> 2550 times the EPC's main home page ALONE was accessed in 9 days
>
> (See end of message for most 'popular' menus hit)
>
> Busiest time to access the EPC 7 pm EST
>
> 2nd busiest 1pm - 4pm EST (each hour tied for second busiest)

Connections by country. Here is a ranked list of countries accessing the EPC:

```
 3714: 28.72%: .edu (USA Educational)
 2346: 17.94%: [unresolved numerical addresses]
 2290: 20.93%: .com (Commercial, mainly USA)
 2251: 15.24%: .net (Network)
  258:  1.73%: .uk (United Kingdom)
  226:  1.91%: .ca (Canada)
  225:  1.72%: .org (Non-Profit Making Organisations)
  186:  1.62%: .us (United States)
  144:  1.23%: .au (Australia)
  100:  0.82%: .jp (Japan)
   71:  0.48%: .it (Italy)
   70:  1.01%: .de (Germany)
```

```
 70:  0.35%: .no (Norway)
 67:  1.49%: .nz (New Zealand)
 65:  0.64%: .fr (France)
 49:  0.29%: .gov (USA Government)
 44:  0.34%: .nl (Netherlands)
 42:  0.30%: .dk (Denmark)
 41:  0.47%: .fi (Finland)
 39:  0.41%: .se (Sweden)
 32:  0.28%: .ch (Switzerland)
 31:  0.13%: .es (Spain)
 27:  0.14%: .il (Israel)
 26:  0.31%: .mil (USA Military)
 23:  0.14%: .my (Malaysia)
 21:  0.09%: .si (Slovenia)
 20:  0.13%: .kr (South Korea)
 20:  0.10%: .lu (Luxembourg)
 18:  0.07%: .uy (Uruguay)
 16:  0.14%: .br (Brazil)
 14:  0.05%: .yu (Yugoslavia)
  6:  0.04%: .pt (Portugal)
  6:  0.05%: .za (South Africa)
  5:  0.02%: .in (India)
  4:  0.11%: .is (Iceland)
  4:  0.12%: .sg (Singapore)
  3:  0.09%: .cn (China)
  2:  0.03%: .hk (Hong Kong)
  2:  0.12%: .mx (Mexico)
  1:  0.01%: .at (Austria)
  1:  0.02%: .bh (Bahrain)
  1:       : .cl (Chile)
  1:       : .cz (Czech Republic)
  1:  0.03%: .id (Indonesia)
  1:  0.05%: .mt (Malta)
  1:  0.01%: .pl (Poland)
  1:  0.06%: .su (Former USSR)
  1:       : .tw (Taiwan)
```

July most 'popular' menus EPC

```
 2550:  4.09%: /epc/
  395:  6.09%: /epc/authors/
  242:  5.41%: /epc/images/authors/
```

```
 230:  0.67%: /epc/poetics/207:  0.74%: /epc/connects/183:  9.98%: /epc/ezines/tree/
 163:  7.33%: /epc/sound/
 148:  0.96%: /epc/mags/
 143:  0.93%: /epc/presses/
 137:  0.86%: /epc/documents/
 129:  2.61%: /epc/rift/rift05/
 120:  2.14%: /epc/rift/rift04/
 109:  2.70%: /epc/epclive/
 101:  2.36%: /epc/rift/rift01/
  93:  2.08%: /epc/authors/bernstein/visual/85:  1.18%: /epc/rift/
  85:  0.11%: /epc/ezines/treehome/
  82:  0.83%: /epc/authors/bernstein/
  77:  0.19%: /epc/forms/
  69:  0.66%: /epc/ezines/diu/
  67:  0.05%: /epc/poetics/archive/
  66:  0.13%: /epc/ezines/tinfish/tinfish01/
  65:  0.79%: /epc/authors/joris/
  64:  0.43%: /epc/forms/poem/
  63:  0.26%: /epc/display/
  58:  0.25%: /epc/biblioteca/
  57:  0.04%: /epc/ezines/treehome/tree01/
  55:  1.58%: /epc/rift/rift02/
  48:  0.86%: /epc/rift/rift03/
  47:  0.98%: /epc/ezines/exper/
  44:  1.05%: /epc/authors/funkhouser/44:  0.14%: /epc/linebreak/
  43:  0.52%: /epc/ezines/spt/
  43:  0.35%: /epc/documents/obits/40:  0.63%: /epc/ezines/we/38:  0.02%: /epc/authors/glazier/e/e/
  36:  0.56%: /epc/documents/reading/35:  0.58%: /epc/ezines/tinfish/
-----------------------------------------------
```

End of Stats

↑ Index

283. Robert J Wilson
Re: Covering Cherub
Wed 10 Jul 1996

--

Dear Jerry, I am on the Big Island of Hawaii now, really a sublime and sacred space, and suggest that you ask Gab and HLAC to send you here to give an "Outer Island" reading-- thre is is bookstore in Kamuela that is willing to host you and would be perfect. Have to run now Wills get back to you soon. Rob Wilson

On Tue, 9 Jul 1996, Jerry Rothenberg wrote:

> Dear Rob Wilson --
>
> Thanks for yours, & please feel free to send any essays/works etc. concerning local & Pacific matters. We'll be arriving there on the 4th of September & I understand from Gab Welford that there's a big Bamboo Ridge reading on the 5th, so certainly we'll plan to get to that one. I have an interest in all of that, so looking forward very much to this particular visit. Tell me if you have any ideas or suggestions, and in the meantime
>
> all good wishes
>
> JERRY

↑ Index

284. George Bowering
Re: tonight's HRs
Wed 10 Jul 1996

Ho ho, I just got back from a poetry festival in Cape Town, to find that my fantasy team is in first place by 10 games!

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

285. George Bowering
Re: List wars
Wed 10 Jul 1996

> db rites:

What does this mean? Has something happened to Bromige? I have been off the continent.

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

286. Emily Lloyd
Re: maria--/& performance
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Rob to me:
>>But let's not
>>show disrespect for the voices that have spoken.
Eryque to Rob:
>so: i don't think anyone is particulary knocking those that have spoken >because they spake, but what they have speaketh-ed.
>

I was thinking more along the lines not of what they have speaketh but the ways in which "they" (and I'll change that to "we," which is what I mean/t) sometimes speak in discussion. I don't think of aggressive, "I know what I'm talking about" speech as a masc.-gendered thing (though it's popularly supposed to be--to which I say--men are from Mars; women are from Venus; I'm from suburban Virginia). And in most cases, I don't have a problem with this kind of speech & often engage in it myself. It's cool for you (Rob) to be "I know what I'm talking about" about the Stones' sloppy rhythm guitar, because, well--(I'm convinced) you do. But I'd get anxious about a bunch of white folks arguing that adamantly about race & eros in the absence of voices of color, I think,

& that's all. I respect the fact that that may still offend you & others. As for inviting people to join, see Eryque's message--and thanks for that, Eq. emily. sigh.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Emily Lloyd [redacted]
"Emily said Emily said, Emily
is admittedly Emily"--G. Stein

↑ Index

287. Diane Marie Ward

Fwd: New Orleans Performer List (fwd)

Thu 11 Jul 1996

White Fields Press & The Literary Renaissance and others are planning another Poetry Feast - this time in New Orleans. Please find below an incredible list of performing poets - a "poetic dream team." Ron Whitehead has surpassed himself and the previous Rants with this itinerary.
---------- Diane Ward [redacted] State University of New York at Buffalo

THE AESTHETE'S LIST : http://www.acsu.buffalo.edu/~dward/

"I dreamt I dwelt in marble halls,
And woke to find it true;
I wasn't born for an age like this;
Was Smith, Was Jones, Were you?" -- George Orwell written in 1935.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 10 Jul 1996 23:54:10 -0400
From: [redacted]
To: dianemarieward <[redacted]>
Subject: Fwd: New Orleans Performer List

RANT for the renaissance, The Majic Bus, & TRIBE present VOICES WITHOUT RESTRAINT 48-Hour Non-Stop Music & Poetry INSOMNIACATHON at The New Orleans Contemporary Arts Center and The Howlin Wolf Club August 16-18

PERFORMERS:

Amiri Baraka (poet, NJ), David Amram (musician, NY), Diane di Prima (poet, CA), Ed Sanders (poet, NY), The Iguanas, Storeyville, E. Ethelbert Miller (poet, D.C.), Willie Smith (poet, CA), WAMO (poet, TX), Robert Creeley (poet, NY), Ramblin' Jack Elliott (musician, CA), Robert Palmer (writer), Nicole Blackman (poet, NY), Hersch Silverman (poet, NJ) & Channel Nine (musicians, NY),
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Douglas Brinkley (writer, LA), Steve Dalachinsky (poet, NY), Frank Messina & Spoken Motion (poet/musicians, NY), Louis Bickett & The Cultural Mudding Ritual (poet/artist, KY), Yusef Komunyakaa (poet), Richard Hell (poet/musician, NY), Mark Reese (filmmaker: Premiere documentary on Jackie Robinson), Chris Iovenko (filmmaker: Harry Crews documentary), MouthAlmighty & Bob Holman's THE UNITED STATES OF POETRY (New Orleans Premiere), Chris Felver (photographer/filmmaker, Premiere of Lawrence Ferlinghetti documentary), The Amazing Chan Klan (pop, KY), The Black Pig Liberation Front (multi-media band of future here now, NY), Grand Passion (new wave from Northeast), Tyrone Cotton (blues), Susi Wood (KY mountain folk), Erik LaPrade (poet, NY), Brian Foye (poet, writer/Founder Kerouac Festival, MA), John Rechy (writer, CA), Andrei Codrescu (renaissance man, LA), Jay McInerney (writer), William S. Burroughs II (live phone conversation), James Grauerholz (writer, KA), Ron Seitz (poet/writer, AZ), Jim McCrary (poet, KA), Ron Whitehead (poet/writer, KY), John Sinclair (poet/musician, LA), Dennis Formento (poet/writer, LA), Eleven Eleven (guilt punk, KY), Sander Hicks (playwright/publisher, NY), Soft Skull Press (NY), Little Molasses Theatre Company (production of RAPID CITY, NY), Matt Kohn (poet/photographer, NY), Kalamu Yasalaam (poet/musician, LA), Denis Mahoney (poet/musician, RI), Arthur Pfister (poet, LA), Hozomeen Press (NYC, CT, RI), Pop rocket Records (CT), Ring Tarigh (RI), White Fields Press (KY, TX), the literary renaissance (KY), COMPOST Magazine (NY, MA), Ralph Adamo (poet, LA), W. Loran Smith (poet, KY), Umar Aki Williams (poet, KY), rich Martin (poet/musician, CT), Kent Fielding (poet, AK), Todd Colby (poet, NY), John Deer (low punk), Anastosias Kozaitis (poet, NY), Kevin Gallagher (poet, NY), Casey Cyr (poet, NY), Phil Paradis (poet, KY), Lori Turner (poet, KY), The New Orleans Poetry Forum, MESECHABE (LA), SPLEEN (KY), GREENPEACE, Bops, Crack, Boom! Press (KY), Al McLaughlin (OH), Jordan Green (poet, KY), Will Kotheimer (poet/filmmaker, KY), Wendy-Charly Lemmon (poet, LA), Paul McDonald (poet, KY), NEMO (poet, NY), Annie McClanahan (poet, KY), Mickey Hess (novelist, KY), Michelle Fowler (poet, CO), Andrea Roney (poet, KY), Heather Kolf (poet, KY), IMPALA SUPER (scruff punk), John Hagan (writer, KY), Mike Forman (poet/musician, KY), Bruce Beroff (poet, KY), Jeff Eckman (poet, KY), Debi Coombs (poet, KY), J.B. Wilson (poet, KY), Kevin Coombs (poet, KY), Rebekah Reeves (poet, KY), Paul Levitch (poet, KY), Luke Buckman (poet, KY), Deirdre Skaggs (poet, KY), Gui Stuart (poet, KY), Amanda Hammons (poet, KY), David Minton (poet, KY), Kelly Render (blues & country musician, KY), Matthew Osborn (poet, KY), Randall Keenan (poet), Jason Powell (poet, KY), Cotton Seiler (poet, KA), Michael Leonard (writer, NY), Allison Bona (poet, KY), Aaron May (poet, KY), Margie Nicoll (poet, MA), Marina Karides (poet, MA), Danielle Legros Georges (poet, NY), John Ryan (poet, MA), Seth Cohen (poet, KY), Chris Kubicek (poet, FL), Reverend Jayne Praxis (poet, KY), Kirstin Ogden (poet, AK), Gene Simmons (poet, AK), Kevin Johnson (poet, LA), Lee Grue (poet/musician, LA), TRIBE Performers, Dorothy Henriques (playwright, LA), Paul Chasse (poet/moto-biker), LA), Dr. Ahmos Zu-Bolton, LA), Christine Trimbo (poet, LA), David Rowe (poet, LA), Dr. Jerry McGuire (poet, LA), Anne Marie (poet, LA), John Bigunet (poet, LA), Cynthia Hogue (poet, LA), Kerry Poree (poet, LA), Barbara Lamont (poet/singer, LA), Nancy Harris (poet, LA), Dell Hall (poet, LA), Ben Gunn (poet/musician, LA) Andrea Gereighty (poet, LA), Bonnie Fastring (poet, LA), Nancy Cotton (poet, LA), Chris Champagne (poet, LA), Stan Bemis (poet, LA), Rene Broussard (video artist, LA), Mada Plummer (poet, LA), Keith Clatyon (vibraphonist, LA), Karen Celesan (poet, LA), Robin Harris Thompson (singer/poet, LA), Kyla Thompsom (9 year old singer/poet, LA), Samara Jones (11 year old poet, LA), Michael Clatyon, Valentine Pierce (poet, LA), Kerry Poree (poet, LA), Quo Vadis Gex Breaux (poet, LA), Ted Graham (musician, LA), Gina Ferrera (poet, LA), Robert Menuet (poet, LA), Clara Connell (poet, LA), plus more to be added plus last minute special guest appearances.

EVENT SPONSORS:

the literary renaissance, White Fields Press, The Eisenhower Center for American Studies & the Majic Bus at University of New Orleans, TRIBE Magazine, The New Orleans Contemporary Arts Center, The Howlin Wolf Club, EXQUISITE CORPSE Magazine, The City of New Orleans, The New Orleans Poetry Forum.

↑ Index

288. Eryque Gleason
Re: maria--/& performance
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Rob H writ:
>I can understand your frustration. But:
>
>The best way to involve more women and people of color in this group >is to invite them here, don't you think? Why slam others for being white >or male, why transfer the abuse from patriarch to matriarch, yeah, but. well, first, i don't think that's quite what emily was getting at, but that's a side issue right now (although maybe not to emily, and apologies if this is redundant, there's quite a few more messages waiting to be read. y'allses have been talkative lately!)

could someone explain to me why, more or less, any marginalized group of people would want to come into an area that is quite clearly not theirs (economically speaking), has been colonized so thouroughly as to be left dead for all newcomers? makes me think of when my aunt and uncle (who are loaded)

invite me over for thanksgiving dinner. sure, it's a free meal but they've not once let me even sit in the '63 corvette, the biggest kick of the evening is playing fetch with the (highly groomed and pedigreed) elkhound while we watch football on the nine hundred inch television. getting back to campus was always more comforting than aunt rita's carefully-planned soft lighting (i think because i knew that it was, in some sense, mine). might have something to do with the fact that they try to pull of a blue-collar persona, spending more money on plastic bags in a week than i could spend on all of my groceries. though i gotta admit, those new heavy duty zippers are kinda cool, kept the leftovers from spilling.

> But let's not
> show disrespect for the voices that have spoken.

so: i don't think anyone is particulary knocking those that have spoken because they spake, but what they have speaketh-ed.

happy summering!
eryque

↑ Index

289. Carnography
Re: maria--/& performance
Thu 11 Jul 1996

At 11:25 PM 7/10/96, Eryque Gleason is rumored to have typed:

> Rob H writ:
> I can understand your frustration. But:
>
> The best way to involve more women and people of color in this group > is to invite them here, don't you think? Why slam others for being white > or male, why transfer the abuse from patriarch to matriarch,

I appreciate your civility, Eryque. I will try to respond in kind, you ulcerous flounder-mount.

> yeah, but. well, first, i don't think that's quite what emily was getting > at, but that's a side issue right now

Is it really a side-issue? Would it be a side-issue if I commented on a plethora of "overly-aggressive" women in this list? What exactly was she getting at such a necessitated this backhanded compliment? I'm not criticizing anyone's intention here: I presume our motives are good ones. But but but: This--

> Mostly I got worried & a little nauseated at the > prospect of a predominantly-white-membered list discussing "race & erotics"
> esp. in the assertive and "I know what I'm talking about" voice

--seems an unfortunate choice of words, not because the passage is horribly offensive, but because it stoops to the stereotyping it denounces.

> could someone explain to me why, more or less, any marginalized group of people would want to come into an area that is quite clearly not theirs (economically speaking)

Marginally speaking, I'm a Jew (on my mother's side). Consider me privileged if you dare, but in the words of Joe Woods, "anti-semitism is the socialism of fools." Also: I'd mention my sexual orientation, but I'm trying to finish my sandwich.

Economically speaking, when I was nine, my parents divorced and my mother was left with nothing. At fourteen, I lived with a prostitute and paid my own rent (though I still took lessons, and practiced piano almost every evening). Even now, my yearly income defines me squarely as lower class. Yet I don't feel I've stumbled into anyone else's economic territory.

> has been colonized so thouroughly as to be left > dead for all newcomers?

Since I myself am a newcomer who doesn't take said colonization for granted, and since there seems to be space here for my voice, why shouldn't there be equal space for newer voices?

> makes me think of when my aunt and uncle (who are > loaded) invite me over for thanksgiving dinner. sure, it's a free meal but > they've not once let me even sit in the '63 corvette, the biggest kick of > the evening is playing fetch with the (highly groomed and pedigreed) > elkhound while we watch football on the nine hundred inch television.
> getting back to campus was always more comforting than aunt rita's > carefully-planned soft lighting (i think because i knew that it was, in > some sense, mine). might have something to do with the fact that they try > to pull of a blue-collar persona, spending more money on plastic bags in a > week than i could spend on all of my groceries. though i gotta admit, > those new heavy duty zippers are kinda cool, kept the leftovers from > spilling.

And enclosed within those bags are the leftovers of the poor: their own cadavers. (Raus! Raus! Kommen Sie schnell!)

(The author wishes to apologize for characterizing Germans as nazis and morbid humor as indigenously German. Why? Because I care, Enryque.)

This is funny stuff, and I like your eye for ironies. But your loaded-relative analogy posits a loaded economic disparity.

> But let's not
> show disrespect for the voices that have spoken.

> so: i don't think anyone is particulary knocking those that have spoken because they spake, but what they have speaketh-ed.

(Are you suggesting that I write like an Elizabethan? Then blame it on my parents: Mom quoted Hamlet whenever I burned my eggs. When it comes to archaisms, I invoke the Menendez defense.)

I can understand anyone's problem with the "I know what I'm talking about" argument, when conclusions are untested and reasons unexplained. But if white males are the only perpetrators of this crime, then eugenicists have had the right idea all along.

Death to reductivism! (Wait a minute--was that reductive?)

> happy summering!
> eryque

Sumer is icumen in or so they sing at breakfast inns

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

290. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: riposte
Thu 11 Jul 1996

This time my response to Robert von Hallberg got to the poetics list before his message -- This may mean that he has rejected my advice to sign onto the list if he wants to continue the discussion in public, and that he is waiting for Keith Tuma to return home to forward his message -- who knows -- It will appear here some day I am sure -- and by the by -- just got a letter from David Bromige, who is just fine, and I thought that was the abbrev. for decibels anyway --

↑ Index

291. R I Caddel
Invisible books
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Ah - OK if I just mention a couple of new books? Call it my monthly shot or whatever....

NEW FROM INVISIBLE BOOKS :

Bill Griffiths : Rousseau & The Wicked : £5.50 : 0 9521256 3 3 14

A man in a silver suit.
A briefcase left in a minority-interest club.
And a cabal of business and government.

The agenda of a banana county.

Not lasses of lotional warm-flower skin not wives of cracky chat / matrons

But a senate that kisses horses.

and here's one for the list:

29

What better disguise for evil
than sonnets?
How can you divide
without rhyme?
How can you obey
without art?

O be ready
there are some sick mysteries and mirages
in the sweetest story.

And Due Soon from Invisible Books:

Catherine Walsh : Idir Eatortha & Making Tents : £5.50 : 0 9521256 4 1

Invisible Books are available direct from the publishers:
INVISIBLE BOOKS, BM INVISIBLE, LONDON WC1N 3XX

or from SPD

Thanks. Same place next month then?
Richard Caddel

↑ Index

292. Ron Silliman
The List
Thu 11 Jul 1996

173 messages in three days? Boy, am I glad that I have the digest option. Still, there are problems with it -- it makes it hard, for example, to save just Simon's elegant synopsis of M. Yeh's article (which I found fascinating and actually not too dissimilar a history from what one might have expected in the old USSR circa 1980). One problem is that in replying to a single message out of a large bundle, one does tend to forget just who said what, so that leads to writing "someone" when one should have written "Joe Amato," for example.

Nobody's written about Lorenzo Thomas as a Texas poet either. He is one of literally hundreds of regionally dispersed (and from the perspective of a "national scene" thus marginalized) poets doing great work in this country.

I recall once seeing a great long poem of his in, of all places, Monthly Review, tho I don't think that work is captured in The Bathers. Does anybody out there in cyberspace have a copy from which they could make me a xerox?

It was also a piece of his in Monthly Review, I think, that first turned me onto the work of Frank Stanford.

And nobody's written yet about that other category of "vermin" (to use Mr Levy's paradigm), writers working in the computer industry, of which this list has many examples (some of them also in the pure lurker mode too). I even saw the PR manager for the Bank of America on the directory the last time I checked it on the EPC (Hi, Peter).

All of the lists that I'm on that have heavy academic participation are quieter than the city of Paris during the month of July right now (viz. the Cage list, which is taking its name "silence" too literally).

So, yes, I do want to note that I am aware that there are varieties of lurking (I do a fair amount of it myself), the only kind of which I find truly obnoxious being the ones who, when you talk to them in person, complain about how "low level" the discourse here is. As if their nonparticipation weren't one of the defining conditions of same!

But 173 messages in three days? Wowie zowie.

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

293. Bill Luoma/Vanstar
Poets, Critics, and Computrix
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Ron,

The computer industry is really cool.

"The Regional Analyst may need to assist the Logistics Analyst with part escalations and will seek the aid of the Logistics Analyst in the de-escalation of the 'people' escalations."

Bill

↑ Index

294. henry
Re: e-mail politics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

On Wed, 10 Jul 1996 16:38:10 -0400 Mark Wallace said:
>
>So, here's my riddle. I'll bet if you said "poetry and poetry criticism" >have a fundamentally generative and symbiotic relation, a larger >proportion of those people who write criticism mainly would agree, >whereas a lesser number of people who mainly write poetry would agree. In >fact I bet it would make some poets actively annoyed. I'd love responses >to this riddle: is what I'm saying true, or not? If it is true, why?

Poets & critics go together like firemen & insurance companies, like doctors and lawyers, like big sister and the kid who tags along, like whales & barnacles, like doctors and leeches, like leeches and fish, like fish and lemons, like lemons and lawyers. Drive on.

Poets don't write, they are written. Critics are smitten; they write.

Poetry better be good enough for criticism; otherwise, it's just criticism.

Critics live in the world created by poets and bequeath it to the little baby barnacles of the future.

- Henry Gould (forthcoming in "Opie's Post Humors: the Nervous Tics of An Aphorism" Peter Lang Press, 1997, $800. if you order early)

↑ Index

295. henry
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

On Wed, 10 Jul 1996 13:33:23 -0400 Rod Smith said:
>Well, an eastern or Wittgensteinian approach wld be a contextual approach-- >an understanding of context as multiply & complexly constitutive. The >emphasis being not only on what we can "compute" but also upon >acknowledgement that any given context is more complexly constituted than one >can apprehend-- which is why intuition is such a powerful & real aspect of >our experience & also why it is so individualized.
>
>Seems to me both Wittgenstein & aspects of buddhist & taoist thought share a >concern with pointing out limits of apprehension & using them. One cld also >talk about Duchamp in these terms.

My response is typically arrogant Western: yes, the context is there - so what? What can you DO with it? The poem is made of choices - it's the spine on which context attaches itself like a barnacle. Elena Shvarts (a St. Petersburg westerner) said to me at the Hoboken conference: "Americans use the poem to find out what they're going to say. That's why they don't memorize & recite like the Russians." (this is a very rough adaptation of what she said to me). Choices give the edge, the structure, the limit, the character. At least in my imagination. It's the leap - even if it's into the dark. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

296. Larry Price
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

What I find suggestive in this thread about poetics is all that, in it, points toward the "problem" of poetic language. The bit Rod paraphrased from Olson is of course relatively early. A much more accurate token of Olson's practice would be the Black Chrysanthemum: that which exists through itself is what is called meaning. But that which exists in and of itself isn't necessarily going to be FOR itself or even for _an_ other. That is, as a term it's going to exist outside language. But then I think it's clear there are agencies by which one thing _becomes_ another thing. And why I agree with Rod about transparency. That is, to posit language at all as _a_ thing (esp. one outside the zeitgeist) DENIES it the agency which otherwise does get the fly out of the flybottle - ie, poetic language as the transformation of one thing into another thing, either one of which or both may exist OF it/themselves but which, in the elision, the agency, casts forward for us - often the feeling is _into us_ - the possibility that that meaning _would_ be. It's that heuristic call forward of poetic language that tells me I no longer need the eternal moods of the bleak wind to ground my agency. Rather it's the swirling motion of that call forward - the adequacy of it and by implication and in general poetic language - that I think I respond to in, say, Dickinson, Villon, or Sappho, and not some iron ribbing in language.

Larry

↑ Index

297. henry gould
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

On Thu, 11 Jul 1996 09:08:26 -0400 Larry Price said: >agencies by which one thing _becomes_ another thing. And why I agree with Rod >about transparency. That is, to posit language at all as _a_ thing (esp. one >outside the zeitgeist) DENIES it the agency which otherwise does get the fly >out of the flybottle - ie, poetic language as the transformation of one thing >into another thing, either one of which or both may exist OF it/themselves >but which, in the elision, the agency, casts forward for us - often the >feeling is _into us_ - the possibility that that meaning _would_ be. It's >that heuristic call forward of poetic language that tells me I no longer need >the eternal moods of the bleak wind to ground my agency. Rather it's the >swirling motion of that call forward - the adequacy of it and by implication >and in general poetic language - that I think I respond to in, say, >Dickinson, Villon, or Sappho, and not some iron ribbing in language.

This is very interesting and sounds like a transcription of, yes, here we go again, Mandelstam's essay "Coversation about Dante" where he distinguishes between the transformative impulse and the replaceable materials of language. But I don't think I posited language as a thing or denied it's agency or said it was outside the zeitgeist - I said it mastered the zeitgeist by being free comprehension WITHIN the zeitgeist, and that this activity of language is a kind of constant, an activity if you like, within the changing pressures of history. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

298. Pierre Joris

George Orwell, informer (fwd)

Thu 11 Jul 1996

& now for something completely different.... Pierre

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: 11 Jul 96 02:48:37 EDT
From: John Whiting <[redacted]>
To: Forum KPFA <[redacted]>

Subject: George Orwell, informer

No apologies for this "off-topic" posting. Without indulging in simplistic analogies, this revelation echoes endlessly down the halls of KPFA's history - Orwell's essay on "Politics and the English Language", for instance, was broadcast again and again on Pacifica stations.

Perhaps the bottom line is Ezra Pound's plaintive cry,
"Every man has the right to have his ideas examined one at a time."

John

##
#########

The [London] Guardian July 11 1996

ORWELL OFFERED WRITERS' BLACKLIST TO ANTI-SOVIET PROPAGANDA UNIT

Richard Norton-Taylor and Seumas Milne

GEORGE ORWELL, the socialist author, offered to provide a secret Foreign Office propaganda unit linked to the intelligence services with names of writers and journalists he regarded as "crypto-communist" and "fellow-travellers" who could not be trusted, documents released yesterday at the Public Record Office reveal.

He made the offer in 1949, shortly before he died, to the covert Information Research Department, which used well-known writers and publishers - including Bertrand Russell, Stephen Spender and Arthur Koestler - to produce anti-communist material during the cold war. Documents also show that the IRD singled out articles from Tribune, the leftwing but then anti-Soviet paper, to back up its hidden crusade.

In March 1949 an IRD official, Celia Kirwan, visited Orwell at a sanatorium in Cranham, Gloucestershire, where he was suffering from tuberculosis. "I discussed some aspects of our work with him in great confidence," she told her colleagues. "He was delighted to learn of them, and expressed his wholehearted and enthusiastic approval of our aims."

Although too ill to write himself, he gave the names of potential contributors. Early the following month, Orwell wrote to Kirwan offering to give her "a list of journalists and writers who in my opinion are crypto-communists, fellow- travellers or inclined that way and should not be trusted... "

He said his notebook with the names was at his home in London. He insisted that the list was "strictly confidential" since it would be libellous to call somebody a "fellow-traveller."

The revelation is likely to shock many of Orwell's admirers, for whom he is a 20th century radical icon. The files released yesterday do not contain the list of names but a card placed next to Orwell's letter to Kirwan says that a document has been withheld by the Foreign Office.

Bernard Crick, Orwell's biographer, confirmed yesterday that Orwell had kept a "notebook of suspects" containing 86 names. "Many were plausible, a few were far-fetched and unlikely," he said. Michael Foot, a friend of Orwell's in the 1930s and 1940s, said he found the letter "amazing".

"There's been a lot of argument about him deserting his socialism at the end of his life. I don't think that's true, but I'm very surprised he was dealing with the secret services in any form."

The papers show that the IRD promoted the foreign language publication of Animal Farm, Orwell's classic anti-communist allegory. "The idea is particularly good for Arabic in view of the fact that both pigs and dogs are unclean animals to Muslims," noted an embassy official in Cairo.

The unit feared communism in Saudi Arabia, notably among oil workers in Dhahran, the scene of last month's bombing of an American base.

The IRD arranged the distribution of Tribune to British missions abroad. Officials noted: "[It] combines the resolute exposure of communism and its methods with the consistent championship of those objectives which leftwing sympathisers normally support".

They added: "Many articles in it can be effectively turned to this department's purposes."

Documents show that the IRD was closely involved with the Trades Union Congress, lobbied against unions supporting the National Council for Civil Liberties, and played an active role in splitting the international union movement in the late 1940s.

A note from a senior IRD official in 1949 warned that the NCCL (now renamed Liberty) was "heavily communist-penetrated and is in fact... being used for little if nothing more than attacking our colonial administration and policies at every opportunity".

The "persuasion" was done through the TUC, where IRD's main contact was Vic Feather, who later became general secretary.

##

This is the text of George Orwell's letter to Celia Kirwan of Whitehall's secret Information Research Department.

"I DID suggest DARCY GILLY, (Manchester Guardian) didn't I? There is also a man called CHOLLERTON (expert on the Moscow trials) who cld be contacted through the Observer.

Cranham
6.4.49.

Dear Celia,

I haven't written earlier because I have really been rather poorly, and I can't use the typewriter even now, so I hope you will be able to cope with my hand-writing.

I couldn't think of any more names to add to your possible list of writers except FRANZ BORKENAU (the Observer would know his address) whose name I think I gave you, and GLEB STRUVE (he's at Pasadena in California at present), the Russian translator and critic. Of course there are hordes of Americans, whose names can be found in the (New York) New Leader, the Jewish monthly paper "Commentary", and the Partisan Review. I could also, if it is of any value, give you a list of journalists and writers who in my opinion are crypto-communists, fellow-travellers or inclined that way and should not be trusted as propagandists. But for that I shall have to send for a notebook which I have at home, and if I do give you such a list it is strictly confidential ...

Just one idea occurred to me for propaganda not abroad but in this country. A friend of mine in Stockholm tells me that as the Swedes didn't make films of their own one sees a lot of German and Russian films, and some of the Russian films, which of course would not normally reach this country, are unbelievably scurrilous anti-British propaganda. He referred especially to a historical film about the Crimean war. As the Swedes can get hold of these films I suppose we can; might it not be a good idea to have showings of some of them in this country ...

I read the enclosed article with interest, but it seems to me anti-religious rather than anti-semitic. For what my opinion is worth, I don't think anti-anti-semitism is a strong card to play in anti-Russian propaganda. The USSR must in practice be somewhat anti-semitic, as it is opposed both to Zionism within its own borders and on the other hand to the liberalism and internationalism of the non-Zionist Jews, but a polyglot state of that kind can never be officially anti-semitic, in the Nazi manner, just as the British Empire cannot. If you try to tie up Communism with anti-semitism, it is always possible in reply to point to people like Kaganovich or Anna Pauleer, also to the large number of Jews in the Communist parties everywhere. I also think it is bad policy to try to curry favour with your enemies. The Zionists Jews everywhere hate us and regard Britain as the enemy, more even than Germany. Of course this is based on misunderstanding, but as long as it is so I do not think we do ourselves any good by denouncing anti-semitism in other nations.

I am sorry I can't write a better letter, but I really have felt so lousy the last few days. Perhaps a bit later I'll get some ideas.

With love,
George.'

END

↑ Index

299. henry gould
Onward: Contemporary etc.
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Addendum to previous post: if you agree with Larry Price that language is not so much a thing as the shadow of a transformative activity (this is bad shorthand), the call or gesture of possible meaning, then perhaps it's not language but poetry-making which is the "constant", persistent thing pervading the "zeitgeist" - a bridge between the oracle and the prophet to the demotic & mundane (Al Cook frames his recent book around this tandem). Because, through conversation and constructive signalling, it REACHES the timebound, it becomes the door for the prophetic - doesn't transcend just the zeitgeist but ordinary Time itself (time in its tapeworm or metronome aspect) - door into the carnival, liminal, mardigras, playground area. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

300. maria damon
white rose
Thu 11 Jul 1996

hey everyone, just saw the beat exhibit at the walker art center here in mpls. i'd seeen it very briefly in nyc, but like it better in mpls (howz that for a surprise! a pleasant one). i was especially touched by the way jay defeo's white rose is lit --it has a radiance that seems to come from inside of it, that makes it look as if its actually growing larger and breathing as one gazes --and the short film of its removal from her sf apt (by --is it bruce conners?) almost had me in tears. i think it's going west (ca) next, tho i'm not sure where. sf? probly. and get this, the African American special collections at the university's library has the original typed ms of an unpublished bob kaufman poem, "hospitalgram," now on display in the exhibit. wow. my very own institution finally has something i can write home about. maybe this'll be a good year after all. optimistically yrs, md

↑ Index

301. David Baratier
Re[2]: List wars
Thu 11 Jul 1996

testing

↑ Index

302. Dean Taciuch
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry
Thu 11 Jul 1996

> P.S.-- yes, I know it wasn't that simple for Olson.

I'm working now on recasting the paper I read at Orono--it was on Olson and Wittgenstein (and there was a short passage on Buddhist methods as well). Anyway, yes, coming from a Wittgensteinian perspective, Olson's "stance" runs into a limit:I had cast this in terms of language games--within a particular game, one can try to "project" ("from where the poet got it, over to, etc"). But once one leaves that game, there's the limit of common usage. The example, for me, is Olson's vision or version of the Maya--as much as he sets them up as models for the projective stance, they're not. As much as he admires their way of being in the world, he can't be them. And the language he uses to describe them (as "animals") reveals the limits of the language (Western aesthetics) he has available to him, the language game in which he is involved.

I want to explore the individual applications of this--to what extent do these limits exist between individuals in the same language game?

"Limits / are what any of us / are inside of"

↑ Index

303. Dean Taciuch
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

> What I find suggestive in this thread about poetics is all that, in it, points toward the "problem" of poetic language. The bit Rod paraphrased from Olson is of course relatively early. A much more accurate token of Olson's practice would be the Black Chrysanthemum: that which exists through itself is what is called meaning. But that which exists in and of itself isn't necessarily going to be FOR itself or even for _an_ other. That is, as a term it's going to exist outside language.

Compare Wittgestein's formulation of meaning as "use." That keeps it within the langauge, doesn't it? And does Olson's sense of the "only absolute" as "this instant, in action" bring him closer to Wittgestein's sense of meaning ("in action" -- "in use")? That is, that which exists in and of itself within this instant, in action, would be use. I'm sure I'm oversimplifying here; I mean, Olson doesn't simply collapse into Wittgenstein. But can such an approach point out the limits of Olson's stance (or of _any_ stance)?

Dean Taciuch

↑ Index

304. Emily Lloyd
Re: maria/&performance
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Rob Hardin--ok, one last time, because I couldn't tell if you'd read my response to Eryque before you wrote your response to him--nowhere in my post did I say "white male." Nowhere! When I say "white-membered," and you assume white male, that's problematic (unless you thought that "member" was used in the euphemistic anatomical sense). To read it as male when it isn't specified that way is not to read it, but to have a knee-jerk reaction (assuming I'd "bash" white males) or to be wildly male-centric. So, what's on that sandwich? & please, no "look ma, I'm marginalized!" contests, ok? Really reductionary. "I myself am a newcomer who doesn't take said colonization for granted" reflects more on you (not a value judgment, there) than on whether or not there's "colonization." over & over & out, emily

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Emily Lloyd [redacted]
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"Emily said Emily said, Emily
is admittedly Emily"--G. Stein

↑ Index

305. Jordan Davis
Loesser NY sch pts
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Rod-- it says Bibliophasia Reprint Service... epigram's from Lewis Warsh, "...my life with each new drug starting anew...", toc reads as follows, Dick Gallup, Larry Fagin, Charlie Vermont, Kit Robinson, Tom Veitch, Joe Brainard, Stephen Rodefer, Joseph Ceravolo, Alice Notley, Lewis Warsh, Maureen Owen, Hilton Obenzinger, Merrill Gilfillan, Alan Senauke, Harris Schiff, Bernadette Mayer, Anne Waldman, Jamie MacInnis, Ted Greenwald, Bill Berkson, Alan Bernheimer, Tony Towle, Simon Schuchat, Michael Brownstein, John Godfrey, Robert Creeley, Peter Schjeldahl, Tom Clark, Michael-Sean Lazarchuck, Jim Brodey.. 'it' is th little golden book of lesser ny school poets.. J

↑ Index

306. Jordan Davis
W's fly, lppl's ground
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Some problems with flies and bottles:
    There may be sugar in the bottle.
    It may be a Klein bottle.

That is, poetry is not _only_ a game with restrictive rules, but it can productively be so. Or, someone accustomed to thinking of poetry writing as rule-governed behavior would think of the 'call-forward' of language as a rule-system that was claiming transcendence from rule-systems? Inspiration? What film studies people call 'diogesis'?

Rules is obviously the wrong word.

Is calling it 'language' positing it as a 'thing'? Reification as productive mistake. Normalization, enforcement, of productive mistakes as tyranny?

More please about this 'calling-forward'.

Jordan

↑ Index

307. Mark Wallace

critics vs. poets (tag team round three)

Thu 11 Jul 1996

Dear Maria:

Absolutely I would not suggest that poetry critics get off this list--the presence of yourself, Marjorie Perloff, many others too numerous to name make this list both more engaging and complex AND intellectually frustrating, which for the most part is all to the good. I guess my thinking has more to do with the social structures that intersect with/underlie the roles of both poet and poetry critic. We'd all like to think of ourselves as individuals, because we are, but it can be much more difficult to recognize that we are also all moving inside a very complex institutionalized social network that we simultaneously critique and constitute, to various degrees (and even those people on this list who don't work in colleges--and thankfully there are many of them--have some relation to other kinds of institutionalization).

