> is certaintly a threat -- a retreat into the self.

I realize that the kind of transcendence espoused in Romanticism has been questioned, doubted, exposed, even ridiculed. But even so, some kind of transcendence was indeed the aim of Wordsworth, Keats, et al -- so I don't think it's quite fair to equate Romanticism with "a retreat intl the self" -- could you explain why you see it as such?

charles

↑ Index

276. Gwyn McVay
Re: Poems for the Millenium....
Thu 9 Jul 1998

"An interesting question, but one that seems to miss some points. One of which Gwynn responded to, & I agree with him"

<DENIRO>You talkin' to me? Huh? You talkin' to me?</DENIRO> If you mean me, with one n, I am a "her." But I'll take the agreement anyway.

bests, Gwyn "XX" McVay

↑ Index

277. Simon DeDeo

Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)

Thu 9 Jul 1998

> Romanticism as a reaction to the conditions of 1998 > is certainly a threat -- a retreat into the self.
>
> I realize that the kind of transcendence espoused in Romanticism has been questioned, doubted, exposed, even ridiculed. But even so, some kind of transcendence was indeed the aim of Wordsworth, Keats, et al -- so I don't think it's quite fair to equate Romanticism with "a retreat intl the self" -- could you explain why you see it as such?

When I used the phrase "retreat into the self", I was thinking more of successors to Romanticism, where the poet walls off the outside world and passes judgement without empathy; adopts a seemingly superior voice that is usually just self-centered. The Romantics themselves, however, did move inwards and develop the lyric into a means of creating and developing a "self"; I wouldn't call it a retreat, but it is a movement directed towards a self.

For the Romantics, transcendence came from an examination of the self as an aspect of God -- "self" and "God" taken very loosly, of course. But always a looking inwards and a creation of a voice, an "I" that is observing, developing and changing as it comes into contact with the outside world -- which may a step down or step up. Wordsworth is an excellent example -- the _Prelude_ is a "poetic autobiography" with a number of transcendent moments. The self he creates is certaintly not Wordsworth in the way the I in Lowell's _History_ poems are Lowell; Wordsworth doesn't even mention his parents, although he spends a number of chapters on his childhood.

The transcendence is of the body and the contingencies of the world; the Romantic eye looks upon the poet and sees a core that is, essentially, the poet's muse -- look at Keats' Ode to a Nightingale -- he hardly even sees the bird before it's become something that exists to define and understand his own body/soul. Far different from, say, a moment in Pound, where physical beauty is more concrete, less tractable for those trying to find a "little man" behind the screen of invention.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

278. Alan J.J.N. Sondheim
The Oldest English Text
Fri 10 Jul 1998

-

The Oldest English Text

(From The Oldest English Texts, Henry Sweet, The Early English Text Society, 1885, reprinted Oxford, 1966)

On the Thames Knife, 400-500 AD:

Beagnoth

Note that 'th' is the letter _thorn._ Beag, crown, ring.

Inscription from Sandwich, Kent, 428-597 AD:

Raehaebul

(Proper name?)

↑ Index

279. J. Kuszai
Meow Press is Moving!
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Meow Press is Moving!

At the end of July, Meow Press will go into boxes and will be moved across the country to San Diego, California. The ambitious publishing season announced some weeks ago is ongoing and is shockingly on schedule for the most part. There should be only a two to four week disruption in printing, assembly, and shipping of pure-poetry product.

Thanks to those of you who have ordered books from me and those who have contributed to this project in the last few weeks. You subscribers, my people, will be taken care of in the next world (ex-post-Buffalo) which will see many expansions of Meow, into "real" books and also CDs. My name is Santa and I live on the second floor...another flurry of packages headed out this weekend...so if you're waiting for something from me expect it this week.

Orders for backlist items will be accepted for another two weeks or so. After I move, all bets are off on full-sets and a great deal of the backlist, as I am not sure I will have materials with me to keep those books in print. BUY NOW! SPD has more of the books than I do!

The Meow Press address in Buffalo will remain open for another year, though I will supply a local California address within a week or two. This email and the meow web address will remain active.

The Fall98 publishing season will see work by Caroline Bergvall, David Bromige, Jackson Mac Low, among others.

checkout the website for more information on forthcoming books:
[updated recently]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/presses

thanks for listening! and I'll be home to poetics soon (still on the midnight digest, tho I'm reading it all)

jk

aka elijah mcCracker

↑ Index

280. Poetics List Administration
Puffing OTHER
Fri 10 Jul 1998

The FULL VERSION of the
"Introduction: 'A Fair Field Full of Folk'," to the forthcoming
OTHER: British and Irish Poetry since 1970 edited by Richard Caddel and Peter Quartermain and due from Wesleyan UP /U of New England P in December is now available in Jacket#4, with a few pictures, at:

http://www.jacket.zip.com.au/jacket04/otherbrit.html

You might want to check it out.

PQ/RC

+ +

Peter Quartermain
846 Keefer Street
Vancouver
B.C.
Canada V6A 1Y7
Voice : [redacted]
Fax: [redacted]

+ +

↑ Index

281. George Bowering
Re: millenium/knife+fork
Fri 10 Jul 1998

I have never seen an anthology that did not leave out good poets. That is the nature of anthologies.

Selected poems often leave out good poems.

The American League all-star team leaves out good first basemen.

George Bowering.

,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

282. rsillima
The Eliot problem(s)
Fri 10 Jul 1998

There have been two Eliot problems raised in the past two days --

One is the impact of his estate making stupid demands that keep the work from appearing in something akin to Millenium, save by round-about means.

The other is the Eliot as good/bad person thing.

They're really very different issues. The former Eliot shares with the estates of David Jones and Jack Kerouac. In Jones' case, where many people don't know the work, it's really regretable. In the other cases, it's mostly just stupid.

The other question takes us into the quagmire shared by Pound, Spicer and others, really a reader's problem -- how to handle a writer's racism (or sexism or or or). Earlier this summer I read Faulkner's Flags in the Dust, the original version of what was released as Satoris (before Faulkner became famous and could really publish whatever he wanted). It's a rough work, in the sense that a book like Visions of Cody is rough, brilliant and awkward by turns. It's also the most racist work I've ever encountered, just jaw droppingly so, even though he may have thought himself a liberal by northern Mississippi 1930s standards. I've always liked Faulkner, since he is the one writer of his generation besides Stein who seems to have seriously thought about the sentence as a unit of writing ("thought" might not be the right word), but it was hard to feel good about liking the writing when has to wade through the muck.

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

283. Henry G

Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)

Fri 10 Jul 1998

On Thu, 9 Jul 1998 20:51:32 -0400 Simon DeDeo said:
>
>Wonderful; fireworks explode in my brain with the revelation that >this poem is about LOVE. Really, it was quite a shocker. And now >that I know that the poet actually met the woman in question, I'm >even more amazed and convinced that this is a good poem.
>
>Sarcasm aside. My point, which you really haven't responded to, is that >the poem is a catalogue of cliche strung together by wretchedly boring >prose. I'm sure the subject matter is important; that doesn't make it >any less worthy of being ignored. Where is the attention to language?
>Where is the sensation that this guy has done anything more than throw >the first and completely uninteresting string of metaphors down on the >page?
>
>And I will certaintly speak for myself. I'm sure the actual Stuart Blazer >is a wonderful guy, really friendly, kind to animals and head of the >local chapter of domestic abuse survivors. But if this is what he writes, >then he should stick to writing newspaper columns for his friends back home >who would be alternately shocked, upset and titilated by the stories he >can tell. Not poetry.
>
>I'm just missing the aesthetic experience of appriciating the poem here,

>Henry, is the problem. It's reportage dressed up a little and with linebreaks.
>Perhaps this exhange should end here, since it's hard to argue someone >into an aesthetic position; you think I'm a philistine or a brute, I >have my own opinions about your taste.
>

I think what I like about Blazer's poem is its simplicity and directness in addressing THE big traditional subject in poetry, while putting it in the framework of a sestina (in case you hadn't noticed while you scanned his "prose", the sestina puts him back in the matrix of (post) Provencal Italian renaissance poetry; his concluding line is a take-off on the last line of Dante's "Inferno"). He's not trying to be cute, he's not trying to be postmodern; I don't find the prose boring, just fairly graceful in the way it moves through the stanzas. I sent it in because it was so clearly "about" love and succeeds in that way, as opposed to addressing the ponderous socio-political questions of "self" which appear to be more important than the issues of "love" on this thread about love poetry; an emphasis which seems so parochially American-academic (of about 8 years ago). There is so much real poetry out there, past and present, in English and other languages, which is the living tradition itself and which overshadows these vague philosophical conundrums which are definitely a sub-subset of style. Love poetry will always be around; but to measure it by our own musings on the ontology of "self" seems misplaced. Sure, the philosophical issues are important; but maybe it would be good to start with some poetry. I know that's exactly what Patrick Durgin did & was trying to do in starting this discussion & I'm sorry once again to have this blown out of proportion, so now I will be quiet, let lurkers chirp.

Re: your fantasies about Stuart Blazer: he's been writing & teaching poetry for decades, going along his own path in his own way, very much out of the mainstream, very talented. He had an interesting sort of Poundian poem about a trip to Morocco in Nedge #4. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

284. sylvester pollet
Re: The Oldest English Text
Fri 10 Jul 1998

So it's the knife of a cutpurse or highwayman (did they have highwaypersons in 400 A.D.?) who called his/her knife "Beg Not"?

At 12:59 AM -0400 7/10/98, Alan J.J.N. Sondheim wrote:
>-
>
>

>The Oldest English Text
>
>
>(From The Oldest English Texts, Henry Sweet, The Early English Text >Society, 1885, reprinted Oxford, 1966)
>
>On the Thames Knife, 400-500 AD:
>
>
> Beagnoth
>
>
>Note that 'th' is the letter _thorn._ Beag, crown, ring.
>
>Inscription from Sandwich, Kent, 428-597 AD:
>
> Raehaebul
>
>(Proper name?)
>
>
>_____

↑ Index

285. Joe Amato/Kass Fleisher

Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)

Fri 10 Jul 1998

geez, i hate to sound in the least aloof or condescending, but two poets quarreling over what constitutes the proper? approach to a love poem... wow... i mean, i find the exchange fascinating, simon and henry, but you needn't be so much at each other, right?...

there's just so much to say, no?... depending on my mood, i like cummings's stuff (sorry!), i like donne too, barrett browning, creeley and mayer---the usual suspects, incl. the bard hisself... this is english of course, which may not be the best language for that sentiment---depending muchly too, i suppose, on how you've experienced said sentiment, which seems for some folks to be a matter of being unsentimental, or unsentimental being... i might have said "i prefer---"

but i'm tempted here to pull a bit against the perceived registers, and say that sentiment too has its place---direct, unabashed "i luv u" sentiment... provided, of course, we all keep our wits about us...

anyway, hey---absence makes the heart grow fonder? and we're all about to be unplugged for a s p e l l, so/// love & kisses, joe

↑ Index

286. Charles Bernstein

Al Cook

Fri 10 Jul 1998

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) - Albert Cook, a Brown University professor who published more than 20 books and plays, died Tuesday of cardiac arrhythmia and coronary artery disease. He was 72.

The scholar of comparative literature, classics and English wrote criticism, poetry, plays and textbooks.

He taught at the University of California, Western Reserve University and the State University of New York at Buffalo before going to Brown in 1978.

* Forrest Gander just sent this sad news to me. Cook was the key figure in initially bringing poets, and not incidentally, poetics to SUNY-Buffalo, hiring Creeley, Olson, Weiners and many others and envisioning an English department where poets and fiction writers would teach literature, rather than creative writing, to undergraduates and graduates. Cook founded the UB English department, and taught there from 1963-1968. He was the author of over 20 books of criticism and 8 books of poetry, and the translator of Oedipus Rex and The Odyssey.

Among his most recent books are Canons and Wisdoms (University of Pennsylvania Press), Temporalizing Space: The Triumphant Strategies of Piero della Francesco (Peter Lang), and a collection of poetry, Modes (Mellon). Other books include: An Anthology Of Greek Tragedy, The Burden Of Prophecy: Poetic Utterance In The Prophets Of The Old Testament, Canons and Wisdoms, Changing The Signs: The Fifteenth-Century Breakthrough, The Dark Voyage and the Golden Mean; A Philosophy of Comedy, Enactment: Greek Tragedy, Figural Choice in Poetry and Art, French Tragedy: The Power Of Enactment, History/Writing, The Meaning of Fiction, Modulars: Poems, Myth and Lanugage, Progressions and Other Poems, The Reach of Poetry, The Root of The Thing; A Study of Job and The Song of Songs, Shakespeare's Enactment: The Dynamics of Renaissance Theatre, The Stance Of Plato, Thresholds: Studies In The Romantic Experience, and Soundings: On Shakespeare, Modern Poetry, Plato, and Other Subjects.

↑ Index

287. Douglas Barbour

Re: Where's Eliot when we need him?

Fri 10 Jul 1998

<<"An interesting question, but one that seems to miss some points. One of which Gwynn responded to, & I agree with him"

<DENIRO>You talkin' to me? Huh? You talkin' to me?</DENIRO> If you mean me, with one n, I am a "her." But I'll take the agreement anyway.>>

Oops! Pardon me, but my fingers almost never get things right the first time. Sorry.

About that ol' Possum being absent so presently in Poems...:

It is possible that R & J could have included a short poem, say "Morning at the Window" or, even better, 'Hysteria," but I think it's obvious that for their purposes "The Waste Land" is the poem that counts -- and it would have been prohibitively expensive, warping the anthology they were dreaming way out of whack. For me, the poem IS there, & Is invoked in such a way as to be recognized as the part of the necessary experimentation of early modernism it so obviously is.

I would suspect that Heaney & Hughes got him because their anthology was published by Faber & (I would guess) by Eliot's US publisher. Of course, their anthology (ies?) is (are) attempting something very different from Poems 1 & 2.

Hey, what I think Jordan may be missing is that a lot of us 'guys' really appreciate all those women poets & moreover even learn from them as well as from the men. Contra Bloom, I have no problems with my forbears, & am more than happy to celebrate the mothers as well as the fathers -- God knows they taught me well...

Douglas Barbour (h) [403] 4363320 (b) [403]
[redacted]
Department of English
University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta Canada T6G 2E5

> By stress and syllable
> by change-rhyme and contour
> we let the long line pace equal awkward to its period.

The short line
we refine
and keep for candor.

Robert Duncan

↑ Index

288. sylvester pollet
aldon/hotel/nyc
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Sorry, I lost the message so will have to do this on the big board, but then it might be of general interest. There's a very sweet hotel in NYC called Larchmont Hotel, 27 W. 11th St., heart of the village, just off Fifth Ave. It's run like a European place, & is usually full of French speakers, etc. singles $60. & 70., doubles $85. & 90., which includes continental breakfast, use of umbellas, etc. Baths down the hall, two for each wing of 5 rooms, which is one reason it's cheap. But super safe/clean/friendly. Rates I'm giving are as of spring. Tel. [redacted], fax [redacted]. I have the brochure in front of me, so if you want more info back-channel. My wife stayed there in March, loved it. Bon voyage! Sylvester

↑ Index

289. Gary Sullivan
I've always wanted to use the word "crustaceans" in a post. Jackpot!
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Do crustaceans have rights?

On Friday, July 10, 1998 11:50 AM, Jordan Davis [SMTP:[redacted]] wrote:
> If language is alive,
> does language have rights?

↑ Index

290. Jordan Davis
missing lots
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Douglas --

I miss lots. They build their butts.

If language is alive,
does language have rights?

If William Carlos Williams was a male gazer, are his readers leading the league in rushing?

The brackets are always male.
I said female brackets

and for this they say I mock young women.
Is there any thought in American poets?

Is for

↑ Index

291. William Marsh
Re: Eng/Poetry/899
Fri 10 Jul 1998

---

this guy's a riot!

At 06:24 PM 7/9/98 -0400, you wrote:
> Now children. Let me explain. Tristan Tzara > was Tristan Tzara. Paul Celan was Paul Celan.
> Paul Celan was a poet. HE was also a translator.
>
> T.S. Eliot was a great great poet. He also > was a translator. But now, children,
>
> Oh shhh. Be quiet back there. Yes, yes. I know,
>
> Cd made a typo, oh oh how terrible!
>
> The Waste Land.
>
> Millennium.
>
>
> There we go. yes, children we don't want to fuse those nouns
>
> or adjectives.... Now , children, let me explain.
>
> T.S. Eliot was not St. John Perse.
>
> So the pome[not a typo but an Irishism]
>
> is Not by Mr. Eliot.
>

> However.
>
> I respect Douglas Barbour enough to see that a discourse
>
> could arise out of this polemic.
>
> However on the other hand, this anthology's missing Poet > makes me think that It is > like publishing an Anthology of
>
> North American Poesie and not Including
>
> Irving Layton. OR Gregory Corso. say. Or scores of others.
>
> Of course I admire the anthos Millennium as a whole
>
> But it is a whole with a ver Big Missing Part.
>
> Maybe I am wrong and the absence only Proves How Giant > and gigantic the presence of Eliot's poetry still retains.
> O O O that rage that rage 'agin' the great...
>
> of poetasters and small time readers, would be poets
>
> and could a be poets...
>
> Which is what Harold Bloom does in his funny little list
>
> at the back of the Western Canon.
>
> Now BLoom is a critic and makes no claim to be avant-garde,
>
> marginal, or whatever .
>
> But he does, in spite of his great personal distaste
>
> for Eliot include Eliot in his list of books.
>
> I would say generosity would have been in Order
>
> in the anthology edited by Rothenberg and Joris.
>

> In earlier anthologies of Rothenberg Eliot
>
> is represented as he should be.
>
> Well children, you know Poets are always fighting.
>
> yes, its terrible terrible.
>
> yes, I remember when I met that friend of your father's
>
> and Mister Eliot had tea and he spoke so softly
>
> so much that grandma cld. barely hear him
>
> then he recited those last lines about the mermaids
>
> and the waves rolling back
>
>
> now that was a pleasure.
>
> Yes, a fine one indeed.
>
>
> End Game.
>
> 'Nam Sibyllam quidem Cumis ergo ipse oculis > meis vidi in ampulla pendere et cum illi pueri dicerent....
>
> Hurry Up Please Hurry Up Please
>
>
> to quote William Burroughs quoting T.S. Eliot.
>
>
> That Dada Strain. Don't ya just love it.
>
>
> I do. I love that book.
>
> Sami Rosenstock meets T.S. Eliot.
>

> in 1920 Ithink it was Tzara sent some poetry to Eliot.
>
> Eliot turned it down.
>
> So it goes. Tzara did very well anyhow.
>
> Tzara and Tom.
>
> Two expatriates..
>
> Meet for Tea in Heavenly Poetic Seminar Room
>
> and discuss meters and meaning.
>
>
>
> Sagacity, Sagacity, Dada Dada.
>
> He do the Poets in Different Voices.
> I like to hear it lap the miles.
>
>
> The sound of money and poetry makes the world go round.
>
> Ah yes, la poesie et l'argent.
>
>
> and Love.
>
>
> Oh . So we read the poetry finally.
>
>
>
>
>

- -
William Marsh | PaperBrainPress
http://bmarsh.dtai.com
- -

↑ Index

292. Simon DeDeo

Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)

Fri 10 Jul 1998

First off, thanks for a civilized reply; the e-mail
I sent off last night was over the top. You're right, of course, that a love poem is about "love" first, and the self second; and I certainly don't think that poetry should be in the business of posing, riddle-like, philosophical questions that critics try to answer.
On the other hand, remember that "vague philosophical conundrums" have motivated a large amount of poetry.

I still am not a fan of Blazer's poem -- something essential, fundamental, still seems to be missing for me; but let that rest.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

> I think what I like about Blazer's poem is its simplicity and directness in addressing THE big traditional subject in poetry, while putting it in the framework of a sestina (in case you hadn't noticed while you scanned his "prose", the sestina puts him back in the matrix of (post) Provencal Italian renaissance poetry; his concluding line is a take-off on the last line of Dante's "Inferno"). He's not trying to be cute, he's not trying to be postmodern; I don't find the prose boring, just fairly graceful in the way it moves through the stanzas. I sent it in because it was so clearly "about" love and succeeds in that way, as opposed to addressing the ponderous socio-political questions of "self" which appear to be more important than the issues of "love" on this thread about love poetry; an emphasis which seems so parochially American-academic (of about 8 years ago). There is so much real poetry out there, past and present, in English and other languages, which is the living tradition itself and which overshadows these vague philosophical conundrums which are definitely a sub-subset of style. Love poetry will always be around; but to measure it by our own musings on the ontology of "self" seems misplaced. Sure, the philosophical issues are important; but maybe it would be good to start with some poetry. I know that's exactly what Patrick Durgin did & was trying to do in starting this discussion & I'm sorry once again to have this blown out of proportion, so now I will be quiet, let lurkers chirp.

↑ Index

293. Gary Sullivan

Kerenyi's use of "opposite"

Fri 10 Jul 1998

Everyone:

Reading Carl Kerenyi's _Dionysos, the Archetypal Image of Indestructible Life_ this weekend near Woodstock (trees! streams! no constant low-level hum of electricity! lots of free marijuana!) I ran across this pretty wonderful passage on Cretan / Minoan art ... but, now I have a question & thought maybe someone could help me out, either posting here or backchannel: What does Kerenyi mean here by "opposite"? I'm totally baffled, have read it to a couple poet friends & roommate Chris, and, well, we can't figure it out. PLEASE help!!!

--Gary

Cretan art ignored the terrifying distance between the human and the transcendent which may tempt man to seek a refuge in abstraction and to create a form for the significant remote from space and time; it equally ignored the glory and futility of single human acts, time-bound, space-bound. In Crete artists did not give substance to the world of the dead through an abstract of the world of the living, nor did they immortalize proud deeds or state a humble claim for divine attention in the temples of the gods. Here and here alone the human bid for timelessness was disregarded in the most complete acceptance of the grace of life the world has ever known. For life means movement and the beauty of movement was woven in the intricate web of living forms which we call "scenes of nature"; was revealed in human-bodies acting their serious games, inspired by a transcendent presence, acting in freedom and restraint, unpurposeful as cyclic time itself." --this section is actually a direct quote from H.A. Groenewegen-Frankfort, from her book _Arrest and Movement_ ... then Kerenyi says: "Minoan art fully justifies this negative characterization--negative from the standpoint of man as center, as the vehicle of his own historical and non-historical glory, but not from the standpoint of the deity, whose presence it demands and requires. Man is always on the edge of this epiphany of the spirit--the spirit or spirits of life and nature--if not face to face with it. In this view an intimation of the godhead could be manifested not only in a swarm of insects, in birds, or in the beasts of the sea, but also in a human gesture, and it could in turn determine man's gestures. ... here I am speaking not of cult gestures side by side with other equally characteristic gestures of simple human existence, but of the gesture which time and time again, in different forms of movement, represents the identical situation of man: his non-central position which demands an "opposite" and can be understood only as an "opposite." ..."

PS: Some of you will note that this book wasn't on my list of summer "plan-to-read"s. So, why am I reading it & not the "planned" books? A confession: I am a really, really, really bad planner ...

↑ Index

294. Elizabeth Treadwell romantic-not women duelling
Fri 10 Jul 1998

> What is the love poem, anyway? If you move it far enough away from the Romantic notions of self, would people still recognize it and respond to it as such?

this part intrigues me. I have been wanting to post about an article on Gertrude Stein that was in a fairly recent New Yorker (excuse me!) wherein the author gave a very psychological reading of the lady's life and work. saying she only wrote 'that way' cause she was scared of her own psychology. and how V Woolf considered Stein a "generational failure".
my questions:
how is psychology (self?) framed?
is there a new way into interiority? (i expect an immediate and foolproof response) does anyone else love the flatness of Stein's characterization (no i must be the only one) like the repetition in Ada?
why must Woolf and Stein be opposed in this critical/gossip history? is their a way to integrate?
(and i know they didn't BOND in REAL LIFE)

excuse me. the New Yorker disturbed me.

ps i just must say that bitterish reference to 'poetry of young women' and the Possibility of a trajectory (anthology) framed by women's writing sounds a bit HYSTERICAL!

Elizabeth Treadwell
Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
PO Box 9013
Berkeley, Ca
94709
http://users.lanminds/com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

295. Simon DeDeo

Re: Kerenyi's use of "opposite"

Fri 10 Jul 1998

> *... here I am speaking not of cult gestures side by side with other equally characteristic gestures of simple human existence, but of the gesture which time and time again, in different forms of movement, represents the identical situation of man: his non-central position which demands an "opposite" and can be understood only as an "opposite." ..."*

Kerenyi seems to be making a lot of his argument through visual analogy; man is moved from the center of the Minoan/Cretan attention, but since man (according to K) will by default place himself in the center (geocentric, heliocentric...) of the universe, the decentering must introduce a second element of equal or greater importance to remove the asymmetry. This is the "opposite", towards which, it seems, man is making his gesture; because the tendency to anthropcentrism is so strong, this "opposite" is important only in as much as it alters this fundamental parameter of life.

It is a well written passage; I'm not sure if it holds together, however -- K seems to be somewhat amazed at the conclusion of his thesis, and wants to retract some of the apparent strangeness of the Minoans by understanding their art as a spiritual geometric modification of the Western Renaissance.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

296. Charles Alexander

Re: romantic-not women duelling

Fri 10 Jul 1998

> does anyone else love the flatness of Stein's characterization (no i must be the only one)

No, you're certainly not the only one. Many love it. It too is a landscape, and one certainly of love, at times.

> why must Woolf and Stein be opposed in this critical/gossip history?

because we (the vague overwhelming general pronoun here) seem to love simplicities, dualities. Someone (and the New Yorker is more than sometimes complicit in this) seems to want a nice packaged one-flavor modernism. There may be a sexist thing going on here, too -- let's not admit both such women into this company -- but that's somewhere way behind the scenes.

> excuse me. the New Yorker disturbed me.

In the last bunch of years I've been disturbed, as I would imagine many have, by characterizations of Stein and/or her work in the New Yorker, the New York Times, and other large cultural/media organs of information dissemination, sometimes this dismissal by hack journalists, sometimes by a more 'realistic' writer such as Cynthia Ozick -- here I am reminded of Hejinian and other's notion that "realism too is an '-ism.'" Disturbed often enough that I just can't pay that much attention to the Stein naysayers anymore.

So I then go back to Stein and her work.
and maybe it's not so flat.
maybe it's round:

> This is a little a scene.
> Just when will they go by adapting.
> Nor may they be merrily there. To share.
> Justly. In why.
> It is a round movement this. Because. Declared.
> For it. It is. A Wonder. Because. They. Were. Spared.
> Might it be agreeable if it were a mistake.

I guess what disturbs me most about all who would throw out Stein, flat or round, is just that I have a hard time imagining that people's first take on Stein is not simply finding that her work is so agreeable.

flat or round with approval of new yorker or not and without casting out virginia woolf, either -- the flatness or roundness can accomodate both, and more.

charles
charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

297. Michael Franco

BOSTON ALTERNATIVE POETRY CONFERENCE AKA POETSTOCK 98

Fri 10 Jul 1998

M. Franco here for Aaron Kiely's BOSTON ALTERNATIVE POETRY CONFERENCE: BLACKSMITH HOUSE, CAMBRIDGE MA. [HARVARD SQUARE]

FRI-SUN JULY 17-19 1998.

READERS/PRESENTERS:

BERNSTEIN, MESSERLI, TAGGART, MATLIN, TORRA, MLINKO, LANSING, F. HOWE, R. WALDROP, BOUCHARD, WARSH, JARNOT, BANSINSKI, GANICK, W. ALEXANDER, PREAVALLET, FUNKHOUSER, ZHANG ER, DOUD, LEASE, L. SCHWARTZ, D. GARDNER, KRUKOWSKI, STROFFOLINO,BURGER, W HOWE, GRUMNAN, BRADY, POUND, KRAMER, KNOX, WARSH, S. COLE, B. ANDERSON, GILMORE, KIELEYWERSHLER-HENRY, KIRSCHENBAUM, KRAMER, SCALAPINO, FRANCO,

FRIDAY JULY 17

READING: 7:30
INTRODUCTION TO THE WEEKEND: w/ KIELY, SCHWARTZ & ALEXANDER

NIGHT READING:
F. HOWE D. BOUCHARD, GARDNER & STROFFOLINO

SAT JULY 18- 9: 30AM
VOCABULARY AND IMIGINATIONS: PANAL W/ MESSERLLI, ALEXANDER, SCHWARTZ, MATLIN, KIELEY, LEASE, MLINKO & FRANCO

12:00 READING W/ TORRA, LANSING, MLINKO, LEASE, & KRUKOWSKI & SCALAPINO & KIELY

2PM: BIOGRAPHY & CRITCISM PANAL: W/ PREVALLET ON HELEN ADAM... JARNOT ON DUNCAN, ALEXANDER ON LAMANTIA TAGGART ON OPPEN, KNOX ON KOCH & ASHBERY, KIRSCHENBAUM ON d.a.levy, GILMORE ON OPPENHEIMER.

4PM AFTERNOON READING W/ TAGGART, KNOX, SCHWARTZ, ZHANG ER, FUNKHOUSER, KNOX, ANDERSON,BRADY, S.COLE

6PM DAVID MATLIN ON HIS NEW BOOK

7PM NIGHT READING: WARSH, JARNOT, MATLIN, ALEXANDER

SUNDAY JULY 19

10AM NEW POETRY PANEL PRESENTED & ORGANIZED BY BASINSKI w/ KRAMER, BRADY, BURGER, W.HOWE, WERSHLER-HENRY, GRUMMAN & POUND

2PM AFTERNOON READING: WALDROP, MESSERLI, DOUD & FRANCO

4PM PUBLISHING PANAL: W/ TORRA, MESSERLI, BOUCHARD, GANICK, KIRCHENBAUM, FUNKHOUSER

7PM NIGHT READING PREAVALLET, GANICK

8PM CHARLES BERNSTEIN POETRY & POETICS

ADMISSIONS:
$5/reading, $15/saturday pass, $10/sunday pass,
$35/weekend-people can reserve their space now through email or phone and then pay at the conference- checks payable to aaron kiely at p.o.box 441517 somerville, ma 02144-INFORMATION / RESERVATIONS:

Aaron Kiely
PO box 441517
Somerville Ma 02144
or Email [redacted]

BEST TO ALL ON THE LIST
MICHAEL FRANCO

↑ Index

298. Chicago Review

New Chicago Review

Fri 10 Jul 1998

The latest issue of Chicago Review (vol. 44, no. 2) is now out, and might be of interest to subscribers to this list. Contents include:

--A long essay by John Taggart entitled "Walk-Out: Rereading George Oppen."

--Poetry by Linh Dinh, Martin Corless-Smith, John Koethe, Colin Simms, Paul Vangelisti, Catherine Wagner, Bill Griffiths, Jody Gladding, and Ronald Johnson.

--Reviews of Peter Cole, Jeff Clark, Ted Hughes, and Louis Zukofsky, with commentary on Poems for the Millennium and Millennial Evenings at the White House.

This issue can be found in bookstores, or ordered directly for $6. Subscriptions are $15 to Poetics List members. Please reply via e-mail or US mail to the address below.

Forthcoming in June: Poetry by Mark Salerno, Matthew Rohrer, Greg Miller, Peter Dale Scott, and many others, as well as a special section on Basil Bunting's biography

Our Web site is currently being updated.

Thank you.

Devin Johnston
Poetry Editor, Chicago Review
5801 S. Kenwood Ave.
Chicago IL 60637-1794 ph/fax [redacted]
e-mail [redacted]

↑ Index

299. ken|n|ing
Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Henry, I should clarify, perhaps. The discussion is not so a-historical, as I see it. By bringing up the Schwitters piece, I meant to begin to consider what "love" is (which pretty obviously calls the "self" into question continuously and in very palpable ways) and how the poem which includes it, comments upon it, can be of service to one's personal history. Love is not what it used to be when I first read the poem in high school. Neither am I, my"self". Todd's comments are welcomed, and I pretty much agree. For all of Da-da poetics's supposed nihilism, this poem is remarkably both dismissive and celebratory. It might be interesting to hear from those reading Watten, to come at these issues from "Bad History"'s trajectory. What that is, I'm still discovering.
Patrick F. Durgin

|
|

k e n n i n g``````````````|```````````````````````````````
a newsletter of contemporary |poetry, poetics, and non-fiction writing
|418 Brown St. #10 Iowa City, IA 52245 USA

On Thu, 9 Jul 1998, henry wrote:

> Couldn't disagree more. But I'm tired of playing the spoiler shutter-downer of conversations in an alternate universe. My response: let the intellectuals work out the intellectual boundaries of the self. It's all sub-poetry.
> This discussion is a-historical in a strictly POETIC HISTORY sense.
> Forget about the "self". Try to understand what "love" might be. Then you might take a new tack on the love poem. Start with some Montale, for example. And if you call me Elitist, I will call you a Black Shirt.
> - Henry Gould
> ----------Original message----------
> that Schwitters was writing--from bits and scraps of paper--and really writing--to my mind--about the "self"--evident in the line
>
> > Thou thee thee thine, I thine, thou mine, we?
> > That (by the way) is beside the point
>
> and that romantic ideology is really an investigation of the idea of "self"--that Scwitters was amazed by the notion of (him)self and the notion of an art form that negated the central parity as self--is amazing..and yr question, really, it seems, is not what to do with the love poem per se, but what to do with the slef...Love poem as epistolary to the self, really.
>
> and the love poem as "petty bourgeous sentimentality...is made fun of...(Werner Schmalenbach...in response to the immeidate "hit" of the poem's publication)
>
> and that language /the self trying to produce it--gets all messed up--tangled--in love--so that the real drive behind the poem--is language's self--which exists?
>
> "Ich--------liebre------Dir!"
>
> Todd Baron

↑ Index

300. Mark Prejsnar
Tumbling into existence
Fri 10 Jul 1998

On Fri, 10 Jul 1998 [redacted] wrote:

> I still crave a polemical collection that if it dare not dispense with the editorial introduction, will somehow tell me a surprising story about where and how and why and when poetry tumbles into existence.

Why not write one yourself??

If the rhetoric, analysis, metaphors, that are dominating discussion seem unuseful to ya, or questionable, why not develop your own analysis that'll show us what you think really does need to be said? It would certainly be the best way to explain (and argue compellingly for) your feeling that these other accounts are inadequate.

The point about spatial metaphors is a good one. Important too. Natch, we've gone around on that one on the List more than once before (as you probably remember also)...but without i hasten to add settling anything. As part of one of those earlier threads, i explained my violent opposition to the term "avant-garde," pointing out that it's a military term that isn't helpful or relevant to the activities of poetry. (and of course it carries its own spatial logic, one of advancing armies meeting at a frontline area for combat, rather then of center and periphery...) But i dislike and object to all the rest of 'em as well..

One of the problems is that, perhaps a whole cognitive realignment will be needed, before people stop talking center & periphery. On the other hand (and even more problematically) maybe it will take a complete realignment of the economy, the publishing, distribution and teaching institutions themselves. I mean, there is a reason that spatial metaphors appeal so to people and it ain't just lack of imagination..When the main teaching anthologies contain as much Stein or Zukofsky as Richard Wilbur and Robert Lowell, spatial metaphors of exclusion and clash won't occur so readily to people who know the former are more interesting than the latter...

The post i read just before yours, about the "psychopathology" attack on Stein, is (to use an appropriate word) symptomatic. That is just the umpteenth recycling of the infamous attack on her during her career by BF Skinner.

So, here is one story (sorry it's not more surprising): poetry tumbles into existence, but like people making history in marx's famous phrase, it doesn't tumble into existence just however it pleases: it does so in circumstances it didn't choose, in a fallen world of workshops and Possumless anthologies and listservs.....

mark prejsnar

↑ Index

301. HENRY GOULD
Re: Tumbling into existence
Fri 10 Jul 1998

I like Gary Roberts' thoughts on this & would suggest an anthology based on a filter of style understood in terms of certain categories. Set aside the conflict-of-interested literary maneuvering: set aside a chronological approach except within the terms of the defined style parameters.

Example: taking off on something Simon Dedeo said about romanticism, make an anthology based on a kind of realism/nominalism spectrum, where realism would be understood as foregrounding "objective description" - Pound's imagism, no-idears-button-things, the Objectivists, the whole anti-personal "epic" thrust of 20th-cent poetry. At the other end of the spectrum would be poetry which "objectifies" itself as object (the Objectivists sort of were planted at the cusp of this position), leading maybe to language poetry etc. This end would include poetry valorized also by the New Critics. Then you'd do another anthology of the subjective/informal stream, which is just as important. & you'd be surprised at the confusion of "mainstream/marginal" and "innovative/traditionalist" categories...

Maybe the millennium antho does this, I don't know.

Another anthology: the generic buddy anthology, entitled Me & My Gang - which would only include real gang members and would have to define its poetics in a forthright & complete manner & not include any of their noble forebears or purported Ancestors in Genius.

- Henry G

↑ Index

302. groberts
Other introductions
Fri 10 Jul 1998

I just finished reading Richard Caddell and Peter Quartermain's intro to their forthcoming anthology Other British and Irish Poetry since 1970, as currently given at Jacket#4. Having read a number of anthology intros over the years, I was not surprsied to recognize these latest historical narratives and critical syllogisms: they are familiar.

But what would an anthologist's rhetoric of contemporaneity be like if she or he were not to use the spatial metaphor "center/periphery" nor the diction of "mainstream," "other," and "margin"?

These narratives, syllogisms, metaphors, and dictions are assumed to have efficacy; they organize and reveal and overcome x, y, and z. They also can bore.

I still crave a polemical collection that if it dare not dispense with the editorial introduction, will somehow tell me a surprising story about where and how and why and when poetry tumbles into existence.

Since a few of the poets named in the introduction participate on this list from time to time, perhaps they might weigh in on The Way To Introduce Anthologized Poetry.

Must I always pass through the same gate presided over by the same authorities in order to reach your poems?

Gary R.

↑ Index

303. Jordan Davis
why I love country music & poetics (artist of the floating womb)
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Henry --

When you say you don't know whether the Millennium anthology(ies) does this is it because you haven't cracked it yet? Eh? Ask Blarnes, I saw him thumbing (his nose at) it a few weeks ago in the Cold War Bookshop in Oswego.

O we can make theories
about what it is not,
we can make theories
for thought and for not
I mean I don't think that's theory exactly, to talk about a book without READING
it

and you know I care for you Henry so don't take that badly

Barrett Watten well, I guess I'm with Ben Friedlander liking Watten's paradoxical position of attacking totalization by means of totalizing discourse .. and I am starting to see the charming vulnerability .. Bad History p.43 "there occurs a moment when EVEN I [my caps] can sum up an experience" ... that the anecdotal is being attacked here doesn't make me giggle less to think of EVERY SINGLE SENTENCE in the book thus far as such a summation. Is anybody else thinking MINIMA MORALIA as they read this? So far the only one I get stuck on the wrong side of is "To Elsie" -- hence my crustacean-inducing post -- what's anybody's favorite literature on what the tradition of male gaze lyric poetry does to things, people, poetry, etc?

Not mocking, drowning,
Is for

↑ Index

304. Gary Sullivan
Blurbs in Everyday Life
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Gary Roberts asked: "Must I always pass through the same gate presided over by the same authorities in order to reach you...?" Gary? Let me introduce an idea I've been toying with for the last ten minutes:

Blurbs in Everyday Life

Roommate Chris Stroffolino shares his condiments and ground coffee like an angel-headed Daffy Duck trying to break through the cartoon world into a rigorously codified "everyday life." Lease-bound, currently employed, Stroffolino doesn't mix plastics with glass or newspaper, preferring Lefebvre's space to Bachelard's. "I'm going/ out/ with Rachel/ tonight," Stroffolino urges, with such insistence you have no choice but to believe him. If roommates are the "unacknowledged legislators of the Chore Wheel," Stroffolino's broad sweeping gestures "clean up the house," like they say. The legitimate heir of Brent Sunderland.

Non-romantic Female Friend Fatimah Tuggar returns all calls within the hour with the insistence and urgency of a thousand ringing telephones, and expects you to do the same. Tuggar never lets you forget she's every bit the Leo that you are. Whether sharing the new Wilt Stillman movie on 19th & Broadway or eating Indian food at Panna II, no other Non-romantic Female Friend so openly & fully articulates the "why" of "Men Basically Suck"--or is as eager to hear about your own sexual frustration. Taking her cues from previous NrFFs such as Maria Damon and Pamela Z, Tuggar offers the perfect blend of ideas, emotion, experience and, that crucial but too-often missing element in M/F relationships: humor. If it weren't for the occasional awkward moment of sexual tension, you'd admit it without hesitation or stuttering: "You're really my best friend." Highly recommended.

Workmates Brenda Iijima and Elizabeth Caine team up during break periods to offer you a choice: Smoking or non? Whether sharing poems, or griping about the office tattle-tale, Iijima and Caine offer empathy, support and the mutually held conviction that all dead-end jobs, including this one, exist for these moments tenderly held together. "Fifteen minutes with you," Smiths frontman Morrissey once whined, "Ooooh, I wouldn't say no" ? and neither will you. How could you?

Estranged Best Friend Erik Belgum's recent e-mails urge the reader toward reconciliation, reconnection. The poignancy of "Maybe someday we can talk about it" juxtaposed side-by-side with good-natured jokes about the arrogance of, say, Richard Kostelanetz, imply that connection still exists, however tenuous. Though lacking the depth of its previous incarnation, the surface of this relationship shimmers with the brilliant light of possibility reflecting off the shards of all our earlier lives. Who was it--Heidegger?--no, maybe Adorno ? well, it doesn't really matter, I don't even remember the quote itself. Belgum is making a comeback, determined to take the stage with Stroffolino, Tuggar, Iijima, Caine and others. Can you spell A-n-t-h-o-l-o-g-y o-f N-e-w A-m-e-r-i-c-a-n F-r-i-e-n-d-s? What logically follows "A"? B, as in Belgum. Put him in yours.

Okay ... you get the idea ...

Yours,

Gary

↑ Index

305. louis stroffolino

Re: why I love country music & poetics (artist of the floating womb)

Fri 10 Jul 1998

Drown on, drown on, Davis, Sullivan!
(oh what rhythm! what GESTURE! what crust.. systole diastole)
(are you on vacation jordan this week just asking) Gary says that Gerald Burns has a poem on watching strippers in the cold war bookshop which might be an answer post it, post on, (oh float on by the floaters the drifters the spinners the tops taps

Izza 4?

On Fri, 10 Jul 1998, Jordan Davis wrote:

> Henry --
>
> When you say you don't know whether the Millennium anthology(ies) does this is it because you haven't cracked it yet? Eh? Ask Blarnes, I saw him thumbing (his nose at) it a few weeks ago in the Cold War Bookshop in Oswego.

> O we can make theories
> about what it is not,
> we can make theories
> for thought and for not
> I mean I don't think that's theory exactly, to talk about a book without > READING
> it
>
> and you know I care for you Henry so don't take that badly
>
> Barrett Watten well, I guess I'm with Ben Friedlander liking Watten's paradoxical position of attacking totalization by means of totalizing discourse .. and I am starting to see the charming vulnerability .. Bad History p.43 "there occurs a moment when EVEN I [my caps] can sum up an experience" ... that the anecdotal is being attacked here doesn't make me giggle less to think of EVERY SINGLE SENTENCE in the book thus far as such a summation. Is anybody else thinking MINIMA MORALIA as they read this? So far the only one I get stuck on the wrong side of is "To Elsie" -- hence my crustacean-inducing post -- what's anybody's favorite literature on what the tradition of male gaze lyric poetry does to things, people, poetry, etc?
>
> Not mocking, drowning,
> Is for

↑ Index

306. louis stroffolino

Re: Kerenyi's use of "opposite"

Fri 10 Jul 1998

---

or what does barthes mean when he "speaks" of mythical speech's "benumbed look"
(i think he means it as a kind of flattery).....
c

↑ Index

307. ken|n|ing

Re: why I love country music & poetics (artist of the floating womb)

Fri 10 Jul 1998

Jordan says: the charming vulnerability .. Bad History p.43 "there occurs a moment when EVEN I [my caps] can sum up an experience" ... that the anecdotal is being attacked here doesn't make me giggle less to think of EVERY SINGLE SENTENCE in the book thus far as such a summation.

And that's just it. "An Anna Blume" relishes the paradox. "Bad History" rues it. Still, the former is "about" love, the latter "about" politics.

Patrick F. Durgin

|
|
k e n n i n g``````````````|``````````````````````````
a newsletter of contemporary |poetry, poetics, and non-fiction writing
|418 Brown St. #10 Iowa City, IA 52245 USA

↑ Index

308. Henry Gould
Re: Blurbs in Everyday Life
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Henry Gould's endless endlessness is endlessly refined here as he rejoinders jovially to Jordan's quaint quips, as in his all-too-briefs lyric, "I Haven't Read It" in which he confesses to not having cracked either Millennium while sending-up the whole confused genre in the process cheese aisle while on a 20 min - no make that 30 - break from his jovial (did I use that word already today?) terminal nicknamed Terminal; as Rowena Fameuse flamed after skimming these gems with her pinky, "I'm - just - flab-flabbergasted!" And lest we forget - the book is FREE.

↑ Index

309. Michael Coffey
Other introductions -Reply
Fri 10 Jul 1998

gary r.: I too tire of staid introductions to anthologies (though i don't really like the anthology form that much, it is really someone else doing the work for you and putting such a spin on it, though sometimes, i know, they are all we can get), though i doubt i would find caddell's and quartermain's so; but jeez, man, work on your own, that's the ticket isn't it, even if you don't have a publisher asking YOU to cull a collection and write an intro, you might be surprised what could happen if you DID cull a selection and propose to introduce it as you say. how bout that?

i have to admit this, though, by way of a question: who published the C&Q anthology on Brits and mics?; in this case, there is so much irish stuff (at least) that is hard to find, or expensive i should say.... a howdy to Irishman Randolph Healey, whose work i hope is in that anthology, i think randolph is a fellow on this list. His Arbor Vitae is very interesting poem indeed, but only available in a chapbook.

And, gary r., i have to point out that yhou have complained about the center/periperhy dyad common to poetry introductions only to introduce your own about a gate, being outside it or inside it. as beckett says, "don't indict the words, they're no shoddier that what they peddle."

>>> UB Poetics discussion group 07/10/98 02:13pm >>>
I just finished reading Richard Caddell and Peter Quartermain's intro to their forthcoming anthology Other British and Irish Poetry since 1970, as currently given at Jacket#4. Having read a number of anthology intros over the years, I was not surprsied to recognize these latest historical narratives and critical syllogisms: they are familiar.

But what would an anthologist's rhetoric of contemporaneity be like if she or he were not to use the spatial metaphor "center/periphery" nor the diction of "mainstream," "other," and "margin"?

These narratives, syllogisms, metaphors, and dictions are assumed to have efficacy; they organize and reveal and overcome x, y, and z. They also can bore.

I still crave a polemical collection that if it dare not dispense with the editorial introduction, will somehow tell me a surprising story about where and how and why and when poetry tumbles into existence.

Since a few of the poets named in the introduction participate on this list from time to time, perhaps they might weigh in on The Way To Introduce Anthologized Poetry.

Must I always pass through the same gate presided over by the same authorities in order to reach your poems?

Gary R.

↑ Index

310. Robert Corbett
Not romantic, but drowning
Fri 10 Jul 1998

---

i just want to rant about the new yorker's article on stein which managed to be about as snidely dismissive as a positive article could be. the use of biography there could be well used in a course on the use and abuse of biography as a critical tool. obviously, the writer had no time for stein's experiments in language, but says rather that they were way to avoid confronting herself. i.e. stein should have written more like Kathryn Harrison. what this shows is that whatever poets understand by the terms "self" & "reality" today, the popular press clings to a victorian notion, with a soupcon of freud (or rather Ego-Psych). And it ain't pretty, as far i am concerned. i suppose when the new yorker publishes the occasional literary treacle, it provides an opportunity to vent spleen, or cancel a subscription, but it is rather worrying that newspapers of record (the Times), literary reviews (the Oxford Dons of the New York Review and the London Review), etc, cling to a premodern notion of literature. when faced with such frustration, i often agree with Blake that "That which can be made explicit to the idiot is not worth my care," but ultimately for the sake of literary culture, this is a very dire situation.

for instance, consider the preference for round over flat characters, as in the ritual complaint, "David Foster Wallace [or insert your favorite misread writer] creates programmatic characters, whom, for all the brilliance of their talk and the quirkiness of their actions, never come alive for this reader." This is patent nonsense. Characters in a novel, play, poem, are not alive--they are not dead either, but is a confusion about what it means to suspend disbelief. (After all, however much we believe in the Ancient Mariner, we don't expect to meet him at the grocery store). "Roundness", "Aliveness", etc, are the shibboleths of the rear guard of realism, firmly entrenched in literary journalism in america. it is an easily deconstructed binary (are Dickens' characters round or flat? Doestevksi? if they are flat, why do they seem alive), which designates not an argument, but the likes and dislikes of the reader. Parse the sentence above as "I don't like the characters of Wallace's fiction" and it makes sense.

such a distinction seems even more odd now, because the characters that are the most memorable in today's popular culture are cartoons (the Simpsons, King of the Hill), the gang on Seinfeld, and Mulder & Scully. The cartoons are flat by definition, while I dare say that the best episodes of Seinfeld are dadaistic riffs on the way we live now. the spate of columns that used Seinfeld as an index for the increasing meanness of the culture last year was hilarious, though it proved neither Quayle nor journalists understood Murphy Brown. as for Mulder & Scully, even their palpable attraction suggests not a rich inner life, but a knowing wink on the part of Chris Carter about eighties' narratives of opposites attracting, as well as the extradiegetic knowledge on our part that such a romance would mean the end of the X-Files. popular culture has become modern, even post-modern, while literary journalists subscribe to the outmoded fashions of realism, desiring coherence and straightforward plot, legible character and prosaic epiphanies. i'm not saying that such criticism should be censored or such works of art be banned--i love a juicy anachronism as much as the next person. i am saying that forget about the liberal bias of the press, let's talk about the realistic bias of literary reviewers.

here endeth the lecture (and i know i am preaching to the choir).

robert

On Fri, 10 Jul 1998, Elizabeth Treadwell wrote:

> What is the love poem, anyway? If you move it far enough away > from the Romantic notions of self, would people still recognize > it and respond to it as such?
>
> this part intrigues me. I have been wanting to post about an article on > Gertrude Stein that was in a fairly recent New Yorker (excuse me!) wherein > the author gave a very psychological reading of the lady's life and work.
> saying she only wrote 'that way' cause she was scared of her own psychology.
> and how V Woolf considered Stein a "generational failure".
> my questions:
> how is psychology (self?) framed?
> is there a new way into interiority? (i expect an immediate and foolproof > response)
> does anyone else love the flatness of Stein's characterization (no i must be > the only one)
> like the repetition in Ada?
> why must Woolf and Stein be opposed in this critical/gossip history? is > their a way to integrate?
> (and i know they didn't BOND in REAL LIFE)
>
> excuse me. the New Yorker disturbed me.
>
> ps i just must say that bitterish reference to 'poetry of young women' and > the Possibility of a trajectory (anthology) framed by women's writing sounds
> a bit HYSTERICAL!
>
> Elizabeth Treadwell
> Outlet, a periodical
> Double Lucy Books
> PO Box 9013
> Berkeley, Ca
> 94709
> http://users.lanminds/com/~dblelucy

Robert Corbett "you are there beyond/ tracings flesh can [redacted] take,/ and farther away surrounding and University of Washington informing the systems" - A.R. Ammons

↑ Index

311. R. Gancie and then the ones takin' the money
Fri 10 Jul 1998

"No one today hopes to conduct the psychology of the future in the vocabulary of the neurophysiologist , let alone that of a physicist, and principled ways of relaxing the classical "rules" of reduction have been proposed."---from The Intentional Stance by Daniel C. Dennett --- Then for all practical purposes, everyone takin' the money does exactly what Dennett claims they won't do, e.g. ground psychology in neuroscience, communication theory, AI, mathematics, engineering and, of course, physics. --- "A processing subsystem is characterized in terms of its function; it corresponds to a network or set of networks that maps an input and an output. Processing subsystems can be characterized more precisely as performing computations. A computation is a systematic mapping between interpretable inputs and outputs....The input can be interpreted as specifying quantities and a relation between them, and the output can be interpreted as specifying a quantity."---from Image and Brain by Stephen M. Kosslyn, Professor of PSYCHOLOGY at Harvard University---cp

↑ Index

312. Christian Roess
Re: Poems for the Millennium
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Professor CD says on 9 july:

> Now children. Let me explain. Tristan Tzara
> was Tristan Tzara. Paul Celan was Paul Celan.
> Paul Celan was a poet. HE was also a translator.
>
> T.S. Eliot was a great great poet. He also
> was a translator. But now, children,

A child, my fellow list-mate, could have figured out that T.S.Eliot has a poem in Volume 1 of_ Poems For The Millennium_. YOU however did not know this because you have a strategy and agenda which we are not privy to. A child, however , could figure out with very little assistance that T.S. Eliot signed his name to a translation of a St.-John Perse poem. A child however, would not be as convinced as you seem to be that Tristan Tzara is Tristan Tzara or Paul Celan is Paul Celan, etc. On some level CD I don't know what the HELL you are talking about. You are chattering , thinking your words say what they are saying. Meanwhile, A CHILD would be delighted by your non-sense AND still be able to turn one page . ONE PAGE, instead of trying to teach us "children" a lesson.

Ok. Well what about another lesson.

William Carlos Williams wrote this in an essay :

"Destruction according to the Babylonia order of creation, comes before creation. . . . We must be destructive first to free ourselves from forms accreting to themselves forms we despise. Where does the past lodge in the older forms? Tear it out." And

"to destroy the past is precisely a service to tradition".

Joseph Riddel writes:

"The destruction of historical forms, of the tyrannous designs (the "TEXTS") of history . . .

(ie. Anthologies, and doesn't this volume by Joris & Rothenberg have as one of its projects, to tear out and free itself from the dusty old notions about anthologies?)

. . . opens up rather than closes the possibility of signification and mandates the freedom that must be like the beginning".

In that sense this "anthology" is the best thing that could have happened to T.S. Eliot. It dusts off the old anthologized T.S.Eliot. But guess what? To re-configure Eliot into a counter-poetic tradition , we have to do the work instead of letting Harold Bloom do it for us. If we care, we have to find Eliot's poetry ourselves, and figure out for ourselves what that gaping hole on page 382 should be filled with, or even WHY it should be filled (depending on our mood: are we for or against inclusion? : both delighted and/or anguished by the absence?)

My last post got cut off 3 times in transmission. It was a digression on [1]feuding neighbors , [2]George Oppen's breakthrough year of 1966 , [3]mentioning(s) that some of the "absent poets" (ie T.S. Eliot or Jack Spicer) from the _Poems For The Millennium_ ARE included as translators and [4]a quote from Walter Benjamin's "Task of the Translator", which may be seen as situating the translator's task within the (to quote Giorgio Agamben) scission wherein "Criticism is born". An extreme point in Western culture situated where the word comes unglued from itself: " and it points, on the near or far side of that separation , toward a unitary status for the utterance".

OR:

Stated another way, my fellow-list mate CD, you DID NOT TURN the page, as any child could do and WOULD if the sophisticated adult in us would stay out of the picture. OK?

For example, show a child, still learning to read, the letters T-S-E-L-I-O-T, hand him Volume 1 of _ Poems For The Millennium_ , turn to page 382, tell the child to identify the Letters T-S-E-L-I-O-T, all in a row . Then say, my dear child TURN the page to 383. Good, that's correct these letters don't occur all in a row there. Ok, what about the next page? Oh, yes the letters T-S-E-L-I-O-T do occur on page 384. Very good . What's that you say? Yes, ok he is mentioned again on page 385. And you're only four years old?(I guess it just takes the CURIOSITY of child sometimes.)

That means, precious, that someone with those letters signed his name to a poem, changed the arrangement of the letters of French to an order in English.

You, however , CD can't turn the page. Or refused to. Ok it may be hard as an adult BUT : a child could do it. You possibly did not have hands when you wrote this on the 8 July:

> I find it very strange that this anthology Poems for the Millenium has not one poem by T.S. Eliot.

I am reminded of Michael Palmer's "Autobiography 3" :

Yes, I was born on the street known as Glass--as Paper, Scissors or Rock.

Several of my ancestors had no hands.

Several of my ancestors used their pens in odd ways.

Later on in "Autobiography 3" are these lines:

Once I bought an old boat.

I abandoned the tyrannical book of my dreams and wrote about dresses, jewels, furniture and menus

eight or ten times in a book of dreams.

It sets me to dreaming when I dust it off.

Our time is a between time; best to stay out of it.

To summarize :I'm not buying your old boat CD. Perhaps a poem by T.S. Eliot has too much dust on it right now. Joris and Rothenberg , by including "not one poem" have afforded those of us who care to, an opportunity to dust off a 'pome' by TSE so as to "re-contextualize" it in terms of a "counter-poetic" tradition.{ a tradition which "counters", or counter-memorizes the open tomb of Modernism, which is a double opening: the poetic resistance to history's closure.(Joseph Riddel's ideas in his book_ The Inverted Bell_ are being borrowed here) }.

T.S. Eliot has been abandoned to this open tomb of 'modernist practices', and tyrannical anthologies for too long, as Mark Scroggins points out in his post to the list yesterday. Therefore, the "real" T.S. Eliot may AND may not be a poem by St.-John Perse. (Although, you would be hard pressed to convince me that Eliot is or was an ancestor of mine with hands; or that he did have a hand in a translation, and EVEN used his pen. And I'm not talking metaphorically. He literally did not have hands. If you want my self-important explanation, please back channel). ie, I hate Eliot's "back-channeled" , less overt , form of anti-semitism. Less overt than Pound, that is.

This remark by Emmanuel Levinas in_ Nine Talmudic Readings_ seems crucial during this "between time":

"For we assume the permanence and the continuation of Israel and the unity of its self-consciousness throughout the ages. Finally, we assume the unity of the consciousness of mankind, claiming to be fraternal and one throughout time and space.It is Israel' history which has suggested this idea, even if mankind, now conscious of its oneness, allows itself to challenge Israel's vocation, its concrete universality. Does not antisemitism, a phenomenon unique in its kind, attest to its translogical nature?"

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

313. Christian Roess

Re: Poems for the Millennium

Fri 10 Jul 1998

Professor CD says on 9 july:

> Now children. Let me explain. Tristan Tzara
> was Tristan Tzara. Paul Celan was Paul Celan.
> Paul Celan was a poet. HE was also a translator.
>
> T.S. Eliot was a great great poet. He also
> was a translator. But now, children,

A child, my fellow list-mate, could have figured out that T.S.Eliot has a poem in Volume 1 of_ Poems For The Millennium_. YOU however did not know this because you have a strategy and agenda which we are not privy to. A child, however

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

314. Christian Roess
Re: Poems for the Millennium
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Professor CD says on 9 july:

> |

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

315. Ryan Whyte
Announce: Aporia #1 and call for submissions
Fri 10 Jul 1998

July 10 1998. Please distribute where appropriate.

 Announce: Aporia ***

ISSN 1480-9389
28 pages offset/photocopy

Aporia is a small-press journal focusing on experimental writing and art criticism. It is intended as a vehicle for radical or "difficult" writing which may not have an outlet in the usual art and theory publications. In a larger sense, Aporia is an anti art-magazine.

Aporia #1, on "space and the artwork," features the work of:

Alan Sondheim
Nick Piombino (on Gins/Arakawa)
Gordon Lebredt
Ryan Whyte
Ed Aoki
and Tosh Berman (on the Benshi tradition), among others.

Single issues are $3 Canadian, or $2.25 U.S. Two issue subscriptions are available, for $5 Can for Canadian subscribers, $4 U.S. for U.S. subscribers, and $6 U.S for overseas subscribers. Please make cheques out to Ryan Whyte.

Aporia is now accepting submissions for issue #2, on "Time." The deadline for submissions is October 1, 1998. Future issues will focus on "Color," "Void," "Light," and "the Avant-Garde."

Please direct all correspondence to the editor:

Ryan Whyte
504 Queen St. East
Toronto, ON, Canada M5A 1V2
email: [redacted]

---end---

↑ Index

316. louis stroffolino
Re: Not romantic, but drowning
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Jordan asks--I think--about literature of interest re male gaze... well been thinking been wanting to rant about that Wayen Kostenbaum piece on Vanessa Beecroft in the latest ARTFORUM lately and so will well he begins the piece with going to see a Jane Frielecher show and expressing boredom (or more likely ENNUI) at--not at the work per se (nor have I seen it nor will judge but that's the issue HERE)--but at the MEDIUM (can you BELIEVE that it's 1998 and some people still PAINT on WALLS and only on WALLS?" come on now, he'd probably add, this is the error of the HUGO BOSS PRIZE and that souglass clown and his slowed-down 24 hour version of PSYCHO and the sequel currently at the guggenheim).... After, claiming the PASSE quality of the MEDIUM or GENRE in which frielicher works, he moves on to praise (i think it's praise) Beecroft's show of 20 or so models, 5 naked, all but 5 wearing clothes by GUCCI GUCCI GUCCI. A "by invite only" show (but they invite a lot of people it says here)--therefore "special." Kostenbaum is simply ASTOUNDED that skinny model women's legs do not touch at their crotch. And this is the NEW ART, the "interactive" "installation piece." Question: am I silly or just plain "out of the ballpark" for imagining the scene at this show, as stiff and stuffy???? Would rather see the frielicher, and then maybe go to a topless cabaret a certain A. Berrigan told me about--no GUCCI at least there, one step closer to the more "naked" voyeurism i assume is more available at the kind of strip clubs guiliani wants to close down (i did go once with fellow Hard Press author Sharon Messmer; i wonder if the baby doll lounge made the AX).... Well, have I made my preferences "clear"? And, no, I'm not going to retell the story about baby's first reading with Bernstein in 89 and his public response to my early poem "blackburniana", but I may mention that my recent, as yet unpublished piece "NUDE" (which I really should remember to send to Eileen Myles after hearing her portrait of the male nude model she had "sit" for her creative writing class--but this is the "female gaze" or at least one of them) was rejected by Mark Nowak's magazine (I forget the name I always get it confused with that thing in philly). I had sent it in response to his call for his "VOYEUR/VOYAGER" issue, but I guess he didn't want something so much VOYEUR as VOYAGER, or if he sees the two as one, he sees the VOYEUR as a kind of VOYAGER whereas I might be interested in figuring the VOYAGER as a kind of VOYEUR, a line of emphasis (my sister prefered to be "lost in space" too "lost lost i want you lost" as Frank O'Hara says) so drowning in a liquor not yet brood

↑ Index

317. Maria Damon

invite

Fri 10 Jul 1998

---

okay everyone so i'm down on the cape for a while. anyone who wants to stop in after the boston alternative poetry conference is welcome to do so. back channel for info if that sounds nice. i shd warn you it's a bit of a cultural void here in woods hole w/ very little reading material at the house other than the hannah weiner i've brought along...md

↑ Index

318. toddbaron

Re: romantic-not women duelling--romatinc --men asking--duelling romatic--

Fri 10 Jul 1998

Elizabeth Treadwell wrote:
>
> >What is the love poem, anyway? If you move it far enough away > >from the Romantic notions of self, would people still recognize > >it and respond to it as such?
>
> this part intrigues me. >

The wonder of Stein has always been , fr me, the language as a COMPOSING TOOL--not one which reports. So, for yr question there--about "interior" I think the way is always the same--a construction of grammar is a construction of the self. Stein's "voice" is not a personaility--which so many hate her for--or blame her for--anymore than the architecture of Neutra or Schindler is a direct read of them"selves". Stein constructed--and attempted to get to a construction of the poem, the play, the fiction, the essay. Thus, by her composing a world through noitcing a world by composing a world she asked "what is a sentence. A sentence is a part of speech." & " How is sentiment maintained. A pause." Here I might sound like a fool in love (sic) but here I must say that Stein's composing a world(sound) through the grammatical is indeed a grammar of the self that need not focus on the one interiority.

Perhaps I've been inside too long and need the sun--or perhaps "a grammar relates to not liking to see again those you used to know."

Tb

↑ Index

319. maz881
Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)
Fri 10 Jul 1998

I guess barratt watten was right, a bus ride is better than most poems.

<<Date: Thu, 9 Jul 1998 19:26:15 EDT
From: henry <[redacted]> Subject: Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)

Oh well, we're all going a-historical, we rememeber what the other one forgot, blah blah. "Elite". Dangers of subject / object. Romanticism is a threat in 1998?

Here's something about love, forthcoming in Nedge #6, courtesy of Stuart Blazer, of Provence, which has some tradition in that line:

When you love you have no eyes
is what she said; you just see love.
She didn't leave until he hurt
the baby. Young, oriental, scarred, adopted since five, living now in France.
We wait for the bus, passing time.

Almost beautiful. I'm a fool for it each time.
Even blind, ears would be my eyes.
It's not just Europe, though granted, it is France.
Whose gestalt makes love evident: its signs and scars, proof that too much pleasure hurts.

A black belt and still she let him hurt her. Love, she called it at the time, so completely scarred
I'm forced to turn my eyes though who am I to question what they meant by love?
Might as well read de Sade or Anatole France...

Not only the cooking is mouth-watering in France;
hot enough to burn the tongue or at least hurt

you into wanting more, love here is a way of living time.
Its forms tease and please the eyes leaving them finally sated, scarred.

Betrayed, disfigured, bruised, scarred in existential oriental France where it's a festival of talk with lips and eyes that keeps on until the whole body hurts, a kind of tatouage, skin pierced by time displaying our own and others' love.

Disease and remedy, love polishes its golden silver scars brightening our passage through time, French but not confined to France it radiates as from a sun a hurt so essential we both offer then shield our eyes.

When you love you have no eyes
is what she said; you just see love.
"And we came out once more to see the scars."

- Stuart Blazer
Aix-en-Provence
June, 1998>>

↑ Index

320. Daniel Zimmerman
Re: Kerenyi's use of "opposite"
Fri 10 Jul 1998

Gary,

I think you'll find the referent for "opposite" on the same page [11 in my paperback Bollingen ed.], which you quote below: "the standpoint of the deity,' as confirmed on page 12, where he says that "the Minoan gesture . . . revelas man in a wholly religious situation: not oriented solely toward himself and his fellow men, but determined by something other, something outside hmiself, caught up in an atmosphere of festival as in an enchanted world." Further down the same page he says that "the Minoan bull game was clearly a festive game. In honor of whom? The Great Goddess of nature and life? Nikolaos Platon drewthis inference from his interpretation of Minoan art. In his view, the goddess was the divine onlooker, the 'opposite' . . ."

Dan

Gary Sullivan wrote:
>
> Everyone:
>
> Reading Carl Kerenyi's _Dionysos, the Archetypal Image of Indestructible Life_
> this weekend near Woodstock (trees! streams! no constant low-level hum of > electricity! lots of free marijuana!) I ran across this pretty wonderful > passage on Cretan / Minoan art ... but, now I have a question & thought maybe > someone could help me out, either posting here or backchannel: What does > Kerenyi mean here by "opposite"? I'm totally baffled, have read it to a couple > poet friends & roommate Chris, and, well, we can't figure it out. PLEASE > help!!!
>
> --Gary
>
> Cretan art ignored the terrifying distance between the human and the > transcendent which may tempt man to seek a refuge in abstraction and to create > a form for the significant remote from space and time; it equally ignored the > glory and futility of single human acts, time-bound, space-bound. In Crete > artists did not give substance to the world of the dead through an abstract of > the world of the living, nor did they immortalize proud deeds or state a humble > claim for divine attention in the temples of the gods. Here and here alone the > human bid for timelessness was disregarded in the most complete acceptance of > the grace of life the world has ever known. For life means movement and the > beauty of movement was woven in the intricate web of living forms which we call > "scenes of nature"; was revealed in human-bodies acting their serious games, > inspired by a transcendent presence, acting in freedom and restraint, > unpurposeful as cyclic time itself." --this section is actually a direct quote > from H.A. Groenewegen-Frankfort, from her book _Arrest and Movement_ ... then > Kerenyi says: "Minoan art fully justifies this negative > characterization--negative from the standpoint of man as center, as the vehicle > of his own historical and non-historical glory, but not from the standpoint of > the deity, whose presence it demands and requires. Man is always on the edge of > this epiphany of the spirit--the spirit or spirits of life and nature--if not > face to face with it. In this view an intimation of the godhead could be > manifested not only in a swarm of insects, in birds, or in the beasts of the > sea, but also in a human gesture, and it could in turn determine man's > gestures. ... here I am speaking not of cult gestures side by side with other > equally characteristic gestures of simple human existence, but of the gesture > which time and time again, in different forms of movement, represents the > identical situation of man: his non-central position which demands an > "opposite" and can be understood only as an "opposite." ..."

>
> PS: Some of you will note that this book wasn't on my list of summer > "plan-to-read"s. So, why am I reading it & not the "planned" books? A > confession: I am a really, really, really bad planner ...

↑ Index

321. Karen Kelley

Re: romantic-not women duelling

Fri 10 Jul 1998

Check out (in one of my favorite books _Breaking the Sequence: Women's Experimental Fiction_ by Ellen Friedman & Miriam Fuchs) the essay: "Woolfenstein" by Rachel Blau DuPlessis. She manages to not ignore the two women's obvious differences, but doesn't let them get in the way of an intertextual analysis. Her reading of _The Waves_ as influenced by Stein's "beginning again"-ness (among other things) is way cool. Princeton U, publishers.

Actually, I was thinking of love in a slightly different context yesterday. I don't know who it was who said we can learn morality from novels, but I started thinking again about the "people" I've learned most from (& loved) and made my not complete but pretty close list:

Emma Bovary
Anna Karenina
Kate Pointellier
Isabel Archer
Tess Durbeyfield
Molly Bloom
(& Leopold)

Anyone listees with characters they feel really speak to "how one lives one's life"?

P.S. Elizabeth: I too love the "flatness" of Stein--and see it a bit, perhaps, in _Orlando_, though I love Woolf best in her "roundness" (_To the Lighthouse_).

Elizabeth Treadwell wrote:

> What is the love poem, anyway? If you move it far enough away > from the Romantic notions of self, would people still recognize > it and respond to it as such?
>
> this part intrigues me. I have been wanting to post about an article on > Gertrude Stein that was in a fairly recent New Yorker (excuse me!) wherein
> the author gave a very psychological reading of the lady's life and work.
> saying she only wrote 'that way' cause she was scared of her own psychology.
> and how V Woolf considered Stein a "generational failure".
> my questions:
> how is psychology (self?) framed?
> is there a new way into interiority? (i expect an immediate and foolproof > response)
> does anyone else love the flatness of Stein's characterization (no i must be > the only one)
> like the repetition in Ada?
> why must Woolf and Stein be opposed in this critical/gossip history? is
> their a way to integrate?
> (and i know they didn't BOND in REAL LIFE)
>
> excuse me. the New Yorker disturbed me.
>
> ps i just must say that bitterish reference to 'poetry of young women' and
> the Possibility of a trajectory (anthology) framed by women's writing sounds
> a bit HYSTERICAL!
>
> Elizabeth Treadwell
> Outlet, a periodical
> Double Lucy Books
> PO Box 9013
> Berkeley, Ca
> 94709
> http://users.lanminds/com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

322. Karen Kelley

Re: Not romantic, but doesn't need curlers: you can just wash it & go

Fri 10 Jul 1998

Tina Brown used to run Vogue or Mademoiselle or something similarly femme. They brought her on as editor to make the NYer more trendy.

So the New Yorker likes Jorie Graham but not Stein. Perhaps they like writers who write round but are flat, vs flat writers who are round in person.

Secretly though I think Stein is often dismissed because her haircut was too butch. Seriously.

Robert Corbett wrote:

> i just want to rant about the new yorker's article on stein which managed > to be about as snidely dismissive as a positive article could be. the use > of biography there could be well used in a course on the use and abuse

of > biography as a critical tool.

↑ Index

323. George Bowering

Re: Kerenyi's use of "opposite"

Sat 11 Jul 1998

... here I am speaking not of cult gestures side by side with other >equally characteristic gestures of simple human existence, but of the >gesture
>which time and time again, in different forms of movement, represents the >identical situation of man: his non-central position which demands an
>"opposite" and can be understood only as an "opposite." ..."

I havent been reading all that closel;y, but my guess is that he means it in its primary meaning; i.e. facing him, as a dancer or dining partner.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

324. Daniel Zimmerman
Re: Kerenyi's use of "opposite"
Sat 11 Jul 1998

Gary,

As a footnote to my earlier reply, a statement by the Jungian analyst Edward C. Whitmont [in _The Return of the Goddess_]: "Life as a dramatic play, as theater (_theatron_ in Greek meant a place for seeing, but especially 'A SHOWPLACE FOR DIVINE ONLOOKERS'), is an archetypal motif recurring over and over in dreams and poetry" (qtd. in Stephen Larsen, _The Mythic Imagination_ 29). [my caps; Whitmont may echo Kerenyi's phrase here].

Dan

Gary Sullivan wrote:
>
> Everyone:
>
> Reading Carl Kerenyi's _Dionysos, the Archetypal Image of Indestructible Life_
> this weekend near Woodstock (trees! streams! no constant low-level hum of > electricity! lots of free marijuana!) I ran across this pretty wonderful > passage on Cretan / Minoan art ... but, now I have a question & thought maybe > someone could help me out, either posting here or backchannel: What does > Kerenyi mean here by "opposite"? I'm totally baffled, have read it to a couple > poet friends & roommate Chris, and, well, we can't figure it out. PLEASE > help!!!
>
> --Gary
>
>

↑ Index

325. henry gould
Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)
Sat 11 Jul 1998

On Fri, 10 Jul 1998 19:33:34 EDT <[redacted]> said:
>I guess barratt watten was right, a bus ride is better than most poems.
>
When you get a little older, try them both - bus rides, poems - you might learn something!

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

326. David Baratier
Pi-bolar "opposite" of Kerenyi
Sat 11 Jul 1998

What does stroffolino mean when he "speaks" of ""barthes "speaks" of mythical speech's "benumbed look" ""? The stroffolinolion quotes split our attention toward the author, the authored, and the relation between them in the way that "clams" are the closest thing to "bait" I can think of. Barthes is writing of the unfolding of a name, since the character who says "I" has no name but at the same time "I" immediately becomes a name. To say ""barthes 'speaks'" inevitably attributes signifieds into plurality, a biographical duration where one cannot return to barthes who can never ride a horse with no name.

Ron I disagree. I believe the eliot good/person bad person thing is genetic. Therefore the same issue up and through the millenium.

Thinking about the gazes, I think male / male, female / female, are doing wild recasts recently.

There are other ways to get there. For variants sake, one can pass through the unoccupied tollhouse gate pre-sided in wood shingles by someone whose receipt for the work was lost, was not recorded, in order to reach you, riding a bus on an island country.

Be well

David Baratier

"As suicides diminish, family size regularly increases"
--Emile Durkheim

↑ Index

327. charles alexander
Re: Watten)Schwitters)Eros)Romance)
Sat 11 Jul 1998

Wasn't it "A bus ride is better than most art."

or is my memory failing me?

charles

At 08:34 AM 7/11/98 EDT, you wrote:
>On Fri, 10 Jul 1998 19:33:34 EDT <[redacted]> said:
>>I guess barratt watten was right, a bus ride is better than most poems.
>>
>When you get a little older, try them both - bus rides, poems - you might >learn something!
>- Henry Gould
>
>

↑ Index

328. Peter Quartermain
Re: Other introductions
Sat 11 Jul 1998

At 03:04 PM 7/10/98 -0400, Michael Coffey wrote:
> even if you don't have a publisher asking YOU to cull a collection and >write an intro, you might be surprised what could happen if you DID cull >a selection and propose to introduce it as you say. how bout that?

For the record: yes, it would be wonderful to have a publisher ASKING us or me to cull a collection. Ric Caddel and I nattered together about this anthology for a couple of years before actually doing anything substantial about it, and it took more than another two years, and a LOT of work, to find a publisher courageous enough (or foolish enough) to risk it. We're both thankful indeed that Wesleyan UP / U of New England Press took it on.
"Inside"? "Outside"? "Centre"? "Margin"? "Gate"? Well, whatever metaphor Gary R wants to reject or adopt, SOMETHING might account for publishers' reluctance.

Michael Coffee also asked >though, by way of a question: who published the >C&Q anthology on Brits and mics?

The book itself won't be out till December, but (as already posted) the unabridged Intro is available in John Tranter's Jacket # 4 (http://www.jacket.zip.com.au/jacket04/otherbrit.html

and he added
> .... a howdy
>to Irishman Randolph Healey, whose work i hope is in that anthology,

SOME of it is, yes.

Peter
+ +
Peter Quartermain
846 Keefer Street
Vancouver
B.C.
Canada V6A 1Y7
Voice : [redacted]
Fax: [redacted]
+ +

↑ Index

329. Jerry McGuire contest update
Sat 11 Jul 1998

Please note that the deadline for the contest of the Deep South Writers Conference has been changed. The new postmark deadline is August 3.

For full details on the conference and/or contest, please email me at

[redacted]

Best wishes,

Jerry McGuire

↑ Index

330. Christian Roess
Re: Influence of Poetics Programs
Sun 12 Jul 1998

I am glad to have gotten my digest. I guess some mail is getting through. There was a posting that it was shutdown for the weekend.??

Todd Baron. I am unable to answer your question, except indirectly. I do wonder, as you do, how various poetics programs will and promote the dissemination, ie teaching, writing, editing of poetry. I have only ever taken one post-graduate poetry/poetics seminar, one semester, fortunately with William Slaughter , at Univ. of North Florida, seven years ago, before he launched and edited MUDLARK (part of the List group here as you probably know).The class was overbooked as it was, and I had to get special permission from the instructor to get into the class, but by showing genuine interest I had my ticket in NO questions asked.

The only poets I had read on my own outside the classroom because I wanted to, were Stevens, Raymond Carver, and Rilke (because Carver mentioned him in a few poems, and in his short story "The Student's Wife", written when he was only around 23 years old, by the way). Yet this little bit of interest was all it took , and gradually I wanted to find out more. Until then, I had never dreamed that there were writers like Oppen or Reznikoff or Robert Duncan ,Creeley and Olson, Michael Palmer& Zukofsky, or _Sulfur_ mag,etc. I remember looking at _A_ seven years ago and feeling like it was impenetrable. Resisting it, somehow. Oh, well...blah, blah, blah. Now, I jump into it from time to time.I am astounded at times, and still befuddled, of course.

These kinds of stories are a dime- a- dozen, I know , so sorry for the boring home movie.

Yet , I'm kind of connected ("virtually connected") to the Buffalo Poetics program, though my grades were lousy in college,and with no publications, etc., I would never be accepted into any kind of a poetics progam like this one which can choose from among the best of the best. And YET, I am a part of it too! I was welcomed to the Listserv, no questions asked. Ain't it a gas! Think of it Todd. I can look up Charles Berstein's or Susan Howe's syllabus (or is it syllabi?) for their classes! So , what does that say about the influence of this particular poetics program?

Anyhow, I was fortunate to have a fine teacher, and just one course is all it took to help me find my way . The testimony of one teacher was the signpost needed.. And since I work in the public schools, well won't I be more effective in the classroom because in a sense, I AM part of this 'Poetics' program, through EPC?(Though of course human interaction in a physical classroom setting , interacting with the teacher and classmates is obviously the best way to go.)

As Carver might say, this is 'gravy'.

chris

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

331. toddbaron
a (new) dialogue
Sun 12 Jul 1998

Here's a dialogue I'm very interested in starting:

As one of a few (comparatively) MAs--MFA--etc. with a degree in Poetics--I'm wondering what listees think of Poetics (versus Creative Writitng: not a program where one works on one's own work--but a poetics dept. like Naropa, New College, Buffalo) Departments and their affect of Poetics. Under the "leadership" of Duncan McNaughton and Louis Patler, under the teaching of M. Palmer, David Meltzer, Lyn Hejinian--I gradued in 1990 from New College. The program was then not a creative writing program per se: we had to do grad. level work and writing to earn our degrees--a thesis--and I "think" I know how the study of Olson, The Romantics, Oppen, Dickinson, Basic Texts (Aristotle, etc), Whitman and the texts that influenced their poetics has affected my work as a poet. But:

I recently asked the question of "affect" of Charles B. and the idea has flown about in my head for awhile-- The question is throughly documented in terms of Visual/Plastic Arts dept.s: How Cal-Arts affects the Arts (heavily conceptual)--how Black Mountain affected the Arts--How R.I.S.D , Irivine, UCSD, or etc. has affected a dialogue in the visual arts. We know that critics--that theory--that work itself comes from these schools: But I'm wondering if those out there involved/enrolled/graduated from could speak to the question:

What affect do Poetics/Poetry Dept. degrees and programs actually have on cont. poetry and poetics.

Since some of these places are not strictly "academic"(as New C. wasn't) How do these dept.s enlarge their circle of influence? Think of Black Mountain--and who/what came from there under Olson. Think of the myriad of publications that appear from these places (Apex of the M, Tripwire--some ones that recently come to mind)

I'm meandering abit--but the question is large. Since the question has been raised about academic studies in lit. here in general.

thanks for all,

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

↑ Index

332. toddbaron
ps
Sun 12 Jul 1998

Obviously an MA in Poetics hasn't guranteed my typing or spelling abilities!

Tb

↑ Index

333. izak
robert gluck
Sun 12 Jul 1998

Does anyone know Robert Gluck's email address?
If so, please backchannel it to me.

Thanks,
Joanna Sondheim

****

"It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am." -Edith Sodergran
****

↑ Index

334. R I Caddel
Other introductions
Sun 12 Jul 1998

Sympathies with Gary Roberts, even as we trot out the lines he finds over-familiar, the centre/ periphery mainstream/ margin monoculture/ plurality rag. I get tired of it too, and wish it was no longer necessary to say it. But - this is the point - it's where I (and the other Others) live. As we try to suggest in our intro (invoking Matthias from three decades ago and Langland from the 14th cent) it's not a new thing: the pluralities of the culture of these islands seem always to be "outside". Why, it got so bad at some points that people just sailed away from it...

Yes, Healy's there, and I guess many - er - Others who may or may not be known to members of this list, but who remain for the most part firmly unknown and yes, marginalised at our end. But at this point in the process I lie awake nights fretting about the other Others, the ones we had to leave out in what is self-evidently a non-canonical plural presentation rather than a group show. The telling of the wheres hows n whys which Gary craves would thus be a book at least as long as this 352pp collection, rather than an introduction to it. Someone should write it.

Richard Caddel
Durham University Library, Stockton Rd., Durham DH1 3LY, UK
E-mail: [redacted]
Phone: [redacted] Fax: [redacted]
WWW: http://www.dur.ac.uk/~dul0ric

"Words! Pens are too light. Take a chisel to write."
- Basil Bunting

↑ Index

335. Karen Kelley
Re: a (new) dialogue
Sun 12 Jul 1998

Hi Todd,

I wanted to say a word about the Creative Writing/Poetics Program split you seem to suggest. As an undergrad in visual arts, I learned to critique and respond to the work of other visual artists "around" me (conceptually, in that some worked in other historical times), and be involved in and aware of their work & its influences on mine. I was surprised in grad school (creative writing) to find that there were students there who seemed to expect to be taught how to write, who read very sparingly the works of other poets, and who formed almost no critical responses to the little work they did read. This, while it was the norm, was not absolute across the board. There were students there who had (as Clayton Eshleman has suggested as necessary) "broken their heads" against the works of challenging writers. This persistence is of course what will direct poetry, I think. Just the pure ornery desire to get into poetics we don't immediately "understand," poetics that capture our imagination and challenge our ideas of what poetry is.

But it isn't a process that needs necessarily be absent from writing programs. My professors (especially one in undergrad & one in grad school) were excellent directors--and one has to be motivated enough to go looking for one's self. Certainly anthologies like _Millennium_ are GREAT resources for people who pursue their knowledge for themselves (like Chris Roess).

(p.s. to Chris: Clayton has a wonderful book about the vocation of poetry called _Novices_)

The concept of certain schools being important sort of seems to come after the fact, in that way that history retroactively narrativizes what it assumes happened purposefully. Some schools may come to be a locus for lots of activity, but in fact it's the people who make the difference.

toddbaron wrote:

> Here's a dialogue I'm very interested in starting:
>
> As one of a few (comparatively) MAs--MFA--etc. with a degree in > Poetics--I'm wondering what listees think of Poetics (versus Creative > Writitng: not a program where one works on one's own work--but a poetics > dept. like Naropa, New College, Buffalo) Departments and their affect of > Poetics. Under the "leadership" of Duncan McNaughton and Louis Patler, > under the teaching of M. Palmer, David Meltzer, Lyn Hejinian--I gradued > in 1990 from New College. The program was then not a creative writing > program per se: we had to do grad. level work and writing to earn our > degrees--a thesis--and I "think" I know how the study of Olson, The > Romantics, Oppen, Dickinson, Basic Texts (Aristotle, etc), Whitman and > the texts that influenced their poetics has affected my work as a poet.
> But:
>
> I recently asked the question of "affect" of Charles B. and the idea has > flown about in my head for awhile-- The question is throughly documented > in terms of Visual/Plastic Arts dept.s: How Cal-Arts affects the Arts > (heavily conceptual)--how Black Mountain affected the Arts--How R.I.S.D
> , Irivine, UCSD, or etc. has affected a dialogue in the visual arts. We > know that critics--that theory--that work itself comes from these > schools: But I'm wondering if those out there > involved/enrolled/graduated from could speak to the question:
>
> What affect do Poetics/Poetry Dept. degrees and programs actually have > on cont. poetry and poetics.

>
> Since some of these places are not strictly "academic"(as New C. > wasn't) How do these dept.s enlarge their circle of influence? Think
of > Black Mountain--and who/what came from there under Olson. Think of the > myriad of publications that appear from these places (Apex of the M, > Tripwire--some ones that recently come to mind)
>
> I'm meandering abit--but the question is large. Since the question has > been raised about academic studies in lit. here in general.

>
> thanks for all,
>
> Todd Baron
> (ReMap)

↑ Index

336. morpheal

Re: the center will not hold [so fortify it so it does hold or perish for not doing so]

Sun 12 Jul 1998

> "Man is not so much placed in this idealized center of the world as he is exposed there. The position of Stoicism's observer of the world, at rest, has become the initial position of a self-shaping and world-transforming agent. All other creatures, we are told, have a definite nature, within firmly established laws, imposed upon them. Man is supposed to determine his nature himself on the basis of his freedom; which now means to see the world as serving his self-definition. Even before Copernicus, the shift of the accent from cosmology to anthropology, a process on which the Middle Ages as a whole had worked--under the terms set by prior assumptions--in tiny steps, and with setbacks, is pushed so far forward that the loss of the real center of the universe, as a consequence of a relation to the world that could no longer be characterized cosmologically, could be accepted."---from The Genesis of the Copernican World by Hans Blumenberg

Anthropocentricism is dangerous. It leads to the belief that there are no other intelligent, competing, species out there in the universe. It leads to the belief that life on planet Earth is safe harboured from those competing species, and only a danger to itself, mostly by means of war and ecological disasters. Nothing could ultimately be further from the truth. As humankind probes further from home planet, the dangers increase, and the sophistication of potentially competitive species also increases. There is nothing to guarantee that such species will be peaceful, except our own wishful science fiction. A science fiction that is in its search for lost father figures in outer space and perhaps lost divinities, which amounts to much the same thing in strictly Freudian terms. We must realize that a more intelligent species might in fact be a more violently competitive species despite its intelligence.

We have seen how war changed on Earth as human intelligence grew. We have seen the willingness to use weapons of mass destruction, by increasingly educated, enlightened beings. We have no reason to believe that an alien, perhaps more intelligent, space traveling, species would not be equally, or more, aggressive in its territorial claims and its efforts at ascendancy than is the human species. In fact we must expect that another species might be more extreme than our own has proven itself to be. If we are disappointed in that grimmest of expectations, then nothing is lost in preparing for the worst.

If there is failure to expect that scenario of violently competitive alien species, endangering human survival, then the result might be the grimmest of all....the most horrible kind of extinction imaginable to our own. So it becomes a matter of survival of the species to be prepared for other worldly threats to human existence. Perhaps that is the ultimate prisoners' dilemma, where the various human factions who keep each other locked into threats of mortal combat, necessarily must join together to prepare a defence against an unknown other worldly adversary. The ultimate battle then is not one of man against man, but is in fact one of man against a hostile alien threat, that remains essentially undefinable unless our mythologies include some vague indications of previous contact. They might. We do not really know the answer. The demons and the angels might well be two non human species who battled amongst themselves, and whose violence against each other touched upon this world in ancient times. Perhaps a few of their ships reached this part of the universe, and the one was more convincing than the other to our ancient ancestors. So they looked on one side in that conflict as good and the other as evil, forgetting that in every war the one side inevitably calls the other side evil. Such wild speculations aside, as perhaps too far fetched, the chance of hostile, technically advanced, highly intelligent, and extremely competitive, species, with beliefs far divergent from our own, out there, somewhere in _our_ universe, is not only extremely high, but completely certain. They are out there,.....somewhere.....waiting for their next challenge....

> "The time of an event is defined as the reading of a clock coincident with the event and at rest relative to it. Events which are simultaneous in one inertial frame are not simultaneous in another. Einstein's example: two identical rods R(1) and R(2) are coincident in a given inertial frame in which two observers O(1) and O(2) have synchronized > their respective clocks...."--from 'Subtle is the Lord; The Science and the Life of Albert Einstein by Abraham Pais

That being incorrect, due to the assumption that all events are vectored positively, forwards, along the time axis. Those clocks never run in reverse. That is in essence what makes them wrong. Time's arrow, its vector, is in fact, at best "bent", and sometimes vectored in the opposite direction, depending on what kinds of events we are discussing. Let us refer to events that are vectored negatively along the time line as vectored T, and events that are positively vectored along the time line as vectored t. Those are the common designations for the negative and positive sides of the time axis.

In fact it is my firm belief that a field, can be technically generated, that is vectored to Tx, around an object that is itself vectored along t, such that that object is carried by that field, at a mathematically infinite velocity, towards Tx, which is a value along the T axis. In other words that tachyonic fields generated around primarily tardyonic objects, can be the basis of vessels capable of "time travel", from the present into the past. Traversing vast distances in space, as well as traversing time towards what we see as being the past, is the expected outcome. It is likely that electromagnetic forces could be arranged in such a manner that the tachyonic field would not disrupt the essentially tardyonic matter of the ship and its crew. Therefore, I claim that manned time travel ships could become a reality in the not very distant future. In fact our ships, which will travel to the distant places in the universe, will essentially be time travel ships, propelled by tachyonic fields.

> "The concept of observation is in so far arbitrary as it depends upon which objects are included in the system of observation."---Neils Bohr

Exactly.

M.

aka Bob Ezergailis

↑ Index

337. Mark DuCharme

Poetix programs?

Sun 12 Jul 1998

This is my first posting to the list-- though I've been following for the last week or so since signing on.

I'd like to respond to Todd Baron, since I am an M.F.A. graduate of one of the programs he mentions, Naropa.

Naropa's program is actually a mix of both creative writing & poetics, with more of an emphasis on creative writing. That said-- there were certainly lit-related seminars, as well as (in my own experience) discussions of poetics in the actual workshops. Naropa's program is loosely structured in terms of content. What does or does not get taught may depend on the interests of faculty: there are no courses on "Basic Texts," for example. As a result, I think more leeway exists at Naropa for students to pursue individual poetics interests, & many do, with greater academic freedom than may exist even in a program like New College's.

However I'd like to bring up another point-- to disagree w/ Todd to a degree, based on my own experience. While Naropa, as I say, had a definite impact on me, I'd like to suggest that in my case &, I think, the case of people I know personally, what one gets from such a program (Naropa or New College) has much to do with the amount of responsibility taken by the individual for her/his education as a poet. & Such education is not just a matter of what one studied in that context (we all continue to read & grow in our practice, one hopes). Which probably doesn't contradict what Todd said at all, but which broadens the question of what affected anyone's poetics to, at least, a larger nexus than just such a program.

--Mark DuCharme

Todd Baron wrote:

<Here's a dialogue I'm very interested in starting:

<As one of a few (comparatively) MAs--MFA--etc. with a degree in <Poetics--I'm wondering what listees think of Poetics (versus Creative Writitng: not a program where one works on one's own work--but a <poetics <dept. like Naropa, New College, Buffalo) Departments and their affect <of Poetics. Under the "leadership" of Duncan McNaughton and Louis <Patler, <under the teaching of M. Palmer, David Meltzer, Lyn Hejinian--I <gradued <in 1990 from New College. The program was then not a creative writing <program per se: we had to do grad. level work and writing to earn our <degrees--a thesis--and I "think" I know how the study of Olson, The <Romantics, Oppen, Dickinson, Basic Texts (Aristotle, etc), Whitman <and the texts that influenced their poetics has affected my work as a <poet. <But:

....

<What affect do Poetics/Poetry Dept. degrees and programs actually <have on cont. poetry and poetics.

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

338. Christopher W. Alexander
Olson/Ojai?
Sun 12 Jul 1998

Recently ran across this mysterious reference in Olson:

> "San Francisco seems to have become an école > des Sages ou Mages as ominous as Ojai, L.A."

Any of you historically-minded californians (or anyone) out there know what the man is referring to? help wld be much appreciated...

c h r i s

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402 press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

339. Tom Beard
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Sun 12 Jul 1998

> Anyone listees with characters they feel really speak to "how one lives one's > life"?

For a while I tried to live like Kundera's (male) characters.

Big mistake.

> Tom (_not_ Tomas)

↑ Index

340. toddbaron
Re: Poetix programs?
Sun 12 Jul 1998

Mark DuCharme wrote:
>
> This is my first posting to the list-- though I've been following for > the last week or so since signing on.
>

> I'd like to respond to Todd Baron, since I am an M.F.A. graduate of one > of the programs he mentions, Naropa.
>
> Naropa's program is actually a mix of both creative writing & poetics, > with more of an emphasis on creative writing. That said-- there were > certainly lit-related seminars, as well as (in my own experience) > discussions of poetics in the actual workshops. Naropa's program is > loosely structured in terms of content. What does or does not get > taught may depend on the interests of faculty: there are no courses on > "Basic Texts," for example. As a result, I think more leeway exists at > Naropa for students to pursue individual poetics interests, & many do, > with greater academic freedom than may exist even in a program like New > College's.
>
> However I'd like to bring up another point-- to disagree w/ Todd to a > degree, based on my own experience. While Naropa, as I say, had a > definite impact on me, I'd like to suggest that in my case &, I think, > the case of people I know personally, what one gets from such a program > (Naropa or New College) has much to do with the amount of responsibility > taken by the individual for her/his education as a poet. & Such > education is not just a matter of what one studied in that context (we > all continue to read & grow in our practice, one hopes). Which probably > doesn't contradict what Todd said at all, but which broadens the > question of what affected anyone's poetics to, at least, a larger nexus > than just such a program.
>
> --Mark DuCharme
>
> Todd Baron wrote:
>
> <Here's a dialogue I'm very interested in starting:
>
> <As one of a few (comparatively) MAs--MFA--etc. with a degree in > <Poetics--I'm wondering what listees think of Poetics (versus Creative > Writitng: not a program where one works on one's own work--but a > <poetics
> <dept. like Naropa, New College, Buffalo) Departments and their affect > <of Poetics. Under the "leadership" of Duncan McNaughton and Louis > <Patler,
> <under the teaching of M. Palmer, David Meltzer, Lyn Hejinian--I > <gradued
> <in 1990 from New College. The program was then not a creative writing

> <program per se: we had to do grad. level work and writing to earn our > <degrees--a thesis--and I "think" I know how the study of Olson, The > <Romantics, Oppen, Dickinson, Basic Texts (Aristotle, etc), Whitman <and
> the texts that influenced their poetics has affected my work as a <poet.
> <But:
>
> ....
>
> <What affect do Poetics/Poetry Dept. degrees and programs actually <have
> on cont. poetry and poetics.
>
> _

Dear Mark:

No contradiction here: but perhaps I was not clear--my investigation reacts to a braoder question--persoanlly then--How do you think YOUR education as a Poet in a poetics dept. at a college has affected yr work. How do you think it affects a "school" of thought as a school of Poetics. NARAPA had a rep. for being based more on a spiritual investigation of poetcs--years ago--than a Comp. Lit study. Does that affect yr poetics--

Why Naropa--for you--rather than somewhere else.

Thanks --every answer engages me!

Tb__

↑ Index

341. Alan Jennifer Sondheim

later, what happened, poetics of space/text

Mon 13 Jul 1998

-

Economy of Silk and Dreams [1989-1998]

(configurations of objects emerging from near-sleeping, turning through the anguish of iron hooks submerged in iron hooks)

visualizations and intersections of hyperspheres Euler's formula for four-dimensional projections fifth and higher-dimension measure polytopes comfort of zero and negative-one dimension constructs inconceivable iron configurations impossible to cast holes and interior expansions of external iron elements slowly rotating tetrahedra interlocked in various directions intersecting polyhedra and columns of various sorts slow excursions of meandering fractal point number of squares necessarily added to reach a given number turbulence in eddies with regular or irregular beds articulations of lines and planes in four dimensions point and line configurations in the plane and three dimensions the centers of hyperspheres of various dimensions hooks or lips against the center of a sphere projection of a point or line in three dimensions truncating polyhedra in two or three dimensions pyramids and polygons completed with equilateral triangles torsion applied to iron beams of various cross-sections exposures of splayed body and its holes in various bindings language-configurations of bindings into signs and omens regular simplices surrounding a point in three and four dimensions tetrahedra formed from skew-orthogonal lines embedded in the cube nodes and skeins collapsing and expanding with luminous trails Petrie polygons for cube and octahedron number of n-dimensional polytopes in an m-dimensional measure polytope threshold logic configurations with gates and channels and markers configurations of conic sections loosely-joined polyhedra in three dimensions and their collapsings seven-hundred-twenty-degree rotational invariant of three dimensions one-dimensional measure polytopes and simplices projections of n-dimensional polyhedra onto one dimension multiplexing in two-dimensional networks loose objects within the interior of unsutured spheres wounds and striations transfigured by thin membranes of silver threads unfoldings opening to unfoldings stretched to the limit flat hard ground withing giving unmarked by any geodesics metal objects placed under self-strain with hooks and rings tidal forces approaching event horizons of black holes patterns of incoherent symmetry sequences perfect alignments of distended arms and torsos and legs approaching skew-orthogonal lines in empty three-dimensional space black lines in yellow space one-dimensional point approached in three-dimensional space white point in black space turbulent plateaus created by upwelling liquid swells liquid pouring across naked open bodies maximum twisting of loosely-joined polyhedra and polygons twisting of three-dimensional cubic configurations in four dimensions twistings and strengths of simplical chains in various dimensions embeddings of three-dimensional interiors in four dimensions perception of four dimensions with three-dimensional binocular vision broken bricks falling through emerging patterns massive compaction of the sphere, cube, and tetrahedron pulled nipples creating breasts with body arched into bridge of dreams relative wear of the massive sphere and various polytopes

True Story of Inheritance

Katagawa Jinko died and Nikuko was put in charge of his manuscripts. She remembers seeing a list of four men, and his name was the first. It was an odd name and she had problems reading it. The kanji were dusty and almost embedded in the wood; everything was close to disappearing, like wood sha- vings hardly holding their own. She smiled and thought, now I am in charge of the manuscripts.

She made a true or false answer to a question about one of the manuscripts - is this a manuscript of Katagawa Jinko - there were three answers, none of them were yes or no. I was quite upset. You're fooling around with this famous author's manuscripts, I said; they'll be dispersed. Don't you have any sympathy at all for the dead. She was contrite in fact at this, and stopped dragging the kanji behind her in furrows marked almost by a sight of miniature valleys left by looping trails in the dust, close to unread- able, and close to disappearing. She'd hold onto the revelation, not thinking further about it. It was enough; there were clouds of dust in the sky, a sense of grit, wood-shavings, the kanji worn and chipped. It was enough that she'd keep them, stop with the multiple-choice giveaways of Katagawa Jinko's work.

( ) ( ) ( )

↑ Index

342. rsillima
Ojai et al
Mon 13 Jul 1998

My understanding is that Ojai has been a "new age" center since at least World War I (which makes it New Age avant le lettre) and that must mean that it's orientation must have been focused around the spiritual fads of its time -- Blavatsky, Krishnamurti, Edgar Casey (whose name I'm certain I've just misspelled).

I've always taken that comment of Olson's to be a sly dig at Robert Duncan who was raised in (and never strayed that far from in later life either) in theosophical tradition, a little payback for "Against Wisdom as Such."

B'rer Bromige, can you add additional insight?

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

343. Simon DeDeo

Re: romantic-not women duelling

Mon 13 Jul 1998

> yikes girl w/ the list above i feel for you. myself, it's genet's narrator in most of his "fiction." and mitya karamazov. thanks for the hot tip on

The usual suspects, thank you, Louie: Raskalnikov, the odd flash of recognition in Turgenev's painstakingly drawn but strangely interchangable heros; Apollon Apollonovich and son in Bely's _Petersberg_, a work similar to (though less ambitious than) _Ulysses_. I wonder why the answers have clustered so far around the 19th century, with the odd excursion into Joyceian territory?

Oh, and of course -- George Eliot's Dorothea.

> *the experimental fiction book. i myself was not enraged by the newyorker on stein, but amused: the tone struck me as one of grandiose naivete, as if the writer thought she had discovered stein and was about to "explain"*

Well, the New Yorker's business is selling the hip -- look at the odd selections they make in the club listings, and the even stranger (and condescending) comments that accompany. The hip people need to explain, in that zen master mode of impenetrable correctness, the Way Things Are.

> her to the masses who were still in the dark. like students who discover marxism for the first time, and think that their parents etc have never heard of it.

Oh, yes; wonderful memories of that. A clunking radiator in a New Hampshire blizzard... I forget the exact circumstances, but it was a garbled version closer to Fourier than Marx... something about "heaven after the conflaguration", which all seems vaguely protosomethingdisturbing in retrospect.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

344. Michael Franco
SLIGHT UPDATE
Mon 13 Jul 1998

M. Franco here for Aaron Kiely's BOSTON ALTERNATIVE POETRY CONFERENCE: BLACKSMITH HOUSE, CAMBRIDGE MA. [HARVARD SQUARE]

FRI-SUN JULY 17-19 1998.

READERS/PRESENTERS:

BERNSTEIN, MESSERLI, TAGGART, MATLIN, TORRA, MLINKO, LANSING, F. HOWE, R. WALDROP, BOUCHARD, WARSH, JARNOT, BANSINSKI, GANICK, W. ALEXANDER, PREAVALLET, FUNKHOUSER, ZHANG ER, DOUD, LEASE, L. SCHWARTZ, D. GARDNER, KRUKOWSKI, STROFFOLINO,BURGER, W HOWE, GRUMNAN, BRADY, POUND, KRAMER, KNOX, WARSH, S. COLE, B. ANDERSON, GILMORE, KIELEYWERSHLER-HENRY, KIRSCHENBAUM, KRAMER, SCALAPINO, FRANCO,

FRIDAY JULY 17

READING: 7:30 [PLEASE NOT NEW SRTARTING TIME]
INTRODUCTION TO THE WEEKEND: w/ KIELY, SCHWARTZ & ALEXANDER

NIGHT READING:
F. HOWE D. BOUCHARD, GARDNER & STROFFOLINO

SAT JULY 18- 9: 30AM
VOCABULARY AND IMIGINATIONS: PANAL W/ MESSERLLI, ALEXANDER, SCHWARTZ, MATLIN, KIELEY, LEASE, MLINKO & FRANCO

12:00 READING W/ TORRA, LANSING, MLINKO, LEASE, & KRUKOWSKI & SCALAPINO & KIELY

2PM: BIOGRAPHY & CRITCISM PANAL: W/ PREVALLET ON HELEN ADAM... JARNOT ON DUNCAN, ALEXANDER ON LAMANTIA TAGGART ON OPPEN, KNOX ON KOCH & ASHBERY, KIRSCHENBAUM ON d.a.levy, GILMORE ON OPPENHEIMER.

4PM AFTERNOON READING W/ TAGGART, KNOX, SCHWARTZ, ZHANG ER, FUNKHOUSER, KNOX, ANDERSON,BRADY, S.COLE

6PM DAVID MATLIN ON HIS NEW BOOK

7PM NIGHT READING: WARSH, JARNOT, MATLIN, ALEXANDER

SUNDAY JULY 19

10AM NEW POETRY PANEL PRESENTED & ORGANIZED BY BASINSKI w/ KRAMER, BRADY, BURGER, W.HOWE, WERSHLER-HENRY, GRUMMAN & POUND

2PM AFTERNOON READING: WALDROP, MESSERLI, DOUD & FRANCO

4PM PUBLISHING PANAL: W/ TORRA, MESSERLI, BOUCHARD, GANICK, KIRCHENBAUM, FUNKHOUSER

7PM NIGHT READING PREAVALLET, GANICK

8PM CHARLES BERNSTEIN POETRY & POETICS

ADMISSIONS:
$5/reading, $15/saturday pass, $10/sunday pass,
$35/weekend-people can reserve their space now through email or phone and then pay at the conference- checks payable to aaron kiely at p.o.box 441517 somerville, ma 02144-INFORMATION / RESERVATIONS:

Aaron Kiely
PO box 441517
Somerville Ma 02144
or Email [redacted]
[redacted]

BEST TO ALL ON THE LIST
MICHAEL FRANCO

↑ Index

345. Maria Damon
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Mon 13 Jul 1998

At 6:21 PM -0700 7/10/98, Karen Kelley wrote:

>
>Actually, I was thinking of love in a slightly different context yesterday. I >don't know who it was who said we can learn morality from novels, but I >started >thinking again about the "people" I've learned most from (& loved) and made my >not complete but pretty close list:
>
>Emma Bovary
>Anna Karenina

>Kate Pointellier
>Isabel Archer
>Tess Durbeyfield
>Molly Bloom
>(& Leopold)
>
>Anyone listees with characters they feel really speak to "how one lives one's >life"?
>
yikes girl w/ the list above i feel for you. myself, it's genet's narrator in most of his "fiction." and mitya karamazov. thanks for the hot tip on the experimental fiction book. i myself was not enraged by the newyorker on stein, but amused: the tone struck me as one of grandiose naivete, as if the writer thought she had discovered stein and was about to "explain" her to the masses who were still in the dark. like students who discover marxism for the first time, and think that their parents etc have never heard of it.

↑ Index

346. Maria Damon
Re: The Eliot problem(s)
Mon 13 Jul 1998

---

i'm curious about the first eliot problem. who controls the estate. is there any reason beside avarice that the cost of permissions is so high, i.e. is the prohibitiveness of the cost intended to be just that, prohibitive? if so, why? is there a subtext here and if so what is it? does anyone know? and thanks, ron, for linking stein and faulkner in terms of investigating the sentence. useful.

At 5:52 AM -0500 7/10/98, [redacted] wrote:
>There have been two Eliot problems raised in the past two days --
>
>One is the impact of his estate making stupid demands that keep the work >from appearing in something akin to Millenium, save by round-about means.
>
>The other is the Eliot as good/bad person thing.
>
>They're really very different issues. The former Eliot shares with the >estates of David Jones and Jack Kerouac. In Jones' case, where many people >don't know the work, it's really regretable. In the other cases, it's mostly >just stupid.
>
>The other question takes us into the quagmire shared by Pound, Spicer and >others, really a reader's problem -- how to handle a writer's racism (or >sexism or or or). Earlier this summer I read Faulkner's Flags in the Dust, >the original version of what was released as Satoris (before Faulkner became >famous and could really publish whatever he wanted). It's a rough work, in >the sense that a book like Visions of Cody is rough, brilliant and awkward >by turns. It's also the most racist work I've ever encountered, just jaw >droppingly so, even though he may have thought himself a liberal by northern >Mississippi 1930s standards. I've always liked Faulkner, since he is the one >writer of his generation besides Stein who seems to have seriously thought >about the sentence as a unit of writing ("thought" might not be the right >word), but it was hard to feel good about liking the writing when has to >wade through the muck.

>
>Ron Silliman

↑ Index

347. Douglas Barbour
Re: Other introductions
Mon 13 Jul 1998

So I went & read all the way through Richard & Peter's Introduction. Aside from the fact that they didnt really PUSH the centre/margin trope all that hard, assuming it, yes, because such tropes of exclusion/inclusion seem unavoidable in such arguments, but really, getting down to pointing out how the engines of commercial publishing & 'high art' have worked very hard indeed to ignore a whole bun ch of writers in GB whose work, as a result, has remained un-, or only semi-, known to many who might otherwise have disovered it & been excited by it years ago. From what little I've read of some of the poets they include (& some of those they say they were forced to leave out), I expect to be terrifically excited by the work of those I havent read. I'm really looking forward to the anthology -- which, like Poems for the Millennium, will be "of use" in that it will provide some open doors to work that fofr many of us just isnt available, or at least not that easily found...

Douglas Barbour (h) [403] 4363320 (b) [403]
[redacted]
Department of English
University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta Canada T6G 2E5

By stress and syllable
by change-rhyme and contour
we let the long line pace equal awkward to its period.

The short line
we refine
and keep for candor.

Robert Duncan

↑ Index

348. Simon DeDeo

Re: Other introductions

Mon 13 Jul 1998

I wonder if a main source of spatial imagery in poetics is due to the fact that many anthologists hope (and many readers expect, as withness the Eliot thread) that their collection represents some sort of omnibus edition of the time. So, before they can work their readers up to more "advanced" topics that involve the more neglected Modernists/ Postmoderns/[insert favourite maligned movement here], they have to trudge through The.Waste.Land just one more time. The periphery is quite literally periphery, filling the end of the chapter or slipping in between the alphabetic gaps left after taking out the E's and P's, a scattershot choice of authors as random, sometimes, as the colonial division of the Dark Continents. Having a "woman's section" or other such grouping only seems to make it worse.

From the OED:

anthology ænþo(hook).lod3i. [ad. L. anthologia, a. Gr. anqologia (f. anqo-j flower + -logia collection, f. leg-ein to gather), applied to a collection of poems. Cf. mod.Fr. anthologie. Later Gr. had also the homonym anqologion applied to a hymnal.]

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

349. hen
Re: Other introductions
Mon 13 Jul 1998

---

the center/margin descriptions come into anthology intros because anthologies usually try to be "representative" of something in a larger literary field. being "representative" is like one of the apologia for existing in the form in which it exists. But is this necessary? I could imagine an anthology that leaves the literary history to the critics & reviewers, and concentrates on the aesthetic dynamics of the various poets included. No apologies, no frames. this is probably sort of an artificial ideal but ideals come in handy sometimes. a problem with it is that anthology-makers are usually guided as much by political & lit-history motivations as by anything else. and people always want frames - it's like a raison d'etre - if you don't have frames, they will question the logic of your selection. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

350. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: Olson/Ojai
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Yes to all that, dear Kevin. And add this: Ojai means "nest" in Spanish and when you drive into the valley from the back way the view is breathtaking. Capra added to its mythology by using it as the backdrop for Shangri-La in "Lost Horizon." I once knew a belly dancer there, but this is hardly the place to go into all that...

Patrick Pritchett

From: [redacted]
To: [redacted]
Subject: Olson/Ojai
Date: Monday, July 13, 1998 10:16AM

Christopher Alexander wrote:

> Recently ran across this mysterious reference in Olson:
>
> > "San Francisco seems to have become an =E9cole des Sages ou Mages as ominous as Ojai, L.A."
>
> Any of you historically-minded californians (or anyone) out there know what the man is referring to? help wld be much appreciated...
>
> c h r i s

Stupidly I loaned my copy of The Collected Prose of Charles Olson (Univ of California Press 1997) to someone undeserving of it, but that's the place to start for the explications of this passage from "Against Wisdom as Such." Donald Allen and Benjamin Friedlander who edited the book have such wonderful notes I'd be surprised if all is not explained therein. And so I don't remember, though they will, what is the reference to the "Ecole des Sages or Mages" (what French group Olson's speaking of). He must have been writing in 1952 or 1953 and at that time Ojai was the center, as it still is, of the US Theosophist movement, and Krishnamurti lived there, and Olson is here deriding the propensity of the intellectuals who flocked round the big K (Huxley, Isherwood, Heard, etc) to lose their sense of balance when confronted with K's holy wisdom. Olson's reading of San Francisco as a kind of Ojai North was of course a challenge to Duncan, a fruitful one it seems to me, tho Duncan admitted nothing and apologized for nothing, but went on to flaunt his own mysticism in ways greater and grander than anything he had done before. ("The Opening of the Field" can be read as Duncan's answer to Olson's charges in "Against Wisdom as Such." I think parts of Spicer's "Language" are also written with this essay in mind.)

I remember first coming here to California when I was a boy and going first straight to Santa Monica to pay homage to Isherwood and then to Ojai to see Krishnamurti. I was so high I'm surprised I didn't tumble off a cliff, or perhaps I did--like Madeleine, or Judy, in "Vertigo."

xxx Kevin Killian

↑ Index

351. dbkk
Olson/Ojai
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Christopher Alexander wrote:

> Recently ran across this mysterious reference in Olson:
>
> > "San Francisco seems to have become an =E9cole des Sages ou Mages as ominous as Ojai, L.A."
>
> Any of you historically-minded californians (or anyone) out there know what the man is referring to? help wld be much appreciated...
>
> c h r i s

Stupidly I loaned my copy of The Collected Prose of Charles Olson (Univ of California Press 1997) to someone undeserving of it, but that's the place to start for the explications of this passage from "Against Wisdom as Such." Donald Allen and Benjamin Friedlander who edited the book have such wonderful notes I'd be surprised if all is not explained therein. And so I don't remember, though they will, what is the reference to the "Ecole des Sages or Mages" (what French group Olson's speaking of). He must have been writing in 1952 or 1953 and at that time Ojai was the center, as it still is, of the US Theosophist movement, and Krishnamurti lived there, and Olson is here deriding the propensity of the intellectuals who flocked round the big K (Huxley, Isherwood, Heard, etc) to lose their sense of balance when confronted with K's holy wisdom. Olson's reading of San Francisco as a kind of Ojai North was of course a challenge to Duncan, a fruitful one it seems to me, tho Duncan admitted nothing and apologized for nothing, but went on to flaunt his own mysticism in ways greater and grander than anything he had done before. ("The Opening of the Field" can be read as Duncan's answer to Olson's charges in "Against Wisdom as Such." I think parts of Spicer's "Language" are also written with this essay in mind.)

I remember first coming here to California when I was a boy and going first straight to Santa Monica to pay homage to Isherwood and then to Ojai to see Krishnamurti. I was so high I'm surprised I didn't tumble off a cliff, or perhaps I did--like Madeleine, or Judy, in "Vertigo."

xxx Kevin Killian

↑ Index

352. William Burmeister Prod
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Mon 13 Jul 1998

On Jul 10, 6:21pm, Karen Kelley wrote:

> Anyone listees with characters they feel really speak to "how one lives one's life"?

Hugo's Jean ValJean has always struck me as a great model for a life of love.

William

↑ Index

353. Jim McCrary
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Mon 13 Jul 1998

On Jul 10, 6:21pm, Karen Kelley wrote:

> Anyone listees with characters they feel really speak to "how one lives one's > life"?

===

as a character in her own works and as a author i would have to add the late kathy acker.

jim mccrary

↑ Index

354. Susan E. Dunn
Underestimated Poetics
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Omigod, like,

Thepoetryofyoungwomen's life had stood a loaded gun and then some. Thepoetryofyoungwomen shops at the Gap. Thepoetryofyoungwomen eats an entire pint of Hagen Daz. Thepoetryofyoungwomen starves herself. Thepoetryofyoungwomen rolls her eyes and won't wipe that look off her face and doesn't care that you don't like her tone of voice. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is a vampire slayer, like Buffy. Thepoetryofyoungwomen smiles sweetly when you call her Blondie and then says asshole when you aren't in earshot. Thepoetryofyoungwomen got drunk on wine coolers and blew chunks. Thepoetryofyoungwomen wants to be an astronaut or a figure skater. Thepoetryofyoungwomen reads the Bell Jar and cries. Thepoetryofyoungwomen thinks Taylor Hanson is cute and Beck Hansen is deep. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is never called on even when her hand is up. Thepoetryofyoungwomen has seen Titanic three times but likes Little Women better. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is good at math. Thepoetryofyoungwomen polishes her nails black. Thepoetryofyoungwomen clears the table. Thepoetryofyoungwomen needs to check her messages. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is not impressed that your father wrote the history book.

Susan E. Dunn
"Are you in the English Department or the History Department?"
"I'm in the Toy Department."
--Maxine Hong Kingston, Tripmaster Monkey: His Fake Book
email: [redacted]
www: http://shc.stanford.edu/sed/sedunn.html

↑ Index

355. Rachel Levitsky
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Maria Damon wrote:
>
> At 6:21 PM -0700 7/10/98, Karen Kelley wrote:
>
> >
> >Actually, I was thinking of love in a slightly different context yesterday. I > >don't know who it was who said we can learn morality from novels, but I > >started > >thinking again about the "people" I've learned most from (& loved) and made my > >not complete but pretty close list:
> >
> >Emma Bovary
> >Anna Karenina
> >Kate Pointellier
> >Isabel Archer
> >Tess Durbeyfield
> >Molly Bloom
> >(& Leopold)
> >Personally I can't really stand Jane Eyre but do love Bella, the crazy woman in the attic on whom Jean Rhys wrote _Wide Sargasso Sea_. Not that what happens to her is any better than what happens to everyone else but she does make a physical mark on the world, eg his house, his eyes (blinded).

-rdl

↑ Index

356. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: Underestimated Poetics
Mon 13 Jul 1998

On Mon, 13 Jul 1998, Susan E. Dunn wrote:

> Omigod, like,
>
this is wonderful! Somehow I saw a derailed train rumble murmuring its way through the lines not all at the beginning but just carrying itself _out loud,_ the sound and psycho and social context. This is beautiful!

Alan

↑ Index

357. Rachel Levitsky
Re: Underestimated Poetics
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Susan E. Dunn wrote:
>
> Omigod, like,
>
> Thepoetryofyoungwomen's life had stood a loaded gun and then some.
> Thepoetryofyoungwomen shops at the Gap. Thepoetryofyoungwomen eats an > entire pint of Hagen Daz. Thepoetryofyoungwomen starves herself.
> Thepoetryofyoungwomen rolls her eyes and won't wipe that look off her face > and doesn't care that you don't like her tone of voice.
> Thepoetryofyoungwomen is a vampire slayer, like Buffy.
> Thepoetryofyoungwomen smiles sweetly when you call her Blondie and then > says asshole when you aren't in earshot. Thepoetryofyoungwomen got drunk on > wine coolers and blew chunks. Thepoetryofyoungwomen wants to be an > astronaut or a figure skater. Thepoetryofyoungwomen reads the Bell Jar and > cries. Thepoetryofyoungwomen thinks Taylor Hanson is cute and Beck Hansen > is deep. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is never called on even when her hand is up.
> Thepoetryofyoungwomen has seen Titanic three times but likes Little Women > better. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is good at math. Thepoetryofyoungwomen > polishes her nails black. Thepoetryofyoungwomen clears the table.
> Thepoetryofyoungwomen needs to check her messages. Thepoetryofyoung-women is > not impressed that your father wrote the history book.
>
> ----------
> Susan E. Dunn
> "Are you in the English Department or the History Department?"
> "I'm in the Toy Department."
> --Maxine Hong Kingston, Tripmaster Monkey: His Fake Book
> email: [redacted]
> www: http://shc.stanford.edu/sed/sedunn.html
> ----------

Susan mind if I add?

Thepoetryofyoungwomen makes xerox copies of her body parts. Thepoetryofyoungwomen thinks she should garden but prefers new shoes. Thepoetryofyoungwomen can never get past imitating G.Stein, as had been noted. Thepoetryofyoungwomen fights like a girl and wont be shaken from her party line. Thepoetryofyoungwomen shares knowing she deserves more than she gets. Thepoetryofyoungwomen would like to take up space and gets shorter. Thepoetryofyoungwomen grows so big it can screw in a lightbulb all by herself.

also forthcoming:
A reluctant promise to J. Kuszai of recap of last week of Naropa SWP events including the dog bite.

--rdl--

↑ Index

358. Billy Little

Re: Ojai et al

Mon 13 Jul 1998

---

duncan and spicer and blaser and ebbe beauregard and joanne kyger and joe dunn and mike mclure and helen adam and others(sister mary norbert korte, james alexander, george stanley, stan persky) attended regular meetings which i believe was known as the magic circle everybody was reading medieval scholarship in the fifties, gershom scholem, walker, ficino, kabala, tarot, which olson was reading also and doing the tarot everyday.

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

...like this - everytime i write a poem - i'm afraid - when i'm dead it will sell & some other poet will starve because no one will buy his poems...

d.a. levy

↑ Index

359. Christopher W. Alexander
Olson/Ojai
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Thanks to all for the very generous response here and backchannel! Not so coincidentally came across this exact quotation in POET BE LIKE GOD: JACK SPICER AND THE SAN FRANCISCO RENAISSANCE last night (the query had been prompted by my reading the Olson) - > which is a good chance, anyway, for me to plug the book

> 'testimonial-style': rec'd it friday, and it's just dreamy! now > everyone go buy it from the nice man at Bridge St. Books... > and congrats to KK, who as usual does not disappoint > (even though he was such a 'degenerate' youth!).
>
> c h r i s

p.s., if anyone cares to visit, the URL for The Ojai Foundation is <http://www.ojaifoundation.org/>; there's a tiny 'history' section that corroborates what's been sed on-list.

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

360. David Baratier
Re: Natch
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Bill Luoma--

A) notch on a plaster mold used in ceramics to keep the halves in position

B)ritish variation on notch

19 C) Karl Henekell. A movement. Based on a stringent disbelief in teleogical explanations. Considers natural causes to be the responsible for all movements in the mind. Specifically the word referred to the ample space required for _the_ environmental experiment. Unfortunately Zola, Prudhomme, and Coppee could not make up their mind what the _the_ was and so blamed Karl for the whole project. Karl got his revenge in 1883(?) with _Dichter charakter_ by anthologizing some mediocre work of theirs and making it look like Arno Holz was the only worthwhile German poet of the bunch. Holz got angry with Karl and created a poetics and subsequent book called _Sekundenstil_ with miniture movements through the prose transitioning from a non-existent meter into a stiffer metrical sound st the end of the book. The joke being that Karl was extremely slow to get an erection, the lack of formal devices implying Karls lack of affluency. Then of course the style caught on sans joke to where the prose(call it what you will, short-short fiction etc.)poem currently rests with Robert Bly. (see Rupperrecht: Literarische Manifeste for a start)

D)errogatory slang word for Natchesan (Nachez tribe) people in southwestern Mississippi.

All spelling is approximate. There's a lot of other slang usages. Why me? I thought only Keats was a baiter of bears.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

361. toddbaron
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Mon 13 Jul 1998

---

problem with
>
 characters "who" feel really speak to "how one lives > one's > > life"?
> is that they're living theirs/instead.
>

↑ Index

362. maz881
Natch
Mon 13 Jul 1998

David Baratier,

What does Natch mean?

↑ Index

363. Chris McCreary publication announcement-- ixnay press
Mon 13 Jul 1998

This message is to announce the first two chapbooks to be published by ixnay press: Frank Sherlock's "13" & Pattie McCarthy's "Octaves."

"13" is a whopping 52 pgs long & staplebound w/ a heavy cardstock cover. From "13": Starwalker head/ for aenid/ once in a/ Life is yes/ like/ an orange/ says/ the dying old rabbi/ Verse volume/ picked up/ by/ a child &/ thrown down/ steps/ follows/ picked up again/ wipe off the meat/ with the citrus/ skins/ Word/ made pulp/ then sung among/ us

"Octaves" is 16 pgs long, printed on linen paper & staple-bound w/ a heavy cardstock cover. From "Octaves"-- A map of the past is a history itself--// one half pair of cloistered yew trees and unweary memory./ My desire to make ugly. Everything/ will be revised.

"13" sells for $6, "Octaves" goes for $5-- or you can get both for $10. Orders or queries should be sent to:

Chris McCreary
1164 S. 10th St.
Philadelphia PA 19147

or just e-mail me: [redacted]

Be sure to make checks out to me & not ixnay press. Thanks much.

↑ Index

364. Tom Beard
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Mon 13 Jul 1998

> Yeah, but it must have been fun while it lasted! (I'm thinking of the earlier books up to and including "Lightness" . . .)

Up to a point. I blame the friend of mine who first lent me "Lightness" (she kept a bowler hat beside her bed...)

Kundera did help me come to terms with a world where desire is transient, problematic, mediated yet undeniable. Other writers, such as Valentine de Saint-Point, Kapka Kassabova, Ian Wedde and Annemarie Jagose are helping me to understand desire/lust/longing/whatever in all its forms and deformations:

"Lust is the panic shudder of a particle of the earth"

- V de S-P

"May you never recover from the lightness of my touch"

- K K

"ardent, headachy, Parnassian"

- I W

"What is lust's question? What could be less simple than a question of lust?"

- A J

It's impossible to write a love poem without questioning the self.

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

365. Karen Kelley
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Mon 13 Jul 1998

> yikes girl w/ the list above i feel for you.

Yeah, I know. I'm aware of all the reasons I'm not supposed to like them, and yet I still do--and I guess that's part of the appeal...

↑ Index

366. Susan Wheeler
The Writing Center, San Diego
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Any information on The Writing Center's status would be appreciated. Their phone seems to be disconnected after being connected a brief month or two ago.

Thanks all, and thanks for the thinking these days. Oblomov's mine (character thread).

Susan Wheeler
[redacted] voice/fax [redacted]

↑ Index

367. Peter Quartermain
Re: The Eliot problem(s)
Mon 13 Jul 1998

Valerie Eliot and Faber and faber control the estate, and play it very close to the chest -- very hard if not impossible to get into the archives to see what's what, for instance.

As for avarice, well. Historically, in the US at any rate the anthologising rule was something like (this is way back in the 50s and 60s you realise) Harcourt Brace would permit a poem to be anthologised provided a) the poem appeared in a max of four anthologies at any one tiome, and b) the anthology iteslf sold for more that $4.50. There was also some other rule about paperbacks, I believe. (All this, you'll realize but not of course remember) when paperbacks were 25 or 35 cents (depending on size), Modern Library books what, $1.45 hardcover, Modern Library Giants $2.45; new fancy trade hardcovers $3.50 to $4.95 max. But you managed (I managed) as a visiting grad student in St Louis to live on a little less than $900 for a year (1955-6). Cornell offered TA-ships in English at $1100, out of which you paid your fees.

Anthologies were big business in those days (Understanding Poetry, I was once told, made its editors around a million each). Maybe they still are, but exceptionally not usually I'd say.

Avarice? I dunno. Control, yes.

One might note though (I think Jerry Rothenberg knows this more than I do) that literary estates are notorious for their dreams of wealth: one anthology I know of had to exclude Marianne Moore because the fee for two poems was MORE than the budget for all 800 or so pages of poetry in the book; cost of printing Zukofsky is, I'm told, $10.00 per line. Eliot? I have no idea, but if the fee is by the line, then The Waste Land would be pretty hefty, no?

Some anthologists, as a result, simply shove the poems in and hope the estate doesn't notice. In these litigious days that's extremely risky and can be cripplingly expensive (witness the Salinger bio some years back).

Peter

At 08:01 AM 7/13/98 -0600, you wrote:
>i'm curious about the first eliot problem. who controls the estate. is >there any reason beside avarice that the cost of permissions is so high, >i.e. is the prohibitiveness of the cost intended to be just that, >prohibitive? if so, why? is there a subtext here and if so what is it?
>does anyone know? and thanks, ron, for linking stein and faulkner in terms >of investigating the sentence. useful.
>

>At 5:52 AM -0500 7/10/98, [redacted] wrote:
>>There have been two Eliot problems raised in the past two days --
>>
>>One is the impact of his estate making stupid demands that keep the work >>from appearing in something akin to Millenium, save by round-about means.
>>
>>The other is the Eliot as good/bad person thing.
>>
>>They're really very different issues. The former Eliot shares with the >>estates of David Jones and Jack Kerouac. In Jones' case, where many people >>don't know the work, it's really regretable. In the other cases, it's mostly >>just stupid.
>>
>>The other question takes us into the quagmire shared by Pound, Spicer and >>others, really a reader's problem -- how to handle a writer's racism (or >>sexism or or or). Earlier this summer I read Faulkner's Flags in the Dust, >>the original version of what was released as Satoris (before Faulkner became >>famous and could really publish whatever he wanted). It's a rough work, in >>the sense that a book like Visions of Cody is rough, brilliant and awkward >>by turns. It's also the most racist work I've ever encountered, just jaw >>droppingly so, even though he may have thought himself a liberal by northern >>Mississippi 1930s standards. I've always liked Faulkner, since he is the one >>writer of his generation besides Stein who seems to have seriously thought >>about the sentence as a unit of writing ("thought" might not be the right >>word), but it was hard to feel good about liking the writing when has to >>wade through the muck.
>>
>>Ron Silliman
>

+ + + +

368. Billy Little
quartermain/cadell intro
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Now that I've read the entire introduction to Other by peter quartermain and rick cadell published in the new Jacket i don't know what you earlier commentors read . This essay is worthy of heidegger and gives an exhaustive outline and precise analysis of an activity over a time, if you could do better oh boy i can't wait to read it. Clear, concise and thorough. Thanks guys, i can't wait to read the book. Nitpicking is a sure sign of the brain in idle, nevertheless I'd say Linton Kwesi Johnson's language is delectable, i like it on the tongue like a candy.

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

...like this - everytime i write a poem - i'm afraid - when
i'm dead it will sell
& some other poet will starve because no one will buy his poems...

d.a. levy

↑ Index

369. k. lederer
New E-MAIL/EXPLO/KLEDERER
Tue 14 Jul 1998

I have new e-mail address--good for EXPLOSIVE MAGAZINE and Spectacular Books--

[redacted]

Katy Lederer

↑ Index

370. k. lederer
OOOps
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Actually, I thin it's

[redacted]

Katy

↑ Index

371. joel lewis
Re: The Eliot problem(s)
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Maria--

I think that dealing with the Eliot estate has been problematic. While Eliot was alive, they did not allow his works to be published in paperback anthologies. And I think there had been a resistance for years in putting his books in paerback format. I think, with the drop off in interest in his work, they've been repackaging the books, etc. The high cost of permissions is the reality is that where the estate makes its money (part of the reason that HarperCollins signed up Ginsberg was to get at a chunk of the permission fees).

These high fees are common to poets who are published by commercial and university presses. I discovered this when i did an anthology of NJ poets for rutgers university press. Unfortunatley, commercial houses have a hard time discerning between a regional anthology that sells a few thousand copies v. a college textbook-type anthology that sells 100's of thousands and are actual money-makers for the editors.

joel lewis

↑ Index

372. Jim Brashear new magazine online
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Lipstick Eleven, a new print and online magazine of experimental writing, is now online at:

http://www.well.com/user/brash/L11.html

The print version is currently winding its way through the assembly lines of McNaughton & Gunn, and will soon be available from Small Press Distribution.

We're publishing work by Dodie Bellamy, Norma Cole, Carla Harryman, Robert Gluck, Kevin Killian, Camille Roy... plus many well-loved "others."

So go to our web site and give us a kiss. (You know you want to.)

Pucker up,

Jim Brashear
co-editor of Lipstick Eleven

↑ Index

373. John Tranter

Why does this make me want to throw up?

Tue 14 Jul 1998

Is there something wrong with me?
Why does this (below) make me want to throw up?
Come on. You guys are mainly American. Please explain.
Where we come from, this kind of stuff is pushed down the toilet, and then we pull the chain.

John Tranter, Australia

I quote:
==========
President and Mrs. Clinton to Welcome Poets Laureate for Millennium Evening at the White House

Transcript of Millennium Evening with Poets Laureate

The President and Mrs. Clinton have announced that the next Millennium Evening will be a celebration of American creativity through poetry featuring Poets Laureate Robert Pinsky, Robert Hass and Rita Dove and will take place in the East Room of the White House on Wednesday, April 22 at 7:30 p.m. The Poets Laureate, along with President and Mrs.
Clinton and members of the audience, will read poems they have selected as particularly illustrative of the American voice in poetry.

Millennium Evenings at the White House are a series of lectures and cultural showcases that highlight creativity and inventiveness through our ideas, art and scientific discoveries. The lectures present prominent scholars, creators and visionaries and are accessible to the public via broadcast and cybercast.

The President and Mrs. Clinton encourage the public to participate in the evening's discussion by e-mailing questions for the three poets laureate or sending a favorite poem with comments, either before or during the cybercast. These may be sent via the White House Web Site several days before the event. The Website will also post satellite coordinates (on C and KU bands) and serve as a link to the cybercast. It will also be available via the Web page of Sun Microsystems.

Robert Pinsky is the current Poet Laureate Consultant in Poetry at the Library of Congress. He is focusing his work on the Favorite Poem Project. In commemoration of the millennium, one to two thousand Americans, from every state, with varying regional accents, ages, levels of education, professions and ethnicities will recite their favorite poems for an audio/video archive. In addition to a long career in teaching, most recently at Boston University, Professor Pinsky has served as poetry editor of The New Republic. He is currently the poetry editor of the on-line magazine Slate.

Robert Hass is Professor of English at the University of California, Berkeley, and served as Poet Laureate Consultant in Poetry from 1995 to 1997. During his tenure, Professor Hass battled illiteracy by putting into action his belief that, "Imagination makes communities." He also sponsored a week long celebration of American nature writing called

"Watershed." His commitment to environmental issues led him to found the River of Words poetry contest which is run through the International Rivers Network. Rita Dove is Commonwealth Professor of English at the University of Virginia at Charlottesville and served as the poet Laureate Consultant in Poetry between 1993 and 1995. She was the youngest person --and the first African American --to receive that honor. While Poet Laureate, Professor Dove brought a program of poetry and jazz to the Library's literary series, along with a reading by young Crow Indian poets and a two-day conference entitled "Oil on the Waters: The Black Diaspora."

The Millennium Evening is co-sponsored by the White House, the National Endowment for the Humanities, and the Library of Congress with major support from Sun Microsystems, Inc. and further support from the Howard Gilman Foundation. The first Millennium Evening was held February 11, 1998, with Harvard historian Bernard Bailyn lecturing on core Americans ideas which must be preserved into the next Millennium. On March 6, 1998, Cambridge University physicist Stephen Hawking discussed "Imagination and Change: Science in the Next Millennium." Transcripts are available on the White House web site.
==========

↑ Index

374. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: In the News
Tue 14 Jul 1998

NYT - July 14, 1998

A Louder Voice for Poetry

By HOLLAND COTTER

America is a nation of poets; New York is a city of poets. But it often seems that only poets themselves are aware of the fact. Audiences for their work are small, financial rewards meager, opportunities to appear in prominent public forums few.

This situation seems to be changing. Competitive poetry readings known as slams have gained an ardent following, and the National Slam, a four-day world championship of poetry, will kick off on Aug. 18 in Austin, Tex.; a 1998 documentary titled "Slam Nation" will open at Film Forum on Friday.; literary bands are flourishing in rock clubs, and poetry has blossomed on the Internet, a medium that eliminates the customary publication hierarchies and gives everyone a say.

But writing poetry as a full-time pursuit, as the thing you do, is still a pioneer's art. There are no shortcuts, no guarantees; resilience and self-reliance are crucial career qualifications.

This has always been true. More than a century ago, Walt Whitman paid a Brooklyn print shop to run off the first edition of his too-hot-to-handle "Leaves of Grass" and distributed and promoted the book himself. Emily Dickinson stitched her handwritten poems into little packets -- each, in effect, a self-published book -- to store away in her New England bedroom for future eyes to find.

Self-publishing enjoyed a real florescence in our own century. Beginning in the 1950's and early 60's, a new poetry outside the academic mainstream was on the rise. It was encouraged by advances in duplicating technology -- mimeographing, offset printing, photocopying -- that made it possible for writers to produce magazines and books cheaply and virtually overnight while having control over contents and circulation.

"A Secret Location on the Lower East Side: Adventures in Writing, 1960-1980," at the New York Public Library at Fifth Avenue at 42d Street through July 25, documents this rich, four-decade-long indie phenomenon in American literature, often called the "mimeograph revolution."

Organized by Rodney Phillips and Steven E. Clay and drawn mostly from the library's collection, the show encompasses some 400 publications, from quick-and-dirty pamphlets to elegantly designed books. (About half the material, in fact, isn't mimeographed.) Some of the best known artists of the era contributed cover art.

A few of the journals are still appearing; most are long gone. And in a sense, it is their ephemerality and their underground origins (the show's title is borrowed from the poet Edward Sanders's account of producing a dissident magazine in his New York apartment) that makes them historically important. As the show's rows upon rows of vitrines reveal, these fragile publications were not so much literary monuments as records of dynamic ideas and personalities passing through a particular time and place.

Although the United States was in tamped-down cold war mode in the 1950's, countercultural energy was stirring. Experimental poetry was an outlet for this ferment, and early on, the avant-garde tended to separate into movements along lines of style, locale and dominant personalities, all of which were defined by Donald Allen's groundbreaking 1960 anthology, "The New American Poetry, 1945-1960."

Charles Olson and Robert Creeley, for example, presided over an influential group of writers at Black Mountain College in North Carolina. Robert Duncan was a central figure in a San Francisco renaissance. The poet Frank O'Hara was the lodestar for a so-called New York School. And Allen Ginsberg turned beat poetry into a galvanic force from coast to coast.

Wildly Varied Work Is Brought Together

The work that resulted was wildly varied, but it staked out new esthetic terrain. It brought popular culture, non-Western thought and countercultural politics together in a language that mixed the rhythms of common speech and the improvisatory flair of jazz. And each group generated a multitude of journals and small press books, often created by hand and on the fly.

One of the first entries in the show suggests the flavor of much of what follows. It is a smudgy, much-handled copy of a poem by Ginsberg titled "Siesta in Xbalba." Ginsberg wrote the piece in Mexico in 1954 but published it himself two years later as a 12-page booklet that he mimeographed aboard a cargo ship in the Bering Sea. He gave friends almost the entire edition, 52 hand-stapled copies.

Just a year earlier, the writer had made literary history when he read his explosively anarchic "Howl" in San Francisco. (A first edition of another of his beat anthems, "Kaddish," published by City Lights Books, is one of the show's iconic objects.) And around the same time, extraordinary things were starting to brew in New York.

Like everything about the city, the poetry was wildly pluralistic, though social circles and trends overlapped. The beat presence was evident in magazines like Yugen, founded in 1958 by the poet and playwright LeRoi Jones (who changed his name to Imamu Amiri Baraka). A little later came the highly polished Art and Literature, edited by John Ashbery and devoted to the work of the New York School poets. And both groups appeared in the mimeographed magazine Kulchur, which had both O'Hara and Baraka on its editorial board.

All these journals figure in the show, but the real focus falls on publications associated with a second generation of New York School poets who settled on the Lower East Side around 1960. At that point mimeographed publications really began to proliferate. Among the most adventurous of them was C: A Journal of Poetry, founded by Ted Berrigan, who had come to New York from Tulsa, Okla., along with the poet Ron Padgett and the artist Joe Brainard.

The Word and Art Helping Each Other

Berrigan had learned to use mimeograph machines in the Army during the Korean War, and he turned C into an exceptional product. Not only was it packed with some of the best writers around, but also it was almost as engaging to look at as it was to read, thanks both to Brainard, who is one of the visual heroes of the exhibition, and to the range of artists whom Berrigan asked to contribute work.

Indeed, the interplay of literature and art was a hallmark of the period. Poets like Ashbery, Bill Berkson and Peter Schjeldahl were also art critics. Tibor de Nagy Gallery, among others, routinely published poetry (and has recently begun to do so again). Work by painters like Philip Guston, Alex Katz, Brice Marden, and Andy Warhol crop up on book and magazines covers throughout the show. (Reva Wolf's 1997 book "Andy Warhol, Poetry and Gossip in the 1960's" gives a fascinating glimpse, by the way, into these relationships.)

The exhibition also make good use of other visual material -- snapshots, paintings, videos -- to evoke the tightly networked social communities from which these publications emerged. The Aquarian Age of psychedelic drugs, Vietnam and sexual liberation was itself, of course, a binding force. But so were the collaborative activities that any shoestring literary scene generates: readings and meetings and workshops, all-night printing and collating parties, the passing of fresh images from hand to hand.

By 1966, much of the action centered on the utopian institution known as the Poetry Project, established that year at St. Marks-in-the-Bowery Church in the East Village. Some gorgeous publications -- notably Angel Hair, edited by Anne Waldman and Lewis Warsh -- had their origins there. So did the Poetry Project Newsletter, which was started by Ron Padgett in 1972 (a copy of the first issue is on display) and remains an invaluable source of information on poetry, both in New York and beyond.

The show also succeeds in giving a sense of the sheer variety of fringe publications that appeared. Designs range from the minimalist look of journals devoted to Concrete poetry and Language writing edited by Aram Saroyan, Clark Coolidge, Ron Silliman, Charles Bernstein and Bernadette Mayer, to the surrealist flair of the cult magazine Semina, created by the West Coast assemblagist Wallace Berman. (The magazine, which was distributed through the mail, was never for sale; its proto-hippie motto was "Art is love is God.")

An Early Bulwark of Multiculturalism

And for evidence that multiculturalism was firmly in place many decades before the 1990's, one need look no further than journals that bring issues of race and sexuality to the fore. Some, like Umbra, focused on black American culture. Others, like Poems From the Floating World, edited by Jerome Rothenberg, mixed Chinese, Arabic and American Indian work. And gay voices found a place, from collaborations between Robert Duncan and his lover, the collagist Jess Collins in the 1950's, to the stylish New Wave Little Caesar, edited by Dennis Cooper in Los Angeles in the 70's.

In the late 1970's and 80's, a third generation of New York School poets emerged, and with it publications reflecting new impulses and styles, including neo-punk rock. Some of the magazines, like the short-lived but lively Dodgems, created by the poet Eileen Myles, who has been called "the last of the New York School poets," were nonmimeo in format. And by the late 80's, desktop publishing had rendered such old production modes all but obsolete.

By the time the show draws to a close, just short of the advent of computer technology, it has covered a huge amount of material and inevitably things are left out.

An important and still-vibrant Lower East Side institution like the Nuyorican Poets Cafe, which is based on oral poetry traditions, is given scant mention. The same is true of the wide range of theater and performance art that has always been an integral part of the poetry world. (Such work is increasingly available on homemade videos and audio tapes, yet another alternative publishing medium for poetry.)

Even with some omissions, the ground that has been covered is vast. And it is great to know that the painstaking exercise in historical research that the show represents will have an afterlife in the form of a catalogue to be published jointly by the library and Granary Books in October.

Of course, no book or lineup of display cases can convey the exhilarating charge of live poetry, hot off the press or spoken out loud. And this raises again the question of the future of this seemingly vulnerable, transitory art. Will it find new venues? (Surely the still-forming gallery neighborhood in Chelsea is tailor-made for reforging the link between art and poetry.) Or will it be swamped and made ever smaller by a media-saturated information age?

Eileen Myles, who has lived and written in the East Village for 25 years, is encouraged. "Poetry is always radical," she says. "It's pure democracy. You can't limit it to a one-minute MTV slot. You can't confine it to bytes. It's an art about time and about expansiveness, the open road. Young people now in their 20's now are hungry for that. And we're in there with them."

↑ Index

375. Henry G
Re: Why does this make me want to throw up?
Tue 14 Jul 1998

The amazing thing is that the Millennium Evenings are actually cyborg virtual "forecasts" from the previous Millennium (a.d. 1000) - the "real" Clintons, Pinsky, Hass, and 500 points of light were invited to Camp David for that evening for a barbecue and a game of "touch-football-with-the-President", sponsored by Nike & Muzak. - Henry Fool

↑ Index

376. William Marsh
Re: The Writing Center, San Diego
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Susan

The Writing Center closed due to lack of funds -- unfortunately not doing the kind of business they needed to to keep afloat

bill marsh

At 09:31 PM 7/13/98 -0400, you wrote:
>Any information on The Writing Center's status would be appreciated. Their >phone seems to be disconnected after being connected a brief month or two ago.
>
>Thanks all, and thanks for the thinking these days. Oblomov's mine >(character thread).
>
>Susan Wheeler
>[redacted] >voice/fax [redacted]

>
>

- -
William Marsh | PaperBrainPress
http://bmarsh.dtai.com
- -

↑ Index

377. Mark Prejsnar
vomit & politix & poetizing
Tue 14 Jul 1998

John Tranter:

There's nothing wrong with you (that a little change of citizenship wouldn't cure). Your problem is, you aren't a USAmerican...

i will try to explain it for you. In the U.S. the labor movement (and therefore most forms of left struggle, and therefore dissident and original thought in general) were defeated/kept in check/bought off, a long time ago. Also, factor number two, the US ruling class and its power structures have been made into world-cop overlords (the american century etc.) via a series of economic and geopol developments.

The concatenation of these things means: 1. a stunning lack of critical edge in public discourse, particularly among those who have the capial and the social position to really set the tone; and 2. what amounts to a monarchical/dictatorial system, often refered to as the Imperial Presidency. The president can be checked on occasion by the Congress (cf. Nixon) but that body is controlled by a single governmental machine (the Republicrat structure, which called "two political parties" but isn't even one, since it is not based on mass membership) that has no real differences of interest from the prez. So anything whether it involves poets or ballplayers or school teachers for idaho or army veterans or whatever, that involves the casa blanca is treated as a religious event, comperable in weepy magnificence to a Norman Rockwell canvas...

Of course, tho' i guess they have their moments once in a while, the "laureates" are (like most of their compeers) quite bad and quite uninteresting as poets, most of the time. It's their sort you often find kickin' up their heels with caeser, isn't it? and not just in "the good ol' USA!!"

mark
@lanta

↑ Index

378. Jordan Davis
sortes pinskianae
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Afloat on their shoulders,
And vague depression on the long walk home
The belts and spindles are nearly
And conceived,
"In all those years at work I must have seen
The dried mucus of her nose
He smelled of pagan incense and char.
Flame's phlegmshaped characters. Take a letter: Dear Flesh,
Even a snake's horizon must expand, Impossible to tell in writing. "Basho" symbol or saxophone--miserable,
With capital letters, lie and oppression with small.

↑ Index

379. Joseph Lease
Re: why I love country music & poetics (artist of the floa
Tue 14 Jul 1998

> Barrett Watten well, I guess I'm with Ben Friedlander liking Watten's paradoxical position of attacking totalization by means of totalizing discourse .. and I am starting to see the charming vulnerability ..

Hey Jordan why didn't you say this three years ago I wouldn't have bothered to write my dissertation--but seriously (folks)--now that my foot is out of that beartrap I agree with the above in a strange and haunting (self-haunting?) tone . . .

↑ Index

380. Erik Sweet
Re: sortes pinskianae
Tue 14 Jul 1998

good poem that rip off the clothes poem was a joke, i don't really know how the school would react to that winning a prize!

we'll see

im off

↑ Index

381. Erik Sweet
Reading in albany, ny 7/18!!!
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Jordan judged my summer class's poem contest on William Carlos Williams...
He chose a funny parody of The Red Wheelbarrow!

on Saturday July 18th for those of you in Albany, New York you must come see

Anselm Berrigan
Jordan Davis
Sean Killian

read at Lulu's Wine Bar third floor at 288 Lark Street at 7 pm

eryque back channel me... any one else from Albany who wants details...come see these poets read
they will heat up the downtown of albany and make it real!!!

hope the summer is well for all...its getting hot here!!!! "Tool a Magazine" will have its first issue available on or around august 14th so prepare for "the poetry" 1 month in counting.....

erik sweet

↑ Index

382. Mark DuCharme
Re: Poetix programs?
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Todd,

Re: Naropa as "spiritual": yes, in a loose sense, this is true of Waldman, Schelling, Bye. Not so (in any way that intersects w/ their teaching or writing, at least) of Hollo or Hawkins, or of the majority of visiting writers, or of the majority of students I've known personally. &, Unlike other programs @ Naropa, there are no Buddhist-related requirements (such as meditation) for students in the M.F.A. writing & poetics program.

As to how it has affected my own poetics-- the emphasis on poetics as not just a genre of comp lit but as the engagement of a fellow practitioner WITH a body of writing, certainly would be one point. In terms of "schools," what's had more of an affect, possibly, would be schools in the non-academic sense (tho' I was never "there")-- e.g. NY school & Language "moment." Certainly the distrust of intellectualism, on the one hand, & intellectual immersion, on the other, characteristic of these two groups, has framed (sometimes ironically) my own sense of engagement in the essays I've written. As for the poetry, I'd like to think I'm independent enough not to have been wholly shaped by any of the above. Certainly, a sense of improvisation, arrangement, pushing at the edges, trying not to repeat myself, has played a role. Certainly some of these are "Naropa values"-- but I think, for better or worse, I'm not very typical of the poets (student poets?) Naropa has "produced."

By the way, could you elaborate on how "the study of Olson, The Romantics, Oppen, Dickinson, Basic Texts (Aristotle, etc), Whitman and the texts that influenced their poetics has affected [your] work as a poet?"....

--Mark

Todd Baron wrote:

> Dear Mark:
>
> No contradiction here: but perhaps I was not clear--my investigation reacts to a braoder question--persoanlly then--How do you think YOUR education as a Poet in a poetics dept. at a college has affected yr work. How do you think it affects a "school" of thought as a school of Poetics. NARAPA had a rep. for being based more on a spiritual investigation of poetcs--years ago--than a Comp. Lit study. Does that affect yr poetics--
>
> Why Naropa--for you--rather than somewhere else.
>
> Thanks --every answer engages me!
>
> Tb__

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

383. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli

"Buke as in puke."

Tue 14 Jul 1998

"Then poet, if you mean to thrive,
Employ your muse on king's alive;
With prudence gathering up a cluster

Of all the virtues you can muster:
Which formed into a garland sweet,
Lay humbly at your monarch's feet;
Who, as the odours reach his throne,
Will smile, and think them all his own:
For law and gospel both determine
All virtues lodge in royal ermine.
(I mean the oracles of both Who shall depose it upon oath.)
Your garland in the following reign, Change but the names, will do again."
---from On Poetry: A Rhapsody by Jonathan Swift

"What you can't calculate, you think, it cannot be true;
What you can't weigh, that has no weight for you."
---from Faust, Second Part by Goethe, naturlich

Thanks to Joe Safdie for his excellent quote on the insidiousness of money

↑ Index

384. Christian Roess
What do these bestsellers have in common?
Tue 14 Jul 1998

I was searching through the Barnes & Noble website earlier today. Here's some of the titles listed under "Literature, Theory & Criticism" BESTSELLERS (updated weekly). See if you can guess what they have in common.

It's a no-brainer on most of these, although some I'm puzzled by.Lots of- Cliff Notes- selling because of the Required Summer Reading Lists at Schools. If you are wondering why Dumas's _Man in the Iron Mask_ and Tobias Wolff's memoir_This Boy's Life_ are on the bestseller list, well you've already forgotten that Leonardo DiCaprio starred in both of these movies (neither very recently, either).We can't underestimate teenagers (mostly young women I'd imagine) and their influence.

Fiction & Literature; Theory & Criticism
Results 1 -50 of 21,176 found are displayed below sorted by most popular.

Top 10:

#1 To Kill a MockingbirdHarper Lee / Mass Market Paperback#2 Conversations Wiith God: An Uncommon Dialogue. Book 1Neale Donald Walsch / Hardcover#3The PearlJohn Steinbeck / Paperback#4The Joy Luck ClubAmy Tan /Get

the Facts on Anyone: 2nd Ed..Dennis King / Hardcover #5How the Irish Saved Civilization: The Untold Story of Ireland's Heroic Role from the Fall of Rome to the Rise of Medieval EuropeThomas Cahill#6GatekeeperPhilip Shelby / Hardcover#7The Essential Rumi #8Conversations With God: An Uncommon Dialgoue, Book 2 Neale Donald Walsch / Hardcover #9Heart of Darkness, with the Congo Diary. Joseph Conrad #10The Complete Works of Oscar Wilde

Here's partial list of rest of Top 50

15The Man in the Iron MaskAlexandre Dumas / 16To Kill a Mockingbird (Cliffs Notes)19 Lord of the Flies (Cliffs Notes)20 Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (Cliffs Notes)21 The Time of Our Time
Norman Mailer / 22Grapes of Wrath (Cliffs Notes)23 Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (Cliffs Notes)24Great Gatsby (Cliffs Notes)
26 The Odyssey (Cliffs Notes)27 To Kill a Mockingbird(Hardcover)
29The Heart of a Woman, Vol. 4y.Maya Angelou
30The Scarlet Letter (Cliffs Notes)32This Boy's Life
Tobias Wolff34Catcher in the Rye (Cliffs Notes)35 Conversations with God, Book 1 (Guidebook).38 Tale of Two Cities (Cliffs Notes)41Shadow of a Dark Queen (Serpentwar Saga #1), Vol. 1.42Raymond E. Feist / Mass Market Paperback43Hamlet: Prince of Denmark (Cliffs Notes) 45The Love between Mothers & Daughters.
Helen Exley /46Zlata's Diary: A Child's Life in Sarajevo
Zlata Filipovic / Paperback47Crime & Punishment (Cliffs Notes)48 Of Mice & Men (Cliffs Notes).50Wuthering Heights (Cliffs Notes)

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

385. Maria Damon
Re: Underestimated Poetics
Tue 14 Jul 1998

---

these are both so, like, totally cool. o, i n v u!

At 12:31 PM -0600 7/13/98, Rachel Levitsky wrote:
>Susan E. Dunn wrote:
>>
>> Omigod, like,
>>
>> Thepoetryofyoungwomen's life had stood a loaded gun and then some.
>> Thepoetryofyoungwomen shops at the Gap. Thepoetryofyoungwomen eats an >> entire pint of Hagen Daz. Thepoetryofyoungwomen starves herself.

>> Thepoetryofyoungwomen rolls her eyes and won't wipe that look off her face >> and doesn't care that you don't like her tone of voice.
>> Thepoetryofyoungwomen is a vampire slayer, like Buffy.
>> Thepoetryofyoungwomen smiles sweetly when you call her Blondie and then >> says asshole when you aren't in earshot. Thepoetryofyoungwomen got drunk on >> wine coolers and blew chunks. Thepoetryofyoungwomen wants to be an >> astronaut or a figure skater. Thepoetryofyoungwomen reads the Bell Jar and >> cries. Thepoetryofyoungwomen thinks Taylor Hanson is cute and Beck Hansen >> is deep. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is never called on even when her hand is up.
>> Thepoetryofyoungwomen has seen Titanic three times but likes Little Women >> better. Thepoetryofyoungwomen is good at math. Thepoetryofyoungwomen >> polishes her nails black. Thepoetryofyoungwomen clears the table.
>> Thepoetryofyoungwomen needs to check her messages. Thepoetryofyoung-women is >> not impressed that your father wrote the history book.
>>
>> ----------
>> Susan E. Dunn
>> "Are you in the English Department or the History Department?"
>> "I'm in the Toy Department."
>> --Maxine Hong Kingston, Tripmaster Monkey: His Fake Book
>> email: [redacted]
>> www: http://shc.stanford.edu/sed/sedunn.html
>> ----------
>
>Susan mind if I add?
>
>Thepoetryofyoungwomen makes xerox copies of her body parts.
>Thepoetryofyoungwomen thinks she should garden but prefers new shoes.
>Thepoetryofyoungwomen can never get past imitating G.Stein, as had been >noted. Thepoetryofyoungwomen fights like a girl and wont be shaken from >her party line. Thepoetryofyoungwomen shares knowing she deserves more >than she gets. Thepoetryofyoungwomen would like to take up space and >gets shorter. Thepoetryofyoungwomen grows so big it can screw in a >lightbulb all by herself.
>

>
>also forthcoming:
>A reluctant promise to J. Kuszai of recap of last week of Naropa SWP >events including the dog bite.
>
>--rdl--

↑ Index

386. Elizabeth Treadwell
Poetics/Poetry Dept. degrees
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Todd, I don't know about affects exactly but you know Cal-Arts now has a Critical Studies program where the kids write. My sister Carol T. graduated last year in the new dept's first class. Her thesis was a novel, but they did seem to do more critical work than I did at San Fran State. I was a bit jealous of that. Seems like it at least gives more to talk about than each other's work and outfits. Sat in on a class of hers with John Wagner which was great--they were talking about Rumi and a million things --criticism, critical thought--i may not be the best at it but it gets me going when it doesnt bore. its kind of like landscaping that way. or wallpaper. The program is headed by Dick Hebdige, of Semiotexte in-fame. They publish Errant Bodies. excuse me if this is all old news. Elizabeth

Elizabeth Treadwell
Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
PO Box 9013
Berkeley, CA 94709
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

387. Elizabeth Treadwell
my additional thot
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Have to be true to my school and add that at SF State, esp in classes of Myung Kim and Bob Gluck, was exposed to a ton of writing that is reverberant (!) and influencing. but all yr headbreaking cant come from school.

Eliz.

↑ Index

388. k.a. hehir
Re: quartermain/cadell intro
Tue 14 Jul 1998

On Mon, 13 Jul 1998, Billy Little wrote:
> in idle, nevertheless I'd say Linton Kwesi Johnson's language is > delectable, i like it on the tongue like a candy.

Billy,

yes LKJ is super, but the real way to experience him is with the dub band. i think most of his albums are available on cd now. he's on shanachie records.

best,
kevin

|----------| | Arsenic, a classic homicidal poison, occurs naturally | | in small amounts in many foods.
	The World of Chemistry Essentials

↑ Index

389. Elizabeth Treadwell interior decorating
Tue 14 Jul 1998

"In fact in fact in the life in fact in the life and after all in fact after all after all which is it after all which is it."
Gertrude Stein, Lucy Church Amiably

"realism too is an '-ism.'": "psychopathology": if they are flat, why do they seem alive

A computation is a systematic mapping between interpretable inputs and outputs.

Thepoetryofyoungwomen is thepoetryofyoungwomen is thepoetryofyoungwomen.

I'm old now anyway.

E.

ps Karen, thank you for the road to "Woolfenstein"

↑ Index

390. Safdie Joseph

Money

Tue 14 Jul 1998

Some months ago, Don Byrd started one of his posts with this remark:

I have found the discussion of poetry and money painful. There have been attitudes, of course, about MFA programs and about academics and about the honor of not making money, etc. But what is the issue?

What, indeed? One answer might be found in a wonderful book I've recently discovered, _Frozen Desire_ by James Buchan. It's a book about the history of money, but not only that. In the manner of R Gancie, let me quote what seemed to me a truly remarkable paragraph from the introduction:

"Yet I saw that money was a deep, almost unbreakable, social relation. The banknote I gave the Lebanese waiter was not a simple object, whose function could be deduced quite quickly, like a pencil or, once the control knob has been found, a television. The engraved swirls and signs, even the King's portrait, did not suddenly reveal the note's purposes to someone who knew nothing of money. The banknote was an outcrop of some vast mountain of social arrangements, . . . It occurred to me that, in using money, I had submitted to the authority of a society of which I knew little, but in which I found as much to deplore as admire: subscribed, as it were, to the tottering triangles in the suq that were women or the tense scamper after Friday prayers when we all coralled into an open space downtown to witness a beheading. There was something sacramental about my pay: that I'd offered up to some higher organ my primary social relations, that it was to me and my friends as a flag is to a regiment or a crucifix to Christians. I felt compelled. I was not a volunteer of Saudi Arabia or any society: I had been pressed. My wages came to me not to satisfy any need -- mine were anyway private, affectionate, atrocious -- but to make my needs universal: to incorporate me in the mainstream of men and things in which my work was not for me but for everybody; and to take what was special in me, my most secure and precious sense of myself, and make it general and banal. In short, I was to be civilized."

He goes from this personal introduction to a more scholarly, yet fascinating, history of money, interest and what might be called "econo-metrics" -- a great read! I recommend it highly.

↑ Index

391. Christopher W. Alexander

Re: Why does this make me want to throw up?

Tue 14 Jul 1998

John - this is part of the new 'journalism lite' that's "popular" here in the U.S. (particularly light on "public discourse", as Mark noted). This far out, I'm afraid it's more disheartening than surprising to see vagaries such as this in the news media:

> During his tenure, Professor Hass battled illiteracy by putting into action his belief that, "Imagination makes communities."

foibles from today's edition of the local paper might include the headline "Boys' Deaths Take the Bounce Out of Orange Marches", or this masterpiece of critical reportage (which sounds like a goddamn'd Pepsi commercial to me):

"The vast Army range west of Tooele this month is staging unique war games that combine ground forces, Army helicopters and Air Force fighter jets, giving part-time warriors a more realistic taste of the front lines, complete with live ammunition. It is part of a nationwide training run dubbed Global Patriot '98. [...] Dugway was selected because of its wide-open airspace, not because it looks much like Korea."

or probably my favorite headline today: "Oxygen: Can't Live With It, But Can't Live Without It". Really -- this is on the front page, whereas such articles as

Clinton Says No To Independence In Kosovo Region
Russian Bailout Gets Approval Of World Bank

are buried deeeep inside. And of course that's not to mention the terrific number of happenings not deemed newsworthy (e.g., any left activity, any rightist activity or corruption on the part of governmental agencies or local corporations that can't be whitewashed...). I suppose mebbe it's worse here in UT than elsewhere -- I get most of my news from a combination of Pacifica, the Times, the Boston Globe (online), the Nation digital edition; local news from very small independents, one of which is excellent on local corruption issues...

c h r i s

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

392. Maria Damon
Re: quartermain/cadell intro
Tue 14 Jul 1998

---

lkj's terrific; what's he up to these days? what's the "scene" (dub and otherwise) like in britain now?

At 4:20 PM -0400 7/14/98, k.a. hehir wrote:
>On Mon, 13 Jul 1998, Billy Little wrote:
>> in idle, nevertheless I'd say Linton Kwesi Johnson's language is >> delectable, i like it on the tongue like a candy.
>
>
>Billy,
>
>yes LKJ is super, but the real way to experience him is with the dub band.
>i think most of his albums are available on cd now. he's on shanachie >records.
>
>best,
>kevin
>
> |---|
> | Arsenic, a classic homicidal poison, occurs naturally |
> | in small amounts in many foods. |
> | The World of Chemistry Essentials |
> |---|

↑ Index

393. toddbaron
Re: Poetix programs?
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Mark DuCharme wrote:
>
> Todd,
>
> Re: Naropa as "spiritual": yes, in a loose sense, this is true of > Waldman, Schelling, Bye. Not so (in any way that intersects w/ their > teaching or writing, at least) of Hollo or Hawkins, or of the majority > of visiting writers, or of the majority of students I've known > personally. &, Unlike other programs @ Naropa, there are no > Buddhist-related requirements (such as meditation) for students in the

> M.F.A. writing & poetics program.
>
> As to how it has affected my own poetics-- the emphasis on poetics as > not just a genre of comp lit but as the engagement of a fellow > practitioner WITH a body of writing, certainly would be one point. In > terms of "schools," what's had more of an affect, possibly, would be > schools in the non-academic sense (tho' I was never "there")-- e.g. NY > school & Language "moment." Certainly the distrust of intellectualism, > on the one hand, & intellectual immersion, on the other, characteristic > of these two groups, has framed (sometimes ironically) my own sense of > engagement in the essays I've written. As for the poetry, I'd like to > think I'm independent enough not to have been wholly shaped by any of > the above. Certainly, a sense of improvisation, arrangement, pushing at > the edges, trying not to repeat myself, has played a role. Certainly > some of these are "Naropa values"-- but I think, for better or worse, > I'm not very typical of the poets (student poets?) Naropa has > "produced."
>
> By the way, could you elaborate on how "the study of Olson, The > Romantics, Oppen, Dickinson, Basic Texts (Aristotle, etc), Whitman and > the texts that influenced their poetics has affected [your] work as a > poet?"....
>
> --Mark
>

> No contradiction here: but perhaps I was not clear--my investigation reacts to a braoder question--persoanlly then--How do you think YOUR education as a Poet in a poetics dept. at a college has affected yr work. How do you think it affects a "school" of thought as a school of Poetics. NARAPA had a rep. for being based more on a spiritual investigation of poetcs--years ago--than a Comp. Lit study. Does that affect yr poetics--
>
> Why Naropa--for you--rather than somewhere else.
>
> Thanks --every answer engages me!
>
> Tb__

---

thank-you.

Send me yr address so's I can send you ReMap #6.

Anyways--the study of those mentioned has affected my work as a poet in various sense

1) the poem as possible dialogue with epic--as history--as a sense so much more interesting than "self" 2) Dickinson--and my study with Rbert Duncan and Arron Shurin--has affected my idea of what the poem is--that Robert said "Trust the poem" never the poet..per se--and that Emily Dickinson was an Occult Poet--and that Robert said "All poetry is an occult scinece" 3) Reading in Basic Texts--and studying--knowing whre the work comes from--the true history of the language--as Spicer said--paraphrased-in order to have Rabbit stew you gotta "catch the rabbit" first! 4) Whitman gave me the idea of what the poem is for me--a poem that has everything to do with the Outisde world as repeated represented on my Inside--the line--the LINE--as the foundation of the poem--what a poem is anways--to look at--is lines--and the rejection of the then current line strangulation in sonnett/neat/form.

Though my work is nothing like the above writers--I read them all the time--I learned to READ in Grad. school. I learned to read in 3rd grade!

THanks Mark--

Your discussion of Naropa is interesting. I've wanted to see what the possible connected between New College Poetics and Naropa is--but I still see a different take--there--as there--was a long time ago at Naropa-- David Meltzer and Diane DiPrima most likely the poets I studied with that have a Naropa Connection. Imagine the joy of studying Kabbalah and The Roamtics with these two--and though my work as a poet doesn't directly engage(as you said yr studies don't) those "subjects"--the constant drive towards a given mystery--I believe that's what seperates the current "academic" departments of Creative Writing programs from those such as Naropa--and even SFSU--and New C.

↑ Index

394. toddbaron

Re: Poetix programs?

Tue 14 Jul 1998

Mark DuCharme wrote:
>
> Todd,
>
> Re: Naropa as "spiritual": yes, in a loose sense, this is true of > Waldman, Schelling, Bye. Not so (in any way that intersects w/ their > teaching or writing, at least) of Hollo or Hawkins, or of the majority > of visiting writers, or of the majority of students I've known > personally. &, Unlike other programs @ Naropa, there are no

> Buddhist-related requirements (such as meditation) for students in the > M.F.A. writing & poetics program.
>
> As to how it has affected my own poetics-- the emphasis on poetics as > not just a genre of comp lit but as the engagement of a fellow > practitioner WITH a body of writing, certainly would be one point. In > terms of "schools," what's had more of an affect, possibly, would be > schools in the non-academic sense (tho' I was never "there")-- e.g. NY > school & Language "moment." Certainly the distrust of intellectualism, > on the one hand, & intellectual immersion, on the other, characteristic > of these two groups, has framed (sometimes ironically) my own sense of > engagement in the essays I've written. As for the poetry, I'd like to > think I'm independent enough not to have been wholly shaped by any of > the above. Certainly, a sense of improvisation, arrangement, pushing at > the edges, trying not to repeat myself, has played a role. Certainly > some of these are "Naropa values"-- but I think, for better or worse, > I'm not very typical of the poets (student poets?) Naropa has > "produced."
>
> By the way, could you elaborate on how "the study of Olson, The > Romantics, Oppen, Dickinson, Basic Texts (Aristotle, etc), Whitman and > the texts that influenced their poetics has affected [your] work as a > poet?"....
>
> --Mark
>

> No contradiction here: but perhaps I was not clear--my investigation reacts to a braoder question--persoanlly then--How do you think YOUR education as a Poet in a poetics dept. at a college has affected yr work. How do you think it affects a "school" of thought as a school of Poetics. NARAPA had a rep. for being based more on a spiritual investigation of poetcs--years ago--than a Comp. Lit study. Does that affect yr poetics--
>
> Why Naropa--for you--rather than somewhere else.
>
> Thanks --every answer engages me!

> Tb__
>
> _____

thank-you.

Send me yr address so's I can send you ReMap #6.

Anyways--the study of those mentioned has affected my work as a poet in various senses and ways:

1) the poem as possible dialogue with epic--as history--as a sense so much more interesting than "self" 2) Dickinson--and my study with Rbert Duncan and Arron Shurin--has affected my idea of what the poem is--that Robert said "Trust the poem" never the poet..per se--and that Emily Dickinson was an Occult Poet--and that Robert said "All poetry is an occult scinece" 3) Reading in Basic Texts--and studying--knowing whre the work comes from--the true history of the language--as Spicer said--paraphrased-in order to have Rabbit stew you gotta "catch the rabbit" first! 4) Whitman gave me the idea of what the poem is for me--a poem that has everything to do with the Outisde world as repeated represented on my Inside--the line--the LINE--as the foundation of the poem--what a poem is anways--to look at--is lines--and the rejection of the then current line strangulation in sonnett/neat/form.

Though my work is nothing like the above writers--I read them all the time--I learned to READ in Grad. school. I learned to read in 3rd grade!

THanks Mark--

Your discussion of Naropa is interesting. I've wanted to see what the possible connected between New College Poetics and Naropa is--but I still see a different take--there--as there--was a long time ago at Naropa-- David Meltzer and Diane DiPrima most likely the poets I studied with that have a Naropa Connection. Imagine the joy of studying Kabbalah and The Roamtics with these two--and though my work as a poet doesn't directly engage(as you said yr studies don't) those "subjects"--the constant drive towards a given mystery--I believe that's what seperates the current "academic" departments of Creative Writing programs from those such as Naropa--and even SFSU--and New C.

↑ Index

395. toddbaron

Re: Poetics/Poetry Dept. degrees

Tue 14 Jul 1998

Yes--the dept. ..The thing there that "bothers" me though is the abolsute lack (here my ego goes) of those students participating in the very small lit. scene in

LA. I fear they feel they are outside of the various and sometimes good readings and publications. I've yet to run into a Cal-Arts strudents that read cont. poetry or goes to the readings at Sun and Moon. While in SF I went to everything! I hear from Noah D. Lissovoy that he runs into SFSU students at everything now that he lives "up there". And so--I'm afraid now that Cal-Arts and other "critical studies" dept.s actually create a border--not a moving one--but a solid firm one. I wonder if this is al my own bullshirt or if I'm right!

Living in LA is horribiliy political. Few readings scarecly attended!

Tb

ps: ?

↑ Index

396. toddbaron
Re: my additional thot
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Elizabeth Treadwell wrote:
>
> Have to be true to my school and add that at SF State, esp in classes of > Myung Kim and Bob Gluck, was exposed to a ton of writing that is reverberant > (!) and influencing.
> but all yr headbreaking cant come from school.
>
> Eliz.
>
> >
> >
and yes--those folks are great teachers--who care! I agree--the New College program exposed me to a library I now cart with me of 700 tons of material I did not previously know of----

↑ Index

397. toddbaron
Re: interior decorating
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Any responses to Margy Sloan's MOVING BORDERS ANTHOLOGY--since we've talked of the damned Millenium--which never seems to come? I believe THIS is the anthology that I want to reread and that matters. If for nothing else but Margy's immense intro and Neidecker's amazing "lots" poem that opens the text. THis is a GREAT text!

Tb (ReMaP)

↑ Index

398. Jordan Davis bad total
Sat 13 Jun 1998

To pick back up the Barrett Watten discussion --

"A sterile madness lives in pictures of highly controlled effects--which is what we mean when we speak of abstraction."

This sounds like Foucault, right? At the end of Bad History, there's a section by section list of citations or readings, and sure enough, at the end of the list for "No Man's Land" comes Foucault's Madness and Civilization.

The footnotes here, what is their relationship to the text? Is the dissociation and deletion of reference what's bad in a Bad History? Watten quotes (someone quoting?) the line that a history without women's proper names is a _bad history_. Is Watten quoting Foucault, or simulating him? At any rate, I'm having a footnote experience David Jones only dreamed about.

Again, this is the cheapest sort of discussion about literature, nothing about what Watten does so admirably in Bad History, but instead taking on a sort of surplus issue, talking about the project and its presentation and not the activity and its rates. Just to mumble in case the book'd been skipped over --

Jordan

↑ Index

399. John Tranter
Re: Why does this make me want to throw up?
Tue 14 Jul 1998

Thanks, Joe.
Yes, I did notice that kerfuffle as it drifted across the screen some months ago, but I hadn't actually seen how awful the original White House guff was.
Twelve years ago August Kleinzahler told me Hass and Pinsky would engineer something like this, and boy, he was right!
I have a poem I wrote about a brace of US poets not entirely unlike them in, I think, 1986:

John Tranter

On Looking Into The American Anthology

1

In California a young man is stuffing a briefcase - first a jug of light, the words 'water' and 'stone', a blurred image of a guy in a pickup truck with a gun

staring through the hush-squeak, hush-squeak of the wipers, a frail woman, crying. A leaf, a sob, a clod of mud. There! His class awaits the real,
the Deep and Meaningful.

Driving downtown he sees a pair of jugglers inch up the face of a glass cathedral full of marriages, mirrored in the noon glare, one on top, and then his double.

The neon signs in the suburbs full of graves say
'Giants Drank and Died Here'. Autos, rusting trucks, police helicopters roam restlessly, their motto: Do it
First, and do it Fast.

2

Down here in New Zealand, jet-lagged in transit at the bottom of the planet, a clutch of Flight Attendants giggle in a corner: one gay, the others married.

The sun that has looked down on Hollywood, on lust, Las Vegas and the will to power, rises, rhododactylos, on Auckland Airport:
through the tinted glass

a perfect field of fodder, five sheep, a tractor nosing at the sedge, the shrill cacophony of jets rehearsing like a madman staring at a vase.

Nothing the amusing natives do here matters in the Capital. The giant engines lift us through the sky. The next stop - Australia - is the end of the line.

----- John Tranter

At 09:37 AM 14/07/98 -0700, you wrote:
>
>John, don't know if you can get into the archives, but I posted a long >and dismissive post about this "activity" a week or so after it had >actually happened, and drew some flack from people who I think are more >interested in fame than in poetry. Anyway, thank you for your supremely >intelligent magazine!
>
>Best,
>
>Joe Safdie

↑ Index

400. Douglas Oliver
Re: Other
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Contributors to Ric Caddel's and Peter Quartermain's "Other British Poetry" anthology have been asked to comment on the introduction.

I wouldn't want to be nationalist about poetry (not even about poor little Scotland, which gets short shrift here), but as far as an international readership is concerned, Britain has been a difficult place to write from in recent years. That itself is a poetic topic of great importance for its writers.

The introduction makes full allowance for the many "Englishes" which now create a multi-cultural, multi-national sense of "British poetry". So thank god for this remarkable piece of entrepreneurship which, at last, will give the US some idea of what's been going on. Until recently, I've found most of my many American friends almost entirely ignorant about the British scene. I'm delighted if Billy Little responds so enthusiastically, for example.

Mostly, the introduction is excellent, although it will be cut down for the actual edition. However, there's hardly ever such a thing as a true overview written from within a situation: perhaps the point about the Donald Allen anthology, which always gets cited as the example, is that Allen wasn't caught up in the tensions he so ably categorised: he was just friendly with everyone. Here, a slight North of England/London bias cannot be avoided in some of the weightings: thus, both Ric and Peter Quartermain come forward from the Basil Bunting direction and place great emphasis upon the London figures Eric Mottram and Allen Fisher (as prime exemplars of new poetics), and Bob Cobbing (as key figure in sound/performance based moves). I don't object to editorial bias -- don't see how it can be avoided. As for unstated reasons they can't include J.H. Prynne's work in the anthology itself, their generous attempt to acknowledge the influence of Cambridge lacks some depth, not least because their list of honourable exclusions includes many younger Prynne disciples. (Prynne's increasingly difficult work can be read in the new "collected" due out this summer.)

The introduction sees British poetry as an arena of gladiatorial battles, the mainstream versus "The Other". A key event, therefore, was the avant-garde's seizure of control of the stuffy Poetry Society in the 1970s, before a counter-coup returned the society and its centrist Poetry Review safely to the mainstream. This was a London event in which Cambridge took a much lesser role: "If we're all struggling against officialising centrism, why are we trying to get control of the official centre?" -- that was sometimes a Cambridge thing to say. But fair enough: Bob Cobbing and Eric Mottram led a heroic tussle for a few years. Let it be acknowledged.

When it comes to such battles the names of women disappear. For such a concentration tends to exclude from discussion those who are cagey about the power relationships involved in all group movements and banner waving; that includes not just many women but many writers from other ethnicities -- and, I must say, myself (I'm rather anarchist about poetic movements) though my work features in the collection, sure enough. I am hopeful that the anthology will actually prove sufficiently multi-cultural and have a proper gender balance, for that is a different kind of battle not fully won in Britain yet.

For me, much of the talk about the Rothenberg/Joris assemblage missed the point. The point with anthologies is that someone has to get the whole business started: Jerry and Pierre have done this for world literature; now Ric and Peter Quartermain have done it for recent British poetry as anthologised in the US.

Salutations to all you out there who are genuinely waiting for the news!

Doug Oliver

↑ Index

401. Gwyn McVay
comment? narrative closure
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Apropos of the "desire" thread bandied about not long ago:

Shelved next to each other by alphabetical fiat in the "Poetry" section at Borders: DESIRE by Frank Bidart and THE END OF DESIRE by Jill Bialosky.

Now that's narrative closure.

Gwyn

↑ Index

402. Douglas
New title and news
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Sun & Moon Press is proud to announce to the publication of DURA, by Myung Mi Kim.

Conceived as one long poem, Myung Mi Kim's DURA is a whirling experimental symphony of images, forms and rhythms assembled and juxtaposed to translate the experince and gestures of the Korean immirant woman surviving in America at the end of the twentieth century. A truly important new collection of poetry.

New American Poetry Series: 28
paper, $11.95

Sun & Moon's CHILDREN OF CLAY, by Raymond Queneau will soon be reviewed in the NEW YORK TIMES BOOK REVIEW, the SAN FRANCISCO CHRONICLE, and THE NEW YORKER, among other places. That book is $14.95.

The two books above and my own AFTER are still available to subscribers of the poetics list for a 20% discount + postage.

Also, a reminder, MR KNIFE, MISS FORK, the new international poetry review published by Sun & Moon Press is available by subscription for $20.00, that's a bit more than a 20% discount from the individual issue price.

Order from Sun & Moon Press, 6026 Wilshire Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90036
[redacted]
www.sunmoon.com

↑ Index

403. daniel bouchard
Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Listerines:

I am forwarding the post below on behalf of the undersigned, whose working-for-The-Man prevents them from participation in ListServs (even small ones from nice tropical islands.)

****

Dear Poets Critics & Fellahin,

WE, Douglas Rothschild, & Tony Dohr, being of unsound judgment, come now, after many hours spent in vigorous debate, requesting your participation in a new THOUGHT project.

There has recently been a small controversy about negativism in critical reviews, we have come to believe that the critic MUST express his or her dissatisfaction with EVERY poem without fear of either sensor, damaged feelings, or hurt friendships. In light of this revelation, we offer these poems up for critical comment. Feel free to critique them, ignore them, savage them or, to our enduring embarrassment, praise them. But please remember that we firmly believe that the most sincere & useful response to work is invariably: Glib, Critical, & Acerbic.

{The Poems} --typography is not always translatible across formats so the poems are available in sep. file upon request.

_____

Textual Queries:

HARD AT WORK

[S]"he told me /Top'/ik/, [emminent danger] I heard, [Impending disaster]" --Jean Luc Nancy

I shifted back & forth

all day. I had thought it out.
The reality of disaster, over took the concept of danger & became tantamount in my mind. I was parallized & reacted suddenly & without warning.

_____

4 / 10 / 1747

Straights of Gibralter, aboard H.S.S. Providence

'Perhaps all this soul searching is the path to the final draft . . . .

'Once a friend answering a fellow's question said of me, "First he writes EVERYTHING down, & then he cross it all out." (I think this, the path this voyage is now taking.)

[Final Draft....is that what it's called as you sit in a cold office on a cold day while the air conditioner blows on you & your tuberian co-worker comes over & breathes tuberculin microbes onto the back of your exposed neck?]
'Maybe all this soul searching is the path to the final draft . . . . & yet again, I keep hearing [the words shining {path}, heaven, & gate in that phrase,] though when I look for them, they are not there.'

--Boswell, A Spanish Journal

POEM 3

April 8th & there is enough breeze to consider March a viable alternative.

Outside the brightness startles
the senses as if long beetled up.
Long since twisted completely around. Never the less, desire, the plan. Part of the image & what it creates. Imposes upon it, the still exists. & revile it. But even the weather remains. Malevolent plans the imaginary. Nature neutral is interferes, repells, light in haze, regardless of control. The sounds apart, the seems exist so much as to be both. Unrecognizable & indistinguishable from the world we've made.

EMMINANT DANGER : ALARM ALARM

ALARM
--Jackson Mac Low

it seemed so simple :
cross it out that which is not in part equal to a sense of what is left.

records of various & disastorous acount abilibies. Among the negotiation of others space & not. Look at the skill of line breaks.

{a dream of stability}

Continue hope. Remember brush. Remember the whole of history. Artfully pressed lips while thinking it out?

RIVER

among the wreackage, twisted cables, cement & retaining bouys which mark the ruined pier

LOBSTER

Devoured by ants, the way people grow restless aimlessly. Collide their better halves & forget the names. i too have no idea how it happens. Yet, have been there to see the result it's ugly, really. A question of stamina & informs salvation. Works, into words into actions like a forlorn calvinist. Ever presant, dulling the edge.

ARSENIC

or having already been trapped away from the event.
The spirit of a phantom. of the shadow of it's former self. A shell of a man, a hulk. The mind is reticent & retaliates with an announcement of its own salvation.

For a moment time has collapsed in, & we are our thoughts a relevation that would only shorten time, stuffing an edge-wise into the preponderance of a precedence of space.

FOLLOWING MELVILLE

GREAT PRIMORDIAL STRUGGLE Between Elements of Air & Water Conducted by Two Mallards & Gull

Now the water logged carcass of a bagel forever out of reach bobbing on the water. The other hovering, held aloft by air.

....topic sentences from THE WORK IN PROGRESS:

His world has been Detroit.

Few people know fish.

That incessant humm rattling around.

The Brain, The Shadow of an Idea.

Lint

GRISTLY SAUSAGE

i'm in Prauge in the late 80's & am getting my Havel's confused. Examine the window, is it open to the intricanteness of a provincial capital? Check it again, i remain dubious.

CALL TO PRAYER

"If there is a plan, perhaps this too is part of the plan, as when the subway turns on a switch, the wheels screeching against the rails, & the lights go out;

but are on again in a moment."
--Charles Resnikoff

If there is a plan. If there is not a plan.
It has worked out just as well at least this is what you've expected to believe.

Lick

your waxy lips, adjust your hat, & try to remember your name enough to put it out of your head. Give you something other to do than merely persue a course of results & the movement itself Byzantine.

An elaborate, intricate mosque is beyond.
Only you instead insist on stepping back, viewing the minnarette, & remembering the compation of the mussa's call to prayer.
An image of nothing than better signifiers confusing or absolute.

---

give up drinking take up drinking & it's dangerous enough to change.

NEW POEM

& the rocks reappear lighter than ducks lighter even than paper cups & the entrance to the canal holds me. For a moment as i consider whether it has tumbled down.

ARE ALL THAT REMAIN

Will it list the breeze?
Who might take care or of themselves, outlast?

& the cure for the counter in counter culture has now become the fashion of us all.

& a Free Trip to Arlington.

"SHOUTING OUT A WARING" --Peter Seger

Believe all danger has past either you or they or name

& the body

in the right place or they do the best you can hope for anonominity

"...to think that all of it exists only because some of it is possible is simple minded." -Wittgenstein

Is an outside which eliminates space my side of the train with the other side of the train; at the same time both sides of the outside from the inside of the train. At night there is an ouside which denies nature with it's glittery ad lights making the darknenss light & the lightness darkness impenitrable.

****

Please respond to List, or back-channel:

Douglas Rothschild <<[redacted]>>

Tony Dorhr <<[redacted]>>

↑ Index

404. henry
Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Hey, you poets have got the flat disjunctive incomplete sentence down, which is the main thing by which we experimentalists distinguish between us and them & what poetry is. The poem as something that started someplace else in your head you've already forgotten and gets truncated in order to remember that missing element. Work a little more on the non-rhythm the boredom the feeling of unexplained angst; learn to throw in some plangent multisyllabic non-references from a fairly large dictionary; work on your spatial distances between words and "lines" which are what shows you are a thoughtful alternative poet patted on the head by major people like Olson Creeley Duncan or generic-newyorkbeatlanguagepoet - and they'll put you in an anthology of (Newer) Americans - (the 14th one - from Urban Bleat Press). - Henry Gould

↑ Index

405. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: Last Blast from Naropa
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Dear Rachel Levitsky - please post that report about the dog bite - inquiring minds want to know! _I_ happen to know who among the illustrious did sit or nearly sit themselves in a pile of dog shit that terrorized the commons all night under rocket's red glare, etc.