At the various colleges where I teach part-time, I would absolutely love to have colleagues like yourself, that is, literary theorists and critics who recognize not only that contemporary poetry is a worthwhile endeavor, but even, frankly, that it exists. I don't want to name names here, but at one college where I teach, the one critic who knew anything about contemporary poetry was let go after several years (funding, etc), and there are only several other people who have even HEARD of language poetry, say. At another where I teach, I've become good friends with an older scholar who studied with Yvor Winters, and has a different sense of poetics entirely (he does, however, teach Ashbery and O'Hara, say) and yet has come to like me because it seems to him that I'm one of the few people in the department who actually reads contemporary poetry (there are some others, poets primarily but not exclusively). There are certainly mainly good scholars at both schools, but poetry is simply not a primary concern for many critics at the moment ANYWHERE, as you well know. This older scholar, for instance, is fond of complaining about someone else in the department who once said to him, "But you know, we don't want to privelege literature."

So I guess I would say that the problem is not the presence of individuals like yourself, by any means, but rather a cultural environment in which, increasingly, critics read other critics as if those other critics were the only "field" of writing that matters much. Clearly, inside such a situation, critics like yourself and Marjorie and Peter Quartermain, etc, constitute a presence that can be only beneficial to poets. On the other hand, the fact remains that inside an academic context, only certain kinds of writing are allowed to be labelled "critical." That, for instance, was one of the points behind the collection I've mentioned on this list before, A POETICS OF CRITCISM, edited by Juliana Spahr, Kristin Prevallet, Pam Rehm, and myself--in that collection were a whole host of clearly "critical" essays which, because of their non-standard form, simply can't be recognized as such in any institutional context. Do their writers want such recognition? In some cases yes, in some cases, probably no. But until a whole multiplicity of writing processes are recognized as "critical," I think that even those poets highly aware of criticism and literary theory will continue to have skepticism not so much of individual critics, but of a whole institutionalized system which valorizes the "dispassionate, objective" observer at the expense of any other mode of critical engagement.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

308. James Brook
Re: George Orwell, informer (fwd)
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Pierre, thanks for forwarding the disheartening news about George Orwell.

It's sad to hear that he aided--or attempted to aid--secret British anticommunist propaganda and provided the names of "unreliable" people. On the other hand, it's not shocking that he did so. At the end of the Second World War the independent left was fragmented and disorganized, and Stalinism was triumphant. Many anti- Stalinist leftists found it tempting to support Western liberal democracy against what they considered the greater enemy--just as they had supported liberal democracy against the Nazis. After all, it was the separate efforts of the Nazis, supporting Franco, and the Communists, supporting the Spanish Republic, that crushed all chances for a social revolution during the Spanish Civil War, in which Orwell fought. (This story is told very well in Ken Loach's recent film, Land and Freedom.) I think this is the context for Orwell's turn--a turn parodied thirty years later by Octavio Paz, who came to see the U.S. as a great friend in the struggle against what Reagan called "the Evil Empire." (Speculating on personal motivation, I imagine that Orwell felt desperate and isolated. But Paz? I don't know--was it stupidity and opportunism? And then there's the question of the writers and poets who remained true to their fascism and Stalinism; e.g., Pound and Neruda.)

--James Brook

↑ Index

309. Michael Davidson research stipends at ANP
Thu 11 Jul 1996

The Archive for New Poetry at the University of California, San Diego is offering small stipends (ca $500.00) to graduate students and scholars interested in working in the archive. The funds can cover travel expenses or lodging/per diem while in San Diego. The Archive, in addition to its extensive collection of small press poetry monographs, magazines, broadsides and tapes, owns the papers of a number of writers: George Oppen, Charles Reznikoff, James Schuyler, Jerome Rothenberg, Joanne Kyger, Paul Blackburn, Lyn Hejinian, Ron Silliman, Joe Brainard, Jackson MacLow, Clayton Eshleman, John Taggart, David Bromige, editor, Donald Allen, United Artists Press. For further information about the stipends, contact Lynda Claassen, Dept. of Special Collections, University Library, University of California, San Diego, La Jolla, CA 92093 ([redacted]).

↑ Index

310. Robert A Harrison
Re(2): maria--/& performance
Thu 11 Jul 1996

---

eryque,

> could someone explain to me why, more or less, any marginalized group of people would want to come into an area that is quite clearly not theirs (economically speaking), has been colonized so thouroughly as to be left dead for all newcomers?

can't speak for anyone else of course, and not to paint a picture of myself as being marginalized, those details incredibly complicated as they are for anyone else, but ... a simple response an attempt to start at one might be because the space belongs to no one else either.

does this space belong even to those who write to it the most? no

bob harrison

↑ Index

311. Rod Smith
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Judy-- I'd like to hear more abt the Abrams book. Terence McKenna's an interesting nut dealing a bit with similar issues. How, exactly, does "the alphabet distort perception"

Henry--
we seem to be talking past each other. You wrote

"I think we're all roaring with hunger for those very packages, & that's why packaged truth, & poetry, & anthologies, are so winning... "

in response to my "many APR folks seem to see meaning as a package to be delivered."

I wasn't talking about commodification's pros or cons, at all. Nor was I talking about mastering historical epics -- a truth package I'd just as soon send back unopened thank you. I'm talking Wittgenstein & Tsong Khapa, you're talking Hegel (which is cool) & Helen Vendler (which sucks) -- seems a little hopeless, but maybe not.

Your question "Why do some artworks still grip us while others seem hackneyed by timebound blinders?" -- The key word in this sentence for me is "us." It privileges the "masterpiece" over the "timebound." & who decides what's hackneyed & on what basis is a question that matters. Is that "us" the Zeitgeist you're talking? Is it some kinda Jungian thing, this Zeitgeist? Or worse, some kinda ideologically unaware masquerade with power aplenty. This seems the appeal of Jameson's totalizing in academia, the idea that "the era" can be apprehended-- when such almost always turns out to be an exercise in excluding/dismissing what don't fit the critic's lens cap. . . . I wouldn't dismiss it, but. . . I would like to be able to.

Rod

↑ Index

312. henry
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

On Thu, 11 Jul 1996 12:32:32 -0400 Rod Smith said:
>we seem to be talking past each other. You wrote
>
>"I think we're all roaring with hunger for those very packages, & that's >why packaged truth, & poetry, & anthologies, are so winning... "

>
>in response to my "many APR folks seem to see meaning as a package to be >delivered."
>
>I wasn't talking about commodification's pros or cons, at all. Nor was I >talking about mastering historical epics -- a truth package I'd just as soon >send back unopened thank you. I'm talking Wittgenstein & Tsong Khapa, you're >talking Hegel (which is cool) & Helen Vendler (which sucks) -- seems a little >hopeless, but maybe not.

Now you do got me confused, Rod. Maybe I am missing the finer grain (linguistics Wittgensteinian) of what you're saying, granted. But my "roaring with hunger" comment does seem apropos to your making a distinction between "APR folks" & us avant-garde Eastern folks. My response is that absorbing ideas & hunches in bits & pieces small & large is just a human trait. As for historical epics - huh? When did I bring that in? Helen Vendler? Wha?

> Your question "Why do some artworks still grip us while others seem hackneyed by > timebound blinders?" -- The key word in this sentence for me is "us." It privileges the "masterpiece" over the "timebound." & who decides what's hackneyed & on what basis is a question that matters. Is that "us" the Zeitgeist you're talking? Is it some kinda Jungian thing, this Zeitgeist? Or worse, some kinda ideologically unaware masquerade with power aplenty. This seems the appeal of Jameson's totalizing in academia, the idea that "the era" can be apprehended-- when such almost always turns out to be an exercise in excluding/dismissing what don't fit the critic's lens cap. . . . I wouldn't dismiss it, but. . . I would like to be able to.

Let me quote from Hermann Nautical of Liebfraumilch Univ. again on this one: "Der Zeitgeist, ja. Der Zeitgeist, vell let me zee. Ja. Vell. Iss ven owl de multifuriowze aspektes uff de hysterical period, ja, ezpecially in de art un kultur, exhibit ein kind uff unity of characterizticks und exprezzions across de many many varied fielts uff endeavors. Unt let me recomment to you unt to everyboody on de liszt a ferry interesting book in dis regardt: "Terrible Honesty" by Ann Douglas, about 20s New York in de US uff A." - And let me just add to Prof. Nautical's comments the following: you say the key word is "us". I assume you mean as in Goethe's famous remark, "The enemy is us." Whut ah wuz tryin t'say wuz that the really heavy-duty poetry, drama, prose, etc. has this primordial human quality that conquers all the particular "us's" of a particular age - those cussed us's that usually vaunt what is most timebound as the "great works of the age". Of course in the suspicious academia of today any expression of overly-strong emotion for past works of art is regarded as hopelessly recherche, don't you think? - Henry Gould

↑ Index

313. Judy Roitman

Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics

Thu 11 Jul 1996

> Well, an eastern or Wittgensteinian approach wld be a contextual approach-- an understanding of context as multiply & complexly constitutive. The emphasis being not only on what we can "compute" but also upon acknowledgement that any given context is more complexly constituted than one can apprehend-- which is why intuition is such a powerful & real aspect of our experience & also why it is so individualized.
>
> *Seems to me both Wittgenstein & aspects of buddhist & taoist thought share a concern with pointing out limits of apprehension & using them. One cld also talk about Duchamp in these terms.*

Many thanks, Rod, for the clarification.

I would add, at least for Buddhist thought (and I think it's true for Wittgenstein as well) that it is not only context, but that language necessarily distorts/hides/distracts/etc., language as the great deceiver. Was this implicit in your comments? No news here, but often forgotten. I think this is what Wittgenstein means by his "fly out of the fly-bottle" remark, but not being a Wittgenstein scholar am relying on intuition here.

Also, at least some Buddhist practices hold up the hope of direct apprehension -- "limits of apprehension" are (themselves) delusions, cut through them and BINGO there you be. But the categories used to describe context are not relevant here, being, you should excuse the expression, empty.

Cheers.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

314. Aldon L. Nielsen door prize --
Thu 11 Jul 1996

The first person to correctly identify Paul Laurence Dunbar as the author of the poem "To a Captious Critic" is the incredibly well-read Alan Golding -- who gets as his prize a lovely paperback volume of literary criticism (just what he wants more of, no doubt) --

Watch this space for further contests -- keep reading those poems!

↑ Index

315. Charles Alexander
poecrititry
Thu 11 Jul 1996

These battles between poets & critics seem to be forgetting that some of the best critics are poets. Like Rachel Blau du Plessis & Charles Bernstein & Ron Silliman & many others.

Personally I tend to read a lot more essays/criticism by "poets" than I do by "scholars," but even stating this makes my stomach turn a bit, as if assuming that these are necessarily separate camps. Are they? Why?

BUT I am not certain this fact is so recognized by the editors/sponsors of such journals as PMLA, ELH, Contemporary Literature, & various others. I am definitely speaking off the hip here, and without recent experience with so-called scholarly journals, and would love to be corrected to find out that, say, one of these journals would be as open to a critical piece written by a non-university poet with no Ph.D., as, for example, a journal like Chain is to an essay by Maria Damon or a poem by a lit professor with full accreditation.

I hope I'm not adding flame to the fire, as I'd really rather heal the rifts between poets & critics than extend them.

charles

↑ Index

316. Rod Smith
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Henry wrote: "As for historical epics - huh? When did I bring that in?
 Helen
Vendler? Wha?"

On 7/10 Henry wrote:
"It's language talking through the obsessions and neuroses & sleepwalking and timeserving of an era - not denying it, but mastering it & throwing light on it" also the term "zeitgeist" you used originally & since is defined as "the spirit of the time." May be a little unfair to accuse you of Vendlerism but confidence in the existence of a or the "zeitgeist" seems loaded with that crap to me. This is not to deny historical processes-- but they are that, I believe, processes, multiple, & only partially apprehendable. I like the Goethe ("The enemy is us") but of course from many perspectives the enemy is legitimately "them."

You said today: "Whut ah wuz tryin t'say wuz that the really heavy-duty poetry, drama, prose, etc. has this primordial human quality that conquers all the particular "us's" of a particular age"

This I don't believe. For me it is a matter of use-- I read Shakespeare or Dickinson or Oppen not because they have "conquered" but because they are _of use_. I prefer that construct to the idea that they have acheived some sort of summation, & insist that what will be of use for one won't necessarily be for another, or even for the same person at different times in their life.

"Its apparition is the mold of it"

Rod

↑ Index

317. George Bowering
Re: Thomas
Thu 11 Jul 1996

I remember Lorenzo Thomas from the early sixties as a Long Island poet, I think. There was one magazine that misprinted his name as Lorenzo Toomes. Or is that somethin i didnt know about?

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

318. william marsh
Re: e-mail politics
Wed 31 Dec 1969

Mark & others,

to offer one response to the "riddle" -- "I'll bet if you said 'poetry and poetry criticism' have a fundamentally generative and symbiotic relation, a larger proportion of those people who write criticism mainly would agree, wheras a lesser number of people who mainly write poetry would agree." -- although i admit i'm not exactly sure how the discussion got to this end, it seems odd to me that it has, since distinctions between so-called "poetic" and "critical" writings, as you point out, have been effectively eradicated, most profoundly by those poet/theorists (Susan Howe, Charles Bernstein, among several others) whose work is very much concerned with blurring the disinction.

my first impulse, for the sake of responding to your question, is to group myself among those who "mainly write poetry", but i quickly stumble over such a categorization due in most part to the fact that when i write, i do so in such a 'critically' engaged manner that the distinction is fruitless and, in my mind, wrongly put. i'd say that any thoughtful writing is critical _and_ poetic by nature, moreso that the critical and poetic "elements" of which you speak are twin directives in any thoughtful engagement of language, and really shouldn't be posed diametrically.

elsewhere Mark writes that he finds himself "inevitably siding with poetry and poets," even though he recognizes that "poetry criticism is unavoidable." perhaps i misconstrue the body of writing he means to identify by "poetry criticism," but in any event what could possibly motivate a "side" taking of this kind? and to say that it's "unavoidable" is almost as damning as to consider it "avoidable," since both suggest that criticism is somehow painfully endured.

bill marsh

↑ Index

319. Henry
Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics
Thu 11 Jul 1996

On Thu, 11 Jul 1996 14:38:26 -0400 Rod Smith said: >Henry wrote: "As for historical epics - huh? When did I bring that in?
> Helen >Vendler? Wha?"
>
>On 7/10 Henry wrote:

>"It's language talking through the obsessions and >neuroses & sleepwalking and timeserving of an era - not denying it, but >mastering it & throwing light on it"

Well, I guess that proves it. Heck, when you said "historical epics" I thought you were talking about a genre of poetry or something! Shows how wrong you can be. My mistake. Should have never used the term. But wait a minute - didn't YOU use the term? Huh?
>
>also the term "zeitgeist" you used originally & since is defined as "the >spirit of the time." May be a little unfair to accuse you of Vendlerism but >confidence in the existence of a or the "zeitgeist" seems loaded with that >crap to me. This is not to deny historical processes-- but they are that, I >believe, processes, multiple, & only partially apprehendable. I like the >Goethe ("The enemy is us") but of course from many perspectives the enemy is >legitimately "them."

Vendlerism - is that like - retailing?

> You said today: "Whut ah wuz tryin t'say wuz that the really heavy-duty poetry, drama, prose, etc. has this primordial human quality that conquers all the particular "us's" of a particular age"
>
> This I don't believe. For me it is a matter of use-- I read Shakespeare or Dickinson or Oppen not because they have "conquered" but because they are _of use_. I prefer that construct to the idea that they have acheived some sort of summation, & insist that what will be of use for one won't necessarily be for another, or even for the same person at different times in their life.

Funny - I read the same people because they're totally useless. - Henry

↑ Index

320. Rod Smith

Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics

Thu 11 Jul 1996

Judy wrote: "I would add, at least for Buddhist thought (and I think it's true for Wittgenstein as well) that it is not only context, but that language necessarily distorts/hides/distracts/etc., language as the great deceiver."

Certainly this is true for certain of Zen, but not for the Mahayana school-- Tibetan Buddhism puts great emphais on book learnin'. & Zen is deeply textual & verbal-- the emphasis on the koan etc.

& also J wrote: "at least some Buddhist practices hold up the hope of direct apprehension -- "limits of apprehension" are (themselves) delusions, cut through them and BINGO there you be."

Yes, the emphasis on the breakthrough-- which leads to that grt quote, can't remember which teacher: "Now that I'm enlightened I'm as miserable as ever." Reminds me of that great master George Bowering. . .

A favorite Wittgenstein quote, which Joan Retallack has in 4 or 5 different languages scattered about her house:

"For what reply does one make to someone who says: 'I believe it merely strikes you as if you knew that?'"

to which I addend in Aerial 5 David Tudor's "If you don't know why do you ask?"

But wld like to hear from you more specifics on Abrams or your take on language's distortions, is he arguing for a less absrtact iconicity?

--rrpfet

↑ Index

321. Charles Smith
Ken Irby
Thu 11 Jul 1996

I'd like thank Ron for the detailed & sympathetic analysis of Irby's poem, which points the way toward the richness of sound patterns embedded there. The music in Ken's poetry has always struck me as extraordinary--carefully constructed & 'scored' on the page, insistent in its certainties. Ron pointed to Ken's use & development of Olson's caesura, noting that Irby's lines are seldom breath based. Irby's musicality derives just as much from things he learned from Duncan, & even more I think, from Bunting & Zukofsky. (When I mention Bunting, I'm thinking specifically of the use of consonants Peter Quartermain demonstrates in his piece on Whitman, Pound, Bunting.) But Zukofsky still seems to be the richest source Ken has developed (maybe because Zukofsky has such rich musical resources to offer?).

From the sequence "Etudes", also from the book _Call Steps_:

call snow draw cold moon sawm

comb new leaver lean

so shadows dough

or take a look at "{requiem etudes 7 for Louis Zukofsky}" which closes "Etudes." I'd also recommend to anyone who didn't see it, his review (it's really more than that) of Michelle Leggott's _Reading Zukofsky's 80 Flowers_ that appeared in Sulfur a few years ago (& curiously has been his only appearance in that magazine i believe, although he was a frequent contributor to Caterpillar).

The reasons for the neglect of Ken's work seem complicated & have always confused me. Part of it rests on his shoulders; he doesn't seek much attention for himself. But _Call Steps_ received a remarkably quiet reception; the only notices I'm aware of are a short, impressionistic piece by Ben Friedlander that appeared in _Notus_, & a longer take by Stephen Ellis in _Poetics Briefs_. (If anyone is aware of others, I'd appreciate hearing about them.) His work was excluded from both the Hoover & Weinberger anthologies; thankfully there is a good selection in the Messerli (including the sequence "Heredom" Ron was writing about).

To subsume Irby's work as "carrying forward the Olsonian project" as Ron did is to pigeonhole it & to give short shrift to its scope. I can't help but think Ken was one of the casualties of the late 70's/early 80's poetry wars; his work had some things in common w/ the emerging Language poetry & he himself read it with interest, but never fell in step w/ the 'movement.' Poems appeared in an early issue of Barry Watten's magazine, This, & Lyn Hejinian published _Archipelago_ in the Tuumba series. But as the lines became more fiercely drawn, people like Irby & Ron Johnson started to fade from sight in that milieu. I'm really not in a position to know how much that had to do with Ken & how much had to with the literary politics of that time & am curious how others view this.

We are left now with _Call Steps_ as the most recent , readily available book which collects work only through 1979!!!!! That leaves over 15 years of writing out of circulation. As Paul Naylor noted, Lee Chapman has been publishing recent work in _First Intensity_. Some poems also appeared in _:that_ a few years ago. A chapbook of 11 poems was letterpress printed at Naropa in 1994, _Antiphonal And Fall To Fall_ in an edition of 200 & has never been distributed. If anyone is interested, I have the address & phone number (as of last fall) of Patrick Tillery who printed it, and Ken himself may still have some copies. BTW, although the Tansy _Catalpa_ is long gone (& a candidate for a Sun & Moon classic?), John Moritz of Tansy was closing the press & advertising copies of the 2nd edition of _To Max Douglas_ a year or two ago, so they may still be around somewhere.

There are many writers today who consider Irby one of the important (& most neglected!) poets of his generation. His engagement with the long line is one of the more interesting & unique today. Where are the critics & publishers?

I'll close this with a poem from _Antiphonal And Fall To Fall_:

Would you take the diaphany of ivory and of brightness to be behind the name, and power,

and carry into the portraying and then into the writing by the way the ear itches from the air the elephant of interior grace and strength or the bear of insistent nub just by the style itself and not by any subject of depiction an elegy of cradle song for the mother, and that for the nations and for history, and for the full orchestra an extended fantasy in meditation for the father, solo, and of the touch or would that be reversed, or would there be the elephant and bear of crossed arms to wonder at hanging not in what is made but in its air, swinging

↑ Index

322. Judy Roitman

Re: Onward: Contemporary Poetry & Poetics

Thu 11 Jul 1996

> Judy--
> I'd like to hear more abt the Abrams book. Terence McKenna's an interesting nut dealing a bit with similar issues. How, exactly, does "the alphabet distort perception"

David Abram is coming from a magician's/shaman's as well as a phenomenologist's (sp? my spell-checker broke) perspective, so he sees intimate connections (complex and not reductive, but essential, connections) among language, meaning, the body, the world. He sees the alphabet as breaking that connection, forcing the mind away from body sensations/ground of experience, and into an abstract realm in which human constructs mediate perception rather than perception creating human constructs. Learning how to read essentially changes the nature of consciousness. Having a dyslexic son, I'm not so sure that he isn't right.

He somewhat exempts the Hebrew alphabet from his general condemnation, because it is still grounded in pictures -- aleph is an ox (do I remember the icon correctly?) etc. and he has a long eloquent section towards the end of his book on some of classical mystical uses of the Hebrew alphabet.

He does not claim total originality for these views, and acknowledges his sources. Terrence McKenna may be one of these. And I am leaving out in this discussion his real motivation, which is to provide a deep philosophical justification for radical ecology. I think it's fair to say that in his view it's a short step from the alphabet to the shopping mall. Having a dyslexic son, I'm somewhat skeptical.

It was a conversation with David that triggered a major shift in my own work, for which I am most grateful. "Interesting nut" yeah, well, not a bad thing to be.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

323. Christina Fairbank Chirot
re Irby reviews
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Thanks to Charles Smith for his excellent message re Ken Irby's work. A review of Call Steps by Edward Schelb appeared in Sulfur 36, and Schelb quotes from Irby's comments on Lansing in the Talisman Lansing issue just out.

To Max Douglas is available at Woodland Pattern Book Center here in Milwaukee.

Here is their address and phone:
720 East Locust Street
Milwaukee, WI. 53212

[redacted]

I'd highly recommend the book--3 long poems--one of which, "Delius" has as theme music.

LISTEN--

dave baptiste chirot

↑ Index

324. Charles Smith
Re: white rose
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Maria,

Yes, the film about Jay deFeo's "White Rose" was done by Bruce Conner. I got to see it in 1990 when Bruce showed it in conjunction w/ an exhibition at trhe Natsoulas Gallery in Davis documenting the art & activities surrounding the 6

Gallery. That exhibit followed on the heels of another one documenting the King Ubu Gallery, run by Robert Duncan,Jess & Harry Jacobus, which had earlier occupied the same space. Exhibition catalogues from both shows were issued & are probably still available from:

Natsoulas Gallery
132 E Street
Davis, CA 95616
[redacted]

Looking forward to seeing the Beat show when it comes out here.

all best,
charles

↑ Index

325. Jordan Davis
The High Points
Thu 11 Jul 1996

To the keeper of the tone--please back up.
As one who has been hit by a broom,
I would ask the language not to explain itself
But http://www.pma.com
To adjust the valves, what about you?
In world overlap, get calm
And consider
That's the way, or how bout

Rod--what are the conditions on that use? Terms of rental? (Or, how to get closer, to be more [perpetually] useful?) J

↑ Index

326. Hank Lazer
Re: Aldon, Hayden, "American Journal"
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Aldon wrote:

> --Hank: whenever you feel you have the time, I'd be interested in hearing more of your take on "American Journal" -- That's a poem I've never been able to enjoy, and I'd like to hear from somebody who has worked with it more than I have -- I talked with Hayden any number of times about the poem, but it seemed a stretch to me -- I always thought it was the occasional poem he felt he had to write as Poetry Consultant -- but I suspect there's more to it than that --

Aldon, and anyone else who's interested:

Thanks for alerting me to the fact that the poem was an occasional composition. I was unaware. I had approached "American Journal" as a slightly different take on Hayden's universalism. What interests me in "AJ" is the sci fi construction that Hayden gives it (similar to the various agent-observers in Doris Lessing's _Canopus in Argos_ series). Hayden begins, "here among them the americans this baffling/ multi people." For me, Hayden's position as alien must involve some self-criticism and some degree of self-mockery. He says that his task is to "disguise myself in order to study them unobserved/ in their varied pigmentations." So, Hayden's distance from "them" (cf. Oppen in "Of Being Numerous"?) becomes exaggerated in "AJ," and for me asks for some re-thinking of his strategies in other poems, essays, and interviews to achieve a similar position outside the conflicts and identities that both trouble and exalt him. In "AJ" he calls "america as much a problem in metaphysics as/ it is a nation." And I remain intrigued by Hayden's use of a conversational mode (and spacing) in the poem. Did he ever tell you, Aldon, why he put the poem on the page that way? I'd be interested. Back to the poem--I'm also struck by the way that sensuality in "AJ" (as in many of Hayden's other poems) constitutes a confusion and a disturbance. In this poem, he does begin to give in:

> confess i am curiously drawn unmentionable to > the americans doubt i could exist among them for > long however psychic demands far too severe > much violence much that repels i am attracted > none the less their variousness their ingenuity > their elan vital and that some thing essence > quiddity i cannot penetrate or name

For me, this poem, by the extremism of its sci fi plot, brings out tensions (of identity and repulsion) that are present throughout the earlier poems (such as "The Whipping"). Perhaps on its own, not a poem worth lots of attention, but as a last poem, of interest?

Hank

↑ Index

327. Carnography

*Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.*

Thu 11 Jul 1996

---

1. (Uttered in a nasal, pestering monotone):

Were Pound and Eliot poets or critics? What about Mathew Arnold?

Was Sir Walter Raleigh an explorer or a writer?

Is Charles Bernstein an ip-ap-grrr-whing or a critic?

What was like Campion, who wrote treatises on prosody?
What were Peacock and Shelley, who wrote long essays on poetics?

(Since many studious poets have written critical essays, and some do so regularly, the dichotomy between critic and poet strikes me as problematic.)

Are essays on poetics in a different category than other critical/historical/linguistic essays on poetry? Did Saintsbury address less practical poetic concerns than William Empson and Yvor Winters? If not, is he a critic?

§§§

level, "free" and "formalist" poetry do not strike me as very different. The distinction seems an impediment, a cliche.

§§§

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

328. Jordan Davis
oh
Thu 11 Jul 1996

---

so then as off
a thing as we is how-- as a co-op board would go to meat

to me
to me

and there be a good

↑ Index

329. Carnography
Re: maria/&performance
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Emily:

> Rob Hardin--ok, one last time, because I couldn't tell if you'd read my response to Eryque before you wrote your response to him

There is often a delay in receiving posts. I'd written my response hours before both of our responses were forwarded to me by UB Poetics.

> *--nowhere in my post did I say "white male." Nowhere! When I say "white-membered," and you assume white male, that's problematic (unless you thought that "member" was used in the euphemistic anatomical sense).*

You've caught me on that one. My apologies, member. I stand corrected.

(However, your racial classification is no less suspect than the gender classification that I wrongly attributed to you, honk honk.)

> To read it as male when it isn't specified that way is not to read it, but to have a knee-jerk reaction (assuming I'd "bash" white males) or to be wildly male-centric.

However, you haven't caught anyone here. A contextual mistake does not imply a sexist motive. What I read was the context of arguments I'd heard before, arguments in which the word "male" was used instead of member. As I said above, that was my mistake. However, your conclusions about me partake of what you would protest.

Just as it would be absurd for me to insist that you secretly "meant" male in your post, so it is equally absurd of you to posit motives and emotional twitches that are not evident in my response. If I'm going to be wildly "male-centric," you'll need to lend me your bongos.

Also: saying that I'm "wildly male-centric" is as sexist as it would be for me to say that you were hysterical.

> on that sandwich? & please, no "look ma, I'm marginalized!" contests, ok?

On the contrary: it was you who raised the subject of marginalization. Enryque fleshed it out and initiated the contest with his complaint of a lack of space for marginalized people. I merely responded by pointing out that, by his definition, I am marginalized, yet I find no evidence of the racial/economic suppresson of marginalized groups on UB Poetics. Being vocal here isn't a question of privilege (unless one addresses the economic considerations involved in being on the internet ($400 for a passable computer, $85 for a modem, and $25 per month for a SLIP account.). It is a question of whether or not people have the courage to speak when they must and the self-control to restrain themselves when they shouldn't. (In their terms, not mine.)

> "I myself am a newcomer who doesn't take said > colonization for granted" reflects more on you (not a value judgment, there) > than on whether or not there's "colonization."

Enryque's generalization about cultural colonization impacted on all "marginalized" newcomers. I myself am a "marginalized" newcomer to whom the generalization does not apply. Therefore it is the generalization that is reductive and not my own example of its inconsistency.

By the way: suggesting that I reveal more about myself than about you reveals more about you than it does about me, and I hope you will write back to say that my statement about your statement reveals more about my last statement than it does about your statement before that one, and so on and so forth, ad infinitum and stir vigorously, whap that Sackbutt and ring around the Rosicrucian.

(Ignore that outburst, E. I just felt like doing that.)

And by the bye (and I do mean bye (but not really)): My response to Enryque and to you was mostly a joke! I don't recall saying anything seriously derogatory about you, your argument or anything else. I even said I presumed your intentions were good. (And just when I'd concluded that humor was the best way to dispel the tension in a debate.)

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

330. Charles Alexander
Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
Thu 11 Jul 1996

> Hey Mark,
>
> *Is Charles Bernstein's Artifice of Absorption poetry, lit crit, crit theory, or what?*
>
> Burt

Yes

(oh but i'm not mark)

↑ Index

331. George Bowering
Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
Thu 11 Jul 1996

> Hey Mark,
>
> *Is Charles Bernstein's Artifice of Absorption poetry, lit crit, crit theory, or what?*
>
> Burt
>
> Yes
>
> (oh but i'm not mark)

[hell, neither am I!]

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

332. Burt Kimmelman
Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
Thu 11 Jul 1996

Hey Mark,

Is Charles Bernstein's Artifice of Absorption poetry, lit crit, crit theory, or what?

Burt

↑ Index

333. Jordan Davis
trouble in river
Thu 11 Jul 1996

that's the word.. debate!

which reminds me of a poem a ninth grader wrote:

Mickey Mouse turned 60 today.
He still looks as young as 60 years ago.
He's still the handsomest mouse in show biz.
If only people could age
as well as him.
I bet he didn't have to write while holding his breath.

--Sarah Blonstein, School for the Physical City

↑ Index

334. filch
satire #2
Thu 11 Jul 1996

<html><head><title>poets vs. critics</title><base href="http://www.chronotope.com/epcone/"></head><body bgcolor="#ffffff" link="#000000" alink="#000000" vlink="#000000"><blockquote>Studies have shown the incidence of peeing in pools to be larger, by far, among members of the adult male population. Subsequent studies will show whether this figure can be broken down by race, socioeconomic status, and/or sexual orientation. If you would be interested in participating in such a study please contact me at your earliest convenience. </blockquote></body><html>

↑ Index

335. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

word, thing narrative.

Thu 11 Jul 1996

The Dreary Familiar, That Story
  ... reading _Where I Stopped_, another of them

Odysseus came back from his war, tells the stories to _Poetry_, to Namebrand Review. His father dies. They print that because it's important -- his father, the dying, the ironic glances and love each buries.

We never came back. We never went there.
War came when we were eleven and the uncle stuck his fingers in our Down There, when our father stopped kissing us and we stopped wanting him to. When we weren't hidden in childhood but were called out by hate spewed from cars. It came in the dorm room where we lay, still saying no as he rolled away the rock that held down our assurance.
War came and it will never leave and we will live in this everyday of it without the luxury of sitting peacefully under an olive tree and telling young men in words printed in That Significant Review because they don't signify, because the space after Troy allows the reflection of the young mens' jealousy, hope of glory and the father dying.
We will tell it, as we tell it, over and over,
in the knives and bruises and wrenching betrayals of the eternally present story.

EMC
@copyright EMC, 1996

↑ Index

336. Gabrielle Welford

ANNC: Literature resource list and publication opportunity (fwd)

Thu 11 Jul 1996

Thought this might be an opportunity for some to get word out. gab.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
New Resource Listing for Computer-Supported Writing About Literature

You're invited to contribute to a collaborative resource list for the Epiphany Project, an Annenberg/CPB project developing resources for educators. If we use sites or sources you suggest first, you will be credited as a contributor both in the project publication, A Field Guide to 21st Century Writing, and on the Epiphany Project's Web site.

Please send me a list of your favorite resources on Computer-Supported Writing About Literature. And don't hesitate to include your own, your students', and your colleagues' work.

= E-mail your suggestions to me privately, Donna Reiss <[redacted]>, by July 23 (I'm the collector of resources for this topic and will assemble and forward them to Judy Williamson, project administrator)

= Give appropriate data about the source (for example, full bibliography info about a book or article or film) and of course the URL if it's a web site, the subscription info if it's a listserv.

= Include a sentence or two annotation just to let us know why the source is notable.

= Don't forget to include info about yourself: your name and school as you want them listed; what you do/teach/or whatever; your e-mail address; if appropriate, your own home page address.

= Repost this invitation to other lists and individuals that you think would be able to offer similar resource listings.

So what's Epiphany, anyway? See their sites through the home page:
http://mason2.gmu.edu/~jwillia9/epiphany.html

Or see what they did at their summer institute in Richmond:
http://www.vcu.edu/hasweb/eng/junebug/index.html

Looking forward to your suggestions-- Donna
==========

========== Donna Reiss, Department of English, Tidewater Community College-Virginia Beach 1700 College Crescent, Virginia Beach, VA 23456 Phone: [redacted] Fax: [redacted] Internet:[redacted] VCCS-mail:[redacted] WWW Home Page:
http://www.infi.net/tcc/tcresourc/faculty/dreiss/dreiss.html

↑ Index

337. Poetics List
To a Captious Critic (fwd)
Thu 11 Jul 1996

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Thu, 11 Jul 1996 12:57:20 -0400 (EDT)
From: Alan Golding <[redacted]>
To: Poetics List <[redacted]>,
"Aldon L. Nielsen" <[redacted]>
Subject: To a Captious Critic

Associate Professor of English, U. of Louisville
Phone: [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted]

Aldon--I'm posting this to the list and backchannel to you 'cause the list has been rejecting my messages lately, for reasons not entirely (or even slightly) clear to me.

Anyway: "To a Captious Critic" is by Paul Laurence Dunbar, right? Though at first I'd mixed it up in my head with Cullen's "To Certain Critics"--worth a second look in the context of the recent conversation on the list around the race / universalism / sociology / etc. nexus, as Cullen's defense of his own aspirations to universalism (which I've always taken to be ambivalent ones). I'm guessing Cullen was a pretty important poet for Hayden, though you'd know better than I.

Happy moving, if such is possible.

All best,

Alan

↑ Index

338. Jordan Davis
summer reruns (amphetamine use of the gods...)
Fri 12 Jul 1996

---

or aporia use or asymptote use

well, or the calculus, the consciousness of limits is either, again, having a death waiting for us someplace or finding what's _sufficient_ of which I'm suspicious and often delighted, yes. but the recurring issue of speed

which everybody seems to think was a boring movie but I admired its structure at least as much as I admired the structure of back to the future i, ii, iii Keanu playing motionless for once was nice rallies me and not because I hate futurism rushing around crazily bores and flatters and being all you can be has always sent me to the refrigerator for halftime

so acknowledging "cognitive limits" is a fairly beautiful part of talking to people and I have no _need_ to take issue with Bruce or Watten except that I miss that necessary vulnerability I admire their "speed" I worry where they're going so fast though and what they step on or in on their way now O'Hara in "easter" or "hatred" although the first articulates his position as alcoholic and the second steals ruthlessly from Rimbaud and so puts him way back on the poursuivre meter is a model of speed with isolable frames unlike the blurry stills we get from more recent demons which may mean that he wasn't going as fast I think it means he had better form at any rate I'd like to get out from under this thinking of myself, ourselves as in the parameters of the recent past which has stridently claimed I think to be patrolling the borders of sense and nonsense when they are pace Larry more like barrier islands usually where the maps say but not necessarily so I'm with that wet meaning, Rod, but I wish for a superhuman ordinary life

you know like the greeks said they had it may have just been grade inflation to keep the kids out of the Trojan war but that constant praise made itself known gratefully,

Jordan

(previously posted elsewhere)
(we all say the same things over and over anyway)
(goin' mahayana on your ass)
(tarantino = gingrich)

↑ Index

339. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: The Clarify Brothers
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Hank -- "American Journal" was not, in the usual sense, an occasional poem -- What I meant was that i had always read it as the occasional poem he felt called upon to write as our (for two years anyway) sort of national poet -- meredith wrote a (much shorter) kind of national poem during his time in the office -- and thanks for your comments on the poem -- will give it a further look with that in mind

↑ Index

340. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Ur Irby and others
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Michael -- Now that's useful information -- With all my migrating northward these past years I've never had the chance to use the UCSD collection, and am now removing to another state -- will get in contact with Special Collections about possible return visit --

On Irby -- There was a special Irby issue of, I think it was, Credences many years ago that is well worth digging out and looking at again --

Ron -- If you can narrow down your Monthly Review memories to at least a year or two, I will look for those pieces before I leave town and try to xerox them for the both of us -- On the subject of Texas -- When I introduced Lorenzo Thomas at Orono I repeated something a friend of his had told him when Lorenzo decided to make the move to Houston permanent -- the friend told him: "You won't be a southern poet, you'll be a forgotten poet."

I am told, though, that there will be a book of Lorenzo Thomas poems in Germnay later this year --

Filch -- THAT ONE had me rolling on the floor with laughter -- I needed that --

AND NOW EVERYBODY --

Sterling Brown used to recite this as his example of a universal poem:

I have a belly ache

of course, this did not prevent critics from accusing him of simply belly-aching

↑ Index

341. Aldon L. Nielsen hidden Hayden
Fri 12 Jul 1996

---

lest I leave everybody even more confused, let me add that Robert Hayden's poem was occasional on at least one accasion -- It was read as the Phi Beta Kappa poem at the University of Michigan in 1976. The cover of the first edition of _American Journal_, (Effendi Press 1978) is well worth looking at -- a sort of space collage with Hayden looking on --

↑ Index

342. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Ken Irby
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Besides the credences Irby issue Aldon Nielsen pointed out on this list, Vort #3 Summer 1973 is an Irby/Bromige issue--has an excellent interview and the poem 'Jesus" later collected in To Max Douglas, as well as essays and reviews--including one on To Max Douglas by Don Byrd. An interview with Irby is also in Lee Bartlett's Talking Poetry (New Mexico Press, 1987). SPD still has Orexis--for $4.50, as well as Call Steps. Big Deal and Truck published Irby often if you have access to them and arelooking.

I woke up hearing Delius wondering why I'd forgotten making the walk to paradise ("Delius")

dave baptiste chirot

PS: thanks to Charles Smith for his comments, suggestions on finding Irby texts--Charles mentioned Ronald Johnson--new Chicago Review has interview, poetry, essays on Johnson--Vort had interview and comments (can't recall the issue number--I think from '74) well worth checking out in conjunction with Chicago review issue-- as Ark in its entirety available now from Guy Blaisdell's Living Batch Books. Johnson's Radi Os--from Sand Dollar--seems to have resurfaced in some places--"get it while you can"--

↑ Index

343. Kevin Killian
Re: white rose
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Hello everyone, it's Kevin Killian. Maria, your post (and the post of Charles Smith) about Jay de Feo inspired me to tell y'all a little bit about my new play. When the Beat Culture show comes to SF, I hope all of you who are in town for the opening can come to see my play, "Wet Paint" which Bill Berkson has asked me to stage at the SF Art Institute. This play will be the life of Jay De Feo.