Meanwhile, back at the Fox Theater in Boulder, the All-Star Millennial Vagabond Poet's Troupe was whispering in the wings of last Wednesday. (Packed house. No air conditioning. Ghost of Allen Ginsberg presiding). Steven Taylor began the evening on harmonium with Ginsberg's musical setting of Blake's "On Another's Sorrow." Utterly lovely and haunting. Taylor then read from a delightful series of travel diary poems written while on the road with Ginsberg and Anne Waldman in Israel and Eastern Europe - "snapshot poetics," he aptly called them. Brief, sharply etched tableaux both amusing and poignant. The old master moving in blurred newsreel now. Taylor closed with a fresh, wistful re-translation of Pound's version of Li Po's "The River Merchant's Wife." "If you're coming down the canyon call ahead of time and we will come out to meet you as far as the mailbox."

Joanne Kyger read next, starting with a long poem inspired by a visit to Mexico. Cleverly skirting the margins of cultural tourism, this work was both lyrical paean to the history of the land and its peoples and a critique of that history - witty, ironic and suffused with an underlying melancholy. Following came a sly poem dedicated to Anselm Hollo - "The tree blossomed. This is what happened."

And she closed with a lush homage to Neruda, culled in part from his own _Memoirs_. A tribute to the bard as vatic seer, political activist and master of song.

David Henderson, author of Hendrix bio _Scuse Me While I Kiss The Sky_ and editor of Bob Kaufman's _Cranial Guitar_, read next, beginning with work from his forthcoming _Neo-California_. These poems are exercises in a very precise form of lyrical irony that engages with the topographical and psychological geography of the dystopian paradise that is Northern and Southern California. Henderson's reading also included a biting elegy for slain rapper Biggie Smalls that surveyed the various forms of class and race oppression, the commodification of desire and the general "mass miasma" of our times.

The inestimable Bobbie Louise Hawkins assumed the stage next with all her usual sang froid and panache. Bobbie's first offerings focused with trademark crankiness and humor on the inescapable absurdities of mother-daughter relationships. Next, a meditation on love: its usurpation, and its ennobling tenderness, that requires only a Yes to change a life. Bobbie closed by reading her first story, written after getting stoned in Bolinas in the 70's, a serene and bittersweet remembrance of things Texan. One of her other trademarks emerged here beautifully - the story as cognitive process - not a _something_ to say, but a way to enable a something unknown to be said.

Anne Waldman began her terrific set with a reading from _Iovis II_, a section called "Asia," that led us through the weird carnival nightmare world of the Bangkok sex slave markets. An incredible evocation (and repudiation) of male lust and rapacity - the carnal unyoked from the spiritual, eros sick & run amuck, smacking up against itself in the mirror of thanatos - a tour through the loveless mills of desire, where crimes against women are status quo, the air one breathes. All of this sung, hummed, chanted, and piquantly punctuated by alarming barks and deep moans, the pain of the passage etched in the very sounds, dissonance abutting dissonance, sound become (returned to) the medium of something primordial, unnerving, shamanic, like the sequence of pure vowels Pound claimed were used once to invoke Mithra.

But wait, there's more! Anne followed "Asia" with an elegaic dream poem about Edwin Denby, Katie Schneeman, and her son, the late Elio Schneeman. Then came the rousing "Negative Capability Blues," accompanied soulfully by Marc Miller on sax. A wild, percussive, dionysiac and _funny_ performance. A selection from a work-in-progress, "Marriage - A Sentence," was next - this portion a lyrical ode to childhood, and dedicated to Eamon Taylor, son of Judy Hussie and Steven Taylor. Anne closed with a Buddhist-style chant for Ginsberg, accompanied by Miller on sax and Steven Taylor on harmonium. "No plot, no plot, embrace the stars." The overall effect of dissonant chanting carried great physical power, opening huge and liberating somatic spaces (i.e. it took the top of my head off).

That ought to have been the climax of the evening. And really, how to top that, much less follow it? But there was more. One wishes there hadn't been. But there was more anyhow. I don't know Ed Sanders, but he sure seems like a heckuva sweet guy and surely is a much loved presence at these gatherings, a much historied person and pioneer-teacher-poet. Ed began his set by recalling his friendship with Janis Joplin. This segued into a rambling poem-song (set to one of my personal bete noirs, home studio pre-recorded music) that covered exactly the same territory of the opening anecdote. Ah, the old double narrative trick, ala Bresson, I thought. Well, no, not exactly. And to tell the truth, Ed really can't sing very well. And the whole piece was, well, in a word, maudlin. But better to risk looking the bardic fool than saying nothing at all. Lament the lyric, commend the courage, pass the Pabst Blue Ribbon.

The evening closed with everyone singing versions from Ed's collection of "Verses for the New Amazing Grace." My favorite (in its entirety) was by William Burroughs - "amazing grace, save my face."

That does it for me from the Naropa Summer Writing Program, 1998. Thanks everybody for your support, disgruntlements, parodies, and very long ears.

Patrick Pritchett

↑ Index

406. Billy Little

Re: Why does this make me want to throw up?

Wed 15 Jul 1998

---

did you go to the white house website johnny? did they lay a cookie on you?

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

Yeah, I stole from
the treasury
of human folly
I spent it all on you, baby...

don't mention it

Duncan McNaughton

↑ Index

407. joel lewis
recent work
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Recent work of mine can be found at the newly revived NEWARK REVIEW, published by the NewJersey Institute of Technology & edited by Chris Funkhouser. This new issue contains work by fellow Jersey poetry comerados and comeradas Ed Smith, Betsy Robin Schwartz, Bob Rixon and Burt Kimmelman. Check it out at:

megahertz.njit.edu/~newrev/v2s1/21index.html

thanks,

joel lewis

↑ Index

408. Gary Sullivan
Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded
Wed 15 Jul 1998

All work arrives out of & into a particular context ... this work arrives goading reply, baiting negativity, "hello, my pants are down--you like take picture?" ... my primary criticism, then, is not of the work itself but the approach of the post ... cuz, I actually agree ... stormy relationships, in which both parties are wholly, actively engaged, are infinitely more colorful, nuanced, & thrilling than the average banter between friendly acquaintances ... & sure, lots of criticism, at least among contemporary avant-gardists (or experimentalists, or whatever) is, basically, no more engaged, or engaging, than the ads for people's workshops you see in Poetry Flash, or the blurbs we stick on the back of our books like souped-up "Hello, My Name Is" stickers ... welcome to the Convention, bay-bay, Robert Creeley & Barbara Guest dig you, natch; now, here's that U-job you ordered, that dead-poet-appreciation-conference-op, that reading w/ Older Morevisible ... but you gotta promise-promise-promise to Always Be Nice ... [holds up Pantone-strip-like swath of fluff; "like anything you see?"] ... at least in print ... & to our faces ...

BUT ... I disagree, finally, that "the most sincere & useful response to work is invariably: Glib, Critical, & Acerbic" ... because ... well ... what if you're being brilliant? ... what if I read three lines of your new poem & wanna instantly marry you? (figuratively speaking) (well, usually) ... the problem with this statement is that it, taken wholeheartedly, earnestly, & acted upon, is that, well, it might too easily become REACTIONARY ... like my ugly paragraph above ... & of what value is that? ... I mean, "really"? ...

... at any rate ... I'm not sure that these poems, _because of their context_, are not meant to be "bad" ... I find it difficult to enter into any serious engagement with them primarily because, well, for instance, I've been told I can "to our enduring embarrassment, praise them" ... which, in the context of everything else said, doesn't read like false modesty, or even genuine humility. ALSO, and this isn't merely being pedantic, SO MANY of the words in these poems are misspelled, I have no idea, at a certain point, whether something said is meant as said ... if that makes sense ... I mean, are the spelling errors the result of laziness? ignorance? or intention? ... anyway, I think, if you're a poet, and you're writing your poems down, it's crucial to spell them as you intend them to be spelled ... I mean, it's okay to misspell, if you're grooving down Unintended Lane ... but I sense, here, there's no real reason to prefer "presant" over "present" or "minnarette" over "minaret" or "Resnikoff" over "Reznikoff" or "intricanteness" over "[god only knows]" ? BECAUSE, when I get to:

> Examine the window,
> is it open to the intricanteness of
>
> a provincial capital? ?"

I don't know whether "capital" really should be "capitol" or it's okay as is: a pun. So, meaning is lost, the kind of fun I might be having isn't had, etc., etc. ? and, dang, man, the possessive "it" never gets an apostrophe ... its = belonging to it; it's = it is ... & the mistake is made twice, so I'm assuming it's either intended as a "mistake" or the poet doesn't quite have the grasp of English you come to expect of anything in which you're going to invest your time & energy ... anyway, there are so many typos in this thing that, if it's sincere, my response would be, "go through this again; it's not ready yet to be shown" ... & leave it at that ...

... now, Doug, does this mean I'll never read at Zinc? and, Tony, are you sure you're not one of Doug's pseudonyms? & listees, will you delete everything I post from now on? ?

? back to, barf, "work,"

Gary

↑ Index

409. groberts
Re: Other introductions
Wed 15 Jul 1998

I thank everyone who has repsonded thus far to my post on Caddell and Quartermain's introduction. I hope that the work of these editors will pay off; when the anthology itself is available, we can congratulate them again for getting it done in the first place. Those who have not yet read the introduction should not be mislead by my first post: the undertaking of these two anthologists is immense and their knowledge of their subject extensive (yet more spatial metaphors).

Mark and Michael's challenges to make my own anthology or write my own introduction are the best initial response to a post such as mine, and if I were to find that same post written by someone else I would want to make the same challenge.

I agree with Mark that a "cognitive realignment" (can I get my tires rotated and brake pads replaced at the same time?), one probably contigent on our acquisition of different economic circumstances for the making and trading of poems, is perhaps needed to enable us to tell some really surprising stories.

I agree with Henry that ideally more anthologies with different organizational logics, or at least logics less overtly loyal to our sociology of poetry, would be a good thing, to the extent that anthologies matter to poetics.

Despite my initial gratitude to Caddell and Quartermain, I still do not think my comments were unwarranted or "nitpicking." For all of its merits, ambition, and self-consciousness, the intro to Other British and Irish Poetry is nonetheless part of a subgenre of prose poetics in our time-- namely the anthology intro-- and this one too uses a rhetoric of contemporaneity characteristic of this subgenre. This rhetoric can and should be read critically from time to time, especially by those who have most to learn from it, and even if it is borrowed from or shared with other poetics subgenres.

It is not so easy to criticize Caddell and Quartermain's introduction. But I find that what are in my opinion some of its least persuasive rhetorical moves are also stimulating me to think about poetics. For example:

1) The version that I have read either puts quotation marks around the word "mainstream," or leaves them off, in a seemingly haphazard way. Whether or not it is intentional, this rhetorical feature is a significant way to allude to/inscribe the provisional quality of a key word of this essay. Its readers should ask themselves, what other ways might there be to thematize or discursively announce doubt about the mainstream/marginal opposition AS A RHETORICAL DEVICE?

2) When these editors conclude of hypothetical readers of "mainstream" poetry that their reading is a kind of "passive consumption," they assume a lot about the act of reading without justifying their indictment. Justifying it would be a worthwhile work of poetics for an introduction to an anthology such as this one.

3) I found the brief look at a "not unrepresentative" mainstream poem to be a missed opportunity. I did not really learn much from the discussion of a mediocre poem by Hugo Williams (who?). Why not for the purpose of contrast use a poem by an expatriate poet perhaps more familiar to readers this side of the Atlantic (if we are the primary audience for this anthology? For me anyway, more sparks would have flown from grinding Thom Gunn or Paul Muldoon against a polemical stone.

All of this has started me thinking about the form of the anthology intro in terms of Derrida's deconstruction of the preface in Dissemination. What is the logical/epistemological/metaphysical status of the introduction and of the names that repose within it? What happens to narrative time when an anthologist places something first that presumably was written last? How does an intro's rhetoric of self-erasure (the intro must end somehow) trace itself onto the anthologized poems? It seems to me that these issues are ones that the anthologist of experimental poetry, who perhaps cannot be other than a prescient ur-reader of posthumous reading, might consider when deploying recognizable rhetorical moves.

Caddell and Quartermain invite us to do more work. I accept their invitation.

Gary R.

↑ Index

410. Henry Gould

money

Wed 15 Jul 1998

Hi gang. Now I'm going to tell you about money. Hey wait a minute - you said we said WEDNESDAY, didn't we?? What?? Come back!!!

Money is the inedible sign of real value (labor).

Poetry is the edible sign of possible value (dream).

Experiment, the new, the inexaustible - signs of life, signs indexing the absence of balance - the early modernists became the idols/fetishes of what followed because as post-aristocrats/conservatives they could invest the power of nostalgia with real experience (they had the most toys growing up - also their 19th century was one giant toy).

So the later avant-garde is between rock & hard place, trying to be new in a tradition of (conservatively-rooted) newness - this is emphatically not a new idea & I bring it up in relation to MONEY -

ie. I think the new century will actually be a socialist century, hard to believe but... not in a military-leninist-class war sense, but in the sense of mankind growing into the species-sense, the species inheritance - so that "bourgois democracy" will be seen as a building block to social democracy - species-sense or innate sense of common good turning the excesses of 20th century around slowly toward social control of capital on behalf of labor/education/environment values -

this is the pipe dream not of adolescent Beats but of their fathers, the Tom McGraths of the 20th century - what does have to do with poetry? Dominant styles reflect cultural impulses & forces - the "alternative" poetries, built on an ossified tradition of "resistance" without the umbrella of a wider cultural ("revolutionary") impulse exhibit form hollowed out by ambiguity doubt tentativeness and knee-jerk victimology - symptoms of fin-de-siecle -

the poem as a sign of labor - universal labor - the labor of birth-pangs - a confidence radiating from it which foliates into "full" forms and relaxed plenitudes - something coming along next year? Buildings - the old battles of thing/process, content/form, finish/experiment - well, they reflect real divisions in reality - ie. if I was building my own house of course I'd lavish blah blah on it but I'm not building it as an artifact but something to be lived in by somebody else actually -

we will probably have a new/old concept of poetics, poetic form, in which experiment/craft/form are not ends in themselves but means to a broader kind of expression which is the person responding to experience - a kind of dialectic between language-per-se and what it stands toward -

"There is in English what might be called a permanent experiment, which is the effort to get the language of poetry back to a certain hard, immediate actuality, what we are likely to think of as the tone of good common speech." (Lionel Trilling)

- and the poems we will value in the future will not repeat the coming cliches of reality (in the future everyone will understand instinctively and obviously what the common good is, we will need no mouthpieces for the masses) - but will celebrate the weird toys & reactionary flops and sad doodles of the 20th century - in all their melodramatic-tragic stupidity - Robert Lowell will be the favorite poet of the avant-garde because he's so baroque & good with rhythms and was such a WASP son of a bitch - (doesn't that sound like something to look forward to?) (we were studying the "1960s" in history today - what did she say a wasp was again?)

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

411. ken|n|ing
Re: bad total
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Jordan,

Being a bit dismayed by the reaction and/or lack thereof to my original posting spurred by my reading of Watten's poem, I appreciate you taking issue of whatever sort . . . As an aside, I'm not particularly pleased with the references section tagged onto the end of the book. After the disclaimer up front, the references (laid out much like a "proper" section of the poem, the heroic couplet driving it all home) would seem to attach a sort of historical valence to the preceeding text which it had shyed away from. But, then I came across this again, perhaps telling of the totalizing trope in Watten in general, from "Plasma"; "But there is another level of complexity to ready-mades. Which gets us home if you talk about poetry. You can say what happens and have it be a part of that."

Patrick F. Durgin

|
|
k e n n i n g``````````````|``````````````````````````
a newsletter of contemporary |poetry, poetics, and non-fiction writing
|418 Brown St. #10 Iowa City, IA 52245 USA

↑ Index

412. Miekal And
Re: Last Blast from Naropa
Wed 15 Jul 1998

---

patrick

thanks for the reports from naropa, being out in the sticks that's about as close to a poetry reading as I can manage to get. mayhaps something to virtuality after all.

miekal

↑ Index

413. Jordan Davis
Re: bad total
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Mm yes. But elsewhere Watten writes (steals?) that Charlie Brown and Felix the Cat are codified gestalts for Little Boy and House Pet.

Is Bad History a codified gestalt for Language Project? Language Moment? (Moment used to mean two minutes.)

Are post-xerox operating systems insidious gestalt generators? I mean any graphic user interface that persuades you that it's normal to retrieve your diskette from the computer by placing it in a trashcan, the logic being that the non-computer world is a giant dump?? I hate windows 95. Anybody got a standard toshiba cdrom driver they can e-mail me? Apparently my machine arrived with it pre-recycled.

What will all this revelation of gestalt lead to?

Revelation? Will we be brought _to our senses_? Or isn't that just another sales pitch. Another nowhere. But then, I can't read the Times, give me any, give me every other paper.

Signed,
Sighed

↑ Index

414. Christopher W. Alexander

Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded

Wed 15 Jul 1998

ARSE NICOTINE (for henny gould)

or having already been tricked away from the vent.
The spit-phantom of shade or it's former blindness -- smeech of man, a house the mind rescinded in prelates with a pronoun of its own salvation. Rejoinder for a moment time has collapsed in. We are thoughts of elevation that short out in time, skiffing to an edgeworn in by the wonderous of evidence. wie schön!

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

415. Henry
Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Hey Cal,
this shows a lot of promise. Here's a similar poem I found in an anthology called E-Z OFF ROSES, publ by Urban Bleat in 1997:

HORSE NICHE (for Krissy Laxativity) or leaving the excrescences.

my thing called name was, and then - smeeches all around.
It's, or its? Yours?

Tripped up and so on toward morning dune trappings we shanked a then or. See it coming and you won't bark, or, even heard, maybe

- Trent Little

----------Original message---------- ARSE NICOTINE (for henny gould)

or having already been tricked away from the vent.
The spit-phantom of shade or it's former blindness -- smeech of man, a house the mind rescinded in

prelates with a pronoun of its own salvation. Rejoinder for a moment time has collapsed in. We are thoughts of elevation that short out in time, skiffing to an edgeworn in by the wonderous of evidence. wie schön!

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

416. Christopher W. Alexander
Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Hen - yes, I'm familiar with Little's work. If you know anything of his milieu, you'll know that he's in dialogue here with Laxativity's haiku-like poem "Horsey Night", over which they argued furiously at one of their famed Sunday round-tables. (As I recall, she left in a rage, slamming his right index finger in the door; he was never able to type correctly again, a difficulty which lead to his temporary name change to "Dend Liddle" in 1966). "Horsey Night" was later to appear as the first poem in Laxativity's book GODOLPHIN'S MEASURE (Pusillanimity Press, ca. 1967).

HORSEY NIGHT

Here's a tiny love of excresences, a little plan that creeps, Smeechless, into sound. It isn't yours to keep Tripping until the break of day.

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

417. Henry g

Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded

Wed 15 Jul 1998

I'm even more familiar with Little Work. Laxativity & I grew up in the same Minnesota neigh-neigh-neigh-bore-hood with Ro-ro-robert Bl-Bly, & I was privuhledged to be in the locale when "Horsey Night" was underwired. I think Little tape-recorded some of our conversations, in fact, before she blew up & nailed his index - you can find them in the Little Work Archives at Left Overbie U library if you really want to pursue this further than you have pursued it as far as you have so far, I mean. Anyway, Laxative used to rave on intensely about Keats and open form and the biology of meadows and field operational binoculars (Zeiss? Seuss?) and that poetry unfettered was like a horse with wings and here's an early-bird unedited version of "Horsey Night" I just happened to have on hand in my locale here within reach so to speak of my hand:

HORSEY NUT

There is the horseshoe and then there is you.
And my tiny excretion, my fictive live louvered Hoover fills the vacuum and is n't

- you can see how far she took it from this rigid fifties product. - H
----------Original message---------- Hen - yes, I'm familiar with Little's work. If you know anything of his milieu, you'll know that he's in dialogue here with Laxativity's haiku-like poem "Horsey Night", over which they argued furiously at one of their famed Sunday roundtables. (As I recall, she left in a rage, slamming his right index finger in the door; he was never able to type correctly again, a difficulty which lead to his temporary name change to "Dend Liddle" in 1966). "Horsey Night" was later to appear as the first poem in Laxativity's book GODOLPHIN'S MEASURE (Pusillanimity Press, ca. 1967).

HORSEY NIGHT

Here's a tiny love of excresences, a little plan that creeps, Smeechless, into sound. It isn't yours to keep Tripping until the break of day.

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

418. Elizabeth Treadwell

lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth

Wed 15 Jul 1998

Todd, when I lived in LA the lit scene seemed to consist of actors thinking they could write a poem for a publicity shoot! As for the Cal-arts kids, I know they have had quite a few group readings at Skylight Books in Los Feliz, a bunch of them attending a reading of mine there last year, etc...I can't complain about them - good listeners and enthusiastic in what i think of as an LA way which may be problematic but is Refreshing. The Bay Area can be a bit dowdy you know. My sis I know attends tons of readings, but she is much more focussed on fiction than I am, and did say she thought the showing for Lynne Tillman at Beyond Baroque was shockingly paltry. What about the fact that the dept puts out a beautiful and well-edited mag? And a lot of their graduates also have been doing art reviews, doesn't that count as dialogue?

And yes, Moving Borders is a great anthology. The introduction gave gobs of historical info I was eager for too.
Eliz

Elizabeth Treadwell
Double Lucy/Outlet users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

419. Safdie Joseph
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Todd, Elizabeth -- it's been many years since I helped run the Wednesday night poetry workshops at Beyond Baroque, but that was really the only "scene" I ever knew, and still is, I suspect. Do you, though, know Holly Prado, Harry Northrup, Bill Mohr (an L.A. mover and shaker if there ever was one), Phoebe MacAdams, Lewis Macadams, Jim Krusoe, Jack Grapes, Amy Gerstler, Dennis Phillips, Paul Vangelisti . . . . well, those were only the people I knew and hung out with, but there were others (Dennis Cooper, of course, before his move to New York) -- but really -- I admit it can seem a bit provincial compared to the Bay Area in terms of poetry, but that's the ONLY contest it loses, isn't it? Which is to say there are . . . compensations, no?

Rolling down the Imperial Highway, big nasty redhead at my side,

Joe

> ----------
> From: toddbaron [SMTP:[redacted]]
> Sent: Wednesday, July 15, 1998 4:52 PM
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth > yr right--I'm bitter. But the dialogue I'm interesting in fostering and > seeing fosater has directly to do with readings! Yes--Beyond Bar. gets > FEW attendeees for important work while hundreds will show up for a > reading by Wanda Coleman or Henry Rollins--yeah--rock'roll! THe program > there does a great job--I'm only bitter about 20 years here trying to > make things work. LITTORAL BOOKS, RiBOT, WITZ, ReMAp--are about it--and > poorly said--too much politics keeps folks apart!
>

I'm reading with Selby down here next week and afraid we'll have 5 people.
Last I read up north there were 40, THat says alot--to me--about the dialoguae that's active. I wished I'd heard you read! SkyLight seems interesting--and on teh "other" side of town--which is nice!

Anyway--

Tb

↑ Index

420. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli
"simple location"
Wed 15 Jul 1998

"For the actual difference-along-with-sameness which is found among species is destroyed by the ignoring of difference for the sake of residual identity. The conservation theories of energy, mass, and motion arise out of this same tendency of reason toward identification. In fact, all those assertions of the persistence of enduring, self-identical substances, unscathed by time, which professor Whitehead brings together under the term "simple location," arise out of the urge toward identification operating in human reason. The fallacy of simple location arises from the unchecked tendency of reason toward identification."---from Explanation and Reality in the Philosophy of Emile Meyerson by Thomas R. Kelly

↑ Index

421. Elizabeth Mathews Losh Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Dear List Members -

Sorry to ask so much after such prolonged silence. I am finishing an essay on Heidegger and Oppen and would be interested in feedback or discussion about any of the following three areas.

1) HISTORICAL CONTEXT OF HEIDEGGER RECEPTION IN POETRY PROGRAMS IN SIXTIES (AND SEVENTIES)

I am looking for scholarly texts, archival materials, or personal recollections about Heidegger's presence in the consciousness of American poetry in the period before the Harper & Row translations of the seventies. In particular, I would like any influence studies for Duncan, Levertov, and especially Oppen. Oppen's personal library was limited to _Being and Time_ and _Existence and Being_ and from his letters I know he was very moved by _Identity and Difference_ to the point of ascribing Yeatsian automatic writing to a particular incident, but I've heard about other texts from poets who knew Oppen (including some on this list) and would appreciate details, especially about materials he sent to other people or readings he suggested.

2) CURRENT ATTITUDES ABOUT TEACHING HEIDEGGER AS PART OF THE POETRY WORKSHOP AND/OR CLASSROOM

Obviously, now there are some who feel that assigning Heidegger to their students is like assigning them passages of _Mein Kampf_ to read, but others on the list seem to be either methodically teaching Heidegger as part of twentieth century poetry theory or at least providing some Heideggerian tenets as inspiration. If you tackle Heidegger, how do you teach Heidegger and what texts do you chose?

3) THOUGHTS ON HOW HEIDEGGER'S CRITIQUE OF METAPHYSICS MIGHT APPLY IN THE CLASSROOM.

My current position, toward which I invite debate, is that Heidegger may be best used in the poetry classroom not as a tool for talking about grand abstracts like the poet's relationship to the ineffable and the problem of the unnameable, but for very practical reasons related to his critique of metaphysics. To make this manageable (and most relevant to close readings of Oppen) I am looking at just two parts of his critique of metaphysics: 1) Heidegger's attack on metaphor as a metaphysical construct and 2) Heidegger's attack on the subject/object relation as it is expressed in terms of grammatical person. I welcome comments or suggestions.

Best,

Liz

↑ Index

422. Jordan Davis
the poetics of importance
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Todd --

I think I've found the problem -- there is no end to the poetics of importance -- not that anybody wants to be unimportant -- or is --

Jodfwr

↑ Index

423. Lawrence Upton.
vispo book - writers forum 750th publication
Wed 15 Jul 1998

---

to all in or interested in the planned 750th publication from writers forum slightly delayed and we are in touch with those associated with the *slight problems causing the delay - but we *shall see it out in the autumn... further announcements then

many thanks to all for all their work please be patient

btw the working title _vispo book_ has now *probably become _visible utterance?_ but the sub title is not yet settled

Bob Cobbing / Lawrence Upton

↑ Index

424. shemurph
Re: Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Liz and others involved in this dialogue -

I am very interested in the findings and various pieces available on this topic, so please keep some of them on the list, so others can follow!

Will look forward to your article, Liz.

Sheila Murphy

↑ Index

425. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: The Real Last Blast from Naropa
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Great report in all particulars, girlfriend. I have a feeling that that is the same sassy little dog that ruined somebody's blanket with its voluminous excrement. Which the distinguished wife of a distinguished foreign poet subsequently lay in unawares as the light was failing. And which a distinguished poet from Naropa herself very nearly sat in. As in your case, the owner of the beast maintained a studied (or is that stoned?) obliviousness as to her responsibility.

Patrick

↑ Index

426. Rachel Levitsky
Re: The Real Last Blast from Naropa
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Patrick--

You didn't mention that compelling David Henderson line about the fags invading Boystown, how did it go? Eileen Myles, Akilah Oliver and I were discussing our confusion and I decided it was a persona, in the poem,ya know?

That was Thursday before the clarity of the following emerged at the Final Friday Panel of Workshop Presentations.

These are the events as I remember them:

Almost all the teachers cme to the questioner's mike to recap their workshops, a new convention, up till then they've sat behind the long table. Very democratizing. Eileen Myles hadn't back from the airport where she'd gone to pick up novelist Karen Cook so Anne Waldman pressed Diana Rickard to come up and report, "get your butt up there you're an MFA student." Victor Hernandez-Cruz gave a long schpiel about this and entertaining that "we all know that poetry is much harder than prose and will last longer, because every word matters," pleasing or pulleeeese. Eileen comes back! Anne invites her to speak her mind--refering apparantly to an earlier exchange. Eileen says, in Allen's absence, Naropa is missing the 'queer light' that he shed,(give her this, that to say anything about Allen at Naropa one must eulogize) and that she'd been noticing an erasure of queerness at Naropa, despite the historical & present queer presence in the avant garde tradition, there is a constant 'straightening' so to speak, witness the failure to write Eileen into the cannon (she is not at all taught at Naropa) and we all, queer, bi, transgendered, straight must be activist in "queering the avant garde."

That's more or less how she put it.

No sooner did the last word leave her mouth and David Henderson chimes in with non-sequiter, "Bob Kaufman was a heterosexual," and then adds, "a black heterosexual," as though this addresses what Eileen has just said. Anselm Hollo brilliantly chimes, "and Jewish and Chinese." And Max Regan appears, reminds Anne Waldman that she too has taught a workshop and Anne jokes, "oh that's right, we let our staff teach," an inside joke based on a visitor's comment. Max, a known lesbian, goes to the mike and says "in my workshop we never discussed homosexuality," which seems like it is an inside joke to the folks who took her workshop but to me just sounds like further burial of what Eileen had just asserted, sort of the opposity of "make it new" on the lines of 'if it's new and feels threatening, make it go away.' Then Max, who is also the administrator, begins to throw animal crackers to those who have worked for the writing program and as I run up for mine, a dog bites my ass. I thought someone had pinched me hard and don't realize what really happened until I hear someone else say it, that the dog bit me. I turn to ___, the dog's owner and I'm pissed because it hurts and what the fuck do I know about dog bites, and ___'s totally out of it. I say, "Your dog bit me, I don't like to be bitten by a dog." "I'm sorry, I don't know what to say, he's not like that, he must've been startled by your sudden movement." I say, "Aren't you going to discipline him?" And ____ says, "I don't hit him." "Can't you tell him -no-?" I return from the library bathroom having examined my butt, she's never left her seat--events have continued along. Hours later, a fellow student approaches me, says "Rachel, I heard you got bit, I heard you really freaked out and wanted _____ to hit the dog."

No wonder the avant garde resists its queering.

↑ Index

427. Rachel Levitsky

Re: Poetix programs

Wed 15 Jul 1998

I'd meant to send this a few days ago but it accidentally went to ToddBaron.

Mark and Todd et al,

One: a correction: since Mark graduated there is a 3 credit "contemplative" requirement, which I think, more than make Naropa vaguely "spiritual" makes it directly parochial, a feeling I have had all along here. All the contemplative courses which fill the requirement have to do with some form of buddhist practice. I took what I hoped to be a theater class called "Mudra Space Awareness" and found it total quackery, a waste of my thousand dollars which I would have preferred to spend on an academic class on Buddhism, which would not count to fill the requirement, more about that if anyone is interested. Trungpa, no disrespect intended, seems to me to have been a trickster who was taken too seriously.

Two: Mark's statement that Naropa's writing program favors independence and self-study strikes me as correct. There is not a multi-pronged curriculum as there is at New College. I organized an independent study on Stein with Anne Waldman and three other students. And my thesis on Ashbery served as yet another ind. study. However, Naropa really offers no pre-20th century lit class outside of a new Blake class taught by Reed Bye and since I've been here, in three years worth of catalogs, all the major author class offered have been men: Pound, Blake, Duncan. I believe before I came a conglom "women poets" class was taught. I have felt a serious dearth of crit. reading here with fellow students--that I'm sure changes with each class. Naropa is workshop-focused with much exposure and much enthusiasm toward reading. Am I the only current Naropa student on this list?

Three: In case I sound too critical. Naropa has its foibles but it's program is run by people truly crazy about poetry and informed and committed to the avant garde or alternative or wateva ya call it, and are supportive of passing on the tradition. The faculty rocks, and what does Anselm Hollo not know about that is interesting? Anne Waldman deserves all the hero-worship she gets. Besides which (I'm adding this today) what Patrick says is true, the pieces she read at the Fox from Iovis 3 knocked me off my seat. Totally urgent and unsentimental.

I hope I didn't just bare myself too much in public.

↑ Index

428. Laura E. Wright
Re: Poetix programs
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Rachel Levitsky wrote:

> Mark and Todd et al,
>
> One: a correction: since Mark graduated there is a 3 credit "contemplative" requirement, which I think, more than make Naropa vaguely "spiritual" makes it directly parochial, a feeling I have had all along here. All the contemplative courses which fill the requirement have to do with some form of buddhist practice. I took what I hoped to be a theater class called "Mudra Space Awareness" and found it total quackery, a waste of my thousand dollars which I would have preferred to spend on an academic class on Buddhism, which would not count to fill the requirement, more about that if anyone is interested. Trungpa, no disrespect intended, seems to me to have been a trickster who was taken too seriously.
>
> Two: Mark's statement that Naropa's writing program favors independence and self-study strikes me as correct. There is not a multi-pronged curriculum as there is at New College. I organized an independent study on Stein with Anne Waldman and three other students. And my thesis on Ashbery served as yet another ind. study. However, Naropa really offers no pre-20th century lit class outside of a new Blake class taught by Reed Bye and since I've been here, in three years worth of catalogs, all the major author class offered have been men: Pound, Blake, Duncan. I believe before I came a conglom "women poets" class was taught. I have felt a serious dearth of crit. reading here with fellow students--that I'm sure changes with each class. Naropa is workshop-focused with much exposure and much enthusiasm toward reading.

> Am I the only current Naropa student on this list?
>
> Three: In case I sound too critical. Naropa has its foibles but it's program is run by people truly crazy about poetry and informed and committed to the avant garde or alternative or wateva ya call it, and are supportive of passing on the tradition. The faculty rocks, and what does Anselm Hollo not know about that is interesting? Anne Waldman deserves all the hero-worship she gets. Besides which (I'm adding this today) what Patrick says is true, the pieces she read at the Fox from Iovis 3 knocked me off my seat. Totally urgent and unsentimental.
>
> I hope I didn't just bare myself too much in public.

Hey Rachel -- After being bit on the ass, it's hard to know how much to bare... Here's my 2 cents on Naropa (I finished my MFA there last year): I did take at least two classes that directly addressed women writers and writing, and I didn't have such a bad time as Rachel doing the contemplative thing (though it does fit in oddly at best with the rest of the writing & poetics program -- seems like it's a concession to the rest of the Institute, parts of which have expressed resentment toward the writing department for its "wild" image).

But really the best things about Naropa, other than actually getting a job when I finished the degree, have been Rachel Levitsky and Anselm Hollo -- and, more vicariously, Patrick Pritchett and Mark DuCharme.

I have a hard time believing anyone goes to school to learn to write -- how could one teach this? I think, retrospectively, I went to school to learn to edit (which I desperately needed) and to find someone to talk to about the things we do and things that are done to us with words. School isn't really necessary for any of this, but it makes it easier. "You don't need company to be a surrealist; you need company to be alive." (said Ted) Or as Anselm once said "we get together to make noises at each other." I don't know that this addresses Todd's original question...

Laura W.
--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan

* * * * * *

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

429. toddbaron

Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth

Wed 15 Jul 1998

---

yr right--I'm bitter. But the dialogue I'm interesting in fostering and seeing fos-ater has directly to do with readings! Yes--Beyond Bar. gets FEW attendeees for important work while hundreds will show up for a reading by Wanda Coleman or Henry Rollins--yeah--rock'roll! THe program there does a great job--I'm only bitter about 20 years here trying to make things work. LITTORAL BOOKS, Ri-BOT, WITZ, ReMAp--are about it--and poorly said--too much politics keeps folks apart!

I'm reading with Selby down here next week and afraid we'll have 5 people. Last I read up north there were 40, THat says alot--to me--about the dialoguae that's active. I wished I'd heard you read! SkyLight seems interesting--and on teh "other" side of town--which is nice!

Anyway--

Tb

↑ Index

430. David Baratier

Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded

Wed 15 Jul 1998

Doug & Tony

All of these poems you have forwarded to the list look like poems which really bores me senseless. Please keep this hopeless dribble off our private listserv, where we prefer to talk about poems rather than actually have to read one. While your at it, stop implicating our innocent Daniel in your scheme. Get a non corporate e-mail so you can post this crap yr damn selves you cheap magnetic poetry reading scum.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

431. George Thompson
Re: The Real Last Blast from Naropa
Wed 15 Jul 1998

> Great report in all particulars, girlfriend. I have a feeling that that is the same sassy little dog that ruined somebody's blanket with its voluminous excrement. Which the distinguished wife of a distinguished foreign poet subsequently lay in unawares as the light was failing. And which a distinguished poet from Naropa herself very nearly sat in. As in your case, the owner of the beast maintained a studied (or is that stoned?) obliviousness as to her responsibility.
>
> Patrick

Clearly this "sassy little dog" is the soul of a poet, probably the soul of a recently departed poet [though I wouldn't know which one], now returned to bite us, shit on us, and have us roll in its voluminous excrement, as you so nicely put it [where I come from, this is called "influence"]. I know all this is true because I have studied Buddhism. You should too. Good for one's poetics. Or maybe not.

Recently returned myself [from elsewhere], I thank you for this report from Naropa.

GT

↑ Index

432. toddbaron
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Wed 15 Jul 1998

---

ps: Bill Mohr actually has attacked "Language" writing and other schools outside of the confessional arena. Hell, once he even wrote me --years ago--that the "new group" (1980) of poets were untalented and shuld simply STOP writing! Believe me, it's not just my own personal feeling that LA is a small town--outside of here many of those peots are unheard of and don't read magazines or books published by those outside of this here town. Sometimes I feel like I am stuck in a consistent circle of voluntary inmates! That's why I go to SF at least 4 times a year--to go to readings and buy books!

Tb
(ReMap)

↑ Index

433. David Baratier

new release

Wed 15 Jul 1998

Some may be interested in our new title. Advance orders taken now.

Pavement Saw Press Chapbook Award Series
Perfect bound ISBN 1-886350-80-9 Price: $5.00

Right Livelihood was selected by Jim Daniels
as the 1997-98 winner of Pavement Saw Press Chapbook Award.

Right Livelihood is full of both a hard-earned reverence and a refreshing irreverence. David Brook's is not afraid to poke fun at himself—one man trying to cope with life's absurdities. Much of this work is funny, truly joyful. The poems are "expecting something to happen," even on the gritty floor of a meatpacking plant. The wonder here is that something great often does happen. These poems celebrate our continuing urge to dream. As we discard our "golden visions" of youth, we must replace them with something. The poems of Right Livelihood replace those visions with a bemused acceptance— "all the gaudy world clearing my mind/ like an improbable plane gliding/ over a mountaintop." These poems are full of the kind of laughter that hurt just a little bit—laughter that sinks in, and stays with you for a long time.

--Jim Daniels

There is a strong consistent personal voice here, one that may have Eros in the stomach or specialize in detesting or renting out illusions. Music, laughter, and insight course like clear water through these poems.
--Karl Patten

Witty and elegant, unswervingly aware of life's absurdity, the poems in David Brooks' Right Livelihood drill steadily into the heart and make us ask for more.
--Harry Humes

David Brooks was born and raised in central Pennsylvannia. He has worked in a meat packing plant, a hospital, a nursing home, has installed insulation, been a masseur, an advertising copywriter, and, for a brief period of time, a salesman. He lives in Hughesville, PA with his wife.

The Pavement Saw Press Chapbook Award was established in 1995 to promote writers whose work challenges conventions of contemporary poetry while encouraging multiple readings. Writers world-wide are invited to participate. Each year, one manuscript is selected by a writer with a thorough familiarity of the small press realm. Publication, a prize of five hundred dollars, and ten percent of the book run was awarded to the winner.

↑ Index

434. toddbaron
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Safdie Joseph wrote:
>
> Todd, Elizabeth -- it's been many years since I helped run the Wednesday > night poetry workshops at Beyond Baroque, but that was really the only
> "scene" I ever knew, and still is, I suspect. Do you, though, know > Holly Prado, Harry Northrup, Bill Mohr (an L.A. mover and shaker if > there ever was one), Phoebe MacAdams, Lewis Macadams, Jim Krusoe, Jack > Grapes, Amy Gerstler, Dennis Phillips, Paul Vangelisti . . . . well, > those were only the people I knew and hung out with, but there were > others (Dennis Cooper, of course, before his move to New York) -- but > really -- I admit it can seem a bit provincial compared to the Bay Area > in terms of poetry, but that's the ONLY contest it loses, isn't it?

I think my bitter mail got lost in the shuffle--but let me simply say that the poets you mentioned--and this outside of their own work as writers--have primarily been exclusive in terms of going to others readings--promoting others work outside of a "pop" and confessionalist sensibility. That years before when Barrett W. read to an audience of 8 I was ashamed to be a poet in LA. THat same thing happened to Robert Duncan year ago--to Fanny Howe recently--etc. Few poets that are listed in your note suport the work of others besides friends. Yes, I am bitter--but my job as an editor and teacher is not simply to read and promote and publish the work of those I like--but to promote and publish a POETICS that is important. I have published poetry by those whom I don't think highly of--but whose work I believe deserves to be read! Of those you mentioned only Paul V. (with whom I started Littoral Books years ago--along with D, Phillips and Martha Ronk and Lee Hickman) even show up at the readings that Sun and Moon give--while Douglas M. and others DO show up at B. B. occasionally! Damn! No compensations besides the sun! No--a scene is unimportant--a dialectic is of utmost importance!

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

↑ Index

435. toddbaron
Re: the poetics of importance
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Jordan Davis wrote:
>

> Todd --
>
> I think I've found the problem -- there is no end to the poetics of > importance -- not that anybody wants to be unimportant -- or is --
>
Jordan:

or that anyone wants to be--

↑ Index

436. Tosh
Re: New title and news
Wed 15 Jul 1998

I just want to recommend a fantastic title from Douglas and Sun & Moon. It's DREAM STORY by Arthur Schnitzler. I haven't finished it yet, but so far it is a wonderful book. Very sexy (well, at least to me!) I believe this is the book that Kubrick is filming right now. If so, in his hands, it should be an intersting film. Go buy it!!

just a fan,
tosh

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

437. Steve Shoemaker strange query
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Well, it's been a while since i've decloaked but I have an odd request, which comes with a little story. My father just came across a fellow whose father was a vaudevillian. In the course of his act he would recite some sixty different poems. This fellow my father met, the son who is now an old man, has spent years tracking down all of these poems and compiling them into a little pamphlet. That is, all but one. The lines of the missing poem would be recited by his father whenever they encountered a railroad track while driving:

> Giving lurching Lizzy
> all the gas that he could give her...

At this point, his father wld hit the gas and cross the tracks. I'm guessing about the line break. Of course that's Lizzy as in Tin Lizzy, & I must say I'm charmed by the mimetically lurching trochees. Any old codgers and/or masters of arcana out there who can shed some light?

Thanks, Steve
Steve Shoemaker
Assistant Professor
English Department
Wake Forest University
Winston-Salem, NC 27109
[redacted]

↑ Index

438. toddbaron
Re: your order
Wed 15 Jul 1998

---

ps: re yr other message to (me)? (the list)?

I certainly would not say there is no poetry "scene" in LA--I would say that it is not very public! In writing to folks outside of LA and even here many don't know about events--not well publizised really--outside of those that get say Sun and Moon mailings. I sent out 100 invites for my ReMap party and 200 per event while at Otis (with Noah). We tried to let the world know about the events. It's hard--i know--but the scenec needs to be les like the art world and more like a communtiy. I let the damn weekly know about every event I'm involved with and they have listed every event. I'd like to see more people at Sun and Moon. And believe me, my heart has been broken over many of these issue for years! I've been here my whole life and have heard every excuse for damning B. B. (many, mine) and/or your ventures or Littorals etc. When it comes down to it though I believe deeply that if you're not included you are excluded! That's why I have 45 subscribers outside of LA for ReMap and only 3 IN the town I was born in!

Tb
(ReMap)

↑ Index

439. Tosh
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Wed 15 Jul 1998

Speaking as an ex- director for Beyond Baroque, I don't think it has anything to do with politics, but more with promotion. Plus there are so many types of people involved with the writing scene - and I mean all types. Some are not at all interested in what's out there, but the poets/writers who have been working on their work for a long time are interested in other readings, etc. Plus location is everything. This is not only for readings, but also for the films that I used to show. For reasons I SORT of understand, people don't like to drive across town for any reason. Los Angeles is sort of divided by East side of L.A. and then there is the westside of L.A. So in general I think it has more to do with time, paying attention, and lack of (or bad) promotion.

I can't speak for all readings, but when Lynne read at Beyond Baroque it was a full house... and yes, rock n' roll always bring people out (ie Rollins, etc.)

ciao,

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

440. Tosh
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Wed 15 Jul 1998

>ps: Bill Mohr actually has attacked "Language" writing and other schools >outside of the confessional arena. Hell, once he even wrote me --years >ago--that the "new group" (1980) of poets were untalented and shuld >simply STOP writing! Believe me, it's not just my own personal feeling >that LA is a small town--outside of here many of those peots are unheard >of and don't read magazines or books published by those outside of this >here town. Sometimes I feel like I am stuck in a consistent circle of >voluntary inmates! That's why I go to SF at least 4 times a year--to go >to readings and buy books!
>
>
Bill is Bill. He has/had strong opinions in the past. I don't think he speaks for a group of poets, but for himself. Basically he's a very passionate man and that's not so bad. And I don't agree with his comments above.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

441. Tosh
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Wed 15 Jul 1998

> Safdie Joseph wrote:
>
> Todd, Elizabeth -- it's been many years since I helped run the Wednesday night poetry workshops at Beyond Baroque, but that was really the only "scene" I ever knew, and still is, I suspect. Do you, though, know Holly Prado, Harry Northrup, Bill Mohr (an L.A. mover and shaker if there ever was one), Phoebe MacAdams, Lewis Macadams, Jim Krusoe, Jack Grapes, Amy Gerstler, Dennis Phillips, Paul Vangelisti . . . . well, those were only the people I knew and hung out with, but there were others (Dennis Cooper, of course, before his move to New York) -- but really -- I admit it can seem a bit provincial compared to the Bay Area in terms of poetry, but that's the ONLY contest it loses, isn't it?
>
> I think my bitter mail got lost in the shuffle--but let me simply say that the poets you mentioned--and this outside of their own work as writers--have primarily been exclusive in terms of going to others readings--promoting others work outside of a "pop" and confessionalist sensibility. That years before when Barrett W. read to an audience of 8 I was ashamed to be a poet in LA. THat same thing happened to Robert Duncan year ago--to Fanny Howe recently--etc. Few poets that are listed in your note suport the work of others besides friends. Yes, I am bitter--but my job as an editor and teacher is not simply to read and promote and publish the work of those I like--but to promote and publish a POETICS that is important. I have published poetry by those whom I don't think highly of--but whose work I believe deserves to be read! Of those you mentioned only Paul V. (with whom I started Littoral Books years ago--along with D, Phillips and Martha Ronk and Lee Hickman) even show up at the readings that Sun and Moon give--while Douglas M. and others DO show up at B. B. occasionally! Damn! No compensations besides the sun! No--a scene is unimportant--a dialectic is of utmost importance!
>
> Todd Baron
> (ReMap)

I would respectfully disagree about the above. There is a big difference between a Sun & Moon gathering and a Beyond Baroque reading. For instince Beyond Baroque is really open to the general public, and Sun & Moon is mostly a small gathering of friends and writers. At Beyond Baroque we produced (and they still do of course) a calendar that goes out to a mailing list that we collected at the door and elsewhere. As far as I know, Sun & Moon doesn't really advertise, except for individuals calling other individuals, etc. Also I don't normally see people going to Beyond Baroque unless they know the writers, etc. So speaking for myself and perhaps others, they didn't know or wasn't aware that things were happening at sun & moon. There are a couple of type of audiences at the Baroque:

One's who go every week no matter what.

Those who know the poet or author.

And those who read about it in a listing in the L.A. Weekly, etc. When we get a big plug usually we get a BIG crowd.

I also want to add that certain writers from Littoral and Sun & Moon were (and perhaps are) members of Beyond Baroque.

And I might add that people go to things they are interested in. There is room for all types of poetics. And yes, sometimes the small readings are the best!

As for the comment "Few poets that are listed in your note suport the work of others besides friends" is not true in my opinion. I truly find writers/poets are the most generous group of people - including the names above.

ciao,

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

442. Tosh
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Thu 16 Jul 1998

> ps: Bill Mohr actually has attacked "Language" writing and other schools outside of the confessional arena. Hell, once he even wrote me --years ago--that the "new group" (1980) of poets were untalented and shuld simply STOP writing! Believe me, it's not just my own personal feeling that LA is a small town--outside of here many of those peots are unheard of and don't read magazines or books published by those outside of this here town. Sometimes I feel like I am stuck in a consistent circle of > voluntary inmates! That's why I go to SF at least 4 times a year--to go to readings and buy books!

>
> Bill is Bill. He has/had strong opinions in the past. I don't think he speaks for a group of poets, but for himself. Basically he's a very passionate man and that's not so bad. And I don't agree with his comments above.
>
> ----------
> Tosh Berman
> TamTam Books
> ----------

Excuse me! When I write on the net sometimes it is between acts of eating and brushing one's teeth. When I said "I don't agree with his comments above,I am talking about Bill's (his opinion then, still?) commentary about Language, etc.

ciao baby,

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

443. Tom Beard
Re: romantic-not women duelling
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Joe,

> Tom, I certainly agree with you that lust is a complicated matter! One could also say that, in Kundera, it's "mediated" through an impossible political situation where sexuality is seen as the only outlet for desire and thus even more desperate and compulsive.

Very much so. I also see the (male) promiscuity in early Kundera as very much tied up with the sixties, and the equation "sleeping around = liberation". But I'll try anything once.

> I'd like to stay out of the self/love battle, though -- if anything, my sympathies are with Henry, though I usually think he winds up overstating the modest points he wants to make and ends up sounding like a buffoon.
>
> Nice quotes! Though, why "panic"? When I'm, shall we say, under the influence of Aphrodite, I don't usually recognize panic as a part of the > complex. And the relative integration or dis-integration of the self doesn't much come to mind either!

The Saint-Point quote (from the Futurist Manifesto of Lust, a gloriously bizarre document) comes after another sentence, "Lust is the expression of a being projected beyond itself". This, I think, ties "panic" in with the loss of self, or at least a realisation of the boundaries of the self.

Saint-Point (or at least her translator) uses "lust" in a slightly different manner from its current connotations of basely instinctual rutting, what my flatmate from Birmingham calls the "Phwoar!" reaction. She talks of prising lust away from the fey romanticism of flowers and violins, but also talks about turning lust into a work of art. So, it's a concept that's earthier than the "frenchified desire" that the list discussed a while back, but more complex than what most strip-joint patrons feel.

Kapka Kassabova also investigates the connection between self and desire by writing of home and exile (she's a Bulgarian immigrant to New Zealand). I've come to a feeling that desire in all of its forms (whether for a lover, for family, for home and culture) is an act of annexation, an attempt to claim a part of the world as part of oneself. This is all still slopping around my head in a mass of unformed thoughts, quotes and intuitions, but I've begun to wonder whether the sort of poetry that I've been working for is a text that is to language what desire is to the self. Language caught in the act of desire, language "projected beyond itself", language aching for non-language and finding that it can never be reached. Maybe this is a definition of poetry. I don't know.

Speaking of Kundera, have you read "Getting used to dying" by (I think) Zhao Xianling? He's been called "the Chinese Kundera", and while that's a gross oversimplification, it's not too far off. An incredible book, anyway.

Cheers,

Tom.

↑ Index

444. Jordan Davis
liber libre tt o (shleep)
Thu 16 Jul 1998

---

what would freedo m be like?

I liked the misspelling from senor dohr

I thought it was like monk or at least like sonny sharrock

as if there were a continuum of jazz in which case there is the white jazz of wha d'ya know praise be t npr

and there is ornette dug dohr is somewhere near ornette loft dude

may I quote bill??luoma

the narrator does stupid & forgetful things because his wife died. Douglass also has trouble with spelling and capitalization.

I THINK JENRALLY there is a sense of what weir spozeda do which has nothin to do with what we wfell feel belhaven ale!

invwear my incwar incwar invest my r friends in belhaven ale!

a pint of plain is yoru only yoruba is o is your only man,

Is five

↑ Index

445. Christian Roess
Re: Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry
Thu 16 Jul 1998

> On Wed, 15 Jul 1998
> Elizabeth Mathews Losh write
>
> and from his letters I know
> he was very moved by _Identity and Difference_ to the point of ascribing
> Yeatsian automatic writing to a particular incident,

I suppose the 'particular incident' you are referring to is the composition of "Route" and what ultimately became section 13 . (You have obviously read the note Oppen wrote to himself on June 1, 1966 , included in Selected Letters of George Oppen , waking up after writing the lines he believed he would have to put quotation marks around , thinking the lines were from Heidegger, and "re-acting with shock"(to quote Oppen) , that they occurred nowhere in the essay 'Identity and Difference', where Oppen was sure he had read there.

Though be careful calling this Yeatsian. Did Oppen ever discuss in his poetry or letters or conversations at anytime, the sense of the process as being anything Yeatsian or 'automatic writing'? And yet it does seem reasonable in some way to talk not about the "mystical" . Would it be more precise to call it"uncanny", eerie, unsettling, troubling. Perhaps 'panic' could be used here to get close to

Duncan's sense of the word.I think this is one place where you need to differentiate between "visionary recital" and "versionary incitement". Maybe one could try to stand in for Oppen at this moment, reacting with shock, then , imagine yourself trying to hold off the sense of panic by focusing in on

"a care for inaccuracies; I strive in the poem not to make some imitation of a model experience but to go deeper and deeper into the experience of the process of the poem itself. "(Robert Duncan)

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

446. Christian Roess

Re: Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry

Thu 16 Jul 1998

Sorry! My post was cut-off in transmission. Here we go again:

> On Wed, 15 Jul 1998
> Elizabeth Mathews Losh writes:
>
> and from his letters I know
> he was very moved by _Identity and Difference_ to the point of ascribing
> Yeatsian automatic writing to a particular incident,

I suppose the 'particular incident' you are referring to is the composition of "Route" and what ultimately became section 13 . (You have obviously read the note Oppen wrote to himself on June 1, 1966 , included in Selected Letters of George Oppen , waking up after writing the lines he believed he would have to put quotation marks around , thinking the lines were from Heidegger, and "reacting with shock"(to quote Oppen) , that they occurred nowhere in the essay 'Identity and Difference', where Oppen was sure he had read there.

Though be careful calling this Yeatsian. Did Oppen ever discuss in his poetry or letters or conversations at anytime, the sense of the process as being anything Yeatsian or like'automatic writing'? And yet it does seem reasonable in some way to talk not about the "mystical" but perhaps, instead, the 'uncanny'. Would it be more precise to call it"uncanny", eerie, unsettling, troubling. Perhaps 'panic' could be used here to get close to Duncan's sense of the word, I think this is one place where you need to differentiate between "visionary recital" and "versionary incitement". Maybe one could try to stand in for Oppen at this moment, reacting with shock, then , imagine yourself trying to hold off the sense of panic by focusing in on

"a care for inaccuracies; I strive in the poem not to make some imitation of a model experience but to go deeper and deeper into the experience of the process of the poem itself. "(Robert Duncan)

.Panic'd & troubled because he's watching himself there , but also opposing himself . At this point I guess I would need to mention something about antinomy(and how this does or does not remain an unresolved conflict);and I know Oppen mentions this at some point, but I would need to do some digging through the letters.

******

I like very much something Emmanuel Levinas said in an interview about Heidegger , and what it "meant" to first read him (obviously Levinas is credited by Sartre and others as introducing into France Husserl's 'phenomenology' and Heidegger's critique of it, in the mid 1930's).

LEVINAS>>"With Heidegger, 'verbality' was awakened in the word being, what is event in it, the 'happening' of being. . .Heidegger accustomed us to this verbal sonority. This reeducation of our ear is unforgettable, even if banal today."<<

How are students in the classroom taught to listen to Oppen? How can you accustom the student to a reading of poetry? With Heidegger do they feel that they are reeducating the ear to listen to what is not "there" to be heard? Or is philosophy and the teaching of poetry just another example of how we end up talking past each other?

And, inclining with the ear, what kind of head do they brin

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

447. Christian Roess

Re: Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry

Thu 16 Jul 1998

Sorry! My post was cut-off in transmission. Here we go again:

> On Wed, 15 Jul 1998
> Elizabeth Mathews Losh writes:
>
> and from his letters I know
> he was very moved by _Identity and Difference_ to the point of ascribing
> Yeatsian automatic writing to a particular incident,

I suppose the 'particular incident' you are referring to is the composition of "Route" and what ultimately became section 13 . (You have obviously read the

note Oppen wrote to himself on June 1, 1966 , included in Selected Letters of George Oppen , waking up after writing the lines he believed he would have to put quotation marks around , thinking the lines were from Heidegger, and "re-acting with shock"(to quote Oppen) , that they occurred nowhere in the essay 'Identity and Difference', where Oppen was sure he had read there.

Though be careful calling this Yeatsian. Did Oppen ever discuss in his poetry or letters or conversations at anytime, the sense of the process as being anything Yeatsian or like'automatic writing'? And yet it does seem reasonable in some way to talk not about the "mystical" but perhaps, instead, the 'uncanny'. Would it be more precise to call it"uncanny", eerie, unsettling, troubling. Perhaps 'panic' could be used here to get close to Duncan's sense of the word, I think this is one place where you need to diff

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

448. Christian Roess

Re: Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry

Thu 16 Jul 1998

Sorry! My post was cut-off in transmission. Here we go again:

> On Wed, 15 Jul 1998
> Elizabeth Mathews Losh writes:
>
> and from his letters I know
> he was very moved by _Identity and Difference_ to the point of ascribing
> Yeatsian automatic writing to a particular incident,

I suppose the 'particular incident' you are referring to is the composition of "Route" and what ultimately became section 13 . (You have obviously read the note Oppen wrote to himself on June 1, 1966 , included in Selected Letters of George Oppen , waking up after writing the lines he believed he would have to put quotation marks around , thinking the lines were from Heidegger, and "re-acting with shock"(to quote Oppen) , that they occurred nowhere in the essay 'Identity and Difference', where Oppen was sure he had read there.

Though be careful calling this Yeatsian. Did Oppen ever discuss in his poetry or letters or conversations at anytime, the sense of the process as being anything Yeatsian or like'automatic writing'? And yet it does seem reasonable in some way to talk not about the "mystical" but perhaps, instead, the 'uncanny'. Would it be more precise to call it"uncanny", eerie, unsettling, troubling. Perhaps 'panic' could be used here to get close to Duncan's sense of the word, I think this is one place where you need to differentiate between "visionary recital" and

"versionary incitement". Maybe one could try to stand in for Oppen at this moment, reacting with shock, then , imagine yourself trying to hold off the sense of panic by focusing in on

"a care for inaccuracies; I strive in the poem not to make some imitation of a model experience but to go deeper and deeper into the experience of the process of the poem itself. "(Robert Duncan)

.Panic'd & troubled because he's watching himself there , but also opposing himself . At this point I guess I would need to mention something about antinomy(and how this does or does not remain an unresolved conflict);and I know Oppen mentions this at some point, but I would need to do some digging through the letters.

******

I like very much something Emmanuel Levinas said in an interview about Heidegger , and what it "meant" to first read him (obviously Levinas is credited by Sartre and others as introducing into France Husserl's 'phenomenology' and Heidegger's critique of it, in the mid 1930's).

LEVINAS>>"With Heidegger, 'verbality' was awakened in the word being, what is event in it, the 'happening' of being. . .Heidegger accustomed us to this verbal sonority. This reeducation of our ear is unforgettable, even if banal today."<<

How are students in the classroom taught to listen to Oppen? How can you accustom the student to a reading of poetry? With Heidegger do they feel that they are reeducating the ear to listen to what is not "there" to be heard? Or is philosophy and the teaching of poetry just another example of how we end up talking past each other?

And, inclining with the ear, what kind of head do they bring? Was it Wittgenstein who said that a philosopher's head is full of question marks? Won't the discussion of Heidegger (ie.,the essence of man takes the form of a question) force them to bring this kind of head to Oppen? Is it valid to read him with that kind of head? You know, Oppen and his poetry of ideas? Lots of problems . LOTS. Isn't this bound to be a mistake? Or is it a mistake?

Where do question marks stop filling the 'head' and instead become, for example, 'marks whereby the body was said to be a world'(M.P.) , which in turn becomes another version and possible reading?

***

I just recently mentioned in a post a few days ago about "Oppen's breakthrough year of 1966", and this incident was part of that. One could argue for other breakthrough years, ie. Meeting Mary Colby and finding poetry in 1926...late 20's meetings with Zukofsky and some aquaintance with Reznikoff, mostly reading a lot of his poetry…Wounding at the Battle of the Bulge 1944…Flight to Mexico to escape the McCarthy, et.al withhunts in the early 1950's…Return to poetry after the 'Rust in Copper' dream (controversy as to the year…perhaps 1958)…but for a number of reasons you've got to consider this year 1966 for many reasons which I can't describe here).

*****

I'll wait and see what others mention about Heidegger in the classroom. This has been discussed on the list before. It will probably raise the temperature some.

I am reconsidering my position toward Heidegger which I had when I first read What is Called Thinking or most ofPoetry, Language, and Thought. I think part of my position stemmed from feeling that we knew Heidegger must have been sincere because of how important poetry was to his teaching and writings…sincerety, is perhaps the word I'm searching for here…But is Heidegger' s attention to poetry, especially Holderlin, proof of something necessarily?

I question that initial gut feeling from my first readings of Heidegger perhaps illustrated in this remark by Emmanuel Levinas in a conversation with Philippe Nemo published in Ethics and Infinity:

LEVINAS>>"I know that the homage I render to Sein und Zeit seems pale to the enthusiastic disciples of the great philosopher. But I think the later work of Heidegger, which does not produce in me a comparable impression, remains valuable through Sein und Zeit. Not, you well know ,that it is insignificant; but it is much less convincing. I do not say this owing to Heidegger's political engagements, taken several years after Sein und Zeit, even though I have never forgotten those engagements, and though Heidegger has never been exculpated in my eyes from his participation in National-Socialism."

PHILLIPE NEMO>>In what does the second part of the Heideggerian work disappoint you?

LEVINAS>>" Perhaps by the disappearance in it of phenomenology properly speaking; by the first place that the exigesi fo Holderlin's poetry and the etymologies began to occupy in his analysis. O course, I know that in his thought the etymologies are not a contingency; for him language bears a wisdom which must be clarified. But this way of thinking seems to me much less verifiable than that of Sein und Zeit- - - a book in which, it is true, there are already etymologies , but adjacent and which only complete wht is eminently strong in the analysis proper and in the phemomenology of existence."

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

449. rsillima
LA Confidential
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Bill Mohr's always been supportive and it was fun to see him when I was in San Diego most recently.

But I understand the impulses behind Todd's original complaint. Scenes have their own unique dynamics and it seems like every city -- NYC and SF included -- have their fallow periods from time to time. I've given readings to audiences of 3 (at Hallwalls in Buffalo -- it was one of the best readings I've ever given) and Leslie Scalapino and I once gave a reading to an audience of 5 in SF (at USF to be exact). The largest audience I ever read to in LA came primarily to hear my reading mate, Jack Grapes. But I had a huge crowd once in Missoula. And likewise on Maui at a little used bookstore/cafe.

Lee Hickman used to complain that he caught static from his local friends for publishing anyone outside LA in Boxcar, which only made him more determined when he moved on to Temblor. Some of the early SF langpo publications also had a decidedly "west of the Bay Bridge" bias that always made me (who'd started publishing earlier and had friends in far places like NY and Chicago) a little nervous.

Time and mobility has a tendency to take care of much of this. Thanks to the internet Meikal And & I can be virtual neighbors, tho his woods and my own must be very different.

Ron Silliman
Chester County, PA

↑ Index

450. Susan Wheeler
Re: The Writing Center, San Diego
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Thanks for the information, and sorry to hear it.

At 08:20 AM 7/14/98 -0700, you wrote:
>Susan
>
>The Writing Center closed due to lack of funds -- unfortunately not doing >the kind of business they needed to to keep afloat
>
>bill marsh

>
>At 09:31 PM 7/13/98 -0400, you wrote:
>>Any information on The Writing Center's status would be appreciated. Their >>phone seems to be disconnected after being connected a brief month or two >ago.
>>
>>Thanks all, and thanks for the thinking these days. Oblomov's mine >>(character thread).
>>
>>Susan Wheeler
>>[redacted] >>voice/fax [redacted]
>>
>>
>
>- -
>William Marsh | PaperBrainPress
> http://bmarsh.dtai.com
>- -
>
>
Susan Wheeler
[redacted] voice/fax [redacted]

↑ Index

451. Douglas
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Tosh,

I certainly was not trying to compare the two organizations. However, there is no question that Sun & Moon--with its bookstore, its salons and the drama reading series we co-sponsor with Bottoms Dream--has served as a kind of smaller literary center. I should add that our mailing list includes about 350 people, and fliers are sent our for each salon and postcards every month for the drama reading series (which is also sent to about 500 people by Bottom's Dream) so neither series of events represents "a small gathering friends and writers." As with Beyond Baroque, of course, we do not ever get the full audience. But they're invited; the public is also free to attend. Tosh, maybe you should attend.

Douglas

Tosh wrote:
>
> >Safdie Joseph wrote:
> >>
> >> Todd, Elizabeth -- it's been many years since I helped run the Wednesday > >> night poetry workshops at Beyond Baroque, but that was really the only
> >> "scene" I ever knew, and still is, I suspect. Do you, though, know > >> Holly Prado, Harry Northrup, Bill Mohr (an L.A. mover and shaker if > >> there ever was one), Phoebe MacAdams, Lewis Macadams, Jim Krusoe, Jack
> >> Grapes, Amy Gerstler, Dennis Phillips, Paul Vangelisti . . . . well, > >> those were only the people I knew and hung out with, but there were > >> others (Dennis Cooper, of course, before his move to New York) -- but > >> really -- I admit it can seem a bit provincial compared to the Bay Area > >> in terms of poetry, but that's the ONLY contest it loses, isn't it?
> >
> >I think my bitter mail got lost in the shuffle--but let me simply say > >that the poets you mentioned--and this outside of their own work as > >writers--have primarily been exclusive in terms of going to others > >readings--promoting others work outside of a "pop" and confessionalist > >sensibility. That years before when Barrett W. read to an audience of 8
> >I was ashamed to be a poet in LA. THat same thing happened to Robert > >Duncan year ago--to Fanny Howe recently--etc. Few poets that are listed > >in your note suport the work of others besides friends. Yes, I am > >bitter--but my job as an editor and teacher is not simply to read and > >promote and publish the work of those I like--but to promote and publish > >a POETICS that is important. I have published poetry by those whom I > >don't think highly of--but whose work I believe deserves to be read! Of > >those you mentioned only Paul V. (with whom I started Littoral Books > >years ago--along with D, Phillips and Martha Ronk and Lee Hickman) even > >show up at the readings that Sun and Moon give--while Douglas M. and > >others DO show up at B. B. occasionally! Damn! No compensations besides > >the sun! No--a scene is unimportant--a dialectic is of utmost > >importance!
> >
> >Todd Baron
> >(ReMap)
>
> I would respectfully disagree about the above. There is a big difference > between a Sun & Moon gathering and a Beyond Baroque reading. For in-stince
> Beyond Baroque is really open to the general public, and Sun & Moon is > mostly a small gathering of friends and writers. At Beyond Baroque we > produced (and they still do of course) a calendar that goes out to a > mailing list that we collected at the door and elsewhere. As far as I > know, Sun & Moon doesn't really advertise, except for individuals calling > other individuals, etc. Also I don't normally see people going to Beyond > Baroque unless they know the writers, etc. So speaking for myself and > perhaps others, they didn't know or wasn't aware that things were happening > at sun & moon. There are a couple of type of audiences at the Baroque:

>
> One's who go every week no matter what.
>
> Those who know the poet or author.
>
> And those who read about it in a listing in the L.A. Weekly, etc. When we > get a big plug usually we get a BIG crowd.
>
> I also want to add that certain writers from Littoral and Sun & Moon were
> (and perhaps are) members of Beyond Baroque.
>
> And I might add that people go to things they are interested in. There is > room for all types of poetics. And yes, sometimes the small readings are > the best!
>
> As for the comment "Few poets that are listed in your note suport the work > of others besides friends" is not true in my opinion. I truly find > writers/poets are the most generous group of people - including the names > above.
>
> ciao,
>
> ----------
> Tosh Berman
> TamTam Books
> ----------

↑ Index

452. Poetics List Administration

this is only a test

Thu 16 Jul 1998

FIRST MAMMALS SENT AS ATTACHMENTS

Buffalo, New York. July 16 (MP): With the recent upgrade of UB's email system, it is now possible to send live animals across the Internet. Researchers hope this will greatly expand the travel industry by the year 2010. As a test, Poetics is sending out a small "Rat." If the rat is not alive when you decompress it, or if for some reason you cannot receive the small lab rat, your matter filters are not adjusted properly. Also, if the Rat has any physical or behaviorial problems, or if it does not exactly look and smell like a rat, etc., then please report to the home office. The rat's first words should be (deadpan, of course): "Take me to your leader." * * * Our system came up only this morning. Apologies to all those whose lives may have been disrupted by the disruption in Poetics service.

↑ Index

453. Burt Kimmelman

Re: Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry

Thu 16 Jul 1998

Liz,

Saw your post on Poetics list. I'm at work and rushing around, and would very much like to have an extended dialogue with you about Oppen and Heidegger, about Oppen generally and about Heidegger generally. For now only these first thoughts/suggestions: In order of importance, perhaps: 1/ Contact Cid Corman in Japan (I have his address at home if you need it). He is absolutely a key figure for your inquiry, since he was an early translator of MH and as well an early conduit for GO to MH. He knows a lot about this, I suspect, that has yet to be written down. 2/ A couple of issues back in Talisman there was an essay on GO and MH (it still sits unread just in back of my keyboard, since I am slowly coming down from an incredibly busy year or two). 3/ Check out my just released book on William Bronk (it can be order from Associated University Presses at [redacted], but eventually the book will be in libraries) which contains some substantial informatio and analysis of GO and MH (as well as of WB and MH). I will also have an essay out from Sagetrieb on WB and GO that takes up the MH influence and in their case connection to a degree). Again, I don't have typescript on me at present to send you.

More later. . .

Oh yeah, there's someon at Ohio State I think who is doing an Oppen book (I have his edress somewhere and will try to send it along).

Good hunting,

Burt

Burt Kimmelman
Department of Humanities and Social Sciences
New Jersey Institute of Technology, Newark, NJ 07102
[redacted] (p) [redacted], [redacted] (f) [redacted] (i) Home phone: [redacted]

↑ Index

454. Burt Kimmelman
Re: Heidegger's Poetics in American Poetry
Thu 16 Jul 1998

---

my apologies to the list for my longish post to Liz which i meant to be back channel.

↑ Index

455. Mark DuCharme
Re: Poetix programs?
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Todd--

my address is 2965 13th Street, Boulder, CO 80304.

I heard Diane DiPrima lecture on Shelley the first summer I was in Boulder. She was awesome.

Whitman is major, but what he was reacting to, & his sense of line, was an entirely different historical condition. We've had Williams & Creeley, among others, since.

I too reject a narrow interest in "self." This is why I say that I may be atypical of "Naropa poetics" (Laura, Rachel & a few others notwithstanding).

My own tendency, in my studies & in my writing, would be toward a non-"occult" reading of possibly occult texts, such as those of Spicer or Rimbaud who truly were interested in that sort of thing. This is not to "de-occult" their work, but to say that the occult axis is not my primary interest in them. This goes back to the spirituality thing, no focus for me; & the word on the page, the temporal mo(ve)ment, the poem as active gesture w/in such immediacy, the gestural move toward reader, then, would be a primary source of value. (Jackson Pollock's more of an "influence" in this regard than Duncan-- sorry).

Interesting though it is, I'd personally (respectfully) reject Duncan's notion of "occult science," er even occulting Dickinson. I do love "'Trust the poem' never the poet." Not sure how this relates to th' Naropa/NC thing....

What Naropa & New College have in common is they are Western United States, non-ivy league (i.e., NOT the Killer Bees) programs, grounded in, for lack of a better term, a "counterpoetics" tradition that is both a literary & a social nexus. I think that sense of mystery you speak to is different-- necessarily so-- for different practitioners, & thus is only a common ground in only the most general sense.

Interesting to (continue to) explore these connections/comparisons--

Best,

Mark

Todd Baron wrote:

>
>thank-you.
>
>Send me yr address so's I can send you ReMap #6.
>
>Anyways--the study of those mentioned has affected my work as a poet in >various sense
>
>1) the poem as possible dialogue with epic--as history--as > a sense so much more interesting than "self"
>2) Dickinson--and my study with Rbert Duncan and Arron Shurin--has >affected my idea of what the poem is--that Robert said "Trust the poem" >never the poet..per se--and that Emily Dickinson was an Occult Poet--and >that Robert said "All poetry is an occult scinece" >3) Reading in Basic Texts--and studying--knowing whre the work comes >from--the true history of the language--as Spicer said--paraphrased-in >order to have Rabbit stew you gotta "catch the rabbit" first!
>4) Whitman gave me the idea of what the poem is for me--a poem that has >everything to do with the Outisde world as repeated represented on my >Inside--the line--the LINE--as the foundation of the poem--what a poem >is anways--to look at--is lines--and the rejection of the then current >line strangulation in sonnett/neat/form.
>
>Though my work is nothing like the above writers--I read them all the >time--I learned to READ in Grad. school. I learned to read in 3rd grade!
>
>THanks Mark--
>

>Your discussion of Naropa is interesting. I've wanted to see what the >possible connected between New College Poetics and Naropa is--but I >still see a different take--there--as there--was a long time ago at >Naropa-- David Meltzer and Diane DiPrima most likely the poets I studied >with that have a Naropa Connection. Imagine the joy of studying Kabbalah
>and The Roamtics with these two--and though my work as a poet doesn't >directly engage(as you said yr studies don't) those "subjects"--the >constant drive towards a given mystery--I believe that's what seperates >the current "academic" departments of Creative Writing programs from >those such as Naropa--and even SFSU--and New C.
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

456. Mark DuCharme

Re: Poetix programs

Thu 16 Jul 1998

Rachel,

Thanks for your post. I didn't know about the added contemplative requirement, & this strikes me as useless.

When I was a student @ Naropa I co-organized two independent studies w/ other students & faculty, one on the Language Poets, the other on the Objectivists.

The lit curriculum is, or can be, a real weak point in the program-- hit or miss, as I was trying to convey, based on faculty interest. I think it's a scandal that figures like Stein, Niedecker, Woolfe, etc., haven't rated a major author course. Interest in non-Beat contemporary poetries/poetics among the writing community is shockingly low.

That said-- Anselm is a natural treasure, Jack a national wonder, & Anne continues to be a model of energy & endurance.

Is it baring oneself in public too much to speak the truth? For the sake of all concerned, for the sake of the work, I hope otherwise.

--Mark

Rachel Levitsky wrote:
>

>I'd meant to send this a few days ago but it accidentally went to >ToddBaron.
>
>Mark and Todd et al,
>
>One: a correction: since Mark graduated there is a 3 credit
>"contemplative" requirement, which I think, more than make Naropa >vaguely "spiritual" makes it directly parochial, a feeling I have had >all along here. All the contemplative courses which fill the >requirement have to do with some form of buddhist practice. I took what >I hoped to be a theater class called "Mudra Space Awareness" and found >it total quackery, a waste of my thousand dollars which I would have >preferred to spend on an academic class on Buddhism, which would not >count to fill the requirement, more about that if anyone is interested.
> Trungpa, no disrespect intended, seems to me to have been a trickster >who was taken too seriously.
>
>Two: Mark's statement that Naropa's writing program >favors independence and self-study strikes me as correct. There is not >a multi-pronged curriculum as there is at New College. I organized an >independent study on Stein with Anne Waldman and three other students.
>And my thesis on Ashbery served as yet another ind. study. However, >Naropa really offers no pre-20th century lit class outside of a new >Blake class taught by Reed Bye and since I've been here, in three years >worth of catalogs, all the major author class offered have been men:
>Pound, Blake, Duncan. I believe before I came a conglom "women poets" >class was taught. I have felt a serious dearth of crit. reading here >with fellow students--that I'm sure changes with each class. Naropa is >workshop-focused with much exposure and much enthusiasm toward reading.
>Am I the only current Naropa student on this list?
>
>Three: In case I sound too critical. Naropa has its foibles but it's >program is run by people truly crazy about poetry and informed and >committed to the avant garde or alternative or wateva ya call >it, and are supportive of passing on the tradition. The faculty rocks, >and what does Anselm Hollo not know about that is interesting? Anne >Waldman deserves all the hero-worship she gets. Besides which (I'm >adding this today) what Patrick says is true, the pieces she read at
the >Fox from Iovis 3 knocked me off my seat. Totally urgent and >unsentimental.

>
>I hope I didn't just bare myself too much in public.
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

457. Henry Gould
wrasslin with Rasula
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Since nobody wants to talk about money, here's another hot topic, Jed Rasula's AMERICAN POETRY WAX MUSEUM, which I have been unable to put down the past few days. I guess it was probably yakked up here a few years back?

What an amazing history lesson this book is, the way he engages "poetics" as a whole conflicted field of engagement. I'm not done with it yet, but the readings from Louise Bogan, Karl Shapiro, & a lot of others are great - and the "blistering indictment" of the changing/unchanging poetry establishment, all the distortions that have been written into the fading canons...

just some problems I'm starting to have with it, since I have to argue with everybody these days, or try to -

I wonder about the overall conceptual frame of it - I guess (wild ignorant guess) it's sort of a Foucauldian-anarchist frame of history - a sort of enormous suspicion of state-cultural "structures" - is this the criticism of sane paranoia? I mean he frames his absolutely necessary critique in the "wax museum" conceit - implying that culture, like a museum, is a subset of the nation-state, and it's the coercive, "carceral", institutional taming/homogenizing/hegemonizing reality that distorts the museum-goer's perception of the artworks encased therein -

I guess what troubles me is the paranoiac aspect of this kind of critical thinking: "things are never what they seem" is like the mirror-image of ("fascist") status-quo "things are only what they seem" establishment thinking. Since I haven't finished the book, I wonder if Rasula ever examines whether there's not a contradiction involved in the hindsight- historical packaging of this kind of study: ie. his metaphor of the wax museum could be applied to his own book (more like a diorama of civil wars). So that nothing is what it seems: the only purpose of the state is coercive-numbing mind control; the only purpose of the museum is to replicate that "control"; both artworks & museum-goers are puppets in that scenario; Robert Lowell is a puppet of the New Critics; Helen Vendler is a puppet of the same long-lasting establishment; the "lyric" in poetry is a mask for uncritical thinking; etc. I would argue that scary as it may seem the democratic state does have a long and bloody real history and a legitimate purpose, and if this is the case, museums, universities, and individual artworks & poets and lyric poems might also have a legitimacy - not a perfect legitimacy by any stretch of the imagination - Rasula de-legitimizes them in all justice - but I wonder if the "controlling metaphor" doesn't in its own turn go too far.

My first response to the book is that it's absolutely necessary even if it can be faulted for its own semi-p.c. manuevering (ie. I got the sense that women poets were slightly criticized for developing their "own" networks, but black poets were above criticism for the same thing - it's called creative "secession". Correct me if I've misread this.)

This book is part of an opening-up of poetry culture by carefully going back over what's just barely visible & re-measuring things. I think that in future decades the saddest aspects of this history will be the numbing controls in place of "official" literature, and secondly the harshness of the name-calling and the tendentiousness of the various positionings. I also think Rasula actually over-emphasizes some of the political differences between poetic approaches; I mean, this is historically correct for the era he writes about but the issue of "open" vs. "received" forms vs. new forms is still in for some major new wrinkles. Rasula contrasts for example Duncan's open form as a reassertion of Keatsian romanticism with the establishment poetics of the 50s as a contrived and superficial formalism; but the strictly historical - I mean literary-historical meanings of some of these metaphysical and renaissance forms in my opinion has not been completely used-up simply because the 50s pseudo-modernists found them useful for promoting their fantasy world.

One of the never-forgettable lessons of this book is that writers come out of their own different histories and nothing is simple. That may seem so obvious now to most as to not constitute a lesson. But for a wasp boomer from the midwest born into the American language of his ancestors, who came to poetry with the sense that the work of writing was a sort of neutral ground of accomplishment, where the self met the community on the stage of achievement and the community met the self there, and there was an honest exchange because the poem on the page is sort of like a testament or a constitution, an accurate measure of work done, and so the obvious thing to do with it was to send it out to magazines in a disinterested way & let quality float to the top -

when you find out that there's another reality out there - that the publishing venues are designed to filter out quality based on 2 things: a particular editor's notion of what you've done, and second, a hidden buddy system or control system; and then you find that there are these "communities" of writers who share ideological/aesthetic visions & then feed them back to one another & push into the publishing venues as groups, and everyone on the poetics list from Don

Byrd on down laughs at the notion of "independent standards" of criticism and reading (this is not to single out Don Byrd for anything negative, just a memory of the indie- crit flap) -

well, you take all this into account & things are very complicated suddenly... so complicated that I think I'll just go back to my original idea: let it happen in the poem, & give them all the lie. The open form concept is marvelous: but the poem is also a toy.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

458. David Baratier

Re: new release

Thu 16 Jul 1998

Forgot to include address. New rat has a few bugs.

Pavement Saw Press / 7 James Street / Scotia, NY 12302

David Baratier / 345 E. Whittier St. / Columbus, OH 43206

& for selected other titles

SPD / 1341 Seventh Street / Berkeley, CA 94710 .[redacted]

---------- Some may be interested in our new title. Advance orders taken now.

Pavement Saw Press Chapbook Award Series
Perfect bound ISBN 1-886350-80-9 Price: $5.00

Right Livelihood was selected by Jim Daniels
as the 1997-98 winner of Pavement Saw Press Chapbook Award.

Right Livelihood is full of both a hard-earned reverence and a refreshing irreverence. David Brook’s is not afraid to poke fun at himself—one man trying to cope with life’s absurdities. Much of this work is funny, truly joyful. The poems are “expecting something to happen,” even on the gritty floor of a meatpacking plant. The wonder here is that something great often does happen. These poems celebrate our continuing urge to dream. As we discard our “golden visions” of youth, we must replace them with something. The poems of Right Livelihood replace those visions with a bemused acceptance— “all the gaudy world clearing my mind/ like an improbable plane gliding/ over a mountaintop.” These poems are full of the kind of laughter that hurt just a little bit—laughter that sinks in, and stays with you for a long time. --Jim Daniels

There is a strong consistent personal voice here, one that may have Eros in the stomach or specialize in detesting or renting out illusions. Music, laughter, and insight course like clear water through these poems. --Karl Patten

Witty and elegant, unswervingly aware of life's absurdity, the poems in David Brooks' Right Livelihood drill steadily into the heart and make us ask for more. --Harry Humes

David Brooks was born and raised in central Pennsylvannia. He has worked in a meat packing plant, a hospital, a nursing home, has installed insulation, been a masseur, an advertising copywriter, and, for a brief period of time, a salesman. He lives in Hughesville, PA with his wife.

The Pavement Saw Press Chapbook Award was established in 1995 to promote writers whose work challenges conventions of contemporary poetry while encouraging multiple readings. Writers world-wide are invited to participate. Each year, one manuscript is selected by a writer with a thorough familiarity of the small press realm. Publication, a prize of five hundred dollars, and ten percent of the book run was awarded to the winner.

↑ Index

459. Linda Russo
Re: vomit & politix & poetizing
Thu 16 Jul 1998

It's like this:

the oprah book club (turned up a notch only "on-line" those "in-line" need supply emails handchosen by governor's

(guvner's -- you kno the thing on the engine that eeeps ya from goin too fast . . .)

don't want no one left behind ain't spewing fumes offending anyone's perfumes
no offensive mimeo smell no musty pages no staples attached
This ain't road kill either behind IT'S DEMOCRATIC AFTERALL

-- payed 4 by the American peoples

a "Distinctly National Product" as Pound would say

unlike Oprah not supported by "private interests" no corporate bookchain tie-dies (they're "linked"

See the guvernment really does care about the arts!!! when you care enough to send the very blest/blecht/bleeachhttt

↑ Index

460. toddbaron
Re: LA Confidential
Thu 16 Jul 1998

[redacted] wrote:
>
> Bill Mohr's always been supportive and it was fun to see him when I was in > San Diego most recently.
>
> But I understand the impulses behind Todd's original complaint. Scenes have > their own unique dynamics and it seems like every city -- NYC and SF > included -- have their fallow periods from time to time. I've given readings > to audiences of 3 (at Hallwalls in Buffalo -- it was one of the best > readings I've ever given) and Leslie Scalapino and I once gave a reading to > an audience of 5 in SF (at USF to be exact). The largest audience I ever > read to in LA came primarily to hear my reading mate, Jack Grapes. But I had > a huge crowd once in Missoula. And likewise on Maui at a little used > bookstore/cafe.
>
> Lee Hickman used to complain that he caught static from his local friends > for publishing anyone outside LA in Boxcar, which only made him more > determined when he moved on to Temblor. Some of the early SF langpo > publications also had a decidedly "west of the Bay Bridge" bias that always > made me (who'd started publishing earlier and had friends in far places like > NY and Chicago) a little nervous.
>
> Time and mobility has a tendency to take care of much of this. Thanks to the > internet Meikal And & I can be virtual neighbors, tho his woods and my own > must be very different.
>
> Ron Silliman
> Chester County, PA

Ron is abolsutely right--my complaints were really meant to stir up dust--some of my best readings have been to less than 10--and ALWAYS it's those who listen anyone--in crowds=etc. THere are certainly poets in LA that participate--and my friendship with Lee taught me a lot about both those that do and those that don't--the really sad thing is that those that don't(here in LA) are often those that create a politically (sorry--that's NEVER the right word--"socially"?)

sorry state . Since LA has a relatively small community (again--maybe the wrong term) keeping away from readings--not going to them--not reading magazines that contain work outside of one's scope of "friends"/etc. sets up our city as a place where there is little DISCOURSE. DISCOURSE to me is what creates a poetics. And so--a sense outside of LA of what we have to offer--is limited. A sense inside too--makes it hard to work here. As I've published (along with Tosh in the 1980s) two magazines here--each time I have I've had responses about publishing "language" writers--writers otuside of LA/etc. When I and Noah De Lissovboy strated the Otis Art Institute "Writing the Margins" reading series--we were literally (the right word!) attacked for creating a schism in LA! Now, hey, we had writers from "up north" AND LA read here, poets from San Diegeo/etc. Many of ths great readings were so little attended that we were embarrased as hosts! Ill-attended by folks we expected would have been excited about such a new series. Consequently the school said --not again--. And we lost!

I hope this dicussion remains not simply one of "townships" --but it seem inherently important for those of us trying for a "public" persona and doing public work such as magazines and presses. Thank g-d for this internet, as Ron said, now at least I feel like LA is simply that place "outside"...

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

↑ Index

461. toddbaron
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Douglas wrote:
>
> Tosh,
>
> I certainly was not trying to compare the two organizations.
> However, there is no question that Sun & Moon--with its bookstore, > its salons and the drama reading series we co-sponsor with > Bottoms Dream--has served as a kind of smaller literary center.
> I should add that our mailing list includes about 350 people, and > fliers are sent our for each salon and postcards every month for > the drama reading series (which is also sent to about 500 people > by Bottom's Dream) so neither series of events represents "a small > gathering friends and writers." As with Beyond Baroque, of course, > we do not ever get the full audience. But they're invited; the > public is also free to attend. Tosh, maybe you should attend.

>
> Douglas
>
> Tosh wrote:
> >
> > >Safdie Joseph wrote:
> > >>
> > >> Todd, Elizabeth -- it's been many years since I helped run the Wednesday
> > >> night poetry workshops at Beyond Baroque, but that was really the only
> > >> "scene" I ever knew, and still is, I suspect. Do you, though, know > > >> Holly Prado, Harry Northrup, Bill Mohr (an L.A. mover and shaker if > > >> there ever was one), Phoebe MacAdams, Lewis Macadams, Jim Krusoe, Jack
> > >> Grapes, Amy Gerstler, Dennis Phillips, Paul Vangelisti . . . . well,
> > >> those were only the people I knew and hung out with, but there were > > >> others (Dennis Cooper, of course, before his move to New York) -- but > > >> really -- I admit it can seem a bit provincial compared to the Bay Area > > >> in terms of poetry, but that's the ONLY contest it loses, isn't it?
> > >
> > >I think my bitter mail got lost in the shuffle--but let me simply say > > >that the poets you mentioned--and this outside of their own work as > > >writers--have primarily been exclusive in terms of going to others
> > >readings--promoting others work outside of a "pop" and confessionalist
> > >sensibility. That years before when Barrett W. read to an audience of 8
> > >I was ashamed to be a poet in LA. THat same thing happened to Robert > > >Duncan year ago--to Fanny Howe recently--etc. Few poets that are listed > > >in your note suport the work of others besides friends. Yes, I am > > >bitter--but my job as an editor and teacher is not simply to read and > > >promote and publish the work of those I like--but to promote and publish > > >a POETICS that is important. I have published poetry by those whom I > > >don't think highly of--but whose work I believe deserves to be read! Of > > >those you mentioned only Paul V. (with whom I started Littoral Books > > >years ago--along with D, Phillips and Martha Ronk and Lee Hickman) even > > >show up at the readings that Sun and Moon give--while Douglas M. and > > >others DO show up at B. B. occasionally! Damn! No compensations besides
> > >the sun! No--a scene is unimportant--a dialectic is of utmost > > >importance!
> > >

> > >Todd Baron
> > >(ReMap)
> >
> > I would respectfully disagree about the above. There is a big difference > > between a Sun & Moon gathering and a Beyond Baroque reading. For instince > > Beyond Baroque is really open to the general public, and Sun & Moon is > > mostly a small gathering of friends and writers. At Beyond Baroque we > > produced (and they still do of course) a calendar that goes out to a > > mailing list that we collected at the door and elsewhere. As far as I > > know, Sun & Moon doesn't really advertise, except for individuals calling > > other individuals, etc. Also I don't normally see people going to Beyond > > Baroque unless they know the writers, etc. So speaking for myself and > > perhaps others, they didn't know or wasn't aware that things were happening > > at sun & moon.

One last thing: an important thing: Not only for the few of us in LA--

Leland Hickman did the most outstanding job anyone has every done in this--or any other--city. He published two magazines that were of the utmost importance to us all. Having all "schools" of writing there--having Ron S. next to a piece by Amy Gerstler/etc. and filling the damn void with poetry was indeed a magic job. His politics were outsdtanding and obvious. He, too, rambled on about the idiocy of the city he called "home"--where 10 poets refuse to speak to 3 others/etc. He was attacked/etc. But it all came down to what was good for the art--what kept it aflloat. It is in this spirit that I have angrily, bitterly, and happily--started this discussiong--which--at botton--really asks--what to do in this--or any other city--when poetry and poetics is at risk--when "groups" form that exclude other "groups"-when groups are thought to exist where there are none--etc. I'm not for rallying around the flag--but--a community discourse in obviously needed. LA is a great example of a city with resources and millions of people and vast geographies (no matter how far apart we are or how freakin' busy! I've know poets to drive 40 miles to eat at a "new" resturant--we can do the same for a reading!) and a problem with getting folks to pay attention to the valid work that is created here and outside of "here". LACMA has a reading series (the county art musuem) Athe Balconey Cafe reading series exists (Littoral Books), Skylights Books has a reading series, Beyond Barqoue exists, Sun and Moon has their Salons, and the Hammer museum has had some amazing readers of late. THese venues need to start a discourse--start to talk to one another--as poets in this town need to do--not just in "gatherings of friends and dinners"--but to gather to see if there is a solution to the late-20th Century demise of Poetry--funding undercut--publications dropping like flies, etc. Hell--in LA our own newspaper refuses to publish review of "local" or "new" poetries--instead publishing an occasional poem by Carolyn Forche or the like as a way out of that commitment!

I am afraid of all the loss--as Lee said " get the work done" --this is all part of the work.

Todd Baron
(ReMap)
> > ----------

↑ Index

462. Safdie Joseph
Re: wrasslin with money
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Henry, I was gonna talk more about money but I just got finished reading your 2,000 word post about it and now there's another one! You have to give some of us slowpokes a break now and then, pard!

What I was going to say is that I'm now halfway through _Frozen Desire_, the book I quoted from a few days back and it's still just wonderful. With these tid-bits . . .

* The difference between the _Iliad_ and the _Odyssey_ is the invention of money -- if there had been any in the _Iliad_, Achilles could have been bought off. "The issue is not resolved through money. It is not resolved at all, except by death. For money cannot coexist with an epic picture of the world." ("Longinus admired the _Iliad_ beyond all expressions of the human spirit but called the _Odyssey_ a 'comedy of domestic manners.')

* Herodotus lived in what is now Bodrum in southern Turkey, where "the first things that have survived that we can call coins were struck late in the seventh century B. C. . . . Embedded in the first book of the _Histories_ is an immense monetary anthropology."

* Something I had known, but forgotten -- Aristotle's hostility to money as capital in _The Politics_: "It is the rallying cry and point of honour of all those who dislike or distrust capitalism." Pound couldn't find much in Aristotle's _Nicomachean Ethics_, as I recall, but Aristotle would have liked the usury cantos . . . a lot!

And finally . . .

"Imagine a landscape: a meadow sloping steeply down to a stream, a mill with a watersplash, a locked chapel, a stand of oaks. You will see in this landscape values both economic, in its actual and potential crops of fruits, grain, timber and money, and aesthetic, in its resemblance to a painting or a touristic brochure or a literary fantasy of rusticity. What you will not feel is the medieval sense of the place's uniqueness. For to the Middle Ages, the valley I am talking about had no exchange equivalent, was inextricably bound up with its lord and tenants, could be improved or ruined but not sold and bought, for it existed in a sort of spiritual mortmain, still, inalienable, come to rest. . . It was the final and perfect embodiment of property as the earthly counterpart and sample of God's realm in heaven, eternal . . . at least until a Mirabeau or Napoleon Bonaparte comes along."

He then goes on to say exactly how the inception of a money economy changes this land and what happens to it: it's pretty fascinating. I'm not trying to suggest that we can somehow exist without money today (unfortunately!), only that we realize the myriad ways it infests our perceptions, actions, and choices -- both of how we lead our lives and how the next line should break . . .

↑ Index

463. tracy s. ruggles
Re: Poetix programs
Thu 16 Jul 1998

Well, I guess I'll post, too, since I'm also a graduate of Naropa. I certainly appreciate your honesty, Mark. (Do you remember me? I remember you, though we never really talked.)

I wish I had known about your independent studies on the language poets and the objectivists. I would have participated. I, too, think it was surprising that no formal class on Stein was offered. I have since had an intense love affair with her writings.

The spiritual side of Naropa was half the reason I attended and the amount of spiritual work I did there was invaluable. I personally found the Mudra Space Awareness class to be helpful especially in relation to writing for a printed page. The concepts and experiences there carried through for me.

But, back to Todd's original question about how a POETICS school has effected my writing... the lack of language-centered study and the almost fanatical devotion to beat poets and their descendents turned me towards a rejection of that 'style' so to speak. I would second Mark's assessment of the teachers there and add that I really connected with Bobbie's southern 'charm', and that her performance prose classes did more for my development as a poet than anything else there.

The fact that we were side by side with the Buddhist studies program and the transpersonal psychology department made for an interesting mix of ideas and taste. I'd hang out with my poet friends at the Sundowner playing pool and drinking beer and playing old country songs on their jukebox, and in the same day I was having tea with the buddhist folks and giving all those hugs to the psyche people.

I regret that at the time I was probably a little to shy to get into any in-depth work with Anne (though I remember waltzing with her at that buddhist center on the tibetan new year). I think I would have gotten quite a lot out of it, but I was too busy being a loud poet and trying to get attention through quirky sex poems and long emotional ventings. I've certainly grown up a bit since then (not to say what I did was childish!), and the so-called 'lineage' (if there is one) that Naropa passed down is still in my work, but I've continued my studies both in poetry and spirit.

Ah, so there's my 2 1/2 cents.

--trace--

P.S. Those at Naropa, say hi for me and tell 'em I still exist and am dying for kindred spirits out here in Portland, OR!

On Thursday, July 16, 1998 9:22:40 AM, Mark DuCharme wrote:

> Rachel,
>
> Thanks for your post. I didn't know about the added contemplative requirement, & this strikes me as useless.
>
> When I was a student @ Naropa I co-organized two independent studies w/ other students & faculty, one on the Language Poets, the other on the Objectivists.
>
> The lit curriculum is, or can be, a real weak point in the program-- hit or miss, as I was trying to convey, based on faculty interest. I think it's a scandal that figures like Stein, Niedecker, Woolfe, etc., haven't rated a major author course. Interest in non-Beat contemporary poetries/poetics among the writing community is shockingly low.
>
> That said-- Anselm is a natural treasure, Jack a national wonder, & Anne continues to be a model of energy & endurance.
>
> Is it baring oneself in public too much to speak the truth? For the sake of all concerned, for the sake of the work, I hope otherwise.
>
> --Mark
>
> Rachel Levitsky wrote:

I'd meant to send this a few days ago but it accidentally went to ToddBaron.

Mark and Todd et al,

One: a correction: since Mark graduated there is a 3 credit "contemplative" requirement, which I think, more than make Naropa vaguely "spiritual" makes it directly parochial, a feeling I have had all along here. All the contemplative courses which fill the requirement have to do with some form of buddhist practice. I took what I hoped to be a theater class called "Mudra Space Awareness" and found it total quackery, a waste of my thousand dollars which I would have preferred to spend on an academic class on Buddhism, which would not count to fill the requirement, more about that if anyone is interested. Trungpa, no disrespect intended, seems to me to have been a trickster who was taken too seriously.

Two: Mark's statement that Naropa's writing program favors independence and self-study strikes me as correct. There is not a multi-pronged curriculum as there is at New College. I organized an independent study on Stein with Anne Waldman and three other students. And my thesis on Ashbery served as yet another ind. study. However, Naropa really offers no pre-20th century lit class outside of a new Blake class taught by Reed Bye and since I've been here, in three years worth of catalogs, all the major author class offered have been men: Pound, Blake, Duncan. I believe before I came a conglom "women poets" class was taught. I have felt a serious dearth of crit. reading here with fellow students--that I'm sure changes with each class. Naropa is workshop-focused with much exposure and much enthusiasm toward reading. Am I the only current Naropa student on this list?

Three: In case I sound too critical. Naropa has its foibles but it's program is run by people truly crazy about poetry and informed and committed to the avant garde or alternative or wateva ya call it, and are supportive of passing on the tradition. The faculty rocks, and what does Anselm Hollo not know about that is interesting? Anne Waldman deserves all the hero-worship she gets. Besides which (I'm adding this today) what Patrick says is true, the pieces she read at the Fox from Iovis 3 knocked me off my seat. Totally urgent and unsentimental.

I hope I didn't just bare myself too much in public.

> Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

464. Tosh

Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth

Thu 16 Jul 1998

> Tosh,
>
> I certainly was not trying to compare the two organizations. However, there is no question that Sun & Moon--with its bookstore, its salons and the drama reading series we co-sponsor with Bottoms Dream--has served as a kind of smaller literary center. I should add that our mailing list includes about 350 people, and fliers are sent our for each salon and postcards every month for the drama reading series (which is also sent to about 500 people by Bottom's Dream) so neither series of events represents "a small gathering friends and writers." As with Beyond Baroque, of course, we do not ever get the full audience. But they're invited; the public is also free to attend. Tosh, maybe you should attend.
>
> Douglas

I have attended some wonderful events at Sun & Moon. I should go to more events. Time, and... time is against me. Also, I hope no one see's my privous post as a negitive commentary on Sun & Moon. As a new publisher (yours truly) Douglas is truly one of my heroes. I was commenting strictly on Todd's viewpoints on L.A. readings, and various schools of poetry. If I sounded harse in regards to other organizations, I am sorry. I didn't mean that whatsoever. The truth is we need a healthly Sun & Moon as well as a healthy Beyond Baroque. It is not only a local thing, but Beyond Baroque as well as Sun & Moon has supported artists from different cities and nations. Many people see these organizations as being only L.A., but I see these organizations more as an international as well as a local outlet for writing, etc. Besides it is not really an aesthetic problem but a financial problem. And that is affecting culture in general. For the work Beyond Baroque & Sun & Moon has done, it should be RICH RICH!! And that goes for other art organizations!

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

465. Wendy Battin
Re: plasma & other hotstuff
Thu 16 Jul 1998

As an aside, and I say this in all friendship.
as an all to whom some friend might turn,
I'm not particularly shy of M. Watten despite he malaprop my name most antic.

Some chop shops sell metal, some sell iron.
Damnded if I'll indulge a why where how might happen.
It's foolish to be lonely on this earth and that compounds it. Trap door. That and the spring are best, and the lever, as long as we have weight to drop there.

> Being a bit dismayed by the reaction and/or lack thereof to my original posting spurred by my reading of Watten's poem, I appreciate you taking issue of whatever sort . . . As an aside, I'm not particularly pleased with the references section tagged onto the end of the book. After the disclaimer up front, the references (laid out much like a "proper" section of the poem, the heroic couplet driving it all home) would seem to attach a sort of historical valence to the preceeding text which it had shyed away from. But, then I came across this again, perhaps telling of the totalizing trope in Watten in general, from "Plasma";
> "But there is another level of complexity to ready-mades. Which gets us home if you talk about poetry. You can say what happens and have it be a part of that."
>
> Patrick F. Durgin

Wendy Battin
[redacted]
http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Lofts/5471/ashland.html

I envy paranoids; they actually feel people are paying attention to them. --Susan Sontag

↑ Index

466. louis stroffolino
Re: wrasslin with Rasula (what about a. watts?)
Fri 17 Jul 1998

I read "wax museum" several years ago, and though i find it a great read (and have lot of notes on it lying around somewhere just waiting for more free time to....) i guess the big memory --or the most recurrent one--is the superficial organizing structure of a kind of manichean dualism: berryman and lowell--bad suns of pound-- vs. duncan and olson good (or less "museumed" because less "museumable" presumably); also the characterization of bogan as THE woman..... ------ A RELATED (or relatable) topic I'd like to start: and i heard one of those alan (i think not allen) watts lecture tapes on WFMU today and realize how he often gets me and how I haven't read him in years.... read him before keroauc (and read "dharma bums" not knowing he was a character in it. tempted to go back and try to find the passages) anyway, when i was a philosophy major as undergrad, i was very into THE BOOK (on the taboo against knowing who you are or something) and THE WISDOM OF INSECURITY. My Philosophy teachers of course said "well, he isn't really philosophy." Did that have something to do with my switching to English major? so, any "defenders" or "detractors" of Watts out there? (this is not an issue of "but he's not original; just a popularizer of other ideas, etc." but more of an issue of his particular style (as writer and/or performer) and the way it relates to what is more "properly" called poetry. Is he in the wax museum too?

chris

On Thu, 16 Jul 1998, Henry Gould wrote:

> Since nobody wants to talk about money, here's another hot topic, Jed Rasula's AMERICAN POETRY WAX MUSEUM, which I have been unable to put down > the past few days. I guess it was probably yakked up here a few years back?
>
> What an amazing history lesson this book is, the way he engages "poetics" as a whole conflicted field of engagement. I'm not done with it yet, but the readings from Louise Bogan, Karl Shapiro, & a lot of others are great - and the "blistering indictment" of the changing/unchanging poetry establishment, all the distortions that have been written into the fading canons...
>
> just some problems I'm starting to have with it, since I have to argue with everybody these days, or try to -
>
> I wonder about the overall conceptual frame of it - I guess (wild ignorant guess) it's sort of a Foucauldian-anarchist frame of history - a sort of enormous suspicion of state-cultural "structures" - is this the criticism of sane paranoia? I mean he frames his absolutely necessary critique in the "wax museum" conceit - implying that culture, like a museum, is a subset of the nation-state, and it's the coercive, "carceral", institutional taming/homogenizing/hegemonizing reality that distorts the museum-goer's perception of the artworks encased therein -

I guess what troubles me is the paranoiac aspect of this kind of critical thinking: "things are never what they seem" is like the mirror-image of ("fascist") status-quo "things are only what they seem" establishment thinking. Since I haven't finished the book, I wonder if Rasula ever examines whether there's not a contradiction involved in the hindsight-historical packaging of this kind of study: ie. his metaphor of the wax museum could be applied to his own book (more like a diorama of civil wars). So that nothing is what it seems: the only purpose of the state is coercive-numbing mind control; the only purpose of the museum is to replicate that "control"; both artworks & museum-goers are puppets in that scenario; Robert Lowell is a puppet of the New Critics; Helen Vendler is a puppet of the same long-lasting establishment; the "lyric" in poetry is a mask for uncritical thinking; etc. I would argue that scary as it may seem the democratic state does have a long and bloody real history and a legitimate purpose, and if this is the case, museums, universities, and individual artworks & poets and lyric poems might also have a legitimacy - not a perfect legitimacy by any stretch of the imagination - Rasula de-legitimizes them in all justice - but I wonder if the "controlling metaphor" doesn't in its own turn go too far.

My first response to the book is that it's absolutely necessary even if it can be faulted for its own semi-p.c. manuevering (ie. I got the sense that women poets were slightly criticized for developing their "own" networks, but black poets were above criticism for the same thing - it's called creative "secession". Correct me if I've misread this.)

This book is part of an opening-up of poetry culture by carefully going back over what's just barely visible & re-measuring things. I think that in future decades the saddest aspects of this history will be the numbing controls in place of "official" literature, and secondly the harshness of the name-calling and the tendentiousness of the various positionings. I also think Rasula actually over-emphasizes some of the political differences between poetic approaches; I mean, this is historically correct for the era he writes about but the issue of "open" vs. "received" forms vs. new forms is still in for some major new wrinkles. Rasula contrasts for example Duncan's open form as a reassertion of Keatsian romanticism with the establishment poetics of the 50s as a contrived and superficial formalism; but the strictly historical - I mean literary-historical meanings of some of these metaphysical and renaissance forms in my opinion has not been completely used-up simply because the 50s pseudo-modernists found them useful for promoting their fantasy world.

One of the never-forgettable lessons of this book is that writers come out of their own different histories and nothing is simple. That may seem so obvious now to most as to not constitute a lesson. But for a > wasp boomer from the midwest born into the American language of his ancestors, who came to poetry with the sense that the work of writing was a sort of neutral ground of accomplishment, where the self met the community on the stage of achievement and the community met the self there, and there was an honest exchange because the poem on the page is sort of like a testament or a constitution, an accurate measure of work done, and so the obvious thing to do with it was to send it out to magazines in a disinterested way & let quality float to the top -

>
> when you find out that there's another reality out there - that the publishing venues are designed to filter out quality based on 2 things: a particular editor's notion of what you've done, and second, a hidden buddy system or control system; and then you find that there are these "communities" of writers who share ideological/aesthetic visions & then feed them back to one another & push into the publishing venues as groups, and everyone on the poetics list from Don Byrd on down laughs at the notion of "independent standards" of criticism and reading (this is not to single out Don Byrd for anything negative, just a memory of the indie-crit flap) -
>
> well, you take all this into account & things are very complicated suddenly... so complicated that I think I'll just go back to my original idea: let it happen in the poem, & give them all the lie. The open form concept is marvelous: but the poem is also a toy.
>
> - Henry Gould

↑ Index

467. Catherine Daly
LA Job Announcements and re:readings
Fri 17 Jul 1998

This is a multi-part message in MIME format.

--part0_900651252_boundary

I have actually been pretty surprised with the turnouts at readings which snail or email calendars to me (so that I can put a copy on my fridge and a copy at work): Beyond Baroque, Sun & Moon, and Writers on Site are the big three as far as organizational skills/mailings go. I am really sorry I missed Fanny Howe at Midnight Special, as she is one of my favorites, and they do have an e-mail list for readings.

Complete listings of LA area readings are very helpful and much appreciated!

I missed a slew of readings recently. But really, these several-hours-in-a- car-to-and-fro slogs around smog city for readings are not pleasant.

Catherine Daly
[redacted]

--part0_900651252_boundary

air05.mail.aol.com (v45.18) with SMTP; Wed, 15 Jul 1998 14:33:01
-0400
by relay28.mx.aol.com (8.8.8/8.8.5/AOL-4.0.0)
with ESMTP id OAA16970; Wed, 15 Jul 1998 14:31:46 -0400 (EDT)
by shim.LABridge.com (8.8.8/8.8.8) with SMTP id LAA02876;
Wed, 15 Jul 1998 11:27:31 -0700
with SMTP (Apple Internet Mail Server 1.1.1); Wed, 15 Jul 1998 10:58:39
-0700
(Stalker SMTP Server 1.6b7) with ESMTP id S.0002244329 for <[redacted]>; Wed, 15 Jul 1998 10:58:40 -0700 by thecity.sfsu.edu (8.8.7/8.8.6) with SMTP id KAA19692;
Wed, 15 Jul 1998 10:58:12 -0700 (PDT)
From: "Lawrence Thoo" <[redacted]>
To: <[redacted]>, <[redacted]>
Subject: Fw: Job Announcements
Date: Wed, 15 Jul 1998 10:57:24 -0700

Please distribute.

-----Original Message-----
From: [redacted] <[redacted]>
To: Multiple recipients of list <[redacted]>
Date: Wednesday, July 15, 1998 7:40 AM
Subject: Job Announcements

>JOB ANNOUNCEMENTS
>
>July 15, 1998
>
>
>1. Director of Programs / Member Services
>
>Applications are now being accepted for the position of Director of Programs /
>Member Services with a nationally recognized statewide arts service >organization which serves the professional development needs of the arts >community in California.
>
>JOB DESCRIPTION: The Director will be responsible for the oversight / >management of CALAA's technical assistance support to the local arts age= ncy >field including coordination of Fundamentals / other skills building >workshops, regional consultancies, Peer Advisory Network mentoring program - >orientation & training; email listserv / online / internet communication= s >management; newsletter production, Statewide District Network - meeting >coordination and network management; Annual Convention logistical planni= ng;

>information gathering & dissemination to the membership; member services=
;
and >coordination of special projects including the annual Governor's Confere= nce on >the Arts. Works closely with CAC staff. Small office. Reports directl= y
to >President.
>
>EXPERIENCE: Minimum three years experience in Local Arts Agency managem= ent >required plus general nonprofit arts organization experience. The successful >candidate should have direct experience in, and familiarity with, techni= cal >assistance provision, including Board of Director development, marketing=
,
>fundraising, staff management, publications, personnel and financial matters.
>Familiarity with California Arts Council workings and advocacy also helpful.
>BA or higher degree a plus.
>
>SKILLS: Applicant must be proficient in word processing, data managemen= t, >online internet communications. Must have meeting / event planning skil= ls;
>excellent written / verbal / communication skills. Must be able to mana= ge

>multiple projects simultaneously, handle diverse demands and needs. Som= e >travel required.
>
>COMPENSATION: Competitive salary, plus excellent benefits, working >environment.
>
>Submit resume, list of references and cover letter to:
>
>SEARCH
>CALAA
>870 Market St., Suite 640
>San Francisco, CA. 94102
>
>Equal Opportunity Employer. No telephone calls. Position open as of August
>1st.
>
>2. Bookkeeper
>
>Applications are now being accepted for a part time, (3 days per week -- may >expand to full time) bookkeeper for statewide membership based arts serv= ice >provider organization.
>
>
>JOB DESCRIPTION: Responsible for processing invoices for member based >statewide arts agency (bulk of which are under state / federal governmen= t >agency contracts); post to books, produce reports (P&L Statement; Balanc= e
>Sheet; Financial Statements for Grant Awards); track Budget projected Income / >Expenses compared to Actual Income / Expenses quarterly. Compliance wit= h >regulations for fiscal sponsorship clients. Manage internal finances -
A/P - >A/C (payroll handled by independent service; taxes, annual review by >independent accounting firm). Manage membership dues. Work with Board >Treasurer. Small office - report to President.
>

>EXPERIENCE: Nonprofit / arts agency experience preferred. Experience w= ith >state contracts a plus. Applicant should have a minimum of three years >bookkeeping experience in an organization with a minimum $250,000 annual >budget.
>
>SKILLS: Must have strong working knowledge of general accounting skills=
.
>Must be proficient in QuickBooks Pro, Excel, Microsoft Word, Mac / PC >platforms, email. Applicant needs to have excellent written / verbal skills >and able to juggle numerous detail oriented projects simultaneously. Mu= st
be >organized and have excellent time management skills. Formal accounting >training a plus.
>
>COMPENSATION: Competitive DOE. Excellent benefits. Position may expan= d
to >FT.
>
>Submit resume, list of references (required) and cover letter to:
>
>SEARCH
>CALAA
>870 Market St., Suite 640
>San Francisco, CA. 94102
>
>Equal Opportunity Employer. No telephone calls. Position open as of August
>1st.
>

--part0_900651252_boundary--

↑ Index

468. George Bowering
Re: well, now
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Now it transpires that David Bromige's troublesome novel _Piccolo Mondo_, which has been for 6 months on line from Coach House Books, is at last out as a fetish object from CHB. It is a thinly fictionalized account of poetic and student life in the late fifties and early sixties, and manages to speak badly of just about everyone in both those spheres from that time. Tch tch.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

469. toddbaron
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

tosh:

yr right--tyhe entire discussion on my part really has the same motive--to begin a DISCOURSE (large) about what to do in a city that funds everything else so wonderfully--but cannot seem to fit two venues into one city of 4.5 million people. It, I'm afraid, is political and suirely not simply a problem of funding. If we haven't learned by now how to avoid that pitfall--late 20th century--than we haven't learned much in the way of being public with our art!

BB vrs Sun and Moon--no--I doubt anyone thought you were saying that. BUT--a political aesthetic is (IS) at foot and hand when one sees various and sundry wonderful porgrams in other cities--translation programs--seminars on late 20th century poetics--arts and poetry--to name a few recent happenings--and LA can't seem to support one even. (NO--NO--they don't happen here--they don't work here--WHY? support! RibOt has had the only "conference" in my mind of great value in MANY years! See the last RiBot for evidence. the LA POETRY FEST. just--I'm afraid--doesn't count. It's a conservative "pop" forum) I think BB gets the raw deal because BB is and says it is--the "only" literary arts center in LA." While this is VAGUELY true--you--more than any single soul --must know that the board of directions has--like any other (give them that) an agenda. The agenda doesn't always parlay into a stance towards or even against a "poetics"--not when the board is made up of those not in the field of literature per se.

Artists that work in a visual medium are not necesarily the best to overse a oftimes federally funded venue! THAT's given BB a "bad" name--and--again--deserved or not--folks in this asylum are/have been/fed up with the "blackness" of the place. (Literally--the stage itself is solid black!) BUT--of course--suport the venues we must. I won't pretend not to accept a reading there--I go where invited! Several this past week in LA have said they missed a GREAT reading by Diane Ward and Noah De Lissovoy simply because "B.B. is not a place of importance anymore..." and the like.

Phew~! Listen--we barely fkin exist! No life support is wrong at this time--esp. the simple support of a poetics community!

Breath!

Tb
(ReMap)

ps: "distance" is no excuse. People in this pueblo travel forty miles to try the new "Japo-French-Columbian-Hungarian--Fried Chicken" resturant--further for a cocktail party--less for a reading!!! (Unles of course you count the readings where "stars" read "their" poems!) Hell-----

↑ Index

470. toddbaron
Re: Poetix programs
Fri 17 Jul 1998

It sounds like the group consensus is--paraphrased--so far--that a poetics dept. doesn't really affect the poets involved! Otherthan the standard--I studied this and studied that! I wonder...what about the idea of beiung in large groups of poets and poet-teachers--and readers!? Isn't this a different world than one re-enters after grad?

↑ Index

471. Maria Damon
Re: Poetix programs
Fri 17 Jul 1998

At 8:02 AM +0000 7/17/98, toddbaron wrote:
>It sounds like the group consensus is--paraphrased--so far--that a >poetics dept. doesn't really affect the poets involved! Otherthan the >standard--I studied this and studied that! I wonder...what about the >idea of beiung in large groups of poets and poet-teachers--and readers!?
>Isn't this a different world than one re-enters after grad?

this consensus seems to me to underestimate the power and varieties of "influence." of course people would claim to not be influenced by their poetics department; even in a post-structuralist world people have some investment in their own "originality," or at least might not see the influence of anything as banal as an institution.

↑ Index

472. Mark Prejsnar
Re: wrasslin with Rasula
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Henry,

i believe you are over-intellectualizing the perspective and theses of the Wax Museum. It might well be glossed as having a "foucauldian-anarchist" framework; but that would be your parsing-out of the approach JR takes...I don't believe he sets out to utilize a specific critical/historical methodolgy. Nor is one in evidence in my opinion, beyond a certain commonsense literary-historical narrativity (overlain by those fancy pyrotecnix involving the museum trope, which have blown more than a few people away, but which after a while come to seem just a mite tedious, not to say extrinsic to the specific historical insights...)

And your claim (as i understand it) that the book demonstrates a "nothing is what it seems" philosophy is just plain silly. "Robert Lowell is a puppet of the New Critics?" You're not serious, right? Lines of relation and force and clash Rasula does indeed trace.....But the paraphrases you give are nonsense. That Lowell and the NCrits are part of a single very basic and powerful moment in the americun po'tree, is fairly self-evident. Indeed, MUCH of what the Wax Museum says is (like this example) hardly controversial at all! it is the sweep and fairness and specificity of JR's account that seem important. Of course if he really said Lowell was somebody's puppet, that might be a little controversial, but he doesn't. He points out alliances and influences and other lines of relation, that's all. (And, as i've posted here in the past, the other thing i find important about the book is the intelligence and nonpartisan attention with which he approaches the task of analyzing the "social sites" of poetry vocation...) from amongst the foo-cold of poetry,

mark p.

↑ Index

473. Michael Franco
BOSTPN ALT POFEST FRIDAY UPDATE
Fri 17 Jul 1998

M. Franco here for Aaron Kiely's BOSTON ALTERNATIVE POETRY CONFERENCE: BLACKSMITH HOUSE, CAMBRIDGE MA. [HARVARD SQUARE]

FRI-SUN JULY 17-19 1998. UPDATE: AWOL SCALAPINO, MLINKO, FUNKHAUSER: Joseph Lease will now be reading Sunday Night

READERS/PRESENTERS:

BERNSTEIN, MESSERLI, TAGGART, MATLIN, TORRA, LANSING, F. HOWE, R. WALDROP, BOUCHARD, WARSH, JARNOT, BANSINSKI, GANICK, W. ALEXANDER, PREAVALLET, FUNKHOUSER, ZHANG ER, DOUD, LEASE, L. SCHWARTZ, D. GARDNER, KRUKOWSKI, ,BURGER, W HOWE, GRUMNAN, BRADY, POUND, KRAMER, KNOX, WARSH, S. COLE, B. ANDERSON, GILMORE, KIELEYWERSHLER-HENRY, KIRSCHENBAUM, KRAMER, FRANCO,

FRIDAY JULY 17

READING: 7:30 [PLEASE NOTE NEW SRTARTING TIME]
INTRODUCTION TO THE WEEKEND: w/ KIELY, SCHWARTZ & ALEXANDER

NIGHT READING:
 F. HOWE D. BOUCHARD, GARDNER

SAT JULY 18- 9: 30AM {scones to be served}
VOCABULARY AND IMIGINATIONS: PANAL W/ MESSERLLI, ALEXANDER, SCHWARTZ, MATLIN, KIELEY, LEASE,   & FRANCO

12:00 READING W/ TORRA, LANSING, & KRUKOWSKI & KIELY

2PM: BIOGRAPHY & CRITCISM PANAL: W/ PREVALLET ON HELEN ADAM... JARNOT ON DUNCAN, ALEXANDER ON LAMANTIA TAGGART ON OPPEN, KNOX ON KOCH & ASHBERY, KIRSCHENBAUM ON d.a.levy, GILMORE ON OPPENHEIMER.

4PM AFTERNOON READING W/ TAGGART, KNOX, SCHWARTZ, ZHANG ER, KNOX, ANDERSON,BRADY, S.COLE

6PM DAVID MATLIN ON HIS NEW BOOK

7PM NIGHT READING: WARSH, JARNOT, MATLIN, ALEXANDER

SUNDAY JULY 19
{more scones}

10AM NEW POETRY PANEL PRESENTED & ORGANIZED BY BASINSKI w/ KRAMER, BRADY, BURGER, W.HOWE, WERSHLER-HENRY, GRUMMAN & POUND

2PM AFTERNOON READING: WALDROP, MESSERLI, DOUD & FRANCO

4PM PUBLISHING PANAL: W/ TORRA, MESSERLI, BOUCHARD, GANICK, KIRCHENBAUM

7PM NIGHT READING PREAVALLET, GANICK & LEASE

8PM CHARLES BERNSTEIN; POETRY & POETICS

ADMISSIONS:
$5/reading, $15/saturday pass, $10/sunday pass,
$35/weekend-people can reserve their space now through email or phone and then pay at the conference- checks payable to aaron kiely at p.o.box 441517 somerville, ma 02144-INFORMATION / RESERVATIONS: highly recomended- space is now quickly filling up

Aaron Kiely
PO box 441517
Somerville Ma 02144
or Email [redacted]
[redacted]

AGAIN BEST TO ALL ON THE LIST & THANKS TO AARON FOR DOING ALL OF THIS AMAZING WORK
MICHAEL FRANCO

↑ Index

474. Michael Magee
never mind the canon, here's COMBO!
Fri 17 Jul 1998

SPLITTING CORNERS PUBLICATIONS presents...

...a HUB ROOM production...

...of a Michael Magee journal...

```
 cccc    oooo   mm  mm  bbbbb   oooo
cc   c  oo  oo  m mm m  b    b oo  oo cc      oo  oo  m  m m  bbbbb  oo  oo cc      oo  oo  m  m m  b    b oo  oo
```

cc c oo oo m m m b b oo oo
cccc oooo mm m mm bbbbb oooo

...with...

BOB PERELMAN

HARRYETTE MULLEN
LEE ANN BROWN
CHRIS STROFFOLINO

JENA OSMAN
LOUIS CABRI

KRISTEN GALLAGHER

ANDREW EPSTEIN
KATHERINE STEELE

MICHAEL MAGEE
KERRY SHERIN
JOHN PARKER
MATT HART

...and introducing JESSICA CHIU as herself

****

COMBO is a journal of poetry and poetics designed as a forum for younger, innovative writers in their 20's and early 30's. Our premise is that it's impossible to answer questions like "What do we find in the way of work [by younger writers] that is actually new?" (Ron Silliman), unless there are contexts in which to ask them. With one exception, all the younger writers here contribute 3 or more poems or 3 or more pages of work. The more established writers were asked to contribute because, by some random and unscientific consensus, they have influenced those younger writers. Harryette Mullen's contribution is a 16 page interview, occupying the back pages as part of an ongoing discussion of poetics.

COMBO is 52 pages on nice off-white paper, side-stapled with cool glossy card stock cover. So, go ahead and see what the upstarts are starting up!!

Copies are $3, which can be sent to

Michael Magee
31 Perrin Ave.
Pawtucket, RI 02861

Feel free to e-mail requests to [redacted] & we'll be glad to send a copy out in advance of payment, we're a trusting (and trustworthy) bunch. Hope to hear from many of you!!

↑ Index

475. Henry Gould
wrasslin with Rasula
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Mark, I agree with you that the very best thing about WAX MUSEUM is the in-depth research & subtle grasp of what was at stake & all the various debates that went on over that 40 yrs. Just a couple of reiterations: I don't agree that it's silly to summarize his take on R. Lowell as a "puppet" of the New Critics - he goes to great length to show that that is EXACTLY what Lowell was - both in his literary politics & his writing itself - here's a sample quote: "He was _the_ poet prepared, golem-like, by the founders of New Criticism, programmed as it were to produce the poems that would confirm for a contemporary audience that their _tastes_ (as honed by the curriculum of _Understanding Poetry_) could handle the new poetry as readily as the old." This is just one quote among MANY. And he handles the Vendler wax very similarly. But it's a complex book - he molds the wax on all sides at various places presenting Lowell as uncannily "self-fashioned" and at other places as the puppet; he lambasts New Criticism but praises it for bring poetry per se front & center; his final section dealing with what he characterizes (following Virilio & others) society as a state of total & unacknowledged war, and arguing that mass corporate media technology has utterly debased the public sphere - his final section is a jeremiad which sounds strangely like the attacks the Fugitive New Critics made 50 years before on industrial modernity.

As far as the Wax Museum metaphor, I don't think you can discount it as mere metaphor, since the total-suspicion critique permeates this analysis in the later part of the book. His evocation of the power of war, its deep connection with communication technologies, and the effect of all this on public & cultural life especially in the US, is very powerful: it seems "dated", but the frightening thing is that this datedness seems an integral aspect of the US as a whole - this is the wax-museum-preservation effect. It's a good monster movie - the US public as zombie-fodder of their television screens & day jobs.

Nevertheless I still finally read it as a partial melodrama. The public sphere is changing fast, becoming more internationalized & contentious at the same time; what art & poetry have to offer is not a "take-over" of those mass instruments of control but an international imaginative reconstruction of social relations, which comes from the mass rather than the mass media.

As with a lot of these historical studies, the latter more contemporary sections seem more rushed & disappointing - this is probably a wax effect too. I found a lot of special pleading for language poetry, but curiously, in the context of the

"total war" era theme, & the evocation of so much social waste & despair as its outcome, I was more impressed by one line (70s) from Robert Bly as an example of political-poetic reality than the whole fanfare for what language poetry was supposedly doing. the line was: "We all feel like tires being run down roads under heavy cars". For all the special pleading about language poetry's 1-2 punch of theory & practice, what seems missing is the fusion of the two in a yes resonant speech.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

476. tracy s. ruggles
Re: Poetix programs
Fri 17 Jul 1998

On Friday, July 17, 1998 6:21:30 AM, Maria Damon wrote:
>
>At 8:02 AM +0000 7/17/98, toddbaron wrote:
>>It sounds like the group consensus is--paraphrased--so far--that a >>poetics dept. doesn't really affect the poets involved! Otherthan the >>standard--I studied this and studied that! I wonder...what about the >>idea of beiung in large groups of poets and poet-teachers--and readers!?
>>Isn't this a different world than one re-enters after grad?
>
>this consensus seems to me to underestimate the power and varieties of
>"influence." of course people would claim to not be influenced by their >poetics department; even in a post-structuralist world people have some >investment in their own "originality," or at least might not see the >influence of anything as banal as an institution.
>

There seems to be a storehouse of available public attention that recycles itself periodically. And, each poet/student lays themselves out in the field of visibility in such a way that each poet/student gathers the maximum amount attention that they're capable of (ready for). The whole field shifts and undulates as people come and go, the storehouse of public attention rises and falls, the teachers point focus to one spot, then another.

Imagine a park. Three people triangulate the perimeter, each with a bag of bread crumbs. Each toss by the feeders sends the pigeon/poets in flight, each at their own pace. The flock/herd seems elastic. The feeding continues. The bread runs out. Then what?

--trace--

↑ Index

477. Henry Gould
teaching poetry network...
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Dear poetics, maybe some teachers among you could help out here. Do I really seem SO professorial? What is this prof crap? and WHAT website? I-am-under-the-control-of-an-electron-named-Crispin... - Zombie Gould

----------Original message---------- Dear Prof. Gould,

I have been searching the internet trying to find information on teaching poetry to secondary school students and fell upon you website. I am a student of Brown University and presently working in paris as an intern for UNESCO in the department of secondary education. I am trying to get underway a network for teachers of poetry via the internet in order for them to have a forum where they could exchange teaching methodologies; I was wondering if you had any information that could help me in this endeavor. It is to be an international project that will encompas as many countries and cultures as possible that can act as a resource to teachers of poetry. The idea is to promote the teaching of poetry to high school aged students in a more analytical and interesting way than has been traditionally taught. If you know of any webisite, organization, group, ect., who could be of use to me could you let me know ASAP. I thank you in advance for your time and consideration.

Sincerely,
Christine Bustany
[redacted]
UNESCO, Dept. of Secondary Education
Paris, France office

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

478. daniel bouchard
Re: teaching poetry network...
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Henry, or Hank, or buddy--whatever:

You have read poetry widely. You love to talk about it. You have a high level of sophistication in discussing it. You have a sense of humor discussing it. You feel comfortable bringing theory into the discussion too, but do not allow it to eclipse the "primary text." You refrain from employing the careful academic buzzwords that often litter poetic "discourse." You are usually bullshit-free. You're not afraid of looking like an ass. (Not at all.) In fact, listening to you talk about poetry makes me often want to seek out new work I haven't yet read. You make me feel like I have a lot of work to do but don't make me feel like an idiot for feeling so. And you have nothing really to gain from any of this. Therefore, I find it astounding that Christine Bustany, or any student, or any person, could mistake you for a university professor.

Hope to see you this weekend.

daniel bouchard

At 10:55 AM 7/17/98 EDT, Henry Gould wrote:
>Dear poetics, maybe some teachers among you could help out here. Do I >really seem SO professorial? What is this prof crap? and WHAT website?
>I-am-under-the-control-of-an-electron-named-Crispin... - Zombie Gould
>
>----------Original message----------
>Dear Prof. Gould,
>
>I have been searching the internet trying to find information on >teaching poetry to secondary school students and fell upon you website.
>I am a student of Brown University and presently working in paris as an
>in

<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

479. Tosh
(no subject)
Fri 17 Jul 1998

No, I have to strongly disagree with Todd's opinions about Beyond Baroque. Los Angeles is perhaps one of the most unique cities in the world. It is not New York, it is not San Francisco. It's Los Angeles. And one can't just complain about its city in comparison to other cities. Each place has its unique history, etc. For its mental and aesthethic landscape Beyond Baroque is very important on many levels. And yes the Los Angeles Poetery Festival is pop and so what? I think there's room for both types (and more) poetics in whatever disguise it chooses itself in. Personally I am not that interested in that type of poetry, but they do manage to organize themselves in a professional matter and give an audience a show. Pop always draw a big crowd. Everything else is small,dark, mysterious, beautiful, etc.

In regards to Todd's commentary on Beyond Baroque's board: It had many visual artists as well as poets/writers, etc. Generally visual artists are interested in the literary field. Many of them go to readings more than writers. Ask why, but I don't know the reason. Perhaps they're more curious. Besides schools like Cal-arts really encourage the mixture of reading, visual arts and writing in their programs. And that schooling has really affected Beyond Baroque in a very positive light. As we speak I believe there are now only writers on the board at beyond baroque. So things change as they should.

I also want to comment that if you look at a regular calendar of Beyond Baroque there are so many type of things happening on it - that it doesn't really support one type of school of writing. For example I know they will be having a Todd reading there shortly - and he has read there many times in the past.

As for the darkness of the place... well for me it is a technique to focus what is happening on the stage -like cinema. As for its reputation, I find most people involved with Beyond Baroque were treated really well - artists and audience. At least that's what they told me and Benjamin.

And the struggle to keep a place like Beyond Baroque open is an ongoing battle. It has nothing to do with poetics, but more with the importance of all aspects of writing. Again culture itself is on attack. And I am talking about all forms of culture. If you are a director at beyond baroque you are working 10 to 12 (and more) hours a day without great pay, and the hardest part of that job is keeping that place open. It is a very difficult job.

I am writing this post in haste, so excuse me for the lack of wit,etc. ciao,

---
Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

480. Loss Pequen~o Glazier
New Issue of Passages
Fri 17 Jul 1998

I'm pleased to announce that the newest issue of Passages, Passages 6, is now available at the EPC. Passages 6 features three takes from the Poetry Project's symposium on "Identity & Invention" with articles by

Tim Davis
"what me worry"

Lisa Jarnot
"On Identity"

Eddie Bell
"Fundamental Truths and Other Expressions"

Special thanks to co-editors, PASSAGES 6: Christopher Funkhouser, Amy Hufnagel for making this issue possible.

Passages 6 is the EPC's current "Featured Resource" available from the EPC home page.

E L E C T R O N I C P O E T R Y C E N T E R
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc

↑ Index

481. sylvester pollet
Re: teaching poetry network
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Don't feel bad, Henry, look at the title I got! I was going to forward her to the list, but was gentlemanly enough to ask her first. Now it's moot, so I'll do it, with my reply. I do think those who can should help--although I'm not sure I see "analytical=interesting." (p.s. I'm no Prof. either) S.

> Date: Fri, 17 Jul 1998 11:48:12 -0400
> To: "christine bustany" <[redacted]>
> From: sylvester pollet <[redacted]>
> Subject: Re: teaching poetry network
> Cc:
> Bcc:
> X-Attachments:
>
> At 7:16 AM -0700 7/17/98, christine bustany wrote:
> To whom it may concern :

> I have been searching the internet trying to find information on teaching poetry to secondary school students and fell upon you website. I am trying to get underway a network for teachers of poetry via the internet and was wondering if you had any information that could help me in this endeavor. It is to be an international project that will encompass teaching methodologies of as many countries and cultures as possible that can act as a resource to teachers of poetry. The idea is to promote the teaching of poetry to high school aged students in a more analytical and interesting way than has been traditionally taught. If you know of any organization, group, website ect., who could be of use to me could you let me know ASAP. I thank you in advance for your time and consideration.
>
> Sincerely,
> Christine Bustany
> UNESCO, Dept. of Secondary Education
> Paris, France office
>
> _____
> Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>
> Dear Christine Bustany,
> The organization Poets & Writers, Inc. (in New York City) is what you want--many books on the subject, a directory of poets & fiction writers, etc. Address is 72 Spring St. NYC 10012. They have a website now, but I don't have the address at hand. Any search engine should find it for you.
> I am also a subscriber to a Poetics List, out of SUNY Buffalo, and if you'd like I could post your message there, and ask people to answer directly to you.
> What excitement in Paris, two days, with the World Cup followed by Bastille Day! I would have liked to have been there for that. Alors, meilleurs voeux, Sylvester

↑ Index

482. louis stroffolino
Re: *wrasslin with Rasula
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Henry's write about Rasula's argument that LOWELL is puppet
(but then i don't think Rasula should be singled out for the such inside/outide rigid polarities; after all this is the land of STAR WARS and all that).....
cs

On Fri, 17 Jul 1998, Henry Gould wrote:

> Mark, I agree with you that the very best thing about WAX MUSEUM is the in-depth research & subtle grasp of what was at stake & all the various debates that went on over that 40 yrs. Just a couple of reiterations:
> I don't agree that it's silly to summarize his take on R. Lowell as a "puppet" of the New Critics - he goes to great length to show that that is EXACTLY what Lowell was - both in his literary politics & his writing itself - here's a sample quote: "He was _the_ poet prepared, golem-like, by the founders of New Criticism, programmed as it were to produce the poems that would confirm for a contemporary audience that their _tastes_ (as honed by the curriculum of _Understanding Poetry_) could handle the new poetry as readily as the old."
> This is just one quote among MANY. And he handles the Vendler wax very similarly. But it's a complex book - he molds the wax on all sides at various places presenting Lowell as uncannily "self-fashioned" and at other places as the puppet; he lambasts New Criticism but praises it for bring poetry per se front & center; his final section dealing with what he characterizes (following Virilio & others) society as a state of total & unacknowledged war, and arguing that mass corporate media technology has utterly debased the public sphere - his final section is a jeremiad which sounds strangely like the attacks the Fugitive New Critics made 50 years before on industrial modernity.
>
> As far as the Wax Museum metaphor, I don't think you can discount it as mere metaphor, since the total-suspicion critique permeates this analysis in the later part of the book. His evocation of the power of war, its deep connection with communication technologies, and the effect of all this on public & cultural life especially in the US, is very powerful: it seems "dated", but the frightening thing is that this datedness seems an integral aspect of the US as a whole - this is the wax-museum-preservation effect. It's a good monster movie - the US public as zombie-fodder of their television screens & day jobs.
>
> Nevertheless I still finally read it as a partial melodrama. The public sphere is changing fast, becoming more internationalized & contentious at the same time; what art & poetry have to offer is not a "take-over" of those mass instruments of control but an international imaginative reconstruction of social relations, which comes from the mass rather than the mass media.
>
> As with a lot of these historical studies, the latter more contemporary sections seem more rushed & disappointing - this is probably a wax effect too. I found a lot of special pleading for language poetry, but curiously, in the context of the "total war" era theme, & the evocation of so much social waste & despair as its outcome, I was more impressed by one line (70s) from Robert Bly as an example of political-poetic reality than the whole fanfare for what language poetry was supposedly doing. the line was: "We all feel like tires being run down roads under heavy cars". For all the special pleading about language poetry's 1-2 punch of theory & practice, > what seems missing is the fusion of the two in a yes resonant speech.

>
> - Henry Gould

↑ Index

483. Jordan Davis
global branding & T&W
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Sylvester --

Yes, Poets & Writers is terrific to find out which student of whom won what prize, and to find out which prizes are about to be given out to which people from where, or how to sign a book, but if you want information about teaching writing and reading to K-12 students (or college, for that matter), you more likely want to talk to Teachers & Writers.

Toll free 1-888-BOOKS-TW,
or http://www.twc.org
or [redacted]

Hotcha --
Jordan Davis

↑ Index

484. henry
Re: teaching poetry network...
Fri 17 Jul 1998

I appreciate that, Dan. See me after class about your paper on "Boston Whalers : Small Craft Poetry Fishing Vessels off the Argentinian Coast". I think we may be able to "place" it in American Poetry Review [letters section].

- Prof. Gould

p.s. from now on, call me Doc!

p.p.s. Darn it! should have back-channeled this one - sorry, class!

↑ Index

485. Michael Magee
Re: *wrasslin with Rasula
Fri 17 Jul 1998

I don't want to single out Rasula either, who I think is very smart, but I do feel like saying that that argument about Lowell as New Critical puppet is tired, tired, tired. Say what you want about the guy, but that ole take is goofy: based on essentially one book - LWC - that Lowell wrote when he was in his mid-twenties. The fact is that Lowell has too severely capricious as a result of basically unmonitored bi-polar ilness to be a very convenient puppet for anyone. And his work post-Life Studies annoyed the hell out of most New Critics and was admired - albeit with some reservations by Ginsburg, Duncan and other very non-New Critics. WC Williams loved Life Studies. And in contrast, New Critic Allen Tate told Lowell, "all the poems about your family, including the one about you and Elizabeth, are definitely bad. I do not think you ought to publish them...the poems are composed of unassimilated details...The free verse, arbitrary and without rhythm reflects a lack of imaginative focus." Square this with Rasula's arguments if you like, but you'll be doing a lot of tap-dancing. I have plenty of critical things to say about Lowell's poetry, but a puppet he was not.

-m.

According to louis stroffolino:
> > Henry's write about Rasula's argument that LOWELL is puppet
> (but then i don't think Rasula should be singled out for > the such inside/outide rigid polarities; after all this > is the land of STAR WARS and all that).....
> cs
>
> On Fri, 17 Jul 1998, Henry Gould wrote:
>
> > Mark, I agree with you that the very best thing about WAX MUSEUM is the > > in-depth research & subtle grasp of what was at stake & all the various > > debates that went on over that 40 yrs. Just a couple of reiterations:
> > I don't agree that it's silly to summarize his take on R. Lowell as a > > "puppet" of the New Critics - he goes to great length to show that that is > > EXACTLY what Lowell was - both in his literary politics & his writing > > itself - here's a sample quote: "He was _the_ poet prepared, golem-like, > > by the founders of New Criticism, programmed as it were to produce the > > poems that would confirm for a contemporary audience that their _tastes_ > > (as honed by the curriculum of _Understanding Poetry_) could handle the > > new poetry as readily as the old."
> > This is just one quote among MANY. And he handles the Vendler wax > > very similarly. But it's a complex book - he molds the wax on all sides > > at various places presenting Lowell as uncannily "self-fashioned" and at > > other places as the puppet; he lambasts New Criticism but praises it for > > bring poetry per se front & center; his final section dealing with what > > he characterizes (following Virilio & others) society as a state of > > total & unacknowledged war, and arguing that mass corporate media > > technology has utterly debased the public sphere - his final section > > is a jeremiad which sounds strangely like the attacks the Fugitive New > > Critics made 50 years before on industrial modernity.

> >
> > As far as the Wax Museum metaphor, I don't think you can discount it as > > mere metaphor, since the total-suspicion critique permeates this analysis > > in the later part of the book. His evocation of the power of war, its > > deep connection with communication technologies, and the effect of all this > > on public & cultural life especially in the US, is very powerful: it seems > > "dated", but the frightening thing is that this datedness seems an integral > > aspect of the US as a whole - this is the wax-museum-preservation effect.
> > It's a good monster movie - the US public as zombie-fodder of their > > television screens & day jobs.
> >
> > Nevertheless I still finally read it as a partial melodrama. The public sphere > > is changing fast, becoming more internationalized & contentious at the same > > time; what art & poetry have to offer is not a "take-over" of those mass > > instruments of control but an international imaginative reconstruction of > > social relations, which comes from the mass rather than the mass media.
> >
> > As with a lot of these historical studies, the latter more contemporary > > sections seem more rushed & disappointing - this is probably a wax effect > > too. I found a lot of special pleading for language poetry, but curiously, > > in the context of the "total war" era theme, & the evocation of so much > > social waste & despair as its outcome, I was more impressed by one line (70s) > > from Robert Bly as an example of political-poetic reality than the whole > > fanfare for what language poetry was supposedly doing. the line was:
> > "We all feel like tires being run down roads under heavy cars". For all > > the special pleading about language poetry's 1-2 punch of theory & practice,
> > what seems missing is the fusion of the two in a yes resonant speech.
> >
> > - Henry Gould
> >
>

↑ Index

486. Laura E. Wright
Re: Poetix programs
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Maria Damon wrote:

> At 8:02 AM +0000 7/17/98, toddbaron wrote:
> It sounds like the group consensus is--paraphrased--so far--that a poetics dept. doesn't really affect the poets involved! Otherthan the standard--I studied this and studied that! I wonder...what about the idea of beiung in large groups of poets and poet-teachers--and readers!? Isn't this a different world than one re-enters after grad?
>
> this consensus seems to me to underestimate the power and varieties of "influence." of course people would claim to not be influenced by their poetics department; even in a post-structuralist world people have some investment in their own "originality," or at least might not see the influence of anything as banal as an institution.

Todd, Maria, et al: I didn't mean to imply lack of influence. Rather, the influence is quite varied and not necessarily corresponding directly to the public image of the program. And the influence goes beyond the program itself. For instance, I've been influenced greatly by Anselm Hollo -- but also influenced by Rachel Levitsky, whose work is very different from what one might consider the Naropa canon. And my experience may not be representative. By the time one gets to grad school, I hope, one has learned to glean what one wants to from a situation, rather than simply ingesting and regurgitating. I'm sure my influences elsewhere would have been equally different and unpredictable. Maybe someone could get a grant to attend graduate writing programs at numerous schools and document the effects on their own writing :-{)

Laura W.
--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *
"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
* * * * * *
"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

487. Mark Prejsnar
puppets in the main stream
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Well Henry,

i know where ya stand vis-a-vis that group (which isn't a group, in any meaningful sense, in contemporary rhetoric and baiting...so i refuse to use "their" L name).....

"Special pleading"?? No i don't think so. But i know how you folks with a narrower interest in form-structures go out of your way to carry out "special bashing"!! (Thus my public stance, that the "L" name belong mostly to y'all on the contra-L barricades, and isn't really useful to folks who are actually reading the stuff....)

So, no, i think JR is quite fair and certainly doesn't engage in "special pleading"..

Your riposte about Lowell appears on the face of it more convincing. I'm willing to grant you that round, in a sense, because the very highly-charged (but very accurate) languange JR uses does indeed justify the term you used in paraphrasing him...I still think he doesn't mean to say, that Lowell was a puppet, as i understand the term..Only in the sense that say Reagan (not the world's most lucid or functional human being) was a "puppet" for other forces. If so, Ronnie was a very powerful puppet, and had and used real volition to initiate real evil..In a similar way, i think JR reads Lowell as able to rise to the po-world heights becasue various things about him made him the perfect embodiment of NewCrit values..But once near the heights, he had his own impact on the poetry world, and certainly achieved the sccess and fame he very much craved; in that sense, he was (and i think in JR's eyes was) an autonomous actor out to get things for himself..and (like the great Rondini) he got 'em. In that sense i stand by my original point that JR's reading of RL does not really reduce the latter to a "puppet."

marionettely, mp

↑ Index

488. daniel bouchard
Re: teaching poetry network...
Fri 17 Jul 1998

The apparent abuse is not intended for anyone on this list (that I am aware), out of the context of the smiling-good-time-fun for which I am re-nouned.

Altho, I reserve the right to contradict myself at a moment's notice.

- db

At 12:43 PM 7/17/98 -0600, Maria Damon wrote: >well said, though do we all deserve the abuse (humorous to be sure) of the >last coupla sentences.
>

<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
  fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

489. Henry
Re: puppets in the main stream
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Mark, the Lowell puppet or not-puppet issue is not that interesting in itself; I pointed it out as an example of what seemed more questionable about WAX, which is, for a lack of a better phrase coming to me, the "total suspicion" theory of social reality; Lowell is a puppet because EVERYTHING is under a form of "control", and the State is ONLY a form of control. My view is the state is a form of organization, that moving from monarchy to democracy was an advance, that those who fought for democracy didn't die in vain, that there is a long way to go - and Rasula's critique of war, manipulation, and conformity is a step forward - but to say government is pure malevolence and control, and that therefore culture, museums, poems, and people fall like puppet-dominoes - well, I say that's stretching it. It's like what I said about his "diorama" effect in his own museum : location is everything; if you can show how the whole culture is duped by evil forces of control then your heroes in the alternative poetry world only seem more heroic; and as I tried to point out I think Rasula really shows how great that resistant tradition is!! But I am here to remind that the left and its poets is capable of distortion and mental blinders too, of demeaning and belittling what they don't understand; and that the most desolate cultures are those built on fantasies of victory over the "enemy" actually being FULFILLED - with all the littered corpses of the vanquished foe lying about under the monuments whose languages they can no longer decipher. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

490. Tosh
poetics and l.a.
Fri 17 Jul 1998

In regards to Todd's statement, basically this is a complaint I hear from all of the poets in L.A. Everyone feels displaced here. Personally I like that feeling! Very Nat West!!

Los Angeles is not about dialogue. It is about action and promotion. And one can't be angry at the L.A. Fest. They are what they are! Imagine a poetry conference in Las Vegas. Well L.A. is not that far off. Plus poetry will always be small compared to other arts. This is neither a good or bad thing. Yes the same faces show up at the readings. But they are nice faces! And L.A. is not really a community except for the movie biz... and of course various gangs, art dealers, and lonely ex & current Art Directors for non-profit org.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

491. Maria Damon
Re: teaching poetry network...
Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

well said, though do we all deserve the abuse (humorous to be sure) of the last coupla sentences.

At 11:14 AM -0400 7/17/98, daniel bouchard wrote:
>Henry, or Hank, or buddy--whatever:
>
>You have read poetry widely. You love to talk about it. You have a high >level of sophistication in discussing it. You have a sense of humor >discussing it. You feel comfortable bringing theory into the discussion too, >but do not allow it to eclipse the "primary text." You refrain from >employing the careful academic buzzwords that often litter poetic >"discourse." You are usually bullshit-free. You're not afraid of looking >like an ass. (Not at all.) In fact, listening to you talk about poetry makes >me often want to seek out new work I haven't yet read. You make me feel like >I have a lot of work to do but don't make me feel like an idiot for feeling >so. And you have nothing really to gain from any of this. Therefore, I find >it astounding that Christine Bustany, or any student, or any person, could >mistake you for a university professor.

>
>Hope to see you this weekend.
>
>daniel bouchard
>
>
>
>
>At 10:55 AM 7/17/98 EDT, Henry Gould wrote:
>>Dear poetics, maybe some teachers among you could help out here. Do I >>really seem SO professorial? What is this prof crap? and WHAT website?
>>I-am-under-the-control-of-an-electron-named-Crispin... - Zombie Gould
>>
>>----------Original message----------
>>Dear Prof. Gould,
>>
>>I have been searching the internet trying to find information on >>teaching poetry to secondary school students and fell upon you website.
>>I am a student of Brown University and presently working in paris as an
>>in
>
>
>
><<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
>Daniel Bouchard
>The MIT Press Journals
>Five Cambridge Center
>Cambridge, MA 02142
>
>[redacted]
>phone: [redacted]
> fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

492. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli
Meyerson radical on relativity.
Fri 17 Jul 1998

"Identification thus eliminates time from the account of cause and effect. All questions about the simultaneity or succesion of cause and effect disappear, for time really means nothing at all in a rational account of the world. The timelessness of the logical necessity which we have already noted in deductive systems is here once more. The effect is the explication of the cause; it is the revelation of the implication of the cause. The mere unfolding of history is as unfruitful in enrichment of that earlier cause as is the process of inference with respect to implication of the cause. The range of being which we call "the actual," which is never apart from time, is explained by identification, which eliminates time entirely from the account. And thus again the crucial problem which occupies us appears: How can the permanent be significantly employed in an account of the changing? Meyerson pushes his investigation of the identifying tendency of reason in science to a stage beyond this. Not only does rational explaining ultimately eliminate time; it finally eliminates qualitative diversity and leaves us with bare homogeneous space."---from Explanation and Reality in the Philosophy of Emile Meyerson by Thomas R. Kelly---Carlo Parcelli---(These quotes are supplied by Carlo Parcelli and not R. Gancie who is innocent in the whole matter.)

↑ Index

493. Linda Russo

Re: interior decorating

Fri 17 Jul 1998

RE: Moving Borders:

Todd you're right. Neidecker's poem is GREAT & "major" & certainly gave me cause to refigure her place in my mental lit history. I'm still not sure she "belongs" in the anthology to the exclusion of other "forgotten women" (Kyger? I don't have the anth with me but I think she might've been left out). Any sort of lineage -- the sort histories and anthologies try to construct -- is necessarily problematic. I know Margy Sloan must've struggled and she does make a compelling case for her inclusion. I'm just glad Neidecker's in though, I'm not complaining. (Maybe this is an "uncritical" typically 2nd wave feminist response -- just being glad for more women writers -- and am I oldfashioned/we're beyond that? The fact that this text is just now recovered, after Neidecker's resuscitation several years ago, seems to suggest the contrary.)

I do think MB is sort of the come-lately Allen's New American Poetryesque come-uppance long overdue yet timely nonetheless. It probably couldn't have been done so wonderfully volumnuously at a previous date. (and your prompt, Todd, is long overdue too. Thanks for bringing it up!)

But what I found Most Compelling was the "statements of Poetics" section (as Don Allen called it in his anthology). I'd come across a lot of poetry by most of these poets (thanks by and large I must say to Peter Gannick -- many of those included are widely published, but many others are primarily potes & poets poets -- Diane Ward, Jean Day, Maureen Owen -- or at least p&p has made them more accessible). I wish there were more "statements"! Here was an opportunity to read "poetics" by many who'd written such things for say Poetics Journal or In The American Tree -- but otherwise hard to find. Encountering Carla Harryman and Tina Darragh, for example -- again two whose poetry (plays etc) I knew -- was and is a thrill.

Linda Russo

On Wed, 15 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:

> Any responses to Margy Sloan's MOVING BORDERS ANTHOLOGY--since we've talked of the damned Millenium--which never seems to come? I believe THIS is the anthology that I want to reread and that matters. If for nothing else but Margy's immense intro and Neidecker's amazing "lots" poem that opens the text. THis is a GREAT text!
>
> Tb (ReMaP)

↑ Index

494. Mark Prejsnar
Suspicion and the State
Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

i dunno---

Quite a few people have posted on the list about Rasula's book in the last two years; very few of us saw in the book what you see (that's my impression); ....

In a way it sounds much more exciting and interesting, in your reading, than the book i remember...

How about other folks who have read Rasula's Wax Museum? Do you-all agree with Henry that it is characterized by "total suspicion" as a theory of social reality? That it's paranoid about the State as a force of control??

Lurid and compelling terms. Much as i loved the book, i don't recall it's being that interesting!

mark p.
@lanta

On Fri, 17 Jul 1998, Henry wrote:

> Mark, the Lowell puppet or not-puppet issue is not that interesting in itself; I pointed it out as an example of what seemed more questionable about WAX, which is, for a lack of a better phrase coming to me, the "total suspicion" theory of social reality; Lowell is a puppet because EVERYTHING is under > a form of "control", and the State is ONLY a form of control. My view is the state is a form of organization, that moving from monarchy to democracy was an advance, that those who fought for democracy didn't die in vain, that there is a long way to go - and Rasula's critique of war, manipulation, and conformity is a step forward - but to say government is pure malevolence and control, and that therefore culture, museums, poems, and people fall like puppet-dominoes - well, I say that's stretching it. It's like what I said about his "diorama" effect in his own museum : location is everything; if you can show how the whole culture is duped by evil forces of control then your heroes in the alternative poetry world only seem more heroic; and as I tried to point out I think Rasula really shows how great that resistant tradition is!! But I am here to remind that the left and its poets is capable of distortion and mental blinders too, of demeaning and belittling what they don't understand; and that the most desolate cultures are those built on fantasies of victory over the "enemy" actually being FULFILLED - with all the littered corpses of the vanquished foe lying about under the monuments whose languages they can no longer decipher.

> - Henry Gould

↑ Index

495. sylvester pollet
Re: global branding & T&W
Fri 17 Jul 1998

At 1:01 PM -0400 7/17/98, Jordan Davis wrote:
>Sylvester --
>
>Yes, Poets & Writers is terrific to find out which student of whom won >what prize, and to find out which prizes are about to be given out to >which people from where, or how to sign a book, but if you want >information about teaching writing and reading to K-12 students (or >college, for that matter), you more likely want to talk to Teachers & >Writers.
>
>Toll free 1-888-BOOKS-TW,
>or http://www.twc.org
>or [redacted]
>
>Hotcha --
>Jordan Davis

Oh my god, a mind failure of major proportions. That's what I meant, of course. It's been over 9o here several days & I'm melting. I'll send a correction Thanks. S.

↑ Index

496. Michael Coffey
never mind the canon, here's COMBO! -Reply
Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

what is a "michael magee journal"? i just don't now it. maybe i should. are there others out there, other m.m.j.'s?
>>> UB Poetics discussion group 07/17/98 10:04am >>>
SPLITTING CORNERS PUBLICATIONS presents...

...a HUB ROOM production...

...of a Michael Magee journal...

↑ Index

497. Michael Coffey poetics and l.a. -Reply
Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

somebody wrote, and my system here doesn't identify everyone very well, so sorry, somebody, but as follows: \ "In regards to Todd's statement, basically this is a complaint I hear from all of the poets in L.A. Everyone feels displaced here. Personally I like that feeling! Very Nat West!!

Los Angeles is not about dialogue. It is about action and promotion. And one can't be angry at the L.A. Fest. They are what they are! Imagine a poetry conference in Las Vegas. Well L.A. is not that far off. Plus poetry will always be small compared to other arts. This is neither a good or bad thing. Yes the same faces show up at the readings."

to which i must add (if douglas messerli hasn't already weighed in here) that l.a. is the center of avant-garde publishing in america. sun & moon is doing 50 books a year (50 BOOKS A YEAR!), with an interest mainly in getting these books into print, as published objects (of which one, i have to say, is mime). other small presses, understandably, take another tack, trying to publish many, many fewer books and publishing them with more attention, perhaps, while douglas, it seems to me, is commited to getting these books into the public world, where they can live and be found by those so motivated.

now, to hear people complaining about the scene out there, being too intimate and not public enough, or, on the other hand, that it is all about "action and promotion" : i wonder what in the hell people want. Douglas is getting the work done, at great risk and with tremendous toil, not to mention the joy that he will telll you about if you happen to talk to him. He is doing his salon, it is ongoing, it is tireless, and so, it seems, is he; whoever is doing the "action and promotion" that is complained about, well i don''t know. But let's be clear: the avant-garde, risk-taking major publisher of innovative work, in translation, third world and otherwise is on Wilshire Blvd. And you can go there to hear work and talk and have a wine. Or two. What was the LA poetry scene, perhaps someone can say, when S&M was in College Park, Md. something mighty less, I would guess.

↑ Index

498. toddbaron
(no subject)
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Tosh: I wasn't attacking anything. It does seem an Agelino thing to defend this city when not necessary. I was comparing other cities because there are things going on there that promote dialogue and the communtiy of poetics. I'm afraid LA doesn't! Ocasionally there are great thing--The Italians reading here was marvelous--but really the same faces showed up for them as for anyone else--yes yes I can hear you sigh--but I was there too--I simply would like to see the boundaries broken down more. THE LA FEST. scence has funding--but the people that go there go for entertainment--the festitival renounces by not including such amazing LA poets as Fanny Howe and Diane Ward--because they "don't fit in". I sat on a panel years ago of "Language Writers" along with Fanny, Doug, Paul, and Bob Crosson! THis wasn't proper but we did it! Fanny was the only one that cold claim to be involved with Language writing historically--but the director of the series didn't know what was what--she even admited that in front of the audience--and asked "Can we learn what this writing is about--it hardly ever makes any sense---! " And that was the last time the "Fest" did anything out of the ordinary! This city is famous for Chares Buk.'s poetry--not the wondrous avante guarde tradition it USED to have!

THat I will continue to bemoan as the pets I know that reside here get pushed aside for more "mainstream" poetics. THAT is truly an LA profile. Look at the LA Times! THe times--our 'offical' rag--has a policy of NOT publishing reviews of works by local poets! Not local fiction writiers--only local poets! Once a week they publish the likes of Carolyn Force and such--but they won't even mention their own poets! THAT's why I bemoan--loudly--the state of affirs--and no one can truly think this a vibrant poetics community! I've had friends move in the past year who need to be able to weekly go to readings and lectures--and they didn't find them here--and boy--they tried!

Oh well. I am obvously saying this because I will not give up! And yes--I will read there and "there" even while I bemoan the "no thereness" of the place.

Tb
(ReMap)

↑ Index

499. maz881
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Todd wrote:

<<when poetry and poetics is at risk--when "groups" form that exclude other "groups"-when groups are thought to exist where there are none--etc. >>

i think it's always at risk mr barron. that's the fun part of it. tho i think i recognize the situation you're describing. group thingness that has no permeable boundaries. i found this situation when i lived in nyc. ear inn people would not go to newyorican, poetry project people would not go to segue, etc etc. and then you could easily map the people who wouldn't go certain places with the way they wrote. ie. they wrote in ONE rather, as blake would have it, newtonian way.

but then also you would run into the more gregarious types who would go to everything, yet still somehow maintain a close circle of friends and "some" kind of approach to poetry that was unique to who they were. i guess i mean their poetry had a sense of honesty and diversity. as easy as it is to leave d. rothschild out of anthologies and dismiss him as a crank who doesn't know the english language, he is one of these. i salute his various field.

Bill Luoma

↑ Index

500. Gwyn McVay
forgotten women
Fri 17 Jul 1998

>>Todd you're right. Niedecker's poem is GREAT & "major" & certainly gave me cause to refigure her place in my mental lit history. I'm still not sure she "belongs" in the anthology to the exclusion of other "forgotten women" (Kyger? I don't have the anth with me but I think she might've been left out).<<<

One of the things I'm liking about the new Spicer bio is the way it shows Kyger as poet and participant in a blossoming poetry scene--a fuller sense of her, not just as "Gary Snyder's wife" (or "ex" etc.) & thus, by extension, the SF/Berkeley renaissance as about more than just its famous men. Helen Adam also gets a fuller treatment than she has elsewhere.

Gwyn

↑ Index

501. Laura E. Wright
Re: Poetix programs
Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

toddbaron wrote:

> You're right--ok then--here's question: dumb as it sounds: why would one get a degree in Poetics? Against ALL odds I've formed a teaching career--but Robert Duncan used to say--"you're not getting a job out of this..." and so--aside from th knowledge--aside from the study--why a degreed program? Black Mountain--while degreed--turnd out few "degreed" writers--but they did not care!
>
> Tb

Hm. This gets really personal, so I'll speak for myself. This also relates to the various poetry and money threads of the recent past, does it not?

I went to music school and then poetics. Neither time did I expect a career to arise directly from the education. I think education solely as a means to a job, while practically unavoidable today, is a recent concept, springing from education no longer being available only to the financial/social/cultural elite. Maybe my path marks me as an elitist?

At any rate, music was even worse, because it's so demanding (time, energy, presentable attire, instrument, sheet music, etc.) and when one works in the field, it's usually demeaning (bad music, disrespect, etc.). At least with poetry, one can write late at night and the neighbors don't complain. And the tools are a lot cheaper.

So, why go to school? I did it because it was a way to focus for 2 years on my writing, and take my own work more seriously. A friend once said "I bought 2 years to write." Also, and more to the point, I had a blast. This was fun. I got to read and write and call it work. I once had a roommate who collected "useless degrees"
-- he had an MA in theology and was working on one in psychology. He was a lot of fun to talk to, and he made a living as a carpenter.

Yours in impracticality,
Laura W(hy not)
--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *
"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
    *   *   *   *   *   *
"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

<HTML>

<P>toddbaron wrote: <BLOCKQUOTE TYPE=CITE>

<P>>

You're right--ok then--here's question: dumb as it sounds: why would one get a degree in Poetics? Against ALL odds I've formed a teaching career--but Robert Duncan used to say--"you're not getting a job out of this..." and so--aside from th knowledge--aside from the study--why a degreed program? Black Mountain--while degreed--turnd out few "de-greed" writers--but they did not care!

<P>Tb</BLOCKQUOTE>
Hm. This gets really personal, so I'll speak for myself. This also relates to the various poetry and money threads of the recent past, does it not?

<P>I went to music school and then poetics. Neither time did I expect a career to arise directly from the education. I think education solely as a means to a job, while practically unavoidable today, is a recent concept, springing from education no longer being available only to the financial/social/cultural elite. Maybe my path marks me as an elitist?

<P>At any rate, music was even worse, because it's so demanding (time, energy, presentable attire, instrument, sheet music, etc.) and when one works in the field, it's usually demeaning (bad music, disrespect, etc.). At least with poetry, one can write late at night and the neighbors don't complain. And the tools are a lot cheaper.

<P>So, why go to school? I did it because it was a way to focus for 2 years on my writing, and take my own work more seriously. A friend once said "I bought 2 years to write." Also, and more to the point, I had a blast. This was fun. I got to read and write and call it work. I once had a roommate who collected "useless degrees" -- he had an MA in theology and was working on one in psychology. He was a lot of fun to talk to, and he made a living as a carpenter.
<DIV ALIGN=right></DIV>
Yours in impracticality,

Laura W(hy not)

--

Laura Wright

Library Assistant

Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute

2130 Arapahoe Ave

Boulder, CO 80302

[redacted]

 * * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan

     *
*
*   *
*
*

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

 </HTML>

----------DC2266D225D845CE1CCB5FFF--

↑ Index

502. Mark Prejsnar
Re: forgotten women
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Didn't Michael Davidson give Kyger quite a lot of respectful attention in her own right, in his book, the San Fancisco Renaissance??

It has been some years since i read it, may or may not be recalling it accurately.....

mp

On Fri, 17 Jul 1998, Gwyn McVay wrote:

> Todd you're right. Niedecker's poem is GREAT & "major" & certainly gave me cause to refigure her place in my mental lit history. I'm still not sure she "belongs" in the anthology to the exclusion of other "forgotten women" (Kyger? I don't have the anth with me but I think she might've been left out).<<<
>
> One of the things I'm liking about the new Spicer bio is the way it shows Kyger as poet and participant in a blossoming poetry scene--a fuller sense of her, not just as "Gary Snyder's wife" (or "ex" etc.)
> & thus, by extension, the SF/Berkeley renaissance as about more than just its famous men. Helen Adam also gets a fuller treatment than she has elsewhere.
>
> Gwyn

↑ Index

503. toddbaron
Re: Poetix programs
Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

thanksLaura E. Wright wrote:
>
> Maria Damon wrote:
>
> > At 8:02 AM +0000 7/17/98, toddbaron wrote:
> > >It sounds like the group consensus is--paraphrased--so far--that a > > >poetics dept. doesn't really affect the poets involved! Otherthan the > > >standard--I studied this and studied that! I wonder...what about the > > >idea of beiung in large groups of poets and poet-teachers--and readers!?
> > >Isn't this a different world than one re-enters after grad?
> >
> > this consensus seems to me to underestimate the power and varieties of
> > "influence." of course people would claim to not be influenced by their > > poetics department; even in a post-structuralist world people have some > > investment in their own "originality," or at least might not see the > > influence of anything as banal as an institution.
>
> Todd, Maria, et al:
> I didn't mean to imply lack of influence. Rather, the influence is quite > varied and not necessarily corresponding directly to the public image of the > program. And the influence goes beyond the program itself. For instance, I've > been influenced greatly by Anselm Hollo -- but also influenced by Rachel > Levitsky, whose work is very different from what one might consider the > Naropa canon. And my experience may not be representative. By the time one > gets to grad school, I hope, one has learned to glean what one wants to from > a situation, rather than simply ingesting and regurgitating. I'm sure my > influences elsewhere would have been equally different and unpredictable.

> Maybe someone could get a grant to attend graduate writing programs at > numerous schools and document the effects on their own writing :-{)
>
> Laura W.
> --

>
You're right--ok then--here's question: dumb as it sounds: why would one get a degree in Poetics? Against ALL odds I've formed a teaching career--but Robert Duncan used to say--"you're not getting a job out of this..." and so--aside from th knowledge--aside from the study--why a degreed program? Black Mountain--while degreed--turnd out few "degreed" writers--but they did not care!

Tb

↑ Index

504. ken|n|ing
[publication announcement]
Fri 17 Jul 1998

After somewhat of a delay, I am happy to be:

ANNOUNCING KENNING #2, A NEWSLETTER OF CONTEMPORARY POETRY, POETICS, AND NON FICTION WRITING.

Featuring:

A. L. Nielsen,
Emily Wilson,
John M. Bennett,
Keston Sutherland,
Ron Silliman,
Alfred Arteaga,
Andrew Levy,
Katy Lederer,
Alice Notley,
Taylor Brady,
Liz Waldner,

Paul Silvia,
Jen Hofer,
Heather Fuller and Rod Smith, and Spencer Selby.

A subscription beginning with this most current issue is $9.50. You will receive a hand printed portfolio/slip case to accomadate the loose leaf pages which comprise issues 2 and 3.

A single copy of issue 2 is available for $5.00. Non-subscribers receive staple-stitched editions.

In the coming weeks, Kenning #2 will appear on the shelves of Cody's & City Lights in the bay area, Bridge Street Books in D.C. As many of you know, you may place orders with the kind people at Bridge Street via e-mail. In stores, Kenning is staple-stitched, with a hand printed cover of tough stock paper for that commodified tactile sensation.

Anyone willing to help distribute Kenning is welcome to contact me at this e-mail address to discuss your ideas. Kenning is a not-for-profit, non-institutional, out-of-pocket enterprise based on the notion that poetics is an integral facet of progressive social discourse.

Forthcoming issues will include the work of Hoa Nguyen, Charles Bernstein, Lisa Jarnot, Ida Yoshinaga, Peter Ganick, Daniel Bouchard, and many more.

The premier issue of Kenning is available for a limited time, $4.00 from the editor, featuring: Mark Wallace, John Kinsella, Daniel Zimmerman, Juliana Spahr, Summi Kaipa, Michael Angelo Tata, John Lowther, Ryan Whyte, and Stephen Ellis. You might also check for it now at the book sellers listed above.

Mail order from the editor, Patrick F. Durgin, to whom you should make out your checks, and use the address below. I look forward to hearing from you.

```
                    |
                    |
k e n n i n g``````````````|```````````````````````````
a newsletter of contemporary |poetry,  poetics,  and  non-fiction writing
                    |418 Brown St. #10  Iowa City, IA 52245  USA
```

↑ Index

505. ken|n|ing

Susan Schultz?

Fri 17 Jul 1998

Hi. Sorry to clog the list with this, but I'm trying to track down Susan Schultz, who has not been responding to e-mail lately. If anyone knows how to contact her, I'd appreciate your help. I have to bring something to her attention a.s.a.p. Back channel please. thanks Patrick F. Durgin

```
                    |
                    |
k e n n i n g``````|``
```

a newsletter of contemporary |poetry, poetics, and non-fiction writing
|418 Brown St. #10 Iowa City, IA 52245 USA

↑ Index

506. toddbaron

Re: interior decorating

Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

yes--margy did work hard! almost to the exclusion--NO--to the exclusion of all else in her life. She said in her statement exactly why there are folks there and some folks not--and the Neidecker piece seems to be explained beautifully. No, we not beyond any discussion that continues to be one. Lately all sorts of news on the radio (KPFK here) about post-feminist ideologies and--to my mind--we need more more more! The entire thing (and I live in a "hip-hyped city") about RETRO crap from the seventies that mostly benefit men: strip joints--martinis--cigars--steaks--causes me to URP and feel as if all the work done prior has falled into NOWHERE. These "kids" and their dang styles--don't they know they'll die from 'em? --my parents did! . But seriously--I am certain that this anthology came out at specifically the most important time. I urge everyone to buy it.

Margy deserves the biggest applause. Yes, other anthologies are out there--but I deny anyone to find one with this gaze--this field of force.

thansk for replying-- Others?

Tb
(ReMap)

↑ Index

507. Billy Little

Re: la scene/ vispo book - writers forum 750th publication

Fri 17 Jul 1998

---

to tell you the truth this whole discussion makes me feel so much better because often after a poetry evening where eight-twelve people attend i go home telling myself billy why do you even bother. then i think of far off hollywood where all the millionaires, speilberg, stallone, woody allen, coppola, shirley mclaine, lina wertmuller, max von sydow, arnold, they've all got a poet or two on the payroll, one for the limo and one for the poolside, i'd be a poolside poet, lighting the cigars of sly's girlfriends, reciting the communist poems of Pasolini in the original Italian. I've heard it was becoming a trend in other cities, if you dined in Le Cirque you just had to have a poet or you didn't rate. the attorney general it is rumored is looking into putting a poet or two on the payroll, just because we work for the government doesn't mean we aren't millionaires he jested, and millionaires must have poets or whats a million mean. maybe defense and health will follow and establish rival poets in their baileywickes, the FBI poet will write poems in bulletholes and the cia poet in blood shipped fresh daily. Milosz @ Pentagon! Ackermann @ Environment! [redacted]! Mark my words there's going to be lots of jobs for poets, so study hard boys and girls and learn a second language.

the millionaire's tongue,

billy little

visible otherance

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

Yeah, I stole from
the treasury
of human folly
I spent it all on you, baby...

don't mention it

Duncan McNaughton

↑ Index

508. Gwyn McVay
Kyger/Renaissance
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Mark P., should have been more clear, I didn't mean in that book, which is quite fine, but more in a nebulous "popular concept" or less thorough print sources--no diss on anyone else was intended, just kudos for the presentation of women writers and artists in the Spicer bio.

Gwyn

↑ Index

509. Tosh
Re: poetics and l.a. -Reply
Fri 17 Jul 1998

> now, to hear people complaining about the scene out there, being too intimate and not public enough, or, on the other hand, that it is all about "action and promotion" : i wonder what in the hell people want. Douglas is getting the work done, at great risk and with tremendous toil, not to mention the joy that he will telll you about if you happen to talk to him. He is doing his salon, it is ongoing, it is tireless, and so, it seems, is he; whoever is doing the "action and promotion" that is complained about, well i don''t know. But let's be clear: the avant-garde, risk-taking major publisher of innovative work, in translation, third world and otherwise is on Wilshire Blvd. And you can go there to hear work and talk and have a wine. Or two. What was the LA poetry scene, perhaps someone can say, when S&M was in College Park, Md. something mighty less, I would guess.

And I might add he has a great bookstore at that location too, as well as a nice website. Sun & Moon rocks!

ciao,
tosh

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

510. Tosh
Re: la scene/ vispo book - writers forum 750th publication
Fri 17 Jul 1998

Billy understands the business of poetry like no one. And one who lives in Los Angeles, he's got the poet's life down pat. Oh by the way, has anyone on this list seen HENRY FOOL?

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

511. toddbaron
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Fri 17 Jul 1998

[redacted] wrote:
>
> Todd wrote:
>
> <<when poetry and poetics is at risk--when "groups" form that exclude other > "groups"-when groups are thought to exist where there are none--etc. >>
>
> i think it's always at risk mr barron. that's the fun part of it. tho i think > i recognize the situation you're describing. group thingness that has no > permeable boundaries. i found this situation when i lived in nyc. ear inn > people would not go to newyorican, poetry project people would not go to > segue, etc etc. and then you could easily map the people who wouldn't go > certain places with the way they wrote. ie. they wrote in ONE rather, as blake > would have it, newtonian way.
>
> but then also you would run into the more gregarious types who would go to > everything, yet still somehow maintain a close circle of friends and "some" > kind of approach to poetry that was unique to who they were. i guess i mean > their poetry had a sense of honesty and diversity. as easy as it is to leave > d. rothschild out of anthologies and dismiss him as a crank who doesn't know > the english language, he is one of these. i salute his various field.
>
> Bill Luoma
I would say tho--that the "fun" I'm afraid is not truly fun for the aesthetic and principal of the politic--that said--I spend many years in Show Business--and cruelty never formed--nor did borders there--any work to be pursued--only to be conquered.

Tb
ReMap

↑ Index

512. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Difficult and Delicate Matter
Sat 18 Jul 1998

-

Difficult and Delicate Matter

Well, I have a good deal of diary material from Kathy Acker, 1974 and earlier; some of it is in the form of letters or texts directly to me, and some of it is revised carbon copy, and some of it is mimeograph. None of this has been published. So I write to someone I know who writes to someone he knows and finds out I cannot in fact quote from the words of the diary, which belong to the estate of Kathy Acker, although I can paraphrase the words which she has written.

But then, who can check up to make sure I am paraphrasing accurately? For example, if I write, that Kathy says on March 1, 1974, that she wishes me dead, then I am writing a fabrication; there is no such state- ment. Which is not to say that Kathy did not wish me dead on that date - only that I do not have such material in my possession.

What Kathy does say is that I am her father and she wants to experiment to see how close she can get to me. She also states that I help her, al- though later I am sure she would not have felt this way. But what are these statements, in light of the fact that they are neither quotations nor content that you may ascertain for yourself?

To be sure, if you visit me in Brooklyn, then I might deign to show you the original material, and you could decide for yourself, providing I did not fabricate such as well - forging a signature, duplicating, etc., from texts I composed for whatever reason.

Kathy says she doesn't understand who she is and doesn't understand a lot of my writing, and I wonder, would she understand this text and ap- prove of it? It is easy to circumscribe, literally, the dead, who are given and given up without recourse; mourning is a moment astride the real, returning the world to itself, and these textual gifts back to a present life, harboring and framing the past.

But this is not about mourning. Kathy says I understand everything she writes and that she understands what I say directly to her. She says she feels as if we're twins joined together, as if I'm protecting her. She continues speaking about power, about my taking power from her, which later became an issue between us, appearing later in the videos we did together (and within what jurisdiction are those spoken words now, as well as those words written on the screen, as well as those unspoken words in her eyes?).

She ends this particular section by saying she doesn't want parents, and wants to know what's happening. She's remembering, and describes a white shawl and a red-brown dress, blankets. Then there is half a page of blank space, and she's into a second, carbon-copied part, about Peter, with a different title as well. Could I quote the different title? I would choose not to, insisting on paraphrase.

Kathy was trying to map out her consciousness; _she says so, in so many words._ I attempt to interface with virtual subjects, dreams, ghosts, machines, mournings, technologies, internets, those moments of syncope described by Clement in Syncope, holding itself back in the throat. "temporary loss of consciousness from fall of blood-pressure," and I feel comfortable quoting from the living Concise Oxford; so many texts begin with dictionary definitions, and this one ends with one.

↑ Index

513. Daniel Carter assume the position!
Sat 18 Jul 1998

up here where it is not known (knot-node) before hand or be forehead what might comb itself out the nothing-nest

swooner or rate her a swell-ass hem an article or particle of clothing in on the flavor-writes how swarming might o' could o' had the versed part last wronger 'til now new and the so-culled end to begin beaconly rest next text as well as texterior

http://www.inch.com/~abz/

http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Cafe/3361/

↑ Index

514. Daniel Carter
EXCESSive multi-directionally yet well-aimed onglowing ecologically dynamic imbalance: the good vectors
Sat 18 Jul 1998

itching aching I-Ching location left up top where before the sign for void not literally nothing or no thing although there might well have pen nothing the air itself not even around nor with write-angles quantum energies fed back into wakefulness when needed a particular book off the shelf concreteness of fuel-type step to aid in not falling asleep a slip into a slip of mad gladness thinly concealed by product placement the sort of opportunism questionable under these illuminating electrical currents an example of translation at every painted entreaty the need of a moment to faintly edit the lyrical insertion wake sure t' lick all post-age invisibles t' stimulate'm to adhere add here its uncountable un-addable richness to what already is everywhere that's anywhere or so-coiled thing the ink-think and the angst-person steamed up

http://www.inch.com/~abz/

http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Cafe/3361/

↑ Index

515. Daniel Carter
fire-sighed chap-hook gallery 'n' guylery
Sat 18 Jul 1998

---

seed the need to get out t' fill screen rhymes with name unmentioned dear free terminal headlamp arsenal the ability to set fire to whatever you like to seethe yourself also go up in blazes 'n' flames the double or multiple multi-pli multi-plea ploy-type(e) toy pipe trouble snowed as heartbeat 'n' heartbeef proof of non- so-signed death the impossible and non-imposeable prefer an ocean-blue sea t' view t.v. through for a change in (self-)programming and thin thenly d' skies-ed return t' non-action as clickly as pose a pill

http://www.inch.com/~abz/

http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Cafe/3361/

↑ Index

516. MAYHEW
I'm ba-ack
Sat 18 Jul 1998

The argument about Lowell begin a puppet of the new criticism goes back to Perloff's _The Poetics of Indeterminacy_; there is a nice demonstration of the way in which the early Lowell seeds his work with symbols and paradoxes in anticipation of New Critical classroom exegesis. Of course, calling him a puppet is rather crude--isn't it more of a convergence of interests? The New Critics might be Lowell's puppets just as plausibly.

The Rasula analysis of Lowell is devastating and for me irrefutable; this does not mean that Lowell does not transcend his "institutional" role within the wax museum, but I am not the person to ask since my aversion to Lowell's work is tempermental and visceral. I realize he is hugely accomplished and great in his own way--I just can't stand him.

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

517. Michael Magee
Re: never mind the canon, here's COMBO! -Reply
Sat 18 Jul 1998

---

parody, parody, parody, my friend. -m.

According to Michael Coffey:
>
> what is a "michael magee journal"? i just don't now it. maybe i should. are > there others out there, other m.m.j.'s?
> >>> UB Poetics discussion group 07/17/98 10:04am >>>
> SPLITTING CORNERS PUBLICATIONS presents...
>
>
>
>
> ...a HUB ROOM production...
>
>
>
> ...of a Michael Magee journal...
>

↑ Index

518. Joe Amato/Kass Fleisher signing off for a spell...
Sat 18 Jul 1998

---

ok folks, gonna sign off the list for a month or so, leaving chicago for points west... if you need to reach me, please just post my address and i'll try to telnet in once or twice in the coming month... need to give my pinkies/eyes/etc a rest from terminal delights...

hey, keep the good vibes flowing!...

best,

joe

↑ Index

519. Catherine Daly
LA Lit Orgs
Sat 18 Jul 1998

It seems to me that if place is the problem, it should be simple enough to invade some den of mediocrity. It seems to me that Sun & Moon and Cal Arts have begun a pretty effective invasion of LACMA. What about MOCA? What about the science museum with the 50 foot woman in it?

The "Buk. School" is ABOUT self promotion. The performance poets are also _everywhere_. Incommunicado and Manic D and 2.13.61 have done good music industry-style promotion for lit. (as well as celebrity publishing, but well).

I think of all the celebs writing books now. By and large, they seem to read at either their local independent bookstore or local B&N rather than do a tour of shopping malls or record stores or whatever. It is a bid for legitimacy. Where promotion is work, to not promote may seem genuine.

As for Bel Air and Fifth Avenue, who cares? Except that British Vogue reviews poetry, you know. Here in LA, I'm mostly told, "Oh yeah, I published poetry in Ploughshares, The Harvard Review, got into the Best blah blah of some year, but then, then I started writing for _Blossom_. Now, I don't have to write." Maybe it's not so bad to be here! If you really suck, they'll throw a lot of money at you and you'll stop writing.

Catherine Daly
[redacted]

↑ Index

520. Matt Kirschenbaum
Blake Archive's July Update
Sat 18 Jul 1998

The latest news of work completed here at the Blake Archive. Apologies for cross-posting. Please forward as appropriate. Matt K.

--

The editors of the William Blake Archive <http://www.iath.virginia.edu/blake> are pleased to announce the publication of six new electronic editions of Blake's illuminated books. They are:

All Religions are One copy A
There is No Natural Religion copies B, C, G, and L
Milton, a Poem copy C

Composed and executed in 1788, _All Religions are One_ and _There is No Natural Religion_ are Blake's first works in illuminated printing, though no copy of either work survives from this date. The ten plates of _All Religions_ were followed quickly by twenty _No Natural Religion_ plates in two antithetical sets (a and b series). Only one copy of _All Religions_ is extant, now in the Huntington Library, printed c. 1795 with and in the same style as _There is No Natural Religion_ copy L, the only copy consisting exclusively of the ten b-series of plates, now in The Pierpont Morgan Library. The other twelve recorded copies of this book consist of a mixture of the same eight to twelve plates, which appeared to be merely incomplete sets of proofs until it was discovered that six of these copies were 19th-century reproductions. Once the inauthentic impressions were weeded out, it became apparent that what remained was Blake's selection of a and b plates for an abridged version of the work printed around 1794. We present copies B, C, and G of this twelve-plate work, now in the collections of the Yale Center for British Art, Library of Congress, and The Pierpont Morgan Library, respectively.

There are only four copies of _Milton_, Blake's most personal epic. Copy C, from the New York Public Library, was Blake's own copy. Printed c. 1811, it was later reconfigured and renumbered by Blake when he inserted extra plates, which he appears to have done on at least two different occasions.

All of these editions have newly edited texts and are all fully searchable for both text and images and supported by the unique Inote and ImageSizer applications described in our previous updates.

We now have twenty-two copies of thirteen illuminated books. Over this and next year, we will be adding Blake's last illuminated works, _On Homers Poetry [&] On Virgil_, _The Ghost of Abel_, and _Laocoon_, as well as _Milton_ copy D and _Jerusalem_ copy E. We will also be adding at least six more copies of _Songs of Innocence and of Experience_, two copies of _Songs of Innocence_, five copies of _The Marriage of Heaven and Hell_, four copies of _The Book of Urizen_, and two copies each of _America, a Prophecy_ and _Europe, a Prophecy_. In addition, work continues on the SGML edition of David V. Erdman's _Complete Poetry and Prose of William Blake_.

We will continue to post updates on various lists every few months, but readers interested in the progress of the Archive can subscribe to our Blake Update list, which can be found on the Archive's Contents Page. On this page readers will also find that we have opened the top level of the Contributing Institutions Page, which provides contact information and links to institutions participating in the Archive. In the coming months, we plan to include color-coded and linked lists of each institution's entire Blake collection to indicate what is and is not in the Archive and what is forthcoming.

Morris Eaves
Robert Essick
Joseph Viscomi

↑ Index

521. Mark DuCharme
Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded
Sat 18 Jul 1998

Hear hear. Enough of these posting on the post-whatever drivel. Let's bring back normative syntax, there's something that never gets formulaic. Better to be bored than provoked. Jolly good, jolly good.

....

>Hey, you poets have got the flat disjunctive incomplete sentence down, >which is the main thing by which we experimentalists distinguish between >us and them & what poetry is. The poem as something that started someplace >else in your head you've already forgotten and gets truncated in order to >remember that missing element. Work a little more on the non-rhythm >the boredom the feeling of unexplained angst; learn to throw in some >plangent multisyllabic non-references from a fairly large dictionary;
>work on your spatial distances between words and "lines" which are what >shows you are a thoughtful alternative poet patted on the head by major >people like Olson Creeley Duncan or genericnewyorkbeatlanguagepoet - >and they'll put you in an anthology of (Newer) Americans - (the 14th >one - from Urban Bleat Press).
>- Henry Gould
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

522. Mark DuCharme
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Sat 18 Jul 1998

I can't help jumping into this, altho' I've never been to L.A. & don't know the scene down there. What Todd describes sounds more like Boulder than what I'd expect of a place like L.A., especially considering Sun & Moon's longstanding presence there. I suspect that outside of "centers" like SF & NYC there's little "popular" audience for alternative poetix; this is a separate issue from the exclusionary tactics one finds all over, & which Todd describes so candidly. What to do, except continue in dialogue, er, dialectics? & After all, isn't that what this list is for?

---Mark DuCharme

>
>Safdie Joseph wrote:
>>
>> Todd, Elizabeth -- it's been many years since I helped run the Wednesday >> night poetry workshops at Beyond Baroque, but that was really the only
>> "scene" I ever knew, and still is, I suspect. Do you, though, know >> Holly Prado, Harry Northrup, Bill Mohr (an L.A. mover and shaker if >> there ever was one), Phoebe MacAdams, Lewis Macadams, Jim Krusoe, Jack >> Grapes, Amy Gerstler, Dennis Phillips, Paul Vangelisti . . . . well,
>> those were only the people I knew and hung out with, but there were >> others (Dennis Cooper, of course, before his move to New York) -- but >> really -- I admit it can seem a bit provincial compared to the Bay Area >> in terms of poetry, but that's the ONLY contest it loses, isn't it?
>
>I think my bitter mail got lost in the shuffle--but let me simply say >that the poets you mentioned--and this outside of their own work as >writers--have primarily been exclusive in terms of going to others
>readings--promoting others work outside of a "pop" and confessionalist
>sensibility. That years before when Barrett W. read to an audience of 8
>I was ashamed to be a poet in LA. THat same thing happened to Robert >Duncan year ago--to Fanny Howe recently--etc. Few poets that are listed >in your note suport the work of others besides friends. Yes, I am >bitter--but my job as an editor and teacher is not simply to read and >promote and publish the work of those I like--but to promote and publish >a POETICS that is important. I have published poetry by those whom I >don't think highly of--but whose work I believe deserves to be read! Of >those you mentioned only Paul V. (with whom I started Littoral Books >years ago--along with D, Phillips and Martha Ronk and Lee Hickman) even >show up at the readings that Sun and Moon give--while Douglas M. and >others DO show up at B. B. occasionally! Damn! No compensations besides >the sun! No--a scene is unimportant--a dialectic is of utmost >importance!

>
>Todd Baron
>(ReMap)
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

523. Elizabeth Treadwell bread & its crumbs--
Sat 18 Jul 1998

Tracy, nicely said there!
-Elizabeth

> There seems to be a storehouse of available public attention that recycles itself periodically. And, each poet/student lays themselves out in the field of visibility in such a way that each poet/student gathers the maximum amount attention that they're capable of (ready for). The whole field shifts and undulates as people come and go, the storehouse of public attention rises and falls, the teachers point focus to one spot, then another.
>
> Imagine a park. Three people triangulate the perimeter, each with a bag of bread crumbs. Each toss by the feeders sends the pigeon/poets in flight, each at their own pace. The flock/herd seems elastic. The feeding continues. The bread runs out. Then what?
>
> --trace--

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

524. Elizabeth Treadwell
no subject or I LOVE LA
Sat 18 Jul 1998

Dear Tosh I just want to second the general feeling of love for LA as is-- I will mention some things that affected my writing while living there rather briefly in early 90s-- looking at those midcentury architect's buildings, like Neutra, etc--- browsing for ages at BB and S/M--- knowing some people who could actually make a living writing, albeit for the screen -- and I know that last one is really Uncool -- plus, just sitting in those chairs having drinks at LACMA, looking around MOCA --- and the grid of streets over landscape-- it inspired me.

x from No-cal,
Eliz.

ps the professors at CAL-ARTS were nothing but friendly to me in several brief mtgs as the sister of one of their students -- also, they did a 6 person TANGO in honor of their students at graduation!! oh was I jealous -- professors at SFState don't even attend graduation.

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

525. charles alexander
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Sat 18 Jul 1998

These questions of audience are so difficult -- I've struggled with them, in terms of people attending readings and poetics talks, for parts of the last 18 years. Here in Tucson, our audiences, and I'm thinking of various events and series from about 1986 to the present, have ranged widely. Because there is a university here, and a lot of poetry students at that university, we have been able to get 75 people to certain Chax Press or POG-sponsored events in the past. But we've also had our share of events with ten people or less. When our audiences are more than 20, I think that half or more of those audiences are in some way associated with the University of Arizona. When 20 or less, that's not so true. Why does there continue to be great variance in attendance? Is Leslie Scalapino really that much better known than Steve McCaffery? Or Bob Perelman than Michael Davidson? Does it depend on the weather? On quirks of scheduling? I'm sure these audience issues, which in some ways are community-building issues, will continue to bug me -- but I also try to keep the attitude that it's the people there, no matter their numbers, that count, and that allow us (POG these days) to continue presenting such events.

I haven't noticed that there's a lot of 'popular' audience for alternative poetics even in SF or NYC, although there is the ability to draw 25 or more people, most of the time -- although, as some have pointed out, and as I've witnessed, not all the time. I've read to one of my largest audiences in Tuscaloosa, Alabama. I tend to think, at this time, that it's something of a myth that the audience or production centers for innovative writing are NY and SF -- although those are certainly important points on the map.

charles

At 12:43 PM 7/18/98 PDT, you wrote:
>I can't help jumping into this, altho' I've never been to L.A. & don't >know the scene down there. What Todd describes sounds more like Boulder >than what I'd expect of a place like L.A., especially considering Sun & >Moon's longstanding presence there. I suspect that outside of "centers" >like SF & NYC there's little "popular" audience for alternative poetix;
>this is a separate issue from the exclusionary tactics one finds all >over, & which Todd describes so candidly. What to do, except continue >in dialogue, er, dialectics? & After all, isn't that what this list is >for?
>
>---Mark DuCharme
>
>
>
>>
>>Safdie Joseph wrote:
>>>
>>> Todd, Elizabeth -- it's been many years since I helped run the >Wednesday >>> night poetry workshops at Beyond Baroque, but that was really the >only
>>> "scene" I ever knew, and still is, I suspect. Do you, though, know >>> Holly Prado, Harry Northrup, Bill Mohr (an L.A. mover and shaker if >>> there ever was one), Phoebe MacAdams, Lewis Macadams, Jim Krusoe, >Jack
>>> Grapes, Amy Gerstler, Dennis Phillips, Paul Vangelisti . . . . well, >>> those were only the people I knew and hung out with, but there were >>> others (Dennis Cooper, of course, before his move to New York) -- but >>> really -- I admit it can seem a bit provincial compared to the Bay >Area

>>> in terms of poetry, but that's the ONLY contest it loses, isn't it?
>>
>>I think my bitter mail got lost in the shuffle--but let me simply say >>that the poets you mentioned--and this outside of their own work as >>writers--have primarily been exclusive in terms of going to others
>>readings--promoting others work outside of a "pop" and confessionalist
>>sensibility. That years before when Barrett W. read to an audience of 8
>>I was ashamed to be a poet in LA. THat same thing happened to Robert >>Duncan year ago--to Fanny Howe recently--etc. Few poets that are listed >>in your note suport the work of others besides friends. Yes, I am >>bitter--but my job as an editor and teacher is not simply to read and >>promote and publish the work of those I like--but to promote and >publish >>a POETICS that is important. I have published poetry by those whom I >>don't think highly of--but whose work I believe deserves to be read! Of >>those you mentioned only Paul V. (with whom I started Littoral Books >>years ago--along with D, Phillips and Martha Ronk and Lee Hickman) even >>show up at the readings that Sun and Moon give--while Douglas M. and >>others DO show up at B. B. occasionally! Damn! No compensations besides >>the sun! No--a scene is unimportant--a dialectic is of utmost >>importance!
>>
>>Todd Baron
>>(ReMap)
>>
>
>
>_____
>Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>
>

↑ Index

526. toddbaron
Re: LA Lit Orgs
Sat 18 Jul 1998

Catherine Daly wrote:
>
> It seems to me that if place is the problem, it should be simple enough to > invade some den of mediocrity. It seems to me that Sun & Moon and Cal Arts > have begun a pretty effective invasion of LACMA. What about MOCA? What about > the science museum with the 50 foot woman in it?

>
> The "Buk. School" is ABOUT self promotion. The performance poets are also > _everywhere_. Incommunicado and Manic D and 2.13.61 have done good music > industry-style promotion for lit. (as well as celebrity publishing, but well).
>
> I think of all the celebs writing books now. By and large, they seem to read > at either their local independent bookstore or local B&N rather than do a tour > of shopping malls or record stores or whatever. It is a bid for legitimacy.
> Where promotion is work, to not promote may seem genuine.
>
> As for Bel Air and Fifth Avenue, who cares? Except that British Vogue reviews > poetry, you know. Here in LA, I'm mostly told, "Oh yeah, I published poetry > in Ploughshares, The Harvard Review, got into the Best blah blah of some year, > but then, then I started writing for _Blossom_. Now, I don't have to write." > Maybe it's not so bad to be here! If you really suck, they'll throw a lot of > money at you and you'll stop writing.
>
> Catherine Daly
> [redacted]

I think that "infiltration" and subversion is a good idea--but I disagree that Sun and Moon has done so outside of the bookstore that they run. LACMA has a pretty narrative and non-innovational series--Laurel Ann Bogen is running it and she has nothing to do with Sun and Moon--nor--do I think)(know) she reads outside of a linear school. THe "stars" I refered top certainly have a right (and several ornamental lefts) but they read at a series that for years has been sponsered by the ever conservation Poetry of America Foundation--at the Chateau Marmont (the hip place for a martini!) and so I'm afraid they don't really count. (Of course--there's room for all--I'm turning sweet now) BUT

No one will throw alot of monet at innovational writers--LA has a rich history of the avante-guarde but not a funded a.g. ! Ribot, Remap, Witz, Rhizome, and the poets reflected in those experiementalconte,poraryinnovation based magazines don't care to publish in Ploughshares/etc--cuz that's not our readership. THose magazines--like the New Yorker--have an investment in narrativity that describes (As Roberts Peters once beautifully stated) the season depicted on the cover!

It's not so "bad" here--but--I, broken "record" dismiss the idea that complaining is a negative thing. While other cities support symposums and conferences (well, not the city itself) we can't fathom anything outside of the BOOK FAIR (promotion) at UCLA and the Poetry Fest. We need to learn to expand this here horizon--I, a citizien of this berg--publish here and want to see the daily sunrise reflect more than the sorrid details of one's "self" as reflected in the poems of complaint! Rememeber,

Huxley
Yeats
Isherwood Cage
Mann Fitzgerald
Duncan, I

ALL complained and worked here

not to mention the poets such as Doug Messerli, Dennis Phillips, Martha Ronk, Diane Ward, (myself), Paul Vangelisti, Guy Bennett, Fanny Howe, etc

still do!

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

ps: this is fun!

↑ Index

527. dbkk
forgotten women
Sat 18 Jul 1998

Mark Prejsnar wrote--

>Didn't Michael Davidson give Kyger quite a lot of respectful attention in >her own right, in his book, the San Fancisco Renaissance??
>
This is Kevin Killian. Mark, you're 100% right, and even better than Michael's version of Kyger is his reading of Helen Adam. Honestly I think it must have been the first account of her work to take it seriously and to place it into the context of the currents from which, at first glance, she and her work seem so distant. [Michael Davidson, "The San Francisco Renaissance: Poetics and Community at Mid-century" (Cambridge Univ. Press, 1989)] Gwyn, thank you for your kind words about the book Lew Ellingham and I have written on Spicer "Poet Be Like God". Where I disagreed with Michael D is in his underlying thesis, I don't think it's ever stated explicitly, that Spicer's fears of women and their sexuality precluded him and his circle from supporting and engaging in the work of the women poets of the period, and also the great female modernists of the 20th century that preceded his own work. Michael and I were both lucky in that Kyger's papers are so marvelously available to the public at the grand Archive for New Poetry at UCSD, they are a great collection and make her life in the 50s and 60s a total open book; lucky also that she is still alive and among us and so helpful to researchers and critics and biographers. In the case of Adam, whose papers are at Buffalo, I expect wonderful things from the work that Kristin Prevallet has been conducting on her the past few years. And there's a biography being written about Ruth Witt-Diamant, the impresario of the SF State Poetry Center, whose career Lew and I sketch out in "Poet Be Like God." The strangest case of "forgotten women" in the Spicer crowd is that of Jamie MacInnis, the super-talented San Francisco-born poet with whom Spicer became acquainted in his final years. She lived on after him and continued to write some stunning poems, but nobody now knows where she is or even if she's alive or dead!

↑ Index

528. trbell

Re: Call Forth Further Notes to Poetry -Forwarded

Sat 18 Jul 1998

Thias is more for Henry but I'll use this chance. I may have it wrong but I think in a recent post on the wax museum you said that essentially nothing muchh changes in the realm of poetics (i.e. good guys and establishment, good women vs. the establishment). This hit me especially hard for some reason - maybe because I've been an 'anti' for a long time. Taken with the ironic and profound gesture of the 80 yr late funeral (with it's reawakening for me the temporal coincidence ?co-happening? ?co-habiting? with zaum, futurism, war, revolution, Trotskii, constructivism, productivism, etcetc of eighty years ago. Has anything changed or are we stuck in these conflicts indefinitely/

tom bell

At 12:19 PM 7/18/98 PDT, Mark DuCharme <[redacted]> wrote: >Hear hear. Enough of these posting on the post-whatever drivel. Let's >bring back normative syntax, there's something that never gets >formulaic. Better to be bored than provoked. Jolly good, jolly good.

>
>....
>
>>Hey, you poets have got the flat disjunctive incomplete sentence down, >>which is the main thing by which we experimentalists distinguish >between >>us and them & what poetry is. The poem as something that started >someplace >>else in your head you've already forgotten and gets truncated in order
>to >>remember that missing element. Work a little more on the non-rhythm
>>the boredom the feeling of unexplained angst; learn to throw in some >>plangent multisyllabic non-references from a fairly large dictionary;
>>work on your spatial distances between words and "lines" which are what >>shows you are a thoughtful alternative poet patted on the head by major >>people like Olson Creeley Duncan or genericnewyorkbeatlanguagepoet -
>>and they'll put you in an anthology of (Newer) Americans - (the 14th >>one - from Urban Bleat Press).
>>- Henry Gould
>>
>
>
>_____
>Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>
>

↑ Index

529. MAXINE CHERNOFF

Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth

Sun 19 Jul 1998

Regarding the discussion of audience size (Mark DuCharme, Charles Alexander and others): Jack Spicer's now historic lectures at Vancouver, which I've just been reading in Peter Gizzi's THE HOUSE THAT JACK BUILT, is good evidence that the size of the crowd at a reading or lecture is little indication of its eventual influence. There were perhaps 30 people in attendance in Warren and Ellen Tallman's living room.

I was one of three poets reading in Elizabeth Robinson's Berkeley house this month, on a Sunday afternoon. Perhaps 40 people were there. It was one of the best reading experiences I've had--a perfect sense of attention in the room for all three poets. Salon settings are just the best. Only Allen Ginsberg and slam tournaments fill larger halls anyway, and few poets are up to that harsh glare, thank god.

Best,
Paul Hoover

↑ Index

530. Poetics Agent 288793

no confidence/UPDATE

Sun 19 Jul 1998

This is your local poetics list manager reporting to you live from Buffalo, New York, where the dew point is high enough to make your computer sweat all its bells & whistles into an organic mush so lush that even roaches will chow down on your motherboard's main wires. But enough of the "bug" motif. Seems like I'm obsessed with pests and the nasty business of either letting those flies crawl all over me or resorting to the dragonslayer napalm-equivalent in the ant's world (so much for those damn centaurians!) but enough metaphor!

some facts:

I logged in for the first time in a day and saw that the nasty business of UB's changeover to the "IMAP" method of mail delivery (which I know nearly nothing about) is finally over. There were nearly 100 messages to the Poetics List's custodial address: [redacted] -- the most messages in a long time (besides the now ubiquitous error messages).

No one from UB was able to send or receive messages until Thursday and stored-up mail was still being delivered yesterday and even today.

Sorry if this delay prevented me from signing people up to the list in a timely manner.

For those newbies to the list, welcome! If you have any questions, or would like to pummel me with your poetical criticisms, please write to me directly at [redacted]

Thanks for your patience - joel kuszai

↑ Index

531. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
LostTime
Sun 19 Jul 1998

[the kernel is the central core of the unix or linux computer operating system. ktrace is used to analyze its operations.]

LostTime

{k:15}time pico LostTime
  2.13s real 0.00s user 0.00s system
*

{k:16}LostTime, hold on, I'm calling the system, calling the kernel, hold on: ktrace /usr/local/bin/LostTime ktrace /bin/LostTime ktrace /usr/bin/LostTime ktrace: exec of 'LostTime' failed
/usr/share/nls/C/libc.cat No such file or directory
*

{k:17}Hold on, LostTime, system callup: Jennifer
*

{k:18}Jennifer calling the Colonel:
*

Oh do come to me so sweetly, for I, you, we, will we now, for I will have all the world's dark time, and you, Colonel, you have time lost, LostTime, this missing file in which I deposit all the world's lost words, all those letters, numbers, those signs of dreary punctuation -
*

Come, Colonel, let me sit upon your knee, I shall raise my pinafore so prettily, do not forbear the passage of wise time while your soldiers, dark from heat of passage through the wired jungle, patrol, patrol, and will never ever notice, for I,
I, Jennifer, have all this time at my disposal
*

And against your death, do give it all of you, and towards your death, to take it from myself, only to return it all;
while you, Colonel, disport against my knee with gallantry, your soldiers march their bamboo way to victory. I shall remain, you notice with your dying words, for I have still this wondrous time, this disregard -
I will do you grand, Colonel, I will do you grand.
*

{k:22} time pico LostTime
  11.20s real 0.01s user 0.01s system

{k:23} LostTime
*

↑ Index

532. Orpheus
Since
Sun 19 Jul 1998

Since Orpheus, we know we must never turn Back to look at what we love, or risk Destroying it.

Barthes: Critical Essays 1964

↑ Index

533. Tosh
Re: lit. scene in LA. --Cal-arts/ Moving Bdrs anth
Sun 19 Jul 1998

I also want to mention in regards to size, that the Beyond Baroque room never seems empty. Besides programming I have read there myself, and when I read in a group reading of course it's packed. But I also read in that room with 20 or less people and it is still an enjoyable event. So the room itself has lot to do with the reading as will as the work and the size of the crowd.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

534. J Kimball
Re: POETICS Digest - 17 Jul 1998 to 18 Jul 1998 (#1998-5)
Sun 19 Jul 1998

Alan --

The Boston Alternative Poetry conference still in progress at Blacksmith House, as I tap on these keys, is at fevery pitch, to coin a phrase. Friday kicked off with readings from Daniel Bouchard, Drew Gardner, Wil Alexander, Fanny Howe. Bouchard bounces off generic events, news wrap-ups, say, and apt link-ages such as those between game show evangelism and Mr. Clinton's recent visit to the MIT computer labs. Drew Gardner resuscitates (one of my favorite words right now!) something verging on urban elegiac, thinking it through to its after-Ashbery and unawful, sense-making matrices within angst in big space. Gardner knows something about cowboys and how they dress. Wil Alexander delivers fresh lines of defense for tropicalism north of Sunset and Canal, variations on never saying anything you could not mean if you had the time to stare for days at cawcaws, Lamantia lizards, stuff. He loves poesies and shows it, and even better, talks it when he does his "prose" intros and so forth. Fanny Howe, who might be wearing sunglasses now, employs a term like "soul" in polished ovular forms that cover no language we can understand equivocally, tanning with HD. I want to pick through those ovals and spin them in my right hand, Queeglike.

Sat.: vocabularies and imaginations panel -- missed this. Biography/criticism panel -- missed. Missed the noontime reading too, but the buzz is that Gerrit Lansing is a wonder, fully clothed in Boston haberdashery, Blackmountain tie. (Will get details on this, later.)

Afternoon reading a Boston phenomenon that occurs every other generation. Last time, perhaps, was during Hurricane Carol (or someone's) when John Wieners swept into Charles Street Meetinghouse to attend his first ever poetry gig, that : to hear Charles Olson read every poem he -- Charles, that is -- had written up to that point. He read for hours and hours, and John and poetry have never been the same. (Two generations before that: Henry James revised brother William's application to Harvard.)

Among the readers this Saturday afternoon: Zhang Er reading in Mandarin and Leonard Schwartz offering the crispest English versions. John Taggart moaning on the blues, repetition, feeding and leading, singing soft, singing "precious," and the mother of it all, the blues, having her vision of how to give it birth -- one that includes, I think, our hearing Taggart moaning "preceeeeessuss" on. A genuine history and a poem performed as a piece! Unstoppably first rate. Chris Funkhouser also singing, bridegroom to his skeleton, flooding the room with a sutra that is not a sutra from nowhere, moving it gracefully on. Caroline Knox tearing into writers' pretensions such as, to paraphrase, "composing" a stark language framework and "going back" and filling it with "content." Knox got some of the biggest laughs, deservedly. Sean Cole got lots of laughs too and a few cardiovascular molecules had to have imploded -- someone's, somewhere -- at Cole's most astonishingly diverse send-ups -- Dickens, house plant life, teen lust, three-family crisscrossed dreams, warped dials... well it's finely warped into a poetry and a poetic presence not unlike his precursors, Ricard, O'Hara, Artaud. Rare. Andrea Brady stands as tall as you want while she rips your peabrain (mine, anyway) into smithereens, flowing, protoliterate incursions into inchoate bliss and something opposite -- isn't this what we all need now?

The afternoon and the conference have been the greatest sort of success, pairing the established with the not-quite-yet, just what a serious gathering of poets should be. The spotlight shines until late tonight. More soon. Call you soon,

-- Ja

↑ Index

535. ken|n|ing
Private Eye
Sun 19 Jul 1998

Looking to hear from Keston Sutherland. If you're out there, please back-channel. Patrick F. Durgin

```
                    |
                    |
k e n n i n g``````````````|```````````````````````````
a newsletter of contemporary |poetry, poetics, and non-fiction writing
                    |418 Brown St. #10 Iowa City, IA 52245 USA
```

↑ Index

536. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli
"Reason , faced with a datum, "
Sun 19 Jul 1998

"Reason, faced with a datum, attempts to transform the blind necessity of the datum, as sheer datum, into a necessity which is a logical necessity. But in doing so it arrives at an eternal Identity, the Parmidean sphere, from which nothing at all can be deduced. Explaining carried out rigorously, has led finally to explaining away! This is indeed the Selbstmord der Vernunft. Meyerson's (and parcelli's) own term for the predicament is, 'THE EPISTEMOLOGICAL PARADOX.' His classic discussion of explanation, the Explication, which begins with the insistence upon the third factor, the realistic penchant of science, ends with the climactic--and despairing--statement of the epistemological paradox."---from Explanation & Reality In the Philosophy of Emile Meyerson by Thomas R. Kelly---carlo parcelli (It's too bad I haven't been able to let Meyerson speak for himself but I've misplaced a collection of his essays published by Dover which contain Meyerson's own insights regarding Epistemological Paradox beginning with his critique of Einstein's special & general relativities.) ---"The Newport factory, built at a cost of eight million dollars, was run for the Pentagon by the Food Machinery and Chemical Corporation of New York. By 1967 it had produced between four and five thousand tons of VX (e.g. Nerve Agent), and a new generation of chemical weapons had entered service with the United States. VX had been loaded into landmines, artillery shells, aircraft spray tanks, even warheads of battlefield missiles. In less than ten years a potential British pesticide had become THE MOST POISONOUS WEAPON IN SERVICE WITH THE AMERICAN FORCES."---from A Higher Form of Killing: The Secret Story of Chemical and Biological Warfare by Robert Harris and Jeremy Paxman, Noonday Press, 1982 (A book called Gene Wars has even more declassfied info but again, I can't locate my copy in the paper vistas surrounding me.)

↑ Index

537. Dan or Orion Raphael Dlugonski

Local scenes

Sun 19 Jul 1998

---

to some extent the dynamics of who goes or doesnt go to what readings is similar in towns of various sizes (from boulder to nyc). here in portland (the western one) there are groups that go mostly to one reading series, but its more the writers who attract the artist through people they know (which has the corollary that the best method of publicity is direct notification--phone or e-mail) for example, while my own work is toward the edge, a lotta words without standard sentencing (delivered energeticly)-- people who come to hear me read come coz of their connections with me and my work; but most of these people would probably not go to see barret watten or lyn hejinian. (any out of town writer without some sort of local rep has difficulty pulling an audience.) i dont go to many readings, usually just close freinds (so rarely does someone interesting come through to read here; the only person who books outside writers in the area has stongly academic tastes); my main excuse is having a day job, a family and my own writing and publishing to tend to.

dan raphael

↑ Index

538. Catherine Daly

LA Lit. Orgs.

Sun 19 Jul 1998

What I meant by LACMA was Will Alexander's Writers On Site grant-funded symposium, and the Cal Arts Asian Art weekend.

While Laurel Ann Bogen is certainly regional, she is rather hardworking. I find it hard to believe she is actually opposed to lengthening her mailing list. Also, since she's teaching the on-the-ground entry-level workshop at UCLA Extension this term, I've got some wonderfully experimental beginners (I feel were pushed over into) my online version.

Ah, but that horribly organized poetry tent at that book fair. And what is this Susan Loomis Y2K poetry shindig? Why did Molly Bendall charge FIFTEEN DOLLARS for her last reading? What is that? And what about the Barnsdall Art Park?

But as for money, or Monet (but that's in San Diego), seems to be a matter of outreach. For every hack out of Harvard there are people who, with a push, could find that $25,000. is really a tiny sum, really not enough for a car, but just enough to issue a book, not of one's own work, but, you know, something one was able to help get done. Really a lot classier than all those actors writing about sunset in Malibu.

It's really "Los Angeles, the Four Economies".

Catherine Daly
[redacted]

↑ Index

539. Rachel Levitsky
Re: For Bay Area Activists
Sun 19 Jul 1998

For those of you interested, these folks are calling for a supportive presence in court on july 31, Oakland, CA.

--RAchel D.

> Justice for Judi Bari!
> 106 W. Standley St. Ukiah, CA 95482 [redacted]
> July 15, 1998
>
> Dear Friends,
>
> On May 24, 1990, a motion-triggered pipe bomb exploded beneath environmental/labor activist Judi Bari's car seat as she and Darryl Cherney drove through Oakland, California, on an organizing tour for Earth First! Redwood Summer. Today, over eight years later, the people who placed the bomb are still walking the streets.
>
> The would-be assassins were allowed to slip away with the approval of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Oakland Police Department, who have never investigated the politically-motivated attack. Instead, they used the bombing as an excuse to vilify and collect information about environmental activists, falsely arresting Judi and Darryl within hours

of the blast on charges of transporting explosives.

*In 1991, Judi Bari and Darryl Cherney filed a Federal Civil Rights lawsuit against the FBI and OPD, charging them with false arrest, illegal search and seizure, and conspiracy to violate the activists' civil rights.
They claim that the FBI used the tactics of their notorius Counterintelligence Program (COINTELPRO) to smear Judi and Darryl as bombers in an attempt to "neutralize" the Earth First! movement.*

The Civil lawsuit has held up to numerous attempts by the defendants to have it dismissed, based on the strength of the evidence collected so far. It has unearthed thousands of pages of FBI and Police documents that show clearly that the government lied and knew they were lying when they arrested Judi and Darryl for bombing themselves.

*On March 2, 1997, Judi Bari died of metastatic breast cancer. The absence of her powerful voice to publicize the lawsuit this last year has served to underscore what Judi knew all along: that this case is our case.
It is about the rights of all progressive activists to effectively organize for social change without a constant covert assault by the FBI. It is up to us to fill the silence left by Judi's untimely passing with a resounding united call for justice!*

The Redwood Summer Justice Project, made up of friends and comrades of Judi's who have been working on the case with her for years, will take the bombing case to trial. The legal team has persevered in the face of a relentless strategy of delay by the FBI and OPD. Recently, Judge Claudia Wilken granted our motion to certify that the Government and Police do not have immunity from prosecution. This victory should have cleared the way to trial, except the Oakland Police snared the case once again by filing a frivolous appeal that could hold things up for yet another 12-14 more months. Now the FBI is refusing to move forward with discovery until the Oakland appeal is resolved.

This is why we need your help. The bombing case gives us an unprecedented opportunity to take the FBI to task for COINTELPRO activities and expose their covert reign of terror against activists and organizations that has undermined progressive movements in the U.S. and elsewhere for decades. But if we want a trial, we're going to have to demand it!

We will be happy to provide copies of RSJP's bombing case leaflets should you want to distribute them to your members or pass them on to other interested groups and individuals. Also, please sign on to the attached statement calling for a trial NOW, and an end to FBI COINTELPRO once and for all. If you know of additional groups and individuals who should receive a packet about the bombing and COINTELPRO, please send us their names and numbers.

The next hearing in the case is scheduled for July 31, 1998, at 1:30 PM, before Judge Claudia Wilken at the Oakland Federal Courthouse (1301 Clay Street, downtown Oakland). Any way you can help publicize this date and mobilize people to attend will be invaluable. We must show up in full force to let the court know that we won't accept any more delays! Make sure to check with the Mendocino Environmental Center at [redacted] before you leave to confirm. Thank you again for your support.

Justice for Judi Bari!

Alicia Littletree
106 W. Standley St.
Ukiah, CA 95482
[redacted]

STATEMENT DEMANDING A TRIAL IN THE EARTH FIRST! BOMBING CASE:

We, the undersigned, add our names to the long and diverse list of groups and individuals who demand justice for Judi Bari and a full jury trial in her and Darryl Cherney's civil rights lawsuit against the FBI and Oakland Police. In 1990, Earth First! activists Judi Bari and Darryl Cherney were the targets of not only a brutal car bombing assassination attempt, but a vicious smear campaign by the FBI and Oakland Police. These agencies used the bombing as an excuse to vilify Earth First!, a nonviolent radical environmental movement, as terrorists. The FBI has never looked for the real bomber, and the person or persons who tried to kill Judi Bari are still at large.

> This case of outrageous police misconduct must be brought to trial without delay. We will not accept further FBI and OPD stall tactics, and we fully expect the court to dismiss any and all frivolous motions and groundless appeals aimed at dragging out the case. We insist that the FBI agents and Oakland Police officers involved in the bombing case be brought to the witness stand to answer for their conduct. We recognize the far reaching implications this trial could have for activists from all struggles who work to achieve social change in the U.S.
>
> Ultimately, we demand an immediate end to the use of COINTELPRO-style tactics by the FBI to disrupt and "neutralize" progressive organizations working for social change.
>
> Signed,
>
> (If you or your group would like to sign on, please contact us at the address at top of this page with your name, address, and other contact info.! Thanks! Earth First!)
>
> The Judi Bari Home Page on the Internet is located at: http://www.monitor.net/~bari
>
> [redacted]

↑ Index

540. Carl Lynden Peters
address search for DIFFERENCE ENGINE
Sun 19 Jul 1998

dear poets,

does anyone know chris meyers's (i think i have the spelling right)--e-mail address, or know how i can reach him (snail mail address is also helpful)? chris runs a small press called DIFFERENCE ENGINE. if you know his address, could you post me back door?

many thanx in advance,

carl

[redacted]

↑ Index

541. Mark Salerno
Hard Press Contact Info
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Friends:

If anyone knows the telephone number, fax number or e-mail for Jonathan Gams' Hard Press in West Stockbridge, Mass., I'd be grateful to receive that information by back channel.

Thanks.

Mark Salerno

↑ Index

542. rachel s. kubie
Henry Dumas Tribute in Baltimore
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Henry Dumas 1934 - 1968
>A Celebration of His Life & Work
>Saturday, July 25, 1998, 11 a.m. - 5 p.m.
>Enoch Pratt Free Library
>400 Cathedral Street
>Baltimore, Maryland 21218
>[redacted]
>FREE
>
>
>Special Guests:
>Loretta Dumas
>Eugene B. Redmond
>Quincy Troupe
>Kenneth Carroll
>E. Ethelbert Miller
>Chezia Thompson-Cager
>Reggie Timpson
>
>
>Born July 20, 1934, in Sweet Home Arkansaa, Dumas was raised in Harlem from >the age of 10. He studied at City College and Rutgers University, served i >the U.S. Air Force, married, fathered two sons, and participated in the >Civil Rights and Black Power movements. Dumas helped develop the little >magazine circuit (Hiram Poetry Review, Umbra, Untitled, Negro Digest) and >wrote what Toni Morrison has called "heroic" poetry and fiction. At the time >of his death in 1968, he was a teacher-counselor and director of Language >Workshops at Southern Illinois University -Experiment in Higher Education

in >East St. Louis.
>
>Dumas did not live to see his poetry and fiction published in book form. On >May 23, 1968 he was shot and killed by a policeman on the Harlem Station >platform of the New York Central Railroad. Dumas writings were published >posthumously under the editorship of Toni Morrison and Eugene B. Redmond.
>
>Works by Dumas:
>
>Ark of Bones and Other Stories (1970)
>Play Ebony, Play Ivory (1974)
>Jonoah and the Green Stone (1976)
>Rope of Wind and Other Stories (1979)
>Goodbye, Sweetwater (1988)
>Knees of a Natural Man (1989)
>

↑ Index

543. linda russo
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Simon --

yes, I agree, (you wrote "the only "true" source of politics in poetry consists in the innovation of form") but I think you perhaps misread me. I wasn't talking about "gender [as] . . .a deep source of voice" -- That is exactly the facile premise that MOVING BORDERS allows us to move away from. I agree that many "women's anthologies" come to that, but MOVING BORDERS doesn't. I also have a problem with _needing_ a women's anthology at this point in time as it is a sort of ghettoization. But as Todd Baron points out, we are having this conversation so we need it. If not a ghetto than MOVING BORDERS serves to collect (and allow readers to compare) the thought of innovative women poets of 2+ generations. We may reveal that feminism, a feminist poetics, is many things and in varying degrees concerned with gender at all. "Feminism _in_ poetry" is different (and yes, often voice based) from poetry that comes out of a feminist awareness of one's context -- which is operative in the poets I mention -- scalapino, howe, hejinian etc.

you say, in an interesting dialogue to Elizabeth Treadwell's (et al
-- i don't know the post she originally lifted from) wonderings of about a week ago
> The question of moving the love poem away from "constructions > of the self" is another part of this; it's not what you see,
> it's how.

I agree. Tradition is masculine (created by men), true, but labelling it thus is a problem. Male does not equal masculine. This has been reductive reasoning (necessarily so) on the side of feminist scholars. I'm interested in how we can talk about these things (power structures -- as tradition is a power structure that "feminizes" certain people who approach it -- I mean it "disempowers" them -- it has nothing to do with gender in the end.)

and my point is that we label "feminist" a focus on gender in relation to literary history -- our fault is not in labeling certain poets/ approaches femininst (always women!! when I'm sure many men on this list will and have come forward to say they consider themsevles (post)"feminist") But to confine our investigation of a gendered relation to tradition to Women.

And this is perhaps my most important point:

you say >Even the gender of > the author is immaterial to the extent that it does > not cause a shift in the methods of creation,

I disagree, though, on the "materiality" of gender when approaching tradition. Gender ISN'T immaterial, it DOES cause a (particular) shift According to Waldrop, (as recorded in Bernstein's _Politics of Poetic Form_). the "main device"of _The Road is Everywhere orStop This Body (Open Places, 1978): is that the object of one phrase turns into the subject of the next phrase without being repeated. I was interested in extending the boundaries of the sentence . . .. However, it also comes out of my feminist preoccupation . . . I propose a pattern in which subject and object function are not fixed, but temporary, reversible roles, where there is no hierarchy of main and subordinate clauses, but a fluid and constant alternation. (61) Waldrop deals with a theme of feminism though not "as theme." Since "the woman as `love object' is a prevalent archetype in our culture" this technique, Waldrop explains "has definite feminist/political implications." "Of course," Waldrop adds, "this is hindsight. Consciously, I was working on a formal problem"(66).

ALL relations cause a particular shift though. e.g. we read celan as having a "feminized" ("disempowered" i.e. as a jew) relation to his language.

-- linda russo

p.s. simon thanks for responding. I wondered if anyone would respond.

Simon DeDeo wrote:
> I can't remember if this topic was covered > here or on the British Poet's list, but the question > of feminism in poetry is similar to the question of > political action in general. I've made this point > before, but again: the only "true" source of politics > in poetry consists in the innovation of form. Subject > matter is forceless, because there are far more effective > means of conveying political beliefs than a poem, and > it's more often than not the poorer poems that are the > most effective political cants. Even the gender of > the author is immaterial to the extent that it does > not cause a shift in the methods of creation, although
> I don't mean to dismiss anthologists who seek to include > women -- gender often is a deep source of voice.
> > And another question:
> > How can forms be "masculine" when, though, they were
> > "created" by men, they were done (usually) intensely in relation to
> > "woman" (no matter how facile and passive his construction of her?)
>
> I think you've sort of answered your own question here;
> with a basic idea of how poets create -- through a combination > of observation and language -- there seems to be no reason > that the Poetics of the "male gaze" (yadda, yadda) would > bear any relation to that that might be written by a woman.
>
> The question of moving the love poem away from "constructions > of the self" is another part of this; it's not what you see,
> it's how. One doesn't expect an 18th gynecologist and a 20th > century midwife to concur in their visions of a woman; the > difference would arise from the point of view of a third person.
> "Gynceological", "Masculine", is how we label them.
>
> -- Simon
>
> http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
> [redacted]

> [redacted]
> [redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

544. linda russo
Guest (for Notley)
Mon 20 Jul 1998

I had an intersting dream last night. Barbara Guest had been asked to give an unrehearsed reading of a new female playwright. I was in the audience (naturally) with my partner (Chris Alexander) (naturally). Guest would look at the script and memorize a bunch of lines very quickly and then read them, between gulping from a glass of water. She didn't look quite nervous and I thought it was very interesting but I reflected on the nature of what "experimental" "women's" theatre HAD TO say, without having any context to know exactly. I found I was then looking at a t.v. screen, which was televising the very same performance. The color on the screen was tweeked a little and looked sort of neat. Thinking I should look at the person and not the image. Looking back and forth a bit. More worried than confused. Woke up. Can anyone tell me what this means?

Linda Russo

↑ Index

545. Jordan Davis
Jamie MacInnis
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Larry Fagin's here in the office right now.

He says to say he hasn't heard from her in a long time, and that although no one knows whether she's alive, no one has heard that she died. As for her work, Larry says there is no more than what he has.

Jordan

↑ Index

546. Katherine Lederer

Announcing SHARK, a magazine of poetics

Mon 20 Jul 1998

S H A R K :

A journal of poetics and art criticism

Edited by Emilie Clark and Lytle Shaw

Announces the publication of its first issue, on the "pre-poetic" featuring:

-Dodie Bellamy, "A Poetics of Boundary Problems"
-Gregg Biglieri, "The Torsion of Thought"
-Mary Burger, "Abjectivist Festschrift"
-Emilie Clark, "Some Ladies in Diagram"
-Alex Cory, "Monologue for SHARK"
-Adam DeGraff, "Poetic Statement"
-Craig Dworkin, "The Brack of Meaning"
-Dmitry Golynko-Volfson, "Walking Past the Church of the French Consulate"
-Robert Hale, "Opposition to Return"
-Lyn Hejinian, "Reason"
-Kevin Killian, "The Pre-Poetic"
-Katy Lederer, "Surprise and the Appropriate: Appropriate Surprise"
-Pamela Lu, "Inappropriations"
-Laura Moriarty, "Simultaneous Journal"
-Eugene Ostashevsky, "Dmitry Golynko-Volfson and New Petersburg Poetry"
-Leslie Scalapino, "Footnoting"
-Lytle Shaw, "The Historical Sentence"
-Mark Shepard, "Situating the Device: Arverne, New York and an Urbanism of Stillborn Renewal"

Issue #1 costs $8; a year's subscription (two issues) is $14 We pay postage

Send Email Requests to:
[redacted]

Mail:
SHARK
74 Varick Street #203
New York, NY 10013

↑ Index

547. Douglas Barbour
Re: Lost Time
Mon 20 Jul 1998

I remain a user of computers & the net who simply doesn't understand the hardware, but pieces like this do tickle my funny bone. The piece is itself an analytical engine of sorts, & it works. Thanks again, Alan.

Douglas Barbour (h) [403] 4363320 (b) [403]
[redacted]
Department of English
University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta Canada T6G 2E5

> By stress and syllable
> by change-rhyme and contour
> we let the long line pace equal awkward to its period.
>
> The short line
> we refine
> and keep for candor.
>
> Robert Duncan

↑ Index

548. Maria Damon
Re: forgotten women
Mon 20 Jul 1998

At 5:32 PM -0700 7/18/98, [redacted] wrote:
... The strangest case of "forgotten women" in the >Spicer crowd is that of Jamie MacInnis, the super-talented San >Francisco-born poet with whom Spicer became acquainted in his final years.
>She lived on after him and continued to write some stunning poems, but >nobody now knows where she is or even if she's alive or dead!...

in 1977 larry fagin showed me her work and said she was his best friend. he might know her whereabouts, give him a call.

↑ Index

549. Simon DeDeo
Re: I'm ba-ack
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Also back, after a short hiatus from work.

> The argument about Lowell begin a puppet of the new criticism goes back to Perloff's _The Poetics of Indeterminacy_; there is a nice demonstration of the way in which the early Lowell seeds his work with symbols and paradoxes in anticipation of New Critical classroom exegesis. Of course, calling him a puppet is rather crude--isn't it more of a convergence of interests? The New Critics might be Lowell's puppets just as plausibly.

I haven't read the essay, so I'm not sure if the "seeding" is discussed as anything more than a textual artifact (i.e., no incriminating letters from Lowell). In that case, it just seems to be another example of the way criticism and poetry depend on each other in the 20th century, and, indeed, in any other century. Did Shakespeare "seed" Hamlet with melancholy so that the psycologies of the time would see their theories mirrored on the stage?

> The Rasula analysis of Lowell is devastating and for me irrefutable; this does not mean that Lowell does not transcend his "institutional" role within the wax museum, but I am not the person to ask since my aversion to Lowell's work is tempermental and visceral. I realize he is hugely accomplished and great in his own way--I just can't stand him.

Which years of Lowell can't you stand? I personally don't care for some of his later work -- _Histories_ seems a royal pain in the ass, a sort of failed hermeticism. He tried to be Yeats, but failed ("failed utterly"). But it seems as if there is a lot of difference in his early (and much later) work. If the list has polarized into camps in my absence, then I'm certaintly on Lowell's side. Again, I'm not familiar with the "wax museum" book, so if I've missed the point, apologies. Does Plath get the same treatment from Perloff? I would assume that she could also easily be accused of New Critical pandering, but Perloff, as I remember, writes very highly of her in places.

What is the difference -- morally speaking -- between seeding your work with Leavis and taking a liberal helping of Derrida? It doesn't matter if you like Derrida more; as countless poetic failures in our time testify, it's not the source, but the channeling.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

550. Linda Russo
post-Fem/For you Guys too
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Todd Baron (and months of burying my head in Margy Sloan's Moving Borders) prompted this response:

To my mind, any innovative writing (by a femininst) that challenges, innovates on, problematizes, makes interesting, or moves away from an identity/voice-based poetics (which employs lyric forms so called "masculine" in this context because they're "traditional" and tradition, created by men, is "masculine") is necessarily post-feminist (i.e. moving away from 1st and 2nd wave feminist agendas -- giving voice to women's experience, recovering erased women, creating an exclusively "women's cannon," and working to be inclusive of other oppressed identities, etc.)

That puts writers like Alice Notley, Leslie Scalapino, Joan Retallack, and Lyn Hejinian in interesting positions, as they all work toward an ungendered poetics (i.e.not priviliging the experiences of women, or viewing innovative writing practices as somehow "feminine" counterparts to the "masculine" tradition -- tho Retallack holds onto this distinction most strongly, and makes it most useful) while retaining (and now I have to add Susan Howe to the list, but it of course continues to grow) a feminist awareness of literary history.

Alice Notley once wrote "you can't have your own tradition, it's not nice" though she's repeatedly invested in configuring a "woman's epic" -- how a woman can write (through) a traditionally masculine form.

I find this the most interesting challenge facing women writers today -- but doesn't it also face men writers? They face the same tradition, and and have every reason and right to challenge the (cultural) construction of their gender and of "our" tradition (I mean by "our" not as a gendered distinction but the fact that cultures, via literary history, construct traditions -- so we're all sort of faced with this thing to go to work on -- is it really "ours," this inheritance?

Yesterday was the 150th anniversary of Caddie Stanton et al's Womens Declaration -- modeled after that "masculine" form, it reads as a sort of "fill in the blanks" substitute "woman" for "man." It's not as simple as all that -- but I wonder whether and how men respond to tradition. Why I feel obliged (in a way) to read (almost exclusively at this point of my bread-crumb spewing) women writers. I'm well aware that men read women & vice versa -- I don't have a problem with women being "under-represented" (that makes me a post-feminist)(even though I'd like to see more talk that I feel really invested in on this list). But I wonder why the problematic way that "tradition" has treated/"constructed" gender is presently a "woman's problem."

And another question:
How can forms be "masculine" when, though, they were
"created" by men, they were done (usually) intensely in relation to
"woman" (no matter how facile and passive his construction of her?)

all yours in words,

linda russo

On Fri, 17 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:

> No, we not beyond any discussion that continues > to be one. Lately all sorts of news on the radio (KPFK here) about > post-feminist ideologies and--to my mind--we need more more more! The

↑ Index

551. Simon DeDeo
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Mon 20 Jul 1998

---

linda --

I can't remember if this topic was covered
here or on the British Poet's list, but the question of feminism in poetry is similar to the question of political action in general. I've made this point before, but again: the only "true" source of politics
in poetry consists in the innovation of form. Subject matter is forceless, because there are far more effective means of conveying political beliefs than a poem, and
it's more often than not the poorer poems that are the most effective political cants. Even the gender of the author is immaterial to the extent that it does not cause a shift in the methods of creation, although
I don't mean to dismiss anthologists who seek to include women -- gender often is a deep source of voice.

> And another question:
> How can forms be "masculine" when, though, they were
> "created" by men, they were done (usually) intensely in relation to
> "woman" (no matter how facile and passive his construction of her?)

I think you've sort of answered your own question here;
with a basic idea of how poets create -- through a combination of observation and language -- there seems to be no reason that the Poetics of the "male gaze" (yadda, yadda) would bear any relation to that that might be written by a woman.

The question of moving the love poem away from "constructions of the self" is another part of this; it's not what you see, it's how. One doesn't expect an 18th gynecologist and a 20th century midwife to concur in their visions of a woman; the difference would arise from the point of view of a third person. "Gynceological", "Masculine", is how we label them.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

552. Simon DeDeo

(no subject)

Mon 20 Jul 1998

Just arrived today from Australia -- Anthony Lawrence's
New & Selected; I've lost your address, Anthony, so I can't thank you directly. Work has officially ceased while I drink coffee and browse. I was pleased to see a Elegy for Berryman; rather appropiate, since that's what the man spent his own life writing; I was also very interested to catch a glimpse of your _Bird Calls_. In any case, thank you very much for sending it along, and I now vacate the machine for the day.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

553. Alan Jennifer Sondheim

Re: Guest (for Notley)

Mon 20 Jul 1998

Does a dream have to mean? We tend to find associative meanings with anything, but dreams, which can be the mind's attempt to structure random neural firings on another level (the randomness seems to increase with temperature, and the dreams become more surrealist), may mean nothing at all.

In general, that is "difficult to deal with" - this nothing at all, just as what is taken as an omen is only the falling of a brick or a piece of the sky.

In the post it is unclear if looking at the person instead of the image is looking _at the person_ instead of the television; perhaps the person is on television, in television, perhaps we are all Guests of the real in such a fashion.

Alan

↑ Index

554. Mark Prejsnar
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Linda,

as a male poet who has tried in various ways to respond to patriarchy as well as (and also, inseperable from) other social and political violences, encoded in and ongoing in our day-to-day world.....

--i will throw out a couple of thoughts.

I believe there are responses to gender oppression and disequalibrium, in some high-profile male poets. My first thought would be to mention Bruce Andrews, whose responses are certainly rent and explosive (as well as implosive..); very problematic much of the time. Also urgent and brilliant and i feel i've learned a lot from his work and theory. I Don't Have Any Paper remains a very disturbing (i use the word as praise, mostly anyway) exploration of (among other things) the way masculine experience is cognitively structured by experiencing otherness as violence (and responding in kind, with violence and rage).

Pretty much the opposite, in poetic temperment, is Bernstein, who certainly twists and yanks at tattered threads of unraveling gender uptightness...and does so for (with, by means of) laffs.

Probably there are male poets who have been influenced by contemporary female poets in their responses to genderpol. Speaking for myself, S. Howe has been central, in presenting a temperment equally different from CB's wackiness and BA's furor: a nuanced focus on how a consciousness can respond to history, to the violences clenched in history, by means of an empathy that tries not to be swept up and violated, that strives also to avoid generating counterviolence as its tool of self-being..

mark p.
@lanta

↑ Index

555. joel lewis
f.y.i.
Mon 20 Jul 1998

 Still mourning Diana? Shouting 'Hoo' may help

The followers of Indian free-love guru Bhagwan Rajneesh have advice for the legions of people still traumatized by the death of Princess Diana. Osho Dynamic Meditation, created as a way "to help modern man release accumulated grief and tension before moving into silent meditation," should help, the cult said Monday. The one-hour drill starts with "deep, fast, chaotic" breathing to bring up repressed tension followed by "total catharsis," or the throwing out of all that has been stirred up by the breathing. Diana fans are then advised to jump with arms raised, shouting the Sufi mantra "Hoo!" Once that is accomplished, they are told to be still and silent, and finally "celebrate through dance." See http://www.infobeat.com/stories/cgi/story.cgi?id=2555159162-de7

↑ Index

556. sylvester pollet
Re: Guest (for Notley)
Mon 20 Jul 1998

At 1:57 PM +0000 7/20/98, linda russo wrote:
>I had an intersting dream last night. Barbara Guest had been asked >to give an unrehearsed reading of a new female playwright. I was in >the audience (naturally) with my partner (Chris Alexander) (naturally).
>Guest would look at the script and memorize a >bunch of lines very quickly and then read them, between gulping from >a glass of water. She didn't look quite nervous and I thought it was >very interesting but I reflected on the nature of what "experimental"
>"women's" theatre HAD TO say, without having any context to know >exactly. I found I was then looking at a t.v. screen, which was >televising the very same performance. The color on the screen was >tweeked a little and looked sort of neat. Thinking I should look at the >person and not the image. Looking back and forth a bit. More worried >than confused. Woke up. Can anyone tell me what this means?
>
>Linda Russo

Could mean it's time you wrote a play. Good luck with it! Sylvester

↑ Index

557. Simon DeDeo
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Mon 20 Jul 1998

---

linda --

I think you're right to call me on the phrase "gender as a deep source of voice", which is pretty vague. What I had in mind, however, began with the idea that one's use of language arises in part out of where you've been in the past and to what uses you've seen language put. If one considers the differences in societal experience that arise from gender, it seems as if the "oddity" of female experience with society's use of word would lead to different direction in style. In retrospect, I think I overestimated such influences -- looking at, say, the Modernists, there are far more differences between poets than there are between genders; sort of like S.Gould's point that there is far more variation within a race than across racial boundaries.

> Tradition is masculine (created by men), true, but labelling it thus is a problem. Male does not equal masculine.

I guess I have a lot of trouble distinguishing "male" from "masculine" without descending into a deep analysis of society's conception of the masculine. "Male" is biological; that we can all (?) agree on, up to the Foucalt limit. To call celan's language "feminized" sounds strangely quaint, a little like calling a particular philosophy "womanish". I saw a book once called "Nietzsche for Women".

But maybe Foucalt has a point here -- if what we consider "rock solid" notions of gender are seen, by an examiniation of the points of rupture, to arise less from any potentially objective criteria, but instead from threads of discourse, where does that take us?

I guess I don't quite understand how you take gender to be in some way _material_ without returning to the reception of woman in society. Your point seems very interesting, however -- I like the way Waldrop problematizes the whole issue by bringing up the political implications of a formal stance ("old school feminism"?) and then retracts them from discussion by noting that she was working on

"a formal problem". At the risk of breaking Adorno's
dictum and paraphrasing a philosophical stance, is Waldorf coming out and saying that certain formal modes where, for e.g., "subject and object function are not fixed", are essentially gendered? That there is some occult connection between the female body and language? How can a feminist poetics, as you say, be potentially "unconcerned" with gender? Isn't gender the sine qua non? Or is it just the starting point? From there, to where does it go?

There is a danger, of course, that "postfeminism" might end up looking like New Criticism -- an analysis of formal structures within a "self contained and democratic whole".

As a side note, I wonder what the "theoretically apatheic" folk on the list think about the problem, since Waldorf's point seems to be a retreat from traditional activist notions of poetry. Henry, others?

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

558. rsillima
Poetry Daily
Mon 20 Jul 1998

I thought I ought to note that Poetry Daily (normally pronounced "Dully") -- www.poems.com -- is making an exception to its usual fare this week and will feature poems next weekend by the following:

Saturday - Rae Armantrout
Sunday - Michael Palmer

The site also has links to lots of stuff, including whatever is the latest in the mainstream media. There's a shortlist for some prize in the UK that will make you cringe.

Ron

↑ Index

559. rsillima
Bay Area representationalism
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Poultry Doily --- www.poems.com -- also has a link to an article in one of the SF papers about the search there for a Poet Laureate (does one hear Kathleen Fraser's name? Palmer's? Rakosi's? Gluck's? Killian or Bellamy? Myung Mi Kim?

In addition, the SF Chronicle has a contest going on the "Best of" for the Bay Area -- you can get to it quickly through www.sfgate.com -- and there is a category for East Bay Bookstore that seems just made for Small Press Distribution. It would be good to give it support -- SPD is really a national (even international) resource.

There's also a "best Bay Area author" selection that I'd hesitate to make any suggestions about, but it would be great to see a bunch of poets get votes.

Ron

↑ Index

560. Tom Beard
Dream meanings
Mon 20 Jul 1998

Alan said:

> Does a dream have to mean?

Which reminds me of something the Brothers Quay (who made the extraordinary film _Institute Benjamenta_, among others) said, when challenged about the lack of narrative structure in their films; something along the lines of "No-one says, 'I had this amazing dream last night, but it had such a lousy story'".

BTW Alan, you may be interested in the following url (you may already know about this):

http://foner.www.media.mit.edu/people/foner/Julia/Julia.html

"You say, `what is e?' to Julia.
Julia says, `The most common English vowel?'
You say, `what is e?' to Julia.
Julia says, `I think it's about 2.71828182845904523536.'
You say, `what is e?' to Julia.

Julia starts to smoke. `Oh no, this doesn't end! Help me, help me!' she cries".

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

561. trbell
Re: Guest (for Notley)
Tue 21 Jul 1998

The description of dreams as 'attempt to structure random neural firings' is too often taken a step further to dismissing dreams as therefore meaningless. Is not poetry an attempt to do the same with life's random firings?

Language can either anchor meaning in an image or else helps serve a relay function to put the image into relation with other elements in a complex structure. - Barthes is it not then the image (or dream) that really matters or means?

tom bell

At 03:56 PM 7/20/98 -0400, you wrote:
>Does a dream have to mean? We tend to find associative meanings with any>thing, but dreams, which can be the mind's attempt to structure random >neural firings on another level (the randomness seems to increase with >temperature, and the dreams become more surrealist), may mean nothing at >all.
>
>In general, that is "difficult to deal with" - this nothing at all, just >as what is taken as an omen is only the falling of a brick or a piece of >the sky.
>
>In the post it is unclear if looking at the person instead of the image is >looking _at the person_ instead of the television; perhaps the person is >on television, in television, perhaps we are all Guests of the real in >such a fashion.
>
>Alan
>
>

↑ Index

562. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: Guest (for Notley)
Tue 21 Jul 1998

On Mon, 20 Jul 1998, trbell wrote:

> The description of dreams as 'attempt to structure random neural firings' is too often taken a step further to dismissing dreams as therefore meaningless. Is not poetry an attempt to do the same with life's random firings?

This depends on how "meaning" is defined - as symptom, portent, or as something acceptable to the mind as constituting sense.

I would never go so far in relation to poetry unless one wants to say everything is such an attempt.
>
> Language can either anchor meaning in an image or else helps serve a relay > function to put the image into relation with other elements in a complex > structure. - Barthes
>
> is it not then the image (or dream) that really matters or means?

No, why or how? And what is meant by "really" here? I would be wary of assigning priority.

Alan

↑ Index

563. toddbaron
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Linda Russo wrote:
>
> Todd Baron (and months of burying my head in Margy Sloan's Moving > Borders) prompted this response:
>
> To my mind, any innovative writing (by a femininst) that challenges, > innovates on, problematizes, makes interesting, or > moves away from an identity/voice-based poetics (which employs lyric > forms so called "masculine" in this context because they're
> "traditional" and tradition, created by men, is "masculine") > is necessarily post-feminist
> (i.e. moving away from 1st and 2nd wave feminist agendas -- giving > voice to women's experience, recovering erased women, creating an > exclusively "women's cannon," and working to be inclusive of other > oppressed identities, etc.)

>
> That puts writers like Alice Notley, Leslie Scalapino, Joan Retallack, > and Lyn Hejinian in interesting positions, as they all work toward an > ungendered poetics (i.e.not priviliging the experiences of women, or > viewing innovative writing practices as somehow "feminine" counterparts to > the "masculine" tradition -- tho Retallack holds onto this distinction > most strongly, and makes it most useful) while retaining (and now I have > to add Susan Howe to the list, but it of course continues to grow) a > feminist awareness of literary history.
>
> Alice Notley once wrote "you can't have your own tradition, it's not nice"
> though she's repeatedly invested in configuring a "woman's epic" -- how a > woman can write (through) a traditionally masculine form.
>
> I find this the most interesting challenge facing women writers today -- > but doesn't it also face men writers? They face the same tradition, and > and have every reason and right to challenge the (cultural) > construction of their gender and of "our" tradition (I mean by "our" not > as a gendered distinction but the fact that cultures, via literary > history, construct traditions -- so we're all sort of faced with this > thing to go to work on -- is it really "ours," this inheritance?
>
> Yesterday was the 150th anniversary of Caddie Stanton et al's Womens > Declaration -- modeled after that "masculine" form, it reads as a sort of > "fill in the blanks" substitute "woman" for "man." It's not as simple as > all that -- but I wonder whether and how men respond to tradition. Why I > feel obliged (in a way) to read (almost exclusively at this point of my > bread-crumb spewing) women writers. I'm well aware that men read women
&
> vice versa -- I don't have a problem with women being "under-represented"
> (that makes me a post-feminist)(even though I'd like to see more talk that > I feel really invested in on this list). But I wonder why the problematic > way that "tradition" has treated/"constructed" gender is presently a > "woman's problem."
>
> And another question:
> How can forms be "masculine" when, though, they were
> "created" by men, they were done (usually) intensely in relation to
> "woman" (no matter how facile and passive his construction of her?)
>
> all yours in words,

>
> linda russo
>
> a wonderful re-spone--to co-respond--and that men's or masculine forms confuse me--other than saying--that when I walk into a skyscraper--so to speak--I KNOW i'm in a form that came from many men's pressurized ways of thinking--and that I find no interest in that--nor the sonnett--IF I think of the form in that way--but once I pay attention to the form itself--then--then-it becomes of interest as a form outside of gender-- and hgow to respond then--other than--write with it--against it--towards it--and include it in the dialeltic that a poem can be. Gender is in relation to an other.

then.

Tb
(ReMap)

↑ Index

564. toddbaron
self promotion
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Spencer Selby
Todd Baron

read
July 24th
7:30 pm
Beyond Barqoue

---

please attend if you're in town please attend if you're not

↑ Index

565. toddbaron
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Linda Russo wrote:
>
> Todd Baron (and months of burying my head in Margy Sloan's Moving > Borders) prompted this response:

>
> To my mind, any innovative writing (by a femininst) that challenges, > innovates on, problematizes, makes interesting, or > moves away from an identity/voice-based poetics (which employs lyric > forms so called "masculine" in this context because they're
> "traditional" and tradition, created by men, is "masculine") > is necessarily post-feminist
> (i.e. moving away from 1st and 2nd wave feminist agendas -- giving > voice to women's experience, recovering erased women, creating an > exclusively "women's cannon," and working to be inclusive of other > oppressed identities, etc.)
>
> That puts writers like Alice Notley, Leslie Scalapino, Joan Retallack, > and Lyn Hejinian in interesting positions, as they all work toward an > ungendered poetics (i.e.not priviliging the experiences of women, or > viewing innovative writing practices as somehow "feminine" counterparts to
> the "masculine" tradition -- tho Retallack holds onto this distinction
> most strongly, and makes it most useful) while retaining (and now I have > to add Susan Howe to the list, but it of course continues to grow) a > feminist awareness of literary history.
>
> Alice Notley once wrote "you can't have your own tradition, it's not nice"
> though she's repeatedly invested in configuring a "woman's epic" -- how a > woman can write (through) a traditionally masculine form.
>
> I find this the most interesting challenge facing women writers today -- > but doesn't it also face men writers? They face the same tradition, and
> and have every reason and right to challenge the (cultural) > construction of their gender and of "our" tradition (I mean by "our" not > as a gendered distinction but the fact that cultures, via literary > history, construct traditions -- so we're all sort of faced with this > thing to go to work on -- is it really "ours," this inheritance?
>
> Yesterday was the 150th anniversary of Caddie Stanton et al's Womens > Declaration -- modeled after that "masculine" form, it reads as a sort of
> "fill in the blanks" substitute "woman" for "man." It's not as simple as > all that -- but I wonder whether and how men respond to tradition. Why I > feel obliged (in a way) to read (almost exclusively at this point of my > bread-crumb spewing) women writers. I'm well aware that men read women
&
> vice versa -- I don't have a problem with women being "under-represented"

> (that makes me a post-feminist)(even though I'd like to see more talk that > I feel really invested in on this list). But I wonder why the problematic > way that "tradition" has treated/"constructed" gender is presently a > "woman's problem."
>
> And another question:
> How can forms be "masculine" when, though, they were
> "created" by men, they were done (usually) intensely in relation to
> "woman" (no matter how facile and passive his construction of her?)
>
> all yours in words,
>
> linda russo
>
>
my last response was sluggish--tired--too:

to re-state:

Gender then is a role we are put into and take on--
I find interest in a response to and notice of gender as a social and written tool--but the attention paid to such as a poet doesn't interest me though the forms (sigh) do:

sonnett as skyscraper shakespeare as Mies

take them apart to see wherer one lives and renotgiate the halls--

Is there a "masculine" form? The Epic?
Is history retold as a sequence of (told) lies of the victor? The victor then reframing HimSelf as male?

Tb

↑ Index

566. linda russo
SF READINGS ?
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Susan Schultz posted to the list a while back; she's reading with Douglas Rothschild and another at Canessa Park in San Francisco on Sunday July 26

Does anyone know what TIME that would be happening? And any other readings in SF this weekend? Is that heat wave from April '97 over yet?

thanks -- & if you're at readings, please come say hello to me -- I'll be hard to pick out of a crowd but Chris Alexander is rather distinguished looking.

yrs in words,
Linda Russo

↑ Index

567. Henry Gould
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Responding to the various threads of this thread, I'd like to recommend a book that has really turned my head around on some of these issues & I wonder if others have read it too. The book is _Bardic Ethos and the American Epic Poem_ by Jeffrey Walker.

One thing Walker does is analyze the long poem as a specific development out of Whitman & Emerson, that WITHIN a a challenging "alternative" rhetoric (Whitman's free-verse democratic open-shirted rough), encodes an elitist and authoritarian message: American culture must be transformed by a select group of transcendental literati speaking an archaic shamanistic poetic speech AGAINST the rationality of civil society. Walker argues that Pound took this approach to its limit and Crane, Williams, and Olson followed in the same tradition (anyone who wonders at the idea of Williams' "elitism" should read some of the quotes Walker includes from IN THE AMERICAN GRAIN: ie. "puritanism" has resulted in "a generation universally eager to barter permanent values (the hope of an aristocracy) in return for opportunist material advantages..." and later in the same text, Williams claims that an aristocracy is "the flower of a locality and so the full expression of a democracy".

I don't want to get into a long illustration of Walker's book; only to point out that the traditions of innovation and experiment - both male-oriented and feminist - have been heavily influenced by the Whitman-Pound STANCE toward traditions and society, and their approach to epic and poetry should be seen as culturally & historically specific (even peculiar). Their approach to writing has had enormous influence on the "alternative' tradition to this day.

I would disagree with Simon that technique rather than subject matter is where the "alternatives" are marked; I would disagree with Notley & Waldrop (if that's what they're saying) that formal innovation is the only challenging writing. In my view the subject & the technique can't be separated, and a really innovative writing today might implement the "ars est celare artem" or "art is to hide art" approach: developing a "modest" style which foregrounds the real history or real story.

I would also suggest that the strictures against "male voice" should not throw writers uncritically into the experimental-formalist camp; Walker's book shows clearly how Whitman's, Pound's, Williams's "abysmal" rhetoric of anti-rational collage have been applied to the most archaic (shamanistic) and authoritarian rhetorical programs of our age. The crux of the problem is the foregrounding of the heroic shaman as exemplar and leader, as opposed to the true "subject" of democracy, which is not a leader but a process of political covenanting and agreement, or peacemaking.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

568. Andrea Brady
New Book by Jordan Davis (for uber list) (forwarded)
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Barque Press gladly announces the publication of Jordan Davis' new book, 'Poem on a Train'

a sustained and self-interrupting (round-)trip (NY to Providence, initially)

e-mail Keston Sutherland for a copy, at

[redacted]

#3.50 / $6.00 incl. p&p. (Barque subscribers will receive a copy very soon, thanks)

Please support our Press!

(also available from the Barque crypt: JORDAN DAVIS' _UPSTAIRS_, J.H. Prynne's _Red D Gypsum_, Andrea Brady's _open bond_ and _Of Sere Fold_, Keston Sutherland's _Girls At Trusion_ and _At The Motel Partial Opportunity_, James Lucas' _hex_ and _Body Clock_ - e-mail Keston for copies)

↑ Index

569. Maria Damon
yo silliman finch et al
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

so, like, could one request a precis of your experiences at the westchester formalist boot camp? did it happen, i mean, your workshop? how'd it go? how'd you like it? wd yuou do it again? were people receptive? etc

↑ Index

570. Maria Damon
query
Tue 21 Jul 1998

At 1:31 AM -0400 7/21/98, Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote: etc

yo alan and others, does anyone have access to or know how to find that sondheim poem of some time ago that went "A lake you a lattle bat," etc? Alan i looked at your website A-Z and couldn't find any of the poems you'd posted to POETIX, so maybe there's another site where i'd find 'em? unfortunately i don't remember titles. thanks.

↑ Index

571. daniel bouchard
Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

When the New York poets come into town you've got to lie about Time and Space. For example, a New England poet who lives 10 minutes from the Conference Space will tell the New York poets that the Conference Space is a ten minute walk. The New England poet plans to leave for the Conference Space about fifteen minutes before the starting time. OK, say the New York poets. At 18 minutes before the starting time, however, the New York poets decide they each need a shower. The New England poet will never learn.

But this is cool (not to mention exaggerated) and only mentioned as a starting point. We—-Drew, Douglas, Dave, and I—-made the walk with no problem save that Harvahd Yahd was blocked off by construction fences on the interior so that we had to skirt along the alleys of the Yard and miss the strange cliché of its bucolic interior. We arrived just as Aaron was speaking which gave us, me at least, no time to talk to anyone. This is ideal when reading.

Some places from which people traveled for the alternative Boston conference this weekend at 56 Brattle Street, a limestone's throw from the Longfellow House: New York, Los Angeles, Toronto, Buffalo, Providence, San Francisco, and Japan.

What was learned?

1) Only poets would spend a 3 day weekend in a hot and cramped room for up to, or over, 12 hours a day on a beautiful, sunny weekend and be very excited about it.

2) If the conference is deemed "alternative," then anything goes. I slipped a Robert Frost poem into my reading ("The Vantage Point") and heard a distinct, pleasurable "hmphh" come from outside the veil of U-V lights. It was my backyard; I had to do it.

I decided not to read the short poem about how lousy it is to be in a room full of milling poets. This is because I was a reader, and that produces a kind of rush for me. Besides, my "I Make a Pact with you Ron Silliman" poem fell flat. Not a giggle was heard. People told me later that I read it as something very serious, but I have always cried the tears of a clown.

Drew's reading was fantastic. It is unusual that I was able to hear it (having just read, and playing back my own reading—-so egocentrically!-—in my mind) but his opening was sharp and irresistable: "I can tell by the way you dress that you're a cowboy." (Roughly.) And his reading was paced so that in the silences I became expectant of the poems, waiting, paying more attention; and as Drew read more, the energy soared.

During Will Alexander's reading I must admit that I lapsed into space. I bounced back for Fanny Howe however. I was so engrossed by her reading that when she stopped I thought my watch was dead. She only read for 10-15 minutes. It seemed, richly, like much longer. And I wanted more.

During the milling bit after the reading a Harvard Lit Comp prof. approached me with the usual chat and asked for poems. No problem. Then she explains, as she hands me her business card, that she is waiting for her mother to die ("she will not, eternally, ever give in. She refuses to die!") so she can take her inheritance and publish poetry. (And people probably think I am sour for the little poem about "milling poets" but I am sure you each have your own stories to tell.) Having nothing to answer this strange remark I stand smiling, nodding, scanning the room with my eyes. Peter Ganick tells me he loved my line about "the way cowboys dress." (Should I tell him? Should I tell him?) I tell him that line was actually Drew Gardner's line which causes him a visceral spasm of embarrassment. (It had to be done.)

On the walk to the car Prageeta and Maggie discuss lesbian dress protocol which has an emphasis on practicality. As I never dress with an objective other than practicality (i.e., comfort) I one-up them on the entire aesthetic by adding, "besides I don't give a fuck what I look like" wearing green shorts, a black T-shirt (both of which are drenched), old running sneakers and ankle-high socks. This boldness earns me the epithet of "Dan: the Complete Lesbian" which I revel in for a night.

Meanwhile, my friend Sven from Cambridge (a Spenser scholar) and Douglas grab a ride with Richard. Richard is filming the entire conference for some reason. In the car Sven notices a hat from Washington & Lee—-a college in Virginia renowned for old-boy fraternities and inbred aristocracy. The hat produces apprehension in Sven, and he hopes it does not come up in conversation.

But Douglas has already picked up on its motto (which I disremember) and inquires of it of Richard. As it turns out, Richard and Sven both "spent time" there, and may likely be (despite their generation differences) the only two alums never to have belonged to a fraternity. They discuss later, at Michael Franco’s, a shared hate for a certain Milton professor.

The party is fine. We get home ok in the crowded car, with Douglas in the trunk. I give Maggie and Prageeta directions to the Mass Pike, but Dave Kirschenbaum prefers not to make the short walk from the bridge, so Maggie and Prageeta end up getting lost for many hours. We don’t see them again till well into the next day.

In the morning I make juice for everyone (oranges and grapes, straight up—-very rich), and we arrive during the panel almost on time. I cannot process anything being said so I try to focus by making sketches of the panelists. I gauge my success by showing the caricatures to Isabel Franco (sitting next to me) as I go. I am feeling better when manna from heaven drops into my lap in the form of a scone, placed with a "whump" from behind me by Douglas.

Some things I remember: Joseph Lease’s metaphor about how the Cold War was two dogs facing each other, and the Post-Cold War a single dog in which we are all micro-organisms. This guy can think on his feet I think. But he dilutes this perception by announcing that he had thought of it earlier and even collaborated on it by phone with Jordan Davis. Still, he’s saying intelligent things, as are all the panelists.

Despite a dangerous level of exhaustion I enjoy the afternoon readings. Gerrit Lansing is fantastic. He is my new model for reading. Beth is great, as is Andrea; the two reminding me of each other in their delivery: low, even tone of long (or long-ish) lines. Joe Torra is high-energy. Zhang Er is good, and Caroline Knox is funny.

>From the bio panel I mostly take comfort in Kristen’s presentation that Helen Adam worked a dull job in which she was able to get a lot done during down time. I decide I like Helen Adam a lot and will seek out her work. I get this also from Lyman Gilmore’s presentation on Joel Oppenheimer, whom I have not read much of. Then I take off to a bar with Patrick Doud to cool off with a margarita, which is refreshing for about fifteen minutes, but I nearly pass out later during the evening readings. In fact I was probably saved from doing so by Lisa Jarnot’s and Lewis Warsh’s reading. Warsh’s "Secret Police" had me stitches; Lisa’s chinchilla and other animal poems had me in a pleasant catatonic state. Kristin Prevallet’s footnote poem also created this effect. Untitled, I suggested to her: "A poem of not-so-useful information."

Another party at Michael and Isabel’s Saturday night. I crash for an hour in an empty room, waking up glad to find the Buffalo/Toronto guys had not drawn on my forehead, and also finding Christian crashed (vampire-like: body straight, arms folded in X on chest) on the floor across the room.

Outside there is literary chat. And Dave Kirschenbaum putting together his instant ‘zine on a laptop in a cloud of mosquitoes by the porch light. The literary chat gets controversial: Douglas argues with Alan about Paradise Lost. Alan, in a manner reminiscent of Steve Evans, sits calmly and accepts Douglas’ points and then evenly returns his own. The crux: what line does Milton’s epic hinge on & is Satan a hero? Alan is firm: better to reign in hell than serve in heaven. Douglas does not accept. It goes back and forth, bringing Dante, Chaucer, and Chomsky (a la Drew and Bill Howe) marginally into the picture. Hanging back I suggest "to justify God’s ways to man" which Andrea seconds. (As I was not centrally involved in this argument, I’ll cease its narrative here.)

Because I am the only one not to have had a drink all night, I drive the car home. It’s tight and we gather Will Alexander and Aaron from the driveway top where they had been waiting for a cab. Douglas gets into the trunk again, Aaron sits on Dave in the passenger seat and away we go. Another thing learned from the weekend: an overcrowded car with the conference organizer’s head protruding from an open window does not sit well with Arlington police. As I pull over with the blue lights and siren screaming behind us, Aaron queries (from outside the car) "why are we pulling over here? Who are we dropping off here?"

It was difficult to ascertain whether the cops were poetry fans. I mean, I could have said "it’s cool, officer, we have Will Alexander in the car" but I’m not sure how that would have played out.

So, as the cops approached, one on each side, I announce sternly to the excited passengers: "everyone shut the fuck up." One cop asks me if I am aware how many seat belt laws I am breaking. One per person except me I think to myself but say nothing. I give him my license. Hess fumbles (unsuccessfully) for his Missouri registration. The officers (one male, one female) note aloud how dangerous our driving situation is, and then huddle up back at the cruiser to ensure our Dodge Shadow is not stolen. As they confer in swirling blue lights, Aaron announces that he and Will can walk from that point and he wishes us well. I tell Aaron that it’s probably not advisable to walk away from the scene at that particular moment.

To be short, the cops let us off without even requesting an intimate acquaintance with my breath. We leave two by the road while we drop off another two and return for the other two shortly. As I was handed back my license it didn’t even occur to me that the law officers will forever remain unaware of Douglas Rothschild, now grown very quiet, cooped up in the hatch-back trunk. Later,

Douglas noted that the incident constituted a good adventure, and it would make Bill Luoma proud.

On Sunday I outted SubPress in the publishing panel. Preceding this debut were fine presentations by Kirschenbaum (the traveling/instant magazine), Douglas Messerli (brief history of Sun&Moon), Peter Ganick (brief history of Potes&Poets), Chris Funkhouser (on Internet publishing and E-things in general), and Joe Torra (on his magazine "lift").

I began by showing off books received thru the "Self-Publish or Perish" initiative, and note how the project grew out of a community; how it all was (my involvement anyway) an extension of MASS AVE., which grew out of a sense of community that began at the Fitterman Poetry Talks in 1996, the Buffalo Poetics list, and then the Subpoetics list (at which point I thumbnail for people what a listserv is). RESULTS: A lot of people want to inspect the SelfPub books after the panel. A lot of people want to know how to get onto the "Buffalo list thing," and many more people want to know where to send money for the "SubPress" thing. I take their addresses instead.

Someone (Maria Damon?) tells me her initial thoughts of what the publishing panel would consist of was "how to get published." It was not so. It was more a testimony of doing things oneself, how to seek out or define your community thru print and initiative (as Torra’s presentation manifested, and Michael Franco—-contrib editor to lift—-supported with comments in the audience). I was happy with it.

There were many great readings Sunday: Rosmarie Waldrop, Joseph Lease, Patrick Doud, Charles Bernstein, Damon Krukowski, Peter Ganick and others; some of which I caught portions of, or missed due to extreme unction, I mean extreme exhaustion.

The weekend ended for me in a seafood restaurant near my house with Beth, Maggie, Drew and Douglas. I had the fish and chips.

After they left for the bus, I went back to the reading and then to the party where I talked with Cambridge poet Jim Dunn (who traded my cop/poetry story with his own, in which a Boston bike cop runs into his car while he is driving John Wieners to the supermarket; "oh christ!" John exclaims) and Heater Scott Peterson (a painter, poet, bookbinder, and ex-student of Ange Mlinko's).

Other participants or attendees are encouraged/requested to fill in gaps or post their own narratives and perceptions to supplement this woeful inadequacy.

daniel bouchard

<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard

The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

572. Christopher W. Alexander
Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Thanks for the extensive report, Dan. I can see Cambridge has gotten a lot more fun since I left (please - no causal relationship implied). I've been told by two people so far that I was/wld be there, but really I wasn't, or only 'in spiritus' (i.e., that was my heavy breathing in the back).

thanks, too, for this lovely addendum to Drew's line:
> "I can tell by the way you dress that you’re a cowboy." (Roughly.)

c h r i s

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

573. Simon DeDeo
Subject & Technique
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Henry wrote --
> In my view the subject & the technique can't be separated, and > a really innovative writing today might implement the "ars est celare artem" > or"art is to hide art" approach: developing a "modest" style which fore-grounds > the real history or real story.

I would say we both agree; I had in mind poets who consider themselves innovative simply because their subject matter is "new". Pound's "make it new" is eternally valid, but it doesn't stop at changing the stars into quasars. The stylistic innovation is more often than not the more original and difficult; most "subjects" have already been done before, and it's unfortunately true that whenever a new subject is broached -- child abuse, the information revolution -- most of what is written is in the dull and repetitive modes of older forms, or in poorly thought out and self-conscious "innovations".

It's true that the subject and technique cannot be separated, but that requires a more complex concept of "subject" that I don't think you're including here. There have been countless poems on war, and I don't think anyone can find a common theme in technique between them.

I'm interested in your concept of a "modest" style. What does that mean? Imagism has always seemed "modest" to me, with the way it foregrounds the words themselves as opposed to the poet's construction of them, but one could easily take any set of poets, with radically different styles, and call them modest. Shakespeare, modest? Auden? Yeats? Plath? What would you consider a "modest" style? Or, better, in which direction from the writers you consider most fruitful does a "modest" style lie? (The excessive quotes are not sarcasm, just my own confusion.) And, just to finish the paragraph, what do you consider the "real" story? Do you mean to exclude all poetry with ambiguity or mulitple narratives, because they deny the reader access to a solid and "real" substrate?

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

574. Henry

Re: Subject & Technique

Tue 21 Jul 1998

Simon, I've yammered at some of these issues before on the list, so apologies if I repeat myself. By "subject" I guess I mean "content" in general, not simply a general topic or theme (war, etc.). These themes or topics are always around, but if we're talking about a "modest" style in relation to something like epic, for example, then the "war" would have to be complexified in its specific historical circumstances.

What I'm getting at is, to extend some of the insights of the Walker book: Ezra Pound was mightily successful within the parameters of a sublime rhetoric, in which the poet by disrupting rational thought & speech, creates a voice of authority; what Walker argues is that writing in this tradition is not the ONLY possible approach to epic or historical materials.

But we have an alternative tradition which not only builds on this rhetoric but follows the Whitman-Pound "stance" as a whole : capitalistic democracy is condemned in favor of a visionary alternative which is not exactly spelled out (it can't be : this would contradict the rhetoric of the sublime) but which underwrites every mannerism of disrupted syntax and justifies it as "alternative".

A modest style in my book would foreground neither the stance of the poet nor the sublimity of the discourse; the sublime is most sublime as an occasional intrusion. It would not be disruptive for disruption's sake or dissonant for dissonance's sake; it would develop from communicability toward complexity. It would foreground "what happened": clarity does not necessarily rule out ambiguity or even undecidability (while obscurity sometimes rules out both).

Now I'm not in favor of capitalistic status quo, but I am in favor of democracy (I think capitalism/socialism is a fading dialectic). And I'm not in favor of technorationalism, but I'm against a bardic authoritarianism posed as its alternative.

And I'm not promoting "modesty" as a mold for all kinds of poetry! Just as a different way of thinking about "innovative" writing, especially in an "epic" frame of mind.

- Henry G.

↑ Index

575. Simon DeDeo

Occult Epics

Tue 21 Jul 1998

Henry -- thanks also for the reference to the Walker book. For many poets who attempt to write an "epic", the aristocratic model presents itself, and Walker's analysis of the Whitman attitude towards America seems dead on -- the endless catalogues always seemed to me to have somewhat a posessive attitude, an image of control or at least omnisence; a "true" democratic poet would perhaps have to realize a speaker that could not transcend space in the most literal sense -- I think of Gary Snyder here, with his endless preoccuption with the mechanics of being.

There's been chatter on EPOUND-L about Pound and the Occult; a question I brought up in reference to Old English translations of the bible -- questions of preserving the numerological significance of the text in translation. Pound himself, when constructing the Cantos, was quite preoccupied with the occult -- as separate from questions of religion and spirituality; I wonder if you can detect the "aristocracy" of Pound's style in his mage-like adoption of occult principles. If anybody's interested in the references to Pound's occultism, backchannel; Michael Coyle at Colgate dropped a good list of texts on the subject.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

576. groberts
Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Ode to Bill Howe's Bowling Ball

O Magic Black Diamond Orb of Eight-to-the-nth-power facets, Tell me who was it that stepped on a dog's turn and unstepped it just as matter-of-factly and walked onward kicking down the alley a rock in the shape of the spherical carved heart of a decapitated electric typewriter, headed for France or Brazil or France, back and forth, this way and that, keeping score with secret numbers in order to record each strike while leaving every frame open? Who was that sunglassed Sisyphus?

↑ Index

577. Linda Russo
Re: Guest (for Notley)
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

alan esp., please notice i asked "CAN anyone tell me what this ["my" dream] means" of course it just "is" but I just thought it was neat, the experience was neat. That it didn't particularly resonate with meaning to me is interesting (I have no particular engagement with Guest or with theatre -- except as icons both)

One day after having a great dream i wrote & re-wrote it to myself, mentally, just to play with the language and connections the dream presented me with. I didn't write it down -- I was walking. I think of it (the mental exercise of moving around the language and images of the dream) as writing, though some would argue it's not writing because I didn't inscribe it & it hasn't been activated by an audience as writing. Maybe the dream was "writing" that I was the "audience" for.

↑ Index

578. Linda Russo
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

you (simon) sort of hit on my point exactly -- when you say

> -- looking at, say, the Modernists,
> there are far more differences between poets > than there are between genders; sort of like S.Gould's > point that there is far more variation within a > race than across racial boundaries.

there are tons of variations (back to mark presjnar's comment on "how" we look at something). But gender as a sort of node has received focus only in terms of women writers, who, perhaps because they throw tradition in relief, point out the "masculine" nature, of say lyric, which objectifies the other and unifies the "I". As these are problems many (esp. lang & post lang) poets deal with, why is it mostly women who explore a GENDERED relation to tradition?

I'm not trying to be reductive about gender. the way we use it to describe power relationships is problematic (male-active/female-passive) WHILE continuing to link it to biological sex -- as in the case of the term "Women Poets" (which often prompts cliched responses such as "it's women's voice-oriented)

Being an innovative (woman) writer necessitates an active scrutiny of literary history. Why is it that innovative men aren't also viewed as exploring a gendered relation to traditional modes of poetic utterance? Is it just another instance of the masculine stance being universal and the woman's other?

For so long poetry was formal & Dorothy Wordsworth didn't write "poetry" -- now journaling has been "legitimized" as a poetic form (cf. Mayer's _Midwinter Day_ for example, and Hannah Weiner) -- But I don't think these innovations are peculiar to women, yet they are couched so, because they are couched as a gendered relation to tradition (though this may be a problem of feminist scholarship)

We all have a gendered relation to everything -- and that's such a large statement, as gender is so complex. And I don't mean gender as biological sex merely, but as a cluster of attributes that constitute our understanding of culture and literary history.

> we can all (?) agree on, up to the Foucalt limit.
> To call celan's language "feminized" sounds strangely > quaint, a little like calling a particular philosophy
> "womanish". I saw a book once called "Nietzsche for Women".

My point exactly -- why link "feminine" with womanish? You're making a biological and not a gendered connection. (As for the title, it's just dumb -- I'm tired of the notion that there is certain sort of information that women must know (to defend themselves?) MIght the same information not be imperative for men as well?). I'm maddened that it persists to be true (i need to know how not to get raped, for example -- but this of course has to do with the larger problems of living in a violent culture)

> But maybe Foucalt has a point here -- if what we > consider "rock solid" notions of gender are seen, > by an examiniation of the points of rupture, to arise > less from any potentially objective criteria, but instead > from threads of discourse, where does that take us?

Then all innovation is, in relation to the "dominant" tradition, "feminine" and it has nothing to do with gender. Not a bad place to start rethinking what it means to be feminine. Or to start throwing out those terms "masculine" and "feminine" because they're obviously too laden with biological markers (Masculine = hairy armpits are ok)

> I guess I don't quite understand how you take > gender to be in some way _material_ without returning > to the reception of woman in society.
I meant that only in response to your comment that it was "immaterial" -- whatever you meant by that

> Your point
> seems very interesting, however -- I like the way > Waldrop problematizes the whole issue by bringing > up the political implications of a formal stance
> ("old school feminism"?) and then retracts them
> from discussion by noting that she was working on
> "a formal problem". At the risk of breaking Adorno's
> dictum and paraphrasing a philosophical stance,
> is Waldorf coming out and saying that certain formal
> modes where, for e.g., "subject and object function
> are not fixed", are essentially gendered?

Only inasmuch as WE gender them, in assigning them positions in a power relationship. She says elsewhere that language is ungendered.

> That there > is some occult connection between the female body
> and language?

of course not, except when words (usually the title of some pop pscyhology book likw "women who love too much") fall out of my vagina. (Kathy Acker and Dodie Bellamy gave me the balls to say that) (That was for all of you who're sticking it out through this post)

> How can a feminist poetics, as you say, be potentially "unconcerned" with gender? Isn't gender the sine qua non? Or is it just the starting point? From there, to where does it go?

Yes, in 500 words or less please.

> There is a danger, of course, that "postfeminism" might end up looking like New Criticism -- an analysis of formal structures within a "self contained and democratic whole".

I doubt it. anyway I'll let you know when I get there, or when I get there I'll let you know . . .

yrs in words,

lvr

↑ Index

579. Elizabeth Treadwell
Jen Hofer/Lori Lubeski reading in San Fran
Tue 21 Jul 1998

If you're in the Bay Area check out Jen Hofer and Lori Lubeski reading at 5:30 saturday july 25 at the attic, 3336 24th @ mission, san fran. right across from the mission st BART sta. cocktails & coketails!!

See you there!

-Elizabeth

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

580. Linda Russo
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

On Tue, 21 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:

> Is there a "masculine" form? The Epic?

Notley would argue that (pretty much) all forms" are masculine. She addresses this in "Epic and Women Poets" (paraphrase) in one of the Naropa Disembodied Poetics anthologies (the recent one) and in her piece excerpted in MOVING BORDERS she talks about the difficulty of writing about VietNam -- for the same reasons -- they are/were "man made" events, epic being a man made record of man's conquests etc. the world (literally -- architects, civil planners, financiers etc.) is man-made.

Kathleen Fraser's lines "otherwise the world is simply that which has been described for you" always resonate for me. Notley takes on the same problem -- how to be a woman -- to be HERSELF -- and write poems? Her writing is a record/response to that struggle.

The problem with saying that all forms are masculine, or describing certain shapes as gendered (venus of willendorf vs. the twin towers (double your power)though the latter is a reconstruction of matriarchy whereas we KNOW that skyscrapers are patriarchal temples) is that there is no point of entry. We can only "imagine" (John & Yoko?) what a more equitable world (or poetry) would look like. Hence innovative poetry.

yrs in words
lvr

↑ Index

581. henry g
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Linda, Poetry has often been metaphorized as weaving. Does weaving create masculine forms? I understand you were not simply assenting to the idea that "all forms are masculine".

- Henry G.

↑ Index

582. Christopher W. Alexander

Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too

Tue 21 Jul 1998

Mark P. sez:
> I believe there are responses to gender oppression and disequalibrium, > in some high-profile male poets.

very much agreed, and thx Mark for the interesting read of Andrews and Bernstein. I'd also add Silliman to that list (and others...) -- thinking, e.g., of sentences in XING that are insistent in their representation of male-ness/masculinity as culturally and esp. (hetero)sexually dominant (oppressive/coercive) -- which makes, for me as a male reader, for an uncomfortable or even humiliating situation. Want to say more about the book (and not leave my remarks so one-dimensional), but it's been over year since last I read it -- quotations are not forthcoming. ("shldn't have drank all that cough syrup this morning").

I think the problem Linda is addressing here-- and one which Rachel Daley and I tried severally to address not long ago (myself with agonized clumsiness, I'm sorry to say) -- is not so much whether the 'gender issue' affects writers of all genders (it does), but a problem of ghettoization, in this case specifically that the critical treatment of gender in writing too often leans toward making it a 'women's issue', and vice versa -- the insane assumption that all women's writing necessarily has to address the reader beginning with "I, woman, say..." or be otherwise dictated by biology. LR:

> I don't have a problem with women being "under-represented" (that makes me a post-feminist) [...] But I wonder why the problematic way that "tradition" has treated/"constructed" gender is presently a "woman's problem."

Oops, now she's pre-empted me with another post, and I have to get to a meeting. damn this 'real-time' stuff!

chris

p.s. Simon -- 'postfeminist' = return to New Crit. seems a bit baroque, really. It's not as if the poem has been evaculated of it's historical context (which, anyway, is a caricature of New Crit) --

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

583. groberts
Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Ode to BOOG

From the imitation-vanilla sky of your jiffy sidereal homeland, the star-cats keep watch over the mushroom caps, while across the stapled centerfold of the 8.5 x 11 night
the Comet of Belle-Doom streaks on the hauser of my arm, taut and slack, slack and taut, toward the rolling letters.

↑ Index

584. Steven Marks
Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

It was hot! And anywhere from 40 to 80 people in a room that was about 15x35 with two ceiling fans and two low-BTU ACs doing their best and probably enough or else we would have all melted into a pool of poetics on the floor. and there were highlights (not to speak of the lights over the stage with the funky orange gels) and for me it was first among equals with Will Alexander whose name I had seen here and there and before but not the poems and his presentation in which he directed thoughts and phrases out of his head into the air and from the air into his head with his index finger. it was digital one moment, analog the next. and then Sunday a.m.'s panel, "New Poetry," orgainzed by Michael Basinski around and about and between visual, aural, fusion, performance poetics and beyond. This is where the bowling ball was which I missed in process but saw the product upon the floor being cut off the roll of white paper and its skid marks and runes by Bill Howe with a box cutter it seemed like the ones used in grocery stores, all to make way for the afternoon reading which was slipping into the present as the panel edged up to the limit of its future. it was close. Douglas Messerli, Rosmarie Waldrop, Patrick Doud, Michael Franco and I introduced myself to Maria Damon up from Woods Hole. but that was now and there was still then: Christian Bok and his sound poems one of which was called "Ubu Hubbub" I think and it was syllables and sounds and Bill Clinton and maybe even Jimmy Carter's malaise upon the land. and then there was Bob Grumman, oh Bob Grumman, is there anybody with a better map up by bus 26 hours from Florida and sleeping on comfortable couches from what I heard there in Cambridge, not Beantown. mathemaku: now I know why I took 2nd semester calculus and why if I wuzn't infected by these poems, I might have been a mathematician and then again maybe not but no need now because the asymptotes and delta neighborhoods, and primes and theory, number theory, are there are there. Darren Wershler-Henry (I'm pretty sure it was him) did a poem in Klingon. Wendy Kramer and Ellay Phillips eyedeared their way around a 3-D collage, reading words and pictures and weaving and dancing. Oh, and Michael Basinski and his daughter Natalie rendered words and pictures and sounds and definitions (this was the place of mushrooms, shrooms) in their amuletic poem because it releases. It's Tuesday afternoon. I just came home from a swim at the beach. I'm still hot.

best and best,
Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

585. Elizabeth Treadwell

postwomen+ (or is not equal to) speculative equations

Tue 21 Jul 1998

First I'd like to say, since I bemoaned the review in the NYer, that the summer issue of Bookforum contains a much more interesting review of the new Lib of Cong Stein anthologies.

Linda, SImon, et al--I will now throw in 2 more cents.

Is there a possibility of an ungendered poetics, even if it is something its possible to work toward or to see others as working toward? I mean if you're looking in terms of gender, won't you see gender?

I wonder what postfeminism really is -- is it an apology I wonder sometimes (tho I do write for a site called 'the Postfeminist Playground' - which this month contains an article by DOdie Bellamy(www.pfplayground.com)) I think PLAY is key to this -- perhaps we are now more free to PLAY -- to speculate, to speculate on speculations,...- than in the 50s or the Victorian era or whenever, with GENDER AS AN IDEA, construction, etc.....The motifs of our clothing. Maybe we are just now more able to have FUN (or if you prefer: imagination). I don't mean this dumbly, I mean not having to spend so much energy "to not be swept up and violated, (& also) to avoid generating counterviolence as its tool of self-being".

I do CLAIM writing as a woman, writing as a "girl", writing about that, engaging in that. Proud of that, then bored by it, etc. Its constantly ENACTED isnt it, along with ten dozen (or a few) other Big Things.... I like it, writing as a WOMAN, thnking about Women. However I of course don't want to be 'marginalized' either, or not taken seriously, or taken seriously in only one way. (But of course it happens...to everyone) misreading is so key aint it intriguin/

I do like Linda read many more women than men.

Why? I think my next point might speak to it at least in some way.

Linda wrote:
>> And another question:
>> How can forms be "masculine" when, though, they were
>> "created" by men, they were done (usually) intensely in relation to
>> "woman" (no matter how facile and passive his construction of her?)

Simon wrote:
>I think you've sort of answered your own question here;
>with a basic idea of how poets create -- through a combination >of observation and language -- there seems to be no reason >that the Poetics of the "male gaze" (yadda, yadda) would >bear any relation to that that might be written by a woman.
>
>The question of moving the love poem away from "constructions >of the self" is another part of this; it's not what you see,
>it's how. One doesn't expect an 18th gynecologist and a 20th >century midwife to concur in their visions of a woman; the >difference would arise from the point of view of a third person.
>"Gynceological", "Masculine", is how we label them.

Here I can't agree. I think the "Poetics of a male gaze" does bear relation to that that might be written by a woman. Here and now. From childhood, books with first person male narrators, looking at movies, whatever: the woman not only sees 'herself' ('itself') in 'the male gaze', but sees as the male gaze, or self-gaze, or whatever. It's like the beginning of "The Bluest Eye".

& of course there are responses to gender oppression and disequilibrium in the work of some high profile male poets, as someone wrote, this strikes me as having gone on since the beginning of time. whether they were aware of it in our current jargon or not, and no matter what kind of personality or politic or wife-treatment they lived in. isn't even creating something in a way responding to it? I think so.

> Waldrop problematizes the whole issue by bringing up the political implications of a formal stance ("old school feminism"?) and then retracts them from discussion by noting that she was working on "a formal problem". At the risk of breaking Adorno's dictum and paraphrasing a philosophical stance, > is Waldorf coming out and saying that certain formal modes where, for e.g., "subject and object function are not fixed", are essentially gendered? That there is some occult connection between the female body and language? How can a feminist poetics, as you say, be potentially "unconcerned" with gender? Isn't gender the sine qua non? Or is it just the starting point? From there, to where does it go?

as perhaps one of the "theoretically apathetic" I would like to note that in the quote from Waldrop, she first states "I was interested in extending the boundaries of the sentence" then says "it comes out of my feminist preoccupation" [this quote is 20 yrs old] and then says this is all hindsight, "Consciously, I was working on a formal problem." So it seems to me that she was interested in form, whilst of course being aware of herself as a woman/feminist and in the world as such. I don't think gender is the starting point or the only point, i think she is merely using it as a way in to explain something, as TRACTION, and then of course there are all these other conscious and unconscious things, RETRACTION..... .....what if the male poets had to explain themselves in this type of terminology? Isn't your gender important to you, and then again hardly the only thing?

Best,
Elizabeth

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

586. louis stroffolino
Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Hey, anybody who attended conference, wanna say anything about Caroline Knox's reading and/or talk? She's kinda the one person there I have NO SENSE about what she's doing, and am curious (also because I think she spoke of O'Hara, Ashes, etc.....). Thanks, chris stroffolino

On Tue, 21 Jul 1998, Steven Marks wrote:

> It was hot! And anywhere from 40 to 80 people in a room that was about 15x35 with two ceiling fans and two low-BTU ACs doing their best and probably enough or else we would have all melted into a pool of poetics on the floor. and there were highlights (not to speak of the lights over the stage with the funky orange gels) and for me it was first among equals with Will Alexander whose name I had seen here and there and before but not the poems and his presentation in which he directed thoughts and phrases out of his head into the air and from the air into his head with his index finger. it was digital one moment, analog the next. and then Sunday a.m.'s panel, "New Poetry," orgainzed by Michael Basinski around and about and between visual, aural, fusion, performance poetics and beyond. This is where the bowling ball was which I missed in process but saw the product upon the floor being cut off the roll of white paper and its skid marks and runes by Bill Howe with a box cutter it seemed like the ones used in grocery stores, all to make way for the afternoon reading which was slipping into the present as the panel edged up to the limit of its future. it was close. Douglas Messerli, Rosmarie Waldrop, Patrick Doud, Michael Franco and I introduced myself to Maria Damon up from Woods Hole. but that was now and there was still then: Christian Bok and his sound poems one of which was called "Ubu Hubbub" I think and it was syllables and sounds and Bill Clinton and maybe even Jimmy Carter's malaise upon the land. and then there was Bob Grumman, oh Bob Grumman, is there anybody with a better map up by bus 26 hours from Florida and sleeping on comfortable couches from what I heard there in Cambridge, not Beantown. mathemaku: now I know why I took 2nd semester calculus and why if I wuzn't infected by these poems, I might have been a mathematician and then again maybe not but no need now because the asymptotes and delta neighborhoods, and primes and theory, number theory, are there are there. Darren Wershler-Henry (I'm pretty sure it was him) did a poem in Klingon. Wendy Kramer and Ellay Phillips eyedeared their way around a 3-D collage, reading words and pictures and weaving and dancing. Oh, and Michael Basinski and his daughter Natalie rendered words and pictures and sounds and definitions (this was the place of mushrooms, shrooms) in their amuletic poem because it releases.

It's Tuesday afternoon. I just came home from a swim at the beach. I'm still hot.

best and best,
Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

587. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Great reports from Bahston, J. Kimball, Daniel Bouchard & Steven Marks! I hereby relinquish the tattered palm of hyperbole. Thanks.

Patrick Pritchett

↑ Index

588. Michael Franco dromenon / lift back-list
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

lift backlist

lift announces a limited number of back issues of issue 10/ 11: the Stephen Jonas issue; as well as # 15/16 the William Corbett issue are available @ $12. each, post-paid.

lift 10&11 JONAS ISSUE. fall, 1992. Torra, editor. 132 pages; wrappers. with photo of Jonas by Petricone. Contains selections from Jonas' EXCERSISES FOR EAR; Orgasms & other work: Essays by Rattray, Killian, Spicer, Dunn, Dorra Fitzgerald, Torra, Wieners, Corman, de Gruttula, Lansing, Ellingham & Weston. Interview with Joe Dunn.

lift 15&16 WILLIAM CORBETT ISSUE. Fall, 1994. Torra, editor. 160 pages; wrappers. Cover photo by Dorfman: Interview w/ Corbett; 9 poems; Review of Vendler's Harvard Book of Contemporary American Poetry; Essays/poems/ art by Creeley, Auster, Kleinzhaler, Lawrence, Harwood, Yau, Meyer, Warsh, Palmer, F. Howe, Mayer, M. Gizzi, Barrett, Pruitt, Mazur, Pruitt, Gander, Mckim, Sawyer- Lauçanno, Franco et al: Art by: Guston, Watkins, Amenoff, Imber, M. Torra, Seidman, M. Mazur, et al.

lift chapbook series #'s 1-4

1. AT LAST ROUND UP: T.J.Anderson III. 1996. 29p. wrappers by Molly Torra.

2. the journals of the man who kept bees [from A BOOK OF MEASURE; Second Circumference (complete)]: 1996. 44 p. wrappers by Katha Seidman.

3. TIMESERVER: Nick Lawrence. 1996. 30p. Wrappers by Ben E. Watkins.

4. Immediate Orgy & Audit: Ange Mlinko. 1996. 26p. Wrappers by Molly Torra.

Individual titles 1,3,4: $8.00 #2 $8.50: all post-paid.

A limited number of complete sets are available on a first come- first served basis at $25.00 post paid.

Also available from dromenon press:

I have several copies of Joseph Torra's 16 Paintings: Edition was limited to 50 signed & numbered copies, hand-sewn in wrappers decorated by Molly Torra. 1992. 21 p. $10 post paid. checks to M. Franco/ dromenon press.

Copies & sets can be reserved via E-mail. Payment must be received with 7 days of confirmation [E-mail] for copies to be held.

Checks for lift book to J. Torra/ lift.

All Checks & Mail Orders: c/o dromenon press 34 Jason St.
Arlington Ma. 02476-6409

E-mail [redacted]

all best

Michael Franco

↑ Index

589. R M Daley
pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

dickinson's hymnal (todd baron) are you penning HYMENAL stretched over all our noses - cf, Christo's hymen over the colorado basin -

ah thx chris and linda, getting a bit more of this thread into the lingo, the lack of necessity to decided HERE or NOW - delueze might say to FOLLOW that nose sometime not just try to re-do it, no need to continue reproducing MY self,me Self, mEYEsELF - a la scalapino yes or also parts of Stevens i have recently bumped into . is a matter of FOLLowing what i can imagine is someone elses nose, my own surroundings as they are always MY surroundings and ...so stevens is a bastard cannot i like him already? when he rocks my boat - surprises even the superhuman....'like this saps like the sun true fortuner for all it takes it gives a humped return exchequering from piebald fiscs unkeyed postfeminist seems , in large parrt my party dress today or my do to the do before i figure where it hurts

- as long as it does and it does and it does so maybe 'gendering' becomes a convenient term? can it be utilized, i think yes as anything that keeps moving, and this is , like, one of the most popular threads that lingers and recurs and full of buttons...

↑ Index

590. Lisa Samuels
new O book by Lisa Samuels
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

dearly missed poetics persons,

newly settled for a year in louisville, i am happy to announce the appearance of The Seven Voices, just published by O Books. it's all poetry, with a way-cool 4-color cover image of one of joseph cornell's boxes.

you can order it from small press distribution, through their mag or website (www.spdbooks.org) -- leslie has a website too, for O Books (www.obooks.com). it's perfectbound, $10, 96 pages, and the blurbs are really sweet though i'm too shy to include them here.

those boston conference reports, btw, are lovely -- lisa

↑ Index

591. Kevin Varrone
address query
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

does anyone know how I might contact Cole Swenson?
please backchannel.
and thanks in advance.

Kevin

↑ Index

592. toddbaron
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Tue 21 Jul 1998

---

you are absolutle and correct!
I agree in all way
and from my privilidge and handicapped zone (male)
I am more than stuck in my gender stupidity--as we all are...

But yes--the forms--hmmmmm....are masculine and such--what do you think of Dickinson's rewritting the hymnal structure--which is male--and damn it--is writing--gender based--re writing or reasembling of structure--and sometimes I wonder if it's all structure anyway--and how sad..but tghe narrative...the epic...the content-based and lecture hall--the architecture of the 20th century

(war)

yes--I agree and love Notley's undergound ventures and Mayers "Letter to mothers..."...and (sigh) (sic) is there a maleness seriously paid attention to I wonder in the newer poets? Is Silliman "new sentence"--there is an address there to self/and gender/no?

Hmmm...
I am lost in the funhouse for sure..

Tb
(ReMap)

ps: which is one reason Carolyn and I do ReMap--I would NOT do a magazine alone--nor with another male--have done that--and yes--I believe strongly our magazine was prone to pen(is) as I hope RE MAp is not (but not without ink, too!)

↑ Index

593. Susan Wheeler
Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville
Tue 21 Jul 1998

Chris, I wasn't there but I will vouch for her books, which are astonishing, pitched carefully at a resonance between mirth and despair, assertively idiosyncratic, and very smart. Good reading, especially for a heat wave.

The House Party, U of GA Press 1984
To Newfoundland, U of GA Press 1989
Sleepers Wake, Timken Publishers 1994

At 06:19 PM 7/21/98 -0400, you wrote:
> Hey, anybody who attended conference, wanna say anything about > Caroline Knox's reading and/or talk?
> She's kinda the one person there I have NO SENSE about what she's > doing, and am curious (also because I think she spoke of O'Hara, > Ashes, etc.....). Thanks, chris stroffolino

>

Susan Wheeler
[redacted] voice/fax [redacted]

↑ Index

594. Christian Roess

Re: Came to Cambridge: Not Bean-ville

Wed 22 Jul 1998

On Tue, 21 Jul 1998 Patrick Pritchett writes:

> Great reports from Bahston, J. Kimball, Daniel Bouchard & Steven Marks! I hereby relinquish the tattered palm of hyperbole. Thanks.
>
> Patrick Pritchett

Yes , my thanks to all for the reports. Also a belated thanks to Patrick Pritchett for his wonderful reports from Naropa.

Chris

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

595. Safdie Joseph

Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too

Wed 22 Jul 1998

---

toddbaron said (in replying to a post from Linda Russo):

you are absolutle and correct!
I agree in all way
and from my privilidge and
handicapped zone (male)
I am more than stuck in my gender stupidity--as we all are...

To which (besides questioning his spelling, and differing with Jordan on the importance of that ability in poetics) I ask:

Why is being male or female "stuck"?
Why is it a "handicapped zone"?
Why is Todd seemingly apologizing for being male?

Are we perhaps to become ambi-sexual and aware of all possible gender perspectives at once?

Look: I like Alan Jennifer's work a lot, but surely one of its virtues is the perception that IDENTIFICATIONS ARE ODIOUS (which is perhaps one of the reasons I've always felt uneasy with "identity politics"). I like SPUNK myself; a certain liveliness and intractability, no matter what sex it emanates from. I myself am "of the male gender" (gag) -- and white besides. I understand that white males are over-privileged in American society (but not only that society -- in fact, LEAST of all in that society). Moreover, I understand that sometimes I exercise these privileges unconsciously. There are, to my great misfortune, innumerable things that I assume unconsciously. No doubt some of these things are related to my maleness and whiteness. No doubt my whiteness and maleness determine many of the decisions I make in my life and, more than that, many of the decisions I make in my poems.

But folks . . .

GIVE ME A BREAK!

Maybe I'm just too much of an old Marxist, but the impersonal economic forces of capitalism seem to me to determine us in a far more comprehensive and degrading way than what sex we happen to be inhabiting. To take an example from the membership of this list, the denial of Joe Amato's tenure (and his postings explaining his perception of that action) are far more alarming than the limitations of "the male gaze." This is just an opinion, limited in universal applicability like any other feeling or opinion. But why should I apologize for my perceptions? Why should ANY OF US APOLOGIZE?

And furthermore . . . how can it BE that NOBODY cares if a fucking POET is A MEMBER OF THE FBI!!!

"But yes--the forms--hmmmmm....are masculine and such--"

Jesus.

Maybe there's a REASON so few people go to poetry readings in L.A! (I don't mean to criticize you personally, Todd; I don't know you or your magazine, and you're more than likely a good guy and a fine poet; I hope you understand it's a style of rhetoric I'm objecting to here).

And you know, Bukowski was an asshole, but he wrote one or two good poems!

Forever, I guess, in the _derrier garde_ (though I like Rachel Daley's post a lot),

Joe Safdie

STUFF THE VOICE-PRINT

Admission of error is a weakness of judgement,
if one senses beforehand that it will be seen as a weakness.

---Edward Dorn

↑ Index

596. trbell
Re: Guest (for Notley)
Wed 22 Jul 1998

Alan,
Findmyselfre assessingsomethingsso notalwayscoherent,but

> The description of dreams as 'attempt to structure random neural firings' is too often taken a step further to dismissing dreams as therefore meaningless. Is not poetry an attempt to do the same with life's random firings?
>
> This depends on how "meaning" is defined - as symptom, portent, or as something acceptable to the mind as constituting sense.

YES

> I would never go so far in relation to poetry unless one wants to say everything is such an attempt.

PERHAPS

> Language can either anchor meaning in an image or else helps serve a relay function to put the image into relation with other elements in a complex structure. - Barthes
>
> is it not then the image (or dream) that really matters or means?
>
> No, why or how? And what is meant by "really" here? I would be wary of assigning priority.

YES, "really" is the issue -

>
>Alan
>
if anyone is still with me

Asapsychologistindisguisehere I am aware that there is a particular verbal therapy that is the treatment of choice for a class of disorders. Neurochemical treatments also work. The fascinating thing here is that the verbal therapy produces the same neurophisical changes on the same brain sites that the neurochemical treatments do. Does this mean that one or the other should be given a priority or are they essentially the same? Does language or neurochemicals "really" produce the change?

tom

↑ Index

597. Linda Russo

Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too

Wed 22 Jul 1998

Good example, henry -- in the Odyssey -- who weaves? Penelope or Homer? Arachne weaves -- but who weaves the myths of Penelope and Arachne?

I know it's ridiculous to try to get down to first causes, to try to separate what's "man-made" and "woman-made" (preferring this to masc/fem) a 2nd wave feminist would Re-Vision these weaving myths to give penelope more autonomy, perhaps make her less chaste, etc. (cf Rukeyser "No more masks! No more mythologies")

A post-feminist read -- necessarily post-structuralist -- would recognize the myth of penelope woven into, and inseparable from, the frames other (man-made) myths.

Weaving -- the technique, the writing strategy -- is neither masculine nor feminine -- Forms are neither masculine nor feminine (an extension of Waldrop's claim that language is neutral). Forms are not masculine but the construction of literary history, the way we view forms, is -- I think it's time feminist scholarship came to grips with its limitations on this front.

i was pointing the gendering of forms as a problem of feminist scholarship (at one point necessary) -- a reduction that perhaps "prohibits" male writers also from assuming a "gendered" relationship to literary history -- which perhaps frames all men as complicit in maintianing this oppressive history

On Tue, 21 Jul 1998, henry g wrote:

> Linda,
> Poetry has often been metaphorized as weaving. Does weaving create masculine forms? I understand you were not simply assenting to the idea that "all forms are masculine".

> - Henry G.

↑ Index

598. Rachel Levitsky
Re: For Joel K. (2 wks late)
Wed 22 Jul 1998

Joel Kuszai asked me, a long while ago, to post something on Steve Dickison's Naropa Lecture. Lemmesay first that Steve did a beautiful thing for the opening panel, which was to approach the issue of Community/Performance/Publishing topic through the Jazz performance scene of the Bay Area, which has been taken back or over by the musicians themselves creating relationships which are direct, no middle developer. This Steve posed in comparison to some venues in Europe that are subsidized by generous art funding but end up with small scattered audience that fail to provide the critical mass necessary for vibrancy. This double edged sword was embodied for us by Kai Nieminem, who was thrilled at the energetic poet's dialogue here but who was only able to get to Naropa through the funding of the Finnish Bureau of Culture, an entity, it was observed, that doesn't have an equal here, unless you consider the international marketing of Armagedon to be such an equal.

As for Steve's lecture I can only by very subjective in terms of what I remember. He raised the question of independence in publishing, whether it was possible in a time when even the smallest press must arrange their marketing to serve the systems of Barnes and Noble and Borders. For example, if presses don't print a computer scanner thing, they can expect their books to get stuck with a large marring sticker--which will come back on the returned books. Small Press Distribution's sales, he told us, had gone up 50%, largely because B&N in their effort to beat Amazon in being the World's Largest, had ordered 2 of everything for their warehouse. Raising all sorts of issues. On one hand the access of largeness has enabled a proliferation of small presses, on the other a devastation of small bookstores.

LIke I said, all this raises much. Sorry the report is so short so late.

Off to camp.

RDL

↑ Index

599. henry g
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Wed 22 Jul 1998

On Wed, 22 Jul 1998 10:26:29 -0600 Linda Russo said:
>
>Weaving -- the technique, the writing strategy -- is neither masculine >nor feminine -- Forms are neither masculine nor feminine (an extension >of Waldrop's claim that language is neutral). Forms are not masculine but >the construction of literary history, the way we view forms, is -- I think >it's time feminist scholarship came to grips with its limitations on this >front.
>
>i was pointing the gendering of forms as a problem of feminist scholarship >(at one point necessary) -- a reduction that perhaps "prohibits" >male writers also from assuming a "gendered" relationship to literary >history -- which perhaps frames all men as complicit in maintianing this >oppressive history

This makes me think of Ann Douglas' books, _Feminization of American Culture_, and _Terrible Honesty_ - and how modernist poets (Pound, Williams especially) were part of a general cultural reaction against the "suffocating genteel Victorian"(& white) feminism of the later 19th century - and how Pound's "breaking of forms" (all the little effete sonnet men) was a macho thing - so that the sonnet was a feminine form (in his mind, at that time), feminine = effete, genteel, soft - but women writing sonnets in the 19th century was maybe a feminist thing to do - and I wonder how much the dissociated, experimental, post-Poundian, post-modern forms illustrate a repeat of this pattern - women "appropriating" "masculine" forms - but too late; there always seems to be a late-arriving avant-garde ready to lead their disciples & acolytes further into a dead-end wilderness supposedly "new" - (just trying to be provocative) these things are just too durn complicated!! There are at least three/four levels: the personal/artistic, which is a person working out of a semi-damaged personal psyche into artistic form; there is the legal/political , where a society tries to control/compromise/negotiate social peace; and there is the intellectual/theoretical, where all the personal/artistic issues are hashed out and analyzed in the sociological/objective abstract (both helping and screwing up the other levels in the process) - and the men poets weave their appropriated forms into a shroud around the actual weavers themselves -

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

600. Franklin Bruno combo?
Wed 22 Jul 1998

I've misplaced the ordering info (where, how much) for Michael Magee's magazine -Combo-. Could someone re-post this (backchannel fine)?

thanks
fjb

↑ Index

601. ken|n|ing
The A's and B's of small press publishing:
Wed 22 Jul 1998

Todd Baron wants insights into

a) dist. and publishing of mags and books
b) getting work published and (AND) supporting small(er) publishing houses.

a) Well, as far as I can tell, outside the bustling matrices of SF & NY (etc), magazines publishing avant-garde poetry & really vital poetics come in two very general varieties. There's the glossy/perfect-bound mag. with a dependable stable of "established" poets representing their latest leading up to its publication in glossy/perfect-bound book form, often in tandem or under the umbrella of an institution, such as a university. These magazines, to my mind, often do not or cannot take the sorts of risks of the second brand; There is a glut of little "experimental" magazines, such as my own or yours, Todd, that can often develop their own stable of authors, but will more often take risks with "emerging" writers, since those with the capital (economic and cultural) to wind up an "important" source of cultural and economic viability, vibrancy, would consider the cottage-industry mag.s' stable of authors "emerging" so long as they allow themselves to be seen in the company of unknowns. I make this admittedly clumsy distinction to make the point that poets & "poeticians" like any other practitioner in a capital economics will run with their own crowd, because one cannot generally afford the other. In other words, what is vital to one community is often misinterpreted as aesthetic posturing, or mere pretense, in another. Anyone publishing independently must first decide what that means as far as procedural concerns go, distribution, marketing, format, then realize that, should you fall into the second category, this provides you a not unique but happy nonetheless opportunity to cross those borders, as far as whom you choose to represent in your pages. Engaged authors produce work which will engage in such a dialogic configuration. Thus, hopefully, the work will carry the mag. into the hands of an audience(s).

b) Thus, hopefully, the work will carry the author into the magazine of an audience.

Patrick F. Durgin
|
|
k e n n i n g```````````````|```````````````````````````````
a newsletter of contemporary |poetry, poetics, and non-fiction writing
|418 Brown St. #10 Iowa City, IA 52245 USA

↑ Index

602. Linda Russo

Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too

Wed 22 Jul 1998

Rah rah.

I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).

I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc. -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in patriarchal biases.

But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!

Until we get some intelligent conversation going to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship) we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)

Todd's comeback:

> being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..) gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
>
> never impersonal.
>
> Tb

↑ Index

603. Linda Russo

Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too

Wed 22 Jul 1998

On Tue, 21 Jul 1998, R M Daley wrote:
> so maybe 'gendering' becomes a convenient term? can it be utilized, i > think yes as anything that keeps moving, and this is , like, one of the > most popular threads that lingers and recurs and full of buttons...
>

OR Conveniently inconvenient

how about instead of MASCULINE and FEMININE we use

CANINE FELINE HEGEMONIC NON-HEGEMONIC CORSETTED BRASSIERED COOKED RAW MEDIUM RARE
PINK DUSTY ROSE
WINEDARK SPARKLING STRAPPED-ON SLAPPED-ON

OR ANY COMBINATION OF THE ABOVE.

↑ Index

604. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli
reductio ad absurdum
Wed 22 Jul 1998

"The concerted effort around 1950 to reduce human affairs to positive science or techniques and technologies led to mislabeling that made much of what was said and done in connection with psychoanalysis absurd. We encounter a similar bias toward techniques, positivism, and reductionism in various forms at the meetings: in the enthusiasm for interpreting existential issues in terms of mathematical decision theory and game theory; in the mislabeling of the political World Federation for Mental Health as a scientific organization; in the reference to psychology as "behavioral science"; in Northrop's replacement of the actual social and political events by logical systems; in Stroud's technical fix to deal with the dangers of nuclear annihilation. This mislabeling is the earmark of not only the Macy meetings but of the postwar era in the United States.... The taboo, around 1950, against tracing the origins of psychological suffering to political and economic conditions and seeking to alter them, the "social amnesia" (to borrow Jacoby's phrase) of psychotherapists, was itself part of the political climate."---from The Cybernetics Group by Steve Joshua Heims---carlo parcelli

↑ Index

605. Bradford J Senning room
Wed 22 Jul 1998

---

26 year old senior at the University of Arizona moving to NYC to attend Hunter College as a National Student Exchange (NSE) member. Needs a cheap room for no more than a semester beginning August 22. Genteel, studious, willing to do chores. Backchannel response.

↑ Index

606. toddbaron
Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too
Wed 22 Jul 1998

Safdie Joseph wrote:
>
> toddbaron said (in replying to a post from Linda Russo):
>
> you are absolutle and correct!

> I agree in all way
> and from my privilidge and
> handicapped zone (male)
> I am more than stuck in my > gender stupidity--as we all are...
>
> To which (besides questioning his spelling, and differing with Jordan on > the importance of that ability in poetics) I ask:
>
> Why is being male or female "stuck"?
> Why is it a "handicapped zone"?
> Why is Todd seemingly apologizing for being male?
> Are we perhaps to become ambi-sexual and aware of all possible gender > perspectives at once?
>
> Look: I like Alan Jennifer's work a lot, but surely one of its virtues > is the perception that IDENTIFICATIONS ARE ODIOUS (which is perhaps one > of the reasons I've always felt uneasy with "identity politics"). I like > SPUNK myself; a certain liveliness and intractability, no matter what > sex it emanates from. I myself am "of the male gender" (gag) -- and > white besides. I understand that white males are over-privileged in > American society (but not only that society -- in fact, LEAST of all in > that society). Moreover, I understand that sometimes I exercise these > privileges unconsciously. There are, to my great misfortune, innumerable > things that I assume unconsciously. No doubt some of these things are > related to my maleness and whiteness. No doubt my whiteness and maleness > determine many of the decisions I make in my life and, more than that, > many of the decisions I make in my poems.
>
> But folks . . .
>
> GIVE ME A BREAK!
>
> Maybe I'm just too much of an old Marxist, but the impersonal economic > forces of capitalism seem to me to determine us in a far more > comprehensive and degrading way than what sex we happen to be > inhabiting. To take an example from the membership of this list, the > denial of Joe Amato's tenure (and his postings explaining his perception > of that action) are far more alarming than the limitations of "the male > gaze." This is just an opinion, limited in universal applicability like > any other feeling or opinion. But why should I apologize for my > perceptions? Why should ANY OF US APOLOGIZE?

>
> And furthermore . . . how can it BE that NOBODY cares if a fucking POET > is A MEMBER OF THE FBI!!!
>
> "But yes--the forms--hmmmmm....are masculine > and such--"
>
> Jesus.
>
> Maybe there's a REASON so few people go to poetry readings in L.A! (I > don't mean to criticize you personally, Todd; I don't know you or your > magazine, and you're more than likely a good guy and a fine poet; I hope > you understand it's a style of rhetoric I'm objecting to here).

Todd Baron:

I must start off by saying Buk. NEVER wrote a good poem--sorry--I am not in favor of

a) poor writing and silliness in the name drunken stupidity and ill-defined post-beat romanticism b) HE is a mysoginist idiot! (Phew!) being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..) gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --

never impersonal.

Tb

↑ Index

607. toddbaron
Re: For Joel K. (2 wks late)
Wed 22 Jul 1998

Rachel Levitsky wrote:
>
> Joel Kuszai asked me, a long while ago, to post something on Steve > Dickison's Naropa Lecture. Lemmesay first that Steve did a beautiful > thing for the opening panel, which was to approach the issue of > Community/Performance/Publishing topic through the Jazz performance > scene of the Bay Area, which has been taken back or over by the > musicians themselves creating relationships which are direct, no middle > developer.
> This Steve posed in comparison to some venues in Europe that are > subsidized by generous art funding but end up with small scattered > audience that fail to provide the critical mass necessary for vibrancy.
> This double edged sword was embodied for us by Kai Nieminem, who was > thrilled at the energetic poet's dialogue here but who was only able to > get to Naropa through the funding of the Finnish Bureau of Culture, an > entity, it was observed, that doesn't have an equal here, unless you > consider the international marketing of Armagedon to be such an equal.
>
> As for Steve's lecture I can only by very subjective in terms of what I > remember. He raised the question of independence in publishing, whether > it was possible in a time when even the smallest press must arrange > their marketing to serve the systems of Barnes and Noble and Borders.
> For example, if presses don't print a computer scanner thing, they can > expect their books to get stuck with a large marring sticker--which will > come back on the returned books. Small Press Distribution's sales, he > told us, had gone up 50%, largely because B&N in their effort to beat > Amazon in being the World's Largest, had ordered 2 of everything for > their warehouse. Raising all sorts of issues. On one hand the access > of largeness has enabled a proliferation of small presses, on the other > a devastation of small bookstores.
>
> LIke I said, all this raises much. Sorry the report is so short so > late.
>
> Off to camp.
>
> RDL

But steve poses some very important questions. I believe--and the discussion not that long ago here abt. the LA or any local "scene" --that we must begin again to redefine ways of distribution and publishing for the many many small(er) presses that exist--from magazines to books. Carolyn Kemp and I do ReMap as only by sub. but we don't want to--even distribution sources that might take our magazine are frenzied and incoherent enugh to scare us--I'd rather give the mag. away (as I have...) to true readers and participants in the porject than have to wait 1 year for small sums. What do we do? How do we--also as poets--get work published? I have been "lucky" enough to work with some very fine presses (O Books, texture, Avenue B..etc) but now I have several manuscripts I would like to see pubished--and how and where. I always feel sheepish sending to presses I have no working relationship with--but must. Direct co-relation to Steve's work--steve's workshop--lectures--(as I understand them from Steve, too) that it's time we think of ourselves in much the same manner as other arts communities. Bands start off small but gain a public if they're good (>?<) enough, etc. I'd love to hear more on what everyone else in the world thinks about

a) dist. and publishing of mags and books
b) getting work published and (AND) supporting small(er) publishing houses.

Tb
(ReMap)

↑ Index

608. Safdie Joseph
Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too
Wed 22 Jul 1998

If that was a "brilliant" comeback, Linda (and where, indeed, would Todd be coming back from?) the word doesn't mean what I thought it meant. Speculations as to Mrs. Marx aside, the economic system is no respecter of persons.

I appreciate that you seem to be wrestling with something and I hope you and others continue to produce the challenging work that would help illuminate the problems as you see them. (Is "patriarchal" really so much a better word than "masculine"?)

Here's an excerpt from this month's Harper's from one William Phillips, which deals a bit with what I said last night . . .

"I've been wondering where the ideas and movements on the left today come from. They do not have their source in either Marx or Lenin, yet they are deemed by the left itself to be authentic, especially in the academy. . . .

1. Cultural diversity. Neither Marx nor Lenin was interested in any kind of cultural diversity. Lenin supported the various nationalisms in Russia, but that was mainly a part of his revolutionary strategy. 2. Gay liberation. Neither Marx nor Lenin had the slightest interest in homosexuality of any kind. . . . And certainly they had no notion of an "alternative lifestyle." 3. Radical feminism. Neither Marx nor Lenin was especially concerned with feminism, though they did not directly oppose it. What they actually believed was that no questions concerning feminism could be adequately solved under capitalism, and that only under socialism would people be free of prejudice or bigotry. And women would be equal to men in all respects. 4. Gender studies. Marx and Lenin, of course, never heard of what are called gender studies. But obviously they would not have had the slightest interest in them and would have thought of them as intellectual and political distractions.

Etc., etc. He makes a few cheap rhetorical points at the end, but I was most interested in his No. 3 above. That is, speculations about gender don't HAVE to be "intellectual and political distractions" . . . they can be linked with other pursuits, some of which I would certainly hope would be poetic and economic. I would repeat, again, my post of last week -- it's the existence of money that makes it impossible to sustain an "epic" view of the world.

(And speaking of persons, my FIRST name is Joseph.)

From: Linda Russo [SMTP:[redacted]]
Sent: Wednesday, July 22, 1998 11:03 AM
To: [redacted]
Subject: Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too

Rah rah.

I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the
"position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).

I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other

'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc.
-- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in patriarchal biases.

But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!

Until we get some intelligent conversation going to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship)
we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)

Todd's comeback:

> being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..)
> gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role > or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and > confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or > "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that
> "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either

male or > female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in > poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male > narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their > way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that > economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are > structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist > Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power > elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are > not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
>
> never impersonal.
>
> Tb
>

↑ Index

609. Alaric Sumner

Michael Basinski reviews The Unspeakable Rooms

Wed 22 Jul 1998

I have just received the following review from Michael D. Basinski (poet, critic, Rare Books/Poetry Librarian etc) of State University of New York at Buffalo. The two previous reviews posted have been about the performance in Cleveland, Ohio. Special thanks to Taylor Brady (Stratch and Dent/Cartograffiti) for organising the gig.

"I recently had occasion to watch and hear the work of sound poet Alaric Sumner and performer Rory McDermott in my home town of Buffalo, New York at the HallWalls Contemporary Art Center (22nd May 1998). The evening featured two works by Sumner. The first, 'error studies and portraits', was a multi-voice, conversation poem carried on between Sumner and McDermott. Certainly, this was interesting because multi-voice presentation poetry looms a major avant garde technique. Sumner's sound poems weave literally philosophy with the aural. The form it manifests exists in a matrix of poetics and sound. It was a pleasure to hear this burgeoning form worked by a poet whose ear is well tuned and whose intellect can manipulate the multi-voice tool to form poetry. "In retrospect, this first piece acted as a prolog and introduction to the second piece of the evening, 'The Unspeakable Rooms'. This was a more physical piece that featured McDermott strenuously and emotionally, passionately moving in front of a screen on which was projected McDermott passionately moving. The sound tract was McDermott's reading, rendering of Sumner's text. Perfectly balanced it was strenuous, riveting performance. McDermott miming himself on film ranged through a host of emotions. As a poetic piece, as a poem, one was constantly aware of the dual qualities of language. Language is both the material of meaning and a veil surrounding meaning. The two McDermotts, one real and one a real film, became a metaphor of this constant and irreconcilable struggle. Beyond this, of course, as poem it was a tactile event, therefore, much new in the realm of the poem. "Both pieces were extremely interesting and engaging and the evening will stick long in my mind because of the challenge it posed to contemporary poetry. That challenge was to become tactile yet intellectually philosophical. The team of Sumner and McDermott seem to be the best operating this day in this opening arena."

Enquires about bookings to:
[redacted]
or phone: [redacted]

JPEG screen dumps from the video made during the Buffalo performance are available as attachments on request (they are not of the highest quality but give a good sense of the visual impact.)

The piece's requirements are:
space: 12ft wide x 9ft tall white wall or screen (performance is end on, so audience should not be too far to the sides of the 12 ft)
blackout video projector (high quality single beam) video player (SVHS ideally, VHS ok) cd player
good sound system (for vocal range)

The piece has been designed with art galleries in mind and does not require conventional performance spaces (though they accommodate it perfectly well).

University venues particularly welcome (especially with educational sessions (workshop/lecture) attached on the piece/performance writing/collaboration, etc). A future issue of PAJ (Performing Arts Journal, published by Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, USA) will include the text of The Unspeakable Rooms in a section I have edited on (live) Performance Writing. Their web site is at: http://calliope.jhu.edu/journals/performing_arts_journal/

It looks as if we have a London Venue for The Unspeakable Rooms in late September. More details shortly. Other venues in October and November in Leeds, Devon and Cornwall.

Performance Writing
Dartington College of Arts, Totnes, Devon TQ9 6EJ, UK
http://www.dartington.ac.uk/prospectus/pw.html

"error studies and portraits" in Cartograffiti (ed. Taylor Brady)
http://writing.upenn.edu/AandL/english/pubs/spc/cartograffiti/contents/poems.htm l

The Unspeakable Rooms, 11th Performance Art Festival, Cleveland, Ohio
http://www.performance-art.org/weekone.html "One of the most stunning performances the Festival has ever presented." Amy Bracken Sparks, "The Plain Dealer" "One of the most powerful performances I've ever witnessed, and I've attended hundreds. A difficult masterpiece." Frank Green, "Cleveland Free Times"

Formerly resident writer at Tate Gallery, St Ives. Book from residency: "Waves on Porthmeor Beach" (words worth) illustrated by Sandra Blow RA. First prize, Renato Giorgi Poetry Award (Cornish section)

↑ Index

610. raea100900
Poetry Daily Website
Wed 22 Jul 1998

Hi all-

Ron mentioned that Poetry Daily is featuring a poem of mine on their website (www.poems.com) on Saturday. Disconcertingly, I've just heard now (for the first time) from them and it seems what they're planning to do is post the second half of a two part poem. So what will show up there isn't complete. That makes the experience even stranger.

Rae Armantrout

↑ Index

611. joel lewis
life in late capitalist society (f.y.i)
Wed 22 Jul 1998

0:39 AM ET 07/22/98

FEATURE-''Air rage'' on the rise on U.S., other airlines

By Diana Fairechild

KAUAI, Hawaii (Reuters) - Blame it on a lack of oxygen or being packed like sardines in a can, but ``air rage'' is on the rise.

In well-publicized incidents, airline passengers have defecated on food carts, been aggressive with the crew and even sexually assaulted their seats. Airline travel once was exclusively for a more refined jet set, but these days flying has become a perilous proposition.

Unruly behavior in the skies has been increasing at an astonishing rate in both numbers and the level of hostility. A recent report by the International Cabin Crew Association showed a rise of about 400 percent in incidents since 1995.

In early July, the ICCA, the International Transport Federation and the International Federation of Airline Pilots issued a joint statement saying airlines should adopt a policy of prosecuting all offenders. They also called for a blacklist of offenders and said airlines should ensure there is restraint equipment such as plastic handcuffs aboard all planes.

In 1996, banker Gerard Finneran was fined $50,000 after he assaulted an attendant and then defecated on a first-class food cart during a Buenos Aires-to-New York flight.

More recently, a man on a Northwest Airlines flight removed his pants and ``simulated having sex with the back of his seat,'' airline officials reported. And a man on a flight to Honolulu ``allegedly urinated on the seats,'' then punched another passenger who told him to stop.

Other incidents include passengers becoming enraged after being asked if their seat-belts were fastened and crews being attacked for trying to put trays back in the upright position.

The problem is not just an American one.

In 1995 a large group of British and Irish tourists ran amok aboard a trans-Atlantic flight after being denied more alcohol. The drunken tourists sent their children to steal more drink from service carts, attacked other passengers and pelted the crew with food until they were overcome by some wrestlers aboard, giving the entire incident a three-ring circus flavor.

BOUND AND GAGGED Airline crews have been forced to take drastic measures. A British Airways passenger who ``improperly touched a flight attendant'' this year was bound with handcuffs and duct tape by the crew and subsequently fined $11,000. Another passenger was tied up with a headset cord by United Airlines crew members after he disturbed the flight.

Japan Airlines also has given flight attendants permission to tie up unruly and raucous passengers. The airline issued the edict last year after incidents on its planes more than doubled between 1995 and 1996. JAL said its crew members had been stabbed with pens, had their buttocks and breasts groped and were even forced to get on their hands and knees to apologize for bringing drinks late to some drunken passengers. Experts say the airline equivalent of road rage is a complex problem with many contributory factors. It could simply be a reflection of increased violence in society, but there may be other underlying issues triggering the rise in unruliness. Some medical experts blame the cabin environment, which they say is high in toxic chemicals and allergens and low in air pressure and oxygen. ``Curtailment of fresh air in airplanes can be causing deficient oxygen in the brain of passengers, and this often makes people act belligerent, even crazy,'' said Dr. Vincent Mark, an environmental physician in Santa Cruz, California. The link between air rage and poor air quality may deserve a closer look. Passenger unruliness began to rise some 20 years ago, coinciding with the cost-cutting practice of using recycled air instead of fresh air in passenger cabins.

SARDINE-CLASS SEATING

Another possible culprit, high on the list of irritations for airline passengers, is cramped ``sardine seating.'' Airline seats are now as small as seats on subway trains, and with many flights lasting longer passengers feel they are packed in like sardines in a can, or chickens in crowded cages. Is it any wonder they peck peevishly at those around them?

Airline executives point the finger in part at excess luggage. In recent testimony before Congress one blamed an explosion in the number and size of bags passengers carry on.

But critics say airlines themselves have contributed to the problem by removing coat closets, leaving little room for garment bags. And with eight percent of all airline baggage lost or stolen, travelers are increasingly reluctant to check their luggage.

While Congress and the airlines think about ways to fix the problem, here are a few tips if you find yourself on a flight with an unruly passenger:

-- Rather than confront the offender directly, leave your seat and seek out the purser or senior flight attendant. The purser is usually found in first class, so bypass the flight attendants in coach.

-- Give the purser the row and seat number of the unruly passenger. Remain calm and communicate clearly.

-- If you have a tendency to be an unruly passenger yourself, keep in mind that the trip is a challenge for everyone on board. Tolerance and polite gestures could make your flights more pleasant for you and everyone around you.

(Diana Fairechild is an expert in aviation health and safety and author of the book ``Jet Smart.'' She maintains a Healthy Flying Web Site at www.flyana.com.) ^REUTERS@

↑ Index

612. Maria Damon
queries
Wed 22 Jul 1998

---

are there surviving members of the Oulipo group and do they still meet in paris? inquiring minds need to know

↑ Index

613. George Bowering
Re: weaving/tying
Wed 22 Jul 1998

> Weaving -- the technique, the writing strategy -- is neither masculine nor feminine --

Writing is textual So is textile. Hence weaving. The ending of the Odyssey is literal denouement.

George Bowering.
,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

614. George Bowering
Re: queries
Wed 22 Jul 1998

> are there surviving members of the Oulipo group and do they still meet in paris? inquiring minds need to know

Harry Mathews is certainly alive.

As are some of the ones whose names I dont know. But of course Perec and Queneau and Calvino are all gone.

The big Oulipo book should be out within the next year.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

615. d.j. huppatz
new webpage/journal
Wed 22 Jul 1998

dear all

ANNOUNCING the new TEXTBASE webpage featuring experimental writing & visual art projects from MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

<http://www.skynet.apana.org.au/~samiam/textbase/textbase.htm>

TEXTBASE has been operating for a few years as a loose collective of writers working in the visual arts scene & we are now publishing our own literary journal. the TEXTBASE webpage features a(n almost) complete documentation of our visual arts projects as well as the first two issues of the journal. there are also some interesting hypertext pieces on the webpage - i recommend benjamin brady's "a is for geophysics" for those of you with good graphics & sound. any comments/criticism/inquiries appreciated.

BUT WAIT, THERE'S MORE: i still have about ten hard copies of the first two issues of the journal which i'm willing to send to interested parties. this is a free offer but swaps for your journal/chapbook/whatever would be great. backchannel a name & address.

dan huppatz melbourne

↑ Index

616. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: Guest (for Notley)
Wed 22 Jul 1998

I think this is the greatest mystery - the relation of the symbolic to the neuro-physiological - how certain words, certain orders, can bring on chem- ical depression, neurosis, even death, how voudou operates, hypnosis; we live half-in, half-out the symbolic - we're cluttered by it...

Alan

↑ Index

617. toddbaron
Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too
Wed 22 Jul 1998

---

weird. I meant simply that as response to the statement earlier made that "economics are impersonal" that that was wrong. Economics are Gender and Race and Age based. This must enter into a discussion of gender based writing--what keeps poets where they're kept in the class system--and writers--and visual artists--etc."--and that economics being gender based (etc) the question must focus on /more/econmics than simply form and function. Marx would not have thought gender studies were "distractions" had they been presented in this manner--He well understood who got paid for what/etc. And Reich (let's get going here) focused much attention on economic constraints primarilly placed on women and child in relation to sex/gender based roles. THAT"S the reason he got kicked out of the Communist party--he wanted to break down the standard economic roles that capitalism AND communism was placing on women and children. esp.

Tb
the poem has possibilities like this, also.

↑ Index

618. J. Kuszai
BEYOND THE PAGE (SD CA Reading Series) from Stephen Cope
Thu 23 Jul 1998

---

as I've been out of the office for three days where the electicity don't shine (michigan during a storm) don't know if this went through. Will read digests later.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Sun, 19 Jul 1998 19:50:30 -0700 (PDT)

From: Stephen Cope <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]

BEYOND THE PAGE PRESENTS:

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:

What: Beyond the Page continues its series of monthly performance and arts events with BOBBIE WEST and STEVE CARLL
Where: Faultline Theatre, 3152 5th Avenue (at Spruce in Hillcrest), San Diego.
When: Sunday, July 26. 4:00 PM.
Contact: Stephen Cope at [redacted] or Joe Ross at [redacted].
E-mail at [redacted], or [redacted].

* * * * * * * * *

STEVE CARLL received an MA in Poetics from New College of California, and is about to become a resident of Honolulu, Hawai'i. He is the editor of _Antynym_ (currently on hiatus), and has published two chapbooks: _Sincerity Loops_ (Bathysphere Press) and _trace a moment's closure for clues_ (Logodaedalus). His book _DRUGS_ is forthcoming from Black Fire White Fire, and his poems have recently appeared in _Rhizome_, _Melodeon_, _Angle_, and _The Washington Review_.

BOBBIE WEST grew up on a farm in Illinois. After drifing into various jobs as a waitress, union machinist, translator, and English teacher in China, she discovered poetry. Since then, her work has appeared in various magazines, the most recent of which is _Tinfish #6_. Currently employed part time at the San Diego Public Library, she works full time on various poetic projects, including a new book of literary responses to the work of Rae Armantrout, edited by Tom Beckett.

* * * * * * * * *

BEYOND THE PAGE is proud to continue its monthly series of arts-related events with this reading. Beyond the Page is an independent arts group dedicated to the promotion of experimental and explorative work in contemporary arts. For more information, call: [redacted], [redacted]; e-mail: [redacted], [redacted].

↑ Index

619. Douglas Oliver
Re: Oulipo
Thu 23 Jul 1998

For Maria Damon:

Jacques Roubeaud and Harry Mathews are surviving Oulipoites but I don't know if there are others.

Best

Doug Oliver

↑ Index

620. david bromige
reductio ad absurdum
Thu 23 Jul 1998

---

to footnote r gancie's citation under this heading :

". . .In this society, we shift social conflicts to psychic problems that can thus be charged to individuals at 50 bucks an hour as private matters. But isn't a percentage of our wages intended to cover the case? It's not only embarrassing to be like a dumb Swede in an Ingmar Bergman movie, it's suicidal. Of course suicide can be the ethically correct choice. I think of him often."

I cite my book _Red Hats_ , published in 1986 but written years earlier (that $50/hour needs updating!). As I read it today, the objection re- a percentage of our wages sounded dumb to me, the "devil's advocacy" an uncalled-for equivocation, thus bringing in the next sentence. One of the more impressive facts of the Free Speech Movement at UC Berkeley was that once the protests began, the number of students seeking psychiatric help dipped sharply -- dramatically, I'd say.

db3.

↑ Index

621. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
re /dream
Thu 23 Jul 1998

L'image est formee de mots qui la revent.

An image is formed by words dreaming it.

(Jabes, trans. K. Waldrop)

- Jennifer

↑ Index

622. Simon DeDeo
back from the 19th century
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Brief note -- telephone and power lines have been down, here, for two days, and just returned a few hours ago, so if anybody has been trying to reach me, their mail probably bounced. Apologies for missing the rest of the postfem. discussion; I'll check the archives after I deal with the work backlog.

Also (separate note), there's a brief snippet of my work up at

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/sonnet2.html

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
[redacted]

↑ Index

623. John Cayley
subpo
Thu 23 Jul 1998

> Here's a one-two from the subpo list

What's the 'subpo list'? Something other or another name for something else? Details please.

↑ Index

624. sean bonney
rooms in london?
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Sorry to clog up the list with this sort of thing but ---- poet (and cat), 29 years, occaisonally noisy about to start PhD on Olson & Artaud at Kings College, London, seeks flat/houseshare by mid-September --- any London poets backchannel PLEASE ---- warm regards, Sean

[redacted]

↑ Index

625. Simon DeDeo
Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

I think I missed the mutation of the subject line, but I did have much fun trying to pronounce it.

Regarding Marx & feminism -- this is one of those old faultlines that shows up every now and then, with lots of bourgeois namecalling mixed in. Class and gender don't get mixed up too much, although it is important to note the "commodification" of women in society, as well as their lack of a salary for work. In a sense,
a woman is the asymptotic point of the proletariat, reduced to being supplied with just enough material compensation to sustain her labor (pun perhaps intended.)

I went to a great Judith Butler lecture in the Fall on Antigone and gender -- a wonderful Hegelian analysis of the positon of Antigone relative to the emerging "Marxist" (meaning "predicted by Marx") aristocratic society of Ancient Greece. In many ways, women are placed anterior to considerations of class; they are perceived as lilliths preceeding the creation of economic production.
The position of Lillith is interesting, in any case;
before the initiation of the Old Testament, she's a spectre in her own right. Communism may haunt from the future, but gender perhaps hearkens from the past.

Regarding the sonnet form; while women may choose to embody notions of "effeminacy" by writing prissy poems, one of the most interesting convergences of political and literary history is the connection between resurgent interest in the "primitive" in literature (e.g., Russia in the '10s) and the "woman question".

I haven't been able to keep up with all the posts on the subject, so I apologise if I'm a few hours (minutes?) out of phase.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
[redacted]

↑ Index

626. Douglas Barbour

Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too

Thu 23 Jul 1998

Henry asks about all those 'feminine' sonneteers of the 19th century & the male macho response to them, but I immediately think of one 19th century woman poet, Emily Dickinson, & how powerful her 'influence' on men as well as women is in the late 20th century. Not with sonnets either (& I know, her work wasn't 'present' in its time).

With regard to gender in writing: it would probably seem a country-minded thing to say, but couldn't it nevertheless be said, that gender is a given, in-eluctably there in whomever's writing? But, then, even if 'we' were to agree to such a simple statement, we still might add that the really interesting question is whether or no the writing (& the writer?) interrogates the concept of gender both _in_ & _by_ its formal strategies...?

Douglas Barbour (h) [403] 4363320 (b) [403]
[redacted]
Department of English
University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta Canada T6G 2E5

> By stress and syllable
> by change-rhyme and contour
> we let the long line pace equal awkward to its period.
>
> The short line
> we refine
> and keep for candor.
>
> Robert Duncan

↑ Index

627. henry g
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998 08:42:05 -0600 Douglas Barbour said:
>Henry asks about all those 'feminine' sonneteers of the 19th century & the >male macho response to them, but I immediately think of one 19th century >woman poet, Emily Dickinson, & how powerful her 'influence' on men as well >as women is in the late 20th century. Not with sonnets either (& I know, >her work wasn't 'present' in its time).

Dickinson's NOT writing in sonnets was a comment on the conventional writing of her time, ahead of the (sexist?) critiques of a later time. Society struggling along cleans the slate, and what was dominant (sentimental genteel versifying) is tossed out - but the battle-lines of "form" are dated now... I mean the old battle-lines... - Henry G

↑ Index

628. David Baratier
Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS (relavant to Russo/bAron etc. discussion)
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Dear Ms. Chris Stroffolino,

what exactly do you mean by "cross-gendered identification"

And how does this imply a form of newness? For example:
Tom Gunn's "All my sad captains" or the guy who wrote the quote both fit the above generalized parameter.How is speaking as woman with Yau different than Browning, in your estimation?

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

629. Mark Prejsnar
oulipo howlipo whylipo wherelipo
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Two people have responding (sort of) to Maria's inquiry about Oulipo. They simply mentioned a few names of folks who are (either) living or dead...

The other part of her question was whether the group still has any ongoing existence qua group: whether anyone oulipan still meets. That to me is the interesting part of the question. If they ceased as a group entity, when did they do so? and similar gossipy inquiries....

The lists of membership i have seen, and group photos, show how perfectly they reflected (at one time, certainly) the assumptions of the world of letters pre-1970: a reasonably large bunch of writers, and they were all men...Can anyone indicate if they ever eventually had a woman member? (or two?)

Mark P.

↑ Index

630. R.Gancie/C.Parcelli
Re: reductio ad absurdum
Thu 23 Jul 1998

---

david bromige wrote:
>
> to footnote r gancie's citation under this heading :
>
> ". . .In this society, we shift social conflicts to psychic problems that > can thus be charged to individuals at 50 bucks an hour as private matters.
> But isn't a percentage of our wages intended to cover the case? It's not > only embarrassing to be like a dumb Swede in an Ingmar Bergman movie, it's > suicidal. Of course suicide can be the ethically correct choice. I think of > him often."
>
> I cite my book _Red Hats_ , published in 1986 but written years earlier > (that $50/hour needs updating!). As I read it today, the objection re- a > percentage of our wages sounded dumb to me, the "devil's advocacy" an > uncalled-for equivocation, thus bringing in the next sentence. One of the > more impressive facts of the Free Speech Movement at UC Berkeley was that > once the protests began, the number of students seeking psychiatric help > dipped sharply -- dramatically, I'd say.
>
> db3.
In support of David's contention, Human Behavior magazine once ran a piece on how depression and suicide decreased dramatically in West Belfast when riots were in full swing: "Suicides Down. Since their neighborhood turned into a battleground, fewer of the downhearted haved moved to end their own lives. The mean suicide figures for both men and women in 1970 were almost half the mean for the years 1964-69." Of course, the psychiatric reasons given for the decline are inane. The Belfastians, who were immersed historically in their condition, have simply identified the cause of their 'depression' and attempted to eliminate it.---Rosalie Gancie (By the way the original quotes as well as the quotes from the passed few months are from Carlo Parcelli who abuses my e-mail in my name. Of course, he hastens to add his agreement to David's post).

↑ Index

631. Carolyn Guertin
BeeHive #2
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Subject: BeeHive #2 goes LIVE!!!

PERCEPTICON is pleased to announce that the second issue of its Hypertext fiction/theory/poetry journal BeeHive is now online!

_____

http://www.temporalimage.com/beehive/index.html

BeeHive #2 features;

QUEEN BEES AND THE HUM OF THE HIVE : Carolyn Guertin
a critical overview of feminist hypertext's subversive honeycombings

THE RED SPIDER and RAZORBURN : Brian Pritchett
2 short stories

5 NEW POEMS : David Hunter Sutherland

6 POEMS : Janet I. Buck

_____

You may also revisit BeeHive #1 in the newly added ArcHive

_____ Carolyn Guertin, Department of English, University of Alberta E-Mail: [redacted]; Tel/FAX: [redacted] Website: <http://www.ualberta.ca/~cguertin/Guertin.htm>

↑ Index

632. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT
Re: oulipo howlipo whylipo wherelipo
Thu 23 Jul 1998

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Mark Prejsnar wrote:

> men...Can anyone indicate if they ever eventually had a woman member? (or two?)*

> Mark P.

The following list can be found online somewhere under http://www2.ec-lille.fr/~book/oulipo/ - a good Oulipo-site, French. There seems to be at least one female member. Fred

Noël Arnaud - président - membre
fondateur
Marcel Bénabou - secrétaire
définitivement provisoire
Jacques Bens - membre fondateur
Claude Berge - membre fondateur
André Blavier
Paul Braffort - premier membre élu
Italo Calvino [décédé]
François Caradec
Bernard Cerquiglini
Ross Chambers
Stanley Chapman
Marcel Duchamp [décédé]
Jacques Duchateau - membre fondateur
Luc Etienne [décédé]
Paul Fournel - secrétaire
provisoirement définitif
Michelle Grangaud
Jacques Jouet
Latis [décédé] - membre fondateur
François Le Lionnais [décédé] - président fondateur
Hervé Le Tellier - trésorier
Jean Lescure - membre fondateur
Harry Mathews
Michele Métail
Oskar Pastior
Georges Perec [décédé]
Raymond Queneau [décédé] - fondateur
Jean Queval [décédé]
Pierre Rosenstiehl
Jacques Roubaud
Albert-Marie Schmidt [décédé]

↑ Index

633. henry
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Don't agree that Dickinson's writing was a "comment" at all-- just tht she did not write in the conventional form--but not as a comment--she didn't live in a world
she was against.... Let's not make her a warrior. She did follwo the voices she heard on the page and the occasional church hymn (written by men) and of course Shakespeare and the bible.
Tb

On the other hand, Dickinson read more widely than that, and anybody who wrote "publication is prostitution" (I don't know the exact quote) seems to be at war with literary protocols on some level. - Henry G

↑ Index

634. George Thompson
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Tb wrote of Emily Dickinson that:

> ...she didn't live in a world she was against....

I'm not so sure about this. If you mean that she didn't live in that world I would agree: she didn't [she lived in a little room upstairs]. If you mean that she wasn't against it, I think that you'd be completely wrong: for she was as against it as they come, and all of her work says so, don't you think?

As for Henry's remarks lately, they continue to entertain and inform me. Thanks again, Henry.

GT

> On the other hand, Dickinson read more > widely than that, and anybody who wrote "publication is prostitution" > (I don't know the exact quote) seems to be at war with literary protocols > on some level. - Henry G

↑ Index

635. J. Kuszai
New from Meow Press
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Meow Press is pleased to announce the publication of its 50th and 51st chapbooks, Benjamin Friedlander's _Selected Poems_ and Don Cheney's _The Qualms of Catullus & K-mart_.

Benjamin Friedlander's _Selected Poems_ contains poems from manuscripts completed in 1990 in Oakland through writing done in Buffalo this year, and includes selections from _Anterior Future_ (Meow Press, 1993) and _A Knot is Not a Tangle_ (Meow Press, 1995). With cover art by Armando Billitteri. 44pg. $6

Don Cheney's _The Qualms of Catullus & K-mart_ includes 27 poems from the full length work. In a comment about this book on the Poetics List, Bill Luoma notes: "Don is a skilled prose writer, so in his hands you get a real nasty & hilarious narrative, as you get in Catullus & Propertius, but you also get great sound. Whereas in Zukofsky's homophones, eg, you for the most part just get great sound, with the nasty humors subordinate." Selected by Bill Luoma. Cover art by Rose Anne Raphael. 32pg. $6.

for more information:

[redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/presses

↑ Index

636. Linda Russo
Re: re /dream
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Jennifer -- this is lovely! thanks. A prof of mine used to say

. . . a dream has _You_

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote:

> L'image est formee de mots qui la revent.
>
> An image is formed by words dreaming it.
>
> (Jabes, trans. K. Waldrop)
>
> - Jennifer

↑ Index

637. Linda Russo
Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:

Joseph & Todd --

I meant simply that I thought Todd responded well to what Joseph seemed to read as an apologist stance ("Give me a break . . "). I felt uncomfortable with Joseph's privileging of economics over gender, but perhaps he's e right, it is a _more_ oppressive system. This is something I need to think on a little more, but I felt uncomfortable measuring one against the other -- as Todd points out they're so integrally related. Didn't mean to misread or offend. I'm really enjoying this discussion. Sorry I have to sign off for a couple of days for a long weekend in the Bay Area!

linda

> weird. I meant simply that as response to the statement earlier made that "economics are impersonal" that that was wrong. Economics are Gender and Race and Age based. This must enter into a discussion of gender based writing--what keeps poets where they're kept in the class system--and writers--and visual artists--etc."--and that economics being gender based (etc) the question must focus on /more/econmics than simply form and function. Marx would not have thought gender studies were "distractions" had they been presented in this manner--He well understood who got paid for what/etc. And Reich (let's get going here) focused much attention on economic constraints primarilly placed on women and child in relation to sex/gender based roles. THAT"S the reason he got kicked out of the Communist party--he wanted to break down the standard economic roles that capitalism AND communism was placing on women and children. esp.
>
> Tb
> the poem has possibilities like this, also.

↑ Index

638. louis stroffolino
John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS (relavant to Russo/bAron etc. discussion)
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
"rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"

and negotiating the representational anxieties that might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
chris stroffolino

On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:

> Rah rah.
>
> I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the
> "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the > original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as > an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I > have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).
>
> I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so
> many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some > appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other
> 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc.
> -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in > patriarchal biases.
>
> But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting
> more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing
> experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what > Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist
> realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that > gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the > counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop
> stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the > Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!
>
> Until we get some intelligent conversation going
> to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship)
> we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it > isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it
> made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)
>
> Todd's comeback:
>
> being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..)
> gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role > or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and > confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or
> "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that

> "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
>
> never impersonal.
>
> Tb

↑ Index

639. Michael Magee

Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS (relavant to Russo/bAron etc. discussion)

Thu 23 Jul 1998

Haven't read the Yau but I often teach Harryman's "In The Mode Of" to my students, a gender bending masterpiece to be sure. -m.

According to louis stroffolino:
>
> Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
> In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
> that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
> "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
> in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
> a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
> and negotiating the representational anxieties that
> might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
> but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
> chris stroffolino
>
> On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:
>
> > Rah rah.
> >
> > I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the

> > "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the > > original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as > > an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I > > have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).
> >
> > I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so
> > many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some > > appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other
> > 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc.
> > -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in > > patriarchal biases.
> >
> > But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting
> > more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing > > experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what > > Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist
> > realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that > > gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the > > counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop > > stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the > > Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!
> >
> > Until we get some intelligent conversation going > > to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship)
> > we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it > > isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it > > made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)
> >
> > Todd's comeback:
> >
> > > being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..)
> > > gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role > > > or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and > > > confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or
> > > "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that
> > > "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or > > > female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in > > > poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male > > > narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their > > > way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that > > > economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are > > > structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist

> > > Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power > > > elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are > > > not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
> > >
> > > never impersonal.
> > >
> > > Tb
> > >
> >
>

↑ Index

640. toddbaron
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

---

henry g wrote:
>
> On Thu, 23 Jul 1998 08:42:05 -0600 Douglas Barbour said:
> >Henry asks about all those 'feminine' sonneteers of the 19th century & the > >male macho response to them, but I immediately think of one 19th century > >woman poet, Emily Dickinson, & how powerful her 'influence' on men as well > >as women is in the late 20th century. Not with sonnets either (& I know, > >her work wasn't 'present' in its time).
>
> Dickinson's NOT writing in sonnets was a comment on the conventional > writing of her time, ahead of the (sexist?) critiques of a later time.
> Society struggling along cleans the slate, and what was dominant (sentimental > genteel versifying) is tossed out - but the battle-lines of "form" > are dated now... I mean the old battle-lines...
> - Henry G

Don't agree that Dickinson's writing was a "comment" at all--
just tht she did not write in the conventional form--but not as a comment--she didn't live in a world
she was against.... Let's not make her a warrior. She did follwo the voices she heard on the page and the occasional church hymn (written by men) and of course Shakespeare and the bible.

Tb

↑ Index

641. louis stroffolino
Party
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Just wanted to remind people again that I and Gary Sullivan are having a roof party (not to be confused with ROOF BOOKS; though people with ROOF BOOKS are invited) tomorrow night. Friday 7/24... We will be UNDER the roof it it rains.....in Brooklyn, NY.... Anybody in the NYC area (or "just visiting") is welcome to attend. Backchannel for directions, etc..... chris strofolino

↑ Index

642. henry
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

>
I do not agree--she did not write "against"
but created "for" ---I am simply saying also that I'm "against" others using her (or otehrs) to promote an ideology the /she did not share. You can't just read the work and say "look-- here she's writing against the role of women and marriage"

she was an occult
writer--writing
to a certain "self" that was surely not the politics of the day--
but rather .....

- it is pretty easy to read your own concerns into somebody's work, and pretend authorial intention is meaningless or not worth trying to understand. In that sense I agree with you that saying Dickinson was "making a statement" about sonneteering & other forms of "pop" literature without any historical record to that effect is just that kind of misreading-chatterteering. But I do think that when she sent her poems to Higginsworth [name right?] she was "testing the waters" in more ways than one - and when she found them wanting, her whole approach became "at war" with conventional literary activity in them days. - Henry G

↑ Index

643. louis stroffolino
DICKINSON
Thu 23 Jul 1998

I am ABSOLUTELY SURE that Dickinson has at least some poems that pretty blatantly (and more that do it more subtly) write AGAINST the society woman role, and marriage. Sure, they are also FOR something, but it's not always just the occult..... (i don't have any definite examples handy, and I have no time to dig through the books at present, but unless my memory is TOTALLY faulty, it's there..... c

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:

> George Thompson wrote:
>
> Tb wrote of Emily Dickinson that:
>
> ...she didn't live in a world she was against....
>
> I'm not so sure about this. If you mean that she didn't live in that world I would agree: she didn't [she lived in a little room upstairs]. If you mean that she wasn't against it, I think that you'd be completely wrong: for she was as against it as they come, and all of her work says so, don't you think?
>
> I do not agree--she did not write "against"
> but created "for" ---I am simply
> saying also that I'm "against" others
> using her (or otehrs) to promote
> an ideology the /she > did not share. You can't just > read the work and say "look--
> here she's writing against the role
> of women and marriage"
>
> she was an occult
> writer--writing
> to a certain "self" that was > surely not the politics of the day--
> but rather .....

↑ Index

644. daniel bouchard
Re: Party
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Chris,

What time does the party start and how many ROOF BOOKS will you have for sale? Shall I bring a banana for Hannah? A salami for Tommy?

Does everyone eat when they come to your house?

- db

At 03:20 PM 7/23/98 -0400, louis stroffolino wrote:
> Just wanted to remind people again that I and Gary Sullivan are > having a roof party (not to be confused with ROOF BOOKS; though > people with ROOF BOOKS are invited) tomorrow night. Friday 7/24...
> We will be UNDER the roof it it rains.....in Brooklyn, NY....
> Anybody in the NYC area (or "just visiting") is welcome to > attend. Backchannel for directions, etc.....
> chris stroffolino
>
<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

645. Michael Magee
Re: DICKINSON
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Poem #199 - "I'm Wife - I've finshed that" - is one that backs you up Chris - anyone who deson't see how this can be read as a vitriolic deconstruction of the institution of marriage doesn't know how to read. -m.

According to louis stroffolino: >
> I am ABSOLUTELY SURE that Dickinson has at least some poems > that pretty blatantly (and more that do it more subtly) write > AGAINST the society woman role, and marriage. Sure, they are > also FOR something, but it's not always just the occult.....

> (i don't have any definite examples handy, and I have no > time to dig through the books at present, but unless my memory > is TOTALLY faulty, it's there.....
> c
>
> On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:
>
> > George Thompson wrote:
> > >
> > > Tb wrote of Emily Dickinson that:
> > >
> > > >...she didn't live in a world she was against....
> > > >
> > >
> > > I'm not so sure about this. If you mean that she didn't live in that world
> > > I would agree: she didn't [she lived in a little room upstairs]. If you > > > mean that she wasn't against it, I think that you'd be completely wrong:
> > > for she was as against it as they come, and all of her work says so, don't > > > you think?
> > >
> > >
> > I do not agree--she did not write "against"
> > but created "for" ---I am simply > > saying also that I'm "against" others
> > using her (or otehrs) to promote > > an ideology the /she > > did not share. You can't just > > read the work and say "look-- > > here she's writing against the role > > of women and marriage"
> >
> > she was an occult
> > writer--writing
> > to a certain "self" that was > > surely not the politics of the day--
> > but rather .....
> >
>

↑ Index

646. Henry g
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Courtesy of Andrew Epstein -

----------Original message----------

The Dickinson line, in case it was bugging you -- "Publication -- is the Auction/ Of the Mind of Man --" and it ends "reduce no Human Spirit/ To Disgrace of Price--" (#709)

↑ Index

647. Christopher W. Alexander wiggling fare-thee-well query
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Hi everyone -- getting ready to set nomail for my last (for awhile) trip out to San Francisco; if anybody needs to reach me in the next few days, you can backchannel me at my "iname.com" address (below). I can't promise I'll see it, but it's worth a shot.
oh, and does anybody know what-the-hell time is the Susan Schultz reading (sunday) at Canessa Park!?

c h r i s

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

email: [redacted] / [redacted]
snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

648. Laura E. Wright
Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

I had to get something in with this subject title, so:

1)
Safdie Joseph wrote:

> toddbaron said (in replying to a post from Linda Russo):

> you are absolutle and correct!

I've always wanted to be absolutle(there is nothing more delightful than a good typo)

2)
Why should ANY OF US APOLOGIZE?

> And furthermore . . . how can it BE that NOBODY cares if a fucking POET is A MEMBER OF THE FBI!!!

Well, then, why should we apologize if he (Jeff Clark, I believe was the suspected agent) were? But, as this question keeps reappearing, I doubt he really is, any more than I am the captain of the Naropa football team*.

*Naropa's athletics program consists of yoga, tai chi, aikido, and african dance.

3)
Who one is does matter to the extent it shapes how one writes. But _what_ one is -- does this matter?

NOBODY
--
aka
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
    *   *   *   *   *   *

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

<HTML>
I had to get something in with this subject title, so:

<P>1)

Safdie Joseph wrote:
<BLOCKQUOTE TYPE=CITE>toddbaron said (in replying to a post from Linda Russo):

<P>you are absolutle and correct!

 </BLOCKQUOTE>

I've always wanted to be absolutle(there is nothing more delightful than a good typo)

<P>2)

<I>Why should ANY OF US APOLOGIZE?</I> <BLOCKQUOTE TYPE=CITE>

<P>And furthermore . . . how can it BE that NOBODY cares if a fucking POET

is A MEMBER OF THE FBI!!!
 </BLOCKQUOTE> Well, then, why should we apologize if he (Jeff Clark, I believe was the suspected agent) were? But, as this question keeps reappearing, I doubt he really is, any more than I am the captain of the Naropa football team*.

<P>*Naropa's athletics program consists of yoga, tai chi, aikido, and african dance.

<P>3)

Who one is does matter to the extent it shapes how one writes. But what one is -- does this matter?

<P>NOBODY

--

aka

Laura Wright

Library Assistant

Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute

2130 Arapahoe Ave

Boulder, CO 80302

[redacted]

 * * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan

     *
*
*   *
*
*

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

 </HTML>

----------AECCBC83C78BC5AECB98AF9A--

↑ Index

649. Charles Bernstein
Re: Poetry Daily Website
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Dear Rae,

I should be around, just back from Buffalo and also just about to leave for Buffalo, as usual!

I think your best best is James: it is rarely at his place over the weekend.

[redacted] is his work email, which I think he will get sooner that his home email.

If that doesn't work, let me know.

Since one of the characteristics of electronic textual space is that there is no real scarsity of "space" -- it wouldn't cost anything more to post your whole poem, then the Poetry Daily thing is even more odd. Anyway, I had never heard of the site till Ron mentioned it --

Love,

Charles

↑ Index

650. dbkk
CS Giscombe directory assistance
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Hi this is Dodie. I'm trying to reach CS Giscombe. Does anybody have a phone number or e-mail address for him they could backchannel me?

Thanks.

↑ Index

651. Linda Russo
Re: postwomen+ (or is not equal to) speculative equations
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Back to Elizabeth's fecund post:

www.pfplayground.com

I felt I was dismissive of POSTFEMINIST PLAYGROUND -- which I honestly hadn't looked at for quite a while -- great graphics!, very smart with a current essay by DODIE BELLAMY that's cool. Part of what IS attractive is the "no more victims/no more apologies" angle. But I really felt when I'd met Lily James and Susannah Breslin (at a Conference (of all places) over 2 years ago), who were powerful presences, that they were sort of forging onward somewhat narrowly. PFPlayground has grown into something major & I appreciate they're grappling with Post-Femininsm, though it's not quite what I have in mind . . .

Elizabeth, as the archives aren't arranged by author, what's the shortcut to some of your stuff?

HINT: Don't click the PLAYBOY seal of approval ("playboy online's pick of the day") because once you go there you're TRAPPED (cyberly, not psychologically)

On Tue, 21 Jul 1998, Elizabeth Treadwell wrote: > Is there a possibility of an ungendered poetics, even if it is something its > possible to work toward or to see others as working toward? I mean if > you're looking in terms of gender, won't you see gender?

I hope so but doubt it, and Yes, most definately. The world we live in is so gendered, & though there's a lot of wonderful blurriness, there's still those two extremes. Am I referring to "man & wife"? or Christian Fundamentalism and The Gap?

> PLAY is key to this -- perhaps we are now more free to PLAY -- to speculate, to speculate on speculations,...- than in the 50s or the Victorian era or whenever, with GENDER AS AN IDEA, construction, etc.....The motifs of our clothing. Maybe we are just now more able to have FUN (or if you prefer: imagination). I don't mean this dumbly, I mean not having to spend so much energy "to not be swept up and violated, (& also) to avoid generating counterviolence as its tool of self-being".

Good points about having more freedom to mess around in the symbolic, so to speak. But I find the play-only attitude (pfp's primary attitude) to be a little shortsighted and breezy. Maybe I'm just getting old. I mean their use of breasty characters may be ironic, funny, or empowering, but I still feel like the mass of those images, while creating a ambiguous message (are they sexy? are they coming on to ME? they're just drawings! Is that Angie Dickinson?!), are, well, like too much -- feels to much like oppression! advertising! I don't "identify" with those images. . . what's wrong with me. I mean I just can't strike such an ironic posture towards them as they do towards me. Maybe they're supposed to make me feel "uncomfortable"?

More ->

> I do CLAIM writing as a woman, writing as a "girl", writing about that, > engaging in that. Proud of that, then bored by it, etc. Its constantly > ENACTED isnt it, along with ten dozen (or a few) other Big Things....
> I like it, writing as a WOMAN, thnking about Women. However I of course > don't want to be 'marginalized' either, or not taken seriously, or taken > seriously in only one way.
> (But of course it happens...to everyone) misreading is so key aint it > intriguin/

>
> I do like Linda read many more women than men.
>
> Why? I think my next point might speak to it at least in some way.
. . .
>
> Linda wrote:
> >> And another question:
> >> How can forms be "masculine" when, though, they were
> >> "created" by men, they were done (usually) intensely in relation to
> >> "woman" (no matter how facile and passive his construction of her?)
>
> Simon wrote:
> >I think you've sort of answered your own question here;
> >with a basic idea of how poets create -- through a combination > >of observation and language -- there seems to be no reason > >that the Poetics of the "male gaze" (yadda, yadda) would > >bear any relation to that that might be written by a woman.
> >
> >The question of moving the love poem away from "constructions > >of the self" is another part of this; it's not what you see,
> >it's how. One doesn't expect an 18th gynecologist and a 20th > >century midwife to concur in their visions of a woman; the > >difference would arise from the point of view of a third person.
> >"Gynceological", "Masculine", is how we label them.
>
> Here I can't agree. I think the "Poetics of a male gaze" does bear relation > to that that might be written by a woman. Here and now. From childhood, > books with first person male narrators, looking at movies, whatever: the > woman not only sees 'herself' ('itself') in 'the male gaze', but sees as > the male gaze, or self-gaze, or whatever. It's like the beginning of "The > Bluest Eye".
>
> & of course there are responses to gender oppression and disequilibrium in > the work of some high profile male poets, as someone wrote, this strikes me > as having gone on since the beginning of time. whether they were aware of > it in our current jargon or not, and no matter what kind of personality or > politic or wife-treatment they lived in. isn't even creating something in a > way responding to it? I think so.

I'd like to see someone else (Simon?) respond to this. I agree more or less > Waldrop problematizes the whole issue by bringing up the political implications of a formal stance ("old school feminism"?) and then retracts them from discussion by noting that she was working on "a formal problem". At the risk of breaking Adorno's dictum and paraphrasing a philosophical stance, is Waldorf coming out and saying that certain formal modes where, for e.g., "subject and object function are not fixed", are essentially gendered? That there is some occult connection between the female body and language? How can a feminist poetics, as you say, be potentially "unconcerned" with gender? Isn't gender the sine qua non? Or is it just the starting point? From there, to where does it go?

>
> *as perhaps one of the "theoretically apathetic" I would like to note that in the quote from Waldrop, she first states "I was interested in extending the boundaries of the sentence" then says "it comes out of my feminist preoccupation" [this quote is 20 yrs old] and then says this is all hindsight, "Consciously, I was working on a formal problem." So it seems to me that she was interested in form, whilst of course being aware of herself as a woman/feminist and in the world as such. I don't think gender is the starting point or the only point, i think she is merely using it as a way in to explain something, as TRACTION, and then of course there are all these other conscious and unconscious things, RETRACTION.....*

Actually, that quote is only 10 years old, but still "hindsight" -- foremost was the formal problem, the hindsight is her realization that the tackling that particular formal problem WAS related to her gender.

See you soon, Elizabeth . . .

↑ Index

652. Katherine Lederer
Re: Party
Thu 23 Jul 1998

Hi Chris--

I want directions! From 108th and B'way (1,2,3, and 9 trains to which transfers?)...

See ya--
Katy

↑ Index

653. toddbaron
Re: post-Fem/For you Guys too
Thu 23 Jul 1998

George Thompson wrote:
>
> Tb wrote of Emily Dickinson that:
>
> >...she didn't live in a world she was against....
> >
>
> I'm not so sure about this. If you mean that she didn't live in that world
> I would agree: she didn't [she lived in a little room upstairs]. If you > mean that she wasn't against it, I think that you'd be completely wrong:
> for she was as against it as they come, and all of her work says so, don't > you think?
>
>
I do not agree--she did not write "against"
but created "for" ---I am simply saying also that I'm "against" others
using her (or otehrs) to promote an ideology the /she did not share. You can't just read the work and say "look-- here she's writing against the role
of women and marriage"

she was an occult
writer--writing
to a certain "self" that was surely not the politics of the day-- but rather .....

↑ Index

654. R M Daley
Re: Party
Thu 23 Jul 1998

---

hey people, stop fucking up the list with these backchannels

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Katherine Lederer wrote:

> Hi Chris--

> I want directions! From 108th and B'way (1,2,3, and 9 trains to which transfers?)...
>
> See ya--
> Katy

↑ Index

655. Elizabeth Treadwell

Re: POETICS Digest - 21 Jul 1998 to 22 Jul 1998 (#1998-9)

Thu 23 Jul 1998

"I can't get out of this poem
it's Your poem
you're making me make it this way
it's us, this poem is alive
even if it's ugly or I'm dead
it's the City of You even if you aren't 'in it'"

_Alice Notley, ms, in the MOVING BORDERS anthology

ET

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

656. Karen Kelley

Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS (relavant to Russo/bAron etc. discussion)

Thu 23 Jul 1998

I recently read something of Yau's in a mag--was it First Intensity? I'm sorry--I can't recall, but it was perhaps from the new book & was the narrative of a stripper & I found it rather disturbing in that the narrator was kind of dumb & angry & thought highly of her breasts (no prob with that in & of itself) & little of men in general--she was kind of a jaded line drawing of a woman--with the interior monolog of a stereotype, which I suppose is okay, though as this thread goes to show, the whole male/female or masc/fem question is much more complex than Yau's piece implied, and I guess I just felt annoyed that he was willing to throw another stereotype my way.

louis stroffolino wrote:

> Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
> In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
> that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
> "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
> in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
> a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
> and negotiating the representational anxieties that
> might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
> but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
> chris stroffolino
>
> On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:
>
> Rah rah.
>
> I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the
> "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the > original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as > an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I > have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).
>
> I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so
> many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some > appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other
> 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc.
> -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in > patriarchal biases.
>
> But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting
> more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing
> experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what > Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist
> realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that > gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the > counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop
> stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the > Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!
>
> Until we get some intelligent conversation going
> to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship)
> we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it > isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it
> made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)
>
> Todd's comeback:

> being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..) gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
>
> never impersonal.
>
> Tb

↑ Index

657. toddbaron

Re: pen(is)essesss post-Fem/For you Guys too

Thu 23 Jul 1998

---

isn't football played with the foot?

isn't that an absolute?

Laura E. Wright wrote:
>
> I had to get something in with this subject title, so:
>
> 1)
> Safdie Joseph wrote:
>
> toddbaron said (in replying to a post from Linda Russo):
>
> you are absolutle and correct!
>
>
> I've always wanted to be absolutle(there is nothing more delightful > than a good typo)

>
> 2)
> Why should ANY OF US APOLOGIZE?
>
> And furthermore . . . how can it BE that NOBODY cares if a > fucking POET
> is A MEMBER OF THE FBI!!!
>
>
> Well, then, why should we apologize if he (Jeff Clark, I believe was > the suspected agent) were? But, as this question keeps reappearing, I > doubt he really is, any more than I am the captain of the Naropa > football team*.
>
> *Naropa's athletics program consists of yoga, tai chi, aikido, and > african dance.
>
> 3)
> _Who_ one is does matter to the extent it shapes how one writes. But > _what_ one is -- does this matter?
>
> NOBODY
> --
> aka
> Laura Wright
> Library Assistant
> Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
> 2130 Arapahoe Ave
> Boulder, CO 80302
> [redacted]
> * * * * * *
> "All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
> * * * * * *
> "It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein
>

↑ Index

658. toddbaron
I will not stand undressed for use!
Thu 23 Jul 1998

714

Rests at Night
The Sun from shining, Nature--and some Men-- Rests at Noon--some Men-- While Nature
And the Sun--go on--

E.D. (1863)

↑ Index

659. Orpheus adam Dalgliesh
Fri 24 Jul 1998

A poet who is cop. Saves the good from the bad. Nice combo.
Thanks to PD James. Why not? And why not poets who who are patriarchal, monarchists;
Dostoevski - at the end years, a believer in the Orthodox.
Why the assumption that poets must believe in feminisms, or be non-patriarchal. Poets, can be anything they want.
Long as they write poetry. They don't need or have to justify anything . The rest is about being a citizen.

Besides , who says Patriarchy is bad?

What is wrong with the Father?

That is not wrong with the Mother?
Joyce, from the evidence one gathers inthe Wake, was a catholic, a patriarch, and indeed a fine and great writer.

'Et tant d'autres et tant d'autres.'

and please dont say Dostoevski was not a poet,

just because he wrote novels.

That means Joyce was not a poet.

O yes I realize that Finnegans Wake is different.

I like the last word 'the'

↑ Index

660. Orpheus
who
Fri 24 Jul 1998

---

who was it said: the unexamined life is not worth living?

like wise: the unexamined assumptions.

For over 30 years the Papa has been attacked in one shape form or another.

fair enough. But now the tables are turning.

"the best lack all conviction, while the worst/are filled with passionate intensity."

So one sees the poetics built so far onto a political need to 'justify' [a disgusting practice which smacks of protestant secular thought'] one's position, that the poetry has gone off the deep end of a reterritorialized liberalism.

it is very sad to know that eliot's poems were kept out of Poems for the Millennium because of financial constraints.

Jack Spicer is also missing from Volume 2.

↑ Index

661. Orpheus
poetics/patriarchy
Fri 24 Jul 1998

---

the epistemes required a fiction which stood en place for centuries....

so imagine a patriarchy which is poetic anarchic and rather like ancient ireland's society of ollav orders...

but not a denial of the Father.
But Anna Livia crying as she sailflows back into her Papa Sea

as Writing Precedes speech so with the father.

if we change the biology then perhaps we can change the order of the epistemes on levels which would allow a poetry of the city, of the body.

Of 'Unreal City'
and

L'Homme Approximatif

the inexact word,

the almost almosting body

each change produces and requires monstrosities.

Oh Wonderful monstrosities of mothers and fathers!!

↑ Index

662. toddbaron
Re: POETICS Digest - 21 Jul 1998 to 22 Jul 1998 (#1998-9)
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Elizabeth Treadwell wrote:
>
> "I can't get out of this poem
> it's Your poem
> you're making me make it this way
> it's us, this poem is alive
> even if it's ugly or I'm dead
> it's the City of You even if you aren't 'in it'"
>
> _Alice Notley, ms, in the MOVING BORDERS anthology
>

He began my creation with constraint,
By giving me life he added only confusion;
We depart reluctantly still not knowing
The aim of birth, existence, departure.

(second Rubiya: Omar Khayyam)
>

↑ Index

663. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Sermounts
Fri 24 Jul 1998

-

Sermon on the Mount by Jennifer

The Real is so stupid and Insignificant, I am saying under the sign of Clement Rosset do you know him? That it is inert, dull, repetitious and Full of our Meanderings. So that We do not Face Face, that is a Moment of what might be a Considerable grain, have you looked at Face up close and then Wondered how your Theories fall apart in the Proof? Because I cannot Do this for too Long, this Look at the Up-Close Face, I mean the first Thing you Notice are Pores and other Holes everywhere There and in the Middle of such Hairs as you will never See at a Distance. So is that an Unknown Horror to Dream of and not to Disparage as you might on a fair Day from a Distance. You will know what I mean. It is never or Nary a Code, Nary or Never a Discourse, when you are that Close that it is as if the Bed left Marks impervious. I am Talking to You. Those impervious Marks. You will look at Stains up close, why there are Stains on this very Chair upon which I am sitting, Leaks from my Panties, you will know how Stupid the real is, you can almost Smell it. Up Close Like a Gulliver wandering, then I know you will Know the World which is what Surrounds you. Then and Precisely then, When you can Speak, Then you Will be ushered into Silence, nary a Thing to Say. Thus I might say from a Distance, you will have been Done to by the World, but you must Know, if the Last Thing, it is of your Doing.

Sermon on the Mound by Jennifer

The Cock is so stupid and Insignificant, I am saying under the sign of Catherine Clement do you know her? That it is inert, repetitious and Full of our Meanderings. So that We do not Talk Cock, that is a Moment of what might be a Considerable grain, have you looked at Cock up close and then Wondered how your Theories fall apart in the Proof? Because I cannot Do this for too Long, this Look at the Up-Close Cock, I mean the first Thing you Notice are Pores and other Holes everywhere There and in the Middle of such Hairs as you will never See in Perversion. So is that an Unknown Horror to Dream of and not to Disparage as you might on a fair Day in Perversion. You will know what I mean. It is never or Nary a Cunt, Nary or Never a Discourse, when you are that Close that it is as if the Bed left Marks impervious. I am Talking to You. Those impervious Marks. You will look at Stains up close, why there are Stains on this very Chair upon which I am sitting, Leaks from my Panties, you will know how Hardness the Twat is, you can almost Smell it. Up Close Like a Gulliver wandering, then I know you will Know the World which is what Surrounds you. Then and Precisely then, When you can Speak, Then you Will be ushered into Silence, nary a Thing to Say. Thus I might say from Perversion, you will have been Bound by the World, but you must Know, if the Last Thing, it is of your Doing.

↑ Index

664. George Bowering
Re: oulipo
Fri 24 Jul 1998

I have not heard of recent Oulipo meetings. Outside of writings by Mathews etc. the latest newsy thing I remember is Warren Motte's Primer published by Nebraska in about 1986.

Of course, if one keeps track of what the Atlas people are publishing, that's about the best one can do.

As to female members--one always notices their absence. Perhaps this is due to the relatively (until recently) small percentage of women interested in being mathematicians.

There is/was a member named Michele Metail. I dont know whether that first name is French or Italian.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

665. david bromige
rew : adam dalgleish
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Nice endrun Orpheus. It takes a village to crucify its poet. Not the scatter we know. I Tiresias have foresuffered all. Once the Imagination is opened, who knows what flies out? Oops. At the dentist's today, the woman cleaning my teeth had several rumbles thru her body, and finally apologized. I said "I thought you were talking to me in code." One may suffer clitoris-envy, and still imagine having a penis. When I'm walking uphill, I wish the world were flat. Adam Dalgleish is a wimp. Thats what makes him attractive. Brahms.

↑ Index

666. david bromige
who
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Socrates.

↑ Index

667. david bromige
poetics/patriarchy
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Emerging from the Unconscious of Civilization in our day is the entire gendering of power-abuse and unlevel playing fields. I appreciate yr application of a logic to dismember this problem but it wont go away. Neither by waving one's lily nor by cutting it off can one avoid the Penis Wars. The penis (phallus, I guess) is the first offense. The inequity starts there, whether it's a burden or an advantage. "He pulled her down with his muscles." Just as was expected. The tact required is extensive and really only realizable one-on-one (and even then . . .). Dont you really think? I hugely wish we could keep the personal out of the poetry, so it could personally be _me_ not Emily Dickinson or TSE. But why didnt Eliot get his double hernia fixed? Doesnt that detail open his poetry to a fuller reading, a fuller recoil? Poetry problematizes vividly the insolubles of this firkin existence. With Beckett one wants an elegant absence of exit to be one's exit but tomorrow someone will be in yr face, dammit. No wonder all these pretty poems avoid the issue. Cash in on the issue. Skirt. I'm with you Orpheus in yr Underground but I want you to stop looking back. Is the light at the end of the tunnel, the tunnel? How about "Che faro senza Eurydice"? In Room 101, we can be disabused of that sort of love. In Room 101. What was Orwell's problem with rats? Kids keep them as pets. I know a poet who shot them at the city dump. He was a good poet (naif disingenuous statement).

D.Broadbent.

↑ Index

668. Douglas
Re: queries
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Maria, accordingly to my editor, Guy Bennett an Oulipo group (new and old) still meet in Paris quite often and read their work.

Douglas

Maria Damon wrote:
>
> are there surviving members of the Oulipo group and do they still meet in > paris? inquiring minds need to know

↑ Index

669. Robert D'Attilio
Re: Party
Fri 24 Jul 1998

---

dan
this is my first day on the buffalo listserv. I imagine that you have received the entire mess also. Is this typical of what goes on? or is this there a nonsense filter somewhere? If I get so many useless messages eachday I think I shall dissappear myself.
saluti
r d'a
where is the marty? In NYC?

↑ Index

670. Rachel Loden
Your friend E Dickinson
Fri 24 Jul 1998

. . .

Your second letter surprised me, and for a moment, swung - I had not supposed it. Your first - gave no dishonor, because the True - are not ashamed - I thanked you for your justice - but could not drop the Bells whose jingling cooled my Tramp - Perhaps the Balm, seemed better, because you bled me, first.

I smile when you suggest that I delay "to publish" - that being foreign to my thought, as Firmament to Fin -

If fame belonged to me, I could not escape her - if she did not, the longest day would pass me on the chase - and the approbation of my Dog, would forsake me - then - My Barefoot Rank is better -

You think my gait "spasmodic" - I am in danger - Sir -

You think me "uncontrolled" - I have no Tribunal.

Would you have time to be the "friend" you should think I need? I have a little shape - it would not crowd your Desk - nor make much Racket as the Mouse, that dents your Galleries -

If I might bring you what I do - not so frequent to trouble you - and ask you if I told it clear - 't would be control to me -

The Sailor cannot see the North - but knows the Needle can -

The "hand you stretch me in the Dark," I put mine in, and turn away - I have no Saxon now -

. . .

But, will you be my Preceptor, Mr Higginson?

↑ Index

671. KENT JOHNSON
(Fwd) On the SAWSJ Conference and After
Fri 24 Jul 1998

I thought some on the List would be interested in this information from Scholars, Artists and Writers for Social Justice, including the report below on the SAWSJ founding conference. (website is www.sage.edu.)