Yes, I have rounded up an all-star cast to act out the different parts. Phoebe Gloeckner will have the main part, Jay De Feo, a feminist artist working in the heyday of the North Beach beat bohemia. Norma Cole will be playing Kay De Feo, her unruly twin sister, who spoils Jay's life by sneaking into her studio at night and adding yet more paint to her "Rose" picture. Leslie Scalapino and Jonathan Hammer will be playing representatives of Hallmark Cards, who have commissioned "The Rose" as a tiny little cameo piece. They like everyone else are annoyed at how large it's getting, and Jay really has no explanation. Rex Ray will be Bruce Conner. Tosh Berman, you will be glad to know that your father, Wallace Berman, will be portrayed on stage too. They were all part of the scene for sure. Let's see what else happened. I called up Michael McClure and asked him to play himself as a young man. He demurred, gee, I wonder why! He said he was too overbooked, but sympathized with my dilemma-who on the current scene is handsome, studly, sexy enough to play the young Michael McClure? (Suggestions, please). I thought it would be a great coup de theatre, all the characters would be standing around saying things like, "Hey, what's Michael McClure been up to lately?" and then he (the real Michael) would come out in those leather pants he invented. But alas, someone else will have to fill those well-worn leathers.

I'm especially gald to announce that Rebecca Solnit will be acting in my play. I hope you all know Solnit's book "Secret Exhibition: Six California Artists of the Cold War," which is really a great book about De Feo, Jess, Conner, W. Berman, George Herms and Wally Hedrick. She will be playing Frida Kahlo, and Cliff Hengst will "be" Diego Rivera. Margaret Crane will be Jay's psychiatrist, unconvinced that she really has a twin sister who is ruining her life. Scott Hewicker will play Tuesday Weld, one of the outlaw Hollywood crowd who made North Beach a kind of Hollywood North in the late 1950s, and D-L Alvarez will be the very young Janis Joplin, drawn to "The Rose" as a kind of avatar of meaning of her own confused life. There will be plenty of other parts too, so come on everybody, bring your bongos and your collage vision of California junk/funk assemblage and buy a ticket today, or be in it! Needless to say this will be yet another benefit for Small Press Traffic! Thanks!

Kevin K.

↑ Index

344. Christina Fairbank Chirot
Ken Irby
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Note: Glitch, not Big Deal (of ones I've seen)published Irby (collected in Orexis.) Bezoar also. Truck also published Enslin. Niedecker special issue #16 well worth a search.

dave baptiste chirot

↑ Index

345. Kevin Killian
Re: e-mail politics
Fri 12 Jul 1996

At 4:00 PM 12/31/69, william marsh wrote:

> distinctions between so-called "poetic"
> and "critical" writings, as you point out, have been effectively eradicated,
> most profoundly by those poet/theorists (Susan Howe, Charles Bernstein, > among several others) whose work is very much concerned with blurring the > disinction.

I think we should pause here and give tribute to those who promoted this blurring as a feminist project, particularly the editors/associate editors/contributing editors of _HOW(ever)_. Such as Kathleen Fraser, Bev Dahlen, Rachel Blau Du-Plessis, Frances Jaffer, Susan Gevirtz, Carolyn Burke, and Chris Tysh.

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

346. hnry

*Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.*

Fri 12 Jul 1996

On Thu, 11 Jul 1996 17:39:47 -0400 Carnography said:
>1. (Uttered in a nasal, pestering monotone):
>
>Were Pound and Eliot poets or critics? What about Mathew Arnold?
>
>Was Sir Walter Raleigh an explorer or a writer?
>
>Is Charles Bernstein an ip-ap-grrr-whing or a critic?
>
>What was like Campion, who wrote treatises on prosody?
>What were Peacock and Shelley, who wrote long essays on poetics?
>
>(Since many studious poets have written critical essays, and >some do so regularly, the dichotomy between critic and poet >strikes me as problematic.)

There are lots of cases of poet-critics, and every poet is a critic and probably every good critic is something of a poet; but maybe what Mark was getting at is the clashes in the arena when the center of the one activity tangles with the other.
When the informed and weaponed reader-critic becomes the arbiter of taste & the explainer of how who done what. Impossible not to cross those lines.
>
>Does anyone else here want to get down into the burial site >and discuss the texture of poetry? I'd love to know how the >rest of you read and write.

Curiosity killed the carp. You're delving into two taboo areas: "secrets of the craft", and "inspiration". I'm not criticizing, just commenting. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

347. k.a. hehir
the loveliest of all
Fri 12 Jul 1996

dreamy black unicorn vision
the god of cult studs

lurking lurking nocturnal eloquence

↑ Index

348. k.a. hehir
Pe: rformance
Fri 12 Jul 1996

hello all,

i've been away for a spell and have just waded through 212 messages, so i have a few short comments.

firstly- the second of the londonOnt poetry series takes place this monday the 15,same place and time as before - carolyn guertin, mark tovey, mike gallay, theresa smalec, kyla brown and curt moeller. now i realise that most(well,practically all)of you can't make it but if i may be allowed to use this announcement to respond to a thread. the success of the first of the series three weeks ago was due to the diversity of voices heard. at least 40 years seperated tthe some of the 8ight readers. the audience reflected the program - from graduate to high school- and had a lot of fun. how is success measured? well, 70 people sat for almost three hours with a 30 min break, drank beer and cider,clapped, laughed, were offended and asked when the next one was.

the combination of townies and university types in the crowd and ont the boards leads me to make a comment about the poet/critic melee. most poets started writing before they knew what poesis was or realised that one could make a living as a literary coroner. one young poet commented to me that the poets from the university had lost all sense of wonderment and used allusion clinically rather than as an homage. i didn't really know what to say. 10 years ago when i was eighteen i wrote this cinquain:

scholars
bumbling down corridors

bu bling down
the poets ha e set t salvation by equation
black laughs

i'm not sure how far i've come now that i pay money to talk about rimbaud in a classroom.

sorry, getting rambly on you and the text is starting to do it's own thing. but i too often think that sometimes when the critics go out to play the poets can only come along if the play net. well at least you can have a smoke when the play is at the other end.

take care,
kevin

"i won't bore you with quotation"
David Bromige

↑ Index

349. k.a. hehir
Pe :rformance
Fri 12 Jul 1996

sorry the cinquain got juiced,

scholars
bumbling down corridors
the poets have set traps no salvation by equation
black laughs

must go poster!
kevin

↑ Index

350. Larry Price
Onward
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Dear Jordan, Dean, and Henry:

My response will be direct in some cases, glancing in others. Some of this repeats another context, for which I apologize, but the things here are the points to which my thought runs concerning this, for me, largely the issue of the status of poetic language.

As much, Dean, as I'm intrigued by your enjambment of Wittgenstein and Olson, I don't think I'd ever be satisfied with a definition of meaning that accounts for it strictly in terms of language (nor for that matter, strictly in terms outside of it). And I think it was that same discomfort that elicited Wittgenstein's fly-bottle amulet. Which is to say, I've never been comfortable with that formula, Meaning is Use. It seems to shine its light only on the feet, finding there footprints leading back up the wall they've just traversed. What I intend to say is: as a term, "use" can only be a partial definition, albeit an important part. And it's true that it is "in" language, but that still leaves me in the fly-bottle. Here I agree with Elena Shvarts and Henry to this extent: I write to engender what isn't. To write what I already know, my use/age, is simply to retrace the hermeneutical (or equipmental) ring already implied in my terms and which those terms determine.

But, Henry, that hardly points to context as a set of barnacles to be mastered. As you yourself say, the writer is written. Here again, Olson with his conic sections registers the potential of limits - outside those limits. It's that intersection, call it elision of registers, that gives us most powerfully the image of what stands beside those limits.

First of all, Henry, you seem to have posed various terms - language and poetry most notably - AGAINST time. Which puzzles me, assuming as I do that temporality fundamentally constitutes all the threads of and through which we are written. And (what I really want to say) just as THEY are constitutive of IT. So then the call forward, the heuristic limning I wrote of yesterday that thinking is, recalls to me Tony Green's carefull attention some weeks ago to the "never more than" in Creeley's formula. Nonetheless, I think the answer to the NO NEW FORMS swamp is to reverse it: that is, I think form can actually precede and illuminate the context and/or content, and in that becomes new form (Olson's intersections). But, Henry, that hardly constitutes "mastery." For example, I've been trying to come to an adequate reading of Rod Smith's IN MEMORY OF MY THEORIES - a great book which I unreservedly recommend - not because I particularly like Mr. Smith but because I particularly like this book. One of the things I'm trying to understand is how form functions in it. The book is all disjunction and yet the line holds, remarkably tensile over and across such displacement of registers. Lexical materials come from everywhere and despite my, the reader's, lack of specificity as to what or how, the contexts come as well. That is, the world is pulled up, across, into the form, such that the form is continuant AND new, both in its discovery to me and in my availability to it.

And in thinking of availability, the "at home" registration of the fundamental research thinking's call forward delivers, two more things occur to me:

First, Santiage Ramon y Cajal's "neuron doctrine" - that nerve cells communicate with others through contiguity rather than continuity - and all the attendant neural machinery: receptors, adjustors, effectors, transduction, afference, and my personal favorite, the Sodium-Potassium Pump (as Rod said, Duchamp is useful in this context), moving as it does Na+ outward and K+ inward against their concentration gradients, thus maintaining neural availability by setting the "membrane potential."

Second: Contingency, which as a term, has three implications:

1. The past is NOT the single, determining condition of the present. The past could have been otherwise.

2. The present leaves the past behind in a state of indeterminateness (and incompletion). Thus, the present stands alone in its temporality, as it were, awaiting our operations.

and

3. The present AND the future are to be determined _in_ the contingent present.

Thus Emerson: "No facts are to me sacred; none are profane; I simply experiment, an endless seeker, with no Past at my back."

So that, if we conjoin the neuron doctrine and its string place >> stimulus >> receptor >> adjustor >> effector >> history with that three-headed dog of contingency, call me a mystifier hopelessly enamored of water, but it begins to look like a poetics and a politics in which poetic language is more than a limit case of the larger set, Language, accounting for use, prospective, but at the same time thoroughly implicated in all the strains of its temporality.

Sorry to have gone on at such length and I'm sure with too many unresolved conflicts. Still, as writers (and I suppose this is my real argument with you, Henry), I think it's important to determine the point at which the work is effective: Is it effective in and of (as well for) itself AT the point at which the text is enacted? Or must it await canonization. Obviously from the above, I think that poetic language IS adequate in and of itself and is more than decorative arrangements for the corridors of time.

Baldly: I live here.

lp

↑ Index

351. henry
Re: Onward
Fri 12 Jul 1996

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996 10:04:12 -0400 Larry Price said:
>
>But, Henry, that hardly points to context as a set of barnacles to be >mastered. As you yourself say, the writer is written. Here again, Olson with

I didn't say the context (barnacles) was to be mastered. I said it attaches itself willy-nilly to the choices the writer makes. I was trying to counterbalance Rod's "eastern" (and currently popular?) emphasis on the complete multivalence of meaning, the supremacy of context.

> First of all, Henry, you seem to have posed various terms - language and poetry most notably - AGAINST time. Which puzzles me, assuming as I do that temporality fundamentally constitutes all the threads of and through which we are written. And (what I really want to say) just as THEY are constitutive of

My point was that language, and perhaps poetry-making in particular, breaks through to a deeper strata of time, deeper than the ordinary "metronome tapeworm" sense of time. The _pleroma_, the playground, the fulness of time. Ripeness is all.
>
>Sorry to have gone on at such length and I'm sure with too many unresolved >conflicts. Still, as writers (and I suppose this is my real argument with >you, Henry), I think it's important to determine the point at which the work >is effective: Is it effective in and of (as well for) itself AT the point at >which the text is enacted? Or must it await canonization. Obviously from the

I can't understand why my very first post on this question, in which I remarked a fascination on my part with artworks that "last", gets me fingered as some kind of Vendlerian canonizer. Why do we immediately jump into the academic "critical" framework? Do we think critics are SO powerful? I'm talking about the lastingness which gets Shakespeare played by mechanics in smalltown hotels in Connecticut in the 19th century, or gets the Bible read, or gets Willa Cather read in spite of all the critics. About works that transcend the popular/elite dichotomy (the Blues is probably America's most powerful, intricate, profound, and at the same time popular poetry). Your dichotomy about the effectiveness of a work is a false one. Of course the work is effective in an of itself in its own time - my point was that some works (and this doesn't make them "better" - just strong) live beyond the present. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

352. henry
Re: barnacle a (onward)
Fri 12 Jul 1996

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996 11:45:13 -0500 Jordan Davis said:
>It's not a fair assumption that fashion is false. You miss a lot that way.
>
>'deeper' 'beyond the present' 'profound' -- I want to say I know what you mean.
>
>I think though we had different playgrounds. I too read Willa Cather, but >it's not that mysterious to me why I want to (or Sarah Orne Jewett, or >Milton, or T.S. Eliot, or Langston Hughes, or Turgenev). Is affection >mysterious? Is dancing? Is mystery mysterious? Nope. Is thinking >mysterious? Thinking is often foggy, but fog is not mysterious.
>
>As they say in the song, 'let's be undecided.'

I agree with you, Jordan. What I said in my last post was that it was a false dichotomy. But I still think that ONE measure of greatness (a middle term between "strong" & "better") is continuing interest & relevance, that lasts beyond the current fashion. The thing about fashion is that it is ONLY current. That's the definition of fashion, I'm not saying it's good or bad. And some academic poets (and I'm not just talking Vendler or APR here) as well as other poets dig themselves in very sophisticated ways into the present - fashion included. (The current fad is: "let's be undecided"). Why does the world read Whitman rather than James Russell Lowell? This seems to be a troubling question, even for fashionable anti-canonizers and trendy outsiders. The ironic thing about the American experience has been that unfashionable truth: "The first shall be last, and the last first." - Henry Gould

↑ Index

353. Jordan Davis
barnacle a (onward)
Fri 12 Jul 1996

It's not a fair assumption that fashion is false. You miss a lot that way.

'deeper' 'beyond the present' 'profound' -- I want to say I know what you mean.

I think though we had different playgrounds. I too read Willa Cather, but it's not that mysterious to me why I want to (or Sarah Orne Jewett, or Milton, or T.S. Eliot, or Langston Hughes, or Turgenev). Is affection mysterious? Is dancing? Is mystery mysterious? Nope. Is thinking mysterious? Thinking is often foggy, but fog is not mysterious.

As they say in the song, 'let's be undecided.'

Jordan Davis
[redacted]
46 e 7 no 10 I believe
NYC 10003 Spumoni $1.00

↑ Index

354. william marsh

*Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.*

Wed 31 Dec 1969

At 05:39 PM 7/11/96 -0400, you wrote:
 But in many ways, I don't feel that >linguistics and semiotics adequately address the texture of a poem >as it was written by a specific poet who used idiosyncratic compositional >processes.

My question would be why would we ever expect linguistics and semiotics to "adequately address the texture of a poem"? Linguistics and Semiotics adequately (arguably) address language and meaning, and to the extent that explorations of this type suggest avenues of inquiry when dealing with a particular poem or poetry, they are useful -- in my mind enormously useful -- without necessarily addressing the whole issue o writing. To get to the texture of the poem, we read the poem, right? To get to the texture of theory, read theory.

But what intrigues me about the "open" poetries of this and the last decade is the extent to which they seem, to me at least, to share the interest and perspective of ling/semio studies, so that distinctions of these kinds (poetry vs. criticism/theory, etc) seem pointless. Language arts and language philosophies share the same venue, as much of the work of the last two decades demonstrates (the work not only of "poets" like Howe, Bernstein and Silliman, but also of "critic/theorists" like M. Perloff (Howe, Bernstein and Silliman!)). The way i see it, this suggests a practice in contemporary poetics that goes beyond neat packages like "theoretical poetry" or "poetic theory".

>
>Does anyone else here want to get down into the burial site >and discuss the texture of poetry? I'd love to know how the >rest of you read and write.
>

>
How 'bout if we discuss the poetry of texture, which might adequately address the writing of poetry.

Bill Marsh

↑ Index

355. Rod Smith
Re: barnacle a (onward)
Fri 12 Jul 1996

HG wrote:
>The
>current fad is: "let's be undecided"

well, I'm undecided whether this is true. Actually, this isn't that different from the use of "zeitgeist" -- there is no one fashion any more than there's one zeitgeist, eh? Go to a slam or a CK Williams class at Princeton and see abt undecideability, you'll find a bit, but not what it wld mean here. & even on this list what folks wld mean by or agree upon with reference to that term is way up in the air, maybe over the wall in left-center.

One "fad" I'd like to see sucess for is the Philly Borders boycott.

Rod

↑ Index

356. Ward Tietz
Re: Onward
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Larry Price,

I haven't been following the exchange between you and Henry, Dean, Jordan and Rod as much as I probably should have, but a few things came to mind after reading your recent post.

I wonder if some of these issues wouldn't perhaps be better conceptualized as textual phenomena rather than language phenomena, and I would apply that also, I think, to your sense of poetic language, since it seems to me we are still very much in the domain of discursive form.

With Wittgenstein it does certainly appear that his "language" games occur on the level of language, but I think these may be textual as well. If they really occurred on a level of language we should be able to translate them into other non-discursive languages, quantitative or pictorial say, and this it seems we can't quite do. They're too propositional, linear and cumulative.

I think this text / language distinction might carry over to some of your other ideas, and also to Henry's idea of being "against time." Language, is seems to me, is subject to an enormous range of presentational and performative contexts and reformulations in ways that text isn't. Text also has a particular speed to it and with that a certain temporal limit or paradigm. By comparison language has a wider range and can get around some of these limitations, but this capacity is finally quite a lot more, I think, than what text supports.

In general though, I think I agree with you, as long as poetic language doesn't only mean poetic text.

Ward Tietz

↑ Index

357. Burt Kimmelman

Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.

Fri 12 Jul 1996

---

okay Bill Marsh,
What DO you exactly mean by texture?
Burt

↑ Index

358. Joe Amato

fyi...

Fri 12 Jul 1996

---

so what do you folks make of the appended?...

(((love to continue on with dodie about how i think the term "middle class" has sucked up what used to be called "working class," but--- i'll be away from my machine, my apt., and my creditors beginning saturday... i know---i can hear (in my egocentric head) many of you already ('WHAT A RELIEF!')...

won't be back till approx. 1 august, hopefully a bit suntanned and mountain-aerated... hope y'all have a nice summer (and winter for you folks down-under!) in the meanwhile... and apologies for any unnecessary mouthiness or presumption on my part of any but good intentions...

all best to all,

joe

From [redacted] Sun Jun 23 18:47:58 1996
Received: from localhost by world.std.com (5.65c/Spike-2.0)
id AA05055; Sun, 23 Jun 1996 14:47:58 -0400
Date: Sun, 23 Jun 1996 14:47:58 -0400 (EDT)
From: Steve Robinson <[redacted]>
To: Steve Robinson <[redacted]>
Subject: ON-LINE POETRY WORKSHOP
Message-Id: <[redacted]>
Mime-Version: 1.0
Content-Type: TEXT/PLAIN; charset=US-ASCII
Status: RO
X-Status:

MEDIAWORKS is proud to offer an On-Line Poetry Writing Workshop with Hilda Raz!

Hilda is editor of the quarterly literary journal PRAIRIE SCHOONER, poet, critic, and associate professor of English at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln.

This unique On-Line Poetry Writing Workshop will take place over a three week period beginning on July 15. The workshop is for poets interested in reading contemporary poetry, and honing their poetry writing skills. Subjects include the tools of contemporary poetry, the writing process, voice, narrative, non-traditional forms, and collaboration -- with a strong emphasis on YOUR writing.

The workshop will be limited to 12 people, and is being offered for $125. Each participant will be part of a private mailing list. Everything participants post to the list will be seen only by the other participants, Hilda, and the workshop moderator.

Ideal participants in this workshop should have experience reading and writing contemporary poetry, have taken poetry writing classes at the college or senior high school level, or be adult poets who have experience writing in groups. People with a penchant for rhyming might better study with another poetry group.

IF YOU ARE INTERESTED IN PARTICIPATING IN THIS UNUSUAL POETRY WORKSHOP, PLEASE SEND AN E-MAIL MESSAGE TO:

[redacted]

We will contact you within a few hours to discuss the details.

Hilda Raz's books include _What Is Good_ and _The Bone Dish_ and a new manuscript _Divine Honors_. Her poems have been published or > are forthcoming in _Ploughshares_, _The Southern Review_, _Colorado Review_, _Hollins Critic_, _Poems for a Small Planet: Contemporary American Nature Poetry_, _Literature and Medicine_, _Judaism_ and elsewhere. She is also a critic and writer of creative nonfiction. Her experience in teaching includes writing workshops at the Bread Loaf Writers Conference, the University of California/Chico, University of Tennessee, City University of New York at Brockport, Florida State University at Tallahassee, the University of Massachusetts-Boston, Hollins College, the University of Denver, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, and elsewhere.

>
> Since 1987, she has been editor of PRAIRIE SCHOONER, the venerable literary quarterly, now entering its 70th year of continuous publication. Contributors include winners of the Pulitzer, Nobel, MacArthur, NEA and other major grants and prizes, and have been Poets Laureate of the United States, as well as beginning and mid-career writers. PRAIRIE SCHOONER publishes poetry, fiction, creative nonfiction, and reviews.

↑ Index

359. Rod Smith

Re: Onward

Fri 12 Jul 1996

Ward T. wrote:
>With Wittgenstein it does certainly appear that his "language" games occur on >the level of language, but I think these may be textual as well. If they really >occurred on a level of language we should be able to translate them into other >non-discursive languages, quantitative or pictorial say, and this it seems we >can't quite do. They're too propositional, linear and cumulative.

Not sure abt this, Witt did a lot of work in other areas, mathematics from early on, pictorial: the famous figure ground bunny/duck. He investigated vision & color extensively in _Remarks on Colour_ in similar terms to the language-games. & _On Certainty_ as well as aspects of the Investigations seems to me to move into areas of perception generally, not strictly "language-games." Any case, my understanding of the term language-games is that it is contextual, i.e. perceptual. Also, I generally don't find Witt "linear" but definitely cumulative.

As Larry sd "I don't think I'd ever be satisfied with a definition of meaning that accounts for it strictly in terms of language (nor for that matter, strictly in terms outside of it)." I think we don't know enough to adequately describe these processes, which is perhaps why Derrida or cognitive science can seem brilliant at times, & useless at others.

>In general though, I think I agree with you, as long as poetic language doesn't >only mean poetic text.

yup.

Rod

↑ Index

360. Steve Carll
Re: barnacle a (onward)
Fri 12 Jul 1996

At 11:45 AM 7/12/96 -0500, Jordan Davis wrote:

> Is affection
> mysterious? Is dancing? Is mystery mysterious? Nope. Is thinking > mysterious? Thinking is often foggy, but fog is not mysterious.

Fog itself may not be mysterious, but fog grants mystery to what it touches, a mystery that may not be dispelled by our knowing what it covers without having to see it. Fog imparts this to thinking, and thinking to what is thought.

****

Steve Carll
[redacted]

"So I start a revolution from my bed
'Cos you said the brains I had went to my head"
--Oasis
****

↑ Index

361. henry
Re: Onward
Fri 12 Jul 1996

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996 13:46:06 EDT Ward Tietz said:
>
>I think this text / language distinction might carry over to some of your other >ideas, and also to Henry's idea of being "against time." Language, is seems to >me, is subject to an enormous range of presentational and performative contexts >and reformulations in ways that text isn't. Text also has a particular speed

>to >it and with that a certain temporal limit or paradigm. By comparison language >has a wider range and can get around some of these limitations, but this >capacity is finally quite a lot more, I think, than what text supports.

Is text the dead letter, the poison cure, the marrow in them dead bones? Bones gonna dance too - they come last. Right, Mr. Bones? - Henry Hankovitch con guit

↑ Index

362. Gabrielle Welford
Re: barnacle a (onward)
Fri 12 Jul 1996

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, Rod Smith wrote:

> One "fad" I'd like to see sucess for is the Philly Borders boycott.
>
> Rod
>
Yes, and for those so inclined, there are boycotts in many other cities too--and even boycotts you can start yourselves. gab.

↑ Index

363. Gabrielle Welford
text/language
Fri 12 Jul 1996

How can text and language be distinguished? I guess have to take a long look at how the word "language" and "text" can and can't sensibly be used. Otherwise into the foggy dew we go. gab.

↑ Index

364. Charles Alexander
Re: text/language
Fri 12 Jul 1996

> How can text and language be distinguished? I guess have to take a long look at how the word "language" and "text" can and can't sensibly be used. Otherwise into the foggy dew we go. gab.

Isn't language much broader? It includes music & other sound-language, visual languages of many kinds, all sorts of symbolic language other than the ones which use letters & words; & usually text is grounded in those letters & words, although I'd be glad to conceive of text more broadly, too.

Or, for example, dealing with book arts/artists' books, the text of the book would be whatever language-text is presented therein, but the language of the book would have to include all its other parts (visual, structural, sometimes aural, etc.) as well. Books can (they don't always, or do they?) make literature physical.

charles

↑ Index

365. maria damon
Re: white rose
Fri 12 Jul 1996

---

kk, yr play sounds wonderfully delicious. if it's playing between aug 27-sept 3, i'll look forward to taking it in.
md

↑ Index

366. filch
Re: barnacle a (onward)
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Get yer boycotts, yer red hot boycotts! Get em while they last!

> Yes, and for those so inclined, there are boycotts in many other cities too--and even boycotts you can start yourselves. gab.

↑ Index

367. George Bowering
Re: text/language
Fri 12 Jul 1996

> How can text and language be distinguished? I guess have to take a long look at how the word "language" and "text" can and can't sensibly be used. Otherwise into the foggy dew we go. gab.
>
> Isn't language much broader? It includes music & other sound-language, visual languages of many kinds, all sorts of symbolic language other than the ones which use letters & words; & usually text is grounded in those letters & words, although I'd be glad to conceive of text more broadly, too.
>
> Or, for example, dealing with book arts/artists' books, the text of the book would be whatever language-text is presented therein, but the language of > the book would have to include all its other parts (visual, structural, sometimes aural, etc.) as well. Books can (they don't always, or do they?) make literature physical.

>
> charles

Also depends, I think, on whether yr saying "langue" or "parole", eh? I mean "text" means that which has been twisted into shape, like the material in a rug.

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

368. George Bowering
Re: british women poets
Fri 12 Jul 1996

I would have thought that s0meone wd mention Mina Loy.

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

369. George Bowering
Re: British Women Poets
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Daphne Marlatt

Margaret Avison

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

370. George Bowering
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Fri 12 Jul 1996

> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan

I dont know what yr talking about.

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

371. Kevin Killian
Re: white rose
Fri 12 Jul 1996

For those who have asked, Kevin's extravaganza about Jay De Feo will play one night only, Wednesday, October 9, 8 p.m. at the San Francisco Art Institute.

Another "official" announcement about it will be posted closer to the date.

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

372. George Bowering
Re: my stack
Fri 12 Jul 1996

1. _Stones_ by Chenjerai Hove. This was published around 1988 or 1989, but it is still in print, and still current. Hove's second novel in English, _Shadows_ is also very interesting, about people who ask fopr descriptions of their loved ones who died in the war of independence in Zimbwabe, so memory will live. His third novel in English is just out.

2, _Horns for Hondo_ by Lesego Rampolokeng. includes some of the best rap you will ever hear. Lesego is a wonder in a live reading, and if you get the chance to hear him, you'll be better able to read the poems on page.

3. _Guava Juice_ by Sandile Dikeni. If you dont know, you will be interested to hear that "Guave Juice" is code for "Molotov cocktail" in the Townships. You cant go to jail for saying "Guave" yet.

4 _Para que no me Olvides_ by Marcela Serrano. Her third novel, now in 9th printing, to deal with life in the Pinochet and p[ost-Pinochet era.

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

373. Charles Alexander
Re: british women poets
Fri 12 Jul 1996

> I would have thought that s0meone wd mention Mina Loy.

someone did

& what about Canadian women poets writing in French, or is that too complicated? & elsewhere in "the commonwealth" aren't their poets writing in any number of languages, & what might their positions be with regard to various conceptions of British poetry?

↑ Index

374. James Brook
Re: text/language
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Gabrielle--

Unless one stretches the concept of "text" into very obscure shape, there's no possibility of a text before the advent of writing.

Language is above all spoken--linguists tend to see writing systems (which underlie texts) as secondary, derivative, and imperfect recordng devices of the spoken language. Of course, once a language does acquire a writing system, the written language begins to affect the spoken language. The effects of writing were broadened and intensified by printing--spelling, meanings, and usages becoming more fixed and employment prospects for copy editors brightening. (Renaissance scholars were employed by pubishers for this task. By the way, their efforts at restoring Latin to its classical form helped kill off Latin as a living, spoken language.)

James Brook

Gabrielle Welford wrote:
>
> How can text and language be distinguished? I guess have to take a long > look at how the word "language" and "text" can and can't sensibly be used.
> Otherwise into the foggy dew we go. gab.

↑ Index

375. Burt Kimmelman
Re: text/language
Fri 12 Jul 1996

George, Gab, et al.

"text, texture, textile"--Kenneth Burke. Long Western history of text and skin and clothing and words via the Christian dispensation (Christ is the word incarnate etc.) but of course it all goes back much further. I'd love to know what the Eastern version of this is. But I'm going on vacation now for a week, so maybe I'll catch up when I get back and if I get to read the backlog stuff (I'm doing the "nomail" set). couldn't resist sticking my oar in the water though.

burt

↑ Index

376. Burt Kimmelman
Re: text/language
Fri 12 Jul 1996

James,

You couldn't be more wrong about "text"--it exists long before writing-- unless, of course, you are construing "text" in a modern sense.

But, again, if you wish to answer me personally on this, you'll have to do it backchannel.

burt
[redacted]

↑ Index

377. Burt Kimmelman
nomail
Fri 12 Jul 1996

I won't be reading Poetics mail for a week or so. i can be reached backchannel. Thanks for your indulgence.

burt kimmelman
[redacted]

↑ Index

378. Schuchat
As for poets and critics
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Having been partially trained at one point as a literary critic, but specifically as a literary critic of Chinese literature, I thought I'd note a few observations:

both writing poetry and writing criticism proceed from mystery, or lack of understanding. but with criticism the goal is understanding, lifting the mystery, explanation.

when a poet writes criticism it isn't criticism, its documentation. (except when the poet is writing as a professional critic)

criticism wants to be science, not journalism. poets generally don't have a big problem with journalism, except when it doesn't act to their advantage (bad reviews).

critics usually like philosophy more than rhetoric.

↑ Index

379. william marsh
Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
Wed 31 Dec 1969

>What DO you exactly mean by texture?
>Burt
>
>
Burt -- my intent in reversing the terms (poetry of texture as opposed to texture of poetry) was to punctuate my point that we might be better off talking about texture, materiality, shape, design (choose your term) regardless of genre distinctions, rather than talking about a texture of poetry as distinct from, say, a texture of criticism. (Especially when, yeah, there's no established sense of what 'texture' is when applied to...)

Otherwise, to be honest, i'm not too fond of the word, which i had picked up from the previous post.

Thanks for responding.

bmarsh

ps. does email have texture?!

↑ Index

380. william marsh
Re: e-mail politics
Wed 31 Dec 1969

At 11:38 AM 7/12/96 +0100, you wrote:
>At 4:00 PM 12/31/69, william marsh wrote:
>
>>distinctions between so-called "poetic"
>>and "critical" writings, as you point out, have been effectively eradicated,
>>most profoundly by those poet/theorists (Susan Howe, Charles Bernstein, >>among several others) whose work is very much concerned with blurring the >>disinction.
>
>I think we should pause here and give tribute to those who promoted this >blurring as a feminist project, particularly the editors/associate >editors/contributing editors of _HOW(ever)_. Such as Kathleen Fraser, Bev >Dahlen, Rachel Blau DuPlessis, Frances Jaffer, Susan Gevirtz, Carolyn >Burke, and Chris Tysh.
>

>Dodie Bellamy
>
>
very good point.

also should point out that the current issue of Chain, which Charles Alexander praised a few days ago, is dealing with 'genre-bending' in some nifty ways.

bmarsh

↑ Index

381. henry travelin
Fri 12 Jul 1996

Bigmouth Hankovitch is headin to Minneysota for a week (MN - the center of the universe), and he's taking all his awful redundant ideas with him - but keep talking - he'll be his old irascible self when he gets back (look - he's starting to refer to himself as Checkers in the third person - that proves it) - have fun everybody - net some keepers for me - Henry Gould woof woof

Just packin up gettin ready to go...

Gonna leave you now
Goin anyhow
Know where I'm bound
I'm just packin up gettin ready... to go

↑ Index

382. maria damon
Re: text/language
Fri 12 Jul 1996

---

burt k writes:

"text, texture, textile"--Kenneth Burke.

this is a conjunction that has fascinated me since i became a weaver at 14 (i was already a writer). a few years ago a friend and i were planning to write about this as a meditation on the ironies and complexities of "women's work" --i had been struck by the way feminist lit critics have so often used textile metaphors in ways that are intended to reclaim this pun as "women's work" --but often they reveal, through their use of that metaphor, that they don't know the basics of the craft they are using as metaphor ("broken tapestry" is the name of one such text; what is a broken tapestry? another didn't understand the way images are created in a woven tapestry, line of weft by line of weft, and was trying to make a complex point about women's writing, sexual violation and philomela or someone else where this lack of knowledge ended up mattering). not that people have to know all the intricate mechanics of every technology they allude to in creating word-texts, or that this is peculiar to feminist literary critics (this just happens to be where we noticed it, since it was the kind of stuff we were reading at the time), but there's a way that this combination pointed, for us, to the ways in which artisanal work is often sentimentalized/gendered in misleading ways. from there we got into stuff like: wanting to get someone to write about actual women working in textile factories and the LACK of artisanal glamor in those modes of production; the economy of circles of women trading and recycling baby-clothes, free stores, etc --textile "businesses" that subvert corporate economies; the ways in which creating text IS like creating textile, despite the occasional clumsy or sentimental ways the trope has been used;the ways in which intellectual labor IS "women's work" because women do it, and doesn't need to be justified by hearkening to an "ancient", socially-coded-feminine art. at first we were going to edit a book, then we were going to collaborate on an article; neither has materialized (so to speak). but i was just thinking about it today and wondering if there was something useful i could "do" with these fragments (like send them to Chain) when burt posted this line.

what is the burke reference?
md

↑ Index

383. maria damon
Re: PUI
Fri 12 Jul 1996

naylor rites:
> a big eraser for Christmas -- OK, that > and tenure.
>
>
ok pau, tenure-vibes coming your way.--md

↑ Index

384. Robert Drake
Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of
Fri 12 Jul 1996

> ps. does email have texture?!

as in the structure, frm entymology, text/texture/textile meaning a weaving ov words, & hence various "threads" ov email discussion... tho the pessimist in me sees a looming shroud...

lbd

↑ Index

385. Paul Naylor
PUI
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Well, I expect the List Police to pull me over after this one for Posting Under The Influence, but, after a nasty trip to the dentist and, oh, a few glasses of my favorite personal anesthetic, I feel some comments on this poet/critic thing coming on. Seems like there's still a host/parasite hierarchy lurking around, lo, these many years after the new criticism. I write both poetry and criticism, as do so many on this list, and, although they do constitute different forms of attention, I'd like to think I'm still taking notes in the aviary when I do either. As someone who straddles both lines in my professional life, I'm asking Santa for nothing but a big eraser for Christmas -- OK, that and tenure.

Paul Naylor
SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

SEND
in%"[redacted]"
in%"[redacted]"

↑ Index

386. Rod Smith
Re: As for poets and critics
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Simon--
There's an old reporters saying here in Washington --
"The purpose of journalism is to shoot the wounded." I have to say I find that a little to accurate. As a poet, journalism means nothing, because poetry

↑ Index

387. Rod Smith
Re: As for poets and critics
Sat 13 Jul 1996

woops, here's what it was getting to be > poets generally don't > have a big problem with journalism, except when it doesn't act to their > advantage (bad reviews).

Simon-- There's an old reporters saying here in Washington -- "The purpose of journalism is to shoot the wounded." I have to say I find that a little too accurate. As a poet, journalism means nothing, because poetry is almost entirely ignored by major press. & of course I'm being overly rhetorical, most journalists are just shlubs like me, trying to get by. It's all there in Chomsky etc.

Rod

↑ Index

388. Tristan D. Saldana
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Sat 13 Jul 1996

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, George Bowering wrote:

> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan
>
> I dont know what yr talking about.

Nor do I, you.

Tristan

↑ Index

389. Peter Quartermain
DON'T call me!
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Hi, everybody. Sorry to bother you all, but this is the most efficient way I can deal with this problem. Yesterday (11 July) my Eudora crashed in the middle of downloading e-mail from the list, and I can no longer access my incoming mail because the home computer won't accept my password. But for some reason I can still send mail out -- or I can if you get to read this! Since I shall be away in the Queen Charlotte Islands (boast! boast!) from 17 - 27, I will not get this fixed until the end of the month. So if anyone needs to get hold of me or Meredith, you'll have to fax or use snail-mail please. And you'd better assume I got nothing posted on 11 July, since I only downloaded a handful of stuff. I'll post another general message around 1 August or so, assuming I get this bug fixed.

A dios.

Peter
+ +
Peter Quartermain
128 East 23rd Avenue
Vancouver
B.C.
Canada V5V 1X2
Voice and fax: [redacted]

+ +

↑ Index

390. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: To Max Douglas
Sat 13 Jul 1996

alongside the rereading of this wonderful book, I hope some will look up Max Douglas's _Collected Poems_ (White Dot Press 1978), edited by Christopher Weinert and Andrea Wyatt (has ANYBODY heard from Andrea these past eight years or so???)

for those who don't already know, the "David" who appears in the first lines of Irby's _To Max Douglas_ is David Bromige.

↑ Index

391. Susan Clark
Peter Quartermain call
Sat 13 Jul 1996

* Forwarded message:

Here is a message forwarded to me by Angela Szeto ([redacted]) for the list.

good wishes out there,
Susan Clark

[redacted]
****

> Date: Sun, 7 Jul 1996 16:11:46 -0700
> X-Sender: [redacted]
> To: [redacted]
> From: [redacted] (Angela Szeto)
> Subject: Notice for PQ letters
>
> (ahem!)
>
> ATTENTION ALL STUDENTS OF PETER ALLAN QUARTERMAIN PAST AND PRESENT
> Peter Quartermain will be retiring in two years' time from his position at the University of British Columbia. A group of his students at UBC wish to nominate him for next year's Killam teaching prize as a long overdue gesture of institutional recognition. We need as many anecdotal letters as possible giving details of how wonderful a teacher Peter is. The letters need not be particularly long but they should avoid sounding wishy-washy and vague. If you can cite specific incidences of brilliance then that would be good but otherwise just try to write something that sounds conventionally credible. You should also include when Peter taught you and the course name (if applicable).
>
> Letters should be addressed to Dr. Herbert Rosengarten (the head of the English Department at UBC) and sent to the following address:
> 104-989 West 20th Avenue,
> Vancouver, British Columbia,
> V5Z 1Y4
>
> We would appreciate receiving the letters by September 1, 1996.
>
> If you have any questions, you can e-mail them to: [redacted]
>
> Thanks everyone.

↑ Index

392. Alan Sondheim

cath

Sat 13 Jul 1996

Clara: thinking and loving, writing, the murmur of the world Alan: heard in the hollow of its shell, close by Tiffany: sounding through fathoms of conversations, these souls Honey: who have lost their fathermothers, mewling and Travis: pity! pity! those unborn, unbearable to this dimmed life Joan: changing bodies and directions, changing moods and genders Sandra: down where ripples no longer reflect surface striations, Clara: languages, terms, obseqious semiologies Alan: as if language conveyed meaning humped against the physical Tiffany: which we hear in our everyday networking and speaking Honey: against or within the abdominal terminal screen Travis: ghosts! ghosts! Joan: the swollen world of the murmur of the world, the ocean Sandra: gone, this gone world, where this speaking forms the cap

↑ Index

393. Carnography
Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
Sat 13 Jul 1996

At 12:59 PM 7/12/96, Burt Kimmelman [redacted] is rumored to have typed:

> okay Bill Marsh,
> What DO you exactly mean by texture?
> Burt

Burt:

It depends. What exactly do you mean when you say Bill Marsh?

Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

394. Carnography
Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.
Sat 13 Jul 1996

---

hnry:

> There are lots of cases of poet-critics, and every poet is a critic and probably every good critic is something of a poet; but maybe what Mark was getting at is the clashes in the arena when the center of the one activity tangles with the other.

I suppose that's where our takes on writing are different: I revel in the "tangle," in the unresolved dissonance, of an exalted activity (poetic composition) sleeping with what is often dismissed as rational, and parasitic (criticism). _Artifice of Absorption_ is an excellent example of this, as are works like _The Duncaid_. One can also argue that works like Kristeva's _Black Sun_, or De Quincey's and Pater's criticism, obviously, are themselves poetic.

> When the informed and weaponed reader-critic becomes the arbiter of taste & the explainer of how who done what. Impossible not to cross those lines.

It isn't necessary to know whether or not "The Raven" was composed as Poe claims it was. To some degree, the posthumous invention of elegant recipes for the composition of pre-exisitng poems are like the imaginary worlds in Ficciones: intricate confections, often delicious in and of themselves.

> Does anyone else here want to get down into the burial site and discuss the texture of poetry? I'd love to know how the rest of you read and write.
>
> Curiosity killed the carp. You're delving into two taboo areas: "secrets of the craft", and "inspiration". I'm not criticizing, just commenting.

Coleridge, Poe, Mallarme, Campion, Alan Davies--these poets never killed their craft or inspiration by writing about them. I see this in terms of classical music, perhaps, where texture and form--ie, counterpoint, orchestration, registration, harmonic syntax, linear syntax, units of phrases and their balance within larger units--constitute the music's "meaning." In music, signification is a surface operation: practically speaking, there are no metaphors.

I do respect a individual's reluctance to talk about unconsious activities. When I was friends with Kathy Acker, she used to scream and cry when I asked technical questions. Consequently, I saved my questons for writers who were interested. People whose inspiration depends on a kind of divine ignorance need not respond to my questions about technique.

Still, I find most compositional techniques fascinating, even when they are arbitrary. I have already mentioned Roussel's _How I Wrote Certain of My Books_. Even Keats's letters still fascinate me to this day.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

395. Carnography

*Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.*

Sat 13 Jul 1996

---

william marsh typed:

> My question would be why would we ever expect linguistics and semiotics to "adequately address the texture of a poem"?

This was merely my polite way of saying that linguistics and semoitics do not entirely address my interest (critically and practically) in poetry.

> Linguistics and Semiotics
> adequately (arguably) address language and meaning, and to the extent that explorations of this type suggest avenues of inquiry when dealing with a particular poem or poetry, they are useful -- in my mind enormously useful -- without necessarily addressing the whole issue o writing.

I don't disagree with you, for the most part. But L and S address language and meaning within a context that is not always relevant to the systems and conventions of poetic diction and devices. In _Seven Type of Ambiguity, Empson tried to address poetic meaning as embodied in poetic technique; in some ways, he came closer than Jameson to examining the question.

To get to the > texture of the poem, we read the poem, right? To get to the texture of > theory, read theory.

I disagree with you completely. Texture is as subject to critical examination as anything else. In the case of poetry, it is often more relevant to discuss assonance or sibilance than it is to discuss borgeiose referents.

> But what intrigues me about the "open" poetries of this and the last decade

I did not suggest that "open" poetries were unworthy of discussion. If anything, I suggested that these are as worthy of prosodic scrutiny as "closed" or "formal" poetry: I suggested that the distinction hindered more than it helped. If a line makes you stumble or feels sinuous, nine times out of ten, the result is a measure of the poet's rhythmic skill. Linguistics has little direct information to teach us about rhythm. If the subject of prosodic rhythm were irrelevant, then Pound's criticism would have been useless to Olsen, et al.

(Also: a line that makes you stumble is not necessarily bad. Much language poetry intentionally makes you stumble: The Art of the Rhythmic Non Sequitur, The Art of the Double-Take.)

> But what intrigues me about the "open" poetries of this and the last decade is the extent to which they seem, to me at least, to share the interest and perspective of ling/semio studies, so that distinctions of these kinds (poetry vs. criticism/theory, etc) seem pointless.

But I, too, am uninterested in such distinctions. I merely pointed out that certain aspects of the poetry of the last three decades, whatever its school or formal orientation, are inadequately addressed by linguistics as currently practiced. I haven't seen a synthesis of linguistics, semiotics, prosody and diction that addressed what are for me the most exciting and visceral aspects of reading or writing a poem.

The purpose here is not to dismiss linguistics. It is to get poets to talk about how they write and read.

> Language arts and > language philosophies share the same venue, as much of the work of the last two decades demonstrates (the work not only of "poets" like Howe, Bernstein and Silliman, but also of "critic/theorists" like M. Perloff (Howe, Bernstein and Silliman!)). The way i see it, this suggests a practice in contemporary poetics that goes beyond neat packages like "theoretical poetry" or "poetic theory".

I get the feeling you're speaking to some earlier poster in this thread. I've read lots of Bernstein, Silliman, Davies, Palmer and so on. I have been intrigued and interested by what they say. But with all due respect, there are other ways to analyze language poetry than the methods employed by their own critical writing. It seems to me that what you're asking for is a very un-postmodern approach: language poet purism.

> Does anyone else here want to get down into the burial site and discuss the texture of poetry? I'd love to know how the rest of you read and write.
>
> How 'bout if we discuss the poetry of texture, which might adequately address the writing of poetry.

That would be great, Bill. But I also want to address the texture of the poetry itself. The patterns of assonance and alliteration i Keats's "Eve of St. Agnes" will always thrill me (and Robert Gluck) more than anything (however useful and astute) Kristeva ever wrote.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

396. Carnography
*Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic technique.*
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Bill Marsh typed:

> Otherwise, to be honest, i'm not too fond of the word, which i had picked up from the previous post.

You find the word texture to be too vague, perhaps? Look again:

Texture: [L textura, fr. textus, pp. of texere to weave--more at technical] 1.: something that is composed of closely interwoven elements. 2.a: The disposition or manner of union of the particles of a body or substance. 3.a: A composite of the elements of prose or poetry <"All these words...meet violently to form a texture immpressive and exciting."--John Berryman.> 4.: A pattern of musical sound created by tones or lines sung together. 5.: a basic scheme or structure; overall structure.

--from Webster's Third International Dictionary

> my intent in reversing the terms (poetry of texture as opposed to texture of poetry) was to punctuate my point that we might be better off talking about texture, materiality, shape, design (choose your term) regardless of genre distinctions, rather than talking about a texture of poetry as distinct from, say, a texture of criticism.

Then I was correct. Your response to my post was actually a response to some other post--since mine had already suggested that distinctions between poetry and criticism were arbitary. However:

I never said anything about "a texture of poetry as distinct from, say, a texture of criticism." I spoke only of wanting to read new criticism that addresses the texture of poetic language.

> ps. does email have texture?!

Of course it does--especially typographical texture.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

397. Charles Alexander

Re: As for poets and critics

Sat 13 Jul 1996

> both writing poetry and writing criticism proceed from mystery, or lack of understanding. but with criticism the goal is understanding, lifting the mystery, explanation.

Everything proceeds from mystery, pretty much ends there too. Isn't that the human condition, never to "know" with completion? But I still think a lot of good criticism (Kristeva has been mentioned in this thread, & so has Keats, Olson, and I'd certainly add Walter Benjamin) extends the mystery, perhaps even illuminates without necessary explaining.

> when a poet writes criticism it isn't criticism, its documentation. (except when the poet is writing as a professional critic)

This to me doesn't come close to explaining the poets named above, or many essays by Pound, Woolf, Howe, Silliman, . . . So could you explain this a little bit. Or are these cases of the poet writing as professional critic??

> criticism wants to be science, not journalism. poets generally don't have a big problem with journalism, except when it doesn't act to their advantage (bad reviews).

Science Journalism Are these the only two choices?

> critics usually like philosophy more than rhetoric.

Many poets do, too. But then philosophy can be presented in rhetorical form, too.

↑ Index

398. Schuchat
Re: As for poets and critics
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Rod, what I meant by journalism wasn't so much Bob Woodward's latest revelations of the first lady's inner life, or even Jonathan Yardley's fulminations, as the kind of criticism that Rexroth wrote, in columns for the Saturday Review, San Francisco Examiner, the Nation, etc. Pound's criticism is often the same kind of journalism. for that matter, while I don't particularly appreciate James Fenton's poetry, I do take his reportage as a poet's journalism. of course, what Chomsky is talking about has more to do with why there is no Kenneth Rexroth writing in the SF Examiner today. but equally, The Classics Revisited are probably considered beneath contempt in the academy.

on another topic, wasn't Lorenzo Thomas the best American poet in Vietnam?

↑ Index

399. Schuchat
Re: As for poets and critics
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Charles,

Re "documentation" -- in many cases (Pound, Silliman, Howe, Bernstein, etc), whatever else the poet is doing, the poet is also creating or furthering a context in which his/her own work can be understood. does a critic write the first book to make it possible for you to understand the second book? (maybe Harold Bloom?)

what other options besides science and journalism are there? literature?

↑ Index

400. Ron Silliman

Joyce Conference

Sat 13 Jul 1996

In keeping with our reportage of conferences, somebody sent me the following from the Asian Wall St Urinal.

Joycean scholarship bloomed in China this past week with the convening of the First International Academic Conference on James Joyce in China. While the five-day conference included Joyce scholars from the United States, Hong Kong and Taiwan, and a representative from the James Joyce Center in Dublin, its acknowledged, but humble star was Chinese "Ulysses" translator Professor Jin Di.

Prof. Jin's involvement with Joyce began with a single chapter. After Deng Xiaoping came to power and launched the era of opening and reform, Joyce's works were freed from their classification as "poisonous weeds." The editors at the Tianjin Academy of Social Sciences, seeking to compile an anthology of modern Western literature, approached Jin Di and convinced him to translate one chapter of "Ulysses."

As anyone who has ever begun it can attest, just reading the novel from beginning to end is a major accomplishment. Without access to Western reference materials, translating the shortest chapter -- 12 pages -- took Professor Jin six months. Painful though it was, this effort launched him on his own odyssey that took him to Yale, Oxford, Notre Dame, the National Humanities Center in North Carolina, and the University of Virginia.

Encouraged by the Joyce scholars he encountered and supported by university grants and publishing house advances, Prof. Jin devoted most of the next 16 years to translating "Ulysses." Several of his translated chapters were published in a prestigious Chinese literat ure journal in the mid-1980s and a separate volume was released in 1987. Volumes containing 12 translated chapters appeared in Taiwan in 1993 and in China in 1994.

However, in 1990 a professor named Xiao Qian began his own translation of "Ulysses," in collaboration with his wife. Prof. Xiao finis hed first, and it was his translation that drew the attention of the international news media when it appeared last year. A controversy has subsequently developed as to whether Prof. Xiao made unfair use of Prof. Jin's published translations in crafting his own, and as to whose translation is better.

The controversy is unfortunate, but more important is the availability of "Ulysses" in Chinese; both translations have together been purchased by several hundred thousand Chinese readers over the past two years. Conference attendees gathered not to dwell on the cont roversy, but to celebrate Joyce's genius, and Prof. Jin's accomplishment.

The conference opened with the reading of a letter from Irish President Mary Robinson in which she praised Prof. Jin's "16-year labor of love in bringing to one billion people the greatest work of twentieth century literature." Mr. Joe Hayes, Ireland's amiable and learned ambassador to China, then addressed the group, reminding them that Chinese intellectuals saw early on in Ireland a link between nationalism and literature which they themselves wished to establish.

At the close of the first day, Ambassador Hayes hosted a dinner reception at his residence where conference participants were joined by Beijing's Irish denizens. Besides facilitating scholarly contacts, the reception also provided Beijing's Irish with an excuse for a party. When the scholars had gone, coolers of Guinness suddenly appeared, Irish music resounded through the residence's formal parlors, and the gathering moved to the patio where the conversation progressed on to more modern Irish concerns.

The conference moved on to Tianjin, where a full schedule of scholarly presentations began, with simultaneous interpretation for the foreign guests. Prof. Jin shared with the participants his views of "Ulysses" and his philosophy of translation.

Simply put, Prof. Jin's goal in translating "Ulysses" was to achieve what he terms "the closest possible approximation in total effect." In other words, he wanted a Chinese reader of "Ulysses" to get the same impression from reading his translation as an English reader would from reading the original. This was a lofty goal, one that required making creative adjustments so as to preserve the flavor of Joyce's prose.

Take, for instance, the palindromes interjected into a conversation by a character named Lenehan. Says Lenehan, "Madam, I'm Adam. And Able was I ere I saw Elba." Faithfully translated into Chinese, "Madam I'm Adam" would read "Furen, wo shi Yadang." It would not be a palindrome and the remark would likely strike a Chinese reader as a non sequitur. To keep the palindromes intact, Prof. Jin changed their meanings. In his translation, Lenehan says, "Furen a, Wo a renfu. Ren neng sheng tian sheng neng ren." Literally translated back from the Chinese, the palindrome now means, "Madam, I am somebody's husband. Man can beat heaven beats able man." (Neng means both "can" and "able" in Chinese.) Prof. Jin thus sacrificed the meaning of the palindrome so he could convey to the Chinese reader the fact that Lenehan is a clown.

Not surprisingly, many of the Chinese scholars chose to discuss Prof. Jin's translation, offering both praise and constructive criticism. A Taiwan scholar argued provocatively that Prof. Jin's use of mainland Chinese dialects to replicate English dialects -- like Shandong dialect for Suffolk English -- made the translation too difficult for Taiwanese readers. "Taiwan wants to assert its own linguistic uniqueness," she stated, going on to suggest that there be separate translations for Taiwanese and mainland Chinese readers.

Western scholars presented on such topics as "James Joyce and Irish Cultural Rebirth" and "Ulysses in the Context of Modern Western Thought." It was the first trip to China for all the Western participants and their thrill at being here was matched only by their Chinese counterparts' delight at being able to discuss James Joyce with renowned experts. Like foreign businessmen who salivate over the China market, the Western scholars made repeated reference to the fact that 1.2 billion more people are now able to read -- or at least buy -- the "product" they are promoting, Joyce's greatest work.

↑ Index

401. Joel Kuszai
Meow Press Reading in Toronto
Sat 13 Jul 1996

MEOW PRESS READING / Book Launch

Featuring 3 New Meow Press books:

Michael Basinski, Heebee-Jeebies
Natalee Caple, The Price of Acorn
Wendy Kramer, Patinas

also out from Meow Press:

Meredith Quartermain, Terms of Sale
Lisa Robertson, The Descent

Idler Pub on Sunday July 21 at 8pm.
The reading is free.

The Idler Pub is located at 255 Davenport Rd. TORONTO

↑ Index

402. Thomas M. Orange credences
Sat 13 Jul 1996

---

listfolks:

whatever happened to credences? has it folded or did my library simply drop its subscription?

tom orange

↑ Index

403. jms
order chain
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Chain has a new main address:

215 Ashland Avenue
Buffalo, NY 14222
(this is Jena Osman's new address)

I also have a new Chain related address as of 8/1:

182 Elm Street
Albany, NY 12202

Chain can be easily ordered at the rate of $18 for two issues or $10 for one issue from Jena Osman or Juliana Spahr by e-mail (we will bill you) or by mail (send check to UB Foundation).

[redacted]

Thanks for interest.

Juliana Spahr

↑ Index

404. McGuire Jerry L
poetry performance
Sat 13 Jul 1996

It's a hoary argument between poets and actors over which in principle ought to be the better interpreters of poetry. The reasons actors tend to assume they'll be better--their training in voice, pacing, textual analysis, stage presence--can lead to a kind of clinical frigidity that is just the opposite of the absorbed precision that Elizabeth McGrand notes: "as larry heinemann has put it, [good readers] 'see/hear/feel' the images as they read them. in other words, as the reader reads, they too are experiencing he writing." This is to say that even actors who do a _good_ job of reading other people's poetry (and some actors, of course, write and perform their own poems) work from a different set of public assumptions from most poets who read their own. (And, as E.M. notes, plenty of us give excruciating readings, with excesses and deficiencies enough to go around.)

The idea, of course, that actors couldn't possibly be good readers of poetry because actors are natively stupid or inept at public presentation is pretty dim. I am _so_ pleased that no one here made it (in so many words).

And yes, no doubt Creeley is one of the greatest readers of Williams, and Ginsberg is a hoot no matter what. But R.C. has been doing his aw-shucks just-plain-Bob readings so long, and has brought them to such rarity of measure and pace and intonation and persuasion--like any fine actor, he creates the illusion that the words are arising within him as they're spoken, even while you know the things are there on paper--that all his pals and fans (all of us, to be sure) find it hard to keep in mind that he's doing an artful thing in artificial circumstances. Would he do as good a job with Stevens, I wonder, or Donne, or Frost, or Dickinson? He probably wouldn't want to.

Or, to take him off the hook, another problem the actor faces is that his/her skills are designed for specific analysis and adaptation to whatever task is at hand. Theatrical audiences regard this kind of performance when it's successful--when the actor is transparent and transcends his or her immediate, personal presence--as a high achievement. But poetry audiences are different (and Christopher Whipple ought to be given credit for trying something to subvert the preconceptions that separate these audiences), and they differ among themselves pretty considerably--slam audiences, "dramatic reading" audiences, workshop-auxilliary cafe series, culture-hero honors-college public viewings, peer-review artfests, not to mention the best of all, the one where across the coffee table or lying on the rug, one poet reads his/her latest poem to someone to whom all this matters. Dean Taciuch thinks that what matters is "the language," and worries that actors would be concerned with the emotions and meanings. Elizabeth singles out a reading where Martin Espada puts his words and voice in the service of collective improvization. Tony Green worries about a "danger" in the kind of reading he supposes actors would do, and feels that "the poetry is damaged" by it. It seems to me that if "poetry" can be "damaged" by the efforts of a dedicated but incompetent assortment of readers, then (a) it's not worth saving, and (b) it must already be damaged beyond help.

The real problem for Christopher Whipple's actors is one many poets are mostly inclined to shrug off and fake--that of preparing oneself to do justice to a set of poems quite different from one's immediate work. (Unless we have an "instinctive," "natural" gift for discovering the perfectly appropriate commonalities among all "good" "poems" of any place/time/culture. Anyone buying that?) Like E.M. says, the "throaty growl" reading has become so standardized--tougher for women, perhaps, some of whom may in consequence be reduced at times to public declarations of communal merger with their audiences that they don't perfectly make a full-time part of their daily lives--that it does get pressed into service in circumstances in which it appears (no longer just dull but) craven and silly.

At bottom I think the actors will fail and the audiences will stay split, because what matters for making poetry come alive involves a manifestation of the personal in the reading that all the actors' training tends to efface. A good poetry reader is more like Schwartzenegger--always Arnold, no matter the role--than like Streep. To achieve that with the kinds of poetry in question means finding readers who will get not just to the language of those poems (an actor can do that fine) and not just to his/her own personal/public performance mode (any hack can do that, however bad it looks to others) but to a public living-out of the specific energies that mades those specific poems come specifically into a human world and matter. C. W. needs to find poet/readers who do this all the time with their own work and who really believe in and love in a specific way the works selected for presentation. A better system yet: find the willing poets, and let them pick their own favorite works from those historical moments that matter to them.

And to E. McGrand, thanks for that really lovely summary and analysis of so many of the issues here--if you don't mind, I've got some friends I'd like to pass it on to. And I'm with you all the way on Tim O'Brien, who certainly is one of the finest readers on the planet--lots of poets could take some direction there.

Jerry McGuire

P.S. Does this satisfy the concerns of the Lurker Police?

↑ Index

405. Sam Pereira
A Warning Re: The Decisiveness Of Glitches
Sat 13 Jul 1996

This is in response to Peter Quartermain's notice of having difficulty with Eudora. As I faxed Peter, and spoke to him via telephone this day, I too have had a similar occurrence. My mail is unreadable. It begins to download and then suddenly freezes and crashes my system.

While I tend to be a rather crafty middle aged poet, I never claimed to be e-mail letter carrier of the year! I AM capable of reading your posts on my AOL account, but it just seems so...so...non-literary there. :)

Anyway, pardon my rambling...I told Peter that I would post this as warning to anyone out there having problems. You are not alone. And if you have corrective measures, please, send them in this direction.

All the best,

Sam Pereira ([redacted] and [redacted])

↑ Index

406. William F. Walsh
Re: A Warning Re: The Decisiveness Of Glitches
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Don't know if this will be of any assistance to those encountering Eudora problems in the US, as I'm across the water with Ireland on Line. However, my system crashed at about 6PM yesterday (1PM east coast US time), in a similar fashion to that described by Sam Pereira--started to download mail, then froze and offered in explanation: "Error Transmitting Mail," or something equally less than helpful. The folks at IOL had me adjust my settings for POP Account from wwalsh @iol.ie to [redacted]. The addition of "gpo" did the trick. Hope this helps.

Lurking in Dublin,
William Walsh

> This is in response to Peter Quartermain's notice of having difficulty with Eudora. As I faxed Peter, and spoke to him via telephone this day, I too have had a similar occurrence. My mail is unreadable. It begins to download and then suddenly freezes and crashes my system.
>
> While I tend to be a rather crafty middle aged poet, I never claimed to be e-mail letter carrier of the year! I AM capable of reading your posts on my AOL account, but it just seems so...so...non-literary there. :)
>
> Anyway, pardon my rambling...I told Peter that I would post this as warning to anyone out there having problems. You are not alone. And if you have corrective measures, please, send them in this direction.
>
> All the best,
>
> Sam Pereira ([redacted] and [redacted])

↑ Index

407. Carnography
Re: The Decisiveness Of Glitches: poss solution
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Possible Solution:

Open your mail with a raw text editor (subh as BBEdit).
Then create a new inbox and save the old mailbox as a text, which you'll then be able to open in Word.

Possible problem:

Your mailbox is probably too large too load.

Hope this helps you.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

temporary shut-in (Hurricane Urethra)

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

408. robert von hallberg

Orono 2

Sat 13 Jul 1996

>To: [redacted]
>From: [redacted] (robert von hallberg)
>Subject: Orono 2
>Cc:
>Bcc:
>X-Attachments:
>
>Dear Aldon,
>
> I have your reply to my reply. I will post this on the Poetics board after I send it to you. I appreciate the offer to keep our correspondence private, but this all began with your discussion of my statements on the Poetics board, and my intention now is simply to see to it that my views are represented accurately.
> 1. I am glad that you tape-recorded the session. And I accept your warning to me about being careful about denying that I said this or that. However, the one statement that I accuse you of misrepresenting (item #1, in my last letter) is, you say, "off the tape." So the tape seems not to resolve the one matter of factual misrepresentation. I repeat now that I did not say that Hughes and Kaufman are bad poets. However, I do not question that I said that the poems cited in the first paper in particular, or even in the first two papers, were bad poems. Since I advocated the critical sifting of the poems of Hughes, I have no embarrassment about admitting here that I use the phrase "bad poems." You say in your reply to me, "you did in fact say to me that the poems discussed were 'bad poems.'" I never denied saying such a thing, but you have now alleged two quite different statements by me about "bad" this or that. The difference between the two statements hypothesized, or remembered, matters significantly. As a critic, the category of the "bad poem" is part of my discourse; whereas to claim that Hughes (or Kaufman) is a "bad poet" would be to speak dismissively of serious writers. (Thomas Hardy seems to me a great poet who wrote an amazing number of bad poems, but he is properly assessed by his successes, not his failures.) If you now agree with me that I did not say that Hughes and Kaufman are bad poets, I would appreciate your saying so in the same place where you alleged that I did say that silly thing.

> 2. You say in your reply that your objection to my criticism of the sociological approach of the first paper in particular, but of your introductory remarks too, is that I "[seem] to [rule] out other efforts [than close reading] that I feel are worthwhile and needed."
> My objection was (I am repeating myself, because you have not met the point of my reply [item #2 in my reply]) to "simplistic sociology," as I termed it in my reply. It is not surprising to learn that only ca. 6% of the papers at the Orono conference were on race or minority writers, and similarly it is not surprising that many distinguished black writers were excluded from most mainstream anthologies. Who would have suspected otherwise? You cite Alan Golding's work, which I have treasured for many years; I seem to be ruling out the utility of that sort of work. Not at all. Alan's work gets at the not perfectly visible political impulses behind anthologies; his work is very surprising. A tabulation of racist exclusion from mainstream anthologies just isn't surprising now, in 1996. We need to move on to the next phase, which I claimed is close analysis and evaluative argument, because the demonstration of the influence of racism in the construction of literary canons and histories has been done cogently. This was my claim at the Orono conference.
> 3. You say in your reply that what angered you was that "you did not ask a question, nor did you offer your comments in a way directed specifically to elements of the papers that might help their authors (or even me) to improve the work in hand. . . . Yo would be far more likely to achieve the result you seem to have aimed at by engaging directly with an element of the readings about which one might argue productively."
> This is a little complicated. I am sorry that I angered you, really. You're right about the objective of my comments: they were not aimed at improving the first two papers presented. I feel that another sort of work should be done, viz. close evaluative argument of particular poems. I could not, however, have engaged with "the readings," because no readings were presented, by my lights. That is the point.
> Yes, I might have commented in such a way that I could have helped the authors to write a more sophisticated sort of literary sociology. If I had felt that they weere likely to develop those papers into surprising sociological analysis, I might have done so. My judgment was that as literary sociology these papers were best left alone.

> 4. You say that you remain puzzled by my comments about Pound and race. My point was straightforward, and I hope that it is on your tape. I had difficulty seeing the advantage of calling Pound and Eliot's moves to London as "white flight." Furthermore, I claimed that if one wanted to meet Pound's ideas about race, segregation, miscegenation, etc., one needed to realize that the Other for him in his formative years and in the peak period of his modernism (ca. 1909-1939, say) was not African American but Italian. Pound lived in Philadelphia when Italians were the controversial new immigrants. His parents did social work aimed at integrating Italians in Philadelphia. Pound left the States to begin his career in Italy. He devoted much of his literary critical efforts in London to advocating the importance of an understanding of southern, Mediterranean literary and intellectual culture. He retreated from London in 1920-21, then from Paris before 1924, and stayed in Italy until he was transferred as a prisoner to Washington in 1945. He was not in flight from the culture he knew in his early American years as the butt racist jokes and bigotry. This is not to say that he had no racist views about African Americans, only that a convincing account of his thinking about race and racism must deal centrally with his dealings with Italian culture. The racism of the post-1945 era is negrophobic; the racism of the first years of the century in Philadelphia was Italophobic. I felt that the attack on Pound as in flight from black people was anachronistic.
> I think that I have dealt with the remaining areas of disagreement between us that I could see in your reply. I have not commented on the areas of agreement, though I was pleased to see that they exist. If I have overlooked something, please let me know.
> I would of course like to have a copy of the tape.
>
> Yours, Robert von Hallberg
>

↑ Index

409. robert von hallberg
re orono 2
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Several days ago I sent a reply to Aldon Nielsen entitled Orono 2. I have now posted that here for others to read, if they wish. My replies are now getting repetitious. Unless something new comes up in the replies of Aldon's that I have not yet read, I will probably drop the matter, because I can't imagine it being of any more interest to people. One last little matter: I do, I do, read Callaloo. Am I on tape denying that too, Aldon?

Bob

↑ Index

410. Charles Bernstein
[redacted]
Sat 13 Jul 1996

//////////Fiftieth//////////////////

> Birthday<<<<<

==========Greetings>>>>>

^^^^^^^to^^^^^^^^^^^
^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^^

Pierre Joris

 born July 14, 1946 ****

↑ Index

411. filch
Eudora
Sat 13 Jul 1996

You might try making more memory available to the app. Eudora, as any app., will crash if the total size of files it is dealing with are too large for its buffer.

Good Luck.

> This is in response to Peter Quartermain's notice of having difficulty with Eudora. As I faxed Peter, and spoke to him via telephone this day, I too have had a similar occurrence. My mail is unreadable. It begins to download and then suddenly freezes and crashes my system.
>
> While I tend to be a rather crafty middle aged poet, I never claimed to be e-mail letter carrier of the year! I AM capable of reading your posts on my AOL account, but it just seems so...so...non-literary there. :)
>
> Anyway, pardon my rambling...I told Peter that I would post this as warning to anyone out there having problems. You are not alone. And if you have corrective measures, please, send them in this direction.
>
> All the best,
>
> Sam Pereira ([redacted] and [redacted])

↑ Index

412. Schuchat
Re: Joyce Conference
Sat 13 Jul 1996

The Xiao Qian mentioned as author of the possibly plagarized translation of Ulysses into Chinese is much better known as novelist/journalist than professor. Among other things, he covered WWII in Europe for Chinese papers. His autobiography, TRAVELLER WITHOUT A MAP, is available in English, translated by Jeffrey Kinkley, I think from Stanford.

The idea of using of regional dialects in Chinese to approximate dialect usage in European fiction is pretty old. One of Thomas Hardy's novels was translated into Shanxi dialect, if I remember right. A separate Taiwan translation would be like insisting that South Carolineans need their own translation of Dostoevsky so that they can understand it read aloud.

In any case, Jin's translation is the one easily available here in Taipei. I am told by those who have read both that Jin's is the more academic, Xiao's is a contribution to the development of Chinese prose. But they no doubt have their own axes to grind.

↑ Index

413. George Bowering
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Sat 13 Jul 1996

> On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, George Bowering wrote:
>
> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan
>
> I dont know what yr talking about.
>
> Nor do I, you.
>
> Tristan

--Neither do I, I.

.....
"The Moose stood in the yard."
--Daniel Pinkwater

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

414. Charles Alexander
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Sat 13 Jul 1996

> On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, George Bowering wrote:
>
> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan
>
> I dont know what yr talking about.
>
> Nor do I, you.
>
> Tristan
>
> --Neither do I, I.

i do not i

↑ Index

415. James Brook
Re: text/language
Sat 13 Jul 1996

Gabrielle, Burt, Maria, George & Co.,

I realize that the dictionary definition of a word is not, well, the last word. But it does mean something; and, in this case, the OED gives some perspective on the word "text" that might dissuade from a sudden plunge into "weaving" and wondering whether all the world's a text. (In my opinion, one of the great mistakes of structuralism was taking the model of Sausserean linguistics and projecting it absolutely everywhere.)

In a way, though, I could see an argument for a kind of "reading" that historically precedes writing and text; one that might even have laid the foundation for the development of writing: divination, the reading of natural signs to reveal hidden truths. ("Divine: To make out by supernatural or magical insight; hence, to interpret, explain, make known. . . .") I think Walter Benjamin speculates along these lines somewhere. . . .

Anyway, this is not to say that someone can't extend the meaning of "text" to include all manner of objects. But to apply the word to, say, the productions of oral cultures would, in my view, obscure what distinguishes oral from literate cultures or, in our impending case, postliterate cultures.

--James Brook

from The Shorter OED, 3rd ed.:

Text [note on the word's derivation from the French "texte," which derives from the Latin "textus"--meaning "the style of literary works" (Quintillian) and, in Medieval Latin, "the Gospel, written character" --and, ultimately, from "texere" (weave)] 1. The wording of anything written or printed; the structure formed by the words in their order; the very words, phrases, and sentences as written. . . . 2. esp. The very words and sentences as originally written. . . . 3. spec. The very words and sentences of Holy Scrpture; hence, the Scriptures themselves; also, any single book of the Scriptures. . . .

↑ Index

416. Carl Lynden Peters
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Sat 13 Jul 1996

>
> >>On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, George Bowering wrote:
> >>
> >>> >Hi. What's the unconscious?
> >>> >
> >>> >Jordan
> >>>
> >>> I dont know what yr talking about.
> >>
> >>Nor do I, you.
> >>
> >>Tristan
> >
> >
> >--Neither do I, I.
>
>
> i do not i

>
id, we're getting closer!

↑ Index

417. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: OrOno release 2.3
Sun 14 Jul 1996

Robert -- the tape is in the mail -- I didn't see a listing for you in the MLA directory, so I mailed it to the Chicago address listed in Modernism/Modernity. I enclosed what I hope will be my last letter on this subject. I will not burden the other listmembers with it here.

I will, again, invite any who do care about this to read your first and second messages on this post. It's not really true that they repeat; as I pointed out last time, the claims change from one to the next.

As you well know, you did not say: "I don't read x, y, z." I named a series of journals in which close readings of texts and notices of conferences often appear. You replied that you cannot be an expert in every field. Excuse me for not knowing that this reply did not apply to each of the journals I had named. On the other hand, since you now tell me that you do read _Callaloo_, your other responses with regard to knowing about conferences having to do with African-American poetry are even more inexplicable. (Though it is all too often the case that, as with many journals, the notices appear too late.)

Your most recent note also clarifies much else. I was profoundly troubled by your remark (which, as you will hear, is on the tape) that very little had been heard at the panel about the poems. Now you indicate that there were no close readings, or satisfactory readings, or good uses of sociological approaches, in the first two papers, by your lights. This clarification is sure to put everything in its proper perspective. You have now made it clear that you had no intention of offering anything of real use to the authors of these papers because you didn't believe they were likely to profit from such a critique -- This, still, does not explain how you reached the conclusion that arguments opposing exclusion on the basis of identity formations were in fact arguments assuming that poets should primarily represent identity formations.

I will gladly discuss with you any of the substantive issues regarding race, poetics, representation, identity formation, literary histroy, etc. that might arise from this episode. I will gladly listen to any further explanations you may offer about what appears on the tape of your remarks. I will not engage further in any discussions about anything that is not on the tape. In your first meesage, as I pointed out last time, you denied having used my opening remarks as an example. You can now hear on the tape that my remarks were the first thing you mentioned. In your first message you carefully explained what you really objected to in certain sociological approaches to literature, without ever acknowledgiing that this differed from what you had said after the panel, and what you will now hear on the tape. Now that you know the tape exists, you seem to have shifted to arguments about that which was not recorded. I will not follow you into that thicket. If any of the other people who were around the podium during that portion of the discussion indicate to me that my memory has been in any way inaccurate, I will then post that information here.

and that, as they say, is all she wrote. happy listening.

↑ Index

418. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: Having now resigned from professional wrestling, I ask

Sun 14 Jul 1996

Can anyone on this list give me any information about a poet named Gloria Tropp? She was active on the East Village scene in the arly sixties, and was then married to poet Stephen Tropp -- I'm particularly interested in tracking down any publications by this poet -- It's possible her name may have changed since that time --

For that matter, does anyone know Stephen Tropp?

Is Dick Higgins still on this list, who might have encountered them ?

↑ Index

419. Aldon L. Nielsen

Re: You May Already Have Won

Sun 14 Jul 1996

This Week's Contest -- Prize goes to first person on the list to identify the poem from which the following is excerpted -- and the poet --

You remember I said that Poe was three parts genius.
As to Whitman, can you think of an action more heinous
Than to write the same book every two or three years?
It's enough to reduce any author to tears
At the thought of this crime to the writing fraternity.
A monstrous, continual, delaying paternity.

Winner gets a copy of _The Unruly Voice: Rediscovering Pauline Elizabeth Hopkins_ U of Illinois Press, 1996 -- ed. John Gruesser

↑ Index

420. Gabrielle Welford
Re: text/language
Sun 14 Jul 1996

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, James Brook wrote:

> Unless one stretches the concept of "text" into very obscure shape, there's no possibility of a text before the advent of writing.
>
> *Language is above all spoken--linguists tend to see writing systems (which underlie texts) as secondary, derivative, and imperfect recordng devices of the spoken language.*

Yes, I think linguists probably do this. But I don't think we normally make such a distinction, in everyday life, so to speak. Aren't poets and all writers dealing with language? I would think Gertrude Stein was playing with language. She produced texts out of her play with language. The texts are written in language. I know we have (the royal academic we) made a special word of "text" and probably also out of "language." So texts are written langauge? gab.

↑ Index

421. George Bowering
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Sun 14 Jul 1996

> On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, George Bowering wrote:
>
> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan
>
> I dont know what yr talking about.
>
> Nor do I, you.
>
> Tristan
>
> --Neither do I, I.
>
> i do not i

--Oh, I'll bet you I from time to time.

.....
"a vivid weightless bean"
--A. Hollo

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

422. George Bowering
Re: text/language
Sun 14 Jul 1996

Some people, when talking to me about text, use it in a sense resembling the sense of "context,"-- i.e., the spoken or written word, say, in its relationship with other words and things in the world into which it enters. In that way, we might be said to be enacting a text all the time. It is a nice notion, though I would tend not to entertain it all the time, because I want to get things done, not just think about them.

.....
"a vivid weightless bean"
--A. Hollo

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

423. Robert Mittenthal
The Parasite Rules!
Sun 14 Jul 1996

[As Herb Levy suggested, the following mess has been pre-Digested -- just the way us parasites like it.]

Hey Ron Silliman--you've got it all wrong--parasites are all for noise--but not for rules. In fact, thinking of M Serres, our very presence on the list may be disruptive to what would otherwise be a much less complex system of exchange.

Your successful email agit prop -- inviting all the parasites to table (thereby bringing Eudora to her knees on computers across the globe--finally a revolution!) -- reminds me of a long troubling _statement_ (??) from your collaboration in Legend (p 71) w/Bruce Andrews.

BA (presumably?) posits: COMMODITY/PRACTICE : ECONOMICS/POLITICS

RS (presumably?) translates: any reader (this means YOU) who is not also a writer is (by definition) a victim

Both your recent _parasite_ post and this 16yr old quote set up non-dynamic binaries of writer and reader (or active and passive elist participants). Impersonally, I crave those rare moments when I dont know if I'm reading or being read -- a sort of intense suspension which occurs, e.g., when reading certain Blanchot texts, Ballard's Crash, or gosh maybe Steven King (hi Kevin!). But this doesn't make me a victim. In a weird way maybe this is what a certain kind of writing (by dictation anyway) is all about. It's okay to embrace the radical passivity posited by Agamben -- that is -- a passivity which is not simply opposed to activity but passive in regard to itself -- submitting to itself as if to an external power. For some reason, this always makes me think of Spicer. A passivity that produced an imaginary which still captivates.

Anyway, here's hoping that yr agitating tongue was at least half in cheek.

Robert Mittenthal

↑ Index

424. George Bowering
Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
Sun 14 Jul 1996

> I've heard that one---the 60's started in 11-22-63 when kennedy died > and "i wanna hold your hand" was released in u.k. and the fifties > didn't start until 1955. but the difference between the fourties > and the fifties is minor in comparison unless the fourties started > BEFORE and/or at PEARL HARBOUR rather than when the boys came home > and tvs. etc. pushed women back into domesticity becoming suburban > and the car began ruining things.....
>
> and the 70's--b--1974. d 1979 (when jimmy carter decided to part his > hair to the right rather than left?) or perhaps died when phil ochs > did--i.e. when carter got elected ("oatmeal man" gil scott heron) > but what were the 70s? the 80s were clearly the 80s all throughout > and they spilled over into 1992--and thne there was that brief euphoria > on the pumice of morons when GUITARS started dominating rock and roll > again and visions of canadian style health car plans danced in the > amerikan head.....brief, briefheart, cap n crunch....

---Dear Chris:

I noticed that your suggestions on the beginnings of decades are almost all connected to things that happened in one country, the USA. Didnt they have fifties and sixties and seventies in the rest of the world?

For instance, the idea that the forties started with Pearl Harbor. You know, quite a few people were busy fighting fascism for some time before the Yanks were finally dragged into the business. I'd say that the forties started in Sept. 1939.

.....
"a vivid weightless bean"
--A. Hollo

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

425. George Bowering

Re: [redacted]

Sun 14 Jul 1996

So Pierre Joris was conceived just after WW2 shut down in Europe.

Hmmmmm.

Is there something to be deduced from this?

Is Pierre the spirit of the new age?