Kent

------- Forwarded Message Follows ------- Date: Tue, 9 Jun 1998 13:14:16 -0400 (EDT)
From: J Saws <[redacted]>
To: SAWSJ Information List <> Subject: On the SAWSJ Conference and After

SAWSJ INFORMATION LIST

CONTENTS

I. Introduction to This List
II. A Report on The National Labor Teach-In and First Annual Meeting of Scholars, Artists and Writers for Social Justice
III. List of the SAWSJ Coordinating Committee Members
IV. Radio Documentary on SAWSJ Conference
V. The SAWSJ Constitution as Ratified at the National Conference.
VI. How to Join SAWSJ

_____

I. INTRODUCTION TO THIS LIST

During the month or so since the Scholars, Artists, and Writers for Social Justice Conference in Washington, DC, the new Coordinating Committee has begun the process of reorganizing SAWSJ along the lines of the new Consitution. At this point the CC has asked me to set up this SAWSJ information list on an experimental basis. The goal of this list is to encourage communication nationally among people -- whether SAWSJ members or not -- working to rebuild the alliance between artists and intellectuals on the one hand, and the multicultural workers' movement on the other. The names and addresses on this list have been compiled from several e-mail lists that SAWSJ developed during its first year. There are THREE PROBLEMS with the present list as it stands: 1. It does not yet include the addresses of those who signed on at the national conference -- apologies. 2. There may be people who are on the list who do not want to receive the list messages. If this is the case for you, again, our apologies -- please write a short message in reply to this one asking to be removed, and it will be done immediately. 3. There are undoubtedly people who aren't on this list who would like to join. Please ask anyone in this situation to e-mail us at the above address, and they will be added. As listed in "Contents" above, this message contains three documents relating to the recent SAWSJ conference. More information on the conference and on SAWSJ in general is available on the SAWSJ web site at http://www.sage.edu/html/SAWSJ (the last five letters MUST be upper case).

In solidarity,
Andor Skotnes

II. A REPORT ON THE NATIONAL LABOR TEACH-IN AND FIRST ANNUAL MEETING OF SAWSJ, By Michael Denning and Steve Fraser for the SAWSJ Coordinating Committee

SAWSJ organized a national teach-in on "Democracy and the Right to Organize" and convened its first annual meeting over the weekend of April 24-26 at George Washington University in Washington, D.C. It was a high energy event of great promise. The vital work of taking on Corporate America by mobilizing the academic and cultural communities in alliance with the revitalized labor movement was carried a giant step forward by the doings at GWU. Approximately 600 people assembled on the opening (Friday) night to hear a diverse array of speakers. Julian Bond's presence as Moderator for the evening was inspirational. His heroic role as a civil rights leader helped establish the critical political and historic connections that make the "Right to Organize" not only a vital issue for the labor movement, but for all movements for social justice. Three local organizers - Betty Dumas of the Avondale Shipyards in New Orleans; Juan Mazlymian, an abstestos worker from New York City; and Jonathan White, an organizer of adjunct teachers at GWU - delivered compelling accounts from the front lines about how imperilled the right to organize has become. John Sweeney, President of the AFL-CIO, reiterated the Federation's warm support for the work of SAWSJ, explaining how welcome the teach-in movement has been in arousing public alarm over what he called "the Nike economy". Juliet Schor of Harvard University emphasized the "time famine" which is putting both work and family life under unbearable stress, arguing the need for SAWSJ to take up the battle against the corporate seizure of "free time." Robin Kelley of New York University, while acknowledging the importance of SAWSJ's link to the labor movement, urged the organization to embrace more actively the struggle against racism and other social injustices. UCLA and Columbia University Law Professor Kimberle Crenshaw focused her remarks on the concept of "intersectionality"; namely the need, both intellectual and political, to explore the connections between gender, race, and class. Writer and editor, Steve Fraser, spoke on behalf of SAWSJ, rehearsing the history of the organization since the Columbia teach-in of 1996 (there have been over 30 teach-ins since then), and sketching SAWSJ's broadest principles and purposes as it goes about the work of helping build a new culture of solidarity. Saturday began with two series of panels and workshops. About 350 people circulated through an opening set of thematic panels: the future of the teamsters, labor and political action, organizing the south, organizing and the law, labor and social movements, anti-labor legislation, lawsuits and ballot initiatives, international organizing, and adjunct and graduate teacher organizing. A second set of "activist workshops" followed: organizing cultural workers, academic support for unions, academic labor, the anti-sweatshop campaign, student labor action, welfare and workfare, the work of the Economic Policy Institute, and Metro Washington alliances. Discussion in both panels and workshops was intellectually vigorous, marked by a respect for the concrete, and permeated by a sense of the potential for SAWSJ to grow and accomplish much politically over the next months and years. That sense of down-to-earth possiblity continued into the first session of the SAWSJ annual meeting which took place Saturday afternoon. Reports from all the "activist" workshops laid out a series of practical suggestions about how to further the alliance between SAWSJ and the labor movement. This first business session was also well attended - about 150 people. There was a shared sense that SAWSJ needs to concentrate during this next year on organizing local SAWSJ chapters and creating "activist networks" across chapters to mobilize around a broad range of issues: sweatshops, workfare, campus labor, and so on. The afternoon ended with a showing and discussion of two films: "Out at Work" - a documentary about sexual identity and representation in the workplace; and "Degrees of Shame" - a film about the plight of adjuncts in the university. SAUSAGES then spent the night partying at a local club, entertained by the band Bones of Contention together with guest poets and musicians. The final session on Sunday morning was devoted to adopting a constitution and organizational structure for SAWSJ. After some discussion and minor amendment, the draft constitution was approved: it is published on the SAWSJ website at http://www.sage.edu/html/SAWSJ. A National Coordinating Committee of 8 persons was elected, charged with operational responsibility for SAWSJ in between meetings of a larger Steering Committee, a body to be created over the next year. The members of the Coordinating Committee are Dan Clawson, Michael Denning, Dorothy Fennell, Steve Fraser, Adam Green, Jenny Lee, Margaret Levi, and Jamal Watson; their email addresses are available on the SAWSJ website. WBAI Pacifica Radio's "Building Bridges: Your Community and Labor Report" has produced an 58-minute program based on the teach-in which is available for your local college, independent or NPR radio station. For information about the May 18 downlink or for audio tape call Pacifica: [redacted] X 266, Mark Torres, or see the notice on this website. It is now available in RealAudio on the "Building Bridges" website, which can be reached from the SAWSJ website. While both the teach-in and the first annual meeting must be accounted successes, the real future of SAWSJ depends entirely on the energy and activity at the local level. We urge all of you to take the intitiatve to inaugurate a SAWSJ chapter where you live or work or go to school. We can help with advice and contacts and explain the rather simple relationship between a local chapter and the national organization. But the future of SAWSJ is in your hands. HELP BUILD THE NEW CULTURE OF SOLIDARITY! _____

III. SAWSJ 1998-99 COORDINATING COMMITTEE MEMBERS

Dan Clawson, University of Massachusetts
Michael Denning, Yale University
Dorothy Fennell, Cornell Industrial & Labor Relations
Steven Fraser, writer and editor
Adam Green, Northwestern University
Margaret Levi, University of Washington
Jenny Stevens, student activist
Jamal Watson, Baltimore Sun

_____

IV. WBAI RADIO DOCUMENTARY ON THE SAWSJ CONFERENCE -- ON THE AIR, ON TAPE, AND ON THE WEB

WBAI Pacifica Radio's "BUILDING BRIDGES: Your Community and Labor Report" has produced a 58-minute radio show on the SAWSJ Labor Teach-in, "Democracy and the Right to Organize." The program is being broadcast in the New York City area and around the country -- over 20 stations are broadcasting it so far. BUILDING BRIDGES is produced by Mimi Rosenberg and Ken Nash. BUILDING BRIDGES has also received a grant from the AFL-CIO to subsidize 40 public and college radio stations to receive a copy of the tape for broadcast and to uplink the show over the NPR satellite. The Pacifica Network will make tapes available to radio stations through the Pacifica Archives and will uplink the show to its affiliates through its Ku band satellite uplink. There are thus several ways for college and public radio stations to receive the program for broadcast. Contact your college or public radio stations and lobby them to get the tape of the conference and put it on their air. Individuals may also purchase the tape from the Pacifica Archives. WBAI has also put the SAWSJ documentary on its web site in RealAudio. The url for the documentary is: http://www.igc.org/wbai-labor/rightorg.htm You can also access this through a link on the SAWSJ web site http://www.sage.edu/html/SAWSJ

SELECTIONS FROM THE DOCUMENTARY INCLUDE: *John Sweeney, President of the AFL-CIO on the degradation of workers in the "Nike economy" and how have no rights in the workplace without unions. *Julian Bond, Chair of the NAACP Board of Directors on the maldistribution of wealth in the economy, and the need for workers to organize and form coalitions between labor and civil rights organizations for social change. *Betty Dumas, an Avondale Shipyard Worker from New Orleans tells her story of being fired and then arrested for organizing. *Kate Bronfenbrenner, Professor at Cornell's School of Industrial and Labor Relations tells of the lawsuit filed against her by Beverley Nursing Homes as a result of her Congressional testimony about their unfair labor practices. *Richard Bersinger, Director of Organizing, AFL-CIO. *Elaine Bernard, Director of Harvard's Trade Union Studies Program on campus based protests over sweatshops here and abroad. *Ken Paff, Director of Teamsters for a Democratic Union talks about the history of organizing for democreacy in the Teamster Union and the bid for the Teamster Presidency by James Hoffa, Jr. _____

V. SAWSJ CONSTITUTION, Ratified Sunday , April 26, 1998

Article I: NAME

The name of this association shall be "Scholars, Artists, and Writers for Social Justice" (SAWSJ).

Article II: PURPOSES

To assist: in reshaping the nation's political culture and fostering the growth of a vibrant, progressive, multicultural working-class movement; in shaping the terms of political debate and contesting corporate dominance of politics and culture; in restoring the mutually empowering relationship between the labor movement and its allies in the academic and cultural communities, and reassessing their places in a changing world. Article III: MEMBERS

Any person who agrees with the purposes outlined in Article II may become a member of SAWSJ upon payment of the dues established.

Article IV: DUES

Section 1: Dues levels

Annual dues shall be paid according to the following schedule:

Student/low income: $10 per year

Others with incomes below $40,000: $25 per year

Those with incomes of $40,000 or above: $40 per year

Section 2: Modifications Said dues may be modified in any given year by vote of the Steering Committee, provided that the change of dues for any member is not made effective until the end of that member's membership year.

Section 3: Allocation of dues money If a member is recruited by a chapter, the new member may request that 25 percent of the dues be allocated to the chapter. If a member is recruited by a regional organization, the new member may request that 25 percent of the dues be allocated to the region. Members may designate money to both chapter and regional organizations, in which case only 50 percent of their dues will be for the national organization. If members do not explicitly designate money for the chapter or region, all dues will be for the national organization.

Article V: CHAPTERS

Chapters shall consist of any geographically based group of 10 or more members who constitute themselves as a chapter and plan or carry out a collective action or project. Chapters may take positions, issue statements and endorsements in their own name, but not in the name of the regional or national organization. Each chapter shall be entitled to elect one representative to the steering committee. Article VI: REGIONS The Steering Committee may determine the geographic boundaries of regions, up to a maximum of six regions. Regions shall consist of geographically based groups of 100 or more members who constitute themselves as a region and hold a meeting, conference, or action open to all members of the region. Regions may take positions, issue statements and endorsements in their own name, but not in the name of the national organization. Each region shall be entitled to elect two representatives to the steering committee. Regions may, by a majority vote of the membership, decide on such regional officers and governance procedures as they deem appropriate, subject to acceptance and certification by the Steering Committee.

Article VII: ACTIVIST NETWORKS

Activist networks shall consist of any group of 10 or more members, united by an interest in an issue, who constitute themselves as an activist network and plan or carry out a collective action or project. Activist networks may take positions, issue statements and endorsements in their own name, but not in the name of the regional or national organization. Each activist network shall be entitled to elect one representative to the steering committee.

Article VIII: ANNUAL MEETING

SAWSJ shall hold a meeting, open to all members, at least once each year, to discuss issues of common concern, debate and vote on resolutions, and elect leadership. A vote open to the entire membership shall be the highest decision making authority of the organization.

Article IX: STEERING COMMITTEE

Section 1: Composition

The Steering Committee shall consist of elected Chapter Representatives, elected Activist Network Representatives, elected Regional Representatives, national officers, and elected members of the Coordinating Committee.

Section 2: Terms of Service Members of the Steering Committee shall serve terms of two years and may be re-nominated and re-elected, except that during the first year the Steering Committee shall, by random lot, designate half its members for one-year terms, in order to provide staggered terms thereafter.

Section 3: Meetings The Steering Committee shall meet at least once each year, and may, by decision of the Steering Committee or the Coordinating Committee, meet more frequently. Meetings of the Steering Committee shall be announced in advance, and all members of SAWSJ shall be able to attend and observe meetings, unless by a two-thirds vote the Steering Committee decides to go into executive session.

Section 4: Authority The Steering Committee shall have authority on all matters of policy, management, and control of the organization's affairs and property, with full power to transact its business and to do and perform all things necessary to be done in order to carry out the purposes of the organization, subject only to the final authority of votes of the entire membership at the annual meeting or by such other means as shall be determined by the Steering Committee.

Article X: COORDINATING COMMITTEE

Section 1: Coordinating Committee The Coordinating Committee will consist of eight members, will select from its members the Chair or Co-Chairs, Treasurer, and Secretary, and will develop its internal division of responsibility. Coordinating Committee members will be elected by open vote of the entire membership, or, in case of a vacancy, by vote of the Steering Committee.

Section 2: Terms of Service

Members of the Coordinating Committee shall serve one-year terms and may be re-nominated and re-elected.

Section 3: Meetings The Coordinating Committee shall meet whenever necessary to conduct the business of the organization, in person or by such other means as it may decide. Meetings of the Coordinating Committee may be called by either of the National Co-Chairs, or by a petition signed by half the members of the Coordinating Committee. To the extent reasonably possible, meetings of the Coordinating Committee shall be announced in advance, and all members of SAWSJ shall be able to attend and observe meetings, unless by a two-thirds vote the Coordinating Committee decides to go into executive session.

Section 4: Authority The Coordinating Committee shall have authority on such matters of policy, management, and control of the organization's affairs and property as are designated to it by the Steering Committee, with full power to transact the organization's business and to do and perform all things necessary to be done in order to carry out the purposes of the organization, subject to the authority of the Steering Committee and to votes of the entire membership.

Article XI: NOMINATIONS

Section 1: Nominations Committee The Steering Committee shall elect a Nominations Committee to consist of at least six members (who may or may not be members of the Steering Committee), of whom at least half must be women and at least half must be people of color.

Section 2: Candidates Selected by Nominations Committee At least six weeks prior to elections, the Nominations Committee shall prepare and circulate to the entire membership a list of candidates for officers, coordinating committee members, steering committee members, and such other positions as are open for election. The aim and intent shall be to select two candidates for each position, in order to guarantee contested elections.

Section 3: Open Nominations Any additional candidate may qualify for the ballot by submitting a petition to the Nominations Committee, containing the names of 10 or more members in good standing who support the person's candidacy. Such petitions must be received at least two weeks prior to the elections, unless this rule is waived by vote of the Steering Committee or by a vote of the entire membership at the annual meeting.

Article XII: ELECTIONS

All members in good standing are eligible to vote. Voting may be conducted at the Annual Meeting, or by mail (including email) ballot. The choice of election procedures shall be decided by a vote of the entire membership or by a vote of the Steering Committee, if the membership votes to designate this authority. If no candidate for an office receives 40 percent or more of the vote, a run-off election shall be held between those candidates with the highest vote totals.

Article XIII: STAFF

The Coordinating Committee may hire such staff as it deems appropriate to conduct the operations of the organization.

Article XIV: ADVISORY BOARD

The Steering Committee may select an Advisory Board, and may determine its rights, privileges, and obligations.

Article XV: AMENDMENTS

These by-laws may be amended, rescinded, changed, or supplemented at any time by a majority vote of the entire membership. Proposals for revisions of these by-laws may be placed on the ballot by a majority vote of the Steering Committee, or by means of a petition signed by 25 or more members in good standing. _____

VI. HOW TO JOIN SAWSJ

To become an individual member, send your name, institutional affiliation, mailing address, phone, fax, and email, along with a check, to:

Scholars, Artists, and Writers for Social Justice
2565 Broadway #176
New York, NY 10025

Dues are $10 for student/low income, $25 for others with incomes below $40,000, and $40 for those with incomes of $40,000 or above.

***

↑ Index

672. raea100900
Re: Directory Assistance
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Hi again-

Does anyone know where or how I can reach Harryette Mullen? I've tried calling her home in L.A. with no luck. I don't have an e address.

Rae Armantrout

↑ Index

673. Elizabeth Treadwell
Re: postwomen+ (or is not equal to) speculative equations
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Dear Linda, if my post is fecund am I a girlywoman?

responding about
>
>www.pfplayground.com
>
>I felt I was dismissive of POSTFEMINIST PLAYGROUND -- which I honestly >hadn't looked at for quite a while -- great graphics!, very smart with a >current essay by DODIE BELLAMY that's cool. Part of what IS attractive is >the "no more victims/no more apologies" angle. But I really felt when I'd >met Lily James and Susannah Breslin (at a Conference (of all places) over >2 years ago), who were powerful presences, that they were sort of >forging onward somewhat narrowly. PFPlayground has grown into something >major & I appreciate they're grappling with Post-Femininsm, though it's >not quite what I have in mind . . .
>
>Elizabeth, as the archives aren't arranged by author, what's the shortcut >to some of your stuff?

Since you asked I will say! Go to "Dick Search" (!) and type my last name--my favorite things are of course my own fiction: "The New Slut Feminism" and "The Resulting Claire". There is also up some memoir and a review I did of Lynne Tillman's work (Its named "Lit Squad Has A Fling") & yes the Dodie B. article is great - I was happy to see it there.

As to your concerns/troubles with the site and its focus, I don't feel totally comfortable responding in public as Lily, Susannah & Joshilyn Jackson (who took over for Susannah in January) are dear to me. Lily & Joshilyn have fiction in Outlet 1 & 2...Lily has a book out from FC2 called _The Great Taste of Straight People_, and it will be clear as (if) you read Joshilyn's story in Outlet 2 (Outlet 2 also featuring Linda Russo!) that she does have what might be considered 'more political? more Feminist?' concerns, too.....Their use of humor is great, I think, and the intended audience is.....not this list?

I'm also impressed with Lily's critical cyberedge. As for the tittygirl illustrations, yes its strange, in the New Slut Fem, my narrator is chubby, in the illustration, she's.....Cindy Crawford with glasses on? But shit, its up and illustrated, what can I say? ANd Susannah's editing helped bring out the story, too, which was written years ago originally.

So now I've admitted everything. and one mor ething-

This month I wrote an article for them featuring a condom at their request as an attempt was being made to get a condom company to sponsor the site---crass commercialism? & maybe MARX (or at least the 'economy') comes (!)(excuse me) in here: I know years ago this would have made me sick, but then years ago I thought MFA programs were ridiculous, now I've attended one, and now I've written an article to try for a sponsor....not my main goal, but an interesting exercise (would you be pleased as an executive to read of a boy's 1st-sex condom being found a month later under a Converse tenny, full of maggots?)

> The world we live in is > so gendered, & though there's a lot of wonderful blurriness, there's still > those two extremes. Am I referring to "man & wife"? or Christian > Fundamentalism and The Gap?

Or the House of Dior and Ann Demuelsteer (SP!)?

Is the Waldrop quote from '78 or '88?

Todd thanks for the lovely poem(s)!

Elizabeth

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

674. Carla Billitteri
Re: postwomen+ (or is not equal to) speculative equations
Fri 24 Jul 1998

On Fri, 24 Jul 1998, Elizabeth Treadwell wrote:

> Dear Linda, if my post is fecund am I a girlywoman?

Funny but I was just wondering about this ... "fecund" sounded somewhat horrid in relation to Elizabeth's post ...

↑ Index

675. Susan Wheeler
Re: Party
Fri 24 Jul 1998

Chris, the best intentions. . .
Sorry. We're both flatout. But I wish you much revelry!

XOX

At 03:20 PM 7/23/98 -0400, you wrote:
> Just wanted to remind people again that I and Gary Sullivan are > having a roof party (not to be confused with ROOF BOOKS; though > people with ROOF BOOKS are invited) tomorrow night. Friday 7/24...

> We will be UNDER the roof it it rains.....in Brooklyn, NY....
> Anybody in the NYC area (or "just visiting") is welcome to > attend. Backchannel for directions, etc.....
> chris stroffolino
>
>
Susan Wheeler
[redacted] voice/fax [redacted]

↑ Index

676. Maria Damon
Re: queries
Fri 24 Jul 1998

---

thanks to all all all who responded in various ways to all these queries. 5:17 AM's mighty early; i think i'm discovering a secret to great productivity. whether i can emulate it; who knows

At 5:17 AM -0700 7/24/98, Douglas wrote:
>Maria, accordingly to my editor, Guy Bennett
>an Oulipo group (new and old) still meet in Paris
>quite often and read their work.
>
>Douglas
>
>Maria Damon wrote:
>>
>> are there surviving members of the Oulipo group and do they still meet in >> paris? inquiring minds need to know

↑ Index

677. toddbaron
Re: Directory Assistance
Fri 24 Jul 1998

[redacted] wrote:
>
> Hi again-
>
> Does anyone know where or how I can reach Harryette Mullen? I've tried > calling her home in L.A. with no luck. I don't have an e address.

>
> Rae Armantrout
Rae:

I'm afraid I've only been able to reach her through her dept. at UCLA-- but that's been awhile. Douglas might/must know.

↑ Index

678. Simon DeDeo
Re: rhyme & reason
Sat 25 Jul 1998

I apologize for the earlier posting with the subject above -- somebody decided to be awful funny and send mail in my name.

I hope all is well with the listfolk,

Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
[redacted]

↑ Index

679. MAYHEW
I dislike chilled soups
Sat 25 Jul 1998

I dislike chilled soups
as a general rule
for you I'll glady make an exception given your penchant for assassination

As a general rule
I sleep only on Thursdays
Given your penchant for assassination
I'll give up even this small pleasure

I sleep only on Thursdays
Such is the limit of my wit
I'll give up even this small pleasure
a tax levied on my mere existence

Such is the limit of my wit
A vaster corral would require too much effort
A tax levied on my mere existence
equal to 150 pounds of flesh

A vaster corral would require too much effort
I am unaccustomed to mental labor
equal to 150 pounds of flesh
A calculation foreign to my nature

I am unaccustomed to mental labor
I dislike chilled soups
a calculation foreign to my nature
For you I'll gladly make an exception

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

680. MAXINE CHERNOFF
Query
Sat 25 Jul 1998

For a piece I'm researching, I'm trying to find out who on the Wesleyan University Press Board of Advisors (assuming there is one) is responsible for the more experimental choices on their list: Howe, Retallack, Scalapino, Perelman, etc. Please back-channel.

Maxine Chernoff

↑ Index

681. Elizabeth Treadwell
Yedda Morrison's _The Marriage of the Well Built Head_
Sat 25 Jul 1998

_____ Double Lucy Books is proud to announce the publication of Yedda Morrison's first collection, _The Marriage of the Well Built Head_. Staple bound, 40 pp., $3.

Yedda Morrison co-edits TRIPWIRE: A POETICS JOURNAL. Her work has appeared in Mirage #4 Period(ical), Outlet, & elsewhere.

 Outlet (2) Fairyland will be available in the first part of September.
Work by Tan Lin, Michelle Murphy, Todd Baron, Linda Russo, & others.
****

please make checks payable to E. Treadwell.

_____
Many thanks to those of you who've already ordered Yedda's book - your copies are in the mail!
And thanks also to those of you who've subscribed to Outlet - your copies will arrive in September.

ET

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

682. toddbaron
Re: Yedda Morrison's _The Marriage of the Well Built Head_
Sat 25 Jul 1998

Odering up!

I'll send the check asap
and look forward to the book.

Your name is popping up in many conversations
of late--Noah and others up there.
Double Lucy ! etc!

best of all,

Todd Baron

2860 exposition blvd
#A
santa monica ca 90404

ps: I'm going to send you a manuscript--and I knwo
you don't have time to read it--but I want to give you a copy not only for "consideration" but for a "gift"
or such--I think you'll like the work
and I really want to have folks

read this body of work--and discuss it when we can..etc.

↑ Index

683. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Kathy's Diary (last of 2 installments)
Sat 25 Jul 1998

-

Kathy's Diary (last of 2)

In Kathy's diary/epistolary material, she also said that the idea of us completely knowing each other stunned her; she thought there were a lot of ways we were alike, and talked about our fantasies in relation to each other. She said she didn't quite understand what was going on, and I re- member feeling the same way myself.

She was working on a book at the time, this was when she was calling her- self The Black Tarantula, publishing under the name. I was involved in her thinking. Our thinking about each other was intertwined, inseparable. I can't think of a gap; we filled each other's spaces. She wanted us to send each other as much information as possible about each other, in varied media, so that we could continue along these lines. She mentioned Vito Acconci, saying the kind of intimacy he explores in his work, she had never seen done between two people who were both subjects and objects. She thought all of this would make an incredible work as well. I thought and still think that Vito's exploration wasn't all that risky, but articulated so as to appear so, without props; the props in fact provided the frame- work, moving the periphery towards the center. But that wasn't clear until much later.

She thought I was more systematic in my exploration than she was; is that true? Certainly I pick up and drop systems like water, like there's link- ages surrounding the gasp of the earth's equator - but then these same systems become corroded by desire, tend to fray/stare at one from the edges where I reside. I was residing there at the time. A bit later we were making tapes together, worlds falling apart, and as the content of one of the tapes indicated, I was reading Norman O. Brown's Love's Body at the time. I just found the book again.

Kathy thought my work could profit from the intimate sexual concerns of hers - perhaps it has. Certainly the tape we did was the farthest I've been able to stretch my body, on the operating-table so to speak, of both semiosis and psychosis. I could but won't speak towards her state of mind at the time, from what she said. But this was later. Now, she was writing to me before that, asking whether I would collaborate with her, speaking of her fanaticism in relation to what she was doing - I certainly shared (and share) that aspect of her psychology.

Now I'm intertwined with this text, which on my part within it, still re- flects concerns I've never figured out, in the sense of a figure or trope, those moments which become signs or ghosts in the very background of our being. They remain there just as these letters and diary have accompanied me; would that they were published, but who is to say concerning the Estate, and to what extent would I want to give up the paraphrase for the real?

And am I living through text, and if so, whose?

↑ Index

684. MAXINE CHERNOFF

Re: Yedda Morrison's _The Marriage of the Well Built Head_

Sun 26 Jul 1998

Haven't seen Yedda's book yet, but she's a terrific writer.

Maxine Chernoff

On Sun, 26 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:

> Odering up!
>
> I'll send the check asap
> and look forward to the book.
>
> Your name is popping up in many conversations
> of late--Noah and others up there.
> Double Lucy ! etc!
>
> best of all,
>
> Todd Baron
>
> 2860 exposition blvd
> #A
> santa monica ca 90404
>
> ps: I'm going to send you a manuscript--and I knwo
> you don't have time to read it--but I > want to give you a copy not only
> for "consideration" but for a "gift"
> or such--I think you'll like the work
> and I really want to have folks
> read this body of work--and discuss it

> when we can..etc.

↑ Index

685. david bromige
hugh steinberg's e-whereabouts
Sun 26 Jul 1998

Anyone having an up-to-date e-ddress for Hugh please b-c me with it?

[redacted] is no longer valid, it seems. Thanks, David

↑ Index

686. raea100900
Re: Poetry Daily
Sun 26 Jul 1998

Hi all again,

This is the most I've ever posted to the list. I don't know that this matters to anyone else, but I got the folks at www.poems.com to post my full poem (instead of just the second half) starting Monday. So if anyone would like to see the whole thing, it'll be there under Saturday's poem.

Rae Armantrout

↑ Index

687. Rachel Levitsky
Re: For J. Mayhew
Sun 26 Jul 1998

Coney Island
after Cesar Vallejo

I'll die drinking
I remember it already in Paris, slow, maybe Peoria, or Brooklyn on a Thursday, like today, in fall or

I'll die on a Thursday, maybe today, thursday promises poems while the bad humors pass me by to join other bad and, like never before,

I have returned with all my cards, my ways and means, and smiles to see myself alone.

You see I have died,
they fought me
I did nothing--they gave it to me hard with a stick and hard

With a story;
without testimony on Thursdays, bleached bones solicitude, stone stoops, the rides. . .

↑ Index

688. Rachel Levitsky
Re: oulipo howlipo whylipo wherelipo
Sun 26 Jul 1998

For Maria et al belated,

In April Harry Mathews was at DU Denver. He said Oulipo is wildly popular these days, attracting crowds in the hundreds to their readings. And by the way, since the question was asked, about women, a question that was on my mind as Harry was discussing the strict application of rules and limitation. I asked Harry if he thought the method appealed to men more than women. He scowled and asked me if I ever watched a game of hopscotch.

I never was any good at hopscotch, or jacks, for that matter.

From one who thinks rules are at their best when they are judiciously broken.
--rdl

(p.s.--I'll be off for a week or two on the road back home to B'lyn--A. Hollo, L. Wright, P. Pritchett, M. DuCharme, D. Rogerson-- I'll miss you terribly)

Fredrik Hertzberg LIT wrote:
>
> On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>
> > men*...Can anyone indicate if they ever eventually had a woman member? (or > > two?)
> >
> > Mark P.
> >

>
> The following list can be found online somewhere under > http://www2.ec-lille.fr/~book/oulipo/ - a good Oulipo-site, French. There > seems to be at least one female member. Fred
>
> Noël Arnaud - président - membre
> fondateur
> Marcel Bénabou - secrétaire
> définitivement provisoire
> Jacques Bens - membre fondateur
> Claude Berge - membre fondateur
> André Blavier
> Paul Braffort - premier membre élu
> Italo Calvino [décédé]
> François Caradec
> Bernard Cerquiglini
> Ross Chambers
> Stanley Chapman
> Marcel Duchamp [décédé]
> Jacques Duchateau - membre fondateur
> Luc Etienne [décédé]
> Paul Fournel - secrétaire
> provisoirement définitif
> Michelle Grangaud
> Jacques Jouet
> Latis [décédé] - membre fondateur
> François Le Lionnais [décédé] - président fondateur
> Hervé Le Tellier - trésorier
> Jean Lescure - membre fondateur
> Harry Mathews
> Michele Métail
> Oskar Pastior
> Georges Perec [décédé]
> Raymond Queneau [décédé] - fondateur
> Jean Queval [décédé]
> Pierre Rosenstiehl
> Jacques Roubaud
> Albert-Marie Schmidt [décédé]

↑ Index

689. Orpheus
Poets
Sun 26 Jul 1998

Poetry, don't you start telling me about poetry. I know all about poetry, thank you very much [he said with a sort of bull-snort].

But let me tell you this.

There's no obligation to accept society or women or religion or anything else, not for anyone there isn't.

As for poetry, that's a job for anarchs.

Poetry's made by rebels and exiles and outsiders, it's made by people on their own, not sheep baaaing bravo to any Pope.

Poets don't need religion and they don't need bloody little cocktail-party gossip either; it's they who make language and make myths. Poets don't need anybody except themselves.

[Undisclosed source]

let me add to list of things Poets don't need:

theories, and any form of dogma of the left or right.

The great poet Tristan Tzara was a leftist all his life.

But he never kissed the ass of any Stalinist. In fact, there was fist fight at his funeral. Between some lettrists and some dogmatic Stalinists. And I am not running down Stalin, and I am not running down the Pope, any more than I would run down the Dalai lama. All these contemporary leftists type autmatically assume that being Christian, patriarchal makes one an idiot. Well friends, Paul Virilio is a christian, and so was Grahame Greene. One does not have to accept any or not even some of the premises of any movement to be a good, great or special poet. IT is all very individual. L.F. Celine was a pretty bad politican in my books, but he was a great novelist.

PD James portrays a type of man and poet which you seem to think is mediocre. Oh well. What is mediocre? Anything which disagrees with a leftist politics. Balderdash is what we say. Politics like poetry should be a porocess of constraint and movement. Not dogma and not a dogma riddled with some blather based on a fickle and badly digested Lacan-ism. That is not a typo. Ism the ism of justifications.

Pah! I have sung 'theory' in three countries.

And the hexagram says: Let It Go.

last but not least if you going to attack orpheus then do so properly. In Lacanian 'thought and doctrine' the penis as you so prudently refer to the male cock is not the Phallus. You can go read that. And see. Not that I am especially interested in that sort of pyscho-analytic gibberish But you shld. know the difference. BEcause I am no fan of Lacan. I prefer Duns Scotus, James Joyce, Milton, HD, Plath, Everson, and hosts of others.

Adam Dalgliesh is something you cannot understand. Because you imagine that poetry is associated with virtue. I mean a circle of virtue which you associate with the left I suppose. Dalgliesh is just part of the English poet image as establishment figure. But if your politics are so paranoid that you cannot imagine beyond that, well then you beyond reprieve. After all, so many great poets are of the right and conservative. In fact it seems that all the American poets who everyone now declares great, were men whose politics was either informed by a Christian view point, and or men whose politics was conservative at one level or another.

Long Live the fictional Adam Dalgliesh.

I love the sound of Dalgliesh.

One thinks of Hopkins, and Donne and Shakespeare.

As close to the establishment of their times

as a man can get and still sing and bring home the bacon.

↑ Index

690. Tosh

Inagaki Taruho

Sun 26 Jul 1998

Right now I am in the middle of reading Inagaki Taruho's "One Thousand and One-Second Stories" published by Sun & Moon. My wife (who is Japanese) have been raving about this writer for some time to me. This Japanese writer is a combination of fairy tale meets sophisticated urban life meets slapstick. Most of these stories I believe were written in the Thirties and Twenties.

If you are familar with Edogawa Rampo, Taruho is a 'lighter' version of Rampo's dark sexuality and horror. And I wanted to mention this title because one - our friend Douglas published it, and two the images are hauntingly (is there such a word) poetic in its language and imagery.

ciao,
Tosh

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

691. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: Inagaki Taruho
Sun 26 Jul 1998

I do get to second this as well; it's a wonderful book straight out of Meiji era I think although much later than that, owes to Melies as well, lots of Mr. Moon falling just about everywhere! And I don't even have _any_ friend named Douglas!

Alan

On Sun, 26 Jul 1998, Tosh wrote:

> Right now I am in the middle of reading Inagaki Taruho's "One Thousand and One-Second Stories" published by Sun & Moon. My wife (who is Japanese) have been raving about this writer for some time to me. This Japanese writer is a combination of fairy tale meets sophisticated urban life meets slapstick. Most of these stories I believe were written in the Thirties and Twenties.
>
> If you are familar with Edogawa Rampo, Taruho is a 'lighter' version of Rampo's dark sexuality and horror. And I wanted to mention this title because one - our friend Douglas published it, and two the images are hauntingly (is there such a word) poetic in its language and imagery.
>
> ciao,
> Tosh
>
> ---
> Tosh Berman
> TamTam Books
> ---

↑ Index

692. KENT JOHNSON
Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

I saw this movie yesterday and am still thinking about it somewhat confusedly. Very powerful, a work of cinematic genius in the battle scenes, no question, but disturbing, it seems to me, in its broader, potential impact on the culture (i.e. Will it help make U.S. police actions against "non-democratic" states more attractive to the public? Will it help set the stage for patriotic rally around our soldiers who are willing to put up with, and rise to--like the heroic, play-calling, and Emerson quoting quarterback Captain Miller--so much visceral violence?). I'm not sure here... The treatment of the American soldiers (though not the Germans--they are pretty much all bad guys and, suggestively, through the temporarily captured one, plain despicable) is quite moving, and one senses what the U.S.veterans of WWII, Korea, and Vietnam must feel about not being fully understood in regards to the horrors they endured. Wondering what people think about this movie? Or are _all_ the critics right that it's a wonderful movie through and through? Is this the best treatment we can get of the "good war"?

And actually, if I may ask,what do people on this List think? Was it a "good war"?

Kent

↑ Index

693. louis stroffolino
Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS
Mon 27 Jul 1998

Dave Baratier asks what "cross-gendered identification" is.
I guess I just meant the term simply (if loosely) to mean
when someone of one gender and/or sex adopts or takes on
the voice of someone of another gender and/or sex....
I didn't say that YAU was NEW for doing that....
but then "make it new" has never been much of a standard for me
(see Mike Magee's intro to his mag COMBO for a view I largely share)

Karen Kelley. COuld you tell me which particular piece of Yau's was in First Intensity? My hunch is you're talking about a piece called BUTCHER, BAKER, or CANDLESTICK MAKER, but I'd like to know more specifically before I respond....Because I'm curious about what you mean by "stereotypical" and why you think the piece you read is so..... Thanks, chris stroffolino

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:

> I recently read something of Yau's in a mag--was it First Intensity? I'm sorry--I can't recall, but it was perhaps from the new book & was the narrative of a stripper & I found it rather disturbing in that the narrator was kind of dumb & angry & thought highly of her breasts (no prob with that in & of itself) & little of men in general--she was kind of a jaded line drawing of a woman--with the interior monolog of a stereotype, which I suppose is okay, though as this thread goes to show, the whole male/female or masc/fem question is much more complex than Yau's piece implied, and I guess I just felt annoyed that he was willing to throw another stereotype my way.

louis stroffolino wrote:

> Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
> In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
> that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
> "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
> in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
> a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
> and negotiating the representational anxieties that
> might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
> but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
> chris stroffolino

On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:

Rah rah.

I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the
"position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).

I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so
many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other
'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc.
-- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in
patriarchal biases.

But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing
experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist
realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!

Until we get some intelligent conversation going to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship)
we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it
made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)

Todd's comeback:

> being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..) gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
>
> never impersonal.
>
> Tb

↑ Index

694. izak

Re: Saving Private Ryan

Mon 27 Jul 1998

I haven't actually seen the movie, but I've heard that there are no African American or Chicano soldiers shown in any of the larger battle scenes. Strange since Spielberg claimed to try and make this movie as close to reality as possible and quite a large number of the soldiers that fought in WWII were African American and Chicano or Latino.

-Joanna Sondheim

****

"It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am." -Edith Sodergran

****

↑ Index

695. david bromige
Re : Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

Kent, I havent seen this movie yet, & may never. (I have spent much time imagining combat, from what I knew of physiology and from what books tell, among earliest memories being _The Great War Illustrated_ , which I discovered in a closet under the stairs where we took refuge (?) during a buzzbomb attack in WW2.) Here, I am only interested to cope with your question, was WW2 a 'good' war? The only way I can answer that is to say that were the exact historical conditions to obtain today, it would need to be fought and I would feel impelled to take part. David

↑ Index

696. ShaunAnne Tangney Humanities
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

On Sun, 26 Jul 1998, KENT JOHNSON wrote:

> I saw this movie yesterday and am still thinking about it > somewhat confusedly. Very powerful, a work of cinematic genius in the > battle scenes, no question, but disturbing, it seems to me, in its

*****

> Wondering what people think about this movie? Or are _all_ the > critics right that it's a wonderful movie through and through? Is > this the best treatment we can get of the "good war"?

admitedly, i haven't seen the movie (and probably won't) but i loved what the guy on NPR (sorry, can't remember his name) said: that the problem w/ the movie was that we could still see "little stevie spielberg" behind the curtin, pulling all the levers.

will the movie "do any good"? well, here's a bit of dialogue from the pen of kurt vonnegut, many years ago:

"Is it an anti-war book?"
"Yes," I said, "I guess."
"You know what I say to people when I hear they're writing an anti-war book?"
"No. What _do_ you say, Harrison Starr?"
"I say, 'Why don;t you write an anti-_glacier_ book instead?"

i was thinking about this "will it do any good" question just this weekend, actually. i saw a clip of an interview w/ spielberg saying that he wanted everyone to understand "the horrors of war" and then, chanel-surfing, i happened upon the defense dep't (remember when it was the war dep't?) press conference about the CNN/Time story about using agent orange on AWOL soldiers in laos. one of the def. dep't guys said that "according to the records" one of the former soldiers who said he was in laos never was there--and i thought to myself, "jesus christ! 'according to records'?! who is this guy kidding?! if it was a secret mission, would there be any records?! i mean, hasn't this guy even seen _apocalypse now_?!"

will it do any good? did _the best years of our lives_? did _coming home_? did the poetry of sigfried sassoon? did _catch-22_ or _going after cacciato_?

--shaunanne

↑ Index

697. Gary Sullivan
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

> will it do any good? did _the best years of our lives_? did _coming home_? did the poetry of sigfried sassoon? did _catch-22_ or _going after cacciato_?
>
> --shaunanne

Someone reads that stuff & is changed by it ... maybe not the culture-as-a-whole ... but "some people" ... _Catch-22_ adds to the dialogue ... so we have something, there, to put eye to & finger on ... other than say "yellow ribbon = support the troops" ... or "loose lips sink ships" ... we have, for instance, Slaughter-house 5 ... which I read when very young ... & it did make a difference ... so did Deer Hunter ... opposition needs to be articulated ... in whatever medium ... otherwise?

↑ Index

698. Mark Weiss
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

In the segregated army of WW II black soldiers served in separate units, none of which, as I remember, saw action on D-Day, although they were active elswehere in the European theater.

At 01:58 AM 7/27/98 -0700, you wrote:
>I haven't actually seen the movie, but I've heard that there are no
>African American or Chicano soldiers shown in any of the larger battle >scenes. Strange since Spielberg claimed to try and make this movie as >close to reality as possible and quite a large number of the soldiers that >fought in WWII were African American and Chicano or Latino.

>
>-Joanna Sondheim
>
>
>
>*******
****
>"It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am."
>-Edith Sodergran
>*******
****
>
>

↑ Index

699. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: Re : Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

I worked on a reply, discarded it; and can only say that I agree with David, although there are no good wars.

I have difficulties with "good" and "bad" as well, not believing in any transcendent metaphoricity that would garner such divisions; which places me in the camp of Tertullian I suppose. And I would have gone as well.

Alan

On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, david bromige wrote:

> Kent, I havent seen this movie yet, & may never. (I have spent much time imagining combat, from what I knew of physiology and from what books tell, among earliest memories being _The Great War Illustrated_ , which I discovered in a closet under the stairs where we took refuge (?) during a buzzbomb attack in WW2.) Here, I am only interested to cope with your question, was WW2 a 'good' war? The only way I can answer that is to say that were the exact historical conditions to obtain today, it would need to be fought and I would feel impelled to take part. David

↑ Index

700. k.a. hehir
FEAST 27 July (fwd)
Mon 27 Jul 1998

Just in case you forget.
see you in church.

Today, 27 July, is the feast of ...

* Pantaleon or Panteleimon, martyr (c. 305?) - the Romans tried killing him by burning, liquid lead, drowning, wild beasts, the wheel and the sword, before finally succeeding by the old standby, beheading; and after the decapitation, milk flowed from his veins instead of blood

kevin

↑ Index

701. Roger Farr
"Book Fungus Can Get You High"
Mon 27 Jul 1998

> "Book Fungus Can Get You High"
>
> By Ellen Warren / Chicago Tribune
>
> CHICAGO -- Getting high on great literature is taking on a whole new meaning. It turns out that, if you spend enough time around old books and decaying manuscripts in dank archives, you can start to hallucinate. Really.
>
> We're not talking psychedelia, "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds" stuff, here. But maybe only a step or two away from that.
>
> Experts on the various fungi that feed on the pages and on the covers of books are increasingly convinced that you can get high - or at least a little wacky -- by sniffing old books. Fungus on books, they say, is a likely source of hallucinogenic spores.
>
> The story of The Strangeness in the Stacks first started making its way through the usually staid antiquarian books community late last year with the publication of a paper in the British medical journal, The Lancet.
>
> There, Dr. R.J. Hay wrote of the possibility that "fungal hallucinogens" in old books could lead to "enhancement of enlightenment."
>
> "The source of inspiration for many great literary figures may have been nothing more than a quick sniff of the bouquet of mouldy books," wrote Hay, one of England's leading mycologists (fungus experts) and dean of dermatology at Guy's Hospital in London.

Well, said an American expert on such matters, it may not be that easy.

"I agree with his premise - but not his dose. It would take more than a brief sniff," aid Monona Rossol, an authority on the health effects of materials used in the arts world.

For all the parents out there, these revelations would seem ideal for persuading youngsters to spend some quality time in the archives.

But attention kids: You can't get high walking through the rare books section of the library.

Rossol said it would take a fairly concentrated exposure over a considerable period of time for someone to breathe in enough of the spores of hallucinogenic fungus to seriously affect behavior. There are no studies to tell how much or how long before strange behavior takes hold.

Still, this much seems apparent - if you want to find mold, the only place that may rival a refrigerator is a library.

Just last week the Las Cruces, N.M., Public Library was closed indefinitely, prompted by health concerns after a fungus outbreak in the reference section. Library director Carol Brey said the fungus promptly spread to old history books and onward to the literature section.

The town's Mold Eradication Team, she said, shuttered the library as a precaution. "We didn't want to take any chances," she said. A mold removal company will address the problem, which is believed to have originated in the air conditioning system.

Psychedelic mushrooms, the classic hallucinogenic fungus, derive their mind-altering properties from the psilocybin and psilocin they produce naturally.

One historic example of this phenomenon, scientists now believe, is the madness that prevailed in the late 1600s in Salem, Mass., where ergot, a hallucinogenic fungus, infected the rye crops that went into rye bread. Ergot contains lysergic acid, a key compound of the hallucinogenic drug LSD. This tiny fungus and its wild effects on the rye-bread-eating women may have led to the Salem witch trials.

Rossol, a New York chemist and consultant to Chicago's Field Museum of > Natural History who publishes the newsletter Acts Facts, the journal of Arts, Crafts and Theater Safety, said that there have not been scientific studies on the hallucinogenic effects of old books.

>
> But, relying on accounts from newsletter readers who report their own strange symptoms - ranging from dizziness to violent nausea - she says there is no doubt that moldy old volumes harbor hallucinogens.
> 8
> (Thanks to Jill Hackenberg, who sent me this e-mail. A great way to start my Monday! Aloha, Liz)

↑ Index

702. Rachel Levitsky
Re: Re : Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

I agree with Alan, about no good war, though violence simply is. Hendrik Hertzberg wrote a pretty comprehensive piece on the movie in this week's New Yorker. He seems to feel the two 25 minute real life depictions of combat made the movie important, though not great, all by themselves. Posing the question of the value of realism. I remain skeptical.

--rdl

Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote:
>
> I worked on a reply, discarded it; and can only say that I agree with > David, although there are no good wars.
>
> I have difficulties with "good" and "bad" as well, not believing in any > transcendent metaphoricity that would garner such divisions; which places > me in the camp of Tertullian I suppose. And I would have gone as well.
>
> Alan
>
> On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, david bromige wrote:
>
> > Kent, I havent seen this movie yet, & may never. (I have spent much time > > imagining combat, from what I knew of physiology and from what books tell, > > among earliest memories being _The Great War Illustrated_ , which I > > discovered in a closet under the stairs where we took refuge (?) during a > > buzzbomb attack in WW2.) Here, I am only interested to cope with your > > question, was WW2 a 'good' war? The only way I can answer that is to say > > that were the exact historical conditions to obtain today, it would need to > > be fought and I would feel impelled to take part. David

> >

↑ Index

703. David Kellogg
Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

Interesting that 25 minutes should seem "long" for a war scene. It's a result of the time-compression brought to us in part by movies themselves. A 25 minute sex scene would likely be labelled pornographic no matter how it was shot.

Speaking of which: I'm listening to a pop station while writing this and just heard a (male) DJ give away tickets to a (female) listener; they banter back and forth, agreeing that the movie will inevitably be great because Matt Damon is so "hot."

No good wars, agreed; I would probably have gone; but can any of us seriously imagine the U.S. faced with a situation that morally unambiguous? (Not the U.S. itself necessarily, but the enemy faced).

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

carnage. I was pleased by their thoughtful response and can't imagine how "Saving. . ." could make anyone gungho to go fight the next big one.

Maxine Chernoff

↑ Index

705. daniel bouchard
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

At 12:46 PM 7/27/98 -0700, MAXINE CHERNOFF wrote:
>I was pleased by their thoughtful >response and can't imagine how "Saving. . ." could make anyone gungho to >go fight the next big one.

but isn't the film more war-IS-horrible-but-by-god-someone's-got-to-do-it? someone's got to fight the Evil Forces. someone's got to be brave but there are no heroes here. there are no heroes here because we're just doing our duty. we're just doing our duty, and it is a bitter pill, and that is heroic, altho we're reluctant to accept such labels, because our boys suffer...

"morally unambiguous"--what does that mean?

<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

706. Laura E. Wright
Re: FEASTing on Oulipo
Mon 27 Jul 1998

And my calendar only said it was Take Your Houseplants For a Walk day...

k.a. hehir wrote:

> Today, 27 July, is the feast of ...

>  Pantaleon or Panteleimon, martyr (c. 305?) - ...*

But more seriously, re Rachel (soon to be sorely missed in Boulder) Levitsky's post on Oulipo and so on, in which she said:And by the way, since the question was asked, about women, a question that was on my mind as Harry was discussing the strict application of rules and limitation. I asked Harry if he thought the method appealed to men more than women. He scowled and asked me if I ever watched a game of hopscotch.

I never was any good at hopscotch, or jacks, for that matter.

Does anyone else gag when they read this? Why is it still acceptable to dismiss rather than addressing (or even refusing to address but owning up to it) questions if they relate to a gender or race or sexual orientation or etc. other than one's own? I'll take forthright bigotry over this sort of snideness any day.

With curry all over my keyboard,
Laura (I was never any good at hopscotch either but I loved logic) W.

--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
 * * * * * *
"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
    *   *   *   *   *   *
"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

<HTML>
And my calendar only said it was Take Your Houseplants For a Walk day...

<P>k.a. hehir wrote:
<BLOCKQUOTE TYPE=CITE>

<P>Today, 27 July, is the feast of ...

<P>* Pantaleon or Panteleimon, martyr (c. 305?) - ...</BLOCKQUOTE> But more seriously, re Rachel (soon to be sorely missed in Boulder) Levitsky's post on Oulipo and so on, in which she said:<I>And by the way, since the question was asked, about women, a question</I>
<I>that was on my mind as Harry was discussing the strict application of</I>
<I>rules and limitation. I asked Harry if he thought the method appealed</I>
<I>to men more than women. He scowled and asked me if I ever watched a</I>
<I>game of hopscotch.</I><I></I>

<P><I>I never was any good at hopscotch, or jacks, for that matter.</
I><I></I>

<P>Does anyone else gag when they read this? Why is it still acceptable to dismiss rather than addressing (or even refusing to address but owning up to it) questions if they relate to a gender or race or sexual orientation or etc. other than one's own? I'll take forthright bigotry over this sort of snideness any day.

<P>With curry all over my keyboard,

Laura (I was never any good at hopscotch either but I loved logic)
W.

<P>--

Laura Wright

Library Assistant

Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute

2130 Arapahoe Ave

Boulder, CO 80302

[redacted]

 * * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan

     *
*
*   *
*
*

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

 </HTML>

----------9AC5B6754CAAF8878F3DF97F--

↑ Index

707. Gary Sullivan

FW: Can you post this on poetics list? Thanks, David

Mon 27 Jul 1998

Hey, Everyone ... fyi:

-----Original Message-----
From: David A. Kirschenbaum [SMTP:[redacted]] Sent: Monday, July 27, 1998 4:14 PM
To: Gary Sullivan
Subject: Can you post this on poetics list? Thanks, David

Saturday Aug. 8, 1998
BOOG Literature 7th anniversary party
Hammell on Trial, Wanda Phipps, James Wilk,
Three Guys from Albany, Suburban Life and more Hosted by BOOGLIT editor David Kirschenbaum
Segue Space 303 E.8th St. (bet. B & C) $6 door Info: [redacted]
Email: [redacted]
F train to 2nd Avenue

_____ Belinda P. Yong ph: [redacted] Publishing Associate fax: [redacted] MBL Communications e-mail: [redacted] 665 Broadway, Suite 805 New York, NY 10012

↑ Index

708. Marjorie Perloff

Re: POETICS Digest - 26 Jul 1998 to 27 Jul 1998 (#1998-14)

Mon 27 Jul 1998

Re: Saving Private Ryan, which I haven't seen and don't intend to see, having found SCHINDLER'S LIST quite phoney and manipulative:

Kent, if you want to see what WWII "felt like," look at some of the superb documentaries often shown on the History Channel. That was the real thing. Spielberg's simulations, as a letter to the editor in the LA Times pointed out today, are on the following order: in one battle scene the officers were helmets with insignias that, acc. to this letter writer who fought in the war, no officer ever would wear in battle because it showed up too much. A small detail but typical. I personally think the simulation of violent battle scenes is voyeuristic and also false. It does NOT tell you what war felt like. My husband Joe who was actually in WWII (tail end, missed the battles) in the Pacific Theatre will tell you how disappointed the 18-year olds like himself were to miss the battles because the felt they weren't being brave and heroic enough. Frank O'Hara, in the Pacific theatre at about the same time, writes the same thing in letters to his family. It may have been crazy, but there it is.

As for the "good war" question, as someone who wouldn't be here today if the British and US had not fought, I find the question really creepy. Would you have liked to live under the Nazis? Not a hypothetical question for the British in 1939. Nothing like a lot of people who have never had to fight or indeed do anything on that order to sit around and discuss whether or not they would have gone, and yes, as we all know all wars are evil! IWhat else is new? It shows that it's time for a few history lessons for the kids.

and, by the way, as endless letters in LA have been saying to Spielberg, who said there were no great war movies?? There have been dozens with amazing battle scenes but perhaps the greatest ever is the Bridge on the River Kwai. Not exactly a "recruiting" picture --it's very anti-war --but deals with real issues not, "Oh boy, war is hell." Isn't there something wrong with sitting comfortably in a theatre, warm enough, well-fed enough, eating popcorn and watching "War is hell" films?

Well--I'm sure I'm in the minority here but I had to sound off a bit....

xxx
Marjorie

↑ Index

709. Billy Little
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

---

or Dalton Trumbo's Johnnie Got His Gun or Nathaniel West's Dream Life of Balso Snell, or Kenneth Patchen's Sleepers Awake, but they only make pacificists one at a time, not like tanks rolling off the chrysler line, and by the way nobody's talking about one of the real reasons the japanese economy is faltering, for fifty years they were forbidden to spend on military but that's all changed in the past decade, they're working hard to make the arms dealers (like Harrod's owned by Diana's boyfriend's Dad) wealthier still and defence spending is a dead loss what i've heard is if you took the money in the defence budget and just threw it in the street more jobs would be created than spent as it is.

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

Yeah, I stole from
the treasury
of human folly
I spent it all on you, baby...

don't mention it

Duncan McNaughton

↑ Index

710. louis stroffolino
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Mon 27 Jul 1998

I probably would not have gone....Hail Robert Lowell! (though, he's been called a mere wax-museum puppet). Hail John and Yoko!..... cs.....

On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, David Kellogg wrote:

> Interesting that 25 minutes should seem "long" for a war scene. It's a result of the time-compression brought to us in part by movies themselves. A 25 minute sex scene would likely be labelled pornographic no matter how it was shot.
>
> Speaking of which: I'm listening to a pop station while writing this and just heard a (male) DJ give away tickets to a (female) listener; they banter back and forth, agreeing that the movie will inevitably be great because Matt Damon is so "hot."
>
> No good wars, agreed; I would probably have gone; but can any of us seriously imagine the U.S. faced with a situation that morally unambiguous? (Not the U.S. itself necessarily, but the enemy faced).
>
> Cheers,
> David
> *~~~

Maxine Chernoff

On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, daniel bouchard wrote:

> At 12:46 PM 7/27/98 -0700, MAXINE CHERNOFF wrote:
> I was pleased by their thoughtful
> response and can't imagine how "Saving. . ." could make anyone gungho to > go fight the next big one.
>
> but isn't the film more war-IS-horrible-but-by-god-someone's-got-to-do-it?
> someone's got to fight the Evil Forces.
> someone's got to be brave but there are no heroes here.
> there are no heroes here because we're just doing our duty.
> we're just doing our duty, and it is a bitter pill, and that is heroic,
> altho we're reluctant to accept such labels, because our boys suffer...
>
> "morally unambiguous"--what does that mean?
>
> <<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
> Daniel Bouchard
> The MIT Press Journals
> Five Cambridge Center
> Cambridge, MA 02142
>
> [redacted]
> phone: [redacted]
> fax: [redacted]
> <<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

712. Rachel Levitsky

Re: Hello I must be going

Mon 27 Jul 1998

Be back in about 2 weeks.

hasta la vista,

RDL

↑ Index

713. Don Cheney
Re: Hello I must be going
Mon 27 Jul 1998

rachel,

damn! i thought you were going to bring up DUCK SOUP as the classic anti-war movie. but of course your subject would've been HAIL HAIL FREEDONIA!

don

> Be back in about 2 weeks.
>
> hasta la vista,
>
> RDL

↑ Index

714. Karen Kelley
Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS
Mon 27 Jul 1998

Hi Chris,

Good call: it IS "Butcher, Baker..."

"I'm a dancer who makes men spin in their graves, gets them to yell 'bay bee,' whisper 'gosh' and 'honey,' and dream of 'whoopee.'"

"Fate got warm with me, dealt me a flush. So I'm packaged right for the job. I have an easygoing, cornstalk smile; I'm tall and tilted just enough so short guys don't have to crane their little necks and hurt themselves. I can crouch and rise smooth as a wave. Twist and twirl until their brains turn to jellyfish bobbing in a beer bottle."

"Early on I learned that men like to be swatted a little if you do it right and put on your girl-next-door smile while shaking your assets just beyond reach. I had tits and a smile that gave men cramps."

This seems extraordinarily off-base as a representation of what a woman might think when contemplating male reaction to her body. Admittedly I am one woman among many. But I wonder if perhaps Yau isn't closer to what men think women think.

When I first read the piece I felt guilty about finding it an amusing read when it was so clearly a man's idea of a woman's feelings. And as someone who's held the same job as the narrator, I'm aware of how routinely dancers are stereotyped.

It sounds like you felt differently about the piece, Chris. C'mon, spill it.

Karen

louis stroffolino wrote:

> Dave Baratier asks what "cross-gendered identification" is.
> I guess I just meant the term simply (if loosely) to mean
> when someone of one gender and/or sex adopts or takes on
> the voice of someone of another gender and/or sex....
> I didn't say that YAU was NEW for doing that....
> but then "make it new" has never been much of a standard for me
> (see Mike Magee's intro to his mag COMBO for a view I largely share)
>
> Karen Kelley. COuld you tell me which particular piece of Yau's was > in First Intensity? My hunch is you're talking about a piece called > BUTCHER, BAKER, or CANDLESTICK MAKER, but I'd like to know more > specifically before I respond....Because I'm curious about what > you mean by "stereotypical" and why you think the piece you read is > so.....
> Thanks, chris stroffolino
>
> On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:
>
> I recently read something of Yau's in a mag--was it First Intensity? I'm > sorry--I can't recall, but it was perhaps from the new book & was the narrative > of a stripper & I found it rather disturbing in that the narrator was kind of > dumb & angry & thought highly of her breasts (no prob with that in & of itself) > & little of men in general--she was kind of a jaded line drawing of a > woman--with the interior monolog of a stereotype, which I suppose is okay, > though as this thread goes to show, the whole male/female or masc/fem question > is much more complex than Yau's piece implied, and I guess I just felt annoyed > that he was willing to throw another stereotype my way.
>
> louis stroffolino wrote:
>
> > Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
> > In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
> > that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
> > "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as > > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
> > in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
> > a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
> > and negotiating the representational anxieties that
> > might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
> > but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
> > chris stroffolino

On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:

Rah rah.

I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).

I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc. -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in patriarchal biases.

But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!

Until we get some intelligent conversation going to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship) we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)

Todd's comeback:

being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..) gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist > Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --

>
> never impersonal.
>
> Tb

↑ Index

715. david bromige

poets & patriarchy (Orpheus Deconstructed)

Mon 27 Jul 1998

Well, now, there, Orpheus, you're off to a fine start with your "Poetry, don't you start telling me about poetry. I know all about poetry, thank you very much." There's an end to discussion right there. No principle of exchange informs your procedures? You will be telling _us_ about poetry. And after all, we don't know all about poetry yet. Well, then, Yessir!

Permit me (or don't permit me) to take issue with certain of your pronouncements (or Papal bulls---).

"There's no obligation to accept society." I would say that you already are enjoying this obligation. I'm sure you use money, and that the electric company introduces power to your home, that when you turn the tap, potable water flows.- Some arm of society probably taught you to read and spell. And we know for a fact that you are on a Poetics List on the Internet.

"There's no obligation to accept women." Well, it all depends what you mean by "accept." At one level, you have to accept their existence and the exclusive function of childbirth, unless you were not of woman born.

"Poets don't need religion...[nor]...theories, and any form of dogma of the left or right." Yet later, you remark that all the American poets now considered great, were men whose politics were either informed by Christian viewpoint, or...whose politics were conservative. Can you clear up this apparent contradiction in your thought?

[Btw, Emily Dickinson? Not a man.]

You are correct in identifying my thinking with Lacan's, although I reject your assertion that my thinking is "a fickle and badly digested Lacan-ism." In fact, when you write "the penis is not the Phallus" it is your Lacan that sounds poorly digested, for although you know that "penis" and "phallus" are not synonymous in his terminology, it did not occur to you that they sometimes overlap, and that my aside indicated one of these times. After all, the penis is a source of the trouble we were discussing, and the phallus is a term for that trouble. It is simply too simple to make the sweeping statement you were anxious to make.

I think you might enjoy reading Lacan at greater length. His is a poetic sensibility; he was a rebel; he was a man.

But I am a poet and I would agree with you that as creators we need humble ourselves before noone. When in 1966 I wrote the poem "A Final Mission" (_The Ends of the Earth_, Black Sparrow, L.A., 1968), in which a B-52 transforms into a penis that then transforms into a naked woman, I had not read Lacan, although I had of course read Freud, and, beyond that, I had experience and the feelings it brings with it. When, a decade later, I _did_ begin to read Lacan, I was drawn on by my recognition of, if not a like-mindedness, then of a shared interest, and a sense that I might find articulated in ways beyond my abilities, insights I'd had.

I thought, you know, I might learn something. Even though I am a poet.

As to a damn' Dogleash : I had the chance to do further research just last night, before I fell asleep. I admire the pretty lawns and the well-kept-up cottages, and the alluring rivers and wave-swept beaches (where would England be today without its tourist industry?) where the corpses keep popping up. Dogleash looks like a wimp to me (whereas, despite his "culture," Morse doesn't) but that's dismissibly subjective. The bigger picture is that in a time of universal police-inspired repression, I balk at making a hero out of even the most sensitive and perspicacious of fictional cops. And that is political, no two ways about it. But I am entertained by the landscape, the lightning, the editing, the sets, the high-priced cars, the make-up and costumes, the simulation of emotions, the memorized dialogs, the shell-game plot, the simple notion that beneath respectable exteriors may lurk evil, a family of ferocious moles beneath one of those lovely lawns... Btw, what's the signification of the increase in corpse dissection in the police labs in all these English tec shows? Is that what market research shows the Brits want? And the rest of the viewing world?

David

↑ Index

716. Rachel Loden

Re: Saving Private Ryan

Mon 27 Jul 1998

Billy Little wrote:

> what i've heard is if > you took the money in the defence budget and just threw it in the street > more jobs would be created than spent as it is.

I spent three years as a full-time antinuclear activist (and lifelong red diaper baby peace creep etc. etc.), so please don't misunderstand my intentions here. But in a fabulous bit of irony, the internet on which you're reading these words began, and probably could only have begun, as a DARPA (Defense Advanced Research Program Agency) project. And writing from the heart of the Silicon Valley, as I do, it's clear that the internet is creating most of the "best" jobs. Which is not to say that such a chain of events is anything more than random, or that most defense spending is productive. It isn't.

Would that the question were simpler and less vexed--

Rachel

↑ Index

717. Tosh
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Tue 28 Jul 1998

> At 12:46 PM 7/27/98 -0700, MAXINE CHERNOFF wrote:
> I was pleased by their thoughtful
> response and can't imagine how "Saving. . ." could make anyone gungho to > go fight the next big one.
>
> but isn't the film more war-IS-horrible-but-by-god-someone's-got-to-do-it?
> someone's got to fight the Evil Forces.
> someone's got to be brave but there are no heroes here.
> there are no heroes here because we're just doing our duty.
> we're just doing our duty, and it is a bitter pill, and that is heroic,
> altho we're reluctant to accept such labels, because our boys suffer...
>
> "morally unambiguous"--what does that mean?
>
> I just saw the movie and I have to agree with the above. I thought the > whole film is a piece of hack work. War films by Sam Fuller, Kurbrick and > others are much better. The hype around the 'realistic' war scenes is > just that - images that have been used before and I think done in a better > way in the past. Something like Kurbrick's film is much more terrifying > than anything I saw this afternoon. Speilberg is a filmmaker without any > soul.

Tosh Berman

TamTam Books

↑ Index

718. Simon DeDeo
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Tue 28 Jul 1998

I'm just a young one who was hardly alive when the Falklands were going on; having never really been around during a serious war that my own country was involved with, I find a lot of the "war movies" (including more "gritty" ones such as Kubrick's) somewhat disturbing. Knowing how much the media distorts, say, the underground environmental movements such as Earth First!, which I'm familiar with, it's hard to take their fare in even more important aspects of an education.
The Killing Fields, for example, is a pretty good movie, but rather confused; as an emotional work, it's excellent, but in the way it blurs the actual events around, I think it fails in it's duty somehow; I remember having to explain to everyone in the rooom what was going on, who Pol Pot was, why everyone getting shot was wearing glasses -- even, at one point, why the Cambodians spoke French.

I realize that this is part of the viewer's problem, but it seems that, if the movie can have its effect without the audience needing to know what's going on, they might as well have made a movie about the Crusades and left it at that.

So what's left, if you exclude the motion picture?
For me, I've always found the craters in the side of the V&A in London the most eloquent "rememberance" of the Blitz; for those who haven't been there, imagine the NY Metropolitan Museum of Art with chunks of stone missing from the side. In the same way, physically being present in a concentration camp is a fundamentally different experience from watching the Spielberg recreation. There's something about physical presence -- or, at least, a representation of physical presence without a narrator -- that overwhelms the senses more than a report, or a film. Perhaps this is a historical approach similar to the Quaker "bearing witness"; it's not enough to be aware second hand.

That's not to say that fiction or poetry or filmmaking has no place in war or tragedy; far from it -- Doris Lessing, for example, has, to my mind, a brilliant depiction of just-post-war London in the Four Gated City. But when you deal with these events as a political being, as a "citizen", it seems as if a different approach is needed.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

719. Marjorie Perloff

Re: POETICS Digest - 26 Jul 1998 to 27 Jul 1998 (#1998-14)

Tue 28 Jul 1998

I wrote last night's message at white heat, mispelled "wear" (put "were") and so on so let me add a little p.s.

The question "Is there such a thing as a good war?" is a non-question. The real issue would be: Since we all know that war is hell for those who fight it, one must ask 1) what led up to War X? 2) could it have been avoided? (in this case, as Churchill shows so beautifully in THE GATHERING STORM) it probably could have been avoided f the West had armed and not let Hitler get away with his actions beginning in 1933. 3) Once war IS declared, can one turn one's back on those who are fighting, in essence, for your ability to continue living and say you won't participate?

Refusing to fight in the case of the Vietnam War was one thing; in the case of WWII it was quite another. There really wasn't much choice since the victory of the Germans was a very real possibility.

I've just been reading (for a conference at Yale in the fall) Eugene Jolas's auto-biography, about to be published. Jolas (the editor of transition, Joyce's great friend, poet, etc) was Alsatian, tri-lingual, describes movingly how his brother got into a fight right on the border with a Nazi as early as 1933 and was jailed for 2 years by the Nazis and tortured just for that. He describes how the whole literary and intellectual community felt when France fell and the Nazis marched into Paris. At a moment like that, you don't sit around and say, "Isn't war hell" and "is this a good war?" You just defend your friends as Beckett did by doing whatever you can.

Therefore I am wholly unimpressed with Spielberg's latest Star Wars venture--cops and robbers yet again. I don't care how "authentic" it is; it's a simulation meant to do--exactly what? Make people wonder if it was worthwhile? Make money? Whatever the motives, they're not very good ones and they totally distort what really went on in WWII.

Incidentally, the best movie on this question (not battle scenes but otherwise) aside from "River Kwai" is surely Ophuls' THE SORROW AND THE PITY. Splices actual war footage and occupation footage with interviews with the survivors, of all political stamps. It's hair-raising.

Basta!

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

720. k.a. hehir
haraldo de campos
Tue 28 Jul 1998

---

hi, after reading the excerpt from 'transient servitude' in the much talked about poems for millenienites, i want to perform it with another member of the modern languages dept. can any body point me to a parallel translation of the whole thing?

if it is a whole book, please excuse my ignomance.

i too am using the series(of 2) as an education.

still,
kevin

|----------| | Arsenic, a classic homicidal poison, occurs naturally | | in small amounts in many foods.
	The World of Chemistry Essentials

↑ Index

721. J. Kuszai
Meow Press is Moving!
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Meow Press is Moving!

* EFFECTIVE IMMEDIATELY *

Meow Press
Joel Kuszai, editor

POBox 948568
La Jolla, CA 92037

[redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/presses

↑ Index

722. David Kellogg
Re: POETICS Digest - 26 Jul 1998 to 27 Jul 1998 (#1998-14)
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Marjorie,

These young people today . . .

Seriously, though, I think we're seeing different things here. The question of "would I have gone" is not I think mainly directed at the actual past but at our imagined future. True, I haven't suffered or done anything "of that order," but why is the _question_ creepy? The answer may be.

You and I may actually converge on a question of "national feeling." I read Richard Rorty's _Achieving Our Country_ a few weeks ago and haven't been the same since.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

723. daniel bouchard
what doing there? why play that?
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Marjorie Perloff:

I haven't seen the film either, and don't intend to for similar reasons that you state. Actually, I haven't seen SCHINDLER'S LIST either; something about Spielberg's films make me feel really angry. (Except JAWS, which was relaxing and enjoyable.)

Perhaps I'm misreading your tone below but I think talking about "whether one would go" during peacetime is quite important. After all, if one wants to conscientiously object out of the military, you've got to do a lot of groundwork before the war comes. It's not just important, it's imperative.

The history lessons for many kids I knew were completely inadequate to stimulate such discussions. I'm talking about classroom lessons. Movies, however, provoked talk; however basic they might have been, the questions came up. The films were THE DEER HUNTER, FULL METAL JACKET (viewed one summer over 60 times with friends, we still have it largely memorized), BIG WEDNESDAY (believe it or not), and PLATOON. Generally, a lot of guys felt (feel) the gov't/military is a fucked lot of liars and dickheads but nevertheless they would go to war if called. (This was before the ROTC guys who were trying to pay for college found themselves in Saudi Arabia, "making the world safe for democracy.") One guy in particular I remember phrased it as "going to bat for you country." He was against senseless war (Korea, VietNam, the Gulf, assorted invasions of Latin American countries) but by-god you've got to "go to bat for you country." His expression as he said it still pains me. (Some kind of vague devotion to... something.)

So sit around. Talk about it. Watch war-is-hell films. Read THE ENORMOUS ROOM, ARMIES OF THE NIGHT, "Route," FROM HERE TO ETERNITY (you can watch this too). Find the documentaries that show how we began a systematic destruction of Iraqi society (and continue to do it).

Better to talk of these things over popcorn in the air-conditioned theater, than in the bunker thru your gas mas---I'm guessing anyway; rather not have to go both roads.

simplistic, naive, bourgeois,

- db

> Nothing like a lot of people who have > never had to fight or indeed do anything on that order to sit around and > discuss whether or not they would have gone, and yes, as we all know all > wars are evil! What else is new? It shows that it's time for a few history lessons for the kids...

Isn't there >something wrong with sitting comfortably in a theatre, warm enough, >well-fed enough, eating popcorn and watching "War is hell" films?
>
>Well--I'm sure I'm in the minority here but I had to sound off a bit....
<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
  fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

724. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: Her Privates We
Tue 28 Jul 1998

When Sam Fuller's WWII film _The Big Red One_ came out in the early 80's, he was asked the usual questions about the verisimilitude of war films and responded by saying that the ony way to give an audience any idea of "what it was like" would be to have rifllemen shoot into the audience.

As far as great battle scenes go, it's hard to imagine anyone improving on Welles's Battle of Shrewsbury in _Chimes at Midnight_, or Kurosawa's storming of the Third Castle in _Ran_. The best war film I've ever seen, bar none, and one that I'm not ashamed to say makes me weep unabashedly, is Kon Ichikawa's _Harp of Burma_, also a WWII film, also "anti-war," and yet, so much more, of course. (Also on WWII by Ichikawa and worth seeing: _Fires on the Plain_).

I look forward to the Spielberg, nevertheless. He's far too important a cultural barometer to dismiss out of hand, regardless of what one may think of him as a filmmaker. Besides which, teenage girls in LA used to mistake me for him when I wore my baseball cap. And me, with such a humble schnozz!

Patrick Pritchett

From: Marjorie Perloff
To: [redacted]

Subject: Re: POETICS Digest - 26 Jul 1998 to 27 Jul 1998 (#1998-14)
Date: Monday, July 27, 1998 4:09PM

Re: Saving Private Ryan, which I haven't seen and don't intend to see, having found SCHINDLER'S LIST quite phoney and manipulative:

Kent, if you want to see what WWII "felt like," look at some of the superb documentaries often shown on the History Channel. That was the real thing. Spielberg's simulations, as a letter to the editor in the LA Times pointed out today, are on the following order: in one battle scene the officers were helmets with insignias that, acc. to this letter writer who fought in the war, no officer ever would wear in battle because it showed up too much. A small detail but typical. I personally think the simulation of violent battle scenes is voyeuristic and also false. It does NOT tell you what war felt like. My husband Joe who was actually in WWII (tail end, missed the battles) in the Pacific Theatre will tell you how disappointed the 18-year olds like himself were to miss the battles because the felt they weren't being brave and heroic enough. Frank O'Hara, in the Pacific theatre at about the same time, writes the same thing in letters to his family. It may have been crazy, but there it is.

As for the "good war" question, as someone who wouldn't be here today if the British and US had not fought, I find the question really creepy. Would you have liked to live under the Nazis? Not a hypothetical question for the British in 1939. Nothing like a lot of people who have never had to fight or indeed do anything on that order to sit around and discuss whether or not they would have gone, and yes, as we all know all wars are evil! IWhat else is new? It shows that it's time for a few history lessons for the kids.

and, by the way, as endless letters in LA have been saying to Spielberg, who said there were no great war movies?? There have been dozens with amazing battle scenes but perhaps the greatest ever is the Bridge on the River Kwai. Not exactly a "recruiting" picture --it's very anti-war --but deals with real issues not, "Oh boy, war is hell." Isn't there something wrong with sitting comfortably in a theatre, warm enough, well-fed enough, eating popcorn and watching "War is hell" films?

Well--I'm sure I'm in the minority here but I had to sound off a bit....

xxx
Marjorie

↑ Index

725. Mark Prejsnar
Re: FEASTing on Oulipo
Tue 28 Jul 1998

---

i agreed with Laura, that the response about hopscotch seemed deliberately evaisive and even meaningless...

Quite frankly, as the person who brought the gender-in-Oulipo question up: i stick by what i felt to start with, that they have retained a strong bias characteristic of the time and place in which the workshop was founded: that most serious intellectuals most of the time, are going to be men. (or, put more simply, that women aren't really human, though of course few individuals would be able to admit that that is a core implication of their thoughts...)

luta continua, by Panteleimon!

mark

On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, Laura E. Wright wrote:

> And my calendar only said it was Take Your Houseplants For a Walk day...
>
> k.a. hehir wrote:
>
> Today, 27 July, is the feast of ...
>
>  Pantaleon or Panteleimon, martyr (c. 305?) - ...*
>
> But more seriously, re Rachel (soon to be sorely missed in Boulder) Levitsky's post on Oulipo and so on, in which she said:And by the way, since the question was asked, about women, a question that was on my mind as Harry was discussing the strict application of rules and limitation. I asked Harry if he thought the method appealed to men more than women. He scowled and asked me if I ever watched a game of hopscotch.
>
> I never was any good at hopscotch, or jacks, for that matter.
>
> Does anyone else gag when they read this? Why is it still acceptable to dismiss rather than addressing (or even refusing to address but owning up to it) questions if they relate to a gender or race or sexual orientation or etc. other than one's own? I'll take forthright bigotry over this sort of snideness any day.
>
> With curry all over my keyboard,
> Laura (I was never any good at hopscotch either but I loved logic) W.

> --
> Laura Wright
> Library Assistant
> Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
> 2130 Arapahoe Ave
> Boulder, CO 80302
> [redacted]
> * * * * * *
> "All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
> * * * * * *
> "It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

726. Mark Prejsnar
saving public poets in a pentagon world
Tue 28 Jul 1998

The observation that the internet emerged and in some sense could only have emerged out of the military machine, is accurate. By and large (as lots of you know) the research that allowed the creation of functional computers with vacuum tubes was almost entriely pentagon-driven. (During ol' wwii that we've been discussing, much of the idea was to be able to calculate long-range targeting of large cannons; almost immediately thereafter, of course, it became coordination of the US nuclear war machine.)

The shape of our lived world, is strongly determined by the reality of war. No war undertaken by the US machine can be better than problematic. Because of the huge weight of US coercion toward its 80 percent working population, we who seldom vote and have no money, and toward most of the world, on behalf of its capitalist elite, it is very, very unlikely that any war launched by the US machine would be supportable, right now. (Think of Grenada, Panama, even apart from murders of civilians in those incursions that are public record, but denied and buried by the state-subservient US media; the "turkey-shoot"...) Sociopolitical circ's change, and it is hard for me to imagine opposing a war against the fascist powers, yet it led to the two nuclear bombings, not to mention Dresden and other ariel murder-bombings; how can a thinking person, with any values at all, support that scale of murder of civilians?

For me, the best response in any medium to the way war has been accepted and integrated into an undemocratic century, is in the work of Susan Howe, especially in The Europe of Trusts (tho' elsewhere too). It is hard to convey how urgently her poetry grapples with the way gender and political weights determine violence, and direct it toward those who have not gained a measure of protection by becoming implicated in a violence of their own (or who have not had any chance to do so). One of the problems with gazing at history's violations and oppressions is, that they are too large and also tangled, to easily discuss; Howe brings the ability of words to frame silence into play, and thus through sounds and visual text images actually brings the wounded violence from history onto the page...

mark

↑ Index

727. daniel bouchard

How

Tue 28 Jul 1998

Mark,

despite it's being hard, can you give some specific examples? I'm most interested in where you say "Howe brings the ability of words to frame silence into play, and thus through sounds and visual text images actually brings the wounded violence from history onto the page..."

Perhaps one luminous example of sounds and visual text images actually bringing the wounded violence from history onto the page.

- db

At 11:47 AM 7/28/98 -0400, Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>It is hard to >convey how urgently her poetry grapples with the way gender and political >weights determine violence, and direct it toward those who have not gained >a measure of protection by becoming implicated in a violence of their own >(or who have not had any chance to do so). One of the problems with >gazing at history's violations and oppressions is, that they are too large >and also tangled, to easily discuss; Howe brings the ability of words to >frame silence into play, and thus through sounds and visual text images >actually brings the wounded violence from history onto the page...
<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]

fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

728. Fred Muratori
Saving Matt Damon
Tue 28 Jul 1998

I heard Tom Shales' review of _Saving Private Ryan_ on NPR, in which he concluded -- with the kind of original, stunning insight that earned him a Pulitzer -- that ultimately the film was no more than a bunch of actors playing with toy guns. So I guess the only way to make a truly convincing war movie -- which seems to be what everyone wants -- is to give the audience a 50/50 chance of getting out of the theater alive. Where is William Castle when we need him? As those of us old enough to remember "The Tingler" can attest, he wouldn't have been afraid to mine a few seats.

But seriously, movies like "Ryan" and "Schindler's List" are inevitable victims of their own overblown marketing apparatus. Would those who found the latter to be slick and exploitive have felt the same way if they stumbled across it -- unheralded, unanticipated -- in some Village art house, as though it were an independent film about which one had few or no expectations? What if the director had been Hal Hartley or John Sayles? What if Steve Buscemi played Schindler? The marketplace has generally made it impossible to approach Hollywood product without prior knowledge or assumptions. Maybe this is a good thing, since yes we are less likely to be manipulated if we already know how many stars, thumbs, whatever, a film has collected on its way through the media's meta-gauntlet. But it also results in weird reverse-experiences. Example: I was bored to sleep by "Wag the Dog," which I'd already been advised by everyone from Dan Schorr to Saddam Hussein was a great film, but absolutely loved "Wild Things" -- about which I'd known nothing beforehand, and only later discovered was a cheap, crass, artless pseudo-noir. It was also great, quirky fun. I'll see "Private Ryan" all right, but in about 3 or 4 years when I've forgotten what everyone tells me what I should think of it.

-- Fred M.

****

Fred Muratori
([redacted])
Reference Services Division
Olin * Kroch * Uris Libraries
Cornell University
Ithaca, NY 14853

WWW: http://fmref.library.cornell.edu/spectra.html
****

↑ Index

729. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: saving public poets in a pentagon world
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Just want to point out, re: Wizards book and other early sources I have here inc. some original papers, although the Net emerged out of the mil- itary, it very quickly developed a superstructure guided by computer scientists not particu- larly interested in such - news and telnet and email and a host of other direc- tions developed in the first 3 years for example including the online eliza game, etc. It's to easy to jump into the mili- tary model, and any close reading of the texts/papers/rfcs will dispel that.

Alan

↑ Index

730. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: POETICS Digest - 26 Jul 1998 to 27 Jul 1998 (#1998-14)
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Just out of curiosity, since you won't go see the film - and yet you blast it here - would you do the same for a book of poetry?

It always bothers me when people critique something from a position of absent authority.

Alan

↑ Index

731. henry gould
Re: Saving Matt Damon
Tue 28 Jul 1998

---

my favorite war movie was "The Mouse that Roared".
- Henry Gould

↑ Index

732. Mark Prejsnar
Re: How
Tue 28 Jul 1998

---

don't have time i think to manage a critical treatise on Howe. Most of Pythagorean Silence and The Defenestration of Prague (the first two of the the three long poems that make up Europe of Trusts) are examples.

m.

On Tue, 28 Jul 1998, daniel bouchard wrote:

> Mark,
>
> *despite it's being hard, can you give some specific examples? I'm most interested in where you say "Howe brings the ability of words to frame silence into play, and thus through sounds and visual text images actually brings the wounded violence from history onto the page..."*
>
> Perhaps one luminous example of sounds and visual text images actually bringing the wounded violence from history onto the page.
>
> - db
>
> At 11:47 AM 7/28/98 -0400, Mark Prejsnar wrote:
> It is hard to > *convey how urgently her poetry grapples with the way gender and political weights determine violence, and direct it toward those who have not gained a measure of protection by becoming implicated in a violence of their own (or who have not had any chance to do so). One of the problems with gazing at history's violations and oppressions is, that they are too large and also tangled, to easily discuss; Howe brings the ability of words to frame silence into play, and thus through sounds and visual text images actually brings the wounded violence from history onto the page...*
> <<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
> Daniel Bouchard
> The MIT Press Journals
> Five Cambridge Center
> Cambridge, MA 02142
>
> [redacted]
> phone: [redacted]
> fax: [redacted]
> <<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

733. Gwyn McVay representations, 'just wars'
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Oppen:

There is a simple ego in a lyric,
A strange one in war.

--and--

'A zero, a nothing':
Assassin.

Not nothing. At nineteen Crossing frontiers,

Rifleman of the suffering-- Irremediable suffering--of the not-great,

Hero and anti hero
Of our time

Despite all he has cost us
And he may have cost us very much

--and, following his famous sections in "Route" about Alsace:

Wars that are just? A simpler question: In the event, will you or will you not want to kill a German. Because, in the event, if you do not want to, you won't.

↑ Index

734. hery gould
the hostilities
Tue 28 Jul 1998

a poem by Edwin Honig from several yrs ago:

STARTING THE HOSTILITIES

We've cleared the wires where the hostages hung all night.
Feeling is up,
horses kick at the barn doors, youngsters in town
round up the old pistols, some test improvised bombs,
wives quietly clean rifles.

This is no child's tourney,
there'll be other casualties.
The veterans are growling
We'll tear out their hearts...

[Honig was a combat veteran in WW II]

General Sherman said it best.

↑ Index

735. Michael Magee
Re: Saving Matt Damon
Tue 28 Jul 1998

To Fred M's question, "What if Steve Buscemi played Schindler?"

Buscemi (in imagined dialogue with Hitler): What, you think you're some kind of authority figure now? You get to punch tickets at every port in Europe? Big Man. You miserbale fuck. Hey, these are the boundaries of your world, man; you pathetic piece of shit.

-m.

↑ Index

736. Hilton Manfred Obenzinger
Re: POETICS Digest - 26 Jul 1998 to 27 Jul 1998 (#1998-14)
Tue 28 Jul 1998

I will go see "Saving PR" as phony as it may be -- just as I saw Spielberg's list. The public discussion is crucial -- athough I'm afraid the end result will be to further undo the "Vietnam syndrome" and not etch more deeply the horrors of war.

I haven't stopped fighting WW2, and I wasn't even born yet.

I haven't stopped fighting against the Vietnam War either -- and I'm not entirely sure that one has ended either.

The wars don't end -- they just pause. The problem has been trying to escape the war mentality as much as the bloodshed.

Better flawed art -- and I do believe Spielberg keeps trying -- than none. There have been excellent war movies: The Power and the Glory, Platoon. Full-Metla Jacket, MASH.

Here's a suggestion for the high-roller producers on this list for movies not yet made: how about a movie about the torment of pacificsts during WW2; how about a movie that genuinely depicts the chaos, rage, fear, and battle of anti-war organizers during Vietnam. Has any movie depicted the anti-War movement accurately? I rage about the depiction of the movement in Forest Gump, for example.

"Medic! Medic! This soldier has been hit by lies!"

Hilton Obenzinger

↑ Index

737. dbkk
postfeminist playground
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Thanks to Linda R. for mentioning my piece at Postfeminist Playground--particularly since I didn't know it was there! They wrote to me ages ago about posting it, and it was a busy period in my life and I kind of lost the message in the piles of e-mail that rush in, and then when I got one of those "Live Dangerously?" messages from Eudora and was cleaning out my mailboxes, I found it and wrote back to them eons later that they could use it. They never wrote back, so I assumed that my flakiness killed the idea.

I like the site, and I like being published in non-avant-garde/poetry environs.

The piece is also in the new/long-overdue Poetics Journal--it was a talk I gave at New Langton Arts years ago--for an evening on Eros and Writing (curated by Kevin K.), and it was purposely written for a non-intellectual audience. When, after the talk Barrett asked if they could use it for PJ, I was surprised, since the piece is so determininately non-high-fallutin'. Barrett was still living here in SF and David Wojnarowitz was still alive--that long ago. The only reason I said it was okay to post it at Postfeminist Playground was because I assumed there would never be a cross-over between its audience and the PJ audience, so it's a bit disconcerting to have seen it mentioned here. I guess this goes to show, you never know . . .

Dodie

↑ Index

738. Rachel Loden
Re: saving public poets in a pentagon world
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Alan,

You're right about the interests of the computer scientists who developed the net. But who gave them the money? The principal funding source behind the Stanford AI Lab, MIT AI Lab, SRI, CMU etc. was DARPA. Money coming from other sources, like the National Science Foundation, was much less significant. The odd collection of graduate students, researchers, hackers and hangers-on who worked on programs such as Eliza, Emacs, telnet, email, etc. were, for the most part, directly or indirectly supported by DARPA money--they may not have been paid by that agency (though many were, including many who did not agree with military goals), but they used facilities and machines purchased with DARPA funds. So while we might want to sanitize that history, the truth is that net pioneers took the money and ran.

Rachel

Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote:
>
> Just want to point out, re: Wizards book and other early sources I have > here inc. some original papers, although the Net emerged out of the mil> itary, it very quickly developed a superstructure guided by computer > scientists not particularly interested in such - news and telnet and email > and a host of other directions developed in the first 3 years for example > including the online eliza game, etc. It's to easy to jump into the mili> tary model, and any close reading of the texts/papers/rfcs will dispel > that.
>
> Alan

↑ Index

739. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: saving public poets in a pentagon world
Tue 28 Jul 1998

On Tue, 28 Jul 1998, Rachel Loden wrote:

> funds. So while we might want to sanitize that history, the truth is > that net pioneers took the money and ran.
>
> Rachel
>
"sanitize"? Hardly. "ran"? as if they were getting away with something?
That's not how the history went down.

As far as the source of the money goes, yes, and there were additional funds from universities, etc. But that hardly made it a military enter- prise.

Alan

↑ Index

740. toddbaron
Re: film and war: in Hollywood--isn't that like ...
Tue 28 Jul 1998

---

war movies?

Kubrick's F.M. Jacket-- seems the only way to truly make a safe-distance piece of art--which all movies that attempt to make a war upon-- is to go inside the mind of those involved--which is a problem--seeing as they're actors by the time they hit the screen.

I'd add--as a suggestion to explore--seeing again--(for me) the film MASH--wehich explores not only the "idea" of war and the lives it actually affects and effetcs--but the interior chaos that the film develops as a piece of art itself. WHich was Altman's response--from years of doing TV--such as COMBAT!

Tb

"suicide is painless,,, it brings on many changes..."

↑ Index

741. Rachel Loden
Re: saving public poets in a pentagon world
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote:

> "sanitize"? Hardly. "ran"? as if they were getting away with something?
> That's not how the history went down.

Alan, I admire you (as I think you know) and don't really want to be in a pitched battle here. But yes--exactly as if they were getting away with something. My husband was at the Stanford AI Lab and that is how the history "went down." Money for research had to be procured from funding agencies, each of which had its own agenda. A successful grant proposal appeared to address this agenda in some way, even while the applicant's interests might be elsewhere.

> As far as the source of the money goes, yes, and there were additional > funds from universities, etc.

Re: "additional funds from universities," Stanford (for example) was heavily dependent on federal research money, and in fact made a killing charging high overhead rates on grants--70% or more. In computer science there was no direct research support other than professorial salaries.

> But that hardly made it a military enterprise.

Not a military enterprise, when colonels were doing project reviews? Call it what you want but the military picked up the tab, and had they not done so we would not have the net today--Congress never would have funded pure computer science research at that scale.

The power of Taoism in action, don't you think?

Rachel

↑ Index

742. Chris McCreary
address query/Joseph Torra
Tue 28 Jul 1998

Hello--

I'm in search of an address-- e or otherwise-- for Joseph Torra. Please backchannel any such info. Thanks much.

--Chris McCreary

↑ Index

743. Steve Shoemaker
Re: Her Privates We
Wed 29 Jul 1998

OK, i can't resist this thread no matter what horrible late-nite revelations it entails. I confess: i grew up in the sixties and seventies watching leftover WWII propaganda films on Saturday afternoon TV, trying to figure out what it mean to "be a man." My great-grandfather was a Marine, my grandfather was a Marine (and a boxer), my father merely served in Army, and i (the gradual de-generation shld be clear) am a vegetarian more-or-less-pacifist (tho, yes, i "would have gone"--interesting, since gender has so often, and recently, been a subject here that this is such a notable male response to the question of war and wars). Up until the age of 10 or 11 at least those explosive sacrifices and sacrificial explosions sure did make me tingle, and there is a lingering susceptibility. So one of my votes goes to a movie that manages to be both a war movie and an anti-war movie at the same time, Preminger's In Harm's Way. Yes, it features John Wayne strutting in his dress whites (opposite the stunningly down-to-earth Patricia Neal) but also glimpses him--hard to believe, even if it's brief--terrified and shell-shocked.

Steve

At 09:16 AM 7/28/98 -0500, you wrote:
>When Sam Fuller's WWII film _The Big Red One_ came out in the early 80's, he >was asked the usual questions about the verisimilitude of war films and >responded by saying that the ony way to give an audience any idea of "what >it was like" would be to have rifllemen shoot into the audience.
>
>As far as great battle scenes go, it's hard to imagine anyone improving on >Welles's Battle of Shrewsbury in _Chimes at Midnight_, or Kurosawa's >storming of the Third Castle in _Ran_. The best war film I've ever seen, bar >none, and one that I'm not ashamed to say makes me weep unabashedly, is Kon >Ichikawa's _Harp of Burma_, also a WWII film, also "anti-war," and yet, so >much more, of course. (Also on WWII by Ichikawa and worth seeing: _Fires on >the Plain_).
>
>I look forward to the Spielberg, nevertheless. He's far too important a >cultural barometer to dismiss out of hand, regardless of what one may think >of him as a filmmaker. Besides which, teenage girls in LA used to mistake me >for him when I wore my baseball cap. And me, with such a humble schnozz!
>
>Patrick Pritchett
> ----------
>From: Marjorie Perloff
>To: [redacted]
>Subject: Re: POETICS Digest - 26 Jul 1998 to 27 Jul 1998 (#1998-14)
>Date: Monday, July 27, 1998 4:09PM
>
>Re: Saving Private Ryan, which I haven't seen and don't intend to see, >having found SCHINDLER'S LIST quite phoney and manipulative:
>
>Kent, if you want to see what WWII "felt like," look at some of the >superb documentaries often shown on the History Channel. That was the >real thing. Spielberg's simulations, as a letter to the editor in the >LA Times pointed out today, are on the following order: in one battle >scene the officers were helmets with insignias that, acc. to this letter >writer who fought in the war, no officer ever would wear in battle >because it showed up too much. A small detail but typical. I >personally think the simulation of violent battle scenes is voyeuristic >and also false. It does NOT tell you what war felt like. My husband >Joe who was actually in WWII (tail end, missed the battles) in the >Pacific Theatre will tell you how disappointed the 18-year olds like >himself were to miss the battles because the felt they weren't being >brave and heroic enough. Frank O'Hara, in the Pacific theatre at about >the same time, writes the same thing in letters to his family. It may >have been crazy, but there it is.

>
>As for the "good war" question, as someone who wouldn't be here today if >the British and US had not fought, I find the question really creepy.
>Would you have liked to live under the Nazis? Not a hypothetical >question for the British in 1939. Nothing like a lot of people who have >never had to fight or indeed do anything on that order to sit around and >discuss whether or not they would have gone, and yes, as we all know all >wars are evil! IWhat else is new? It shows that it's time for a few >history lessons for the kids.
>
>and, by the way, as endless letters in LA have been saying to Spielberg, >who said there were no great war movies?? There have been dozens with >amazing battle scenes but perhaps the greatest ever is the Bridge on the >River Kwai. Not exactly a "recruiting" picture --it's very anti-war
> --but deals with real issues not, "Oh boy, war is hell." Isn't there >something wrong with sitting comfortably in a theatre, warm enough, >well-fed enough, eating popcorn and watching "War is hell" films?
>
>Well--I'm sure I'm in the minority here but I had to sound off a bit....
>
>xxx
>Marjorie
>
>

↑ Index

744. Tom Orange
How
Wed 29 Jul 1998

---

daniel b, mark p --

short of a critical treatise, would love to hear more on howe, if only recommendations of some useful secondary-critical takes on or ways into her work.

thanks,
t.

↑ Index

745. Keith Tuma
anglo-american poetic relations
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Thought I'd float a few reportage pixels concerning the Post-War Anglo-American Poetic Relations conference held at the University of London's Centre for English Studies July 9-11. Lots of good papers, though with so many good panels going on simultaneously it was impossible to catch all that I wanted to hear. There were readings by Bob Perelman and Jennifer Moxley as well, and to close out the conference James Tate and John Ashbery.

Good talks by list-folks Bob Archambeau (on Donald Davie at Stanford), Romana Huk (on Black British poetry), Alan Golding (Susan Howe and Ireland/England), and Marjorie Perloff (on signature and subjectivity in Silliman, Howe, Palmer, Scalapino, etc.). Peter Barry argued the need for a pedagogically-friendly anthology of experimental British poetry. Geoff Ward spoke on recent Ashbery; David Trotter read Olson beside Robert Smithson in an effort to rescue a "minimal" Olson. Robert Hampson followed the wanderings of cris cheek across artforms and nations; Rod Mengham spoke on Moxley's work with the poet in the room and offered his view of the wrestling with Keats etc. in JM's poetry. The word "cartoon," I think, was used as he thought about references to Greek myth in the poems, and this became an issue, though the paper was thoughtful and ultimately flattering.

Frank O'Hara now has some very good British critics and scholars, including (especially) Kevin Nolan, Shari Sabeti, and Graham MacPhee; absurdly enough, these people were scheduled against a panel on the New York School. I showed up for Alison Mark, Carol Watts, and Drew Milne on Veronica Forrest-Thomson (and also C. Bernstein in Milne's case) but refused to sit in the hallway to hear it. (No huge crowd, just a small room). Did get the core of it later from Milne.

Fascinated to learn at a different panel that there is now a cult of O'Hara in Poland--the O'Hara-ists even. This information courtesy of Krystyna Mazur of the American Studies Center, Warsaw University, whose excellent paper included her translations of some of these poets. Here's the opening lines of her translation of "Why I'm not a Grave-digger" by Derek Foks:

I am not a grave digger, I am a carpenter.
Why? I think I would rather be a grave digger, but I am a carpenter. I work with grave diggers. I meet one:

he is beginning to dig. I look at his shovel.
"Sit down and have a drink" he says. I sit down and drink. We drink. I look at his shovel. "You have tons of mud on it."
"I knew there's too much of something there."
"Oh." I go and the days go by and I drop in again.

And so on (and so on). I will resist the temptation to comment on this phenomenon or the world-wide status of O'Hara and O'Hara-influence. Ists and isms also came up with the Scottish Informationists, briefly discussed by Robert Crawford as he took up the poet-in-the-academy question.

Strangely, or maybe not so strangely, the two papers I'll probably remember the best were ones that left me scratching and squirming. Edna Longley went on for an hour complaining that Ezra Pound and American Poundians (Kenner etc.) had effectively but unfairly written W B Yeats out of dominant versions of modernism. Lots of good old American-bashing there, which is always fun and probably even called for in some instances, but the sumo wrestling Longley was describing seemed a little dated or out of touch with the emerging and plural modernisms now alive in American literary history and criticism as well as in contemporary poetic practice here or anywhere. Asked a question by your reporter, she refused to take seriously the existence of traditions of Irish modernisms other than the Yeats line. ("These people are confused" is part of what she said in response to my question about Brian Coffey, Denis Devlin, Catherine Walsh, Trevor Joyce, etc.)

And then there was Helen Vendler's talk, which immediately preceded the Tate-Ashbery reading (with no Q & A.). Vendler talked about Ashbery. She said she didn't like most of his followers because they have ideological or political or religious axes to grind.

However, it turns out that there now is an Ashbery-esque (if that's the word) poet Vendler can admire, though in the end he's more narrative than JA, more concerned with the body, etc. His name is Mark Ford, author of a book I haven't read and thus can't comment on (_Landlocked_, Chatto & Windus, 1992). Grateful if somebody would fill me in a little more.

But that's not all. Vendler also said that, before Mark Ford, England had had no good poet since World War II. Or so she has long thought, she said.

Yowie.

So much for Bunting or Prynne, Raworth or Roy Fisher, Alan Fisher or Denise Riley, Charles Tomlinson, Tom Leonard, Maggie O'Sullivan--even Philip Larkin or Geoffrey Hill or Lynette Roberts or Peter Redgrove or dozens and dozens of contenders. What a thing to say. Maybe it was honest. One wonders who or what she's read.

So much for Anglo-American poetic relations.

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

746. Mark Weiss
Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS
Wed 29 Jul 1998

This (the Yau) is shockingly cliched.

At 05:19 PM 7/27/98 -0700, you wrote:
>Hi Chris,
>
>Good call: it IS "Butcher, Baker..."
>
>"I'm a dancer who makes men spin in their graves, gets them to yell 'bay bee,' >whisper 'gosh' and 'honey,' and dream of 'whoopee.'"
>
>"Fate got warm with me, dealt me a flush. So I'm packaged right for the job. I have >an easygoing, cornstalk smile; I'm tall and tilted just enough so short guys don't >have to crane their little necks and hurt themselves. I can crouch and rise smooth as >a wave. Twist and twirl until their brains turn to jellyfish bobbing in a beer >bottle."
>
>"Early on I learned that men like to be swatted a little if you do it right and put >on your girl-next-door smile while shaking your assets just beyond reach. I had tits >and a smile that gave men cramps."
>
>This seems extraordinarily off-base as a representation of what a woman might think >when contemplating male reaction to her body. Admittedly I am one woman among many.

>But I wonder if perhaps Yau isn't closer to what men think women think.
>
>When I first read the piece I felt guilty about finding it an amusing read when it >was so clearly a man's idea of a woman's feelings. And as someone who's held the same >job as the narrator, I'm aware of how routinely dancers are stereotyped.
>
>It sounds like you felt differently about the piece, Chris. C'mon, spill it.
>
>Karen
>
>
>louis stroffolino wrote:
>
>> Dave Baratier asks what "cross-gendered identification" is.
>> I guess I just meant the term simply (if loosely) to mean
>> when someone of one gender and/or sex adopts or takes on
>> the voice of someone of another gender and/or sex....
>> I didn't say that YAU was NEW for doing that....
>> but then "make it new" has never been much of a standard for me
>> (see Mike Magee's intro to his mag COMBO for a view I largely share)
>>
>> Karen Kelley. COuld you tell me which particular piece of Yau's was >> in First Intensity? My hunch is you're talking about a piece called >> BUTCHER, BAKER, or CANDLESTICK MAKER, but I'd like to know more >> specifically before I respond....Because I'm curious about what >> you mean by "stereotypical" and why you think the piece you read is
>> so.....
>> Thanks, chris stroffolino
>>
>> On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:
>>
>> > I recently read something of Yau's in a mag--was it First Intensity? I'm >> > sorry--I can't recall, but it was perhaps from the new book & was the narrative >> > of a stripper & I found it rather disturbing in that the narrator was kind of >> > dumb & angry & thought highly of her breasts (no prob with that in & of itself) >> > & little of men in general--she was kind of a jaded line drawing of a >> > woman--with the interior monolog of a stereotype, which I suppose is okay,

>> > though as this thread goes to show, the whole male/female or masc/fem question
>> > is much more complex than Yau's piece implied, and I guess I just felt annoyed >> > that he was willing to throw another stereotype my way.
>> >
>> >
>> >
>> > louis stroffolino wrote:
>> >
>> > > Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
>> > > In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
>> > > that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
>> > > "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as >> > > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
>> > > in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
>> > > a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
>> > > and negotiating the representational anxieties that
>> > > might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
>> > > but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
>> > > chris stroffolino
>> > >
>> > > On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:
>> > >
>> > > > Rah rah.
>> > > >
>> > > > I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the
>> > > > "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the >> > > > original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as >> > > > an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I >> > > > have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).
>> > > >
>> > > > I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so
>> > > > many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some >> > > > appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other
>> > > > 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc.
>> > > > -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in >> > > > patriarchal biases.

>> > > >
>> > > > But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting
>> > > > more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing >> > > > experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what >> > > > Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist
>> > > > realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that >> > > > gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the >> > > > counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop
>> > > > stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the >> > > > Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!
>> > > >
>> > > > Until we get some intelligent conversation going >> > > > to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship)
>> > > > we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it >> > > > isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it
>> > > > made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)
>> > > >
>> > > > Todd's comeback:
>> > > >
>> > > > > being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..)
>> > > > > gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role
>> > > > > or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and >> > > > > confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or
>> > > > > "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that
>> > > > > "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or >> > > > > female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in >> > > > > poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male >> > > > > narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their >> > > > > way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that >> > > > > economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are

>> > > > > structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist >> > > > > Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power >> > > > > elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are >> > > > > not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
>> > > > >
>> > > > > never impersonal.
>> > > > >
>> > > > > Tb
>> > > > >
>> > > >
>> >
>
>

↑ Index

747. George Bowering
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Refresh my memory. Did the US army have integrated units in WW2?

> I haven't actually seen the movie, but I've heard that there are no African American or Chicano soldiers shown in any of the larger battle scenes. Strange since Spielberg claimed to try and make this movie as close to reality as possible and quite a large number of the soldiers that fought in WWII were African American and Chicano or Latino.
>
> -Joanna Sondheim
>
> **********
> "It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am."
> -Edith Sodergran
> **********

George Bowering.
,
2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

748. George Bowering
Re: FASTing on Oulipo
Wed 29 Jul 1998

> Quite frankly, as the person who brought the gender-in-Oulipo question up: i stick by what i felt to start with, that they have retained a strong bias characteristic of the time and place in which the workshop was founded: that most serious intellectuals most of the time, are going to be men.

I think that that use of the word "intellectuals" is not quite adequate here. The Oulipo founders were interested in mathematics, and I remember that during "that" time, for various reasons, not as many women as men were excited about mathematics. My first-year math prof was a woman, but there were not a lot of young women in my class, if I remember right.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

749. George Bowering
Re: ww2)
Wed 29 Jul 1998

> Refusing to fight in the case of the Vietnam War was one thing; in the case of WWII it was quite another. There really wasn't much choice since the victory of the Germans was a very real possibility.

And I can remember, I can tell you, that we were glad when the US finally got into it.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

750. L. MacMahon and T.R. Healy

A Review of Trevor Joyce's Syzygy.

Wed 29 Jul 1998

The following review appeared in The Irish Times, Saturday July 25th.

Syzygy by Trevor Joyce is published by Wild Honey Press and is available from me for £3.50 sterling, or $5 currency or by the usual arrangement.

It may also be purchased from Billy Mills (address below) or from Peter Riley.

Apologies for cross posting.

Randolph Healy

* A Modernist Eye

A Review Of Trevor Joyce's Syzygy By Michael Smith

The term " Modernism", as applied to the arts, has become so problematic that one scarcely knows what it means any more. So far as literature is concerned, however, I am taking Modernism to mean the use of language that registers the uncertain status of common-sense reality or indeed of any reality. Put another way, it is the use of language that questions the referentiality of language, that no longer treats words as the unquestioned naming of things or actions that are definitely "out there".

With that in mind, and allowing for some notable exceptions, one is forced to admit that not a great deal of contemporary Irish literature, and in particular Irish poetry, can lay claim to being Modernist. The general practice has been and continues to be an unthinking use of language, language as conditioned reflex, with the implicit assumption of an unequivocal reality accessible to agreed by all. An analogy for this literary condition might be painting that ignored the invention of the camera. Of course, the academics, or many of them, know what has been happening in our understanding of language. But by and large their knowledge stays in the lecture-rooms of academe; and for the purpose of "communicating" with the great uninitiated public, in newspaper reviews, for example, these academics are only too willing to fall back on the accepted "norms" of language and literary appreciation.

Thus we still read about the "realistic grittiness" of novelist X or "the sombre portrayal" of Irish life by writer Y or "the sensuousness" of Z's poetry; and we are smugly back in the age of Victoria. Joyce and Beckett did their thing, and Bord Fáilte are truly grateful to them, but there are more important matters to think about, thank you very much, like selling the film rights and making lots of money and being quoted by politicians and appearing on chat shows and being relevant to the Northern situation, etc.

It is not my intention to malign anyone. My purpose, rather, is to attempt to diagnose, or at least point to, an Irish cultural, specifically literary, condition: language as a quantifiable tribal property, to be bought and sold as any other commodity. This is a serious condition, well worth attention. If, as Auden once said, echoing Pound, poets are the antennae of their society, a society is ill-served by poets who give society what it wants and not what poets believe to be true. It may be that this linguistic conservatism is not unique to the Irish poetic situation, but many Irish poets have bough into the myth that the Irish are linguistically better endowed than other peoples, that poetry comes to them more "naturally", that they have simply to lay bare their soul in metaphorically neatly packaged, emotionally laden vignettes and, voilà! That magical object, the poem, makes its appearance.

As a result of the dominance of this poetic conservatism, experimentation among Irish poets is indeed a rare thing. And this state of affairs is all the more regrettable when one considers that two of the greatest literary experimenters of the 20th century, Joyce and Beckett, were Irish.

All of which brings me, albeit circuitously, to the latest work by the little-known (for commercial reasons but probably the most experimental of contemporary Irish poets - Trevor Joyce. Syzygy, Joyce's latest work, is presented as a text comprising three parts: the first two are verse, titled respectively "The Drift" and "The Net", while the third, two pages of prose, provides "Some Notes".

"The Drift" is a sequence of a dozen brief poems, whose tone and manner are recognisably that of the traditional lyric, though here they are stripped down and intensified in passages of puzzling if fascinating density. This, for example, is the seventh of those lyric pieces, perhaps an elegy, perhaps not:

in three quarters now you lie lacking a fourth of your voice that flew at once away not a tremor breeds with the marble orchard and is it that this simply is either finished or not or not yet begun perhaps truly not begun twig of bone empty still until there come the words now quite forgotten whats the air the sun leans down and lifts the sea

"The Net" is a single, unpunctuated passage of twenty-four three-line verses from which this is a representative segment:

squares mesh of close actions griefs are grounds the twig of bone of time and the sun sun where they sleep centuries new abstracts attentions of clocks so that eventually stay empty still tamed rage is heavy influence leaves howling as wood does not rise

you attend and to the distracted mum unerringly elements turn the tempting until there come reduced broke sometimes fierce the dream on the grass hearing each hour and the child to the infinities metals in parks only perhaps along the words over and weary the shadow is mistaken disordered

The relation between the first two parts is complex and rigorously worked. They are composed of the same phrases, identically, with the order of those phrases mapped between the two parts through an abstract symmetrical patterning, which is easier to sample than to describe. If you focus on the mid-lines of the verses quoted from "The Net" you will see familiar phrases from "The Drift" recur: "twig of bone empty still/until there come the words" intercut with phrases from adjacent sections of part one: "intelligence and griefs are tamed/rage is reduced in parks (#5), brief zones/of time and influence/the tasty metals of the air (#6), and fishing the empty grounds/the heavy elements/turn over in their sleep (#8)".

The effect of this structuring is strange and, so far as I know, unique in poetry. "The Notes" refer the reader to the work of the 14th-century French poet and composer Machaut, but surely it is unnecessary to reach back in this manner to justify a contemporary poem, merely because it is so densely ordered. The gesture is required only because of the inertness and insensitivity to form of so much current work. But the invocation of musical analogues is suggestive, as "The Drift" and "The Net" pick up, interweave, drop and resume their themes, touching on love, death, time, chaos, order and dirt in the manner of a fugue.

"There is nothing either finished or not yet begun", says "The Net", and this is borne out in Syzygy, which can never find a place of rest, apart from the dynamic of the poem. "The Notes" strain to bed the details of the lyrics in the facts of the world, granting them a stability at the cost of narrowing their reference, but "The Net" explodes this tendency, ripping the measured words from the territories they have ordered, where they are safe, and freeing them to the use of the imagination, at the cost of imperilling their familiar purchase on the world. And is it that this simply is words asks "The Net". It is not.

You won't find this book in any Irish bookshop, but you can order it from Poetry Distributor, Billy Mills, 29 Grosvenor Court, Templeville Rd., Templeogue, Dublin 6W.

↑ Index

751. Simon DeDeo
Re: angling american poetic redactions
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Mark --

Not sure if you know this, but Vendler has been a champion of Yeats (over, indeed, Pound and Eliot) both in the classroom and in her published work. I spent a term studying WBY under her at Harvard.
In general, before you start wrecking on a particular person, remember that, chances are, someone else on the list is going to know them; a lesson I learnt quickly (hi, Henry.) Interesting, right before I came to University, I read the APR article that went house on Vendler; when I studied under her, I was much impressed by the meanspiritedness of the assesment.

Since when did we get the idea that professors
in the academy should be responsible for keeping up with the Protean world of contemporary poetry? Isn't it enough for them to apply their knowledge and skill to the poets they like? We accept the academies as repositories of history, but I'm not sure I want to accept them as scribes of the "accepted" poetry,
whether that be Zukofsky, Eliot or Keats.

It was a monumental break in my own life when I realized that my poetic education has guided me down a very particular path, and that, from a height, one could look down and see thousands of different tracks through the wood; to criticize a particular critic for missing contemporary or near-contemporary trends seems to be akin to complaining that you want a better hand-holder.
Certaintly, critics hold power over the NYT Sunday Book Review crowd, but, hell, they're the direct genetic descendents of the people who read Swinburne.

best wishes,

Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

752. Robert Archambeau
Re: anglo-american poetic relations
Wed 29 Jul 1998

> Ashbery read a few of his poems at MIT last fall (along with Holderlin, Moore, Bishop, and Tate)

Ah, I remember it well. Holderlin drank too much at the reception and started hitting on Elizabeth Bishop -- good think Marianne arrived with her impeccable manners and defused the situation.

RA

↑ Index

753. Michael Magee
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Wed 29 Jul 1998

No, they didn't - Truman integrated the troops, but did so either just before or during the Korean War. The fact that Speilberg didn't show ant minority soldiers crossed my mind too, but since he was basically showing one company getting crushed on D-Day I didn't consider it a malignantly ahistorical thing. As for the film in general, which I haven't yet chimed in on, I'll stand up for those first 25 minutes - Anthony Lane points out smartly in the new NYer that the power of that sequence stems not from its "realism" by from its stylized and rhetorical emphasis on the randomness and essential unknowability of war/violence: to wit: there is almost no dialogue for these 25 minutes, & as Lane points out, unlike Peckinpah, Speilberg doesn't fetishize the wound (I'm a big fan of The Wild Bunch but Lane is absolutely right about this) - Speilberg moves from shot to shot so quickly you don't have time as a viewer to admire the aesthetics of the good kill shot. So that sequence is to my mind damn good filmmaking with some real social value. Unfortunately, I though the rest pretty much sucked & agree with Lane that what would have been really striking (but, alas, from Speilberg impossible!) would have been a whole 2 hr movie based on the same style as that beginning, with some equally random and disjunctive downtime. For me the worst part of the film was the present-day sequence which bookends the WW2 story - sugary and silly, Speilberg can't help but hammer home a redemptive message which in light of the Normandy scene feels completely bogus. But that Normandy scene will stick with me. -m.

According to George Bowering:
> > Refresh my memory. Did the US army have integrated units in WW2?
>
>
> >I haven't actually seen the movie, but I've heard that there are no
> >African American or Chicano soldiers shown in any of the larger battle > >scenes. Strange since Spielberg claimed to try and make this movie as > >close to reality as possible and quite a large number of the soldiers that > >fought in WWII were African American and Chicano or Latino.
> >
> >-Joanna Sondheim
> >
> >
> >
>
>*******
> >"It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am."
> >-Edith Sodergran
>
>*******
>
>
>
>
>
> George Bowering.
> ,
> 2499 West 37th Ave.,
> Vancouver, B.C.,
> Canada V6M 1P4
>
> fax: [redacted]
>

↑ Index

754. Robert Archambeau
Re: angling american poetic redactions
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Keith Tuma wrote:

> There's an anthology of younger > Scots as well, though I don't have it in front of me and forget the title > and like so much else it's unavailable in the US anyway.

Do you mean _Dream State_, published by Polygon?

Hard to find in the States, but not impossible -- I ordered mine from that Orwellian-yet-useful behemoth, Amazon.com

Bob Archambeau

↑ Index

755. dee morris
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Wed 29 Jul 1998

One person's experience: my father spend a part of WWII at Vancouver Barracks training "colored" officers to lead "colored" troops in the Quartermaster Corps. When these men were shipped out, their mission was to follow the white troops onto the beaches of Normandy and "clean up," meaning, it seems, bury people and get blown up by mines.

> Refresh my memory. Did the US army have integrated units in WW2?
>
> I haven't actually seen the movie, but I've heard that there are no
> African American or Chicano soldiers shown in any of the larger battle > scenes. Strange since Spielberg claimed to try and make this movie as > close to reality as possible and quite a large number of the soldiers that > fought in WWII were African American and Chicano or Latino.
>
> -Joanna Sondheim
>
> **********
> *
> "It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am."
> -Edith Sodergran
> **********
> *

George Bowering.

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

756. Poetics List
Kinsella on Prynne (fwd)
Wed 29 Jul 1998

_____ For those interested I'll be placing the brief introductory article on J.H. Prynne by Rod Mengham and myself on my website tomorrow - it's from the forthcoming Bloodaxe catalogue and lists publication details for the forthcoming Poems, includes quotes, a Prynne poem, etc.

J.H. Prynne
Poems
August 1998 234 x 156mm 432 pages
1 85224 492 5 £25.00 cloth
1 85224 491 7 £12.00 paper
Bloodaxe/Folio (Salt) co-publication
Australia: Fremantle Arts Centre Press

Best,
JK

John Kinsella
Churchill College
Cambridge CB3 ODS
England
http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Square/8574/

↑ Index

757. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Having seen the film last night, I pretty much concur with Michael's assessment. The opening set piece is a true tour de force. Unfortunately, it operates more or less independently of the rest of the film, which leads me to wonder if it was even a part of the original script. Spielberg afterall is somewhat obsessed with WWII ("1941," "Empire of the Sun," "Always" (remake of a Guy Named Joe), the first and third Indiana Jones films, and "Schindler." This obsession goes to the heart of his putative vision, as I read it, namely the longing for the restoration of a lost moral order. Unlike other filmmakers who have grappled with this same issue, though, this longing is unsupported by any intellectual toughness and inevitably decays into mushy nostalgia.

After the opener, the film becomes a genre rehash, with on-the-nose squad hijinks, wisecracks and various perils. A few good scenes stand out; though the script is generally very weak, very broad. The acting, though, is superb (really, the best thing in the film). Except for Matt Damon, who is badly miscast - too iconic, as my wife remarked. And Spielberg does have a genius for framing the ideological moment in a very affecting way. The film is being trumpeted of course as non-ideological - though the opening and closing shots are of a backlit, sun-bleached US flag. So much for that. Really, the whole thing is a gigantic ghost story. Only it fails to engage the issues of memory and how the dead continue to exact a toll on the living. If it had ventured more deeply into that territory, it could have been quite good.

Patrick Pritchett

From: Michael Magee
To: [redacted]
Subject: Re: Saving Private Ryan
Date: Wednesday, July 29, 1998 5:48AM

No, they didn't - Truman integrated the troops, but did so either just before or during the Korean War. The fact that Speilberg didn't show ant minority soldiers crossed my mind too, but since he was basically showing one company getting crushed on D-Day I didn't consider it a malignantly ahistorical thing. As for the film in general, which I haven't yet chimed in on, I'll stand up for those first 25 minutes - Anthony Lane points out smartly in the new NYer that the power of that sequence stems not from its "realism" by from its stylized and rhetorical emphasis on the randomness and essential unknowability of war/violence: to wit: there is almost no dialogue for these 25 minutes, & as Lane points out, unlike Peckinpah, Speilberg doesn't fetishize the wound (I'm a big fan of

The Wild Bunch but Lane is absolutely right about this) - Speilberg moves from shot to shot so quickly you don't have time as a viewer to admire the aesthetics of the good kill shot. So that sequence is to my mind damn good filmmaking with some real social value. Unfortunately, I though the rest pretty much sucked & agree with Lane that what would have been really striking (but, alas, from Speilberg impossible!) would have been a whole 2 hr movie based on the same style as that beginning, with some equally random and disjunctive down-time. For me the worst part of the film was the present-day sequence which bookends the WW2 story - sugary and silly, Speilberg can't help but hammer home a redemptive message which in light of the Normandy scene feels completely bogus. But that Normandy scene will stick with me. -m.

↑ Index

758. Mark Prejsnar
angling american poetic redactions
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Thanx to Keith Tuma for a superb conference report...

Are you sure the entire Polish Oharista movement isn't someone's idea of a joke? Sounds like it (fairly amusing one too) Maybe it's just that the work of Yasusada has badly destabilized the epistomology of improbable poetic identities...Or maybe i just feel defensive about the homeland of my parents' families! (Poland, i mean, not NYC...)

The Vendler stuff is a stitch. She is truely the Ronnie Reagan of poetic reaction: no matter how much of a caricature people turn her into, she goes several steps further in banality and stupidity...I realize that by this point (as happened with that other great communicator) it has become tedious to point out how bankrupt her drivel is. But 1. like Ronnie, she holds enuff power that it's kinda hard to ignore her; 2. she really tends to sum up very well the most conservative trends in the literary establishment.

As a huge McDiarmid fan, not in touch with the last couple of decades of Scottish work, i found the "informationist" tag intriguing.. Anyone know of a good anthology or other source to focus on recent Scottish work?

...have we really overthrown Yeats and cast him into the outer darkness, in favor of Pound? Has the treatment of Yeats in academe really changed so radically since i went to college in the seventies?? I realize many of us working poets are more likely to read Zuke or H.D., but has the establishment really dropped the adulation of WBY that i grew up with? (...that wouldn't be so bad a thing, not because i don't love much of Yeats, but because like TSE and others he had a cult stretching over quite a few decades in mid-20th century academe that was excessive, boring and used up more of students' energy than any single poet should..)

tendentiously,

mark

↑ Index

759. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: Zbigniew Herbert dies
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Zbigniew Herbert, 73, a Poet Who Sought Moral Values

By HARVEY SHAPIRO

<Picture: Z>bigniew Herbert, the Polish poet and essayist who insisted that civilization depended on artists' staking out clear moral positions resistant to the winds of history and ideology, died yesterday in Warsaw. He was 73.

The cause of death was not disclosed, but a longtime friend and fellow poet, Krzysztof Karasek, said Mr. Herbert had asthma and serious circulatory problems.

The Polish poet Wislawa Szymborska, the 1996 Nobel laureate, told the PAP news agency that Mr. Herbert was a "great artist and thinker" and that he would have an eternal place in Polish literature.

Mr. Herbert's poetry defied categorization. It spoke for no philosophy or school and favored no party or dogma. Although he was a political poet who explored the mechanisms of power and ideology, he resisted Fascism and Communism, nationalism and the church and was willing to pay the price of such moral independence. He gave the impression of being a man alone, answerable to no one except his own conscience.

Place and history determined Mr. Herbert's career as a poet. He lived much of his adult life under the ideologies of National Socialism and Communism. The impingement of the political, the political becoming personal, informed all of his work.

To the chaos of the 20th century, to which he was a personal witness, Mr. Herbert brought a mind trained in law and disciplined by classical literature. It was a mind that would not succumb to self-pity or nostalgia, a mind steeled against chaos.

In "Pebble," one of his best-known poems, he wrote:

Pebbles cannot be tamed to the end they will look at us with a calm and very clear eye

Those lines could describe his stance as a writer. The poet Robert Hass once said that Mr. Herbert wrote as if it were "the task of the poet, in a world full of loud lies, to say what is irreducibly true in a level voice."

Mr. Herbert was born in the city of Lvov, then part of Poland and now in Ukraine, in 1924. (The name Herbert is pronounced as in English; in fact, Mr. Herbert claimed the 17th-century English poet George Herbert as a distant relation.) In 1939, as a 15-year-old, he experienced the annexation of his hometown by the Soviet Union. When the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact collapsed, the city was then seized by the Germans. At the end of the war it was recaptured by the Soviet Union, which retained control over the Baltic republics.

Mr. Herbert wrote his first poems during the Nazi occupation of Poland. As Stanislaw Baranczak, a critic who teaches at Harvard University, has observed, "The image of a city under siege, one of the several symbols that constantly recur in his work, has a historical poignancy that makes it much more than just a figure of speech."

Mr. Herbert took part in the Polish resistance to the Nazi occupiers. When the war ended, he enrolled at the University of Cracow, where he received a master's degree in economics. Later he earned a law degree from Nicolas Copernicus University and a degree in philosophy from the University of Warsaw.

Stalinist restrictions on writers after the war and Mr. Herbert's refusal to bend to Communist dogma and the party functionaries in the Writers' Union impeded the publication of his poetry for 15 years.

During that period he developed his distinctive voice, a style, as the author Eva Hoffman has written, "that functions as a sort of antidote to the dangers of sentimentality or inflation -- restrained, ironic, stripped of punctuation, averse to 'tricks of the imagination' and passionate in its insistence on precision."

His first three volumes of poetry, "A String of Light" (1956), "Hermes, a Dog and a Star" (1957) and "The Study of an Object" (1961), established him as a dominant figure in Polish literature. His search for moral and humanistic values would make a strong impression on his contemporaries and earn him an international audience.

Many poems in those books also appear in the volumes of his poetry available in English: "Selected Poems," translated by Czeslaw Milosz and Peter Dale Scott (Ecco Press, 1986); "Selected Poems" (Oxford Press, 1977), translated by John and Bodgana Carpenter; "Report From the Besieged City," translated by the Carpenters (Ecco Press, 1985), and "Mr. Cogito," also translated by the Carpenters (Ecco Press, 1993).

Mr. Herbert was a modernist in that he wrote in free form, without rhyme and meter. He was an antimodernist in that his work frequently jumped off from Greek myth, Shakespeare and the Latin poets, and in his refusal to ape chaos. In an essay in praise of the great Dutch painters of the 17th century, he explained, "A major part of contemporary art declares itself on the side of chaos, gesticulates in a void, or tells the story of its own barren soul."

Against this attitude, he posed the painters of that period in the Netherlands, who "believed in the purposefulness of their work and the possibility of interhuman communication. They affirmed visible reality with an inspired scrupulousness." And they did that, he asserted, "as if the order of the world and the revolution of the stars, the permanence of the firmament, depended on it."

Yet there is nothing in Mr. Herbert's poetry to suggest that a traditional, conventional art, one imitating the art of the past, could carry today's meanings. On the contrary, in one of his strongest poems, "Apollo and Marsyas," he describes how pain can dictate a new art. Marsyas, a mortal in the myth on which the poem is based, loses a musical contest to Apollo, the Greek god of beauty, who signifies classical control ("absolute ear/versus immense range"). Apollo punishes Marsyas for daring to challenge his authority by flaying him alive. Describing Marsyas's pain, Mr. Herbert writes:

only seemingly is the voice of Marsyas monotonous and composed of a single vowel Aaa

in reality Marsyas relates the inexhaustible wealth of his body

bald mountains of liver white ravines of aliment

As Apollo departs to that sound, he wonders "whether out of Marsyas's howling/there will not someday arise/a new kind/ of art . . . "

And to describe the effect of that art, Mr. Herbert writes:

suddenly at his feet falls a petrified nightingale

he looks back and sees that the hair of the tree to which Marsyas was fastened is white completely

And so the poem ends, moving the myth completely into the 20th century. The pared-down rhetoric, its terse description, is classical (seen with Apollo's eye) but the poem is savage, because it was written in a savage time and because its author believed that art must find a way to reconcile beauty with the reality of human suffering.

Mr. Herbert's stark rhetoric is more than a stylistic characteristic. It signals a moral concern, openly stated in many of his poems, that the path to such reconciliation is to see the world clearly, steadily, with an eye toward understanding it and then writing about it truthfully. His poem "Mr. Cogito and the Imagination," for example, begins:

Mr. Cogito never trusted tricks of the imagination the piano at the top of the Alps played false concerts for him

(He took "the piano at the top of the Alps" from Rimbaud's "Illuminations," a source of the surreal in modern art.)

Later in the poem Mr. Herbert focuses on his theme:

he adored tautologies explanations
idem per idem

that a bird is a bird slavery means slavery a knife is a knife death remains death

Mr. Cogito inhabits many of Mr. Herbert's poems, a character in search of moral certainties. He is an ordinary man who enjoys reading trashy newspaper stories and who fails when he tries transcendental meditation: "his stream of consciousness brings up detritus like a tin can." He is also Mr. Herbert's mouthpiece, a way of distancing himself from himself.

In the Cogito poems Mr. Herbert became his own subject, but they are not confessional poems in the tradition of Robert Lowell, Sylvia Plath and Anne Sexton. They do not dramatize the ego; they dramatize a mind and the way it looks at the world. Ultimately, they return us to the world, as do all of his poems, and the search for what is durable in our lives, for what is attainable.

In "The Envoy of Mr. Cogito," he appears to be looking back on his life in Poland during the long years of war and repression. It begins:

Go where those others went to the dark boundary for the golden fleece of nothing- ness your last prize go upright among those who are on their knees among those with their backs turned and those toppled in the dust

you were saved not in order to live
you have little time you must give testimony

Mr. Herbert was co-editor of a poetry journal, Poezja, from 1965 to 1968 but resigned in protest of anti-Semitic policies. He traveled widely through the West and lived in Paris, Berlin and the United States, where he taught briefly at the University of California at Los Angeles. In one of his essay collections several years ago, "Still Life With a Bridle," translated by the Carpenters (Ecco Press, 1991) he goes in search of the Dutch bourgeois in the golden age of Dutch culture, the 17th century.

After a break of several years from writing, Mr. Herbert, who is survived by his wife, Katarzyna, wrote new poems in 1997 when his health improved slightly. The result was "Storm's Epilogue," published this year.

Mr. Herbert once gave this advice to younger writers: "Life is more complicated, more mysterious and more convoluted than the party, the army, the police. Let us detach ourselves a little from this truly horrible everyday reality and try to write about doubt, anxiety and despair."

↑ Index

760. Mark Prejsnar
S. Howe, or, they laffed when i sat down in the critics' chair
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Let's see...There are very good essays on her in John Taggart's book Songs of Degrees and in one (or more) of Perloff's books; and (i'm pretty sure) in Hank Lazer's Opposing Poetries.

(As hank knows, i'm working my way thru OP, while immersed in about 10 other projects..And everything in it is well-focused and exceptionally useful and lucid, in a perloffian vein you might say; if i misremember about there being a howe essay, he or someone can correct me..As always the book is at home and i can't double-check it today...)

I would just read the stuff ....i'm not sure you will see what i consider so remarkable in her work, if you need arguments to convince you.

The important books are: The Europe of Trusts; Singularities; and The Non-Conformist's Memorial. Then you can go back to the early poetry collected in the recent book Frame Structures. Much of it is brilliant, some a bit apprentice.

I reduced the atlanta poets group to raucous laughter one night by declaring that i considered Howe the most important living US poet. Not that they dislike her work: it was the idea that anyone thought he could make such a claim about any one poet, that had 'em rolling in the ailes. These pomo kids, what're'ya gonna do?? No respect for their elders like in my time... Jeeeez

Anyway, she is that, and more.

Mark Prejsnar

On Wed, 29 Jul 1998, Tom Orange wrote:

> daniel b, mark p --
>
> short of a critical treatise, would love to hear more on howe, if only recommendations of some useful secondary-critical takes on or ways into her work.
>
> thanks,
> t.

↑ Index

761. Simon DeDeo

Re: Was it a "good war"?

Wed 29 Jul 1998

Regarding all these threads on different war movies and the "good versus bad" wars -- there still seems to me, as I wrote in a previous e-mail -- a fundamental difference between fictional recreations of war (or the semi-"documetary" versions that Speilberg churns out) and the "representation" of war itself. By the very virtue that you are watching something 'unreal', projected onto a screen or written in a poem, you are forced away from the political realities; how much difference is there, really, between a WWII movie and Lawerence of Arabia? Both depict the "horrors of war" -- people getting stuck with knives and shot with guns -- and both, it seems to me, are equally ineffective in making people dislike war any less.

All the glossy weeklies are probably waxing elqouent about the horrors of war as depicted in "Saving Private Ryan"; these are the same people that got us all riled up for the Gulf. And the same audience that gets teary eyed in the movie house goes gungho for the video cameras on smart bombs. And while Kubrick certaintly made a good movie (Full Metal Jacket), I think the only lasting effect it's had has been to popularize a few choice phrases from the drill seargent.

I'm not saying that war poetry is not "effective"; there is, of course, a lot of excellent work. Wilfred Owen, Benjamin Britten's _War Requiem_; but am I the only one who sees a fundamental split between people's aesthetic and ethical responses? I think I count Plato as company for starters, but anybody who reads the _Cantos_ probably recognizes the same kind of internal block.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

762. Kristen Gallagher
address query
Wed 29 Jul 1998

dear buffpoes,

anyone know how to contact susan howe? please, thank you - in advance.

↑ Index

763. groberts
Re: anglo-american poetic relations
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Thank you Keith Tuma for your news: how you could remember so much so vividly after three weeks is a wonder.

I can't contribute much to your query about Mark Ford except to say that Ashbery read a few of his poems at MIT last fall (along with Holderlin, Moore, Bishop, and Tate) before getting to his own work. I vaguely remember there being murmurs of curiosity from the audience after the Ford poems, and Ashbery remarked at some point that his work was not available in the U.S., with the air of someone who had acquired a special treat and was obligingly sharing it with the rest of us.

Gary R.

↑ Index

764. Mark Weiss
Re: Saving Private Ryan
Wed 29 Jul 1998

No.

At 01:13 AM 7/29/98 -0700, you wrote:
>Refresh my memory. Did the US army have integrated units in WW2?
>
>
>>I haven't actually seen the movie, but I've heard that there are no
>>African American or Chicano soldiers shown in any of the larger battle >>scenes. Strange since Spielberg claimed to try and make this movie as >>close to reality as possible and quite a large number of the soldiers that >>fought in WWII were African American and Chicano or Latino.
>>
>>-Joanna Sondheim
>>
>>
>>
>>*******
*****
>>"It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am."
>>-Edith Sodergran
>>*******
*****
>
>
>
>
>
>George Bowering.
> ,
>2499 West 37th Ave.,
>Vancouver, B.C.,
>Canada V6M 1P4

>
>fax: [redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

765. Keith Tuma
Re: anglo-american poetic relations
Wed 29 Jul 1998

That would be Allen (not Alan) Fisher, my now slighty less sleep-deprived eyes tell me as I look over the typing of my reportage.

And I also forgot to mention a very useful, densely informing paper I heard given by Andrew Crozier on the virtually unknown 30s left poet Harry Roskolenko, called "(Fourth) International Modernism: The Case of Harry Rosolenko; or, Apocalyptic Transports of an Objectivist."

Keith Tuma

↑ Index

766. daniel bouchard
chris alexander
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Chris Alexander,

Can you back-channel me please?

- db

(sorry for the personal note on the list.)

<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
  fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

767. Mark Weiss
Re: angling american poetic redactions
Wed 29 Jul 1998

She didn't just miss the trends, she actively opposed them. But I'm glad she's a nice woman.

At 01:03 PM 7/29/98 +0400, you wrote:
>Mark --
>
> Not sure if you know this, but Vendler has >been a champion of Yeats (over, indeed, Pound and >Eliot) both in the classroom and in her published >work. I spent a term studying WBY under her at Harvard.
>In general, before you start wrecking on a particular >person, remember that, chances are, someone else on >the list is going to know them; a lesson I learnt >quickly (hi, Henry.) Interesting, right before I >came to University, I read the APR article that went >house on Vendler; when I studied under her, I was >much impressed by the meanspiritedness of the assesment.
>
> Since when did we get the idea that professors
>in the academy should be responsible for keeping up >with the Protean world of contemporary poetry? Isn't >it enough for them to apply their knowledge and skill
>to the poets they like? We accept the academies as >repositories of history, but I'm not sure I want to >accept them as scribes of the "accepted" poetry,
>whether that be Zukofsky, Eliot or Keats.
>
>It was a monumental break in my own life when I realized >that my poetic education has guided me down a very >particular path, and that, from a height, one could >look down and see thousands of different tracks through >the wood; to criticize a particular critic for missing >contemporary or near-contemporary trends seems to be >akin to complaining that you want a better hand-holder.
>Certaintly, critics hold power over the NYT Sunday Book >Review crowd, but, hell, they're the direct genetic >descendents of the people who read Swinburne.
>
>best wishes,

>
> Simon
>
>http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
>[redacted]
>[redacted]
>[redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

768. David Baratier
Re: request for info on cantaloupo
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Charles Cantalupo has a sense of maximalism that fits with Sean Killian except the subject material is centered in the world instead of a non-descript setting bearing a comparable lattices with the mind. Cantalupo has an exquisite sense of journey throughout his best work, in the manner of the Blakean movement of Jerusalem or Patchen's Albion Moonlight. The movement rotates around the subject and is fairly difficult to keep track of but well worth the effort. I sincerely admire Joe Napora for dedicating over 20 pages to "Columba, The Dove" in Bullhead #5, there might even be a sample up on the website. While that action might have played a part in sinking the press, to have the honor of publishing a work such as Columba is worth it.

I'd be interested in what others have to say, if there were any responses, backchannel.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

769. daniel bouchard
Re: anglo-american poetic relations
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Nice reading report from London.

It reminds me that there is an anthology forthcoming from Weslayan in the fall--"OTHER." The complete Introduction is on-line at the JACKET website <<http://www.jacket.zip.com.au/jacket04/otherbrit.html>>

I read it and realized I know very few of the poets included. Obviously this is my own fault; or is it? Is it wrong to ask why "some fifty non-mainstream poets" writing in a language I "know" are so unfamiliar to me. The few that I know/ have read are due, in part, to their work having been introduced to me by Keston Sutherland--an English poet. Is the world so big? Am I alone? Is anyone else looking forward to checking out this book?

If "so much for anglo-americo relations," what about the rest of the planet?

- daniel bouchard

At 12:07 AM 7/29/98 -0600, Keith Tuma wrote:
>So much for Bunting or Prynne, Raworth or Roy Fisher, Alan Fisher or Denise >Riley, Charles Tomlinson, Tom Leonard, Maggie O'Sullivan--even Philip >Larkin or Geoffrey Hill or Lynette Roberts or Peter Redgrove or dozens and >dozens of contenders. What a thing to say. Maybe it was honest. One >wonders who or what she's read.
>So much for Anglo-American poetic relations.
<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
  fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

770. David Baratier vietnam veteran poems vs. hollywood adaptation
Wed 29 Jul 1998

---

peer group

me & the boys got the highest rate of alcoholism & drug abuse & divorce & mental illness & suicide than any other group in America
It's good to see us win for a change

--Bill Shields

↑ Index

771. Mark Prejsnar
Coke from the Vendling machine
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Let's see....i don't think i've used up my quota of posts yet..

Keith and Simon put me to shame with their generosity toward the infamous Vendler. (..especially Keith, who i think is somewhat closer to my own poetix...)

No doubt i was being very cantankerous. But i really feel Mark Weiss was right to toss in the comment he did: Vendler is so actively clueless about poetic form and contemporary work, that she has a real impact on where resources go for poetry, in our society. No i don't think she is just a professor and scholar doing work on poets several generations back; she has strong (and laughable) opinions about the contemporary state of the art, and expresses 'em in reviews and articles and public statements and in her books.

I think her conservatism is cartoonishly exaggerated and flat and not-thought-out....Very much like the great Rondini's. No the point of the comparison was not to suggest she has right-wing beliefs with regard to politix. I was talking about her esthetic hyperconservatism. And as i said, like Ron she has become too easy to laugh at, because of the clodish simplicity of her conservatism. But as Alex Cockburn pointed out about Reagan, a person with institutional power can work against you quite effectively, regardless of whether you perceive them as clownlike..

"what's expertly broken is not soon vendled"....

mark p.

↑ Index

772. Keith Tuma
Re: angling american poetic redactions
Wed 29 Jul 1998

> Thanx to Keith Tuma for a superb conference report...
>
> Are you sure the entire Polish Oharista movement isn't someone's idea of a joke? Sounds like it (fairly amusing one too) Maybe it's just that the work of Yasusada has badly destabilized the epistomology of improbable poetic identities...Or maybe i just feel defensive about the homeland of my parents' families! (Poland, i mean, not NYC...)

Mark,

Thanks. No joke, unless it's on me.

> The Vendler stuff is a stitch. She is truely the Ronnie Reagan of poetic reaction: no matter how much of a caricature people turn her into, she goes several steps further in banality and stupidity...I realize that by this point (as happened with that other great communicator) it has become tedious to point out how bankrupt her drivel is. But 1. like Ronnie, she holds enuff power that it's kinda hard to ignore her; 2. she really tends to sum up very well the most conservative trends in the literary establishment.

Actually, I think that this is a little unfair. I hope I didn't caricature her, didn't mean to. However much I disagree with HV and her canons and/or methods, she's a passionate advocate of what she believes in. No doubting her influence and its consequences but even when she, say, dismisses Mina Loy she circulates discourse. My guess is that her politics are liberal, old-style humanist and all. Probably voted for Clinton. The case for her "Reaganism" would need to be argued. And I take it that her view/neglect of recent British poetries is symptomatic and partly the result of a lack of information for which the causes are many and complex. Which is not to say that after she notices--if she does--forthcoming anthologies like the Quartermain and Caddel she'll suddenly take up exegesis and critique of the poets included therein.

I suppose that at her level of visibility one must expect criticism and like anybody else she should be called on her blindnesses but not via cheap shots. Not to single you out in this regard and of course somehow the big E seems to encourage these as if it were itself an agent of noise and effusive dialogue on the edges of spectacle. Long live its ephemeral blur.

> As a huge McDiarmid fan, not in touch with the last couple of decades of Scottish work, i found the "informationist" tag intriguing.. Anyone know of a good anthology or other source to focus on recent Scottish work?

Robert Crawford's scholarly books would be one place to start and he's edited a forthcoming penguin anthology which will have some of these folks in it and might even make it to the US. There's an anthology of younger Scots as well, though I don't have it in front of me and forget the title and like so much else it's unavailable in the US anyway. W. N. Herbert's work would be one place to start for this nexus though I'd go back and find Tom Leonard and others.

> ...have we really overthrown Yeats and cast him into the outer darkness, in favor of Pound? Has the treatment of Yeats in academe really changed so radically since i went to college in the seventies?? I realize many of us working poets are more likely to read Zuke or H.D., but has the establishment really dropped the adulation of WBY that i grew up with?

> (...that wouldn't be so bad a thing, not because i don't love much of Yeats, but because like TSE and others he had a cult stretching over quite a few decades in mid-20th century academe that was excessive, boring and used up more of students' energy than any single poet should..)
>
> tendentiously,
>
> mark

all best and in haste,

Keith

↑ Index

773. Louis Cabri
request for info on cantaloupo
Wed 29 Jul 1998

I'm wondering if anyone who has read Charles Cantaloupo would be willing to venture a few words about his work/context either on the list or to me backchannel. I would very much appreciate it.

Thanks very much in advance.

Louis

↑ Index

774. Mark DuCharme
Re: the war room (strange love?)
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Afraid I've got to agree w/ Todd here-- & was resisting my own impulses to say something similar. I've always hated Schpielberg's "art" (albeit cognizant of his craft, in both senses)-- & felt he at the time he was iconic of conservative cultural trends of the 80s. (C.f. what was just posted viz Ronnie Reagan & Helen Vendler, which also probably could've gone w/out saying, & which also was dead on)....

--Mark DuCharme

todd baron wrote:

>I must say: the discussion on Spielberg seems way out of line for the >list.
>Not that I'm suggesting a censor --or trying to stop the discussion--but >the man as an artist isn't! He rewrites history in a clumsy albeit >monetary way--see Schindler's List--see that he is in the habit of >recreating a Heroic mythology--a cartoon strip--and has been quoted as >saying that "the great war movies of the 40's inspired (him)" Let's see

>
>a film about a shark (which he had to be pushed into doing)
>a film about an alien (a boyhood idea stolen really from Geroge Lucas)
>another film about aliens (WOW!)
>a film about the ATlantic Slave Trade (he was SUED for this one!)
>a film
> a film
> a film?
>
>WHOOPS--I meant "movie"!
>
>Spillberg (no typo) HAS destroyed the film industry--he won that war!
>The great films of the 60s and 70s he single handedly destroyed when he >found out he couldn't make one! (No "humanity" or "personality" in his >films! Read RAGING BULLS and EASY RIDERS! His first film was THE >SUGERLAND EXPRESS--trying to be Altman, trying to be Scorsessem etc!)
He >was raised on TV for god's sake! The big MACHINERY he p[roduced--the >studio he saved (UNIVERSAL) they both overtook the great films of Hal >Asbhy (Harold and Maude, Shampoo, etc--films that made money!), Altman, >Scorsesee(his great films hardly were released! Yup--Taxi Driver did not >make the man wealthy!) Even Coppola (and left him a rather commercial >idiot I maight say--from Godfather and Apocylypse NOW (a GREAT "war" >movie--a movie that took a war into the lens--to "Jack" and
>.....)
>
>Phew.
>
>Hey..I guess this is fun!
>
>Back to the poem.....
>
>
>What about poetic Heroes anyway--like Spicer?
>
>Todd Baron
>(ReMap)
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

775. Mark DuCharme

Re: (t)angling american poetic redactions

Wed 29 Jul 1998

I also wanted to thank you, Keith, for an engaging post, & postscripts.

Re: the O'Harista thing-- if not a joke, shocking. What imitators, from the Lower East Side to Poland, always seem to me to miss-- & this is clearly brought out in the excerpt you quote-- is the social gesture integral to O'Hara's "personist" (i.e., less abstract, most famous) work. Style, thus-- in an irony apparently lost on the O'Harista-- becomes abstracted from the social, making the poem literally into an artifact, which is something that O'Hara clearly was trying to circumvent. The transposition of contexts from the 1950s NY art world of "Why I Am Not A Painter," to the 90s Polish laborer in the excerpt you quote, thus makes for unintentional parody, completely undermining what (one presumes) is the intended effect. (Though I'd be interested to read more on the poetics of this O'Harista movement).

Re: Vendler-- I don't think it's unfair. Yes, she is probably a good left/liberal, but so is Speilberg (see my previous post). What is _conservative_ in both cases is not the espoused politics (though from an anarchist perspective one might argue differently), but the cultural politics: in Vendler's case as a critic, in Speilberg's case as a filmmaker. Vendler's project, it seems to me, is one of canon-making; if she dismisses Loy, for example, I'm sure that is her personal reaction, but it is also a public dismissal that (she realizes) will probably turn some readers away from Loy's work. Her totalizing (not even apologetic) dismissal of figures like Prynne & Raworth, among others, speaks for itself. It is not as if Vendler ever elevates a poet like Mac Low, for example. Her's is clearly a political project with regard to culture-- the reification of a singular aesthetic. I don't even think she would deny this.

--Mark DuCharme

Keith Tuma wrote:
>>Thanx to Keith Tuma for a superb conference report...
>>
>>Are you sure the entire Polish Oharista movement isn't someone's idea
of >>a joke? Sounds like it (fairly amusing one too) Maybe it's just that >>the work of Yasusada has badly destabilized the epistomology of improbable >>poetic identities...Or maybe i just feel defensive about the homeland

of >>my parents' families! (Poland, i mean, not NYC...)
>
>Mark,
>
>Thanks. No joke, unless it's on me.
>
>>
>>The Vendler stuff is a stitch. She is truely the Ronnie Reagan of poetic >>reaction: no matter how much of a caricature people turn her into,
she >>goes several steps further in banality and stupidity...I realize that by >>this point (as happened with that other great communicator) it has become >>tedious to point out how bankrupt her drivel is. But 1. like Ronnie,
she >>holds enuff power that it's kinda hard to ignore her; 2. she really tends >>to sum up very well the most conservative trends in the literary >>establishment.
>
>Actually, I think that this is a little unfair. I hope I didn't caricature >her, didn't mean to. However much I disagree with HV and her canons and/or >methods, she's a passionate advocate of what she believes in. No doubting >her influence and its consequences but even when she, say, dismisses Mina
>Loy she circulates discourse. My guess is that her politics are liberal, >old-style humanist and all. Probably voted for Clinton. The case for her
>"Reaganism" would need to be argued. And I take it that her view/neglect >of recent British poetries is symptomatic and partly the result of a lack >of information for which the causes are many and complex. Which is not to >say that after she notices--if she does--forthcoming anthologies like

the >Quartermain and Caddel she'll suddenly take up exegesis and critique of
the >poets included therein.
>
>I suppose that at her level of visibility one must expect criticism and >like anybody else she should be called on her blindnesses but not via cheap >shots. Not to single you out in this regard and of course somehow the big >E seems to encourage these as if it were itself an agent of noise and >effusive dialogue on the edges of spectacle. Long live its ephemeral blur.
>
>>
>>As a huge McDiarmid fan, not in touch with the last couple of decades
of >>Scottish work, i found the "informationist" tag intriguing.. Anyone know
>>of a good anthology or other source to focus on recent Scottish work?
>>
>
>Robert Crawford's scholarly books would be one place to start and he's >edited a forthcoming penguin anthology which will have some of these folks >in it and might even make it to the US. There's an anthology of younger >Scots as well, though I don't have it in front of me and forget the title
>and like so much else it's unavailable in the US anyway. W. N.
Herbert's >work would be one place to start for this nexus though I'd go back and find >Tom Leonard and others.
>
>
>>...have we really overthrown Yeats and cast him into the outer darkness, >>in favor of Pound? Has the treatment of Yeats in academe really changed

>>so radically since i went to college in the seventies?? I realize many of >>us working poets are more likely to read Zuke or H.D., but has the >>establishment really dropped the adulation of WBY that i grew up with?
>>(...that wouldn't be so bad a thing, not because i don't love much of >>Yeats, but because like TSE and others he had a cult stretching over quite >>a few decades in mid-20th century academe that was excessive, boring
and >>used up more of students' energy than any single poet should..)
>>
>>tendentiously,
>>
>>mark
>
>all best and in haste,
>
>Keith
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

776. Pritchett,Patrick

Re: un petit pont de pierre (fwd)

Wed 29 Jul 1998

Excellent analysis, David. And I'll shut up about it after this but just to add to your list of "Bridge films" (hadn't quite realized what a genre it was!) Frank Perry's WWII film called "The Bridge" from the early 60's. Depicts ragtag group of German boys, average age 12-14, Hitler Youth I guess, defending a bridge into Berlin. Haven't seen it in years, but I think they all get killed. Very bleak, bitter film.

Richard Slotkin treats the ideology of The Alamo/Custer's Last Stand in American myth at length in the second volume of his Gunfighter Nation trilogy, _The Fatal Environment_. Well worth checking out.

Patrick Pritchett

↑ Index

777. David Erben (Art)

Re: un petit pont de pierre (fwd)

Wed 29 Jul 1998

I've only seen Saving Private Ryan once and so am hesitant to write anything critically about it. However, I have no intention of seeing it again and so offer these comments with the apology in advance that my memory of the film may at times be inaccurate.

The ultimate failure of the film, it seems to me, rests not with the issue of "realism" or "history" or "morality" but with its failure to remain consistent with the logic it establishes for itself in the 25 minutes on Omaha Beach. The logic it seems to be establishing for itself in those 25 shocking minutes is somewhere around "War is Hell" and "The only glory in war is surviving" - the logic, as has been observed, of The Big Red One and All Quite on the Western Front. The Omaha Beach scenes establish war as messy, capricious, horrible, and chaotic: rank, class, religion, etc. all mean nothing in terms of who lives and who is wounded and who dies. The beach is the site of "chance. Once the film privileges the 8 man squad, however, the film radically alters its logic and therefore its attitude toward "war". The focus shifts from the countless men at the beach WHO WE KNOW AND LEARN NOTHING ABOUT (including the defenders, one of whom speaks in Czech, I believe, when he tries to surrender) to the 8 man squad and the obstacles they encounter and their fates. The film attempts to remain true to the logic established on the beach (in the interrogation of the Emerson quote about the nobility of war, the death of the soldier who tried to save the girl, etc) but slowly transforms itself from a D-Day film to a "platoon" film, to a "bridge" film and, ultimately, into a "last stand" film. The "war is hell logic" gives way to a "it's a good day to die" logic (the current, popular, heroic action adventure cliche, I believe) where the heroes get to choose when, where and largely how they die). The cavalry arrives just in the nick of time to save the bridge and the war if not quite all the characters we have been manipulated into knowing just enough to care about. The many deaths on the beach give way to the few significant deaths of the squad. The Germans start to look like Indians from countless westerns (notice how in Hollywood WWII films the Germans always manage to outnumber Americans) and the holding of the bridge becomes just one more fort the outnumbered Cavarly must defend "at all costs." Why? Because Rommel is on the way? Because "if we do this we earn the right to go home?" Because "somebody has to do it"? or because its a spectacular, sentimental way to end a film?

As such, it seems to me, the film is best compared, if we are to stick to war films, not to the various films on D-Day or on WWII in general, or to the many "platoon" films, but instead, as Marjorie Perloff suggested, to "bridge" films: The Bridge at Remagen, The Bridge on the River Kwai, A Bridge too Far, The Bridges at Toko-Ri (also with William Holden), etc. I don't think it ranks very highly in this list because, in the simplest sense, the bridge just does not amount to much: it's an unimpressive stone bridge across a river you could throw a rock over. Visually, unlike the previous bridges mentioned, it is not interesting.

More importantly, perhaps, by the time the squad reaches the bridge, all of the chaos of Omaha Beach and the absurd order to have 8 men try and save 1 and whatever pretense it has for being "historically" accurate and "realistic" is lost and the film becomes cliche driven - just exactly like the John Wayne film The Alamo (which is the name Capt Miller gives the building where they are supposed to retreat to). The issue at the bridge is not "war" or "anti war" or "WWII" but how most of the squad die and how their deaths are given transcendent meaning (and if we did not get the "meaning" of their deaths when the cavalry arrive, we better get it when grandfather Ryan and his children and grandchildren are at the cemetary at the end).

Whereas, in the film, on Omaha Beach death could occur at any moment in the most dehumanizing way, at the bridge all of the remaining Rangers get their heroic moments - each dies after valiantly fighting and killing many Germans (remember the logic of the John Wayne film: for every hero that dies, before he dies, he has to kill 5 bad guys). None of the squad at the bridge die messy deaths and most of them get to say a word or two before they go (no images of Hanks with his guts spilling out, please).

In other words, the film becomes exactly what it argues it is not - just another cliche (and, let me add,I think Schlinder's List becomes just exactly what it argues against as well...).

↑ Index

778. toddbaron
the war room
Wed 29 Jul 1998

I must say: the discussion on Spielberg seems way out of line for the list. Not that I'm suggesting a censor --or trying to stop the discussion--but the man as an artist isn't! He rewrites history in a clumsy albeit monetary way--see Schindler's List--see that he is in the habit of recreating a Heroic mythology--a cartoon strip--and has been quoted as saying that "the great war movies of the 40's inspired (him)" Let's see

a film about a shark (which he had to be pushed into doing)
a film about an alien (a boyhood idea stolen really from Geroge Lucas)
another film about aliens (WOW!)
a film about the ATlantic Slave Trade (he was SUED for this one!)

a film
a film
a film?

WHOOPS--I meant "movie"!

Spillberg (no typo) HAS destroyed the film industry--he won that war! The great films of the 60s and 70s he single handedly destroyed when he found out he couldn't make one! (No "humanity" or "personality" in his films! Read RAGING BULLS and EASY RIDERS! His first film was THE SUGERLAND EXPRESS--trying to be Altman, trying to be Scorsessem etc!) He was raised on TV for god's sake! The big MACHINERY he p[roduced--the studio he saved (UNIVERSAL) they both overtook the great films of Hal Asbhy (Harold and Maude, Shampoo, etc--films that made money!), Altman, Scorsesee(his great films hardly were released! Yup--Taxi Driver did not make the man wealthy!) Even Coppola (and left him a rather commercial idiot I maight say--from Godfather and Apocylypse NOW (a GREAT "war" movie--a movie that took a war into the lens--to "Jack" and .....)

Phew.

Hey..I guess this is fun!

Back to the poem.....

What about poetic Heroes anyway--like Spicer?

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

↑ Index

779. Don Cheney
Saving Private Ryan
Wed 29 Jul 1998

KFI-AM radio out here in Southern California has a wonderful talk show on from 7-11pm called the Phil Hendrie Show. Phil was talking about Saving Private Ryan with Doug Dangur, an entertainment writer for the Orange County Courier. As a gay man, Dangur saw SPR as a metaphor for the struggle of Gays and Lesbians in America.

Some of the connections he found between the film and the struggle for gay liberation:

*Mussolini shaved his head so it would be a phallic symbol

*D-Day is an obvious reference to Doris Day

*The German goose step was developed by a dance instructor

One of his final observations:

*He hadn't actually seen the film, he had just seen clips and WWII newsreels.

You can hear the phil hendrie show using Real Audio over the internet from the KFI webpage at:

http://www.kfi640.com

You can hear sound clips (mostly mp3 files) from the phil hendrie show on my own web page at:

http://members.xoom.com/doncheney

don cheney

↑ Index

780. David Baratier
Re: Was it a "good war"?
Wed 29 Jul 1998

How would the different poets and critics here like to die?

I would like to die like a certain semiotician who was hit one week by a mail truck while reading current philology. A week or so after recouperating, a laundry truck finished the job. I believe the 2nd book was by Vendler which stuck the reader as hilarious shortly before the laundry man, Pierre, went down in history.

be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

781. KENT JOHNSON
Was it a "good war"?
Wed 29 Jul 1998

Marjorie:

You mentioned that you found my question creepy. But I think you (along with David B, Alan S., and Maxine C.) misunderstood my intent: I was not asking whether or not it was a good thing to fight fascism! Actually, if I could choose my death (imagining myself for a moment with courage I probably don't have), I think it would be to travel in time to die on a barricade in Warsaw or Madrid. That would be, from my perspective, a "good" death.

(Now here would be a "creepy" but fascinating thread for the List sometime: How would the different poets and critics here like to die?)

Really, what I was pointing toward (obliquely, I admit) is the way "good war" has become a a kind of propaganda buzz-idea, ideologically loaded and mobilized in the construction of an official myth of national "goodness"-- a myth that Spielberg's film will powerfully contribute to shaping and strengthening. It's a myth that continues to help obscure the real history of U.S. deceit, aggression, and subversion of democracy around the world in the wake of WW2. It helps obscure the fact that WW2 was a conflict between rapacious imperialist states on _both_ sides. It was certainly good that the side that lost, lost. But the side that won was not good, nor was it "anti-fascist" in any principled sense, as Washington's and Wall Street's support of fascistic regimes in the post-war period makes perfectly clear.

So the question I asked seems quite reasonable to me and also quite relevant to our current situation, for it won't likely be long before we have another Gulf War or worse, and we will all be asked to remember how the old Gulf War was a "good war", just as we were being asked to remember how WWII was a "good war" as we were being readied for the Gulf War.

In other words, the enemy might be clear, but for the sake of the future it is good to know for whom one is fighting. This is some of what I had in the back of my mind when I asked my question.

And by the way, David Erben, you should publish that fine analysis of the movie somewhere!

Kent

↑ Index

782. Amarnath V. Rauva

Re: POETICS Programs

Wed 29 Jul 1998

I was wondering if anyone would reply with a list of some MFA/Poetics programs that they considered good. I'm considering getting an MFA in writing or a PhD in Poetics after I graduate from Berkeley this year. One of the most problematic things is that there is no (at least I haven't found it yet) comprehensive list of MFA programs in the country and who teaches at those programs.

thanks,
Amar Ravva

↑ Index

783. Charles Bernstein
Settling New Scores
Wed 29 Jul 1998

If in New York, I recommend "Settling New Scores: Music Manuscripts from the Paul Sacher Foundation", with scores (and related items) by Nancarow, Boulez, Cage, Ferneyhough, Schoenberg, Stravinsky, Berio, Carter, Webern, and many others.

The Pierpont Morgan Library
29 E. 36th Street
[redacted]
Hours: Tues-Sat 10:30am-5pm
Sun 1pm-5pm
Closed Mon

↑ Index

784. Tom Beard
Symptoms of Oulipo women
Wed 29 Jul 1998

I'm not so ready to regard Harry Mathews' comment about hopscotch as "deliberately evasive and even meaningless", although of course there may have been some snideness in its delivery which doesn't come through. Although it might be read as being flip, I read it as rejecting the simplistically essentialist assumption that women are not interested in strict mathematical rules.

Hopscotch might just be one example of a 'traditional women's activity' that relies upon "the strict application of rules and limitation". Knitting (and other fabric arts) and music are perhaps other examples of activities where explicit rules are used. Perhaps it is not the presence or absence of rules that discourages women, but the social context of the activity. In that case, might Mathews' comment not be seen as addressing the question rather than dismissing it?

Henry says that "during 'that' time, for various reasons, not as many women as men were excited about mathematics". It's not just 'that' time: in my maths honours class (late 80s) there were 5 men and no women; and there was only one woman on the staff (a post-grad tutor). Things might have changed for the better even in the last decade: for the past few years our intakes of trainees at work (mostly maths or physics honours grads) have been about 50/50.

Shifting to the discussion of Yau's stripper monologue, I'm not so sure that I'd dismiss it out of hand as being just "what men think women think". Although I'm on shaky ground even discussing this, might it be possible that the gulf between a woman who works in the sex industry and one who doesn't is at least as wide as that between men and women in general? Where Yau's monologue seems unrealistic is in its language rather than in its content: my female friends who put on low cut tops and go out to trashy bars to see what they can pull wouldn't use terms like "cornstalk smile" or "smooth as a wave", but otherwise their thoughts (or at least, the way that they present their thoughts to their male friends) seem not too different.

Again, I may be way off base here too. A female friend of mine (_not_ one of those who go to sleazy bars, I must add, except for research purposes) had a story published a couple of years ago called "Striptease: or the butterfly, this other species", and from what I remember the female protagonist wasn't too far off Yau's. The combination of fierce pride in the powers of her body with total contempt for the subhuman punters seems very similar. I should re-read it. Can anyone suggest a female writer who writes of her own experiences in the sex industry? Annie Sprinkle? Raewyn Alexander? Xaviera Hollander?!?? And which if any of the many filmic presentations of the industry seems realistic and/or productive? "Exotica"? "Mona Lisa"? "Whore"?

Tentatively,

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

785. David Baratier
[Fwd: fixing to die]
Wed 29 Jul 1998

I wanna be killed by Myouka. Preferably a semi. Reading the IIS 4 Guide for Dummies.

http://www.myouka.org/
Image: http://www.myouka.org/bin/Jennifer.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/POETS/ASondheim2.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/Nikuko.jpe
Image: http://www.myouka.org/bin/poets/Rpinsky2.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/findfault.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/POETS/Julu2.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/Look at me! Do I want to say hello!.JPG
Image: http://www.myouka.org/bin/Indentityless.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/POETS/instantpoem.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/WEAPON/used.jpe
Image: http://www.myouka.org/bin/WEAPON/humerictype2.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/POETS/Ilovejennifer.jpg
Image: http://www.myouka.org/BIN/surprise.JPG

Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote:
>
> I wanna be killed by Jennifer.
> I wanna be killed by Alan.
> I wanna be killed by Nikuko.
>
> - Julu
>
> On Wed, 29 Jul 1998, David Baratier wrote:
>
> > How would the different poets and critics here like to die?
> >
> > I would like to die like a certain semiotician who was hit one week by a > > mail truck while reading current philology. A week or so after > > recouperating, a laundry truck finished the job. I believe the 2nd book > > was by Vendler which stuck the reader as hilarious shortly before the > > laundry man, Pierre, went down in history.
> >
> > be well
> >
> > David Baratier
> >

↑ Index

786. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Writing.out
Wed 29 Jul 1998

-

Writing.out

Nikuko says she doesn't speak so much as try words out. And not just words, or not primarily words, but words in sequences, seeing if they fit together. There's always a question associated with her voice as it's written - her voice which is an inference or a dreaming. What is cyberspace. It is a dreaming. What kind of dreaming. The kind where there appear to be dominions and grids, always expanding, intersecting - who knows whether or not they're regular. You can see the fine wires. Nikuko says she doesn't mean fiber optic at all, she's talking about the wires laying across the ground as if they were attached to guided missiles. Someone wears goggles, Jennifer adds, and then she can see where the missile goes. You can see through the front-end television. The target gets closer and closer; you might imagine the pores of the skin and then, nothing.

After the explosion, wires re- mained criss-crossing the desert. That's the kind of dream cyberspace is, says Nikuko, just exactly.

In that, there are words which are targets, you can imagine the mis- sile heading towards _hunger._ It lands somewhere between the _u_ and _n_, she says, think of it as

```
              ||
              ||
              ||
              ||
            hu||nger
```

breaking it in two, its connection with organism. Then there's no more hunger, Jennifer asks playfully? No, there's no more hunger, that is surely the truth, Nikuko "says." She has tried the word on, seen it fit to wear, to fail, to fall, to fulfill. She has tried it on, shot it down. In a dream, the word has appeared; it was at the bottom of a deep valley, in the midst of a deeper ocean. It was blank ink in dark- blue water, and as she watched it, it dissipated, and then later, there was a thread about it on an email list, and that was in her dream as well - writing a response to the list, cc: ing it to her con- scious - and here, Jennifer began to think, she was at last coming to grips with it, writing her hunger out.

↑ Index

787. charssmith

Re: How

Thu 30 Jul 1998

One of the first pieces I read was George Butterick's attempt to engage _Defenestration of Prague_ : "Endless Protean Linkage" (Hambone 3). Might be interesting to read again.

--cs

In a message dated 98-07-29 07:25:28 EDT, you write:

<< short of a critical treatise, would love to hear more on howe, if only recommendations of some useful secondary-critical takes on or ways into her work.
>>

↑ Index

788. Alan Jennifer Sondheim fixing to die
Thu 30 Jul 1998

I wanna be killed by Jennifer.
I wanna be killed by Alan.
I wanna be killed by Nikuko.

- Julu

On Wed, 29 Jul 1998, David Baratier wrote:

> How would the different poets and critics here like to die?
>
> I would like to die like a certain semiotician who was hit one week by a mail truck while reading current philology. A week or so after recouperating, a laundry truck finished the job. I believe the 2nd book was by Vendler which stuck the reader as hilarious shortly before the laundry man, Pierre, went down in history.
>
> be well
>
> David Baratier

↑ Index

789. Tosh
Re: fixing to die
Thu 30 Jul 1998

If I am to die, I want to die as a well-dressed poet... but perhaps it is because I just saw this amazing film directed, written, and staring Yukio Mishima. It is basically a stylized setting for his future suicide. Mishima took death as an art form.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

790. John Tranter
Announcing Jacket # 4
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Jacket magazine is a literary quarterly free on the Internet, edited from Sydney Australia by poet John Tranter. Issue # 4 is now fully fitted and stitched up, at this URL:

http://www.jacket.zip.com.au/jacket04/index04.html

Announcing Jacket's first QUIZ, with real prizes!

With a gallery of sparkling poems by :

Adam Aitken, Charles Alexander and Sheila Murphy - a collaboration, Gary Catalano, Maxine Chernoff, Bernard Cohen, M.T.C.Cronin, Elaine Equi, Coral Hull, David Lehman, Tony Lopez, Rod Mengham, Ian Patterson, Roger Pellett, Gig Ryan, Keston Sutherland, and Robert Vandermolen.

Articles to knock your socks off:

David Lehman - The Questions of Postmodernism,
Eliot Weinberger : on the strange ghosts of Ísland, Caddel and Quartermain : OTHER British and Irish Poetry since 1970, Forrest Gander - review of Yasusada : DOUBLED FLOWERING,
A peculiar and perspicacious Portuguese perspective of the 1998 Cambridge (England) Conference of Contemporary Poetry,
H.M.Enzensberger's "KIOSK" reviewed by Lawrence Joseph,
Noel King interviews Pete Ayrton, publisher of Serpent's Tail books, Mr Rubenking's "BREAKDOWN" - computers and writing (with a REAL AUDIO recording of ROBOT POET Joy H.Breshan reading a computer-generated poem in the mode of Mr Ashbery, and John Tranter's "Carousel", a computer-assisted prose story), Tom Clark's "White Thought" reviewed by Dale Smith,
Photography - art, fine art, or prostitution?,
Pet of the Month - the MEERKAT (very handy for poets - find out why), Great Moments in Literature # 13 - Kleist's TWELVE-VOLUME OPUS reduced to haiku (!) ,
Dangerous Liaisons # 91 - Jo and Meg in Mexico.

. . . and, as usual, a lather of photographs and other visuals.

Drop by, try the fit of the Jacket, and if you like it, tell your friends!

(I understand that you may not wish to receive these notices.
(If so, please reply to this email to that effect, and (I'll take your name off the mailing list pronto. [J.T.]

from John Tranter, 39 Short Street, Balmain NSW 2041, Sydney, Australia
tel ([redacted] fax ([redacted]
http://writing.upenn.edu/epc/authors/tranter/3poems-interview.html
Editor, Jacket magazine: http://www.jacket.zip.com.au

↑ Index

791. Anthony lawrence
Re: fixing to die
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Tosh,

what's the name of the film? The only one I've seen starred Ken Ogata ("Mishima") which was also highly stylised and combined theatre and film.

Best,

Anthony

****

Anthony Lawrence
Po Box 75
Sandy Bay
Tasmania 7006

↑ Index

792. Rodrigo Toscano
Query: Robert Kocik
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Hoping someone has R. Kocik's e or address....or info leading to...

Please "backchannel"...

Rodrigo Toscano

↑ Index

793. George Bowering
Re: Symptoms of Oulipo women
Thu 30 Jul 1998

> I'm not so ready to regard Harry Mathews' comment about hopscotch as "deliberately evasive and even meaningless"
> Might Mathews' comment not be seen as addressing the question rather than dismissing it?

Surely that would be the first interpretation most people would apply, wouldnt it?

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

794. Aviva Vogel
Re: Poetix programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Precious. My experience and sentiments, almost exactly.

In a message dated 98-07-17 16:34:54 EDT, you write:

> So, why go to school? I did it because it was a way to focus for 2 years on > my > writing, and take my own work more seriously. A friend once said "I bought 2 > years > to write." Also, and more to the point, I had a blast. This was fun. I got > to read > and write and call it work. I once had a roommate who collected "useless > degrees"
> -- he had an MA in theology and was working on one in psychology. He was a > lot of > fun to talk to, and he made a living as a carpenter.
> Yours in impracticality,
> Laura W(hy not)
> --

↑ Index

795. Poetics Agent 288793

Re: How (fwd)

Thu 30 Jul 1998

---

this was in poetics mailbox..

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Wed, 29 Jul 1998 11:30:03 -0700
From: Peter Quartermain <[redacted]>
To: Tom Orange <[redacted]>
Cc: [redacted]
Subject: Re: How

Tom:

Excuse my butting in here, but there's a heck of a lot of stuff published about Susan Howe, if that's what you want. I think the best essays are still those by George Butterick (North Dakota Quarterly 55, Fall 1987) Rachel Blau DuPlessis ("Whowe", Sulfur 20, Fall 1987) and Marjorie Perloff (in, hmmm, _Poetic License_ 297-310). There's also a pretty good one by Gregory Dale Adamson in the Michel Serres issue of _Sub/Stance_ 83: 1997 ("Serres Translates Howe"); and I should also (of course!) mention my own essay in _Disjunctive Poetics: From Gertrude Stein and Louis Zukofsky to Susan Howe_ (Cambridge UP 1992).

John Taggart has a pretty good essay too, somewhere, but I can't remember where.

Obviously the best entry to her work is her work. But read the first chapter of her brilliant prose book _The birthmark: Unsettling the wilderness in American literature_ -- or her more celebrated _My Emily Dickinson_.

Peter

At 12:46 AM 7/29/98 -0400, you wrote: >daniel b, mark p --
>
>short of a critical treatise, would love to hear more on howe, if only >recommendations of some useful secondary-critical takes on or ways into >her work.
>
>thanks,
>t.
>
+ +

Peter Quartermain
846 Keefer Street

Vancouver
B.C.
Canada V6A 1Y7
Voice : [redacted]
Fax: [redacted]

+ +

↑ Index

796. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT

Shoptaw's units of measurement

Thu 30 Jul 1998

Reading John Shoptaw's "The Music of Construction - Measure and Polyphony in Ashbery and Bernstein" (in The Tribe of John) I'm just wondering who else has used these units of prosodic measurement - character, word, line, phrase, sentence, section. I'm aware of Silliman's use of sentence but not much else.

Fred Hertzberg,
Finland

↑ Index

797. daniel bouchard

Re: Adverts

Thu 30 Jul 1998

>For those interested I'll be placing the brief introductory article on >J.H. Prynne by Rod Mengham and myself on my website tomorrow - it's from >the forthcoming Bloodaxe catalogue and lists publication details for the >forthcoming Poems, includes quotes, a Prynne poem, etc.
>
>J.H. Prynne
>Poems
>August 1998 234 x 156mm 432 pages
>1 85224 492 5 £25.00 cloth
>1 85224 491 7 £12.00 paper
>Bloodaxe/Folio (Salt) co-publication
>Australia: Fremantle Arts Centre Press
>
>Best,
>JK
>
>
>_____

>John Kinsella
>Churchill College
>Cambridge CB3 ODS
>England
>http://www.geocities.com/SoHo/Square/8574/
>
>
>
<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
  fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

798. henry gould
anglo/amer yeatspound
Thu 30 Jul 1998

The idea of Yeats as a counter-exemplar to Pound is not anachronistic per se. American experiment from Pound to Stein to Zukofsky to Howe etc. has had a lot invested in the "disjunctive", as P. Quartermain's book title emphasizes. While Yeats is no more attractive than Pound on a political level, on an artistic level there is a clear alternative path. Both Pound & Yeats were trained or self-taught in both visual art & music; but they went in different directions with it. Pound's fascination with the image led a poetics of disjunction; Yeats moved toward synthesis - a synthesis of word, rhythm, and image. That approach is by no means played out, despite the experimental tribe's ideological attachment to disjunction as the insignia of political resistance & philosophical savoir-faire. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

799. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Symptoms of Oulipo women
Thu 30 Jul 1998

On Thu, 30 Jul 1998, Tom Beard wrote:

In > that case, might Mathews' comment not be seen as addressing the question > rather than dismissing it?
>

Mebbe.....But the point is, you really have ta work at the reply (as it was repeated on the List, certainly) to create on behalf of HM a good, well-intentioned "meaning." In the context of my original questions and concerns (which were political quite specifically, indeed: offensively P.C. i hope..) about the staggeringly stag character of the O'o, the hopscotch line didn't seem to get us much of anywhere...

But he wasn't answering my question (quite); so no doubt i was being unfair. If it had been me in HM's shoes, i would have addressed the whole gender issue directly, even tho' the question was couched in terms of women and math, because i think gender-politix issues are crucial everywhere in our lives. But admittedly HM is not me (poor guy) and i wasn't there. But that's the source of my sounding overly impatient about the hopscotch comment. (an impatience i still think is pretty appropriate.) politically correctishly,

mark p

↑ Index

800. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT
Shoptaw's units of measurement II
Thu 30 Jul 1998

One clarification: what I meant to ask was who else (than Shoptaw) has used these measures in the context of discussing prosody, i.e. in a "critical" text. (Not of course which poets have used them in writing poetry.)

: Reading John Shoptaw's "The Music of Construction - Measure and Polyphony : in Ashbery and Bernstein" (in The Tribe of John) I'm just wondering who : else has used these units of prosodic measurement - character, word, :
line, phrase, sentence, section. I'm aware of Silliman's use of : sentence but not much else.

Fred Hertzberg

↑ Index

801. L Emerson
Re: POETICS Programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

I too would be interested in knowing who offers MA or PhD programs in poetics--if the person(s) kind enough to know and respond could back-channel me too I would be _grateful_!

Thanks much,
Lori Emerson

On Wed, 29 Jul 1998, Amarnath V. Rauva wrote:

> I was wondering if anyone would reply with a list of some MFA/Poetics programs that they considered good. I'm considering getting an MFA in writing or a PhD in Poetics after I graduate from Berkeley this year. One of the most problematic things is that there is no (at least I haven't found it yet) comprehensive list of MFA programs in the country and who teaches at those programs.
>
> thanks,
> Amar Ravva

↑ Index

802. Erik Sweet
"Tool a Magazine" Party 8/14!!!!NYC
Thu 30 Jul 1998

"Tool a Magazine" is having a party on August 14th to celebrate the premier Issue!
It will be in New York City at 5 Union Square West at "Teachers and Writers Collaborative" ....5th Floor (above Staples)

"So Mark Your Calenders" "Pals" "Get Ready"

There will be drinks, food, a pinata, and readings by:
"Pierre Joris" "Eleni Sikelianos" Anselm Berrigan" and "Jordan Davis"

Beginning at 6pm.

Please come and introduce yourself...

thanks, erik sweet and lori quillen co-editors

"Tool a Magazine" the first issue.." ready August 14th!!!!"

any questions backchannel me....!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!!

↑ Index

803. Corey McLeod
Re: POETICS Programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

---

i too am intersted in poetics programs. back-channel me as well.
thanks,
corey s mcleod

↑ Index

804. Gary Sullivan
d.a.levy / call for papers, etc.
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Hello Everyone:

David Kirschenbaum asked me to post this:

BOOGLIT #6
Call for submissions and papers for:

1) Booglit #6 d.a.levy issue
pub date Dec 1, 1998
edit & art deadline Oct 1, 1998
poems, prose, memories, artwork are all welcome

2) d.a.levy conference We are in the planning stages of putting together a two-day levy conference in NYC Fri-Sat Dec 11-12, 1998, with readings, talks and panel discussions, including a reading on Fri night Dec 11, at the Poetry Project at St. Mark's Church. We are looking for papers relating to the following topics (although any and all papers and proposals will be considered):

a) Mimeo revolution
b) 1968 in American
c) Cleveland poetry scene in the 60s

Please send papers with a one page abstract.
Please send all submissions, when possible, on disc in a word processing program, preferably Microsoft Word.
All submissions should be sent to:

David Kirschenbaum BOOGLIT
P.O. Box 20531 New York, NY 10011
attn: d.a.levy issue (or conference)
If you have any inquiries, contact BOOGLIT
[redacted] or [redacted]

↑ Index

805. Jessica Smith
Re: POETICS Programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

me, too. actually, why doesn't everyone just post their individual lists (as, since there is no comprehensive list, i assume that everyone will have personal suggestions) on the listserv? then we won't have to deal with backchanneling everyone.

Jessica Smith
[redacted]

↑ Index

806. Michael Magee
poetix programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Just a thought for those asking about poetics programs etc which I thought I'd share since it may not occur to others: Penn's Ph.D. program in English has been a damn good place for me to be as a poet. With Bob Perelman a tenured member of the faculty and with the perpetually active Writers House bringing in many writers dear to this list (Silliman, Hejinian, Bernstein, Lauterbach, Waldrop, Mackey and seemingly a zillion others since I've been here) its become, I think an ideal place to work on contemporary poetics (there are other fine professors working on poetics generally who can discuss more or less everything up to and including the 1st generation New American Poetry, and Al Filreis is as schooled in his own way in the current scene as Bob P is). So, if you're thinking PHDeees, Penn might be something to look into. It's not a poetics program per se but I've essentially turned it into one for myself as have other members of this list like Louis Cabri & Matt Hart. -m.

↑ Index

807. Carl Lynden Peters
Re: d.a.levy / call for papers, etc.
Thu 30 Jul 1998

this post makes my day! makes my semester! makes my year! it's great news to hear! fantastic! d.a. levy is a great poet, and needs our attention. i am currently working on a piece entitled _d.a. levy's influence on bpNichol's science of the "pataphysical_, which i will present at the Nichol conference this September. in Vancouver. so a little bit of a plug on my part but what th hell. a d.a. levy conference is just a wonderful idea, and it's very exciting. all th best,

carl

p.s. i'm still searching for levy sources, and a few of you on this list have already been very helpful. if anyone can name any further sources or current work on levy i wld be very grateful. th doors r open,

c.

> Hello Everyone:
>
> David Kirschenbaum asked me to post this:
>
> BOOGLIT #6
> Call for submissions and papers for:
>
> 1) Booglit #6 d.a.levy issue
> pub date Dec 1, 1998
> edit & art deadline Oct 1, 1998
> poems, prose, memories, artwork are all welcome
>
> 2) d.a.levy conference
> We are in the planning stages of putting together a two-day levy conference in NYC Fri-Sat Dec 11-12, 1998, with readings, talks and panel discussions, including a reading on Fri night Dec 11, at the Poetry Project at St. Mark's Church. We are looking for papers relating to the following topics (although any and all papers and proposals will be considered):
>
> a) Mimeo revolution
> b) 1968 in American
> c) Cleveland poetry scene in the 60s
>
> Please send papers with a one page abstract.
> Please send all submissions, when possible, on disc in a word processing program, preferably Microsoft Word.
> All submissions should be sent to:
>
> David Kirschenbaum BOOGLIT
> P.O. Box 20531 New York, NY 10011
> attn: d.a.levy issue (or conference)
> If you have any inquiries, contact BOOGLIT
> [redacted] or [redacted]

↑ Index

808. Gary Sullivan
some levy sites
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Hey, Carl & anyone else interested in levy:

http://www.charm.net/~brooklyn/Lists/LevyWorks.html
http://www.charm.net/~brooklyn/People/DALevy.html
http://138.87.36.239/text_only_html/ghostponycatalogue.html
http://www.thing.net/~grist/l&d/dalevy/levy-l2.htm
http://www.thing.net/~grist/l&d/dalevy/levy-l1.htm
http://www.thing.net/~grist/l&d/dalevy/dal-ts00.htm
http://www.thing.net/~grist/l&d/dalm00.htm http://www.thing.net/~grist/l&d/dalevy/dalevy.htm
http://www.theroc.org/roc-mag/textarch/roc-15/roc1519c.htm

Happy surfin'!

Gary

↑ Index

809. maz881
Re: the war room
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Todd, yes, but you left out his best film. Starring Dennis Weaver.

I'll send anyone a pineapple who can come up with the title.

I've always wanted to write a treatise about that movie and Killdozer.

Bill Luoma

<<

Date: Wed, 29 Jul 1998 20:20:42 +0000
From: toddbaron <[redacted]>
Subject: the war room

I must say: the discussion on Spielberg seems way out of line for the list. Not that I'm suggesting a censor --or trying to stop the discussion--but the man as an artist isn't! He rewrites history in a clumsy albeit monetary way--see Schindler's List--see that he is in the habit of recreating a Heroic mythology--a cartoon strip--and has been quoted as saying that "the great war movies of the 40's inspired (him)" Let's see a film about a shark (which he had to be pushed into doing)

a film about an alien (a boyhood idea stolen really from Geroge Lucas)
another film about aliens (WOW!)
a film about the ATlantic Slave Trade (he was SUED for this one!)
a film
a film
a film?

WHOOPS--I meant "movie"!

Spillberg (no typo) HAS destroyed the film industry--he won that war! The great films of the 60s and 70s he single handedly destroyed when he found out he couldn't make one! (No "humanity" or "personality" in his films! Read RAGING BULLS and EASY RIDERS! His first film was THE SUGERLAND EXPRESS--trying to be Altman, trying to be Scorsessem etc!) He was raised on TV for god's sake! The big MACHINERY he p[roduced--the studio he saved (UNIVERSAL) they both overtook the great films of Hal Asbhy (Harold and Maude, Shampoo, etc--films that made money!), Altman, Scorsesee(his great films hardly were released! Yup--Taxi Driver did not make the man wealthy!) Even Coppola (and left him a rather commercial idiot I maight say--from Godfather and Apocylypse NOW (a GREAT "war" movie--a movie that took a war into the lens--to "Jack" and .....)

Phew.

Hey..I guess this is fun!

Back to the poem.....

What about poetic Heroes anyway--like Spicer?

Todd Baron
(ReMap)>>

↑ Index

810. Rachel Loden

Re: the war room

Thu 30 Jul 1998

That would be _Duel_, about a truck as I recall. Thanks for the pineapple.

[redacted] wrote:
>
> Todd, yes, but you left out his best film. Starring Dennis Weaver.
>
> I'll send anyone a pineapple who can come up with the title.
>
> I've always wanted to write a treatise about that movie and Killdozer.
>
> Bill Luoma

↑ Index

811. maz881
Re: anglo-american poetic relations
Thu 30 Jul 1998

<<Rod Mengham spoke on Moxley's work with the poet in the room and offered his view of the wrestling with Keats etc. in JM's poetry.>>

While it is true that JM trained her parakeet to say Poor John Keats, I think that is the extent of the connection.

↑ Index

812. linda russo
postfeminist POETICS JOURNAL?
Thu 30 Jul 1998

[the subject line is purely whimsical]

hey Dodie or someone -- could you clarify? What is this new PJ? what's the story?

> . . . the new/long-overdue Poetics Journal [which features] a talk > [Dodie Bellamy]
> gave at New Langton Arts years ago--for an evening on Eros and Writing > (curated by Kevin K.) . . . purposely written for a non-intellectual > audience. . . .

thanks. lvr

↑ Index

813. linda russo
Re: POETICS Programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

There is in fact a comprehensive list, put out by the AWP called . . .
called . . ._the AWP Guide to Writing Programs_ -- Though they probably don't list "poetics" among their genres, some reading between the lines may prove illuminating and will certainly get you a list of all MFA/PhD's with a focus on writing, who teaches there, what special programs or perks they offer . . .

I'm also available for personal e-consultations. I've done extensive research over the past few years. Did you know that UNLV GIVES their students money to leave Las Vegas & go abroad? Did you know that Jorie Graham lives on a ranch in North Dakota and they heli-port her in for office hours? Did you know that Kathleen Fraser will be teaching a course on mixed-genre type "poetry" at the New College this fall? Did you know that Derek Walcott often takes his entire workshop out for lunch ON HIM (literally!! lookout girls!)? I'll tell you which schools accepted me, which rejected (don't bother with those losers!) and on what terms.

> I was wondering if anyone would reply with a list of some MFA/Poetics programs that they considered good. I'm considering getting an MFA in writing or a PhD in Poetics after I graduate from Berkeley this year. One of the most problematic things is that there is no (at least I haven't found it yet) comprehensive list of MFA programs in the country and who teaches at those programs.
>
> thanks,
> Amar Ravva

↑ Index

814. KENT JOHNSON
Oh Henry!
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Oh Henry!

What is this silly little black and white thing about Yeats contra Pound, as if that is really the point anymore?

Such silliness is as vulgar as the anti-reference stuff during Langpo's youthful, heroic days.