.....
"a vivid weightless bean"
--A. Hollo

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

426. Eryque Gleason
Re: Eudora
Sun 14 Jul 1996

---

if these email problems haven't been resolved, and if someone could pass it on to those in need: occassionally eudora will do odd things if it's got too many messages in any one mailbox (sometimes the way this list moves, leaving mail unchecked for a couple days might do it), eudora will sometimes get a little uppity, doesn't like to work that hard. when i ran into this problem i was able to fix it by creating new mailboxes and transferring some of the mail to those, that way eudora only has to deal with all that mail in smaller bundles.

also, if using eudora for macintosh, try trashing the eudora preferences file. this forces the app to make a new set of preferences (though don't empty the trash unless this works!) which usually cleans up minor problems. if using eudora on a pc, might try re-installing it (uninstalling first, if possible), but only after backing up the eudora directory.

happy eudoring!

eryque

↑ Index

427. Sam
Re: Eudora
Sun 14 Jul 1996

Thanks to all who offered their expertise in the above matter. I found that, for myself anyway, going into the mail via VT100 and clearing it out that way freed up the system. All is well again...all those fabulous minds hitting my mailbox in rural hell!

And, over the weekend, an offering to do a newspaper column regularly...anything my heart desires...I am warning the readers in my first born, that it may even include an occasional mention of POETRY. That ought to scare the living bejeezus out of em, eh?

Thank you all for the prompt efforts. I could have tried contacting tech support somewhere, but it wouldn't have been nearly as much fun.

As always,

Sam

↑ Index

428. Tony Green
O sole cism
Sun 14 Jul 1996

For Robert Drake's attention --

HEGEMONEY

As clear as a whistle the forces
Of nature are taking their tool
On mankind. I wouldn't say
A lack of inexperience.

No praise is too high enough for him. She turned
The canvas on the evil. The laugh
Was on the other foot.

[n.b. collected, not made up]

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

429. Joseph Zitt
Re: O sole cism
Sun 14 Jul 1996

On 15 Jul 96 at 11:32, Tony Green wrote:

> As clear as a whistle the forces
> Of nature are taking their tool
> On mankind.

Is it just me, or did this sentence immediately play in other people's heads to the tune of "I'm Called Little Buttercup"? (I gotta replace these brainscape plugins !-]) ---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ==== [redacted] ===== Dallas, Texas \||| ||/ Question Authority, The == SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/ http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt == <> <> == The Data Wranglers! \|

↑ Index

430. Steve Carll
Re: Eudora
Sun 14 Jul 1996

At 02:40 PM 7/14/96 -0700, Sam wrote:
> Thanks to all who offered their expertise in the above matter. I found >that, for myself anyway, going into the mail via VT100 and clearing it out >that way freed up the system. All is well again...all those fabulous minds >hitting my mailbox in rural hell!

The same problem hit me three days in a row (Thu-Fri-Sat). I don't leave more than a few messages in my mailbox, so that can be ruled out, and I reinstalled Eudora twice. The common factor in all these occurrances was that Eudora was downloading messages posted to this list from Bill Marsh (hi Bill!) I telnetted into my shell account and used Elm to delete just Bill's posts, and the rest downloaded into Eudora just fine. Whenever Eudora tried to download one of Bill's, it crashed with an "application error: integer divide by zero" (whatever that means.) I got the same error thereafter trying to repair the "in" mailbox table of contents. I noticed when reading the posts in Elm that all are dated December 31, regardless of when they were actually sent. Otherwise, they're no different from any other e-mail as far as I can see. I would think that something odd is happening to the mail at Bill's end (either with his email program or his service provider) that's configuring his mail in such a way that certain of our email programs don't know how to deal with. Of course, the tech support guys I've talked to in the last couple days aren't much help. One said, "You might try downloading your email with Netscape." Which may or may not get around the problem, but it doesn't really explain much about it.

++++++++++++++++++++++++++++
[redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/antenym/

"In seed-
sense
the sea stars you out, innermost, forever."
--Paul Celan
\\\

perhaps for the first time in Japanese), Cage and the Beat as well. Many people who are now writing about American poetry used to be his students and many poets, including Shuntaro Tanikawa, were his friends. I myself didn't have the chance to study with him, but I started to read Ashbery after I read his article in _Eigo Seinen_, and it was fun to discuss Stein with him over cups of sake. He died of lung cancer. He was 78.

Akitoshi Nagahata
email: [redacted]

↑ Index

432. Tony Green
Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
Sun 14 Jul 1996

"Artifice of Absorption" is a text that can be read as, it itself suggests v early on, as poetry or as this or that. So saying, it is clear that "readings" are perspectives on a text, from a given view-point, such as that which takes the text mainly on the level of its philosophical argument, or mainly as a play of syntax, or syntax and sound, or sound. Some perspectives are less usable than others, as for instance reading the text as an instruction on how to build a shed. With representational arts like picture-making, the texture that is in question here is the specifics of the graphic materials and their manipulation so that a scene can be seen. The absence of attention to the process by which one reads from this texture to the picture and its contents is virtually absent from art writing. This is a serious deficiency (and a matter I have been giving my attention to for many many years). I believe that the equivalent in writing is that between the words heard or read and the sense that we have them make. In all of the arts the crucial critical issue is the understanding of the passage from the texture to the reading of the text established by the know-how of the artist. That is what we should probably recognise as the art that criticism concerns itself with as fundamental. What is doleful is the large-scale absence from criticism of this fundamental process of reading which underpins all other contents. Criticism for the most part functions as if the given were the contents, whereas it is the inert stuff of paint or words or whatevers turning into contents that artist make happen.

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

433. Carnography
Re: Hisao Kanaseki
Mon 15 Jul 1996

Akitoshi:

From your description, Hisao Kanaseki's work sounds fascinating. His style would seem to address certain problems with critical language: immediacy and invention, for example. What was Mr. Kanaseki's practice when it came to critical terminology-- spec., the idea that critics must use a limited repertoire of academically accepted terms, ideas and interdisciplinary approaches? I've found that, for all its seeming disregard for the phallocentric engines of European history, and for the so-called ivory towers of the academy, American letters seems to revere a only limited number of critical approaches, most of them derived from linguistics and semiotics (Lacan, Barthes, etc.).

> He died of lung cancer. He was 78.

My condolences to your and to your culture's loss. Are there any translations of Kanaseki's books in English?

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: Are you familiar with the criticism of Takayuki Tasumi and Mari Kotani?

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

434. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Akitoshi's note
Mon 15 Jul 1996

I'm very sad to hear about Dr. Kanaseki. I had drinks with him in Tokyo a couple of years ago and he gave me his beautiful translation (beautiful to look at, I can't tell how good it is) of TENDER BUTTONS. He was a lovely person, devoted to U.S. new poetries, had worked with Gary Snyder closely, and so on. Will there be any sort of memorial?

Thanks, for passing on the news, Akitoshi! And hello from Los Angeles! Hope all is well with you.

Marjorie

↑ Index

435. Carnography

Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)

Mon 15 Jul 1996

Tony:

> In all of the arts the crucial critical issue is the understanding of the passage from the texture to the reading of the text established by the know-how of the artist. That is what we should probably recognise as the art that criticism concerns itself with as fundamental. What is doleful is the large-scale absence from criticism of this fundamental process of reading which underpins all other contents. Criticism for the most part functions as if the given were the contents, whereas it is the inert stuff of paint or words or whatevers turning into contents that artist make happen.

Thanks for addressing what I consider to be a fundamental deficiency in the poetic discourse I find both here and in most English departments across America. A case in point: The first thing one notices about Mr. Watten's stanza-work, _Progress_, is its innovative, idiosyncratic surface (style, diction, syntax, scansion, rhythm) and the relentless subversion of figures of speech, conventional metaphors and common syntactical grids. Yet the only place I've ever found an accurate description of its technical properties was not in one of the myriad of language poetry journals of the eighties, not in a paper taught at Brown University or Cal Arts, but rather in _The Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetics_. What does this say about our critical interest in the texture of the writing itself?

Neither/Nor restored

To remark upon this dearth of critical attention is neither to incite vitriol nor to invite mere silence from those who do not share my interests: other modes of critical discourse need not be usurped or ignored simply because I choose to write and read technical analyses of the texture of poetic language. I am still interested in hearing from other poets as to how they approach what they write. I'd also like to read analyses of the surfaces of poems. If ppoets are not comfortable using what they perceive to be an accepted critical vocabulary, so much the better.

Question: Melville is almost universally considered to have been a wretched poet. But after a century of systematic trun- cations, diminutions and elisions of the iambic line, does Melville's dogerrel now yield a rhythmic richness that was unavailale to more conventionally competent poets of his period?

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

436. Christopher K. Whipple
Thank you for your responses
Mon 15 Jul 1996

I want to thank everyone who responded to my request for ideas and advise concerning a project I'm doing. The project is a season of performed poetry built around themes and using actors. The intelligently thought out responses I received have become a real resource for me.

It seems the idea of using actors in order to deliver the poetry has touched on a kind of fault line, at which notions of spontanaity versus rehearsal, language versus interpretation, immediacy versus preconception, honesty versus training, clash and grind against one another. Hopefully I will find a way to harness the unstable energy underlying the merger of the two traditions of theater and poetry--thank you for making me aware of it.

I would like to make my actors aware of the complexity of these issues, and of the diversity opinions and even prejudices that may be waiting to receive our work. I thought of putting exerpts from your responses on the web site I created for this project (it's a kind of "conferencing zone" for my far flung actors), but I cautiously went back and read the conditions of my subscription to this newsgroup and found the following caveat:

"IMPORTANT: This list is confidential. You should not publicly mention its existence, or forward copies of information you have obtained from it to third parties."

I think that's pretty straightforward. I cannot duplicate and disperse your responses. Which is really a good policy, after all.

But I do invite you to visit my web site at Verseworks and post your comments directly via the site's "blackboard".

Thanks again, to Shananne Tangney, David Baratier, Lisa Samuels, Kathrine Varnes, Rob Hardin, Peter Quartermain, Tony Green, Charles Alexander, Dean Tariuch, James Brook, Christopher Filkins, Judy Roitman, Pat Pritchett, Eliza McGrand, wystan, Nada Gordon and Michelle Roberts for your responses.

Christopher K. Whipple

↑ Index

437. Ron Silliman
Two from Bowering, one for Rob
Mon 15 Jul 1996

(1) "I noticed that your suggestions on the beginnings of decades are almost all connected to things that happened in one country, the USA. Didnt they have fifties and sixties and seventies in the rest of the world?"

Sheesh. You probably don't date the founding of Canadian literature from the day when Robin Blaser, George Stanley and Stan Persky moved to British Columbia either....

(2) So Pierre Joris was conceived just after WW2 shut down in Europe.
>
>Hmmmmm.
>
>Is there something to be deduced from this?

Arkadii Dragomoshchenko and I (both of whom will be turning 50 this summer) once noted that there are a lot of "victory babies" in this scene, and that they aren't all descended from the same army either.

(3)

Rob,

I always write with tongue posted firmly in cheek. Where else can one get the most serious writing done?

All best,

Ron Silliman
[redacted]

↑ Index

438. Jonathan A Levin
Re: text/language (fwd)
Mon 15 Jul 1996

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Fri, 12 Jul 1996 15:16:21 -0600 (MDT)
From: Marisa Januzzi <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: Re: text/language (fwd)

Jon--

They apparently have not straightened out this problem-- can you forward for me? Thanks.....

I still miss you. Will call to give the newsless update!

xx,M

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Fri, 12 Jul 1996 15:09:50 -0600 (MDT)
From: Marisa Januzzi <[redacted]>
To: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
Cc: Multiple recipients of list POETICS <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: text/language

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, Gabrielle Welford wrote:

> How can text and language be distinguished? I guess have to take a long look at how the word "language" and "text" can and can't sensibly be used. Otherwise into the foggy dew we go. gab.

Text as score for linguistic performance? How's that? (Textual editors make the distinction for pragmatic reasons...) Why do you ask? _____

And here's my bedside exhibitionist booklist, and I guess my lurker dues:

1) Loy and more Loy-- Carolyn Burke's bio, and Roger Conover's edition of the poems, are both out. It's a Loyfest. (And it may well happen, soon, in Aspen... I'll keep y'all posted.)

2) Johnson's ARK. And all the cookbooks of his I've gotten hold of! (Thanks again to Charles Alexander et al. for putting me in touch with Living Batch)(My near neighbors right next door in New Mexico!!)

3) Dawn Powell-- MY HOME IS FAR AWAY, and the diaries. Funny, tart, and totally unmistakably WRITTEN if not experimental.

4) And as if I am plugged in to poetics even when not, Notley (UNBORN SECOND BABY book), the Niedecker TRUCK issue, and Larry Eigner (the Oyez Selected, which I found in a remote poetry section of a bookstore which is the house of this guy who, I discovered, translates Trakl)

5) Wasatch Winter Trails (for insomnia)

6) Paul Gilroy's Black Atlantic book and 7) lots of stuff for courses I've got to teach in the fall, including an intro to lit theory for majors. If anyone's ever had a kind of theory or poetics break-through/breakout/breakdown (or whatever!) enmeshed in a text, I'd love to hear about it... I remember feeling those paradigms shift as I struggled to read, and then finally DID read Derrida's "White Mythology." You know the feeling: the blood carbonates, the long workvistas open, the sleep goes... etc. And so what is teaching? i wonder

Bye for now-- Marisa

↑ Index

439. Lisa Samuels

*Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic*

Mon 15 Jul 1996

---

dear rob hardin,

in response to the last part of your 11 July post:
how one writes poems. for me the process is very like a verbal string theory at work, or the physical way i used to imagine string theory: under a particular kind of emotional and intellectual pressure,
a phrase or title comes into my mind. like, say,
"Hyperplastic iconography buffers". i sit at the computer fairly soon after that verbal occurrence
and begin to write. the form of the poem asserts itself, usually, pretty quickly: either it wants space
and dislocation among its phrasal pieces, or it wants a compression or intimacy. the pieces
themselves seem to feed out one from the other,
according to some distended story-like material that floats around in the background of unreal
images, or according to a pattern of sound-connectives,
or according to a seemingly self-generating vision
of space and color for which it is necessary to imagine words. or all three. this describes, to some extent, a poetic trance, i realize, and tremendous poetry gets written with a much higher degree of compositional consciousness in the moment of the writing. but not by me; or anyway not since i started to write without worrying about whether i was making sense. so i end up with work like these two samples, (each is only the first section of two different poems,
and the spacing is not quite right here):

---

(1) Iconoclastic relationship to suffering

there is no clean verso to crawl under, anyway nominal

    crisp devolution into status angles, mine and yours and the terminal pathos in between wrecked integer of head modules, the ones we saw and sawing, made wooden in other words gone bad in their fidelity, construed according shaped as armlessly as this one for when the parachute falls, it's no descent at all not kin, not dementia-held but when I found it striking, you were not in the air, not plugged in the outlets entirely unlit schema

---

and (2) The stupefaction of her clothes

Informal synaloepha: let's get dressed upon the luminous imaginary bed of idea's thetic absolute,

the migratory information spread around.

The form of crows, the wing of wings, wholesome dilatory things, creeping through rapt dreaming, adjust the head's coarse irradiance, a search to realign a steadiness the lungs translate, the body glides not as though time is a gift, not as if one were made for it

---

and so on. the slow pondering of the made poem happens afterwards, not during, and revision is for me
a process of chipping away what seems redundant or unnecessary pieces of word-wood, let's say, from
the primary sculpture, and sometimes in reimagining
how the spacing should go, whether to introduce more air among the words, or less.

long enough.

yours,

lisa samuels

↑ Index

440. filch
Re: Beatle Bones and Smokin' Stones
Sat 15 Jul 1995

Didnt they have >fifties and sixties and seventies in the rest of the world?

Actually George, no, they did not.

↑ Index

441. Charles Alexander
*Re: Critics vs. poets? What I miss here are criticisms of poetic*
Mon 15 Jul 1996

Thanks, Lisa, for the description of the texture of your writing process. It sounds, in its own way, like a personal adaptation (although not necessarily consciously adapted at all) of Olson's sense of composition by field. I particularly like the way you articulate the conscious process of listening/writing/attending to the work as it comes, with some sense of the revision as simply a further listening to what matters.

For me part of this process also involves materials. For example, in one work in progress I am writing on some paper saved from being thrown away somewhere. The sheets are 11 x 17 and I am writing on them by hand, virtually filling the sheet from top to bottom, although there is no constant left or right margin. But again, like you, as soon as I began, this ragged completion of space seemed to be the demand of the materials, including the writing as it emanates, the hand & pen in action, and the paper as it exists. The primary revision is then enacted during the translation from this medium to word processing file on the computer. At the same time I'm working on something else considerably different, poems of mid-length lines, 13 lines each, very orderly on the page, although that order belying a consistency of invention throughout and a lack of "finished-ness." These poems are composed at one sitting each at the computer keyboard. But this work too is conditioned by the writing of the first piece in this series, which actually predated the continuation by a few months. What both of these distinct works share is a lack of interest in completion, so that they both now have several installments and are at the point where I am wondering if their form will change, if more complexity of shaping will be part of the evolution, and if varying senses of completion will begin to enter in.

thanks again for opening up this conversation.

charles

> a phrase or title comes into my mind. like, say,
> "Hyperplastic iconography buffers". i sit at the > computer fairly soon after that verbal occurrence
> and begin to write. the form of the poem asserts > itself, usually, pretty quickly: either it wants space
> and dislocation among its phrasal pieces, or it
> wants a compression or intimacy. the pieces
> themselves seem to feed out one from the other,
> according to some distended story-like material
> that floats around in the background of unreal
> images, or according to a pattern of sound-connectives,
> or according to a seemingly self-generating vision
> of space and color for which it is necessary to > imagine words. or all three. this describes, to some > extent, a poetic trance, i realize, and tremendous > poetry gets written with a much higher degree of > compositional consciousness in the moment of the > writing. but not by me; or anyway not since i started
> to write without worrying about whether i was making
> sense. so i end up with work like these two samples,
> (each is only the first section of two different poems,
> and the spacing is not quite right here):
>
> and so on. the slow pondering of the made poem
> happens afterwards, not during, and revision is for me
> a process of chipping away what seems redundant
> or unnecessary pieces of word-wood, let's say, from
> the primary sculpture, and sometimes in reimagining
> how the spacing should go, whether to introduce more
> air among the words, or less.
>
> long enough.
>
> yours,
>
> lisa samuels

↑ Index

442. Rod Smith
Re: The High Points
Mon 15 Jul 1996

Jordan wrote:
>Rod--what are the conditions on that use? Terms of >rental? (Or, how to get closer, to be more [perpetually] useful?) J

Well J, let's just say I didn't want to depend on my painting for a living.

Rod

↑ Index

443. Jerry Rothenberg
Re: Hisao Kanaseki
Mon 15 Jul 1996

---

dear Akitoshi Nagahata --

I heard of Kanaseki's death from Ito Hiromi, who has been staying up the street from us and with whom I had sent a fax to Kanaseki and had spoken to his wife only the day before. It was thru Kanaseki that I came to know Hiromi and many others in Japan, and we (my wife and I) were very much looking forward to seeing him again this November. We knew each other from the time that he was working on his book about (and of) American Indian poetry and he got in touch with me through Dan MacLeod and possibly Gary Snyder. He was, as far as I could tell, bound to no school or academic mode of criticism as such, but his devotion to poetry and those who made it was very real and very moving. He was an active and experimental (adventurous) reader and enthusiast, who must have seen some kind of bridging as a primary function of his work as critic/scholar. We felt very needed in his presence and feel immensely saddened by his loss.

If there is to be any memorial or any way of contributing to a memorial, please let me know.

Jerome Rothenberg
[redacted]

↑ Index

444. filch
BookStore
Sat 15 Jul 1995

(Thanks again to Charles Alexander et al. for putting me in touch with Living Batch)(My near neighbors right next door in New Mexico!!)

Of course one of the best book stores around. Sorry to hear about the death of the salt of the earth.

↑ Index

445. Judy Roitman
Wittgenstein
Mon 15 Jul 1996

Rod Smith wrote
> Also, I generally don't find Witt
>"linear" but definitely cumulative.
>

How about simultaneous?

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

446. Rod Smith
Re: [redacted]
Mon 15 Jul 1996

GB wroted:
>Is Pierre the spirit of the new age?

This not to do with Pierre, but just to mention-- Anselm calls it "newage" pronounced with similar inflection as, yes, you guessed it, sewage.

R

↑ Index

447. David Baratier
tag teamsters local 354 (poet vs critic)
Mon 15 Jul 1996

I got the feeling from these posts that the subject had shifted from earlier discussions on "can a poet be a critic also?" into one about how a mutual relationship can or does exist. And this is off the subject a bit, but I'm tired of a bunch of whinny-ass "poets" telling me about academia ruining writers. As if this was a situation unique to employees of a university. This insider/outsider status a lot of these folks are ego-tripping on is a large load, as an outsider why does one claim the marginalia as a methodology to defeat the inner sanctum(ie Here outside of the academic realm _our_ ideas are purer because we are not in danger of being assimilated into the "university sameness" of ideology, do not have free funding for our journal like the academics who publish each other (ad infinitum), or do not have our writing diluted through a desire for tenure). As if claiming the outside gives a righteous stance of finger pointing. They did this to us, give me sympathy, or one of them NEA funded pick-up trucks. Sorry to drop the bomb, but my continual experience with the outside non-academia has a similar and substantitive threat of ruining your writing, bucko. None of this is to say the academics are off the hook either, I could live without about a half-dozen of the I'm having problems with tenure or I don't go to non-university sponsored readings because the quality is suspect types of discussions. As if we sit in the audience and say: there's one of them university critters from the mansion on the hill, guess they wanted that yearly check-up so they'd have some thing real to write about. As if anywhere is less real than here. Hello, I'm a publisher and editor on the tenth floor of a white tower in a creative corporate environment, therefore my experience is more valid(as informed by the real world) but less crafted (ie not academically supported). This is the foundation peg I have been expected to lie in, come visit me and tack on your framework joineries. I think the validity of the writing accomplished during a particular period is a question whose answer lies in universal determinates, where the natural human desire for comfort does not simply equate to a particular writer's complacency and stability occurs in what ever bastion it arrives.

Paul - erasist vibes coming your way-- Jordan - Suburbs present us with a negation of the present, a landscape consumed by it's past and present.
Rod - If you don't know why do you ask? Still chewing.
Henry - Everyone does everyone. Recherche!!!!
Be well.

Davbid Baratier

↑ Index

448. Mark Wallace
poetry and criticism as the same
Mon 15 Jul 1996

Dear Bill Marsh and others:

A quick thanks to Henry Gould and Charles Alexander for making some valuable additions to my remarks about poets and critics, and to you, Bill, and some others for asking me helpful questions.

Let me see if I can briefly answer your question.

Theoretically, and aesthetically, the difference between poetry and poetry criticism can be easily and successfully collapsed.

Sociologically, except for a few avant garde publications, the difference between poetry and poetry criticism is absolute. For proof of this, please try to send one of your own, highly theoretical (and successfully so) poems to a standard academic journal, or any magazine that pays contributors, and tell them that it is criticism. Or, were you working at a university, turn in your published collection of poems to a tenure committee for evidence that you have been "critically active."

I pay attention to aesthetic and philosophical questions because I enjoy them.

I pay attention to sociological problems because I have no choice.

Frankly, I'm still enough of a Marxist to believe that sociological conditions determine artistic production--although the weakness of much Marxist criticism has been its tendency to oversimply what is meant by "determine." What that means is that I do not think there are any purely "aesthetic" questions.

Thus, the fact that we can aesthetically collapse the distinction between poetry and poetry criticism does not mean that anything of sociological significance has changed, at least to any significant extent.

I do not really understand Robert van Halleburg in his recent debate with Al Nielsen when he starts talking about "sociological" readings of poems as separate from some other possibilities for reading poems. I'm pretty much convinced there are ONLY sociological readings, and that the whole history of "close reading" itself is based in social phenomena. The difference is between readings that recognize their social conditions, and those that are under the illusion that they transcend them.

The extent to which my poetry raises questions that can be discussed as purely "aesthetic" rather than sociological is the extent to which my poetry, or its readers, have failed to understand what is at stake.

mark wallace

(please excuse any typos over this long distance, semi-functional modem)

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |

to go to extremes" || GWU: | | http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw || EPC: || http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace || |_____|

↑ Index

449. maria damon
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Mon 15 Jul 1996

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion group writes:
> >
> > >>On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, George Bowering wrote:
> > >>
> > >>> >Hi. What's the unconscious?
> > >>> >
> > >>> >Jordan
> > >>>
> > >>> I dont know what yr talking about.
> > >>
> > >>Nor do I, you.
> > >>
> > >>Tristan
> > >
> > >
> > >--Neither do I, I.
> >
> >
> > i do not i
> >
> id, we're getting closer!

super!

↑ Index

450. maria damon
Re: text/language
Mon 15 Jul 1996

thanks for the "divination" stuff; i like that as a notion of "reading" --one last quickie about weaving (sorry about the pomposity of my earlier post about how i "became a weaver"..."writer"...) --one of the things that charms me about

weaving is the technical terms, which are childish and fun: "shuttle," "heddle," "treadle" (pronounced "treddle"), "raddle," "bobbin." can any of you linguists shed light on why these terms might be the way they are? (backchannel wd be cool, so as not to distract others with this sidelight)--md

↑ Index

451. maria damon
Re: [redacted]
Mon 15 Jul 1996

---

yes indeed, happy birthday, hope yr out reveling in sun and joy, and here's to another 50 just as fab.
md

↑ Index

452. Tony Green
Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
Mon 15 Jul 1996

Rob Hardin: one more word (repeated ad lib) " doleful "

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

453. Peter Quartermain
eudora crash
Mon 15 Jul 1996

(Still sending, not receiving)

For those who need to know, and for Bill Marsh in especial:

EUDORA crashed because the server sending Bill Marsh's message dates his message
--wait for it!!!-- 1969 instead of 1996.
This is known to Eudora (their technicians tell me) as a BAD DATE
for which you get the message "Application Error Integer Divide by Zero".

So I set my system up again, having had my server delete Bill Marsh's messages, got going nicely, and dammit there was another one! The bad date does not affect Winsock (which I use to interface) but does affect Netscape and Eudora, on a PC486 (memory is no problem that i can see on my machine) -- it has no effect on a MAC. Once again I have lost half my mail (downloaded and then scrambled / garbled by a second wrong date -- origin unknown: you again, Bill?))

In any case, I'm off-line till 1 August; I can however download (horribly, and sort of) through Windows 3.1 Terminal (yuck) till I fix myself up again.

Madre dios!

Peter.

+ + + +

456. Tony Green
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Mon 15 Jul 1996

> On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, George Bowering wrote:
>
> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan
>
> I dont know what yr talking about.
>
> Nor do I, you.
>
> Tristan
>
> --Neither do I, I.
>
> i do not i

--Oh, I'll bet you I from time to time.

-- no,no no, no, meaning yes

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

457. trace s. ruggles
Re: the texture of poetry
Mon 15 Jul 1996

---

considered the world of texture in a poem

listened to my body went to the poetry room (as opposed to the short story room) heard the soundvoice who doesn't exist with the audible (went to the syntax room) processed a line of energy through head neck chest abdomen crotch

then turned to edit as another being being emptied space and filled space
one word as another moves an other wise simple page

i don't know exactly what i'm saying but this whole business is so damn organic that the 'voice' that exists is something larger than me and comes through me, filtered with the body, the body as a resonance tool and it all creates a tactile song apprehended but once and remembered many times how do we forget what we've done to make another?

---

trace (from the vermin lurkers...)

↑ Index

458. Aldon L. Nielsen
Re: Kweisi he calls me
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Won't have time after all to post that report on the Bob and Elizabeth Dole book signing at Westwood Borders -- Just let me tell you it's not true what they say about me "setting them up." Nor was that me in the big cigarette suit -- Noticed, by the way, that Mr. Cigarette got more requests for autographs than did Bob & Elizabeth -- But Mr. Cig. probably has a larger constituency --

BUT THE REAL POINT OF THIS NOTE is to say that I'm going away for six days -- will leave mail ON so as to receive any additional stabs at that poem I posted here for the contest -- Several VERY good efforts so far (and Alan Golding figured out by means of literary history that it could not be the poet most people were guessing) -- Will check mail for first correct answer when I get back & will then post the awful truth of that poem -- (This is not a particularly tricky one, by the way -- This is a poet you've all heard of)

↑ Index

459. Gabrielle Welford
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Tue 16 Jul 1996

> >>>> >Hi. What's the unconscious?
> >>>> >
> >>>> >Jordan
> >>>>
> >>>> I dont know what yr talking about.
> >>>
> >>>Nor do I, you.
> >>>
> >>>Tristan
> >>
> >>
> >>--Neither do I, I.
> >
> >
> >i do not i
>
> --Oh, I'll bet you I from time to time.
>
> -- no,no no, no, meaning yes
>
i yes i yes i you

↑ Index

460. George Bowering
Re: of the whole art/spam two generations
Tue 16 Jul 1996

> Hi. What's the unconscious?
>
> Jordan
>
> I dont know what yr talking about.
>
> Nor do I, you.
>
> Tristan
>
> --Neither do I, I.

> i do not i
>
> --Oh, I'll bet you I from time to time.
>
> -- no,no no, no, meaning yes
>
> i yes i yes i you

:oh, yez, I ewes too
but no now, no I i's

.....
"a vivid weightless bean"
--A. Hollo

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

461. Carnography
Re: text/language
Tue 16 Jul 1996

maria damon typed:

> (sorry about the pomposity of my earlier post about > how i "became a weaver"..."writer"...)

What do you mean "pompous?" Your lack of pomposity was evident (you weren't lecturing anybody), and you were far too informative to be accused of self-absorption. Like any really good performance poet (Dael Orlandersmith) will attest, autobiography is just a mode. To confuse autobiography for narcissism is to mistake the writer's approach for the quality of the writer's attention.

> --one of the things that charms me about weaving is the technical terms, > which are childish and fun: "shuttle," "heddle," "treadle" (pronounced > "treddle"), "raddle," "bobbin." can any of you linguists > shed light on why these terms might be the way they are? (backchannel

"Linguists?" You don't need to be a linguist to study the origins and sounds of words. Your weaver's lexicon sounds far too fun.

> wd be cool, so as not to distract others with this sidelight)--md

Etymology isn't off-topic on a poetics list. The subject certainly leaves me more interested than impatient.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

462. Carnography
Re: critics vs. poets (tag team round three)
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Tony Green:

> Rob Hardin: one more word (repeated ad lib) " doleful "

And you'd like this ||:word:|| to be repeated in response to...Melville's poetry?

§

Still thinking about Lisa, trace, and Charles's recent missives concerning their real-time approaches to composition. It's a pleasure to read people speaking about their work.

§

And no, my interest in fugitive theory doesn't mean I'm anti-academic. It merely means that I'm researching other approaches to theory. So far as I know, that knd of research was one of the primary critical activities of many of the educated (but not always tenured) poets we discuss in UB Poetics.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

463. cris cheek
Carla Harryman and Barrett Watten
Tue 16 Jul 1996

A Reading Performance by North American Language Writing Artists, Carla Harryman and Barrett Watten. (part of this year's East International)

Date: Wednesday 17 July at 15.00
Venue: Riverside Lecture Theatre, Norwich School of Art and Design, St Georges Street, Norwich (phone 01603 610561)

all are welcome and admission is Free

↑ Index

464. Kevin Killian
Re: press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

At 1:23 PM 7/16/96, Charles Alexander wrote:

> And here's possibly a devil's advocate thought, concerning the demise of Coach House. That is, part of my experience with the institutionalization and bureaucratization of nonprofit arts and publishing since I've been in the Twin Cities has only reinforced my feelings that many institutions live past their richest artistic periods as they achieve stabilization. Often such stabilization means doing work which is more fundable and which can demonstrate reaching larger audiences. Certainly art & literature needs those audiences, and those audience needs deserve to be met.

Charles,

I'm sure you've written grants and are aware how hard it is to write grants for the desperately-need funding a nonprofit needs--how difficult it is to keep true to the mission of the org and yet please the whims of funders. Increasingly on grant applications I'm seeing, audience development seems to be a bigger and bigger focus--sometimes it seems the actual programming is an after-thought. Putting on experimental poetry readings for a bunch of over-served snobs (which is what I think my programming would look like to many funders) is not going to be seen as audience development, even though SPT's audiences are quite large by poetry standards. Looking at grant applications I often think, "Now how can I sneak in an intelligent project." It's not easy. Sometimes it seems that literature has it worse than other arts. It's not all that rare to see interesting projects in visual arts funded, but for literature it's heart-strings projects all the way. I was a judge for one artist in residency program, and consistently there was a high intellectual standard for visual arts, whereas when I tried to get an award for a white male experimental poet I practically got laughed out of the room. Recently SPT got to the second round for one of those grants that cycle through disciplines--the year before, visual arts was the category, and I was impressed with some of the awards. But the literature awards the year we applied were gruesome. When I read them to our graphic designer, he said they sounded like topics for the Rickie Lake Show.

Just needed to bitch.

Dodie

↑ Index

465. Michael Boughn
Bad news
Tue 16 Jul 1996

The bad news here this a.m. is the announcement of the closing of Coach House Press, much esteemed publishers of Robin Blaser, George Bowering, Michael Ondaatje, Sharon Thesen, and many many others, after 31 years due to the continuing implementation of knee-jerk neo-con economics by the provincial and federal governments. Chalk up another victory for the New York bankers.

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

466. Alan Sondheim
Coach House
Tue 16 Jul 1996

CH is closing? I can't believe this - the best editions of Nicole Brossard in English... it's hard enough to get hold of Quebecois work in translation outside Mtl.... Alan

http://jefferson.village.virginia.edu/~spoons/internet_txt.html images: http://www.cs.unca.edu/~davidson/pix/
Canis caninam non est.

↑ Index

467. maria damon
Re: Bad news
Tue 16 Jul 1996

---

this news is really sad. i'm sorry and mad. what next.--md

In message <[redacted]> UB Poetics discussion
group writes:
> The bad news here this a.m. is the announcement of the closing of > Coach House Press, much esteemed publishers of Robin Blaser, George > Bowering, Michael Ondaatje, Sharon Thesen, and many many others, after > 31 years due to the continuing implementation of knee-jerk neo-con > economics by the provincial and federal governments. Chalk up another > victory for the New York bankers.
>
> Mike
> [redacted]

↑ Index

468. Lisa Amber Phillips

Re: Coach House (re-post due to delivery failure)

Tue 16 Jul 1996

From: IN%"[redacted]" "PMDF Mail Server" 16-JUL-1996 10:34:11.42 To: IN%"[redacted]", IN%"[redacted]" CC: Subj: Undeliverable mail: SMTP delivery failure

(PMDF V4.3-10 #10451) id <[redacted]>; Tue,
16 Jul 1996 10:34:05 -0500 (EST)
Date: Tue, 16 Jul 1996 10:34:05 -0500 (EST)
From: PMDF Mail Server <[redacted]>
Subject: Undeliverable mail: SMTP delivery failure
To: [redacted], [redacted]

--Boundary (ID PxZB22RCVXxwGm025Ae1zw)

The message could not be delivered to:

Addressee: [redacted]
Reason: Illegal host/domain name found.

--Boundary (ID PxZB22RCVXxwGm025Ae1zw)

(PMDF V4.3-10 #10451) id <[redacted]>; Tue,
16 Jul 1996 10:34:02 -0500 (EST)
Date: Tue, 16 Jul 1996 10:34:02 -0500 (EST)
From: [redacted]
Subject: Re: Coach House
To: [redacted]

Mike, I'm interested in the details behind "the continuing implementation of knee-jerk neo-con economics by the provincial and federal governments." What, in your view, are the particulars of those kinds of economics? I ask because in the last year, in conversation with one or two people who publish poetry (at the moment I'm thinking of Sam Hamill of Copper Canyon Press), I've gotten the distinct impression that there are a great number of small presses out there who are in more danger than usual of going under. I have also gotten the impression that, due to the always-rising costs of publishing (especially the price of paper), small presses have become increasingly dependent upon grants from governmental arts institutions like NEH, which have of course recently and drastically reduced funding due to their own decreased funding b by Congress. Since small presses publish a very high percentage of the contemporary poetry in this country--especially experimental work--then I also get the impression that poetry itself is in some danger; not only will the already-published works of poets like Robin Blaser and Sharon Thesen fall out of print (which is tragic), but there will be fewer places and opportunities for poets to publish as well (which is also tragic).

The next question I want to ask (because I've been turning it over in the back of my mind for some months now and would be interested in other viewpoints) is: Is it possible for small presses of today to remove themselves from live-or-die dependence upon the fickle funding of governments, or avoid it altogether, or are publishing costs just too high and returns on sales too small? And, are there any alternatives to this situation to keep distributing the work of contemporary writers (I know there are, but I want to hear suggestions from others, as well as pro-and-con evaluations of those alternatives if there are any). I'd especially be interested in hearing from those who are currently publishing contemporary poets. Thanks.

Lisa Amber Phillips
[redacted]

--Boundary (ID PxZB22RCVXxwGm025Ae1zw)--

↑ Index

469. Charles Alexander
Re: BookStore
Tue 16 Jul 1996

> (Thanks again to Charles Alexander et al. for putting me in touch with Living Batch)(My near neighbors right next door in New Mexico!!)
>
> Of course one of the best book stores around. Sorry to hear about the death of the salt of the earth.

And of course if you're looking for rare first editions, out of print poetry, limited edition handmade books, etc., in Albuquerque, you have to check out Passages, begun a few years ago by the incomparable David Abel (some in New York will know David from the Bridge Bookstore several years ago there). His email is [redacted]

charles

↑ Index

470. Charles Alexander
Re: eudora crash
Tue 16 Jul 1996

I'm sorry for everyone's Eudora problems. And while glad to see my friend Bill Marsh's name here so much, I'm sorry it's in such a circumstance. I had a feeling the problem might be with someone's internet service provider.

But I'm puzzled about presumably all the systems, including my own, which weren't affected at all. And mine is a PC, not a MAC, running Windows 3.11, Eudora, Netscape, etc.

charles

>(Still sending, not receiving)
>
>For those who need to know, and for Bill Marsh in especial:
>
>EUDORA crashed because the server sending Bill Marsh's message dates his message
>--wait for it!!!-- > 1969
>instead of 1996.
>This is known to Eudora (their technicians tell me) as a BAD DATE
>for which you get the message "Application Error Integer Divide by Zero".
>
>So I set my system up again, having had my server delete Bill Marsh's >messages, got going nicely, and dammit there was another one! The bad date >does not affect Winsock (which I use to interface) but does affect Netscape >and Eudora, on a PC486 (memory is no problem that i can see on my machine)
>-- it has no effect on a MAC. Once again I have lost half my mail >(downloaded and then scrambled / garbled by a second wrong date -- origin >unknown: you again, Bill?))
>
>In any case, I'm off-line till 1 August; I can however download (horribly, >and sort of) through Windows 3.1 Terminal (yuck) till I fix myself up again.
>
>Madre dios!
>
>Peter.
> + + +

> Vancouver
> B.C.
> Canada V5V 1X2
> Voice and fax: [redacted]
>
> + + +

472. Charles Alexander press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

> Mike, I'm interested in the details behind "the continuing implementation of knee-jerk neo-con economics by the provincial and federal governments." What, in your view, are the particulars of those kinds of economics?

There is certainly a relationship between conservative politics and the de-funding of the arts in America, and probably in Canada, although I know much less about that. And the more limited funding tends, in my view, to go to the most established presses publishing the most commercially palatable/successful literature. Although even those presses are struggling more than usual (but it would be wrong to deny that it has always in this century and probably before been a struggle to publish literature of practically any kind). In addition, with national funding cutbacks there were many hopes that more funds could be leveraged in state legislatures to replace lost federal dollars for the arts. For the most part, in most states, the opposite may be happening. States are saying they can't & won't replace the federal dollars, and in many cases are cutting back their own dollars. Most states are as politically conservate as the federal government, if not moreso, and this absolutely effects arts funding.

> I ask because in the last year, in conversation with one or two people who publish poetry (at the moment I'm thinking of Sam Hamill of Copper Canyon Press), I've gotten the distinct impression that there are a great number of small presses out there who are in more danger than usual of going under.