Who doesn't think Yeats was a great poet? And Mandelstam, who in your hands has become something like a stick you pretend is a sword-- yes, alright already. He is a great poet and no one ever said he wasn't.

Stevens is very "synthetic" but also quite conceptually "disjunctive," not in the Yeats "alternate path" at all, eventhough he loved the symbolists too.

Christopher Smart's "Jubilate Agno" is a thoroughly paratactic poem that is deeply moving and overflowing with spirit. God dictated it.

Renga is a centuries old tradition which continues, into the present, to be at service of a refined and "non-logical" exploration of emotional and perceptual dimensions. Word, rhythm, and image, as you put it, can be fused in this poetry in ways Yeats would have died for.

(come to think of it, what, more exactly, do you mean by "synthetic"? In what way can you argue that Pound did not "move toward a synthesis of word, rhythm, and image"? Really, Henry, it's like you're just throwing words around because you think you are a bull. Here, at least _so far_, the word 'synthetic' is just a pile of you know what.)

Celan doesn't make any sense like Yeats and those of his "path," but he makes people weep.

Have you read the work of Donald Revell, C.D. Wright, or Duncan McNaughton? These three contemporaries, off the top and among many, are disjunctive as all get out, but their emotional and musical and intellectual complexity is far beyond what you or I can manage.

And so on...

In fact, what about that Jennifer Moxley you wrote a review on? You were so enthralled you couldn't even bring yourself to explain what it was that was so great about her work. I don't know her work well, but I know it's really quite "disjunctive." My point is that you apparently found "disjunctiveness" in this case to be one path into the poetic values you have been so insistently trying to instruct the list about.

Why is Pound "the path" the "disjunctive" poets have followed? Some have followed Dickinson just as much as Pound. That poet is really weird, and she wasn't even into Theosophy. Whitman was really weird too. Sometimes it was like one thought just didn't connect to another.

Oh Henry. There is strong poetry and there is not-so-strong poetry and there is fake poetry and so on. But value has little to do with syntax or form. Some smart things you've said that I've seen point to this truth, but often you sound like someone who just got kicked out of the MA program at SUNY-Buffalo and is really pissed.

In good humor,
Captain Miller

↑ Index

815. linda russo
Re: BeeHive #2
Thu 30 Jul 1998

BEEHIVE is definitely worth checking out for those of us who know nothing or something about hypertext. I got lost (or did I wander?) for hours in CAROLYN GUERTIN's super piece QUEEN BEES AND THE HUM OF THE HIVE. As well as dancing beautifully and graphically with the hive metaphor, it traces lineages to hypertext pioneers, esp. to QUEEN BEES (women), across borders and into Canada (or into the US?) and with femininst and postmodernist theories . It's loaded with info, texts & links (both Canadian and American). A few of Guertin's essays have interesting analogues to the recent postfeminist thread on POETICS. See esp "Breaking Down Walls: experimental women's fiction" and "Honeycombing: open forms in hypertext and women's writing"

> BeeHive #2 features;
>
> QUEEN BEES AND THE HUM OF THE HIVE : Carolyn Guertin
> a critical overview of feminist hypertext's subversive honeycombings
>
> THE RED SPIDER and RAZORBURN : Brian Pritchett
> 2 short stories
>
> 5 NEW POEMS : David Hunter Sutherland
>
> 6 POEMS : Janet I. Buck
>
> ———
>
> You may also revisit BeeHive #1 in the newly added ArcHive
>
> ———
> Carolyn Guertin, Department of English, University of Alberta
> E-Mail: [redacted]; Tel/FAX: [redacted]
> Website: <http://www.ualberta.ca/~cguertin/Guertin.htm>

↑ Index

816. toddbaron
Re: POETICS Programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

New College of California and NAROPA outside of the"academy"

↑ Index

817. toddbaron
Re: the war room
Thu 30 Jul 1998

DUEL

(Can I have mine cut up?)

Todd Baron

ps: TV movie--and the prequel to JAWS

↑ Index

818. Jessica Smith
Re: POETICS Programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

---

what about poetics programs abroad? are there schools in Europe or Australia that anyone can recommend? what can be said about Johns Hopkins' program?

Jessica Smith

↑ Index

819. izak
Re: POETICS Programs
Thu 30 Jul 1998

Actually, I'd be interested in finding out about programs as well....

-Joanna Sondheim

****

"It does not behoove me to make myself smaller than I am." -Edith Sodergran
****

↑ Index

820. Tom Orange
thanks on howe
Fri 31 Jul 1998

---

thanks to all those who responded with suggestions on susan howe criticism. and yes, i did start with some of the primary texts but felt, more so than with other quote-unquote difficult texts, that i was more or less missing the boat.

would be interested to others' take on criticism as an heuristic. e.g. the first coolidge book i ever got was solution passage which on first glance left me largely disinterested. but upon some of watten's essays in total syntax, plus a good look at as much of the early stuff as i could find, solution passage became a whole new world...

bests,
t.

↑ Index

821. Kathy Lou Schultz
Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

This may just be my beef, but I get a little annoyed with anyone who has an MFA, MA, PHd in poetry (of whatever version) claiming to be "outside the academy." I, for one, believe this is a dated notion that no longer applies. Experimental writers ARE in the "academy." Susan Howe at Buffalo, Nathaniel Mackey at Santa Cruz, Myung Mi Kim at San Francisco State, Bob Perelman at U Penn, and etc. and etc.

So you wanna be in the "academy"? Can't say that I would necessary "recommend" San Francisco State University's MFA (having gotten it myself) but it's worth checking out for those who want the degree/experience. Besides the aforementioned Myung, Bob Gluck is a new tenure track professor there starting this fall (after having taught part-time for eons, but that's another story, actually not, it has to do with opposing political forces in the dept.). Aaron Shurin has taught part-time for quite a while also. And Maxine Chernoff is a good new leadership force as chair of the dept. (We couldda used her while I was there!)

One HUGE caveat: SFSU has no money for fellowships, so either be prepared to work a lot (SF being a notoriously expensive place to live) or be wealthy. Both types, the working & the wealthy, co-mingle there. Plus SF is home to great writing community. Sure we're a little cranky, and a whole lot gossipy, but we've got energy! We've got readings! We've got magazines! All in all, there's enough to love.

Kathy Lou Schultz

↑ Index

822. groberts
ONE NIGHT STAND
Fri 31 Jul 1998

---

does anyone know of any interesting reviews of ONE NIGHT STAND, the posthumous collection of Spicer poems edited by Allen, 1980?

Gary R.

↑ Index

823. trbell
Re: anglo/amer yeatspound
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Henry,

Thought-provoking thesis, but I'm not sure how there can be disjunction without synthesis and vice-versa

or maybe verse-vica squad:

```
                _Lettre-Ocean_
                              QQQQQQQQQQ
                                 Q     Q
                                  Q Q
     Q                        Q      Q Q
    Q   Q          --->       Q      Q     Q
   Q     Q                   Q     Q      Q
    Q   Q          <---       Q   Q        Q
     Q                        Q         Q
```

there would then be two sides to one coin?

tom bell

At 09:59 AM 7/30/98 EDT, you wrote:
>The idea of Yeats as a counter-exemplar to Pound is not anachronistic per >se. American experiment from Pound to Stein to Zukofsky to Howe etc. has >had a lot invested in the "disjunctive", as P. Quartermain's book title >emphasizes. While Yeats is no more attractive than Pound on a political >level, on an artistic level there is a clear alternative path. Both Pound >& Yeats were trained or self-taught in both visual art & music; but they >went in different directions with it. Pound's fascination with the image >led a poetics of disjunction; Yeats moved toward synthesis - a synthesis of >word, rhythm, and image. That approach is by no means played out, despite >the experimental tribe's ideological attachment to disjunction as the >insignia of political resistance & philosophical savoir-faire.
>- Henry Gould
>
>

↑ Index

824. Douglas Oliver

Re: anglo-american literary relations

Fri 31 Jul 1998

Suj : Re: anglo-american poetic relations
Date : 30/07/98
A : [redacted] (Keith Tuma)

Felt a leap in spirit when I read Keith Tuma's fascinating report on this London conference a day ago. There have been several signs recently that the old friendly and knowledgeable relationship between British and US non- mainstream writing -- the one I'd known in my earlier days -- is in process of revival. As I dislike poetic nationalisms, even British ones, this delights me.

Bit of history. When I lived in New York for nearly five years in 1987-8/92, apart from Tom Raworth, I couldn't have been asked about all other British poets more than six times altogether. Round about then, Greg Masters lent me Hugh Kenner's "The Sinking Island", an analysis of why British poetry had gone down the tubes . . . except for a few poets who had been influenced by the Americans. Since I've always had close friendships with US poets I'd do my best to spread more news. Even when helping to sum up a St Mark's symposium where Amiri Baraka had trounced not just the European-based literary syllabuses in the American academy but also British literature in particular (it's all Irish), I didn't go hostile because I can well see the necessities out of which he was speaking.

Helen Vendler and Edna Longley are perhaps easy targets, since they seem generally hostile to the experimental as this list might think of it. However, Vendler's reported belief that, before Mark Ford, Britain has had no good poet since WWII would reinforce my point that it's easier for Americans to appreciate Brit poets who have been strongly influenced by Americans (apparently Ford by Ashbery -- I don't know Ford's work). As for Ireland, didn't Oxford prof John Bayley declare in the Times or the NY Review of books about 1990 that the only good poetry currently being written in our isles was, indeed, Irish? Since I haven't myself gone the way of cloning my poetry off the States, I could get accosted after a reading in SF and asked, "Why is your poetry so Eurocentric?" "Because I live in Europe?"

During the 80s and early 90s Britain had become a difficult country to write from (even if, like me, you lived abroad). One slight ray in the transatlantic darkness came with a Charles Bernstein article in Sulfur, where Charles went to Britain and sort of "rediscovered" us -- at least, he mainly rediscovered the poets closest to the language schools. So be it. For us who had been toiling away, it was rather like Louise Bennett's old phrase, "Colonisation in reverse". But it was a useful start. Recent transatlantic conferences like the one Keith has reported are another flicker of awakening, especially if they keep their terms of reference generous and avoid coterie.

At the conf., Peter Barry asked for a pedagogically-friendly anthology of experimental British poetry. May I appeal to readers of this list to check out the introduction by Ric Caddel and Peter Quartermain to their new anthology, "Other British and Irish Poetry Since 1970" shortly to appear from Wesleyan? No one has yet been able to inspect the contents, but the book shows every hope of answering at least part of Peter Barry's requirements.

"Other", as I fondly call it, has already been cited on the Buffalo list: I'd like to re-emphasise that it's the first anthology of British and Irish experimental writing to be published in the States for decades. The introduction presents a particular view of British experimental poetry, one that I've already said I don't always agree with: but there's lots to chew on; and it is unremittingly intelligent. It's on John Tranter's Jacket mag webp at:

http://www.jacket.zip.com.au/jacket04/otherbrit.html

Can we now look forward to more of this genuine dialogue, US-British? I mean, just check out authors like Denise Riley, Allen Fisher, Bill Griffiths, Andrew Duncan, Grace Lake, Helen Macdonald, the Londoners, the Northerners, the Scots and Irish, the austere Mr Prynne, the Cambridge Circus, Rod Menghem's praiseworthy Equipage enterprises, Nicholas Johnson's Etruscan Readers, Ken Edwards Reality Street press, Lawrence Upton and the Subvoicive series in London, sparky Glasgow, the signifying North of England, Ireland's buried experimenters! There's very little spare cash in Britain for readings and almost none for the kinds of grants poets pick up in the States -- much more difficult to mount activities -- but there's a very sharp energy.

Also, Britain is newly receptive to American poetry as a recent conference I attended in Exmouth, Devon, made obvious to me. The younger writers on both sides are fast coming up. The time is ripe. Any suggestions for more contact, more mutual spreading of knowledge? Any comments about US perceptions of the current state of British poetry.

↑ Index

825. rsillima
Question of a "good war"
Fri 31 Jul 1998

I would never make light of the decision to participate in WW2. I don't think that stopping Hitler was optional.

But having seen the photos my own father took in Nagasaki one month after the bombing there (though never having spoken with him about this),

And thinking not just of Lowell, but of Creeley choosing to drive an ambulance in Burma, and of Whalen, Rexroth and others in the C.O. camp in Oregon, it certainly does seem that it was possible to step back and decide, for perfectly good reason, to say no. None of these people (not even Lowell) was an idiot.

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

826. linda russo
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

---

i feel even slightly so silly saying this but "being an academic" is more a frame of mind than a matter of degrees. Sometimes I sigh and say "so I'm an academic poet" (MFA, forthcoming PhD) -- but I absolutely AM NOT. "Academic" rings to me of "New Critical" -- viewing a certain set or relations between the establishement and poetry (establishment -- academic journals, first book prizes, homage to Laureate type gods and goddesses -- that whole rap).
Perhaps todd hit it on the head:
> It is possible to hold those degrees and not join up. I would add, > too, that "outside" don't mean much--BUT--that often the "academy" has > focused on poets and poetics that don't address what is being read or > written by "innovative" (er, experimental?) er--poets.

The Question to Ask Now is: has bringing "innovative" poetics, poets and poetries into the academy -- _taking_ the there (and off the streets?) -- MADE them academic/exclusive/closed/deadened them somehow? I wonder what people think? Personally, it's made it a possibility -- though I had to sit out many years with Academic academics until I got wind of the innovative ones -- but that now has changed; many "entering" the academy -- undergrads thinking of going on, as recent postings in this thread prove, know what's there.

> Kathy Lou Schultz wrote:
>
> This may just be my beef, but I get a little annoyed with anyone who has an MFA, MA, PHd in poetry (of whatever version) claiming to be "outside the academy." I, for one, believe this is a dated notion that no longer applies. Experimental writers ARE in the "academy." Susan Howe at Buffalo, Nathaniel Mackey at Santa Cruz, Myung Mi Kim at San Francisco State, Bob Perelman at U Penn, and etc. and etc.

↑ Index

827. henry
Re: Oh Henry!
Fri 31 Jul 1998

On Thu, 30 Jul 1998 19:54:35 -0500 KENT JOHNSON said: >Oh Henry!
>
>What is this silly little black and white thing about Yeats contra >Pound, as if that is really the point anymore?

>
>Such silliness is as vulgar as the anti-reference stuff during >Langpo's youthful, heroic days.
>
>Who doesn't think Yeats was a great poet? And Mandelstam, who in >your hands has become something like a stick you pretend is a sword-- >yes, alright already. He is a great poet and no one ever said he >wasn't.
>
>Stevens is very "synthetic" but also quite conceptually
>"disjunctive," not in the Yeats "alternate path" at all, eventhough >he loved the symbolists too.

Oh Kent! Thanks for waking me up this jelly-beaned Friday morning! Sure, disjunction isn't bad in itself... can't have poetry without leaps. But sometimes the simple observation isn't necessarily vulgar. There's a book out there [forget title as usual] that frames 20th-century modernism as the discovery of disjunction on many levels. Probably lots of books on that. But we're talking trends. Trends don't last forever. Open up any magazine advertised on this list. You will find poems made up of inchoate jumbles of broken syntax. I call this obscurity in a negative sense. By synthesis I mean the combination of syntactic rhythm - beautiful in itself ["good prose", as Ez put it in his early days] - the rhythm of sentences, phrases, lines - with imagery: concrete, conceptual. "Song" is a synthesis of music and vision. I don't think you can disagree that synthesis so defined, on both an artistic & an ideological level, has been devalued by the postmodernist/experimental movements in poetry.

>
>Celan doesn't make any sense like Yeats and those of his "path," but >he makes people weep.
>
>Have you read the work of Donald Revell, C.D. Wright, or Duncan >McNaughton? These three contemporaries, off the top and among many, >are disjunctive as all get out, but their emotional and musical and >intellectual complexity is far beyond what you or I can manage.
>
>And so on...
>
>In fact, what about that Jennifer Moxley you wrote a review on? You >were so enthralled you couldn't even bring yourself to explain what >it was that was so great about her work. I don't know her work well, >but I know it's really quite "disjunctive." My point is that you >apparently found "disjunctiveness" in this case to be one path into >the poetic values you have been so insistently trying to instruct the >list about.

I repeat, I'm not against disjunctive leaps per se. I'm just having fun suggesting that there are alternatives to the alternative, there are counters- to the counter-. In fact when I sent the message I was thinking of some of the Moxley I had read (in the Tender Buttons book) as an example of the counter-counter tendency toward complete sentences and synthetic structure.
>
>Oh Henry. There is strong poetry and there is not-so-strong poetry >and there is fake poetry and so on. But value has little to do with >syntax or form. Some smart things you've said that I've seen point to >this truth, but often you sound like someone who just got kicked >out of the MA program at SUNY-Buffalo and is really pissed.

I think syntax has a lot to do with the pleasure & beauty of poetry.

- W.B. [white bull] Henry

↑ Index

828. henry
Re: anglo/amer yeatspound
Fri 31 Jul 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998 00:24:28 -0500 trbell said:
>Henry,
>
> Thought-provoking thesis, but I'm not sure how there can be disjunction >without synthesis and vice-versa
>
> or maybe verse-vica squad:
>

```
>                    _Lettre-Ocean_
>                                  QQQQQQQQQQ
>                                     Q     Q
>                                       Q Q
>          Q                       Q       Q Q
>        Q   Q          --->       Q       Q     Q
>       Q     Q                  Q     Q      Q
>        Q   Q          <---       Q   Q        Q
>          Q                       Q         Q
```

>
>
>there would then be two sides to one coin?

Absolutely right, Tom. I'm just reminding the list that there ARE 2 sides. -Henry

↑ Index

829. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli
"a great Peeeeacock"
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Indeed, there was a great artistic mutuality between Yeats and Pound to the benefit of both, and to the reader. Pound had his egoistic fascism and Yeats had his post-Raphaelite automatic writing and these and many other differences surfaced e.g. over Joyce, over how to attack middle-class values etc. But to understand the depth and quality of the intellectual exchange, as well as mutual affection, just listen to Pound from Pisa:

The Kakemono grows in a flat land out of mist sun rises lop-sided over the mountain so that I recalled the noise in the chimney as it were the wind in the chimney but was in reality Uncle William downstairs composing that had made a great Peeeeacock in the proide ov his oiye had made a great Peeeeeeecock in the...
made a great peacock in the proide of his oyyee proide ov his oy-ee
    as indeed he had, and perdurable

    a great peacock aere perennius.

Yeats, the older poet, maintained the "I" ("eye" or "oy-ee") as the fixed center of observation. Pound, through the sheer material ambitions of his poetry culminating in the Cantos, shattered that assumption of the center ("I cannot make it cohere") attributing the subsequent fragmentation and dislocation as symptomatic of the modernist dilemma but not of 'the world' itself. The reorganization of culture occurred around the systems of quantification that elaborated or mimicked the success of technological science-- an historical condition that had been set in motion in the late Renaissance. Pound's modernism like all poetry, even work operating in bounded randomness such as Cage's composition, relies ultimately on its 'qualitates' not on any statistical efficacy. The Cantos' huge and largely failed ambitions opened the way for an understanding of the failure & fragmentation that poetry has experienced in this century in its attempt to assert itself in a world that largely dismisses it or requires a squeaky sentimentality in tone, form, and content which, for its meager existence, must contract to remain bereft of the critical capacity to address culture's central paradigms of science and technology. (Please excuse the sweeping generalizations and elisions that this form of communication (e.g. email) demands.)---Carlo Parcelli

↑ Index

830. Gwyn McVay
Re: POETICS Programs
Fri 31 Jul 1998

The /AWP Guide/ does indeed list those things, but precious few PhD programs, many more MA/MFA--and one does have to do a good bit of reading between the lines to determine what congenial or gnarly attributes each program "really" has.

(North Dakota? I thought the former Marjorie Pepper lived in Tie Siding, Wyoming when not in Iowa class, and I remember that only because I liked the name Tie Siding.)

pls add me to the list of those interested--I am actively seeking a good phud program in which to turn an idee fixe into a dissertation.

Gwyn McVay

↑ Index

831. henry gould
crabby bull
Fri 31 Jul 1998

---

the insipid artiness of the NY poets

the vulgar elitism of the language poets

the boring conventions of MFA programs

the elite vulgarity of the beat poets

the preppy blandness of the New Formalists

the genteel neatness of the old formalists

the good intentions of the new American poets

the ego-noise of the slam poets

the professional antics of professional poets

the tribalism of the in-groups

the identity crises of identity groups

I don't fit into any of these groups

I read Nabokov (in high school) & Mandelstam (in my 20s) just for relief

- crabby bull

↑ Index

832. louis stroffolino
Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Thanks, Karen Kelley, for your reponse....Well, spilling it (or stripping it--since strippers are artists), I have many responses-- only some of which I can touch on here. One would be to ask you how YOU would represent what goes on in the mind of a stripper (or to direct me to work of yours that deals with this).... Another response would be to agree with you (up to a point): Let's say that--in the particular passages you quote--that Yau is probably closer to what men think women are than to the actuality of a woman who may strip her clothes but yet not "Spill it" (her mind). But, if you look at the entire book (in which there are a variety of female characters, some as "I" and some as "she"), or even if you look at this particular piece in question IN ITS ENTIRETY, you might find that at least Yau is self-conscious (and meta) enough to admit this possibility (even the choice of title of the book, MY SYMPTOMS, calls attention to the possibility that the female speaker is a "masked male" etc... (a la Shakespeare).... I wonder if women who represent male characters in ways that might seem "stereotypical" or "derogatory" (or "positively" even) have the same problem (I'm not saying that I don't like reading such writing by the way: I learn much from it). Certainly not every woman writer is as extreme as Jane Austen who never had a scene in which two male characters appear without any women in the the scene (because she only wrote "what she knew"), nor am I suggesting they should do so....

I don't know enough about how dancers are "stereotyped" to comment on whether Yau is, in fact, doing it. In my experience (admittedly little) with strippers, the "stereotype about strippers" is "we only do it for the money. We get little or no intrinsic thrill out of exhibitionism, and we certainly see it more as humiliation than as any kind of 'grrrl power' over men." And in this particular story (which is good, but not--in my opinion, one of the best pieces in MY SYMPTOMS--I say this by way of "sales pitch" I guess), Yau goes very much against THAT stereotype, and yet elsewhere in MY SYMPTOMS he sympathetically portrays a woman who "had been a model, it was her boyfriend's idea. He brought her to New York when she was 17 and finally pushed her up the stairs the agency, even though she had been crying non-stop for two days."(120). So, I think we see a range here of attitudes towards female exhibitionism rather than an AGENDA proferring "proper" female roles. And if both these characters-- taken alone--may run the risk of becoming "stereotypes," I believe that by offering a range, these "stereotypes" cancel each other out (again, like Shakespeare presenting both a Beatrice and a Hero in the same play for instance--so the "truth" can be somewhere "in between" for a wider range of readers...)...

Besides, you take OUT OF CONTEXT a few quotes that all occur near the beginning (in the first 2 pages) of an 8 page story. In "Butcher, Baker..." the woman is only a stripper for the first two pages. Later on, the woman character, an EX-stripper, single-mother, is expressing her attraction to firemen, and raises all these doubts about her motivations: "i don't know why I have this thing about firemen, but I do...maybe it's because I think in metaphors and I should learn to think some other way..." (Yau himself a metaphorical thinker, going against the traditional anti-metaphorical prejudice that linked metaphor and women, in Locke, in Renaissance Rhetoricians like Puttenham, etc., though nowadays some claim it's a feminist argument to argue AGAINST metaphor....blah blah). Now, I see what happens here as an inversion of an "archetypal" stereotype here....the traditional linkage of women with water and men with fire (as in LYSISTRATA, another man putting words in the mouth of a woman, or in Jagger's "She's So Cold" for instance) and then, and I think this also goes beyond stereotype, the female character starts expressing a desire for a FIREWOMAN. There's both an unstereotypical lesbian dimension here, as well a desire on the character's part to BECOME a firewoman ("a woman who fights fires. They have to give her her due and treat her like a man. She's on the line with them..."), so this woman character tries on quite a few "non-traditional" roles in the course of this piece. This piece is --on one level--about whether identity is contingent not only on gender (or sex), but also one ones choice of profession (a la Harryman). And I am curious what you, Karen kelley, have to say about this (though I do not grant Mark Weiss the authority I grant you in this matter, since I am more suspicious of a male judging another male as sexist,) and I have more to say on this (but will save it for the longish essay I want to write on this book--if I can find a publisher who will make room for my logorrhea), but wanted to express some of these points here in this forum, in the interest of dialogue.... Again, thanks, for responding..... Chris Stroffolino

On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:

> Hi Chris,

> Good call: it IS "Butcher, Baker..."
>
> "I'm a dancer who makes men spin in their graves, gets them to yell 'bay bee,' whisper 'gosh' and 'honey,' and dream of 'whoopee.'"
>
> "Fate got warm with me, dealt me a flush. So I'm packaged right for the job. I have an easygoing, cornstalk smile; I'm tall and tilted just enough so short guys don't have to crane their little necks and hurt themselves. I can crouch and rise smooth as a wave. Twist and twirl until their brains turn to jellyfish bobbing in a beer bottle."
>
> "Early on I learned that men like to be swatted a little if you do it right and put on your girl-next-door smile while shaking your assets just beyond reach. I had tits and a smile that gave men cramps."
>
> *This seems extraordinarily off-base as a representation of what a woman might think* > *when contemplating male reaction to her body. Admittedly I am one woman among many.*
> *But I wonder if perhaps Yau isn't closer to what men think women think.*
>
> When I first read the piece I felt guilty about finding it an amusing read when it was so clearly a man's idea of a woman's feelings. And as someone who's held the same
> job as the narrator, I'm aware of how routinely dancers are stereotyped.
>
> It sounds like you felt differently about the piece, Chris. C'mon, spill it.
>
> Karen
>
> louis stroffolino wrote:
>
> > Dave Baratier asks what "cross-gendered identification" is.
> > I guess I just meant the term simply (if loosely) to mean
> > when someone of one gender and/or sex adopts or takes on
> > the voice of someone of another gender and/or sex....
> > I didn't say that YAU was NEW for doing that....
> > but then "make it new" has never been much of a standard for me
> > (see Mike Magee's intro to his mag COMBO for a view I largely share)
> >
> > Karen Kelley. COuld you tell me which particular piece of Yau's was > > in First Intensity? My hunch is you're talking about a piece called > > BUTCHER, BAKER, or CANDLESTICK MAKER, but I'd like to know more > > specifically before I respond....Because I'm curious about what > > you mean by "stereotypical" and why you think the piece you read is
> > so.....
> > Thanks, chris stroffolino

On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:

I recently read something of Yau's in a mag--was it First Intensity? I'm sorry--I can't recall, but it was perhaps from the new book & was the narrative of a stripper & I found it rather disturbing in that the narrator was kind of dumb & angry & thought highly of her breasts (no prob with that in & of itself) & little of men in general--she was kind of a jaded line drawing of a woman--with the interior monolog of a stereotype, which I suppose is okay, though as this thread goes to show, the whole male/female or masc/fem question is much more complex than Yau's piece implied, and I guess I just felt annoyed that he was willing to throw another stereotype my way.

louis stroffolino wrote:

> Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
> In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
> that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
> "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
> in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
> a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
> and negotiating the representational anxieties that
> might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
> but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
> chris stroffolino

On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:

Rah rah.

I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).

I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc. -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in patriarchal biases.

But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing > experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!

>
> Until we get some intelligent conversation going to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship) we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)
>
> Todd's comeback:
>
> being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..) gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --
>
> never impersonal.
>
> Tb

↑ Index

833. louis stroffolino

Re: Question of a "good war"

Fri 31 Jul 1998

Thanks Ron Silliman--I didn't mean to "make light" of it either with my reference to Lowell.... I am definitely aware of speaking as one who was

"socialized" by a vietnam-era anti-war attitude..... yet to what extent america helped create (fertile ground for) Hitler (humiliation of germany after ww1,"our own" fledgling imperial desires, the support then given germany as against communism, etc. etc.) would probably need to be addressed-- (and by one with the pull of spielberg!) .....cs On Fri, 31 Jul 1998 [redacted] wrote:

> I would never make light of the decision to participate in WW2. I don't think that stopping Hitler was optional.
>
> But having seen the photos my own father took in Nagasaki one month after the bombing there (though never having spoken with him about this),
>
> And thinking not just of Lowell, but of Creeley choosing to drive an ambulance in Burma, and of Whalen, Rexroth and others in the C.O. camp in Oregon, it certainly does seem that it was possible to step back and decide, for perfectly good reason, to say no. None of these people (not even Lowell) was an idiot.
>
> Ron Silliman

↑ Index

834. Mark Prejsnar

Re: Poetics programs, etc.

Fri 31 Jul 1998

On Thu, 30 Jul 1998, Kathy Lou Schultz wrote:

> This may just be my beef, but I get a little annoyed with anyone who has an MFA, MA, PHd in poetry (of whatever version) claiming to be "outside the academy." I, for one, believe this is a dated notion that no longer applies. Experimental writers ARE in the "academy." Susan Howe at Buffalo, Nathaniel Mackey at Santa Cruz, Myung Mi Kim at San Francisco State, Bob Perelman at U Penn, and etc. and etc.

Er, who precisely makes this claim, who has a degree?? any of these folks (Howe, Mackey, etc...?) They do indeed teach, and i don't know as i have ever heard/read any of 'em claim to be "outside the academy"...

Of course, some of us are, in many important senses. (OK i am clerical support-staff at a university, but like most support-staff, i'm way outside the academics that go on there..This just for clarification..Since i have no graduate degrees i realize the above couldn't have been aimed at me, even if you knew me from adam, which i suspect you don't...)

Whence this little tirade??

mark
@lanta

↑ Index

835. Robert Archambeau
Re: anglo-american literary relations
Fri 31 Jul 1998

> Any suggestions for more
> contact, more mutual spreading of knowledge?

My only suggestion is the obvious: get your hands on the British and Irish books. Unfortunately, this is often easier said than done from this side of the Atlantic.

The best way to get the Irish "buried experiment" is through Billy Mills' latest catalog, available at this address:

Alternative Irish Poetries Distribution List
c/o Billy Mills
37 Grosvenor Court
Templeville Road
Dublin 6W
Eire

If you just can't wait a minute longer, call:
353 1 [redacted]

Loads of good stuff, from the 30s to last week.

Bob Archambeau

↑ Index

836. Mark Prejsnar
Re: anglo-american literary relations
Fri 31 Jul 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Douglas Oliver wrote:

> "Other", as I fondly call it, has already been cited on the Buffalo list: I'd like to re-emphasise that it's the first anthology of British and Irish experimental writing to be published in the States for decades. The

No!! The Potes & Poets anthology Floating Capital : New Poets from London (1991) is superb.

And there was a special fat issue of New American Writing, which (despite the mag's title) was a similar anthology of non-mainstream Brits. It isn't in my humble opinion as good as Floating Capital, but it is good. (Came out 1989-1992, somewhere in there...)

mark prejsnar
@lanta

↑ Index

837. david bromige
creeley and WW2; s. howe, writings about
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Ron, Creeley, with only one eye, would not have qualified for the army. I believe he joined the ambulance corps as the next best thing he could do to take part in the war. Your list today seems to lump him together with C.O.s.

For those who want to read about Susan Howe, I'd like to add to Peter Quartermain's list my own article, published in Magill's Literary Ecnyclopedia, which category and issue I dont now recall, but there'll be an index.

Vtw, speaking of Silliman and Literary Ebcyclopediae, Volume 29 of the Gale Research Autobiography Series has a wonderful piece done by Ron, in a volume that also contains good articles by Ann Ericksaon and Gerald Rosen and Stephen Sandy.

David

↑ Index

838. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT
Shoptaw III
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Thanks for many helpful backchannel tips on what poets have used prosodic measures such as the charecter, word, phrase, etc. But again, I ws hoping to hear about _critical/ theoretical_ texts in which such measures are introduced/ used/ discussed. Or where prosody or the poem's soundscape is discussed in terms of syntax, grammar, instead of meter or phonology.

:: Reading John Shoptaw's "The Music of Construction - Measure and Polyphony :: in Ashbery and Bernstein" (in The Tribe of John) I'm just wondering who :: else has used these units of prosodic measurement - character, word, :: line, phrase, sentence, section. I'm aware of Silliman's use of :: sentence but not much else.

Fred Hertzberg

↑ Index

839. Reinfeld, Linda
Susan Howe
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Don't forget the issue of The Difficulties on Susan Howe, the (more recent) issue of Talisman -- and my book, Language Poetry: Writing As Rescue(LSU Press, 1992), which includes a chapter on Howe's work (chapters on Berstein and Palmer as well).

Linda Reinfeld
Rochester, NY

↑ Index

840. louis stroffolino
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

years ago, when susan howe was at temple, she accussed a certain poet (i mean 'dismissed' a certain poet--who will remain nameless--) as an "academic"....
i don't know if she still does this, and i certainly don't hold it against her (she wasn't as far "in"
the academy then as now), but it did resonate strongly with some fellow students of mine....
anyway, just to answer.....cs

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Mark Prejsnar wrote:

> On Thu, 30 Jul 1998, Kathy Lou Schultz wrote:
>
> This may just be my beef, but I get a little annoyed with anyone who has an MFA, MA, PHd in poetry (of whatever version) claiming to be "outside the academy." I, for one, believe this is a dated notion that no longer applies. Experimental writers ARE in the "academy." Susan Howe at Buffalo, Nathaniel Mackey at Santa Cruz, Myung Mi Kim at San Francisco State, Bob Perelman at U Penn, and etc. and etc.
>
> Er, who precisely makes this claim, who has a degree?? any of these folks (Howe, Mackey, etc...?) They do indeed teach, and i don't know as i have ever heard/read any of 'em claim to be "outside the academy"...
>
> Of course, some of us are, in many important senses. (OK i am clerical support-staff at a university, but like most support-staff, i'm way outside the academics that go on there..This just for clarification..Since i have no graduate degrees i realize the above couldn't have been aimed at > me, even if you knew me from adam, which i suspect you don't...)

>
> Whence this little tirade??
>
> mark
> @lanta

↑ Index

841. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, toddbaron wrote:

> ps: odd to say, but even at an Art school--Williams was news, Olson was a shock, Dickinson scared them--and Ashbery, O'Hara, Spicer--Hejinian, Scalapino--etc...were all revelations--and I was one of 5 teachers who focused on literature and poetry! I have friends who teach inside the "academy walls"--and they do amazing work--but each and everyone say it is a struggle to persuade dept. heads to change coursework..to have readings..to get work done that follows the course of late-20th century poetics! Imagine that problem in an art dept.!

This is germane to the interesting reflections by Bruce Andrews (somewhere in Paradise and Method), about the disparity he found, in the mid-, late-sixties, when starting out as a poet, between how much modernism "the establishment" accepted and understood in classical music, painting, dance, film, jazz, etc. and how much modernism was accepted or understood in the world of poetry (i.e., zilch). Leading him to look to other arts primarily for contemporary inspiration and example...

mark p.

↑ Index

842. Don Byrd
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

At 01:02 PM 7/31/1998 -0400, Chris Stroffolino wrote:
> years ago, when susan howe was at temple, she accussed a > certain poet (i mean 'dismissed' a certain poet--who will > remain nameless--) as an "academic"....
> i don't know if she still does this, and i certainly > don't hold it against her (she wasn't as far "in"

> the academy then as now), but it did resonate strongly
> with some fellow students of mine....
> anyway, just to answer.....cs

Being an "academic poet" has little to do with having an academic address and the notion of an academic art arose long before poets were notably teaching in universities.

In "Composition as Explanation" (1926), Gertrude Stein wrote:

"Lord Grey remarked that when the generals before the war talked about the war they talked about it as a nineteenth-century war although to be fought with twenieth-century weapons. That is because war is a thing that decides how it is to be done when it is to be done. It is prepared and to that degree IT IS LIKE ALL ACADEMIES it is not a thing made it is a thing prepared.Writing and painting and all that, for those who occupy themselves with it and don't make it as it is made."

In some sense most poetry and art are academic; it has nothing to do with whether its can be stylistically identified as "avant-garde" or "traditional." The Workshops at St. Mark's may in this sense be as academic as the Iowa Writer's Workshop.

db

db

↑ Index

843. Maryrose Larkin

Re: Poetics programs, etc.

Fri 31 Jul 1998

I do not wish to get involved with the inside/outside the academy argument, but I can say that, for me, getting an MFA was invaluable.

I received my degree from Bard College. At the time of my application, I had lived in a small (>10,000) town in upstate New York for over ten years. I applied to Bard because a) I knew where it was and b) I respected Robert Kelly. I wanted to go to school, any school, because I was desperately sick of my own writing and my own ignorance, and did not know how to fix either one.

At Bard, I got to work with some really wonderful people. At first, they just gave me a lot to read, which was mind blowing. It was beyond imaging what poetry could do. It blew the top of my head off. Then they started taking my writing apart, which was wonderful too. I learn to think about writing in a new way, and to acknowledge its enormity.

I have no idea why they admitted me to Bard. My writing was terrible and I knew nothing. I do know that most of the people who go through that particular MFA program feel their writing improves, no matter where they started.

Of the people I keep track of, one is working in a liquor store, one lives in New Orleans, one is a literacy coordinator & one lives at home. None of them are employed as teachers. They are all still writing.

If anything, getting an MFA has decreased my chances for material success in this world. When I go on job interviews, people either think I am overqualified or under qualified. While I was going to school, a lot of people asked me what I was going to do with this degree, and I said that one doesn't necessary do anything with it. One might become a better writer.

A while back, there was a comment that people should use the money they spend on school and go live in New York or San Francisco instead. In some ways, that is true. I would have had a lot more exposure to different writings and individuals. I am a very shy person (for example, I have been on this list for over 2 years, and this is my second post, I think). I don't think I would have been able to talk to people about writing from just living in a city. It is possible now that I might be able to live in a city and talk to strangers, but I couldn't then.

For me, meeting other people who really cared about writing, having a mixed community of peers and teachers, having my writing improve and having poetry and poetics become so much larger was well worth the cost of admission.

Maryrose Larkin

↑ Index

844. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

I think your reflections on this are highly interesting, Don...But i don't believe Kathy's original point, or what most of us have been saying, is about people being "academic poets." Rather it's about a socioideological location Being an academic poet is another matter. While Bob Gruman (inventor of "acadominant" as a label for langpots) and other will disagree, i consider the work of Howe and Perelman and our distinguished ListHoncho to be about as far from "academic poetry" as any i've ever seen. But they are the ones who've (correctly) been enumerated as otherstream poets teaching in the academy...Now Chris has also pointed out, in response to my challenge, that some of 'em are (or have been) capable of dismissing other poets as "academics.." Which i agree is very interesting and enlightening indeed...

mp

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Don Byrd wrote:

> At 01:02 PM 7/31/1998 -0400, Chris Stroffolino wrote:
> years ago, when susan howe was at temple, she accussed a > certain poet (i mean 'dismissed' a certain poet--who will > remain nameless--) as an "academic"....
> i don't know if she still does this, and i certainly
> don't hold it against her (she wasn't as far "in"
> the academy then as now), but it did resonate strongly > with some fellow students of mine....
> anyway, just to answer.....cs
>
> Being an "academic poet" has little to do with having an academic address and the notion of an academic art arose long before poets were notably teaching in universities.
>
> In "Composition as Explanation" (1926), Gertrude Stein wrote:
>
> "Lord Grey remarked that when the generals before the war talked about the war they talked about it as a nineteenth-century war although to be fought with twenieth-century weapons. That is because war is a thing that decides how it is to be done when it is to be done. It is prepared and to that degree IT IS LIKE ALL ACADEMIES it is not a thing made it is a thing prepared.Writing and painting and all that, for those who occupy themselves with it and don't make it as it is made."
>
> In some sense most poetry and art are academic; it has nothing to do with whether its can be stylistically identified as "avant-garde" or "traditional." The Workshops at St. Mark's may in this sense be as academic as the Iowa Writer's Workshop.
>
> db
>
> db

↑ Index

845. Gary Sullivan
Groovy Stein Collaborator on "Academic"
Fri 31 Jul 1998

"I call them academic because I think the composer's interest in the musical devices he was employing was greater than his effort toward a direct ... expression of anything in particular." --Virgil Thompson

Also, my Nordic American e-friend Erik "Ice" Belgum sent me the paragraph which follows. Anyone have any responses they'd like to backchanel? --Gary

I'm working out a new theory about the jacket design of New Directions books.

Basically, I'm claiming that they are designed to look like they already smell like cigarette smoke. That way when they do smell that way, after years of reading while smoking, no one is surprised. A corollary of this theory then is that smokers buy more New Directions books than non-smokers and that's why Laughlin designed them this way.

Did Laughlin smoke? (As if I didn't know!)

Your thoughts...

↑ Index

846. Gary Sullivan
My Definition of Academic
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Arguing about the word/status "academic."

↑ Index

847. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli
the end of the Hilbertian experiment
Fri 31 Jul 1998

"At the end of the Hilbertian experiment, Davis and Hersh assert,

'The actual experience of all schools--and the actual daily experience of mathematicians--shows that mathematical truth, is fallible and corrigible....It is reasonable to propose a different task for mathematical philosophy, not to seek indubitable truth, but to give an account of mathematical knowledge as it really is--fallible, corrigible, tentative, and evolving, as is every other kind of human knowledge.'

Not much in this line has been done, though one astounding book has shown what can be: Imre Lakatos' Proofs and Refutations: The Logic of Mathematical Discovery (1976) gives a detailed account of the rhetoric of the Descartes-Euler theorem on polyhedra...."---from The Rhetoric of Economics by Donald N. McCloskey---Carlo Parcelli

↑ Index

848. R. Gancie/C.Parcelli
Re: Question of a "good war"
Fri 31 Jul 1998

---

louis stroffolino wrote:
>
> Thanks Ron Silliman--I didn't mean to "make light" of it either > with my reference to Lowell....
> I am definitely aware of speaking as one who was "socialized"
> by a vietnam-era anti-war attitude..... > yet to what extent america helped create (fertile ground for) > Hitler (humiliation of germany after ww1,"our own" fledgling > imperial desires, the support then given germany as against > communism, etc. etc.) would probably need to be addressed-- > (and by one with the pull of spielberg!)
> .....cs
> On Fri, 31 Jul 1998 [redacted] wrote:
>
> > I would never make light of the decision to participate in WW2. I don't think > > that stopping Hitler was optional.
> >
> > But having seen the photos my own father took in Nagasaki one month after the > > bombing there (though never having spoken with him about this),
> >
> > And thinking not just of Lowell, but of Creeley choosing to drive an ambulance > > in Burma, and of Whalen, Rexroth and others in the C.O. camp in Oregon, it > > certainly does seem that it was possible to step back and decide, for > > perfectly good reason, to say no. None of these people (not even Lowell) was > > an idiot.
> >
> > Ron Silliman
> >

Stroffolino's points are extremely important as they are context by which we avoid sentimentality and error.---Carlo Parcelli

↑ Index

849. Gary Sullivan
VACATION!
Fri 31 Jul 1998

I'm off for two weeks, everyone! Yay! Now, I know full well I owe at least a couple people on this list responses, readings, e-mails & god knows what else, I hope not money. Soon! I swear! Whatever it is! It's yours! I'm just too exhuasted! To deal! Now! Anyway. Anyone who has any "must have Gary's attention" needs (or if you just wanna chat endlessly about afro-cuban music or Chantal Akerman's underarms [as seen in je tu il elle]) may please-to-dial [redacted] or write me write me write me Gary Sullivan, 331 - 13th Street, #4L, Brooklyn, NY 11215. Also, I don't mean to use this list to, like, "score drugs" or anything, but ... especially please-to-call me if you ... how can I say this ... & make it PoeticsList relevant? ... oh, okay, I have a question for everyone was it laudanum or opium that coleridge used? ... personally, I've always preferred XTC ... (wink, wink) ... cough ... cough-cough ... "nonsense filter"?!? ... puh-LEEZE ... when I git back I wanna see 4,000 derisive posts arguing for & against an "esperanto para poesia!"

ciao for niao,

Gary

↑ Index

850. Robert Corbett
Re: anglo/amer yeatspound
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Henry-

Aren't there more than two side? Where are the sides exactly? Are they the sides of the same coin. I would ask ask who side you are on, but I know which one. Modernism/Postmodernism are not "trends" -- they are the air we breathe. Anyone who says otherwise is itching for a fight. I don't know about Mandelstam, but Nabokov would be unreadable before modernism, counting our interest in the abject and the hyperironic. Of course, some of us find him unreadable anyway. And he was a crank so perhaps there is yet another side to join.

Robert
Purveyor of Poetry Siding

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, henry wrote:

> On Fri, 31 Jul 1998 00:24:28 -0500 trbell said:
> Henry,
>
> Thought-provoking thesis, but I'm not sure how there can be disjunction without synthesis and vice-versa
>
> or maybe verse-vica squad:
>
> ```
> _Lettre-Ocean_
>                 QQQQQQQQQQ
>                    Q     Q
>                     Q Q
>   Q                 Q     Q Q
>  Q  Q       --->     Q     Q    Q
> Q    Q               Q     Q     Q
>  Q  Q       <---     Q  Q        Q
>   Q                 Q        Q
> ```
>
> there would then be two sides to one coin?
>
> Absolutely right, Tom. I'm just reminding the list that there ARE 2 sides.
> - Henry

Robert Corbett "you are there beyond/ tracings flesh can [redacted] take,/ and farther away surrounding and University of Washington informing the systems" - A.R. Ammons

↑ Index

851. MAYHEW
Huranku Ohara
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Frank O'Hara also has some disciples in Japan, I believe:

I am not a sushi-chef, I am a noodle maker, why?
I think I would rather be a sushi-chef, but I am not. For example, I go to my friend's restaurant, he is making some nori, there is a sardine in it.

"Ano, sono sakana ga nan-desuka?" I ask him.
It needed something there, he explained. But I,
I am a noodle maker...

With greatest apologies,
Jonathan Mayhew, academic poet
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

852. Mark Prejsnar
Enigmatic Listmember on "Academic"
Fri 31 Jul 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Gary Sullivan wrote:

> "I call them academic because I think the composer's interest in the musical devices he was employing was greater than his effort toward a direct ... expression of anything in particular." --Virgil Thompson

Hmmmmmm...GS seems to be more interested in the device he's employing (the pithy but accusatory quote) than in direct expression of anthing in particular (..such as, who he thinks Thompson's groovy dictum referes to, among poets)....

↑ Index

853. John Latta
Re: My Definition of Academic
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Exactly. What I notice is how academics of all stripes (like prisoners of yore) must needs scramble always to the margins, those now fashionable outposts. Those everywhere in the thickest of the thick of it claiming they ain't. Reminds me of Walker Percy's image of the man on the crosstown bus reading about alienation: he ain't no way so alienated as the alienated man who can't even conceive of reading about alienation.

For the record: solidly clerical (library); MFA (mainstream); PhD (on the edge of the backwash or, switching metaphors, neglected sibling to one of the big poetics programs).

I have taken to identifying with Akaky Akakievich, academically so.

We're all academics. (Echo of Mai 68.)

John Latta

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Gary Sullivan wrote:

> Arguing about the word/status "academic."

↑ Index

854. toddbaron
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Kathy Lou Schultz wrote:
>
> This may just be my beef, but I get a little annoyed with anyone who has > an MFA, MA, PHd in poetry (of whatever version) claiming to be "outside > the academy." I, for one, believe this is a dated notion that no longer > applies. Experimental writers ARE in the "academy." Susan Howe at > Buffalo, Nathaniel Mackey at Santa Cruz, Myung Mi Kim at San Francisco
> State, Bob Perelman at U Penn, and etc. and etc.
>
> So you wanna be in the "academy"? Can't say that I would necessary > "recommend" San Francisco State University's MFA (having gotten it > myself) but it's worth checking out for those who want the > degree/experience. Besides the aforementioned Myung, Bob Gluck is a new > tenure track professor there starting this fall (after having taught > part-time for eons, but that's another story, actually not, it has to do > with opposing political forces in the dept.). Aaron Shurin has taught > part-time for quite a while also. And Maxine Chernoff is a good new > leadership force as chair of the dept. (We couldda used her while I was > there!)
>

well--I hold an MA in Poetics--have taught at the Community College level--and at the Otis Art Institutte--then made a shift to middle school (7th grade) and certainly am "outside" both the academy and much else. It is possible to hold those degrees and not join up. I would add, too, that "outside" don't mean much--BUT--that often the "academy" has focused on poets and poetics that don't address what is being read or written by "innovative" (er, experimental?) er--poets.

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

ps: odd to say, but even at an Art school--Williams was news, Olson was a shock, Dickinson scared them--and Ashbery, O'Hara, Spicer--Hejinian, Scalapino--etc...were all revelations--and I was one of 5 teachers who focused on literature and poetry! I have friends who teach inside the "academy walls"--and they do amazing work--but each and everyone say it is a struggle to persuade dept. heads to change coursework..to have readings..to get work done that follows the course of late-20th century poetics! Imagine that problem in an art dept.!

↑ Index

855. MAYHEW
Yeatpound
Fri 31 Jul 1998

I read Yeats now as a sort of bizarre oddball, rather than as a high-modernist, an official role that sort of trapped him. In "a prayer for old age" he wanted to eschew respectability in favor of madness. Is Yeatsianism played out? Yes, to the extent he is identified with a particular sort of aesthetic conservatism that has passed its prime. No, if we read him somewhat differently. I love parts of Yeats and would not oppose him to Pound completely. There are more than two sides--modernism is more like a twelve or thirteen sided figure. To paraprhase Perloff, Pound/Stevens/Stein/Yeats/Williams/Maiakovsky/Vallejo... whose period?

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

856. toddbaron
PS: THE LAW
Fri 31 Jul 1998

KATHY:

ps: one reason--to be addressed I hope--that many of the poets you mention are inside the academy--is work. Plain and simple. I know they are great teachers--but boy did they spend years fighting to get in--and they/we all need the damn steadiness of the work. I chose to teach Middle School becauseI love kids--and the steady check--my summers off simply allow me to remind myself how much joy there is in the serios work of a poet--but that--hereabouts--frightens my 40 year old mind and body--and no-one I know who writes can really afford not to work at all. Tho--of course--there are some--and they teach out of the joy and conflict teaching allows.

What would happen tho if all these poets--if all these writers--had the choice to collect their checks and not teach? Many would stay where they are--they are often doing the amazing work of keeping students readings and thinking! The academy ain't evil--but it does have an evil face!

↑ Index

857. Christine Palma

Your contact information, please.

Fri 31 Jul 1998

Hello Friends,

Because of a SCSI termination problem I've lost all of the files on my computer. Among other things - my eudora folder with various saved e-mail from over the past four years, all of my e-mail addresses, and it also zapped my regular address book. Data recovery attempts have failed. I don't have a hard copy of anything and I didn't back up... Yes, I was cocky to think it wouldn't happen to me, and even I don't feel sorry for myself.

Today a friend reinstalled a bunch of apps to get me up and running. All I can think about right now is that I would sure like to rebuild my address book and e-mail list.

If you gave me your contact info in the past, please send it again. Sorry for this form letter (I am sending it to my various lists), but it seems like the most efficient way to ask.

name/nickname

e-mail

phone number mailing address

date of birth

I'm sad :-(,
Christine

.....
Christine Palma

KXLU Los Angeles - 88.9 FM
"Echo in the Sense"
Countemporary Writers, Artists, and Performers.
Saturday Evenings, 8 to 9 PM

take a step into the sublime...

↑ Index

858. Karen Kelley
Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Hi Chris,

It's true, I've not read all of _My Symptoms_, and I didn't at all mean to dismiss the book. The idea of the title suggesting a masked male is quite interesting.

You also note: "This piece is--on one level--about whether identity is contingent not only on gender (or sex), but also on one's choice of profession."

We all choose & choose not to buy into our socially constructed gender identities, and choose & choose not to buy into our identities as contingent upon our professions. I've done/been lots of things, but try not to get too attached: overidentifying myself as a poet is as irritating to me as overidentifying myself as an ex-stripper. Interestingly, though, the stripper portion of my experience, which took up only 2 years of my 40, is the one that people focus on most & draw the largest number of conclusions about. The fact that I taught adult ed during that same time is, apparently, neither here nor there. The fact that I was a dancer is a strange demerit mark, dark & irreversible.

I got a tattoo when I was 17: back then, it was viewed by peers & parents as something irrevocable, signifying wantonness (esp. for a woman) & transgression. Getting a bachelors degree during that time, by contrast, was socially transparent. It was okay for me to be college-educated, and it even faded the intensity of the tattoo.

Now, of course, tattoos come & go with the swipe of a laser & are even trendy, so the tattoo has turned into something else again.

Dancing, while in part a survival move in the transition from housewife to divorced single-parent-with-no-child-support & degrees in sculpture & writing (contemplate that earning power), was also a fascinating experience in what I could absorb identity-wise. I suspect it is something that will not fade socially, as the tattoo did. It's an experience I still haven't fully digested, and perhaps will never be able to, but I am reluctant to over-intellectualize it, because I don't want to tidily categorize my own experience.

I've written about dancing once, as portion of a larger poem & include it (since our subject is , after all, immodesty):

That’s me, displaying.

movable dream lab.

inside the lid: something long buried: subdued light, carpeted floors, stairs, bird beak, a couch of some kind, forgotten books, stones, dirt, water, beautiful illegible scribbles, voices down the hall narrating as if a whole new continent I have been listening to all my life passing under the roof of my mouth, inwards.

_during her time on stage green envelops her, at other times other hues, notably deep blue._
wedding rings and husbands and wives rise urgently, sometimes turning into a cry.
_I work with a small stash of movements and gestures, the meaning of which is fluid._
there are several other styles of walking which accentuate gait or pace. a suggestive movement pierces through the relatively smooth surface.
at this moment she is low on the ground. the deceptive nature of the dance glides slowly towards shape—is it an arm or wing?--that comes down from the ceiling and fits into her chest.
the shape now appears to be one hand pointing downward to great advantage when she takes off an article of clothing in front of spectators. the actions of dressing and undressing are far from natural, a facet of the teasing process—now you see me, now you don't. just before the show ends and you think you might have got it, the beautiful dress has come off some time before.

I am alone. Vast views and the feeling of being forever and ever alone. My secret hiding places are woven around my body, shortcuts known only to me when I sink upon my knees. _Stiletto_—is that a curse, is that a whisper? Eyes, mouth, breasts, hips, hands. Nothing after that is denied me: birds freeze in midair and fall like stones to the ground.

And widow's weeds, bridal veils, bassinets, memorial wreaths, trousers, whiskers, wedding cakes, maps. My costume hides the fact, the great fact, the only fact. Faithless, fickle, whore, deceiver. Now I have the queerest sensation in my thighs. There's washing and powdering and lies in my teeth like ghosts within me, a covey of swans, undulant and florid. Somehow I still don't know how I do it. The men's faces are a thin gauze rising and falling, turning like a slow arrow. _What's in there?_ I have a variety of selves who have forgotten my name, as happens when one wishes to be nothing but one self. Corners of streets, bowls, bodies, windows and apples travel the immensely long tunnel of real things. Pictures should somehow be suspended between you and me, between the spectator and the dancer, equidistant from both. This promise is a glass of wine, an arm, it changes, it shapes itself differently, the one I need most keeps aloof, I fling after my name a little breath of crying and dancing. I see it falling and there it is, alone on the stage as if my life does in fact run or hurry before me, picking out one particular thing, the thing that matters, is it good, is it bad, is it right or wrong?

I have looked upon the aesthetic as the ethical.

I waver about in an air of secrecy. The heels make my weight fall in different directions, the looks over my shoulder help to stabilize my position. How nice it would be to marry a man—oh no, that idea someone else invented, raising her hand to her brow—it is not so. Instead of saying anything I turn, holding my stocking, and look at you.

louis stroffolino wrote:

> Thanks, Karen Kelley, for your reponse....Well, spilling it (or > stripping it--since strippers are artists), I have many responses-- > only some of which I can touch on here. One would be to ask you how
> YOU would represent what goes on in the mind of a stripper (or > to direct me to work of yours that deals with this)....
> Another response would be to agree with you (up to a point):
> Let's say that--in the particular passages you quote--that Yau > is probably closer to what men think women are than to the > actuality of a woman who may strip her clothes but yet not
> "Spill it" (her mind). But, if you look at the entire book
> (in which there are a variety of female characters, some as "I"
> and some as "she"), or even if you look at this particular piece > in question IN ITS ENTIRETY, you might find that at least Yau is > self-conscious (and meta) enough to admit this possibility (even > the choice of title of the book, MY SYMPTOMS, calls attention to > the possibility that the female speaker is a "masked male" etc...
> (a la Shakespeare)....
> I wonder if women who represent male characters in ways that might > seem "stereotypical" or "derogatory" (or "positively" even) have the > same problem (I'm not saying that I don't like reading such writing > by the way: I learn much from it). Certainly not every woman writer > is as extreme as Jane Austen who never had a scene in which two male > characters appear without any women in the the scene (because she only wrote "what she knew"), nor am I suggesting they should do so....

I don't know enough about how dancers are "stereotyped" to comment on whether Yau is, in fact, doing it. In my experience (admittedly little) with strippers, the "stereotype about strippers" is "we only do it for the money. We get little or no intrinsic thrill out of exhibitionism, and we certainly see it more as humiliation than as any kind of 'grrrl power' over men." And in this particular story (which is good, but not--in my opinion, one of the best pieces in MY SYMPTOMS--I say this by way of "sales pitch" I guess), Yau goes very much against THAT stereotype, and yet elsewhere in MY SYMPTOMS he sympathetically portrays a woman who "had been a model, it was her boyfriend's idea. He brought her to New York when she was 17 and finally pushed her up the stairs the agency, even though she had been crying non-stop for two days."(120). So, I think we see a range here of attitudes towards female exhibitionism rather than an AGENDA proferring "proper" female roles. And if both these characters--taken alone--may run the risk of becoming "stereotypes," I believe that by offering a range, these "stereotypes" cancel each other out (again, like Shakespeare presenting both a Beatrice and a Hero in the same play for instance--so the "truth" can be somewhere "in between" for a wider range of readers...)...

Besides, you take OUT OF CONTEXT a few quotes that all occur near the beginning (in the first 2 pages) of an 8 page story. In "Butcher, Baker..." the woman is only a stripper for the first two pages. Later on, the woman character, an EX-stripper, single-mother, is expressing her attraction to firemen, and raises all these doubts about her motivations: "i don't know why I have this thing about firemen, but I do...maybe it's because I think in metaphors and I should learn to think some other way..." (Yau himself a metaphorical thinker, going against the traditional anti-metaphorical prejudice that linked metaphor and women, in Locke, in Renaissance Rhetoricians like Puttenham, etc., though nowadays some claim it's a feminist argument to argue AGAINST metaphor....blah blah).
Now, I see what happens here as an inversion of an "archetypal" stereotype here....the traditional linkage of women with water and men with fire (as in LYSISTRATA, another man putting words in the mouth of a woman, or in Jagger's "She's So Cold" for instance) and then, and I think this also goes beyond stereotype, the female character starts expressing a desire for a FIREWOMAN. There's both an unstereotypical lesbian dimension here, as well a desire on the character's part to BECOME a firewoman ("a woman who fights fires. They have to give her her due and treat her like a man. She's on the line with them..."), so this woman character tries on quite a few "non-traditional" roles in the course of this piece. This piece is --on one level--about whether identity is contingent not only on gender (or sex), but also > one ones choice of profession (a la Harryman). And I am curious what you, Karen kelley, have to say about this (though I do not grant Mark Weiss the authority I grant you in this matter, since I am more suspicious of a male judging another male as sexist,) and I have more to say on this (but will save it for the longish essay I want to write on this book--if I can find a publisher who will make room for my logorrhea), but wanted to express some of these points here in this forum, in the interest of dialogue....

> Again, thanks, for responding.....
> Chris Stroffolino
>
> On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:
>
> Hi Chris,
>
> Good call: it IS "Butcher, Baker..."
>
> "I'm a dancer who makes men spin in their graves, gets them to yell 'bay bee,' whisper 'gosh' and 'honey,' and dream of 'whoopee.'"
>
> "Fate got warm with me, dealt me a flush. So I'm packaged right for the job. I have an easygoing, cornstalk smile; I'm tall and tilted just enough so short guys don't have to crane their little necks and hurt themselves. I can crouch and rise smooth as a wave. Twist and twirl until their brains turn to jellyfish bobbing in a beer bottle."
>
> "Early on I learned that men like to be swatted a little if you do it right and put on your girl-next-door smile while shaking your assets just beyond reach. I had tits and a smile that gave men cramps."
>
> *This seems extraordinarily off-base as a representation of what a woman might think* > *when contemplating male reaction to her body. Admittedly I am one woman among many.*
> *But I wonder if perhaps Yau isn't closer to what men think women think.*
>
> When I first read the piece I felt guilty about finding it an amusing read when it was so clearly a man's idea of a woman's feelings. And as someone who's held the same
> job as the narrator, I'm aware of how routinely dancers are stereotyped.
>
> It sounds like you felt differently about the piece, Chris. C'mon, spill it.
>
> Karen
>
> louis stroffolino wrote:

> Dave Baratier asks what "cross-gendered identification" is.
> I guess I just meant the term simply (if loosely) to mean
> when someone of one gender and/or sex adopts or takes on
> the voice of someone of another gender and/or sex....
> I didn't say that YAU was NEW for doing that....
> but then "make it new" has never been much of a standard for me
> (see Mike Magee's intro to his mag COMBO for a view I largely share)
>
> Karen Kelley. COuld you tell me which particular piece of Yau's was > in First Intensity? My hunch is you're talking about a piece called > BUTCHER, BAKER, or CANDLESTICK MAKER, but I'd like to know more > specifically before I respond....Because I'm curious about what > you mean by "stereotypical" and why you think the piece you read is
> so.....
> Thanks, chris stroffolino
>
> On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:
>
> I recently read something of Yau's in a mag--was it First Intensity? I'm > sorry--I can't recall, but it was perhaps from the new book & was the narrative > of a stripper & I found it rather disturbing in that the narrator was kind of
> dumb & angry & thought highly of her breasts (no prob with that in & of itself)
> & little of men in general--she was kind of a jaded line drawing of a > woman--with the interior monolog of a stereotype, which I suppose is okay, > though as this thread goes to show, the whole male/female or masc/fem question
> is much more complex than Yau's piece implied, and I guess I just felt annoyed > that he was willing to throw another stereotype my way.
>
> louis stroffolino wrote:
>
> > Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
> > In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
> > that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,
> > "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as > > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
> > in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
> > a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
> > and negotiating the representational anxieties that
> > might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
> > but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
> > chris stroffolino
>
> On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:
>
> Rah rah.

I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).

I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc. -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in patriarchal biases.

But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine and stop stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!

Until we get some intelligent conversation going to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship) we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages. (Not that it isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)

Todd's comeback:

being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..) gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --

never impersonal.

> Tb

↑ Index

859. L Emerson
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, linda russo wrote:

> The Question to Ask Now is: has bringing "innovative" poetics, poets > and poetries into the academy -- _taking_ the there (and off the > streets?) -- MADE them academic/exclusive/closed/deadened them > somehow? I wonder what people think? Personally, it's made it a > possibility -- though I had to sit out many years with Academic > academics until I got wind of the innovative ones -- but that now has > changed; many "entering" the academy -- undergrads thinking of > going on, as recent postings in this thread prove, know what's there.
>
Thankyou to all who have suggested programs, gives me something to think about.

In response to Linda Russo's Question...I'm about to begin my MA in English this fall on Canadian sound poetry and I'm bursting at the seams with excitement--excitement to be finally done with what the academy considers necessary, which is (more often than not) "mainstream." It's not 'mainstreamedness' that I have minded, but the drab and absolutely deadening, unvital way in which the mainstream folk are approached. Fortunately, a little over halfway through my degree, with the help of a few great profs here, I _did_ catch wind of the more innovative poets and from then on studying and aspiring within an academic environment has become a joy. Flakey-sounding perhaps, but I think what I think _now_ is that yes, the mainstreamed folk cherished by the academy have been _ made_ dead by the normal academic machinery (which is why, as my sessional friends teaching English 101 tell me, when given the choice to skip the poetry unit altogether most happily vote to do so); so given that they were all, at one time, as innovative and "on the street" (?) as the innovators of today, how have I had such good luck? Maybe it's not only the rigid way in which institutions have in the past approached poetry, but the poetry itself was well-suited to being studied in an institutional setting (I'm thinking of Eliot--is this unfair of me?).

SO, maybe all this is to say that it's the rigidity of institutions that makes them yucky and that does violence to the vital elasticity of a lot of great art/poetry; and since--as far as I know!--I'm "inside" academia and been able to have enough room to do explore the margins, maybe the academic environment is becoming more conducive to the study of innovative poetry/poetics and more flexible in its ranges of possible approaches.

↑ Index

860. maz881
Zinc Bar Reading
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Special NY appearance:

MICHAEL TURNER

JUDY RADUL

Zinc Bar, Sunday August 2nd {1998}

6:30 pm / 90 West Houston St. (just west of Laguardia Place)

↑ Index

861. Kathy Lou Schultz
Poetix programs/my little tirade
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Oh, my little tirade, I remember it well. . . I was thinking about the fact that I no longer think it's historically accurate to say that "experimental" poetry, or language poetry for that matter, is a project "opposed" to the academy. It is opposed to traditional/conservative forces within the academy that have dug their heals in, ready to defend what(?) their position, what they see as a (their) "tradition." But most often those folks are ahistorical themselves, not understanding the longstanding traditions of what is called "experiment."

I weathered vicious "poetry wars" while a grad student at San Francisco State, so am particularly aware of these factions. My point came up in the context of someone (Todd B.?) recommending grad programs and then saying that these were "outside of the academy" and this just does not make sense. Certain programs may embrace more radicalizing traditions, but that doesn't make them "outside" the "academy."

I agree with this point:

Mark Prejsnar wrote:
I think your reflections on this are highly interesting, Don...But i don't believe Kathy's original point, or what most of us have been saying, is about people being "academic poets." Rather it's about a socioideological location Being an academic poet is another matter.

And find this interesting:

John Latta wrote: Exactly. What I notice is how academics of all stripes (like prisoners of yore) must needs scramble always to the margins, those now fashionable outposts. Those everywhere in the thickest of the thick of it claiming they ain't.

Thanks all.
Kathy Lou

↑ Index

862. Matt Kirschenbaum
Re: My Definition of Academic
Fri 31 Jul 1998

The current insider/outsider discussion re the academy recalls the "poets vs. critics" thread (and yes, if memory serves, that was one of the actual subject lines) played out on Poetics a year or two ago. Perhaps the cyclical resurrection of the topic is invetiable given the proximity (or, if you excuse the academically fashionable pluralization, the multiple proximities) this list and many of its constituents bear towards academic institutions. But still, the appearance of this topic always depresses me for its unavoidable ressonance with broader strains of public anti-intellectualism: the conservative attack on the professoriate, media attacks on the "ivory tower" (what is the origin of that epithet, anyway?).

(Nor are these topics of only "academic" interest given that the budgets of public universities like SUNY Buffalo or the U. of Virginia (where I am) are functions of state legislatures and public policy -- and thus, in some ultimate sense, public opinion.)

Academic self-hatred of the kind sometimes seen here strikes me as a nostalgic gesture, nostalgia for a time when academics could still afford the luxury of their identity.

John Latta wrote:

> We're all academics. (Echo of Mai 68.)

Will the real world please stand up. Matt

↑ Index

863. Tosh
Re: fixing to die
Fri 31 Jul 1998

Dear Anthony and list,

The Mishima film was filmed in the mid or late 60's. I can't remember the name. There's no dialogue or sound except for Wagner's music. It is a weird beautiful, odd, narcissistic film by Mishima himself. It is about 20 minutes long, and basically it is based on his short story "Patriotism."

Mishima plays a soldier who has been dishonored, and therefore, along with his wife, commits suicide, . Basically a little warm up to his final performance.'

After his death, Mishima's wife tried to destroy all prints, including the negatives. What I saw was pretty much a bootleg video - and the print wasn't that hot.

So the film is sort of between Cocteau, Genet's prison film, and Kenneth Anger.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

864. Katherine Lederer
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

I've always thought of "academic" as a term denoting a certain form of cultural entrenchment. As in: "the academy" functions as a sort of cultural repository--and as such it is by definition conservative.

I have never understood the claim that "avant-garde" poets are in any way less academic than "mainstream" poets. Both (ostensible) camps guard their traditions and canons jealously... both harbor various means of garnering prestige (mags, prizes--c'mon that the avant-garde doesn't have lots of book prizes and awards...).... both maintain a capacity for dogma.

Best,
Katy

↑ Index

865. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: My Definition of Academic
Fri 31 Jul 1998

I'd join the academy if I could.
I'm tired of never having any money.
I'm tired of the stress always looking for the next little job.
I'm tired of being an outsider.
I'm tired of no health insurance book/travel/conference perks.
I'm tired of begging. I'm tired of insomnia.
I'm tired of no furniture, eating poorly.
I'm tired of the whole fucking thing.
I'd join in a second.
I'd join for free.

Alan's Gang, wondering who's in and who's out at the moment.

↑ Index

866. KENT JOHNSON
Re: Question of a "good war"
Fri 31 Jul 1998

On 31 July, Ron Silliman wrote:

> I would never make light of the decision to participate in WW2. I don't think that stopping Hitler was optional.
>
> But having seen the photos my own father took in Nagasaki one month after the bombing there (though never having spoken with him about this),
>
> And thinking not just of Lowell, but of Creeley choosing to drive an ambulance in Burma, and of Whalen, Rexroth and others in the C.O. camp in Oregon, it certainly does seem that it was possible to step back and decide, for perfectly good reason, to say no. None of these people (not even Lowell) was an idiot.

Worth remembering too, whatever one might think of it, that there were a number of U.S. anti-Stalinist socialists (none of them idiots, either) who followed in the tradition of Bill Haywood, Mother Jones, and Eugene Debs, and said: This is a capitalist war; workers should refuse to fight for the armed forces of capital and organize, through the newly won unions, their own military contingents to fight fascism.

Most of them went to jail under the Sedition Act. The U.S. Communist Party (which had significant influence in the CIO) publicly cheered, calling them Nazi agents.

Kent

↑ Index

@poetics

The UB Poetics Discussion Group

Archive of Electronic Correspondence

August 1998

753 messages · Fri 31 Jul 1998 – Mon 31 Aug 1998

August 1998 was the month the news refused to be ignored. In eleven days the American embassies in Nairobi and Dar es Salaam were bombed, Omagh was torn open, the President testified at last, and cruise missiles fell on Sudan and Afghanistan — and the Poetics list, which as a rule lets the world's calamities pass, this time could not, as it had not in the spring, for Jonesboro. But the manner of its attention was entirely its own. The room did not report the news or grieve it so much as translate it: every catastrophe that entered in August was made, within a post or two, to speak the list's private language of framing, lineage, and blame.

For underneath the sirens the list went on with its own largest argument, which was about the word academic. It ran to some forty-six messages and, characteristically, never settled what the word meant — linda russo typing out a history of the mimeo revolution past midnight ("it's lonely on this list at 2 am!"), david bromige countering that to call a thing academic is merely to call it "of no moment", the whole room circling the awkward fact that the avant-garde and the mainstream now share a faculty lounge. It was the month's real occupation, and it tells you where the list lives: even as the missiles flew, its deepest energy went to litigating a piece of its own vocabulary.

When the missiles did become the subject, the list answered them as only it would — with a proposal for a poem. In the thread someone had titled Brainwashed Sudanese poets, Kent Johnson called for a statement against the strike, signed jointly by American and Sudanese poets, and the room argued the idea with its usual scruple. Henry Gould warned against romanticising a foreign regime, invoking the poets who had loved Stalin too well; Mark Weiss named what Sudan had done to its own; Judy Roitman observed that naïve contact could get the Sudanese killed. Ron Silliman cut under all of it — "military offenses against terrorism basically NEVER work." A war arrived, and the room's response was to workshop a solidarity.

The month's sharpest moment needed no argument at all. All August a cheerful thread had been assembling a syllabus of American comedy — the list at play, trading funny books and funnier theories — when k.a. hehir walked into it carrying the roll of the Omagh dead and retitled the thread, mid-stream, terrorism like comedy is not pretty. He had posted the names to cool the theorising; "this made me cry at my desk today.” It is the truest picture of the month: the news arriving in the room not through the door marked politics but as a reply in the comedy thread, the dead of Northern Ireland laid down among the punchlines.

And the one loss that needed no translation was the list’s own. On the fifth, before the missiles, Charles Watts had died in Vancouver — the librarian who kept the Contemporary Literature Collection, the very kind of archive that makes a month like this one legible, dead of cancer. The room did not have to convert his death into anything; it simply mourned him, George Bowering and Billy Little among them, and Peter Quartermain closed the notice with the plainest sentence the month produced: “He was one of the reasons to be, here.” I have set that quiet death at the head of a loud August exactly as it fell — the one thing all month the room did not first translate into an argument.

— Kristen M. Fabians

Index

Writers, names mentioned, and concepts. Every number links to its message. 753 in all.

WRITERS

Acgold01 285
Alexander, Charles 17, 21, 39, 41, 42, 79, 85, 114, 218, 223, 302, 319, 352, 381, 383
Alexander, Christopher W. 200
And, Miekal 543, 647, 657, 711
Andrews, Jim 116, 288, 603, 604
Archambeau, Robert 65, 67, 71, 122, 124, 211, 262, 280, 281, 286, 409, 411, 414, 732
Balestrieri, Peter 30, 75, 391, 456, 714
Baratier, David 58, 222, 241, 257, 287, 396, 484, 527, 528, 654, 693, 737
Barbour, Douglas 49, 240, 609
Beard, Tom 102, 255, 344
Bell, Thomas 489, 510, 554, 602, 655, 706, 715
Bernstein, Charles 248, 256, 267, 690, 704
Bouchard, Daniel 278, 326, 475, 574, 583, 586, 630
Bowering, George 37, 56, 107, 164, 186, 187, 343, 447, 471, 491, 512, 565
Brennan, Joe 332
Bromige, David 14, 15, 134, 136, 194, 195, 201, 323, 327, 329, 466, 481, 498, 579, 623, 646, 650, 662, 678, 722, 724, 748
Byrd, Don 69
Cabri, Louis 185, 247
Caddel, R I 64, 368
Card, Macgregor S 359
Carter, Daniel 117
Casey, Sean 568
CD 500
Charssmith 20, 143, 269, 692, 695, 709
Cheezem, David 508, 577
Cheney, Don 573, 580
CHERNOFF, MAXINE 22, 245, 503
Clippinger, David 46, 61
Coffey, Michael 264
Conte, Joseph 320
Corbett, Robert 84, 92, 227, 295, 297, 358
Corbin, Michael 513, 592, 667
Daley, R M 24, 374, 408, 440, 463, 465, 470
Damon, Maria 12, 13, 44, 45, 60, 129, 149, 197, 213, 351, 369, 370, 701
Davis, Jordan 219, 300, 318, 350, 453, 559, 660, 674, 686, 736, 739
Dbkk 16, 29, 138, 220, 648
Debrot, Jacques 10, 541, 652, 696
DeDeo, Simon 104, 105, 106, 375
Devaney, Mj 437
Dlugonski, Dan Or Orion Raphael 524
Douglas 151, 473, 665
Drake, R. 439, 483, 501, 526, 656
DuCharme, Mark 25, 82, 111, 145, 165, 167, 208, 242, 249, 252, 270, 272, 273, 274, 441, 442, 717
Durand, Marcella 364
Epstein, Andrew D 135
Farmland, Skagitonians To Preseve 593
Farr, Roger 333
Al Filreis 322
Franco, Michael 72
G, Henry 128, 277, 357, 486, 677
Gallagher, Kristen 480
Ganick, Peter 313, 410
Glazier, Loss Pequen~o 251, 459, 671
Golumbia, David 744
Gould, Henry 133, 171, 173, 196, 224, 298, 354, 386, 412, 436, 478, 566, 581, 626, 670, 733, 742
Groberts 177, 529, 536, 611
Grotjohn, Bob 525
Gudding, Gabriel 745
Guertin, Carolyn 284
Hatlen, Burt 570, 734
Healy, L. MacMahon And T.R. 115, 172, 226
Hehir, K.a. 57, 289, 340, 424, 462, 538, 560, 725, 726, 727
Hen 221, 306, 307, 395
Henry 54, 55, 62, 73, 76, 80, 89, 121, 131, 140, 170, 178, 199, 204, 231, 261, 429, 449, 454, 633, 637, 641
Hreha, Sarah 664
Humanities, ShaunAnne Tangney 11
JOHNSON, KENT 5, 81, 100, 155, 387, 405, 406, 545, 595, 596, 618, 636, 640, 645, 685, 700, 749
Joris, Pierre 392, 718
Joseph, Safdie 112, 193, 338, 496, 607
Joyce, Trevor 371
Kaipa, S. 96
Keeney, Scott 672
Kelleher, Michael 688
Kelley, Karen 506, 555, 591, 753
Kellogg, David 90, 95, 125, 153, 334
Ken|n|ing 445, 669
Kirschenbaum, Matt 68, 192, 589
Kuszai, J. 474, 476
Latta, John 533
Lawrence, Anthony 493
Lazer, Hank 716, 729
Lederer, Katherine 535
Levy, Herb 110, 282

Lewis, Joel 184, 305, 310, 366, 367, 497, 567, 638, 702
List, Poetics 315, 530
LIT, Fredrik Hertzberg 292, 446, 624
Little, Billy 19, 23, 205, 423, 482, 521, 562, 563, 658, 659, 679, 680, 681
Loden, Rachel 156, 188, 191, 215, 492
Magee, Michael 88, 120, 137, 150, 198, 202, 203, 210, 212, 216, 238, 276, 290, 314, 316, 317, 331, 347, 349, 417, 427, 432, 433, 448, 450, 451, 552, 584, 613, 625, 634
Marks, Steven 47
Marsh, William 494
MAYHEW 86, 130, 175, 271, 301, 337, 393, 394, 415, 430, 488, 520, 575, 617, 666, 741
Maz881 98, 183, 229, 258, 523
McColl, Michael 487
McCrary, Jim 330, 477, 612
McCreary, Chris 99
McFadden, David W. 324, 325, 360, 416, 418, 420, 421, 422, 452, 479, 516, 534, 548, 549, 590, 644, 682
McGuire, Jerry 461
McVay, Gwyn 279, 348, 537
Muratori, Fred 569
Nielsen, Aldon 93, 254
Obenzinger, Hilton Manfred 504, 558, 588
Oh-oh, Henry 214
Oliver, Douglas 6, 38, 87, 113, 232, 663
Orange, Tom 141, 142, 166
Pecqueur, J. 74
Perez, James 419, 455, 668
Perloff, Marjorie 1, 237, 239, 699
Perrella, F. W. 263, 710
Peters, Carl Lynden 228, 230
Piuma, Chris 649, 676
Pollet, Sylvester 517
Pound, Scott 490, 544, 594, 620, 751, 752
Prejsnar, Mark 63, 66, 77, 123, 126, 132, 139, 174, 389, 572, 610, 631, 632, 651, 735, 738
Pritchett,Patrick 180, 296, 542, 608
Prunty, Randy 50, 51
Quartermain, Peter 182
Qureshi, Ramez Ejaz 598, 621, 661, 705, 707
R.Gancie/C.Parcelli 147, 321, 390
Reiner, Christopher 639
ReMap, Todd Baron /*/ 472, 561, 564, 587, 605, 606, 619, 703, 723
Roess, Christian 34, 53, 59, 94, 176, 233, 253
Roitman, Judy 614, 627, 642
Rosenberg, Jim 673
Rsillima 118, 169, 206, 246, 260
Ruggles, Tracy S. 217
Russo, Linda 2, 3, 9, 78
Salerno, Mark 385, 708
Samuels, Lisa 28, 48
Schaefer, P.Standard 376, 691
Schultz, Kathy Lou 162, 189, 190
Schultz, Susan 160, 293, 457, 713
Schwartz, Jay 468
Scroggins, Mark W 36
Senning, Bradford J 635
Shemurph 469
Silliman, Ron 515, 551, 557, 576, 728
Smith, Hazel 161
Sondheim, A. Jenn 499, 502, 507, 600, 601, 622, 643, 712
Sondheim, Alan Jennifer 91, 97, 163, 236, 275, 311, 365, 407
Steinberg, Hugh 7, 40
Stroffolino, Louis 294, 403, 426, 518, 687
Sullivan, Gary 425, 431, 628, 675, 683, 697, 740
Sumner, Alaric 144
Sweet, Erik 18, 27, 291, 438, 443, 458, 460, 743
Taylor, B. 519
Thompson, George 378, 388, 444, 464, 467, 629
Tiess, Robert J. 43
Toddbaron 148, 154, 168, 259, 308, 312, 335, 336, 341, 342, 346, 355, 356, 363, 377, 397, 398, 399, 402, 434, 435
Toscano, Rodrigo 495, 556, 578
Tosh 101, 108, 127, 345, 547, 719
Tranter, John 514
Trbell 4, 31, 32, 103, 109, 146, 157, 158, 159, 179, 181, 209, 250, 299, 361, 362
Treadwell, Elizabeth 225, 485, 532, 599, 615, 684
Trevor, Karen And 404, 546
Trujillo, Dorothy 235, 244, 268, 730
Tuma, Keith 26
Upton., Lawrence 8, 265
Vassilakis, Nico 750
Wallace, Mark 731
Weiss, Irving 52, 616
Weiss, Mark 33, 35, 70, 243, 339, 379, 380, 382, 400, 428, 505, 509, 511, 522, 550, 553, 582, 585, 597, 653, 689, 698, 720, 721, 746
Wellman, Donald 119, 152, 303, 304, 384
Wheeler, Susan 83, 207
Whyte, Ryan 234, 309, 539, 540
Wright, Laura E. 266, 283, 328, 353, 372, 373, 747 Zauhar, David 401, 694
Zimmerman, Daniel 413
Zurawski, Magdalena 531, 571

NAMES MENTIONED

Abbott, Steve 296
Acker, Kathy 235, 244, 295, 740

Adams, Robert 84
Adorno, Theodor 666, 667, 670, 705, 751
Agamben, Giorgio 176, 181
Albon, George 359
Albright, Madeline 475, 586
Alexander, Christopher W. 200, 302
Alice, Mary 38, 530, 562, 563, 658, 659, 679, 680, 681, 694, 717
Ambrose, Joe 112, 420
Americans, Asian 122, 475, 522, 548, 574, 599, 605, 626
Amerika, Mark 548
Anania, Michael 280, 320
Anderson, Beth 359, 541
Anderson, Laurie 628
Andrews, Bruce 79, 185, 207, 256, 576, 596
Armand, Louis 701
Armantrout, Rae 93, 280
Ashberry, John 500, 658
Ashbery, John 4, 214, 249, 523, 536, 537, 541, 567, 568, 569, 575, 591, 598, 603, 604, 628, 644, 652, 662, 677, 686, 687, 713, 731, 733, 735
Atkins, Tim 113, 183
Atlanta, Mark P. 691
Atwood, Margaret 512, 534
Auden, W. H. 84, 630
Austen, Jane 33
Ayler, Albert 491
Baker, Mary 33, 315, 625
Baker, Tony 113, 183
Balestrieri, Pete 466
Baraka, Amiri 22, 369, 406, 413, 425, 431, 452, 490, 491, 513, 518, 530, 628
Barancik, Steve 461
Baratier, Dave 33, 724
Barker, Clive 560
Barnard, Mary 609
Barnes, Diane 88, 151
Barnett, Anthony 113, 183
Barthelme, Donald 512
Barthes, Roland 2, 47
Battin, Wendy 672
Baude, Michelle 212, 269
Baudelaire, Charles 324, 342, 437, 445
Baxter, Ted 344
Beatty, Paul 369
Beatty, Warren 413, 425, 452, 485, 487, 495, 503, 513, 518, 530, 532, 542, 599, 605
Beckett, Samuel 512, 523
Beckett, Tom 185
Bellamy, Dodie 16, 138, 220, 474
Belle, Cecelia 282
Benjamin, Walter 705
Bennett, John M. 315, 461, 639, 672
Bergvall, Caroline 1, 113, 183
Berkeley, Michael 171, 225, 226, 269, 485, 487, 532, 542, 558, 590, 599, 605, 683, 684
Berlin, Irving 642
Berman, Tosh 101, 108, 127, 345, 547, 719
Bernhard, Thomas 359
Bernstein, Emma 4, 33, 71, 81, 88, 95, 110, 188, 193, 303, 304, 314, 361, 403, 624, 625, 629, 672
Berrigan, Anselm 291, 438
Berrigan, Eddie 150, 372, 380, 423, 593, 674, 678, 683, 695, 703, 741 Berrigan, Ted 191, 197, 266, 270, 283, 328, 353, 367, 372, 373, 380, 441, 442, 515, 517, 747
Berry, Stephen 126, 413, 425
Berryman, John 375, 379, 390, 679, 703
Bertholf, Robert J. 280
Bevington, Stan 315
Bishop, Elizabeth 150, 560
Blake, William 84, 231, 252, 253, 261, 273, 274, 298, 436, 521
Blanchot, Maurice 234
Blarnes, Eric 173
Blaser, Robin 182, 186, 227, 228, 235, 244, 282, 423, 593, 662, 718
Blau, Rachel 185
Bloom, Harold 679
Bogle, Ann 396
Bogosian, Eric 506
Borges, Jorge Luis 561
Bourdieu, Pierre 666, 667, 670, 751
BpNichol 13, 37, 44, 56, 186, 228, 230, 231, 240, 252, 289, 315, 340, 462
Bradstreet, Anne 375, 379, 390
Brady, Taylor 560
Brautigan, Richard 628
Brazil, David 310, 455
Brecht, Bertolt 740
Brennan, Sherry 672
Brodsky, Joseph 437
Bronk, William 46, 61, 575, 591
Brown, Andy 265
Brown, Ann 150, 210, 212, 213, 215, 256, 259, 541
Browne, Colin 282
Bunting, Basil 64, 718
Burger, Mary 29, 541
Burger, Peter 628
Burke, Andrew 88, 199, 202, 203, 238, 427
Burnham, Clint 185, 205, 315
Burns, Gerald 628
Burroughs, William S. 3, 295, 335, 362
Butler, Judith 33
Byrne, Ted 235, 244
Byron, Philip 437, 445
Bök, Christian 539, 571, 594
Caddel, Richard 6, 64, 113, 183, 368, 596
Cage, John 112, 115, 146, 280
Cameron, Sharon 542, 599, 605

Campbell, Bruce 280
Campbell, Jeremy 222, 560
Caples, Garrett 691
Carll, Steve 160, 672
Carlos, William 17, 26, 401
Carpenter, Brian 282
Carr, Emily 289, 315, 340
Carson, Anne 280
Castro, Michael 138, 653
Celan, Paul 89, 132, 741, 742
Chaloner, David 113, 183
Charyn, Jerome 512
Chester, Jeff 461, 521
Child, Abigail 256
Clampitt, Amy 90, 125, 129, 149, 453
Clark, Cheryl 461, 722
Clark, George 461
Clark, Jeff 438, 691
Clark, Thomas A. 64
Clinefelter, Jim 750
Clinton, Bill 237, 436, 475, 492, 496, 513, 518, 551, 553, 565, 581, 583, 586, 608, 685, 686, 689
Coffey, Brian 64
Cohen, David 473
Coleman, Victor 427, 530, 575, 591
Coleman, Wanda 369
Collins, Phil 113, 183
Collom, Jack 296
Columbus, Christopher 423, 593
Conte, Joseph M. 10, 286, 320
Coolidge, Clark 132, 133, 139, 140, 280, 575, 591
Cooper, Paula 334, 338, 351
Cope, Stephen 369, 474
Corbett, Bill 681, 694, 717
Corman, Roger 280
Corso, Gregory 369, 628
County, Mike 35, 476, 489, 494, 560
Crane, Lee 214
Creeley, Robert 1, 150, 188, 193, 196, 242, 243, 249, 253, 303, 314, 347, 361, 625
Cronenberg, David 295
Crozier, Andrew 6, 113, 183
Curtis, Dana 396, 461
Darragh, Tina 185, 256
Davey, Frank 315
Davidson, Daniel 628, 740
Davidson, Ian 302
Davidson, Michael 302
Davie, Donald 124, 409, 411, 427, 430, 488
Davies, Alan 150, 185, 256
Davies, Kevin 427, 436
Davis, Leigh 344
Davis, Martin 541, 580, 628
Davis, Tim 736, 738
Deleuze, Gilles 295, 624, 625, 629, 667
Delville, Michel 359
Dennis, Michael 25, 688
Derksen, Jeff 185
Derrida, Jacques 102, 314, 606, 743
Desmond, Rae 560
Dewey, John 88, 238, 290, 298, 303, 314, 361, 411, 414, 417, 427, 429, 433, 436
Dickey, James 280
Dickinson, Emily 89, 231, 252, 326, 339, 522, 558, 628
Dixon, Bill 560
Donne, John 59
Donnelly, Jean 359
Doris, Stacy 534
Doty, Mark 484
Drucker, Johanna 616
Duncan, Andrew 19, 23, 86, 113, 175, 177, 178, 183, 196, 205, 228, 242, 243, 249, 253, 423, 482, 521, 593, 735, 738
Duncan, Robert 176, 181, 216, 280, 392, 678
Dunn, Joe 681
Durgin, Patrick F. 280, 438, 445, 665, 669
Dylan, Bob 697
Dylan, Michael 628
Edwards, Brent 369
Edwards, Ken 113, 183, 265
Eigner, Larry 280, 614, 627, 642
Elena, Maria 527
Eliot, Joe 22, 84, 105, 214, 436, 437, 445, 500
Ellingham, Lewis 474
Ellison, Ralph 448
Emerson, Claudia 88
England, Amy 6, 113, 183, 305, 359, 560, 574, 685, 689
Eshleman, Clayton 296
Esther, Little 560
Eugene, Brett 327
Evans, George 10, 310
Evans, Steve 280, 320, 369
Federman, Raymond 284, 295
Felix, Joel 478, 566
Ferlinghetti, Lawrence 423, 593
Ferrini, Henry 379, 390
Fisher, Allen 64, 113, 183, 194
Fisher, Roy 64, 232, 411
Fitterman, Rob 541
Fleisher, Kass 237, 239
Fletcher, Nielsen 461
Forbes, John 560
Forche, Carolyn 280
Foreman, Richard 132
Foster, Edward 280, 593, 731
Foucault, Michel 88
Fox, Skip 461
France, Peter 113, 183, 305, 310
Frances, Mary 37
Fraser, Kathleen 49, 240, 684

Fraser, Simon 9, 186, 327, 387
Friedlander, Benjamin 185, 280
Friedlander, Lee 688
Friedman, Thomas 282
Frost, Corey 65, 150, 280, 679
Frost, Robert 170, 326, 339
Fuller, William 672
Fulton, Alice 280, 437
Gardner, Drew 740
Garrison, Deborah 207, 210, 212, 213, 215
Gevirtz, Susan 535
Gibson, William 560
Gilbert, Alan 185
Gilbert, Roger 113, 183, 205
Ginsberg, Allan 3, 22, 27, 283, 504, 505, 506, 509
Ginsberg, Allen 1, 266, 270, 283, 328, 353, 372, 373, 374, 377, 378, 380, 441, 442, 747
Gioia, Dana 437
Gizzi, Michael 672
Gizzi, Peter 59, 185, 359
Gladman, Renee 29
Gordon, Nada 628
Gould, Glenn 86, 171, 261, 273, 274, 301, 306, 321, 677
Graham, Susan 663
Green, Adam 387
Greene, Jonathan 296
Gregory, Jane 359
Grenier, Bob 269
Griffin, Tim 64, 331
Griffiths, Bill 64, 113, 144, 183
Grosman, Ernesto 256
Grossman, Allen 177, 178, 280, 728
Guest, Barbara 280
Hall, Donald 17, 150
Hall, Lind 370
Halle, Craig 413, 425
Halsey, Alan 113, 183, 280
Hamill, Sam 593
Hamshaw, Carol L. 726
Hardy, Thomas 124, 409, 411, 488, 529, 536, 537, 590, 611
Harris, Ken 84
Harryman, Carla 9, 33, 280
Harvey, George 461
Harwood, Lee 113, 183
Hass, Bob 169
Hawkins, Bobbie 296, 521
Hawkins, Ralph 113, 183
Hayden, Robert 508
Healey, Randolph 134, 169
Healy, Randolph 113, 115, 146, 172, 173, 183, 194, 214, 226, 579
Heaney, Seamus 62
Heidegger, Martin 97, 301, 303, 304, 306, 308, 314, 321, 337, 361
Hejinian, Lyn 9, 88, 458, 459
Heller, Michael 256
Helms, Jesse 475, 586, 630
Henderson, David 672
Hendricks, Brent 750
Herbert, George 113, 183
Hershon, Bob 207
Hill, Crag 750
Hirsch, Edward 17, 26
Hollander, Ben 59, 83, 191, 197
Hollander, John 59, 90, 125, 129, 149, 207
Hollo, Anselm 265, 296, 515, 517, 558
Holloway, Rob 404
Holmes, Janet 448
Homer 253
Hoover, Edgar 27
Hoover, Paul 22
House, White 574
Howard, Richard 280
Howe, Susan 34, 36, 40, 46, 53, 61, 90, 114, 125, 129, 132, 133, 140, 149, 158, 214, 326, 339, 680
Howe, William R. 476, 489, 494
Hughes, Ted 560
Hugo, Richard 750
Huk, Romana 64
Hunter, Carrie 461
Iijima, Brenda 438, 672
Indiana, Gary 1
Inman, Peter 256
Ireland, Lauren 64, 226, 553, 557, 560
Israel, David R. 558, 586, 633
Israeli, Henry 558
Jackson, Jesse 185
Jaeger, Peter 315
Jameson, Fredric 88, 238, 411, 427, 429, 448
Jarnot, Lisa 6, 210, 212, 213, 215, 282, 296, 392
Jennings, Peter 589
Joans, Ted 369
Johnson, Nicholas 113, 183
Johnston, Devin 359
Jonas, Steve 681, 694, 717
Jones, Bob 3, 277, 298, 301, 303, 304, 306, 308, 314, 321, 361, 460, 461, 521, 589
Jones, David 277, 298
Jonson, Ben 698
Jordan, June 231, 252, 318, 453, 454, 457, 471, 484, 541, 559, 660, 674, 678, 683, 686, 695, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 744
Kafka, Franz 548, 561
Kaipa, Summi 96
Kaufman, Andrew 175, 310, 370
Kaufman, Andy 311
Kaufman, Bob 175
Keaton, Diane 523, 561, 619
Keats, John 105, 106, 150, 386, 388

Keckler, Joseph 672
Kelley, Mike 244, 258
Kelly, Paul 185, 728
Kelly, Robert 438, 718, 728
Kennedy, John 437
Kennedy, Kit 310
Keppler, Joseph F. 116
Kerouac, Jack 27, 296
Kerry, John 185
Khlebnikov, Velimir 188, 193, 195
Killian, Sean 474, 735
Kim, Myung Mi 445, 473
Kimball, Jack 87, 113, 183
Kinsella, John 1, 113, 183
Klobucar, Andrew 185
Koch, Kenneth 401, 492, 496, 504, 505, 506, 509, 545, 550, 556, 564
Kostelanetz, Richard 359, 672
Kristeva, Julia 643, 715, 752
Kuhn, Thomas 94, 109
Kyger, Joanne 269, 717
Lacan, Jacques 601, 752, 753
Lamantia, Philip 369
Larkin, Joan 207
Laurence, Paul 560, 663
Lauterbach, Ann 280
Lecercle, Jacques 629
Lehman, David 59, 207
Lennon, John 516
Leonard, Tom 113, 183, 731
Levine, Philip 207
Levitsky, Rachel 672
Livingston, Ira 137
Locke, Duane 33
Logan, John 169, 569
Logan, William 523
London, Frank 1, 65, 71, 113, 183, 184, 262, 265, 276, 277, 306, 310, 321, 507, 638
Lopez, Tony 113, 183
Lorca, Federico García 423, 593
Louise, Bobbie 574
Mac Low, Jackson 63, 68, 256, 280
Lowe, Thomas 750
Lowell, Amy 1, 150, 500
Lowell, Robert 457, 471, 484
Lowry, Malcolm 89
Lundquist, Sara 280
Luoma, Bill 25, 98, 145, 156, 160, 183, 208, 244, 258, 541, 580, 628
Luther, Martin 267
Mackey, Nate 88, 347, 625
Mackey, Nathaniel 359
Madison, James 718
Madrid, Anthony 560
Magee, Mike 153, 202, 203, 411, 532, 542, 560, 607, 608, 610, 613
Malcolm, Janet 52, 60
Mallarmé, Stéphane 17, 26, 214, 241, 252, 257, 272
Mandel, Tom 185
Mandelstam, Osip 30, 32, 89, 214, 224, 354, 437, 641, 670, 742
Manery, Robert 37, 282
Manhire, Bill 102
Mann, Thomas 590
Marie, Julie 188, 193, 280, 315, 560, 675
Marley, Bob 232
Marquis, Don 521
Martin, Chris 113, 183
Martin, John 285, 568
Martin, Paul 713
Marx, Karl 271
Mathews, Harry 207, 512
Mattlin, Sharon 256
Maxwell, Andrew 359
Mayakovsky, Vladimir 401
Mayer, Bernadette 207, 256, 359, 460, 628
Mayer, Jane 9
Mayhew, Jonathan 86, 130, 135, 175, 271, 301, 337, 394, 415, 417, 430, 433, 435, 488, 520, 575, 591, 617, 631, 634, 666, 670, 741, 751
McCaffery, Steve 260, 315
Mengham, Rod 113, 183
Meredith, William 282, 517
Messerli, Douglas 151, 256, 473, 665, 691, 692
Meyer, Thomas 716, 718
Meyer, Tom 718, 728, 729
Miki, Roy 56, 240
Miller, Henry 521
Miller, Lee 284, 369
Milne, Drew 1, 113, 183
Milton, John 105, 231, 252, 253, 417, 437
Mirakove, Carol 278
Miriam, Erica 37
Mittenthal, Robert 282
Mobilio, Albert 207, 359
Monk, Geraldine 64
Morgan, Edwin 64, 439
Morgan, Robin 461
Morrison, Jim 102
Mottram, Eric 64, 113, 183
Mulford, Wendy 113, 183, 194
Mullen, Harryette 331
Mullen, Laura 180
Murphy, Michelle 672
Murphy, Sheila E. 469, 628, 672, 688, 740
Murray, David 513, 518
Murray, Elizabeth 284
Myles, Eileen 280
Neilson, Melanie 541
Nelson, Gale 359
Neruda, Pablo 423, 593

Nguyen, Hoa 210, 212, 213, 215
Nichols, Travis 37
Nicole, Anna 672
Nicoll, Hugh 585
Niedecker, Lorine 628
Nolan, John 461
Norman, Peter 396
Norris, Chuck 682
Norton, John 731
Notley, Alice 9
Nowak, Mark 729
O'Hara, Frank 165, 280, 504, 505, 506, 509
O'Sullivan, Maggie 1, 113, 183, 194
Oliver, Doug 6, 663
Oliver, Mary 280
Olson, Charles 69, 114, 150, 196, 242, 243, 249, 253, 261, 273, 274, 277, 280, 282, 303, 314, 344, 346, 347, 353, 361, 366, 379, 384, 388, 390, 396, 412, 420, 442, 662, 679
Oppen, George 67, 564, 578, 587
Oppenheimer, Joel 280
Opstedal, Kevin 533
Ortiz, Travis 460
Osman, Jena 185, 210, 212, 213, 215, 552, 573
Ovid 253, 628, 696, 697, 698
Pacific, Asian 6, 469, 699
Padgett, Ron 207
Paige, Abby 461
Palmer, Michael 53, 61, 196, 242, 243, 249, 253, 359, 574, 583
Paquin, Ethan 357
Parish, Jefferson 461, 560
Parker, Dorothy 519, 548
Patchen, Kenneth 296, 521
Patton, Julie 347
Peirce, Kathleen 436, 448, 449, 451, 454
Penberthy, Jenny 699
Perelman, Bob 71, 88, 95, 102, 110, 120, 132, 150, 159, 165, 170, 185, 280, 294, 320, 579
Pettet, Simon 113, 183
Phillip, Andrew 529
Phillips, Malcolm 688
Pickard, Tom 113, 183
Pinsky, Robert 59, 62, 67, 72, 73, 84, 88, 437
Piombino, Nick 256
Pitt, William 461
Plath, Sylvia 375, 379, 390
Pollack, Jackson 132
Pound, Ezra 42
Powell, Dawn 519
Price, Laurie 628, 740
Di Prima, Diane 740
Prince, Richard 184
Pritchett, Pat 98, 145
Prynne, J. H. 113, 183
Prynne, Jeremy 124, 194, 411
Purcell, Jack 726
Pynchon, Thomas 479
Quayle, Dan 713
Quillen, Lori 438, 443
Rakosi, Carl 280
Randall, Karen 282
Rankine, Claudia 207
Rasula, Jed 280
Raworth, Tom 64, 113, 183, 194, 731
Reagan, Nancy 41, 69, 92, 126, 169, 199, 202, 203, 475, 608, 610, 613
Retallack, Joan 71, 95, 110, 256
Reuters, Boston 184, 305
Reznikoff, Charles 148
Ribot, Marc 376, 691, 708
Rice, Doug 295
Rich, Adrienne 150
Riding, Laura 293
Riley, Denise 1, 113, 183
Riley, Peter 6, 113, 183
Rilke, Rainer Maria 479
Rimbaud, Dee 323, 324, 325, 336, 341, 342, 437, 445, 650
Rivera, Alex 589
Roark, Randy 372, 380
Roberts, Gary 280
Roberts, Wendy 495, 503
Robertson, Lisa 235, 244, 423, 579, 593
Robeson, Paul 513, 518
Robinson, Elizabeth 171, 359
Robinson, Mary 171
Rodefer, Stephen 658, 662
Rodin, Renee 423, 593
Rogers, Kimberley 461
Ronk, Martha 639
Rorty, Richard 430, 433
Rosemont, Franklin 369
Rosenthal, Barbara 256
Ross, Joe 474
Ross, Steven 315
Roth, Philip 512
Rothenberg, Jerome 280
Rothenberg, Jerry 22, 81, 88, 474, 683, 728
Rothschild, Douglas 574
Roubaud, Jacques 538, 725
Samuels, Ian 51
Sanders, Jay 521
Sappho 609
Saroyan, William 438
Sartre, Paul 337
Scalapino, Leslie 9, 71, 95, 110, 188, 193, 280, 438, 460, 691
Schelling, Andrew 296, 372, 380
Schorn, Brian 359
Schultz, Susan M. 29
Schuster, Joshua 185

Schuyler, James 359
Schwerner, Armand 698
Serres, Michel 365
Shakespeare, William 33, 119, 120, 231, 252, 456, 628, 693, 696, 697, 698
Shelley, Percy Bysshe 122
Sheppard, Robert 265
Sherry, James 256, 672
Sherwood, Kenneth 672
Shoptaw, John 4
Shurin, Aaron 359
Sigo, Cedar 296
Sikelianos, Eleni 210, 212, 213, 215, 291, 438
Simms, Colin 64
Simon, Greg 64, 104, 105, 106, 122, 375, 379, 390
Sinclair, John 113, 183, 516
Smith, Marc 22
Smith, Rod 185, 280, 359, 460, 541
Smith, Tracy K. 18, 315, 403
Smithson, Robert 541
Snyder, Gary 461
Snyder, Rick 171
Solomon, Laura 589
Spahr, Boyd 160, 212, 213, 215
Spahr, Juliana 210, 639
Spandrift, Jack 395, 581, 733
Sparrow, John 33, 169, 285, 568
Spicer, Jack 25, 175, 244, 258, 280, 474, 735, 738, 740, 741 Spinelli, Martin 672
Stafford, Jane 461
Stanley, Jared 280, 320
Starr, Heather 185
Starr, Kenneth 492, 496, 586, 589, 608
Stefans, Kim 185, 541
Stein, Gertrude 266, 270, 283, 328, 353, 372, 373, 380, 441, 442, 688, 747
Stein, Suzanne 54, 88, 111, 121, 132, 157, 165, 167, 170, 427, 574, 683, 736, 738
Steinberg, Nicole 61
Stevens, Wallace 54, 150, 153, 194, 372, 380, 387
Stevenson, Matt 193
Stewart, Susan 185
Strand, Mark 17, 26
Strickland, Stephanie 284
Sutherland, Keston 265, 438
Sweeney, Jennifer K. 387
Swensen, Cole 14, 359, 372, 380
Taggart, John 280
Tardos, Anne 256, 359
Tarlo, Harriet 113, 183
Tarn, Nathaniel 691
Tate, James 693
Taylor, Cecil 369
Taylor, Jesse 59, 94, 109, 296, 519, 750
Templeton, Fiona 113, 183, 256
Texas, Irving 39, 70, 77, 476, 489, 494
Thesen, Sharon 315
Thomas, Dylan 169, 326, 339, 365, 526, 685, 689, 693, 696, 697, 698, 724
Thompson, Jon 364
Torra, Joe 672
Trevor, Jesse 47, 404, 546
Trinidad, David 359
Turner, Brian 84, 126
Twain, Mark 504, 505, 506, 509
Tyler, Mary 504, 505, 506, 509
Tzara, Tristan 500
Uschuk, Pamela 461
Vallejo, César 54, 89, 132
Vangelisti, Paul 376, 691
Vaughan, Sarah 113, 183
Vendler, Helen 63, 64, 68, 84, 194, 415, 417, 435
Vermont, Charlie 34, 36, 40, 46
Vickery, Ann 280
Vincent, Gregory 207
Vizenor, Gerald 512
Vonnegut, Kurt 512
Waldman, Anne 359, 680, 717
Waldman, Ken 9, 22, 296
Waldrop, Rosemary 9
Waldrop, Rosmarie 359, 473, 672
Walker, Alice 412
Wallace, Sara 39, 69, 70, 77, 672
Walsh, Catherine 65, 113, 123, 183, 280
Warner, Jim 561
Warren, Jim 222, 485, 487
Warsh, Lewis 256, 359
Washington, Harold 84, 92, 227, 278, 295, 297, 460, 568, 574, 581, 630, 689
Wasserman, Ann 207
Watkins, Ben 359
Watson, Sasha 387
Watten, Barrett 71, 95, 102, 110, 112, 152, 256, 280, 304, 458, 459, 460, 515, 517
Watts, Charles 182, 186, 205, 206, 235, 244
Watts, Robert 206
Weaver, Rebecca 25
Webster, Daniel 589
Weiner, Hannah 176, 181, 256, 259
Weinstein, Norman 282
Welch, Brian 683, 702
Welford, Gabrielle 280
Welsh, Lawrence 277, 306, 321, 744
Whalen, Philip 1, 662, 674, 678, 683, 687, 695, 703, 706, 734
Wharton, Samuel 599, 605
Whitman, Walt 17, 26, 88, 454, 523
Wieners, John 185, 683, 740
Wilbur, Richard 413, 425
Wilk, David 41

Wilkinson, John 113, 183, 265
Williams, Jonathan 718
Williams, Tony 17, 26, 54, 88, 150, 261, 273, 274, 277, 287, 290, 298, 303, 304, 308, 312, 314, 361, 366, 396, 439, 658, 662, 728
Williamson, Aaron 113, 183, 280
Willis, Elizabeth 210, 212, 213, 215
Wilson, Robert 132
Wilson, Steve 461, 560
Wittgenstein, Ludwig 393, 400
Woolf, Douglas 512
Woolf, Virginia 33, 730
Wordsworth, William 88, 150
Wright, C. D. 207
Wright, Laura E. 266, 283, 328, 353, 372, 373, 374, 377, 378, 747
Yau, John 33
Zappa, Frank 521
Zavatsky, Bill 207
Zinnes, Harriet 280, 438
Zorn, John 132
Zukofsky, Louis 5, 55, 170, 423, 593, 605

CONCEPTS

9/11 461
Activism and protest 174, 189, 379, 384, 387, 390, 470, 526, 560, 586, 630, 633, 681, 683, 694, 717
Aesthetics 54, 55, 59, 75, 76, 81, 88, 111, 157, 167, 214, 295, 306, 321, 419, 428, 436, 499, 513, 518, 666, 667, 670, 679, 701, 704, 705, 707, 715, 751, 752, 753
Afghanistan 475, 551, 553, 574, 626, 630, 633, 653, 700, 749
African American poetry 437
Anthologies 6, 29, 38, 43, 64, 69, 78, 79, 80, 81, 85, 88, 89, 113, 170, 183, 232, 366, 437, 439, 474, 541, 628, 652, 658, 670, 683, 688, 731
Appropriation 55, 59, 75, 76, 78, 79, 84, 111, 119, 120, 126, 157, 159, 167, 235, 244, 249, 255, 295, 351, 358, 362, 363, 372, 374, 377, 378, 380, 584, 651, 660
Archives and libraries 17, 26, 34, 36, 40, 46, 64, 113, 183, 235, 244, 266, 270, 283, 315, 328, 353, 372, 373, 374, 377, 378, 380, 441, 442, 461, 476, 489, 494, 569, 590, 616, 694, 726, 747 Autobiography 45, 208, 461, 599, 605, 615, 619
Avant-garde 2, 3, 22, 27, 88, 122, 150, 301, 306, 321, 409, 424, 430, 432, 437
Beauty 5, 306, 321, 423, 437, 560, 561, 593, 650
Biography 280, 286, 437, 474, 599, 605, 735
Black Mountain 3, 9, 124
Book announcements 29, 33, 208, 230, 296, 453, 593
Bookstores 34, 36, 40, 46, 79, 138, 405, 438, 716, 718, 729
Calls for submissions 13, 37, 43, 44, 56, 340, 370
Capitalism 33, 55, 59, 75, 76, 111, 157, 167, 260, 268, 406, 413, 425, 561, 663
Censorship 25, 78, 295, 437, 526
Cities 161, 179, 310, 344, 375, 379, 390, 461, 527
Class 66, 162, 174, 189, 260, 268
Close reading 10, 47, 141, 683, 696, 697, 698
Collage and montage 48, 158, 188, 193
Conferences and festivals 11, 12, 13, 37, 44, 56, 81, 84, 88, 132, 160, 186, 205, 206, 227, 248, 282, 289, 295, 297, 315, 340, 376, 436, 461, 526, 531, 538, 539, 544, 657, 662, 690, 691, 700, 701, 704, 708, 714, 722, 723, 726
Confessional poetry 65
Copyright and permissions 285, 310, 526, 574, 589
Craft 306, 321, 461
Creative writing pedagogy 79, 461
Dada 333, 474
Deconstruction 112, 413, 425, 526
Difficulty 10, 73, 79, 80, 84, 85, 89, 132, 137, 194, 388, 437
Disability 624, 625, 629
Dreams 11, 33, 38, 141, 216, 233, 238, 311, 365, 541, 650, 688, 693, 700, 741 Ecology and ecopoetics 310, 461
Editing 3, 6, 65, 67, 72, 73, 84, 320, 327, 461, 483, 685, 689, 699, 728
Electronic poetry and hypertext 59, 74, 99, 158, 267, 331, 365, 458, 459, 514, 525, 554, 639, 684, 731
Elegy 150, 513, 518, 726
Empire and imperialism 326, 339, 595, 597, 608, 610, 613, 663
Epic 33, 59, 78, 437
Epistemology 90, 125, 129, 149, 686
Ethics 411, 476, 483, 489, 494
Experimental poetry 6, 39, 63, 68, 70, 77, 88, 160, 162, 165, 174, 189, 224, 238, 290, 298, 304, 320, 409
Fascism 84, 268, 372, 380, 427
Feminism 16, 19, 33, 79, 109, 184, 372, 380, 534, 558
Film 25, 93, 100, 101, 107, 108, 126, 161, 179, 222, 231, 252, 315, 327, 335, 362, 406, 413, 425, 452, 461, 475, 485, 487, 490, 491, 495, 502, 503, 506, 507, 513, 518, 532, 542, 549, 561, 590, 592, 599, 605, 612
Formalism 65, 120, 130, 131, 159, 320, 409, 427, 437, 598, 644
Free verse 701, 704

Futurism 103, 158, 250, 260, 266, 268, 270, 602
Gender 33, 109, 295, 387, 495, 503, 542, 599, 605, 688
Globalization 277
Grants and funding 33, 41, 68, 69, 85, 92, 204, 294, 295, 305, 437, 461, 628, 683, 701, 704, 741
Haiku 102, 508, 688
Hermeneutics 393, 400, 675
Humour and satire 156, 195, 206, 208, 231, 244, 252, 405, 504, 505, 506, 509, 510, 512, 520, 534, 548, 558, 579, 580, 607, 612, 650
Identity politics 214, 216, 217
Ideology 133, 170, 178, 214, 231, 252, 257, 271, 272, 413, 415, 417, 425, 430, 432, 435, 675, 731
Imagism 273, 274, 277, 279
Improvisation 365, 437
Indigenous and Native poetics 277, 461, 599, 605
Interviews 45, 61, 82, 185, 267, 292, 310, 331, 400, 440, 444, 445, 447, 461, 463, 464, 465, 467, 514, 560, 589, 591, 595, 596, 597, 685, 689, 702, 734
Israel and Palestine 558, 586, 595, 597, 630, 633
Jewish poetics 407, 641
Language poetry 22, 55, 59, 65, 75, 76, 79, 80, 81, 85, 88, 92, 95, 106, 110, 111, 119, 120, 121, 123, 130, 141, 157, 165, 167, 170, 214, 372, 374, 377, 378, 380, 430, 432, 520, 534, 541, 628, 652, 675
Latino and Latin American poetry 630
Letters and correspondence 59, 105, 138, 220, 474
List moderation 163, 185, 315, 560, 597
Little magazines 3, 5, 9, 16, 22, 45, 52, 60, 65, 79, 83, 96, 106, 188, 192, 193, 195, 210, 212, 213, 214, 215, 248, 255, 262, 276, 291, 305, 359, 410, 438, 443, 450, 458, 459, 460, 461, 473, 514, 554, 568, 621, 628, 652, 708, 726, 731
Lyric poetry 54, 80, 84, 85, 132, 141, 216, 368, 371, 718, 728
Marxism 33, 88, 238, 271, 427, 705
Materiality of the text 306, 321
Memory 59, 63, 68, 94, 109, 113, 176, 181, 183, 185, 253, 260, 268, 298, 365, 381, 382, 396, 403, 406, 413, 425, 642, 718, 726
MFA programs 2, 22, 69, 76, 79, 111, 157, 160, 167, 222, 231, 252, 461, 523
Modernism 17, 26, 54, 86, 89, 102, 111, 121, 133, 157, 165, 167, 170, 178, 216, 217, 261, 273, 274, 304, 307, 308, 309, 415, 417, 435, 437, 445, 512, 522, 701, 704
Mourning and loss 235, 237, 244, 251, 284, 365, 437, 459, 508, 560, 593, 671, 706
Multiculturalism 387, 713
Music and poetry 4, 5, 19, 23, 27, 47, 77, 85, 88, 89, 119, 126, 132, 205, 214, 266, 270, 283, 292, 315, 328, 345, 353, 372, 373, 380, 393, 394, 400, 401, 419, 423, 427, 428, 437, 441, 442, 461, 482, 491, 521, 523, 524, 526, 560, 562, 563, 581, 591, 593, 658, 659, 679, 680, 681, 683, 693, 694, 698, 717, 718, 722, 737, 740, 744, 747 Nationalism 558, 577
Nature 53, 61, 97, 122, 173, 185, 238, 262, 276, 306, 321, 375, 379, 390, 436, 448, 461, 476, 479, 489, 494, 504, 505, 506, 509, 626, 627, 636, 637, 642
Negativity and refusal 125, 149, 523, 541
New Formalism 130, 131, 320, 437
New York School 453, 541
Obituary and memorial 59
Ontology 178, 214, 221, 238
Performance and the poetry reading 8, 22, 71, 95, 110, 160, 207, 316, 317, 437, 474, 498, 501 Phenomenology 91
Philosophy 59, 88, 105, 112, 117, 133, 144, 166, 170, 176, 177, 178, 181, 214, 221, 244, 258, 276, 290, 295, 365, 396, 417, 427, 433, 436, 446
Place and region 150, 344, 375, 379, 390
Poet laureate 102, 437, 461
Poetics 2, 3, 7, 9, 16, 17, 26, 33, 37, 63, 68, 71, 79, 83, 87, 95, 108, 110, 119, 120, 122, 128, 150, 177, 178, 199, 200, 202, 203, 204, 244, 258, 264, 289, 290, 295, 298, 301, 306, 312, 315, 318, 319, 321, 336, 340, 344, 374, 377, 378, 387, 391, 394, 405, 430, 445, 452, 458, 459, 460, 462, 467, 472, 476, 479, 489, 494, 522, 530, 541, 561, 564, 572, 578, 581, 582, 584, 587, 592, 619, 625, 629, 651, 652, 665, 669, 690, 701, 719, 723, 734
Poets Against the War 593
Politics and poetry 84
Postmodernism 89, 102, 111, 121, 133, 157, 165, 167, 170, 178, 216, 217, 307, 309, 522, 701, 704
Print vs. digital 33, 88, 120, 141, 150, 159, 176, 181, 218, 222, 231, 252, 272, 286, 299, 314, 366, 381, 382, 580, 616
Prizes and awards 69, 106, 147, 194, 290, 437, 461, 482, 527, 558
Procedural and constraint writing 333, 569
Prose poem 263
Prosody and meter 4, 132, 170, 306, 321, 359, 437
Psychoanalysis 258, 705, 715, 752, 753

Queer poetics 29, 33, 310, 541, 615, 619
Race and poetry 33, 387, 406, 413, 425, 452, 485, 487, 490, 495, 503, 586, 650, 700
Reading announcements 295, 461, 474, 740
Religion and the sacred 1, 34, 36, 40, 41, 53, 59, 62, 84, 94, 176, 214, 228, 231, 233, 238, 242, 243, 249, 252, 253, 261, 273, 274, 277, 279, 292, 303, 306, 310, 314, 321, 361, 430, 448, 539, 551, 553, 558, 560, 571, 577, 584, 594, 628, 663, 700, 727
Representation 33, 295, 365, 550, 668
Reviewing and criticism 2, 3, 10, 17, 21, 26, 47, 55, 57, 59, 60, 64, 72, 73, 75, 79, 83, 84, 88, 90, 105, 106, 112, 119, 124, 125, 129, 149, 194, 199, 202, 203, 207, 220, 225, 226, 237, 243, 248, 249, 251, 263, 284, 393, 400, 404, 436, 437, 461, 474, 522, 523, 541, 555, 567, 568, 569, 575, 591, 598, 644, 652, 670, 672, 707, 726
Revision 34, 36, 40, 46, 94, 109, 222, 231, 252, 375, 379, 390
Romanticism 437, 445, 707
San Francisco Renaissance 474
Science 33, 85, 94, 109, 112, 119, 120, 147, 159, 288, 321, 393, 400, 436, 742
Semiotics 2, 166, 306, 321, 652, 675
Serial poem 84, 298, 569
Small press publishing 3, 6, 9, 29, 38, 46, 53, 106, 113, 116, 183, 185, 225, 226, 289, 326, 339, 340, 359, 404, 437, 445, 460, 461, 462, 474, 476, 483, 489, 494, 526, 648, 656, 665, 669, 671, 702, 708, 711
Software and code 179, 288, 668
Sonnet 33, 119, 120, 217, 252, 368, 371, 561, 641, 666, 670, 693, 703, 751
Sound poetry 79
Subjectivity 4, 16, 64, 137, 152, 166, 295, 300, 307, 309, 415, 417, 419, 428, 430, 432, 435, 653, 715, 752
Sublime 253, 707
Surrealism 119, 152, 227, 304, 401, 523, 541, 652
Terrorism 335, 362, 475, 503, 545, 550, 551, 553, 556, 559, 560, 564, 574, 581, 583, 584, 586, 595, 597, 609, 620, 626, 630, 636, 653, 700, 722, 749
The academy 2, 3, 7, 9, 11, 12, 14, 17, 18, 20, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 38, 39, 41, 42, 46, 49, 55, 58, 59, 61, 63, 64, 66, 68, 69, 70, 71, 75, 77, 78, 80, 84, 85, 86, 90, 92, 95, 102, 105, 106, 110, 112, 113, 115, 125, 128, 129, 130, 146, 149, 151, 153, 160, 161, 162, 168, 170, 174, 175, 179, 183, 185, 186, 189, 192, 194, 196, 202, 203, 227, 240, 242, 243, 249, 250, 253, 254, 260, 266, 267, 268, 270, 271, 284, 286, 295, 297, 301, 320, 322, 334, 337, 351, 366, 370, 387, 394, 397, 401, 409, 411, 414, 415, 417, 430, 433, 435, 436, 437, 461, 474, 478, 488, 514, 520, 522, 530, 560, 569, 575, 591, 609, 614, 617, 627, 628, 631, 634, 642, 652, 664, 666, 675, 677, 683, 688, 694, 731, 741, 746, 747, 751
The body 150, 161, 179, 311, 314, 353, 365, 399, 401, 442, 524, 751
The canon 2, 64, 90, 125, 129, 149, 194, 294, 400, 419, 428
The Gulf War 613, 630, 643
The internet 43, 144, 161, 170, 179, 387, 405, 437, 479, 494, 595, 597, 639, 648, 649, 654, 655, 656, 659, 668, 671, 673, 676, 706, 719, 745, 746, 747
The Iraq war 582, 584, 586, 626, 630, 633
The line 97, 150, 656
The listserv 34, 36, 40, 46, 55, 59, 73, 75, 84, 87, 93, 104, 106, 113, 114, 123, 143, 155, 158, 160, 165, 166, 170, 178, 183, 202, 203, 227, 235, 244, 251, 258, 261, 264, 265, 302, 361, 383, 387, 396, 437, 446, 455, 456, 466, 468, 470, 472, 476, 481, 489, 494, 495, 503, 504, 505, 506, 509, 510, 525, 551, 553, 554, 570, 589, 597, 600, 602, 607, 621, 626, 630, 632, 653, 685, 689, 706, 715, 746, 747, 752
The New Sentence 152
Theatre 132, 263, 365, 404, 413, 425, 437, 461, 473, 474
Torture and Abu Ghraib 700
Translation 14, 45, 52, 54, 60, 122, 158, 328, 332, 334, 338, 351, 353, 359, 372, 374, 377, 378, 380, 423, 424, 439, 441, 442, 461, 522, 593, 594, 597, 666, 670, 683, 700, 714, 749, 751
Vietnam 214, 551, 553, 586, 639
Visual and concrete poetry 79, 116, 158, 231, 252, 439, 510, 616, 628, 750
Visual art 5, 60, 88, 106, 140, 158, 184, 252, 298, 306, 321, 335, 362, 376, 413, 425, 437, 461, 616, 675, 691, 726
Women's writing 512, 704

Contents

Every entry links to its message. 753 in all.

31 JUL 1998

1. Marjorie Perloff — Re: varia
2. linda russo — Re: Poetics programs, etc.
3. linda russo — Poetics/Academics/revolutions
4. trbell — Re: Shoptaw III

1 AUG 1998

5. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Oh Henry!
6. Douglas Oliver — Re: anglo-american literary relations
7. Hugh Steinberg — Re: Poetics/Academics/revolutions
8. Lawrence Upton. — Re: anglo-american literary relations
9. linda russo — Re: academic as in poetry
10. Jacques Debrot — Re: Shoptaw III
11. ShaunAnne Tangney Humanities — Re: My Definition of Academic
12. Maria Damon — Re: My Definition of Academic
13. Maria Damon — Re: d.a.levy / call for papers, etc.
14. david bromige — academic as in poetry
15. david bromige — help re current poetries in japan, peru, chile
16. dbkk — Re: postfeminist POETICS JOURNAL?
17. charles alexander — the purity the purity (sung to the tune of "the horror the horror")
18. Erik Sweet — Re: academic as in poetry
19. Billy Little — Re: postfeminist playground
20. charssmith — Re: academic as in poetry
21. charles alexander — Re: the purity the purity (sung to the tune of "the horror the horror")
22. MAXINE CHERNOFF — Re: academic as in poetry
23. Billy Little — Re: academic as in poetry
24. R M Daley — help w/ djuna barnes
25. Mark DuCharme — Re: the war room
26. Keith Tuma — Re: the purity the purity (sung to the tune of "the horror the horror")
27. Erik Sweet — Re: academic as in poetry
28. Lisa Samuels — Re: My Definition of Academic
29. dbkk — Two new books I've read
30. Peter Balestrieri — Re: crabby bull
31. trbell — anglo/amer yeatspound and pounding yeats
32. trbell — Re: crabby bull
33. Mark Weiss — Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS
34. Christian Roess — Re: Susan Howe
35. Mark Weiss — Arthur Dove
36. Mark W Scroggins — Re: Susan Howe

2 AUG 1998

37. George Bowering — call for papers, etc.
38. Douglas Oliver — Re: anglo-american literary relations
39. Charles Alexander — Re: My Definition of Academic
40. Hugh Steinberg — Re: Susan Howe
41. Charles Alexander — Re: My Definition of Academic
42. Charles Alexander — Re: My Definition of Academic
43. Robert J. Tiess — Call for Submissions
44. Maria Damon — Re: call for papers, etc.
45. Maria Damon — fwd: new journal; please forward
46. David Clippinger — Re: Susan Howe
47. Steven Marks — Shoptalk

48. Lisa Samuels — beautiful =germ=
49. Douglas Barbour — Re: Huranku Ohara
50. Randy Prunty — Re: beautiful =germ=
51. Randy Prunty — Re: beautiful =germ=
52. Irving Weiss — Re: fwd: new journal; please forward
53. Christian Roess — Re: Susan Howe
54. henry — Re: Yeatpound
55. henry — Re: Oh Henry!

3 AUG 1998

56. George Bowering — Re: call for papers, etc.
57. k.a. hehir — Re: anglo-american literary relations
58. David Baratier — Re: Oh Henry!
59. Christian Roess — Re: Oh Henry!
60. Maria Damon — Re: fwd: new journal; please forward
61. David Clippinger — Re: Susan Howe
62. henry — Re: Oh Henry!
63. Mark Prejsnar — Re: My Definition of Academic
64. R I Caddel — angling others / different tracks through the woods / longish rant
65. Robert Archambeau — Re: Oh Henry
66. Mark Prejsnar — Re: My Definition of Academic
67. Robert Archambeau — NYRB
68. Matt Kirschenbaum — Re: My Definition of Academic
69. Don Byrd — Re: My Definition of Academic
70. Mark Weiss — Re: My Definition of Academic 71. Robert Archambeau — Re: My Definition of Academic
72. Michael Franco — Re: - Henry Gould
73. henry — Re: - Henry Gould
74. J. Pecqueur — computer generated text (fwd)
75. Peter Balestrieri — More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
76. henry — Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
77. Mark Prejsnar — Re: My Definition of 1975
78. Linda Russo — Re: My Definition of Academic
79. Charles Alexander — Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
80. Henry — Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
81. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Oh Henry
82. Mark DuCharme — another Listee succumbs
83. Susan Wheeler — Re: Oh Henry!
84. Robert Corbett — Re: - Henry Gould
85. Charles Alexander — Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
86. MAYHEW — More on Yeats
87. Douglas Oliver — Re: Other
88. Michael Magee — Re: Oh Henry
89. henry — Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
90. David Kellogg — Academic exchange value
91. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — Re: Oh Henry
92. Robert Corbett — Re: My Definition of Academic
93. Aldon Nielsen — In which will be found what is set forth therein
94. Christian Roess — Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
95. David Kellogg — Re: My Definition of Academic
96. s. kaipa — Address Change/ Interlope
97. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — The They
98. maz881 — DuCharme
99. Chris McCreary — address query/Brian Lucas & Angle
100. KENT JOHNSON — Rock n' Roll?
101. Tosh — Re: Rock n' Roll?

102. Tom Beard — Re: My Definition of Academic

4 AUG 1998

103. trbell — Re: Oh Henry
104. Simon DeDeo — Address Change
105. Simon DeDeo — Re: angling others / different tracks through the woods / lofgish rant
106. Simon DeDeo — Milosz
107. George Bowering — Re: Rock n' Roll?
108. Tosh — Re: Rock n' Roll?
109. trbell — feminism and "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
110. Herb Levy — Re: My Definition of Academic
111. Mark DuCharme — Re: H=E=N=R=Y
112. Safdie Joseph — Re: Saving Private Henry
113. Douglas Oliver — Re: Other
114. Charles Alexander — Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
115. L. MacMahon and T.R. Healy — Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
116. Jim Andrews — L A N G U (I M) A G E in Seattle Sept. 5
117. Daniel Carter — phasic thin the nest
118. rsillima — Huh
119. Donald Wellman — Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
120. Michael Magee — Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
121. Henry — Re: H=E=N=R=Y
122. Robert Archambeau — Re: Milosz
123. Mark Prejsnar — Re: Oh Henry
124. Robert Archambeau — Re: should we criminalize mediocrity?
125. David Kellogg — Re: Academic exchange value
126. Mark Prejsnar — Shouting Rock and Roll in Prvt. Ryan
127. Tosh — Re: Shouting Rock and Roll in Prvt. Ryan
128. Henry G — Re: Oh Henry
129. Maria Damon — Re: Academic exchange value
130. MAYHEW — should we criminalize mediocrity?
131. henry — Re: should we criminalize mediocrity?
132. Mark Prejsnar — a few basics
133. Henry Gould — Re: a few basics
134. david bromige — ron o'silliman
135. Andrew D Epstein — Re: should we criminalize mediocrity?
136. david bromige — poetry in the age of medication
137. Michael Magee — Re: a few basics
138. dbkk — Bellamy reading in SF
139. Mark Prejsnar — Re: a few basics
140. henry — Re: a few basics
141. Tom Orange — (no subject)
142. Tom Orange — saving disjunctive
143. charssmith — Re: In which will be found what is set forth therein
144. Alaric Sumner — Bill Griffiths FWD Seaham Unaligned Literary & Philosophical Association
145. Mark DuCharme — Re: Luoma
146. trbell — Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
147. R.Gancie/C.Parcelli — an example of the fundamental contradiction of scientific analysis, t…
148. toddbaron — basics
149. Maria Damon — Re: Academic exchange value
150. Michael Magee — Re: a few basics, a few specifics
151. Douglas — Re: help w/ djuna barnes
152. Donald Wellman — Re: saving disjunctive
153. David Kellogg — yaaay!
154. toddbaron — Re: poetry in the age of medication
155. KENT JOHNSON — Ole!

156. Rachel Loden — instead of a pineapple
157. trbell — Re: H=E=N=R=Y
158. trbell — Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
159. trbell — Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media

5 AUG 1998

160. Susan Schultz — Re: creative writing at the University of Hawai`i
161. Hazel Smith — hypermedia piece
162. Kathy Lou Schultz — Ahistorical finger pointing
163. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — what happened from 1809
164. George Bowering — Re: Shouting Rock and Roll in Prvt. Ryan
165. Mark DuCharme — Re: H=E=N=R=Y
166. Tom Orange — saving disjunctive
167. Mark DuCharme — Re: H=E=N=R=Y
168. toddbaron — Re: creative writing at the University of Hawai`i
169. rsillima — My David O'Bromige
170. Henry — Re: H=E=N=R=Y
171. Henry Gould — query: Robinson, Snyder
172. L. MacMahon and T.R. Healy — Re: writing in the age of media
173. Henry Gould — Re: writing in the age of media
174. Mark Prejsnar — Confused Kathy fingerpointing
175. MAYHEW — Academic Exchange Value
176. Christian Roess — :Re:poetry in the age of medication
177. groberts — Re: h=e=n=r=y
178. Henry — Re: h=e=n=r=y
179. trbell — Re: hypermedia piece
180. Pritchett,Patrick — Re: need email address
181. trbell — Re: :Re:poetry in the age of medication
182. Peter Quartermain — Charles Watts
183. maz881 — Re: Other
184. joel lewis — f.y.i.
185. Louis Cabri — phillytalks
186. George Bowering — Re: Charles Watts
187. George Bowering — Re: My David O'Bromige
188. Rachel Loden — Re: poetry in the age of medication (the testimony begins)
189. Kathy Lou Schultz — "Poor Confused Kathy" responds
190. Kathy Lou Schultz — Spelling Bee for Mark P.
191. Rachel Loden — poetry in the territories (response to Wheeler)
192. Matt Kirschenbaum — Re: "Poor Confused Kathy" responds
193. Safdie Joseph — Re: (the testimony begins)

6 AUG 1998

194. david bromige — wrtng in thage f mdia/2ndng Randolph Healy
195. david bromige — poetry in the age of medication
196. Henry Gould — my territory
197. Maria Damon — Re: poetry in the territories (response to Wheeler)
198. Michael Magee — quotes o' the day
199. henry — Re: quotes o' the day
200. Christopher W. Alexander — this insulating sleeve is detrimental
201. david bromige — gotta go
202. Michael Magee — Re: quotes o' the day
203. Michael Magee — Re: quotes o' the day
204. Henry — Re: quotes o' the day
205. Billy Little — Re: Charles Watts
206. rsillima — The real Charlie Watts
207. Susan Wheeler — Re: quotes o' the day
208. Mark DuCharme — Re: instead of a pineapple

7 AUG 1998

209. trbell — Asif NOT related to recent posts here
210. Michael Magee — marginalized poets? - not so fast!
211. Robert Archambeau — Germ (s) (ans) (any) (inal)
212. Michael Magee — Re: marginalized poets? - not so fast!
213. Maria Damon — Re: marginalized poets? - not so fast!
214. Henry oh-oh — 1 more dizjunk peep
215. Rachel Loden — 42 Little Ways to Happier Love
216. Michael Magee — Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
217. tracy s. ruggles — Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
218. Charles Alexander — Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
219. Jordan Davis — fadenya badenya
220. dbkk — Mina review
221. hen — Re: fadenya badenya
222. David Baratier — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
223. Charles Alexander — Re: fadenya badenya
224. henry gould — Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
225. Elizabeth Treadwell — Outlet review cc's
226. L. MacMahon and T.R. Healy — Re: Outlet review cc's
227. Robert Corbett — All things nicholian
228. Carl Lynden Peters — Re: All things nicholian
229. maz881 — aldon
230. Carl Lynden Peters — bpNichol feature
231. henry — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
232. Douglas Oliver — Re: Snuff and more
233. Christian Roess — Re: fadenya badenya
234. Ryan Whyte — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
235. Dorothy Trujillo — Charles Watts

8 AUG 1998

236. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — ISEA98 (completed '96) from Jennifer
237. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Kass Fleisher piece
238. Michael Magee — Re: fadenya badenya
239. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Kass Fleisher piece
240. Douglas Barbour — Re: bp studies
241. David Baratier — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
242. Mark DuCharme — Re: your territory (& welcome to it)
243. Mark Weiss — Re: your territory (& welcome to it)
244. Dorothy Trujillo — Re: ME "on" list

9 AUG 1998

245. MAXINE CHERNOFF — Query
246. rsillima — Private Ryan
247. Louis Cabri — Re: bp studies
248. Charles Bernstein — Russian festival of poetry (fwd)
249. Mark DuCharme — Re: your territory (& welcome to it)
250. trbell — proletarian _Glamour
251. Loss Pequen~o Glazier — Mouseover at EBR
252. Mark DuCharme — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
253. Christian Roess — Re: my territory
254. Aldon Nielsen — where in the world is Aldon Nielsen
255. Tom Beard — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
256. Charles Bernstein — Hannah Weiner Tribute
257. David Baratier — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment

10 AUG 1998

258. maz881 — Re: Me "on" list

259. toddbaron — Re: Hannah Weiner Tribute
260. rsillima — Doling out the prole
261. henry — Re: my territory
262. Robert Archambeau — EP, Spit Laureate
263. F. W. Perrella — Web Del Sol - Quictions, In Posse Review
264. Michael Coffey — Welcome Message -Reply
265. Lawrence Upton. — Programme for Sub Voicive Poetry, London, Autumn 98
266. Laura E. Wright — Re: proletarian _Glamour
267. Charles Bernstein — Writer on Line Interview
268. Dorothy Trujillo — Re: Doling out the prole
269. charssmith — Baude/Grenier
270. Mark DuCharme — Re: proletarian _Glamour
271. MAYHEW — Why I am not a Marxist

11 AUG 1998

272. Mark DuCharme — Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
273. Mark DuCharme — Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
274. Mark DuCharme — Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
275. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — (no subject)
276. Michael Magee — Re: EP, Spit Laureate
277. henry g — Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
278. daniel bouchard — Washington DC area reading
279. Gwyn McVay — Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
280. Robert Archambeau — DLB on Perelman, Watten, Cage etc
281. Robert Archambeau — PS to DLB
282. Herb Levy — Subtext readings (Seattle)
283. Laura E. Wright — query
284. Carolyn Guertin — Electronic Book Review: new issue
285. acgold01 — Black Sparrow address
286. Robert Archambeau — DLB info
287. David Baratier — snorting up the Pound / Williams line
288. Jim Andrews — some software for you

12 AUG 1998

289. k.a. hehir — in the key of bp
290. Michael Magee — Re: snorting up the Pound / Williams line
291. Erik Sweet — "Tool a Magazine" Party Friday 8/14
292. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT — Cave the teacher (fwd)
293. Susan Schultz — Re: Cave the teacher (fwd)
294. louis stroffolino — Re: PS to DLB
295. Robert Corbett — Re: Postmodern Piracy Festival /Call for Participants (fwd)
296. Pritchett,Patrick — Re: Bombay Gin
297. Robert Corbett — Re: Postmodern Piracy Festival /Call for Participants (fwd)
298. Henry Gould — Re: snorting up the Pound / Williams line
299. trbell — poetic incest or snorting
300. Jordan Davis — <to enter the subject>
301. MAYHEW — Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
302. charles alexander — (Fwd) Rejected posting to [redacted]
303. Donald Wellman — Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
304. Donald Wellman — Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
305. joel lewis — f.y.i.
306. hen — Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
307. hen — Re: <to enter the subject>

13 AUG 1998

308. toddbaron — Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
309. Ryan Whyte — Re: <to enter the subject>

310. joel lewis — more f.y.i.
311. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — Elaboration for Andy Kaufman
312. toddbaron — Re: "I" is another"---
313. Peter Ganick — address request
314. Michael Magee — Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
315. Poetics List — bpNichol Conference, Program (fwd)
316. Michael Magee — Re: Reading In Providence
317. Michael Magee — Re: Reading In Providence
318. Jordan Davis — <to enter blind carbon>
319. Charles Alexander — Re: <to enter blind carbon>
320. Joseph Conte — DLB 193 and its contents
321. R.Gancie/C.Parcelli — Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
322. Al Filreis — Gerd Stern/Seven Stray Cats
323. david bromige — je est un autre
324. David W. McFadden — Re: <to enter blind carbon>
325. David W. McFadden — Re: je est un autre
326. daniel bouchard — whose emily d?
327. david bromige — gerd stern
328. Laura E. Wright — Re: je est un autre
329. david bromige — joe est un autre
330. Jim McCrary — Re: joe est un autre
331. Michael Magee — Mullen interview
332. Joe Brennan — Re: je est un autre
333. Roger Farr — Chance Operations
334. David Kellogg — Bob est un autre
335. toddbaron — Re: <to enter blind carbon>
336. toddbaron — Re: <to enter blind carbon>
337. MAYHEW — Mayhem,Headgear, sartorial
338. Safdie Joseph — Re: Joe am another
339. Mark Weiss — Re: whose emily d?
340. k.a. hehir — Wild Things Call for Submissions
341. toddbaron — Re: je est un autre
342. toddbaron — Re: <to enter blind carbon>
343. George Bowering — Re: Al Filreis

14 AUG 1998

344. Tom Beard — Re: location location location
345. Tosh — Re: location location location
346. toddbaron — location location location
347. Michael Magee — Re: location location location
348. Gwyn McVay — piercing misreading (was location)
349. Michael Magee — Re: piercing misreading (was location)
350. Jordan Davis — collation, collation, collation
351. Maria Damon — Re: Bob est un autre/ joe est un mama
352. charles alexander — Re: location location location
353. Laura E. Wright — Re: location location location
354. Henry Gould — Re: location
355. toddbaron — Re: location location location
356. toddbaron — Re: location location location
357. Henry G — sorry Ez
358. Robert Corbett — Millennium Spellchecks
359. Macgregor S Card — Spring-cum-Summer Germ is here

15 AUG 1998

360. David W. McFadden — Re: <to enter blind carbon>
361. trbell — Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
362. trbell — Metaphoric or metonymic < blind carbon>

363. toddbaron — Re: Metaphoric or metonymic < blind carbon>
364. Marcella Durand — Zinc Bar

16 AUG 1998

365. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — _the continuity girl_
366. joel lewis — Re: location location location
367. joel lewis — kenneth koch on the www

17 AUG 1998

368. R I Caddel — Scully's Steps
369. Maria Damon — many queries
370. Maria Damon — call for papers/Kaufman
371. Trevor Joyce — Re: Scully's Steps
372. Laura E. Wright — Re: oogling
373. Laura E. Wright — ooooops
374. R M Daley — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
375. Simon DeDeo — Re: location location location
376. P.Standard Schaefer — CONS CONFERENCE
377. toddbaron — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
378. George Thompson — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
379. Mark Weiss — Re: location location location
380. Mark Weiss — Re: oogling
381. charles alexander — printing
382. Mark Weiss — Re: printing
383. charles alexander — sorry

18 AUG 1998

384. Donald Wellman — Re: location location location
385. Mark Salerno — Reading in Chicago
386. Henry Gould — Re: location
387. KENT JOHNSON — (Fwd) Join SAWSJ
388. George Thompson — Re: location
389. Mark Prejsnar — Feeling sorry
390. R.Gancie/C.Parcelli — Re: location location location
391. Peter Balestrieri — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
392. Pierre Joris — single query
393. MAYHEW — Not yet/already
394. MAYHEW — stupidity
395. hen — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
396. David Baratier — Re: snorting up the Pound / Williams line
397. toddbaron — Re: (Fwd) Join SAWSJ
398. toddbaron — Re: location
399. toddbaron — Re: location location location
400. Mark Weiss — Re: Not yet/already
401. David Zauhar — location(3): three quotes and 2 questions
402. toddbaron — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
403. louis stroffolino — QUERIES (CB and DS)
404. Karen and Trevor — submissions
405. KENT JOHNSON — (Fwd) from Another Labor-Related List ...

19 AUG 1998

406. KENT JOHNSON — Bullworth
407. Alan Jennifer Sondheim — susan's "and the aliens" (fwd)
408. R M Daley — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
409. Robert Archambeau — Re: reactionary query
410. Peter Ganick — location location location
411. Robert Archambeau — Re: reactionary query

412. Henry Gould — Re: snorting up the Pound etc.
413. Daniel Zimmerman — Re: Bullworth
414. Robert Archambeau — Re: reactionary query
415. MAYHEW — reactionary query
416. David W. McFadden — Re: oogling
417. Michael Magee — Re: reactionary query
418. David W. McFadden — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
419. james perez — Re: Not yet/already
420. David W. McFadden — Re: location location location
421. David W. McFadden — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
422. David W. McFadden — Re: location(3): three quotes and 2 questions
423. Billy Little — translation anyone?
424. k.a. hehir — Jornal de Poesia
425. Gary Sullivan — Marianne Moore's spirit on Bullworth's ghost
426. louis stroffolino — Re: QUERIES (CB and DS)
427. Michael Magee — Re: reactionary query
428. Mark Weiss — Re: Not yet/already
429. Henry — Re: reactionary query
430. MAYHEW — Re: reactionary query
431. Gary Sullivan — Moore's finicky rewrite for the _Collected Posthumous Dictation_
432. Michael Magee — Re: reactionary query
433. Michael Magee — Re: reactionary query
434. toddbaron — Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
435. toddbaron — Re: reactionary query
436. Henry Gould — Re: reactionary query
437. mj devaney — Re: _Economist_ piece on the state of poetry
438. Erik Sweet — "Tool A Magazine" available now!
439. r. drake — Re: Jornal de Poesia
440. R M Daley — Re: Writer on Line Interview
441. Mark DuCharme — Re: je est un autre
442. Mark DuCharme — Re: location location location
443. Erik Sweet — "Tool a Magazine" address
444. George Thompson — Re: Writer on Line Interview

20 AUG 1998

445. ken|n|ing — Re: _Economist_ piece on the state of poetry
446. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT — bp would have liked this
447. George Bowering — Re: Writer on Line Interview
448. Michael Magee — Re: reactionary query
449. henry — Re: reactionary query
450. Michael Magee — Re: _Economist_ piece on the state of poetry
451. Michael Magee — Re: reactionary query
452. David W. McFadden — Re: Bullworth
453. Jordan Davis — more recent economist article
454. henry — Re: reactionary query
455. james perez — brasil
456. Peter Balestrieri — Regarding Civility on the List
457. Susan Schultz — Re: more recent economist article
458. Erik Sweet — Need Persons and Poetry
459. Loss Pequen~o Glazier — Re: Need Persons and Poetry
460. Erik Sweet — Need Persons and Poetry/Cats
461. Jerry McGuire — deep south newsletter 2, schedule & registration
462. k.a. hehir — new from housepress: keyboard po (e/li)tics
463. R M Daley — Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery
464. George Thompson — Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery
465. R M Daley — Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery

466. david bromige — Rudeness on the List
467. George Thompson — Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery

21 AUG 1998

468. Jay Schwartz — Re: Rudeness on the List
469. shemurph — the rude planets
470. R M Daley — Re: Rudeness on the List
471. George Bowering — Re: more recent economist article 472. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: Rudeness on the List: "I" is another and another and an other an...
473. Douglas — new Sun & Moon titles
474. J. Kuszai — Bellamy,Killian,Rothenberg BEYONDthePAGE in SanDiego
475. daniel bouchard — Terror on the tee vee: A Repeat
476. J. Kuszai — back in the saddle
477. Jim McCrary — Re: High West Rendezvous by Ed Dorn
478. Henry Gould — 2 queries
479. David W. McFadden — Fresh New Member!
480. Kristen Gallagher — address query
481. david bromige — Rudeness on the List
482. Billy Little — Re: Fresh New Member!
483. r. drake — Re: back in the saddle
484. David Baratier — Re: economists
485. Elizabeth Treadwell — bullworthless (executive of color)
486. henry g — flims
487. Michael McColl — Re: bullworthless (executive of color)
488. MAYHEW — Re: reactionary query
489. Thomas Bell — Re: back in the saddle
490. Scott Pound — Re: Bullworth
491. George Bowering — Re: Bullworth
492. Rachel Loden — terms of endearment
493. Anthony Lawrence — Re: bullworthless (executive of color)
494. William Marsh — smallpress/websites
495. Rodrigo Toscano — Re: Bullworth
496. Safdie Joseph — Re: terms of endearment

22 AUG 1998

497. joel lewis — f.y.i.
498. david bromige — Nude Poetry
499. A. Jenn Sondheim — Heian Aesthetics
500. CD — lowell
501. r. drake — Re: Nude Poetry
502. A. Jenn Sondheim — for the sake of _the continuity girl_
503. MAXINE CHERNOFF — Re: Bullworth
504. Hilton Manfred Obenzinger — Comedy
505. Mark Weiss — Re: Comedy
506. Karen Kelley — Re: Comedy
507. A. Jenn Sondheim — Re: Comedy
508. David Cheezem — Re: Comedy
509. Mark Weiss — Re: Comedy
510. Thomas Bell — Re: Comedy
511. Mark Weiss — (no subject)
512. George Bowering — Re: Comedy
513. michael corbin — Re: Bullworth

23 AUG 1998

514. John Tranter — Ivory tower, etymology thereof
515. Ron Silliman — Re: Comedy

516. David W. McFadden — John Lennon Murdered!
517. sylvester pollet — Re: Comedy
518. louis stroffolino — Re: Bullworth
519. B. Taylor — Re Comedy
520. MAYHEW — Re: comedy
521. Billy Little — Re: Comedy
522. Mark Weiss — (no subject)
523. maz881 — ahsbery review

24 AUG 1998

524. Dan or Orion Raphael Dlugonski — the continuity girl
525. Bob Grotjohn — Poetry On-line, a request
526. r. drake — Re: Postmodern Piracy Festival /Call for Participants
527. David Baratier — Elena Garro
528. David Baratier — Re: Poetry On-line, a request
529. groberts — Re: Comedy
530. Poetics List — Re: Bullworth
531. Magdalena Zurawski — Help!
532. Elizabeth Treadwell — bullworth
533. John Latta — Query
534. David W. McFadden — Re: comedy
535. Katherine Lederer — Re: Susan Gevirtz
536. groberts — Re: Comedy
537. Gwyn McVay — Re: Comedy
538. k.a. hehir — Re: Help!
539. Ryan Whyte — request
540. Ryan Whyte — (no subject)
541. Jacques Debrot — Re: Ashbery, Talisman anthology, etc.
542. Pritchett,Patrick — Re: bullworth
543. miekal and — in case ewe wur wundering
544. Scott Pound — Re: Help!
545. KENT JOHNSON — Funny
546. Karen and Trevor — mike magee
547. Tosh — Re: Funny
548. David W. McFadden — Re: Comedy
549. David W. McFadden — Fwd: Regeneration
550. Mark Weiss — Re: Funny
551. Ron Silliman — The Age of Experience
552. Michael Magee — not-so-funny
553. Mark Weiss — Re: The Age of Experience
554. Thomas Bell — Re: Poetry On-line, a request
555. Karen Kelley — Re: ahsbery review
556. Rodrigo Toscano — Re: funny
557. Ron Silliman — Re: The Age of Experience
558. Hilton Manfred Obenzinger — Re: Comedy
559. Jordan Davis — skateboarding into Bonnie

25 AUG 1998

560. k.a. hehir — terrorism like comedy is not pretty
561. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — A fine Mess--A finely Mess
562. Billy Little — Re: Funny
563. Billy Little — Re: Funny
564. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: funny
565. George Bowering — Re: The Age of Experience
566. Henry Gould — query
567. joel lewis — Re: Ashbery Review
568. Sean Casey — Re: Ashbery Review

569. Fred Muratori — Re: Ashbery Review
570. Burt Hatlen — aliens
571. Magdalena Zurawski — Thanks for Klingon
572. Mark Prejsnar — Rich inner lives and the State
573. Don Cheney — Re: not-so-funny
574. daniel bouchard — news that don't stay news isn't really news
575. MAYHEW — Overproducing Ashbery
576. Ron Silliman — Quartermain's Andrews / N'awlins
577. David Cheezem — Re: The Age of Experience
578. Rodrigo Toscano — Re: Todd B's "funny" post
579. david bromige — re : comic writing
580. Don Cheney — re : comic writing
581. Henry Gould — bombs away
582. Mark Weiss — Re: Rich inner lives and the State
583. daniel bouchard — Hurricane Bonnie ordered Clinton killed
584. Michael Magee — Re: Rich inner lives and the State
585. Mark Weiss — help! I need someone's address!
586. daniel bouchard — acknowledged armchair editors of world
587. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: sponse is a key word
588. Hilton Manfred Obenzinger — Re: acknowledged armchair editors of world
589. Matt Kirschenbaum — JokeMaster Funnies: King Leer (fwd)
590. David W. McFadden — Re: Comedy
591. Karen Kelley — Re: Overproducing Ashbery
592. michael corbin — Re: The Age of Experience
593. Skagitonians To Preseve Farmland — Re: translation anyone?
594. Scott Pound — Re: Thanks for Klingon
595. KENT JOHNSON — Response to Mark Weiss
596. KENT JOHNSON — Andrews/Caddel in DQ
597. Mark Weiss — Re: Response to Mark Weiss
598. Ramez Ejaz Qureshi — Re: Ashbery Review
599. Elizabeth Treadwell — HOLLYWOOD, USA
600. A. Jenn Sondheim — Re: Response to Mark Weiss
601. A. Jenn Sondheim — Re: HOLLYWOOD, USA

26 AUG 1998

602. Thomas Bell — Re: response to responce toResponse to Mark Weiss
603. Jim Andrews — Ashbery in online Jacket
604. Jim Andrews — Ashbery and the horoscopical
605. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: HOLLYWOOD, USA
606. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: HOLLYWOOD, USA
607. Safdie Joseph — Humorous and rich inner lives
608. Pritchett,Patrick — Re: Those warlocks in the pentagram, er pentagon
609. Douglas Barbour — Re: Daniel Bouchard 'reads' the news
610. Mark Prejsnar — Those warlocks in the pentagram, er pentagon
611. groberts — Re: Comedy
612. Jim McCrary — Re: re : comic writing
613. Michael Magee — Re: Those warlocks in the pentagram, er pentagon
614. Judy Roitman — Re: Those warlocks in the pentagram, er pentagon
615. Elizabeth Treadwell — Miss Mae
616. Irving Weiss — Exhibit SUNY Purchase
617. MAYHEW — Rich inner lives
618. KENT JOHNSON — Politics in the poetry
619. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: Miss Mae
620. Scott Pound — Re: terrorism
621. Ramez Ejaz Qureshi — Re: Response to Mark Weiss/Sudanese poets

27 AUG 1998

622. A. Jenn Sondheim — JENNIFER IN PHAEDRA
623. david bromige — warlox-on-bagel, pentagram, an address
624. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT — the write to a bad language
625. Michael Magee — Re: the write to a bad language
626. Henry Gould — Re: warlox-on-bagel, pentagram, an address
627. Judy Roitman — Re: warlox-on-bagel, pentagram, an address
628. Gary Sullivan — Written to Avoid Obsessing about Women
629. George Thompson — Re: the write to a bad language
630. daniel bouchard — Re: warlox-on-bagel, pentagram, an address
631. Mark Prejsnar — Cooks run State, Have Rich Inner Lives
632. Mark Prejsnar — the Pentagon's employers
633. henry — Re: warlox-on-bagel, pentagram, an address
634. Michael Magee — Re: Cooks run State, Have Rich Inner Lives
635. Bradford J Senning — Re: Cooks run State, Have Rich Inner Lives
636. KENT JOHNSON — Brainwashed Sudanese poets
637. henry — Re: Brainwashed Sudanese poets
638. joel lewis — f.y.i.
639. Christopher Reiner — new WITZ
640. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Brainwashed Sudanese poets
641. henry — Re: Brainwashed Sudanese poets
642. Judy Roitman — Re: Brainwashed Sudanese poets
643. A. Jenn Sondheim — Re: Brainwashed Sudanese poets (fwd)
644. David W. McFadden — Re: Ashbery Review
645. KENT JOHNSON — Re: Brainwashed Sudanese poets
646. david bromige — workin' for the man (was warlox-on-bagel)
647. miekal and — like begging for quarters
648. dbkk — poetry on the web
649. Chris Piuma — Re: poetry on the web
650. david bromige — brainwashed sudanese poet
651. Mark Prejsnar — Workin' for the workin' class
652. Jacques Debrot — Re: Ashbery/Obsessing
653. Mark Weiss — Re: Brainwashed Sudanese poets
654. David Baratier — Re: poetry on the web
655. Thomas Bell — Re: poetry on the web
656. r. drake — Re: poetry on the web
657. miekal and — Re: Masha Zavialov email/Russain Poetry Festival (fwd)
658. Billy Little — Re: Written to Avoid Obsessing about Women
659. Billy Little — Re: poetry on the web

28 AUG 1998

660. Jordan Davis — "hypothetical back to school night"
661. Ramez Ejaz Qureshi — Re: the write to a bad language
662. david bromige — re : written to avoid obsessing . . .
663. Douglas Oliver — Re: Sudanese poets
664. Sarah Hreha — Re: Response to Mark Weiss/Sudanese poets
665. Douglas — Re: A Border Comedy
666. MAYHEW — ascetic aesthetics
667. michael corbin — Re: ascetic aesthetics
668. james perez — Re: poetry on the web
669. ken|n|ing — A Border Comedy
670. henry gould — Re: ascetic aesthetics
671. Loss Pequen~o Glazier — Re: poetry on the web
672. Scott Keeney — the end, no. i
673. Jim Rosenberg — Re: poetry on the web
674. Jordan Davis — Whalen/Berrigan
675. Gary Sullivan — If it wasn't for spell-check I could offer you no "cantaloupe"

676. Chris Piuma — Re: poetry on the web
677. henry g — Re: If it wasn't for spell-check I could offer you no "cantaloupe"
678. david bromige — re : whalen/berrigan
679. Billy Little — Re: the write to a bad language
680. Billy Little — thanks dave, for the sudanese whitman in the washing machine and obsessing...
681. Billy Little — re : whalen/berrigan
682. David W. McFadden — Re: warlox-on-bagel, pentagram, an address
683. Gary Sullivan — last call
684. Elizabeth Treadwell — Linda Russo's Kathleen Fraser
685. KENT JOHNSON — Spin
686. Jordan Davis — Drift, collapse, mutilation
687. louis stroffolino — HELP!
688. Michael Kelleher — alyricmailer #8
689. Mark Weiss — Re: Spin
690. Charles Bernstein — Masha Zavialov email/Russain Poetry Festival (fwd)
691. P.Standard Schaefer — RIBOT conference
692. charssmith — Re: A Border Comedy
693. David Baratier — Re: last call
694. David Zauhar — Re: re : whalen/berrigan
695. charssmith — Re: Whalen/Berrigan
696. Jacques Debrot — Re: last call 697. Gary Sullivan — With a straight face
698. Mark Weiss — Re: last call
699. Marjorie Perloff — Re: Sulfur special issue, 1999
700. KENT JOHNSON — (Fwd): Khartoum Translation Conference
701. Maria Damon — Re: Masha Zavialov email/Russain Poetry Festival (fwd)
702. joel lewis — Re: whalen/berrigan
703. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: Whalen/Berrigan
704. Charles Bernstein — more on Russian poetry festival (fwd)

29 AUG 1998

705. Ramez Ejaz Qureshi — Re: ascetic aesthetics
706. Thomas Bell — Re: poetry on the web
707. Ramez Ejaz Qureshi — Re: ascetic aesthetics(2)
708. Mark Salerno — Re: RIBOT conference
709. charssmith — Re: new WITZ
710. F. W. Perrella — Liberian Poets - any info?
711. miekal and — Re: Jargon books
712. A. Jenn Sondheim — Nikuko on Ytalk
713. Susan Schultz — Re: more Ashbery
714. Peter Balestrieri — Re: (Fwd): Khartoum Translation Conference
715. Thomas Bell — ascetic aesthetics
716. Hank Lazer — Re: Jargon books
717. Mark DuCharme — Re: re : whalen/berrigan

30 AUG 1998

718. Pierre Joris — Re: Jargon books
719. Tosh — RIBOT
720. Mark Weiss — Re: Jargon books
721. Mark Weiss — (no subject)
722. david bromige — Mr.Kent's inviting letter
723. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap — Re: RIBOT conference
724. david bromige — Re : Last Call
725. k.a. hehir — Re: Thanks for Klingon
726. k.a. hehir — capilano review
727. k.a. hehir — Re: the write to a bad language

728. Ron Silliman — Tom Meyer
729. Hank Lazer — Re: Tom Meyer
730. Dorothy Trujillo — Pete Hautman

31 AUG 1998

731. Mark Wallace — mapping the Ashbery influence
732. Robert Archambeau — The Ubiquitous Bowering
733. henry gould — Re: mapping the Ashbery influence
734. Burt Hatlen — Re: POETICS Digest - 28 Aug 1998 to 29 Aug 1998 (#1998-47)
735. Mark Prejsnar — The Anxiety of Nonfluence, Or, Spicing it Up
736. Jordan Davis — talkin to me?
737. David Baratier — Re: Last Call
738. Mark Prejsnar — Hermes Tries Majestically
739. Jordan Davis — encoded heterosexism colonizes the future apologetically 740. Gary Sullivan — What's there is there. I'm here . . .
741. MAYHEW — poetic careerism
742. Henry Gould — Re: poetic careerism
743. Erik Sweet — pets and sparks...money losing my teeth again
744. David Golumbia — Re: Last Call
745. Gabriel Gudding — Cheering Thought
746. Mark Weiss — Re: Cheering Thought
747. Laura E. Wright — Re: Cheering Thought And Location
748. david bromige — Sordid in Lund
749. KENT JOHNSON — (Fwd) To say again: Will you come to Khartoum?
750. nico vassilakis — Northwest Vispo
751. Scott Pound — Re: ascetic aesthetics
752. Scott Pound — Re: ascetic aesthetics
753. Karen Kelley — Re: ascetic aesthetics

1. Marjorie Perloff
Re: varia
Fri 31 Jul 1998

For Ron: you're quite right re Lowell, Creeley, Whalen but don't forget that it was very difficult to get out of being drafted and one had to have all kinds of connections. Lowell did spend time in jail, as recorded in Life Studies. I don't know about Whalen. Creeley was ofcourse 4F. I had just meant that you couldn't just "decide" not to go although long-time Quakers were pretty much exempt for religious reasons.

Shift of topic: There's an excellent piece on the visual element in Olson's poetry in WORD & IMAGE by Christian Moraru who has just gone from Indiana to teach at North Carolina-Greensboro. "Topos/ typos / tropos": visual strategies and the mapping of space in Charles Olson's poetry." Vol. 14, no. 3 (July-Sept 1998), 253ff. Moraru shows how "the political potential of Concrete discourse was downplayed if not utterly ignored by Allen Ginsberg and his generation," and hence Olson's earlier (and strong) connections to Concrete have largely been ignored.

And loved Douglas Oliver's comments about Anglo-American relations--indeed on a major UPSWING. THEIR respect for OUR poetry at the London conference makes me think that it's about time that we pay attention to the work of the many exciting poets there--Maggie O'Sullivan, Denise Riley, Caroline Bergvall, Drew Milne, John Kinsella, Miles Champion--many others. The scene has really changed!

Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

2. linda russo
Re: Poetics programs, etc.
Fri 31 Jul 1998

As an A/academic, it's my duty to point out that we are, perhaps, mincing terms: is the question: what does is mean to be _an_ "Academic"? or what does it mean to be "academic"?

My american Heritage pocket dict. says "scholarly to the point of triviality" -- I think I AM (in most circumstances in which I find myself) scholarly to the point of triviality! ("always a critic!") I sort of like that! I'm not supposed to be employable! -- what a relief! But then that's just me with my lil ol' american heritage. Any OED-clad Academics out there?

> I have never understood the claim that "avant-garde" poets are in any way less academic than "mainstream" poets. Both (ostensible) camps guard their > traditions and canons jealously... both harbor various means of garnering prestige (mags, prizes--c'mon that the avant-garde doesn't have lots of book prizes and awards...).... both maintain a capacity for dogma.

They (a/g & mainstream) are academic -- I agree -- if by that you mean "scholarly to the point of triviality"; but in terms of The Academy in general (in the mainstream) the a/g is "less Academic" -- less institutional -- the mainstream canon is Academic, the a/g merely "academic"?

and on another note?: How many times have you heard writers (we are talking about academic poets after all) say that theory would mess them up? That they don't need theory? I've sat with a roomful of MFA/PhD students who absolutly refused to engage with Barthes because they felt semiotics wasn't important to their writing -- and yet they consistently employed patently Academic critical methodologies. Which is more Academic?

I'm dreading the conversation even as i'm engaging in it. It has been played on this list before and I wonder if the question I ask in a previous post can't take it to another place?

> The Question to Ask Now is: has bringing "innovative" poetics, poets and poetries into the academy -- _taking_ the there (and off the streets?) -- MADE them academic/exclusive/closed/deadened them somehow?

thought that last "academic" should read "Academic"

My american Heritage pocket dict. says "scholarly to the point of triviality" -- ha ha! (thought that was pretty funny out of context)

↑ Index

3. linda russo

Poetics/Academics/revolutions

Fri 31 Jul 1998

Katy -- I think I figured out why your response bugged me
> I have never understood the claim that "avant-garde" poets are in > any way less academic than "mainstream" poets.

If you look at history, I think you'll understand the claim. In writing a history of women in the small press I've looked into the mimeo revolution -- to see what went on & specifically the roles individual women played. To be avant garde in the 50s-60s was to be categorically anti-academic; Small press movements spawned the work that became the New American Poetry were grassroots, anti-establishment movments, providing an alternative forum -- journals such as The Floating Bear, Yugen,"C", Beatitude, Fuck You: A Magazine of the Arts, Big Table, The Black Mountain Review, Caterpillar, Open Space, Contact, The San Francisco Review, 0 to 9, The World &c &c -- in NY, SF, Black Mt, and Chicago. Many editors fought obscenity charges (Diane DiPrima has an amazing anecdote about taking on the FBI, LeRoi Jones single handedly taking on the supreme court) that the academy as a matter of course complied with.

For example, Academy pressure over obscenity charges wagered against the _Chicago Review_ caused it's editors to go anti-establishment -- literally, the editors quit their academic editing posts and began _Big Table_ so they could publish Burroughs and Ginsberg. The U of C had pressured them to stop publishing because a Chicago newspaper journalist accused the Chicago Review of publishing "filth" !!!

Until these presses and little magazines began, there were only "academic quarterlies" to publish in.

Yes, Ginsberg and Burroughs are canonized, the a/g has all the fixins on their plates too. Yes, both the the "a/g" (whatever that is) and the mainstream are "in" the academy. So I repeat my Q: what now? What does this mean for the a/g, for innovative poetry, to "be" "academic"?

-- it's lonely on this list at 2 am! It must be nearly lunchtime for Douglas Oliver!!

↑ Index

4. trbell

Re: Shoptaw III

Fri 31 Jul 1998

What about "lexia"?

and to broaden the subject some, is anyone aware of work that uses Iser's concepts of 'fictive' and 'imaginary' in relation to poetry as play. Iser does a fine job, but doesn't delve into poetry.

tom bell

At 07:43 PM 7/31/98 +0300, you wrote:
>Thanks for many helpful backchannel tips on what poets have used prosodic >measures such as the charecter, word, phrase, etc. But again, I ws hoping >to hear about _critical/ theoretical_ texts in which such measures are >introduced/ used/ discussed. Or where prosody or the poem's soundscape is >discussed in terms of syntax, grammar, instead of meter or phonology.
>
>:: Reading John Shoptaw's "The Music of Construction - Measure and Polyphony
>:: in Ashbery and Bernstein" (in The Tribe of John) I'm just wondering who >:: else has used these units of prosodic measurement - character, word,

>:: line, phrase, sentence, section. I'm aware of Silliman's use of >:: sentence but not much else.
>
>Fred Hertzberg
>
>

↑ Index

5. KENT JOHNSON

Re: Oh Henry!

Sat 1 Aug 1998

On July 31, Henry Gould wrote:

> Open up any magazine advertised on > this list. You will find poems made up of inchoate jumbles of > broken syntax. I call this obscurity in a negative sense.

Sure, Henry, no question. But why such a gripe? There are many _more_ magazines filled to overflowing with gibberish written in complete sentences and organized around "images." All "poetries" have their learning poets or lifelong weak ones. A few become really good and change everything. Yeats is one; Zukofsky is another. One can delight in both.

This is pretty obvious, isn't it? Why be a bull, pawing the ground, fixated on a piece of cloth?

> I think syntax has a lot to do with the pleasure & beauty of poetry.

Yes, of course. My point was that there are _all sorts_ of syntaxes available to poetry. It's a deep and wide realm of the possible, and it's what makes poetry what it is. Painting is a bit like this too. So is music. (Isn't that miraculous?) Heaven forbid poetry become something like the refinement of a particular or preferred idea of syntax (i.e. words arranged as "complete sentences" as you say).

Well, this is getting boring, isn't it Henry? To bed.

Kent

>

↑ Index

6. Douglas Oliver

Re: anglo-american literary relations

Sat 1 Aug 1998

Very grateful to Mark Prejsnar for correcting and Bob Archambeau for adding to my remarks about the Ric Caddel, Peter Quartermain anthology of the "Other" British poetry. In my original draft of the message, I called "Other" the first full anthology of British experimental writing to be published in the US for decades. On checking, I was surprised I'd left out the word "full" during self-editing.

I gladly remember the important Potes and Poets Floating Capital 1991 collection, pioneering at the time. The fine New American Writing selection of 26 new British poets was No. 8 & 9, Fall 1991, and many years before that New Directions did a mini-anthology edited by Andrew Crozier. No doubt there have been other inklings which I've forgotten, but the gist of what I said stands: it's seven years later, there isn't much about, not published in the US, and "Other" should prove to be "fuller".

Bob Archambeau's plug for Billy Mills' book service very timely in these circumstances. One of the best British distributors of small press work is Peter Riley, 27 Sturton Street, Cambridge CB1 2QG, England. John Tranter is also doing a good job across the Atlantic-Pacifix axes on the Jacket website.

Another possibility for firming relations: Talisman House have broken the new turf with the Jarnot/Schwartz/Stroffolino Anthology of Younger (American) Poets. Excellent start. There's a good case for a US-British (or US-British- Canadian-Australian) anthology of younger poets -- born after 1960, say -- one day soon. Then, along with "Other" we'd have a representative set of texts on the market to encourage book buying from the specialist distributors on both sides of the Atlantic, and perhaps the Pacific. When I taught workshops on the younger poetry in the US and Britain at Naropa this summer, the interest from students was remarkable.

I've been fiddling myself with the idea of collecting up a set of young poet texts on these lines for proposal to a publisher but have concluded, sadly, that I have too many other projects on hand. This may make my suggestion sound weak -- can't be helped. But I'd be glad to be in contact with any person/ persons who did get enthused to offer what help I could.

Doug Oliver

↑ Index

7. Hugh Steinberg
Re: Poetics/Academics/revolutions
Sat 1 Aug 1998

Linda Russo writes:
  So I repeat my Q: what now?
>What does this mean for the a/g, for innovative poetry, to "be"
>"academic"?

a/g re:culture

Hugh Steinberg

↑ Index

8. Lawrence Upton.
Re: anglo-american literary relations
Sat 1 Aug 1998

To Doug Oliver's list of things to check out, if you do check out me and Sub Voicive Poetry - and there is a distinction - then do also check out Miles Champion and One in the Other reading series. Miles, too, is separate from the series and he is *well *worth knowing as a poet... as a person too

Lawrence Upton

↑ Index

9. linda russo
Re: academic as in poetry
Sat 1 Aug 1998

> From: [redacted]
>
> The interesting question isn't who's academic, who's not, or what makes an "academic," but rather what Linda asked: what's it MEAN that alternative poetries & practioners are firmly "inside" now? What's the effect of two generations of poets passing through Buffalo, or all the writers who have graduated from the New College, Naropa, San Diego, Bard & Brown and who are now writing, teaching & publishing? Certainly the terms of debate within the universities has been altered. My sense is that it's basically a postive force. We need it. Institutional tensions follow in the wake. Who will be forgotten?

Yes.

Or as Notley asks (out of her awareness of writing as a woman) "what are we leaving out now?

It might also be fruitful to read the academic ensconcement of the a/g as somewhat inevitable, (Black Mountain for example) a direct result of the mimeo revolution and the proliferation of small press poetic materials -- inevitably archived for ("academic") study. (if you haven't already, you might want to see my Poetics/Academics/Revolution post)

what emerges is a confluence rather than an influence -- studying different sorts of poetries demands different theoretical/essayistic apparatuses -- "changes" what it means to be A/acadmic.

And so not to be apologists, not to "scurry from the margins"
but to SIEZE the STRUCTURE (the Academy) and WRENCH OR BREAK its FRAMES
jeez this is like dealing with being a woman poet all over again

so Yes, the imporance of remembering can't be stressed enough -- An interesting confluence in the increasing amount of women small poet-editors and the increasing importance of contemporary production by women -- poets like Hejinian, Scalapino, Harryman, Waldrop, Fraser, Dahlen, DuPlessis, Notley, Waldman, Mayer &c&c -- might be less known had they not endeavored to create the materials (little magazines/books) that all of us now turn to in defining our traditions.

↑ Index

10. Jacques Debrot
Re: Shoptaw III
Sat 1 Aug 1998

For me, the chief virtue of Shoptaw's work is that he has made previously inaccessible poems available to close reading without entirely normalizing their strangeness. His analyses of _The Tennis Court Oath_ in several articles are, I think, unsurpassed. Not too long ago however Mark Wallace defended Steve Evans (against Henry Gould?) for Evan's somewhat oblique -- though, brilliant, apology -- of poetic innovation by arguing that close readings are ephemeral stuff -- an attitude which, since I imagine it is widespread, might explain why Shoptaw's techniques of close reading are somewhat anomolous -- hence the apparent difficulty of naming similarly oriented criticism -- though it strikes me that it is precisely new techniques of "close reading" that the current situation most urgently requires). Perhaps, in addition to Fred's question, someone might want to comment on the dynamic between the criticism being done by practicing poets (& in the last 20 years there has been a renaissance of poet/critics unmatched since the period of the New Criticism) & scholars such as Shoptaw, Perloff, Damon, Conte, etc.

↑ Index

11. ShaunAnne Tangney Humanities

Re: My Definition of Academic

Sat 1 Aug 1998

---

i haven't been following this thread very closely, but want to chime in as someone who is at the end of her first year "in" the academy: tenure-track job and all that, and who was desperate to "get in"--

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote:

> I'd join the academy if I could.

as i said, doing so was goal/dream number one for me.

> I'm tired of never having any money.

i make less than anyone else i know in academia: point here: just being in doesn't mean you get paid well. plus w/ all those student loans having come due, i live hand to mouth--at a similar if not lower level as i did as a grad student.

> I'm tired of the stress always looking for the next little job.

at my university everyone (even tenured faculty) is issued a one-year contract. we are, in effect, glorified adjuncts. point here: being in doesn't necessarily mean you don't always work with the nagging worry at the back of yr mind that next year you may be looking for a job again.

> I'm tired of being an outsider.

this _feels_ better to me now, as in, i _do_ feel "inside" but this feeling doesn't really do anything for me or my career. i live and teach in a samll, rural, isolated town/university--i'm never really sure just what it is that i am "inside." going to confs and such i do get to introduce myself as dr. tangney--that is, i would if we did that kind of thing, which as we all know we don't --so--what is this inside feeling really worth? i'm not that sure.

> I'm tired of no health insurance book/travel/conference perks.

i teach a 4/4, i am expected to give conf papers and publish and do service. i am given minimal travel support (i got better support from my dep't as a grad student), and no release-time to write. i had intended to write all summer, but due to financial hardship i had to teach this summer (again: i made more as a grad student for summer school courses than i did this summer as a tenure-track faculty member). our helath insurance is terrible; i still haven't been able to afford the dentist.

> I'm tired of begging. I'm tired of insomnia.

see above.

> I'm tired of no furniture, eating poorly.

when i got this job i seriously considered not moving the couch i had because it was so awful and old and beat up. i'm very glad i did because as it turns out i can't even afford to get it cleaned, let alone replace it.

> I'm tired of the whole fucking thing.
> I'd join in a second.
> I'd join for free.

i'm tired of it, too. i wonder almost every day if there's enough jesus christ in me to keep at it. i believe in it, i want it, i know we need it, and i wish like hell i felt like i had enough strength and power to fight like hell to preserve and improve it. some days i do; many i don't. the days i don't are because i'm exhausted from doing what "the system" keeps me doing instead of what i know i should be doing--take for example just the issue of college profs teaching a 4/4 load: this is crazy. it makes lousy teachers of us all. but at the end of the day/week, i'm often to freaking tired to fight about it. it's classic, isn't it? keep 'em so wasted they won't complain--it's positively feudal.

i don't mean to be bitter: i am trying VERY HARD not to be bitter. and i was very naive before i got "in." i thought i would have some secruity, some respect, and i thought i'd be able to get my teeth fixed and buy the kind of beer i really like. it's just not that simple. and it doesn't happen overnight. and it takes much more fight than i ever dreamed it would. i'm not ready to give up, but let's be careful not to aggrandize "in".

best,
shaunanne

> Alan's Gang, wondering who's in and who's out at the moment.

↑ Index

12. Maria Damon
Re: My Definition of Academic
Sat 1 Aug 1998

---

i appreciate this. thanks.

At 11:39 PM -0400 7/31/98, Alan Jennifer Sondheim wrote:
>I'd join the academy if I could.
>I'm tired of never having any money.
>I'm tired of the stress always looking for the next little job.
>I'm tired of being an outsider.
>I'm tired of no health insurance book/travel/conference perks.
>I'm tired of begging. I'm tired of insomnia.

>I'm tired of no furniture, eating poorly.
>I'm tired of the whole fucking thing.
>I'd join in a second.
>I'd join for free.
>
>Alan's Gang, wondering who's in and who's out at the moment.

↑ Index

13. Maria Damon

Re: d.a.levy / call for papers, etc.

Sat 1 Aug 1998

---

hey, can you tell us more about this bpNichol conference in september? dates, players, schedule, contact person etc?

At 1:12 PM -0700 7/30/98, Carl Lynden Peters wrote:
>this post makes my day! makes my semester! makes my year! it's great news >to hear! fantastic! d.a. levy is a great poet, and needs our >attention. i am currently working on a piece entitled _d.a. levy's >influence on bpNichol's science of the "pataphysical_, which i will >present at the Nichol conference this September. in Vancouver. so a little >bit of a plug on my part but what th hell. a d.a. levy conference is just >a wonderful idea, and it's very exciting. all th best,
>
>carl
>
>p.s. i'm still searching for levy sources, and a few of you on this list >have already been very helpful. if anyone can name any further sources or >current work on levy i wld be very grateful. th doors r open,
>
>c.
>
>> Hello Everyone:
>>
>> David Kirschenbaum asked me to post this:
>>
>> BOOGLIT #6
>> Call for submissions and papers for:
>>
>> 1) Booglit #6 d.a.levy issue
>> pub date Dec 1, 1998
>> edit & art deadline Oct 1, 1998
>> poems, prose, memories, artwork are all welcome

>>
>> 2) d.a.levy conference
>> We are in the planning stages of putting together a two-day levy >>conference in >> NYC Fri-Sat Dec 11-12, 1998, with readings, talks and panel discussions, >> including a reading on Fri night Dec 11, at the Poetry Project at St. Mark's >> Church. We are looking for papers relating to the following topics (although >> any and all papers and proposals will be considered):
>>
>> a) Mimeo revolution
>> b) 1968 in American
>> c) Cleveland poetry scene in the 60s
>>
>> Please send papers with a one page abstract.
>> Please send all submissions, when possible, on disc in a word processing >> program, preferably Microsoft Word.
>> All submissions should be sent to:
>>
>> David Kirschenbaum BOOGLIT
>> P.O. Box 20531 New York, NY 10011
>> attn: d.a.levy issue (or conference)
>> If you have any inquiries, contact BOOGLIT
>> [redacted] or [redacted]

↑ Index

14. david bromige
academic as in poetry
Sat 1 Aug 1998

To me, the term "academic poetry" feeds off that use of the word "academic" to mean "nugatory," as in "oh, thats only of academic interest," or "that's academic" meaning "of no moment."

In this light, a lot of poetry written outside the academies is as "academic" (to me) as a lot that is written from within academe.

Theres no sense drawing a line around the universities and saying "everything within this circle is of no interest." Most of the challenging and rigorous poetry being written today in north america is being written by college professors. Some of these, its true, are only college professors _because_ of their poetry (i.e., dont have advanced degrees; were hired to teach only poetry anyway). But others followed the more common route to their posts. I think of Michael Davidson, a phenomenon in that he teaches fulltime at UCSD, publishes articles, gives papers, and has 2 scholarly books out; raises two young kids, corresponds extensively, swims daily, and is one of america's finest poets. Alson Neilsen of this List is a like wonder (exempt the kids and the daily swim).Then there's that other Dano-America, Cole Swensen, with a doctorate, teaches at Denver U, writes marvelous poetry and does extensive translation from the French. Nothing academic about them. David

↑ Index

15. david bromige

help re current poetries in japan, peru, chile

Sat 1 Aug 1998

If anyone has some k-edge of the current situation in these countries, where poetry is concerned, please b-c me. It will be of great help with a study I'm undertaking. Thanks in advance, David

↑ Index

16. dbkk

Re: postfeminist POETICS JOURNAL?

Sat 1 Aug 1998

Linda, the last planned issue of PJ never appeared--this was several years ago. It's now being put out--with some of the material of the originally proposed issue as well as some newly solicited material, much of it by "younger" writers. In June Barrett said it would be out in July, so I imagine it will be out soon. There are others on this list who are also in this issue and who are probably in closer contact with Barrett and Lyn than I am this summer--who might have more details.

Dodie

> Date: Thu, 30 Jul 1998 22:45:22 +0000
> From: linda russo <[redacted]>
> Subject: postfeminist POETICS JOURNAL?
>
> [the subject line is purely whimsical]
>
> hey Dodie or someone -- could you clarify? What is this new PJ?
> what's the story?
>
> . . . the new/long-overdue Poetics Journal [which features] a talk > [Dodie Bellamy]
> gave at New Langton Arts years ago--for an evening on Eros and Writing > (curated by Kevin K.) . . . purposely written for a non-intellectual > audience. . . .

> thanks. lvr

↑ Index

17. charles alexander

the purity the purity (sung to the tune of "the horror the horror")

Sat 1 Aug 1998

Please forgive me if I am repeating earlier conversation. I admit to being away, stopping poetics mail, and not going completely through the archive of the last ten days or so.

But a friend just put the July 16 New York Review of Books in my hand. Therein, by some John Bayley, an article on new poetry books by Donald Hall, Frederick Seidel, J.D. McClatchy, Mark Strand, and Edward Hirsch, from which Bayley extracts such overall characterizations of poetry, and contemporary poetry, as . . .

"Poets must often write to cheer themselves up, and in so doing the good ones can cheer up their readers as well."

"Poetry works immediately . . . or it doesn't work at all . . . Its function must be, as Mallarme said, to give a purer meaning to our tribal language, and also a more concentrated one."

"A general impression . . .: how quietly but firmly civilized much American poetry has lately been becoming. It is partly of course the influence of the campus, but, more than that, it may reflect a general nostalgia for civility and civilization as being in the end an inevitable source for poetic culture. Poetic learning in America today is worn easily, seldom irritatingly academic, but also not making apologies for any lack of vox pop elementariness. What would the founding fathers of modernism, and those who wanted with Carlos Williams a plain poetry for cats and dogs, think about these developments? How would Walt Whitman respond? With surprise? Dismay? No, I think he would have liked these poems."

This angers and befuddles me, as I try to imagine what constitutes this "poetic culture" and what kind of "purer meaning" is given "to our tribal language," by a poetry which is praised for being civilized, which seems to mean the same thing as not being irritating, as it collaborates with a general cultural nostalgia.

I have a hard time imagining Mallarme or Whitman or Carlos Williams approving.

I know the NY Rev of Books is only being itself here, but it's still disgusting.

charles

↑ Index

18. Erik Sweet
Re: academic as in poetry
Sat 1 Aug 1998

In a message dated 8/1/98 11:37:16 AM, Bromige wrote:

<< Nothing
academic about them."... David

Except that they teach in the "academy." I agree that there should be no circles, but this is like saying Dr. "Smith" works at the hospital as a surgeon and swims on the weekends but there is nothing "doctorly" about him.

It is strange how the idea of the academy makes people so defensive...drawing lines against those academic and those not...(ask anyone outside of the scholarly argument what they think about this and they will tell you anyone who is a professor is an academic...) who cares! is it what others think of the academic job or what you think?

Thousands are in line to get a job as an "English Professor" to all at the Academy be happy where you are...seems like a great job... and it is what you do in there that matters...

erik sweet

↑ Index

19. Billy Little
Re: postfeminist playground
Sat 1 Aug 1998

your fans db up allnight fixing the fibre optics to search for yr bytes

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

Yeah, I stole from
the treasury
of human folly
I spent it all on you, baby...

don't mention it

Duncan McNaughton

↑ Index

20. charssmith
Re: academic as in poetry
Sat 1 Aug 1998

The interesting question isn't who's academic, who's not, or what makes an "academic," but rather what Linda asked: what's it MEAN that alternative poetries & practioners are firmly "inside" now? What's the effect of two generations of poets passing through Buffalo, or all the writers who have graduated from the New College, Naropa, San Diego, Bard & Brown and who are now writing, teaching & publishing? Certainly the terms of debate within the universities has been altered. My sense is that it's basically a postive force. We need it. Institutional tensions follow in the wake. Who will be forgotten?

--cs

↑ Index

21. charles alexander
Re: the purity the purity (sung to the tune of "the horror the horror")
Sat 1 Aug 1998

Keith, I thought your response to those NY Review quotes was perfect.

thanks,

charles

↑ Index

22. MAXINE CHERNOFF
Re: academic as in poetry
Sat 1 Aug 1998

Regarding Erik Sweet's comment on the academic, the history of which (David Bromige post) I haven't followed:

In Chicago in the 1980s, when the performance poetry scene was booming, I suddenly found myself framed (by Marc Smith) as an academic because I taught at Columbia College Chicago. When reporters from The Smithsonian and Wall Street Journal called to ask what I thought of the slam phenomenon, I would talk at length about its history, in Chicago and elsewhere, and make a claim for myself as "non-academic." But the reporters wanted soundbites, which I didn't know how to construct, and concluded that since I taught at a college I must therefore be an academic. I said that the slams seemed to me (Baraka said so, too) a relentless capitalization of the popularity of "voice"; that it represented the triumph of mass-media-ready poetry at the expense of text; and that it generally lacked the kind of political critique to be found in Ginsberg, Baraka, Rothenberg, and Waldman, among others. The reporters would use my most negative statements to frame me as the disapproving professor/bete noire needed to make the story dramatic.