Yes, they are. See above.

> I have also gotten the impression that, due to the always-rising costs of publishing (especially the price of paper), small presses have become increasingly dependent upon grants from governmental arts institutions like NEH, which have of course recently and drastically reduced funding due to their own decreased funding b by Congress.

Paper costs are actually descending once again, and I am not finding it considerably more expensive to publish books this year than five or six years ago. But I am finding it more difficult to find dollars to pay the costs, and somewhat more difficult to distribute & sell books, although this is somewhat offset by the advantage of having been at it now for several years, and the audience-building that the ongoing activity achieves. The NEH almost never funds small presses, unless the activity is specifically scholarly. The NEA has consistently funded a small number of presses, although the record with regard to more experimental/innovative poetries has been spotty.

> Since small presses publish a very high percentage of the contemporary poetry in this country--especially experimental work--then I also get the impression that poetry itself is in some danger; not only will the already-published works of poets like Robin Blaser and Sharon Thesen fall out of print (which is tragic), but there will be fewer places and opportunities for poets to publish as well (which is also tragic).

This is not so clear to me. There seem to be more journals popping up each year, although they are not necessarily long-lived. Also, the possibilities of electronic publishing and distribution have barely been tapped. And the presses which perhaps have the best chance of survival are the micro-presses publishing chapbooks off the desktop and keeping expenses at the minimum. I think this is all good news, and we may have to lose some of our hierarchical ideas about what constitutes an important book (looks of book, whether or not we find it in many bookstores or in creative independent channels, etc.)

> The next question I want to ask (because I've been turning it over in the back of my mind for some months now and would be interested in other viewpoints) is: Is it possible for small presses of today to remove themselves from live-or-die dependence upon the fickle funding of governments, or avoid it altogether, or are publishing costs just too high and returns on sales too small?

There are some presses which do so. The answers here are as multiple as the presses. A recent article in Publishers Weekly (perhaps a couple of months ago) was by the director of The Permanent Press and discussed that press's ability to keep afloat, not as a nonprofit organization. I would certainly not encourage new presses beginning now to go the nonprofit corporation route, at least not without some deep thought and research about it. On the other hand, I don't think I'd yet encourage those who already have that status and have learned how to work with it, to throw it out the window. But no doubt about it, presses are going to have to be creative in developing survival strategies.

> And, are there any alternatives to this situation to keep distributing the work of contemporary writers (I know there are, but I want to hear suggestions from others, as well as pro-and-con evaluations of those alternatives if there are any). I'd especially be interested in hearing from those who are currently publishing contemporary poets. Thanks.

I certainly would like to hear other ideas about this as well. Thanks to Lisa Amber Phillips for bringing it up.

charles

↑ Index

473. Judy Roitman
Re: press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

> ... we may have to lose some of our
> hierarchical ideas about what constitutes an important book (looks of book, whether or not we find it in many bookstores or in creative independent channels, etc.)

But combined with the dominance of B&N & Borders, and the resulting difficulties of independent bookstores, how will these creative independent channels flourish, and how will people find them?

This is a serious question. There is (always -- the natural course of things) too much of an insider/outsider situation, and a whole school of writing going samizdat will make things worse.

---------- Judy Roitman
| "Glad to have Math, University of Kansas | these copies of things
Lawrence, KS 66045 | after a while." [redacted]
| Larry Eigner, 1927-1996

↑ Index

474. Carnography
Re: Coach House (re-post due to delivery failure)
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Lisa Amber Phillips typed:

> The next question I want to ask (because I've been turning it over in the back of my mind for some months now and would be interested in other viewpoints) is: Is it possible for small presses of today to remove themselves from live-or-die dependence upon the fickle funding of governments, or avoid it altogether, or are publishing costs just too high and returns on sales too small?

My fellow editors and I at _Sensitive Skin_ have been wondering exactly the same thing. It is easy enough for us to sink dough into an issue of the magazine when we've each got lots of freelance work (see 89-92). But when we're coasting financially, like we are now, there is absolutely nowhere to turn. For two years, we've tried for grants without success. In our current unpublished issue, we've got original work by Luc Sante and Lynne Tillman, an unpublished interview with William Burroughs conducted by Ginsburg, and photographs by Richard Kern. None of this work is particularly difficult (except, subtly, for Lynne's), yet no one has given us the financial time of day. Not to be able to find the backing to publish a Burroughs issue in 1996 seems tragic if not downright mystifying.

My strategy in editing SS and other magazines has always been to use names to attract readers, but to concentrate on promoting writers who are relatively obscure. If we can't find the funding to publish Burroughs, then how will we publish the diffcult writing that people ought to know? Autonomedia has faced similar problems; Prof. Doug Rice has been publishing his magazine _Nobodaddies_, out of his own pocket. Are the arts to follow a kind of economic arch form? Have we reverted from the financial independence of Beethoven to the patrons of Haydn and Mozart? And if so, what literate millionaire is going to understand the writing of, say, Rae Armantrout? I've just been speaking to the heir to Prentice-Hall; let's just say that he is interested in reportage and despises the entire notion of literature, of fiction and poetry, on principle. I wouldn't trust him to write a literate sentence, let alone to value important or difficult work.

Defunding, I think, is partly at fault for the dumbing of readings that people complain about in UB Poetics. Lowest common denominators begin to look good to artists who are fighting for economic survival. What we're dealing with, of course, is financial censorship. A kind of _On the Waterfront_ close-out of artists who don't reflect the Deaf, Dumb & Dumber values of the culture.

It's odd, how _Skin_ eds have begun to look at publishing in terms of escape from financial famine. Just get to Germany, we've been thinking. Get the magazine to Europe and tap our resources there.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

475. Carnography
Re: BookStore
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Charles Alexander typed:

> And of course if you're looking for rare first editions, out of print poetry, limited edition handmade books, etc., in Albuquerque, you have to check out Passages, begun a few years ago by the incomparable David Abel (some in New York will know David from the Bridge Bookstore several years ago there). His email is [redacted]

Thanks, Charles. David's bookstore, The Bridge, was the only one of its kind in NYC: no one else was interested promoting in difficult poetry and prose. The Bridge was only bookstore here to face-out the entire Sun & Moon catalog, the only place where you might enter into a conversation about Clark Coolidge, to have a book-signing party for Robert Pinget. You should have seen how moved Pinget was by David's interest.

The Poetry Project was always interested in a kind of interdisciplinary pop culture strategy that I don't find particularly useful as a writer. David was our resident monk, our interlocutor. We miss him sorely.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: Segue and other presses are certainly based in NYC. But so far as I know, The Bridge was and remains the only cross-plat poetry bookstore of the late eighties. Anselm Hollo, David Rattray and Keith Waldrop in beautifully dissonant succession.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

476. Mark Wallace
experiments and identities
Tue 16 Jul 1996

For anyone interested in the recently ongoing thread about experimental poetries and identity politics, Harryette Mullin's piece "Poetry and Identity" in the new West Coast Line is really a must read. Well argued, precise, and right there.

But as I was reading it last night, I also saw this new commercial for Colgate toothpaste, whose main character is an African American woman poet who uses Colgate and recites her poetry on stage, the key line being "Free. Free to be me." Has anyone else seen this?

I wanted to quote another choice bit from the new West Coast line. I think it applies to all sorts of contexts other than the one for which it is perfectly well-suited. In this piece by Jessica Johnson, Sam ("a smallish Cub Scout of indeterminant gender") knocks at the door of a house where there is a party hosted by Judith Butler, with Monique Wittig as one of the guests. Sam doesn't know whether to "become a Girl Guide or a Boy Scout." Here's how the scene ends:

"But what am I supposed to do right this minute?" asked Sam. "I can't stay in your kitchen forever. I have to go out and play on a team." "You could alternate teams, for maximum effect," suggested Judith Butler. "Or you could simply forget about being a scout. Deny teams. In my case, I find it necessary to suppress them. That is the point of view of the lesbian," said Monique Wittig. "I've been meaning to talk to you about that," said Judith Butler.

And that started a debate. This gave Sam the opportunity to take a muffin from the counter, and slip quietly out the back door.

mark wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

477. Kevin Killian
Re: press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

At 3:21 PM 7/16/96, Judy Roitman wrote:

> Dodie, I thought that only happened in Kansas.

Actually, a project involving Toto would probably have a good chance of getting funded.

db

↑ Index

478. Charles Alexander
Re: press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

> ... we may have to lose some of our
> hierarchical ideas about what constitutes an important book (looks of book, whether or not we find it in many bookstores or in creative independent channels, etc.)
>
> But combined with the dominance of B&N & Borders, and the resulting difficulties of independent bookstores, how will these creative independent channels flourish, and how will people find them?
>
> This is a serious question. There is (always -- the natural course of things) too much of an insider/outsider situation, and a whole school of writing going samizdat will make things worse.

Perhaps you are right, and I don't have the answers about how the creative channels will flourish. But in the last year Chax Press has sold more books through this Poetics list than it ever has through any single source other than specific book distributors like SPD. More through Poetics than through library jobbers like Baker & Taylor. So that indicates to me that, while it may be samizdat, the potential for the actual number of readers to grow through such channels may be great.

Look forward to another Chax sales announcement very soon (within the next week) for a new book by Tom Mandel, Prospect of Release, and for a couple of previous handmade books (by Nathaniel Mackey & Gil Ott). This is a sale prior to our return move to Tucson, Arizona, which will take place before the end of August.

And I will extend a thank you right here to the terrific participants on this poetics list who have supported Chax Press and other presses as well, and for the ongoing conversation of which it is a pleasure to be a part.

And here's possibly a devil's advocate thought, concerning the demise of Coach House. That is, part of my experience with the institutionalization and bureaucratization of nonprofit arts and publishing since I've been in the Twin Cities has only reinforced my feelings that many institutions live past their richest artistic periods as they achieve stabilization. Often such stabilization means doing work which is more fundable and which can demonstrate reaching larger audiences. Certainly art & literature needs those audiences, and those audience needs deserve to be met. But I still feel that not every (& possibly not even most) arts organizations and activities need to live on in perpetuity (or close) & that it's perfectly fine to serve a dedicated mission for any period of time from a few days to several years and then simply stop, for whatever reasons. Some of my favorite presses and magazines historically (The Objectivist Press, Black Sun Press, HOW(ever), etc.) were not particularly long-lived. In comparison, Coach House lived a long and very productive life. I think I'd rather celebrate its glory than bemoan its passing.

charles

↑ Index

479. Mark Wallace
readings in Washington, D.C.
Tue 16 Jul 1996

We may have some openings for poetry readings here in D.C., so if there's anyone who is interested in that possibility, please contact me at this e-mail address. Unfortunately, we don't have any travel money to offer at this time, but we can always offer an informed and committed audience.

But please, no requests for readings around the time of MLA in late December. Things here will be very hectic then. We're hoping to put something together at that time, and more information will be posted as it becomes available.

Mark Wallace

/----------\ |
| | [redacted] "I have not yet begun | |
to go to extremes" | | GWU: |
| http://gwis2.circ.gwu.edu/~mdw | | EPC:
| | http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/wallace | |
_____|

↑ Index

480. Herb Levy
Re: Bad news
Tue 16 Jul 1996

It is obviously very sad news that Coach House is going under, and I agree with much of what people have said (& no doubt will continue to say) about the problems of distribution, marketing, and selling new, experrimental poetry to an audience of people who aren't on this e-mail list; etc. But distribution for avant garde work has always sucked, finding that audience (one person at a time) has always been a pain in the ass, & grants have rarely, if ever, been enough to support a project of the scale of Coach House.

Historically, how many small presses have lasted thirty years or more? How many small presses from the mid-Sixties are still going strong? (For that matter, how many adventurous, experimental, or whatever non-profit arts organizations in any field have lasted this long?)

In the US, I can think of City Lights, New Directions & Black Sparrow (which may not be quite that old), but these seem to have survived because they have reprint rights for books used in college & university courses or some other works that have guaranteed sales (is Bukowski on the syllabus anywhere?). (& yes, I do know that New Directions started with a wad of family money, but the continued survival of ND as a business is at least as related to the number of copies of books by Pound, WCW, HD, Duncan, & others that are sold to students yearly.)

I'm not trying to minimize the impact that the loss of Coach House will have: It is (& I'm consciously using the present tense here) clearly THE major press for new poetry in Canada, they have a great backlist, they know what work is important to publish and have been able to find ways to get it out there.

Still, I'm not sure that the forces at work here are simply the current economic state of the Corporate/State. We're not talking best sellers here. Small presses, & arts organizations in general, which last more than thirty years have developed some kind of financial stability (whether it's market share, donor base, or stylish t-shirts & gimme caps) that has been, unfortunately, all too often unrelated to artistic merit.

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

481. maria damon
Re: Coach House (re-post due to delivery failure)
Tue 16 Jul 1996

---

lisa amber philips writes:
>
>... I've gotten the distinct impression that there are a > great number of small presses out there who are in more danger than > usual of going under...
> The next question I want to ask (because I've been turning it over in the > back of my mind for some months now and would be interested in other > viewpoints) is: Is it possible for small presses of today to remove > themselves from live-or-die dependence upon the fickle funding of > governments, or avoid it altogether, or are publishing costs just too > high and returns on sales too small? ...
>
>
i know some presses (coffee house, arte publico, etc.,) have gone non-profit as a way of becoming eligible for lots of private foundation money like lila wallace reader's digest, lannan foundation, etc. the trouble is, many small presses are basically the vision of one or two people, and when going non-profit they have to have a board of directors, staff, etc. and there can be some uncomfortableness, basically, in shifting to a more corporate model of operation.
md

↑ Index

482. David Baratier

press haus

Tue 16 Jul 1996

The rising cost of paper has occurred for a very simple reason: it is bought on the futures market, in the same way one might reserve oil now (through purchase) which will not be freed up for the buyer until one yuear from the purchase date. Large publishing houses are buying up millions of pounds of paper in this advance method, making smaller lots of paper for purchase scarce. While I'm glad that this period of scarcity seems to have lightened, I do keep in mind the fact of the almost decimation of independent films in the mid-seventies through this same kind of process (competing with the major studios for film purchase).

As a publisher who does not depend on grants at all, I find the recent lack of NEA and other funds in the US for literary publications to be a excellent opportunity for our journal. Publications which have outlived their life-expectancy through government monetary support will finally have wake-up and-- SURPRISE!-- pay attention to what their re-formed public constituency of readers is looking for. They will have to _build_ a community of writers and readers instead of assuming there is one nebulously floating in some provincial area. Many journals will fold, lacking the aptitude to adapt to this new found circumstance, and many will lament the occurrance in the same way that newspapers lament the closing of an independant bookstore without ever having run a positve write-up of that same store when in business.

Distribution is in a horrible state. When Charles mentioned that people need to change their thinking on what constitutes a publication to also include xerox staple-bound books (such as Tom Beckett's Interruptions book of work by Fielding Dawson) or smaller free-bound publications (with an envelope as binding, such as the old Hanging Loose issues, or the one we are doing by Robert Grenier) or e-mail/web sites as publications. But what I think is as important is re-tooling the ideologies of the consumer towards a willingness to purchase products through direct-to-publisher mail order methods. Unless piggy-backing onto a larger organization, small press publishers have a difficult time finding a distributor. And if a press purely publishes work which is not perfect bound, none of the major distributors will carry the product. Period.

Be well.

David Baratier

↑ Index

483. Charles Smith
Re: press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

In a message dated 96-07-16 12:02:59 EDT, Charles Alexander writes:

<< I would certainly not encourage new presses beginning now to go the nonprofit corporation route, at least not without some deep thought and research about it. >>

Charles, would you amplify on this?

& deep regrets at the passing of Coach House

↑ Index

484. Daniel Salmon
Re: Marsh
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Hi all,

Exactly the same thing happened to me, ie "integer divide by 0" i have swapped modems, deleted my entire c drive, been convinced it was a hard ware problem and nerely bought more memory, spent about 3 days trying to sort it out with my provider and the people i bought the computer from, perhaps Bill Marsh could talk to his people before continuing to mail. It sounds as though its fucking a lot of people up, do others use pegasus or something. A bit bloody frustrating really, Dan.

BTW using netscape to access it works today, but didn't when it first happened.

Yours 'ludditedly'

Dan.

↑ Index

485. Charles Alexander
Re: BookStore
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Dear Rob

Thanks for your moving tribute to David Abel & The Bridge. I'll forward it to David who I am certain will be his usual gracious self, very glad to be appreciated in such a way. And I hope to see him in about a month in Albuquerque, and hopefully give a report sometime after that to this list.

charles

↑ Index

486. Gabrielle Welford

Language in Contemporary American Poetry (9/15; NEMLA) (fwd)

Tue 16 Jul 1996

Call for Papers:

Panel for 1997 Northeast Modern Language Association Convention, Philadelphia, PA. Notes Toward "Notes Toward A Supreme Fiction": Language in Contemporary American Poetry

Postmodern theory, ideas that have dominated academic circles for the past three decades, has again come under heavy negative criticism, rending fresh philosophical "rifts" in universities worldwide. This backlash, harboring academia's desire to re-affirm its identity in the face of theory that renders our pursuit for meaning meaningless, exemplifies the perpetual modern dilemma (and our endless quest to solve it) that both artists and humans in general confront: justification for the creation of art (and literary criticism); validation of one's self in an indeterminate world. Traditionally, American poets have attempted to come to terms with this paradox and situate our collective thought on this always fluctuating issue; I wish to review, in this panel, where contemporary poetry currently finds itself with regards to the use of language and the making of meaning. Working in a medium that has been declared "slippery," unable to convey fixed meaning, American poets may (or may not) need to look beyond the postmodern inconceivable notions of meaning, guaranteeing their place in society as an artist and an individual. In order to satisfy the contradictory desires for absolute meaning and a multiplicity of meaning generated by our use of language in a diverse, pluralistic society, where the fragmentary nature of our culture contributes to the "slipperiness" of language, contemporary poets appear to attempt to sustain simultaneously the interplay and interdependency of the possibilities of language as metaphor explaining some "truth" and language as fragmentation, the making of many meanings. My goal for this panel is to assess how "well" contemporary poets are dealing with our paradox of language, a paradox that begs for unification of the idea of existentialism with the reality of communal life and a balancing between truth and absurdity. It would be worthwhile to observe how concerned our poets are with the notion that there is no meaning in a medium in which they create something of permanence; how close do they reflect/reveal the thought behind the postmodern rebellion (outlined above); what, if anything, do our contemporary American poets, traditionally our spokespeople, our seers, predict for what lies ahead for language-using humans beyond our postmodern age.

Deadline for abstracts or papers is September 15, 1996.
Papers should be limited to ten double-spaced pages (an absolute maximum of 20 minutes).
All panel participants must be members of NEMLA by November 1, 1996.
Please send abstracts or papers to:
John R. Woznicki
Dept. Of English
Lehigh University
35 Sayre Drive
Bethlehem, PA. 18015
If you have any questions, feel free to e-mail at: [redacted]

↑ Index

487. Gabrielle Welford
Re: text/language
Tue 16 Jul 1996

I know I've flaked on this discussion because here I am supposed to be studying away. Wanted to say a few things, though.

On Fri, 12 Jul 1996, Charles Alexander wrote:

> >How can text and language be distinguished? I guess have to take a long > >look at how the word "language" and "text" can and can't sensibly be used.
> >Otherwise into the foggy dew we go. gab.
>
> Isn't language much broader? It includes music & other sound-language, > visual languages of many kinds, all sorts of symbolic language other than > the ones which use letters & words; & usually text is grounded in those > letters & words, although I'd be glad to conceive of text more broadly, too.
>

Yes. I think what I was trying to get at is just that--pushing our way around the interstices of teh meanings of words like "langauge" and "text" until we can see what we can or can't say with them, rather than making arbitrary decisions about what we are going to accept or not as far as meaning goes.

> Or, for example, dealing with book arts/artists' books, the text of the book would be whatever language-text is presented therein, but the language of the book would have to include all its other parts (visual, structural, sometimes aural, etc.) as well. Books can (they don't always, or do they?) make literature physical.

Isn't it amazing? Then we have to start looking/pushing at the edges or inbetweennesses of what "physical" can mean. And "literature." Mkae language physical? But isn't it always? If physical means to do with bodies. Could there be a way of conceiving of langauge that wasn't physical? Is thinking physical? Hmmmm. That's a nice one. I guess we can say it is and we can say it isn't. It hums between perhaps. So text can be langauge, but language doesn't need to be text. Certe. Unless we do one of those overboard things and say anything that can be read is text (read my lips), as I suppose some people do. My life as text. My life as language? Pushing it, huh? gab.

> charles >

↑ Index

488. George Bowering
Re: BookStore
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Speaking of which, for years and years I was looking for Charyn's _Eisenhower, my Eisenhower_ and never found it in a bookstore; but last February on a cold night in Ottawa, I got it from the amazing collector Rod Anstee. I have him a copy of Ted Joans's first book.

For almost as many years now I have been looking for Markson's _Going Down_

Meanwhile looking for somewhere to sell old _Trobars_ and the like.

.....
"Lifting belly is so kind."

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

489. George Bowering
Re: press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Sometimes it seems that literature has it worse >than other arts. It's not all that rare to see interesting projects in >visual arts funded, but for literature it's heart-strings projects all the >way. I was a judge for one artist in residency program, and consistently >there was a high intellectual standard for visual arts, whereas when I >tried to get an award for a white male experimental poet I practically got >laughed out of the room. Recently SPT got to the second round for one of >those grants that cycle through disciplines--the year before, visual arts >was the category, and I was impressed with some of the awards. But the >literature awards the year we applied were gruesome. When I read them to >our graphic designer, he said they sounded like topics for the Rickie Lake >Show.

I dont know who Rickie lake is, but I have a feeling that Dodie is right about the comparison between visual and writing grants. I was on a recent grant-giving panel, and it tried to be as fair as possible, but you know? the stuff with content and the stuff with current ethnocorrectness too eaSILY seen, etc. (My sentence got screwed by the 33rd ringing of doorbells and phones in the past hour. Anyway, sure you complain a lot, Dodie, but one would rather hear you complain than hear Louis Simpson complain, eh?

.....
"Lifting belly is so kind."

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

490. George Bowering
Re: [redacted]
Tue 16 Jul 1996

Hey, Pierre!

As soon as you turn fifty you get hairs growing out of your ears and around your nipples, and you get a few long hairs in your eyebrows. Neat.

.....
"Lifting belly is so kind."

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

491. c.g. guertin
Re: Bad news/Coach House
Tue 16 Jul 1996

I am shocked and terribly saddened to hear the news of Coach House's impending demise.

Coach House has a 30 year history of financial woes to be sure, having constantly lived on the verge of bankruptcy and having been chronically underfunded. The ramifactions of this for Canadian poetry and experimental writing are immeasurable. I cannot imagine the devastation that this will bring to the Canadian literary community and to teachers and professors of Canadian lit across the country as well. Authors who have all or some of their backlist with Coach House include Robin Blaser, George Bowering, Daphne Marlatt (whose new novel was supposed to be published this fall), Phyllis Webb, Sharon Thesen, Michael Ondaatje, bpNichol, Lola Lemire Tostevin, Nicole Brossard, Steve McCaffery, and Gail Scott.

As a former publicist for Coach House, I know how important the press has been for writers with its unique position in this country as a writer's press. Its focus has shifted and changed many times, but it has survived so long because it remained adaptable and stayed on the cutting edge. Coach House has had that rare talent to turn literary works into bestsellers as well as continuing to win award after award for its list. These are sad times indeed when a mere pittance (as far as the governments are concerned) could save the press, but when arts funding has no value in the eyes of the different levels of government.

Arts organizations are always prime targets in times of fiscal restraint. How do we fight back?

Carolyn Guertin

↑ Index

492. Charles Alexander
Re: press survival
Tue 16 Jul 1996

> In a message dated 96-07-16 12:02:59 EDT, Charles Alexander writes:
>
> << I would certainly > not encourage new presses beginning now to go the nonprofit corporation > route, at least not without some deep thought and research about it. >>
>
> Charles, would you amplify on this?

Just a little, I will.

I think, first of all, that when I began making/publishing books in about 1981, and then when I incorporated Chax in 1985, there was the sense that an individual could set up a nonprofit organization and rather easily become eligible for grants from government & foundation sources without following some corporate model or becoming professionalized in the way Dodie (I think it was Dodie) described. As competition for such dollars has increased I think that avoiding such corporate models (which are highly rewarded by funders, which attract rather powerful & corporate board members, etc.) is increasingly difficult. So, first of all, think about the hoops one has to jump through, or how terribly hard one must work to not jump through such hoops (& what the consequences of either jumping or not jumping might be) -- before one goes that nonprofit route.

Also, given the scarcity of dollars particularly for the sorts of work that seems to attract a lot of people on this list, it may be incumbent on a press to do other sorts of work to raise money. For example, if one has design skills, sell design services. Or if one is moved to make the most of some publishing opportunity and publish something outside the realm of fundable projects, say for example a hot cookbook or whatever, to actually generate good income -- that may be very difficult to do as a nonprofit organization, but rather easy as a for profit organization. And if one goes the "for profit" route, organizes as a sole proprietorship, chances are there won't be a lot of money made & there won't be much of a tax bite, in fact it's quite possible that all kinds of expenses will be deductible. This nation rewards entrepreneurship more than it rewards nonprofit arts enterprises (but yes of course there is such a thing as nonprofit entrepreneurship, but I'm not certain how easy that is for extremely small organizations, and by extremely small I probably mean anything with a budget of less than $75,000 or so a year -- even organizations with a half million dollar budget find it really difficult to mount the kinds of promotions and other activities necessary to make things like museum shops succeed).

But these are just two of the things to think about, and they don't go at all into an investigation of specific tax laws or legal niceties. Just that I have a general notion now that it's extremely difficult to succeed as a small nonprofit publishing organization, perhaps with no visible benefits over a small "for profit" publishing company. Plus you might consistently find hands tied and forms aplenty. I even heard the head of one of the largest arts-funding foundations here criticize small presses in the area as having bad cases of what he called "founderitis," meaning the founders of the presses couldn't get beyond their own personal visions enough to be able to create successful, stable (and ostensibly somehow less personal) organizations. Now if that's the kind of press one wants to create, then by all means go nonprofit.

charles

↑ Index

493. Thomas M. Orange
Bad News
Wed 17 Jul 1996

Mike Boughn:

Why is Couch House's demise "another victory for the New York bankers?"

Tom

↑ Index

494. Tenney Nathanson
Mullen piece?
Wed 17 Jul 1996

> Date: Tue, 16 Jul 1996 13:35:16 -0400
> From: Mark Wallace <[redacted]>
> Subject: experiments and identities
>
> For anyone interested in the recently ongoing thread about experimental poetries and identity politics, Harryette Mullin's piece "Poetry and Identity" in the new West Coast Line is really a must read. Well argued, precise, and right there.

Mark--

do you have an address handy for West Coast Line, or order info of any kind? or does anyone?

I'm getting ready to add /Muse & Drudge/ to the reading list for my fall u.g. contemporary poetry class, and am getting nervous....

are you on the list Gil (or Harryette?)?

thanks for any help

Tenney

↑ Index

495. Robert Drake
Re: Mullen piece?
Wed 17 Jul 1996

West Coast Line
2027 East Academic Annex
Simon Fraser Univ.
Burnaby BC V5A 1S6 canada

lbd

↑ Index

496. Gwyn McVay
Re: [redacted]
Wed 17 Jul 1996

George, does that mean the birthday boy will be achieving eyebrows like Czeslaw Milosz's?

Gwyn

↑ Index

497. Charles Alexander
Opening of the San Francisco Center for the Book
Wed 17 Jul 1996

I thought some people, particularly those in the Bay Area and those interested in "the art of the book and the visible word," would be interested in this announcement, so I'm forwarding it. Sometimes good news comes, too.

charles

> Return-Path: [redacted]
> Date: Wed, 17 Jul 1996 01:00:25 -0700
> Reply-To: "The Book Arts: binding, typography, collecting"
> <[redacted]>
> Sender: "The Book Arts: binding, typography, collecting"
> <[redacted]>
> From: Mary Katherine Austin <[redacted]>
> Subject: Opening of the San Francisco Center for the Book
> To: Multiple recipients of list BOOK_ARTS-L
> <[redacted]>
> X-UIDL: 67ad917c988c930a7ddb1ade31b2b429
>
> The San Francisco Center for the Book celebrates its opening on Tuesday, July 30, from 5 to 9 p.m. , at 300 De Haro Street, between 16th and 17th Streets. The opening will be a great opportunity to meet members of the book arts community and to learn about upcoming events, exhibitions, and classes at The Center.
>
> The San Francisco Center for the Book is a newly-formed arts organization devoted to exploring the art of the book and the visible word. Centrally-located at the foot of Potrero Hill, The Center has set up a stylish public facility that will house the activities and studio practice of the growing book arts community. Drawing upon the creative talents and expertise of members of Bay Area book arts organizations, The Center offers > a wide range of workshop classes in bookmaking such as experimental printmaking and book structures, as well as exhibitions, special events, a resource library. The Center also intends to facilitate interdisciplinary collaboration of artists exploring the book format.

>
> The three founding directors staff The San Francisco Center for the Book: Mary Austin, Kathleen Burch, and Susan Landauer. The Center also houses the activities of The Pacific Center for the Book Arts and The Hand Bookbinders of California, two lively Bay Area book arts organizations.
>
> Starting with the local expression of the Arts & Crafts movement a century ago, some of the world's most creative book artists have worked in the Bay Area. Their diverse arts have decorated Berkeley coffee house menus, lined the bookshelves of the Bohemian Club, or been given away in The Haight. During the seventies, the practice and perception of book arts began to move from "craft" to "fine art," as museums began to mount major exhibitions, and as the prices of the works mounted as well. Current interest in the book arts has never been higher, perhaps due to the visual stimulation of changing publishing technologies. To book artists, "the death of the book" really means a transformation of its form, and a way for all of us to re-examine reading, sequence, and content.
>
> Publicity photos available. For more information, call Mary Austin or Kathleen Burch at [redacted].
>
> # # #

↑ Index

498. Daniel Bouchard
Boston reading
Wed 17 Jul 1996

Gerritt Lansing and Ken Irby will be reading Sunday, July 21 from 3-5 p.m. at T.T. the Bears in Central Square, Cambridge. John Wieners will introduce the readers.

Come early for the poetry, stay late for the poetry.

[redacted]

↑ Index

499. Michael Boughn

Re: Bad News

Wed 17 Jul 1996

Dear Thomas Orange:

I know this not a politcal discussion group, so I'll try to keep my rant short.

Last year, our social democratic government was defeated, partly because of its own inexperience and occasional stupidity, but largely because of the economic fallout from free trade and the manipulation of bond interest rates by said bankers who weren't crazy about having a bunch of socialists in power and weren't shy about letting people know it.

The current gang of goofs we've got running things is more to their liking: a golf-pro for premier, a highschool dropout for education minister, a used car salesman in charge of rapid transit, etc etc. You guys probably thought nobody could outdo having a grade B actor with Alzheimer's for president. What we lack in quality, we try to make up for in sheer quantity.

Last month the golf-pro was down in NY kissing bankers' ass left right and center, showing his credentials: revocation of equity legislation, the dismantling of inexpensive public education, protection of the "rights" of scabs, the use of the provincial riot squad to kick the shit out of striking workers, the sell-off of conservation areas and parks, oh yeah, and a promise to corporations to undo any environmental legislation they found unduly restrictive of their business practices. As he told the bankers, "Ontario is open for business." I could come up with an obscene translation of that idea (an old cartoon by Paul Krastner comes immediately to mind), but I'll spare you. Needless to say, they loved it, and showered him with promises of lower interest rates.

Here's the same golf-pro on Coach House, from this morning's Globe:

> Ontario Premier Mike Harris said yesterday that Coach House Press went under not because the province cut its grants to the publisher but because "they can't compete in the marketplace."
>
> Harris told reporters before a meeting of the inner cabinet that the fact the comapny blames the province for its demise "probably speaks to their management capabilities."
>
> Last year, the Ontario government cut its grant to the publisher by 74% and a loan guarantee by the Ontario Development Corp. will not be renewed when it expires in October.
>
> etc. etc.

I don't think any particular banker was out to get Coach House. I don't even think the golf-pro was, largely because he's never heard of them before, and in fact, hasn't read a book since high school. But this idea of "competition in the market place" as the _summa summarum_ of human potentiality and the determining fact of existence guarantees us only an utterly degraded world.

Best,
Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

500. Michael Boughn
New H.D. Stories
Wed 17 Jul 1996

For those on this list interested in the work of H.D., I'm pleased to announce the publication of 2 short children's stories by her on the H.D. Home Page. These stories were first published in Sunday School magazines around 1910, and have never been seen since. I discovered them several years ago when I was working on the H.D. Bibliography. Heather Hawkins has been generous enough to edit them and post them to the home page.

The address is: http://www.well.com/user/heddy/hdstor.html

Mike
[redacted]

↑ Index

501. Charles Alexander
chax books number one
Wed 17 Jul 1996

This is the first of three messages with special offerings from Chax Press. Please do not post any replies to the Poetics List. Rather respond with orders to
Chax Press
Box 19178
Minneapolis, MN 55419-0178

or respond with questions to [redacted], or call at [redacted]

Because Chax Press is moving in one month, we are taking only orders by mail accompanied by a check to Chax Press, and to insure you have books mailed to you before our move, you should get them in to us by August 6. And just in case you are worried about tracking us down, our Tucson address will be 101 W.

Sixth Street, Tucson, AZ 85701, but we will not be at that address until about August 30. And mail will be forwarded from the Minneapolis address as well.

ANNOUNCING:

Prospect of Release, by Tom Mandel

ISBN 0-925904-11-2
Retail Price: $12.95
Price to Poetics List & whoever else may see this message and order prior to August 6, 1996: $8.00, including shipping/handling

Available in 1 week

Ron Silliman writes of this book:

Memento mori: sonnets. These 50 poems, 700 lines (neither number divisible by three), confront self, other, identity, loss, history, language and meaning through the most concrete instance we have of what the poststructuralists call “an absent presence” — the death of a parent. This loss of apparent meaning (who gave you your name?) doubles (this father arrived by marriage, already a rhyme for the dead blood kin that came before), invoking tradition, transmission, instruction. Ritual (the sonnet, the ceremonies of grief) kaleidoscopes through its own echoes. “Do not speak these / words, but repeat them.” “Ghosts, all of them,” as Spicer said, though here it is Paul Celan’s Shakespeare (of all possible bards) who thrusts the blade from behind the curtain:

The knife comes out clean; the cake is done. Why does time pass? Because one observes a rule. Why wear clothes? To model a soul in paradise, clothed in its days.

These are the most intensely felt poems I have ever read."

And here are the first two poems of the series:

That one is conscious and not know why like cleaved rock or two that never joined eyes blue in life become brown coals silent as the Kodak into which they stare

from the rear of a backyard family gathering.
Brothers-in-law caper in the foreground.
Seasons, months, weeks, moments flatten against the horizon, forgotten. To whom now do I belong? An infinity of numbers whose factor is three. I saw it was a volume. At sea when I met him, light poured in unrecalled, he offered no answers to the questions I asked whose answers were obvious, and I did not know why.

Of the ten things made at twilight
the greatest was ‘speech-act.’ Think of the orator moving in memory’s rooms.
Imagination speaks, a matter of meaning, internal volumes. It was like him to know me. Articulate in perplexity, like all bodies in a state of erratic motion unless compelled to uniform motion or rest by a mental law that unfolds phenomena in time, words as it were want to live their ‘truth until the heavens.’ Thorough, transparent, opaque, coded (undecoded), tragedy studies us to divine our terms of meaning. It is no absolute entity.

Thank you in advance for your orders.

charles alexander
chax press
box 19178
minneapolis, mn 55419-0178

[redacted]

↑ Index

502. Charles Alexander chax books number two
Wed 17 Jul 1996

This is the second of three messages with special offerings from Chax Press. Please do not post any replies to the Poetics List. Rather respond with orders to
Chax Press
Box 19178
Minneapolis, MN 55419-0178

or respond with questions to [redacted], or call at [redacted]

Because Chax Press is moving in one month, we are taking only orders by mail accompanied by a check to Chax Press, and this particular offer is only available if your order makes its way to us by August 6. And just in case you are worried about tracking us down, our Tucson address will be 101 W. Sixth Street, Tucson, AZ 85701, but we will not be at that address until about August 30. And mail will be forwarded from the Minneapolis address as well.

ANNOUNCING:

Three of Ten, by Hank Lazer, including three sequences: H's Journal, Negation, & Displayspace 168 pages

cover image by Jess

ISBN 0-925904-18-X
Retail Price: $14
Price to Poetics List & whoever else may see this message and order prior to August 6, 1996: $8.00, including shipping/handling

Available in October 1996. Respondents to this order by August 6, 1996 will receive the first copies.

Here is an excerpt from the opening of Three of Ten. The works in this book make creative use of a number of source materials which are noted in the book's notes.

From H's Journal, Number 1:

1 In a show of independence for which no crowing is called for, I went home to spend my fortieth birthday with my parents and my sister, for I have settled deliberately at some distance, knowing that to go home bestirs the confused marrow of one’s imagined autonomy.

2 As said in a friend’s words: “you do that again, & I’ll beat the dog out of you.”

3A distrust of feelings transcendental is itself a bracing tonic.

4 Product of its given day, each sentence a citizen in full.

5 “Like cuttlefish we conceal ourselves, we darken the atmosphere in which we move; we are not transparent.”

6 “’Life in the Words’ suggests much of the geniuine significance of the book to Thoreau: it was life and self re-created and revised in words, and he lived in the words he had created.”

7 Redundant wonder — the learned arpeggio of an appreciative, sensitive observer — amounts to a truncated intellect and failure to recognize the place of rhetoric in governing written (and thus constructed) expression.

Thank you in advance for your orders.

charles alexander
chax press
box 19178
minneapolis, mn 55419-0178

[redacted]

↑ Index

503. Charles Alexander chax press books number three
Wed 17 Jul 1996

This is the third of three messages with special offerings from Chax Press. Please do not post any replies to the Poetics List. Rather respond with orders to
Chax Press
Box 19178
Minneapolis, MN 55419-0178

or respond with questions to [redacted], or call at [redacted]

Because Chax Press is moving in one month, we are taking only orders by mail accompanied by a check to Chax Press, and to insure you have books mailed to you before our move, you should get them in to us by August 6. And just in case you are worried about tracking us down, our Tucson address will be 101 W. Sixth Street, Tucson, AZ 85701, but we will not be at that address until about August 30. And mail will be forwarded from the Minneapolis address as well.

ANNOUNCING:

A special offer on two deluxe handmade, letterpress books.

OUTLANTISH, by Nathaniel Mackey

This book was published in late 1992. Recently we have bound a few copies which were not released at that time, although they still make up part of the 100 copies in the edition. Just one dozen copies are available at this time. The original price of the book was $110. To members of the Poetics List these dozen copies are now available for $40 each.

Outlantish contains "mu" fourth part through eleventh part. Its epigraphs read " . . . a myth is not merely a word spoken; it is a re-utterance or pre-utterance, it is a focus of emotion. . . . Possibly the first muthos was simply the interjectional utterance mu . . ." (Jane Harrison); and " . . . a continent of feeling beyond our feeling . . . " (Robert Duncan).

The book measures 11 & 3/4 inches high by 6 inches wide. It is letterpress printed on Mohawk letterpress paper with covers letterpress printed (title is printed blind or without ink, thereby debossed into the cover) on Cross Pointe Genesis recycled paper. The binding is a variation of the lang-stitch method, with threads sewn and visible through the spine. Sheets of Japanese Fuji Unryu paper in a soft brownish-grey with neutral-colored fibers visible in it, are wrapped around the first and last signature of the book to offer a dramatic and sensual break in the reading of the text, and in a sense extending the outside of the book to the inside. Mackey's text is accompanied by three collage illustrations by Tucson Arizona artist Sonia Telesco. One of these illustrations is printed on a double-page sheet so that the halves of the illustration are separated by four pages of text. The illustrations make no attempt to conventionally "illustrate" the text (something we're not that fond of at Chax), rather are the result of the artist's response to that text in her own way -- collaboration rather than accompaniment.