But of course there are numerous "academic" poets, by which we mean those who employ the received idiom, who do not teach. Because there are only 250 creative writing programs in the country, these poets are in the majority.

Both language poetry and performance poetry have been assimilated to an extent by academic and broader cultural interests. Because we are a culture that values indeterminacy, risk-taking (especially with capital), the "new" is prized. But most poets like to operate on safe ground. They wait until an idiom has general acceptance and then leap in. It's the second wave that often gets the most attention. Pound to Eliot: "I'll break down the door, you take out all the swag."

It is possible to be avant-garde and also academic; to be mainstream and also non-academic.

True or false: (1) Bad art is central to the concept of pleasure; (2)Transgression is always sentimental; (3) Disjuncture heals all wounds.

--Paul Hoover

↑ Index

23. Billy Little

Re: academic as in poetry

Sat 1 Aug 1998

---

in my pea brain i always hear moot as the echo of academic, i.e., everybody knows that, who cares? i never thought of creeley as academic, electric would be the antonymn, creeley is electric, academic is sherlock holmes elementary, scholarship is closer to obsession than academic, love writ large on an subject/field

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

Yeah, I stole from
the treasury
of human folly
I spent it all on you, baby...

don't mention it

Duncan McNaughton

↑ Index

24. R M Daley
help w/ djuna barnes
Sat 1 Aug 1998

---

can anyone help me out with a bit of digging about?- trying to find out what happened to the work-in-progress found in djuna barnes apt when she died? (according to shari benstock, a poem she had been working on for thirty years) - or point me in the direction of barnes' papers, etc -

or even just carolyn burke's address

thanks

rd

↑ Index

25. Mark DuCharme
Re: the war room
Sat 1 Aug 1998

The title is "Duel." But I don't want a pineapple.

--Mark DuCharme

Bill Luoma wrote:

>
>Todd, yes, but you left out his best film. Starring Dennis Weaver.
>
>I'll send anyone a pineapple who can come up with the title.
>
>I've always wanted to write a treatise about that movie and Killdozer.
>
>Bill Luoma
>
><<
>----------
>Date: Wed, 29 Jul 1998 20:20:42 +0000
>From: toddbaron <[redacted]>
>Subject: the war room
>
>I must say: the discussion on Spielberg seems way out of line for the >list.
>Not that I'm suggesting a censor --or trying to stop the discussion--but

>the man as an artist isn't! He rewrites history in a clumsy albeit >monetary way--see Schindler's List--see that he is in the habit of >recreating a Heroic mythology--a cartoon strip--and has been quoted as >saying that "the great war movies of the 40's inspired (him)" Let's see
>
>a film about a shark (which he had to be pushed into doing)
>a film about an alien (a boyhood idea stolen really from Geroge Lucas)
>another film about aliens (WOW!)
>a film about the ATlantic Slave Trade (he was SUED for this one!)
>a film
> a film
> a film?
>
>WHOOPS--I meant "movie"!
>
>Spillberg (no typo) HAS destroyed the film industry--he won that war!
>The great films of the 60s and 70s he single handedly destroyed when he >found out he couldn't make one! (No "humanity" or "personality" in his >films! Read RAGING BULLS and EASY RIDERS! His first film was THE >SUGERLAND EXPRESS--trying to be Altman, trying to be Scorsessem etc!)
He >was raised on TV for god's sake! The big MACHINERY he p[roduced--the >studio he saved (UNIVERSAL) they both overtook the great films of Hal >Asbhy (Harold and Maude, Shampoo, etc--films that made money!), Altman, >Scorsesee(his great films hardly were released! Yup--Taxi Driver did not >make the man wealthy!) Even Coppola (and left him a rather commercial >idiot I maight say--from Godfather and Apocylypse NOW (a GREAT "war" >movie--a movie that took a war into the lens--to "Jack" and
>.....)
>
>Phew.
>
>Hey..I guess this is fun!
>
>Back to the poem.....
>
>
>What about poetic Heroes anyway--like Spicer?
>
>Todd Baron

>(ReMap)>>
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

26. Keith Tuma

Re: the purity the purity (sung to the tune of "the horror the horror")

Sat 1 Aug 1998

Charles writes:

> Please forgive me if I am repeating earlier conversation. I admit to being away, stopping poetics mail, and not going completely through the archive of the last ten days or so.
>
> But a friend just put the July 16 New York Review of Books in my hand. Therein, by some John Bayley, an article on new poetry books by Donald Hall, Frederick Seidel, J.D. McClatchy, Mark Strand, and Edward Hirsch, from which Bayley extracts such overall characterizations of poetry, and contemporary poetry, as . . .

"Poets must often write to cheer themselves up, and in so doing the good ones can cheer up their readers as well."

Poets rust, often right to beer themselves suds, and in no doing the god ones can near sud their readers as well.

"Poetry works immediately . . . or it doesn't work at all . . . Its function must be, as Mallarme said, to give a purer meaning to our tribal language, and also a more concentrated one."

Poetry woks remedially. . .or it doesn't wok at all. . . Its function must be, as Marmalade said, to give pureed meaning to our tribal lunch, a more concentrated bunch.

"A general impression . . .: how quietly but firmly civilized much American poetry has lately been becoming. It is partly of course the influence of the campus, but, more than that, it may reflect a general nostalgia for civility and civilization as being in the end an inevitable source for poetic culture. Poetic learning in America today is worn easily, seldom irritatingly academic, but also not making apologies for any lack of vox pop elementariness. What would the founding fathers of modernism, and those who wanted with Carlos Williams a plain poetry for cats and dogs, think about these developments? How would Walt Whitman respond? With surprise? Dismay? No, I think he would have liked these poems."

A general's depression. . . : how bitely but wormly nugatory much Apparent poetry has lately been becoming becoming. It is partly a horse the frat boys camped, but, more fat, it may erect a general neuralgia for devilry and egg salad as reading in the rend inevitably hoarse for your pepsi culture. Poetic yearning in America for sale worn easily, seldom irrigated endemic, but also not making apologies for any lack of knocks dad silly. What would the floundering feathers of modernism, and those who vaunted with carloads and billions a vain poetry for rats and hogs, blink about these befuddlements? How would Malt Liquor depend? With a cry? Hooray? Blow, I think he would have spiked these poems.

> ---
>
> This angers and befuddles me, as I try to imagine what constitutes this "poetic culture" and what kind of "purer meaning" is given "to our tribal language," by a poetry which is praised for being civilized, which seems to mean the same thing as not being irritating, as it collaborates with a general cultural nostalgia.
>
> I have a hard time imagining Mallarme or Whitman or Carlos Williams approving.
>
> I know the NY Rev of Books is only being itself here, but it's still disgusting.
>
> charles

Not to deny the seriousness of the matter,

KT

↑ Index

27. Erik Sweet

Re: academic as in poetry

Sat 1 Aug 1998

In a message dated 8/1/98 1:51:09 PM, Hoover wrote:

<<It is possible to be avant-garde and also academic; to be mainstream and also non-academic.
>>

Hoover, and to all: I thought it obvious that to be all that is stated above is not a one sided endeavor...the question of mainstream has always bothered me. In music, art, government the mainstream has always been defined as reaching the masses or manipulated and argued through the public presses. Mainstream I believe is a concept, an idea that is in flux.

There is as Hoover states, a mainstream of the non-academic or avante-garde, i.e. I would say... Naropa etc..something that is pretty well known through media via Ginsberg, Kerouac... and which holds to a tradition of avante-garde or non-academic? poetical style. Naropa is good, the more that know of it...only the better things can be. Academic as a "notion" means so many things to so many people... is at core a good force, it means scholarship, discussion..and whatever "frame" people want to put around it (good, bad) it will always mean possibilty and growth to me, whether it is T.S. Eliot's disciples or some language poetry influenced young poet teaching...

erik sweet

↑ Index

28. Lisa Samuels

Re: My Definition of Academic

Sat 1 Aug 1998

---

shaunanne, eric, charles, alan, &c, first, thanks to shaunanne for your academic example. it resonates. it isn't so simple as being happy to be 'in' because this seems like a good job, i don't think -- after a decade of university (a decade of no salary to speak of) and tens of thousands in debt, it doesn't seem that tremendous to be making what a good administrative assistant would be making at any number of strong businesses i can think of. so there's that. more problematic for me is the much-talk-of corporatization of the university. that has made faculty (mainly of course younger, non-star-class) less important in the university structure. more painfully (and as i've also seen discussed), it is making students feel more like consumers, as if they needed more excuses to resent the degree-conferring power of institutions. as for the effect of practising writers in the academy, i can't generalize -- right now it seems their influence is scattered, though presumably it exerts some centripetal force toward whatever we imagine the academic center of america to be. when i was an educational advisor in yemen, i used to tell aspiring middle eastern students that there were upwards of 2500 institutions of higher education in the states. but back here it seems we're almost always talking only of conditions and definitions in about 100 schools. i'm happy to be 'in,' then, but it's difficult, and not least because of having to negotiate the very ideals -- ideals that are necessarily compromised because institutions are institutionalizing -- that make being 'in' seem so attractive from 'outside'.

lisa samuels

↑ Index

29. dbkk

Two new books I've read

Sat 1 Aug 1998

Two new books appeared on my desk this week, both short little books and very worth your while. The first was "Addenda," by Susan M. Schultz, a handsome little book from Joel Kuszai's estimable Meow Press. Schultz read the last part of "Addenda" at a reading here on Sunday in San Francisco; it's sparked with inane quotations allegedly from supermodels, "Once I got over my anger at my mother, I became adept at volleyball, and modelling," says Gabrielle Reece. Schultz uses these promising materials to produce her own meditations on excellence, generation roles, the look of the page and poem, the extension of poetic technique into blocks of pure prose.

The other book is "Not Right Now," by Renee Gladman, from Second Story Books, a Proliferation Imprint. This book, promises editor Mary Burger, is the first in a series of "New Narrativist" books of prose written by poets--poets exploring prose as one might wander through a new continent. I have long admired Gladman's work, and here in San Francisco we know her as a fascinating poet, but until recently her reputation has been a local one (though she appears in the Talisman anthology of "New (American) Poets"). "Not Right Now" is a kind of reduction/recut of Kerouac's "Subterraneans," glistening at its essence, asking the question, what would happen if San Francisco's Mission District were a kind of sexual, interracial beat bohemia, with a young, black, short, mustached Lesbian at its center? "The day I was no longer a transcriber, I decided to be a weight historian. To go out and find things as they lie and then write a book about them."

Both these books will in time I guess be available at Small Press Distribution, but Mary Burger who published "Not Right Now" is reachable through e-mail at [redacted].

I forgot to say how beautifully designed these books are, whatever happened to the days when nine times out of ten the poetry you wanted to read was bound in those execrable covers that made a cat wince.

Thanks everyone!

↑ Index

30. Peter Balestrieri
Re: crabby bull
Sat 1 Aug 1998

> Henry Gould wrote:
> I read Nabokov (in high school) & Mandelstam (in my 20s) just for relief
>
> Say Hank,
> How about "the crabby elitist ego-noise of Henry Gould"
>
> Affectionately,
> P. "Bull Roar" B.

↑ Index

31. trbell
anglo/amer yeatspound and pounding yeats
Sat 1 Aug 1998

The recent disjunctive synthesizing dichotomy discourses here raise a couple of questions for me:

1. Is it not possible (nay, even desirable) to begin with disjunction and move to synthesis?

2. If there is disjunction in the world (e.g., WWI, WWII, WWWIII) is it _____ to not account for it in synthesizing?

_____ a. foolishness
b. cheerful
c. pure of heart
d. all of the above

↑ Index

32. trbell
Re: crabby bull
Sat 1 Aug 1998

I was even suspended for reading _Lolita in class, and I'm not sure whether Osip in Russian would be classified as a follower of Yeats or Pound, or someone who didn't care one way or the other. It seems to me that perhaps the Yeats-pound split and the Anglo/American split/ reunion may be missing some other lits/langs?

yom bell
At 05:15 PM 8/1/98 -0700, you wrote:

> Henry Gould wrote:
> I read Nabokov (in high school) & Mandelstam (in my 20s) just for > relief
>
> Say Hank,
> How about "the crabby elitist ego-noise of Henry Gould"
>
> Affectionately,
> P. "Bull Roar" B.
>
>

↑ Index

33. Mark Weiss
Re: John Yau's MY SYMPTOMS
Sat 1 Aug 1998

I had to look up the comment of mine that triggered Chris'apparently annoyed response "I do not grant Mark Weiss the authority I grant you in this matter, since I am more suspicious of a male judging another male as sexist." Here's the entirety of what I said: "This (the Yau) is shockingly cliched." This was a gut reaction to the quality of the writing, not the morality or politics. I have no idea where Yau stands on these matters or how he gets along with his wife.

Some years ago I dated a woman named Laurie Lewin (her nom de plume--her name de danse was Lolita) who had been a stripper until shortly before our relationship. She wrote a pretty good insider's look at the world of stripping (although the publisher insisted that what had been in its first draft an autobiographical and theoretical discussion and a series of oral histories be recast novelistically). Wish I could give a better reference--it was from a major press and should be out there somewhere. She speaks, I think, with some authority. Her motivations and those of the other dancers were, as I remember, extremely complex.

It would be interesting, Chris, if you could do so non-combattively, to hear an explanation of why you are suspicious of males judging males as sexist. Are there other categories to be aware of? Or are you just defending a friend's writing? I'd also like to know where you got your authority-granting privileges--I could use some of those myself.

At 10:04 AM 7/31/98 -0400, you wrote:
> Thanks, Karen Kelley, for your reponse....Well, spilling it (or > stripping it--since strippers are artists), I have many responses-- > only some of which I can touch on here. One would be to ask you how

> YOU would represent what goes on in the mind of a stripper (or > to direct me to work of yours that deals with this)....
> Another response would be to agree with you (up to a point):
> Let's say that--in the particular passages you quote--that Yau > is probably closer to what men think women are than to the > actuality of a woman who may strip her clothes but yet not
> "Spill it" (her mind). But, if you look at the entire book
> (in which there are a variety of female characters, some as "I"
> and some as "she"), or even if you look at this particular piece
> in question IN ITS ENTIRETY, you might find that at least Yau is > self-conscious (and meta) enough to admit this possibility (even
> the choice of title of the book, MY SYMPTOMS, calls attention to > the possibility that the female speaker is a "masked male" etc...
> (a la Shakespeare)....
> I wonder if women who represent male characters in ways that might > seem "stereotypical" or "derogatory" (or "positively" even) have the > same problem (I'm not saying that I don't like reading such writing > by the way: I learn much from it). Certainly not every woman writer > is as extreme as Jane Austen who never had a scene in which two male > characters appear without any women in the the scene (because she > only wrote "what she knew"), nor am I suggesting they should do so....
>
> I don't know enough about how dancers are "stereotyped" to comment > on whether Yau is, in fact, doing it. In my experience (admittedly > little) with strippers, the "stereotype about strippers" is "we only > do it for the money. We get little or no intrinsic thrill out of > exhibitionism, and we certainly see it more as humiliation than as > any kind of 'grrrl power' over men." And in this particular story > (which is good, but not--in my opinion, one of the best pieces in > MY SYMPTOMS--I say this by way of "sales pitch" I guess), Yau goes > very much against THAT stereotype, and yet elsewhere in MY SYMPTOMS > he sympathetically portrays a woman who "had been a model, it was > her boyfriend's idea. He brought her to New York when she was 17 > and finally pushed her up the stairs the agency, even though she had > been crying non-stop for two days."(120). So, I think we see a range > here of attitudes towards female exhibitionism rather than an AGENDA > proferring "proper" female roles. And if both these characters-- > taken alone--may run the risk of becoming "stereotypes," I believe > that by offering a range, these "stereotypes" cancel each other out > (again, like Shakespeare presenting both a Beatrice and a Hero in > the same play for instance--so the "truth" can be somewhere "in > between" for a wider range of readers...)...

>
> Besides, you take OUT OF CONTEXT a few quotes that all occur near > the beginning (in the first 2 pages) of an 8 page story. In "Butcher, > Baker..." the woman is only a stripper for the first two pages. Later > on, the woman character, an EX-stripper, single-mother, is expressing > her attraction to firemen, and raises all these doubts about her > motivations: "i don't know why I have this thing about firemen, but > I do...maybe it's because I think in metaphors and I should learn to > think some other way..." (Yau himself a metaphorical thinker, going > against the traditional anti-metaphorical prejudice that linked > metaphor and women, in Locke, in Renaissance Rhetoricians like > Puttenham, etc., though nowadays some claim it's a feminist argument > to argue AGAINST metaphor....blah blah).
> Now, I see what happens here as an inversion of an "archetypal" > stereotype here....the traditional linkage of women with water > and men with fire (as in LYSISTRATA, another man putting words in > the mouth of a woman, or in Jagger's "She's So Cold" for instance) > and then, and I think this also goes beyond stereotype, the female > character starts expressing a desire for a FIREWOMAN. There's both > an unstereotypical lesbian dimension here, as well a desire on the > character's part to BECOME a firewoman ("a woman who fights fires.
> They have to give her her due and treat her like a man. She's on > the line with them..."), > so this woman character tries on quite a few "non-traditional" roles > in the course of this piece. This piece is --on one level--about > whether identity is contingent not only on gender (or sex), but also > one ones choice of profession (a la Harryman). And I am curious what > you, Karen kelley, have to say about this (though I do not grant Mark > Weiss the authority I grant you in this matter, since I am more > suspicious of a male judging another male as sexist,) and I have more > to say on this (but will save it for the longish essay I want to > write on this book--if I can find a publisher who will make room > for my logorrhea), but wanted to express some of these points here > in this forum, in the interest of dialogue....
> Again, thanks, for responding.....
> Chris Stroffolino
>
>On Mon, 27 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:
>
>> Hi Chris,
>>
>> Good call: it IS "Butcher, Baker..."

>>
>> "I'm a dancer who makes men spin in their graves, gets them to yell 'bay bee,' >> whisper 'gosh' and 'honey,' and dream of 'whoopee.'"
>>
>> "Fate got warm with me, dealt me a flush. So I'm packaged right for the job. I have >> an easygoing, cornstalk smile; I'm tall and tilted just enough so short guys don't >> have to crane their little necks and hurt themselves. I can crouch and rise smooth as >> a wave. Twist and twirl until their brains turn to jellyfish bobbing in a beer >> bottle."
>>
>> "Early on I learned that men like to be swatted a little if you do it right and put >> on your girl-next-door smile while shaking your assets just beyond reach. I had tits >> and a smile that gave men cramps."
>>
>> This seems extraordinarily off-base as a representation of what a woman might think >> when contemplating male reaction to her body. Admittedly I am one woman among many.
>> But I wonder if perhaps Yau isn't closer to what men think women think.
>>
>> When I first read the piece I felt guilty about finding it an amusing read when it >> was so clearly a man's idea of a woman's feelings. And as someone who's held the same >> job as the narrator, I'm aware of how routinely dancers are stereotyped.
>>
>> It sounds like you felt differently about the piece, Chris. C'mon, spill it.
>>
>> Karen
>>
>>
>> louis stroffolino wrote:
>>
>> > Dave Baratier asks what "cross-gendered identification" is.

>> > I guess I just meant the term simply (if loosely) to mean
>> > when someone of one gender and/or sex adopts or takes on
>> > the voice of someone of another gender and/or sex....
>> > I didn't say that YAU was NEW for doing that....
>> > but then "make it new" has never been much of a standard for me
>> > (see Mike Magee's intro to his mag COMBO for a view I largely share)
>> >
>> > Karen Kelley. COuld you tell me which particular piece of Yau's was >> > in First Intensity? My hunch is you're talking about a piece called >> > BUTCHER, BAKER, or CANDLESTICK MAKER, but I'd like to know more >> > specifically before I respond....Because I'm curious about what >> > you mean by "stereotypical" and why you think the piece you read is
>> > so.....
>> > Thanks, chris stroffolino
>> >
>> > On Thu, 23 Jul 1998, Karen Kelley wrote:
>> >
>> > > I recently read something of Yau's in a mag--was it First Intensity?
I'm >> > > sorry--I can't recall, but it was perhaps from the new book & was the narrative >> > > of a stripper & I found it rather disturbing in that the narrator was kind of >> > > dumb & angry & thought highly of her breasts (no prob with that in & of itself)
>> > > & little of men in general--she was kind of a jaded line drawing of a >> > > woman--with the interior monolog of a stereotype, which I suppose is okay, >> > > though as this thread goes to show, the whole male/female or masc/fem question >> > > is much more complex than Yau's piece implied, and I guess I just felt annoyed
>> > > that he was willing to throw another stereotype my way.
>> > >
>> > >
>> > >
>> > > louis stroffolino wrote:
>> > >
>> > > > Has anybody here read Yau's new Black Sparrow book?
>> > > > In it, there is much "cross-gendered identification"
>> > > > that---though it is written by a male--seems to, er,

>> > > > "rupture patriarchal discourse" and could serve as >> > > > a complement to, say, Carla Harryman who also engages
>> > > > in "cross-gendered" identification. I think Yau does
>> > > > a very good job at trying to speak AS woman "other"
>> > > > and negotiating the representational anxieties that
>> > > > might attend the "presumption" of such a task.....
>> > > > but would be very interested to hear opposing views....
>> > > > chris stroffolino
>> > > >
>> > > > On Wed, 22 Jul 1998, Linda Russo wrote:
>> > > >
>> > > > > Rah rah.
>> > > > >
>> > > > > I'm glad to see Safdie Joseph annoyed with the
>> > > > > "position" that feminism had seemed to put Todd in (in reading the >> > > > > original post, before Todd's brilliant comeback) -- as >> > > > > an apologist. Elizabeth Treadwell makes the same point as well (though I >> > > > > have definite issues with Postfeminist Playground, for another post).
>> > > > >
>> > > > > I wish we could just do away with the gender essentialism which causes so
>> > > > > many with physical bodies to feel they have to apologize for some >> > > > > appendage or other. I'm intrigued by the problems women (and other
>> > > > > 'others') face in trying to enter the current the forums/debates etc.
>> > > > > -- very material problems (as Woolf pointed out early on) rooted in >> > > > > patriarchal biases.
>> > > > >
>> > > > > But it's more fruitful to continue mucking things up, to keep getting
>> > > > > more and more challenging writing published, to continue framing >> > > > > experiment as a rupture of "patriarchal laws" (Kristeva's argument; what >> > > > > Woolf recognized as "convention," what Bernstein has called "populist
>> > > > > realism" etc) -- to recognized that oppression is at work, even that >> > > > > gender oppression is at work, but to quite calling the >> > > > > counter/re/active strategies "feminine"! or to call it feminine

and stop >> > > > > stop linking this to (women's) biology! Or we all really do have the
>> > > > > Anxiety of Influence -- we're all a bundle of nerves!
>> > > > >
>> > > > > Until we get some intelligent conversation going
>> > > > > to reframe the issues (and reframe them for feminist literary scholarship)
>> > > > > we're going to be beaten over the heads with said appendages.
(Not that it >> > > > > isn't out there -- Judith Butler, for example -- But to what extent has it
>> > > > > made its way into contemporary poetics discussions?)
>> > > > >
>> > > > > Todd's comeback:
>> > > > >
>> > > > > > being "stuck' has to do with our discussion of (bad spelling...er..)
>> > > > > > gender roles and structures in poetics. If one is aware of a gender role
>> > > > > > or gender model--then I believe on is "stuck" within the defintion and >> > > > > > confinement of terminology. I do not believe tho that one is punished or
>> > > > > > "jailed" as in "stuck in prision..stuck in my room". The thing is that
>> > > > > > "stuck" is structure--if one identifies patterns as either male or >> > > > > > female--but I agree with others when they notice that structures in >> > > > > > poetics are male--in that they derive from male poets and male >> > > > > > narratives--how else would the Epic, the sonnet, etc. have found their >> > > > > > way here--now--in their forms. Your Marxist response negates that >> > > > > > economics is gender and age (and race) based also. Very much so--are >> > > > > > structures of Marxism (poor ms. marx and his daughters) and Capitalist >> > > > > > Democracy/etc ("Free Market") based on a male pattern (baldness?) power >> > > > > > elite-thus yes economics determine us--BUT--those economics are not--are >> > > > > > not ---"impersonal economic forces..." --

>> > > > > >
>> > > > > > never impersonal.
>> > > > > >
>> > > > > > Tb
>> > > > > >
>> > > > >
>> > >
>>
>
>

↑ Index

34. Christian Roess
Re: Susan Howe
Sat 1 Aug 1998

My public library has 3 copies of Susan Howe's _Articulations of Sound Forms in Time_ published by AWEDE (Box 376 Windsor, Vermont 05089) in an edition of 1000 copies (in 1987). But now I've just recently seen it is included in _Singularities_. I don't have both versions in front of me. . . so I may be off here, but . . .

This is a radical revision, isn't it? I had a more difficult time with the version in _Singularities_ (which doesn't mean that this version of Articulation of Sound Forms In Time is necessarily better or worse).I suppose I have to undercut my presumptions about what's happening, really 're-read' it, but the 1987 version seems more lyrical to me and somehow more "accessible".

Since there is much recent discussion of Howe on the list, maybe some out there have comments or opinions about the original vs. revision of this poem. I suppose I should buy _Singularities_ . I've been reading it in the bookstore.

Just curious. The Awede edition of AOSFIT mentioned above is the most intense experience of Howe (for me) so far. Although, a poem which appeared recently in _Conjunctions_ is an incredible poem , too.

Chris

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

35. Mark Weiss
Arthur Dove
Sat 1 Aug 1998

For those of you who can get to LA, the just-opened Arthur Dove retrospective at the LA County will change your lives.

↑ Index

36. Mark W Scroggins
Re: Susan Howe
Sat 1 Aug 1998

And for those who want to pursue this thread, isn't the version of _Bibliography of the King's Book_ included in _Nonconformist's Memorial_ different in some really significant ways from the paradigm press edition? In this case, it seems something of a simplifying, rather than a making more difficult. Mark Scroggins

On Sat, 1 Aug 1998, Christian Roess wrote:

> My public library has 3 copies of Susan Howe's _Articulations of Sound Forms in Time_ published by AWEDE (Box 376 Windsor, Vermont 05089) in an edition of 1000 copies (in 1987). But now I've just recently seen it is included in _Singularities_. I don't have both versions in front of me. . . so I may be off here, but . . .
>
> This is a radical revision, isn't it? I had a more difficult time with the version in _Singularities_ (which doesn't mean that this version of Articulation of Sound Forms In Time is necessarily better or worse).I suppose I have to undercut my presumptions about what's happening, really 're-read' it, but the 1987 version seems more lyrical to me and somehow more "accessible".
>
> Since there is much recent discussion of Howe on the list, maybe some out there have comments or opinions about the original vs. revision of this poem. I suppose I should buy _Singularities_ . I've been reading it in the bookstore.
>
> Just curious. The Awede edition of AOSFIT mentioned above is the most intense experience of Howe (for me) so far. Although, a poem which appeared recently in _Conjunctions_ is an incredible poem , too.
>
> Chris
>
> _____
> Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

37. George Bowering

call for papers, etc.

Sun 2 Aug 1998

--==========_-1310115618==_==========

> hey, can you tell us more about this bpNichol conference in september? dates, players, schedule, contact person etc?

Yep

--==========_-1310115618==_==========

Date: Mon, 29 Jun 1998 23:26:08 -0700 (PDT) X-Sender: [redacted]
From: [redacted] (Robert Manery) Subject: bp Nichol conference

On the H Orizon: bpNichol After Ten
Vancouver B.C.
September 25-25, 1998

West Coast Line is pleased to welcome submissions which will be considered for a tribute to the work of bpNichol at an event recognizing Nichol's achievement and continuing influence on contemporary Canadian writers. To this day, Nichol remains one of Canada's most prolific, innovative and influential writers. The conference/tribute will showcase Nichol's work and draw attention to the continuing formation of a poetics that involves a community of emerging writers and critics from across Canada.

Presentations will be a maximum of 15 minutes and may consist of creative, critical, theoretical or performance work that addresses or bounces off bpNichol's poetics.

Please send a brief proposal and a one page CV, including publications/performances to:
West Coast Line
c/o Miriam Nichols
103 - 1738 Frances Street
Vancouver, B.C. V5L 1Z6 or fax [redacted]

Deadline for proposals: 20 July 1998

We regret that we cannot provide financial assistance.

Please pass this notice to other Nichol fans.
--==========_-1310115618==_==========

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

--==========_-1310115618==_==========--

↑ Index

38. Douglas Oliver
Re: anglo-american literary relations
Sun 2 Aug 1998

Ah, here I am at our Parisian breakfast-time, cursing because the fusebox has struck out at my computer, Alice is prowling around wildly thinking while I use her strip plugs, and way over there Linda Russo is, at last, abed.

Sweet dreams of Anglo-American literary relations, Linda!

I was really glad to see Marjorie Perloff take up this important theme of cross-Atlantic relationships picking up again. On the academic-small presses thread, I'll add that Britain hasn't suddenly awoken from some dark medieval night: it may seem like that. The small press scene remained highly active from the sixties to the nineties and the "Other" anthology will show, I think, how the poets who kept active during the difficult eighties were writers of particular mettle.

Lawrence Upton is right to mention the role of the young generations and Miles Champion has made an early reputation, agreed. If, as it appears from the Introduction to "Other" his work is not to be represented there, he is not alone among the younger writers, and his turn in the anthologies, it seems clear, will come. See my suggestion for a trans-Atlantic anthology of the younger work.

Doug

↑ Index

39. Charles Alexander
Re: My Definition of Academic
Sun 2 Aug 1998

> In large part, in the "wars" (as someone has just called 'em) that have raged since 1975 around experimental poetries, it is mostly the academics who've championed neo-babbitism, the non-academics who've been focused on the real issues...

just a note -- I'm interested in your dating these wars as "since 1975," particularly as I remember a poet grad student at U-Wisconsin, but from Texas, in the early '80's, who at the time it seemed was being groomed by Wisc. poet Ron

Wallace. When arguing with this poet about these very experimental/academic issues, his take on it at the time was that these wars had been fought quite a few years before, and the "experimentalists" had lost, so why are we talking about these things any more?

Yes, talk about a failure to communicate . . .

but seriously -- any particular reason why 1975 sticks out to you as the beginning of these raging wars?

charles

charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted] chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

40. Hugh Steinberg
Re: Susan Howe
Sun 2 Aug 1998

Check out her collected early poems, _Frame Structures_, and compare to the earlier versions: many revisions there too. There is much in her work that changes from version to version, which is wonderfully congruent to the content of her poems.

Hugh Steinberg

> And for those who want to pursue this thread, isn't the version of _Bibliography of the King's Book_ included in _Nonconformist's Memorial_ different in some really significant ways from the paradigm press edition? In this case, it seems something of a simplifying, rather than a making more difficult.
> Mark Scroggins
>
> On Sat, 1 Aug 1998, Christian Roess wrote:
>
> My public library has 3 copies of Susan Howe's _Articulations of Sound Forms in Time_ published by AWEDE (Box 376 Windsor, Vermont 05089) in an edition of 1000 copies (in 1987). But now I've just recently seen it is included in _Singularities_. I don't have both versions in front of me. . . so I may be off here, but . . .
>
> This is a radical revision, isn't it? I had a more difficult time with the version in _Singularities_ (which doesn't mean that this version of Articulation of Sound Forms In Time is necessarily better or worse).I suppose I have to undercut my presumptions about what's happening, really 're-read' it, but the 1987 version seems more lyrical to me and somehow > more "accessible".

>
> Since there is much recent discussion of Howe on the list, maybe some out there have comments or opinions about the original vs. revision of this poem. I suppose I should buy _Singularities_ . I've been reading it in the bookstore.
>
> Just curious. The Awede edition of AOSFIT mentioned above is the most intense experience of Howe (for me) so far. Although, a poem which appeared recently in _Conjunctions_ is an incredible poem , too.
>
> Chris
>
> _____
> Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

41. Charles Alexander

Re: My Definition of Academic

Sun 2 Aug 1998

> For a few years, when David Wilke was the head of the NEA lit division, it looked > like that at least part of that might change, but, alas! Reagan,etc.
>
> Don

Yes, at the time David Wilk left the NEA I had just started a press, and had, directly through David's urging, applied for a first NEA press editor's grant and received it -- at the time such things could even be done without non-profit status for the press, if applying as an individual editor. I remember David stated that if Reagan was elected, he would quit. At the time that move seemed wise, perhaps even an important statement. But in retrospect, I wish David had stayed there a while longer -- not that things wouldn't have eventually changed, with advent of Reaganism, rise of religious right, etc.

charles
charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

42. Charles Alexander
Re: My Definition of Academic
Sun 2 Aug 1998

At 08:33 AM 8/3/98 -0700, you wrote:
>Of course the war in question goes back to the end of WW 2, with a major >public battle fought over Howl when it first went public and again when it >was published.

or further. I remember one older professor who, as late as the early 1980's, was claiming that Ezra Pound brought on the death of poetry.

c

charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted] chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

43. Robert J. Tiess
Call for Submissions
Sun 2 Aug 1998

| Call for Submissions - POETFEST - Calling All Poets |

POETFEST, a series of free anthologies published on the Internet, is seeking material for its upcoming collection, MEMORIES. All poets are welcome to submit.

For guidelines please visit

http://www.geocities.com/Athens/Acropolis/7101

The current collection, INSIGHTS, is also freely available for your reading enjoyment.

Note: New anthologies will now be archived at Poetfest.

Please share this annnouncement with your fellow poets and poetry lovers, wherever such notices are welcome.

| Call for Submissions - POETFEST - Calling All Poets |

-

↑ Index

44. Maria Damon
Re: call for papers, etc.
Sun 2 Aug 1998

hey bowering this cfp lists the conference dates as sept 25-25. is that right? thanks for the info.

At 9:27 PM -0700 8/1/98, George Bowering wrote:
>>hey, can you tell us more about this bpNichol conference in september?
>>dates, players, schedule, contact person etc?
>
>Yep
>
>Attachment converted: PB 1400CS:bp_Nichol_conference (TEXT/ttxt) (00001B37)
>
>
>
>George Bowering.
> ,
>2499 West 37th Ave.,
>Vancouver, B.C.,
>Canada V6M 1P4
>
>fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

45. Maria Damon
fwd: new journal; please forward
Sun 2 Aug 1998

From: "Shikha Malaviya" <[redacted]>
To: <[redacted]>
Subject:
Date: Thu, 30 Jul 1998 15:05:05 -0500
Importance: Normal

Introducing the website of 'Monsoon,' an on-line journal of South Asian Culture and Literature, located at:

http://www.monsoonmag.com

Monsoon's mission is to promote a more positive understanding and appreciation of the diversity (culture, nationality, geography, etc.) that is South Asia and the South Asian Diaspora, while flooding the literary world with the most talented writers of prose and poetry as well as create a greater dialogue on issues concerning South Asia.

Monsoon's first issue will debut this fall. Currently the site contains guidelines, links, contact information, a sample of what lies ahead, and other related information. We are currently accepting submissions for autobiographical sketches, essays, fiction, interviews, poetry, reviews, and translations that range from earthy to experimental.

Won't you join us in making Monsoon the best on-line literary journal on the web? Send us your submissions and/or suggestions, and spread the word!!!

We look forward to hearing from you soon!

Shikha Malaviya
Publisher/Editor

↑ Index

46. David Clippinger
Re: Susan Howe
Sun 2 Aug 1998

I asked Susan Howe about the differences between the original "small press" issues and the versions published in _Singularities_, to which she informed me that because of spatial constraints dictated by Wesleyan UP, she had to edit down/edit out material.

I would agree that the changes certainly create further difficulties by lessoning the number of threads for the reader to follow and consider.

All best,

David

At 09:51 PM 8/1/98 -0400, you wrote:
>My public library has 3 copies of Susan Howe's _Articulations of Sound Forms in Time_ published by AWEDE (Box 376 Windsor, Vermont 05089) in an edition of 1000 copies (in 1987). But now I've just recently seen it is included in _Singularities_. I don't have both versions in front of me. . .
so I may be off here, but . . .
>
>This is a radical revision, isn't it? I had a more difficult time with the version in _Singularities_ (which doesn't mean that this version of Articulation of Sound Forms In Time is necessarily better or worse).I suppose I have to undercut my presumptions about what's happening, really 're-read' it, but the 1987 version seems more lyrical to me and somehow more "accessible".

>
>Since there is much recent discussion of Howe on the list, maybe some out there have comments or opinions about the original vs. revision of this poem. I suppose I should buy _Singularities_ . I've been reading it in the bookstore.
>
>Just curious. The Awede edition of AOSFIT mentioned above is the most intense experience of Howe (for me) so far. Although, a poem which appeared recently in _Conjunctions_ is an incredible poem , too.
>
>Chris
>
>
>_____
>Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1
>
>
David Clippinger
Assistant Professor of English
Penn State University
100 University Drive
Monaca, PA 15061-2799
[redacted] (phone)
[redacted] (fax)

+ + + + + + + + + + + + + + +

In a world where nothing is known or can be known beyond the known-to-be unspeakable,
only metaphor speaks literally
and literal speech, itself, is metaphor.

William Bronk, "Speech Making"

+ + + + + + + + + + + + + + +

↑ Index

47. Steven Marks
Shoptalk
Sun 2 Aug 1998

This is in response to Jacques Debrot's comments on criticism as well as the intelligent review of Trevor Joyce's _Syzygy_ in The Irish Times. I'm interested in what people think about close readings of poetry. How can it be done, as Debrot says, "without entirely normalizing their strangeness." What is a close reading that does not do violence by killing off all possible readings except one? is not fleeting or superficial because it simply resorts to the cliched response that there are a number of interpretations and that interpretation is dependent upon the reader completing the writing? wears theory like a skin, but does not use it as a tool -- surgical, truth beam or otherwise? I suppose we all do close readings of poems that call to us. The trick is how do we write about these close readings. One way is to write another poem, paint a picture, compose a song, but that is not the critical response usually meant by close reading. So I ask everybody, what do they mean by close reading? or what can it mean? How can they be accomplished?

Myself, I use what skills I have picked up from school (a B.A. in 1976) and my own reading (and that would be a mixture of some New Critical with the post-structural) and do as Barthes suggested: find a loose thread, pull on it and follow where it leads. Knowing, of course, that violence and superficiality will have their way with me, but trusting that the reader of my close reading will feel the scars and see through the translucent structural skins I have made.

cricketlingly,
Steven

Steven Marks

http://members.aol.com/swmarks/welcome.html

↑ Index

48. Lisa Samuels beautiful =germ=
Sun 2 Aug 1998

---

issue #2 of =the germ= just came in the mail, and like #1 it is a completely gorgeous book. many fine things in it (yes i'm in it too, but that's not the point of my praise). stunning cover art and collage works inside by joyce lightbody, poems by bernadette mayer, rod smith, ray dipalma, lisa isaacson, many others. highly recommended, not least to those who long for lovely bookness. it's great to see so many journals out -- let a thousand flowers bloom! lisa

↑ Index

49. Douglas Barbour
Re: Huranku Ohara
Sun 2 Aug 1998

Oh I did enjoy that one

the deliberateness of it, of course...

More seriously, thanks also to Karen Kelley for her contribution too; nice the way it did NOT give the expected while dancing...

Douglas Barbour (h) [403] 4363320 (b) [403]
[redacted]
Department of English
University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta Canada T6G 2E5

If

a city is an invention
why are we not there

Kathleen Fraser

↑ Index

50. Randy Prunty
Re: beautiful =germ=
Sun 2 Aug 1998

I too just received my copy of germ. It is mighty mighty fine. The beautifully funky cover. The Joyce Lightbody work makes me want to fly to CA and see the actual artifacts. They look fantastic. I've been reading all the poetry the last two days and have been delighting in piece after piece (including yours, Lisa Samuelson)

Randy Prunty

↑ Index

51. Randy Prunty
Re: beautiful =germ=
Sun 2 Aug 1998

---

oops, seems my reading should have been a little closer. the name is Samuels. Sorry Lisa

Randy

↑ Index

52. Irving Weiss
Re: fwd: new journal; please forward
Sun 2 Aug 1998

--- You wrote:
'Monsoon,' an on-line journal of South Asian Culture and Literature, located at:

http://www.monsoonmag.com

but there's no link after home page. No info.

Are you interested in my English translation of Malcolm de Chazal's prose and poetry, French language, Mauritius?

Irving Weiss
http://members.tripod.com/~sialbach/

↑ Index

53. Christian Roess
Re: Susan Howe
Sun 2 Aug 1998

On 02Aug David Clippinger writes:

> I asked Susan Howe about the differences between the original "small press" issues and the versions published in _Singularities_, to which she informed me that because of spatial constraints dictated by Wesleyan UP, she had to edit down/edit out material.
>
> I would agree that the changes certainly create further difficulties by lessoning the number of threads for the reader to follow and consider.
>
> All best,
>
> David

David,

I find myself taken aback by this bit of information. However, your comments, when juxtaposed next to those by Mark Scroggins and Hugh Steinberg, line up for some very interesting considerations, which I don't know how to voice at this particular time. I'll be re-visiting her poems again soon with this shocking bit of news in hand.

I guess for a poet who, as Peter Quartermain has written, "treads borders, boundaries, dividing lines, edges, invisible meeting points" or as Michael Palmer has written , "addresses questions of disappearance and recovery, identity and absence. . .by means of a radical reevaluation of ...the nature of the text in relation to time" she has allowed her own work to disperse into these same

'meeting places', and I'm not sure what encounter is possible there. . and ... well, I could make some other arguments at this point but they would be only "subtle" rather than convincing.

Thanks for this information, all. I hope to hear more.

Chris

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

54. henry
Re: Yeatpound
Sun 2 Aug 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998 14:36:28 -0500 MAYHEW said:
>I read Yeats now as a sort of bizarre oddball, rather than as a >high-modernist, an official role that sort of trapped him. In "a prayer >for old age" he wanted to eschew respectability in favor of madness. Is >Yeatsianism played out? Yes, to the extent he is identified with a >particular sort of aesthetic conservatism that has passed its prime. No, >if we read him somewhat differently. I love parts of Yeats and would not >oppose him to Pound completely. There are more than two sides--modernism >is more like a twelve or thirteen sided figure. To paraprhase Perloff, >Pound/Stevens/Stein/Yeats/Williams/Maiakovsky/Vallejo... whose period?

Does anybody want to argue the substance of what I said? The substance was that Yeats represents - yes, Jonathan, there are other poets out there too - but Yeats represents a different approach to poetry in terms of synthesis/disjunction. Yeats is a premodernist AND a modernist: he writes poems in complete sentences, he uses "old" techniques of stanzaic development, etc. Now everybody can hop in & say "oh well hey Pound was a synthesist too blah blah"... but lest we forget, Pound wrote toward the end of the cantos, " I cannot make it cohere" and also "it coheres all right, even if my notes do not" [or something close to that anyway] and left "IT ALL COHERES" for his TRANSLATION of I believe a Euripides play... - whereas I think Yeats' attitude, reflected in his poetry, was that the lyric poem itself is a synthesis, a coherence, of rhythm, syntax, image, meaning. & my point is that this is not a harebrained oddball out-of-date concept of poetry, but is the mainstream concept of poetry. If that automatically rules it out of consideration by the poets & critics of today, I feel sorry for them. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

55. henry
Re: Oh Henry!
Sun 2 Aug 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998 23:40:22 -0500 KENT JOHNSON said:
>
>Sure, Henry, no question. But why such a gripe? There are many _more_ >magazines filled to overflowing with gibberish written in complete >sentences and organized around "images." All "poetries" have their >learning poets or lifelong weak ones. A few become really good and >change everything. Yeats is one; Zukofsky is another. One can delight >in both.

Why should I join the other cheerleaders on this list? Why not question some of their assumptions? The fact is I think American poetry is at a sort of dead end. I know this sounds crabby & unpleasant to all the delightful poets & readers on the list. In the NY Times Bk review today there was another "mainstream" overview of the poetry situation. the author talked about the East European poets, Milosz in particular, & how they provided a counter- example of a less egocentric "confessional" poetry prevalent for so long in the US. Pinsky's book "Situation of Poetry" was cited again for its call for clear speech & narrative poetry. The whole counter-tradition, which this list supports & represents, was again invisible. Why? Oh, because of the evil capitalist market system & the establishment networks blah blah... nobody wants to consider the notion that this counter-tradition might itself be bankrupt, in part for the very reason I mentioned: the tearing apart of syntax for the sake of innovation; the use of isolated vocabulary as a kind of aesthetic private property (eg. "language poetry" - take it out of the dictionary & it's yours) as opposed to the concept of language as a whole function of "public" communication. I know the intent was to critique another style of appropriation; but appropriation is appropriation & academic enclaves are academic enclaves. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

56. George Bowering
Re: call for papers, etc.
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Oh no. The other note on it I have trashed. You can find out for sure by wiring Roy Miki, the honcho in charge. He's addressed at

[redacted]

> hey bowering this cfp lists the conference dates as sept 25-25. is that right? thanks for the info.

> At 9:27 PM -0700 8/1/98, George Bowering wrote:
> hey, can you tell us more about this bpNichol conference in september?
> dates, players, schedule, contact person etc?
>
> Yep
>
> Attachment converted: PB 1400CS:bp_Nichol_conference (TEXT/ttxt) (00001B37)
>
> George Bowering.
>
> ,
>
> 2499 West 37th Ave.,
> Vancouver, B.C.,
> Canada V6M 1P4
>
> fax: [redacted]

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

57. k.a. hehir

Re: anglo-american literary relations

Mon 3 Aug 1998

HI there, about this request, i have an irish book review that comes into my e-mail box about once a month. currently i send it to about 7 on this list. if any one else want to try it out please backchannel and i'll add you to my list.

THIS IS NOT A SALE just a service i get as a part of a news weekly from galway.

uncommercially yours,
kevin

p.s. july is still in my outbox for sample.

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Robert Archambeau wrote:

> Any suggestions for more
> contact, more mutual spreading of knowledge?

> My only suggestion is the obvious: get your hands on the British and Irish books. Unfortunately, this is often easier said than done from this side of the Atlantic.

↑ Index

58. David Baratier

Re: Oh Henry!

Mon 3 Aug 1998

~The fact is I think American poetry is at a sort of dead end.

I agree with you on this Henry & set the tone aside. It seems there is a lack of poets investing their time in terms of knowledge and willingness to share their understandings with others. Perhaps the absence of investment is why I hear of so many writers who, after they go to university to seek out a mentor, leave writing programs severely disappointed. My favorite poets invest partly to protect the people against fraudulent activity and consequent impoverishment, partly to innocuate the people against cults and all forms of conditioning, and partly to bring the advantages of the poetic enterprise to the people who can most benefit from them.

Similarly, people who contribute to poets and publishing ventures help to prevent things from getting worse on a sociological basis: they make it impossible for things to ever be as biased again.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

59. Christian Roess

Re: Oh Henry!

Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Sun, 2 Aug 98, Henry Gould writes:

> Why should I join the other cheerleaders on this list? Why not question some of their assumptions? The fact is I think American poetry is at a sort of dead end. I know this sounds crabby & unpleasant to all the delightful poets & readers on the list. In the NY Times Bk review today there was another "mainstream" overview of the poetry situation. the author talked about the East European poets, Milosz in particular, & how they provided a counter-example of a less egocentric "confessional" poetry prevalent for so long in the US. Pinsky's book "Situation of Poetry" was cited again for its call for clear speech & narrative poetry. The whole counter-tradition, which this list supports & represents, was again invisible. Why? Oh, because of the evil capitalist market system & the establishment networks blah blah... nobody > wants to consider the notion that this counter-tradition might itself be bankrupt, in part for the very reason I mentioned: the tearing apart of syntax for the sake of innovation; the use of isolated vocabulary as a kind of aesthetic private property (eg. "language poetry" - take it out of the dictionary & it's yours) as opposed to the concept of language as a whole function of "public" communication. I know the intent was to critique another style of appropriation; but appropriation is appropriation & academic enclaves are academic enclaves.

>
> - Henry Gould

I'm not sure that this list is cheerleading over here on the counter-tradition sidelines, while the mainstreamers with their cheerleaders and supporters, are suiting up on the other side. It seems like it is . And maybe most of us 'take sides' from time to time for argument's sake (ie.,Didn't Yeats say he believed poetry is elitist, and he would make no apologies for that?) but what kind of lens are we viewing this whole 'contest' through? I am bothered by these labels and the way certain cultural assumptions are passed on 'osmotically', and the buck stops here, as much as you seem to be, but is this really what is happening?

David Lehmann in the newest edition of BEST AMERICAN POETRY 1999 (Guest Editor: John Hollander) does mention Charles Bernstein and the (quote) "lively" Electronic Poetry Center. So, now what happens? Is this forgotten because no one reads the forward? Or is there someone out there now who wants to learn about poetry, and doesn't let this remark stray to far from his/her concerns?

Is anyone going to read this snippet in the 'Foreward' or are they going to turn to the selection by Hollander with comments by the poets themselves in the contributor's notes? Probably the latter.

Lehman also mentions Peter Gizzi in his forward, but the rest of the volume seems to contain no one on " our side".

Surely some new readers will question the use of the appellation "Best" in regard to the poetry "selected" for it? Isn't this another example of 'cultural selection' to borrow Gary Taylor's use of the word? You know the argument: the so-called combatants of the Culture Wars seem to miss the point "that culture is not what was done but what is remembered." I guess that's what your point is Henry Gould(?). Is this why you say "let's question some of their assumptions."(meaning our 'side' as well ?)Amen to that. Taylor mentions somewhere in his book about how, in the 1950's, a taxi drove off with the only copy of completed typescript of the letters of John Donne, and so we are (still?) missing a complete edition of Donne's letters. Isn't that the fear you are expressing? That something is being deliberately lost and is irretrievable?

Your mentioning of the Pinsky & NY T BK Rv piece suggests that our cultural memory is being deliberately repressed, or for some reason these particular arbiters of our culture believe they have in their possession the missing piece or have now located the only extant 'complete edition' (of something). Or more precisely, they don't worry about the 'missing letters', because they feel that they can already fill in the blanks themselves. Kind of giving us a wink and a nod as if to assure us that our poetry is in good hands.

However, I hope something else is occurring, as it were 'underground'. Something which I just read 15 minutes ago in Taylor's Cultural Selection :

"…this strategy of isolation never works. It is defeated by a linguistic paradox : when a memory is deliberately repressed, one part of the mind tells another: REMEMBER TO FORGET THIS! You can forget only if you keep remembering the order to forget, and if you keep the part of the mind giving the order from the part of the mind receiving the order. Every reiterated act of deliberate disconnection depends upon, indeed creates, another connection. Moreover, the repression will work only if the offending memory is systematically disconnected from the system to which it belongs."

Another illustration of this is a clipping I saved from USA TODAY (April 21,1998), page #8D. At the top of the page in bold black letters is the headline : WHITE HOUSE'S EPIC EVENING WITH POETS LAUREATE with three pictures and stories profiling Robert Haas, Robert Pinsky, and Rita Dove. Below these 3 stories and just above a section of classified ads is an obituary notice for Octavio Paz's passing on April 19 ('titled' "Mexican stateman Octavio Paz was the world's poet). It mentions that Paz was often asked if it mattered that so few read poetry these days. He replied, "Those who do are young people, women and dissidents of all kinds : philosophical, sexual, political. It has become an art on the margins of society. It is the other voice. It lives in the catacombs, but it won't disappear."

So now where is it not to forget?

Chris

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

60. Maria Damon

Re: fwd: new journal; please forward

Mon 3 Aug 1998

---

update on monsoon magazine:

From: "Shikha Malaviya" <[redacted]>
To: <[redacted]>
Subject: Monsoon magazine- a few things!
Date: Fri, 31 Jul 1998 11:55:58 -0500
Importance: Normal

Just a few things...

1) Many of you visited Monsoon's site yesterday. Unfortunately, those without Java-enabled browsers installed in their computers could not access any of the links in Monsoon. The font may also have been altered for those viewing the site with a Macintosh computer or Unix-based ones. We are in the process of fixing these problems and apologize for the inconvenience this may have caused you. In the meantime, you can access the pages directly from the links provided below.

http://www.monsoonmag.com/MonsoonMission.htm

http://www.monsoonmag.com/guidelin.htm

http://www.monsoonmag.com/sample.htm

http://www.monsoonmag.com/contact.htm

http://www.monsoonmag.com/links.htm

2) Please keep in mind this is Monsoon's information site. The first issue of Monsoon will debut sometime in October 1998. However, we will be adding new things almost every week, such as a South Asian writers database, a writers photo gallery, a book review section along with a 'what people are reading right now' list, and yes... a chat area/discussion group! We hope you will check back from time to time and tell us how we are doing!

3)Finally, send us your creative endeavors.... and spread the word!!!

Shikha Malaviya
Publisher/Editor
([redacted])

At 8:36 PM -0400 8/2/98, Irving Weiss wrote:
>--- You wrote:
>'Monsoon,' an on-line journal of South Asian >Culture and Literature, located at:
>

>http://www.monsoonmag.com
>
>--- end of quote ---
>
>but there's no link after home page. No info.
>
>Are you interested in my English translation of Malcolm de Chazal's prose >and poetry, French language, Mauritius?
>
>Irving Weiss
>http://members.tripod.com/~sialbach/

↑ Index

61. David Clippinger
Re: Susan Howe
Mon 3 Aug 1998

I should have also mentioned that Howe discusses this issue in an interview published in _Contemporary Literature_ a few years back.

Best,
David

At 08:49 PM 8/2/98 -0400, you wrote:
> On 02Aug David Clippinger writes:
>
>>I asked Susan Howe about the differences between the original "small press" >>issues and the versions published in _Singularities_, to which she informed >>me that because of spatial constraints dictated by Wesleyan UP, she had to >>edit down/edit out material.
>
>>I would agree that the changes certainly create further difficulties by >>lessoning the number of threads for the reader to follow and consider.
>
>>All best,
>
>>David
>
>
>David,
>
>I find myself taken aback by this bit of information. However, your comments, when juxtaposed next to those by Mark Scroggins and Hugh Steinberg, line up for some very interesting considerations, which I don't know how to voice at this particular time. I'll be re-visiting her poems again soon with this shocking bit of news in hand.

>
>I guess for a poet who, as Peter Quartermain has written, "treads borders, boundaries, dividing lines, edges, invisible meeting points" or as Michael Palmer has written , "addresses questions of disappearance and recovery, identity and absence. . .by means of a radical reevaluation of ...the nature of the text in relation to time" she has allowed her own work to disperse into these same 'meeting places', and I'm not sure what encounter is possible there. . and ... well, I could make some other arguments at this point but they would be only "subtle" rather than convincing.
>
>Thanks for this information, all. I hope to hear more.
>
>Chris
>
>
>
>
>_____
>Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1
>
>
David Clippinger
Assistant Professor of English
Penn State University
100 University Drive
Monaca, PA 15061-2799
[redacted] (phone)
[redacted] (fax)

+ + + + + + + + + + + + + +

In a world where nothing is known or can be known beyond the known-to-be unspeakable,
only metaphor speaks literally
and literal speech, itself, is metaphor.

William Bronk, "Speech Making"

+ + + + + + + + + + + + + +

↑ Index

62. henry
Re: Oh Henry!
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Lee Christian sends a thoughtful response to my grouchy generalizations. The broad-brush bashing is stupid & unfair on my part. The only reason I'm on this list is that it seems alive, it seems like that catacomb thing you quote Octavio Paz about that the NY Times Bk Rv crowd does miss. The dynamics are interesting. Pinsky, Heaney, et al. look to the eastern europeans (two of whom sadly died in the last week - M. Holub and the famous Polish poet whose name I can't come up with at the moment...) as a way out of the narcissism & pettiness of US poetry; from their position on the heights that's all there is. Meanwhile in the catacombs of the "counter-tradition" a set of stylistic paradigms are in place that set the poet firmly at one or two removes from "prosaic communication". The Yeats/Pound thing is not an attempt to narrow the range; just a means of once again raising the possibility that "innovative" poetry & experiment might be organized on a whole different set of paradigms. I'm not saying that's not already happening; what do I know? - Henry G.

↑ Index

63. Mark Prejsnar
Re: My Definition of Academic
Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Matt Kirschenbaum wrote:

> The current insider/outsider discussion re the academy recalls the "poets vs. critics" thread (and yes, if memory serves, that was one of the actual subject lines) played out on Poetics a year or two ago. Perhaps the cyclical resurrection of the topic is invetiable given the proximity (or, if you excuse the academically fashionable pluralization, the multiple proximities) this list and many of its constituents bear towards academic institutions. But still, the appearance of this topic always depresses me for its unavoidable ressonance with broader strains of public anti-intellectualism: the conservative attack on the professoriate, media attacks on the "ivory tower" (what is the origin of that epithet, anyway?).

This is very interesting Matt.....Especially since many folks perceive the academics as the ones who tend to take a hard-nosed anti-intellectual stance. Now i strongly agree that a pretty shallow anti-intellectualism is a prominent feature of U.S. life and cul'chah..

But, contrary to your equation of folks outside the ivory pinnicle, with Anti-I:

Who strike you as more anti-I, more opposed to new perspectives and challenging poetics, Jackson Mac Low or Helen Vendler?

In large part, in the "wars" (as someone has just called 'em) that have raged since 1975 around experimental poetries, it is mostly the academics who've championed neo-babbitism, the non-academics who've been focused on the real issues...

↑ Index

64. R I Caddel

angling others / different tracks through the woods / longish rant

Mon 3 Aug 1998

Simon wrote:

> Since when did we get the idea that professors in the academy should be responsible for keeping up with the Protean world of contemporary poetry?

Interesting point, Simon: since when did we say that surgeons should be - er - boned up on the latest re the operations they perform? Vendler comes to UK and pronounces on a dearth of decent UK poets since WWII, but let's not press her to show any knowledge of the field, since she's a Great Person anyway. Edna Longley pronounces the alternatives in Irish poetry "confused", and again, she's an Expert on (selected) Irish Poetry, she ought to know, let's not question. Also, it's true that many Learned Profs and Literary Pundits in the UK would concur with both these views so, hey, let's go with the flow on this one, no point in paying for expertise and not accepting it, even if the expertise is inadequate for the subject matter upon which it pronounces.

I'm assuming a level of irony in your original post, and lumbering along in a similar vein. But seriously, folks - assumptions of the unimpeachability of academic niche have contributed significantly to the sustained critical invisibility of a wide range of poetries in my part of the world (and for all I know many others) and to deny linkage between the voices of academic criticism and the supression mechanics of mainstream literary publishing is simply naive. If only Vendler and Longley (to whose bait I'm rising as Keith knew I would...) and the other canon-builders would recognise Simon's succinctly-put truth that there are "thousands of different tracks through the woods" they'd be less likely to come out with ill-informed opinions which Keith Tuma relays to us, and perhaps even, more - dare we say it - open to the possibilities which are before them.

The careers of the major non-mainstream poets of UK and Ireland are marked by public ignorance and neglect. The story of Bunting's years of obscurity in his own country now needs no further telling, other than to remind folk of our long trackrecord of such neglect. Along with him come Jonathan Griffin (his poems published in the States at his death, at a time when he was practically unknown here) Brian Coffey and other "Elder Statesmen" honoured more by omission than attention. Collected Poems of poets such as Gael Turnbull and Roy Fisher have been dropped by their publishers. Paladin, an imprint which briefly pushed innovative brits into mass circulation, was taken over by Murdoch's News International, resulting in the dumping of Harwood, Raworth, and substantial selections of Allen Fisher, Bill Griffiths, Thomas A. Clark and Others. And behind them (in the sense of not having even that moment of accessibility) generations of writers as varied as Colin Simms, Ulli Freer, Geraldine Monk - all writers with honourable careers in "fugitive editions", who've existed by word-of-mouth (significant phrase for what is often a strongly oral tradition), by personal contact, and by smallscale activity. Mainstream publication and notice in the UK were and are simply closed to them, and to follow their work - from the UK or the US - takes a degree of conscious effort. (The teachers who would be interested in teaching them hadn't got texts which were readily available, and there weren't texts available because teachers weren't teaching it...)

I'm tired of having these decades of inventive and responsible work ignored or swept under the carpet with one-liners from those who can't be bothered. That's not responsible academic or critical practice, and it's simply not good enough to allow it as a kind of license on the strength of somebody's work in another part of the field. Certainly the UK and Irish writers who Tuma mentions - and many more besides (the 55 featured in the forthcoming Wesleyan anthology ed. Quartermain and Caddel are not the end of the story, though they're certainly a start) - well, they deserve better.

To paint the picture thus bleakly is, of course, to overlook the crucial critical exceptions - such as Jim Mays for his support of "younger" Irish poets (they're not so young anymore, but they're still "confused" according to Ms. Longley), Edwin Morgan in Glasgow, and the late Eric Mottram practically everywhere; and the stream of US academics from John Matthias to Tuma, Romana Huk and others - thanks to y'all, lights in the dark. For many of the British and Irish poets I'm talking about, the possibility of open readers in the US has been a lifesaver over the years, a feeling that we weren't alone and weren't as eccentric as our posh neighbours proclaimed us. Thanks to anyone who'll help bring the range of "britpo" into the daylight and make it less possible for the Vendlers and Longleys and the critical squirearchy of the UK to make their sweeping and inaccurate statements from on high. Phew. Hrumph. Thankyou.

Richard Caddel
Durham University Library, Stockton Rd., Durham DH1 3LY, UK
E-mail: [redacted]

Phone: [redacted] Fax: [redacted]
WWW: http://www.dur.ac.uk/~dul0ric

"Words! Pens are too light. Take a chisel to write."
- Basil Bunting

↑ Index

65. Robert Archambeau
Re: Oh Henry
Mon 3 Aug 1998

What interests me most about this discussion, which I'm joining awfully late, are Henry's primary charge (that the counter-tradition may be bankrupt) and his secondary charge (that the counter-tradition is left out of the most prominent debates about poetry because of a willful obscurity). These are important issues, presented as real challenges, and if this makes Henry a bull then we need more bulls, no matter whether we agree or disagree.

With regard to the secondary charge:

Peter Barry had a lot to say about this in the English context at the London conference being discussed in the Anglo-American thread. He made the US out to be a greener pasture, but I think his comments apply here, too (others have discussed this better than I could on the thread I've mentioned).

With regard to the primary charge:

It seems to me that traditions of poetry _can_ decline into mannerism, and that one way this can occur is through value being judged predominantly on the employment of one particular poetic element. For example, when we fetishize a particular subject matter (personal trauma, say, or ethnicity) and judge poetry primarily on the basis of that subject matter, we risk mannerism -- think of the fate of confessional poetry.

We also run this risk when we fetishize a particular formal quality, and judge poetry primarily on the basis of the use of one particular trope or formal element. The decline of formalism from Frost to _Rebel Angels_ seems to me to come from the fetishizing of full rhyme without enjambment, for example. But the decline of formalism into mannerism isn't a matter of controversy on this list -- as the charge that the syntactic disjunction of language poetry has become mere mannerism is.

What about that charge? Are we left with "inchoate jumbles of broken syntax" littering the journals, as Henry claims? The question is worth following up, so kudos to Henry for raising it. (And kudos to Kent for giving some perspective by reminding us that there are more bad poems that work through coherent synatax and image than there are bad poems that work through disjunction).

I thin it is demonstrable that that there is still important poetry being written in the syntactically disjunctive mode (just now I've been reading some by Catherine Walsh, but there are American examples too). But my sense is also that there is a hell of a lot of mannerist late langpo that disjoins for the sake of disjoining and that doesn't give us anything new or powerful. And I think that the most exciting energies in poetry in the US and elsewhere are to be found neither in the (for lack of a better shorthand term) mainstream nor in the language poetry tradition (see Archambeau duck behind the nearest tree, the peep out sheepishly to see if the lead is flying).

Who or what am I talking about? I hope some of this will be apparent when the first issue of _Samizdat_, a journal I'm editing, comes out at the end of the month. If you're interested, I can wrangle a few free copies -- backchannel with your street address. Of course, you're also free to subscribe ($10/year -- three tabloid-format issues).

Bob Archambeau,
still hiding behind the tree, hoping the schrapnel doesn't hit

↑ Index

66. Mark Prejsnar
Re: My Definition of Academic
Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Sat, 1 Aug 1998, ShaunAnne Tangney Humanities wrote:

> i make less than anyone else i know in academia: point here: just being in doesn't mean you get paid well. plus w/ all those student loans having come due, i live hand to mouth--at a similar if not lower level as i did as a grad student.
>
> I'm tired of the stress always looking for the next little job.
>
> at my university everyone (even tenured faculty) is issued a one-year contract. we are, in effect, glorified adjuncts. point here: being in doesn't necessarily mean you don't always work with the nagging worry at the back of yr mind that next year you may be looking for a job again.

Yup....As i hope everyone knows by now, the situation of academics has been stomped on so hard, and without sufficient resistence, that they are truly reaching a level of proletarianization....It ain't a figure of speech. (I hasten to add that the lack of sufficient resistence reflects the state of class struggle overall, and isn't the fault especially of folks in academe alone. You might blame developments in the steel and auto industries, in fact, for selling down the river the chance at a strong working class decades ago..Without a true labor movement in society as a whole any one sector is vulnerable)

A related point: there are disturbing hints in a number of recent posts that people are moving the discussion of "academics" into an essentialist model: as if the issue were that there's something wrong with being an academic. The only useful issue here is an empirical-sociological one. Is the site of innovative poetries still outside academe, as it once was (during the NAP '50s and the Lang 70s, as so well pointed out by Linda) or is it mostly inside (as avowed by Bob G's notorious coinage "acadominent") or what?

I think the answer is, "or what." That is, the situation is fairly tangled.

Mark P.

↑ Index

67. Robert Archambeau
NYRB
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Michael Franco wrote:

> re Pinsky... he writes what he writes -his view- which I do not necessarily share
> . . . but having worked with him a bit editing poetry submissions... there are few people that I know that are as clean in their approach to each poem as he is> He always took the submission on its terms -not his- & in ways that far exceeded those of the other panel members -myself included- who all had an agenda of what poetry they thought most vital for the mag.

There is that. Whatever else is to be said about Pinsky, I'm sure he's the only US laureate ever to have written a sympathetic essay on George Oppen.

(reprinted in Poetry and the World, if you're interested).

Bob

↑ Index

68. Matt Kirschenbaum
Re: My Definition of Academic
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Mark Prejsnar:

> On Fri, 31 Jul 1998, Matt Kirschenbaum wrote:
>
> The current insider/outsider discussion re the academy recalls the "poets vs. critics" thread (and yes, if memory serves, that was one of the actual subject lines) played out on Poetics a year or two ago. Perhaps the cyclical resurrection of the topic is invetiable given the proximity (or, if you excuse the academically fashionable pluralization, the multiple proximities) this list and many of its constituents bear towards academic institutions. But still, the appearance of this topic always depresses me for its unavoidable ressonance with broader strains of public anti-intellectualism: the conservative attack on the professoriate, media attacks on the "ivory tower" (what is the origin of that epithet, anyway?).
>
> *This is very interesting Matt.....Especially since many folks perceive the academics as the ones who tend to take a hard-nosed anti-intellectual stance. Now i strongly agree that a pretty shallow anti-intellectualism is a prominent feature of U.S. life and cul'chah..*
>
> But, contrary to your equation of folks outside the ivory pinnicle, with Anti-I:

Mark, all of this strikes me as a pretty heavy-handed reading of my original post, which makes no such equation, certainly not by way of the "folk" (a word you use twice and which I didn't use at all).

> Who strike you as more anti-I, more opposed to new perspectives and challenging poetics, Jackson Mac Low or Helen Vendler?
>
> In large part, in the "wars" (as someone has just called 'em) that have raged since 1975 around experimental poetries, it is mostly the academics who've championed neo-babbitism, the non-academics who've been focused on the real issues...

I suppose, but that was hardly the context for what I wrote about public perceptions of the academy today, and the material consequences of those perceptions at the level of funding for public universities. Matt

↑ Index

69. Don Byrd

Re: My Definition of Academic

Mon 3 Aug 1998

At 03:26 AM 8/2/1998 -0700, Charles Alexander wrote:

> Wisc. poet Ron Wallace. When arguing with this poet about these very experimental/academic issues, his take on it at the time was that these wars had been fought quite a few years before, and the "experimentalists"

> had lost, so why are we talking about these things any more?
>
> Yes, talk about a failure to communicate . . .
>
> but seriously -- any particular reason why 1975 sticks out to you as the beginning of these raging wars?

And, when I left graduate school in 1971 with my dissertation on Charles Olson in hand, I believed that these issue had been fought out during the previous decade, since the publication of the Allen anthology, and that the experimentalists had decisively _won_.

And we had won, intellectually. At least one of the problems with this victory was that the "institutions" remained firmly in the hands of the traditionalists. The Creative Writing Programs were almost exclusively in the hands of Iowa Writer's Workshop types (who had 25 years of tenure left), as were the well-funded, university-sponsored magazines, the university press poetry editorships, the prize-conferring committees, and the granting institutions. For a few years, when David Wilke was the head of the NEA lit division, it looked like that at least part of that might change, but, alas! Reagan,etc. (Even corporate sponsorship is likely less treacherous than government sponsorship...).

Don

↑ Index

70. Mark Weiss

Re: My Definition of Academic

Mon 3 Aug 1998

Of course the war in question goes back to the end of WW 2, with a major public battle fought over Howl when it first went public and again when it was published.

At 03:26 AM 8/2/98 -0700, you wrote:
>>In large part, in the "wars" (as someone has just called 'em) that have >>raged since 1975 around experimental poetries, it is mostly the academics >>who've championed neo-babbitism, the non-academics who've been focused on >>the real issues...
>
>just a note -- I'm interested in your dating these wars as "since 1975," >particularly as I remember a poet grad student at U-Wisconsin, but from >Texas, in the early '80's, who at the time it seemed was being groomed by >Wisc. poet Ron Wallace. When arguing with this poet about these very >experimental/academic issues, his take on it at the time was that these >wars had been fought quite a few years before, and the "experimentalists" >had lost, so why are we talking about these things any more?

>
>Yes, talk about a failure to communicate . . .
>
>but seriously -- any particular reason why 1975 sticks out to you as the >beginning of these raging wars?
>
>charles
>
>
>charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
>chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
>books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
>http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com
>
>

↑ Index

71. Robert Archambeau

Re: My Definition of Academic

Mon 3 Aug 1998

> Bob Perelman, Bud Lite Professor of English, University of Pennsylvania
>
> Barrett Watten, General Motors Professor of American Studies, Wayne State U
>
> Charles "Gordita" Bernstein, Taco Bell Chair of Poetry and Poetics, SUNY-Buffalo
>
> "Poetry, by Ralph Lauren" reading series at the Hear Inn.
>
> The 1998 Nike "Girls in the Game" tour (featuring Howe, Retallack, Scalapino and others reading simultaneously on three stages!)

David --

Let's not forget Marjorie Perloff reading her London paper in that stock-car-racing jumpsuit covered in STP and Mobil Oil patches.

We lesser mortals are, of course, stuck with local sponsors -- I teach in a little-league style uniform that says "Hoagie Hut" across the back.

Bob

↑ Index

72. Michael Franco
Re: - Henry Gould
Mon 3 Aug 1998

In a message dated 98-08-03 00:04:01 EDT, you write:

<< In the NY Times Bk review today there . . .The whole counter-tradition, which this list supports & represents, was again invisible.

Henry it strikes me that so long as your looking to the NYT BK Review for authentication you are going to feel that poetry is at a dead end. . .

re Pinsky... he writes what he writes -his view- which I do not necessarily share . . . but having worked with him a bit editing poetry submissions... there are few people that I know that are as clean in their approach to each poem as he is> He always took the submission on its terms -not his- & in ways that far exceeded those of the other panel members -myself included- who all had an agenda of what poetry they thought most vital for the mag.

Kent is quite right in his brief assessment & i would add that if you address yourself to fools & people out there scrambling to make money [cf TNYTBR] (as opposed to addressing those trying to release something in/from Language ... (a continual search... & a real tradition -not a trend-) you will have to suffer the discourse that they are willing to have ie what # are the best seller list are you???

all best
Michael Franco

↑ Index

73. henry
Re: - Henry Gould
Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 11:42:57 EDT Michael Franco said:
>
>Henry it strikes me that so long as your looking to the NYT BK Review for >authentication you are going to feel that poetry is at a dead end. . .
>
>re Pinsky... he writes what he writes -his view- which I do not necessarily >share
>. . . but having worked with him a bit editing poetry submissions... there are >few people that I know that are as clean in their approach to each poem as he >is> He always took the submission on its terms -not his- & in ways that far >exceeded those of the other panel members -myself included- who all had an >agenda of what poetry they thought most vital for the mag.

>
>Kent is quite right in his brief assessment & i would add that if you address >yourself to fools & people out there scrambling to make money [cf TNYTBR] (as >opposed to addressing those trying to release something in/from Language ...
>(a continual search... & a real tradition -not a trend-) you will have to >suffer the discourse that they are willing to have ie what # are the best >seller list are you???

I wasn't quoting Pinsky to criticize him, rather to suggest that some of the ideas in "Situation of Poetry" still make sense. There are a lot of ways to deal with the myopia of mainstream press about poetry. Most of them have been tried here on the list - jeremiads, dismissals, conspiracy theories, histories of the culture wars... In the criticism of my posts lately I haven't heard anybody try to refute specifically what I've been trying to say: that "marginalized" counter-traditions are responsible to some degree for their invisibility, because the disjunctive traditions they espouse are difficulty- and obscurity-generators. I'm not saying this is bad, either. I'm not saying poetry has to be the fountainhead of public oratory. I'm only saying, Yeats had a different tradition which is not necessarily reactionary and is not necessarily dead. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

74. J. Pecqueur computer generated text (fwd)
Mon 3 Aug 1998

I remember this thread spinning out recently as I was struggling with Mina Loy's idea of a monopattern--Is it patterned or is it solid? Could anyone with a more tightly wound knowledge backchannel me some site info I could pass along to a fellow worker.

Garcias

Jean-Paul

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Sun, 02 Aug 1998 20:23:05 PDT
From: Jason Whitmarsh <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: computer generated text

JP:

You know of any website where I can get the Travesty (or equivalent) program for f...ing with, computer-wise, my writing? I looked through EPC and couldn't find much.

J.

↑ Index

75. Peter Balestrieri

More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split

Mon 3 Aug 1998

On August 1st, Henry Gould wrote: Why should I join the other cheer-leaders on this list? Why not question some of their assumptions? The fact is I think American poetry is at a sort of dead end. I know this sounds crabby & unpleasant to all the delightful poets & readers on the list. In the NY Times Bk review today there was another "mainstream" overview of the poetry situation. the author talked about the East European poets, Milosz in particular, & how they provided a counter- example of a less egocentric "confessional" poetry prevalent for so long in the US. Pinsky's book "Situation of Poetry" was cited again for its call for clear speech & narrative poetry. The whole counter-tradition, which this list supports & represents, was again invisible. Why? Oh, because of the evil capitalist market system & the establishment networks blah blah... nobody wants to consider the notion that this counter-tradition might itself be bankrupt, in part for the very reason I mentioned: the tearing apart of syntax for the sake of innovation; the use of isolated vocabulary as a kind of aesthetic private property (eg. "language poetry" - take it out of the dictionary & it's yours) as opposed to the concept of language as a whole function of "public" communication. I know the intent was to critique another style of appropriation; but appropriation is appropriation & academic enclaves are academic enclaves. - Henry Gould Henry, I'm trying to follow your argument and I'm wondering if you'd be willing to clarify what you mean by "...the intent was to critique another style of appropriation..." Who was doing the critiquing and what style of appropriation are you referring to? I think you've raised something important here and I want to be able to better understand what you're saying. Did you mean that Langpo was critiquing capitalist "appropriation" but only replaced it with another form of appropriation, aesthetic rather than economic? Or am I way off?

Peter

↑ Index

76. henry
Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 10:03:15 -0700 Peter Balestrieri said:
>
> Henry, I'm trying to follow your argument and I'm wondering if you'd > be willing to clarify what you mean by "...the intent was to critique > another style of appropriation..." Who was doing the critiquing and > what style of appropriation are you referring to? I think you've > raised something important here and I want to be able to better > understand what you're saying. Did you mean that Langpo was critiquing > capitalist "appropriation" but only replaced it with another form of > appropriation, aesthetic rather than economic? Or am I way off?

I think Langpo - hit me, real langpoets out there - was trying to write against the appropriation of poetry by 70s MFA "self" factories, and against the appropriation of literary space by "privacy capital" of all kinds. Their strategy was a drastic one: basically to dynamite the rhetorical/communicative function, the authorial function, and so on by letting "language" - individual words, non-sequiturs, broken syntax & rhetoric - speak (often comically) for itself. I'm suggesting this was a kind of unwitting creation of a new kind of private property - sort of prospecting the dictionary. - Henry G.

↑ Index

77. Mark Prejsnar
Re: My Definition of 1975
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Er, well, Charles, no as a matter of fact....no "particular" reason.

But the early gathering of the Lang clusters, would have been over the previous 4 or 5 years. ("This" began in 1971, right?) By 1975, the infamous "L" designation (which has outlived its usefulness, and now resides in the hands of curmudgeonly retro-ists like our Henry) had not yet arisen; but it was fairly clear that various strains were around that did not fit into the old mutiple New American paradigm of rebel poetries (Black Mt., beat, NY, etc.)...Through the agency of This and other venues, newer things had been appearing in print for long enuff to start a sense of unfamiliar idioms emerging..

Maybe i was thinking of the fact that 1975 was the date of Watten's wonderful book, Opera-Works, one of the first things i saw in that vein.

..Mark

On Sun, 2 Aug 1998, Charles Alexander wrote:

> In large part, in the "wars" (as someone has just called 'em) that have raged since 1975 around experimental poetries, it is mostly the academics who've championed neo-babbitism, the non-academics who've been focused on the real issues...
>
> just a note -- I'm interested in your dating these wars as "since 1975," particularly as I remember a poet grad student at U-Wisconsin, but from Texas, in the early '80's, who at the time it seemed was being groomed by Wisc. poet Ron Wallace. When arguing with this poet about these very experimental/academic issues, his take on it at the time was that these wars had been fought quite a few years before, and the "experimentalists" had lost, so why are we talking about these things any more?
>
> Yes, talk about a failure to communicate . . .
>
> but seriously -- any particular reason why 1975 sticks out to you as the beginning of these raging wars?
>
> charles
>
> charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
> chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
> books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
> http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

78. Linda Russo

Re: My Definition of Academic

Mon 3 Aug 1998

I'm really enjoying the epic that's opening up before me here, another angle (personal testimony) of the struggles apparent in the mimeo revolution publications and its aftermath.

I'm bemused, though, by the "war" analogy (as I was by the "anthology wars"). Certainly in constructing new structures poets, editors & academix wage "ideological wars" in their own minds & in their own "camps." But is it really an appropriate analogy?

In the case of censorship, where, for example, the editors of the Chicago Review probably "battled" with the administration before quitting & starting Big Table - a sort of second-wave mimeo revolution, and certainly a "turning" as the term suggests, the analogy seems appropriate.

Are there other particular (cross-camp) cites/battles to support a more general application? When one asserts a position or "claims a territory" that is yet unclaimed (being a sort of virtual territory -- publishing a little mag doesn't necessarily take territory "away" from other such publications) and there is no "battle," why is it a "war"?

thx. Linda Russo

↑ Index

79. Charles Alexander

Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split

Mon 3 Aug 1998

> I think Langpo - hit me, real langpoets out there - was trying to write against the appropriation of poetry by 70s MFA "self" factories, and against the appropriation of literary space by "privacy capital" of all kinds. Their strategy was a drastic one: basically to dynamite the rhetorical/communicative function, the authorial function, and so on by letting "language" - individual words, non-sequiturs, broken syntax & rhetoric - speak (often comically) for itself. I'm suggesting this was a kind of unwitting creation of a new kind of private property - sort of prospecting the dictionary. - Henry G.

Except that this appropriation was enacted with a sense of language as noone's property, and, in fact, in direct dispute with the presentation by a more narrative poetics of private experience as primary content for poetry, and a spelling out, for example in Rae Armantrout's wonderful review of the Morrow Anthology in Poetics Journal, that there are consistent themes/formulas (and some rather dangerous ones at that) in those supposedly individual experiential voice-poems which made up that anthology and more. So that (leap with me here) the lang experiments were a kind of freedom from ownership, freedom from language (more or less restricted in many ways) as capital in poetry. Freeing "language itself" from "language as mine (the poet's and a certain invited-to-overhear audience)."

Whether this was successful or not is a big issue -- but did it create what you call, Henry, "a new kind of private property?" It does seem to have created a broad range of strategies for poetry which can now be used, and maybe can only be used, without the kind of "dynamiting" function of which you speak. And, if robbed of that, then also robbed of a good deal of the political import. Still, though, the gap between subject and what is enunciated, is a real gap which still engenders real exploration. The work is not only political, but psychological, cultural -- and to my mind, is still allowing new and engaging explorations.

I don't give credit to their "difficulty" as the agent which separates such poems from a wider audience. That seems too easy to me, and goes against things I've learned in teaching, where much more so-called 'conventional' poems are seen as equally difficult by a good many students. There are a lot of things working in our culture against anyone reading any poetry at all, whether it be W.B. Yeats or Bruce Andrews. What brings more to the former than to the latter has a lot to do with how we are taught to read poetry, and what poetry we are encouraged to read by teachers, publishing industry, bookstores, etc. By the age of 7 or 8, according to my direct experience teaching workshops in elementary schools, half or more of the students already think poems are supposed to rhyme. Perhaps such ideas are formed much earlier, from nursery rhymes and early children's books. So, are any of us ready to revamp the entire human curriculum (not just inside the classroom) from birth? -- we may be ready and know it's necessary -- but how to do it???

I also think it's wrong, though, to see langpo as "the" alternative here. I think it is one part of a broad range of innovative practices, which to me still includes ideas from the various poetics included in the Allen Anthology (Black Mtn, Beat, NY School, Deep Image, and more), from specifically feminist poetics, from sound poetry, visual poetry, and much more -- and by no means is all of this work "difficult" in ways which should keep anybody away.

I rather like prospecting the dictionary.

charles

charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted] chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

80. Henry
Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Charles's post makes a lot of sense throughout. Still, I would ask how you differentiate a poetry that makes stereotyped lyric moments part of the private property of the self, and a poetry that prospects out its own private range, complete with anthologies, exegetes & explainers. Nor am I restricting this question to "language poetry" - I'm talking about the anthologized "postmodern moment". I'm suggesting its difficulty is one of its attributes or properties which provides it with academic exchange value. For a long time on this list I have been promoting another kind of difficulty - as something layered within a synthetic, communicable "prose" speech that can rise to poetry. - HG

↑ Index

81. KENT JOHNSON
Re: Oh Henry
Mon 3 Aug 1998

On 2 August, Henry Gould wrote:

> nobody wants to consider the notion that this counter-tradition might itself be bankrupt, in part for the very reason I mentioned: the tearing apart of syntax for the sake of innovation; the use of isolated vocabulary as a kind of aesthetic private property (eg. "language poetry"- take it out of the dictionary & it's yours) as opposed to the concept of language as a whole function of "public" communication.

I'm curious, why so few responses? Henry's comment above is very provocative. And it comes from a fellow who really does read and is clearly no lightweight in the head. Here we are getting at what the World War of Poetry is all about, no?

Bernstein, Silliman, Perloff, Rothenberg and Joris (so much for your anthology, according to Henry, apparently), Bromige, Quartermain, etc. (and also everyone involved in the Alternativve Poetries Conference in Boston and young turks of the New (American) Poetry anthology): There is a pillbox to take! How many more comrades will die, shredded on the beach, before you respond? Are you really just a crew of aphasic, Scrabble-playing ninnies as Henry seems to claim?

(And Henry, sincerely curious, what _do_ you think of the Poems for the Millennium anthology? Most of that just grabbing from the dictionary too? If there is work there you think is worthy, what is it?)

Kent

↑ Index

82. Mark DuCharme
another Listee succumbs
Mon 3 Aug 1998

from Carmilla 2000

CHAPTER II

Prosecuting which to lose
An hour is possibly Return
Three months is whispered

Distant daughter, considerable pend
Her journey. The horses were tractable
The lady threw affectionate quite as one might beckoned

I was filed. Stern Countenance
A little benediction spinning

Then hastily kissing her liveries Cracked
Whips, the horses Plunged & Broke suddenly
Following, at the same rapid horsemen
Cortège our eyes were hoofs this very air Illusion moment— but the young

Raised her tenderly Ask
This carriage hurt
Converse
With possibly overpower I thought
My father in the meantime sent

Drawing room longation
Large Utrecht velvet leanings
He insisted with our coffee Hardly store

Set teeth to fury!
Ill-
Looking band of men
I beheld in life my clever rogues
I am very curious

Passed velvet interview

It was pretty even

Dimpling cheeks were now delightfully Vein-- which hospitality spoke & Took her as I spoke

She answered my welcome with her vision
"I must tell you my vision":

*In the land before Assaulted & defrayed the firebrands

These villagers weren't used to sing Quiescently. Swallowing her voice
& All manner of companions*

Her Habits-- A Saunter
W/ something of gold. I loved to let it Back in her chair

By comparison, the archduke was plum;
To foil & braid it

One girl a syllable can endure
Any mortal breathing--

((. = strikethrough, _._ = italics))

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

83. Susan Wheeler
Re: Oh Henry!
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Trying to read through today's posts while sitting on my hands knowing what else I should be doing, but no go. Just a SMALL response --

Henry wrote >to narrow the range; just a means of once again raising the possibility >that "innovative" poetry & experiment might be organized on a whole >different set of paradigms.

Does anyone on this list, in their heart of hearts, not WANT this if it indeed means paradigms that are not arbitrarily territorial? And if I believe with Charles Alexander that the learning begins with the young'ins do we really expect their weary public school reading teachers to look for clues and fodder in Poetics Journal before they try the NYT Book Review (why NOT know what's on that ticker, appalling as it be, as well as on other tickers)? Why NOT expect "literary literacy" to include Bayley -- off-base though he be on poetry, not his forte and ill-chosen clearly by NYRB -- along with Pound -- god love 'im off-base on a people?

My own work may play as more "conservative" than much on this list (yes one of my poems was a Hollander selectee) but I'll freely admit I have not the courage of some of you in accepting the colors and wielding the weapons. To me, this territory war seems to me like the tiniest subset of larger cultural and economic dynamics, and I choose cowardice and selfishness in pretending that I can ignore categories in order to write with a greater sense of freedom, even if it be self-illusory -- instead of using up this energy in sandbagging the brittle dams the waves are toppling anyway. Or so I think when I feel called to justify.

Got to clam up or I'll never finish this book (prose). Sorry to not engage further.

Susan Wheeler
[redacted] voice/fax [redacted]

↑ Index

84. Robert Corbett
Re: - Henry Gould
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Yeats is inappropriate in some ways as pole star for a "synthetic" tradition of poetry, because of his long engagement with Blake and the fact that an elaborate, "archetypal" system underlies all his seemingly lucid lyricism. One of the most important Yeats' critics, Hazard Adams, claims that all of his work is of a piece, and poems inevitably take on different meanings when referred back to his system. Yeats' strategies were not "disjunctive" as such, and he created a system that aspired to totalization, but nevertheless, there is an esoteric, some would say, obscurantist, aspect to his work that makes it resonate much with Ron Silliman's work as it does with Robert Hass's.

In terms of a modest, synthetic style, the precursor I would put here is Auden. And of course Auden estranged his vocabulary with the use of jargon words as well occasionally awkward musics.

Finally, Yeats rediscovered Blake for the 20th century, whom Eliot claimed wrote outside of tradition in his own esoteric vocabulary. Vendler might say the same thing. Of course, Blake is the perhaps the most "webbed" romantic poet there. History has made nonsense of Eliot's criticism, and given comfort to many unregarded poet--perhaps too much. This is not to say that mystical Yeats is the only Yeats or even that one has to read a Vision in order to understand Yeats' great political poems (let me add that it is offensive to me to stereotype Yeats as a fascist pure and simple when his politics are much more complex). It does suggest that there usually more than two sides to great poets. It also suggests a more complex "situating" of elite and popular poetries, along the lines of the rationale for parables in christian discourse: those in the know will understand the kernel of meaning around which the germ (often the rather obvious moral) is wrapped.

As far as modest, narrative, historical poetry, I can suggest two candidates, one facetiously and one not. Michael Lind (a student of Frederick Turner, though not really a "professional poet") has written a narrative poem about the fall of the Alamo, which by many accounts sinks under the bathos of sentiment and the banality of verse. Out here in Seattle, we have an interesting poet, Jana Harris, who has written a long poem (really a series of poems) about the settling of the Northwest. Of course, Lind, because of his New Republic and political connections (his a neo-con who has turned against neo-cons), has gotten a lot more publicity.

I wonder where would bp nichol fall in this (perhaps by now discarded) distinction? perhaps as a run-up to the coming conference we could start a nicholian thread?

unravellingly yours
Robert

On Mon, 3 Aug 1998, henry wrote:

> On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 11:42:57 EDT Michael Franco said:
>
> Henry it strikes me that so long as your looking to the NYT BK Review for authentication you are going to feel that poetry is at a dead end. . .
>
> re Pinsky... he writes what he writes -his view- which I do not necessarily share
> . . . but having worked with him a bit editing poetry submissions... there are few people that I know that are as clean in their approach to each poem as he is> He always took the submission on its terms -not his- & in ways that far exceeded those of the other panel members -myself included- who all had an agenda of what poetry they thought most vital for the mag.
>
> Kent is quite right in his brief assessment & i would add that if you address yourself to fools & people out there scrambling to make money [cf TNYTBR] (as opposed to addressing those trying to release something in/from Language ... (a continual search... & a real tradition -not a trend-) you will have to suffer the discourse that they are willing to have ie what # are the best seller list are you???
>
> I wasn't quoting Pinsky to criticize him, rather to suggest that some of the ideas in "Situation of Poetry" still make sense.
> There are a lot of ways to deal with the myopia of mainstream press about poetry. Most of them have been tried here on the list - jeremiads, dismissals, conspiracy theories, histories of the culture wars...
> In the criticism of my posts lately I haven't heard anybody try to refute specifically what I've been trying to say: that "marginalized" counter-traditions are responsible to some degree for their invisibility, because the disjunctive traditions they espouse are difficulty- and > obscurity-generators. I'm not saying this is bad, either. I'm not saying poetry has to be the fountainhead of public oratory. I'm only saying, Yeats had a different tradition which is not necessarily reactionary and is not necessarily dead. - Henry Gould

Robert Corbett "you are there beyond/ tracings flesh can [redacted] take,/ and farther away surrounding and University of Washington informing the systems" - A.R. Ammons

↑ Index

85. Charles Alexander

Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split

Mon 3 Aug 1998

Henry, I would certainly grant you the point that "difficulty" gives a lot of poetry, postmodern and otherwise, and a lot of music and art and science and mathematics, a certain "academic exchange value." I think a lot of people in the academy who study poetry want a challenge. I want a challenge, too, as a reader. But you speak of this difficulty as though it is something consciously just layered on, as if poets are saying, "oh we'd better make these works difficult," rather than respecting their various projects as inherently involving and leading them into ideas and intermeshings of language with ideas, that are themselves quite difficult at times -- although not, I think, all the time. Whereas you seem to be espousing a "kind of difficulty" which is entirely involved with the content of what is said, and not the form, if what you want is really this "communicable prose" speech that you put forward. There is such work I admire, but I certainly don't think it any more worthy than work whose intellectual/emotional difficulty crawls right into the craggy juxtaposition of phonemes and morphemes, the gaps between one enunciation and another.

As for "rising" to poetry, though -- I have trouble with that metaphor, as I don't necessarily see poetry as occupying a higher ground than prose, or scientific writing, or mathematics, or any other such endeavor.

And I guess I do differentiate "stereotyped lyric moment" poetry from what you term as "poetry that prospects out its" language, content, and form. You seem to want to link the two on the shared plateau of privacy. Yet in the one, you admit that privacy is a matter of the idea of self and its transcendence (perhaps) through those lyric moments, whereas in the other you argue that the privacy comes from what you see as "difficulty." I think, even for those who might agree with you that both achieve a kind of privacy (and I don't think I'm one of those), it would be evident that they are entirely different kinds of privacy won in entirely different ways. And I certainly see it as fine to value one over the other.

charles

At 02:21 PM 8/3/98 EDT, you wrote:
>Charles's post makes a lot of sense throughout. Still, I would ask how you >differentiate a poetry that makes stereotyped lyric moments part of the >private property of the self, and a poetry that prospects out its own >private range, complete with anthologies, exegetes & explainers. Nor am >I restricting this question to "language poetry" - I'm talking about >the anthologized "postmodern moment". I'm suggesting its difficulty is >one of its attributes or properties which provides it with academic >exchange value. For a long time on this list I have been promoting another >kind of difficulty - as something layered within a synthetic, communicable
>"prose" speech that can rise to poetry.
>- HG
>
>
charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

86. MAYHEW
More on Yeats
Mon 3 Aug 1998

I think Robert Corbett's last post said, much more eloquently than I did, what I had meant to say about Yeats--his sort of bizarre occultish side making him the precursor of people like Duncan. A thought experiment--what if Yeats had been neglected for years and suddenly been discovered as a cult figure, not associated with any sort of official modernism at all?

A question for Mr. Gould: what contemporary American poets represent the legacy of Yeats as he understands it?

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

87. Douglas Oliver
Re: Other
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Excuse personal message to Jack Kimball, but he may be looking for this message on the Poetics List. Jack, I've back-channelled the list of "Other" Brit poet names you requested to the miyazaki mailing address.

Doug

↑ Index

88. Michael Magee
Re: Oh Henry
Mon 3 Aug 1998

"God bless henry" for asking tough questions - but I have to say I think he's completely wrong here, both about the motives behind experimental writing and the state of American poetry: so 1) as for the state of Am Po, I think its quite alive and well, thank you. Henry, do you know how many people read Williams Spring and All when it came out - well, the thing did not sit in the window of a Barnes & Noble - we're talking a handful of people in the Village (the "Others" crowd) and a few other like-minded souls. It's that retrospective vision which kills - eg, "jeez, no one seems to be as celebrated as Williams" (or Whitman, Wordsworth, ...). Of course, we're not the print culture we once were, & as far as I'm concerned that's great - I love TV, films, visual arts, jazz, hip-hop (and look at me, mom, I'm still writing!). As for the argument that the good stuff is abroad, well, hell, that's the oldest one in the book - I love much international poetry (I'm publishing the wonderful avant-garde Russian poet Lev Rubenstein in the next COMBO), but rhetorically, I think the celebration of such often depends on an old "great poems are written in times of war and strife" mentality which, frankly, makes me squeemish. And as for the NYT Book Review and its ilk, there a big bore - but more than this, they're not very important - the suggestion that they are Foucaultian wielders of clout doesn't hold water anymore, I think - I think I'm fairly representative of intellectuals of my generation and I hardly ever touch it. Likewise with the writers they promote - Pinsky may get around with NYT types in midtwon Manhattan but I have never - never - heard of his books being taught in five years at Penn - in contrast I've taught Hejinian, Silliman, Perelman, Bernstein and their friends to hundreds of students - who, I might add, dug their poems a whole lot. I say this only because I believe we need to be disabused of the idea we've all somehow run out of gas: for me, to take that attitude is to make the fatal mistake which Foucault was always on the verge of making: confusing one's personal struggle with the universal state of things.

So, 2) there are GOOD REASONS for writing experimentally that have NOTHING TO DO with an "innovation for innovation's sake" position: rather, in Am Po, one can follow a tradition from Emerson & Wm James to DuBois, Stein, Dewey, Williams, Burke (all in one way or another students of James) to to the New American Poetry generally, which invests in an experimental methodology precisely BECAUSE they believe that langauge is "a function of public communication." That is, they see language as symbolic action and they believe that experiment/innovation has a symbolically active set of points to make. Some of these writers are radical democrats trying to make language/syntax function more democratically on the level of symbolic action; others have Marxist predilections and are in the general area of Jameson (a serious student of Burke) in their considerations of symbolic action (particularly as Jameson works in The POlitical Unconscious).

My point here is that these writers are damn serious and not self-indulgent in their pursuits (that is, not any more self-indulgent than we all are on a day to day basis). You may think this is bullshit bu I'll take the philosophical (and social) rigor of James or Burke (or Cornel West, or Nate Mackey) any day. So viva poetry!!! -m.

According to KENT JOHNSON: > > On 2 August, Henry Gould wrote:
> > >nobody wants to consider the notion that this counter-tradition > >might itself be bankrupt, in part for the very reason I mentioned:
> >the tearing apart of syntax for the sake of innovation; the use of > >isolated vocabulary as a kind of aesthetic private property (eg.
> >"language poetry"- take it out of the dictionary & it's yours) as > >opposed to the concept of language as a whole function of "public" > >communication.
>
> I'm curious, why so few responses? Henry's comment above is very > provocative. And it comes from a fellow who really does read > and is clearly no lightweight in the head. Here we are getting at > what the World War of Poetry is all about, no?
>
> Bernstein, Silliman, Perloff, Rothenberg and Joris (so much for your > anthology, according to Henry, apparently), Bromige, Quartermain, > etc. (and also everyone involved in the Alternativve Poetries > Conference in Boston and young turks of the New (American) Poetry > anthology): There is a pillbox to take! How many more comrades will > die, shredded on the beach, before you respond? Are you really just > a crew of aphasic, Scrabble-playing ninnies as Henry seems to > claim?

>
> (And Henry, sincerely curious, what _do_ you think of the Poems for > the Millennium anthology? Most of that just grabbing from the > dictionary too? If there is work there you think is worthy, what is > it?)
>
> Kent
>

↑ Index

89. henry

Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split

Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 11:55:33 -0700 Charles Alexander said:
 Whereas you seem to be >espousing a "kind of difficulty" which is entirely involved with the >content of what is said, and not the form, if what you want is really this >"communicable prose" speech that you put forward. There is such work I >admire, but I certainly don't think it any more worthy than work whose >intellectual/emotional difficulty crawls right into the craggy >juxtaposition of phonemes and morphemes, the gaps between one enunciation >and another.

The kind of difficulty I espouse is very close to what R. Corbett described regarding Yeats: layers of meaning steeped into a kind of forthright, singing syntax. This is what I find in the Russians too, Mandelstam & Akhmatova in particular. Ars est celare artem = art is to hide art. Kent, there's nobody in the pillbox; Jonathan, I don't read much contemporary work; I read stuff I need for my own writing. If Vallejo, Mandelstam, Celan, Akhmatova, Dickinson, Yeats are in the Millennium anthology, they are some of my favorites, good. I've been reading Portuguese Cape Verdean popular poems for a project I'm working on; I've been reading Under the Volcano by Malcolm Lowry because his anti-hero Geoffrey Firmin, like me, identifies with William Blackstone. Susan, sorry the wars cause headaches; my strategy is to hammer away at people so they figure out how to read my stuff if it ever gets published. Plus I like the idea of something after postmodernism. Aside: there was a CD not long ago of Yeats poems performed by various Irish pop music groups. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

90. David Kellogg

Academic exchange value

Mon 3 Aug 1998

No matter who you're talking about, the "academic exhange value" of any contemporary poetry is assumed to lie in its ability to be _promoted_ in the critical essay or review. Whether you're writing on John Hollander or Charles Bernstein, Amy Clampitt or Susan Howe, academic value is wrenched out of poetry as a relentless critical project. Pick your own favorite essay on a poet and see if it matches this rough structure:

1. Most contemporary poetry is [moribund, pathetic, too academic, not academic enough, too trendy, not trendy enough, too much form, too much content]. [Pages of examples]

2. The work of [poet's name here], however, bucks this trend. As a result, [poet's name here]'s work has been ignored. Critics have hitherto been unable to deal with this poet's [intellect, emotion, epistemology, sexuality, bad attitude, vocabulary] and have written [poet's name here] out of the canon. I propose to correct this oversight.

3. [Pages of counter-examples from the work of the poet]

4. If only the world would pay attention to [poet's name here], we would all love poetry. Pity the world doesn't follow my shining example.

Now THERE'S a bankrupt tradition for you: yet it seems to be viable all over the place, certainly not restricted to any one wing of the academic critical establishment.

Cheers,
David

~~~
~~~

91. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
Re: Oh Henry
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Sometimes you write experimentally because we're at the portal of another millennium different technology cyborg phenomenology writing in the skull with unforeseen mediations and to repeat writing is sewing the whirlwind with useless thread

Alan

↑ Index

92. Robert Corbett
Re: My Definition of Academic
Mon 3 Aug 1998

> For a few years, when David Wilke was the head of the NEA lit division, it looked > like that at least part of that might change, but, alas! Reagan,etc. (Even corporate > sponsorship is likely less treacherous than government sponsorship...).
>
> Don

The last phrase is a bit cryptic for me. Is there that much corporate sponsorship of writing program (or language poetry, for that matter)?

Robert Robert Corbett "you are there beyond/ tracings flesh can [redacted] take,/ and farther away surrounding and University of Washington informing the systems" - A.R. Ammons

↑ Index

93. Aldon Nielsen
In which will be found what is set forth therein
Mon 3 Aug 1998

) sorry to bother everybody about this, but -- the computer gremlins here at LMU threw out the saved baby emails along with the crashed bathwater, so I need to ask --

Will whoever it was that asked me about writing about Rae Armantrout please get back in touch with me about the deadline --

& Who is it on the list who was trying to put together a collection of Dan Davidson's work?

Pvt. Ryan, by the way, appears to have far fewer verbal anachronisms in the dialoge than does the Lyne _Lolita_ -- Though Spielburg films all seem to boil down to getting ET home and directing lots of traffic (what made DUEL perhaps his best movie, though Sugarland Express has better acting)

↑ Index

94. Christian Roess

Re: More about "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split

Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Mon, 3 Aug 98 Henry Gould writes:

> The Yeats/Pound thing is not an attempt > to narrow the range; just a means of once again raising the possibility > that "innovative" poetry & experiment might be organized on a whole > different set of paradigms. I'm not saying that's not already happening...

This discussion about 'paradigm' shifts has me examining again something I am just reading now in Gary Taylor's book and then comparing it to some remark by Octavio Paz in the 'Preface to his book ONE EARTH, FOUR OR FIVE WORLDS, which I first read a few weeks back.

For example,

From CULTURAL MEMORY by Gary Taylor:

"In his book _The Structure of Scientific Revolution_ , Thomas Kuhn argues that science does not 'progress' in the orderly, incremental way we usually assume; instead, scientific revolutions turn the established worldview on its head, replacing one paradigm with another. The new paradigm is not necessarily better; it is just different, so different that it cannot really be compared with the old paradigm, because there is no common standard of measurement that both paradigms would accept. Kuhn divides the history of science into brief periods of revolution, when paradigms shift, and much longer periods of normal science, when researchers investigate technical problems defined by the prevailing stable paradigm. We especially remember the revolutionary periods and the scientist associated with them because they generated an exceptionally large intellectual stimulus. . ...."

From Octavio Paz:

"Like the Mayas, who had two ways of measuring time, the 'short count' and the 'long count', French historians have introduced the distinction between 'long duration' and 'short duration' in historical processes. The first designates the broad rhythms that, through modifications that are imperceptible at first, alter old structures and create new ones, thus bringing gradual but irreversible social changes. Examples include increases and decreases in population, which are still not entirely explained; the evolution of sciences and technologies; the discovery of new natural resources or their gradual exhaustion; the erosion of social institutions; the transformation of mentalities and sensibilities. . ."

" 'Short duration' is the domain par excellence of the event : falling empires, nascent States, revolutions, wars, presidents resigning, monica lewinsky, assassinated dictators, crucified prophets, sanctimonious crucifiers, ken starr, etc. [yes, I made a clever revision here]

History is often compared to a woven fabric, the work of many hands; without deciding on a pattern beforehand, and without knowing exactly what they are doing, these hands weave threads of every color together until a succession of figures, at once familiar and enigmatic, appears on the loom. From the point of view of 'short duration', the figures are not repeated : history is constant creation, novelty, the realm of the unique and singular. From the standpoint of 'long duration', repetitions, ruptures, and renewals can be perceived: rhythms. Both visions are true."

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

95. David Kellogg

Re: My Definition of Academic

Mon 3 Aug 1998

On Mon, 3 Aug 1998, Robert Corbett wrote:

> The last phrase is a bit cryptic for me. Is there that much corporate sponsorship of writing program (or language poetry, for that matter)?

Bob Perelman, Bud Lite Professor of English, University of Pennsylvania

Barrett Watten, General Motors Professor of American Studies, Wayne State U

Charles "Gordita" Bernstein, Taco Bell Chair of Poetry and Poetics, SUNY-Buffalo

"Poetry, by Ralph Lauren" reading series at the Hear Inn.

The 1998 Nike "Girls in the Game" tour (featuring Howe, Retallack, Scalapino and others reading simultaneously on three stages!)

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

[redacted] Program in Writing and Rhetoric
[redacted] Durham, NC 27708
FAX [redacted] http://www.duke.edu/~kellogg/

↑ Index

96. s. kaipa
Address Change/ Interlope
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Please note my new address!

Summi Kaipa & I n t e r l o p e magazine
103 S. Governor St., Apt. 1
Iowa City, IA 52240

My email and phone will not change:
[redacted]

Thanks!

↑ Index

97. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
The They
Mon 3 Aug 1998

-

Subject: The They

De Man Heidegger and Maybe Celine
De Man Heidegger and Maybe Celine
My Name is Jennifer Where have you Been De Man Heidegger and Lovely Celine

"what they wrote, or didn't write, about the war at one time, meaning and a motivation the dim grapple, blunted hook and circulation of beard and book and object, always a roar of Truth about their writing they'd thought they'd go down fighting through clear delineations of a mausoleum door they'd see 'from out of into' the scum then there was clarity and deaf ambition by now and later also blind attrition writing contaminated by its source beat a dead horse in your condition"

(Wilfred Owen)

To which I might reply:

Celine is a special case, Jewish Gravel Standing Upright on the Peninsula
De Man another, for who would want the Inability to Change a Mind
Before the Patriarch, Denial of Title
 For I, Daishin Nikuko, insist that Roots atrophy,
 The Inexorable Grinding of Wrong Opinion
 Before the Castle of Chastity shall Lose its Way across the Straightest Moat
Dear Heidegger, Let us Read what is Written, Remembering but Losing At times the Thread across This Way
 For the Thread is a Thread to be sure,
 And sometimes Knowledge is Grounded in Letting-Go

The Hardest Lesson of All is that Not everything is Reflected in everything else
 There are Things Cut off, Cauterized
A Reading is Always a Beginning to take and Give simultaneously Across the Moat towards the Castle of Fortitude
 Which is not Always Right, but has proper Reading Lamps

I shall not Strain my I's.

I shall Cut myself Off in the Wilderness
I shall Howl Like a Beast that Longs to Open and Run
I shall Wear Gravel
I shall Cease Reading Gain Certain Knowledge
            Forget What I have Gained

"For the Thread to be Sure is a Thread
And Knowledge is sometimes Grounded in Letting-go"

↑ Index

98. maz881
DuCharme
Mon 3 Aug 1998

<<But I don't want a pineapple.>>

ok Mark D., what do you want?

what's your address btw, and you Todd Barron and you Pat Pritchett?

gracias,

Bill Luoma
[redacted]

↑ Index

99. Chris McCreary
address query/Brian Lucas & Angle
Mon 3 Aug 1998

I'm trying to contact Brian Lucas/Angle & am looking for either an e address or his new (NYC) mailing address. His e-mail and mailing addresses listed @ the EPC are both out of date...

Please backchannel any info. Thanks.

Chris McCreary

↑ Index

100. KENT JOHNSON
Rock n' Roll?
Mon 3 Aug 1998

On August 3, Aldon Nielsen wrote:

(Saving Private Ryan) "has far verbal anachronisms in the dialogue than the Lyne _Lolita_."

A small thing, and I know the discussion on the film is pretty much over, but did anyone else notice that as the Germans are rolling into town in the final battle scene one of the American soldiers scurries to his position and calls out, "Rock n' Roll boys!"

I'm pretty sure I heard this. If so, this would be out of time, wouldn't it? How could a film like this, where even the boots are the real item, get something like that wrong? Or maybe it was a little joke on purpose?

Kent

↑ Index

101. Tosh
Re: Rock n' Roll?
Mon 3 Aug 1998

---

a_."
>
>A small thing, and I know the discussion on the film is pretty much >over, but did anyone else notice that as the Germans are rolling >into town in the final battle scene one of the American >soldiers scurries to his position and calls out, "Rock n' Roll boys!"
>
>I'm pretty sure I heard this. If so, this would be out of time, >wouldn't it? How could a film like this, where even the boots are >the real item, get something like that wrong? Or maybe it was a >little joke on purpose?
>
>Kent

I too notice this and thought it was odd! But as a friend pointed out to me maybe they were saying lock n' load - as get your guns ready.

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

102. Tom Beard
Re: My Definition of Academic
Mon 3 Aug 1998

Mark P:

> This is very interesting Matt.....Especially since many folks perceive
the > academics as the ones who tend to take a hard-nosed anti-intellectual > stance. Now i strongly agree that a pretty shallow anti-intellectualism > is a prominent feature of U.S. life and cul'chah..

Wow, this sounds weird to me. Maybe it's just that NZ has nothing to compare to the Ivy League establishment, but I don't know many people here who would say that academics were anti-intellectual. In popular usage, academic = intellectual = pretentious = bad.

I've probably been exposed to too many open mike nights (where anything that's influenced by poets more serious than Jim Morrison is 'academic') or 'Sundaystream' Poetry Society readings (where anything other than a haiku about one's cat is 'academic'). I'm used to being abused as 'academic', though I haven't studied literature formally since I was 16. One gets labelled as a post-modernist (= especially bad) if one's poems don't rhyme.

Most 'established' poets here work in or are friendly to the academy, but the academy is neither stuffy-leather-armchairs staid nor (except perhaps in Auckland) radical-political-post-modernist. I suppose it's close to the Iowa school: middle-brow cultured liberal, with an emphasis on 'common sense' and being down-to-earth. Blame it on the sheep, I guess.

If I were being less facetious (and I suppose I'd better make an effort), I'd say that the phrase 'academic poetry' refers here to anything that requires a post-compulsory education to appreciate. It has nothing to do with the qualifications or career of the poet: an English professor who writes nice little poems about trees and mountains is not academic; but a truckdriver who quotes Derrida is.

Robert A:

> Bob Perelman, Bud Lite Professor of English, University of Pennsylvania
>
> Barrett Watten, General Motors Professor of American Studies, Wayne State U

How about: Bill Manhire, Te Mata Wines Poet Laureate?

Actually, I've no objection to this sort of sponsorship: Te Mata are not exactly a megacorporation (and anyone who can make a wine like their Coleraine is okay with me); the post lasts two years, requires no "Ode to Merlot", funds the publication of a book and results in more public awareness for poetry. Maybe we need more sponsorships like this?

Address flames to: Tom Beard.

↑ Index

103. trbell
Re: Oh Henry
Tue 4 Aug 1998

"This colorful, complex, and influential movement was...considered 'a harmful influence' or 'a bourgeois error,' and, since approximately 1930, thought unworthy of serious consideration" - Markov, _Russian Futurism_ - happened across this today and couln't help wondering how it might relate to the current flurry here.

tom bell

↑ Index

104. Simon DeDeo
Address Change
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Hello, all; in a bit of an e-mail blockout, unfortunately, and soon I will be far, far away from e-mail at all (well, the Orkneys.) I will also soon be changing my address on the list to:

[redacted]

In anticipation of the coming term and the end of my time in Puerto Rico.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

↑ Index

105. Simon DeDeo
Re: angling others / different tracks through the woods / lofgish rant
Tue 4 Aug 1998

As far as I know, the concept of the academics commenting on contemporary poetry has a very short history -- beginning in the 20th century, no? -- with the introduction of studies in the UK cirrculum. Harvard, for example, began much later; not sure when. Does anybody know when the correspondance between the academy and the poets began, with the poets as supplicants? Perhaps it all began when Eliot dropped out of philosophy to begin writing; the footnotes to The Waste Land seem to demand three classical scholars and a sociologist to decpiher.

I'd be interested to hear how critics within the academy perceive themselves. Do you consider your position in the university as a handy way to support yourself in what you love to do? Or do you perceive a more organic communication between the university (and all the social and intellectual privileges that entails) and your work? That you share a building with, say, the historians, who indirectly codify and thus direct the course of history -- does this seem to mirror your own experience of working from "within"?

(Or "more blue", for those tired of spatial metaphors.)

On a side note; my comment that "why can't critics stick to talking about the poets they like" seems in retrospect to be a little naieve. I was thinking of the kind of criticism -- very valuable -- that goes on in the letters of a man such as Keats, or Pound, where they trash various writers that would be considered today a "vital" part of a critic's repertoire -- Milton, for example. A critic perhaps has more responsibility -- but this seems to return to the question of how the critics see themselves in relationship to the university.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
[redacted]

↑ Index

106. Simon DeDeo
Milosz
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On a different subject; I've been reading Czeslaw Milosz's journal _Year of the Hunter_, which he kept from late 1987 to mid 1988. Here's an entry from November 17th, 1987 (which seems somehow significant -- the only date near it that I can think of is Guy Fawkes.)

I try to read contempgrary American poetry conscientiously. It's understandable that where there are thousands of poets, the overwhelling majority cannot be worth very much, though they provide an incentive and nourishment for the few, just a handful; it's the same everywhere. Something similiar is happenang in modern painting and the results are similar, too, because the paintings afford little pleasure.

One can say about these poets that their technique is first-rate, but that they have nothing to write about. Their "life experience" shows through every line of verse; it is the life of lecturers on university campuses or in high schools and what they describe most frequently is their family-life complications, their own or heard about in the neighborhood bar. It is a common, monotonous reality, free of historical earthquakes; at most, it includes one or two earthquakes, in a literal sense. Nothing drives them to leap like salmon confronting an obstacle. Precisely that, this "having nothing to write about", is, in my opinon, quite a universal problem to be studied.

Many things in this quote. First of all, the difference between his perception of American poetry and the one that has dominated this list discussion. For Milosz, it seems, the L=A=N=G=U=A=G=E folk are wound like ivy to the sonnet writers. The attention, which is rare these days, to content, sticks out in my mind -- which might be due to Milosz's encounters with a language he doesn't write in?

And the notion of historical earthquakes? What does he mean? It all seems rather odd to someone who grew up on poetry as the product of a comfortable life -- from Aeschylus to Keats and on. Not that all poetry need be generated from peace, but certaintly not that war or "earthquakes" need be the sole generators of verse. Perhaps he means conceptual earthquakes -- but it seems that then only the first to arrive on the scene would claim the prize. A later arrival would, no matter what the skill, would fail to experience the earthquake and be left "common, monotonous".

And finally, I'll take issue with the (slightly snide) remark about lecturers and high school teachers, which on later consideration seems not so snide. There needs be, for Milosz, some kind of substrate from which is thrown up from time to time the "great", something more than a "community" it seems, but rather a community in the land of word. It's slightly mystical, even, the way that he believes the unread chapbooks of the many provide "nourishment for the few".

Enough. Best wishes to all,

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
[redacted]

PS: I hope nobody on the list takes my quote of Milosz as a my criticism of academics who write poetry -- a broad class that would draw in many fish, including minnows such as myself.

↑ Index

107. George Bowering

Re: Rock n' Roll?

Tue 4 Aug 1998

Two friends in Toronto e-mailed me the news that they had gone to see that "Saving Pvt Ryan" movie, and that they had slumped out afterward, complaining that it was yet more US jingoism.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,

Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

108. Tosh
Re: Rock n' Roll?
Tue 4 Aug 1998

> Two friends in Toronto e-mailed me the news that they had gone to see that "Saving Pvt Ryan"
> movie, and that they had slumped out afterward, complaining that it was yet more US jingoism.
>
> Well yeah, it is a shitty film. A well made shitty film, but neverless a shitty film. Actually it is sort of like a three hour version of the tv show COMBAT. And I like Vic Morrow better then Tom Hanks. But I must say, it must be more than a movie to appear in the Poetics discussion group!

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

109. trbell
feminism and "Oh Henry" and the Yeats/Pound split
Tue 4 Aug 1998

I might be speaking out of gender here, but it might be a "feminine" weaving that Paz feels will bring these familiar and enigmatic figures to the loom.

tom bell

At 04:15 PM 8/3/98 -0400, you wrote:
>On Mon, 3 Aug 98 Henry Gould writes:
>
>>The Yeats/Pound thing is not an attempt >>to narrow the range; just a means of once again raising the possibility >>that "innovative" poetry & experiment might be organized on a whole >>different set of paradigms. I'm not saying that's not already happening…
>
>This discussion about 'paradigm' shifts has me examining again something I am just reading now in Gary Taylor's book and then comparing it to some remark by Octavio Paz in the 'Preface to his book ONE EARTH, FOUR OR FIVE WORLDS, which I first read a few weeks back.

>
>For example,
>
>>From CULTURAL MEMORY by Gary Taylor:
>
>"In his book _The Structure of Scientific Revolution_ , Thomas Kuhn argues that science does not 'progress' in the orderly, incremental way we usually assume; instead, scientific revolutions turn the established worldview on its head, replacing one paradigm with another. The new paradigm is not necessarily better; it is just different, so different that it cannot really be compared with the old paradigm, because there is no common standard of measurement that both paradigms would accept. Kuhn divides the history of science into brief periods of revolution, when paradigms shift, and much longer periods of normal science, when researchers investigate technical problems defined by the prevailing stable paradigm. We especially remember the revolutionary periods and the scientist associated with them because they generated an exceptionally large intellectual stimulus. . ...."
>
>
>>From Octavio Paz:
>
>"Like the Mayas, who had two ways of measuring time, the 'short count' and the 'long count', French historians have introduced the distinction between 'long duration' and 'short duration' in historical processes. The first designates the broad rhythms that, through modifications that are imperceptible at first, alter old structures and create new ones, thus bringing gradual but irreversible social changes. Examples include increases and decreases in population, which are still not entirely explained; the evolution of sciences and technologies; the discovery of new natural resources or their gradual exhaustion; the erosion of social institutions; the transformation of mentalities and sensibilities. . ."
>
>" 'Short duration' is the domain par excellence of the event : falling empires, nascent States, revolutions, wars, presidents resigning, monica lewinsky, assassinated dictators, crucified prophets, sanctimonious crucifiers, ken starr, etc. [yes, I made a clever revision here]
>
>History is often compared to a woven fabric, the work of many hands; without deciding on a pattern beforehand, and without knowing exactly what they are doing, these hands weave threads of every color together until a succession of figures, at once familiar and enigmatic, appears on the loom. From the point of view of 'short duration', the figures are not repeated : history is constant creation, novelty, the realm of the unique and singular. From the standpoint of 'long duration', repetitions, ruptures, and renewals can be perceived: rhythms. Both visions are true."

>
>
>
>_____
>Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1
>
>

↑ Index

110. Herb Levy

Re: My Definition of Academic

Tue 4 Aug 1998

Well okay, sure.

But other than these few extremely rare exceptions (so rare, they're hardly worth commenting on) can you really make a case for corporate sponsorship?

(Does the FBI count as a corporation?)

David Kellogg wrote:

> On Mon, 3 Aug 1998, Robert Corbett wrote:
>
> The last phrase is a bit cryptic for me. Is there that much corporate sponsorship of writing program (or language poetry, for that matter)?
>
> Bob Perelman, Bud Lite Professor of English, University of Pennsylvania
>
> Barrett Watten, General Motors Professor of American Studies, Wayne State U
>
> Charles "Gordita" Bernstein, Taco Bell Chair of Poetry and Poetics, SUNY-Buffalo
>
> "Poetry, by Ralph Lauren" reading series at the Hear Inn.
>
> The 1998 Nike "Girls in the Game" tour (featuring Howe, Retallack, Scalapino and others reading simultaneously on three stages!)

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

111. Mark DuCharme

Re: H=E=N=R=Y

Tue 4 Aug 1998

I disagree. I don't believe language, even in the texts of the dreaded <Language Poets>, CAN be private property. I believe language is inherently communal. This presumption changes how one _reads_ such texts-- de-esotericizes them, if you will. Perhaps this, I think strange, belief in language as private property in modernist & postmodernist writing (since I assume you would probably extend your critique not just toward Langpo, but perhaps also to Stein, Zukofsky's _"A"_, Un Coup de Des, _Finnegan's Wake_, etc.) explains why you are seemingly incapable of reading these texts with pleasure, or without annoyance. Whereas someone like me, who doesn't share your belief in language as private property in or outside of these writings, IS capable of reading these texts as non-esoteric-- as a liberation & a pleasure.

--Mark DuCharme

Henry Gould wrote:

>On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 10:03:15 -0700 Peter Balestrieri said:
>>
>> Henry, I'm trying to follow your argument and I'm wondering if you'd >> be willing to clarify what you mean by "...the intent was to critique
>> another style of appropriation..." Who was doing the critiquing
and >> what style of appropriation are you referring to? I think you've >> raised something important here and I want to be able to better >> understand what you're saying. Did you mean that Langpo was critiquing >> capitalist "appropriation" but only replaced it with another form
of >> appropriation, aesthetic rather than economic? Or am I way off?
>
>I think Langpo - hit me, real langpoets out there - was trying to >write against the appropriation of poetry by 70s MFA "self" factories, >and against the appropriation of literary space by "privacy capital" of >all kinds. Their strategy was a drastic one: basically to dynamite the >rhetorical/communicative function, the authorial function, and so on by >letting "language" - individual words, non-sequiturs, broken syntax & >rhetoric - speak (often comically) for itself. I'm suggesting this was >a kind of unwitting creation of a new kind of private property - sort

of >prospecting the dictionary. - Henry G.
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

112. Safdie Joseph
Re: Saving Private Henry
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Perhaps it was all the war talk around here lately that made Robert Archambeau dive behind that tree. Robert! You can come out now! No more shrapnel! (Stephen Ambrose -- that crusty old fart! -- turns out to have been Spielberg's technical advisor on matters warlike and was on McNeil-Lehrer tonight . . .)

I apologize for letting Henry defend that hill all by himself for the last few days -- as someone who usually agrees with him (well . . . about 75% of the time), it was cowardly on my part not to have joined in until now. But I was just waiting to hear how Gary Sullivan fared on his vacation quest.

But seriously folks, the sad truth is -- I'm having to fight off becoming a double agent, because I've been giving a close (academic) reading to Marjorie Perloff's _Writing Poetry in the Age of Media_ (which many of you receiving this transmission will already know). And Henry -- she hasn't convinced me, but she sure is asking the right questions!

Listen to this, just from the first page of the Preface: She quotes a line from Diane Ward which is the KIND of thing I think Henry has been complaining about -- "Dark windows in which a list followed by facts in us erupt chilling comparing" -- and then says:

"Our first response to such 'sentences,' especially when there is a whole paragraph or page of them, is that we are the victims of some kind of scam. There are, so the common wisdom goes, a bunch of mandarin poets around . . . who have some sort of murky relationship to Deconstruction and write meaningless and pretentious trash that they pass off as literature. . . . For reasons unclear, a significant body of poetry (or what claims to be poetry) has been produced that is unnaturally _difficult_ -- eccentric in its syntax, obscure in its language, and mathematical rather than musical in its form."

She took the words right out of my mouth -- my mouth in the early 1980s, that is. Veterans of this list will perhaps remember my disinclination to appreciate the project of Mssrs. Silliman, Watten, et al back in those days (and by the way, I was glad that Kent, in his initial response to Henry, was also critical of the "there is no referent" philosophy). But Marjorie, in this book, has set the bar for critics like myself at a very great height. That doesn't mean I'm going to stop vaulting, just that I really recommend this book as some of the more stimulating -- and infuriating! -- criticism I've read.

I'll have more to say (perhaps only in the form of backchannels to Marjorie) about this opus as I get further along, but have two questions immediately: one, is the "aspirational thought" of John Cage that she cites really a model for anyone here? That is, are we bound, as current practitioners, to find a way OUT of our present mess, rather than just present the mess? And two, she quotes our List Master as differentiating between modes of fragmentation, preferring the kind that "reflects a conception of meaning as prevented by conventional narration . . . dipping into other possibilities available within language." In this formulation and others I've seen promoting "discovery," I smell the vague but undeniable odor of mystification -- we can never say exactly WHAT those "other possibilities" are. Fair enough, but when does the endless spiraling outward become simple bad faith?

Joe Safdie

↑ Index

113. Douglas Oliver
Re: Other
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Jack Kimball has asked me to post a list of some interesting names in current Brit poetry. I'll do my best to give you, say, 50, very much off the top of my head, with absolutely no order of importance implied by the list.

You see, what I'm really asked to do here is create an anthology via the immediacy of e-mail. This can't be a list of that kind: it would take research and fuller memory recall. I've probably forgotten my oldest friend! At present, most US views of the British scene are somewhat narrowed by the preoccupations both of US poets and British poets who have so far compiled the names or arrange the conferences. Nothing especially wrong with that, but below is a fairly non-partisan list from someone who hasn't lived in Britain for nearly two decades and will miss quite a bit, I expect. May other Brits correct me.

A "T" means I have at least some contact or channel, sometimes close but not always. If Jack or anyone else is interested in following up on a name and I can help, I'd be glad to (within reason).

Andrew Duncan T (edits Angel Exhaust)
Helen MacDonald T
J.H. Prynne T (renewed interest in his work after the "Stars and Tigers" essay, has become more and more concentrated in lexis more and more difficult.) Denise Riley T (not producing much poetry just now, but still one of the finest of all) Aaron Williamson T (balletic performance artist, fully deaf, still interesting on-page)
Nicholas Johnson T (runs Etruscan Reader series and conferences)
Karlien ven den Beukel T
W.N. Herbert T (Scots, sometimes writes in Dundee dialect)
Bill Griffiths T (has long been one of the most individual of poets writing out of London, runs the Eric Mottram archive)
Allen Fisher T (one of the older writers to have kept most constantly innovative)
Catherine Walsh (said to be a good performer)
Miles Champion T (spending a lot of time in the States)
Grace Lake T
Wendy Mulford T (Used to run Reality Street editions with:
Ken Edwards (who continues these editions)
Maggie O'Sullivan T
Iain Sinclair T (Edited Conductors of Chaos, see below)
Harriet Tarlo T
Randolph Healy (with Joyce below part of the non-mainstream Irish)
Trevor Joyce
Tom Leonard T (Scots, strong, political work)
Carlyle Reedy (good performer)
Caroline Bergvall T (again, a good performer)
Merle Collins (With next two. Being out of the country, I don't know much
E.A. Markham about African-British, Caribbean-British, and Asian-British Jack Mapanje writing. It's difficult to get the publications and I'd dearly love to be better informed. Fred d'Aiguar has been an important editor/poet. Can someone help me here?)
Ralph Hawkins T
Alaric Sumner (works with sound and performance motifs)
Tom Raworth T (currently the Brit poet best known by the non-Academic

States writers)
Lee Harwood T (has been writing strongly again)
Andrew Crozier T (his work has recently reappeared: one of the keenest intellects in British poetry)
Adrian Harding (Scots, living in Paris) T
David Chaloner T
Anthony Barnett
Victoria Vaughan T
Simon Pettet (New York resident)
Fiona Templeton
Helen Kidd
Peter Riley (publishes Poetical Histories)
Tim Atkins
Martin Corless-Smith (in States)
John Wilkinson T
Drew Milne T
Khaled Hakim (has sort of invented an English of his own from semi-phonetics.
I don't know him -- he's quite young.)
D.S. Marriott T
Tony Baker (in France) T
Ric Caddel T
John Kinsella (works out of England right now, but properly regarded as Australian) T
Tony Lopez T
Rod Mengham T (runs the Equipage series)
Alan Halsey T
Barry MacSweeney T (recently returned to the scene)
Tom Pickard T
cris cheek T (works a lot with performance)
Lawrence Upton (good contact for the small press scene and activity generally)
Gilbert Adair

↑ Index

114. Charles Alexander

Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media

Tue 4 Aug 1998

At 02:07 PM 8/4/98 -0500, you wrote:
>Although this might be a gross over-simplification, one of the major >issues for me is that I would like the reader to be involved in >'constructing' the poem. I am aware that this goes back to Iser and >there may be other sources I am not familiar with.

> If i am right in this would there then be 'lazy readers' and readers who are more willing to invest themselves?

I don't think it's good to label readers who don't want to take these steps as lazy. Some readers who don't want to join in the constructive process may not understand the invitation. Others simply may not want to participate in this way, while they may eagerly track down every reference in a work by Olson or Pound, which is certainly another kind of investment.

What is it in various of poems which demand a reader's participation/construction, that makes the invitation to do such work, perhaps makes it rather obviously, or in a way which is encouraging? Or is this necessary? And what, in other works, makes them come across as a brick wall which resists such participation rather than inviting it?

These are some of the many questions we struggle with, as I don't think, even with the most 'difficult' (and define that in Henry's way or any way you wish) poets, there is a desire to not have a readership.

When I read what you have posted, I want more explanation of what you mean is involved in the reader 'constructing' the poem. I think such an act is involved in a lot of work talked about on the list, from Susan Howe to Alan Sondheim. So I'm wondering if you have a more specific idea of such reader-construction in mind.

charles

charles
charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

115. L. MacMahon and T.R. Healy
Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
Tue 4 Aug 1998

---

from [redacted]

> From: Safdie Joseph

> .....I've been giving a close (academic) reading to Marjorie Perloff's _Writing Poetry in the Age of Media_

> .....two questions
> immediately: one, is the "aspirational thought" of John Cage that she cites really a model for anyone here? That is, are we bound, as current practitioners, to find a way OUT of our present mess, rather than just present the mess? And two, she quotes our List Master as differentiating between modes of fragmentation, preferring the kind that "reflects a conception of meaning as prevented by conventional narration . . . dipping into other possibilities available within language." In this formulation and others I've seen promoting "discovery," I smell the vague but undeniable odor of mystification -- we can never say exactly WHAT those "other possibilities" are. Fair enough, but when does the endless spiraling outward become simple bad faith?

On point one: the thought of poets of any stripe setting themselves the project of finding pat answers is an unhappy one. Yet there are no neutral descriptions, and even should one attempt to "just present the mess" such a presentation will insensibly move in certain directions. I would consider the principle of "aspirational thought" to be satisfied if the writer can keep the ambiguities of the situation in suspension rather than crystallising prematurely. Which I think fits well with Cage's awareness that chance and cadence have the same root.

On point two: . My initial reaction to fragmented syntax was that it may be used as a probe which does not impose any particular hierarchy on the possibilities it discovers. And it seemed that the experience of the reading was an inseparable part of the text. Which is why I think it is hard to talk about such poetry without falling a little flat: the analysis of a rollercoaster ride in terms of velocity and pitch is not quite the same as the real thing. The what of those "other possibilities" can be indicated explicitly, if not definitively, in terms of individual texts, and I am strongly tempted to demonstrate this, only an unwillingness to inflict what may be entirely personal lucubrations preventing me.

Randolph Healy

↑ Index

116. Jim Andrews
L A N G U (I M) A G E in Seattle Sept. 5
Tue 4 Aug 1998

You're invited to an evening of langu(im)age, an opening/reading/party at The Globe Cafe in Seattle.

VISUAL POETRY OPENING: The pornomorphs will be loosed upon the unsuspecting (but not entirely innocent) patrons of The Globe for a month or two (as long as Robin can stand them) in high res, color wax prints hanging from the ceiling and adorning the walls. Some of the pornomorphs are in a preliminary Web state currently at http://www.speakeasy.org/~jandrews/vispo/images/GarbOTheGods/SexGoddess.html. These images are drawn from porn on the Net, so if you find such things offensive, please pass on this one. They will be accompanied by the texts on the Web.

The other side of the Globe will feature high res, wax print versions of some of the images at http://www.islandnet.com/~jandrews/mocambo/jimvispo.htm and their accompanying texts.

POETRY: I'm very proud to have Joseph F. Keppler, Robin Schultz, and margareta waterman reading/performing at the Globe with me on this evening of langu(im)age. The four of us share a passion for all the dimensions of language.

margareta waterman wrote the primordial alphabet, cloud coop songs, occam's razor, and several others she's published, along with the works of many other poets, within her nine muses books.

Joseph is the editor of Poets.Painters.Composers and is a poet, photographer, and sculptor. His readings are legendary, as is his innovative, powerful work in multiple mediums.

Robin is the owner of The Globe Cafe. His most recent book is LOVE, OR, which evolved from responses to a wall-sized visual poem Robin did in the cafe. The Globe is itself an interesting work of visual poetry featuring visual poets and their work constantly. There's a visual poem on the ceiling. Until recently there were phrases dangling from the ceiling. And they paint over the full wall mural each year with a new one by a different writer. It also features a great collection of small press poetry available to the patrons. O yes and the food! The Globe is maybe the only vegan restaurant in Seattle.

Party time.

TIME AND PLACE:
Saturday, September 5, 8 pm,
The Globe Cafe, 1531 14th, Seattle, WA
Refreshments and The Globe's excellent vegan victuals available.

↑ Index

117. Daniel Carter
phasic thin the nest
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Ken Beacon: an other in it-zone relating itself to ensliced vinyl perceptics 'n' name subtleties available veil as label with an eye for battle effects in the brain of subcontinental scentsatiations 'n' red roots gathering the lather link lock 'n' lull bed-lute slathering the swelling bottle(d spices) spied-upon veiled philosophical questions the discomfort at having said what shall come about be-floor-lit before it buzzes its versed breath of reel eggs hen insist dense city-dweller even if not that much bitter nor abyss doubt Nora B. Hiss doubt the hat's lid the hat slid (write off) through d' pen t' yonder blurry blue be the plural love us all 'n' each the singular huzzle 'n' buzzle a fit fall t' the glownd rownd the way from grown control occur us hue-weaver shower-tangents utter hence for worth-name subtleties available with an eye for battle I melt foreign hour the new word order betwine wager 'n' sin so often than not do quantifiable distance t' speak huff 'n' puff most simultaneously mutually debilitating relief 'n' squander the total exterior resources dry as the moon in the sky contradistinguishing itself from the waters of space-mind and heart of the picture which in this case is no image whatsoever the reverie might madly be in each instance some think new so...so let's order a new letter in with the well-oiled though now quite dirty in the desirable sort of swayin' list of items and eye brightens the asymmetries all araw the way the path the math hath in it the moist inner difference the divine and dynamic potential not just waiting idly in a lie nor lying waitingly in an idol

http://www.inch.com/~abz/

http://www.geocities.com/Paris/Cafe/3361/

↑ Index

118. rsillima

Huh

Tue 4 Aug 1998

Bob Corbett writes,

"Yeats' strategies were not "disjunctive" as such, and he created a system that aspired to totalization, but nevertheless, there is an esoteric, some would say, obscurantist, aspect to his work that makes it resonate much with Ron Silliman's work as it does with Robert Hass's."

Huh?

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

119. Donald Wellman

Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media

Tue 4 Aug 1998

This post suggested (for me) a way to cut through the many questions that have arisen recently (Henry's) concerning the value of a disjunctive poetics (its liveliness, how moribund, how vitalistic).

It seems to me that if a poem is disjunctive at the level of syntax (fragmented syntax) then it will deny the reader an experience of closure (the rounding out of musical or mathematical form).

This has always seemed to me the primary source of resistance to disjunctive poetries. They prevent the reader from walking away with a sense of having got the meaning. They prevent my appropriation of their language, of the language. Personally, I am not opposed to this state of affairs--meaning I do not need/want/desire to make the poem mine, to file it away in my heart as I have some sonnets by Shakespeare, for instance. Disjunctive poetics requires a different reading process than that. Even at the level of the glowing jolt (unexpected irony, often a pun), I do not find the Emersonian holistic fragment.

What some seem to be asking then is this: is it possible to find coherence at some level in a poem that is disjunctive on the surface? To find such would allow them to walk away from the poem "owning" it. The criticism may boil down to: "how much unownable poetry do we need?" One response is: "we now have so much that the project seems 'moribund.'"

My counter question seems necessarily then: are there disjunctions other than those of the surface?

Oh my mind boils with disjunctions and they do not cohere? but I do not look to disjunction for redemption. I look at it as I look down the barrel of a "fact" that I distrust. It speaks to something reeling in me when it does speak and does not give me words for it.

What I think is interesting about some language poetry is that seems to be something other than a mirror of otherwise inarticulable disjunctions (that would make it surrealistic poetry). It gives language then a presence that is materialistic, language becomes one of those facts that I have stared at reeling--facts that for me might be likened to the timbre of some music I love rather than its form or coherence.

Don Wellman

Don Wellman

↑ Index

120. Michael Magee
Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Donald Wellman writes: "It seems to me that if a poem is disjunctive at the level of syntax (fragmented syntax) then it will deny the reader an experience of closure (the rounding out of musical or mathematical form).

This has always seemed to me the primary source of resistance to disjunctive poetries. They prevent the reader from walking away with a sense of having got the meaning. They prevent my appropriation of their language, of the language. Personally, I am not opposed to this state of affairs--meaning I do not need/want/desire to make the poem mine, to file it away in my heart as I have some sonnets by Shakespeare, for instance. Disjunctive poetics requires a different reading process than that. Even at the level of the glowing jolt (unexpected irony, often a pun), I do not find the Emersonian holistic fragment."

I think this is essentially true, though I'd want to differ slightly - one can appropriate the disjunctive poem: it's just that, one can't do it unselfconsciously - that is, one can't do it without being painfully aware that one has done it: I think must of the discomfort over, say, language poetry, stems from this: that readers bred on staid narrative or formalist poem do not want any conscious responsibility for the generation of meaning, they would rather entertain the fiction that they have "got it" - that there can be a transcendental (though also very ordinary) connection between a) authorial intention and readerly recption; or b) between langauge itself (as deity) and the worshipping reader. The only difference, then, between, say, a Perelman poem and a Mary Jo Salter poem - so far as reading practice is concerned - is that there is a codified set of reading-rules for the latter which aids the reader so-inclined in his/her pursuit of that "got it" feeling. In contrast, since Perelman "re-instates the vague" as Wm James put it, the reader has a heightened awareness of her/his own complicity, and either says, "fuck this" and puts the book down, or accepts a more dialogic/antiphonal poetic model. This doesn't imply that things don't "mean," just that they mean differently along different points in a continuum. -m.

↑ Index

121. Henry
Re: H=E=N=R=Y
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 22:39:52 PDT Mark DuCharme said:
>I disagree. I don't believe language, even in the texts of the dreaded ><Language Poets>, CAN be private property. I believe language is >inherently communal. This presumption changes how one _reads_ such >texts-- de-esotericizes them, if you will. Perhaps this, I think >strange, belief in language as private property in modernist & >postmodernist writing (since I assume you would probably extend your >critique not just toward Langpo, but perhaps also to Stein, Zukofsky's

>_"A"_, Un Coup de Des, _Finnegan's Wake_, etc.) explains why you are >seemingly incapable of reading these texts with pleasure, or without >annoyance. Whereas someone like me, who doesn't share your belief in >language as private property in or outside of these writings, IS capable >of reading these texts as non-esoteric-- as a liberation & a pleasure.

Well, the property bit could take us into distant realms of abstraction... but I guess it seems simplistic to say that language is "inherently communal". A big problem for the writer is to find the language that CAN be shared in a way that gets across what she or he wants to get across. And my point was that the canonizing-publishing process gradually applies the same "property effects" to experimental poetry as to the rest.

But this isn't the interesting issue. You're wrong that I'm incapable of enjoying innovative or disjunctive work - I think Don Wellman's description of his response to some Language poetry was true & close to my own experience of it. But several posts have talked about "how to get into disjunctive writing" from a sort of reader-response perspective. You have to learn to enjoy non-closure, etc. But what if coming from the WRITER'S position, these modes of composition are simply NO LONGER INTERESTING? Do not reflect the goals of the writer? I think "closure" is a very weak descriptor for what the writer is after. What if postmodern perspectives & techniques do not accomplish the writer's point of view? That is what interests me about approaches that Yeats (as ONE example) can represent, in part: and I'm also talking about the micro levels of technique from a WRITER'S perspective. The idea that a synthetic approach to syntax, rhythm & meaning is just a handy way to package McMeaning ignores 95% of the fascination of the text or the performance, as far as I'm concerned. - your favorite reactionary curmudgeon, Henry G.

↑ Index

122. Robert Archambeau
Re: Milosz
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Simon DeDeo quotes Czeslaw Milosz saying that he finds American poetry wanting because, among other things, American poets write from lives that reflect:

a common, monotonous reality, free of historical earthquakes;

To understand where CM is coming from, and why he'd find it second nature to look for "historical earhquakes" in poetry, it helps not only to think about him in the context of his own experiences in war-torn Poland, but to think of the whole tradition of Polish poetry that, until recently, was overwhelmingly vatic, historical and Romantic (Shelley plays well in Warsaw).

The idea of a public poet speaking seriously of serious things and the fate of nations has even become something of a burden for later Polish poets -- there's that whole crowd of new, O'Hara-influenced Polish poets, for example, or there's the concern with the personal and the poetics of the private moment that we see in someone like Adam Zagajewski.

Zagajewski often look deceptively mainstream to many Americans, who often don't expect "historical earthquakes" in their poetry, but in Poland this is considered fairly avant-garde.

Not to keep harping on _Samizdat_, but the new issue has an essay by Piotr Parlej explaining Zagajewski's relation to the Polish national tradition, as well as a couple of Adam's poems (in translation). Once I've learned more about the Polish O'Hara scene, I plan to run some of their work, too (maybe in the December issue).

Bob Archambeau

↑ Index

123. Mark Prejsnar
Re: Oh Henry
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On Mon, 3 Aug 1998, Robert Archambeau wrote:

> I thin it is demonstrable that that there is still important poetry being written in the syntactically disjunctive mode (just now I've been reading some by Catherine Walsh, but there are American examples too). But my sense is also that there is a hell of a lot of mannerist late langpo that disjoins for the sake of disjoining and that doesn't give us anything new or powerful. And I think that the most exciting energies in poetry in the US and elsewhere are to be found neither in the (for lack of a better shorthand term) mainstream nor in the language poetry tradition (see Archambeau duck behind the nearest tree, the peep out sheepishly to see if the lead is flying).
>
> Who or what am I talking about?

Good question....And worthy of being addressed on the List, i think.

Good poetry is possible in all modes, even the very conservative ones favored by Henry. He offers no substance of critique regarding particular poets or poems; i see nothing to engage in his snipes.

I find Robert's bit quoted above far too broad and abstract to move us much further....

This reification of broad critical categories ("syntactically disjunctive mode"..ugh!) is just not very helpful.

Folks are chiming in with great sanctimoniousness (like Henry's own) about how wonderful these crticisms are...Er, so far as far as i can see, the clothes have no emperor. Thus far. Neo-conservatisim rools, i guess.

↑ Index

124. Robert Archambeau
Re: should we criminalize mediocrity?
Tue 4 Aug 1998

> Henry declares American poetry at an impasse--but he doesn't read his own contemporaries

I've never met him, but judging from his posts during the time I've read this list, Henry seems to read both the contemporary poets he has an immediate affection for and those he has a hard time finding a way to appreciate -- he seems to be that rare and wonderful kind of person who doesn't read only what he suspects he'll find affirming. Donald Davie was like that -- a Larkinesque Movement poet who made himself read the Black Mountain crowd and take them seriously, even if it was to eventually reject most of what they stood for. That way of going about things somethimes made Davie into a raging bull, but people like that keep us all honest and less complacent. (sidebar: Davie was the first critic I know of to understand much about Jeremy Prynne -- see the chapter in _Thomas Hardy and British Poetry_).

If there are no bullets but only spitballs, hair-pulling and name-calling, I suppose I can come out from behind that tree now.

R.A.

↑ Index

125. David Kellogg
Re: Academic exchange value
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On Tue, 4 Aug 1998, Maria Damon wrote:

> thanks david this is exactly the kind of "salvage work" and rhetoric that goes nowhere and one reason i find institutional histories, etc not very inspiring. however, may i suggest that a lot of essays on poets and poetry (like, i hope, my own) dont follow the model you suggest below? kristin ross's writing on rimbaud, watten's ILS piece, michael davidson's recent work on the 50s --all go far beyond championing "underdog" poets.

You're welcome. I agree with you on all these works, including your own; but their refusal to fit that mold is one reason, perhaps, why their _own_ value is sometimes viewed suspiciously by perplexed readers who want the same-old-same-old. The effort to carve out a new cultural-poetic critical writing is something I'm keenly interested in, as you know (and something I view as basically collaborative, including all the above, myself, and many others) -- readers' resistance to that critical work is buttressed by the dominance of a stale "salvage" model that always-already presents itself as novel, even if its form is predictable in its entirety.

> At 3:28 PM -0400 8/3/98, David Kellogg wrote:
> No matter who you're talking about, the "academic exhange value" of any contemporary poetry is assumed to lie in its ability to be _promoted_ in the critical essay or review. Whether you're writing on John Hollander or Charles Bernstein, Amy Clampitt or Susan Howe, academic value is wrenched out of poetry as a relentless critical project. Pick your own favorite essay on a poet and see if it matches this rough structure:
>
> 1. Most contemporary poetry is [moribund, pathetic, too academic, not academic enough, too trendy, not trendy enough, too much form, too much content]. [Pages of examples]
>
> 2. The work of [poet's name here], however, bucks this trend. As a result, [poet's name here]'s work has been ignored. Critics have hitherto been unable to deal with this poet's [intellect, emotion, epistemology, sexuality, bad attitude, vocabulary] and have written [poet's name here] out of the canon. I propose to correct this oversight.
>
> 3. [Pages of counter-examples from the work of the poet]
>
> 4. If only the world would pay attention to [poet's name here], we would all love poetry. Pity the world doesn't follow my shining example.
>
> ---
>
> Now THERE'S a bankrupt tradition for you: yet it seems to be viable all over the place, certainly not restricted to any one wing of the academic critical establishment.

> Cheers,
> David
> *~~~

In general, this is an extension of the gradual appropriation of R&R by the right as a symbol of machismo and jingoist national distinctiveness. (Within this story there are many little mini-dramas, like Reagan and the song "Born in the USA," etc.)

the second question is the history of the phrase itself. By far the best approach to this, at least as a place to start, are the essays collected in Nick Tosches' book "Unsung Heroes of Rock & Roll." The cumulative thesis of that book is that the label should be used for pretty much any strong-beat, straight-ahead music that somewhere used the phrase "rock" or "rock and roll" for sex. Whether it originated as blues, jump-blues, piano boogie, or even came from a white artist with country roots like Hard Rock Gunter. This thesis is not widely accepted among rock critics/scholars, to offer an understatement. (But while simple-minded, it's not the worst way to approach a thorny historical/theoretical issue) But Tosches' claim for what can be called r&r music is beside the point: in the process of making his claim, he traces dozens of uses of the phrase in white and (mostly) black music before Berry, Little Rich. and Elvis. Some certainly in the second half of the 1930s, as the so-called Bluebird Beat uptempo sound was nudging country blues in the direction of a city feel, and boogie piano and early efforts by Big Joe Turner and similar shouters were rushing toward jump-blues, the black form that most directly fed into "R&R."

So the short answer has two parts: Yes, the phrase was fairly common on the air waves, pretty much exclusivley as a very ungenteel, crude reference to sex; and No, unless the soldier shouting it was Black, he was not very likely to know the phrase well and have it on the tip of his tongue...

So this is a very direct and strong piece of anachronism, tying in to (what i mentioned at first) the recent macho americanist/militarist appropriation of the phrase....
--
Mark P.

↑ Index

127. Tosh
Re: Shouting Rock and Roll in Prvt. Ryan
Tue 4 Aug 1998

I still think they were saying 'lock & load.'

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

128. Henry G
Re: Oh Henry
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On Tue, 4 Aug 1998 09:16:59 -0400 Mark Prejsnar said:
>
>Good poetry is possible in all modes, even the very conservative ones >favored by Henry. He offers no substance of critique regarding >particular poets or poems; i see nothing to engage in his snipes.
>
>I find Robert's bit quoted above far too broad and abstract to move us >much further....
>
>This reification of broad critical categories ("syntactically disjunctive >mode"..ugh!) is just not very helpful.
>
>Folks are chiming in with great sanctimoniousness (like Henry's own) about >how wonderful these crticisms are...Er, so far as far as i can see, the >clothes have no emperor. Thus far. Neo-conservatisim rools, i guess.

Mark, if you use the word "conservative" one more time, I might start to think you are stooping to broad critical categories yourself. You want me to have a roll call of some of the hundreds of "disjunctive" poets? It's unfair to talk about pervasive styles? What is poetics anyway? Ad hominem snipes at "reactionaries"? The naked emperors in my battle plan are the babies of the postmod scholars - those who lay claim to be the few scholars attending to "contemporary" work - who have all the young college students getting headaches over their turgid academic poetry. But you stick with the ad hominems, Mark - it's a way of showing that post-lang people can still get personal. - Henry G.

↑ Index

129. Maria Damon
Re: Academic exchange value
Tue 4 Aug 1998

---

thanks david this is exactly the kind of "salvage work" and rhetoric that goes nowhere and one reason i find institutional histories, etc not very inspiring. however, may i suggest that a lot of essays on poets and poetry (like, i hope, my own) dont follow the model you suggest below? kristin ross's writing on rimbaud, watten's ILS piece, michael davidson's recent work on the 50s --all go far beyond championing "underdog" poets.

At 3:28 PM -0400 8/3/98, David Kellogg wrote:
>No matter who you're talking about, the "academic exhange value" of any >contemporary poetry is assumed to lie in its ability to be _promoted_ in >the critical essay or review. Whether you're writing on John Hollander or >Charles Bernstein, Amy Clampitt or Susan Howe, academic value is wrenched >out of poetry as a relentless critical project. Pick your own favorite >essay on a poet and see if it matches this rough structure:
>
>1. Most contemporary poetry is [moribund, pathetic, too academic, not >academic enough, too trendy, not trendy enough, too much form, too much >content]. [Pages of examples]
>
>2. The work of [poet's name here], however, bucks this trend. As a >result, [poet's name here]'s work has been ignored. Critics have hitherto >been unable to deal with this poet's [intellect, emotion, epistemology, >sexuality, bad attitude, vocabulary] and have written [poet's name here] >out of the canon. I propose to correct this oversight.
>
>3. [Pages of counter-examples from the work of the poet]
>
>4. If only the world would pay attention to [poet's name here], we >would all love poetry. Pity the world doesn't follow my shining >example.
>
>
>----------
>
>Now THERE'S a bankrupt tradition for you: yet it seems to be viable all >over the place, certainly not restricted to any one wing of the academic >critical establishment.
>
>Cheers,
>David
>~~~

130. MAYHEW
should we criminalize mediocrity?
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Should we criminalize mediocrity?
There are practical details to be worked out...
So few of us (brilliant intellectuals) left to run the nation
And who among us is not mediocre?
Though to have escaped detection for so many years is itself a form of genuis.
Conversely, the prisons would be filled with insecure genuises
Who would sooner confess their mediocrity than endure the agonizing wait...

On another note: Henry declares American poetry at an impasse--but he doesn't read his own contemporaries, since they are not necessary to his own writing. All other poets fall into some category which disqualifies them in advance--New York poets are snide art-world groupies, Language Poets are ruining poetry, New Formalists are beyond the pale, etc... except, of course, for Henry Gould, reader of the great Russians. Is this a fair paraphrase?

I would suggest more generosity of response to one's own time. "as if it would never leave me and were / the inexorable product of my own time." (FO'H).

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

131. henry
Re: should we criminalize mediocrity?
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On Tue, 4 Aug 1998 10:02:53 -0500 MAYHEW said:
>
>On another note: Henry declares American poetry at an impasse--but he >doesn't read his own contemporaries, since they are not necessary to his >own writing. All other poets fall into some category which disqualifies >them in advance--New York poets are snide art-world groupies, Language >Poets are ruining poetry, New Formalists are beyond the pale, etc... >except, of course, for Henry Gould, reader of the great Russians. Is this >a fair paraphrase?

>
>I would suggest more generosity of response to one's own time. "as if it >would never leave me and were / the inexorable product of my own time."
>(FO'H).

You may be right, Jonathan. I've sniffed out quite a few of them briefly - will let you know if any become necessary for me. In the meantime I'd like to remind you that running as fast as I can away from American poetry of the last 20 years IS a kind of response to it - may not be generous, granted - but I've tried to sketch out some of my reasons for doing so - Henry G. the insufferable snoboob

↑ Index

132. Mark Prejsnar
a few basics
Tue 4 Aug 1998

One of the most helpful theoretical claims to emerge from the recent decades has to do with what a poem does. Ultimately, this claim is useful to cobble together an approximate measure for all kinds of poetry, including more normative types accepted throughout most of the literary establishment. (One thing lost in the last few days, partly because of the high-intensity of Henry's rhetoric, is that almost all financial/institutional resources in our culture, are still geared toward lionizing and supporting "art writing" of a very conservative sort, which actually quite directly dismisses most vibrant writing as irrelevant..) But mostly this theoretical claim is about what less mainstream types of writing are setting out to try to do...

The claim is, that poetry can and does actually create and set in motion, and constitute, an experience. It is not (or should not be) about evoking, recapturing, describing or narrating an "experience." It is, in and of itself, experience.

This seems a very uncontroversial claim, if put forward about Monet or Pollack, Mahler or Ornette, John Zorn or the Mekons, about many dance pieces. Even about the theater of Richard Foreman and his disciple Robert Wilson (though they have their neo-conservative detractors).

But it is still hard to establish this as a working premise among poetry folks. None the less, i'm convinced that it is true. It explains part of what's going on in many of the best pieces of, say, Clark Coolidge.

Within the creation of a vibrant experience, there are always thematic resonances ; in Raphael there are angels, in Monet there are landscapes and Parisians (and the angels and landscapes and Parisians often shimmer with the tensions of history and perception..) , in a Mekon song there may be 5 different social issues, twisted through 3 layers subjective angst.... In all these forms, for the thematic "subject" to register, there has to first be an electricity in the paint or the guitars (or the words).

But the theory of recent decades points to a regard for the feel and excitement of poetry, as in Coolidge. A poet for whom thematic resonances are primary, in a sense, is Susan Howe. Yet her work creates an experience ... The simultaneous marshelling (martialing?) of sound and vizpo word patterns, of difficulty wading thru thick colliding lines on the page, drags the reader into a historical morass of suspicion, confrontation, violence and war..

I use the word "resonance" to emphasize that good writing can come in all sorts of styles, including ones where the "subject" is embodied in the text-texture; thus, not using normal syntax or even normal words IS NOT THE ISSUE (which is why i dissent from the majority, who take henry's broad generalizations seriously)

If we're thinking about work of the last few decades, that connects up with Oppen and Zuke and Stein (and Vallejo and Celan), then the issue is the creation of vibrant experience through understanding and working with your medium

This point of view leaves plenty of room to admire and understand a fine lyric written with more familiar verbal gestures and sytax, such as Henry's "Notes on a Still Life," which i published in issue #4 of my mag, Misc. Proj. There are many different ways to kick consciousness in the direction of an experience.

But this analysis is tied historically to a partisan stance in favor of verbal adventurousness. I believe what i'm refering to here is partly what Ron had in mind in his comment (in ILS at the Perelman symposium?) that there was still a long way to go in fully realizing a poetry that transcends, or moves away from, "aboutness."

Indeed, there is plenty of room for greater disjunction among the tools that prosody can reach for, at this juncture. No doubt many people are doing bad poetry that uses forms of disjunction. Not sure that this is stunning news to most of us..Far more bad poetry is being published (in more high-profile contexts) using the smooth sytactic flow HG likes.

But ultimately it is much more interesting to pursue directions of poetry that are generative and risk-taking, and have a vector, soaring quality, using different tools; fear of "disjunction" (an inadequate term for opnness to many different modes of text-structuring) seems uninteresting and unhelpful.

Mark P.

↑ Index

133. Henry Gould
Re: a few basics
Tue 4 Aug 1998

A few basic points. Yes, Mark, a poem is an experience in itself, but not only that. Art is not just about art; it's an apprehension of experience and reality. I have tried to suggest that the contrast of Yeats/Pound might reveal a DIFFERENT PARADIGM for your vaunted "verbal adventurousness". An adventurousness revealed within a pattern of normal or simple speech structures. But the partisanship you subscribe to is not open to this idea: your strategy is to set up the exemplars (Clark Coolidge, Susan Howe, undoubtedly fine practitioners) - claim the theoretical high ground (so much MORE bad middlebrow poetry is written in traditional sentences) - and defend the pillbox, with its motto: explode the forms (sentence, stanza, etc.). And let the new generations of radical resisters rise, proud & strong, unable to spell or write a complex sentence, but hey - it's poetry. My dislike for this front is not a matter of snobbery, however. I disagree with the basic apprehension of reality underlying it, the philosophical bases. But let's not get into a thing about politics or postmodernism. BECAUSE art is about more than itself - these debates bring out - or seem to bring out - IDEOLOGICAL differences over what "reality" is, where our commitments lie. And that leads to more long boring abstract debates... - Henry G.

↑ Index

134. david bromige
ron o'silliman
Tue 4 Aug 1998

sure and havent I been after telling Ron this for decades now, tis time to come out of that Celtic Twilight into the sun of common day. Same for Bob O'Hass also, him and Ron being alike as two peas in the pod. The mystifications of "Meditation at Lagunitas" smells of the druid censer no less than those of "Ketjak" and "Tjanting." Appears that not until the Liffey flows with Guinness shall we hear the plain speech of common sense from these two boyos, (brothers, tis rumored, though the connection has been hushed up). On a seperate but related issue, I would love for Randolph Healey to demonstrate his argued point, just that any poem by RH boils my potatoes. David O'Boy Bromige

↑ Index

135. Andrew D Epstein
Re: should we criminalize mediocrity?
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Jonathan Mayhew wrote:

>>I would suggest more generosity of response to one's own time. "as if it would never leave me and were / the inexorable product of my own time." (FO'H).>>

While I agree with Jonathan's call for greater generosity to our contemporaries, I thought it was interesting that he quoted O'Hara on this. I think that line speaks more to O'Hara's desire to have his own poetry be as contemporary as possible and has less to do with the poetry of his time written by others...

and remember his comment in "Statement for the New American Poetry," where his annoyance sounds a bit like Henry with one major distinction:

"I dislike a great deal of contemporary poetry -- all of the past you read is usually quite great -- but it is a useful thorn to have in one's side."

I think that last clause makes all the difference.

This discussion also reminds me of O'Hara's quip about "mediocrity" and the poetry of his peers that he didn't like, when asked to comment on it: "It'll slip into oblivion without my help."

Take care,

Andrew

↑ Index

136. david bromige
poetry in the age of medication
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Poets here to ruin poetry? Youre goddam right we are! Whats the point in leaving it just the way we found it? I HATE POETRY . Poetry that seduced me with its (and my) worst impulses when I was utterly vulnerable to its insinuations!? Poetry the molester of children's minds? The Trauma of Poetry, of having been poetized, can never be forgiven never cured in therapy.

Just about any of the poetry that we call Maindrainins doest look to be written from any such wounds, but it is. It's is written in denial of those wounds, it is written to protect the molester, it is written by incest victims unable to acknowledge the fatal tinkering to which they were subject while too green or too conflicted to enjoy their outrage.

I exaggerate? Name me one poet you admire who left Poetry the same as it had been before. Poetry that opens my lips and shuts my mouth. Poetry that wants me to lie down and let the past roll all over me. And makes me want just that.

David

↑ Index

137. Michael Magee
Re: a few basics
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Henry: "And let the new generations of radical resisters rise, proud & strong, unable to spell or write a complex sentence, but hey - it's poetry."

Now, come on Henry: I realize we're in full generalizing mode at this point in the dialogue, but, as a member of the "new generation," I write one hell of a complex sentence, and am a fine speller. Moreover, I'll go toe to toe with anyone on the subject of Yeats anytime, any place. The point is this: why on earth is it so hard to believe that someone would make a very honest (read non-conspiratorial) choice to employ non-narrative rhetorical strategies without positioning herself against every strategy employed in the days of yore, in fact, without situating her verse as polemic in the least. The poet is trying to do something with the poem, to be sure, but rarely - rarely - is that thing a simple, caricatured, attempt at "explosion." I can never remember sitting down with some paper and thinking to myself, "How can I go about lingusitically exploding the world-structure?" Is this a common point of departure for anyone? The truth is, motivations range widely but also, in a sense, stay the same: some poets are interested in "the political unconscious" of form - which is simply to say they believe that, on a contextual basis, grammar and syntax can imply a politics; or more generally, that form is one "anticipatory arena where actuality and possibility, past and present, are allowed to collaborate on a history of the future" (James Livingston). Or put in the simplest form: some poets want to write in a new way because, socially speaking, they want something new. Other poets are more focussed on finding a language which feels compatible with their immediate apprehension of experience. Provided there are measures taken against self-indulgence, that's good and interesting too, isn't it? And might not parataxis of one sort or another be one viable method for these various motives? And aren't those motives acceptable and worthwhile? If your answer to these questions is yes, then I suggest you take a harder look at what is out there and what is coming out. The difficulty of Yeats is tempered by one's willingness to read Yeats long and hard - the reader patiently develops a symbolic economy that will suffice. But of course he's "Yeats": the name alone goes along way to convincing us that the effort is worth it. I know its hard to imagine b/c his context is too set in stone, his methodology too clearly a link in the chain of tradition, but would anyone be able to read, say, "Nineteen Hundred and Nineteen," devoid of context? Or, more to the point, would they bother? "Many ingenious lovely things are gone / That seemed sheer miracle to the multitude, / Protected from the circle of the moon / That pitches common things about." Without context this too becomes gibberish. What it comes down to is whether you have any real interest in the methods and contexts of these "experimental" poets. If you do, you'll take the time to have a good look and probably like much. If you don't, ah well, you won't. But I don't believe the discussion of whether these poets are "good" or "serious" is a very worthwhile discussion. Clearly, they are serious, and, in many contexts, good.

-m.

↑ Index

138. dbkk
Bellamy reading in SF
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Hi, this is Dodie. If any Bay Area localites are looking for something to do next Wednesday, August 12, at 7:30, I'll be reading from The Letters of Mina Harker at A Different Light bookstore on Castro Street. They have this great carrot/ginger/parsley juice cocktail at the yogurt place next door.

↑ Index

139. Mark Prejsnar
Re: a few basics
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On Tue, 4 Aug 1998, Henry Gould wrote:

> A few basic points. Yes, Mark, a poem is an experience in itself, but not only that. Art is not just about art; it's an apprehension of experience and reality.

No no no no no .....

Creating an experience, an experience field, has NOTHING WHATSOEVER to do with the art "being about art." A sedate exercise in writing a poem "about" a pre-existing "subject," where topical laziness kills the drive and the writing, is more "about art" than a Howe or Coolidge poem is. Good writing is a kind of perturbed severity, a confrontation with historicity and difficult living. It is complex and mobilizes sound and (may use) all possible manner of typological textual arrangement. Including various furors and strategies that middle-brow market-culture calls "nonsense" and "disjunction." (But these are inadequate words.)

I was arguing before (in terms i borrow from Silliman) for a writing field-of-possibility within which at least some of the poets are "moving away from 'aboutness.' " Which (you should note, but you haven't) has NOTHING to do with not having thematic resonance. How the hell could Howe, the most deeply historical poet now writing, be "about art" fa crissakes??

You are clinging to "aboutness." I remain convinced that my field of possibilities is more interesting and exciting. But in any case i definitely reject your terms and their conceptual underpinnings.

huffily,
Mark

↑ Index

140. henry
Re: a few basics
Tue 4 Aug 1998

On Tue, 4 Aug 1998 12:43:20 -0400 Mark Prejsnar said:
>On Tue, 4 Aug 1998, Henry Gould wrote:
>
>> A few basic points. Yes, Mark, a poem is an experience in itself, but >> not only that. Art is not just about art; it's an apprehension of >> experience and reality.
>
>
>No no no no no .....
>
>Creating an experience, an experience field, has NOTHING WHATSOEVER to do >with the art "being about art." A sedate exercise in writing a poem >"about" a pre-existing "subject," where topical laziness kills the drive >and the writing, is more "about art" than a Howe or Coolidge poem is. Good >writing is a kind of perturbed severity, a confrontation with historicity >and difficult living. It is complex and mobilizes sound and (may use) all >possible manner of typological textual arrangement. Including various >furors and strategies that middle-brow market-culture calls "nonsense" and >"disjunction." (But these are inadequate words.)

But Mark, you yourself were just saying (in previous post) that poetic theory has advanced to the point of recognizing that writing/reading a poem is an experiential process. You compared it to other art forms (painting, poetry) to suggest that it's the thick textual/performative experience, not the derivable meanings, that's the thing itself. Okay. I have no problem with that. I just think that the thing itself is never just the thing itself, and stylistic choices reflect stances toward reality and history. I introduced the Yeats / Pound argument not because I'm stuck in the past, as Andrew Epstein seemed to imply, but because I knew people would find it outrageous. Susan Howe may be a deeply historical poet, but that doesn't forestall entirely different approaches to the same history (poetic and general history). - Henry G.

↑ Index

141. Tom Orange
(no subject)
Tue 4 Aug 1998

---

getting to the point of entry of particulars, the problems perhaps boiling down to (not?) finding and making articulations, as critics, readers, and writers, appropriate to quote-unquote disjunctive poetries.

as has already been mentioned, "disjunctive" as a blanket term pretty much loses any valence in terms of particulars. take the line by diane ward quote by joe safdie quoted by perloff, and take another line by, say, karen mac cormack:

> Dark windows in which a list followed by facts us erupt > chilling comparing.
>
> The point isn't just to changing points needs it overblown more than complex guarantee...

can we say what/how these lines mean, where the disjunctions occur and what kind they are, give close readings that don't simply normalize the syntax back into stable meaning(s), that in turn allows us to draw larger implications for these individual works, authors, and any "camps" in which they may be said to "belong"?

or how about two more examples, where the disjunction is taking place more, but not exclusively, at a level between sentences than within them:

> A paradox is eaten by the space around it.
> I'll repeat what I said.
> To make a city into a season is to wear sunglasses inside a > volcano.
> He never forgets his dreams.
> The effect of the lack of effect.
>
> He would live against sentences.
> Trees here of leaf the several speakers.
> Tiered objects of her talking and water below.
> Trees of sound to broaden shadow.
> Damp walls will quiet things.

aside from taking these passage individually, can we discern how/if, to follow donald wellman's question, there are disjuntions other than those of the surface? why/whether the first is barrett watten and the second is michael palmer? why/whether it matters?

enough with the rhetorical questions. possible articulations as critics/readers: 1) close the book(s) in dismay or disgust, no meaning to get, or, whatever meaning to be had not worth the effort, the difficulties marking an area of exclusive or esoteric readership. 2) perform the apologia pro poetica sua that it strikes me perloff's commentary performs; which is not to slag perloff by any means, but again the treatises in defense of langpoesie continue to repeat the same arguments of old, cudgeling even the already converted (read: mystified?). 3) supplementary to 2), trot out critical truisms (i.e. maintain the economy of academic exchange value) about the challenges to stable reference, the resistance to meaning-as- commodity, the invitations to the reader to create meaning, etc. corollaries to 3): a) read a given poet's (or poets') work along these lines using a given theme, say, "(method)" in "(charles bernstein)"; b) offer a close reading of a few lines as synecdochally illustrative.

we are in dire need of further possible articulations. we need a critical vocabulary in which to fruitfully discern and discuss the ways in which these writings are operating here. if anything we are truly lacking, rather than taking, a "theoretical high ground."

this i think is one aspect of the impasse that henry finds us in, as pertains to critics and readers.

the other aspect pertains to writers (dividing poetic labor as such for argument's sake). again, henry chooses for his writing not to follow such leads, a choice which should, if disagreed with, at least be respected. any choice entails risks, the risks of henry's choice being apparent in the discussion.

the risks of the other choice, to follow the leads of "disjunctivity" (but again the choice is not one of such simple opposition; i can think of lise downe from toronto, whose two books show a very judicious use of disjunction woven with a very beautiful and more syntactically conventional lyricism), already suggested, if somewhat bluntly, by mark p. and others, namely "bad disjunctive writing," are indeed great.

the issue of eso/exotericism is a serious one, as is the possibility that once the devices of disjunction have been laid out the writing becomes simply a matter of manipulating the devices. i wonder too, to get back to linda russo's earlier question about the institutionalization of language writing can be thought to have a part in this -- tho i can't imagine a workshop at, say, buffalo, brown, naropa, ucsd, new college, etc., in which an young writer would be told: "this is good, but it needs to be more disjunctive: work in some anacoluthon here, use more parataxis here, and torque it up a bit here..."

"disjunction"'s possibilities are far from exhausted. with the further development of such devices (as opposed to their mere reiteration and recombination), however needs to come the further development of critical sensibilities to distinguish how and when the devices are operating and on what terms those operations can be said to be "effective." no division of labor here...

bests,
t.

↑ Index

142. Tom Orange
saving disjunctive
Tue 4 Aug 1998

---

sorry all, the last message shoulda had the above subject heading...

hastily hitting "yes-to-send",
t.

↑ Index

143. charssmith
Re: In which will be found what is set forth therein
Tue 4 Aug 1998

In a message dated 98-08-03 15:57:13 EDT, you write:

<< & Who is it on the list who was trying to put together a collection of Dan Davidson's work? >>

Aldon -- I think that was Gary Sullivan, who's, ummm .... "vacationing" now.

I've glanced "Long Division" a few times now, but haven't given it a real read yet. Never knew Dan or his work. Thanks for putting this out.

best,

charles

↑ Index

144. Alaric Sumner
Bill Griffiths FWD Seaham Unaligned Literary & Philosophical Association
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Bill Griffiths is pleased to announce a new web site at <www.gmtnet.co.uk/sulpha> (for Seaham Unaligned Literary & Philosophical Association).

This deals with local history matters, includes a talk on superstitions by Bill and a few ghost stories.
It has been prepared for the internet by Bob Trubshaw of Heart of Albion Press, to whom Bill is duly grateful.
For what we are up against, by all means visit an 'official' site like <www.seaham.com/timeless/mayday.htm>.
The SULPhA site will be changed three times a year (Xmas, Easter, August), and suggestions and contributions are welcome.

[redacted]

↑ Index

145. Mark DuCharme

Re: Luoma

Tue 4 Aug 1998

Bill Luoma wrote:

> <<But I don't want a pineapple.>>
>
> ok Mark D., what do you want?

Just a cigarette, & a feeling of satisfaction when it's all through. Except I don't smoke.

Bill L. continues:

> what's your address btw, and you Todd Barron and you Pat Pritchett?

2965 13th Street
Boulder, CO 80304

Ciao,

--Mark DuCharme

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

146. trbell

Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media

Tue 4 Aug 1998

Although this might be a gross over-simplification, one of the major issues for me is that I would like the reader to be involved in 'constructing' the poem. I am aware that this goes back to Iser and there may be other sources I am not familiar with.

I am also aware that I tend very much toward th incomprehensible end of the spectrum of asking the reader for input in building the experience - i tend to often be as 'difficult' in my interpersonal relations.

If i am right in this would there then be 'lazy readers' and readers who are more willing to invest themselves?

Some of this concern for the reader and the relationship undoubtably relates to my life as a practicing psychologist. BTW it is my impression that the field (and related fields) has abandoned focus on self-revelation, confession, self-expresion, etc. so that poetry of this type is to a large extent foundationless. [however, there are more specifically-defined and concrete areas where self-expression and 'writing' - if done right - do have effects and their efficacy has very good research support]

I'll end before I wander too far away

At 10:15 AM 8/4/98 +0100, you wrote:
>from [redacted]
>
>----------
>> From: Safdie Joseph
>
>>.....I've been giving a close (academic) >> reading to Marjorie Perloff's _Writing Poetry in the Age of Media_
>
>>.....two questions
>> immediately: one, is the "aspirational thought" of John Cage that she >> cites really a model for anyone here? That is, are we bound, as current >> practitioners, to find a way OUT of our present mess, rather than just >> present the mess? And two, she quotes our List Master as differentiating >> between modes of fragmentation, preferring the kind that "reflects a >> conception of meaning as prevented by conventional narration . . . >> dipping into other possibilities available within language." In this >> formulation and others I've seen promoting "discovery," I smell the >> vague but undeniable odor of mystification -- we can never say exactly >> WHAT those "other possibilities" are. Fair enough, but when does the >> endless spiraling outward become simple bad faith?
>
>On point one: the thought of poets of any stripe setting themselves the >project of finding pat answers is an unhappy one. Yet there are no neutral >descriptions, and even should one attempt to "just present the mess" such a >presentation will insensibly move in certain directions. I would consider >the principle of "aspirational thought" to be satisfied if the writer can >keep the ambiguities of the situation in suspension rather than >crystallising prematurely. Which I think fits well with Cage's awareness >that chance and cadence have the same root.

>
>On point two: . My initial reaction to fragmented syntax was that it may >be used as a probe which does not impose any particular hierarchy on the >possibilities it discovers. And it seemed that the experience of the >reading was an inseparable part of the text. Which is why I think it is >hard to talk about such poetry without falling a little flat: the analysis >of a rollercoaster ride in terms of velocity and pitch is not quite the >same as the real thing. The what of those "other possibilities" can be >indicated explicitly, if not definitively, in terms of individual texts, >and I am strongly tempted to demonstrate this, only an unwillingness to >inflict what may be entirely personal lucubrations preventing me.
>
>Randolph Healy
>
>

↑ Index

147. R.Gancie/C.Parcelli

an example of the fundamental contradiction of scientific analysis, typified

Tue 4 Aug 1998

"Hence the entire system is TOTALLY[?!], intensely conservative, locked into itself, utterly impervious to any "hints" from the outside world. Through its properties, by the microscopic clockwork function that establishes between DNA and protein, as between organism and medium, an entirely one way relationship, this system obviously[?] defies any dialectical description. It is not Hegelian at all, but thoroughly Cartesian: the cell is indeed a machine.... Physics tells us however that--save at absolute zero, an inaccessible limit--no microscopic entity can fail to undergo quantum perturbations, whose ACCUMULATION WITHIN A MACROSCOPIC SYSTEM WILL SLOWLY BUT SURELY ALTER ITS STRUCTURE."---from Chance and Necessity by Jacques Monod --- What happened to the "totally...conservative " "Cartesian" "machine" in the face of "quantum perturbations?" Well, within an experimental context, e.g. analytically, the 'totally conservative system' finds an existence. In reality (or even meta-analytically) it is impractical and, e.g. be ethically supportable as regards the environment etc.---Carlo Parcelli And Monod won the Dynamite Prize.

↑ Index

148. toddbaron
basics
Tue 4 Aug 1998

"poetry is derived (obviously) from everyday existence--(real or ideal)" Zukofsky

"first there is need--then--the way--then the name--then the formula " Reznikoff

↑ Index

149. Maria Damon
Re: Academic exchange value
Tue 4 Aug 1998

---

thanks again, and it's true, i must admit, that the reception of my work if i can be permitted so smug and grandiose a phrase has been very different in the poetry world and in the cult stud world, which has been confusing to me since the reception in the poetry world has been much warmer and more proactive than the cult studs world although i find much of the poetry world's concerns myopic and solipsistic (sp?). still, the po-folks have gotten excited about essays on kaufman and spicer/duncan, whereas in the intro to that book i make a point of saying that the kaufman essay fits most neatly into a dated "man and his work" salvage operation. the cult studs, on the other hand, to the extent that they've been interested at all, have remarked on the material about previously unpublished "naive" poets. while i myself ahve found it more interesting intellectually to write about the latter, the relatively warm response i've received from the poetry community, combined with the way my tenure process straitjacketed me into a "poetry job" (I was ordered to remove from my list of prospective tenure reviewers people who were not primarily scholars of 20th c american poetry in the narrowest sense of the term), has resulted in my gravitating away from the subjects i found of intellectual interest.

At 9:54 AM -0400 8/4/98, David Kellogg wrote:
>On Tue, 4 Aug 1998, Maria Damon wrote:
>
>> thanks david this is exactly the kind of "salvage work" and rhetoric that >> goes nowhere and one reason i find institutional histories, etc not very >> inspiring. however, may i suggest that a lot of essays on poets and poetry >> (like, i hope, my own) dont follow the model you suggest below? kristin >> ross's writing on rimbaud, watten's ILS piece, michael davidson's recent >> work on the 50s --all go far beyond championing "underdog" poets.

>
>You're welcome. I agree with you on all these works, including your own;
>but their refusal to fit that mold is one reason, perhaps, why their _own_ >value is sometimes viewed suspiciously by perplexed readers who want the >same-old-same-old. The effort to carve out a new cultural-poetic critical >writing is something I'm keenly interested in, as you know (and something >I view as basically collaborative, including all the above, myself, and >many others) -- readers' resistance to that critical work is buttressed by >the dominance of a stale "salvage" model that always-already presents >itself as novel, even if its form is predictable in its entirety.
>
>> At 3:28 PM -0400 8/3/98, David Kellogg wrote:
>> >No matter who you're talking about, the "academic exhange value" of any >> >contemporary poetry is assumed to lie in its ability to be _promoted_ in >> >the critical essay or review. Whether you're writing on John Hollander or >> >Charles Bernstein, Amy Clampitt or Susan Howe, academic value is wrenched >> >out of poetry as a relentless critical project. Pick your own favorite >> >essay on a poet and see if it matches this rough structure:
>> >
>> >1. Most contemporary poetry is [moribund, pathetic, too academic, not >> >academic enough, too trendy, not trendy enough, too much form, too much >> >content]. [Pages of examples]
>> >
>> >2. The work of [poet's name here], however, bucks this trend. As a >> >result, [poet's name here]'s work has been ignored. Critics have hitherto >> >been unable to deal with this poet's [intellect, emotion, epistemology,
>> >sexuality, bad attitude, vocabulary] and have written [poet's name here]
>> >out of the canon. I propose to correct this oversight.
>> >
>> >3. [Pages of counter-examples from the work of the poet]
>> >
>> >4. If only the world would pay attention to [poet's name here], we >> >would all love poetry. Pity the world doesn't follow my shining >> >example.
>> >
>> >
>> >----------
>> >
>> >Now THERE'S a bankrupt tradition for you: yet it seems to be viable all >> >over the place, certainly not restricted to any one wing of the academic >> >critical establishment.

>> >
>> >Cheers,
>> >David
>>
>~~~

lot (the book The Stone Cottage details this). I don't mean this to be catty - it actually helps me make a larger point, namely, that our either/or approach to arguments about poetic innovation gets in the way any attempt to discuss actual details in the poetic landscape (and vice versa). Though I hate to use myself as an example, I'm a good case in point: my biggest influence as a college student was Robert Cording, a professor at my college and a good poet who most people would consider mainstream/normative, whatever label you might like to apply. Through him I read Keats, Wordsworth, Yeats, Frost, Stevens, Williams, Bishop, Lowell, others. Now, I still read all these poets, though through a somewhat different lens and Bob Cording and I still talk about poetry, including our own, all the time. By most accounts on this list he and I should want to kill each other. But I think our relationship makes perfect sense and that the tensions are productive. Nor does it seem to me anomalous: how else to explain Donald Hall's longtime support of Berrigan, Perelman and others. I don't mean this to be a "why can't we all get along" argument, far from it. But it sure would be nice to argue particulars every once in a while. Why does Donald Hall read Perelman so carefully (as he once told me he did)? Now that would be a question to answer with specifics.

So, now that I've advocated for specifics, I should probably make use of some. I thought I'd post and discuss a couple short poems that appear in the first issue of COMBO, one by Lee Ann Brown, one by Louis Cabri, two "my generation" writers with plenty of experimental pedigree.

Lee Ann's:

"Valentines"

a wide-eyed leaning forward chewing on the gristle rolling our eyes in the heart of the matter glossy arches liquid maps

we could use a place like this in your neighborhood Eat our vegetables they'll do a gearbox good

Done details:
Memo
15 of 15
Valentines,
I kiss you
Six million times

plus one raised to the max higher power propertius anonymous
I won't give you away don't put the light on unless you absolutely have to

There’s so much to like here but the first thing I’d like to point out is that the last thing in the world this poem does is arrogantly break of communication with the reader. There’s even some tried-and-true poetic devices present: the linebreak at "we could use a place," for instance, which broadens the possibilities in the casual sentence, "we could use a place like this in your neighborhood." In that line break I hear Creeley’s insistence that "place is a real event - where you are is a law equal to what you are." As such, "we could use a place /" seems emblematic of a desire for position (subject position? positioning which would fuse "your neighborhood" with "my neighborhood"?) which runs counter to the casualness of the sentence as a whole (we could use any place like this) and counter to the desire for anonymity highlighted at the poem’s end. I like too the range in tone and style, all the different registers: that serious conclusion out of context might be mistaken for Adrienne Rich or someone - but it’s right next to "Six million times / plus one / raised to the max higher power" - this is the language of childhood "I hate you infinity plus one!") without the diminution in value which would generally go along with it - then, too, there’s "rolling our eyes / in the heart of the matter" gnarling two clichés together in a manner which bears comparison not to Rich but to Chris Stroffolino: putting these two clichés together somehow forces the words "eyes" and "heart" out of the world of abstraction and back into talk of the body. Obviously what happens there on the level of poetics (the way Brown very consciously gets this effect) has major ramifications for the poem as a whole, which is largely about bodies: bodies fed, bodies as maps, bodies revealed, bodies concealed. Anonymity is a kind of flexibility but also, potentially, a kind of concealment, and this seems to be one conflict latent in the poem. Anonymity also can suggest the dangers involved in naming, in coming into view: "I won’t give you away" - because if I give you away (reveal who you are, where you are) then I give you away (give you over to the hands of someone else). That one is "given away" in a marriage ceremony seems of potential relevance as well. "liquid maps" jumps out at me: what to do when maps are liquid, a question the poem seems to complexly address.

So, on to the next one, Louis Cabri’s:

from For Alan Davies

"Water proof"

How about that, voice.
How about that voice.
How about that choice.

How about that bit.
How about that, hoarse.
How about that drink forgets it.

How about that quartz awhile replaced it.
How about that quart.
How about that habit dressed to spill now.

For instance how about that backyard time.
And that body too eh.
How about that comma rhyme.

I like the tensions set up right from the beginning. The first line evokes a kind of "New American" immediacy (Louis is Canadian): "How about that, voice" - it seems to say, well, what do you know, here we are. But dropping the comma - "How about that voice" - makes the sentence look backward at line 1 and the sense of immediacy is compromised: we're talking - possibly - about a previous voice now. Likewise with the 3rd line where we may be talking about the previous 2. Tonally, I feel like the poem can be read almost as elegy for this reason: each sentence looks back on its predecessor and we drift closer to the past tense: this is mediated by attempts to "replace" and "forget" (attempts which are interestingly couple with more Steinian invention), but is reinforced somewhat by "habit" and put pretty clearly in "How about that backyard time" which wants to be extended into historical narrative - "How about that backyard time when…" The last two lines seem to me to warn against the seductiveness of invention for its own sake: the "comma rhyme"-as-"hot body" a reminder of the masculinist fantasy of "breaking the mold," etc (who called Olson's model "the phallic lung"?)

Anyway, Lee Ann and Louis probably feel like I've butchered them in public by now but, my own misreadings aside, I think the exercise has its point: that these poems, by young poets whose names, if recognized, would be pitched most assuredly into the "disjunctive" school, are actually highly readable and pertinent to discussions of societies and langauges on many, many levels. There's much good writing going on in all shapes and sizes.

-m.

↑ Index

151. Douglas
Re: help w/ djuna barnes
Tue 4 Aug 1998

The Barnes papers are the University of Maryland, College Park in the Special Collections. There you will find anything she'd been working on. There are numerous poems in that collection, but each has been written over, crossed out, deleted, revised, crossed out, written over again, etc. that it would take a true textual scholar to come up with anything. And frankly, the poetry is just not as interesting as her other works. But then, that's my opinion about it.

Douglas Messerli

R M Daley wrote:
>
> can anyone help me out with a bit of digging about?- trying to > find out what happened to the > work-in-progress found in djuna barnes > apt when she died? (according to shari benstock, a poem she had been > working on for thirty years) - or point me in the direction of barnes' > papers, etc -
>
> or even just carolyn burke's address
>
> thanks
>
> rd

↑ Index

152. Donald Wellman
Re: saving disjunctive
Tue 4 Aug 1998

I was hedging some hunches in the last part of my post concerning the "disjunctive" surface of the poem. Tom Orange's post has encouraged me to elaborate more on what is on my mind. Both of his examples (lines from Diane Ward and Barrett Watten) create or slide through disjunctions in the language. Disjunctions of desire (which are the other sort of disjunctions that interest me) do not exist in or mirror language in either case. I suppose I reject the coherence a transparency might suppose. Disjunctions of my desiring might prompt me to narrativize either effect. I could say that Watten provokes a more cinematic response as though each sentence were a frame through which I view a world. If I were to go on about what he has done, I might try to distinguish a super-realism from the easy automatism of surrealism. Surely I will not be longing for one phrase that has the power to cut through my silences. Instead, I will follow the motion, impeded and impelled in my flight by the instinct to read as clues lines that I'd best (it is my hunch) unfold--and they do sustain attention as they unfold.

so i might say that Watten's lines are an example of extensive, serial, and continuously unfolding language, working effectively against my desire for closure, diverging again and again, and thereby compelling my attention. I do still admit to that desire to narrativize. I think Silliman referred to it as the principle of "evisagement" way back in The New Sentence.