WHEEL, by Gil Ott

Wheel was also originally published in 1992, and only a dozen or so copies remain available.

The original price was $38. It is available to Poetics List members at this time for $20.

Both text and linoleum block prints in the book are by Gil Ott. The book measures 7.5 inches wide by 8 inches high. It is printed letterpress all in black, text and block prints on Mohawk paper with one smaller-sized leaf of Frankfurt paper sewn in. The cover of the book is made of handmade paper made by Tom Leech at the San Miguel Paper Workshop in Colorado Springs and is a beautiful burnt orange color. The unusual cover is intentionally undersized, becoming a cover which does not entirely cover, leaving the inside of the book visible to the outside, enacting a kind of ongoing wheel in its engagement, physically, of book with world.

An excerpt from WHEEL:

sheet to the line, perspective

in that book any instant bound

wind rise or fall

where to begin, or end. A breath describes another passage, that tugs. Or "point of view." Without us, it has no

Thank you in advance for your orders.

charles alexander
chax press
box 19178
minneapolis, mn 55419-0178

[redacted]

↑ Index

504. David Baratier
r h y m m s by Robert Grenier
Wed 17 Jul 1996

Pavement Saw Press
is taking advance orders for our newest publication which is a selection of poems from _r h y m m s_ by Robert Grenier.

The 12 pages are reproduced in a loose leaf, arrangeable, four color reproduction format,
on acid-free paper, with a handpress printed envelope for containment.

There will be a limited edition of 110 copies made of which 10 are signed and numbered. The pre-press cost for the unsigned copies of this edition will be $20, including p & h.
Libraries and instiutions are also welcome to inquire Reserve one now. Copies will be distributed in 6 to 8 weeks.

Pavement Saw Press
7 James Street
Scotia, NY 12302

An informative article which elaborates the intricacies of Grenier's complete project of _r h y m m s_ can be found in Witz, Spring 1996.

↑ Index

505. Kevin Killian
Re: Bad news
Wed 17 Jul 1996

At 3:58 PM 7/17/96, MAXINE CHERNOFF wrote:
>Dear Herb, Dodie, etc.,
>
>Itis obviously thecase that nowhere in the arts as they are now funded by >government grants is aesthetic difference, complexity, depth, what have >you, taken as a serious value.

This is Dodie. I just returned from the first of a two day arts administration seminar. Learned helpful tips like forming partnerships with non-arts organizations, such as joining forces with a save-the-swans group and putting on a production of Swan Lake and getting a corporate sponsor--that way the corporate sponsor gets to fund an arts org and an environmental org at the same time! Perhaps we could put on a Virgina Woolf festival with a save-the-wolves organization?

Also, learned that corporate funding is more and more about point of purchase advertising. A great example given was somebody put on some even and got Pepsi to hang advertisements for their event on Pepsi bottles, and for each six-pack of Pepsi purchased you get a dollar off admission to the event!

Government grants were basically jumped over--just many suggestions to get the bucks from other places.

Oh, oh =8A

↑ Index

506. Kevin Killian
Re: press survival
Wed 17 Jul 1996

At 5:14 PM 7/16/96, George Bowering wrote:

> I dont know who Rickie lake is.

Rickie (and I don't know if I'm spelling her name right) hosts one of those low-rent rip-offs Oprah--you know, talks shows where people cry and yell at one another about their perverse living situations/problems. Rickie was discovered by John Waters, played Divine's daughter in one of his movies. Waters hired her because she was a fat girl who could dance. But now that she's a talk show queen she's svelt.

Dodie

↑ Index

507. Kevin Killian
Re: press survival
Wed 17 Jul 1996

Rickie (and I don't know if I'm spelling her name right) hosts one of those low-rent rip-offs Oprah

That should be:

Rickie (and I don't know if I'm spelling her name right) hosts one of those low-rent rip-offs OF Oprah

↑ Index

508. Louis Cabri
my slack
Wed 17 Jul 1996

1. 756 posts & finally here now to record that my fascination remains, 2hrs later, with Ron Silliman's "modest proposal." It really is a bit of subtle cunning, once its angles are displayed in a sunny logic. I fully agree to implementat it - and will volunteer to delete my own too-infrequent posts even before they hit the screens: saving people the trouble. And will save my finger - constantly worrying over the delete key - for pleasure- seeking/-giving pursuits instead. Bliss!

2. Wal here's a mess, shows am not reading poetry to feed a horse at the moment. The machines are hungrier right nu.

3. "Agency" seems to be where the friction lies between sociological and speculative/formal approaches.... (But when exactly was this concept rescucitated from the social sciences? Pardon my ignorance, I don't know - was it Bourdieu when he "did" Flaubert? ...Paul Smith critiques postruc theories of the "subject" with it - in Discerning the Subject 1988. It's there in a 1987 Barrett Watten essay on Louis Zukofsky and Bruce Andrews, as Bourdieu's "habitus." That essay is peculiar and telling of the problems encountered when one tries to argue-for/examine formally innovative poetry in terms of "agency." There's that long-winded book by Charles Altieri, Subjective Agency, 1994, which doesn't talk about poetry, but provides a sketch of various positions on "agency," from constructionist to essentialist, in a footnote. Steve Knapp, from an unabashedly liberal individualism, negotiates agency through Wimsatt's concrete universal to come up with the astonishing formula that "the self is a formalist," thus literary interest provides best analogue of what it is like to be an "agent in general" (Literary Interest: The Limits of Anti- Formalism) - yep. Maybe "agency" was under different guise - the authorial persona, biographical studies - before.

4. Or as Steve McCaffery has informally said it, a fold of identity onto ontology. As a formulation for "agency," this is witnessed in the problems of representational politics in poetry, which Harryette Mullen describes in the essay in new West Coast Line mentioned previously. (Incidentally, there's a collaborative interview with her that appears in next BOO Magazine, transcribed from various responses she gave to questions after her talk and reading here in Calgary. - Qs by Jeff Derksen, S McCaffery, Fred Wah, Nicole Markotic, Cheryl Teelucksingh, the transcriber & others.)

5. Some reading found here at the house I'm "sitting": Journal of the Charles Olson Archive, including O's record of a 3-wk swordfish-hunting trip in '36 (they found them in trees); plans for a long poem then entitled "West," where he's explicit about the "Western box" he was wanting out from - although the last & first time I ever met R Creeley he denied Olson had ever used that term; worthy notes by student worthies, including Clark Coolidge and Pauline Butling, of O's Vancouver '63 seminars; O notes for an incomplete essay on "totality" as the sort of ultimate reach of an "individual" ("single intelligence") an essay which helps in reading the recent O archive retrieval "Culture and Revolution" in A flex of the M, #2.

6. Wlad Godzich's The Culture of Literacy. "[A]ny tendency to abstract general statement is a greased slide" - E.P. But Godzich has interesting things to say about the strange movements of theory down the halls of social mirrors through these years. He remarks there's no history yet done (or is there?) on historical formation of the concept of agency.

7. Some of Lenin's pieces (e.g. in Pravda) for Jn-Sept 1917, months during the crisis when the slogan "All power to the soviets!" had to be rescinded due to increasing counter- revolutionarism.

8. Chapter 4 in Thousand Plateaus on "order-words"
(slogans would be example: they cite Lenin's, above)

9. Agenda 4:2 1965 (London, ed. William Cookson), special for Pound's boiday. Anecdote from John Wieners on Pound at Spoleto poetry fest that year, together in company of Olson... "We saw LeRoi Jones' Dutchman, and asking him after, what he thought of the play, Pound said, 'Tremendous', to Charles going up the stairs." Foto of that fest prolly the one of Pound that is in Behind the State Capitol - beside the piece on Olson?

10. New Reflections on the Revolution of Our Time, Ernesto Laclau. Intrinsic to social antagonism is a constitutive outside. Take this list, for example, the Von Hall flare, or last summer, the Alfred Corn. "Von Hall" as The Actuality. His symbolic presence is enough for me. It bothers me to have the symbolic action of this listserv used as if it were an actual boundary (which is to say, as if the symbolic - boundary or no - were not actual enough). To belabour a point others have already made, this listserv's boundary is not really actual, in the sense that, if I have the interest (poetic & financial) I can meet you whoever "you" are tomorrow if we so choose (of course, we had to have met Charles Bernstein somehow to begin with, etc etc).

-Louis

↑ Index

509. william marsh
Re: "Marsh"crash/sorries
Wed 17 Jul 1996

Dear all -- especially all those burdened by the "error":

First, apologies. I was astonished to learn that the Eudora problems were traceable back to little-ol me. I just recently bought a new system, and it seems the people who installed my OS entered 2096 in the date column. Being, as of 1996, something of a systems dummie, I didn't bother to check it, didn't even think of it, I guess under the foolish assumption that something as rudimentary as a date would be the least of my worries as I learned to navigate this beast. Now I see the error of that assumption. So, to any who lost time, sleep or (gosh) even money to this glich, I'm truly sorry. And genuinely flabbergasted, I have to add, that the repurcussions would stretch so far and wide. The date has of course been changed, and I hope (but could never be certain) that the problem fixed.

All best,

Bill Marsh

↑ Index

510. George Bowering
Re: [redacted]
Wed 17 Jul 1996

> George, does that mean the birthday boy will be achieving eyebrows like Czeslaw Milosz's?
>
> Gwyn

I hope so. Pierre is pretty cute; but shaggy eyebrows would make his irresistible.

I hope he doesnt develop that other thing that happens to men that are 50. They often buy convertibles and sports cars. That would take away from the eyebrows entirely.

.....
"Lifting belly is so kind."

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

511. David Baratier
Vanguard
Wed 17 Jul 1996

Thinking about the "Toward a multiplictiy of form" essay of Mark W in Witz, and remembering a riotous panel at AWP in Pittsburgh on "what constitutes the avant guarde," re-focussed my attention toward the prevailing ignorance among many of the "avant-garde" practicioners and followers regarding the issue of traditional forms. As any critique has to include oneself, or ones lay of the land, I keep running into this situation where someone asks "why did you place it in this form?" and I find myself metrically decomposing --say-- Hopkins, receiving a nod of understanding, then a subsequent accusation which parlays and reifies the individuals ignorance of the sonnet(or in this case the curtal). It's as if the revolution of Stevens (through most would call it WCW's) has led to a generalist assumptive visual form, that is to say one which is based on visual similarities sans awareness of the metrical composite. I've expressed in earlier posts my concerns with (and avoidance of) upholding the "I'm a card carrying member of the avant-guarde" position, but what about the appropriation of the avante-garde into the institutions they were in opposition with a mere 20 years ago (ie have the instituitions really changed enough to warrant the absorption) or has the linguistic codifification of the word avante-guarde turned into another marketing terminology through repetitive use.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

512. David Baratier
Re: [redacted]
Wed 17 Jul 1996

George, would owning a mansion detract from or enhance the eyebrow effect?

↑ Index

513. MAXINE CHERNOFF

Re: Bad news

Wed 17 Jul 1996

Dear Herb, Dodie, etc.,

Itis obviously thecase that nowhere in the arts as they are now funded by government grants is aesthetic difference, complexity, depth, what have you, taken as a serious value. Having recently served on several such panels, local and national, I was depressed but not surprised at how grossly evaluations were made ("This magazine has 12 women and 7 men-- the editors must be very progressive!" etc.). When New American Writing still lived in Chicago and used to apply for Illinois grants, people would ask in panel review, "Why do they publish John Ashbery? Is he so important?" (not to mention the rest of our contributors who were far less recognizable.) Anyway, we decided to come out once yearly and to never write grants again.

As for presses that survive, they seem to somehow gain institutional credibility-- you mean you're not dead yet? Hey, let's give you a grant. But getting to that point is extremely painful. When we were still applying for grants, we were told to "build a board," etc. No one seemed to care about our publicatiuon itself in the money world.

As for New Directions, it was Herman Hesse and Tennessee Williams that finally stabilized them and allowed them to grow.

MaXINE cHERNOFF

On Tue, 16 Jul 1996, Herb Levy wrote:

> It is obviously very sad news that Coach House is going under, and I agree with much of what people have said (& no doubt will continue to say) about the problems of distribution, marketing, and selling new, experrimental poetry to an audience of people who aren't on this e-mail list; etc. But distribution for avant garde work has always sucked, finding that audience (one person at a time) has always been a pain in the ass, & grants have rarely, if ever, been enough to support a project of the scale of Coach House.
>
> Historically, how many small presses have lasted thirty years or more? How many small presses from the mid-Sixties are still going strong? (For that matter, how many adventurous, experimental, or whatever non-profit arts organizations in any field have lasted this long?)
>
> In the US, I can think of City Lights, New Directions & Black Sparrow (which may not be quite that old), but these seem to have survived because > they have reprint rights for books used in college & university courses or some other works that have guaranteed sales (is Bukowski on the syllabus anywhere?). (& yes, I do know that New Directions started with a wad of family money, but the continued survival of ND as a business is at least as related to the number of copies of books by Pound, WCW, HD, Duncan, & others that are sold to students yearly.)

>
> I'm not trying to minimize the impact that the loss of Coach House will have: It is (& I'm consciously using the present tense here) clearly THE major press for new poetry in Canada, they have a great backlist, they know what work is important to publish and have been able to find ways to get it out there.
>
> Still, I'm not sure that the forces at work here are simply the current economic state of the Corporate/State. We're not talking best sellers here. Small presses, & arts organizations in general, which last more than thirty years have developed some kind of financial stability (whether it's market share, donor base, or stylish t-shirts & gimme caps) that has been, unfortunately, all too often unrelated to artistic merit.
>
> Herb Levy
> [redacted]

↑ Index

514. Steve Carll

Re: "Marsh"crash/sorries

Wed 17 Jul 1996

Hey Bill:

My program handled your last message with no problem. I think we're in the clear!

++++++++++++++++++++++++++++
[redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/antenym/

In seed-
sense
the sea stars you out, innermost, forever.
--Paul Celan
\\\

515. maria damon
Re: Bad news and good
Wed 17 Jul 1996

having served on the board of directors of a high-profile, "small" literary press that went non-profit, i can attest to the seemingly endless time we spent at meetings trying to think of rich influential people to be on the board compared to the milli-seconds spent talking about books. (i stepped down from the board cuz i ended up not really pulling my weight; i didn't know any rich influential folks in the area).

good news: michael bibby's book, Hearts and Minds: Bodies, Resistance, and Poetry in the Viet Nam Era, is out from Rutgers UP, in their perspectives on the '60s series. it's a good example of the poetry/cultural studies nexus i keep yammering about on the list, esp the chapter on GI Resistance Poetry. bests, maria d

↑ Index

516. Gjoseph Farrah
monthly posting
Wed 17 Jul 1996

That the level reflects the night somewhat

has become a fact to build with estimation of this content overthrown

with thunder of craftsmen started it

no longer willing to levitate with that pleasure

what becomes fixated with duration

or a simultaneous excavation of memory

wherein history as currency disappears into itself

and that is the problem again

moments churning above the apparent links

george f
(another vermin lurker)

↑ Index

517. Rod Smith

New Perelman, Loys, Jarnot etc @ Bridge Street

Wed 17 Jul 1996

Here's another list of the latest.

1. _Becoming Modern: The Life of Mina Loy_ by Carolyn Burke, FSG, $35. "Mina was more absorbed in efforts to earn a living that spring than in her friends' antics."

2. _Scatter Matrix_ by Abigail Child, Roof, $9.95. "plecta pitchflower / coincide with pitched midi / an impulse / literally naive"

3. _Powers & Prospects: Reflections on Human Nature and the Social Order_ by Noam Chomsky, South End, $16. "The reason for this rather implausible assumption is that we do not know that it is wrong."

4. _Merchants of Misery: How Corporate America Profits from Poverty_ ed. Michael Hudson, Common Courage, $14.95. "I couldn't see how anyone could claim otherwise," he said repeatedly throughout his testimony.

5. _Some Other Kind of Mission_ by Lisa Jarnot, Burning Deck, $11. Lisa's long-awaited excellent tome. Here comes the Brooklyn Renaissance.

6. _Lotion Bullwhip Giraffe_ by Tan Lin, Sun & Moon, $10.95. "This end dupes / this dead fun."

7. _The Lost Lunar Baedeker: Poems_ by Mina Loy, FSG, $22. "A vagabond in delirium / aping the rise and fall // of ocean / of inhalation / of coition."

8. _Selected Declarations of Dependence_ by Harry Mathews, Sun & Moon, $10.95. With terrific art by Alex Katz. "Every drug has its day"

9. _The Marginalization of Poetry: Language Writing and Literary History_ by Bob Perelman, Princeton, $15.95. "Making the sentence the basic unit of composition separates the writer from three widely held positions."

10. _Charles Ives: A Life with Music_ by Jan Swafford, Norton, $30. "To assume that business is a material process, and only that, is to undervalue the average mind and heart." --Ives, not Swafford

11. _Twentieth-Century Latin American Poetry: A Bilingual Anthology_ edited by Stephen Tapscott, Texas, $24.95. Big 8 1/2 x 10" 400 page book. Variety of translators, some I'd trust, some I certainly wouldn't, but the spanish is there, so cool. "palabras que son flores que son frutos que son actos."

Poetics folks receive free shipping on orders of more than $20. Free shipping + 10% discount on orders of more than $30. There are two ways to order. 1. E-mail your order to [redacted] with your address & we will bill you with the books. or 2. via credit card-- you may call us at [redacted] or e-mail [redacted] w/ yr add, order, & card # & we will send a receipt with the books. We have to charge some shipping on orders outside of the US.

Bridge Street Books, 2814 Pennsylvania Ave NW, Wahsington, DC 20007.

↑ Index

518. Charles Alexander
Re: Bad news and good
Wed 17 Jul 1996

> having served on the board of directors of a high-profile, "small" literary press that went non-profit, i can attest to the seemingly endless time we spent at meetings trying to think of rich influential people to be on the board compared to the milli-seconds spent talking about books. (i stepped down from the board cuz i ended up not really pulling my weight; i didn't know any rich influential folks in the area).

I think I know which press you're talking about, and it's actually one of the largest "small" literary presses, or at least one of the largest nonprofit literary presses, in the country -- and it says something that even one like that can not attract such people on the board.

But I spent time with an organization which had certain people on the board with considerable financial capability and influence. And while those people tended to be fairly generous, they were not really willing to use their influence actively and often, and in general to do the intense work nonprofit fundraising requires. Even after I was sent to The Fundraising School at their request, I returned to find them unwilling to put what I was sent to learn into practice. I'd rather have a committed and active board, willing to work hard for the organization, using whatever limited resources & influence they may have.

And with regard to time spent talking about books or not talking about books, I don't think it has to be that way, but it's a struggle to keep a board educated and interested. And sometimes can be downright confrontational. After one board retreat session about innovative writing, a board member responded that ideas presented by Sheila Murphy were "a menace to art." But I don't mind having those discussions. I do, however, believe in a division of responsibilities between board and staff. It's the staff's responsibility to develop vision, determine programs and carry them out. It is the board's responsibility, though, to try and understand the vision and why those programs exist -- and the staff's responsibility to make sure the board does understand those things. But the vision itself is generally the one of an executive director or artistic director (or whoever else they choose to ask to become involved), and not that of the board, whose role is concerned with hiring the executive (executive hires everyone else), longterm policy, financial planning & stability (including lots of fundraising to achieve it). In smaller organizations it's generally the founder who becomes the executive director and invites/appoints a board of directors, and from that point on the board works on such things as financial stability and long-term policies. And it is true that such organizations have a board which may feel they have less stake in what happens, because they did not hire the person with the vision.

Still, I don't think all of this precludes art or even risk-taking art. But it can significantly complicate the picture.

charles

↑ Index

519. maria damon
Re: monthly posting
Wed 17 Jul 1996

---

g farrah writes:
> That the level reflects the night somewhat
>
> has become a fact to build with
>
> estimation of this content overthrown
>
> with thunder of craftsmen started it
>
>
>
> no longer willing to levitate with that pleasure
>
> what becomes fixated with duration
>
> or a simultaneous excavation of memory
>
> wherein history as currency disappears into itself
>
> and that is the problem again
>
> moments churning above the apparent links
>
>
>

> george f
> (another vermin lurker)

nice job, you verm you.

↑ Index

520. Loss Glazier
Re: eudora crash
Thu 18 Jul 1996

No Eudora crash here either.
Did the possessors of the crash copies have the latest versions?
Did they contact the "publisher"?
Any details appreciated
since these are not just words
but writing.

At 10:45 AM 7/16/96 -0500, you wrote:
>I'm sorry for everyone's Eudora problems. And while glad to see my friend >Bill Marsh's name here so much, I'm sorry it's in such a circumstance. I had >a feeling the problem might be with someone's internet service provider.
>
>But I'm puzzled about presumably all the systems, including my own, which >weren't affected at all. And mine is a PC, not a MAC, running Windows 3.11, >Eudora, Netscape, etc.
>
>charles
>
>
>
>>(Still sending, not receiving)
>>
>>For those who need to know, and for Bill Marsh in especial:
>>
>>EUDORA crashed because the server sending Bill Marsh's message dates his >message
>>--wait for it!!!-- >> 1969
>>instead of 1996.
>>This is known to Eudora (their technicians tell me) as a BAD DATE
>>for which you get the message "Application Error Integer Divide by Zero".
>>
>>So I set my system up again, having had my server delete Bill Marsh's >>messages, got going nicely, and dammit there was another one! The bad date

>>does not affect Winsock (which I use to interface) but does affect Netscape
>>and Eudora, on a PC486 (memory is no problem that i can see on my machine)
>>-- it has no effect on a MAC. Once again I have lost half my mail >>(downloaded and then scrambled / garbled by a second wrong date -- origin >>unknown: you again, Bill?))
>>
>>In any case, I'm off-line till 1 August; I can however download (horribly, >>and sort of) through Windows 3.1 Terminal (yuck) till I fix myself up again.
>>
>>Madre dios!
>>
>>Peter.
>> + + +

confirmed) and possibly Jonathan Hayes and Tina Rotenberg as well (not yet confirmed). Admission is a mere $5.00.

THE MAGAZINE features work from the above PLUS: Fernando Pessoa as Alberto Caeiro, Jacques Debrot, Amy Garrett, Bob Heman, John Lowther, William Marsh, Fred Muratori, Joseph Noble, John Olson, Dan Raphael, Jesse Taylor-York, Tod Thilleman and Mark Wallace, all lovingly crafted for your eyes by Kristin Burkart. It's available for $2 if you come to the celebration; otherwise it's $3 plus $1.50 postage. 1-year subscriptions available for $13.50, payable to Steve Carll (he's the editor) at 106 Fair Oaks St. #3, S.F., CA 94110-2951. For more info call [redacted], or e-mail me: <[redacted]>

++++++++++++++++++++++++++++
[redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/ezines/antenym/

In seed-
sense
the sea stars you out, innermost, forever.
--Paul Celan
\\\

--Paul Celan
\\

↑ Index

523. GRAHAM W. FOUST

Proles vs. the Pulitzer

Thu 18 Jul 1996

Reprinted (sans permission, but hey, it's the people's paper) from the People's Weekly World, the official newsweekly of the Communist Party USA.

INCOHERENT "POETIC" BABBLE GETS THE PULITZER

The recent Pulitzer Prize award for poetry went to Jori [sic] Graham who teaches poetry at the Iowa Writer's Workshop at the University of Iowa in Iowa City.

After reading about the award and reading one of her "poems" within the story in the _Des Moines Register_, I was curious enough to get two of her books from the library. My suspicions were right. Her "poetry" consists of long streams of incoherent babbling. I find it hard to believe that any publisher would accept her work. It is especially hard to believe that she merits a Pulitzer Prize.

Today while thinking of the above subject, I wrote the enclosed off-the-cuff "Contro-Verse" to add to my new collection called _The Pink Pitchfork (verses for the peasantry)_. The subject of elitist awards deserves some sort of mention in PWW.

Pulitzer Prize "Poetry"

Did you ever try to read it?
Try to read heavy disjointed muck?
Try to savor the elitist rambling?
Well, I assure you, you'll get stuck.

Jori Graham wrote the last one.
Her flow of words wear on and on.
Long strings of words bump meaning out,
like when a poor thing's sanity is gone.

Take a peek at Jori's twisted "verses".
But, I warn you: do it quick.
Cuz if you linger too long,
The glop might make you sick.

--Charlotte Walker, PWW, 7/13/96

↑ Index

524. David Golumbia
Re: Proles vs. the Pulitzer
Thu 18 Jul 1996

Dear Frenz,

Found this on other list and stole it to repeat since it's relevance to list over-whelping, obvious:

I AM INCOHERENT AND WIN PULITZER

Dear Sir or Madam,

The recent Pulitzer Prize award for poetry went to me.
I write incoherently and lack ability to understand.

Dateline.

After re-reading the award and reading one of my "poems" within my book called _Des Moines Register_, I was curious. Suspicious. Historically, "poetry" consists of long streams of incoherent babbling. I find it a publisher. I accept my work. It is especially hard to believe that I have won a Pulitzer Prize.

Today while writing the off-the-cuff "Contro-Verse" to add to my Pulitzer Prize, the subject of my elitist understanding of my own work and life occurred to me, and I realize now desrves mention in Weekly World News.

Here is the poem of mine which won the Pulitzer Prize:

HOW TO WIN PULITZER PRIZE BY DRAWING HUCK, OUR FRIENDLY RABBIT
by WEEKLY WORLD NEWS COLUMNIST

Try to read heavy disjointed muck --
Charlotte Walker, WWW, 7/13/96
Did you ever try to read it?
Did you ever try to read it?
Well, I assure you, you'll get the Pulitzer Prize. I wrote it and I did.
Now I savor the elitist rambling.

My flow is words, wearing on and on.
Jori Graham wrote the last one.
Whos next, Galway Kinnell?
Whos next, William Stafford?
Whos next, Richard James?
Whos next, X. J. Kennedy?

Im like a poor thing. My sanity is gone.
Long strings of words bump meaning out.

This is result of winning Pulitzer Prize
For writing incoherent verse like mine.
I do it quick.
I rip off Jori Grahams versus
I rip off Johnny Rotten -- yeah, great.
I cut off my finger.
I win Pulitzer Prize.

Thank you very much.

--
[redacted]
David Golumbia

↑ Index

525. Robert A Harrison
Re(2): eudora crash
Thu 18 Jul 1996

---

there's such a thing as the year 2000 problem, caused by bad date management.

its been a hot topic in the programming community, and now here it is on poetics.

attached are some descriptions of the problem, etc.

bob harrison

~~~

from http://www.cai.com/products/ca2000/disc2000.htm#challenge

The Challenge Of The New Millennium

January 1, 2000. The dawn of the new millennium strikes fear in the hearts of Information Systems professionals. And for good reason. If no action is taken, the crippling effect of disabled enterprise systems will be devastating. As this inescapable deadline approaches, some crucial questions must be addressed. Are all your systems ready for the Year 2000? Will your applications continue to process date information accurately? Or will they collapse on or before January 1, 2000?

Information Systems professionals who have yet to address this issue will find that time is quickly running out. Consider the fact that every line of code must be scrutinized to ensure Year 2000 compliance. For many enterprises, that's 50 to 100 million lines of code to be inspected at an estimated cost of $0.50 to $1.00 per line--a substantial expense not accounted for in most enterprise budgets. Consider too, that a Year 2000 initiative typically requires many person-years to complete. For example, a company with 20 million lines of code or 5,000 to 10,000 programs that require modification would face costs of $10 to $20 million for a manual conversion process and 24 person-years to complete. This is just to keep the existing systems in production and includes no provision for new enhancements or new technology of any sort. The time, cost and effort involved in a Year 2000 initiative is further exacerbated by a lack of adequate documentation for the complex program logic of existing systems, the absence of the original programmers, and the challenges inherent in managing a project of this scope and magnitude.
~~~

As time runs out, the millennium date change will likely become your primary IS concern. After all, it has the potential of derailing all your other IS initiatives and significantly impacting the competitiveness of your enterprise. What can you do to ensure that your Year 2000 initiative is thorough, cost-effective and efficient?

and from http://www.bozemanlegg.com/year2000.html

To put it simply, the Year 2000 Problem stems from the fact that most software programs were written using the date format: MM/DD/YY. As you can see, there is no way the computer can distinguish between the 20th and the 21st centuries. This is a major problem for the thousands of companies that rely on computers for their everyday business.

It was estimated that 20 percent of business applications would fail because of invalid date computations in 1995, according to the Gartner Group. Without corrective measures, this number is estimated to increase to more than 90 percent by 1999, potentially resulting in interruptions of service due to errors in mission-critical systems. Application failure includes programs ending abnormally, or worse, returning incorrect results to the trusting user.

Who will be affected?

Just about every business that uses computers, especially those in data and date intensive industries, such as finance, insurance, and retailing.

↑ Index

526. Brigham Taylor
Poetry Funding
Thu 18 Jul 1996

This is in response to Dodie's account of an arts grants board's attitudes toward literature in general and poetry in particular. Why is it that people who can be very sophisticated regarding innovations in visual art, music, etc. are so reactionary when it comes to poetry? I wonder if it's that unless people have a specific interest in poetry, its marginal status in the world of the arts leads many perhaps well intentioned people to regard it as a means to an end. They consider its value to be in the "exthpression of perthonal feelingth" and therefore its function becomes principally theraputic (we can thank Mrs. Sexton's shrink for this). Therefore an individual can "let out emotionth" and become happy and balanced. Or on a collective level, it becomes a means of "sharing your feelingth," a means of achieving multicultural understanding. Of course the unspoken and unexamined assumption behind such a position is that poetry is not valuable as living art forms, that the great poems have already been written, and there is no reason to take it seriously. But even if we acknowledge the validity of everyone's experience of the world, it does not follow that all formal expressions of this experience are of equal value. No matter how worthy the political, theraputic or educational goal might be, to regard the chief function of any art form as a means of achieving that goal serves only to devalue and and limit the potential of that art form.

A mini manifesto for my first post.... lurker no more!

Brigham Taylor
[redacted]

↑ Index

527. Charles Alexander
Jewish women artists
Thu 18 Jul 1996

Please spread the word about this.
Thanks,

charles

> Return-Path: [redacted]
> Date: Wed, 17 Jul 1996 23:47:35 -0700
> Reply-To: "The Book Arts: binding, typography, collecting"
> <[redacted]>
> Sender: "The Book Arts: binding, typography, collecting"
> <[redacted]>
> From: "Judith A. Hoffberg" <[redacted]>

> Subject: Jewish women artists
> To: Multiple recipients of list BOOK_ARTS-L
> <[redacted]>
> X-UIDL: 7f500e393d7deab9797846b8e44dc5c9
>
> To women book artists:
>
> I am making a proposal for a museum exhibition of Jewish Women Artists who make books. I am seeking them in North America and in the rest of the world. If you are, or know a Jewish woman artist who is making artist books or who has made artist books in the past or who might even attempt to make a special book for the exhibition, please have them contact me. I want to see who will respond to this call. I would not mind if anyone posted this on another Listserv, since I am in the process of leaving for New York City for a week. So--spread the word and let me see if there are identifiable artists in this category--enough beyond my own list to create a fascinating show called Women of the Book.
>
> Judith
> Judith A. Hoffberg
> Umbrella/Umbrella Editions
> P.O. Box 3640
> Santa Monica, CA 90408
> [redacted]/fax:[redacted]
> [redacted]

↑ Index

528. Ken Norris
Somewhere Across the Border #3
Thu 18 Jul 1996

The third issue of SOMEWHERE ACROSS THE BORDER, a Canadian Interactive Poetry Magazine, is currently available for viewing at www.letelier.com/sab/sab.html

↑ Index

529. Tony Green
Re: Carla Harryman and Barrett Watten
Thu 18 Jul 1996

"North American Language Writing Artists". Haven't seen that one before, but quite like that as a Brit way of advertising C.H. & B.W. best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

530. Tony Green
Re: poetry performance
Thu 18 Jul 1996

Chris Whipple, please re-read what i wrote. It's not saying what you think it is saying. Nothing to do with emoting. best

Tony Green,
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

531. Bill Luoma
growlie
Thu 18 Jul 1996

We're getting more than one and a half times
the science we originally anticipated.
We're getting more science each orbit and are able to accept larger programs.

↑ Index

532. George Bowering
Re: [redacted]
Thu 18 Jul 1996

> George, would owning a mansion detract from or enhance the eyebrow effect?

It would depend on whether the mansion has eyebrow windows, my wife's favourite kind of windows.

Come to think of it, Pierre is one of my wife's favourite men.

Hmmm.

.....
"Lifting belly is so kind."

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

533. George Bowering
Re: press survival
Thu 18 Jul 1996

Dodie,

Thanks for the information on Rickie Lake. No relation to Veronica Lake, I guess. Sigh. Veronica Lake. It was she who first made me think of the possibility of manipulating parts of my own body so that I might somehow respond to the inchoate thrill Ms Lake's visage seemed to emanate, if that is possible. I take it that R. Lake does not have that effect, except maybe on strange people such as, maybe, David Bromige. That's just a speculation, mind you. I have never discussed TV with David. But we did have martinis at a soccer game together last sunday.

I am so damned ignorant about some parts of popular culture, and knowledgeable about others. 5 years ago I knew all about Marvel Comics and the World Wrestling federation, but I didnt recognize the name of the fashion guru-ess people were mentioninbg on this list last year, the one who apparently teaches people to make cocktail dresses out of old popsicle sticks.

I do know who Divine was, though.

.....
"Lifting belly is so kind."

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

534. George Bowering
Re: Bad news
Thu 18 Jul 1996

> Perhaps we could put on a Virgina
> Woolf festival with a save-the-wolves organization?
>
> Dodie.

How about a Virginia Woolf festival with a save-the-river organization?

.....
"Lifting belly is so kind."

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

535. Gwyn McVay
Re: [redacted]
Thu 18 Jul 1996

George,

OK, I'll bite: what is an eyebrow window?

Keep dem European smoothies away from da wife.

Gwyn

↑ Index

536. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest feelength, nothing more than feelength... try to forget
Thu 18 Jul 1996

---

this problem about poetry being regarded as "principally therapeutic" (from Brigham Taylor's message) is at the heart of the victim art controversy i mentioned on earlier posting.

on the one hand, writing, especially poetry, is for many fueled by internal emotional jihads and hurricanes. also writing has a long history as force for social change, especially when an issue is placed within a personal narrative. on the other hand, emotional flux does not, as such, automatically make a writer, either in that one having it will be a writer or that one writing must have it. ditto issues needing social change.

perhaps dodie's gulf war fellow might be considered an example of the latter -- fellow feeling in need of a cause to be credible.

what is the place of a writer with a personal issue/cause for social change? my personal feeling is that one needs to be very, very wary of falling into the trap of letting one's victimhood, neediness, social credentials be used, or considered to, or overwhelm the art.

re: b. taylor's message, though we swipe at what sexton's work is sometimes used to justify, and though new unsavory biographical tidbits continue to come out almost hourly, her work still stands on its own incredible power and brilliance. consider a more extreme case -- lillian hellman. here we have someone whose "autobiographical" work is coming into increasing question even as her biographical details emerge as increasingly despicable. the autobiographical works, seen as complete fiction, are fascinating, books about how we'd LIKE to think art and writing and writers are... but CAN they be seen as complete fiction? can we ever divorce the text from its supposed biographical context? think of cellini... [probably even better example of this but he comes to mind right now].

e

↑ Index

537. Daniel Salmon
Re: eudora crash
Thu 18 Jul 1996

Mine was running eudora 154, but is a fairly small 486, which could contribute to the problem i guess, the strange thing is that when both i and my provider (at different times) tried to look at it through netscape 2 it came up with the same error, it was only when i looked at it in the old netscape with its less complex mail prog. that i could get in and delete the corrupt message.

Dan

At 01:54 AM 7/18/96 -0400, you wrote:
>No Eudora crash here either.
>Did the possessors of the crash copies have the latest versions?
>Did they contact the "publisher"?
>Any details appreciated
>since these are not just words
>but writing.

↑ Index

538. Tristan D. Saldana
Re: Proles vs. the Pulitzer
Thu 18 Jul 1996

On Thu, 18 Jul 1996, GRAHAM W. FOUST wrote:

> INCOHERENT "POETIC" BABBLE GETS THE PULITZER
>
> After reading about the award and reading one of her "poems" within the story in the _Des Moines Register_, I was curious enough to get two of her books from the library. My suspicions were right. Her "poetry" consists of long streams of incoherent babbling. I find it hard to believe that any publisher would accept her work. It is especially hard to believe that she merits a Pulitzer Prize.

I don't know . . . I mean it's sometimes problematic to tell a language poet from a coxcomb . . . where a language poet departs and where an imposter may slip in. Their may have been imposters who have "hitched a ride" under this aesthetic category of putting language first as the primary world of experience, or at least it would be convenient to do so. However, (at least from having read _Materialism_ and _The Dream of a Unified Field_) I find her stuff wonderfully -linguistically - conspicuous. I wouldn't call it "long streams of incoherent babbling" in any event. Inarticulate (more reticulated), non-linear, and spatial . . . by all means. Whether Graham deserved the Pultizer is another thing. I am not sure about her "liberal" appropriation of other texts. She pushes Eliot's belief of what mature and amateur/immature poets do.

What does anyone else think?

Tristan

↑ Index

539. Thomas Bell

Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget

Thu 18 Jul 1996

On Thu, 18 Jul 1996, Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest wrote:

> this problem about poetry being regarded as "principally therapeutic" (from Brigham Taylor's message) is at the heart of the victim art controversy i mentioned on earlier posting.
>
> flux does not, as such, automatically make a writer, either in that one having it will be a writer or that one writing must have it.

As a professional therapist I find the connection of therapy and victim art problematic and close to offensive. The nconnection might be out there somewhere in the popular imagination, but effective therapy has never had any connection to personal revalation. It is an art (or science) just as poetry is art or criticism(?).

some days tom, other days Thomas Bell, Psy.D.

late night steam dissapating.

↑ Index

540. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest

Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget

Fri 19 Jul 1996

"connection of therapy and victim art problematic and close to offensive" -- huh? connection is as follows:

person told as part of therapy, produce art centered on your problems. or patient reads how sexton's art was therapeutic for her and decides producing art about problems will be therapeutic for them.

--> they produce art about traumas ---> this art makes people think they have to describe it about art because whoops, as great art because person putting it out in public as art wants to believe themself a great artist. if they aren't told it is great art, their feelings will be hurt. ---> as editors/evaluators/grantees, we begin giving/granting/evaluating well "victims," people whose art is about their victim hood because we feel bad for them, we want to go on record as thinking the source of their trauma is bad, we are so empathetic to the trauma we want to respond based on how bad trauma was and how sorry we feel for them, etc ALL NOT having to do with the art as art, all at the expense of non-victim artists. leading the midground to search for trauma of the day because that makes them a victim which will make their art worthwhile as other victim's art is because they are victims. and i KNOW these exist because i see/receive/struggle with/see in other people's evaluative/grant/editing process same struggle arriving at different places. this is what croce's article was about, how as critic she is meant to evaluate art by victim as art when all around her she is feeling/perceiving pressure to evaluate it as suffering by victim.

---

reverse of this connection, which i've also seen:

artist feels something is off in her/his work, it is not 'deep' or 'meaningful' enough. there is not enough of the stuff of real important human lives.... yes, you hear it coming, not enough suffering, not enough of the trauma that other important people write about -- no drugs, no alcohol, so...

---> artist decides in order to make their art more relevant they have to experience life, suffer, so --> they start shooting up, having sex with most of the east village, going out drinking and...