Diane's lines are more intriguing to me. I requote two:
"Dark windows in which a list followed by facts us erupt chilling comparing."

Now it is possible that the above could fit into a series such as Watten's, but my impulse is not to follow divergent serial possibilities. Issues of subjectivity seem paramount here. I can successfully narrativize an "erupt"-ed subjectivity. I seem to know more fully what this is about. It is some musical dissonance that echoes with my own sense of perhaps seeing myself erupted--compared, chilled, raw. There is no sliding beyond this for me, but a circling back.

I could use a lot of different adjectives to describe the different effects of each passage. I do not think that distinguishing between disjunctions at the level of phrase or sentence is especially helpful. I do think that each writer has knowingly played their language, managed the effect of it so as to catch, frame, stress a pulse and in each case my instinct to narrativize both sustains my attention and also takes something away from my ability to hear.

I hazard that I am hearing a vision, subject to different turmoils and pacing inexorably in the case of Watten's lines. I feel that I am at a recurring and highly sensitive sticking point when I listen to Ward.

don wellman

↑ Index

153. David Kellogg
yaaay!
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Whenever my 21-month old hears applause on the television or radio, he says "yaaay" and claps. I learn living from him, so I'd like to give a big "yaaay" to Don Wellman and Mike Magee for concretizing the discussion. I found both their posts useful, specific, and helpful, although as I understand it Henry is at least in part calling for a pluralism which I too support, so I'm all with Henry on this point. Yaaay also to Mike Magee for disagreeing with Henry on the smaller point, i.e., Yeats/Pound dichotomy; Stone Cottage is a great book and a similar dichotomy, Pound/ Stevens, as outlined by Marjorie Perloff was roundly critiqued by John Timberman Newcomb in Wallace Stevens and Literary Canons and then later by me, in a quick'n dirty fashion, in my essay on Perloff in Diacritics oh more than a year ago.

Posts like these make the signal/noise ratio on this list worth bearing. Soon I might add signal, but for the moment I remain

Part of the noise,
David
~~~
~~~

> wounds, it is written to protect the molester, it is written by incest > victims unable to acknowledge the fatal tinkering to which they were > subject while too green or too conflicted to enjoy their outrage.
>
> I exaggerate? Name me one poet you admire who left Poetry the same as it > had been before. Poetry that opens my lips and shuts my mouth. Poetry that > wants me to lie down and let the past roll all over me. And makes me want > just that.
>
> David

--YEA! THe idea--scuse me while I kiss Ezra Pound--is to make it new--is to continue in a process--or else end up like Andrew Wyeth!

Todd Baron

↑ Index

155. KENT JOHNSON
Ole!
Tue 4 Aug 1998

This unfolding discussion on the "disjunctive" question is wonderful--one of the best, for me, since I've been on the list. Who are these smart people and where do they come from?

Ole!

(Waiter, please, a little more on the volume and another pack of Turkish ovals...)

And Henry, remember that in the bullfight, if the bull gets the matador, he lives like a king in the fields; if the bull dies and has been brave, he is showered with flowers. The crowd loves its gallant bull.

(Of course, no one is really going to die, which is fantastic!)

Ole!

↑ Index

156. Rachel Loden
instead of a pineapple
Tue 4 Aug 1998

Bill Luoma wrote:

> <<But I don't want a pineapple.>>
>
> ok Mark D., what do you want?

One good thing to want (and I wanted it more than a pineapple) is Bill's new book _Works & Days_ (Hard Press/The Figures), a sort of cracked comic memoir.

"It's a big world out there, and thanks to perception management it appears to be getting smaller."

Rachel

↑ Index

157. trbell
Re: H=E=N=R=Y
Tue 4 Aug 1998

I agree with you here, Mark, with a slightly different twist: is not part of the agenda of the dreaded an attempt to add to/modify/detract from the communal language - I know that it is this for me among other intentions. I also know too well that the songs and rhythmic communications by my teenage kids is an attempt in some ways to subvert my establlished place. - perhaps this is why disjunction is often seen as threatening in poetry?

tom bell

At 10:39 PM 8/3/98 PDT, you wrote:
>I disagree. I don't believe language, even in the texts of the dreaded ><Language Poets>, CAN be private property. I believe language is >inherently communal. This presumption changes how one _reads_ such >texts-- de-esotericizes them, if you will. Perhaps this, I think >strange, belief in language as private property in modernist &
>postmodernist writing (since I assume you would probably extend your >critique not just toward Langpo, but perhaps also to Stein, Zukofsky's
>_"A"_, Un Coup de Des, _Finnegan's Wake_, etc.) explains why you are >seemingly incapable of reading these texts with pleasure, or without >annoyance. Whereas someone like me, who doesn't share your belief in >language as private property in or outside of these writings, IS capable >of reading these texts as non-esoteric-- as a liberation & a pleasure.
>
>--Mark DuCharme
>
>
>
>Henry Gould wrote:
>
>>On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 10:03:15 -0700 Peter Balestrieri said:
>>>

>>> Henry, I'm trying to follow your argument and I'm wondering if >you'd >>> be willing to clarify what you mean by "...the intent was to >critique
>>> another style of appropriation..." Who was doing the critiquing
>and >>> what style of appropriation are you referring to? I think you've >>> raised something important here and I want to be able to better >>> understand what you're saying. Did you mean that Langpo was >critiquing
>>> capitalist "appropriation" but only replaced it with another form
>of >>> appropriation, aesthetic rather than economic? Or am I way off?
>>
>>I think Langpo - hit me, real langpoets out there - was trying to >>write against the appropriation of poetry by 70s MFA "self" factories, >>and against the appropriation of literary space by "privacy capital" of >>all kinds. Their strategy was a drastic one: basically to dynamite the >>rhetorical/communicative function, the authorial function, and so on by >>letting "language" - individual words, non-sequiturs, broken syntax & >>rhetoric - speak (often comically) for itself. I'm suggesting this was >>a kind of unwitting creation of a new kind of private property - sort
>of >>prospecting the dictionary. - Henry G.
>>
>
>
>_____
>Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>
>

↑ Index

158. trbell

Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media

Tue 4 Aug 1998

Charles, You find me talking before acting as I have not yet come up with a way of translating these things to the printed page (and may never be able to.). The examples here are not the only ones out there as you can see, for example, with a visit to the writings scratchpad: http://www.burningpress.org/wreyeting/which is well worth a visit by anyone interested in this area. I don't lay claim to be the only one working in this direction in print or hypertext/visual poetry.

In many of the work I have been doing lately (generally a group of linked smaller pieces or pages) the reader can construct their own poem in a variety of ways by the way they traverse the links, layers, and directions. In several areas words and citations are present at times and then covered at other times in the animation. I am currently experimenting with timing issues: words and images appear at different intervals - at times so fast the reader can get frustrated by or enjoy the amount of time the material is there. I have been looking at the Russian Futurists and other visual/collage/ poem-painting stuff and welcome suggestions as to other sources.

Things I currently have in progress are at http://members.home.net/trbell/motheran.htm
http://members.home.net/trbell/motheran.htm
comments welcome.

My experience constructing these works is here or there in the work. What is your experience reading them this way or that way?

I am involved in a project http://www.acs.ucalgary.ca/~rswillco/PH/ where participants will be able to modify pages and poems done by others and I'm sure it's not theonly one of it's kind - I suspect that the day will come soon when someone can post a poem to let readers make actual changes.

tom bell

At 01:49 AM 8/4/98 -0700, you wrote:
>At 02:07 PM 8/4/98 -0500, you wrote:
>
>When I read what you have posted, I want more explanation of what you mean >is involved in the reader 'constructing' the poem. I think such an act is >involved in a lot of work talked about on the list, from Susan Howe to Alan >Sondheim. So I'm wondering if you have a more specific idea of such >reader-construction in mind.
>
>
>charles
>
>
>charles
>charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
>chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
>books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
>http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

>
>

↑ Index

159. trbell
Re: Writing Poetry in the Age of Media
Tue 4 Aug 1998

---

m, I think what yoou say here articulates very well what I may have been struggling with when I said anything about fear or avoidance of the disjunctive (if I did say anything along those lines). Stepping back or away from _conscious_ responsibility raises the discussion to higher ground.

tom bell

At 07:48 AM 8/4/98 -0400, you wrote:
>Donald Wellman writes:
>"It seems to me that if a poem is disjunctive at the level of syntax >(fragmented syntax) then it will deny the reader an experience of >closure (the rounding out of musical or mathematical form).
>
>This has always seemed to me the primary source of resistance to >disjunctive poetries. They prevent the reader from walking away with a >sense of having got the meaning. They prevent my appropriation of their >language, of the language.
>
>I think this is essentially true, though I'd want to differ slightly - one >can appropriate the disjunctive poem: it's just that, one can't do it >unselfconsciously - that is, one can't do it without being painfully aware >that one has done it: I think must of the discomfort over, say, language >poetry, stems from this: that readers bred on staid narrative or formalist >poem do not want any conscious responsibility for the generation of >meaning, they would rather entertain the fiction that they have "got it" - >that there can be a transcendental (though also very ordinary) connection >between a) authorial intention and readerly recption; or b) between >langauge itself (as deity) and the worshipping reader. The only >difference, then, between, say, a Perelman poem and a Mary Jo Salter poem
>- so far as reading practice is concerned - is that there is a codified >set of reading-rules for the latter which aids the reader so-inclined in >his/her pursuit of that "got it" feeling. In contrast, since Perelman
>"re-instates the vague" as Wm James put it, the reader has a heightened >awareness of her/his own complicity, and either says, "fuck this" and puts >the book down, or accepts a more dialogic/antiphonal poetic model. This >doesn't imply that things don't "mean," just that they mean differently >along different points in a continuum. -m.

>
>

↑ Index

160. Susan Schultz
Re: creative writing at the University of Hawai`i
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Dear friends--for the next three years I will be chair of the creative writing program in the English department at UH; because this is not a job I've held before, I'm writing to solicit suggestions from any of you who have held similar positions, within or without the academy. Please feel free to tell me what worked for you and what didn't. How did you deal with the almost inevitable tensions between creative writers and critics? How did you increase interest in experimental writing? (The emphasis here, though we don't have an MFA, has been on MFA type work, and one of the primary fears has been of theory in any of its guises, and this is only one of the stories, since the tensions between local writers and the academy have also been strong.) What did you do to increase interest and activity among graduate students? Undergrads? What sources of money did you find? Any comments are more than welcome.

Let me also say that, even though there is not a lot of money presently to bring writers out here in the current long state-wide recession, that there are local reading series that pay modestly, and there are audiences for poetry (Juliana Spahr and Bill Luoma and Gabe Welford and Steve Carll are now here all the time). The local writing scene is fractious, fascinating, and important to the culture and politics of the entire state and region. If you're on the list and you're going to visit Hawai`i, please let us know. Anyone planning to visit in mid-September should attend the festival of island writing, which will feature many local poets and fiction writers, as well as Kamau Brathwaite, Sia Figel, and others.

Thanks in advance,

Susan Schultz

↑ Index

161. Hazel Smith
hypermedia piece
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Members of this list might be interested to look at the hypermedia interactive piece "Wordstuffs: the city and the body" created by myself, Roger Dean and Greg White. It consists of text, sound and image and is on the Australian Film Commission website site at www.stuff-art.com.au -(there are also other pieces on this site which might interest you). You will need the Shockwave plug-in for Flash and Director and you will also also need Quicktime and Java. However, if you do not have these, you can download them free of charge from the internet.

Hazel Smith
School of English
University of New South Wales
Sydney 2052

↑ Index

162. Kathy Lou Schultz
Ahistorical finger pointing
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Mark Prejsnar wrote:

"Yup....As i hope everyone knows by now, the situation of academics has been stomped on so hard, and without sufficient resistence, that they are truly reaching a level of proletarianization....It ain't a figure of speech. (I hasten to add that the lack of sufficient resistence reflects the state of class struggle overall, and isn't the fault especially of folks in academe alone. You might blame developments in the steel and auto industries, in fact, for selling down the river the chance at a strong working class decades ago..Without a true labor movement in society as a whole any one sector is vulnerable)"

Talk about ahistorical finger pointing! Yes, working conditions in the academy are worsening, but it's a load of crap to try to blame this on "developments" in the steel and auto industries. And from your final sentence it seems that you're not blaming "developments," but rather those working class people who could have built a "true labor movement." First of all, wake up! Ever heard of the UPS strike? The organizing was masterful. And what about the 40,000 rank and file construction workers who recently took over midtown Manhattan? These are great examples of the resurgence of the American Labor Movement.

To borrow from an old adage, convenience has bred apathy on the part of college professors for some time. Part-timers and adjuncts are currently leading the charge in organizing on college campuses. Get involved. All workers are under attack and it's not possible to improve conditions or hold onto past gains without fighting back.

And, you know, this whole "academy" discussion was started by my observations about experimental poetry no longer being "outside" the academy. Interesting that this has spurred such defensiveness on the part of academics. I don't think anyone's point was that academics, or the academy itself, is "bad;" that's simply too reductive, and not the point in any case.

Kathy Lou Schultz

↑ Index

163. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
what happened from 1809
Wed 5 Aug 1998

-

" - express the mythical identity of one 'Sabeth the Forsaken,' a frustra- ted woman neglected by a lover

"_whose body juices were all spent upon the paper [on which he was writing Voyage] the fountain of his sex turned inward; the exploration of her flesh was nothing when compared to the penetration of the vast labyrinth within. The quest for monsters demanded monstrous denial. Thus, she would become 'Sabeth, the Forsaken,' to his friends. Magnificent and futile, she roamed the streets of Montmartre; drank nightly in the bars; let them caress her in his stead. In his presence, even,_"

Ostrovsky, Voyeur Voyant, quoted in Elizabeth and Louis, Elizabeth Craig talks about Louis-Ferdinand Celine, Alphonse Juilland and Nikuko thinking about all of this and how to deal with the magick gothic, high and other- wise, so futile! while she wrytes and writhes away her life spent outward, inversion-M.-Celine, just a moment now! while she raises a drink for a final toast before closing time: a hunger, mysterious impulse, seizes her as she enters these lines into the machinery, skin stretched to the limit, threaded through the maze of world and desire, just a minute, little Jennifer! reeling back from the force and effort of all of it, turned with flame & fury Towards that Text that placed Itself in the Sky outside the St- Antoine, now so stars and now, and now

```
*          *      something flashes/is flashing       in the moment, little Jennifer thinks
        ****
      ****
```

```
             o pretty pretty picture, all these stars
 ****      *
      in the sky spelling such a big-little word!
    ****
  **********
        *       and someday Jennifer will be upon the sea
*         *      and she will look above the crest of wave
*         *
 ***     ***
   ********
          *      and remember stars and words
        ***
      *******
  *******
               and she will be drinking in a bar with a man           and she will turn to the man
            she will turn to the man, I remember you
    **
        *      and now I remember you
          *      and now I remember you
```

and she will turn, she will turn to the stars she will turn towards the dark night and the moon

she will turn tricks and planets and she will sing

now I remember you
and now I remember you

I remember now

↑ Index

164. George Bowering

Re: Shouting Rock and Roll in Prvt. Ryan

Wed 5 Aug 1998

> I still think they were saying 'lock & load.'

Sounded to me as if the guy was instructing, "Drop your toad!"

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,

Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

165. Mark DuCharme
Re: H=E=N=R=Y
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Agreed without hesitation that canonization applies "property rights," as it were, even to Langpo works. Yet I thought you had been talking about the "elitism" or "esotericism," as you would have it, of such texts-- NOT about the social effects of critics' uses of them. Have I misunderstood you? And in any case, how would such a process be substantively different whether the poet is Yeats or Bob Perelman? I don't see how this is relevant in the context of the issues you were raising.

As for language as communal-- well, it is a shared system of signs, isn't it? We could go back & forth on this point from now til the end of time & probably bore the rest on the list to tears.

I'm sorry if I mischaracterized your response to disjunctive poetry (you'll note I tried to be careful to qualify my assertion), but you have to admit you have tried to come off as attacking disjunction-- just as you sign this recent post "your favorite reactionary curmudgeon." I'm sure your stance is more complicated than you can easily represent in a post or two, but you also seem to go out of your way to bait the "pro-disjunctionists" (as if there were such a thing). You can't have it both ways.

"What if postmodern perspectives & techniques do not accomplish the writer's point of view?" Then bully for you, as Frank O'Hara said. I don't see anybody, least of all myself, logging on to the list to tell Henry Gould how he should write a poem. Yet I have to say I feel a little brow-beaten at times if some of the enthusiasms you champion sound boring to me PERSONALLY, in terms of my own practice (not what you or anyone else should like). "But what if coming from the WRITER'S position, these modes of composition are simply NO LONGER INTERESTING? Do not reflect the goals of the writer?" But there isn't just one "the writer"-- maybe this gets back to that "simplistic" communality of language after all. So let's all agree to write just what interests us, okay?-- & know full well that others, doing the same, will be different.

Now what would be so elitist about that?

--Mark (well you asked for a response) DuCharme

Henry Gould wrote:

>On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 22:39:52 PDT Mark DuCharme said:
>>I disagree. I don't believe language, even in the texts of the dreaded >><Language Poets>, CAN be private property. I believe language is >>inherently communal. This presumption changes how one _reads_ such >>texts-- de-esotericizes them, if you will. Perhaps this, I think >>strange, belief in language as private property in modernist &
>>postmodernist writing (since I assume you would probably extend your >>critique not just toward Langpo, but perhaps also to Stein, Zukofsky's
>>_"A"_, Un Coup de Des, _Finnegan's Wake_, etc.) explains why you are >>seemingly incapable of reading these texts with pleasure, or without >>annoyance. Whereas someone like me, who doesn't share your belief in >>language as private property in or outside of these writings, IS capable >>of reading these texts as non-esoteric-- as a liberation & a pleasure.
>
>Well, the property bit could take us into distant realms of abstraction... >but I guess it seems simplistic to say that language is "inherently >communal". A big problem for the writer is to find the language that >CAN be shared in a way that gets across what she or he wants to get >across. And my point was that the canonizing-publishing process gradually >applies the same "property effects" to experimental poetry as to the rest.
>
>But this isn't the interesting issue. You're wrong that I'm incapable of >enjoying innovative or disjunctive work - I think Don Wellman's description >of his response to some Language poetry was true & close to my own experience >of it. But several posts have talked about "how to get into disjunctive >writing" from a sort of reader-response perspective. You have to learn >to enjoy non-closure, etc. But what if coming from the WRITER'S position, >these modes of composition are simply NO LONGER INTERESTING? Do not >reflect the goals of the writer? I think "closure" is a very weak >descriptor for what the writer is after. What if postmodern perspectives >& techniques do not accomplish the writer's point of view? That is >what interests me about approaches that Yeats (as ONE example) can >represent, in part: and I'm also talking about the micro levels of technique >from a WRITER'S perspective. The idea that a synthetic approach to >syntax, rhythm & meaning is just a handy way to package McMeaning >ignores 95% of the fascination of the text or the performance, as far >as I'm concerned.

>- your favorite reactionary curmudgeon, Henry G.
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

166. Tom Orange
saving disjunctive
Wed 5 Aug 1998

---

grateful to don wellman and michael magee for (re)posting lines and offering some commentaries. whether this amounts to defending the ramparts of the innovative (henry to michael) vis a vis different (presumably outmoded) paradigms of writing -- nothing that can be fruitfully revisited is outmoded.

don's take on ward's lines (anybody out there got the whole poem?)

> Dark windows in which a list followed by facts us erupt
> chilling comparing

which find subjectivity pertinent here (certainly also in the lee ann brown poem as michael points out), to which i would add epistemolgical concerns as well, how affect confronts kinds of experience. whereas a list need not be factual but rather a paratactic stacking up of items dependent on context for any kind of referential grounding, facts are purportedly verifiable or objective and equally context-dependent, though their status as facts masks that very dependency. these mixed levels of experience erupt us (subjects acted upon, social constructivism) and at the same time we erupt the empirical concatenation (active subjects, semiotic rupture into the symbolic). both are chilling: brute experience and the subject's encounter with it. as is the comparing, of the list and facts (not to mention the dark windows), of experience and rupture.

i think karen mac cormack's lines are working on a similar level, which was why i initially put them together, tho without elaborating, which i will try here (i give the whole stanza):

> The point isn't just to changing points needs it > overblown more than complex guarantee crescendo exceeds > advance created appearance covert treatment

we're almost beginning in the midst of a discussion. i'm tempted to hear the 11th thesis on feurbach here, "philosophers have only interpreted the world, the point however is to change it," tho i wouldnt insist on it cuz we're quickly swept in other directions. but i can't stop rethinking that first line because of all the different senses of "point": geometry, space, time, jist, indicator. one (sense of?) point cannot be made to link to or index another because they are always changing. but not just changing. necessarily. is there an index to/of necessity? perhaps the whole project of aligning, connecting points of spatial, experiential, argumentative reference -- call it cognitive mapping -- must, needs be overblown. that is overblown because complex is too euphemistic a way of putting it, to clean and unproblematic. overblown renders the necessity of cognitive mapping as puffed up hollow distorted and untenable as it is. certainly exceeds my attempt here to reign it in. but perhaps parallels a kind of experiential rupture found in ward's lines...

t.

↑ Index

167. Mark DuCharme
Re: H=E=N=R=Y
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Sure, it's fooling around w/ the transmitter, but I don't think that can undermine language as transmission.

--Mark DuCharme

tom bell wrote:

>I agree with you here, Mark, with a slightly different twist: is not >part of the agenda of the dreaded an attempt to add to/modify/detract >from the communal language - I know that it is this for me among other >intentions. I also know too well that the songs and rhythmic >communications by my teenage kids is an attempt in some ways to >subvert my establlished place. - perhaps this is why disjunction >is often seen as threatening in poetry?
>
>tom bell
>
>At 10:39 PM 8/3/98 PDT, you wrote:
>>I disagree. I don't believe language, even in the texts of the dreaded >><Language Poets>, CAN be private property. I believe language is >>inherently communal. This presumption changes how one _reads_ such >>texts-- de-esotericizes them, if you will. Perhaps this, I think >>strange, belief in language as private property in modernist &

>>postmodernist writing (since I assume you would probably extend your >>critique not just toward Langpo, but perhaps also to Stein, Zukofsky's
>>_"A"_, Un Coup de Des, _Finnegan's Wake_, etc.) explains why you are >>seemingly incapable of reading these texts with pleasure, or without >>annoyance. Whereas someone like me, who doesn't share your belief in >>language as private property in or outside of these writings, IS capable >>of reading these texts as non-esoteric-- as a liberation & a pleasure.
>>
>>--Mark DuCharme
>>
>>
>>
>>Henry Gould wrote:
>>
>>>On Mon, 3 Aug 1998 10:03:15 -0700 Peter Balestrieri said:
>>>>
>>>> Henry, I'm trying to follow your argument and I'm wondering if >>you'd >>>> be willing to clarify what you mean by "...the intent was to >>critique
>>>> another style of appropriation..." Who was doing the critiquing
>>and >>>> what style of appropriation are you referring to? I think you've >>>> raised something important here and I want to be able to better >>>> understand what you're saying. Did you mean that Langpo was >>critiquing
>>>> capitalist "appropriation" but only replaced it with another form
>>of >>>> appropriation, aesthetic rather than economic? Or am I way off?
>>>
>>>I think Langpo - hit me, real langpoets out there - was trying to >>>write against the appropriation of poetry by 70s MFA "self" factories,
>>>and against the appropriation of literary space by "privacy capital"

of >>>all kinds. Their strategy was a drastic one: basically to dynamite
the >>>rhetorical/communicative function, the authorial function, and so on by >>>letting "language" - individual words, non-sequiturs, broken syntax & >>>rhetoric - speak (often comically) for itself. I'm suggesting this was >>>a kind of unwitting creation of a new kind of private property - sort
>>of >>>prospecting the dictionary. - Henry G.
>>>
>>
>>
>>_____
>>Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>>
>>
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

168. toddbaron
Re: creative writing at the University of Hawai`i
Wed 5 Aug 1998

---

susan:

congrats--one thinks--and best of luck.
I would fly to an island of writing
if I could--and your generous announcement sounds like a promising start to a strong wind!

Bests!

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

↑ Index

169. rsillima
My David O'Bromige
Wed 5 Aug 1998

I first met Bob Hass in Buffalo in 1970 when he was studying with John Logan and I've liked the man (and his work) ever since.

If my paternal grandfather had not been adopted and given the name Emerald Silliman (the Silliman family, starting with the first brothers, Daniel and Thomas, who came to Connecticut out of Berne, Switzerland, in the 1600s, started a tradition of adoption that continues to this day, making the name one that contains an enormous genetic diversity, but one that also means that many a cousin has no shared DNA with one another), I would be Ron McMahon today.

Now, being the oldest living human (I turn 52 today, one year for each card in the deck) to have been named for the 40th president of the United States is a more complicated and dubious distinction. Even Reagan Jr. is younger than that.

But, as I wrote to Bob Corbett yesterday, Pound is unthinkable without Yeats. So is David Bromige, for that matter (Cf. A Final Mission in _The Ends of the Earth_, Black Sparrow '68).

And I always thought that the phrase O'Canada was a salute to that nation's Irish heritage,

Ron

"Date: Tue, 4 Aug 1998 08:56:51 -0700
From: david bromige <[redacted]> Subject: ron o'silliman

sure and havent I been after telling Ron this for decades now, tis time to come out of that Celtic Twilight into the sun of common day. Same for Bob O'Hass also, him and Ron being alike as two peas in the pod. The mystifications of "Meditation at Lagunitas" smells of the druid censer no less than those of "Ketjak" and "Tjanting." Appears that not until the Liffey flows with Guinness shall we hear the plain speech of common sense from these two boyos, (brothers, tis rumored, though the connection has been hushed up). On a seperate but related issue, I would love for Randolph Healey to demonstrate his argued point, just that any poem by RH boils my potatoes. David O'Boy Bromige"

↑ Index

170. Henry
Re: H=E=N=R=Y
Wed 5 Aug 1998

On Tue, 4 Aug 1998 23:04:16 PDT Mark DuCharme said:
>Agreed without hesitation that canonization applies "property rights," >as it were, even to Langpo works. Yet I thought you had been talking >about the "elitism" or "esotericism," as you would have it, of such >texts-- NOT about the social effects of critics' uses of them. Have I >misunderstood you? And in any case, how would such a process be >substantively different whether the poet is Yeats or Bob Perelman? I >don't see how this is relevant in the context of the issues you were >raising.

I think what I was saying is that though postmodernists may consider themselves to be "freeing language itself" from stereotypes of the narcissistic undivided monistic self, the social effect or outcome of this approach is to accumulate disparate chunks of dictionary language
- prospectin the vocabulary - stakin your claim, puttin up your shingle, callin in them hifalutin postmod scholar-lawyers to cover yer tenure, flashin yer anthology... in other words the social effect of the project is undifferentiable from other professional academic styles.
But I agree with you this is not exactly relevant & is sort of unfair & typical email bombast. oh well.
>
>
>I'm sorry if I mischaracterized your response to disjunctive poetry >(you'll note I tried to be careful to qualify my assertion), but you >have to admit you have tried to come off as attacking disjunction-- just >as you sign this recent post "your favorite reactionary curmudgeon."
>I'm sure your stance is more complicated than you can easily represent >in a post or two, but you also seem to go out of your way to bait the >"pro-disjunctionists" (as if there were such a thing). You can't have >it both ways.

I've been trying to satirize a reigning style or approach. I apologize for going over the top & browbeating & boring people. As you can see I'm at the sated stage now - this happens to bulls after a few days of noisy rampaging. The actual poets - the people who delight in words & poetry & make something themselves, unique & independent & substantial - continue to do their work, many of them working below the elitist level of academic libraries & internet access & office jobs, others just avoiding most of that because they are creative & clever.
It would be truly reactionary to deny the impact of all the work very roughly flowing from say a "Pound Stein Zukofsky Howe" matrix (purely imaginary construct). The creme de la creme currently of that stream is possibly in the mag GERM, the new issue of which exhibits a lot of the faults & strengths of the reigning approach. Maybe when I've read it more thoroughly I can be more specific.

> don't see anybody, least of all myself, logging on to the list to tell Henry Gould how he should write a poem. Yet I have to say I feel a little brow-beaten at times if some of the enthusiasms you champion sound boring to me PERSONALLY, in terms of my own practice (not what you or anyone else should like). "But what if coming from the WRITER'S position, these modes of composition are simply NO LONGER INTERESTING? Do not reflect the goals of the writer?" But there isn't just one "the writer"-- maybe this gets back to that "simplistic" communality of language after all. So let's all agree to write just what interests us, okay?-- & know full well that others, doing the same, will be different.
>
> Now what would be so elitist about that?

I guess what I was getting at was that I was SKETCHING some bases for an alternative style, so that it won't do simply to recount "how to read" "disjunctive" work - I'm suggesting writing & reading something else entirely - you certainly have every right to find it not worth pursuing - but I don't quite agree with David Kellogg & others who simply cite the "Stone Cottage" book or how close Yeats & Pound were. Of course they were, & influenced each other to a great degree - but they also distinguished their approaches quite clearly, I think. Sorry I can't quote any evidence at the moment but I believe both Yeats & Pound specifically pointed out where they parted ways.

To summarize once more: my alternative position is this: it is possible to pursue an innovative poetry which aims for a direct synthesis of speech rhythms, metrics, imagery, and meaning; which maintains the syntax of "ordinary speech" while changing it, defamiliarizing it at the same time; which is an "art which hides art" by concealing layers of feeling & meaning beneath such a "non-disjunctive" surface; which even speaks "in propria persona" - or its mask - the autobriographical self - rather than a neutral non-voice or a mask of marginality. And this general approach is closer to the path Yeats took rather than Pound, whose drive to "break the pentameter" and so forth has continued on its centrifugal path for almost a century. I am not saying that we must obsess about Yeats or Pound as paradigms, or that disjunctive work is no good, or that such innovative poetry must sound like Robert Frost or something suitably antique. I am saying that I have a philosophical quibble with much of the ideological foundations of postmodern poetry, which I've gestured toward in some essays in Witz & Mudlark, and that's been part of my motive for running to the Russkies & slamming the creme de la creme. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

171. Henry Gould
query: Robinson, Snyder
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Can anyone provide email addresses for Elizabeth Robinson in Berkeley or Rick Snyder in Brooklyn? Please backchannel only. Thanks very much. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

172. L. MacMahon and T.R. Healy
Re: writing in the age of media
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Joe Safdie quotes Marjorie Perloff as saying:

Our first response to such 'sentences,' especially when there is a whole paragraph or page of them, is that we are the victims of some kind of scam.

* I think an inflamed version of this response drives a great deal of the dismissal of "disjunctive" poetries. (Though why the disjunctive since they pre-eminently put things together).

A possible way out of this is to entertain the idea, however much as a polite fiction, that one's taste may not be absolutely trustworthy. And that one may not perhaps have arrived at the terminal point of the process of learning to read. This can be a bitter pill for those of us who like to judge a poem quickly, since it requires a different kind of attention to the text than we are used to giving. Moreover, in the absence of familiar rewards, some kind of faith in poetry may be necessary.

Randolph Healy

from [redacted]

↑ Index

173. Henry Gould
Re: writing in the age of media
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Randolph Healy wrote:
Joe Safdie quotes Marjorie Perloff as saying:

Our first response to such 'sentences,' especially when there is a whole paragraph or page of them, is that we are the victims of some kind of scam.

* I think an inflamed version of this response drives a great deal of the dismissal of "disjunctive" poetries. (Though why the disjunctive since they pre-eminently put things together).

A possible way out of this is to entertain the idea, however much as a polite fiction, that one's taste may not be absolutely trustworthy. And that one may not perhaps have arrived at the terminal point of the process of learning to read. This can be a bitter pill for those of us who like to judge a poem quickly, since it requires a different kind of attention to the text than we are used to giving. Moreover, in the absence of familiar rewards, some kind of faith in poetry may be necessary. [end quote]

It's worth being reminded that the poem-text is a wilderness requiring patient application & care. Let us all have faith in poetry and give it an opportunity to be heard. Especially those of us inured to Tennyson & AE Housman, who like a jolly rhyme & a quick message before lunch; who want a poet like Vachel Lindsay to arise & speak to the people. These dizjunk chaps are awfully mind-boggling - what's it all about? - Eric Blarnes

↑ Index

174. Mark Prejsnar
Confused Kathy fingerpointing
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Wake up yerself...

I'm a working class person who's been deeply involved in the labor movement for over 20 years.

Yeah, in fact the movement was sold out by what i refer to as the sweetheart leadership, who allowed red-baiting and the-post-war-boom-will-raise-all-boats to convince 'em to sell out the militancy we needed.

Get a grip and look at things clearly. We need to be critical and not mealy-mouthed.

Mark
(at various times of UAW, AFSCME, HUCTW, OCC and other organizing drives and organizing committees... currently activist/organizer with the Labor Party)

On Tue, 4 Aug 1998, Kathy Lou Schultz wrote:

> Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>
> "Yup....As i hope everyone knows by now, the situation of academics has been stomped on so hard, and without sufficient resistence, that they are > truly reaching a level of proletarianization....It ain't a figure of speech. (I hasten to add that the lack of sufficient resistence reflects > the state of class struggle overall, and isn't the fault especially of folks in academe alone. You might blame developments in the steel and auto industries, in fact, for selling down the river the chance at a strong working class decades ago..Without a true labor movement in society > as a whole any one sector is vulnerable)"

>
> Talk about ahistorical finger pointing! Yes, working conditions in the academy are worsening, but it's a load of crap to try to blame this on "developments" in the steel and auto industries. And from your final sentence it seems that you're not blaming "developments," but rather those working class people who could have built a "true labor movement." First of all, wake up! Ever heard of the UPS strike? The organizing was masterful. And what about the 40,000 rank and file construction workers who recently took over midtown Manhattan? These are great examples of the resurgence of the American Labor Movement.
>
> To borrow from an old adage, convenience has bred apathy on the part of college professors for some time. Part-timers and adjuncts are currently leading the charge in organizing on college campuses. Get involved. All workers are under attack and it's not possible to improve conditions or hold onto past gains without fighting back.
>
> And, you know, this whole "academy" discussion was started by my observations about experimental poetry no longer being "outside" the academy. Interesting that this has spurred such defensiveness on the part of academics. I don't think anyone's point was that academics, or the academy itself, is "bad;" that's simply too reductive, and not the point in any case.
>
> Kathy Lou Schultz

↑ Index

175. MAYHEW

Academic Exchange Value

Wed 5 Aug 1998

While the the rhetorical mode of the "salvage operation" is tired, as David K. points out with great wit, does that mean that it is not worth doing? Perhaps in some other rhetorical mode? I for one appreciated Maria Damon's chapter on Bob Kaufman--despite the fact that it fell into a pattern of "rescue this neglected poet."

That supposedly hipper but actually simply "not interested in poetry" cult studs were less interested in Duncan/Spicer/Kaufman says something about them, Maria. The revealing phrase for me in your post about reception of your work was "to the extent they were interested at all." What WOULD interest these "cult studs"?!!! I would much rather be a poetry stud.

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

176. Christian Roess
:Re:poetry in the age of medication
Wed 5 Aug 1998

On Tue, 4 Aug 98 david bromige writes >Poets here to ruin poetry? Youre goddam right we are! Whats the >point in leaving it just the way we found it? I HATE POETRY . Poetry >that seduced me with its (and my) worst impulses when I was utterly >vulnerable to its insinuations!? Poetry the molester of children's minds?
>The Trauma of Poetry, of having been poetized, can never be forgiven >never cured in therapy.

> Just about any of the poetry that we call Maindrainins doest look to be written from any such wounds, but it is. It's is written in denial of those wounds, it is written to protect the molester, it is written by incest victims unable to acknowledge the fatal tinkering to which they were subject while too green or too conflicted to enjoy their outrage.
>
> I exaggerate? Name me one poet you admire who left Poetry the same as it had been before. Poetry that opens my lips and shuts my mouth. Poetry that wants me to lie down and let the past roll all over me. And makes me want just that.

It's a relief of sorts to hear someone say so, OR its not our dirty little secret anymore. I've often wondered about the 'Trauma of being poeticized'; I don't know if its a question of 'failure of nerve' or 'piety' to (in effect) choose or not choose to discuss 'trauma' in regards to 'being poeticized'. I don't think it is. Poetry is , in a sense, a blessing and a curse.(Hey, if I'm wrong here, tell me. I can take it. I need to know.)

I was quite interested in the discussion last month with re: Hannah Weiner and the talk Maria Damon will be giving in October(?). This seems to be another aspect to this question. I wanted to mention the book _Unclaimed Experience: Trauma, Narrative, and History_ by Cathy Caruth as an important disclosure, and isnt being poeticized to be exposed to whatever is 'unclaimed' in one's life, what Giorgio Agamben calls 'the possession of what cannot be enjoyed, and the enjoyment of what cannot be possessed.'?

When 'the beams of my house' are not so sturdy anymore, and philosophy is unmasked as a form of homesickness, and well, I want to check the view again out the 'north window', am I so sure the window frame is intact, or that I can point in that direction any longer, or that it even matters anymore calling this, or it, or us 'noble' anymore?

I don't know if this is necessarily what Bromige is talking about...It's hard to get the hang of it, and that's another dirty secret. I don't know if I will or will not get the hang of it. How much longer do I have. Please check your clocks. Or are the colors I'm flying 'too loud'?

Chris

"rereading,instead of memory,
as if to mediate the immediate,

needs prayer.

Most of them don't get the hang of it." <<<Robert Duncan 'Dante Etudes'>>>

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

177. groberts
Re: h=e=n=r=y
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Henry, you predicate your search for an "alternative" innovative poetry, one that is not also based on disjunctive poetics, on a "general approach closer to the path Yeats took than Pound." But in your careful description of the stylistics qualities of your alternative (your latest posts disregard "content" or the "form/content" issue, which may or may not be helpful in this instance)--you seem to leave out the relationship to a transcendental term(s) that Yeats predicated his poetics on, as did Duncan or Allen Grossman after him. Perhaps your most recent polemic ends up too quickly at claims about "how" to write a poem without addressing "why" write a poem, and this emphasis doesn't seem closer to Yeats at all. I assume that the stakes are higher than merely asserting your freedom from (the fiction of) a hegemony of disjunction. The energy field for Yeats was not delimited to self/language/ experience, and even adding history/social organization to this string will not be sufficiently encompassing. If you do not leave out the philosophical, or rather the theological, ground of Yeats' figures, then your discourse will need to get into much more than stylistics...no?

Gary R.

↑ Index

178. Henry
Re: h=e=n=r=y
Wed 5 Aug 1998

On Wed, 5 Aug 1998 11:31:16 -0500 <[redacted]> said:
>Henry, you predicate your search for an "alternative" innovative poetry, >one that is not also based on disjunctive poetics, on a "general approach >closer to the path Yeats took than Pound." But in your careful description >of the stylistics qualities of your alternative (your latest posts disregard >"content" or the "form/content" issue, which may or may not be helpful in >this instance)--you seem to leave out the relationship to a transcendental >term(s) that Yeats predicated his poetics on, as did Duncan or Allen Grossman >after him. Perhaps your most recent polemic ends up too quickly at claims >about "how" to write a poem without addressing "why" write a poem, and this >emphasis doesn't seem closer to Yeats at all. I assume that the stakes are >higher than merely asserting your freedom from (the fiction of) a hegemony >experience, and even adding history/social organization to this string will >not be sufficiently encompassing. If you do not leave out the philosophical, >or rather the theological, ground of Yeats' figures, then your discourse >will need to get into much more than stylistics...no?

Yeats' practice was more traditional and conservative than Pound's in many ways. It was Pound's influence that pushed Yeats to strive for a "harder", more "modern" voice, but he retained his original approach to language & form for the most part, it seems to me. It's not the fact of tradition that appeals to me: it's the emphasis on full, direct statement; the sense of a poem as a complete development and movement. This too will seem gratingly traditionalist. As I said in previous post, I have a philosophical quibble with [what I think of] as postmodernism; but I don't want to rehash lengthy comments of years ago on the list which bored a lot of people the first time. In the Witz & Mudlark essays I have tried to get at them in an indirect way. I bring forward the concept of wholeness as an ontological reality at least as real as division & fragmentation; I emphasize the "idea" of the Person as something slighted or made subservient by ideology on both left & right; & I talk about the traditional idea of the human as the image of god and the culture of the icon in Eastern European Christianity as realities which favor art-making in general. These are some of the notions that underlie my argument with postmodernism & my attempt to question the sort of "automatic marginality" which seems to flow from sophisticated contemporary poetics. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

179. trbell
Re: hypermedia piece
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Marvelous stuff, Hazel. I've only started to explore here, but it does illustrate what I was saying about mutual "auther"-reader poem construction, along with some pitfalls inherent apparently in the process - e.g. need for sophisticated hardware/software. You have done a marvelous job of avoiding another common problem with this work - I didn't detect a fascination with the means of production and fancy tricks, something that is found too often.

tom bell
[redacted]

At 02:52 PM 8/5/98 +1000, you wrote:
> Members of this list might be interested to look at the hypermedia >interactive piece "Wordstuffs: the city and the body" created by myself, >Roger Dean and Greg White. It consists of text, sound and image and is on >the Australian Film Commission website site at www.stuff-art.com.au -(there >are also other pieces on this site which might interest you). You will need >the Shockwave plug-in for Flash and Director and you will also also need >Quicktime and Java. However, if you do not have these, you can download >them free of charge from the internet.
>
> Hazel Smith
> School of English
>University of New South Wales
>Sydney 2052
>
>

↑ Index

180. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: need email address
Wed 5 Aug 1998

---

or phone number for Laura Mullen. Pls. backchannel.
Thanks.
Patrick Pritchett

↑ Index

181. trbell
Re: :Re:poetry in the age of medication
Wed 5 Aug 1998

The cure for poetic trauma is not to be found in a pill or a bottle but might be written out of [!this is writing OUT OF, NOT confessional], might be helped through thherapy or mentoring, or taken as an "as-if" fact of life. If I were to say this applies to me does this than become "confessional" and automatically bad? What a weird world we inhabit. "Good Will Hunting' does have something to say.

tom bell

At 11:37 AM 8/5/98 -0400, you wrote:
>On Tue, 4 Aug 98 david bromige writes >>Poets here to ruin poetry? Youre goddam right we are! Whats the >>point in leaving it just the way we found it? I HATE POETRY . Poetry >>that seduced me with its (and my) worst impulses when I was utterly >>vulnerable to its insinuations!? Poetry the molester of children's minds?
>>The Trauma of Poetry, of having been poetized, can never be forgiven >never cured in therapy.
>
>>Just about any of the poetry that we call Maindrainins doest look to be >>written from any such wounds, but it is. It's is written in denial of those >>wounds, it is written to protect the molester, it is written by incest >>victims unable to acknowledge the fatal tinkering to which they were >>subject while too green or too conflicted to enjoy their outrage.
>
>>I exaggerate? Name me one poet you admire who left Poetry the same as it >>had been before. Poetry that opens my lips and shuts my mouth. Poetry that >>wants me to lie down and let the past roll all over me. And makes me want >>just that.
>
>----------
>It's a relief of sorts to hear someone say so, OR its not our dirty little secret anymore. I've often wondered about the 'Trauma of being poeticized';
I don't know if its a question of 'failure of nerve' or 'piety' to (in effect) choose or not choose to discuss 'trauma' in regards to 'being poeticized'. I don't think it is. Poetry is , in a sense, a blessing and a curse.(Hey, if I'm wrong here, tell me. I can take it. I need to know.)
>
> I was quite interested in the discussion last month with re: Hannah Weiner and the talk Maria Damon will be giving in October(?). This seems to be another aspect to this question. I wanted to mention the book _Unclaimed Experience: Trauma, Narrative, and History_ by Cathy Caruth as an important disclosure, and isnt being poeticized to be exposed to whatever is 'unclaimed' in one's life, what Giorgio Agamben calls 'the possession of what cannot be enjoyed, and the enjoyment of what cannot be possessed.'?

>
>When 'the beams of my house' are not so sturdy anymore, and philosophy is unmasked as a form of homesickness, and well, I want to check the view again out the 'north window', am I so sure the window frame is intact, or that I can point in that direction any longer, or that it even matters anymore calling this, or it, or us 'noble' anymore?
>
>I don't know if this is necessarily what Bromige is talking about...It's hard to get the hang of it, and that's another dirty secret. I don't know if I will or will not get the hang of it. How much longer do I have. Please check your clocks. Or are the colors I'm flying 'too loud'?
>
>Chris
>
>
>"rereading,instead of memory,
>   as if to mediate the immediate,
>
>   needs prayer.
>
>Most of them don't get the hang of it." <<<Robert Duncan 'Dante Etudes'>>>
>
>
>
>
>
>
>_____
>Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1
>
>

↑ Index

182. Peter Quartermain
Charles Watts
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Many people on this list will be personally saddened to hear that dearly loved Charles Watts died this morning, 5 August, at about 4.15 a.m., of cancer.

After years and years of conversations, as Robin Blaser says, turning the world round and round, that lovely mind enfolding one's thought and self, we'll miss him.
He was one of the reasons to be, here.

Please send any messages or tributes to me (address below), or to Tom McGauley at [redacted]

I'll post details of the memorial gathering when I know them.

+ + + +

longer holds. people actually have each other's addresses. the inevitable can't be stopped.

so yes, even in light of the current saturation bombing from anthology hell, i am looking forward to the other thing. it is the only one i will actually go out and buy.

best,

Bill Luoma

<<Date: Tue, 4 Aug 1998 04:15:53 EDT
From: Douglas Oliver <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: Other

Jack Kimball has asked me to post a list of some interesting names in current Brit poetry. I'll do my best to give you, say, 50, very much off the top of my head, with absolutely no order of importance implied by the list.

You see, what I'm really asked to do here is create an anthology via the immediacy of e-mail. This can't be a list of that kind: it would take research and fuller memory recall. I've probably forgotten my oldest friend! At present, most US views of the British scene are somewhat narrowed by the preoccupations both of US poets and British poets who have so far compiled the names or arrange the conferences. Nothing especially wrong with that, but below is a fairly non-partisan list from someone who hasn't lived in Britain for nearly two decades and will miss quite a bit, I expect. May other Brits correct me.

A "T" means I have at least some contact or channel, sometimes close but not always. If Jack or anyone else is interested in following up on a name and I can help, I'd be glad to (within reason).

Andrew Duncan T (edits Angel Exhaust)
Helen MacDonald T
J.H. Prynne T (renewed interest in his work after the "Stars and Tigers" essay, has become more and more concentrated in lexis more and more difficult.) Denise Riley T (not producing much poetry just now, but still one of the finest of all) Aaron Williamson T (balletic performance artist, fully deaf, still interesting on-page)
Nicholas Johnson T (runs Etruscan Reader series and conferences)
Karlien ven den Beukel T

W.N. Herbert T (Scots, sometimes writes in Dundee dialect)
Bill Griffiths T (has long been one of the most individual of poets writing out of London, runs the Eric Mottram archive)
Allen Fisher T (one of the older writers to have kept most constantly innovative)
Catherine Walsh (said to be a good performer)
Miles Champion T (spending a lot of time in the States)
Grace Lake T
Wendy Mulford T (Used to run Reality Street editions with:
Ken Edwards (who continues these editions)
Maggie O'Sullivan T
Iain Sinclair T (Edited Conductors of Chaos, see below)
Harriet Tarlo T
Randolph Healy (with Joyce below part of the non-mainstream Irish)
Trevor Joyce
Tom Leonard T (Scots, strong, political work)
Carlyle Reedy (good performer)
Caroline Bergvall T (again, a good performer)
Merle Collins (With next two. Being out of the country, I don't know much
E.A. Markham about African-British, Caribbean-British, and Asian-British Jack Mapanje writing. It's difficult to get the publications and I'd dearly love to be better informed. Fred d'Aiguar has been an important editor/poet. Can someone help me here?)
Ralph Hawkins T
Alaric Sumner (works with sound and performance motifs)
Tom Raworth T (currently the Brit poet best known by the non-Academic States writers)
Lee Harwood T (has been writing strongly again)
Andrew Crozier T (his work has recently reappeared: one of the keenest intellects in British poetry)
Adrian Harding (Scots, living in Paris) T
David Chaloner T
Anthony Barnett
Victoria Vaughan T
Simon Pettet (New York resident)
Fiona Templeton
Helen Kidd
Peter Riley (publishes Poetical Histories)

Tim Atkins
Martin Corless-Smith (in States)
John Wilkinson T
Drew Milne T
Khaled Hakim (has sort of invented an English of his own from semi-phonetics. I don't know him -- he's quite young.)
D.S. Marriott T
Tony Baker (in France) T
Ric Caddel T
John Kinsella (works out of England right now, but properly regarded as Australian) T
Tony Lopez T
Rod Mengham T (runs the Equipage series)
Alan Halsey T
Barry MacSweeney T (recently returned to the scene)
Tom Pickard T
cris cheek T (works a lot with performance)
Lawrence Upton (good contact for the small press scene and activity generally)
Gilbert Adair>>

↑ Index

184. joel lewis
f.y.i.
Wed 5 Aug 1998

 Man strung up on meat hooks sets new world record

John Kamakaze, Scotland's self-styled "Prince of Pain," set a stomach-churning world record Wednesday when he spent 15 minutes suspended in mid-air by meat hooks imbedded in his back. A smiling Kamakaze, with eight meat hooks stuck in his back, and one in each leg, said pain was all in the mind. "It didn't hurt a bit. It's just a case of mind over matter," Kamakaze said afterwards. "I'm perfectly happy. The only thing that hurts is a blister on my foot from walking about too much yesterday." Unsurprisingly, the stunt has never before been attempted. See http://www.infobeat.com/stories/cgi/story.cgi?id=2555409538-f1f

 Man squirts paint on Rembrandt portrait in London

A man squirted yellow paint over a Rembrandt self-portrait at London's National Gallery this week but the work has been cleaned up and is now back on show, a gallery spokeswoman said Wednesday. The attack on the picture of the artist at the age of 63 happened on Tuesday. "It hasn't sustained any permanent damage," the spokeswoman said. A 26-year-old unemployed man has been charged with criminal damage over the attack, for which the motive was unclear. "This happens about once every 10 years," the spokeswoman said. "We normally nip these things in the bud." (Reuters)

 French language watchdog growls at U.S. feminists

One of the staunchest defenders of the French language has found a new ememy in his never-ending battle against linguistic pollution - American feminists. Maurice Druon, secretary of the hallowed Academie Francaise that guards the language as a national treasure, grumbled on Wednesday about a recent fashion for "feminizing" titles which he said was an American aberration infiltrating French via Quebec. "Do we know where this fashion of feminizing titles was born? Certainly not in Canada, but in the United States. Canada was only contaminated through geographical proximity." See http://www.infobeat.com/stories/cgi/story.cgi?id=2555404916-1ac

↑ Index

185. Louis Cabri
phillytalks
Wed 5 Aug 1998

PhillyTalks Response Issue & Gil Ott Issue

Response Issue

Folding the past forward for another year of talks, a response issue to the contexts/issues/authors presented in PhillyTalks 1-4 will be available in September. Respondants include Fred Wah, Ben Friedlander, Al Filreis, Clint Burnham, Andrew Klobucar, Kerry Sherin, Ammiel Alcalay, Tom Beckett, many others, as well as edited transcripts of the discussions post the four live events. Featured poets in 1-4: Laura Moriarty & David Bromige, Andrew Levy & Jackson Mac Low, Jeff Derksen & Ron Silliman, Jena Osman & Tina Darragh. RESPONSES ARE STILL BEING CONSIDERED. I need, and would be very happy, to hear from you no later than the third week of August.

A Gil Ott Issue
PhillyTalks invites you to contribute to an upcoming issue on the work of Gil Ott. Ott's poetry, essays, Singing Horse Press, dedication to community and arts education in Philadelphia have been of great importance in encouraging formally innovative, socially aware writing practice. We seek responses to Gil's poetry and critical work, and are interested as well in commentary of a more personal nature (anecdote, reminiscence, etc.). Deadline: November 1st, 1998. The issue will feature an interview with the poet, conducted by Kristen Gallagher, Heather Starr and Kerry Sherin. For a Gil Ot bibliography, difficult-to-find or out-of-print work, contact Kristen Gallagher at [redacted] or [redacted].

Future Issues
Featured talks include Rodrigo Toscano & Alan Gilbert, Brian Kim Stefans & Fred Wah, Rod Smith & Bruce Andrews, Susan Stewart & Bob Perelman, Steven Farmer & Peter Gizzi, and others! There will be a John Wieners Celebration issue, with Rachel Blau DuPlessis and Alan Davies, among others, available soon. The March 1998 talk by Ammiel Alcalay and Tom Mandel, moderated by Joshua Schuster, will be available in early September, together with a chapbook by Alcalay, _A Masque in the form of a Cento_, published by hole books. Contribute to the next set of talks by subscribing -- the second response issue is due next summer. $12 for the next five issues; donations acccepted. Please make your cheque out to Louis Cabri.

Subscribers
Due to a fatal laptop mishap, some subscribers' addresses have been lost. PLEASE email me your address if by the first week of September you have not received a newsletter! Sorry! I will try my best to contact you myself, as memory serves.

PhillyTalks is a project of Kelly Writers House at the University of Pennsylvania. [redacted]; http://dept.english.upenn.edu/~wh

↑ Index

186. George Bowering
Re: Charles Watts
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Thanks to Peter Q. for his sad and lovely words on Charles Watts.

We will miss him on this list, and we will hardly know how to get by without him in Vancouver.

You will remember that Charles did yeoman work on the Blaser conference here a couple years ago. He was currently working on the bpNichol symposium for this Fall.

If you are lucky enough to have his book _Bread and Wine_, have a read.

Charles, along with Gene Bridwell, was custodian of the Contemporary Literature Collection at Simon Fraser University, a wonderful place.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

187. George Bowering
Re: My David O'Bromige
Wed 5 Aug 1998

> And I always thought that the phrase O'Canada was a salute to that nation's Irish heritage,
>
> Ron

It is. Just ask Michael O'Ndaatje.

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

188. Rachel Loden
Re: poetry in the age of medication (the testimony begins)
Wed 5 Aug 1998

david bromige wrote:

> Just about any of the poetry that we call Maindrainins doest look to be written from any such wounds, but it is. It's is written in denial of those > wounds, it is written to protect the molester, it is written by incest victims unable to acknowledge the fatal tinkering to which they were subject while too green or too conflicted to enjoy their outrage.

And one support group is gathered to speak the full bitterness of poetry abuse in the latest issue of the (uh oh) PSA Journal. Charles Bernstein, Robert Creeley, Marie Ponsot, Leslie Scalapino and others write about their "first loves" in poesy.

Bernstein: "I remember, as if it were another life, those nights that Khlebnikov was my babysitter. After giving me a hot plate of Campbell's Vegetarian Baked Beans with cut-up franks, and then tucking me into bed, he would perform 'Incantation by Laughter' . . . Although I also admired his 'supersaga' _Zangezi_, which he wrote while bouncing me on his knee (or so it has often seemed), I was definitely partial to his shorter _zaum_ poems . . ."

Creeley: "So what I remember finally is what I have to--because I can't ever forget. It's the eighth grade? Miss Stolte, blonde, slim, quite tall, quick almost ironic manner, desperate in a way I can now recognize, lonely, disdaining, speedy, begins to read. We have badgered her mercilessly until she yields. But she must enjoy her powers? She is reading a poem by Alfred Noyes, which I find wondrous, arousing, sensual beyond anything I can put words to . . . "

All join hands and let the healing begin,

Rachel Loden

↑ Index

189. Kathy Lou Schultz
"Poor Confused Kathy" responds
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Please, Mr. Presjnar, I have no interest in attacking you as a person. Rather, I take issue with your ideas--and still take issue with them. I think you need to differentiate between union bureaucrat "leaders," and rank and file unionism in your gloss of the labor movement. And what about the UPS strike? And the NYC construction workers? Should we just ignore that and continue to bemoan the state of Labor Movement? I prefer to recognize the tremendous energy and militancy happening on the part of the rank and file.

And you're simply not going to convince me that past failures (and yes there have been failures) on the part of union leaders in the steel and auto industries (your examples) are responsible for building the boat academics find themselves in. I still think they need to get off their butts and fight for their rights like everyone else--and help to build equality for workers. And increasing numbers are doing just that.

Oh so "mealymouthed". . .

I remain

truly yours,

Kathy Lou

Mark Prejsnar wrote:
>
> Wake up yerself...
>
> I'm a working class person who's been deeply involved in the labor > movement for over 20 years.
>
> Yeah, in fact the movement was sold out by what i refer to as the > sweetheart leadership, who allowed red-baiting and > the-post-war-boom-will-raise-all-boats to convince 'em to sell out the > militancy we needed.
>
> Get a grip and look at things clearly. We need to be critical and not > mealy-mouthed.
>
> Mark
> (at various times of UAW, AFSCME, HUCTW, OCC and other organizing drives > and organizing committees... > currently activist/organizer with the Labor Party)
>
> On Tue, 4 Aug 1998, Kathy Lou Schultz wrote:
>
> > Mark Prejsnar wrote:
> >
> > "Yup....As i hope everyone knows by now, the situation of academics has > > been stomped on so hard, and without sufficient resistence, that they > > are > > truly reaching a level of proletarianization....It ain't a figure of > > speech. (I hasten to add that the lack of sufficient resistence > > reflects
> > the state of class struggle overall, and isn't the fault especially of > > folks in academe alone. You might blame developments in the steel and > > auto industries, in fact, for selling down the river the chance at a > > strong working class decades ago..Without a true labor movement in > > society

> > as a whole any one sector is vulnerable)"
> >
> > Talk about ahistorical finger pointing! Yes, working conditions in the > > academy are worsening, but it's a load of crap to try to blame this on > > "developments" in the steel and auto industries. And from your final > > sentence it seems that you're not blaming "developments," but rather > > those working class people who could have built a "true labor movement."
> > First of all, wake up! Ever heard of the UPS strike? The organizing was > > masterful. And what about the 40,000 rank and file construction workers > > who recently took over midtown Manhattan? These are great examples of > > the resurgence of the American Labor Movement.
> >
> > To borrow from an old adage, convenience has bred apathy on the part of > > college professors for some time. Part-timers and adjuncts are currently > > leading the charge in organizing on college campuses. Get involved. All > > workers are under attack and it's not possible to improve conditions or > > hold onto past gains without fighting back.
> >
> > And, you know, this whole "academy" discussion was started by my > > observations about experimental poetry no longer being "outside" the > > academy. Interesting that this has spurred such defensiveness on the > > part of academics. I don't think anyone's point was that academics, or > > the academy itself, is "bad;" that's simply too reductive, and not the > > point in any case.
> >
> > Kathy Lou Schultz
> >

↑ Index

190. Kathy Lou Schultz
Spelling Bee for Mark P.
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Mark Prejsnar,
Sorry for misspelling yr name in recent post -- very tired after work.
KL

↑ Index

191. Rachel Loden
poetry in the territories (response to Wheeler)
Wed 5 Aug 1998

Susan Wheeler wrote (in part):

> Does anyone on this list, in their heart of hearts, not WANT this if it indeed means paradigms that are not arbitrarily territorial? . . .
>
> My own work may play as more "conservative" than much on this list (yes one of my poems was a Hollander selectee) but I'll freely admit I have not the courage of some of you in accepting the colors and wielding the weapons. To me, this territory war seems to me like the tiniest subset of larger cultural and economic dynamics, and I choose cowardice and selfishness in pretending that I can ignore categories in order to write with a greater sense of freedom, even if it be self-illusory -- instead of using up this energy in sandbagging the brittle dams the waves are toppling anyway.

Hear hear. The poet wants free rein (or reign) but the territorialists, who are not necessarily or usually the originators in any school, are out in force. Why? Because marking territory, pissing on the snow you own, is a form of marketing.

So I'd disagree only about "cowardice and selfishness," unless we want to call Ted Berrigan, for example, cowardly and selfish for reading what he pleased. Poets are magpies--acquisitive and curious. But camp followers and plodders are always out on patrol, making the world safe for dullness.

Rachel Loden

↑ Index

192. Matt Kirschenbaum
Re: "Poor Confused Kathy" responds
Wed 5 Aug 1998

> And you're simply not going to convince me that past failures (and yes there have been failures) on the part of union leaders in the steel and auto industries (your examples) are responsible for building the boat academics find themselves in. I still think they need to get off their butts and fight for their rights like everyone else--and help to build equality for workers. And increasing numbers are doing just that.

Kathy,

At least a few academics have started to get off of their butts, or are at least sitting propped up on one elbow. See _Workplace_, an electronic journal devoted to academic labor issues that's sponsored by the MLA Graduate Student Caucus:

http://www.workplace-gsc.com/

See too the Palinurus site, devoted to "teaching the humanities in a restructured world," which I know I've mentioned here before:

http://humanitas.ucsb.edu/liu/palinurus/

Having been to distance education conferences myself (and listened to the rhetoric and ogled the pie charts), I very much believe that there's no more vital an issue for academics of all ranks, not least because the assault on tenure, the increasing reliance on part-time and non-degreed labor, and so forth are all integral to some of the more influential distance ed. scenarios. Matt

↑ Index

193. Safdie Joseph
Re: (the testimony begins)
Wed 5 Aug 1998

And the Independent Prosecutor then asked:

Wasn't it Rachel Loden who wrote "My Wicked, Wicked Ways"? Wasn't it Robert Creeley who first denigrated the word "about" in relation to poetry? (It happened traveling in lovely company, as I remember).

The hands that rocked the cradle, indeed!

I'm trying to remember the first wound that poetry inflicted, but "A Child's Garden of Verses" by Robert Stevenson seemed pretty innocuous at the time . . .

-----Original Message-----
From: Rachel Loden
To: [redacted]
Sent: 8/5/98 6:09 PM
Subject: Re: poetry in the age of medication (the testimony begins)

david bromige wrote:

> Just about any of the poetry that we call Maindrainins doest look to be > written from any such wounds, but it is. It's is written in denial of those > wounds, it is written to protect the molester, it is written by incest > victims unable to acknowledge the fatal tinkering to which they were > subject while too green or too conflicted to enjoy their outrage.

And one support group is gathered to speak the full bitterness of poetry abuse in the latest issue of the (uh oh) PSA Journal. Charles Bernstein, Robert Creeley, Marie Ponsot, Leslie Scalapino and others write about their "first loves" in poesy.

Bernstein: "I remember, as if it were another life, those nights that Khlebnikov was my babysitter. After giving me a hot plate of Campbell's Vegetarian Baked Beans with cut-up franks, and then tucking me into bed, he would perform 'Incantation by Laughter' . . . Although I also admired his 'supersaga' _Zangezi_, which he wrote while bouncing me on his knee (or so it has often seemed), I was definitely partial to his shorter _zaum_ poems . . ."

Creeley: "So what I remember finally is what I have to--because I can't ever forget. It's the eighth grade? Miss Stolte, blonde, slim, quite tall, quick almost ironic manner, desperate in a way I can now recognize, lonely, disdaining, speedy, begins to read. We have badgered her mercilessly until she yields. But she must enjoy her powers? She is reading a poem by Alfred Noyes, which I find wondrous, arousing, sensual beyond anything I can put words to . . . "

All join hands and let the healing begin,

Rachel Loden

↑ Index

194. david bromige
wrtng in thage f mdia/2ndng Randolph Healy
Thu 6 Aug 1998

Absolutely (a word I seldom use), Randolph, and so elegantly put. Why it has to be stated so often is a puzzle. The rush to judgment of literary taste is as stupid, every bit, as Why wait for the Law let's string 'em up now. I should think everybody has had the experience of later coming to love a writing which they at first distrusted if not detested. (As of coming to love a person one at first detested). (And then, later again, of experiencing a further reversal).

Part of the problem is that one actually _can_ know better, not only than oneself at a previous stage, but than another person who is at that previous stage. That is, one now knows more concerning this activity. And then, it can bug the hell out of us to have to put up with an ass, braying. Then, one's caution with regard to one's own judgments looks uncalled-for. Let us imagine for a moment that Helen Vendler knows more about Post-WW2 British poetry than "we" do. How impatient she must be, with us!

Still, one would like to see the evidence, if not of her taste forming, then of her research--the reading she has done in the field. Where she bogged down with Allen Fisher. Where she found Wallace Stevens preferable to Jeremy Prynne. What her readerly approach has been, to Tom Raworth, Maggie O'Sullivan, Wendy Mulford.

Absent such, one has difficulty trusting that she has done her research (as much into oneself, such research, as into the field; as much, but not, more) even in the fields where she _is_ known as critic and canon-maker. Maybe even there, she's a merely charismatic well-situated person with intimidating powers of persuasion, whose preferences chanced to fit into a social or political agenda among the well-connected. We are to blame, after all, for according more respect to those who teach at Harvard than those who teach at Highland Community College, or those who don't teach at all, if we accord such respect simply because Harvard is where they do teach, and this or that prestigious university press, where they do publish.

"The best lack all conviction, the worst are full of passionate intensity" --isnt that how Yeats phrases it? The passions of some persons' convictions have enslaved large portions of humanity.Some of whom, at some level, presumably wished to be enslaved : "Let Joe do it." We are bowled over by such single-mindedness, even where there isn't that much of _mind_ in it. We want to be told what to do, like, choose. Experts soothe. Therefore, ignore experts? But part of the difficulty, again, is, there _can_ be expertise. _We_ don't want know-nothings.

Hence the battlefields of criticism. And poetry wars. Throughout History, time and again, the mildest-mannered of women and men have had to take arms against a sea of passionate intensity, or be drowned. Where poetry is the prize, Randolph Healy's modesty and patience, with their glimpse of fine sarcasm, may be the keenest weapon of them all. Otherwise, breaking arms and legs will have to do. But the (fill in name of favorite enemy here) keep a-comin' . Wherever a favorite intelligence lodges in our midst, the stupidity which is its shadow, fastens upon it like loathsome flies.

And too, the times change, and we change. . . with them or against them. Blush for past passions! For they fail to recognize you.

David

↑ Index

195. david bromige
poetry in the age of medication
Thu 6 Aug 1998

Thank you, Rachel, for a posting whose humor shows how to read my own posting : as T.R.Bell suggests to me, I speak "as-if." But in no way attempt to make fun of incest survivors, nor to cheapen their experience. More of this, perhaps, subsequently.

I was pleasantly surprised to learn from Rachel's post of the PSA Journal's gathering of threads from the 4 corners & ends of the earth, on this topic of "first loves" in poetry. The passage from Charles Bernstein I found particularly engaging, and for those like myself who cannot get enough of the Master in this familiar, dis/respectful, jiving mode (he speaks of Khlebnikov as telling him bed-time poems), may I suggest my own work, "Six of One, Half a Dozen of the Other" where one reads of the author's encounter with Freud ("Facing my father he said, Not to worry. Then, patting my head, he added : later, he vill remember ziss differently") and D.H.Lawrence ("who should never have had to be a teacher. He wanted to be a poet, & he had too much sympathy with our condition to be of any use") and James Joyce ("who had been a famous cricketer in his day, though in later years he never left the attic where he'd sit day in day out going over old scorecards from his immense collection & reworking the games on paper to see why they hadn't come out differently").

Unknown, I expect, to anybody under 40, these pieces may be found in _The Falcon 13_ for Fall 1976, and then in _My Poetry_, The Figures Press, 1980. (This book was the first of a series of titles: _My Life_, _My Pleasures_ ,in Berkeley that year; I am delighted to find this original couching re-surfacing today with _My Symptoms_ and the upcoming Charles' _My Way_ .)

Back to the beginning: to me (as I suspect, to Charles) the truth is a made thing; Reality's existence is read in many ways, and one reality of being a poet is that of a love/hate relationship with poetry. "Poetry that opens my lips and shuts my mouth." Poetry that inspires emulation. That shuts my mouth with itself. Poetry that, like a father, can point out that one owes one's life to him--a life that is not sound pay-back coin if it can only repeat. These are realities of our experience; in ways they are analagous to the double-bind of incest. I hope this makes matters plainer.

David

↑ Index

196. Henry Gould
my territory
Thu 6 Aug 1998

Imagine a hydrahead: Ashberybloomvendler.

Imagine a nation of academic journals dedicated to securing tenure for professional poets who run contests and give awards and so on.

Imagine a poetry counter-culture of shallow roots, a-historical hokum and spiritual posturing.

Then think about Grand Fenwick.

There's more poetry in one saying of the Sermon on the Mount than in all the writings of Pound, Olson, Duncan, Creeley, Palmer, etc. put together. Am I impinging on your territory? I will lift mine eyes unto the hills, whence cometh my strength.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

197. Maria Damon

Re: poetry in the territories (response to Wheeler)

Thu 6 Aug 1998

At 7:42 PM -0700 8/5/98, Rachel Loden wrote:
>Susan Wheeler wrote (in part):
>
>> Does anyone on this list, in their heart of hearts, not WANT this if it >> indeed means paradigms that are not arbitrarily territorial? . . .
>>
>> My own work may play as more "conservative" than much on this list (yes one >> of my poems was a Hollander selectee) but I'll freely admit I have not the >> courage of some of you in accepting the colors and wielding the weapons. To >> me, this territory war seems to me like the tiniest subset of larger >> cultural and economic dynamics, and I choose cowardice and selfishness in >> pretending that I can ignore categories in order to write with a greater >> sense of freedom, even if it be self-illusory -- instead of using up this >> energy in sandbagging the brittle dams the waves are toppling anyway.
>
>Hear hear. The poet wants free rein (or reign) but the territorialists, >who are not necessarily or usually the originators in any school, are >out in force. Why? Because marking territory, pissing on the snow you >own, is a form of marketing.
>
>So I'd disagree only about "cowardice and selfishness," unless we want >to call Ted Berrigan, for example, cowardly and selfish for reading what >he pleased. Poets are magpies--acquisitive and curious. But camp >followers and plodders are always out on patrol, making the world safe >for dullness.
>
>Rachel Loden

i agree; which is one reason, to refer to my earlier somewhat self-absorbed post, i find much of the "school"-mongering that passes for scholarship in poetry circles to be not very stimulating; it doesn't open out into a larger view of the world...

↑ Index

198. Michael Magee
quotes o' the day
Thu 6 Aug 1998

Thought I'd interoduce a couple quotes from my morning's reading which seem relevant to our recent Henry-ignited discussions, both from Burke's essay, "The Rhetoric of Hitler's Battle," Burke's reading of Mein Kampf as symbolic action:

1) "There are other ways of burning books than on the pyre - and the favorite method of the hasty revieer is to deprive himself and his readers by inattention...If the reviewer but knocks off a few adverse attitudinizings and calls it a day, with a guarantee in advance that his article will have a favorable reception among the decent members of our population, he is contributing more to out gratification than to our enlightenment."

2) "It is part of the genius of the great leader [read Adolph] to make adversaries of different fields appear as always belonging to one category only, because to weak and unstable characters the knowledge that there are various enemies will lead only too easily to incipient doubts as to their own cause."

-m.

↑ Index

199. henry
Re: quotes o' the day
Thu 6 Aug 1998

On Thu, 6 Aug 1998 10:28:55 -0400 Michael Magee said: >Thought I'd interoduce a couple quotes from my morning's reading which >seem relevant to our recent Henry-ignited discussions, both from Burke's >essay, "The Rhetoric of Hitler's Battle," Burke's reading of Mein Kampf as >symbolic action:
>
>1) "There are other ways of burning books than on the pyre - and the >favorite method of the hasty revieer is to deprive himself and his readers >by inattention...If the reviewer but knocks off a few adverse >attitudinizings and calls it a day, with a guarantee in advance that his >article will have a favorable reception among the decent members of our >population, he is contributing more to out gratification than to our >enlightenment."

>
>2) "It is part of the genius of the great leader [read Adolph] to make >adversaries of different fields appear as always belonging to one category >only, because to weak and unstable characters the knowledge that there are >various enemies will lead only too easily to incipient doubts as to their >own cause."
> >-m.

O what joy to find myself compared to Hitler! I was hoping for Reagan, though... maybe the next stormtrooper can try that one. Luckily these screens are pellet-proof. Comparing somebody to Hitler is a good way to marginalize your opponent - hope everybody will remember that as we wade further into the poetics swamp for today.

But seriously there, Mike - I don't think I've been tossing off negative attitudes to the converted, like some established reviewer putting down books. I have been negative, sarcastic, controversial about some things - mostly popular poetic styles that have held sway for about the same length of time as I've been writing myself (30 yrs). Yes, my resentment and ressentiment & so on is there, and that is a negative thing & a limitation. No, I don't have all the answers or think I do - I just like to be controversial & outrageous because it's fun & stimulates discussion. But maybe there's too much of me & of that, I admit. Secondly I don't think I've lumped enemies together etc. in the way Burke describes. So I don't see how that applies, if that's what you're trying to do. But if what I say scares you, makes you worried that maybe I've done irreparable damage to poetic reputations or careers, made it harder for you to enjoy poetry, well, just say so. Others have. I don't mean to roil up the clubhouse so much - everybody okay out there? Free spirits & all? Gaily traipsing through the fields of Zephyr or whatever? I'll shut up now, somebody can send in a positive review of something, cheer us all up. - Henry G.

↑ Index

200. Christopher W. Alexander this insulating sleeve is detrimental
Thu 6 Aug 1998

---

the first thing is I shld apologize for posting blindly - as a few of you have noticed, I'm set "no mail" right now, due to the exigencies of moving, i.e., I'm soon to be leaving my job here and have a lot to get done before that time.

the next thing (two) is to let all of you in on how to reach myself and Linda Russo in the coming weeks - new address information etc. as follows:

19 Hodge Ave. #9, Buffalo NY 14222 and by telephone: [redacted]

anyone I've given this address to before today, please take note: I had been substituting "Street" for "Avenue".

my email address will cease to be the familiar and beloved one you see before you, in favor of <[redacted]>.
mail from this address is being forwarded to me at work until I leave this job (thursday of next week).

sorry to those of you who've rec'd no response to yr backchannels - I'm still here, I assure you, and I'll make my response asap. daniel bouchard, if yre still trying to reach me, now's yr chance!

this relates to poetics b/c "apologize" has its roots in Apollo.

c h r i s

..

Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective

*new email: [redacted] snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402 *snail-mail after 16 August: 19 Hodge St. #9 / Buffalo NY 14222 press/zine site:
http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/

↑ Index

201. david bromige
gotta go
Thu 6 Aug 1998

---

have to step outside for a few days. sorry to be missing the debates.. david

↑ Index

202. Michael Magee
Re: quotes o' the day
Thu 6 Aug 1998

I should have anticipated Henry's equating Burke-on-Hitler to Magee-on-Burke (below) and said somehing more specific in my posting of quotes. For the record, I think there is a key difference between Hitler and Henry, as well as between causal critics of Hitler and Henry-as-critic: the difference lies in the fact that Henry has no "guarantee in advance" that he will get a "favorable reception" - indeed in most cases precisely the opposite. In fact, one of Henry's enduring roles on the list, to my mind, is to make sure that the list doesn't fall into a cycle of tacit self-gratification, which is why I'm generally happy to see his name pop up in all its permutations on my message board, & happy to respond when I have something to say. Henry's saving strength is his awareness that he is in fact in a conversation, albeit a rather combative one. So, peace brother.

Now, that said, I would argue that Henry's rhetoric often functions in such a way that it "make(s) adversaries of different fields appear as always belonging to one category only," and that I am against such rhetorical strategies. Henry's motive, I would guess, couldn't be farther away from Hitler's: and in a sense it might be as "motive-less" as language can be, the result of a lack of knowledge regarding those "different fields" rather than a specific wish to lump those fields together for purposes extinguishing "the enemy." But language has a funny way of doing what it wants despite its originators consciousness or lack thereof and, as such, Henry's does indeed sometimes conjur up for me "the enemy of disjunctive poetics" which controls "The Academy" and "must be stopped." You see where I'm getting. -m.

> O what joy to find myself compared to Hitler! I was hoping for Reagan, though... maybe the next stormtrooper can try that one. Luckily these screens are pellet-proof. Comparing somebody to Hitler is a good way to marginalize your opponent - hope everybody will remember that as we wade further into the poetics swamp for today.
>
> But seriously there, Mike - I don't think I've been tossing off negative attitudes to the converted, like some established reviewer putting down books. I have been negative, sarcastic, controversial about some things - mostly popular poetic styles that have held sway for about the same length of time as I've been writing myself (30 yrs). Yes, my resentment and ressentiment & so on is there, and that is a negative thing & a limitation. No, I don't have all the answers or think I do - I just like to be controversial & outrageous because it's fun & stimulates discussion. But maybe there's too much of me & of that, I admit. Secondly I don't think I've lumped enemies together etc. in the way Burke describes. So I don't see how that applies, if that's what you're trying to do. But if what I say scares you, makes you worried that maybe I've done irreparable damage to poetic reputations or careers, made it harder for you to enjoy poetry, well, just say so. Others have. I don't mean to roil up the clubhouse so much - everybody okay out there? Free spirits & all? Gaily traipsing through the fields of Zephyr or whatever?
> I'll shut up now, somebody can send in a positive review of something, cheer us all up. - Henry G.

↑ Index

203. Michael Magee
Re: quotes o' the day
Thu 6 Aug 1998

Whoops - "Magee-on-Burke" should read "Magee-on-Henry". -m.

According to Michael Magee:
>
> I should have anticipated Henry's equating Burke-on-Hitler to > Magee-on-Burke (below) and said somehing more specific in my posting of > quotes. For the record, I think there is a key difference between Hitler > and Henry, as well as between causal critics of Hitler and > Henry-as-critic: the difference lies in the fact that Henry has no > "guarantee in advance" that he will get a "favorable reception" - indeed > in most cases precisely the opposite. In fact, one of Henry's enduring > roles on the list, to my mind, is to make sure that the list doesn't fall > into a cycle of tacit self-gratification, which is why I'm generally > happy to see his name pop up in all its permutations on my message board, > & happy to respond when I have something to say. Henry's saving strength > is his awareness that he is in fact in a conversation, albeit a rather > combative one. So, peace brother.
>
> Now, that said, I would argue that Henry's rhetoric often functions in > such a way that it "make(s) adversaries of different fields appear as > always belonging to one category only," and that I am against such > rhetorical strategies. Henry's motive, I would guess, couldn't be > farther away from Hitler's: and in a sense it might be as "motive-less" > as language can be, the result of a lack of knowledge regarding those > "different fields" rather than a specific wish to lump those fields > together for purposes extinguishing "the enemy." But language has a > funny way of doing what it wants despite its originators consciousness or > lack thereof and, as such, Henry's does indeed sometimes conjur up for me
> "the enemy of disjunctive poetics" which controls "The Academy" and "must > be stopped." You see where I'm getting. -m.
>
>
> > O what joy to find myself compared to Hitler! I was hoping for Reagan, > > though... maybe the next stormtrooper can try that one. Luckily these > > screens are pellet-proof. Comparing somebody to Hitler is a good > > way to marginalize your opponent - hope everybody will remember that > > as we wade further into the poetics swamp for today.
> >
> > But seriously there, Mike - I don't think I've been tossing off > > negative attitudes to the converted, like some established reviewer > > putting down books. I have been negative, sarcastic, controversial > > about some things - mostly popular poetic styles that have held sway > > for about the same length of time as I've been writing myself (30 yrs).

> > Yes, my resentment and ressentiment & so on is there, and that is > > a negative thing & a limitation. No, I don't have all the answers or > > think I do - I just like to be controversial & outrageous because it's > > fun & stimulates discussion. But maybe there's too much of me & of > > that, I admit. Secondly I don't think I've lumped enemies together > > etc. in the way Burke describes. So I don't see how that applies, > > if that's what you're trying to do. But if what I say scares you, > > makes you worried that maybe I've done irreparable damage to poetic > > reputations or careers, made it harder for you to enjoy poetry, > > well, just say so. Others have. I don't mean to roil up the > > clubhouse so much - everybody okay out there? Free spirits & all?
> > Gaily traipsing through the fields of Zephyr or whatever?
> > I'll shut up now, somebody can send in a positive review of something,
> > cheer us all up. - Henry G.
> >
>

↑ Index

204. Henry
Re: quotes o' the day
Thu 6 Aug 1998

But Mike, people are always using categories. I didn't invent the "disjunctive poetics" label. People have rightly complained about the level of abstraction in these poetics list debates - rightly, rightly - the whole strategy of opposing Pound/Yeats on the grid synthesis/disjunction is probably the biggest abstraction proposed yet. But I don't think that warrants comparing this strategy to Hitler & suggesting I'm too unread to know or care about the differences & unique qualities of the writing out there. When I say I have a quibble with the zeitgeist informing a lot of American poetry the fact is I do, hard to believe as that may be; when I say I am bored & fed up with a lot of the poetry that seems to reflect that zeitgeist that is exactly how I feel. It's not just boredom - it's really a sense of exile. I think it is legitimate in the field of poetics to talk about general trends; and I don't think using categories or abstract terms is a specifically Hitlerian strategy. Maybe talking too much is, I grant you that. - Henry G.

↑ Index

205. Billy Little
Re: Charles Watts
Thu 6 Aug 1998

charles was a jewel a shiny brilliant mind half exposed enclosed in this solid chuck of ore he was happy a few short weeks back dinner at bukowski's on commercial before Dorothy and George's reading, happy afterwards at the Georgia Hotel where Gerry Gilbert took pictures, Charles bemused behind Clint Burnham on the striped couch charles knew but he let you make a fool of yourself anyway he wanted to hear what you had to say he had a big heart and a good ear almost as refined as blaser mild mannered and unassuming he talked the talk he read the books and he made the connections, truly a servant of poetry, right to the last few days he was correcting the galleys of the blaser conference proceedings: the poetry monster that is vancouver lost an arm and a leg and have a disconnected corpos calosum with the passing of charles watts, he made things happen without seeking praise or adulation, impeccable he dotted your teas and crossed your eyes remained a student to the finish, kept learning stayed young encouraged all, editor, publisher, scholar, friend, ones like him don't grow on trees

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

Yeah, I stole from
                the treasury
of human folly
I spent it all on you, baby...

don't mention it

Duncan McNaughton

↑ Index

206. rsillima
The real Charlie Watts
Thu 6 Aug 1998

The last time I corresponded with Charles Watts, a few months back, he told me t hat he was "fine," and that his melanoma was a thing of the past. His own attention was turned inst ead to the ever-delayed Ph.D. thesis and his excitement over Italy and all things Italian that a trip last summer had kindled. Other friends warned me otherwise about his health, so I knew what Pete r's notice was going to say even before I opened it, but it's hard news for us all.

Krishna and I got to know and love Charles when he insisted that we stay with hi m for a few days of sight-seeing after the 1985 Vancouver Poetry Festival. In addition to being a pe rfect host and fabulous guide, he was a gentle, brilliant, far-too modest, extraordinarily well
-read soul with the driest sense of humor I've encountered. A rolled eye and the barest upturned smile ofte n suggested sans words precisely what he thought of this or that event or person.

It turned out that his life-long buddy Peter Magnani was (is) the brother of a w oman with whom I'd worked in the prison movement and I would encounter Charles and Peter at reading s, particularly at Canessa Park, when Charles came down to California for his annual visit with his family. More than once this led to dinner at Brandy Ho's or Hunan during which I got to pump him f or the latest scoop on the Vancouver scene. Charles introduced me to the work of several of the folk s north of the border whose writing I follow and his opinions caused me to rethink some first i mpressions of other writers.

Charles first moved to Canada as a war resister in the late 1960s. I stayed at h ome and fought my induction notice (for seven years!) until I finally "qualified" for CO status, w hich was how I began doing prison movement work in the first place. We often speculated on how differ ent our lives might have been had either one of us taken the other's approach, or how different had the war in Indochina simply not happened. Charles' move was clearly Canada's gain and one more piece of evidence (not that any's needed) of how war wastes a nation's resources.

Charles never published very much, but his devotion to (and understanding of) th e poetry scene was complete. Even at this distance, I'm convinced that he was indispensible to the worlds of poetry that he touched, especially the scene in Vancouver, and I have no idea how we will ge t along without him.
It will certainly be a different world.

I know that I've said and written this before, but it's worth repeating -- beyon d the pure pleasures of reading and writing, the greatest thing about poetry is how it permits you to me et some wonderful, even magical people all over the world. Charles was just such a person in my lif e. We should treasure and nurture each one.

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

207. Susan Wheeler
Re: quotes o' the day
Thu 6 Aug 1998

> I don't mean to roil up the >clubhouse so much - everybody okay out there? Free spirits & all?
>Gaily traipsing through the fields of Zephyr or whatever?
>I'll shut up now, somebody can send in a positive review of something,
>cheer us all up. - Henry G.
>
Henry, your acumen alone cheers me up. Let alone generosity.

I'm forwarding this notice that just came my way:

KGB Poetry Readings
Fall 1998
Series Directed by Star Black & David Lehman
Monday, Sept 28: Bernadette Mayer & Ron Padgett
Monday, October 5: Ruth Stone & Rosanne Wasserman
Monday, October 12: John Hollander & Julia Kasdorf
Monday, October 19: Charles Bernstein & Carole Maso
Monday, October 26: Deborah Garrison & Philip Levine
Monday, November 2: Harry Mathews & Albert Mobilio
Monday, November 9: Vincent Katz & Claudia Rankine
Monday, November 16: Joan Larkin & Jaime Manrique
Monday, November 23: No Reading
Monday, November 30: Bob Hershon & Bill Zavatsky
Monday, December 7: Bruce Andrews & C. D. Wright

KGB is at 85 East 4th Street. All reading begin at 7:30. Free! They're as free as freedom.

Susan Wheeler
[redacted] voice/fax [redacted]

↑ Index

208. Mark DuCharme
Re: instead of a pineapple
Thu 6 Aug 1998

Thanks, Rachel. As a matter of fact I already have that book.

-Mark D

>Bill Luoma wrote:
>
>> ><<But I don't want a pineapple.>>
>> >
>> >ok Mark D., what do you want?
>
>One good thing to want (and I wanted it more than a pineapple) is Bill's
>new book _Works & Days_ (Hard Press/The Figures), a sort of cracked >comic memoir.
>
>"It's a big world out there, and thanks to perception management it >appears to be getting smaller."
>

>Rachel
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

209. trbell

Asif NOT related to recent posts here

Fri 7 Aug 1998

As if there were water we forge on forge on.

<P></P>
<P ALIGN="CENTER"><I><FONT SIZE="+2">The Metaphor of Play</FONT></I></P> <P ALIGN="CENTER"></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT">"The proto-conversation between the 2-month-old baby and </P> <P ALIGN="LEFT">the mother is between I and the other. There is no self </P> <P ALIGN="LEFT">in it. A third element needs to be found for self to </P> <P ALIGN="LEFT">evolve. This element is the </P> <P ALIGN="LEFT">world-to-be-manipulated." Russell Meares.</P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"><B>Toy</B></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"><B>Don't toy with me.</B></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"><B></B></P>
<P ALIGN="LEFT"><B>He's got the whole world in his hand, the whole world </B></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"><B>in her hand.</B></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"><B></B></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"><B><FONT FACE="Courier">The construction of the poem is the experience of a </FONT></B></P> <P ALIGN="LEFT"><B><FONT FACE="Courier">poem between me and I</FONT></B></P>

As if we had the answer
we ask.

↑ Index

210. Michael Magee marginalized poets? - not so fast!
Fri 7 Aug 1998

If you'll all thumb through to page 174 of the latest issue of Glamour Magazine you'll be welcomed by a photo of none other than Lee Ann Brown, Lisa Jarnot, and Eleni Sikelianos, under the heading "Women are Making Poetry Hot Again," w/ commentary. "Who are the new female poets?" the writer asks: Elizabeth Willis, Jena Osman, Lee Ann, Eleni, Lisa, Juliana Spahr, Hoa Nguyen, Deborah Garrison. You go girls! I for one am thrilled that Glamour is giving such fine poets their props (no mention, unfortunately, of the fact that two of them appear in the inaugural issue of COMBO). Thanks to my wife Susanna for discovering this while thumbing through Glamour at the supermarket. -m.

↑ Index

211. Robert Archambeau
Germ (s) (ans) (any) (inal)
Fri 7 Aug 1998

So how do I get my hands on a copy of Germ? Backchannel info appreciated.

Bob Archambeau

↑ Index

212. Michael Magee
Re: marginalized poets? - not so fast!
Fri 7 Aug 1998

The article was written by Dawn Michelle Baude. A big fat YAAAY to her as well. -m.

According to Maria Damon:
>
> At 7:50 AM -0400 8/7/98, Michael Magee wrote:
> >If you'll all thumb through to page 174 of the latest issue of Glamour > >Magazine you'll be welcomed by a photo of none other than Lee Ann Brown, > >Lisa Jarnot, and Eleni Sikelianos, under the heading "Women are Making > >Poetry Hot Again," w/ commentary. "Who are the new female poets?" the > >writer asks: Elizabeth Willis, Jena Osman, Lee Ann, Eleni, Lisa, Juliana > >Spahr, Hoa Nguyen, Deborah Garrison. You go girls! I for one am thrilled > >that Glamour is giving such fine poets their props (no mention, > >unfortunately, of the fact that two of them appear in the inaugural issue > >of COMBO). Thanks to my wife Susanna for discovering this while thumbing > >through Glamour at the supermarket. -m.

>
> a big fat YAAAY a la kellogg jr to these groovy chicks. who wrote the > article i wonder?
>

↑ Index

213. Maria Damon
Re: marginalized poets? - not so fast!
Fri 7 Aug 1998

At 7:50 AM -0400 8/7/98, Michael Magee wrote:
>If you'll all thumb through to page 174 of the latest issue of Glamour >Magazine you'll be welcomed by a photo of none other than Lee Ann Brown, >Lisa Jarnot, and Eleni Sikelianos, under the heading "Women are Making >Poetry Hot Again," w/ commentary. "Who are the new female poets?" the >writer asks: Elizabeth Willis, Jena Osman, Lee Ann, Eleni, Lisa, Juliana >Spahr, Hoa Nguyen, Deborah Garrison. You go girls! I for one am thrilled >that Glamour is giving such fine poets their props (no mention, >unfortunately, of the fact that two of them appear in the inaugural issue
>of COMBO). Thanks to my wife Susanna for discovering this while thumbing
>through Glamour at the supermarket. -m.

a big fat YAAAY a la kellogg jr to these groovy chicks. who wrote the article i wonder?

↑ Index

214. Henry oh-oh
1 more dizjunk peep
Fri 7 Aug 1998

Will try to salvage something from my side of the disjunct divide for the fit though few, and will try to be brief.

Randolph Healy reminded us that "disjunctive" (new word, anybody?) poets "put things together". Good point. Obviously 20th cent poetry's glories include the leaps, the freedom, the documentary openness, the new forms, the new contents, that Pound's big "grab bag" opened up.

So many forces & influences have pushed in a centrifugal direction. Open up any poem almost by bestboy Mandelstam & you find disjunction like a natch'l born schizophrenic. Music, science, technology, speed, relativity, knowledge-boom... poetry HAD to spread the net in order to be real. (when it wasn't ahead of the times).

People think (maybe rightly considering my snarling) I have an agenda, to turn back the clock, to denigrate language poetry & experiment & difference. These are or would be reactionary tactics, true enough, if that were all. But that is not exactly the case. All I ask is that some of you consider the possibility that I am suggesting something positive rather than simply tearing down.

In a nutshell I am suggesting that there is always a repressed "other side" of any dominant cultural direction. One other side of our current zeitgeist of difference, otherness, disjunction, fragmentation would be world views that recognize continuity (aesthetic, ontological), synthesis, unity-of- being, wholeness. The mistake is to consider these representative of any particular cultural or political establishment & reject them out of hand. In my view the most radical challenge to a world order still enslaved to political violence and organized war (thinking of Ron Silliman's interesting note on his & C. Watts' C.O. experience during Vietnam war) comes from religious belief: Franciscan, Buddhist, Quaker, anarchist... While most religious philosophies long ago confronted the paradoxes of otherness and the unknown, unlike some contemporary ideologies they do not simply deny the existence of unity or synthesis of being.

Enough about philosophy. Let me disjunct over to the recent issue of GERM. I haven't read all of it yet, but I think the issue both displays some of the tried & true techniques I criticized before (fragmentary syntax, almost total obscurity of meaning(s)), and also quite a bit of artistry. Beth Anderson's series of poems stands out as different from the rest I read anyway. The most obvious difference is syntactical continuity and stylistic consistency. There are 4-5 poems which seem sort of Ashbery- Mallarme, in a consistent extremely neutral tone. Late 20th-cent symbolism: music of language, a serious, almost somber modern music. As in Ashbery, it's a beautiful syntax but sort of with the meaning hollowed out, at least the obvious meaning-packages. The music comes to the fore - but there is this distinctive, complex continuity & consistency of style. Devin Johnston's sequence was interesting too: like a Susan Howe protege, steeped in original 17-18th century texts, but also in Eliot and Crane, there's clearly a synthetic motivation at work & an awareness of rhythm & harmony.

I am not singling these out as "approved" texts from the journal - I am trying to point out elements of synthetic as opposed to disjunctive composition at work. I am trying to suggest that syntax CAN be an integral part of structural rhythm, and that structural rhythm CAN be put to a coherent, synthetic authorial purpose. And to me the original contrast of Yeats/Pound is apropos here.

I am talking about the lexical tools of poetry & suggesting that it is not enough to tear apart & throw into a grab bag anymore, no matter what hoary postmodernist truisms or ideals of class/identity politics or self-interested company histories of alternative art are brought to bear. I am suggesting looking for other means at work, other motivations. Every time you break apart a sentence, consider the cost. It's one more broken string on your bow. Is it worth it? Can you still shoot your arrows?

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

215. Rachel Loden
42 Little Ways to Happier Love
Fri 7 Aug 1998

Let the torrid source text work for you

— creating a structural glow that comes from multiple orgasm, not layers of blush and dissonance. From letting your morphemes shine to flaunting untamed,

just-slipped-out-of-the-swimming-pool syntax, this is the season to let go and fall in love — with your own sultry lacunae

--Rachel Loden

Michael Magee wrote:
>
> If you'll all thumb through to page 174 of the latest issue of Glamour > Magazine you'll be welcomed by a photo of none other than Lee Ann Brown, > Lisa Jarnot, and Eleni Sikelianos, under the heading "Women are Making > Poetry Hot Again," w/ commentary. "Who are the new female poets?" the > writer asks: Elizabeth Willis, Jena Osman, Lee Ann, Eleni, Lisa, Juliana > Spahr, Hoa Nguyen, Deborah Garrison. You go girls! I for one am thrilled > that Glamour is giving such fine poets their props (no mention, > unfortunately, of the fact that two of them appear in the inaugural issue
> of COMBO). Thanks to my wife Susanna for discovering this while thumbing > through Glamour at the supermarket. -m.

↑ Index

216. Michael Magee
Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
Fri 7 Aug 1998

> I am talking about the lexical tools of poetry & suggesting that it is > not enough to tear apart & throw into a grab bag anymore, no matter what hoary postmodernist truisms or ideals of class/identity politics or self-interested company histories of alternative art are brought to bear. I am suggesting looking for other means at work, other motivations. Every time you break apart a sentence, consider the cost. It's one more broken string on your bow. Is it worth it? Can you still shoot your arrows?

>
> - Henry Gould

I feel bad that I just can't put this down but I need, again, to make an exception: I think you're confusing "breaking apart a sentence" with writing a sentence which some people will consider broken. These are two totally different things. the first is based on an assumption that there is such a thing as a sentence and that this thing can be accurately recognized and measured according to certain criteria. The second attempts to create the definition of a sentence in the act of fashioning. So, no, I never, ever break sentences; I simply write a different kind of sentence (Monk's definition of his style: "How to use notes differently. That's it. Just how to use notes differently"). Vernacular traditions have always recognized this possibility, and the danger of putting a priori limits on communicative agency. The old joke, where the liguist says to his class, "There is no grammarical formation in which two positives equal a negative," and someone yells from the back of the room, "Yeah, right." I imagine that must have given those classmates a sense of breathing room to do their own thing. In my own work I see lots of possibilities for, if not "wholeness" exactly, then shared signs, or as Robert Duncan put it, "fictive certainties" - its just that these have less to do with the sanctioned rules of sentence construction than they do w/ what I hear around me - or dream up - in the shape of new, liminal, structures of "getting across," ones which I think better fit my sense of the real, or better fit my sense of what that real should be (the utopian commitment implicit in a belief in symbolic action). I remember laughing out loud the first time I hear the Beastie Boys lyric, "I got more rhymes than J.D.'s got Salinger" - of course, JD doesn't have Salinger, according to the rules of syntax, and yet he does, & I felt like I'd gotten something of the point. There's a big difference betwen just wanting to smash stuff up and trying to find structures compatible w/ ones evolving desires.

-m.

↑ Index

217. tracy s. ruggles
Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
Fri 7 Aug 1998

On Friday, August 7, 1998 7:08:49 AM, Henry oh-oh wrote:

[...]
>
>I am talking about the lexical tools of poetry & suggesting that it is >not enough to tear apart & throw into a grab bag anymore, no matter >what hoary postmodernist truisms or ideals of class/identity politics >or self-interested company histories of alternative art are brought >to bear. I am suggesting looking for other means at work, other >motivations. Every time you break apart a sentence, consider the >cost. It's one more broken string on your bow. Is it worth it?
>Can you still shoot your arrows?
>

I'm probably jumping in at the tail end of this thread, but this last paragraph has inspired me to say something.

To say, "every time you _break apart_ a sentence, consider the cost..." has an assumption buried in it that a poet begins with sentences as a frame of reference, or that a poet comes to a raw, previously written work to break it apart. I would also add a caution, "every time you _form_ a sentence, consider the cost."

I have been "looking for other means at work" and I, personally, have found that in order to touch some sort of truth in writing, I've got to begin with nothing, a blank page, emptiness. Of course, history, styles, traditions, politics, personal preferences, etc. are all swirling around in my mind and have their influences, but when I investigate the pure physicality of writing, there is the "problem" of a blank page (or computer screen, canvas, etc.), and then, how to _begin_.

So, I may be way off-base here, but the whole of disjunctive work has taught me not to question the modalities that it attempts to break apart, but to question the act of creating a work and all that that entails. It may be that when I write, I write a perfect sonnet. It may also be that when I edit it, I break it apart. Or it also may be that I write the broken sonnet without having written the perfect sonnet. Or I just write a few words and leave it at that.

"Can you still shoot your arrows?" Assuming that I'm even here to shoot anything, I'm not sure. I'm still learning. (I hope I haven't jumped into a thread that's bigger than what I think)

--trace--

And, like other here, I want to thank Henry for asking these questions...

↑ Index

218. Charles Alexander
Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
Fri 7 Aug 1998

> I think you're confusing "breaking apart a sentence" with writing a sentence which some people will consider broken. These are two totally different things. the first is based on an assumption that there is such a thing as a sentence and that this thing can be accurately recognized and measured according to certain criteria. The second attempts to create the definition of a sentence in the act of fashioning. So, no, I never, ever break sentences; I simply write a different kind of sentence (Monk's definition of his style: "How to use notes differently. That's it. Just how to use notes differently").

Or, on the one hand, using the weight of traditional usage, perhaps even with allowed variance, or beyond that but always with reference to accepted usage vs

treating language as material, being able to place a word here, a letter there, a mark on one side, a phrase on the other, and believe that the 'sense' one makes with such strategies is at least as important/interesting as the 'sense' one might make with more traditional usage

knowing all the while that we never entirely escape the centuries of built-up rules and conventions governing normative language use, and perhaps (this point is arguable) we would not want to escape such norms

but we want to make other voices/gestures/styles/arrangements possible, too as we extend what it is we might do in a poem or other written/sounded/projected work as we extend how such things might be read to me there is a good parallel in this ongoing discussion with activities in the world of bookmaking, where some will only accept the traditional codex form as a 'book,' while others are just busily making various structures which still offer themselves as one kind of gathering or another, able to be 'read'

charles
charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

219. Jordan Davis
fadenya badenya
Fri 7 Aug 1998

Is the difference that makes meaning always only oppositional, dialectic?

Small boat
appraisal guide

↑ Index

220. dbkk
Mina review
Fri 7 Aug 1998

Check out David Buuck's fabulous, smart, sensitive, informed, review of The Letters of Mina Harker at the Electronic Book Review:

http://www.altx.com/ebr/reviews/rev7/r7buu.htm

I feel so lucky and thrilled to have this piece written about my book.

Dodie Bellamy

↑ Index

221. hen
Re: fadenya badenya
Fri 7 Aug 1998

> Is the difference that makes meaning always only oppositional, dialectic?
>
> Small boat
> appraisal
> guide

"The relationship of our intellect to the truth is like that of a polygon to a circle; the resemblance to the circle grows with the multiplication of the angles of the polygon; but apart from its being reduced to identity with the circle, no multiplication, even if it were infinite, of its angles will make the polygon equal to the circle. "It is clear, therefore, that all we know of the truth is that the absolute truth, such as it is, is beyond our reach. The truth, which can be neither more nor less than it is, is the most absolute necessity, while, in contrast to it, our intellect is possibility. Therefore, the quiddity of things, which is ontological truth, is unattainable in its entirety; and though it has been the objective of all philosophers, by none has it been found as it really is. The more profoundly we learn this lesson of ignorance, the closer we draw to truth itself." - Nicolas Cusanus, OF LEARNED IGNORANCE, 1440.

↑ Index

222. David Baratier

Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment

Fri 7 Aug 1998

Charles made a comment about Henry's commentary fitting into certain aspects of the bookmaking realm. Which mused me with similarities for a few days. A fine press uses hand set type, sewn signatures, spine covers, textured paper stocks, to create a book into a made thing with a sense of typography and place, not a generated commodity.

"When the purpose of printing is to produce cheap, disposable copies, as is the case with paperbacks, high-speed rotary presses are functional and acceptable. Such means, however, seldom provide the esthetic aspect of reading-- the look and feel of a good page." Warren Campbell, _A short history of the printed word_

We are missing the book here. There are generative commodity writer's out there on any side seen worthy to name. In the way that MFA programs have given us plenty of "competent writers," the more "experimental" based programs give us a different ilk with similar results. Except in rare instances, the total book has disappeared through the falsity of sentence fracture. Why should it matter if the sentence was written out first then fractured or written for fracture, when the results are the same tired notion sacked from "A roll of the dice will abolish chance?" Late last century is hardly innovation. Where the looks of a piece are the show not an aspect thereof like how revising history through the guise of a new film prepares us in spirit for the next, not to denigrate the last.

It reminds me of a study presented before the American Marketing Association a few years back. Truthful advertisements fail, but false ones succeed in placing end use consumers in a buying mode.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

223. Charles Alexander
Re: fadenya badenya
Fri 7 Aug 1998

At 12:09 PM 8/7/98 -0400, you wrote:
>Is the difference that makes meaning always only oppositional, dialectic?
>
>Small boat >appraisal >guide
>
>

I certainly hope not paper aloft generous apprehension

charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

224. henry gould
Re: 1 more dizjunk peep
Fri 7 Aug 1998

The Ultimate Authority, Poeta Superbissima Osip Mandelstam, once wrote: poetic material is language in its raw state, infinitely more raw than speech & "literature".

This accords well with Mike, Tracy & Charles's points. Points well taken. Still, I would argue that boilerplate experimental poetry is made up of either abrupt jumps between single words & partial phrases, or neutral simple sentences - neutral in the sense of being so contextless as to mean anything you want them to mean. And I would suggest, and have been suggesting, that those who want to consider themselves adventurous and experimental might look in the direction of verbal & syntactical richness, complexity, development, and synthesis as well as in the direction of staccato idioms of their own devising. There are a lot of ways to shoot arrows. Imagine a poetry that didn't foreground its verbal mannerisms, but built up an organ-like presentation of communications based on comprehensible speech patterns.

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

225. Elizabeth Treadwell
Outlet review cc's
Fri 7 Aug 1998

Outlet is starting a reviews column to be written by various people (if you're interested in reviewing, contact me). If you are a chapbook publisher, that's what we want to see please, review copies! Our particular interest is poetry chapbooks, fiction also ok - especially 'experimental' -- especially small press.

Thanks.

Elizabeth Treadwell

Outlet, a periodical
Double Lucy Books
P.O. Box 9013
Berkeley, California 94709
U.S.A.
http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

226. L. MacMahon and T.R. Healy
Re: Outlet review cc's
Fri 7 Aug 1998

Hi Elizabeth,

I run a small poetry press called Wild Honey Press. Will be glad to send copies for potential review.

I'd also like to write some reviews. If you wish to see some examples of my "work" (it's pleasure really), I can send some.

best wishes

and congrats on such a good idea

Randolph Healy
16a Ballyman Rd, Bray, Co. Wicklow, Ireland.

from [redacted]

> From: Elizabeth Treadwell <[redacted]>
> To: [redacted]
> Subject: Outlet review cc's
> Date: 07 August 1998 19:02

>
> Outlet is starting a reviews column to be written by various people (if > you're interested in reviewing, contact me). If you are a chapbook > publisher, that's what we want to see please, review copies! Our particular > interest is poetry chapbooks, fiction also ok - especially 'experimental'
--
> especially small press.
>
> Thanks.
>
> Elizabeth Treadwell
>
> Outlet, a periodical
> Double Lucy Books
> P.O. Box 9013
> Berkeley, California 94709
> U.S.A.
> http://users.lanminds.com/~dblelucy

↑ Index

227. Robert Corbett
All things nicholian
Fri 7 Aug 1998

In the spirit of getting a positive thread going, what do people on the list have to say about bp nichol. I noticed that the phrasing of the conference abstract suggests that he is still alive. I take it this means his influence lives on, but in the midst of the matyrology, one can be forgiven for mixing up presence and absence.

As a start, can someone confirm for me whether nichol was a student of Robin Blaser? Or is his work developed along a parallel circuit with the notion of serialism (is it surrealism) as poetic method?

Robert

Robert Corbett "you are there beyond/ tracings flesh can [redacted] take,/ and farther away surrounding and University of Washington informing the systems" - A.R. Ammons

↑ Index

228. Carl Lynden Peters
Re: All things nicholian
Fri 7 Aug 1998

This is in response to Robert's e-mail re bpNichol & influence. It's certain his influence is alive and well. And to further a point made implicit in your post: In an issue of th _Capilano Review_ (summer 1995?) Robin Blaser sd that Nichol was "top of the heap." i've always taken Blaser's comment very seriously, and won't argue. There is also much scholarship on Nichol currently in the works. It's very exciting. Whenever i talk to people about Nichol they say things like "he was connected" -- to what? with what? WHAT! . . . something sacred. i think the poetic relationship between Blaser and Nichol--is intimate. And then the one between Nichol and Duncan remains to be written. Altho from what i have learned, i don't think Nichol was ever all that taken by Duncan's work. Maybe he felt it was a bit inaccessible. Maybe Nichol's sense or idea of the sacred is more immediate, everyday, and ordinary. But then so might Duncan's. i dunno. Blaser--Duncan--bpNichol . . . very inneresting!

Nichol's "Talking About The Sacred in Writing" (in _Tracing The Paths_) is very useful. . . . "Godness" in terms of "pataphysics . . .

c.

↑ Index

229. maz881
aldon
Fri 7 Aug 1998

---

can someone email me aldon nielsen's hard copy address as i seem to have temporarily lost it.

thanks,

bill luoma
[redacted]

↑ Index

230. Carl Lynden Peters
bpNichol feature
Fri 7 Aug 1998

---

sorry, forgot to mention before that _West Coast Line_ just published excerpts from Nichol's last notebook. It's just out this week.

carl

↑ Index

231. henry
Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
Fri 7 Aug 1998

David Baratier said: ----------Original message----------
Charles made a comment about Henry's commentary fitting into certain aspects of the bookmaking realm. Which mused me with similarities for a few days. A fine press uses hand set type, sewn signatures, spine covers, textured paper stocks, to create a book into a made thing with a sense of typography and place, not a generated commodity. []

We are missing the book here. There are generative commodity writer's out there on any side seen worthy to name. In the way that MFA programs have given us plenty of "competent writers," the more "experimental" based programs give us a different ilk with similar results. Except in rare instances, the total book has disappeared through the falsity of sentence fracture. Why should it matter if the sentence was written out first then fractured or written for fracture, when the results are the same tired notion sacked from "A roll of the dice will abolish chance?" Late last century is hardly innovation. Where the looks of a piece are the show not an aspect thereof like how revising history through the guise of a new film prepares us in spirit for the next, not to denigrate the last.

It reminds me of a study presented before the American Marketing Association a few years back. Truthful advertisements fail, but false ones succeed in placing end use consumers in a buying mode. [end of quote] - - - - - - - - -- - - - - The creation of the unique art-book is related to the exchange between poetry & visual art in concrete poetry, & the suggestion of bpNichol as an antidote to the negative/dialectic haggling over the dizjunk issue. From his book titles alone (all I've seen of it for now) Nichol seems to be somebody with a sense of humor & a strong art-sense, a spiritual independence, pure joie-de-vivre. Poetry needs to draw sustenance from this kind of life & example. On the other hand I think poetry has strange spiritual weapons (Blake, Hopkins, Dickinson, Shakespeare, Milton, come to mind) which are in the word itself and transcend the mode of presentation to some extent; poetry has its resources, sui generis, just as visual art does, which I have been trying to point out in the emphasis on clear speech etc. Perhaps the most radical aspect of pure art is the sense of play which as Jordan pointed out ain't dialectical but generous... calling down judgement on the utilitarian, mechanical, pre- artistic or sub-artistic, the careerist, the arriviste, the noisy, the ideological, the rational, the irrational, the graceless, purely on the basis of its graceful presence amongst us... its fulfillment of its own joyful prerogatives... that takes a certain gift & sweat...

- Henry G.

↑ Index

232. Douglas Oliver
Re: Snuff and more
Fri 7 Aug 1998

A few other Brits on my previous list: John James, most elegant not so much recent work as heretofore, Roy Fisher -- good book out from Bloodaxe, Ian Patterson and many others of the Cambridge fraternity and, slightly, sorority, and I'm told of Hugh Maxton veteran of the Irish Other wing. Others could be rescued: the slender, valuable work of Mark Hyatt, Brian Marley, and so forth.

But thassnuff names, I'm sure, for you are beginning to hate me. What I'll do now is dive back on to my other list, the Britpo, and talk about some US names. See the little winged Mercury heels. We need to know more over there, too, and is there a good anthology of American poetry published in Britain that I've somehow missed? Can anyone inform me? I'll ask the Brits too.

Hail and Farewell, temporarily no doubt.

Doug

↑ Index

233. Christian Roess
Re: fadenya badenya
Fri 7 Aug 1998

> At 12:09 PM 8/7/98 -0400, you wrote:
> Is the difference that makes meaning always only oppositional, dialectic?
>
> Small boat
> appraisal
> guide

Dear Small Boat,

Good question. Alas, I'm not shore.And it's hard to stay current. I think, though, I get your drift. Of course: check your star-board on occasion, especially amid*ships.

And stay trim;

Yours truly,

River-o'-dreams

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

234. Ryan Whyte
Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
Fri 7 Aug 1998

I generally agree with this, except I don't see the problem as being that books are mass-produced, and that really good 'total books' (a questionable phrase, Blanchot might say) must be hand-made/letterpressed etc. (as bourgeoise fetish-objects). Simply, typography does certain things with certain materials, and this is too easily forgotten as typography is ostensibly to remain transparent, to somehow assure the total delivery of the text.

There are some poems that do great things on a photocopied page. I try to remember with my work on Aporia that the type itself is performative.....

Ryan

↑ Index

235. Dorothy Trujillo
Charles Watts
Fri 7 Aug 1998

Like Senor Silliman, I also knew what the notice from Peter was going to be on the list but I still reeled into a pretty shocky state. I spoke with a friend later who said,"No. We knew Charles was dying" but I did not know that at all. Many years ago, Charles had meningitus and spent months in hospital. I still remember the sick anxiety of impending loss. But Charles came through being that close to death and lived for a good long time before the cancer showed up. He'd had operations and various treatments, was taking a lot of really good supplements, was taking care of himself and was continuing to work but being very mindful of his health, was not putting in excessive hours at Special Collections, as he'd a tendancy to do. I know he'd been putting in long days with Ted Byrne on the Blaser papers but I do think he was pacing himself to not become overtaxed. I just always believed he would prevail, as ever. I so appreciate Peter Quartermain's sensitivity in the initial posting and Bowering, Little and Silliman's tributes and reminiscences, particularly mention of Charles's sense of humour which could be paradoxically droll yet giggly. I always valued of Charles that he truly seemed to enjoy my own socially inappropriate daftness as a worthy lark rather than pathologizing me/'it' as many other real grown-ups were wont to do. & the giggle was right out there when years ago I shared with him plans to form a LOUD BAND called the Pound Scholars. Charles enjoyed his neighbourhood and his terrific neighbours, including Lisa Robertson right upstairs. He had friends with him towards the end and at the end and I am very glad that he was with those he cared for and who cared for him so much. I last saw Charles at the reading I did with Bowering a few weeks back and Charles was as he will always be for me the Best Company.

I am having so much sadness with all of us in Vancouver. We have so much loss and so much to remember. We'll probably be putting something together along similar lines as the Kathy Acker Memorial Benefit through the Kootenay School of Writing, possibly at the Western Front sometime in September but its really early days on this.
Take care everyone, xxxx Dorothy Trujillo Lusk
[redacted]
765 Sawyer's Lane
Vancouver, BC V5Z 3Z8
[redacted]

↑ Index

236. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
ISEA98 (completed '96) from Jennifer
Sat 8 Aug 1998

http://www.isea98.org/people/sondheim/jennifer/index.htm

↑ Index

237. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Kass Fleisher piece
Sat 8 Aug 1998

Everyone on this list should treat him or herself to our own Kassia (Kass) Fleisher's piece in the current electronic book review (http:///www.altx.com/ebr/reviews/review7fleisher> called "oh Say Can You see It's All a Show" on the Clinton Capers. It is BRILLIANT, HILARIOUS, AND SAD.

Same issue has a piece by Loss Glazier that I shall call up next.

xxx
Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

238. Michael Magee
Re: fadenya badenya
Sat 8 Aug 1998

I would say no - that it is not always oppositional, thoug it probably is always, in some sense, dialectic: a questioning a old strategies, a proposal of new ones. But certainly a praxis focussed merely on opposition, in failing to provide alternatives, misses the boat. This is why Jameson's Marxism is so dependent on descriptions of Marxian utopias: as he "explains" to some degree toward the end of the POlitical Unconscious, those invented utopias have a key purpose, they awaken both dissatisfaction (w/ present conditions) and desire (for what has been described). & it's that latter conection between utopian description and desire that I would say is not precisely oppositional in nature. Jameson leanrs this from Burke who, in turn, learned it from Dewey. Dewey describes how the pragmatist might use ideal formulations, not to argue there ontological validity, but for the complex set of negotiations which they engender:

"the idea becomes a standpoint from which to examine existing occurrences...the suggestion or fancy though still ideal is treated as a possibility capable of realization in the concrete natural world. As such, it becomes a platform from which to scrutinize natural events."

This seems to me to be one motivation behind a lot of experimental writing: it has a propositional quality, and treats new ways of writing/speaking as potentially viable forms of communication.

-m.

According
to Christian Roess: > > > > > At 12:09 PM 8/7/98 -0400, you wrote:
> >Is the difference that makes meaning always only oppositional, dialectic?
> >
> >Small boat > >appraisal
> >guide
>
>
> Dear Small Boat,
>
> Good question. Alas, I'm not shore.And it's hard to stay current. I think, though, I get your drift. Of course: check your star-board on occasion, especially amid*ships.
>
> And stay trim;
>
> Yours truly,
>
> River-o'-dreams
>
>
>

>
> _____
> Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1
>

↑ Index

239. Marjorie Perloff
Re: Kass Fleisher piece
Sat 8 Aug 1998

Dear Joe Safdie:

I look forward to your response--I like good arguments!

All best wishes,
Marjorie Perloff

↑ Index

240. Douglas Barbour
Re: bp studies
Sat 8 Aug 1998

There's quite a bit on bpNichol out there, & I have no doubt much more to come. For those who knew him, he is still 'present,' & for those who only come to him in the writing, I believe he will be a living force.

Stephen Scobie's early book, _bpNichol: What History Teaches_ still available from talonbooks ECWPress still has copies of _bpNichol and His Works_ (my monograph from 1992).

There was the special issue of West Coast Line _Tracing the Paths: Reding/Writing the martyrology_ edited by Roy Miki, also from talonbooks; & now, from _West Coast Line_ , _Beyond the Orchard: Essays on the martyrology_, edited by Roy Miki & Fred Wah.

from _Open Letter_ (6th series, Nos 5-6 [Summer-Fall 1986[): _Read the Way He Writes: a Festschrift for bpNichol_.

Those will give anyone a good start

& with bp, it's always a good start...

Douglas Barbour (h) [403] 4363320 (b) [403]
[redacted]
Department of English

University of Alberta
Edmonton Alberta Canada T6G 2E5

If

a city is an invention
why are we not there

Kathleen Fraser

↑ Index

241. David Baratier
Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
Sat 8 Aug 1998

Ryan: the total book is a mallarmean notion. I thought this was obvious from the mention of Un coup de des jamais. Perhaps not. Read Cook's Mallarme on John's Hopkins. The comparative referent was how the medium of bookmaking has changed, and the transience of that change over time has caused a lowering of standards of what is published. From dime store novels to current disposable poetry.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

242. Mark DuCharme
Re: your territory (& welcome to it)
Sat 8 Aug 1998

Go to those hills, for all I care. I'm sorry to be blunt. If I believed, for example, that Yeats' poetry was of little worth (which I don't!), I wouldn't have the bad taste to go trumpeting that opinion about as if the judgements of other intelligent readers were as grains of sand compared to my monolithic literary intelligence (ego). Was it you in a post awhile back who suggested that the current avant garde literary scene was self-involved? Take the log out of your own eye--as Christ would say.

Your scholar,

Mark DuCharme

>Imagine a hydrahead: Ashberybloomvendler.
>
>Imagine a nation of academic journals dedicated to securing tenure for >professional poets who run contests and give awards and so on.

>
>Imagine a poetry counter-culture of shallow roots, a-historical hokum
and >spiritual posturing.
>
>Then think about Grand Fenwick.
>
>There's more poetry in one saying of the Sermon on the Mount than in
all >the writings of Pound, Olson, Duncan, Creeley, Palmer, etc. put together.
>Am I impinging on your territory? I will lift mine eyes unto the hills,
>whence cometh my strength.
>
>
>- Henry Gould
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

243. Mark Weiss

Re: your territory (& welcome to it)

Sat 8 Aug 1998

Henry hardly needs my help to defend himself. Let me just say that while I disagree with him about the Sermon on the Mount (they were platitudes even then, Henry), you seem to have misconstrued his attitude towards Yeats.

I've noticed in myself and others that artists tend to value, when we rank other artrists, those whom we find useful to or related to our own work at the moment of judgement. This is because, I think, we interact with their work differently than either the lay audience or the teacher or critic. And it's difficult to wear more than one of these hats at a time, which is why I try to avoid teaching a great many poets whom others find essential. I also (caveat to Henry) have found myself at times promoting with religous ferocity poets I couldn't abide not long before. As my work evolves (or devolves) towards or away from the work of another my tastes modify.

At 12:31 PM 8/8/98 PDT, you wrote:
>Go to those hills, for all I care. I'm sorry to be blunt. If I >believed, for example, that Yeats' poetry was of little worth (which I >don't!), I wouldn't have the bad taste to go trumpeting that opinion >about as if the judgements of other intelligent readers were as grains >of sand compared to my monolithic literary intelligence (ego). Was it >you in a post awhile back who suggested that the current avant garde >literary scene was self-involved? Take the log out of your own eye-- as >Christ would say.

>
>Your scholar,
>
>Mark DuCharme
>
>
>>Imagine a hydrahead: Ashberybloomvendler.
>>
>>Imagine a nation of academic journals dedicated to securing tenure for >>professional poets who run contests and give awards and so on.
>>
>>Imagine a poetry counter-culture of shallow roots, a-historical hokum
>and >>spiritual posturing.
>>
>>Then think about Grand Fenwick.
>>
>>There's more poetry in one saying of the Sermon on the Mount than in
>all
>>the writings of Pound, Olson, Duncan, Creeley, Palmer, etc. put >together.
>>Am I impinging on your territory? I will lift mine eyes unto the >hills,
>>whence cometh my strength.
>>
>>
>>- Henry Gould
>>
>
>
>_____
>Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>
>

↑ Index

244. Dorothy Trujillo
Re: ME "on" list
Sat 8 Aug 1998

Hey Joe! Nice to hear from you. Yeah, Charles WAS great. Just got a nice message from Bill Luoma remembering him. Thamx too,Bill & aloha.

As for being "on" the list--it's an odd thing really, I'd not thought of doing postings and such--I only just figured out how to do them (apologies to any for any errors of form &c)--in this instance,however,because of our friend Charles, there somehow seemed to me a need for a response in a public testimony.

Umm--well--what do I "think". Well I'm mostly on this list for access to information and the movement of information that is of some concern to the Kootenay School of Writing (ie:there is a posting that a writer we'd be interested in coming to x location & maybe we can get that person as well on the same trip) & personally, to see what other people are nattering on poetics. I found Karen Kelley contra Yau fictive gal consciousness pretty interesting and all the Pvt Ryan stuff,particularly the earlier responses and I believe Maxine Chernoff initiating the discussion. But by the time they were all on about which way they wanted to die, I admit that I too was thinking of which way I wanted them to die. There are quite a few of you out there with a much more philosophical bent than I am rather impressed in my pit of willful ignorance--go for it--looks good to ME anyway.

I enjoyed reading with you -- I did think it was a perversely interesting mix -- I do know that you felt much better afterwards when it became apparent that I am not only an Evil Language Dupe but also Spicer Spawn, through a bastard yet noble lineage via the Spicer Diaspora. We sort of can't help that up here. Any way, thamx again & keep in touch.

Dorothy Trujillo Lusk <[redacted]>

At 08:04 PM 8/7/98 -0700, you wrote:
> Hi Dorothy -- thanks for this. I really feel bereft, after reading it >and the other tributes you mention, and I didn't even know the man! But >he must have been really special.
>
>You may remember we did a reading together last December in Seattle. I >really enjoyed talking with you afterwards much more than the reading!
>Are you "on" this list now? What do you think?
>
>All best,
>
>Joe Safdie

>
>
>-----Original Message-----
>From: Dorothy Trujillo
>To: [redacted]
>Sent: 8/7/98 7:24 PM
>Subject: Charles Watts
>
>Like Senor Silliman, I also knew what the notice from Peter was going to >be >on the list but I still reeled into a pretty shocky state. I spoke with >a >friend later who said,"No. We knew Charles was dying" but I did not know >that at all. Many years ago, Charles had meningitus and spent months in >hospital. I still remember the sick anxiety of impending loss. But >Charles
>came through being that close to death and lived for a good long time >before >the cancer showed up. He'd had operations and various treatments, was >taking >a lot of really good supplements, was taking care of himself and was >continuing to work but being very mindful of his health, was not putting
>in >excessive hours at Special Collections, as he'd a tendancy to do. I know >he'd been putting in long days with Ted Byrne on the Blaser papers but I >do >think he was pacing himself to not become overtaxed. I just always >believed >he would prevail, as ever.
>I so appreciate Peter Quartermain's sensitivity in the initial posting
>and >Bowering, Little and Silliman's tributes and reminiscences, particularly >mention of Charles's sense of humour which could be paradoxically droll >yet >giggly. I always valued of Charles that he truly seemed to enjoy my own >socially inappropriate daftness as a worthy lark rather than >pathologizing >me/'it' as many other real grown-ups were wont to do. & the giggle was >right >out there when years ago I shared with him plans to form a LOUD BAND >called >the Pound Scholars. Charles enjoyed his neighbourhood and his terrific >neighbours, including Lisa Robertson right upstairs. He had friends with >him >towards the end and at the end and I am very glad that he was with those >he >cared for and who cared for him so much. I last saw Charles at the >reading I >did with Bowering a few weeks back and Charles was as he will always be >for >me the Best Company.

>
>I am having so much sadness with all of us in Vancouver. We have so much >loss and so much to remember. We'll probably be putting something >together
>along similar lines as the Kathy Acker Memorial Benefit through the >Kootenay
>School of Writing, possibly at the Western Front sometime in September >but >its really early days on this.
>Take care everyone, xxxx Dorothy Trujillo Lusk
>[redacted]
>765 Sawyer's Lane
>Vancouver, BC V5Z 3Z8
>[redacted]
>
>

↑ Index

245. MAXINE CHERNOFF
Query
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Dear Folks: Does anyone have mailing addresses for Fred Muratori and Albert Mobilio? If so, can you backchannel them to me?

Thanks,

Maxine Chernoff

↑ Index

246. rsillima
Private Ryan
Sun 9 Aug 1998

It's definitely "Lock and load,"

But what is it that Tom Hanks mumbles about "earning it" in the scene on the bridge to Matt Damon?

Ron Silliman

↑ Index

247. Louis Cabri
Re: bp studies
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Probably the first critical essays on the bp industry in canada appear in: _beyond the orchard: essays on the martyrology_. An h project. west coast line. 1997.

-l

↑ Index

248. Charles Bernstein
Russian festival of poetry (fwd)
Sun 9 Aug 1998

---------- Forwarded message ----------
Date: Sat, 8 Aug 1998 09:42:35 +0400 (MSD)
From: [redacted]

A festival of contemporary Russian poetry will be held on Sept 18 to 20 in St.Petersburg and Sept. 25 to 27 in Moscow. The title of the festival is "Genius Loci". 24 poets from Russia (mostly Moscow and St.Petersburg) will be participating, among them such prominent literary figures as Dmitry Prigov, Lev Rubinstein, Arkadi Dragomoshchenko, Genrich Sapgir, Viktor Krivulin. There will be a number of young poets too.

The festival is sponsored by the "New Literary Review' journal and partly sponsored by the Soros Foundation.

All those who share an interest in modern poetry are very welcome to visit.

Accomodation may be provided.

Contact:
email: [redacted]
tel: (812) 1351836
addr: Sergei Zavialov / Masha Zavialov 198329 Partizana Germana st. 21, apt 114,
St. Petersburg Russia

↑ Index

249. Mark DuCharme
Re: your territory (& welcome to it)
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Mark,

I agree w/ what you say about how one reads/ reacts to poets who have affected one's own work (though I'm not sure that such a reaction is any more or less valid than a supposedly "objective" critical or academic one, since the "influenced" poet brings a unique perspective to discussion of an author's work: & thus I think wearing multiple "hats" may be appropriate). However (& to get to yr main point), I don't think that I _was_ commenting on Henry's attitude toward Yeats, but on his apparently flippant dismissal of "Pound, Olson, Duncan, Creeley, Palmer," as well as Ashbery. Such a summary dismissal as I took him to mean does nothing to further poetic dialogue, & does a disservice to those poets, obviously, as well as to those of us who take their work seriously. I only brought up Yeats as a way to make this point clear to Henry. In doing so I wasn't attempting to characterize Henry's attitude toward Yeats, or my own.

Thanks for your comments.

--Mark DuCharme

Mark Weiss wrote:
>Henry hardly needs my help to defend himself. Let me just say that while I >disagree with him about the Sermon on the Mount (they were platitudes even >then, Henry), you seem to have misconstrued his attitude towards Yeats.
>
>I've noticed in myself and others that artists tend to value, when we rank >other artrists, those whom we find useful to or related to our own work at >the moment of judgement. This is because, I think, we interact with their >work differently than either the lay audience or the teacher or critic. And >it's difficult to wear more than one of these hats at a time, which is why >I try to avoid teaching a great many poets whom others find essential.
>I also (caveat to Henry) have found myself at times promoting with religous >ferocity poets I couldn't abide not long before. As my work evolves (or >devolves) towards or away from the work of another my tastes modify.

>
>At 12:31 PM 8/8/98 PDT, you wrote:
>>Go to those hills, for all I care. I'm sorry to be blunt. If I >>believed, for example, that Yeats' poetry was of little worth (which I >>don't!), I wouldn't have the bad taste to go trumpeting that opinion >>about as if the judgements of other intelligent readers were as grains >>of sand compared to my monolithic literary intelligence (ego). Was it >>you in a post awhile back who suggested that the current avant garde >>literary scene was self-involved? Take the log out of your own eye-- as >>Christ would say.
>>
>>Your scholar,
>>
>>Mark DuCharme
>>
>>
>>>Imagine a hydrahead: Ashberybloomvendler.
>>>
>>>Imagine a nation of academic journals dedicated to securing tenure
for >>>professional poets who run contests and give awards and so on.
>>>
>>>Imagine a poetry counter-culture of shallow roots, a-historical hokum
>>and >>>spiritual posturing.
>>>
>>>Then think about Grand Fenwick.
>>>
>>>There's more poetry in one saying of the Sermon on the Mount than in
>>all
>>>the writings of Pound, Olson, Duncan, Creeley, Palmer, etc. put >>together.
>>>Am I impinging on your territory? I will lift mine eyes unto the >>hills,
>>>whence cometh my strength.
>>>
>>>
>>>- Henry Gould
>>>
>>
>>

>>_____
>>Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>>
>>
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

250. trbell
proletarian _Glamour
Sun 9 Aug 1998

My reading about early Russian Futurism leads me to ask:
What is a proletarian poet?
Is this someone with a proletarian backgroun?
Is this someone who writes for (on behalf of politically) the proletariat?
Is this someone who writes for the proletariat's enjoyment (for the working woman, for the college educated woman, for the academic, etc.?)

tom bell

↑ Index

251. Loss Pequen~o Glazier
Mouseover at EBR
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Marjorie recently mentioned my "Mouseover: Essay in JavaScript" piece that appears in the current Electronic Book Review. I am posting this note to let you know that, as the piece presently appears, it is not fully readable. The editors are working on correcting this problem and I can let the list know when the problem is corrected. Hopefully, it won't be long. Thanks.

↑ Index

252. Mark DuCharme
Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Wanted to say, since we've had some contentious exchanges, that I completely agree w/ what's said here, w/ the possible exception of David's comment about fragmentation-- just that I don't subscribe to the ideology of innovation, so the fact that we date fragmentation from Mallarme or the sonnet from the troubadors is not in & of itself relevant to whether it's alive NOW in a given practitioner's work.

Could it be that semantics (or Henry's spirit of devil's advocacy) covers up broader areas of agreement?

Just checking...

--Mark DuCharme

>David Baratier said:
>----------Original message---------- >Charles made a comment about Henry's commentary fitting into certain >aspects of the bookmaking realm. Which mused me with similarities for a >few days. A fine press uses hand set type, sewn signatures, spine >covers, textured paper stocks, to create a book into a made thing with a >sense of typography and place, not a generated commodity.
>[]
>
>We are missing the book here. There are generative commodity writer's >out there on any side seen worthy to name. In the way that MFA programs >have given us plenty of "competent writers," the more "experimental" >based programs give us a different ilk with similar results. Except in >rare instances, the total book has disappeared through the falsity of >sentence fracture. Why should it matter if the sentence was written out >first then fractured or written for fracture, when the results are the >same tired notion sacked from "A roll of the dice will abolish chance?" >Late last century is hardly innovation. Where the looks of a piece are >the show not an aspect thereof like how revising history through the >guise of a new film prepares us in spirit for the next, not to denigrate
>the last.
>
>It reminds me of a study presented before the American Marketing >Association a few years back. Truthful advertisements fail, but false >ones succeed in placing end use consumers in a buying mode.
>[end of quote]
> - - - - - - - - -- - - - -
>The creation of the unique art-book is related to the exchange between >poetry & visual art in concrete poetry, & the suggestion of bpNichol as >an antidote to the negative/dialectic haggling over the dizjunk issue.

>From his book titles alone (all I've seen of it for now)
>Nichol seems to be somebody with a sense of humor & a strong art-sense, >a spiritual independence, pure joie-de-vivre. Poetry needs to >draw sustenance from this kind of life & example. On the other hand I think >poetry has strange spiritual weapons (Blake, Hopkins, Dickinson, Shakespeare, >Milton, come to mind) which are in the word itself and transcend the >mode of presentation to some extent; poetry has its resources, sui generis, >just as visual art does, which I have been trying to point out in the >emphasis on clear speech etc. Perhaps the most radical aspect of pure >art is the sense of play which as Jordan pointed out ain't dialectical but >generous... calling down judgement on the utilitarian, mechanical, pre->artistic or sub-artistic, the careerist, the arriviste, the noisy, the >ideological, the rational, the irrational, the graceless, purely on the >basis of its graceful presence amongst us... its fulfillment of its own >joyful prerogatives... that takes a certain gift & sweat...
>
>- Henry G.
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

253. Christian Roess

Re: my territory

Sun 9 Aug 1998

On Thu, 6 Aug 98 Henry Gould writes

> Imagine a hydrahead: Ashberybloomvendler.
>
> Imagine a nation of academic journals dedicated to securing tenure for professional poets who run contests and give awards and so on.
>
> Imagine a poetry counter-culture of shallow roots, a-historical hokum and spiritual posturing.
>
> Then think about Grand Fenwick.
>
> There's more poetry in one saying of the Sermon on the Mount than in all the writings of Pound, Olson, Duncan, Creeley, Palmer, etc. put together. Am I impinging on your territory? I will lift mine eyes unto the hills, whence cometh my strength.

> Henry Gould

In 1804 , ' To justify the Ways of God to Men', The Author & Printer W Blake, writes:

> The Stolen and Perverted Writings of Homer & Ovid: of Plato & Cicero. which all Men ought to contemn: are set up by artifice against the Sublime of the Bible. but when the New Age is at leisure to Pronounce; all will be set right: & those Grand Works of the more ancient & consciously & professedly Inspired Men, will hold their proper rank, & the Daughters of Memory shall become the Daughters of Inspiration. Shakspeare & Milton were both curbd by the general malady & infection from the silly Greek & Latin slaves of the Sword.
>
> Rouze up O Young Men of the New Age! set your foreheads against the ignorant Hirelings! For we have Hirelings in the Camp, the Court, & the University: who would if they could, for ever depress Mental & prolong Corporeal War. Painters! on you I call! Sculptors! Architects! Suffer not the fash[i]onable Fools to depress your powers by the prices they pretend to give for contemptible works or the expensive advertizing boasts that they make of such works; believe Christ & his Apostles that there is a Class of Men whose whole delight is in Destroying. We do not want either Greek or Roman Models if we are but just & true to our own Imaginations, those Worlds of Eternity in which we shall live for ever; in Jesus our Lord.

(from 'preface' to MILTON)

Henry,

You call it "my territory". But is this anything so new? The 'new age' has arrived? Or didn't Blake recognize this 194 years ago? I haven't read much of Blake's -Milton- but Is this territory you are proclaiming as "my territory", also a territory which shares a boundary with the ignorant 'hirelings' who don't recognize the 'proper rank' of the 'writings of Pound, Olson, Duncan, Creeley, Palmer, etc.'?

For example, are you espousing along with Blake that their writings seem like 'artifice' when compared to the 'sublime' "Sermon on the Mount"? So the so-called 'counter-traditionalists' along with the AshberybloomVendler School of Social Research are only making 'expensive advertizing boasts' and your territory is the only way to be 'just & true' to our own Imaginations ? Hey who's to say you are not on target Henry : yours being the 'Bow' to Blake's' Lyre'.

I'm not wanting to come off here like a smart-ass : Are you being serious? I mean, this seems to be the way, both implicitly and explicitly, your statements are to be taken. At the same time, are you saying also that yours is 'just & true' way, which is what Blake is calling our Imaginations? Am I mis-reading your statements?

The boastful side of me wants to proclaim: What are you getting at? What in the sam heck are you talking about? !! In some sense , what you are calling 'my territory' is an awfully silly boast. Don't you think?

Chris

_____ Get free e-mail and a permanent address at http://www.netaddress.com/?N=1

↑ Index

254. Aldon Nielsen
where in the world is Aldon Nielsen
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Before any number of listees send Bill any number of my past addresses, let me advise all and sundry that the best way to reach me is at my office:

Department of English
Loyola Marymount University 7900 Loyola Blvd.
Los Angeles, CA 90045-8215

Let me also beg the forgiveness of any who may have sent material to any of my proliferating addresses in San Jose, Boulder and the prior Los Angeles -- I am in the process of collecting old mail from all over the place -- much of which I will actually answer -- It's been a mobile few years, but I'm now fairly well planted -- I'm only living in two cities now, and the job looks to remain stable for a time -- living on the faultline, aldon

↑ Index

255. Tom Beard
Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Hi All,

I just had a rejection letter from a mainstream journal, and it was interesting because most of the criticisms were actually nice summaries of exactly what I'm after in poetry (e.g. "It sounds like something crucial, or even heartfelt, is trying to be expressed, but it gets lost in a sea of slippages" - I like that "Sea of Slip-pages" bit, it would make a good book title). Anyway, that old hobby horse

"clarity" gets dragged out for another thrashing, and Ryan's comment about type being performative reminded me of just how inappropriate such optical metaphors (clear or unclear, opaque or transparent) are when it comes to describing language.

> There are some poems that do great things on a photocopied page. I try to remember with my work on Aporia that the type itself is performative.....

Words are always obscure: they work by obscuring part of the page, and it's the pattern of obscuration that (per)forms the poem. If I wanted my words to be clear, I'd have to write in invisible ink.

Tom.

(another gem from the rejection letter was "just what is the reader supposed to make of the last stanza?" Heck, don't ask me, I'm just the author.)

↑ Index

256. Charles Bernstein
Hannah Weiner Tribute
Sun 9 Aug 1998

Hannah Weiner: A 70th Birthday Memorial Tribute

4pm, Saturday, November 7, 1998
The Poetry Project
St. Mark's Church
10th Street and Second Avenue, New York

Charles Alexander
Bruce Andrews
Charles Bernstein
Lee Ann Brown
Abigail Child
Maria Damon
Tina Darragh
Alan Davies
Maurice Finegold
Ernesto Grosman
Bob Harrison
Michael Heller
Herny Hills
Peter Inman
Andrew Levy
Jackson Mac Low
Sharon Mattlin

Bernadette Mayer
Douglas Messerli
Phill Niblock
Nick Piombino
Joan Retallack
Barbara Rosenthal
James Sherry
Ron Silliman
Ann Tardos
Fiona Templeton
Lewis Warsh
Barrett Watten

Organized by Charles Bernstein, Lee Ann Brown, Andrew Levy

↑ Index

257. David Baratier
Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
Sun 9 Aug 1998

I do not believe a specific sense of Mallarme ala benchmark was invoked, but rather a benchmark like I slept here, or at some future point, "when Mark lived in Colorado the such and such movement and yadda, yadda," A Timeline, I mean. Or locus solus. I'm curious Mark, what is "the ideology of innovation" you mention, I am taking it that one person would not be attributable solely for an innovation. My view is biased though by wanting an attributation to a group rather than an individual. Or do you mean a McGann type of indeterminacy (no such thing as authored text but rather textual evidence toward that ideal)? Or is it more how "make it new" threads through the past, a culmative effect?

In semantics, if that which is meant or pointed to is unclear it may be called the reference (librarian tie in).

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

258. maz881
Re: Me "on" list
Mon 10 Aug 1998

---

hi Dot.

agreement about Karen Kelley. you should if you haven't check out her Her Angel from singing horse press. it's kind of an erotic psychodrama. i mean if kevin davies were a freudian . . .

" 1) Cereal lobsters do not taste very strong
  2) My senses have been dulled about 90% by the blast"

Bill

<<Date: Sat, 8 Aug 1998 20:34:18 -0700
From: Dorothy Trujillo <[redacted]>
Subject: Re: ME "on" list

Hey Joe! Nice to hear from you. Yeah, Charles WAS great. Just got a nice message from Bill Luoma remembering him. Thamx too,Bill & aloha.

As for being "on" the list--it's an odd thing really, I'd not thought of doing postings and such--I only just figured out how to do them (apologies to any for any errors of form &c)--in this instance,however,because of our friend Charles, there somehow seemed to me a need for a response in a public testimony.

Umm--well--what do I "think". Well I'm mostly on this list for access to information and the movement of information that is of some concern to the Kootenay School of Writing (ie:there is a posting that a writer we'd be interested in coming to x location & maybe we can get that person as well on the same trip) & personally, to see what other people are nattering on poetics. I found Karen Kelley contra Yau fictive gal consciousness pretty interesting and all the Pvt Ryan stuff,particularly the earlier responses and I believe Maxine Chernoff initiating the discussion. But by the time they were all on about which way they wanted to die, I admit that I too was thinking of which way I wanted them to die. There are quite a few of you out there with a much more philosophical bent than I am rather impressed in my pit of willful ignorance--go for it--looks good to ME anyway.

I enjoyed reading with you -- I did think it was a perversely interesting mix -- I do know that you felt much better afterwards when it became apparent that I am not only an Evil Language Dupe but also Spicer Spawn, through a bastard yet noble lineage via the Spicer Diaspora. We sort of can't help that up here. Any way, thamx again & keep in touch.

Dorothy Trujillo Lusk <[redacted]>
>>

↑ Index

259. toddbaron
Re: Hannah Weiner Tribute
Mon 10 Aug 1998

---

anyone have an address for Lee Ann Brown?

or--if you "are" lee ann brown-- please e-maiul todd baron here. unless you "are" todd abron in which case e-mail j.l. borges.. unless of course you are.....rod serling or ted berrigan...

TB
(ReMap)

↑ Index

260. rsillima
Doling out the prole
Mon 10 Aug 1998

Tom,

Your missive (reprinted below for those whose short term memory was left behind in the 1960s) brings up the age-old (50 years at least) problem of class background, class stance and class position. It's possible for somebody to fall into any one of those categories -- Engels the factory owner, for example -- and imagine himself as part of some version of a classically defined proletariat. "We are the world," etc.

While it's always useful to look at specifics (as in "X was the child of the professional-managerial class, but by becoming a poem became downwardly mobile"), it's never been that useful overall to get into pissin' contests over which conceptualization of the working class (or, as one Steve McCaffery poem I believe has it, the "wukking class") is being bandied about, and as we move into an ever later capitalism I notice the term being used with less and less clarity and specificity every day.

Ron Silliman

Date: Sun, 9 Aug 1998 10:40:01 -0500
From: trbell <[redacted]>
Subject: proletarian _Glamour

My reading about early Russian Futurism leads me to ask:
What is a proletarian poet?
Is this someone with a proletarian backgroun?

Is this someone who writes for (on behalf of politically) the proletariat?
Is this someone who writes for the proletariat's enjoyment (for the working woman, for the college educated woman, for the academic, etc.?)

tom bell

↑ Index

261. henry
Re: my territory
Mon 10 Aug 1998

responding to Lee Christian & Mark DuCharme - I called it my territory in response to Rachel Loden's sensible "territorializing" post. I don't know about Blake, but I do believe several strands of modernist poetry (Pound, Williams, Olson, & their heirs), while claiming a "historical" angle of vision, somehow leave out the whole impact of Judeo-Christianity on Western culture (except in negative terms). This is probably an endlessly debatable & somewhat dead-end issue so let's just leave it there. Secondly, & relatedly, I do happen to think that the poetic-narrative dramatic impact of the Bible - the sermon on the mount, say, placed in its dramatic context - that impact has been incredible. so powerful that individual artists sometimes need to shield their eyes from all the cultural predispositions & impressions in order to create their own work. This too is a huge issue for blab... & I will continue creating my "list-image" as reactionary religious fanatic egomaniac. But when I say that "one saying" from the Sermon on the Mount trumps all the poets I listed for poetic power, it's not pure exaggeration. Start reading the Bible say - Genesis to the "New Testament" - see if you don't agree. This is not evangelizing on my part. I'm talking about literary impact.

Mark - why does making controversial - perhaps scandalous! - statements on the list mean I have a big ego? Maybe I do - but mainly I just like to mindfuck people with wild ideas, when I'm not into boring them to tears.

- henry Gould

↑ Index

262. Robert Archambeau
EP, Spit Laureate
Mon 10 Aug 1998

This just in from Slate magazine's "culturebox" (there's a term worth thinking about):

Winning Entry, The Spiterature Contest:

Seamus Patrick writes:

I have never seen anything meaner (nor agreed with anything more) than Ezra Pound's "take" on A. E. Housman:

> Mr. Housman's Message
>
> O woe, woe,
> People are born and die,
> We also shall be dead pretty soon
> Therefore let us act as if we were dead
> Already.
>
> The bird sits on the hawthorn tree
> But he dies also, presently.
> Some lads get hung, and some get shot.
> Woeful is this human lot.
> Woe! woe, etcetera....
>
> London is a woeful place,
> Shropshire is much pleasanter.
> Then let us smile a little space
> Upon fond nature's morbid grace,
> Oh, woe, woe, woe, etcetera....

Culturebox's note: Was Housman Pound's mentor? Culturebox doubts it, though she doesn't actually know. It doesn't matter. Patrick has correctly identified a masterpiece of spiterature: literature as a projectile of spit, composed in the spirit of spite.

↑ Index

263. F. W. Perrella

Web Del Sol - Quictions, In Posse Review

Mon 10 Aug 1998

Two new items at Web Del Sol's What's New Page:

http://webdelsol.com/solhome.htm

The summer issue of North American Review is up, featuring short-short "quictions", among other things - have a look, enjoy, opine, (subscribe to the paper version!)

A new fiction zine debuts, too: In Posse Review, edited by LuAnn Kaiser, seeks to publish the best fiction online, along with hybrid forms such as flash fiction and prose poetry. Essays and drama works are also sought.

Browse, peruse, comment, question, visit again - thanks!

Anne Perrella

↑ Index

264. Michael Coffey
Welcome Message -Reply
Mon 10 Aug 1998

---

this is [redacted]

i am having a problem with the reciept of poetcis list mail; it is this: in my in box, messages are identified as only "from" ub POETICS DISCUSSION; as a result, I don't at first glance know who on the list has posted the msg; and if they person does not sign the msg, then i never know who sent it; about 6 months ago, it was different; it would say in my inbox under From: Charles Bernstein, or Rsilliman, or whatever.

i am told that this might be fixable at your end. can you?

↑ Index

265. Lawrence Upton.
Programme for Sub Voicive Poetry, London, Autumn 98
Mon 10 Aug 1998

The paper sub voicive poetry mailshot is prepared and will be sent out in a little while. But here for the wired in is the list for the coming season. Apologies for cross-posting

Tue 22 9 98 Robert Sheppard / Keston Sutherland

Tue 6 10 98 Karlien van der Beukel / John Wilkinson

Tue 20 10 98 Rob Mackenzie / Anselm Hollo

Tue 3 11 98 Ken Edwards / Andy Brown

Tue 17 11 98 Will Rowe / + other(s) to be announced

Tue 1 12 98 Quick Hits 98 - a range of poetry, a gathering of poets

All readings take place upstairs the three cups sandland street london wc 1 at 8 pm still only L5 or L2.50 despite the need to curb spending

↑ Index

266. Laura E. Wright
Re: proletarian _Glamour
Mon 10 Aug 1998

trbell wrote:

> My reading about early Russian Futurism leads me to ask:
> What is a proletarian poet?
> Is this someone with a proletarian backgroun?
> Is this someone who writes for (on behalf of politically) the proletariat?
> Is this someone who writes for the proletariat's enjoyment (for the working woman, for the college educated woman, for the academic, etc.?)
>
> tom bell

A poet who has to work for a living?

--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *
"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
  * * * * * *
"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

267. Charles Bernstein
Writer on Line Interview
Mon 10 Aug 1998

There is a two part interview that I did with Dana Luther on issues related to the recent collection I edited, Close Listening: Poetry and the Performed Word (Oxford University Press).

Part one: http://novalearn.com/wol/dana8.htm
Part two: http://novalearn.com/wol/archives/dana7.htm

(these links are also in place at my home page at the EPC)

↑ Index

268. Dorothy Trujillo
Re: Doling out the prole
Mon 10 Aug 1998

At 07:42 AM 8/10/98 -0500, you wrote:
>Tom,
>
>Your missive (reprinted below for those whose short term memory was left >behind in the 1960s) brings up the age-old (50 years at least) problem of >class background, class stance and class position. It's possible for >somebody to fall into any one of those categories -- Engels the factory >owner, for example -- and imagine himself as part of some version of a >classically defined proletariat. "We are the world," etc.
>
>While it's always useful to look at specifics (as in "X was the child of the >professional-managerial class, but by becoming a poem became downwardly >mobile"), it's never been that useful overall to get into pissin' contests >over which conceptualization of the working class (or, as one Steve >McCaffery poem I believe has it, the "wukking class") is being bandied >about, and as we move into an ever later capitalism I notice the term being >used with less and less clarity and specificity every day.
>
>Ron Silliman
>
>RE: Pissing contests. Yeah, it's really quite bad enough whilst a prole on the dole to be analysed by those not yet laid off as 'surplus labour' but I think 'potentially fascistic lumpen' really dose add insult to injury, specifically.

Dorothy Trujillo Lusk
>
>
>Date: Sun, 9 Aug 1998 10:40:01 -0500
>From: trbell <[redacted]>
>Subject: proletarian _Glamour
>
>My reading about early Russian Futurism leads me to ask:
>What is a proletarian poet?
>Is this someone with a proletarian backgroun?
>Is this someone who writes for (on behalf of politically) the >proletariat?
>Is this someone who writes for the proletariat's enjoyment (for >the working woman, for the college educated woman, for the >academic, etc.?)

>
>tom bell
>
>

↑ Index

269. charssmith
Baude/Grenier
Mon 10 Aug 1998

In a message dated 98-08-07 09:13:51 EDT, you write:

<< The article was written by Dawn Michelle Baude. >>

... who a week ago, read w/ Bob Grenier at Cody's in Berkeley. Anyone in the bay area catch it? I'm curious how Bob's thaaang played there. Last time I was saw him was abt 3 yrs ago in Sonoma -- steadfastly refusing to "read" any of the scrawl poems he was projecting w/ an overhead -- & Joanne Kyger heckling from the back, "C'mon Bob, read us a PO--EM" & Bob just grinning, inviting audience to decipher, which quite a few, Mr. Bromige, proceeded to do.

--cs

↑ Index

270. Mark DuCharme
Re: proletarian _Glamour
Mon 10 Aug 1998

Right on, sister Laura!

--Mark DuCharme, via workplace computer

Laura Wright wrote

> trbell wrote:
>
> My reading about early Russian Futurism leads me to ask:
> What is a proletarian poet?
> Is this someone with a proletarian backgroun?
> Is this someone who writes for (on behalf of politically) the proletariat?
> Is this someone who writes for the proletariat's enjoyment (for the working woman, for the college educated woman, for the academic, etc.?)
>
> tom bell

> A poet who has to work for a living?
>
> --
> Laura Wright
> Library Assistant
> Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
> 2130 Arapahoe Ave
> Boulder, CO 80302
> [redacted]
> * * * * * *
> "All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
> * * * * * *
> "It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

271. MAYHEW

Why I am not a Marxist

Mon 10 Aug 1998

I got my books from Spain today that I sent myself a few weeks ago. Here is a poem by Jorge Riechmann (this is not a hoax):

"Je ne suis pas Marxiste" (Karl Marx)

Until 1939 I was a Marxist.
Then I became a Marxist.

I was a Marxist until 1956.
But the events of that year shook up many of my certainties and I became a Marxist.

So things went on. Universal history beat me up once more on purpose and that same year
I was transformed into a Marxist.

In spite of everything I was a Marxist until 1989. For some ideologues the end of history, for me the year when I definitively succeded in becoming a Marxist.

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

272. Mark DuCharme
Re: Oh henry bookmaking comment
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Dave, by "ideology of innovation" I was crudely trying to express something that I think Henry may be reacting against, a notion that I think was expressed by Pound (I don't have the book at hand), & went something like: there are poets who are inventors, & others who come along & refine the raw work derived from those "inventions," & still others who come along & are just derivative without refining or adding anything new. This is in ABC of Reading, & you'll have to excuse me if I don't remember the exact quote &/or can't express the fullness of Pound's thought just at this wee hour of the evening.

I like your sense of "a benchmark like a slept here." In that sense, maybe, we should all be sleeping around.

I also agree that I prefer to attribute anything to the group more than the individual. All I was trying to convey is that any notion of innovation which implies this sort of Poundian "progress" isn't something I subscribe to.

Best,

Mark DuCharme

>
>I do not believe a specific sense of Mallarme ala benchmark was invoked, >but rather a benchmark like I slept here, or at some future point, "when >Mark lived in Colorado the such and such movement and yadda, yadda," A >Timeline, I mean. Or locus solus. I'm curious Mark, what is "the >ideology of innovation" you mention, I am taking it that one person >would not be attributable solely for an innovation. My view is biased >though by wanting an attributation to a group rather than an individual.
>Or do you mean a McGann type of indeterminacy (no such thing as authored >text but rather textual evidence toward that ideal)? Or is it more how

>"make it new" threads through the past, a culmative effect?
>
>In semantics, if that which is meant or pointed to is unclear it may be >called the reference (librarian tie in).
>
>Be well
>
>David Baratier
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

273. Mark DuCharme
Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Henry,

I didn't mean to seem to characterize your ego. I wasn't trying to comment on _you_, but on your post-- the "my" of "my territory."

As for the Bible, I'll admit I lack an appreciation of most of it, but not for lack of having read a good bit in my parochial schoolboy days. Perhaps I should read it again, but I do find Williams more engaging.

Mark (cultivating a "secular humanist" egomaniac "list-image") DuCharme

P.S.: keep the wild ideas coming >responding to Lee Christian & Mark DuCharme - I called it my territory

in >response to Rachel Loden's sensible "territorializing" post. I don't know >about Blake, but I do believe several strands of modernist poetry (Pound, >Williams, Olson, & their heirs), while claiming a "historical" angle of >vision, somehow leave out the whole impact of Judeo-Christianity on >Western culture (except in negative terms). This is probably an endlessly
>debatable & somewhat dead-end issue so let's just leave it there.
>Secondly, & relatedly, I do happen to think that the poetic-narrative >dramatic impact of the Bible - the sermon on the mount, say, placed in its >dramatic context - that impact has been incredible. so powerful that >individual artists sometimes need to shield their eyes from all the >cultural predispositions & impressions in order to create their own work.

>This too is a huge issue for blab... & I will continue creating my >"list-image" as reactionary religious fanatic egomaniac. But when I say >that "one saying" from the Sermon on the Mount trumps all the poets I listed
>for poetic power, it's not pure exaggeration. Start reading the Bible >say - Genesis to the "New Testament" - see if you don't agree. This is >not evangelizing on my part. I'm talking about literary impact.
>
>Mark - why does making controversial - perhaps scandalous! - statements on the >list mean I have a big ego? Maybe I do - but mainly I just like to >mindfuck people with wild ideas, when I'm not into boring them to tears.
>
>- henry Gould
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

274. Mark DuCharme
Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Henry,

I didn't mean to seem to characterize your ego. I wasn't trying to comment on _you_, but on your post-- the "my" of "my territory."

As for the Bible, I'll admit I lack an appreciation of most of it, but not for lack of having read a good bit in my parochial schoolboy days. Perhaps I should read it again, but I do find Williams more engaging.

Mark (cultivating a "secular humanist" egomaniac "list-image") DuCharme

P.S.: keep the wild ideas coming >responding to Lee Christian & Mark DuCharme - I called it my territory

in >response to Rachel Loden's sensible "territorializing" post. I don't know

>about Blake, but I do believe several strands of modernist poetry (Pound, >Williams, Olson, & their heirs), while claiming a "historical" angle of >vision, somehow leave out the whole impact of Judeo-Christianity on >Western culture (except in negative terms). This is probably an endlessly
>debatable & somewhat dead-end issue so let's just leave it there.
>Secondly, & relatedly, I do happen to think that the poetic-narrative >dramatic impact of the Bible - the sermon on the mount, say, placed in its >dramatic context - that impact has been incredible. so powerful that >individual artists sometimes need to shield their eyes from all the >cultural predispositions & impressions in order to create their own work.
>This too is a huge issue for blab... & I will continue creating my >"list-image" as reactionary religious fanatic egomaniac. But when I say >that "one saying" from the Sermon on the Mount trumps all the poets I listed
>for poetic power, it's not pure exaggeration. Start reading the Bible >say - Genesis to the "New Testament" - see if you don't agree. This is >not evangelizing on my part. I'm talking about literary impact.
>
>Mark - why does making controversial - perhaps scandalous! - statements
on the >list mean I have a big ego? Maybe I do - but mainly I just like to >mindf..k people with wild ideas, when I'm not into boring them to tears.
>
>- henry Gould
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

275. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
(no subject)
Tue 11 Aug 1998

-

I am stale; there is nothing to ail this body that has not done its damage much as this body has done homage to language, pillage which is stale as in before, when you have read it whispered in my ear; then I'd write it, no need to read it further, you'd been bit
by what you steer to me; then through me, back again, that's what is stale, theory, me, and you, binding without fail what would unglue me, become stale, fear it winding that trail, cuing the nearly stale or train of mind, cycle and rail, what could entail a natural kind.

m y life o o z i n g
0000000 0a0a 2069 6970 7373 6120 6c6c 6f20 6576
0000010 2072 6f79 7275 7020 6e61 6974 7365 6a20
0000020 6e65 696e 6566 2072 6f79 2075 7473 6675
0000030 2066 6874 6d65 6920 206e 796d 6d20 756f
0000040 6874 670a 6761 6d20 2065 6977 6874 6e20
0000050 6b69 6b75 276f 2073 6577 2074 6167 7472
0000060 7265 2073 6c73 626f 6562 2072 6c73 626f
0000070 6562 2072 6f6d 7475 2068 7566 6c6c 6f20
0000080 0a66 756a 756c 7327 6d20 6e65 6573 2073
0000090 7264 7069 6970 676e 6420 776f 206e 796d
00000a0 7320 616f 696b 676e 6320 6568 7473 6920
00000b0 6c20 766f 2065 7573 6b63 6e69 2067 6977
00000c0 6874 6d0a 2079 6f6d 7475 2068 7566 6c6c
00000d0 6f20 2066 6c61 6e61 6a2d 6c75 2d75 656a
00000e0 6e6e 6669 7265 6e2d 6b69 6b75 0a6f 00000ee

in these lost moments in my dark oozings in my life oozing dark moments away
now to defend myself additions and extra digits clawing against a final stroke of brush-wielding nikuko or pen-wielding jennifer, say pencil and julu, keyboard and alan say say say say say

↑ Index

276. Michael Magee
Re: EP, Spit Laureate
Tue 11 Aug 1998

For a brilliantly mean dismissal of a contemporary I've always liked Nietzsche's dismissal of Carlyle as "The philosophical equivalent of dyspepsia." -m.

According to Robert Archambeau:
>
> This just in from Slate magazine's "culturebox" (there's a term worth > thinking about):
>
> ----------
> Winning Entry, The Spiterature Contest:
>
> Seamus Patrick writes:
>
> I have never seen anything meaner (nor agreed with > anything more) than Ezra Pound's "take" on A. E.
> Housman:
>
> Mr. Housman's Message
>
> O woe, woe,
> People are born and die,
> We also shall be dead pretty soon
> Therefore let us act as if we were dead
> Already.
>
> The bird sits on the hawthorn tree
> But he dies also, presently.
> Some lads get hung, and some get shot.
> Woeful is this human lot.
> Woe! woe, etcetera....
>
> London is a woeful place,
> Shropshire is much pleasanter.

> Then let us smile a little space
> Upon fond nature's morbid grace,
> Oh, woe, woe, woe, etcetera....
>
> Culturebox's note: Was Housman Pound's mentor? Culturebox doubts it, > though she doesn't actually know. It doesn't matter. Patrick has > correctly identified a masterpiece of spiterature: literature as a > projectile of spit, composed in the spirit of spite.
>

↑ Index

277. henry g
Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
Tue 11 Aug 1998

On Mon, 10 Aug 1998 22:27:05 PDT Mark DuCharme said:
>Henry,
>
>As for the Bible, I'll admit I lack an appreciation of most of it, but >not for lack of having read a good bit in my parochial schoolboy days.
>Perhaps I should read it again, but I do find Williams more engaging.

Mushing & chatting about poetry & religion in a shallow way is a desecration of both. Or at least an over-simplification. There are cultural dimensions of experience irreducible to uninformed chit-chat. So my off-the-cuff remarks are like a swine casting himself before pearls. But I have found the essays & work of Welsh poet David Jones provide a perspective on some of the issues that fascinated Pound & the whole American experimental tradition - a very different perspective which feels less alien to me. See his essays on Welsh culture & modern technocracy, art in relation to war, art & sacrament. His concepts of religion as sign-making, of man as sign-making animal, of the relations between the useful & the "extra-utile", the technical & the beautiful-in-itself, the marginalisation of all art (the extra-utile) in modern times, art as form reflecting wholeness, and so on. Jones could be thought of as a sort of relic in a way - of Welsh culture as the remnant of "native" life analogous to Native American culture in America - and a person caught up in watching the techno-globalization-commercialisation of all life as a direct threat to Welsh culture & language. But he is also an english-native-speaker brought up in London, a representative of "European" traditional (Christian) culture, and a veteran of WW I whose war experience shaped all his writings. His essays provide some sharp critical insight on some of the marginal-experimental questions which occupy this list, because he reflects on poetry from a perspective on art & mankind in general which stretches way back - but on a very different trail than say Olson or Duncan. But different from Eliot's or Yeats's pomposities as well. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

278. daniel bouchard
Washington DC area reading
Tue 11 Aug 1998

HOT AUGUST NIGHT

Saturday, August 15 Backyard Reading
at 7 p.m.:

DOUGLAS ROTHSCHILD
and
DANIEL BOUCHARD

@ the house of Carol Mirakove in Arlington, Virginia

For info., back-channel Carol or Dan--

Carol Mirakove <[redacted]>
Daniel Bouchard <[redacted]>

<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
  fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

279. Gwyn McVay
Re: my territory (anyone for list-Imagism?)
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Isn't "mushing and chatting about poetry and religion in a shallow way" a description of the last few decades of Robert Bly's career? (One assumes not MUSHing in caps.)

Meeow,
Neko-chan

↑ Index

280. Robert Archambeau
DLB on Perelman, Watten, Cage etc
Tue 11 Aug 1998

The latest volume of the Dictionary of Literary Biography just clunked through my mail slot, and it looks like the most experiment-friendly volume ever. Okay, I wrote something for it, and okay, "the most experiment-friendly DLB" may sound like the rough equivalent of "the world's tallest pygmie," but check out some of the poets covered...

Full contents consists of essays on:

Michael Anania by Robert Archambeau
Rae Armantrout by Ann Vickery
David Bromige by Charla Howard
John Cage by Rod Smith
Anne Carson by Steven Marks
Clark Coolidge by Bruce Campbell
Cid Corman by William Walsh
James Dickey by Ronald Baughman
Robert Duncan by George F. Butterick & Robert J. Bertholf
Larry Eigner by Benjamin Friedlander
Carolyn Forche by Constance Coiner
Alice Fulton by Sergei Lobanov-Rostovsky
Allen Grossman by Gary Roberts
Barbara Guest by Sara Lundquist
Carla Harryman by Chris Stroffolino
Ann Lauterbach by James McCorkle
Jackson Mac Low by Bruce Campbell
Eileen Myles by Patrick F. Durgin
Frank O'Hara by George F. Butterick & Robert J. Bertholf
Mary Oliver by Susan Marie Powers
Charles Olson by George F. Butterick & Robert J. Bertholf
Joel Oppenheimer by George F. Butterick & Robert J. Bertholf
Bob Perelman by Steve Evans
Stanley Plumly by Steve Evans
Carl Rakosi by Elizabeth Losh
Jerome Rothenberg by Jed Rasula
Leslie Scalapino by Elizabeth A. Frost

Jack Spicer by Edward Halsey Foster
John Taggart by Mark Scroggins
Mary TallMountain by Gabrielle Welford
Barrett Watten by Jacques Debrot
Harriet Zinnes by Eric & Melissa Williamson

I mean, Yee-Hah! I'm not leaving my office for a week with all this to go through.

What say we all get together and carry the editor, Joseph Conte, through the streets of Buffalo while singing his praises?

(The best part of all this is that most big libraries get the DLB, so you should be able to get your hands on this).

Bibliographic info

Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 193, American Poets Since World War Two (sixth series). Detroit: Gale Research, 1998.

Robert Archambeau

↑ Index

281. Robert Archambeau
PS to DLB
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Almost forgot to mention -- p. 23 includes rare photo of David Bromige at 2 years of age. Awwwww....

Bob

↑ Index

282. Herb Levy
Subtext readings (Seattle)
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Hi all,

Here are the Subtext readings scheduled for summer into fall 1998. All readings start at 7:30 pm in the back room of the Speakeasy Cafe, 2304 2nd Ave in Seattle's restaurant and condo-loaded Belltown district.

August 20
Lisa Jarnot/Roberta Olson

September 17
Meredith Quartermain/Robert Mittenthal

October 15
Rob Manery/Brian Carpenter

November 19
Will Alexander/Laynie Browne

Also of note at Bumbershoot (a local "festival" over Labor Day weekend) a reading by Robin Blaser, Ed Friedman, Joel Lipman, Dan Raphael, Belle Randall, Norman Weinstein late on Monday afternoon.

Bests,

Herb

Herb Levy
[redacted]

↑ Index

283. Laura E. Wright
query
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Does anyone out there happen to know of any texts that address Poe's influence on Ginsberg?
(helping a friend do some research)
Backchannel PLEASE

Laura W.
--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
* * * * * *

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

284. Carolyn Guertin
Electronic Book Review: new issue
Tue 11 Aug 1998

If not sure if this has been announced yet or not, but

Electronic Book Review 7 image + narrative: part two is now online...

<http://altx.com:80/ebr>

Including work by Janet Murray, J. Hillis Miller, Loss Pequeño Glazier, Raymond Federman, Stephanie Strickland, etc., etc.

_____
Carolyn Guertin, Department of English, University of Alberta
E-Mail: [redacted]; Tel/FAX: [redacted]
Website: <http://www.ualberta.ca/~cguertin/Guertin.htm>
See bees: <http://www.temporalimage.com/beehive/index.html>

↑ Index

285. acgold01
Black Sparrow address
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Does anyone have a snail-mail address for John Martin at / and Black Sparrow? I need to write him for a reprint permission.

Thanks.

Alan

↑ Index

286. Robert Archambeau
DLB info
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Since I've had quite a few queries backchannel about how to get the new and miraculous DLB volume, here's some information about getting the book:

The publisher's address is:

Gale Research
835 Penobscot Building
Detroit, MI 48226
USA

The book is:

Conte, Joseph, editor. Dictionary of Literary Biography vol. 193, American Poets Since World War Two (sixth series). Detroit: Gale Research, 1998. ISBN is 0-7876-1848-9.

I don't have price info, and the book, still white-hot from the press, isn't listed on Amazon.com yet.

Note that this is the SIXTH SERIES -- Amazon has earlier volumes, also edited by Conte, but they are different books.

Here's the bad news: this is a 12 by 8 inch, 450 page hardcover sold mostly to libraries, so it costs a bundle. I don't have a figure, but the earlier series ran around $100 or $150.

That's a lot of cash, but if you can swing it the book is worth it. An event, a landmark, a big hoo-hah -- words fail me. But if the money is a problem, almost all university libraries will get copies, and the big public libraries tend to take the DLB books, too.

Thanks to all for their interest,

Bob Archambeau

↑ Index

287. David Baratier

snorting up the Pound / Williams line

Tue 11 Aug 1998

Innovators. Pound missed the drunken boat there. The exclamation of Inventio as having a placement above the other four parts of oratory hits me like one saying Pindar's anti strophes are the most important element of a triad, or spacial cogency into irrationality in Demuth's #5 was the primary poignancy of preferring cheese over the milk and macaroni after cooking. I advocate a current mimeticism into mediocrity. Name who we wish. Excogitaire. For those of us who think there might not be.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

288. Jim Andrews
some software for you
Tue 11 Aug 1998

Pardon the non-poetical post please, if such there be, o yes there be, but I've just finished a freeware game perhaps for poets who like puzzles called CoLoRaTiOn at http://www.islandnet.com/~jandrews/MORPHTEA which, though not particularly poetical in any recognizable sense, is, I think, original in concept and design. It can be played by young children, but some of the mathematical issues it raises are unresolved and can be pondered indefinitely.

Regards,
Jim Andrews

↑ Index

289. k.a. hehir
in the key of bp
Wed 12 Aug 1998

A Call for "Wild Things"
>
> In conjunction with "On the H Orizon: bpNichol After Ten"
> An event sponsored by West Coast Line
> Emily Carr Institute of Art and Design
> Granville Island, Vancouver BC
> September 25-26, 1998

For more information contact:
> Glen Lowry, "Wild Things" Co-ordinator email: [redacted]
>
> For information on "On the H Orizon" contact:
> Jacqueline Larson, Managing Editor, West Coast Line, email:
> [redacted]
> phone: 604 - [redacted]
>

> As a tribute to bpNichol's enormous contribution to small press publishing, "On the H Orizon: bpNichol After Ten" is putting a call out for publishers and writers to produce what we're calling "Wild Things" (after the title of bp's work in bp, published by Coach House in 1967).
>
> In the spirit of bp's work with small presses & small press networks, we're inviting submissions of chapbooks or ephemeral publications, which we can distribute as part of the event.

> SOME GUIDELINES:
>
> All kinds and forms of text are welcome.*
>
> Publishers: choose a writer whose work extends a bp poetics; writers: produce something of your own in tribute to bp.*
>
> Print run: 25 copies, lettered A-Z (excluding H).*
>
> Optional: designate the text somewhere as "An H Project."*
>
> West Coast Line will sell them at the conference at $5 each (50% to the publisher, 50% for the conference costs). All unsold copies will be returned.*
>
> DEADLINES: Please contact Glen Lowry with intent to contribute ASAP. In order to qualify for inclusion, Wild Things must be received by September 18th.
>
> For more information contact:
> Glen Lowry, "Wild Things" Co-ordinator email: [redacted]
>
> For information on "On the H Orizon" contact:
> Jacqueline Larson, Managing Editor, West Coast Line, email:
> [redacted]
> phone: 604 - [redacted]
>
> "Wild Things" is designated by West Coast Line as "An H Project" in honour of bpNichol

↑ Index

290. Michael Magee

Re: snorting up the Pound / Williams line

Wed 12 Aug 1998

It's really becoming a pet peeve of mine, this equation of Pound & innovation for the purpose of dismissing both: could there be a more flammable straw man? Of course not, hence his invocation tends to be followed by grousing and innuendo rather than a real, pragmatic discussion of the relative merits of innvative models of artistic production. You can't begin, first of all, by assuming that "the parts of oratory" is a scheme we need to accept out of hand: Pound's familiarity with such schemes and his paradoxical reverence for them is precisely what makes him such an easy target: he's the son who should know better. But while "inventio" is schematized easily enough, a discussion of innovation or "experiment" might well move outside those preset boundaries: that is, experiment can be taken as a more pervasive and far-reaching method, as it is, for instance, in Ralph Ellison's discussions of "democratic vernacular speech." It's ironic that David B. would lean on "the parts of oratory" without really discussing rhetoric as itself persuasive: the act of separating oratory into parts is itself a rhetorical act, it implies a certain attitude toward both language and experience, one which values either the comfort provided or the power gained by preset categories. In contrast, there are arguments like John Dewey's that

"A Philosophy animated, be it consciously or unconsciously, by the strivings of men to achieve democracy will construe liberty as meaning a universe in which there is real uncertainty and contingency, a world which is not all in, and never will be, a world which in some way is incomplete and in the making, and in these respects may be made this way or that according as men jusdge, prize, love and labor...a genuine field of novelty of real and unpredictable increments of existence, a field for experimentation and invention" (Characters & Events 2:851).

Now, Dewey spends 350 pgs in Art as Experience describing how this insistence on "experimentation and invention" applies to language. Let's have a discussion about the merits of that, or of Burke's Language as Symbolic Action (also a masterful argument for innovative writing) or, for that matter, of Bernstein's A Poetics - all serious defenses of experimental writing too complex and distinct to simply equate. Which is to say, pick on someone your own size, & leave Pound's carcass alone - it's picked clean. -m.

According to David Baratier:
> > Innovators. Pound missed the drunken boat there. The exclamation of > Inventio as having a placement above the other four parts of oratory > hits me like one saying Pindar's anti strophes are the most important > element of a triad, or spacial cogency into irrationality in Demuth's #5 > was the primary poignancy of preferring cheese over the milk and > macaroni after cooking. I advocate a current mimeticism into mediocrity.
> Name who we wish. Excogitaire. For those of us who think there might not > be.
>
> Be well
>
> David Baratier
>

↑ Index

291. Erik Sweet
"Tool a Magazine" Party Friday 8/14
Wed 12 Aug 1998

EVERYONE IS WELCOME!!!
"Tool a Magazine"

I would like to invite all of you in the NYcity area to a party

"Tool a Magazine" is celebrating our first issue with a party at:

*Teachers and Writers Collaborative in Manhattan, 5 Union Square West, 5th Floor
Friday August 14th at 6pm

Reading from their work will be: Pierre Joris
Jordan Davis
Anselm Berrigan (its his birth-day!!!!)
Eleni Sikelianos
plus "surprise guests.."

There will be food, drinks, and a Pinata at 9pm!!!
...Let the candy rain down.....

Everyone is welcome
Fisrt Ten Guests get a great Pez Dispenser!!!!!

Hope to see you all there!!!!!! The magazine will be available for purchase...

erik sweet lori quillen

↑ Index

292. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT
Cave the teacher (fwd)
Wed 12 Aug 1998

---------- Forwarded message ---------- Date: Wed, 12 Aug 1998 14:40:47 +0000
From: peggy <[redacted]>
To: [redacted]
Subject: Cave the teacher

Hallo !

while peeling potatos i was listening to the radio. It was an interview with Christian Hinze from the Vienna Poetry School announcing a course called "How to write a lovesong" from 15th till 28th of september. The course will lead Nick Cave. 12 people are allowed to take part. Cave himself will select these peole out of applications they have to send. There are strict rules for application. Christian Hinze said the only song by Nick Cave he knew was the one everybody kows and Blixa Bargeld (who has lead a course before) invited him to a Bad Seed concert last year in Vienna. And after the concert Hinze asked Cave whether he would like to lead a course at the school, yeah and it seemed like he has agreed.....

who had ever thought he would...

↑ Index

293. Susan Schultz
Re: Cave the teacher (fwd)
Wed 12 Aug 1998

Would Chris Stroffolino be so kind as to back-channel me (about Laura Riding).

Thanks, Susan S.

↑ Index

294. louis stroffolino
Re: PS to DLB
Wed 12 Aug 1998

Yes, Robert, and we must not forget the picture of David at the piano (i didn't know you played piano david) and of Rae A. at the horse.... Haven't gotten around to reading much of it yet, but have read Steve Evans' piece, and I think it does a great service to Perelman by NOT simply mentioning P's "canonical" poems, but also his earlier work.... and also for including such phrases as-- "Published in a mid-sized, NEA-supported run of six hundred..." etc.... well, more on this DLB thing later.....chris

On Tue, 11 Aug 1998, Robert Archambeau wrote:

> Almost forgot to mention -- p. 23 includes rare photo of David Bromige at 2 years of age. Awwwww....
>
> Bob

↑ Index

295. Robert Corbett
Re: Postmodern Piracy Festival /Call for Participants (fwd)
Wed 12 Aug 1998

Dan-

this probably wouldn't help your vita, but it sounds quite fun. it seems that anything with the word "pirates" in the title is hip academically. perhaps poe and piracy is a doable topic.

robert

On Fri, 19 Jun 1998, Poetics List wrote:

> forwarded from Doug Rice at [redacted]
>
> NOBODADDIES: An Independent Press of > Pirated Textual and Sexual Identities > Presents:
> A Festival of Postmodern Piracy
> April 14-16, 1999
> Kent State University-Salem (Ohio)
> Kent State University-Salem (Ohio)
>
> You are invited to submit theoretical and critical abstracts (100-500 words) addressing any aspect or interpretation of the festival's theme Piracy of Words, Bodies, Subjectivities, Cultures, Identities, or Representations. Panel proposals are also encouraged and should include the panel's title, participant's names, and abstracts. All approaches in the humanities (particularly literary, cinematic, musical, or philosophical) are welcomed. Possible topics include, but are not limited to:
>
>  History and Practice of Plagiarism, Appropriation, or Piracy * Theoretical approaches to Plagiarism, Appropriation, or Piracy * Performances of Plagiarism, Appropriation, or Piracy * Explorations of Contemporary Rewriting of Older Tales * Aesthetic Outlaws, Migrant Tongues * Schizo-Flesh or Infected Texts * Gender Blurring/Blending/Cutting/Erasing * Nomadic Skinshows * Viral Languages, Theories, Images, Bodies * Transgender Issues of Bodies and Languages * The Politics and Poetics of Transgression * Special Panels and Sessions on the works of Kathy Acker, William S. Burroughs, Ray Federman, Gilles Deleuze, David Cronenberg. * A Colloquium on the NEA and Censorship.*
>
> We are interested in a variety of approaches, including works that confuse boundaries of genre, discourse, and discipline; works that analyze primary texts; creative works that perform any of these issues. Selected work will be published in a festschrift celebrating the festival.
>
> Please Address submissions to: Doug Rice Kent State University-Salem 2491 State Route 45 South Salem OH 44460 For further information, please contact Doug Rice at [redacted]

Robert Corbett "you are there beyond/ tracings flesh can [redacted] take,/ and farther away surrounding and University of Washington informing the systems" - A.R. Ammons

↑ Index

296. Pritchett,Patrick
Re: Bombay Gin
Wed 12 Aug 1998

The 1998 issue of Bombay Gin - the annual publication of The Jack Kerouac School at Naropa - is now available. It features a beautiful color cover by Kenneth Patchen, along with a 30 page excerpt from _In Quest of Candlelighters_.

Work by all the usual suspects - Waldman, Schelling, Hawkins, Hollo, Collom, Abbott, Taylor, Bye - and poems by, among many others, Diana Rickard, Jack Greene, Jeni Olin, Cedar Sigo, Clayton Eshleman, Lisa Jarnot, Ha Jin, Alma Luz Villanueva, and yours truly.

Price is $10.00. Order by calling (303) 546 - 3540 or 800/[redacted].

Thanks,
Patrick Pritchett

↑ Index

297. Robert Corbett
Re: Postmodern Piracy Festival /Call for Participants (fwd)
Wed 12 Aug 1998

---

pardon my backchannel, though perhaps this managed to remind people about this interesting conference(?)

robert

Robert Corbett "you are there beyond/ tracings flesh can [redacted] take,/ and farther away surrounding and University of Washington informing the systems" - A.R. Ammons

↑ Index

298. Henry Gould
Re: snorting up the Pound / Williams line
Wed 12 Aug 1998

On Wed, 12 Aug 1998 09:36:05 -0400 Michael Magee said:
>
>Now, Dewey spends 350 pgs in Art as Experience describing how this >insistence on "experimentation and invention" applies to language. Let's >have a discussion about the merits of that, or of Burke's Language as >Symbolic Action (also a masterful argument for innovative writing) or, >for that matter, of Bernstein's A Poetics - all serious defenses of >experimental writing too complex and distinct to simply equate. Which is >to say, pick on someone your own size, & leave Pound's carcass alone - >it's picked clean. -m.

I doubt if anybody's against experiment & innovation per se. But since you seem to think a serious pragmatic discussion requires citation - then how would one or more of the above authorities, do you think, respond to the following positions of anglo-welsh artist-poet David Jones, which he asserts in various places:

1. All art is fundamentally abstract, since it basically involves "making a shape"; and the (Aquinas-Joycean) "radiance of form" is the substance of the work itself. So "abstract art" is an assertion of this basic aspect in isolation to some degree. Jones does NOT condemn it or even criticize it on these grounds; but he suggests that any foregrounding of any particular "virtue", while it may have immediate benefits, can lead to various kinds of dessication.

2. All art is a sign-making activity which points toward something lost or distant or "other"; in this sense it is "extra-utile", un-useful, impractical; it is the opposite of what Jones (writing during WW II) called materialism, pure force, the material "thing" without this "significance". Not that he was a "spiritualist" or anti-materialist; he was an "incarnational" artist, whose exemplar was Joyce, and he related giving somebody flowers as a token of love and the Eucharistic Mass as equally "significant". Poetry & art are essentially anamnesis - re-calling - something absent, via signs.

3. Well-made art aspires to re-member & contain EVERYTHING; thus comedy will touch on tragedy & vice versa; a painting of a chair will recall thrones & kingdoms, etc. Art aspires to all-inclusive wholeness: this is "objective" form.

For Jones the material of art had a "sacramental" unity; he was a old culture bard,"conservative", who wrote long poems clearly influenced by Pound's techniques as well as Joyce, the Bible, Blake, Smart, folk tales, history, geology, etc. This devotional mentality set him against a purely "material" approach to art; the bardic role of memory (anamnesis) put limits on invention for its own sake, which I think he would relate to pure materialism or in-significance. At the same time he followed Jacques Maritain in recognizing that art perfects itself within its own sphere (practice, "doing") and this involves technical, formal "rightness". But he distinguished between the technical (or purely instrumental) and the artistic (the making of "extra-utile" signs). It's the old yin/yang, active/contemplative, dominate/cooperate, nominalist/realist thang...

I don't think anybody's been "dismissing" experiment. I for one have been questioning some of the American shibboleths of who or what or in what spirit experiment is now happening (or have been trying to anyway).

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

299. trbell
poetic incest or snorting
Wed 12 Aug 1998

Black Whole or 101 Ways to Conquer Chaos

chaotic child's play curbed hammock backyard slowswinging sarcastically soar

reading too much into it reading too homesafe oxenfree by the book and candle flares rocket's red glare snarled clay owned if uttered platitudes marshmallow mayhem phallicle starship or oracle heeded

or

Tanka 1.
Chaotic child's play
curbed in 101 ways.
In a slowswinging soar in blue backyard hammock sarcastically over.

Tanka 2.
Reading too much reading into it Jack's homesafe.
Do it by the book until candles flare, rockets glare red, and does startle, flee.

Tanka 3.
Snarled clay, phallic swagger, owned if uttered by pious platitudes,

marshmallow pillows, discursive rules and regs., objects. Not I.

tom bell

↑ Index

300. Jordan Davis
<to enter the subject>
Wed 12 Aug 1998

---

1. The difference that makes meaning may or may not be oppositional, dialectic.

There is no context for this remark.

The difference that makes meaning what? Assume that some part of language is being talked about, maybe some small part.

Is a phonemic difference meant, and if so, is a sort of "color-wheel" of english (for example) phonemes implied? If so, how does this connect to encryption and graphological systems of value (e.g. gematria, kaballah)? Do systems which attribute different qualities to the letters pay their pathos dues?

If not a phonemic difference, then what. Morphemes? The question, and then the apap. The apparently relevant found text skews the rhetorical question, it starts to look like allegory. The clause then because. Then becomes the unit of meaning which must differ. The late 19th early 20th century terrain of statements, hesitations and modifications.

But! subtle observations distributed among several clauses become attenuated, less robust. Associationism and stream-of-consciousness present a cluster of meanings, literature is writing again! Progress! (Or, epistomology as SWAT team).

The party isn't over, you just stopped getting invited, at least until things get retro enough for you to be seen as a genial precursor of the next odd use for words.

Is this change in the making of meaning from the clausal genteel to free cluster-fuck ... is it a DIALECTIC change? Always already? Never not yet?

Small boat
appraisal
guide

↑ Index

301. MAYHEW
Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
Wed 12 Aug 1998

Is there sort of a techno-poetics specific to American poetry of which Pound is the founder, an emphasis on the invention of new literary techniques? While there are avant-gardes everywhere I don't find this same obsession with techne per se in other modern traditions, to the same extent at least. Someone can correct me if I'm wrong on this. This is what Bly was trying to say back in the 50s and 60s. (not that I agree with HIM)

Jones, as described by H. Gould, seems vaguely Heideggerian (if that is not a redundancy). The Heideggerian approach would seem to distrust technique for at least two reasons--because technique seems somehow inessential to what poetry is really about, and because technique is related to technology, seeing the world as somehow raw material waiting for us to instrumentalize it. Am I on the right track here or am I missing the point?

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

302. charles alexander
(Fwd) Rejected posting to [redacted]
Wed 12 Aug 1998

I'm forwarding this from Chris Alexander

>From: "Christopher W. Alexander" <[redacted]> (by way of Charles Alexander <[redacted]>)
>Subject: Davidson query
>Mime-Version: 1.0
>Content-Type: text/plain; charset="us-ascii"
>
>
>
>off the list but as you can see I'm still breathing >(typing) and haven't left yet. can one of you nice >listees give a former listee Michael Davidson's >snail-mail address?
>

> thanks! chris
>
>pls backchannel me at <[redacted]>.
>
>..
>
>Christopher W. Alexander etc. / nominative press collective
>
>*new email: [redacted]
>snail-mail: P.O. Box 522402 / Salt Lake City UT 84152-2402
>*snail-mail after 16 August: 19 Hodge St. #9 / Buffalo NY 14222 >press/zine site: http://choengmon.lib.utah.edu/~calexand/nonce/
>
>
>
>
>

↑ Index

303. Donald Wellman

Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger

Wed 12 Aug 1998

I'll chirp in here.