== they end up junkies (a very close relative of mine has) == they get aids (i'm afraid to count any more -- there have been too many) == they black out alot of their life in drinking and == get killed in auto accident (couple i know, and several i've heard of) == lose major parts of their life, family's life, sanity to drink == don't stop drinking and all of these don't do much for their art. i've seen alot of terrible artists who did one of above to get sense of being more "in" to the marrow of creation and now they are terrible artists who drink alot/shoot up/have aids and write about it. lost people. had people die.

all of this IS real life true, not just "popular" myth. i don't know what you meant, or thought you meant that was offensive. this is what i meant and i don't think it is offensive, i think it is scary and sad.

i also meant, on another plane, that when you've gone through something tough, there is, of course, the fact that for a lot of us, it comes out in the writing. and it is very hard to know if the writing is just trauma working its way out and not really very good art, and the "buzz" of energy we get from looking at that work of our own is from having conquered the trauma enough to write about it. and of course people evaluating/editing/ grantmaking, are brought by first set of responses into seeing it through the filter of you the poor victim.... artist. and you could mistake the sympathy, carefulness, kindness, as awe, as reward, as whatever it is that good work touches off. we WANT good work so much we do mistake it. keep telling ourself the work MUST be great or people wouldn't like it so much. i am having alot of trouble seperating out and getting others reading to separate out, sympathy/victim response from critical response. i'm not sure when i get praise for art as such or when someone feels sorry for me. i'm not sure when my "buzz" is because it is good or because i've written myself out of it. again, real life, lived, mine, not "popular" misperception. again, don't know what you thought you saw, but don't see that that struggle is offensive. damn well OUGHT to struggle that way says i -- got to keep ourselves honest, our work honest. i don't want to end up 50, a terrible writer, whinging at readings and forcing scraps of awfulness on bored, embarrassed outsiders so i can get off on their scraps of uncomfortable sympathy. and i've seen those too, gotten their scraps of paper pressed on me and had to come up with what i want to make the most helpful, not the most easy, response. e

↑ Index

541. Kevin Killian

Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget

Fri 19 Jul 1996

At 9:29 AM 7/19/96, Robert Drake wrote:

> i'm thinking, frinstance, about various poetries by Nam vets,
> bill shields & elliot richmond, or various ov the Viet Nam > Generation publications (mostly prose)... & since i think yr

> talking more about "our" critical reception of the work, i might suggest that for some folks, a cathartic working-out of what that (now mythic) figure in our social history is useful work, and such writing might be useful Culture... owens etal might have provided such after WW1... but you seem to be positing a single use-value--Art--that all writing shd be evaluated by?

Luigi,

I couldn't agree with you more. I think that the relationship between art and content is random to say the least--in other words I think that dreck can be produced no matter the content and that great writing can be produced out of just about anything. This is also harmonizing with Bill Luoma's nonose comment. I'm speaking here more from a prose perspective--in poetry I think the whole issue of content becomes more problematic/complex. But look at the history of Great Works of Fiction--it's loaded with suffering and victims--but goes beyond that self-indulgence somehow. Much of my writing project is to take dis-enfranchized female experience and hurl it into the avant-garde. Recently I was delighted by _The House of Mirth_ because in many ways the content of it doesn't differ that much from the content of _Cosmo_, the most petty and superficial of female obsessions and occupations, and how Wharton writes through that to show its absolute poignancy and oppression and tragedy. I think that one can write out of a position of victimhood and make it work. In my Mina Harker project I made Mina a sort of half goddess, half woman--that way I had the pleasure of letting Mina wallow in her sense of victimhood, to be a Garbo, a Bette Davis of victimhood--but I never try to pull a fast one over on the audience and hide that Mina is wallowing. It's nearly impossible to be a woman writing and to not be writing out of some position of abuse--some of us are abused more than others, to be sure, but all women are abused in this culture. This is just an example, plenty of men are also abused. To propose that writing about abuse is valuable as art, merely because it is about abuse is absurd--not that there isn't some value in writing workshops whose sole purpose is for people to write about their abuse. But, I don't see why this has to be rationalized as art.

The whole issue of victim art often comes up in my life in terms of writing about AIDS--all the crappy writing that comes out of AIDS, and how to deal with that. Once a friend who was teaching a course on writing and AIDS called up Kevin and asked him, rather desperately, for suggestions of good writing about AIDS that he could teach--because he was having a hard time pulling together a list. It was after that that Kevin himself began writing about AIDS, out of a sense, I believe, that skilled writers have a responsibility to confront this epidemic. The other obvious example of someone making art (art really is a dreadful word) out of this incomprehensible tragedy is Aaron Shurin. Neither Kevin nor Aaron are avoiding the devastating emotional impact in all this by falling into some safe stance of objectivity.

I think I'm rambling here. But I guess what I'm saying is that I don't believe that there are these priviledged subjects that should therefore blind us to the fact that what the person is producing is bad writing. That's not doing anybody any favors. Difficult, painful material deserves the same cut-throat technical proficiency as anything else.

As far as Sexton goes, though she has her moments, I think much of her stuff is dreck. But then you have her unfortunate twin Plath, who is, in my opinion, a brilliant writer. Content isn't what makes the difference here.

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

542. Kevin Killian
Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
Fri 19 Jul 1996

This is Dodie again.

R. Drake's mentioning of Viet Nam made me think of one more thing. Several years ago I read an oral history of Viet Nam. It was an amazing book, some cheap paperback that I may or may not still own. One chapter in particular that still haunts me was by this American soldier who had spent something like six years locked in a tiny bamboo cage, I can't remember the dimensions, but he couldn't stand up in it. In straightforward, clean prose he proceeded to explain in detail what he did to keep from going insane, memory games, mathematics, etc. It was horrifying and awesome. I think this is an important cultural document. Thank god nobody talked him into writing some sappy poem about the scariness of some metaphorical cage.

↑ Index

543. Robert Drake
Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
Fri 19 Jul 1996

---

eliza--

i'm interested, & potentially troubled, by yr contentions re: "victim art", but i'd like to understand better what you are trying to say. praps some of my confusion has to do w/ the generality of yr remarks? could you give concrete examples (beyond sexton) of the problems you see? wd be easier fr me to evaluate yr arguement in ref. to specific works, rather than broad generalizations ov "how victim/art functions"...

i'm thinking, frinstance, about various poetries by Nam vets, bill shields & elliot richmond, or various ov the Viet Nam Generation publications (mostly prose)... & since i think yr talking more about "our" critical reception of the work, i might suggest that for some folks, a cathartic working-out of what that (now mythic) figure in our social history is useful work, and such writing might be useful Culture... owens etal might have provided such after WW1... but you seem to be positing a single use-value--Art--that all writing shd be evaluated by?

i'm looking, to, at a recent collection edited by Cynthia Edelberg called _Scars: American Poetry in the Face of Violence_... i'm having all kinds of questions abt the book, which contains work from a range of authors (frm Rachel Blau Duplessis, Rosemarie Waldrop & Robert Creeley to Amy Clampitt & Joyce Carol Oates) addressing violence by catagory--domestic, race, war... one of the selection criteria (which i'm guessing you wd agree with?), seems to be that the writers generally present a voice of "objectivity", rather than firstperson & "emotional"... i mself am not convinced that there is such a thing as objectivity beyond a basically rhetorical gesture, and if there were such a thing i'm not sure i'd value it very highly... but are you suggesting that "victim art", in the pejoritive, is work that lacks enuf objectivity, or emotional distance, to be credible? or something else?

i'm also wondering about "victim art", which implies i guess a connotation of autobiography, and other topical work that addresses emotionally charged subjects... certainly problematic if there wd be a different critical response to a text based on the "authenticity" of the writer's experience--is that part of what you're critical of...

ultimatly, i'm very interested in the place of poetry _in_ the society, as living culture, and some of yr concerns seem to be about just that-- i'd like to know more about what you think, particualarly about specific texts or writers...

asever
lbd

↑ Index

544. Bill Luoma
Anne Sexton's shrink
Fri 19 Jul 1996

Brigham,

why do you want to dis anne sexton? she wrote a good poem about the van allen belt. (Don Allen's anthos). which is just another belt like the salem pack that sits on her file cabinet

parallel to her wrist watch as she buttons and unbuttons her die

I mean Jed Rasula told me some things I didn't want to know.

↑ Index

545. Bill Luoma
Bromige & nonose
Fri 19 Jul 1996

George,

have you read Bromige's work in Kevin & Dodie's mirage mag? is that new work? it's much fun. i hope it's part of a book about to come out.

i even laughed at the language-referential bits which usually make me cringe when i see or hear them around.

yes, he upset my nono, which is using troped-out words like this or sign or word or major signifiers like history or thinking or poem etc. but somehow he managed to pull it off. does anyone have an example they'd like to share about getting your nonose upset in a good way?

for example, maybe Jeff Derksen has been struck by a two word title that he liked?

Bill Luoma

↑ Index

546. Herb Levy clear-cut
Fri 19 Jul 1996

I doubt that Nico Vassilakis (one of the few local lurkers on this list who hasn't come out during the recent spate of, uh, odd de-lurkings from the Northwest) will get around to noting this before leaving for an extended road trip (watch for readings by him, Noemie, & Quixote somewhere near you shortly), so I'll briefly announce a new publication/Web site that debuted at last night's Subtext reading.

Clear-cut is an extremely ecumenical anthology of writing by more than thirty Seattle writers, including some people some of you know: Antero Alli, Laynie

Brown, Maxfield Pol Chandler, Steve Creson, Jerome Gold, Jeane Heuving, Paul Hunter, Jay Jaworski, Joseph Keppler, Marion Kimes, Charlotte London, Michael Magoolaghan, Tom Malone, Bryant Mason, Noemie Maxwell, Heather McHugh, S P Miskowski, Robert Mittenthal, Doug Nufer, Mickey O'Connor, John Olson, Roberta Olson, Belle Randall, Robbo, Steve Shaviro, Willie Smith, Curtis Taylor, Craig Van Riper, Nico Vassilakis, Don Wilsun, J Yarrow.

There's a clear-cut Web site just down the road from the Subtext site:

<http://www.speakeasy.org/clear-cut/>

You'll find information there about ordering a print copy of the book. The texts should be available online there, sometime real soon now, but they aren't there now.

Herb Levy

[redacted]

↑ Index

547. Herb Levy

Another "Yasusada" Sighting

Fri 19 Jul 1996

While out doing errands this morning, I looked through the newest American Poetry Review & was amazed to see four pages devoted to the legendarily non-existent Araki Yasusada.

But wait, there's more: a limited edition selection of verse is forthcoming from Northern House in the UK, as well as a larger manuscript being readied for publication.

Do any of the list readers from Britain know the Northern House people? They should probably be told of the spurious nature of the work they're planning to publish.

How much further can this hoax go? Will work by "Yasusada" end up in a Norton anthology before the end of the century?

Herb Levy

[redacted]

↑ Index

548. Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest
Re: Another "Yasusada" Sighting
Fri 19 Jul 1996

---

i know i'm being a dummy here, but what is the yasusada legend? i've never heard of araki yasusada...
e

↑ Index

549. George Bowering
Re: [redacted]
Fri 19 Jul 1996

> George,
>
> OK, I'll bite: what is an eyebrow window?

Oh, how can I tell you without drawing it. Well, it is a kind of gable window in that it juts out from the roof. But instead of having an inverted V shape it has its little personal roof in the shape of an eyebrow.

.....
"An occasional crow makes poetry more interesting but not prophetic."
--Carl Rakosi

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

550. George Bowering
Re: Bromige & nonose
Fri 19 Jul 1996

> George,
>
> have you read Bromige's work in Kevin & Dodie's mirage mag? is that new work? it's much fun. i hope it's part of a book about to come out.

I havent been fortunate enough to see it, and though Brom and I see each other often, I havent talked about his new poems with him lately. Mainly we talk about our recently-finished co-authored novel, for which we have no publisher. But i can say that ever since I first knew him, circa 1959, he has had a deft comic, satirical touch that does not dump him into the canister labeled satiric poet. I think he can do it to almost anyone.

.....
"An occasional crow makes poetry more interesting but not prophetic."
--Carl Rakosi

George Bowering.
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

551. MAXINE CHERNOFF
Re: feelength, nothing more than feelength... try to forget
Fri 19 Jul 1996

Dodie's right about sappy poems on important subjects and the suitability of other media with the same subject matter. No one, of course, should censor anyone else or his/her subject matter, but what grates is that crass marketers of writing often dwell on subject matter. I was recently at a gathering where a local poet told another what she was reading in just that way: a great book of poetry on incest, another on the war, etc. Try to tell someone that you write about flux or the perilous language of human communication and you're in trouble. What's your subject--language-- might go over here but try it on the general public or on a polite gathering of "writers" and you're in big trouble. Wish it weren't so but it is.

Maxine Chernoff

On Fri, 19 Jul 1996, Kevin Killian wrote:

> This is Dodie again.
>
> *R. Drake's mentioning of Viet Nam made me think of one more thing. Several years ago I read an oral history of Viet Nam. It was an amazing book, some cheap paperback that I may or may not still own. One chapter in particular that still haunts me was by this American soldier who had spent something like six years locked in a tiny bamboo cage, I can't remember the dimensions, but he couldn't stand up in it. In straightforward, clean prose he proceeded to explain in detail what he did to keep from going insane, memory games, mathematics, etc. It was horrifying and awesome. I think this is an important cultural document. Thank god nobody talked him into writing some sappy poem about the scariness of some metaphorical* > cage.

↑ Index

552. Herb Levy
Re: Another "Yasusada" Sighting
Fri 19 Jul 1996

> i know i'm being a dummy here, but what is the yasusada legend? i've never heard of araki yasusada...
> e

"Araki Yasusada" is a fake poet whose work has been turning up in several very presitigious mags over the last few years. Outside of this list I've seen little or no mention of the fact that this is a rather tacky hoax. The mention of forthcoming work in the APR header makes it possible for someone to actively stop some future publication rather than merely note another instance of this.

Here's a better description of the situation than I could give myself from the poetics archives:

> Date: Tue, 29 Aug 1995 21:45:29 -0400
> Reply-To: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> Sender: UB Poetics discussion group <[redacted]>
> From: Lee Chapman <[redacted]>
> Subject: Yasusada = Hoax?
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS <[redacted]>
>
> As one of the editors who recently published work by Araki Yasusada (Brad Morrow, CONJUNCTIONS, and Jean Stein, GRAND STREET, were others), I feel a responsibility to inform anyone who may have read the work (in FIRST INTENSITY #5) that it is more than likely a hoax; that is, a person or persons unknown to me at this time concocted the bio and writings of this supposed Hiroshima poet. The person who submitted the work to me refuses to confirm or deny the rumors of fakery, and with absolutely no evidence in favor of Yasusada's existence, while there is plenty against it, I think it's safe to assume that the rumors are true.
>
> I don't want to interrupt the flow of current discussions to use this forum for a big screechy diatribe on the ethical ramifications of such practices, but I want everyone to know that I did not know of the hoax when I accepted the work, which obviously I found very moving--and timely, of course. However, I believe that the author's deliberate targeting of some major literary magazines, such as CONJUNCTIONS, just in time for the 50th anniversary of the horror of the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki is indefensible.
>
> If the purpose was to bring attention to this 50-year-old horror, well I > think we are already perfectly aware of that--many of us have been living "under that bomb" for all our lives! If the author's purpose was to assure that he/she/they received closer attention by synchronizing their attack with the anniversary, well they succeeded. They got our attention. But now what are they going to do with it?

>
> My main purpose here is to alert you all to this hoax, and to warn any publishers who may have been approached by anyone (such as Kent Johnson of Freeport, Illinois, who submitted the work to me) claiming to be associated with "Yasusada's editors."
>
> The perps did a nice job of writing, but they trashed their own creation when they decided to trash their readers' hearts. Thousands of human beings died in Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and thousands of their family members are still alive today, to remember the horror personally. To use their pain as a springboard to some kind of notoriety is unconscionable. There are hoaxes (such as the Ern Mally affair in Australia during World War II, in which the target was a single editor) and there are hoaxes (such as Yasusada, in which the pain of millions of people--as everyone on earth is affected to some extent by what happened in Japan 50 years ago this month--was callously ignored, apparently in favor of personal gratification); this one really stinks.
>
> I guess I diatribed after all. Sorry. As it seems that the RENGA got started after someone posted a note about the Yasusada business in FIRST INTENSITY, I'm somewhat to blame for the seemingly endless renga-ing. You know, I almost didn't publish the renga part of the Yasusada submission--see what happens when you don't listen to your instincts?
>
> Best to all,
> Lee Chapman

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

553. Tristan D. Saldana
Re: Another "Yasusada" Sighting
Fri 19 Jul 1996

What might be a poet hoax? How can we recognize one?

Tristan

↑ Index

554. Pritchett,Pat
Re: feelength, nothing more than feeling
Fri 19 Jul 1996

The book you're referring to, Dodie, is "Nam," compiled by Mark Baker (or possibly Barker). I've been haunted for years by that particular chapter. As I recall (it's been over ten years since I read it), the POW in question would spend each day building his dream house. In his imagination, he pored over every aspect of construction with the same kind of deliberation as the actual building would have required. In this way, it took him years to finish "the project." It sounds like something straight out of Borges and is a real testament to poesis in its most elemental form.

Best,

Patrick Pritchett

From: Kevin Killian
To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
Subject: Re: feelength, nothing more than feelength... try to forget
Date: Friday, July 19, 1996 4:26PM

<<File Attachment: HEADERS.TXT>>

This is Dodie again.

R. Drake's mentioning of Viet Nam made me think of one more thing. Several years ago I read an oral history of Viet Nam. It was an amazing book, some cheap paperback that I may or may not still own. One chapter in particular that still haunts me was by this American soldier who had spent something like six years locked in a tiny bamboo cage, I can't remember the dimensions, but he couldn't stand up in it. In straightforward, clean prose he proceeded to explain in detail what he did to keep from going insane, memory games, mathematics, etc. It was horrifying and awesome. I think this is an important cultural document. Thank god nobody talked him into writing some sappy poem about the scariness of some metaphorical cage.

↑ Index

555. Joseph Zitt
Murmurings from the Renga Pits
Fri 19 Jul 1996

For anyone who's interested: after a six month wandering of attention, I've gotten back to working on boiling the Renga down into a hypertext.

I'm toying with doing it as a Java app rather than in simple HTML. The question boils down to whether the wait involved in schlepping lines back and forth across the Net is more or less annoying than waiting once to drag the whole file, with the program (well, Java classes) along with it, down. Either way, I'm trying to keep the interface clear and the program platform-independent.

It's not going to be ready really soon, but will emerge in the fullness of time :-). ---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------1---------- |||/ Joseph Zitt ===== [redacted] ===== Dallas, Texas \||| ||/ Question Authority, The == SILENCE: The John Cage Mailing List \|| |/ http://www.realtime.net/~jzitt == <> <> == The Data Wranglers! \|

↑ Index

556. Thomas Bell

Re: feelength, nothing more than feelength... try to forget

Fri 19 Jul 1996

Yes, exactly - this has nothing to do with competent therapy. It has to do with popular misconceptions, critics, and academic fashion.

On Fri, 19 Jul 1996, Eliza McGrand- CVA Guest wrote:

> "connection of therapy and victim art problematic and close to offensive" -- huh? connection is as follows:
>
> person told as part of therapy, produce art centered on your problems. or patient reads how sexton's art was therapeutic for her and decides producing art about problems will be therapeutic for them.
>
> --> they produce art about traumas
> ---> this art makes people think they have to describe it about art because whoops, as great art because person putting it out in public as art wants to believe themself a great artist. if they aren't told it is great art, their feelings will be hurt.
> ---> as editors/evaluators/grantees, we begin giving/granting/evaluating well "victims," people whose art is about their victim hood because we feel bad for them, we want to go on record as thinking the source of their trauma is bad, we are so empathetic to the trauma we want to respond based on how bad trauma was and how sorry we feel for them, etc ALL NOT having to do with the art as art, all at the expense of non-victim artists. leading the mid-ground to search for trauma of the day because that makes them a victim which will make their art worthwhile as other victim's art is because they are victims. and i KNOW these exist because i see/receive/struggle with/see in other people's evaluative/grant/editing process same struggle arriving at different places. this is what croce's article was about, how as critic she is meant to evaluate art by victim as art when all around > her she is feeling/perceiving pressure to evaluate it as suffering > by victim.

---

reverse of this connection, which i've also seen:

artist feels something is off in her/his work, it is not 'deep' or 'meaningful' enough. there is not enough of the stuff of real important human lives.... yes, you hear it coming, not enough suffering, not enough of the trauma that other important people write about -- no drugs, no alcohol, so...

---> artist decides in order to make their art more relevant they have to experience life, suffer, so --> they start shooting up, having sex with most of the east village, going out drinking and...

== they end up junkies (a very close relative of mine has)
== they get aids (i'm afraid to count any more -- there have been too many) == they black out alot of their life in drinking and == get killed in auto accident (couple i know, and several i've heard of) == lose major parts of their life, family's life, sanity to drink == don't stop drinking

and all of these don't do much for their art. i've seen alot of terrible artists who did one of above to get sense of being more "in" to the marrow of creation and now they are terrible artists who drink alot/shoot up/have aids and write about it. lost people. had people die.

all of this IS real life true, not just "popular" myth. i don't know what you meant, or thought you meant that was offensive. this is what i meant and i don't think it is offensive, i think it is scary and sad.

i also meant, on another plane, that when you've gone through something tough, there is, of course, the fact that for a lot of us, it comes out in the writing. and it is very hard to know if the writing is just trauma working its way out and not really very good art, and the "buzz" of energy we get from looking at that work of our own is from having conquered the trauma enough to write about it. and of course people evaluating/editing/grantmaking, are brought by first set of responses into seeing it through the filter of you the poor victim.... artist. and you could mistake the sympathy, carefulness, kindness, as awe, as reward, as whatever it is that good work touches off. we WANT good work so much we do mistake it. keep telling ourself the work MUST be great or people wouldn't like it so much. i am having alot of trouble seperating out and getting others reading to separate out, sympathy/victim response from critical response. i'm not > sure when i get praise for art as such or when someone feels sorry for me. i'm not sure when my "buzz" is because it is good or because i've written myself out of it. again, real life, lived, mine, not "popular" misperception. again, don't know what you thought you saw, but don't see that that struggle is offensive. damn well OUGHT to struggle that way says i -- got to keep ourselves honest, our work honest. i don't want to end up 50, a terrible writer, whinging at readings and forcing scraps of awfulness on bored, embarrassed outsiders so i can get off on their scraps of uncomfortable sympathy. and i've seen those too, gotten their scraps of paper pressed on me and had to come up with what i want to make the most helpful, not the most easy, response.

> e

↑ Index

557. Thomas Bell

Re: feelingth, nothing more than feeling

Fri 19 Jul 1996

I do resonate with this. I would however call it hero art. It is certainly not victim art, and it is legitimately therapeutic as well as inspiring. tom

On Fri, 19 Jul 1996, Pritchett,Pat @Silverplume wrote:

> The book you're referring to, Dodie, is "Nam," compiled by Mark Baker (or possibly Barker). I've been haunted for years by that particular chapter. As I recall (it's been over ten years since I read it), the POW in question would spend each day building his dream house. In his imagination, he pored over every aspect of construction with the same kind of deliberation as the actual building would have required. In this way, it took him years to finish "the project." It sounds like something straight out of Borges and is a real testament to poesis in its most elemental form.
>
> Best,
>
> Patrick Pritchett
> ----------
> From: Kevin Killian
> To: Multiple recipients of list POETICS
> Subject: Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget
> Date: Friday, July 19, 1996 4:26PM
>
> <<File Attachment: HEADERS.TXT>>
>
> This is Dodie again.
>
> R. Drake's mentioning of Viet Nam made me think of one more thing. Several years ago I read an oral history of Viet Nam. It was an amazing book, some > *cheap paperback that I may or may not still own. One chapter in particular that still haunts me was by this American soldier who had spent something like six years locked in a tiny bamboo cage, I can't remember the dimensions, but he couldn't stand up in it. In straightforward, clean prose he proceeded to explain in detail what he did to keep from going insane, memory games, mathematics, etc. It was horrifying and awesome. I think this is an important cultural document. Thank god nobody talked him into writing some sappy poem about the scariness of some metaphorical cage.*

↑ Index

558. Louis Cabri

si

Sat 20 Jul 1996

The concept gradually ate
    Until only a scifi movie Remained, & gradually
    Ate the scifi movie remains

The day when incoherence
    Became obvious
Something happened, as if
    By thinking

I feared for my life & friends
    "Once again," upon a rhyme
It pounced as proof, science
    Nor seances suede

***

Re: Gulf War/Political poetry, I patch this from my scrapbook, a rather cynical assessment:

"[A] poet is an "unacknowledged legislator" who bravely takes a stand against corruption in power. It is this model, dimly remembered, that leads the poets I heard read during the Gulf War to choose their antiwar poem to read first; that tang of forbiddenness with (the best part) no real risk behind it.... A quick index of the difference between this purely simulated forbiddenness and the real thing may be got in comparing reaction to these antiwar poems (applause, indulgence, boredom) and the reaction to a Stanford University lecturer who, a few months later, publicly declared that he used marijuana and that he had sometimes brought it to work with him. He was fired. No one reacted." ("A Show of Defiance: Poetry as 'Protest' in Contemporary America," John C. Dolan, in Rhetorical Republic - I didnt take down who the editor is nor biblio details).

It's interesting to me where and how the line is drawn on the question of the political a/effect of poetry/language. Dolan here draws it one way. Stanford U may not get too much contrastive sympahty, however. Another way to draw it would be as a legal limit of, say, defamatory libel, as it's called in the Cdn Criminal Code. I think it's Derrida who has an interesting essay on the "undecidable performative" in a French poet whose names escapes me right now, a rhetorical maneouvre of self-reflexive language that freaked de Man out (he said the u.p. couldn't be "tolerated"). I can't give example of the u.p. right now (but McCaffery's poetry has lots of instances of it, I think). Anyway, one could call the legal limit a "decidable performative." There was a recent case in Canada concerning the legality of a protester's poster outside the court, whose message was ultimately directed toward a Crown decision concerning charges of manslaughter brought against Kingston Penitentiary guards in the case of Robert Gentles. I don't know if the protester was charged under the Code.

***

Re: victim art, imposters, concepts, perhaps these lines may suggest new

...Behind every survival is a whole totality in words.

> i.e., parenthesis it is a text. To answer a > question in runic workings of quotations > behind which passion slips.
>
> And left, imagining a sum: an _I_ inverted > to an _it_.
>
> At the same time as an imposter.

B. Watten, from "Conduit" in _Conduit_ (Gaz, 1988)

-Louis

↑ Index

559. Kevin Killian

Re: feelength, nothing more than feelength... try to forget

Sat 20 Jul 1996

At 8:02 AM 7/20/96, Carnography wrote:

> Speaking of victim art: "Every woman adores a fascist" seems rather simplistic. Plath's suburban pain was hardly comparable to the suffering of Jews, gypsies, dissidents and homosexuals in WWII concentration camps.

Rob,

Jacqueline Rose addresses this issue in her excellent _Haunting of Sylvia Plath_. I won't attempt to paraphrase from a book I read a few years ago, but one thing that Rose points out is that in fact Plath was much more politically engaged than is commonly known--one of her many aspects "edited" out of her myth by her executors. Rose argues that Plath's references to the Holocaust, fascism, Rosenbergs, etc., aren't as gratuituous as they seem.

Michael Davidson picked up on this at his recent talk at the Orono conference when he led off his talk on Cold War Politics with a discussion of the _Bell Jar_.

"Every woman adores a fascist." Of course it's simplistic--and I'm sure Plath knew that in this sing-songy nursery rhyme poem. I think she's very much in control in this poem and is being in-your-face provocative.

Plath's hard for a lot of people to like because she's mean. I admire that about her.

Sexton's the bored well-to-do housewife who drank too much and liked to screw around. Plath at least struggled in her life, financially and socially, had some real tragedy. As far as suburban goes, wasn't she living in London when she wrote "Daddy?" Or maybe she was still in the country with the bees?

Dodie

↑ Index

560. Rachel Loden

Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget

Sat 20 Jul 1996

MAXINE CHERNOFF wrote (in part):

> Try to tell someone that you write about flux or the perilous language of human communication and you're in trouble. What's your subject--language-- might go over here but try it on the general public or on a polite gathering of "writers" and you're in big trouble. Wish it weren't so but it is.

Hear hear. I just spent much too much time trying to jump through all the byzantine hoops on a local arts council application (including a demand for a "statement" which seemed more appropriate for a lepidopterist than a poet). I found myself liberally quoting from Frank O'Hara's brilliant tapdance before the Paterson Society: "I don't want to make up a lot of prose about something that is perfectly clear in the poems...At any rate, this will explain why I can't really say anything definite for the Paterson Society for the time being." Which will no doubt win me lots of points with the bureaucratic Cerberus who guards the gateway to the judges, and probably with the judges themselves--but the alternative was vile.

Rachel Loden (briefly delurking)

↑ Index

561. Carnography

Re: feelingth, nothing more than feelingth... try to forget

Sat 20 Jul 1996

Dodie typed:

> I think I'm rambling here. But I guess what I'm saying is that I don't believe that there are these priviledged subjects that should therefore blind us to the fact that what the person is producing is bad writing. That's not doing anybody any favors. Difficult, painful material deserves the same cut-throat technical proficiency as anything else.

The problem of the reader's (and critic's) identification with the author's persona is as pervasive as a virus. I find it odd that many of our champions of multiculturalism have denounced in "victim art" what I consider to be equally problematic in multiculturalism: it posits inherent values to the experience/ethnicity/gender/sexual orientation of the poet. To argue by authority is the fastest possible way to lower the level of a dialogue between diverse parties.

> *As far as Sexton goes, though she has her moments, I think much of her stuff is dreck. But then you have her unfortunate twin Plath, who is, in my opinion, a brilliant writer. Content isn't what makes the difference here.*

Are you saying that craft makes the difference? If so, I'd have to agree. Still, I thought that much of _To Bedlam and Part Way Back_ was good, and that much of Plath is overstated or overly dramatic.

Speaking of victim art: "Every woman adores a fascist" seems rather simplistic. Plath's suburban pain was hardly comparable to the suffering of Jews, gypsies, dissidents and homosexuals in WWII concentration camps. The problem here, I think, is one of craft (Plath's verbal felicity and fecundity notwithstanding). The difficulty for the writer is to avoid getting painted into a corner: not to make blank statements in an attempt to be powerful, but to address the complexity and subtlety of an experience as well as its power. Plath's suffering was horrible enough as it was. She didn't need to sing anapestic similes involving Hitler to prove her point.

All the best,

Rob Hardin

PS: A horrible confession: I used to listen to library recordings of Plath in high school. (For all I know, I probably cried.) Later, I discovered Thomas Lovell Beddoes, whom I love far more than Plath and Sexton combined.

Plath and Sexton, Eliot and Pound. Have you ever heard Plath's expatriate accent on those recordings?

PPS: I'm not dissing Plath and Sexton, I'm reading them.

http://www.interport.net/~scrypt

↑ Index

562. Ron Silliman
Hoaxification
Sat 20 Jul 1996

I'm curious -- and maybe a little disturbed -- at the idea that one would want to stop the publication of any of "Asusada's" work before it comes into print just because it's a hoax. Besides being a classic instance of prior censorship, I think it fails to see what's going on in the whole phenomenon.

After the Social Text "hoax" and the lengthy discussion here of the Ern Malley affair (which I'd not heard of before this list), it seems worth looking a little more closely at the ideas that are put into play.

Let's look at the basics:

(1) Asusada doesn't exist -- he is a social construct built by one or (more likely) more people. There's been speculation here about who that might be, but it seems to me unimportant.

(2) The work as writing is pretty good. One reason it's getting published is because it IS better than just decent.

(3) The social narrative that is Asusada's "background" (Japanese survivor of Hiroshima, lost his family, got into the work of Spicer and Barthes in the 1960s, etc) is compelling enough to get the work into places (Grand Street, APR) that, frankly, wouldn't publish Spicer if he was alive today (oh, maybe Grand Street would, now that Corbett's the poetry editor).

(3a) It would be possible to argue that the work crosses over from the ordinary to the publishable BECAUSE of the context the hoax creates -- but I'm not convinced of that.

(4) "Asusada" is the only "poet" publishing right now who foregrounds the horror of nuclear war. Think about that. Is that "tacky"? It may in fact be just the opposite.

(5) "Asusada" also plays on the orientalism of various English-speaking writers/editors/readers in complex ways. Is it an exploitation of it or an expose? I think it may be both, but a lot of what makes people uncomfortable with this hoax is that it sets it up pretty ambivalently and we don't like to feel those dynamics at play in ourselves -- even when they are.

(6) "Asusada" by now must know that lots of folks recognize the project as a hoax and that when he/they appear in APR or elsewhere they give its editors (and readers) the opportunity to feel for a moment the way Andrew Ross and the editors of Social Text must feel. I hear that same tone of defensiveness in some of the posts on Asusada here that I heard in Ross' replies (there's been more of the same in the Nation of late as well). I think we all know how SILLY that sounds to others. Maybe we should try to hear it in ourselves as well.

(7) Having been the person who first brought Asusada's name up on this list (I wrote a note about how good I thought the work in Conjunctions was), I write this from the perspective of "one of the _taken_."

Having "said" all that, I don't see why anyone would want to stop the publication of this work. I can see that, if the editor were your friend, you might want to let them know that the context is different from/more complex than they might think. But why stop it?

All best,

Ron

↑ Index

563. Robert Drake
Re: Hoaxification
Sat 20 Jul 1996

---

ron-- author as a social construct? that might be "Asusada", but it couldn't be "me"...

[chetongueek]

asever
lbd

↑ Index

564. Herb Levy
Re: Hoaxification
Sat 20 Jul 1996

Ron -

Acouple of quick things & then I gotta run.

I agree that my use of the term "stop" was an overstatement, but I still think it makes sense for potential publishers of poetry "by" Yasusada to have the opportunity to make an informed decision of the work they are considering.

Your comparisons with Ern Malley & the recent Social Text fiasco are right on. But those works were submitted for publication to show that the editors were rubes who didn't know what they're doing. This is not the same as the avant garde tradition of false identities, which have most often included collaborations from within an artistic community to "fool" those outside it. One could make the argument that this ispartly what's at work in the Yasusada project, but then where do you draw the line as to who is within & outside of the artistic community under consideration? APR, Grand Street, First Intensity, Conjunctions, Aerial?

At this point there's no way of knowing who Jack Spicer would be "if he were still alive", but APR has published work by others who were in the New American Poetry & so have other mags w/o roots in the experimental tradition that wouldn't (yet) touch anyone in, say, In the American Tree.

I also agree that some of the Yasusada poems are good. But the "social narrative" of the author is becoming more & more of the recent publications, which seem mired in footnotes and other explanatory material. A lot of the APR stuff is letters and journal entries with lots of accompanying apparatus. If this more recent stuff is indicative of the larger project, I think we're ultimately going to see an awkwardly parodistic "novel" with some good poetry in it.

As for Yasusada's being the only poetry dealing with the atomic bombing of Japan, I think you were moving from the Bay area to Philadelphia during at least a part of the fiftieth anniversary of these bombings and so may have missed some of what seemed to be A LOT of related poetry. Much of this work wasn't in an "experimental" tradition, but I think there's a project that Karl Young is involved in that might better fill that bill.

Have a good weekend

Bests

H

Herb Levy

[redacted]

↑ Index

565. Christina Fairbank Chirot poetry and nuclear war
Sat 20 Jul 1996

Thanks to Ron Silliman for his thoughtful note re Asusada. A cautionary note is well taken when the issues of censorship and nuclear destruction are found in conjunction. Actually there is an excellent ongoing forum for work concerned with Hiroshima and its ongoing after effects: the International Shadows Project. The Project has mounted exhibits and events for several years now, from here In Milwaukee to California to, this year, Finland. For information on the Project, there is a site at Grist On-Line: http:/ / www.thing.net/~grist Check on Jukka Lehmus' Page for info on how to participate and for photos of this year's work in progress (including wooden dice made by Karl Gartung, of Woodland Pattern Book Center here in Milwaukee). Also on Grist On-Line, check Karl Young's Light and Dust Books for available catalogues of previous Shadows Projects and for Young's poem Three,Hiroshima done as part of the 1990 Project. Get in touch and participate--the anniversary of Hiroshima and Nagasaki is approaching--another way to think of that "deadline".

who are you/the moment is escaping/ we couldn't do anything so hideous/ our death keeps going on and on/we couldn't do anything so hideous/the citadel faces its own darkness/it'll be over in just a minute/the moment is escaping/who are you

from Three, Hiroshima by Karl Young

---get in touch with the International Shadows Project--

--dave baptiste chirot

↑ Index

566. Curt Anderson
Re: Hoaxification
Sat 20 Jul 1996

My impression of the Asusada hoax is quite different from Ron Silliman's. I don't think the poems are particularly good, and I doubt they would have been widely accepted independent of their poetically correct pedigree. The instructive and insidious thing about the work is that it manipulates the editor, and thus the reader, by virtue of the circumstances it clothes itself in. It presents itself as exotic, critically and aesthetically current, and socially conscious. I acknowledge the value of appropriation of materials to some extent, but appropriating identities is something else altogether, especially when that identity manipulates its relationship to an event in which thousands of innocent people were extinguished. I got thrown off the list by the Eudora bouncer, and haven't been privy to previous posts on the subject, other than Silliman's, but I know a couple editors who have been taken in by the hoax and the distress the publication of misrepresented material has caused them. Just thought I'd put in my monthly two bits, Ron. Now back to the darkness.

Curt Anderson
[redacted]

↑ Index

567. Mark Wallace
avant garde as production network
Sat 20 Jul 1996

Dear David Baratier:

I have some sympathy for the problems you speak about regarding being "a card-carrying member of the avant garde," that is (and I'm reading you implicitly here) your sense that working in a range of "avant garde" poetries, you sometimes get the sense that people read that as a committment on your part to believe certain things and not others, to practice certain ways and not others, and yet you're not sure always that you want to believe or practice these things, and certainly not in every instance.

There have been a lot of debates on this list about what the notion of an avant-garde really could be in 1996, and whether using the world itself is even valid, so I don't think at this time I really want to repeat those arguments here. But what I would suggest, as a way of thinking about the problems you bring up, is two different definitions of avant garde, both of which describe different areas of pheonomena. One is that group of poems which at various points and times have been described by that term, the other is a social network of people who claim in various degress to be involved in something called "avant garde" practice.

The difference is important (and could be further characterized). But it seems pretty clear that what's frustrating you, at times anyway, is the issue of the avant garde as a social network committed to the production and distribution of certain kinds of texts. Frankly, many poets actively resist seeing themselves as part of a production "network" at all--they like to think of themselves as free individuals who critique the very notion of production/consumption, and the idea that they themselves are both producers and consumers is an uncomfortable one. What it seems to me that you're questioning, in valuable ways, is your relation to this kind of production activity. Is there really some part of avant garde practice that is just simply capitalist production, is there any part that gets beyond that? Are you, when labelled "a card-carrying member" of the avant garde, simply a production manager for certain kinds of texts? Are you a member of a significantly oppositional community? Are you committing yourself to the creation only of certain kinds of products, and what if you don't want to create only those products? Are there ways in which the creation of a poem, and the reading of one, can critique or escape production-consumption relations?

A lot of writers have attempted answers to these questions, and many of them have failed, too. I'm just now reading Raymond Williams' THE POLITICS OF MODERNISM in which, so far anyway, he sees the failure of high modernism as the way in which it was eventually "bought out" by capitalist modernity and became the "postmodern," which he reads often as modernism without any real subversive capability, a failure which he sees as arising at least in part from the unresolved internal contradictions of modernism. I've heard this before from Jameson, and thought it was wrong then too--Williams seems to be implying that if postmodern art really was what it should be, then normative capitalist production couldn't continue--therefore, postmodern art must in some way "support" capitalist production. In so saying, I think he misses the idea that postmodernist art can indeed critique capitalist relations of production PERFECTLY, and still not make a damn bit of large scale difference. Why? Because people who make art are not in charge. Should they be?--that's a problem for another day.

I think, finally, that there's no way out of production/consumption relations. HOWEVER, there are different kinds of production, and different kinds of use of that production, not all of them fundamentally exploitative. That is, production is not at all negative by definition--it's only negative when it's a certain KIND of production (at the moment, the mass production of standardized products of relentless and alienating banality, as just one for instance).