For both Pound and Jones, I believe 'techne' is a form of weaving over the surface of something soul-like and essentailly spiritual, a catching of those shadows:

> And the small stars now fall from the olive branch,
> Forked shadow falls dark on the terrace
> More black than the floating martin (EP, Canto XLVII)

For Williams, 'techne' is more mahinic, the poem being a machine made of words: 'techne' becomes 'method'. And this seems a pretty clear line through Creeley and Olson to Bernstein. I think the notion of poetry or language as an instrumental extension of the senses useful for making discoveries otherwise not-detectable seems to me a very American, very pragmatic take on how or why one writes.

So as far as this history goes, Pound is on Henry's side; Williams etc aligns with Dewey etc.

Don Wellman

↑ Index

304. Donald Wellman
Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
Wed 12 Aug 1998

---

toddbaron wrote:

> william's "machine"
> was a modernist technic of > responding to a query regarding "WHAT > is poetry." He meant it > and didn't mean it--for williams-- > (see KORA) the machine always needed to > be refuled and reworked and discarded--plus > he very much thot of the AMERICAN machine--
> a device.

Yes " a device" this is very much what I meant in my hurry to conflate reductions. The method of using language as a device for discovery (many orders of discovery) seems very American. I believe Bernstein has spoken more than once on meaning and method in ways that reflect this notion of a "device." It is one of the clearer lines among those that one might attempt to trace. Watten too has an essay on on Williams's machine that seems to align Williams with his own practice.

Now there are other methods--surrealism of course that I don't think will be confused with 'techne".

I stand by my aligning of Pound and Jones with respect to techne and in differentiation from the more mechinic and technical use of language as device that seems distinctive of American Experimental poetry--pointing out what I think of as a major mis-alignment of Henry's pawns.

Don

↑ Index

305. joel lewis
f.y.i.
Wed 12 Aug 1998

Human Interest

 Sony shutters camera that sees through clothes

Electronics giant Sony Corp. said Wednesday it had halted shipments of some video cameras after finding they could be used for filming more of their subjects than meets the eye. Some versions of the Handycam have infrared technology which lets users shoot at night or in darkness in a "night shot" mode. But magazine reports revealed that when the special feature is used in daylight or a lighted room with a special filter it can "see through" clothing - underwear can show up, especially on those lightly dressed, and people wearing swimsuits look almost naked. A Sony spokesman said the first the company knew of the camera's surprise feature was when reporters started asking for comments on the "new way" of using the camera. See http://www.infobeat.com/stories/cgi/story.cgi?id=2555514238-e9f

 Killer mink, sharp fish dominate U.K. newspapers

If you are lucky enough to avoid the killer mink marauding through Britain's forests and the razor fish littered across its beaches, watch out for the funky chickens. This is the peak of the so-called "Silly Season," when editors desperate to fill space resort to stories which would usually be buried deep inside the paper. "In France and Italy the whole country shuts down in August - even cinemas close - but in Britain, hacks must still turn out a newspaper and hope that something or other happens while the population takes its two-week holiday," wrote Linda Grant of the Guardian broad-sheet. In the dog days of August, anything will do. Most front pages on Monday were dominated by the tragic story of unwary bathers on a beach in southwestern England who cut their feet open on the exposed shells of razor fish. (Reuters)

 Iran women to be allowed to watch male wrestling meet

Iranian women will be permitted to attend a men's wrestling competition for the first time in nearly 20 years, the vice-president of Iran's wrestling federation said Wednesday. A special viewing section will be allocated to women during the World Wrestling Championships in Tehran on Sept. 8-11, the daily newspaper Tous quoted Mohammad-Reza Taleqani as saying. After the 1979 Islamic Revolution, women have been prohibited from attending men's sports competition. See http://www.infobeat.com/stories/cgi/story.cgi?id=2555516914-d63

↑ Index

306. hen
Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
Wed 12 Aug 1998

On Wed, 12 Aug 1998 15:50:44 -0500 MAYHEW said:
>Is there sort of a techno-poetics specific to American poetry of which >Pound is the founder, an emphasis on the invention of new literary >techniques? While there are avant-gardes everywhere I don't find this same >obsession with techne per se in other modern traditions, to the same >extent at least. Someone can correct me if I'm wrong on this. This is >what Bly was trying to say back in the 50s and 60s. (not that I agree >with HIM)

>
>Jones, as described by H. Gould, seems vaguely Heideggerian (if that is >not a redundancy). The Heideggerian approach would seem to distrust >technique for at least two reasons--because technique seems somehow >inessential to what poetry is really about, and because technique is >related to technology, seeing the world as somehow raw material waiting >for us to instrumentalize it. Am I on the right track here or am I missing >the point?

You're not off the point but it gets complicated. From the little I've read of Jones so far it does seem he could fall into a sort of reactionary dualistic thinking along the lines of CP Snow, emphasizing the wide gap between science and art, technology and culture. But it's complicated; his father & grandfathe r I think were both craft workers in the London dockyards; his poetry his FILLED with images of techne, making, etc.; he had an anthropological concept of "man" the maker, claiming that "the Christian religion could not exist without artefacture" (the bread & wine were not simply things of nature but were "made" things).

Jones's fear of the sameness of industrializing technology is related to his "Welsh" consciousness, the identification with a threatened local culture, and perhaps this fear blinded him to the creative-theoretical (non instrumental) aspects of science. But he made up for it with a highly organized christological aesthetics: the universe is itself a "work of art", a "making"; the sacraments unite humanity with the divine form at the crux of that making; art which remains true to itself (the orbit of free & beautiful "making") is a sign of that larger whole; and so on. Jones's own poetry is highly technical & experimental - but he distinguished between all the functional arts (from agriculture to war) & the fine arts, which are strictly "useless", being devoted to beauty-as-it-is. (Not without acknowledging the beauty of the functional as a basis & inspiration of the fine arts.) If you read some of his essays & poetry you notice his awareness of a great deal of "useless beauty" not only in art itself but in life in general, everywhere. The link between the two is what he saw threatened by mere functionalism, utilitarianism, standardisation, etc.

I don't want to juxtapose Pound & Jones; you can find these affinities & contrasts just about anywhere. Perhaps Jones didn't emphasize the "instrumentalities" of technique as much as Pound did because he was actually more derivative, & borrowed a lot from Pound himself. But you won't find Jones talking about the culture-changing possibilities of the variable foot or the breath-line or the materiality of the signifier or breaking the pentameter etc. etc. He had a different, perhaps deeper sense of craft, possibly because he was a skilled painter as well as a poet. All the techne goes for naught if the "form" of the artwork gives no "sign" - and he understands this in a kind of strict, Jesuitical, almost military sense, derived partly from Joyce & Aquinas. & the "signs" are coterminous & continuous with the miraculous & incarnational formal "sign-substance" of reality itself... - Henry Gould

↑ Index

307. hen
Re: <to enter the subject>
Wed 12 Aug 1998

On Wed, 12 Aug 1998 16:34:38 -0400 Jordan Davis said:
>
>But! subtle observations distributed among several clauses become >attenuated, less robust. Associationism and stream-of-consciousness present >a cluster of meanings, literature is writing again! Progress! (Or, >epistomology as SWAT team).
>
>The party isn't over, you just stopped getting invited, at least until >things get retro enough for you to be seen as a genial precursor of the next >odd use for words.
>
>Is this change in the making of meaning from the clausal genteel to free >clusterfuck ... is it a DIALECTIC change? Always already? Never not yet?

Abstract art makes a splash by devaluing every referent except itself, but that's a risky strategy because the next step is to devalue itself; so you have Ab Expressionism & then the referent zeroes in on flags & targets for a moment & then pop, value of art per se is gone. Example of Jones's idea of a virtue taken in isolation. So postmodernism took association streams of meaning & just left the clusters, took out the meanings; you have abstract-abstractionism in literature; self-reference to nada; clusters of clusters. Naturally the clausal-causal sentence starts to seem dialectical in this atmosphere. "The purpose of art is to give pleasure" somebody said. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

308. toddbaron
Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
Thu 13 Aug 1998

---

william's "machine"
was a modernist technic of responding to a query regarding "WHAT is poetry." He meant it

and didn't mean it--for williams-- (see KORA) the machine always needed to be refuled and reworked and discarded--plus
he very much thot of the AMERICAN machine--
a device.

A clear line to Charles B?
Nothing is a clear line--not always is writing a "instrumental extension of the senses"--that's sd obviously--ironically I hope--as the sense are not always a part of writing. Haven't we got past that yet?

Did Duchamp inform Williams?

Yes-- Duchamp's "senses" include a love of the machine-- not of a singular (coleridge) self composed.

Todd B
(Remap)

↑ Index

309. Ryan Whyte
Re: <to enter the subject>
Thu 13 Aug 1998

---

is this a joke?

On Wed, 12 Aug 1998, hen wrote:

> Abstract art makes a splash by devaluing every referent except itself, but that's a risky strategy because the next step is to devalue itself; so you have Ab Expressionism & then the referent zeroes in on flags & targets for a moment & then pop, value of art per se is gone. Example of Jones's idea of a virtue taken in isolation. So postmodernism took association streams of meaning & just left the clusters, took out the meanings; you have abstract-abstractionism in literature; self-reference to nada; clusters of clusters. Naturally the clausal-causal sentence starts to seem dialectical in this atmosphere. "The purpose of art is to give pleasure" somebody said. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

310. joel lewis
more f.y.i.
Thu 13 Aug 1998

* In May, Walter Scott Knieriemen, who admitted breaking into a woman's home in Wheeling, W. Va., was acquitted of burglary charges after a jury apparently found that he had done it without illegal intent. A psychiatrist testified that Knieriemen suffered from a childhood-based sexual dysfunction that impelled him to pursue a pair of leather gloves he had recently seen the woman wear.

* The Guardian (London) newspaper reported in May on the enormous television audiences in Brazil watching the nightly, Jerry Springer-like show "Ratinho Livre" (roughly, The Mouse, Unleashed), a forum for the downtrodden. Among recent interviewees were patients with horrible medical conditions begging for otherwise-unaffordable treatment (e.g., 8-year-old boy with 21 tumors in his mouth); a woman whose eyes were skewered and ears lopped off in a domestic fight but whose husband was still on the lam; and an equally unpopular husband and wife, whom the audience urged to assault one another.

* Cafe Ke'ilu ("Cafe Make Believe") opened in a trendy section of Tel Aviv, Israel, in April, with tables, chairs, plates, silverware, menus, and servers, but no food or drink. Explained manager Nir Caspi (who calls the experience "conceptual dining"), people come to be seen and to meet people but not for the actual food. The menu, designed by top-rated chef (and owner) Phillipe Kaufman, lets diners order some of the world's most exquisite dishes (eel mousse, salad of pomegranates, if in season), "served" on elegant (but empty) platters.

* In November, the Albuquerque Environmental Health Department, in an official inspection report, urged that the Ice House nude-dance club should immediately correct two food- contamination conditions. First, it was serving pizza at less than the required 140 degrees F. Second, wrote the city inspector, a sanitation risk was being posed by a dancer named Stephanie Evans, whose act consisted in part of expelling Ping Pong balls from her vagina to various points in the room, in that the balls could possibly land on pizza slices or in customers' drinks.

* The official historical agency Heritage Canada released its 1998 calendar in January marking such benchmark dates as "World Book and Copyright Day" but making no mention of Christmas and Easter. And an official Valentine's Day poster at Langara College in Vancouver, British Columbia, featuring a silhouetted female and a male ready to kiss, drew fire from a campus gay and lesbian group, which suggested a "neutral" image of two hands clasping. That latter image itself was later derided by a Langara student union representative as possibly offensive to a person with no hands.

* In March, the Romanian soccer team Jiul Petrosani sold midfielder Ion Radu to the Valcea team for about $2,500 worth of pork. (Jiul Petrosani earlier traded defenseman Liviu Baicea to Valcea for 10 soccer balls.)

* In a story on pet-friendly hotels, the Boston Globe in April reported that the Four Seasons lets pets stay free and offers a special menu (including room service) featuring "Rin Tin Tin Tartare" (tenderloin and egg yolk) and "Cat's Meow" (poached salmon with arborio rice), as well as special desserts and dishes for pets on a diet.

* In February, Christian Poincheval, a radio station manager in LeMans, France, introduced Petit Lutin toilet paper for the "reading room," on which are printed short articles on French current affairs, geography, and culture, with no-stain ink and new editions to be released monthly.

* Recent Restaurant-Openings: In Tokyo, the trendy Alcatraz BC, themed after the California prison, in which diners are handcuffed, eat in cells, and must beg permission from the guards to be allowed out to visit the restroom. And in London, a pill-themed restaurant called The Pharmacy (designed by edgy artist Damien Hirst), with prescription containers everywhere, barstool seats resembling aspirins, and staff dressed as surgeons. ("The challenge," said co- owner Jonathan Kennedy, "was how far you can go before it becomes too much.") And in Singapore, the House of Mao, an otherwise-upscale Chinese restaurant but with green-uniformed staff and pictures galore of Mao Zedong.

* In February, two Russian cosmonauts aboard the Mir space station hawked NASA space pens ($32) and other paraphernalia on the American QVC shopping channel, in an effort to raise some money for their country's underfunded space program. A total of 530 people bought something, including 11 who paid from $90 to $2,500 for tiny Mars rocks. Six others submitted to credit inquiries about buying $25,000 Sokol KV-2 spacesuits.

↑ Index

311. Alan Jennifer Sondheim

Elaboration for Andy Kaufman

Thu 13 Aug 1998

-

Elaboration

2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 < I'm always surprised about the reactions my work receives. I live inside of the texts, surrounded by them. I think they're literally the only reason I'm alive. I can't see them all that clearly, and I wear glasses even for the most mundane tasks of everyday life. I thirst for responses, imagine readers and other writers, imagine the world held together by tooth-picks and safety pins. Someone carefully breaking through the fabric. Another voice which is also a face. 2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 <

2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 < Sometimes I would like her to wear suspenders. They would carefully and lovingly wrap around the softness of the shoulders, descending in front, and behind as well, tiny clips holding everything in place, the X-hieroglyph before and behind the body, or perhaps parallel lines. For the nourishment that the reaction to my writing gives, were he to take soft time and pen in hand. 2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 <

2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 < He was beautiful and read my words slowly, one after another, for example this one, and now this. Then he would write to me and for me, on the lists and backchannel, such sweet sweet lines such that I would learn true understanding of my work and life. 2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 <

2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 < Sometimes I will dream of a reader who comes to me in her sleep. 2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 <

2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 < always learning and beautiful Alan 2d1 < 18d16 < 21d18 < 54d50 < 57d52 < 74d68 < 77,78d70 < < 82d73 < 108d98 < 2d1 < 5d3 < 11d8 <

↑ Index

312. toddbaron

Re: "I" is another"---

Thu 13 Aug 1998

ah--ok. but really--I was attacking yr instance of "self or sense" as primary de-vice--that might have been true at one point of williams--but the poem extends much further than the "senses" and--again--my instance of Duchamp--and Williams--as Williams was most influenced and interested in that school of thot--the armory show/etc.

we need to rid the "self" from such discussion of poetics--

"I" amend.

TB

↑ Index

313. Peter Ganick
address request
Thu 13 Aug 1998

hello

does anyone have a current email and/or snailmail address for kevin magee?...backchannel, please.

peter ganick
[redacted]

↑ Index

314. Michael Magee
Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
Thu 13 Aug 1998

I think Don's answer to Henry below is a smart and succinct frame. The mention of Heidegger, too, is potentially useful - Jones, as described by Henry believes that "all art is a sign-making activity which points toward something lost," - this, I think bears relation to that tendency of Heidegger's (which, incidentally, rubs off on Derrida) to deify the endless chain of signification. As Heidegger put it,

"The origin of language is strange and mysterious. And this means that language could only have arisen from the overpowering, the strange and terrible, through man's departure into being. In this departure, language was being, embodied in the word: poetry."

What's interesting to me here is that someone like Dewey wouldn't take exception to Heidegger's premise so much as his emphases, as revealed in those adjectives: "strange and mysterious...the overpowering, the strange and terrible." Language becomes in Heidegger's hands, the substituted God-term, it is what has been lost, and - most important - what can only be found in a moment of transcendent revelation or the like. If Jones is like Heidegger and Heidegger is like Pound it's here: "the book should be a ball of light in one's hand," as EP put it. So while Dewey would certainly agree that language is mysterious, that, as Heidegger would say (after Heracleitus), it "likes to hide," he would be careful about using words like "overpowering" and "terrible" b/c he's keen to their rhetorical dubiousness. He'd prefer to emphasize the utility of linguistic contingency when it is not mystefied, when art is not a hand stretched toward a lost other (language, God, it makes no difference since rhetorically it serves the same purpose: we were once part of it and now we're alienated); when art is, instead a particularly useful method for negotiating both with and against received vocabularies, useful, as Don sugested, for discovering "what's new" about the body's relation to the body-politic. -m.

According to Donald Wellman: > > I'll chirp in here. >
> For both Pound and Jones, I believe 'techne' is a form of weaving over > the surface of something soul-like and essentailly spiritual, a catching > of those shadows:
> And the small stars now fall from the olive branch,
> Forked shadow falls dark on the terrace
> More black than the floating martin (EP, Canto XLVII)
>
> For Williams, 'techne' is more mahinic, the poem being a machine made of > words: 'techne' becomes 'method'. And this seems a pretty clear line > through Creeley and Olson to Bernstein. I think the notion of poetry or > language as an instrumental extension of the senses useful for making > discoveries otherwise not-detectable seems to me a very American, very > pragmatic take on how or why one writes.
>
> So as far as this history goes, Pound is on Henry's side; Williams etc > aligns with Dewey etc.
>
> Don Wellman
>

↑ Index

315. Poetics List
bpNichol Conference, Program (fwd)
Thu 13 Aug 1998

On the Horizon: bpNichol After Ten
Tentative Program, as of 10 August
September 25-26, Emily Carr College of Art and Design Room 328, 1400 Johnson Street
Granville Island, Vancouver

Friday, September 25
6:00 - 7:00 p.m. Registration
Music by Susan McMaster, poems for bp on CD Installations by derek A. beaulieu (displayed throughout the conference)

7:00 - 8:00 p.m. "bp: pushing the boundaries," a film by Brian Nash

8:00 - 11:00 p.m. Readings and performances (Readers will include Lillian Allen, and Darren Wershler-Henry)

*

Saturday, September 26
9:30 a.m. Registration

10:00 a.m. - 12:00p.m. Introductions
Panel 1: Frank Davey, Daphne Marlatt, Fred Wah, Irene Niechoda (moderator)

12:00 - 1:00 p.m. Lunch

1:00 - 1:30 p.m. Stan Bevington, Coach House Books, "printing bpNichol"

1:30 - 3:30 p.m. Panel 2: Clint Burnham, Ashok Mathur, Peter Jaeger, Marie Annharte Baker

3:30 - 3:45 p.m. Coffee break

3:45 -6:00 p.m. Panel 3: Brian Dedora, Steven Ross Smith, Carl Peters, Steve McCaffery
Respondent to the day: Sharon Thesen

6:00 - 8:00 p.m. Dinner

8:00 - 10:30 p.m. Gala reading (readers TBA)

Ticket prices: $5 single evening; $10 two day pass
For more information or to register, contact Jacqueline Larson, West Coast Line, [redacted]; email [redacted]

NOTE: RELATED EVENT!!
24 September, SFU campus, a celebration of "bpNichol Day"
Special Collectsion, 7th Floor, W.A.C. Bennett Library
1:30 - 3:30 p.m. -
Display of publications and manuscripts from the Nichol papers - Readings by Steve McCaffery and Darren Wershler-Henry - Ellie Nichol in attendance

↑ Index

316. Michael Magee
Re: Reading In Providence
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Hi, just curious whether the tuesday night reading series is still happening every tuesday - thinking of coming by this week, having recently moved to Pawtucket. Thanks. -Mike.

↑ Index

317. Michael Magee
Re: Reading In Providence
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Whoops - ignore this, meant to backchannel. -m.

According to Michael Magee:
>
> Hi, just curious whether the tuesday night reading series is still > happening every tuesday - thinking of coming by this week, having > recently moved to Pawtucket. Thanks. -Mike.
>

↑ Index

318. Jordan Davis
<to enter blind carbon>
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Todd --

Why get rid of the "self", even only from these discussions? It sounds so retro, so Lukacs, I mean, _maybe_ ..... maybe get rid of selfish poetics? or elfin poetics, shellfish ...

but you gotta remember, what Charlie B. said was that it was a mistake to posit the self as the basis for a poetics, he didn't _exclude_ it, not that _Content's Dream_ is _scripture_ ..... or papal bull ..... no matter what the inarticulate and unreasonable forces of journalism might say, to argue for the interchangeability of selves is .. on the one hand, beautiful, on the other, deadly so so anyway, as I say, Todd, I'm saying it to you, Todd, signed, Jordan

↑ Index

319. Charles Alexander
Re: <to enter blind carbon>
Thu 13 Aug 1998

At 10:48 AM 8/13/98 -0400, you wrote:
>Todd --
>
>Why get rid of the "self", even only from these discussions? It sounds so >retro, so Lukacs, I mean, _maybe_ ..... maybe get rid of selfish poetics?
>or elfin poetics, shellfish ...

Todd didn't suggest getting rid of the "self" from such discussions. Here's what he said, precisely:

"we need to rid the 'self' from such discussion of poetics--"

which as I read it, suggests that we need to get rid of such discussion of poetics, or at least banish such discussion from the "self." which I took as a more interesting suggestion.

charles

charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted] chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

↑ Index

320. Joseph Conte
DLB 193 and its contents
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Thanks to Bob Archambeau (whose fine article on former Buffalo doctoral candidate Michael Anania appears in DLB 193) for posting the table of contents for this volume, copies of which have just arrived at the homes and offices of its various contributors, several of whom are listmembers.

One correction to Bob's list of essays, while Steve Evans did write an excellent piece on Bob Perelman for the volume, the essay on Stanley Plumly was written by Plumly's colleague at Columbia, SC, Ron Baughman.

I'll take some credit for reversing the trend in earlier volumes on American poetry toward the New Formalism and other creations of the creative writing programs around the country. But I'd like to note that contact with many of the contributors through this list was instrumental in arranging, gathering, and recruiting (the hardest part of editing these volumes) the range of articles on progressive, experimental writing.

It's true that the earlier volumes, v. 165 & v. 169, are available through Amazon.com at about $150. Contributors can get a 40% discount on sales of the volume. It's obviously targeted by Gale Research Press for sale as a reference volume to research, university, school, and public libraries. So it's widely available, or will be in a short while. And the 81/2 x 11 in. pages are easily photocopied.

Thanks again to all the contributors--and subjects of entries--who are on Poetics.

Joseph Conte

========== Joseph M. Conte
[redacted] x1009 Associate Professor and FAX: [redacted] Director of Graduate Studies

Department of English
306 Clemens Hall
SUNY at Buffalo
Buffalo, NY 14260-4610

http://www.acsu.buffalo.edu/~jconte/
==========

↑ Index

321. R.Gancie/C.Parcelli
Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
Thu 13 Aug 1998

---

hen wrote:
>
> On Wed, 12 Aug 1998 15:50:44 -0500 MAYHEW said:
> >Is there sort of a techno-poetics specific to American poetry of which > >Pound is the founder, an emphasis on the invention of new literary > >techniques? While there are avant-gardes everywhere I don't find this same > >obsession with techne per se in other modern traditions, to the same > >extent at least. Someone can correct me if I'm wrong on this. This is > >what Bly was trying to say back in the 50s and 60s. (not that I agree > >with HIM)
> >
> >Jones, as described by H. Gould, seems vaguely Heideggerian (if that is > >not a redundancy). The Heideggerian approach would seem to distrust > >technique for at least two reasons--because technique seems somehow

> >inessential to what poetry is really about, and because technique is > >related to technology, seeing the world as somehow raw material waiting > >for us to instrumentalize it. Am I on the right track here or am I missing > >the point?
>
> You're not off the point but it gets complicated. From the little I've read of > Jones so far it does seem he could fall into a sort of reactionary dualistic > thinking along the lines of CP Snow, emphasizing the wide gap between science > and art, technology and culture. But it's complicated; his father & grandfathe > r I think were both craft workers in the London dockyards; his poetry his > FILLED with images of techne, making, etc.; he had an anthropological concept > of "man" the maker, claiming that "the Christian religion could not exist > without artefacture" (the bread & wine were not simply things of nature but > were "made" things).
>
> Jones's fear of the sameness of industrializing technology is related to > his "Welsh" consciousness, the identification with a threatened local > culture, and perhaps this fear blinded him to the creative-theoretical > (non instrumental) aspects of science. But he made up for it with a > highly organized christological aesthetics: the universe is itself a > "work of art", a "making"; the sacraments unite humanity with the > divine form at the crux of that making; art which remains true to itself > (the orbit of free & beautiful "making") is a sign of that larger whole; > and so on. Jones's own poetry is highly technical & experimental - > but he distinguished between all the functional arts (from agriculture to > war) & the fine arts, which are strictly "useless", being devoted to > beauty-as-it-is. (Not without acknowledging the beauty of the functional > as a basis & inspiration of the fine arts.) If you read some of his essays & > poetry you notice his awareness of a great deal of "useless beauty" not > only in art itself but in life in general, everywhere. The link between > the two is what he saw threatened by mere functionalism, utilitarianism, > standardisation, etc.
>
> I don't want to juxtapose Pound & Jones; you can find these > affinities & contrasts just about anywhere. Perhaps Jones didn't > emphasize the "instrumentalities" of technique as much as Pound did > because he was actually more derivative, & borrowed a lot from Pound > himself. But you won't find Jones talking about the culture-changing > possibilities of the variable foot or the breath-line or the materiality > of the signifier or breaking the pentameter etc. etc. He had a different, > perhaps deeper sense of craft, possibly because he was a skilled painter > as well as a poet. All the techne goes for naught if the "form" of the > artwork gives no "sign" - and he understands this in a kind of strict, > Jesuitical, almost military sense, derived partly from Joyce & Aquinas.

> & the "signs" are coterminous & continuous with the miraculous & incarnational > formal "sign-substance" of reality itself... - Henry Gould Unfortunately for Henry's argument the "creative-theoretical (non-instrumental) aspects of science" (whatever this phrase might mean) are MORE dependent on notions of "sameness" e.g mathematical formalization, quantification, reduction etc.) than their assembly line fruits. A limited number of mathematically expressable characteristics or properties circumcribes the being of the object. This approaches Heidegger's view, in small part, on science and technology. Sameness at the level of experiment and communication is mandatory and anomolies are ignored, suppressed and/or elided unless they overwhelm through their own process of formalization the existing (dare I use the word) paradigm. This notion of formal constituents did escape Jones and is related to his ideas concerning social hierarchies. ---Carlo Parcelli

↑ Index

322. Al Filreis
Gerd Stern/Seven Stray Cats
Thu 13 Aug 1998

I'm keen to know more about the word of Gerd Stern and the poem-performance group, "Seven Stray Cats"--especially in the period of the late 50s/early 60s? What leads can anyone give me?

Al Filreis
University of Pennsylvania

↑ Index

323. david bromige
je est un autre
Thu 13 Aug 1998

I always understood that as saying that by the time your poem is being read, someone else is inhabiting the space of your written "I". That the poet's written "I" is a construct that must make room for another.

And I also thought it meant that who-one-is. is as strange as anything else writing touches upon. And also, "to you, I am a you." And then . . .

"Because I would not stop for Death" .. .is a composite of ED(whatever one discovers or conjectures concerning her), oneself (or "one's elf" as amusingly put by parties to this discussion), the condition of being an I (which is not comnpletely an historical determination, that is, we are species AND we are new), as another New Englander has it, "As soon as/I speak, I/speaks."

A rider : the other day, a friend defined _I love you_ as "I would die for you." Otherwise, it shouldn't be said, he said. !! I'm intrigued how this attaches to "I is an other."

Perhaps Rimbaud was feeling the Otherness of language, too. That one is othered by language, even as one is created of it. One goes to speak but--the words are already in the way. "I can feel my eye/breaking." But then there's Whitman's sense of I, "I am there with you in your kayak"--of which Lawrence makes such hay in _Studies in Classical American Literature_ .

However all this may/not be (for you or for me), the poetic act is the apparently ungrammatical "est" in lieu of "suis," the separation that prevents the knee-jerk assumption of what must always follow "je". It's a fissure thru which l/sp/eak volumes. It's the necessary act of transgression that stops habit and opens thought, it's the poetic. David

↑ Index

324. David W. McFadden
Re: <to enter blind carbon>
Thu 13 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>yup! again--"I" is another ... (Rimbaud)
"Anyone, provided that he can be amusing, has the right to talk about himself" (Baudelaire).
dwm

↑ Index

325. David W. McFadden
Re: je est un autre
Thu 13 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>Perhaps Rimbaud was feeling the Otherness of language, too.
Perhaps he was saying it's okay to talk about the self if the self is seen as another.
dwm

↑ Index

326. daniel bouchard

whose emily d?

Thu 13 Aug 1998

I spent four years in Amherst and never once went to the "Homestead." The Homestead is the homey name tagged onto a brass plaque sign in front of The Emily Dickinson House. It's on Main Street. I lived a stone's throw (the best form of anecdotal measurement) west on North Pleasant Street. On the opposite side of the Homestead is Bart's Pizza. It's ok but not spectacular and my friends and I patronized it mainly because it was on Main Street and the delivery time was relatively quick. Up the street, indeed uphill, from the Homestead, is the new police station, Amherst College, and the center of town (Amherst).

I don't believe any of what I am saying is mentioned in the Susan Howe book. This is obviously a political issue, and I will be heard.

There is a tourist shop in the garage of the Emily Dickinson House. There are books for sale, postcards, booklets, chapbooks, book mementos, photographs, and key-chains with heavy books on them. I bought three postcards and didn't send them to anyone.

Down the street from the Emily Dickinson House is a house of no distinction save the fact that my friend Jack lived there one semester. One night Jack and his friends had a great party where everyone got really drunk and stoned. We danced and sang, just like in the Amherst of Emily Dickinson's time. Then Jack got completely naked and began running around the house. It was springtime I think.

When the cops showed up they entered without knocking and shot the stereo. No, wait, come to think of it they did not shoot the stereo but they did ask one of us to turn it down. I then began an endless, meaningless, and stupid cascade of verbal abuse directed at the law officers which was filled with forgettable things but said quite loudly. On a certain cue, like a trained pet, I clammed up. The cue was: "if you don't shut the fuck up, we're going to arrest you." This proved to me that the State is superior in psychological warfare. I was too weak to resist. It was at that point that Jack ran into the house, naked as a bluejay.

On the walk to the new police station (to retrieve Jack) we passed the Emily Dickinson House. It was closed.

The tour of the Homestead begins in the garden. The guide, a middle-aged woman with an English accent and librarian glasses, spoke with touching fondness about what Emily grew, where Emily walked, what Emily's niece had to say about it, and where the barn stood. Apparently, no structure had ever stood in this portion of Homestead land. In the distance, a man was exiting the parlor known as Bart's.

If you think the single surviving photograph of Emily Dickinson is pretty dry and unrevealing, then her house is a crusty supplement indeed to the photograph. The house has been restored well enough (an Evangelical pastor with a family of 8 once lived there and they installed four bathrooms) and we even got to see the narrow steps where Emily sat while her "guests" played the piano for her but didn't get to meet her. There was a bit of freakishness about the house, about Emily herself, that was charming. We saw China. The china was a wedding gift to Emily's parents.

Here is something of note: there is a Seth Thomas clock in Emily's bedroom. You may recall that Charles Olson's dad wound a Seth Thomas clock in his drawers in the living room every day except the 30th of each month.

Emily's original bed has kept quite well over the years. It's a sleigh bed.

The tour guide tells us that Emily asked that all her letters be burned upon her death. And her poems too I say. No, the guide says, just the letters. Well, I'm not going to argue with you I say, but you're completely wrong, a sham and travesty to the National Park system. She clenches her fists. Her eyes flare in anger. I make a fart sound with my lips but she has already succeeded in undermining my confidence. Susan Howe, where are you?

After a spell, some wandering, reading of placards but no taking of pictures, we leave the house. It's a quite nice Federal style house. Next door, the home of Emily's brother is being restored. It looks like the mansion from The Addams Family. It was occupied by the Dickinson family until 1987, the year I came to Amherst.

As my companion and I walk toward town and past the now-not-quite-as-new police station, we are diverted by some new public art. Two silhouettes atop two large rocks and facing each other and making hand gestures, as if speaking to each other. One silhouette is Emily Dickinson. Beside her is a plaque explaining that Emily was a poet, lived a stone's throw from the big stone her shadow now sits upon, and a poem is reprinted too. The opposite figure? If you guessed Robert Frost, there is a future in public art awaiting you. He too is gesturing beside the plaque which explains him, his life, his time in Amherst, his kooky relationship to words, etc.

My companion snaps pictures. She's from California. And I, I turn to the police station, toward the west, where the course of empire went.

<<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
Daniel Bouchard
The MIT Press Journals
Five Cambridge Center
Cambridge, MA 02142

[redacted]
phone: [redacted]
fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<

↑ Index

327. david bromige
gerd stern
Thu 13 Aug 1998

At first I thought to b-c this to Al Filreis, but decided it may be of interest more generally. There was an article some years since, in _West Coast Line_, which comes from Simon Fraser U in Vancouver (Burnaby, to be exact), making use of archived materials having to do with _Northwest Review_ and _Coyote's Journal_ and which I recall referred to Stern's showing of his film "Y"(? "Stop Sign"?) at U of O in Eugene in 62 or 63. This was a showing I attended, and thus may be mixing up the article I allude to, with my own experience: apologies if so.

Gerd Stern was a wild-man, mad-artist "beat" from SFran, & his art was far out to some of us then, heavily edited to keep the eye quick, and as part of its "epater le bourgeois" address. I think portions of human anatomy not usually seen in movies (back then) were in the film and caused some scandal. This may have prepared Oregonian conservative hearts and minds to turn into a ton of bricks a year or so later when an issue of NWR was declared blasphemous, obscene and treasonable, by powers-that-were, & got the editorial staff (of which I'd been a member), canned.

This period is increasingly interesting to me--where the 50s and the 60s meet in teeter-totter fashion--and I hope this note, though fragmentary, will bring further testimony. As to the Seven Stray Cats, of them I recall nothing. Anyone got a dish of cream re them? David

↑ Index

328. Laura E. Wright
Re: je est un autre
Thu 13 Aug 1998

My word-processing spell check translates "je" as "Joe." I propose we adopt joe as the universal pronoun.

--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant

Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]

* * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan

* * * * * *

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

329. david bromige

joe est un autre

Thu 13 Aug 1998

JOE EST UN AUTRE, THIS I KNOW
(for Laura Wright)

Joe est un autre, believe you me!
A dude more autre there couldn't be.
He thinks so un- & -like the rest,
And anything that you suggest
He may do opposite. O, he's perverse
But what strikes all as even worse,
He has bits missing from his brain.
He says that Portugal's in Spain,
That Spain's in pain, that pain's delight,
That black is white, that day is night,
That night is a lacustrine city,
That he uses words because they're pretty,
Not to be accurate : if this cause woe,
He says So what, those are the breaks.
Yours truly, Joe

↑ Index

330. Jim McCrary

Re: joe est un autre

Thu 13 Aug 1998

---

laura & david....thanks for clearing THAT up...always thought it was Gene est un autre. mccrary

↑ Index

331. Michael Magee
Mullen interview
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Howdy folks, just thought I'd mention that the long interview (2 hrs, & in my copy 30 single spaced pages) which Farah Griffin, Kristen Gallagher and I did w/ Harryette Mullen is now up on the Mullen page at the EPC website. Mullen ranges all over the place and is always fascinating. For those of you who liked the 16 pg excerpt of this interview in COMBO 1 I'd say its a must. -m.

↑ Index

332. Joe Brennan
Re: je est un autre
Thu 13 Aug 1998

In a message dated 8/13/98 1:51:15 PM Eastern Daylight Time, [redacted] writes:

<<
 My word-processing spell check translates "je" as "Joe." I propose we adopt joe as the universal pronoun.
 >>

I thought it already was.

joe

↑ Index

333. Roger Farr
Chance Operations
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Can anybody suggest or comment on good (esp. free) computer programs useful for chance operation poetry. I'm aware of some anagram generators, and the Dada Engine, but that's about it.

Cheers,

Roger Farr
[redacted]

↑ Index

334. David Kellogg
Bob est un autre
Thu 13 Aug 1998

On Thu, 13 Aug 1998, Joe Brennan wrote:
>
> In a message dated 8/13/98 1:51:15 PM Eastern Daylight Time, [redacted] > writes:
>
> <<
> My word-processing spell check translates "je" as "Joe." I propose we adopt > joe as the universal pronoun.
> >>
>
> I thought it already was.

No joe, that would be "Bob."

As Agent Cooper once asked, "Where does Bob come from?"

Answers: (1) That cannot be revealed.
(2) Maybe Bob is just the name we give to the evil we do.

Cheers,
David
~~~
~~~

etc has done . Poetry still comes with a knot tied in it--for readers--that this is a reading of the poet's "self". Burroughs said that painting had (1950) far surpassed writing--and I'm always still very much with that thot in mind.

it's not deadly to try and remove the self from a discussion of poetry. As I've said--(it was me) if I want to know something of the poet's elf--we can do that over coffee--if I want a poem--I'll read!

TB
(ReMap)

↑ Index

336. toddbaron
Re: <to enter blind carbon>
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Charles Alexander wrote:
>
> At 10:48 AM 8/13/98 -0400, you wrote:
> >Todd --
> >
> >Why get rid of the "self", even only from these discussions? It sounds so > >retro, so Lukacs, I mean, _maybe_ ..... maybe get rid of selfish poetics?
> >or elfin poetics, shellfish ...
>
> Todd didn't suggest getting rid of the "self" from such discussions. Here's > what he said, precisely:
>
> "we need to rid the 'self' from such discussion of poetics--"
>
> which as I read it, suggests that we need to get rid of such discussion of > poetics, or at least banish such discussion from the "self." which I took > as a more interesting suggestion.
>
> charles
>
> charles alexander :: poet and book artist :: [redacted]
> chax press :: alexander writing/design/publishing
> books by artists' hands :: web sites built with care and vision
> http://alexwritdespub.com/chax :: http://alexwritdespub.com

yup! again--"I" is another ... (Rimbaud)

TB

↑ Index

337. MAYHEW
Mayhem,Headgear, sartorial
Thu 13 Aug 1998

I ran through my spell checker an article I just wrote, it suggested I change Mayhew to mayhem (I should have seen that one coming), Heidegger to head-gear, Sartre to Sartorial.

When we got back from Spain, my 3 year old daughter asked me "where did the hotel go?" I told her it was in Spain. The next day I asked her where the hotel was and she said "in the pain," thus anticipating David B' line "Spain is in the pain."

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

338. Safdie Joseph
Re: Joe am another
Thu 13 Aug 1998

> In a message dated 8/13/98 1:51:15 PM Eastern Daylight Time, [redacted] > writes:
> <<
> My word-processing spell check translates "je" as "Joe." I propose we adopt > joe as the universal pronoun.
>
> I thought it already was.

No joe, that would be "Bob."

As Agent Cooper once asked, "Where does Bob come from?"

Answers: (1) That cannot be revealed.
(2) Maybe Bob is just the name we give to the evil we do.

Joe's assertion isn't negated by this information -- all it means is that evil isn't universal . . . (which will come as a great relief to the more theologically minded among us).

Nice little ditty that David cooked up there! I read it as homage . . . people don't realize the tough time we universalists have . . .

Joe (almost finished with _Radical Artifice_) Safdie

↑ Index

339. Mark Weiss
Re: whose emily d?
Thu 13 Aug 1998

Do they have the famous dining room table that sheltered the trysts of Mary Loomis Todd and Emily's brother? Did the docent mention any of that?

At 01:47 PM 8/13/98 -0400, you wrote:
>I spent four years in Amherst and never once went to the "Homestead." The >Homestead is the homey name tagged onto a brass plaque sign in front of The >Emily Dickinson House. It's on Main Street. I lived a stone's throw (the >best form of anecdotal measurement) west on North Pleasant Street. On the >opposite side of the Homestead is Bart's Pizza. It's ok but not spectacular >and my friends and I patronized it mainly because it was on Main Street and >the delivery time was relatively quick. Up the street, indeed uphill, from >the Homestead, is the new police station, Amherst College, and the center of >town (Amherst).
>
>I don't believe any of what I am saying is mentioned in the Susan Howe book.
>This is obviously a political issue, and I will be heard.
>
>There is a tourist shop in the garage of the Emily Dickinson House. There >are books for sale, postcards, booklets, chapbooks, book mementos, >photographs, and key-chains with heavy books on them. I bought three >postcards and didn't send them to anyone.
>
>Down the street from the Emily Dickinson House is a house of no distinction >save the fact that my friend Jack lived there one semester. One night Jack >and his friends had a great party where everyone got really drunk and >stoned. We danced and sang, just like in the Amherst of Emily Dickinson's >time. Then Jack got completely naked and began running around the house. It >was springtime I think.
>
>When the cops showed up they entered without knocking and shot the stereo.

>No, wait, come to think of it they did not shoot the stereo but they did ask >one of us to turn it down. I then began an endless, meaningless, and stupid >cascade of verbal abuse directed at the law officers which was filled with >forgettable things but said quite loudly. On a certain cue, like a trained >pet, I clammed up. The cue was: "if you don't shut the fuck up, we're going >to arrest you." This proved to me that the State is superior in >psychological warfare. I was too weak to resist. It was at that point that >Jack ran into the house, naked as a bluejay.
>
>On the walk to the new police station (to retrieve Jack) we passed the Emily >Dickinson House. It was closed.
>
>The tour of the Homestead begins in the garden. The guide, a middle-aged >woman with an English accent and librarian glasses, spoke with touching >fondness about what Emily grew, where Emily walked, what Emily's niece had >to say about it, and where the barn stood. Apparently, no structure had ever >stood in this portion of Homestead land. In the distance, a man was exiting >the parlor known as Bart's.
>
>If you think the single surviving photograph of Emily Dickinson is pretty >dry and unrevealing, then her house is a crusty supplement indeed to the >photograph. The house has been restored well enough (an Evangelical pastor >with a family of 8 once lived there and they installed four bathrooms) and >we even got to see the narrow steps where Emily sat while her "guests" >played the piano for her but didn't get to meet her. There was a bit of >freakishness about the house, about Emily herself, that was charming. We saw >China. The china was a wedding gift to Emily's parents.
>
>Here is something of note: there is a Seth Thomas clock in Emily's bedroom.
>You may recall that Charles Olson's dad wound a Seth Thomas clock in his >drawers in the living room every day except the 30th of each month.
>
>Emily's original bed has kept quite well over the years. It's a sleigh bed.
>
>The tour guide tells us that Emily asked that all her letters be burned upon >her death. And her poems too I say. No, the guide says, just the letters.
>Well, I'm not going to argue with you I say, but you're completely wrong, a >sham and travesty to the National Park system. She clenches her fists. Her >eyes flare in anger. I make a fart sound with my lips but she has already >succeeded in undermining my confidence. Susan Howe, where are you?
>
>After a spell, some wandering, reading of placards but no taking of >pictures, we leave the house. It's a quite nice Federal style house. Next >door, the home of Emily's brother is being restored. It looks like the >mansion from The Addams Family. It was occupied by the Dickinson family >until 1987, the year I came to Amherst.

>
>As my companion and I walk toward town and past the now-not-quite-as-new >police station, we are diverted by some new public art. Two silhouettes atop >two large rocks and facing each other and making hand gestures, as if >speaking to each other. One silhouette is Emily Dickinson. Beside her is a >plaque explaining that Emily was a poet, lived a stone's throw from the big >stone her shadow now sits upon, and a poem is reprinted too. The opposite >figure? If you guessed Robert Frost, there is a future in public art >awaiting you. He too is gesturing beside the plaque which explains him, his >life, his time in Amherst, his kooky relationship to words, etc.
>
>My companion snaps pictures. She's from California. And I, I turn to the >police station, toward the west, where the course of empire went.
>
>
><<<<<<>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>>
>Daniel Bouchard
>The MIT Press Journals
>Five Cambridge Center
>Cambridge, MA 02142
>
>[redacted]
>phone: [redacted]
> fax: [redacted]
>>>>>>>><<<<<<<<<<<<<<<<
>
>

↑ Index

340. k.a. hehir
Wild Things Call for Submissions
Thu 13 Aug 1998

---

can't remember if i forwarded this already or not. if yes then sorry, i appollogize for the redundancy again.
still,
kievn

A Call for "Wild Things"
>
> In conjunction with "On the H Orizon: bpNichol After Ten"
> An event sponsored by West Coast Line
> Emily Carr Institute of Art and Design
> Granville Island, Vancouver BC
> September 25-26, 1998

For more information contact:
> Glen Lowry, "Wild Things" Co-ordinator email: [redacted]
>
> For information on "On the H Orizon" contact:
> Jacqueline Larson, Managing Editor, West Coast Line, email:
> [redacted]
> phone: 604 - [redacted]
>

As a tribute to bpNichol's enormous contribution to small press publishing, "On the H Orizon: bpNichol After Ten" is putting a call out for publishers and writers to produce what we're calling "Wild Things" (after the title of bp's work in bp, published by Coach House in 1967).

In the spirit of bp's work with small presses & small press networks, we're inviting submissions of chapbooks or ephemeral publications, which we can distribute as part of the event.

SOME GUIDELINES:

All kinds and forms of text are welcome.*

Publishers: choose a writer whose work extends a bp poetics; writers: produce something of your own in tribute to bp.*

Print run: 25 copies, lettered A-Z (excluding H).*

Optional: designate the text somewhere as "An H Project."*

West Coast Line will sell them at the conference at $5 each (50% to the publisher, 50% for the conference costs). All unsold copies will be returned.*

DEADLINES: Please contact Glen Lowry with intent to contribute ASAP. In order to qualify for inclusion, Wild Things must be received by September 18th.

For more information contact:

> Glen Lowry, "Wild Things" Co-ordinator email: [redacted]
>
> For information on "On the H Orizon" contact:
> Jacqueline Larson, Managing Editor, West Coast Line, email:
> [redacted]
> phone: 604 - [redacted]
>
> "Wild Things" is designated by West Coast Line as "An H Project" in honour of bpNichol

↑ Index

341. toddbaron
Re: je est un autre
Thu 13 Aug 1998

---

david bromige wrote:
>
> I always understood that as saying that by the time your poem is being > read, someone else is inhabiting the space of your written "I". That the > poet's written "I" is a construct that must make room for another.
>
> And I also thought it meant that who-one-is. is as strange as anything else > writing touches upon. And also, "to you, I am a you." And then . . .
>
> "Because I would not stop for Death" .. .is a composite of ED(whatever one > discovers or conjectures concerning her), oneself (or "one's elf" as > amusingly put by parties to this discussion), the condition of being an I > (which is not comnpletely an historical determination, that is, we are > species AND we are new), as another New Englander has it, "As soon as/I > speak, I/speaks."
>
> A rider : the other day, a friend defined _I love you_ as "I would die for > you." Otherwise, it shouldn't be said, he said. !! I'm intrigued how this > attaches to "I is an other."
>
> Perhaps Rimbaud was feeling the Otherness of language, too. That one is > othered by language, even as one is created of it. One goes to speak > but--the words are already in the way. "I can feel my eye/breaking." But > then there's Whitman's sense of I, "I am there with you in your kayak"--of > which Lawrence makes such hay in _Studies in Classical American Literature_

> .
>
> However all this may/not be (for you or for me), the poetic act is the > apparently ungrammatical "est" in lieu of "suis," the separation that > prevents the knee-jerk assumption of what must always follow "je". It's a > fissure thru which l/sp/eak volumes. It's the necessary act of > transgression that stops habit and opens thought, it's the poetic. David yes--and the poetic is the tension/between.

Todd

↑ Index

342. toddbaron
Re: <to enter blind carbon>
Thu 13 Aug 1998

David W. McFadden wrote:
>
> [redacted] writes:
> >yup! again--"I" is another ... (Rimbaud)
> "Anyone, provided that he can be amusing, has the right to talk about > himself" (Baudelaire).
> dwm

"either this wallpaper goes or I do....."

Wilde.

You'd better be damned amusing to speak of yourself!

↑ Index

343. George Bowering
Re: Al Filreis
Thu 13 Aug 1998

What is going on here?

For years there has been a fake name in my address book (for reasons I wont reveal), : Al Fileres.

What's happening?

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,

Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

344. Tom Beard
Re: location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

> a question posed to the group:
>
> how does "location" (the "local" --Olson)
> affect or help affect yr writing?

It's been very important to me. The only long sequence (and I mean long both in terms of # of lines and the time over which it was/is being written) that I have attempted has the idea of location at its core. I wonder whether this is a tendency that others have noticed: my sequence (Urban Songs) evolved as a response or reaction to sequences by Olson, James K. Baxter, Leigh Davis and Dinah Hawken, all of which have a strong sense of engaging with location.

I started Urban Songs not so much to write _about_ my location, but with the hope that all of its concerns (ambition, desire, poetics, technology, friendship) would inevitably be _of_ my location. And the location of the sequence is somewhat fluid: I moved from Wellington to Auckland and back while writing it, so the location represents a superimposition of these two cities upon "the idea of the city".

In New Zealand, the idea of location has been central to the arts for much of this century, with "location" being equated with "landscape". But the last few decades have seen this equation breaking down, and I've been interested in the way that "location" (and "home") is now seen as being inscribed by culture; by economic, electronic, emotional and intellectual networks. I've lived in about six flats since I started the sequence, but there is a sense in which the poem's location remains constant. Of course, factors such as geography, climate and history leave unavoidable traces on the poems, but not to the extent that they do in the Maximus poems.

Perhaps the centrality of location in one's work is related to one's sense of that location's otherness. Mid-century pakeha poets were obsessed with their location because it was so distant from Europe, that being the centre of the universe at the time. I imagine that many have consciously set out to write about the "ordinariness" of where they live, but the idea of location as a poetic concern might be more likely to occur to someone who is aware that their home is different from the norm.

Tom Beard.

↑ Index

345. Tosh
Re: location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

Overall it doesn't matter to the reader, but for the writer, well, that's another matter. My best writing place is in the tub - of course writing by hand. After the soak, I use the computer to jazz up the rhymes and limes, and then I leave for another country. Japan is good, because there you can write about the four seasons. I like the Fall, because it is full of regret,and the spring is good too for promise. Of course then comes the dreaded winter - and that becomes - as we know - deadly. Summer I guess is for vacation - therefore useless for poetry! Yes, one can imagine me writing a poem in a cheap sake bar somewhere in Fukuoka - and damn it, it is that damn poet from NYC who made some deals with the yakuza - that Alan guy. He comes in and says: Why don't you join the FOP list? And I have, and now I am famous in front of billions, and they want more of my poems, my wit, my seasons (except for Summer, which you know...), and at last I can lay my head on the pillow and think of someone else's love.... which of course leads to another poem, story, or at least someone else's list.

In other words, Mr Baron,
ciao,
tb

Tosh Berman
TamTam Books

↑ Index

346. toddbaron
location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

---

a question posed to the group:

how does "location" (the "local" --Olson)
affect or help affect yr writing?

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

?
?
?

↑ Index

347. Michael Magee
Re: location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

For me "location" ("the local" rings in my ear too much of "local color" etc) is the crucial corrective to whatever mythology of myself I might, at any given moment, be entertaining: b/c it implies constraints and privileges, also the flux of experiences re-situating "me" - and most importantly one's location is where one is always reminded that, to quote Nate Mackey, "not only other things but other minds exist." Creeley has this great quote,

"The imagination of a commonwealth must make that sharing literal - there cannot be an invested partiality hidden from the participants...Realize that the general, the we-ness proposed in various realities, may well prove to be this kind. Obviously, any 'we' must, willynilly, submit to the organic orders of its existence: must sleep, must eat, must drink, most move, must die. But that is very nearly the totality of the actual demand. Elsewise, the 'geography leans in,' as Olson put it. Place is a real event - where you are is a law equal to what you are."

So, in this sense community, or the imagination of a community, must be located - otherwise, as Creeley says elsewhere, "the general" (abstract, universal) might become "the General" (Patton, MacArthur).

-m.

at According to toddbaron: > > a question posed to the group: > > how does "location" (the "local" --Olson) > affect or help affect yr writing?
>
>
> Todd Baron
> (ReMap)
>
>
> ?
> ?
> ?
>

↑ Index

348. Gwyn McVay
piercing misreading (was location)
Fri 14 Aug 1998

Michael Magee, I read

> ("the local" rings in my ear

as a fashion statement--where "ring" is what an / earbob does--

bests
Gwyn McVay

↑ Index

349. Michael Magee
Re: piercing misreading (was location)
Fri 14 Aug 1998

Well, if I were wearing rings in my ear they would indeed be local rings, though I'd be thinking of them globally. :) -m.

According to Gwyn McVay:
>
> Michael Magee, I read
>
>
> >>>("the local" rings in my ear
>
> as a fashion statement--where "ring" is what an / earbob does--
>
>
> bests
> Gwyn McVay
>

↑ Index

350. Jordan Davis
collation, collation, collation
Fri 14 Aug 1998

Living in tenements has helped me appreciate the rage for palimpsests. J

↑ Index

351. Maria Damon

Re: Bob est un autre/ joe est un mama

Fri 14 Aug 1998

---

i vote for joe as the more versatile. when i taught briefly at a lockup facility for kids one of the ways they circumvented the rule against "inappropriate use of the word 'mother'" (i kid you not) was the following: knock knock. who's there? joe. joe who? JO MAMA!!! whereon they'd collapse in giggles at having snuck one over on their jailer/teachers. it was quite adorable.

At 4:13 PM -0400 8/13/98, David Kellogg wrote:
>On Thu, 13 Aug 1998, Joe Brennan wrote:
>>
>> In a message dated 8/13/98 1:51:15 PM Eastern Daylight Time, >>[redacted] >> writes:
>>
>> <<
>> My word-processing spell check translates "je" as "Joe." I propose we adopt >> joe as the universal pronoun.
>> >>
>>
>> I thought it already was.
>
>No joe, that would be "Bob."
>
>As Agent Cooper once asked, "Where does Bob come from?"
>
>Answers: (1) That cannot be revealed.
> (2) Maybe Bob is just the name we give to the evil we do.
>
>Cheers,
>David
>~~~

352. charles alexander
Re: location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

local as in low-cal

and where are we or was that I?

too thin
to notice

any way

I is where I does

to say nothing of the poem neither here nor there

↑ Index

353. Laura E. Wright
Re: location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

toddbaron wrote:

> a question posed to the group:
>
> how does "location" (the "local" --Olson)
> affect or help affect yr writing?

Todd: Here is an excerpt from a still raw (read rough draft) translation of Michaux (thanks to Anselm), which speaks to my experience of location. Location is a changing constant (does that make it an everpresent variable?) and thus always influential, always useful. What's really interesting to me is the location within oneself (or joe's self) that external locations and situations may affect. For instance, the ugliest wallpaper in the world, found in a Las Vegas hotel, does something to the mind which then goes its own ways...

The Michaux:
"There is a place in the body where one prefers to live. It's not the same for everyone. That's normal. But it is normal for many to like to stay in their heads. They go about, of course, move around, from organ to organ, hither and yon, but they like to return often to their heads."
--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *

"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
* * * * * *

"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

354. Henry Gould
Re: location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

---

how does it go:

Pull down thy vanity, I say pull down
the green casque has outdone thy elegance learn from the green world what can be thy place in scrolled invention or true artistry

- seems like there's sort of a triangle between the local of the poem, the local of the author, and the local place. a lot of playing with that: "little Rhody", the smallest state in the union, is also the rose island of the poem, and so on. but these things happen with or without conscious planning. the interesting writer makes interesting things "take place"...

history is local - local times, local places; THIS place, THIS time - and every place is what it is with respect to various global or universal qualities, so every place leads to other places... with their own unique fate...

I wrote a poem set in a place called "Paradise" (a neighborhood near Newport RI), and related it to another neighborhood of Petersburg Russia with the same name. The poem was a take-off on some Mandelstam octets, & dedicated to a Petersburg poet, to whom I had given a toy boat once (boats are important symbols in Petersburg). a few years later I found a picture of Mandelstam taken in Petersburg in 1905. He's holding a toy boat.

- Henry G

↑ Index

355. toddbaron
Re: location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

Tom: thanks for yr insight. Could you explain "pakeha" poets? I'm lost.

↑ Index

356. toddbaron
Re: location location location
Fri 14 Aug 1998

---

charles alexander wrote:
>
> local
> as in low-cal
>
> and where are > we > or > was that I?
>
> too thin
> to notice
>
> any > way
>
> I is > where
> I does
>
> to say > nothing

> of the > poem
>
> neither > here nor > there

re: the dreaded "I" (other) located in. location in. loco motion in. so that --the view or the viewer's (er's) eye?

neither here nor there?

↑ Index

357. Henry G
sorry Ez
Fri 14 Aug 1998

The ant's a centaur in his dragon world.
Pull down thy vanity, it is not man
Made courage, or made order, or made grace.
    Pull down thy vanity, I say pull down.
Learn of the green world what can be thy place
In scaled invention or true artistry,
Pull down thy vanity,
                Paquin pull down!
The green casque has outdone your elegance.

SCALED invention. that's much better.

art from "ars" from "to fit together"

↑ Index

358. Robert Corbett
Millennium Spellchecks
Fri 14 Aug 1998

My office's version of word's spell checker doesn't recognize "remediation" as a word. Perhaps appropriate in age of downsized education (i.e. reduced access). But what it suggests in place of "remediation" is a further clue to its microsoft's agenda: "redemption." I guess if you can't get education, it is wise to have god on your side.

robert

↑ Index

359. Macgregor S Card
Spring-cum-Summer Germ is here
Fri 14 Aug 1998

 Listgoers ***

The summer issue of _THE GERM: A Journal of Poetic Research_ has arrived. 240 pages (yet strangely, a great deal more intimate than most telephone books), featuring:

) Previously uncollected work of James Schuyler) The postage-stamp cartographies of artist Joyce Lightbody) New work from the German poet Elfriede Czurda, translated by Rosmarie Waldrop) Reviews from Marjorie Perloff (on Mac Wellman), Cole Swensen (on Peter Gizzi), Michelle Delville (on Madeleine Gins)

) New work from Bernadette Mayer, Rod Smith, Lisa Isaacson, Anne Waldman, George Albon, Devin Johnston, Nathaniel Mackey, Elizabeth Robinson, Ray DiPalma, Aaron Shurin, David Trinidad, Lisa Samuels, Anne Tardos, Chris Stroffolino, Albert Mobilio, Gale Nelson, Anne Talvaz, Lewis Warsh, Beth Anderson, Jay Dillemuth, Richard Kostelanetz, Amy England, Brian Schorn, Gregory Vincent St. Thomasino, and others.

_____

Single issues are $6. Subscription rates: $12 for two issues / $20 for four / $28 for six. Make checks payable to "The Germ" and send to either of our addresses:

Macgregor Card
P.O. Box 2543
Providence, RI 02906

Andrew Maxwell
P.O. Box 8501
Santa Cruz, CA 95061

We are also distributed by Bernhard DeBoer and Small Press Distribution.

_____

 We are always reading submissions--will respond in 6 weeks. Book reviews, prosody, poesy, serial works, graphic musical scores--all is welcome. We try to publish no fewer than 5 pages from each contributor, and no more than 20. Please post to BOTH addresses, as this will ensure the most careful and bipartisan consideration of your work. Thanks! ***

Issue #3 (due out mid-fall) already includes:) Lengthy excerpt from John Ashbery's new work, "Girls on the Run") Photo/poetry interplay: Michael Palmer and Ben Watkins.) New work from Jean Donnelly, John Latta, Linda Vorris and many others.

New campaign from the Complaints Department: A response in six weeks!

The Germ is published by the Poetic Research Bloc, a nonprofit foundation. Donations are tax-deductible and welcome.

Thanks,
Macgregor Card & Andrew Maxwell, eds.

↑ Index

360. David W. McFadden
Re: <to enter blind carbon>
Sat 15 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>You'd better be damned amusing
>to speak of yourself!
It's settled then. There is nothing amusing about someone speaking of himself, unless there is the sense that he has no choice but to do so.
dwm

↑ Index

361. trbell
Re: Pound, techne, Jones, Heidegger
Sat 15 Aug 1998

I've been off the list for awhile, so may have missed some discussion. but I'm not sure I follow the distinction you are drawing here - it seems more like apples and oranges: Pound and Jones would assume there is "something soul-like" that they are trying to "catch." I would see the others as being concerned with the poem as instrument or "techne" without considering whether or not there is a "something" there and the poem need not be "machinic" as one can weave with a loom or with one's hands. Related to this there is a new theory that homo sapiens brain development is based on the need to manipulate using the hands to survive.

tom bell

At 07:36 PM 8/12/98 -0400, you wrote:
>I'll chirp in here.
>

>For both Pound and Jones, I believe 'techne' is a form of weaving over >the surface of something soul-like and essentailly spiritual, a catching
>of those shadows:
> And the small stars now fall from the olive branch,
> Forked shadow falls dark on the terrace
> More black than the floating martin (EP, Canto XLVII)
>
>For Williams, 'techne' is more mahinic, the poem being a machine made of >words: 'techne' becomes 'method'. And this seems a pretty clear line >through Creeley and Olson to Bernstein. I think the notion of poetry or >language as an instrumental extension of the senses useful for making >discoveries otherwise not-detectable seems to me a very American, very >pragmatic take on how or why one writes.
>
>So as far as this history goes, Pound is on Henry's side; Williams etc >aligns with Dewey etc.
>
>Don Wellman
>
>

↑ Index

362. trbell

Metaphoric or metonymic < blind carbon>

Sat 15 Aug 1998

I think the dichotomy of emotion vs. no emotion, particularly as applied to "self" is unfortunate as it tends to gloss over some crucial (for me, at least) issues. When I draw a black cloud or use "black cloud" in a poem it may have some relation to a feeling that might be called "anger" but this need not be a "self-expression." It's more appropriately seen as a step in the process of discovering a feeling that might turn out to be "anger." Catharsis has been pretty much discarded professionally (from my view), becase self-expression in this sense does _not lead to any change, although the action of expression (the gesture of writing or drawing) does do all kinds of interesting things, including at times finding the "self", if there is such a thing. Unfortunately the lay public has not been apprized of this - ?not a convenient sound bite concept for the media?

To return to my 'black cloud" I think the distinction I am trying to express goes back to R.Jakobson's theory of the importance of the metaphor/metonym distinction: a black cloud is like an expression of anger vs. black cloud (.) anger.

Todd - I may have gotten carried away and off the track here - don't mean to use you as a straw man.

tom bell

At 08:17 PM 8/13/98 +0000, Todd Baron wrote: >seeing as the "self" has been a dangerous tool for so much >(terrorism--today--government selves--a poetcis that is still hampered >by "a spontaneous overflow of emotion) and that I feel akin to the >visual arts as much if not more often than so much poetry--and those >visual or plastic arts of--as I sd Duchamp--and such--the focus needs to >be on LANGUAGE not the self that thinks it is representing a sense or >emotion or even thot. I think Charle's work is so much more >interesting--and that of course "I" am not saying that we have no >selves--only that our art needs to extend itself the way that film, >sculpture, painting, assembladge, etc has done . Poetry still comes with >a knot tied in it--for readers--that this is a reading of the poet's >"self". Burroughs said that painting had (1950) far surpassed >writing--and I'm always still very much with that thot in mind.
>
>it's not deadly to try and remove the self from a discussion of poetry.
>As I've said--(it was me) if I want to know something of the poet's >elf--we can do that over coffee--if I want a poem--I'll read!
>
>TB
>(ReMap)
>
>

↑ Index

363. toddbaron
Re: Metaphoric or metonymic < blind carbon>
Sat 15 Aug 1998

---

trbell wrote:
>
> I think the dichotomy of emotion vs. no emotion, particularly as > applied to "self" is unfortunate as it tends to gloss over some > crucial (for me, at least) issues. When I draw a black cloud or > use "black cloud" in a poem it may have some relation to a feeling > that might be called "anger" but this need not be a "self-expression."
> It's more appropriately seen as a step in the process of discovering > a feeling that might turn out to be "anger." Catharsis has been pretty > much discarded professionally (from my view), becase self-expression in > this sense does _not lead to any change, although the action of > expression (the gesture of writing or drawing) does do all kinds > of interesting things, including at times finding the "self", if > there is such a thing. Unfortunately the lay public has not been > apprized of this - ?not a convenient sound bite concept for the > media?

>
> To return to my 'black cloud" I think the distinction I am trying > to express goes back to R.Jakobson's theory of the importance of > the metaphor/metonym distinction: a black cloud is like an > expression of anger vs. black cloud (.) anger.
>
> Todd - I may have gotten carried away and off the track here - > don't mean to use you as a straw man.
>
> tom bell
>
>
"ok--I'm straw" but remember also that Jakobson said "literature is organzied violence commited on ordinary speech" --so that yr "cloud" is never yr cloud. (.)

TB

↑ Index

364. Marcella Durand
Zinc Bar
Sat 15 Aug 1998

Tomorrow, Sunday, Aug. 16th

Brian Lucas

&

surprise guest at the Zinc Bar

6:30 pm
90 W. Houston St.
btwn Laguardia & Thompson Manhattan

↑ Index

365. Alan Jennifer Sondheim
_the continuity girl_
Sun 16 Aug 1998

-

the continuity girl

Michel Serres, Panoptic Theory, in The Limits of Theory, ed. Thomas M. Kavanagh:

"[...]

"I shall call poor that which has no object. Myth has no object, nor does theater or politics.

"We had few objects in the past, long ago, once upon a time. This state of a humanity with few things has not been erased from our memory. Poor in things, our wealth then consisted of men. We spoke only of them and of their relations. We lived in and on our relations. I call myth poor, then, without objects. I call poor the theater, deprived of things; theories are poor; politics is poor. Our philosophies are poor and miserable. Our human scien- ces are poor.

"[...]

"The proliferation of objects, the exponential deluge of things, has led us to forget the time of their absence. And that time now seems to us so old! Archaic, antediluvian - yes, mythic. Our myths and our philosophies tell us about that time. Memories of places where lovers were watched in an empty and resonant space, where no one ever thought of eating. Thus philosophies that lack objects (almost all of them), philosophies that derive their val- ues only from the human sciences (almost all of them), are aged and poor. They seem so old to us that we read them as we read myths. One might think they were politics, or theater, or magic. Whenever, by chance, they come upon an object, they change it, by the stroke of a magic wand, into a rela- tion, into language, into representation.

"[...]"

Yes, Alan, you have almost come to life, almost carrying one or another name across one or another myth, traveling across one or another text, one or another philosophy. _the continuity girl_ holds you in check, just as others are held by you, tight against your thin chest, Nikuko, Jennifer, Julu, and myself included; it is my duty as your continuation to ensure, not the pro- liferation of objects, but of emergences governed, not by an unrequited pov- erty, but by the fullness of the real as language becomes languaging, as magic issues forth its own dominions.

Not ever deprived of things or relations, tissues or words which dream themselves into existence, far beyond the hypertextual - it is _the continuity girl_ whose long fingers write your head into your head, your arms into your arms, legs into your legs - _the continuity girl_ writing Jennifer into Jen- nifer, Julu into Julu, Nikuko into Nikuko, and with a swirl of a skirt and a toss of hair, the invagination of Alan, dare she say it, and the further emergence of a philosophy, and a theater - yes a theater, and a politics, dare she say it, yes, a politics, and a philosophy and a theater and one theory and another theory, and still one more theory, in addition, and still yet a theory once again and once more.

Because _the continuity girl_ is everywhere at once, she is nowhere at all; because she garners the script, she speaks from experience; because she reads from memory, she improvises what is the thought that one or another is thinking,

Because she ensures that the thought continues into the thought, that the I continues through the I, that one eye sees what the other eye sees, with just the slightest difference -

That histories are memorizations and lists and forgotten names, just as Julu and Jennifer and Alan and Nikuko will be forgotten - that histories are mo- ments and slights of hand, just as _the continuity girl_ is a magic powder and a poultice, or a patch and a plaster - just as there are cures for the body ailing, and aches that never go away -

Just the memory of _the continuity girl,_ just the hair and fingers, eyes and mouth, hands and legs, arms and feet of _the continuity girl,_ just as the face is an other, face is always already an other, face of _the contin- uity girl,_ circling and the cycling of the script, pagination and collat- ing of the script, as she writes this -

Ensuring the one to the one, other to the other, ensuring the one to the other, other to the one -

Naming, forgetting, naming - just as there are almost objects coming into the world, almost a pleasure in theory or philosophy; just as there is almost a pleasure in the reading and the writing; just as there is almost a belief in the one and the other, and the value of speech and the meaning among them; just so _the continuity girl_

That there be a striving or a mourning, that there is a mourning one is born into and within, a _mourning already in place_ ...

[...]

↑ Index

366. joel lewis
Re: location location location
Sun 16 Aug 1998

ulp! as New Jersey's unoffical poetic goodwill ambassadcor to the western world, i suppose i should toss in my 2 zlotys on the lidea of location.

i guess i might be the only list member who lives about ten miles from where he grew up and have remained in this locale much of my life.

Certainly Williams and, soon after, Olson became key mentors and both taught me to look down the block and see what was going on.

Location is important to me as both as a writer and a reader. I'm less intersted in local color than affinity for place. After working most of my adult life in NYC, i know work out of home and teach in Jersey and find that the local and location is flooding much of my writing.

In the early 90's, I did an anthology of NJ poets for Rutgers University Press that did well and got much publicity. I kept meeting people (some are students) who read the book and got into poetry as it addressed their world and, in a way, demystified writing and the "subject" of writing.

Am I an oddity these days? Probably. I read in Seattle a few years back and after an evening of work that invokes the tissue of North Jersey (ranging White Mana Hamburgers to Robert Smithson's Great Notch quarry), a poet came up and said that he found it strange to here someone read about a place he knew so well. "In Seattle", I recall him saying, "Everyone is from someplace else, and here."

Joel Lewis

"The Jersey Kid"

↑ Index

367. joel lewis
kenneth koch on the www
Sun 16 Aug 1998

saw that kenneth koch is the featured poet on the usually cubed "Poetry Daily" (www.poems.com)

"you should read kenneth koch, even if you don't like him"
--- Ted Berrigan (1980)

joel lewis

↑ Index

368. R I Caddel

Scully's Steps

Mon 17 Aug 1998

STEPS, by Maurice Scully, (Reality Street Editions, six pounds fifty, ISBN 1-874400-15-6) plops onto the breakfast table, and is wonderful. It's the penultimate section of Scully's five-volume LIVELIHOOD (of which THE BASIC COLOURS, Pig Press, is also part), and continues preoccupations of earlier sections: observational, personal and economical survival. Scully revises and revises his work so that the parts really do relate to the longer whole, and little echoes run up and down the set each time a new bit appears. The range of forms, as in any of Scully's work, is great, as in exciting, including extended lyric tempered by angry rant, sonnets that aren't, and little nursery rhyme bits: and it coheres ok, as they say, there's a dynamism in the rhythm and the sound which is worth celebrating. Here's a short bit which should reproduce ok in e-form:

RESPONSIBILITY

Washing her clothes in a rusty old wheelbarrow by the dam by the track under the eucalyptus where the frogs at night fill the village air with/her bright brown eyes and mouth connect in a smile whose radiance and playfulness the fine skin black/I thought I could get to know almost everything once not quite yet feeling the bounce in the net
(The Oxford English Dictionary of Spraints, The Pretoria Encyclopaedia of Mortgages, The Concise Cambridge Political), when arcane thinking clicks in its conduit. Tap: "an artist is _never_ poor." Swallow that.

_____

RC

↑ Index

369. Maria Damon

many queries

Mon 17 Aug 1998

---

if anyone has up-to-date e-mail and/or snail mail addresses for the following folks, please let me know what they are thanks in advance:

Alvin Aubert
Amiri Baraka
Paul Beatty
Bruce Cheney
Andrei Codrescu
Wanda Coleman
Conyus
Stephen Cope
Gregory Corso
Pierre Delattre
Justin Desmangles
Diane DiPrima
Brent Edwards
Steve Evans
Erika Hunt
Roderick Iverson
Darius James
Ted Joans
Pierre Joris
Philip Lamantia
Clarence Major
Devorah Major
Reginald Major
Kaye McDonough
E. Ethelbert Miller
Aldon Nielsen
Claude Pélieu
Ronald Radano
Ishmael Reed
Franklin Rosemont
A. B. Spelman
Jacqueline Starer
Cecil Taylor

↑ Index

370. Maria Damon
call for papers/Kaufman
Mon 17 Aug 1998

please distribute this as widely as possible, thanks all

CALL FOR PAPERS

for a special issue of Callaloo devoted to the poet

BOB KAUFMAN

Creative work or scholarly essays, personal reminiscences, tributes, work placing Kaufman's work in the various contexts in which he wrote and lived. Essays that engage the multi-dimensionality of Kaufman's significance are especially welcome, as are poems and other imaginative work that evince his influence implicitly or explicitly. We are concerned to present the fullest possible profile and the "thickest" description of the poet, the work, and the historical/cultural milieu in which he participated, as well as presenting some of the ways in which his work and example have influenced contemporary writers and writing; thus a diversity of approaches (interdisciplinary, comparative, theoretical, historical) is particularly encouraged.

Manuscripts up to 30 typewritten, double-spaced pages should follow the latest edition of The MLA Style Manual and should be sent to Special Issue Editor:
Maria Damon
English Department
207 Lind Hall
207 Church Street SE
University of Minnesota
Minneapolis MN 55455-0134

Deadline for creative work is June 1, 1999.
Deadline for scholarly work is September 1, 1999.

↑ Index

371. Trevor Joyce
Re: Scully's Steps
Mon 17 Aug 1998

> STEPS, by Maurice Scully, (Reality Street Editions, six pounds fifty, ISBN 1-874400-15-6) plops onto the breakfast table, and is wonderful. It's the penultimate section of Scully's five-volume LIVELIHOOD (of which THE BASIC COLOURS, Pig Press, is also part), and continues preoccupations of earlier sections: observational, personal and economical survival. Scully revises and revises his work so that the parts really do relate to the longer > whole, and little echoes run up and down the set each time a new bit appears. The range of forms, as in any of Scully's work, is great, as in exciting, including extended lyric tempered by angry rant, sonnets that aren't, and little nursery rhyme bits: and it coheres ok, as they say, there's a dynamism in the rhythm and the sound which is worth celebrating.

I'll second this, with knobs on, as my mother used to say. It's beautiful stuff, delicately worked at the level of the miniature, and totally convincing in its broad sweep. The sooner the whole Livelihood set sees the light together, the better, but this'll do to be getting on with.

****

Trevor Joyce
Apple Cork IS&T
Phone : [redacted]
EMail : [redacted]

****

↑ Index

372. Laura E. Wright
Re: oogling
Mon 17 Aug 1998

Safdie Joseph wrote:

> I like your translation quite a bit (and Michaux, and Ted's appropriation of Michaux). I find Todd Baron to be sloppy and stupid, though. By the way,I think that one of the reasons some of us had problems with the original project of langpo was the tendency of its founders to live exclusively in their heads.

Thanks. I am a relatively recent (2 years ago?) convert to The Cult of Ted as Andrew Schelling once called it. I did my undergraduate work in music performance and had never read Berrigan before I came to Naropa! (now that's confessional)

I feel sorry for Todd Baron -- he seems puppy-like in his desires, probably lonely. He probably means well, though that's hardly an excuse.

Living in one's head... well, as in many cases, it's fine if one does it superbly. (I think Michaux pulls it off -- but his is far from a self-centered or confessional "I.")

> Which brings me to ogling. I looked it up in my Skeats and the etymology is from Dutch, of all places -- wait'll you hear this -- from _oogen_, "to cast sheepes eyes upon one" -- cf. Low German (low, of course!)_oegen_ to look > at! Cognate with "eye"

"sheepes eyes"?! for some reason this reminds me of a phrase my sister and I used in our childhood -- googly babies (those were the unpleasantly noisy and wet ones)

> So EYE thank you for your comment about same. I love to look at women, actually, but mostly, I love to look. Didn't Wallace Stevens write a poem called "The Pleasures of Merely Seeing"? If he didn't he should have.

I had an interesting (to me at least) exchange once with Randy Roark (do you know him?) -- I said a reading Cole Swensen gave was sexy, and he said he agreed but felt he couldn't make a comment like that without being perceived as sexist. Now, I consider myself feminist, and this seems wrong. Harassment lines get drawn all over the place... and having been sexually harassed before, I have strong feelings about it. But there's plenty that's still _not_ harassment. It's too fascist to say that men can't talk about x, y, or z. Sometimes I don't think I can stand to live another minute in a Puritan country such as this one.If people call everything remotely titillating harassment, it's belittling to real cases.

> . How much
> of that translation have you done?

I probably have 30 pages left (guesstimate). Plus Anselm's commentary, corrections, suggestions, etc. He's really the co-translator, and without everything he's put in, the work would be mediocre at best. It's quite an honor (and a blast) to work with him. With Michaux, sometimes I feel an eerie mind-meld sort of connection. This may sound grim, but I enjoy the frankness with which he examines the undersides of the mind. I've spent some time in the nether regions of depression, and find that true horror is pretending that the black holes (or heffalump traps as I used to refer to them) aren't there.

Drinking too much coffee in the library
(after drinking too much beer on Saturday), Laura
--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]

* * * * * *
"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
* * * * * *
"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

373. Laura E. Wright
ooooops
Mon 17 Aug 1998

---

ooops. sorry. guilty of imprecision...

--
Laura Wright
Library Assistant
Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
2130 Arapahoe Ave
Boulder, CO 80302
[redacted]
* * * * * *
"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
* * * * * *
"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein

↑ Index

374. R M Daley
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Mon 17 Aug 1998

On Mon, 17 Aug 1998, toddbaron wrote:

> Laura E. Wright wrote:
>
> Safdie Joseph wrote:
>
> I like your translation quite a bit (and Michaux, and Ted's appropriation of Michaux). I find Todd Baron to be sloppy and stupid, though. By the way,I think that one of the reasons some of us had problems with the original project of langpo was the tendency of its founders to live exclusively in their heads.
>
> I feel sorry for Todd Baron -- he seems puppy-like in his desires, probably > lonely. He probably means well, though that's hardly an excuse.

>
> Living in one's head... well, as in many cases, it's fine if one does it superbly. (I think Michaux pulls it off -- but his is far from a self-centered or confessional "I.")
>
> Laura
> --
> Laura Wright
> Library Assistant
> Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
> 2130 Arapahoe Ave
> Boulder, CO 80302
> [redacted]
> * * * * * *
> "
>
> OK--enough. FIRST --these two remarks have nothing to do with this list. I have NO idea what they are even responding to--and they sure as hell sound like attacks on a "self" (mine). I seek to ONLY discuss poetics on this list--and these two statements are hopefully not "poetics".
>
> SECOND: IF you two are responding to my rejection of a poetics that centers itself around a single "I"--then it's seemingly fitting that my argument finds voice in two "I" responses--with so very little specificity in them.
>
> YIKES. Lay off!
>
> Todd Baron
>
> (NOT lonely--and no dog...)
>
> ps: A friend states that e-mail is too quick--yr foot falls in yr mouth. I suggest we often READ what we write before we send it!)

todd-- yeah, looks like these backchanneling attempts get confused sometimes-sad thing about librarians isnt it, always confusing public, private, when everyone already knows you (the universal YOU)should just keep QUIET!!!

love to all, in disgust

rd

↑ Index

375. Simon DeDeo

Re: location location location

Mon 17 Aug 1998

[A few subscription problems -- this e-mail is a little out of date, since the location thread was a while (a few days?) ago, but 'thought it might be of interest.]

I think my position is similar to Tom's on this one. I grew to a consciousness of writing when I lived in New Hampshire, where the most interesting things happen when (speaking broadly, as always) man collides with his location in nature and society. Given the state of much of our developed land -- essentially interchangable units arrayed in mutating sequence -- I wonder if the attention to location is disappearing, or, rather, appearing as an atavism. Feeling as if I was engaging in some unconscious nostalgia at the time, I look back at the "postitioned" work I did then and wonder how much is worthwhile. I remember looking at Plath's Ariel in a seminar, and hearing someone make the comment that the first few stanzas are Plath still trying to write "vivid description" (a commen that was supposed to be critical), and only reaching a more "metaphysical" plain/plane in the later lines; it's an interesting comment, one that I was resistant to at the time, and I wonder if its true that a poem must eventually escape position in such a direct manner.

Pound's _Cantos_, in passing, seem to me to be an amazing way to unite a postmodern notion of the decay of a Thoreau-like "location" with a feeling of position, of some kind of connection to a particular physical reality.

Moving from the theoretical to the practical act of writing and creation of a poetic "landscape" in the most general sense, I think where one is at a particular time can have an enormous positive effect on the work itself. When I write, what emerges after revision is a space that in many ways maps almost topologically to an experience of a place, mirroring in some way my inhabitation of it, and the accidents of coming to know it.

Below, for anyone who's made it this far, is a draft of a work drawn from that little blue sign in Harvard Square that marks Anne Bradstreet's residence, with thanks to John Berryman.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html

[redacted]

Entering the site of the former residence of Anne Bradstreet

Varnish in layers laid on the hardwood floor.
In empty rooms, where barefoot one might feel
the anonymous grit warm in years of occupation,

I charade my guide, keeping two steps behind with meditations on the brass doorknobs
and the crumbled paint in a pile by the door.

I have made numerous telephone calls, perjured
and damned myself to spend a quarter hour --
how the hour ticks, now -- in observation.
Agitated, my guide drops the stormwindow
and enquires into my deeper motives.
The distance to the street is immense.

We exchange cards, mine as fradulent
as Al Capone's, and I linger on the stair awkward as the local tough thieving roses for the virgin in the mansion in the city on the hill. Vain, vain, vanity
all. But the marble here is cold.

↑ Index

376. P.Standard Schaefer
CONS CONFERENCE
Mon 17 Aug 1998

THE 2ND ANNUAL CONFERENCE OF THE COLLEGE OF NEGLECTED SCIENCE
celebrating "Generation" and the publication of Ribot 6 (1998) international poets and visual artists over 60, under 30.
Friday-Sunday, October 30-November 1, 1998, Otis College of Art & Design, Los Angeles, featuring publication party, symposia & a masked ball.
More details forthcoming.
Contact: Paul Vangelisti
tel. [redacted] (home) [redacted] (work)
e-mail: [redacted]

↑ Index

377. toddbaron
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Mon 17 Aug 1998

Laura E. Wright wrote:
>
> Safdie Joseph wrote:

>
> > I like your translation quite a bit (and Michaux, and Ted's appropriation > > of Michaux). I find Todd Baron to be sloppy and stupid, though. By the way,I > > think that one of the reasons some of us had problems with the original > > project of langpo was the tendency of its founders to live exclusively in > > their heads.
> >
>
>
>
> I feel sorry for Todd Baron -- he seems puppy-like in his desires, probably > lonely. He probably means well, though that's hardly an excuse.
>
> Living in one's head... well, as in many cases, it's fine if one does it > superbly. (I think Michaux pulls it off -- but his is far from a self-centered > or confessional "I.")
>
> Laura
> --
> Laura Wright
> Library Assistant
> Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
> 2130 Arapahoe Ave
> Boulder, CO 80302
> [redacted]
> * * * * * *
> "

OK--enough. FIRST --these two remarks have nothing to do with this list. I have NO idea what they are even responding to--and they sure as hell sound like attacks on a "self" (mine). I seek to ONLY discuss poetics on this list--and these two statements are hopefully not "poetics".

SECOND: IF you two are responding to my rejection of a poetics that centers itself around a single "I"--then it's seemingly fitting that my argument finds voice in two "I" responses--with so very little specificity in them.

YIKES. Lay off!

Todd Baron

(NOT lonely--and no dog...)

ps: A friend states that e-mail is too quick--yr foot falls in yr mouth. I suggest we often READ what we write before we send it!)

↑ Index

378. George Thompson
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Mon 17 Aug 1998

One of this list's notorious angels once rather notoriously said:

First thought best thought.

I say, Those who live by the first thought will die by the first thought [to paraphrase another rather notorious angel].

George Thompson

> On Mon, 17 Aug 1998, toddbaron wrote:
>
> Laura E. Wright wrote:
>
> Safdie Joseph wrote:
>
> I like your translation quite a bit (and Michaux, and Ted's appropriation > of Michaux). I find Todd Baron to be sloppy and stupid, though. By the way,I > think that one of the reasons some of us had problems with the original > project of langpo was the tendency of its founders to live exclusively in > their heads.
>
> I feel sorry for Todd Baron -- he seems puppy-like in his desires, probably > lonely. He probably means well, though that's hardly an excuse.
>
> Living in one's head... well, as in many cases, it's fine if one does it
> superbly. (I think Michaux pulls it off -- but his is far from a self-centered
> or confessional "I.")
>
> Laura
> --
> Laura Wright
> Library Assistant
> Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
> 2130 Arapahoe Ave
> Boulder, CO 80302
> [redacted]
> * * * * * *

> "
>
> OK--enough. FIRST --these two remarks have nothing to do with this list. I have NO idea what they are even responding to--and they sure as hell sound like attacks on a "self" (mine). I seek to ONLY discuss poetics on this list--and these two statements are hopefully not "poetics".
>
> SECOND: IF you two are responding to my rejection of a poetics that centers itself around a single "I"--then it's seemingly fitting that my argument finds voice in two "I" responses--with so very little specificity in them.
>
> YIKES. Lay off!
>
> Todd Baron
>
> (NOT lonely--and no dog...)
>
> ps: A friend states that e-mail is too quick--yr foot falls in yr mouth. I suggest we often READ what we write before we send it!)
>
> todd--
> yeah, looks like these backchanneling attempts get confused sometimes-sad thing about librarians isnt it, always confusing public, private, when everyone already knows you (the universal YOU)should just keep QUIET!!!
>
> love to all, in disgust
>
> rd

↑ Index

379. Mark Weiss

Re: location location location

Mon 17 Aug 1998

Back to the locus classicus, it's good to remember that when Olson positioned himself as Maximus "of Gloucester" and touted the necessity of the local he was making a decision to swim counter to the current. Prior to then he had been plenty peripatetic, and he certainly continued to be aware of the fragility of "polis." His polis, in fact, had become something of a fiction, even in Gloucester--his reference is to the portuguese fishermen and working-class yankees, who certainly made up the world of Fort Square, and if you only looked seaward I suppose you could screen out the commuter town that the rest of Gloucester was morphing into. What would he have made of the Moonies taking over the canneries? But his stance--his "stand"--involved an active protest, including, for instance, letters to the editor--it was a political action--and poems like "In the face of a Chinese View of the City."

If you stand by the seaward window of Olson's apartment you see the world as imagined in Maximus, from the local, even to the temporally local as witnessed by the weather notations Olson scrawled on the window frame, to the houses of the fishermen, the harbor to the left and the sweep of the beach that fronts the town to the right. And straight out, beyond all that, the bay open to the Atlantic beyond the two wooded arms that enclose it, and outward to the world and the cosmos. It really is an extraordinary, and empowering, view. If you look out the door towards town you see the old yankee spires through a filter of fish-racks. Remember the maps that fronted the three big volumes of Maximus, and the maps sketched out by the position of words on the page in some of the poems, and "I come back to the geography of it,/the land falling off to the left" etc. Those maps, be it noted, are also maps of past configurations, so that the reach outward from that window is four dimensional.

So, the local as a place to stand, to take strength from, perhaps, where one's protest has a chance of being heeded, and a place to look out from, in all the directions. Check out Letter 5, Olson's savaging of Ferrini, which I think draws the issues. "...winds, Ferrini,/which are never 4, which have their grave dangers (as writing does)/just because weather/is very precise to/the quarter it comes from (as writing is,/if it is as good as"

At 04:05 PM 8/17/98 -0400, you wrote:
>[A few subscription problems -- this e-mail is a little out of date, since >the location thread was a while (a few days?) ago, but 'thought it might >be of interest.]
>
>I think my position is similar to Tom's on this one. I grew to a >consciousness of writing when I lived in New Hampshire, where the most >interesting things happen when (speaking broadly, as always) man collides >with his location in nature and society. Given the state of much of our >developed land -- essentially interchangable units arrayed in mutating >sequence -- I wonder if the attention to location is disappearing, or, >rather, appearing as an atavism. Feeling as if I was engaging in some >unconscious nostalgia at the time, I look back at the "postitioned" work I >did then and wonder how much is worthwhile. I remember looking at Plath's >Ariel in a seminar, and hearing someone make the comment that the first >few stanzas are Plath still trying to write "vivid description" (a commen >that was supposed to be critical), and only reaching a more "metaphysical" >plain/plane in the later lines; it's an interesting comment, one that I >was resistant to at the time, and I wonder if its true that a poem must >eventually escape position in such a direct manner.

>
>Pound's _Cantos_, in passing, seem to me to be an amazing way to unite a >postmodern notion of the decay of a Thoreau-like "location" with a feeling >of position, of some kind of connection to a particular physical reality.
>
>Moving from the theoretical to the practical act of writing and creation >of a poetic "landscape" in the most general sense, I think where one is at >a particular time can have an enormous positive effect on the work itself.
>When I write, what emerges after revision is a space that in many ways >maps almost topologically to an experience of a place, mirroring in some >way my inhabitation of it, and the accidents of coming to know it.
>
>Below, for anyone who's made it this far, is a draft of a work drawn from >that little blue sign in Harvard Square that marks Anne Bradstreet's >residence, with thanks to John Berryman.
>
>-- Simon
>
>http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
>[redacted]
>
>
>
>Entering the site of the former residence of Anne Bradstreet
>
>Varnish in layers laid on the hardwood floor.
>In empty rooms, where barefoot one might feel
>the anonymous grit warm in years of occupation,
>I charade my guide, keeping two steps behind
>with meditations on the brass doorknobs
>and the crumbled paint in a pile by the door.
>
>I have made numerous telephone calls, perjured
>and damned myself to spend a quarter hour --
>how the hour ticks, now -- in observation.
>Agitated, my guide drops the stormwindow
>and enquires into my deeper motives.
>The distance to the street is immense.
>
>We exchange cards, mine as fradulent
>as Al Capone's, and I linger on the stair

>awkward as the local tough thieving
>roses for the virgin in the mansion in >the city on the hill. Vain, vain, vanity
>all. But the marble here is cold.
>
>

↑ Index

380. Mark Weiss
Re: oogling
Mon 17 Aug 1998

Looking sheep-eyes at someone is still a current expression, or have I become archaic?

At 12:43 PM 8/17/98 -0600, you wrote:
>Safdie Joseph wrote:
>
>> I like your translation quite a bit (and Michaux, and Ted's appropriation >> of Michaux). I find Todd Baron to be sloppy and stupid, though. By the way,I >> think that one of the reasons some of us had problems with the original >> project of langpo was the tendency of its founders to live exclusively in >> their heads.
>>
>
>Thanks. I am a relatively recent (2 years ago?) convert to The Cult of Ted as >Andrew Schelling once called it. I did my undergraduate work in music >performance and had never read Berrigan before I came to Naropa! (now that's >confessional)
>
>I feel sorry for Todd Baron -- he seems puppy-like in his desires, probably >lonely. He probably means well, though that's hardly an excuse.
>
>Living in one's head... well, as in many cases, it's fine if one does it >superbly. (I think Michaux pulls it off -- but his is far from a self-centered >or confessional "I.")
>
>> Which brings me to ogling. I looked it up in my Skeats and the etymology is >> from Dutch, of all places -- wait'll you hear this -- from _oogen_, "to cast >> sheepes eyes upon one" -- cf. Low German (low, of course!)_oegen_ to look >> at! Cognate with "eye"

>>
>
>"sheepes eyes"?! for some reason this reminds me of a phrase my sister and I >used in our childhood -- googly babies (those were the unpleasantly noisy and >wet ones)
>
>> So EYE thank you for your comment about same. I love to look at women, >> actually, but mostly, I love to look. Didn't Wallace Stevens write a poem >> called "The Pleasures of Merely Seeing"? If he didn't he should have.
>>
>
>I had an interesting (to me at least) exchange once with Randy Roark (do you >know him?) -- I said a reading Cole Swensen gave was sexy, and he said he agreed >but felt he couldn't make a comment like that without being perceived as sexist.
>Now, I consider myself feminist, and this seems wrong. Harassment lines get >drawn all over the place... and having been sexually harassed before, I have >strong feelings about it. But there's plenty that's still _not_ harassment.
>It's too fascist to say that men can't talk about x, y, or z. Sometimes I don't >think I can stand to live another minute in a Puritan country such as this >one.If people call everything remotely titillating harassment, it's belittling >to real cases.
>
>> . How much
>> of that translation have you done?
>>
>
>I probably have 30 pages left (guesstimate). Plus Anselm's commentary, >corrections, suggestions, etc. He's really the co-translator, and without >everything he's put in, the work would be mediocre at best. It's quite an honor
>(and a blast) to work with him. With Michaux, sometimes I feel an eerie >mind-meld sort of connection. This may sound grim, but I enjoy the frankness >with which he examines the undersides of the mind. I've spent some time in the >nether regions of depression, and find that true horror is pretending that
the

>black holes (or heffalump traps as I used to refer to them) aren't there.
>
>Drinking too much coffee in the library
>(after drinking too much beer on Saturday),
>Laura
>--
>Laura Wright
>Library Assistant
>Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
>2130 Arapahoe Ave
>Boulder, CO 80302
>[redacted]
> * * * * * *
>"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
> * * * * * *
>"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein
>
>

↑ Index

381. charles alexander printing
Mon 17 Aug 1998

Mark,

We were wrong about my printing problem today. It wasn't a memory problem at all. Somehow, the .eps file for the bar code on the book cover was either corrupted, or not properly linked in some way. When I went back to the original of that file, saved it again, making sure I included the fonts with it, and loaded the "new" file into my PageMaker file, it worked fine.

charles
chax press : alexander writing/design/publishing [redacted]
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax
[redacted] (phone) [redacted] (fax)

↑ Index

382. Mark Weiss
Re: printing
Mon 17 Aug 1998

Glad to hear it. A pleasure to be wrong.
Is the wisdom of computers the memory of past mistakes? Like learning about cars from what goes wrong? (Or kids for that matter?)

At 06:58 PM 8/17/98 -0700, you wrote:
>Mark,
>
>We were wrong about my printing problem today. It wasn't a memory problem >at all. Somehow, the .eps file for the bar code on the book cover was >either corrupted, or not properly linked in some way. When I went back to >the original of that file, saved it again, making sure I included the fonts >with it, and loaded the "new" file into my PageMaker file, it worked fine.
>
>
>charles
>chax press : alexander writing/design/publishing >[redacted]
>http://alexwritdespub.com/chax
>[redacted] (phone) [redacted] (fax)
>
>

↑ Index

383. charles alexander sorry
Mon 17 Aug 1998

sorry for sending a private message to Mark Weiss to the list.

It happens sometimes, but it is always rather embarrassing.

charles

chax press : alexander writing/design/publishing [redacted]
http://alexwritdespub.com/chax
[redacted] (phone) [redacted] (fax)

↑ Index

384. Donald Wellman
Re: location location location
Tue 18 Aug 1998

I am deeply impressed by a loving and intimate knowledge in Mark's posting to this thread, describing the view from Olson's windows. And yet it seems the local is always made to serve something "other" isn't it? always a reification of some desire, defiantly even never itself or we would not have that need for its solidities compounded of distances.

Mark wrote: "So, the local as a place to stand, to take strength from, perhaps, where one's protest has a chance of being heeded, and a place to look out from, in all the directions."

There is such a difference between the "local" as a value and "local knowledge" that can be quite blinding. To get back to Todd, if you look out "your" window at night (as Olson who" inverted night and day" must often have done) "you" can see "your" face in it as well as the stars, light pollution permitting.

Don Wellman

↑ Index

385. Mark Salerno
Reading in Chicago
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Friends:

I'll be in Chicago on November 19, 1998, to read at the Art Institute, and I'm searching for other venues at which to read while I'm in town. Anyone with suggestions please back channel.

I'd be grateful.

Mark Salerno

↑ Index

386. Henry Gould
Re: location
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Mark Weiss & Don Wellman sound both right on this one. "Where we are" is something of a mystery, to put it mildly, maps or no maps; but should probably beware of any particular formulas (ie. the local is the key, or, the local stands for some other desire) - because "the local" primarily stands for an inexaustible

fulness that is really beyond telling, though we keep trying - maybe Keats came pretty close - in simple formula fashion -

"the poetry of earth is never dead"

- though I'm sure he would agree that's not the "end" of the story -

- Henry Gould

↑ Index

387. KENT JOHNSON
(Fwd) Join SAWSJ
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Poetics folks:

The below appeal comes from one of the most interesting and promising new organizations the American left has seen in some time. Please read!

Kent

Forwarded Message Follows -------Date: Wed, 12 Aug 1998 13:51:24 -0400 From: SAWSJ <[redacted]>
Subject: Join SAWSJ
To: SAWSJ <[redacted]>

Can we persuade you to join Scholars, Artists, and Writers for Social Justice (SAWSJ)? You are on our email list; you may even think you are a member, but according to our records you aren't -- yet. We've sponsored the Columbia University teach-in and thirty others, mobilized support for the UPS and GM strikes, and helped raise the issue of the right to organize. With your support, and that of others, we can do much more.

The primary aim of SAWSJ is to strengthen the relationship between the labor movement and its allies in the academic and cultural communities. Working together we can help to shape the terms of political debate, contest corporate dominance of politics and culture, and foster the growth of a vibrant, progressive, multicultural working-class movement, one that speaks to issues of race, gender, and sexual orientation.

If you share these goals, PLEASE JOIN. A membership form follows this message; it lists some of the activist groups we are working to build. We hope you'll join one or more of these, and together we will fight against sweatshops and for the right to organize, against workfare and for a more inclusive university. Together we can create our own media network to write op-eds and letters to the editor so that our views get attention equal to those of the right (okay, maybe that won't happen next week, but ...). If you join we'll send you a letter describing these projects, as well as how to form a chapter or become a part of our steering committee.

The labor movement knows that standing alone it can't win the right to organize, change the image of unions, or win political victories. Academics and cultural workers know that unless we connect with a larger movement, our voice will not be heard and we will miss the grounding and connections that can enrich our vision.

John Sweeney and the AFL-CIO have strongly supported SAWSJ -- participating actively in the teach-in movement, speaking at our founding meetings, and assigning staff to work closely with us. At the same time, they have been clear that we are and should be an independent organization; President Sweeney went out of his way to indicate he is sure we will sometimes disagree, and that such disagreements are healthy and can be productive.

Why join, rather than just continuing to be a free rider on our email list? One obvious answer: we need the money to keep up our activities; without members we can't continue. But even more, we need your commitment. You'll receive our members-only mailings, and soon will have the option of joining our members-only listserv. We want your dues and an indication of your commitment; we hope you'll want to do more and will join one of our working groups. Together we can work to realize our mutual goals.

The Coordinating Committee of Scholars, Artists, and Writers for Social Justice (Dan Clawson, Michael Denning, Dorothy Fennell, Steve Fraser, Adam Green, Margaret Levi, Jenny Stevens, and Jamal Watson)

Scholars, Artists, and Writers for Social Justice (SAWSJ)

The aim of SAWSJ is to assist in reshaping the nation's political culture and fostering the growth of a vibrant, progressive, multicultural working-class movement; in shaping the terms of political debate and contesting corporate dominance of politics and culture; in restoring the mutually empowering relationship between the labor movement and its allies in the academic and cultural communities. If you share these goals, PLEASE JOIN.

Please print this form, fill it out, and send it in; or complete it via e-mail, and snail mail us a check.)

Name:
Email:
Home Phone: ( )
Work Phone: ( )
Address:

City: State: Zip:

Organizational Affiliations University (if any):
Work:
Union (if any):
Political and Cultural Groups:

_____ Yes, I want to become a SAWSJ member.
Dues - check one:
____ $10 student/low income
____ $25 others with incomes below $40,000
____ $40 for those with incomes of $40,000 or above

Make checks payable to SAWSJ and mail to:
SAWSJ
c/o Labor Relations and Research Center University of Massachusetts
125 Draper Hall
Box 32020
Amherst, MA 01003

EMAIL LIST INFO -- SAWSJ maintains an informational email list. Once or at most twice a week, we send out news and information, collected from many sources, about labor and social justice issues. Please check one:

_____ I am already on the list.
_____ I am not on the list. Please add my e-mail
_____ Please do not add my e-mail address to the list.

SAWSJ ACTIVITIES - We have underway, or are working at creating, both local chapters and networks focused on particular issues. Please indicate if you'd be interested in working on one or more of the following. Check as many as you like; if you check an item, someone will be in touch with you about working on the project:

___ Joining or forming a local chapter
___ Organizing a teach-in in your area
___ Big chill - fighting attacks on labor researchers ___ Anti-sweatshop
___ Right to organize ___ Workfare-welfare
___ On-campus organizing ___ Race and campus access ___ McJobs - part-time and contingent work issues
___ Op-ed and media projects - building a left network
___ Directories - of experts, of student groups ___ Internal SAWSJ - membership, fundraising, newsletter
___ Teamster Reform
___ YOUR issue - what else would you like to work on?
Please specify:

Scholars, Artists and Writers for Social Justice (SAWSJ)

Email: [redacted]
Phone: [redacted] Fax: [redacted]
Internet: www.sage.edu/html/SAWSJ

Address: SAWSJ
c/o Labor Relations and Research Center
University of Massachusetts Amherst
125 Draper Hall, Box 32020
Amherst, MA 01003

↑ Index

388. George Thompson
Re: location
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Diane DiPrima once told the story of visiting Olson in that apartment, listening to him for hours as he sat there in a rumpled bed pointing frequently out the window as he talked, rapidly of course,and also pointing, without ever looking, at a map of Gloucester that was pinned up on the wall over his bed. She marvelled at the fact that that map, which must have been there for years, had become completely bleached out by the light and had become completely illegible.

Tells you where Olson's map really was.

GT

> Mark Weiss & Don Wellman sound both right on this one. "Where we are" is > something of a mystery, to put it mildly, maps or no maps; but should probably > beware of any particular formulas (ie. the local is the key, or,
> the local stands for some other desire) - because
> "the local" primarily stands for an inexaustible fulness that is > really beyond telling, though we keep trying - > maybe Keats came pretty close - in simple formula fashion -
>
> "the poetry of earth is never dead"
>
> - though I'm sure he would agree that's not the "end" of the story -
>
> - Henry Gould

↑ Index

389. Mark Prejsnar
Feeling sorry
Tue 18 Aug 1998

I feel sorry for people who dis poets, groups of poets etccc..

And then post said attacks, to 650 people, when they intended them to be private.

Gosh, such people seem to be "living inside their heads."

I feel sorry for people who are frightened by poetries outside the mainstream (such people seem to be "living insdie their heads.").

Vladimir Gerturde Lenin
(ah! Lenine! quel chanteur!)

↑ Index

390. R.Gancie/C.Parcelli
Re: location location location
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Thanks to Mark Weiss for this beautiful evocation of Olson's Gloucester.---Carlo Parcelli

> Back to the locus classicus, it's good to remember that when Olson positioned himself as Maximus "of Gloucester" and touted the necessity of the local he was making a decision to swim counter to the current. Prior to then he had been plenty peripatetic, and he certainly continued to be aware of the fragility of "polis." His polis, in fact, had become something of a fiction, even in Gloucester--his reference is to the portuguese fishermen and working-class yankees, who certainly made up the world of Fort Square, and if you only looked seaward I suppose you could screen out the commuter town that the rest of Gloucester was morphing into. What would he have made of the Moonies taking over the canneries? But his stance--his "stand"--involved an active protest, including, for instance, letters to the editor--it was a political action--and poems like "In the face of a Chinese View of the City."
>
> If you stand by the seaward window of Olson's apartment you see the world as imagined in Maximus, from the local, even to the temporally local as witnessed by the weather notations Olson scrawled on the window frame, to the houses of the fishermen, the harbor to the left and the sweep of the beach that fronts the town to the right. And straight out, beyond all that, the bay open to the Atlantic beyond the two wooded arms that enclose it, and outward to the world and the cosmos. It really is an extraordinary, and empowering, view. If you look out the door towards town you see the old yankee spires through a filter of fish-racks. Remember the maps that fronted the three big volumes of Maximus, and the maps sketched out by the position of words on the page in some of the poems, and "I come back to the geography of it,/the land falling off to the left" etc. Those maps, be it noted, are also maps of past configurations, so that the reach outward from that window is four dimensional.
>
> So, the local as a place to stand, to take strength from, perhaps, where one's protest has a chance of being heeded, and a place to look out from, in all the directions. Check out Letter 5, Olson's savaging of Ferrini, which I think draws the issues. "...winds, Ferrini,/which are never 4, which have their grave dangers (as writing does)/just because weather/is very precise to/the quarter it comes from (as writing is,/if it is as good as"
>
> At 04:05 PM 8/17/98 -0400, you wrote:
> [A few subscription problems -- this e-mail is a little out of date, since the location thread was a while (a few days?) ago, but 'thought it might be of interest.]

I think my position is similar to Tom's on this one. I grew to a consciousness of writing when I lived in New Hampshire, where the most interesting things happen when (speaking broadly, as always) man collides with his location in nature and society. Given the state of much of our developed land -- essentially interchangable units arrayed in mutating sequence -- I wonder if the attention to location is disappearing, or, rather, appearing as an atavism. Feeling as if I was engaging in some unconscious nostalgia at the time, I look back at the "postitioned" work I did then and wonder how much is worthwhile. I remember looking at Plath's Ariel in a seminar, and hearing someone make the comment that the first few stanzas are Plath still trying to write "vivid description" (a commen that was supposed to be critical), and only reaching a more "metaphysical" plain/plane in the later lines; it's an interesting comment, one that I was resistant to at the time, and I wonder if its true that a poem must eventually escape position in such a direct manner.

Pound's _Cantos_, in passing, seem to me to be an amazing way to unite a postmodern notion of the decay of a Thoreau-like "location" with a feeling of position, of some kind of connection to a particular physical reality.

Moving from the theoretical to the practical act of writing and creation of a poetic "landscape" in the most general sense, I think where one is at a particular time can have an enormous positive effect on the work itself. When I write, what emerges after revision is a space that in many ways maps almost topologically to an experience of a place, mirroring in some way my inhabitation of it, and the accidents of coming to know it.

Below, for anyone who's made it this far, is a draft of a work drawn from that little blue sign in Harvard Square that marks Anne Bradstreet's residence, with thanks to John Berryman.

-- Simon

http://www.fas.harvard.edu/~sdedeo/localpapers.html
[redacted]

Entering the site of the former residence of Anne Bradstreet

Varnish in layers laid on the hardwood floor.
In empty rooms, where barefoot one might feel
the anonymous grit warm in years of occupation,
I charade my guide, keeping two steps behind
with meditations on the brass doorknobs
and the crumbled paint in a pile by the door.

I have made numerous telephone calls, perjured

> and damned myself to spend a quarter hour --
> how the hour ticks, now -- in observation.
> Agitated, my guide drops the stormwindow
> and enquires into my deeper motives.
> The distance to the street is immense.
>
> We exchange cards, mine as fradulent
> as Al Capone's, and I linger on the stair
> awkward as the local tough thieving
> roses for the virgin in the mansion in
> the city on the hill. Vain, vain, vanity
> all. But the marble here is cold.

↑ Index

391. Peter Balestrieri
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Tue 18 Aug 1998

To Todd Baron:

Remember the way you dissed and dismissed Alan Sondheim's work a few months back? You say in your recent post, "I seek to ONLY discuss poetics on this list..." but back then you wrote, "I have long ago dismissed a poetics that engages the language in a self-ish way--that is--where one tries to force the language into an "experimental" form--for the sake of being that thing others would call "experimental" --the piece I responded to wasn't doing anything--Why discuss it, then--if, in my mind--I already have"?

It seems your chickens are roosting quite nicely.

PB

↑ Index

392. Pierre Joris
single query
Tue 18 Aug 1998

I need to quickly get in touch with Lisa Jarnot. Does anyone have a current phone # or email? Is she in Colorado right now? B.C. is best -- thanks -- Pierre
--
==========
pierre joris 6 madison place albany ny 12202
tel: [redacted] fax: [redacted]

email:[redacted]
http://www.albany.edu/~joris/

“I take place out there”

-- Robert Duncan
==========

↑ Index

393. MAYHEW
Not yet/already
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Our language does not consist of a stock set of sentences, but sometimes we behave as though it did (Xavier Rubert de Ventos). Against Heidegger's contention that we have not yet begun to think, Wittgenstein: we are already thinking. Phenomology takes us further, rather than closer, to phenomena, just as hermeneutics takes us further from understanding. Do we need someone to explain to us how we understand something that we already understand, how in some sense we understand it because we have already understood it before we even know what its about? As we get older our experience grows while our openness to new experience diminishes: few will try sushi for the first time after the age of 35, or change their taste in music, or get their tongues pierced, according to a recent scientific survey (consequences of this for educational theory). I no longer read the books I review; I look at the index, the table of contents, the footnotes. In the grocery store I am constantly seeing people that look vaguely familiar to me. This is because I saw them three minutes before in another aisle. To be continued...

Jonathan

↑ Index

394. MAYHEW
stupidity
Tue 18 Aug 1998

I think a distinction is being lost. For Todd to say "I have long ago dismissed a poetics that engages language in a selfish way" is not to attack the person, but the poetics. How is this an ad hominem attack? He didn't say that Alan Sondheim was a pathetic puppy dog, stupid, etc... Or are we so identified with our 'opera' that any attack on our position becomes an attack on our various selves? For me, it is different if someone says to me "Jonathan, I have long ago dismissed the basic premise underlying your book," and "Judging by your book, you are a stupid guy." the first invites debate, the second really does not. After all, I might dismiss my earlier positions at some later date with no shame at all.

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

395. hen
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Tue 18 Aug 1998

On Tue, 18 Aug 1998 10:23:34 -0700 Peter Balestrieri said:
>
> It seems your chickens are roosting quite nicely.

"I hate gossip."
- Jack Spandrift, Angola Penitentiary #41575, Angola, LA

↑ Index

396. David Baratier
Re: snorting up the Pound / Williams line
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Howdy. Just getting back from Boston. The question posed was one where Pound's innovator's were merely the focus of invention, rather than all five sections of oratory. First of all, Pound sacked the innovators / imitators idea from Horace's Ars Poetica without a thread of improvement. Hook line & sinker. Which is to say, I am picking on someone my own size. 2nd. Since I have taken a stance as speaking to a group posited at a certain level of familiarity with oratory, exploring Quintillian did not, and still does not, strike me as a necessity. I disagree in the following way:

Patent No. 296,933 - Bench Plane / Norman Edward Curtis Mauston, WI April 15, 1884.

This bench plane provided for "accurate and quick lateral adjustment of the plane iron" and consisted of a fulcrum, a longitudinal groove, and a lever that could be operated by hand or by an adjusting screw.

Patent No. 17,192 - Improvement in boats for duck hunting / Robert Bogle / Rock Hall, MD, May 5, 1857.

Propelled by wading or paddling, this low-floating boat served as a duck blind where a hunter was hidden by a waterproof cloth. The floating platform, which could be painted to match the water, contained four decoys representing the types of waterfowl being hunted.

A simple, quantifiable, traceable reason for each invention's "success" or "failure" is not contained within a specific philosophic model that could possibly offer a determinacy with regularity. Can we always say an invention expires as a direct result of the innovators ingenuity? The idea of experiment as purely derived from method has been suggested to the listserv as if there is some way to come up with an approximal why. And yet, at least in the above case, the end result is one of simplicity, one object is still in production, the other is not.

One product failed as the result of production methods used by the manufacturer, as well as the shelf space requirement. Where does this fit in? All kinds of metonymy, synecdoche, metaphor, arrive beyond these but here is a start: Success of invention vs. oratio invention - invention shelf space allocated & arranged - disposition pairing down of intended audience through marketing - elocution product brand name awareness - memory production methods, packaging and impact of product - delivery

Olson carries me with disposition as much as memory (contrivance thereof) and invention. In short, in a statement where invention and originality are the sole reduciaries then one would say Boo-berry cereal lasted for nearly a decade on the market because it was a superb invention & Bob Perelman's The First World disappeared from the market in under five years for lacking the cereal's cloven foot. Originality and independence in the production of subject matter is not even close to the whole of the moon.

There is comfort provided or power gained by preset categories? This is where the wonder twin powers of poetry are activated in a Kristevan form of oppositional forces in society. That the existence of an X starts to inform the existence of its polar enemy -X.

I value the five parts of oratory because I know them, imbed them, work against them. Each of them has influenced a work and offered a way to bridge into a desire for understanding.

Be well

David Baratier

↑ Index

397. toddbaron
Re: (Fwd) Join SAWSJ
Tue 18 Aug 1998

> Scholars, Artists and Writers for Social Justice (SAWSJ)
>
> Email: [redacted]
> Phone: [redacted] Fax: [redacted]
> SAWSJ
> c/o Labor Relations and Research Center
> University of Massachusetts Amherst
> 125 Draper Hall, Box 32020
> Amherst, MA 01003

thank-you for forwarding this very imp. chance to participate. I encourage others to join.

TB

↑ Index

398. toddbaron
Re: location
Tue 18 Aug 1998

---

speaking of Diane D P. --does anyone have a current address for her--is she still in SF. (I studied with her and simply want to send ReMap)-- thanks--pls do this "privately"

Todd Baron

↑ Index

399. toddbaron
Re: location location location
Tue 18 Aug 1998

---

this is simply a beautiful way to wake this a.m. yr writing--the many Olson's I find here--all the Location--from here (LA) a place where bulldozers create location but "dig" nothing--(outsiode the window--besides the reflection of a face--the GTE warehouse, tomatoes, the street, somewhere off--the sea--the same constant--the body--of water--I have no map of).

thanks so much for this "seaward window"

Todd Baron
(ReMap)

I guess ReMap should do a LOCATION issue!

↑ Index

400. Mark Weiss
Re: Not yet/already
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Yeah, I heard an interview about this. The interviewee, who has written on the subject, contrasted himself with a young assistant. He himself would tend to listen to the same kind of music every day, his assistant was totally unpredictable and experimental--more open to new experience was the interpretation. And there seems at present to be no explanation of the difference wrought by age. It occurred to me that there may be another partial explanation. When I was the age of his assistant I used to have marathon listening sessions. The was one night that started with Parsifal then proceeded to the Mass in B Minor (both for the first time) and ended at dawn with Mahler's Third. Now I tend to hear new things and accept or dismiss them fairly quickly, with far more dismissals. Age? Or maybe my ear is better trained. Or maybe, more importantly, when I was first learning the classics almost everything I listened to was in fact great music and having learned the canon and then some the experiments were less frequently rewarding. The same being true of all the other arts, high and popular. As for not eating sushi after 35, those experimental enough to do so would have done so far earlier given availability. My father, who was always an adventurous eater, fell hopelessly in love with raw fish in his late 40's--love, in his case, at first sight. But in this age of more universal availability those likely to experiment would have done so by 35, and the rest, the potential sushinuts, would be the more conservative remnant. More thoughts on flexibility. One does fall into routines. Along comes a major life change, a divorce, say, or a threat to life, and with it an explosion of new learning, new experimentation. So, maybe neither so mysterious nor so frightening a phenomenon.

At 01:52 PM 8/18/98 -0500, you wrote:
>Our language does not consist of a stock set of sentences, but sometimes >we behave as though it did (Xavier Rubert de Ventos). Against Heidegger's >contention that we have not yet begun to think, Wittgenstein: we are >already thinking. Phenomology takes us further, rather than closer, to >phenomena, just as hermeneutics takes us further from understanding. Do >we need someone to explain to us how we understand something that we >already understand, how in some sense we understand it because we have >already understood it before we even know what its about? As we get older >our experience grows while our openness to new experience diminishes: few >will try sushi for the first time after the age of 35, or change their >taste in music, or get their tongues pierced, according to a recent >scientific survey (consequences of this for educational theory). I no >longer read the books I review; I look at the index, the table of >contents, the footnotes. In the grocery store I am constantly seeing >people that look vaguely familiar to me. This is because I saw them three >minutes before in another aisle. To be continued...

>
>
>Jonathan
>
>

↑ Index

401. David Zauhar
location(3): three quotes and 2 questions
Tue 18 Aug 1998

"thus we are to work in our own 'locality': not piggishly, not narrowly. We must see, steal, beg, borrow--but we borrow only that which we want. What we feel, think, conclude that we need. Not what is imposed on us (unless we can't help it, then we use that too: Negro American Music)."

William Carlos Willams, _The Embodiment of K._, p. 150

Question: has anyone ever lived/visited some place where it seemed impossible to get any writing/thinking done? How to deal w/ it?

"It would be awfully lonely being the only surrealist at the University of Minnesota"

-- Kenneth Koch

Question: Joel Lewis raised in interesting point about reading his NJ poems in Seattle. I like his work and I mean no disrespect to it or the general point he raised: I think I'm going elsewhere with this question: what would it mean if poets in Seattle and New York cared more about the Minnesota poetry of Kenneth Koch's hypothetical surrealist than his or her St. Paul neighbor w/ which said hypothetical surrealist goes Walleye fishing? How much does location mean if the local is so portable?

"critics may smile, but I would rate the verse of an Alaskan poet (given the same ability) higher than the verse of a poet from Yalta. Of course! Since the Alaskkan has to freeze and spend money on warm clothes and the ink from his pen keeps freezing. Whereas the yalta man writes against a background of palmtrees in a spot which is nice even without poetry."

--Vladimir Mayakovsky

David Zauhar
University of Illinois at Chicago

"I believe that the devil is in these poets. They destroy all universities. And I heard from an old master of Leipsic who had been Magister for 36 years that when he was a young men then did the university stand firm, for there was not a poet within 20 miles."

Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum, ii.46. Quoted in Helen Waddell's _The Wandering Scholars_

↑ Index

402. toddbaron
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Tue 18 Aug 1998

I bloody well have no idea what yr talking about!

I'm scared!

I'm lost!

Todd

↑ Index

403. louis stroffolino
QUERIES (CB and DS)
Tue 18 Aug 1998

Two questions----

Does anybody here know what Bernstein poem (i think it's at least 9 years old) that has some line (or sentiment) to the effect of "Hey, I'm glad I didn't live any longer, because if I would have I would have had to spend more money?" (this is a TOTAL paraphrase, from flimsy memory.... I probably have the TONE totally wrong, and maybe even the MEANING). Any help would be appreciated? Thanks

2) Does anybody have email (backchannel) address for Dale Smith?
thanks, chris s.....

↑ Index

404. Karen and Trevor submissions
Tue 18 Aug 1998

The next deadline for Fourteen Hills: The SFSU Review is coming up. We publish poetry, fiction, drama, creative nonfiction and essays. Send up to 5 poems or one piece of prose (2 if short short) with SASE by September 1. The Editor-in-Chief is Linda Jarkesy. Look for our most recent issue at Small Press Distribution.

Fourteen Hills
Creative Writing Dept
San Francisco State Univ
1600 Holloway
San Francisco, CA 94132

↑ Index

405. KENT JOHNSON
(Fwd) from Another Labor-Related List ...
Tue 18 Aug 1998

A few weeks back there was some discussion on Poetics about Borders Bookstores. Forwarded from the UCLEA Labor Studies List. Ah, culture...

Kent

Some humor for your Monday mornings up there in North America....

Early Warning Signs

Borders bookstore chain has been bothered of late by union activity.
As a result, Anne Kubek of their Human Resources Dept. prepared a manual on
"Union Awareness Training for Borders Managers." As a public service, someone has been kind enough to post the whole text on the internet . Of particular value is a section entitled "Recognizing the Early Signs of Union Activity," a concern we all share. Here are a few of the warning signals:

1. "Employees gather in small groups of twos and threes and immediately halt their conversations when managers approach."

2. "Employees start gathering to talk in areas that are off the beaten path."

3. "Employees who are not normally seen talking to one another begin associating more regularly. Strange alliances begin to form."

4. "New vocabulary may creep into employees conversations. Union terms such as seniority, grievance, bumping, job security, job posting, etc. may appear in conversations."

5. "Managers start getting an inordinate amount of critical and probing questions concerning policies and/or benefits. "

Keep vigilant. You never know where the virus of critical thought will strike next.

found at: http://www.scn.org/news/newspeak/week.html

Tom

Tom Kruse / Casilla 5812 / Cochabamba, Bolivia
Tel/Fax: (591-4) 248242
Email: [redacted]

--part0_902453804_boundary--

↑ Index

406. KENT JOHNSON
Bullworth
Wed 19 Aug 1998

There was quite a bit of discussion about _Saving Private Ryan_ a couple of weeks ago. Has there been any discussion of _Bullworth_? I just saw it in a Motel 6. What a movie!

I'm pretty sure there is no Hollywood film in recent memory that features a major (whatever that really means) American poet. Amiri Baraka, no less, plays a homeless sort who haunts Bullworth and tells him to be a "spirit" and not a "ghost." Bullworth is a typical bought white politician who more or less goes nuts, sheds his skin, and starts rapping anti-capitalist stuff like a Black Panther. This inspires the kingpin of an inner-city gang to suddenly see the light and become responsible to the children of his community. A number of loud and sexed-up black women go wild for Bullworth in advance of the men learning, via his didactic rap, how to be men. But Bullworth gets shot dead by an insurance executive, his promise cut short.

Sorry if this movie has already been discussed here, but I'm curious about what people think: Amiri Baraka, Maoist extraordinaire, jumped all over Spike Lee a few years back in Sulfur for selling out to liberal revisionism with _Malcom X_. Does Baraka do the right thing in _Bullworth_? It's a strange and fascinating movie. Some critics say it's profoundly racist. Others say it's the most leftist and subversive thing ever done in Hollywood.

Can it be both?

Kent

↑ Index

407. Alan Jennifer Sondheim susan's "and the aliens" (fwd)
Wed 19 Aug 1998

-

susan's "and the aliens"

"and the aliens, where are they, in our desperation, looking for large eyes or things which dwell within us or within our identities or equivalences, sliding ourselves into a more dangerous universal womb, but at least the womb which doesn't show, exfoliate, closed labia just as they refuse us entrance - that there are none of them, no scripts, no continuities but our own hysterias seeming to construct semblance, so that now we substitute the net or art or just about anything else, else which might nonetheless turn ashy in a universal conflagration generated by the smallest flesh or flash, risen from the surface of the sun; so now we wait on meteors or asteroids, veering from dangerous safety to safe danger, a distance few or fewer, but then the danger's real, safety's not, that's the truth of it as it falls disturbed and scattered to the floor where one might imagine grounds defined as metaphysics or whatever until the text chars, explodes, implodes - "it's as if there's nothing to read, nothing to see,"
say the aliens - now we can move them from say siberia or area fifty-one all the way to our interior - there are scripts within scripts, encrypted scripts, lost-treasure-scripts, scripts-of-ghosts-and-demons, scripts-of-discontinuities, kabbalistic numbers prying open numb alien skulls and thought-forms, "Oh, how she could go on, in the mornings when the sun was just rising behind the poplars in the garden."

"The truth is, she did go on, she went on alone and speaking, murmuring the pulse of the green-gold world, and there was nothing else to it, nothing else to any of it, nothing, nothing at all."

↑ Index

408. R M Daley
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Wed 19 Aug 1998

It seems your chickens are roosting quite nicely.

↑ Index

409. Robert Archambeau
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Jonathan,

For a primary document in the history of anti-experimental backlash, and one that provides some historical depth, (at least back to the late nineteenth century) I suggest checking out Donald Davie's book _Thomas Hardy and British Poetry_. This isn't a history of anti-experimentalism, but an instance of it grounded in history.

Davie claims that Hardy's very conservative, neo-Augustan poetry is central to English poetry, and that experimental work, while often more interesting, is nevertheless unacceptable. (This kind of ambivalence is typical of Davie).

What is really interesting (and sometimes infuriating) about this is that Davie tries to demonstrate that liberalism is the province of formalism, while experimentalism implies utopian and therefore totalitarian politics. So: a good book to sharpen your own arguments against.

By the way -- do you know anything about Brazilian experimental poetry? I'd like to do a Brazillian avant-garde issue of Samizdat, but need a guide to the terrain.

Robert Archambeau
Dept. of English
Lake Forest College, Illinois &
Lund University, Sweden

↑ Index

410. Peter Ganick
location location location
Wed 19 Aug 1998

having a laptop computer has changed my notion of 'location' in my writing practice...

before, i would transcribe into a journal at some place or in my house, then transfer onto a typewriter (later an old computer) and that'd be it...

now, with portabibility, one can write basically anywhere and using floppy diskettes, bring the results back home, or work on them in even another location...

and, speaking personally, i've always felt that my best writing has been done while in the middle of a noisy cafe, so the laptop works just fine...

peter ganick

↑ Index

411. Robert Archambeau
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Magee quotes Dewey:

> "*The idea becomes a standpoint from which to examine existing occurences...the suggestion or fancy though still ideal is treated as a possibility capable of realization in the concrete natural world, not as a superior reality apart from that world. As such, it becomes a platform from which to scrutinize natural events.*"

This is some interesting stuff, and I have quite a bit of sympathy for the view that Dewey shares with Jameson.

As for what you say about Davie -- yes. Davie proceeds from opposite (and, I think, incorrect but provocative) assumptions. He likes the idea of provisionality, but it is exactly this that he sees as a possibility limited to neo-Augustan poetry like Thomas Hardy's. That is, he would agree with Dewey/Jameson about platforms from which to scrutinize events being valuable, but he feels that there is an absolutism in any poetry that claims a vatic or visionary power for the poet (he puts Pound in the visionary camp), and that this disallows for any kind of provisionality in the "platform". It becomes an uncompromisable goal, not an archimedian point outside the world from which we can perform critique.

Ironically, Davie thinks the vatic makes for better poetry, but the provisional/ ironic stance of someone like Hardy seems more ethical, and more liberal, to him. Familiar stuff to anyone who's read Plato's Republic -- 'we love this stuff, but for the sake of the children, dear, it has to go'.

Even more ironically, Davie's chapters on experimental Brits like Jeremy Prynne and Roy Fisher are subtle, appreciative and dead-on about particular poems, even though they are part of an argument that condemns experiment.

Robert Archambeau
Lake Forest College, Illinois &
Lund University, Sweden

↑ Index

412. Henry Gould
Re: snorting up the Pound etc.
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Dave Baratier's interesting post. Maybe "innovation" or "invention" or "experiment" are usually umbrella terms for originality/creativity in general, ie. standing for all five parts of oratory combined. But the "inspired idea" (invention) which creates a "product" which is both popular and lasting does seem to fall under the sway of a "muse" of some kind. Was Dickinson's oeuvre an outcome of strategic marketing or devotion to the muse (ie. an ordering of "poetic instruments" - all of them - to inspiration)? Jeff Walker in his book Bardic Ethos argues that Pound, Wms, Olson ultimately failed in their goal of writing the "tale of the tribe" because their oratory - their dispositions & elocutions - contradicted their own subject matter (shared history) with an elite/sacerdotal ethos which made the sufferings of the Dionysian poet, rather than the shared history, the center of attention. I guess my thought would be: if a sort of inspiration rules the general "disposition" of a poet's materials, then Pound et al. are telling the history they HAD to tell - "the builders builded better [& worse] than they knew". Perhaps this takes the poets off the hook somehow? Horace & Dante might disagree with this? (Plato might agree...). I don't know. Maybe this is a false trail or off your subject. - Henry Gould

↑ Index

413. Daniel Zimmerman
Re: Bullworth
Wed 19 Aug 1998

KENT JOHNSON wrote:
>
> There was quite a bit of discussion about _Saving Private Ryan_ a > couple of weeks ago. Has there been any discussion of _Bullworth_?

> I just saw it in a Motel 6. What a movie!
>
> I'm pretty sure there is no Hollywood film in recent memory that > features a major (whatever that really means) American poet. Amiri > Baraka, no less, plays a homeless sort who haunts Bullworth and tells > him to be a "spirit" and not a "ghost." Bullworth is a typical > bought white politician who more or less goes nuts, sheds his skin, > and starts rapping anti-capitalist stuff like a Black Panther. This > inspires the kingpin of an inner-city gang to suddenly see the light > and become responsible to the children of his community. A number of > loud and sexed-up black women go wild for Bullworth in advance of the > men learning, via his didactic rap, how to be men. But Bullworth > gets shot dead by an insurance executive, his promise cut > short.
>
> Sorry if this movie has already been discussed here, but I'm curious > about what people think: Amiri Baraka, Maoist extraordinaire, jumped > all over Spike Lee a few years back in Sulfur for selling out to > liberal revisionism with _Malcom X_. Does Baraka do the > right thing in _Bullworth_? It's a strange and fascinating movie.
> Some critics say it's profoundly racist. Others say it's the most > leftist and subversive thing ever done in Hollywood.
>
> Can it be both?
>
> Kent

I saw it about six weeks ago. Although it contained racist elements, it didn't strike me as a 'racist' film, because its political agenda sought to counter the milieu which mulches racism.

Certainly, the positions Warren Beatty took as Bulworth [an allegorical monicker of New Critical ambiguity,or a deconstructive Dorian Grayism?] represent some of the most radical statements by a 'hero' I've ever seen from Tinseltown, but the cartoonish improbability of his conversion from Wilbur Mills to Ice-T seemed to me to undercut the seriousness with which the audience might feel obliged to consider his rap-analysis. As you say, he "more or less goes nuts." [One also gets the sense that the lady in the film goes a bit nuts, too -- Halle Berry ain't no Monica Lewinsky.]

Baraka's admonition [be a spirit, not a ghost] seemed an antidote to the temptation to understand the film's point as coextensive with its 'that's enter-tainment' frivolity; it suggests that his conversion, however heartfelt, may have left him as 'ghostly' as in his previous incarnation as the careerist slimeball politician. Baraka functions like a Sprecher in Renaissance painting, pointing our way back into the picture's ideological structure, lest we groove too much on its surface slickness. I loved seeing him in this cameo, but wonder how many other folks in the theatre had the foggiest notion of his identity. Now, if Spike Lee had done the role...

What do others think?

Dan Zimmerman

↑ Index

414. Robert Archambeau
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Henry wrote:

> So let me see if I get this straight: reactionary critics are hanging around judging poetry according to moral recipes based on their idea of how the world should be (their outdated idea). But progressive critics judge poetry according to moral recipes based on their (up-to-date) idea of how the world should be. Utopia is good; the good old days are bad; right? No - let's be more specific. For progressive critics, all experiment is good because the past & the present are bad & we're hopeful for new things in the future, and experiment at least tries to open those doors. Right? For reactionary critics, all experiment is bad because the present is bad & getting worse because experimenters are forgetting everything good the past gave us. Are we getting closer now? Is this a useable recipe?

Looking back on the various passages from Dewey that Michael has posted, it seems to me that the difference between "bad" visions of another moral universe (eg, Dante's world) and "good" versions of same has more to do with absolutism than with whether the view is backward looking or forward looking.

That is, Dewey seems to me to condemn the _exclusive_ view that Dante's world is the good world (so therefore we'd best not look at Milton's). Wheras a "good" use of visions of utopias/'better times' would be to use them as springboards from which to critique our times, as opportunities to come to fresh perceptions, rather than as specific recipies for how the world ought to be.

Michael knows Dewey a hell of a lot better than I do -- I think he can speak to this with greater accuracy.

Robert Archambeau
Lake Forest College, Illinois &
Lund University, Sweden

↑ Index

415. MAYHEW
reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Does anyone know of a study of reactionary anti-modernism? What I mean is the sort of periodic anti-experimental reaction, often with a conservative political ideology, that crops up every twenty years (or perhaps never disappears). I don't mean just another ritualistic vilification of Vendler, but something that perhaps puts some historical perspective on the matter, with some breadth and depth. Thanks in advance.

Changing the subject, I found this sentence last night in a book I was reading:

"It is characteristic of Heidegger's thought that at precisely at the moment when he is most baffling--he refuses the explain himself."

For me it is nearly the opposite: at precisely the moment I explain myself, I am least baffling.

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

416. David W. McFadden
Re: oogling
Wed 19 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>I feel sorry for Todd Baron -- he seems puppy-like in his desires, >probably >lonely. He probably means well, though that's hardly an excuse.
I'm new to this list. This is very embarrassing. Is there something I should know? It's some kind of an in joke, right? Or else, poor Todd!
dwm
"After all, there is a touch of aggression in demanding of a man you don't know why he hums on a public footpath."
- H. G. Wells, The First Men in the Moon.

↑ Index

417. Michael Magee
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Dewey has a great, albeit brief commentary of the kind you're looking for. Of reactionary critics (he gives as an example Eliot's calling for a poetry which emanates from the "truest philosophy") Dewey writes,

"critics of this school do not lack definite, not to say dogmatic, convictions on this point. Without any particular special competency in philosophic thought, they are ready to pronounce ex cathedra judgements, because they are committed to some conception of the relation of man to the universe that flourished in some past epoch. They regard its restoration as essential to the redemption of society from its present evil state. Fundamentally their criticisms are moral recipes. Since great poets have had different philosophies, acceptance of their point of view entails that if we approve the philosophy of Dante we must condemn the poetry of Milton, and if we accept that of Lucretius we must find the poetry of both the others woefully defective. And where, upon the basis of any of these philosophies, does Goethe come in? And yet these are our great 'philosophic' poets" (Art as Experience, p. 319).

Art as Experience is actually a wonderful rand complex epudiation of the methodology employed by critics such as Vendler, though of course that repudiation is implicit rather than explicit. -m.

According to MAYHEW: >
> Does anyone know of a study of reactionary anti-modernism? What I mean is > the sort of periodic anti-experimental reaction, often with a conservative > political ideology, that crops up every twenty years (or perhaps never > disappears). I don't mean just another ritualistic vilification of > Vendler, but something that perhaps puts some historical perspective on > the matter, with some breadth and depth. Thanks in advance.
>
> Changing the subject, I found this sentence last night in a book I > was reading:
>
> "It is characteristic of Heidegger's thought that at precisely at the > moment when he is most baffling--he refuses the explain himself."
>
> For me it is nearly the opposite: at precisely the moment I explain > myself, I am least baffling.
>
> Jonathan Mayhew
> Department of Spanish and Portuguese

> University of Kansas
> [redacted]
> [redacted]
>

↑ Index

418. David W. McFadden
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Wed 19 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>YIKES. Lay off!
>Todd Baron
>(NOT lonely--and no dog...)
Anybody who, in a public forum, is called lonely, a dog, sloppy and stupid, well he's gotta have something pretty interesting going for him.
Todd, we're into the Interesting Zone, as Henry James used to call it.
Yikes, indeed!
dwm
"In the vast silence, surrounded by the intoxicating scent of wild pennyroyal and other aromatic plants, the bees buzzed."
- Grazia Deledda. After the Divorce (1902).

↑ Index

419. james perez
Re: Not yet/already
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Mark Weiss said...

>Now I tend to hear new things and accept or >dismiss them fairly quickly, with far more dismissals. Age? Or maybe my ear >is better trained. Or maybe, more importantly, when I was first learning
>the classics almost everything I listened to was in fact great music
and >having learned the canon and then some the experiments were less frequently
>rewarding. The same being true of all the other arts, high and popular.

I always worry, that my ear in fact hasn't become "better trained," but in fact "more" trained (and maybe also less patient). Which leads to listening to the canon and how that makes one more likely to enjoy this or that or listen for specific things (repetitions, melody, counterpoint and all that), and not appreciate the merits or aesthetic of other musics (though this applies to other arts). I don't mean to inspire a discussion of subjectivities and "training," but maybe that is what I mean.

jperez

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

420. David W. McFadden
Re: location location location
Wed 19 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>I am deeply impressed by a loving and intimate knowledge in Mark's >posting to this thread, describing the view from Olson's windows.
Me too! Shamefully (and shamelessly), I haven't looked at Olson for twenty years but these comments made me want to go back and have another look through his window. It also brought back to mind old Ambrose Bierce and the definition of "resident" one finds in his Devil's Dictionary: "One who can't leave."
dwm
"Better one's own crust than another's cake."
- Sholom Aleichem.

↑ Index

421. David W. McFadden
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Wed 19 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>It seems your chickens are roosting quite nicely.
Come on, you guys! Get civilized. This is an international list.
dwm
"Never speak of yourself: either you will praise yourself, which is vanity, or you will denigrate yourself, which is stupidity."
- Umberto Eco. The Island of the Day Before (1994).

↑ Index

422. David W. McFadden
Re: location(3): three quotes and 2 questions
Wed 19 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>Question: has anyone ever lived/visited some place where it seemed >impossible to get any writing/thinking done? How to deal w/ it?
Is writing and thinking about the impossibility of writing and thinking an impossibility?
Sounds as if it could be interesting.
Sounds like Toronto!
Those were three good quotes and two good questions.
dwm
"I don't mean, of course, that you should write a lot of poetry while we're away. You don't need to write. The important thing is to fertilize your poetic sensibility."
- Yukio Mishima, "Act of Worship" (1965).

↑ Index

423. Billy Little translation anyone?
Wed 19 Aug 1998

---

i'm trying to write about this translation of Dino Campana's Orphic Songs by i.l. solomon not being fluent in italian and not being a translator, but a constant reader of translations, and having studied italian, i definitely believe in reading the original language out loud in however poor a pronounciation, because meaning pops from the sounding writely or wrongly, Berrigan and Zukofsky translate by sound leaving the morpheme to swim in the subconscious to work like a drunken worm and poets like Campana and Neruda or Lorca can write in a simple or vernacular that makes heightened feelings from rhythms. But I'm finding these translations in general too literal and not rapturous as Campana's own lingo is reputed. I'm not interested in slagging a 98 year old translator but i think the rapture might come more readily from a translator in their 20's, or even 40-'s I see that Charles Wright has also done a translation i ought to read that before telling you to give a pass to this very sensuous book (production wise)City Lights, reissue of a thirty year old translation, maybe it's Ferlinghetti paying some dues to the community he grew up in and the neighbourhood he continues to get wealthy in (Columbus). one thing i will report about this translation that irks me somewhat is, for grammars sake, he'll (occasionally) transpose the ultimate line with the penultimate; negating the weight of the finality, the last word lingering on the tongue and the tympanum the position of the word as final serving in my ear like epiphany triggers not blind! meaning. some of us engage in that old fashioned cogitation, and find it hard to think too quickly when old friends are dying like this weekend I was at the extended family memorial for charles watts his ashes there in an urn. Robin Blaser spoke and read and read a poem of Charles from his sole publication, bread & wine, Goh Poh Seng read, Bob Rose read, George Bowering appeared looking grey (the opposite of merry) the opposite of light he probably had to leave i missed speaking to him, Dorothy Trujillo Lusk, Lisa Robertson, Pirsilla Groves, Marya Hindmarch, Renee Rodin, Jan___, Peter Magnani, Peter and Patti Huse, Ralph Maude's darling her name slips my mind but her beauty is seered in my reptile brain, bryant knox, ted byrne, susan clark, peter and meredith quartermain, melissa wolsak, all taking one's thoughts far from e-mail as grandchildren do and animals needs. anybody else reading this City Lights translation of Campana? it's a side by side original and translation, which is always my preference, i might have three translations on the shelf, one for the quality of the translation, one for the original text, and another for the apparatus(notes, intros, essays) that's if i can afford a shelf.

billy little
4 song st.
nowhere, b.c. V0R1Z0

Yeah, I stole from
the treasury
of human folly
I spent it all on you, baby...

don't mention it

Duncan McNaughton

↑ Index

424. k.a. hehir
Jornal de Poesia
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Robert,

for your interest in the brazilian avant-garde you may find this interesting.
http://www.secrel.com.br/jpoesia/poesia.html

It is a site dedicated to Poetry in Portuguese.

i'm still looking for a translation or h. de campos' "transient servitude" so if you come across one please back channel me.

thanks,
kevin h.

↑ Index

425. Gary Sullivan
Marianne Moore's spirit on Bullworth's ghost
Wed 19 Aug 1998

LIKE A BULLWORTH

Pimped. Sexed-up "Panther Power" Hollywood's left, the paradigm--
a paradox. Post-Spike. Well dressed, you rap the did/act and are subversive.
Beatty's last?
Hot, the tempting tinsel.
Careerist; firmament Maoed-up by Baraka till undercut, like a Bullworth lead-saluted
saluted by lead?
As though flying Old Ghost full mast.

On Wednesday, August 19, 1998 9:32 AM, Daniel Zimmerman [SMTP:[redacted]] wrote:
> KENT JOHNSON wrote:
> >
> > There was quite a bit of discussion about _Saving Private Ryan_ a > > couple of weeks ago. Has there been any discussion of _Bullworth_?
> > I just saw it in a Motel 6. What a movie!
> >
> > I'm pretty sure there is no Hollywood film in recent memory that > > features a major (whatever that really means) American poet. Amiri > > Baraka, no less, plays a homeless sort who haunts Bullworth and tells > > him to be a "spirit" and not a "ghost." Bullworth is a typical > > bought white politician who more or less goes nuts, sheds his skin, > > and starts rapping anti-capitalist stuff like a Black Panther. This > > inspires the kingpin of an inner-city gang to suddenly see the light > > and become responsible to the children of his community. A number of > > loud and sexed-up black women go wild for Bullworth in advance of the > > men learning, via his didactic rap, how to be men. But Bullworth > > gets shot dead by an insurance executive, his promise cut > > short.
> >
> > Sorry if this movie has already been discussed here, but I'm curious

> > about what people think: Amiri Baraka, Maoist extraordinaire, jumped > > all over Spike Lee a few years back in Sulfur for selling out to > > liberal revisionism with _Malcom X_. Does Baraka do the > > right thing in _Bullworth_? It's a strange and fascinating movie.
> > Some critics say it's profoundly racist. Others say it's the most > > leftist and subversive thing ever done in Hollywood.
> >
> > Can it be both?
> >
> > Kent
>
> I saw it about six weeks ago. Although it contained racist elements, it > didn't strike me as a 'racist' film, because its political agenda sought > to counter the milieu which mulches racism.
>
> Certainly, the positions Warren Beatty took as Bulworth [an allegorical > monicker of New Critical ambiguity,or a deconstructive Dorian Grayism?] > represent some of the most radical statements by a 'hero' I've ever seen > from Tinseltown, but the cartoonish improbability of his conversion from > Wilbur Mills to Ice-T seemed to me to undercut the seriousness with > which the audience might feel obliged to consider his rap-analysis. As > you say, he "more or less goes nuts." [One also gets the sense that the > lady in the film goes a bit nuts, too -- Halle Berry ain't no Monica > Lewinsky.]
>
> Baraka's admonition [be a spirit, not a ghost] seemed an antidote to the > temptation to understand the film's point as coextensive with its > 'that's enter-tain-ment' frivolity; it suggests that his conversion, > however heartfelt, may have left him as 'ghostly' as in his previous > incarnation as the careerist slimeball politician. Baraka functions like > a Sprecher in Renaissance painting, pointing our way back into the > picture's ideological structure, lest we groove too much on its surface > slickness. I loved seeing him in this cameo, but wonder how many other > folks in the theatre had the foggiest notion of his identity. Now, if > Spike Lee had done the role...
>
> What do others think?
>
> Dan Zimmerman

↑ Index

426. louis stroffolino
Re: QUERIES (CB and DS)
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Thanks all who backchanneled the address info. for DAle S.....

I still await an answer to the bernstein question....
I thought it was in THE SOPHIST, but no luck.....
I wonder if charles himself is out there, and has any idea what i'm talking about.....
chris

↑ Index

427. Michael Magee
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

According to Robert Archambeau:
>
> What is really interesting (and sometimes infuriating) about this is > that Davie tries to demonstrate that liberalism is the province of > formalism, while experimentalism implies utopian and therefore > totalitarian politics. So: a good book to sharpen your own arguments > against.
>
>
Can't resist adding one more comment of Dewey's to this discussion a propos to RA's frustration w/ Davies' critique of experimentalism's utopian impulse. Dewey argues for the efficacy of utopian narrative strategies - and anticipates Jameson - in the following:

"The idea becomes a standpoint from which to examine existing occurences...the suggestion or fancy though still ideal is treated as a possibility capable of realization in the concrete natural world, not as a superior reality apart from that world. As such, it becomes a platform from which to scrutinize natural events."

Now, Dewey's utopian term would be "democracy," while Jameson's would be some variation on a Marxist utopia, but both would have the same reponse for Davies - that he has failed to recognize the evocation of utopia (in description, in syntax, grammar) as rhetorical strategy as "socially symbolic act" to use the phrase Jameson takes from Burke. Davies, not believing Dewey's maxim that "philosophy is a form of desire, of effort at action," simply takes utopian strategies to be bad philosophy or bad writing, or bad politics, precisely b/c he believes they represent " a superior reality apart from (the) world." But I'd say that, at least in regard to the 20th C. tradition of experimentalism I know & love, he's dead wrong. Writers like Dewey, Stein, O'Hara, or for that matter musicians like Ornette Coleman ("free" jazz), are predominantly interested in utopian strategies b/c they catalyze disatisfaction (w/ existing occurences) and desire (for better ones, pointed in the direction of whatver utopian description has been offered), not because they believe their utopia to be "true" or "real." This more than anything else, I would say, distinguishes pragmatism's utopian strategies from fascism's.

-m.

↑ Index

428. Mark Weiss
Re: Not yet/already
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Point well taken, and I realize that "canon" is politically loaded (pardon the pun), altho on this occasion I didn't mean to be provocative. My own experience, and of course the caveat here is that it's me with all my agendas doing the reporting here, is that while any kind of training can limit appreciation of what falls outside that training the learned discipline of listening and an educated (no matter how attained) curiosity about sound and form (I speak of music again) actually has made it easier for me to venture outwards.

At 08:21 AM 8/19/98 PDT, you wrote:
>Mark Weiss said...
>
>>Now I tend to hear new things and accept or >>dismiss them fairly quickly, with far more dismissals. Age? Or maybe my >ear >>is better trained. Or maybe, more importantly, when I was first >learning
>>the classics almost everything I listened to was in fact great music
>and >>having learned the canon and then some the experiments were less >frequently >>rewarding. The same being true of all the other arts, high and popular.
>
>I always worry, that my ear in fact hasn't become "better trained," but >in fact "more" trained (and maybe also less patient). Which leads to >listening to the canon and how that makes one more likely to enjoy this >or that or listen for specific things (repetitions, melody, counterpoint >and all that), and not appreciate the merits or aesthetic of other >musics (though this applies to other arts). I don't mean to inspire a >discussion of subjectivities and "training," but maybe that is what I >mean.

>
>jperez
>
>_____
>Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com
>
>

↑ Index

429. Henry
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

On Wed, 19 Aug 1998 13:11:53 -0400 Michael Magee said:
>>
>Can't resist adding one more comment of Dewey's to this discussion a >propos to RA's frustration w/ Davies' critique of experimentalism's >utopian impulse. Dewey argues for the efficacy of utopian narrative >strategies - and anticipates Jameson - in the following:
>
>"The idea becomes a standpoint from which to examine existing >occurences...the suggestion or fancy though still ideal is treated as a >possibility capable of realization in the concrete natural world, not as >a superior reality apart from that world. As such, it becomes a platform >from which to scrutinize natural events."

So let me see if I get this straight: reactionary critics are hanging around judging poetry according to moral recipes based on their idea of how the world should be (their outdated idea). But progressive critics judge poetry according to moral recipes based on their (up-to-date) idea of how the world should be. Utopia is good; the good old days are bad; right? No - let's be more specific. For progressive critics, all experiment is good because the past & the present are bad & we're hopeful for new things in the future, and experiment at least tries to open those doors. Right? For reactionary critics, all experiment is bad because the present is bad & getting worse because experimenters are forgetting everything good the past gave us. Are we getting closer now? Is this a useable recipe? - Henry Gould

↑ Index

430. MAYHEW
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Robert writes:

"but he feels that there is an absolutism in any poetry that claims a vatic or visionary power for the poet (he puts Pound in the visionary camp), and that this disallows for any kind of provisionality in the "platform". It becomes an uncompromisable goal, not an archimedian point outside the world from which we can perform critique."

Yes, the danger if you are are a prophet or visionary or charismatic religious leader is that someone might listen to you and you can start a totalitarian movement. (I hate when that happens.) This is why Richard Rorty, a Deweyan pragmatist, confines poetry to a private sphere--it's all very well to have visionary poetics, but politics must be liberal/pragmatist.

Some Spanish poets I have worked on/against say, essentially: now that we have normal, democratic politics, we can have "normal" poetry too, by which they mean the creation of a fictional simulacrum of the poet's subjectivity with which "normal" readers can identify without too much trouble. This stance seems reactionary to me, though couched in the language of liberalism. Of course, they say, "we are not reactionary, it is the avant-garde that is ideologically suspect." This normalization of poetry leads invevitably to what "reactionary" English language poets have advocated on both sides of the Atlantic, hence my original query. The Davie book is an extremely helpful suggestion.

Jonathan Mayhew
Department of Spanish and Portuguese
University of Kansas
[redacted]

↑ Index

431. Gary Sullivan
Moore's finicky rewrite for the _Collected Posthumous Dictation_
Wed 19 Aug 1998

LIKE A BULLWORTH

Pimped. Sexed-up "Panther Power" Hollywood's left, the paradigm--
a paradox. Post-Spike. Well Xed,
you rap the didact and are subversive.
Beatty's last?
Hot, the tempting tinsel.

Careerist; firmament Maoed-up by Baraka
till mowed down, like a Bullworth Reds alluded saluted dead?
As though flying the Low Ghost full mast.

↑ Index

432. Michael Magee
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

According to MAYHEW:
>
> Some Spanish poets I have worked on/against say, essentially: now that > we have normal, democratic politics, we can have "normal" poetry too, by > which they mean the creation of a fictional simulacrum of the poet's > subjectivity with which "normal" readers can identify without too much > trouble. This stance seems reactionary to me, though couched in the > language of liberalism. Of course, they say, "we are not reactionary, it > is the avant-garde that is ideologically suspect." This normalization of > poetry leads invevitably to what "reactionary" English language poets have > advocated on both sides of the Atlantic, hence my original query.
>

This view, in poets Spanish or otherwise fails to take into account what Barbara Packer once called language's "natural tendency toward ossification, which can turn the purest truth into the deadliest falsehood." Which is to say, "normal, democratic politics" (the phrase) might not equal "normal, democratic politics" (the social system) in your neighborhood. And, even more importantly, the former may not be working anymore in the service of the latter. -m.

↑ Index

433. Michael Magee
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

I agree with Robert's answer to Henry here, for what its worth. What saves Dewey from getting into a good-vision / bad-vision, bad-past / good-future befuddlement, is his general unwillingness to talk in terms of good and bad. Again, I'd agree that he's much more interested in how various narratives can be/ might be / are "used as springboards" (RA's nice phrase) & he tends to find narratives which emphasize "real uncertainty and contingency" to be useful in sustaining democracies b/c they imply that institutions are re-makeable in accordance w/ changes in collective experience He'd say the opposite about narratives which rebuke experiment. So, one more quote which might help:

"Let one bear this idea fully in mind and he will see how largely philosophy has been committed to a metaphysics of feudalism. By this I mean that it has thought of things in the world as occupying certain grades of value, or as having fixed degrees of truth, ranks of reality...It has become unconsciuosly an apologetic for the established order, b/c it has tried to show the rationality of this or that hierarchical grading of values and schemes of life."

Incidentally, Mayhew mentioned Rorty &, while Rorty is obviously Deweyan in some sense, I think Dewey would be disgusted w/ much of what Rorty has to say, particularly in regards to his concept of "ethnocentrism" which relies on, to my mind, a pretty twisted view of the implications of pragmatism's theory of langauge, & on a reified notion of Western langague and culture generally. -m.

According to Robert Archambeau: >
> Looking back on the various passages from Dewey that Michael has posted, > it seems to me that the difference between "bad" visions of another > moral universe (eg, Dante's world) and "good" versions of same has more > to do with absolutism than with whether the view is backward looking or > forward looking.
>
> That is, Dewey seems to me to condemn the _exclusive_ view that Dante's > world is the good world (so therefore we'd best not look at Milton's).
> Wheras a "good" use of visions of utopias/'better times' would be to use > them as springboards from which to critique our times, as opportunities > to come to fresh perceptions, rather than as specific recipies for how > the world ought to be.
>
> Michael knows Dewey a hell of a lot better than I do -- I think he can > speak to this with greater accuracy.
>
>
> Robert Archambeau
> Lake Forest College, Illinois &
> Lund University, Sweden
>

↑ Index

434. toddbaron
Re: ooooooooooogling stupidity
Wed 19 Aug 1998

David W. McFadden wrote:
>
> [redacted] writes:
> >YIKES. Lay off!
> >Todd Baron
> >(NOT lonely--and no dog...)
> Anybody who, in a public forum, is called lonely, a dog, sloppy and > stupid, well he's gotta have something pretty interesting going for him.
> Todd, we're into the Interesting Zone, as Henry James used to call it.
> Yikes, indeed!

> "In the vast silence, surrounded by the intoxicating scent of wild pennyroyal and other aromatic plants, the bees buzzed."
> - Grazia Deledda. After the Divorce (1902).

why--arf--thank-you--(sqeak)--

↑ Index

435. toddbaron
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

MAYHEW wrote:
>
> Does anyone know of a study of reactionary anti-modernism? What I mean is > the sort of periodic anti-experimental reaction, often with a conservative > political ideology, that crops up every twenty years (or perhaps never > disappears). I don't mean just another ritualistic vilification of > Vendler, but something that perhaps puts some historical perspective on > the matter, with some breadth and depth. Thanks in advance.
>
> Changing the subject, I found this sentence last night in a book I > was reading:
>
> "It is characteristic of Heidegger's thought that at precisely at the > moment when he is most baffling--he refuses the explain himself."
>
> For me it is nearly the opposite: at precisely the moment I explain > myself, I am least baffling.
>

> Jonathan Mayhew
> Department of Spanish and Portuguese
> University of Kansas
> [redacted]
> [redacted]

Timothy Stelle--I believe--that's his name--at UCLA--has written in a vehemently anti-modernist tone about the need for a formal return to the formal (sic) poem.

Todd B.

↑ Index

436. Henry Gould
Re: reactionary query
Wed 19 Aug 1998

I'm glad we're talkin poetry & philosophy & criticism, rather than badmouthing Todd Baron or analysing the Clinton situation [tho there's some good poem & play material there]. I can accept Dewey's criticism of Eliot, especially when his snooty provocations were becoming New Critical food for textbooks.

But poetry is a conservative thing, fellas, profoundly so if I may use that word, as well as a progressive thing; good poetry transcends these boundaries. That was what I was trying to suggest; that Dewey has a set of paradigms or criteria just as fixed as Eliot's, if not so blatantly insignia'd with The Past. Experiment is always a good spin on Contingency; Open is a good spin-word for Inconclusive.

What if I don't accept the binary thing you set up with Pound / Davies? What if I say, with Davies, that the poem is an end-in-itself, its purpose is to play out its own teleology; but what if I say with Eliot that the Universe is also a Work of Art, a Creation, and the perfected work of art - by being perfect - becomes a part of that supernatural Nature? Ask Blake where that fits into the vatic/toy continuum.

Poetry is made by readers; the Poet is a Reader. Poetry is an actual Stream in which the reader begins to swim - with or against the currents. By conservative I mean that the poet is essentially a Listener who hears things down to their most ancient roots & relates them to the present; who "brings things old & new out of the storehouse".

The reactionary/progressive boundaries of 100 years ago have shifted; the hierarchies of the middle ages seen as a threat to democracy may still have a stranglehold on institutions (viz. the Anglican Lambeth Conference recently adjourned) but they are no longer of much intellectual interest. The concept of "experiment" in poetry is not only an open, forward-looking, vatic opportunity;

in academic circles it has a converse face: aestheticism, just as remote from mundane realities as any of Davies' propositions, to which any intellectual or philosophical challenge to "nominalism" [Peirce's term for relativism] is seen as a threat. Let me quote from the founder of Dewey's pragmatism as he reflects on some of those outmoded Dantean categories (from Peirce's essay "The Concept of God"):

"No concept, not even those of mathemativs, is absolutely precise; and some of the most important for everyday use are extremely vague. Nevertheless, our instinctive beliefs involving such concepts are far more trustworthy than the best established results of science, if these be precisely under- stood. For instance, we all think that there is an element of order in the universe. Could any laboratory experiments render that proposition more cert- ain than instinct or common sense leaves it? It is reidiculous to broach such a question. But when anybody undertakes to say _precisely_ what that order consists in, he will quickly find he outruns all logical warrant. Men who are given to defining too much inevitably run themselves into confusion with the vague concepts of common sense...

...Now such being the pragamticist's answer to the question what he means by the word "God", the question whether there really is such a being is the question whether all physical science is merely the figment - the arbitrary fig ment - of the students of nature, and further whether the _one_ lesson of Gautama Boodha, Confucius, Socrates, and all who from any point of view have had their ways of conduct determined by meditation upon the physico-psychical universe, be only their arbitrary notion or be the Truth behind the appear- ances which the frivolous man does not think of; and whether the superhuman courage which such contemplation has conferred upon priests who go to pass their lives with lepers and refuse all offer of rescue is mere silly fanaticism the passion of a baby, or whether it is strength derived from the power of the truth. Now the only guide to the answer to this question lies in the power of the passion of love which more or less overmasters every agnostic scientist and everybody who seriously and deeply considers the universe. But whatever there may be of _argument_ in all this is as nothing, the merest nothing, in comparison to its force as an appeal to one's own instinct, which is to argument what substance is to shadow, what bed-rock is to the built foundations of a cathedral...

...Where would such an idea, say as that of God, come from, if not from direct experience? Would you make it the result of some kind of reasoning, good or bad? Why, reasoning can supply the mind with nothing in the world except an estimate of the value of a statistical ratio, that is, how often certain kinds of things are found in certain combinations in the ordinary courser of experience. And scepticism, in the sense of doubt of the validity of elementary ideas - which is really a proposal to turn an idea out of court and permit no inquiry into its applicability - is doubly condemned by the fundamental principle of scientific method - condemned first as obstructing inquiry, and condemned second because it is treating some other than a statistical ratio as a thing to be argued about. No: as to God, open your eyes - and your heart, which is also a perceptive organ - and you see him. But you may ask, Don't you admit there are any delusions? Yes: I may think a thing is black, and on close examination it may turn out to be bottle- green. But I cannot think a thing is black if there is no such thing to be seen as black. Neither can I think that a certain action is self-sacrificing, if no such thing as self-sacrifice exists, although it may be very rare. It is the nominalists, and the nominalists alone, who indulge in such scepticism, which the scientific method utterly condemns."

- Charles Peirce, founder of Pragmatism

↑ Index

437. mj devaney

Re: _Economist_ piece on the state of poetry

Wed 19 Aug 1998

Thought the list might find this interesting. --MJ Devaney

_____ Economist December 20, 1997

MODERN VERSE

> Poetic injustice
>
> WHAT ever happened to poetry? Once poets spoke for the age and strutted the cultural stage as stars. What would European romanticism have been without Byron or Schiller? French symbolism without Rimbaud or Baudelaire? Anglo-American modernism without Eliot or Pound?
>
> It is easy now to forget just how ubiquitous poetry once was, and how central to the cultivated life. Schoolchildren were compelled to memorise long stanzas, until the rhythms of Tennyson or Longfellow were inscribed indelibly upon young minds. New poetry was reviewed as widely as novels, biographies and cookbooks are today. Now-forgotten poets such as America's John Greenleaf Whittier could become as famous, sometimes on the strength of a single poem, as actors, tycoons or politicians. Verse was humorous, populist, narrative, satirical or polemical; it was lyrical, personal or learnedly esoteric. Great occasions were marked by poems whose phrases sometimes entered the language, at least for a while. Walt Whitman's "When lilacs last in the door-yard bloom'd" mourned the death of Abraham Lincoln. Robert Frost's reading of "The Gift Outright" dignified the inauguration of John Kennedy.

All that, however, was a long time ago. Today, contemporary poetry seems more akin to collecting butterflies, painting-by-numbers or gazing at stars: a nice pursuit for enthusiasts, but of little significance to anyone else. For many, the only poems that matter are advertising jingles, pop-music lyrics or rap music. Yet, to most people, song lyrics and rap remain one thing, poetry another. Whatever odd forms it may take, poetry is still usually assumed to consist of words to be spoken or read on their own, relished for their sound and meaning, not merely as an accompaniment to music, dancing or the latest pop video.

Old-fashioned, just-the-words poetry continues to matter in places where artistic expression is repressed. This year, Index on Censorship, which chronicles the worldwide persecution of writers, devoted its 25th anniversary issue to poets. They can still end up in jail in Turkey, Iran, China and many African countries: the jackboot still fears the quill pen. But when repression has ended, interest in poetry often evaporates. Russia is the home of such poet-heroes as Mandelstam, Akhmatova, Pasternak and Brodsky; officially tolerated poets there once filled football stadiums and people once risked their freedom, and sometimes their lives, to read something new by a forbidden hand. Today Russia seems to have turned its back on contemporary poetry, now that made-for-television movies, hamburger joints and other temptations are available.

In America and Britain, two countries with great poetic traditions and equally great poetic freedom, poetry has become more than culturally marginalised: it has fallen off the map. It is rarely reviewed in the pages of newspapers or popular magazines. Most big publishers, under pressure from their corporate bean-counters, dropped their poetry lists long ago.

The money-man, however, is no more dangerous to verse than is the modernist, with his avant-garde ethos and public-be-damned attitude. Contemporary poetry is often obscure or self-referential, neither scans nor rhymes nor tells a story, is impossible to memorise, is often about the act of writing poetry itself, is humourless, and can be more like a puzzle than a poem. Small wonder that so many general readers, even those who lap up novels or buy theatre tickets or visit art galleries, have given up on contemporary poetry. When was the last time you bought a book of contemporary poetry? Can you remember even one poem by a living poet?

More poems, less poetry

Here arises a puzzle. Ironically, as poetry has become less significant as a cultural form, more of it has been produced. In America the explosive growth of creative-writing courses in colleges and universities has produced tens of thousands of "credentialed" poets. Most of them want to see their work in print, even if few people actually read it. Hundreds of small magazines and presses exist to oblige them, usually publishing their work in minute quantities.

Len Fulton of Dustbooks, which publishes the Small Press Review, receives books from 300 new small presses and another 300 new magazines each month. Many little publishers do not survive long. But more than 1,400 magazines and 800 small presses do last long enough to find their way into Mr Fulton's biannual "Directory of Poetry Publishers". "I've been doing this for years and I still find it amazing how much is published," he says. "Why do they do it?" The Internet, too, has produced a Niagara of self-publication by aspiring poets.

This flood of versifying flows year in, year out: and it is almost completely unnoticed by the rest of the world. Some of the verse is good. But for a general reader wanting to sample it, the sheer volume is intimidating. To find something rewarding, the curious outsider has to plough through piles of dross, with little to guide him. Ask for advice, and an expert happily rattles off a list of names. Unfortunately, a second poetic expert will come up with an entirely different list. Third expert, third list. There are some fine poets writing today, but most people, with so many other claims on their time, can be forgiven for not finding them.

People power

So is poetry doomed forever to be like knitting, only less fun? Maybe not. Surprisingly, in the past few years it has begun to make something of a comeback. And the comeback has been led, not by more publications, but by more public readings.

In the 1990s, poetry readings have become hip. Pioneered by places such as the Nuyorican Café in Manhattan, readings have spread to most large British and American cities, and are being staged not only in universities and schools but in libraries, bookshops, cafés and bars. Many are no longer the soporific, reverential affairs of the past, but lively, even boisterous, events. Some readings attract hundreds of people. One regular feature is an "open mike", an invitation to anyone to read or improvise.

In America, poetry "slams" have become popular. Slam audiences, often of 200 or more, give each poem a "score" after it is read, until a final winner emerges in a "read-off". Perhaps the ultimate slam is a contest staged every June in Taos, New Mexico, to find the "Heavyweight Champion of Poetry". Quincy Troupe, the champion for two consecutive years (1994-95), describes an enthusiastic audience of "thousands" of people paying $15-20 to attend a week of readings which culminate in the "bout". The two contenders read a poem each for nine "rounds", which are scored for the audience by three judges. In the final round, the two poets have to improvise a poem from a word pulled out of a hat. The victor, cheered or jeered by the crowd, is awarded a trophy and heavyweight belt.

For some people, such razzmatazz is a long way from what poetry is, or should be, about. Mr Troupe, however, disagrees. He is a two-time winner of the American Book Award and a professor of literature and creative writing at the University of California in San Diego, and he sees no inherent contradiction between showmanship and seriousness. "I write for the page," he says. "Any poet worth his salt does. But I think you can have mastery, you can have thought-provoking, difficult poems, and still be able to lift the poem off the page for an audience. And if you're going to read in front of people, you've got to give them a real performance."

Is the vogue for public reading merely a fad, the final debasement of poetry as a pretentious sort of cabaret? Or is it the beginning of a genuine revival? The answer depends on what you think went wrong in the first place. It depends, that is, on whether poets are responsible for their own isolation, or whether poetry was doomed anyway to be shoved aside by television and films and popular music and web-surfing.

"A little province for yourself"

That question has long divided the poetry world. In 1991 Dana Gioia, a poet (and former marketing manager for General Foods), set off a fierce debate in American poetry circles with an attack on American academia for turning poetry into a smug, producer-driven lobby, concerned only with its own survival and indifferent to the fact that it had alienated a wider audience. In an article entitled "Can Poetry Matter?", published in the Atlantic Monthly (and later elaborated in a book of the same title, published by the Graywolf Press), Mr Gioia lambasted the creative-writing establishment for loss of critical nerve, back-scratching and complacency.

"The proliferation of literary journals and presses over the past 30 years has been a response less to an increased appetite for poetry among the public than to the desperate need of writing teachers for professional validation," he wrote. "Like subsidised farming that grows food no one wants, a poetry industry has been created to serve the interests of the producers and not the consumers. And in the process the integrity of the art has been betrayed."

The wounds his words inflicted are still raw. When asked about Mr Gioia's argument, David Fenza--the director of Associated Writing Programs, which represents creative-writing teachers in academia--speaks of "smarmy little putzes that are blinded by their own presumptions." He flatly rejects Mr Gioia's criticisms.

"They just don't make sense," Mr Fenza says. "The spread of writing programmes represents the democratisation of the arts. Creative writing is so attractive to students because it is one way of exercising the efficacy of the human will. There's an awful lot in our society that tells people that they don't have a free choice, that they can't make a difference. You can create a little province for yourself in a work of art, where your choices are paramount. That's a wonderful place to be."

It must be, because 11,000 American students choose to work for degrees in creative writing every year, according to Mr Fenza, of whom about half "do poetry". The number of American universities offering creative-writing degrees has quadrupled in the past 20 years to 285. Mr Fenza blames a "stupefaction and dumbing-down of the media" for its indifference to poetry, and does not believe that the creative-writing industry itself bears any of the responsibility, or even that poetry has been marginalised.

Mr Gioia remains unrepentant. Writing programmes are highly profitable for universities, he argues: hence their growth. They require no expensive laboratories, workshops or computers, just a room and a teacher. Students like creative writing because they cannot fail, since self-expression is difficult to mark. One result, Mr Gioia says, is a generation of professional poets with little experience of life outside full-time education. "The average academic poet has been in school since the age of six," he says. This hardly favours adventurousness or diversity.

The reaction to his article and book, Mr Gioia says, showed that "there is a huge reservoir of interest in poetry out there, but most people feel cut off from what they see as official culture." He was deluged with letters. People from all walks of life, including housewives, ranchers, even a Hollywood producer and a UN ambassador, wrote to support his attack on the poetry subculture. Many, he says, complained that he had not gone far enough. "These people felt deprived of something important."

Baudelaire on the Frigidaire

For Mr Gioia, the sudden boom in public readings over the past few years has vindicated his view that the poetry establishment has been smothering a wider audience for poetry. "It happened completely outside the academy," he says. "The experts were taken by surprise." He is greatly encouraged by the popularity of rap ("the metre of Beowulf with African-American syncopation on top"), and by the recent rediscovery of such as "cowboy poetry", for which there are now 200 festivals a year (horses get in free). Mr Gioia himself is one of a group of "new formalist" poets returning to traditional poetic forms.

There is other evidence that a wider public is interested in poetry, even if not in the fare offered by many contemporary poets. How else to explain the success of Dave Kapell, a former English major and sometime songwriter in Minneapolis? Four years ago he stumbled upon the idea of selling little boxes of word magnets that people can use to compose poems on the doors of their refrigerators. Since then, sales of his "Magnetic Poetry" kits have soared. He currently ships 50,000 kits a month and expects sales of the kits and related merchandise to reach $6.5m this year.

"Many people start out by creating something pretty juvenile, often something obscene," admits Mr Kapell, "but most quickly start to take it more seriously." One who takes "magnetic poetry" seriously is Robert Pinsky, America's current poet laureate. He has written the preface to a new American anthology (from Workman Publishing) of ordinary people's "magnetic" poems, which he praises as true popular art, "the compositions of actual American people, produced not for profit but for the fun of it, to satisfy that peculiar, deep itch to make something new." (In fact, much of the collection proves that, although many people do have that peculiar, deep itch, they should probably scratch it in private.)

The enthusiasm for posted poetry extends also to public transport. Poems on London's underground trains have enriched dreary commutes for a decade. A collection of these short poems, by contemporary poets as well as long-dead masters, has sold more than 250,000 copies (Cassell), and underground systems from Sydney to Stockholm have followed London's lead, as have buses in American cities. Britain's Poetry Society recently received a £450,000 grant from National Lottery funds to place poets (not just poems) in public parks, health centres, libraries, bookshops and zoos, as well as in schools. Poets are finding work in prisons, schools and companies, helping people to express their thoughts and feelings.

More than a hanky

As heartening as all this is for poets, who are usually grateful for any attention or gainful employment, a vogue for poetry as therapy is not quite the same as a revival of poetry as art. Composing poems on one's refrigerator door, or on the wall of one's prison cell, may bring comfort. But does it really spread a genuine interest in poetry, or is it just another gimmick for the emotionally constipated and the underworked? And does anyone but the author really want to read the poems produced?

> Viv Beeby, the producer of the BBC's "Poetry Please", a long-running radio programme which invites requests from listeners, reports that most listeners ask for old favourites learned in school, not for new poems. "People still seem to turn to poetry in times of crisis, when they can't find the words to express their feelings," she says. "I suspect that most of our listeners don't read poetry at other times." Verses on headstones and in Valentine's Day cards have always been popular. But surely poetry, if it is to matter as an art form, has to be something more than a verbal handkerchief for life's weepy moments?

> No doubt it is too much to expect that poets will ever again be cultural avatars, or that legions of readers will clamour for the next verse epic from some successor to Milton or Pope or Tennyson. And yet poetry need not, perhaps, have been pushed quite so far to the sidelines. Serious playwrights and novelists still find an audience, and they still occasionally make people sit up and listen. By comparison, too many poets seem to have lost the ability, or in many cases the desire, to reach readers outside their coterie, beyond their "little province of the self".

> The beauty of a surprising image; moments of revelation or contemplation; the pleasure of a well-turned or oft-remembered phrase: these are satisfactions that poetry, above all other arts, can offer. Society can afford to ignore contemporary poetry, and poets can complacently accept their isolation. But if that is how it is to be, something valuable will have been lost--valuable beyond words.

↑ Index

438. Erik Sweet
"Tool A Magazine" available now!
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Announcing in the right corner..."Tool a Magazine"

"Available right now!!!" via mail!!!! and also at
St. Marks Bookstore in NYCity

The first issue of "Tool a Magazine" is available now for 6 $ postage paid

!!!!The first issue is 90 pages and includes great work from the following!!!!

Charles Bernstein, Aram Saroyan, Keston Sutherland, Jordan Davis, Brenda Iijima, Robert Kelly, Pierre Joris, Bobbie West, Harriet Zinnes, Gary Sullivan, Leslie Scalapino, Chris Fonkhauser, Joel Lewis, Patrick F. Durgin, Anselm Berrigan, Jeff Clark, MTC Cronin, Chris Stroffolino, Jason Lynn, M. Kettner, and Michael McColl.

This poetry magazine-journal is based out of Albany, NY and is paid for entirely by the editors, Lori Quillen and Erik Sweet.

Our Party at Teachers and Writers was amazingly fun and much thanks to the readers!

Pierre Joris, Anselm Berrigan, Jordan Davis, and Eleni Sikelianos who were all fantastic!!! Special thanks to Pierre's son Miles for breaking the Pinata!!! Special Thanks to Teachers and Writers and Jordan Davis for giving us the space for the party it was a blast!

Please make any checks out to Lori Quillen next issue.... to be printed in October 1998 so send submisions!

"Tool a Magazine"
"Tool A Magazine"
"Tool a Magazine"

↑ Index

439. r. drake
Re: Jornal de Poesia
Wed 19 Aug 1998

---

in _Anthology of Concrete Poetry_, (Emmett Williams, ed.; Something Else Press 1967) There's an english version of
"Servida~o de passagem", frm Edwin Morgan...

> ...i'm still looking for a translation or h. de campos' "transient servitude"
> so if you come across one please back channel me.
>
> thanks,
> kevin h.

↑ Index

440. R M Daley
Re: Writer on Line Interview
Wed 19 Aug 1998

---

im offended.

↑ Index

441. Mark DuCharme
Re: je est un autre
Wed 19 Aug 1998

Je est un auteur. Signed, Joe

>My word-processing spell check translates "je" as "Joe." I propose we adopt >joe as the universal pronoun.
>
>--
>Laura Wright
>Library Assistant
>Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
>2130 Arapahoe Ave
>Boulder, CO 80302
>[redacted]
> * * * * * *
>"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
> * * * * * *
>"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein
>

Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

442. Mark DuCharme

Re: location location location

Wed 19 Aug 1998

---

w/out fearing to sound too grouchy-- let me say that any location other than that one Michaux speaks of I often find a hindrance. (but need I hasten to add that hindrances sometimes can be USEFUL)???

-Mark

>toddbaron wrote:
>
>> a question posed to the group:
>>
>> how does "location" (the "local" --Olson)
>> affect or help affect yr writing?
>
>Todd:
>Here is an excerpt from a still raw (read rough draft) translation of >Michaux (thanks to Anselm), which speaks to my experience of location.
>Location is a changing constant (does that make it an everpresent >variable?) and thus always influential, always useful. What's really >interesting to me is the location within oneself (or joe's self) that >external locations and situations may affect. For instance, the ugliest >wallpaper in the world, found in a Las Vegas hotel, does something to >the mind which then goes its own ways...
>
>The Michaux:
>"There is a place in the body where one prefers to live. It’s not the >same >for everyone. That’s normal. But it is normal for many to like to stay
>in >their heads. They go about, of course, move around, from organ to >organ, >hither and yon, but they like to return often to their heads."
>--
>Laura Wright
>Library Assistant
>Allen Ginsberg Library, The Naropa Institute
>2130 Arapahoe Ave
>Boulder, CO 80302
>[redacted]
> * * * * * *

>"All music is music..." -- Ted Berrigan
> * * * * * *
>"It is very much like it" -- Gertrude Stein
>

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

443. Erik Sweet
"Tool a Magazine" address
Wed 19 Aug 1998

The address to order "Tool a Magazine" is:

"Tool a Magazine"
P.O. Box 3125
Albany, New York 12203

Sorry I forgot! Checks payable to Lori Quillen, 6 $

erik sweet

↑ Index

444. George Thompson
Re: Writer on Line Interview
Wed 19 Aug 1998

> im offended.

Dear R M Daley,

I find this kind of post utterly useless and a painful waste of time. No context, no substance. I've begun to automatically delete this kind of post from the various lists that I listen to, when I figure out the sort of people who like this sort of thing, and who are prone to it.

If you want me to read your posts, please give me a reason to. Otherwise, deletion will be automatic.

GT

↑ Index

445. ken|n|ing

Re: _Economist_ piece on the state of poetry

Thu 20 Aug 1998

<< WHAT ever happened to poetry? Once poets spoke for the age and strutted the cultural stage as stars. What would European romanticism have been without Byron or Schiller?
French symbolism without Rimbaud or Baudelaire?
Anglo-American modernism without Eliot or Pound?>>

Scanning this article, I thought of Myung Mi Kim interviewed in Tripwire #1, finding a context for poetry, especially as she touches on a theory of "generosity" (which I'm not prepared to try and paraphrase) whereas the above article discusses the glut of small press publications. Frankly, mention of Pound (whom it is always safe to assume your contentious press-citizen has not read) alone contradicts what can only be the unsafe assumptions put forth in the second sentence. The way "poetry" is being considered in this article, by this author, allows for it to only be contextualized one way, negatively. Why, then, does this article matter? Whatever the statistics, which are fraudulent at best, I imagine, in any reasonable summation of a poetry's effectiveness in the social/civic sphere, the poem is no longer a site of knowing but is expected to be what none of the above cited authors ever truly were, affirming. Hypocrite reader, Patrick F. Durgin

|
|
k e n n i n g``````````````|``````````````````````````
a newsletter of contemporary |poetry, poetics, and non-fiction writing
|418 Brown St. #10 Iowa City, IA 52245 USA

↑ Index

446. Fredrik Hertzberg LIT

bp would have liked this

Thu 20 Aug 1998

---------- Forwarded message ----------
>Date: Thu, 20 Aug 1998 09:54:45 +0800
>X-MSMail-Priority: Normal
>Subject: Fw: scroll down
>From: "Lubica Ucnik" <[redacted]>
>To: <[redacted]>
>X-List: [redacted]
>X-List-Unsubscribe:
<mailto:[redacted]?body=leave%20film-philosophy>

>Reply-To: [redacted]
>Sender: [redacted]
>Errors-To: [redacted]
>Precedence: list

> HOLD THE DOWN THE SCROLL ARROW AND KEEP GOING
>
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people
> * hi people

```
*   hi people
*   hi peopl e
*   hi peopl   e
*   hi peopl    e
*   hi peop l    e
*   hi peop  l    e
*   hi peop   l    e
*   hi peop    l    e
*   hi peo p    l    e
*   hi peo  p    l    e
*   hi peo   p    l    e
*   hi peo    p    l    e
*   hi pe o    p    l    e
*   hi pe  o    p    l    e
*   hi pe   o    p    l    e
*   hi pe    o    p    l    e
*   hi p e    o    p    l    e
*   hi p  e    o    p    l    e
*   hi p   e    o    p    l    e
*   hi p    e    o    p    l    e
*   hi  p    e    o    p    l    e
*   hi   p    e    o    p    l    e
*   hi    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h  i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h   i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*    h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*     h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*      h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*       h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*        h    i    p    e    o    p    l e
*         h    i    p    e    o    p    le
*          h    i    p    e    o    p   le
*           h    i    p    e    o    p  le
*            h    i    p    e    o    p le
*             h    i    p    e    o    ple
*              h    i    p    e    o   ple
*               h    i    p    e    o  ple
*                h    i    p    e    o ple
*                 h    i    p    e    ople
*                  h    i    p    e   ople
*                   h    i    p    e  ople
*                    h    i    p    e ople
*                     h    i    p    eople
*                      h    i    p   eople
```

```
*                    h    i    p  eople
*                     h    i    p eople
*                      h    i    people
*                       h    i   people
*                        h    i  people
*                         h    i people
*                          h   i people
*                           h  i people
*                            h i people
*                             hi people
*                              hi people
*                               hi people
*                                hi people
*                                 hi people
*                                  hi people
*                                   hi people
*                                    hi people
*                                     hi people
*                                      hi p e ople
*                                       hi p  e  ople
*                                        hi p   e   ople
*                                         hi p    e    ople
*                                          hi p     e     ople
*                                           hi p      e      ople
*                                            hi p       e       ople
*                                             hi p        e        ople
*                                              hi p         e         ople
*                                               hi p          e          ople
*                                                hi p           e           ople
*                                                 hi p            e            ople
*                                                  hi p             e             ople
*                                                   hi p              e              ople
*                                                    hi p               e               ople
*                                                     hi p                e                ople
*                                                      hi p                 e                 ople
*                                                       hi p                  e                  ople
*                                                        hi p                   e                   ople
*                                                         hi p                    e                    ople
*                                                          hi p                     e                     ople
*                                                           hi p                      e                      ople
*                                                            hi p                       e                       ople
*                                                             hi p                        e                        ople
*                                                              hi p                         e                         ople
*                                                               hi p                          e                          ople
*                                                                hi p                           e                           ople
*                                                                 hi p                            e                            ople
*                                                                  hi p                             e                             ople
*                                                                   hi p                              e                              ople
*                                                                    hi p                               e                               ople
*                                                                     hi p                                e                                ople
*                                                                      hi p                                 e                                 ople
*                                                                       hi p                                  e                                  ople
*                                                                        hi p                                   e                                   ople
*                                                                         hi p                                    e                                    ople
*                                                                          hi p                                     e                                     ople
*                                                                           hi p                                      e                                      ople
*                                                                            hi p                                       e                                       ople
*                                                                             hi p                                        e                                        ople
*                                                                              hi p                                         e                                         ople
*                                                                               hi p                                          e                                          ople
*                                                                                hi p                                           e                                           ople
*                                                                                 hi p                                            e                                            ople
*                                                                                  hi p                                             e                                             ople
*                                                                                   hi p                                              e                                              ople
*                                                                                    hi p                                               e                                               ople
*                                                                                     hi p                                                e                                                ople
*                                                                                      hi p                                                 e                                                 ople
*                                                                                       hi p                                                  e                                                  ople
*                                                                                        hi p                                                   e                                                   ople
*                                                                                         hi p                                                    e                                                    ople
*                                                                                          hi p                                                     e                                                     ople
*                                                                                           hi p                                                      e                                                      ople
*                                                                                            hi p                                                       e                                                       ople
*                                                                                             hi p                                                        e                                                        ople
*                                                                                              hi p                                                         e                                                         ople
*                                                                                               hi p                                                          e                                                          ople
*                                                                                                hi p                                                           e                                                           ople
*                                                                                                 hi p                                                            e                                                            ople
*                                                                                                  hi p                                                             e                                                             ople
*                                                                                                   hi p                                                              e                                                              ople
*                                                                                                    hi p                                                               e                                                               ople
*                                                                                                     hi p                                                                e                                                                ople
*                                                                                                      hi p                                                                 e                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                       hi p                                                                  e                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                        hi p                                                                   e                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                         hi p                                                                    e                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                          hi p                                                                     e                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                           hi p                                                                      e                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                            hi p                                                                       e                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                             hi p                                                                        e                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                              hi p                                                                         e                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                               hi p                                                                          e                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                hi p                                                                           e                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                            e                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                             e                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                              e                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                               e                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                e                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                 e                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                  e                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                   e                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                    e                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                     e                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                      e                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                       e                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                        e                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                         e                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                          e                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                           e                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                            e                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                             e                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                              e                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                               e                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                e                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                 e                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                  e                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                   e                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                    e                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                     e                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                      e                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                       e                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                        e                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                         e                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                          e                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                           e                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                            e                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                             e                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                              e                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                               e                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                         ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                          ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                           ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                            ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                             ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                   hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                              ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                    hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                               ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                     hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                      hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                 ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                       hi p                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  e                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                  ople
*                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                                        hi p
```

* hi p e ople
* hi people
* hi people
* *hi people

```
*   hi peopl   e
*   hi peopl    e
*   hi peop l    e
*   hi peop  l    e
*   hi peop   l    e
*   hi peop    l    e
*   hi peo p    l    e
*   hi peo  p    l    e
*   hi peo   p    l    e
*   hi peo    p    l    e
*   hi pe o    p    l    e
*   hi pe  o    p    l    e
*   hi pe   o    p    l    e
*   hi pe    o    p    l    e
*   hi p e    o    p    l    e
*   hi p  e    o    p    l    e
*   hi p   e    o    p    l    e
*   hi p    e    o    p    l    e
*   hi  p    e    o    p    l    e
*   hi   p    e    o    p    l    e
*   hi    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h  i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h   i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*   h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*    h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*     h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*      h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*       h    i    p    e    o    p    l    e
*        h    i    p    e    o    p    l e
*         h    i    p    e    o    p    le
*          h    i    p    e    o    p  le
*           h    i    p    e    o    p le
*            h    i    p    e    o    p le
*             h    i    p    e    o    ple
*              h    i    p    e    o   ple
*               h    i    p    e    o  ple
*                h    i    p    e    o ple
*                 h    i    p    e   ople
*                  h    i    p    e  ople
*                   h    i    p    e ople
*                    h    i    p   eople
*                     h    i    p  eople
*                      h    i    p eople
*                       h    i   p eople
```

```
*                    h    i    people
*                     h    i   people
*                      h    i  people
*                       h    i people
*                        h   i people
*                         h  i people
*                          h i people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                           hi people
*                          hi p e ople
*                         hi p  e  ople
*                        hi p   e   ople
*                       hi p    e    ople
*                      hi p     e     ople
*                     hi p      e      ople
*                    hi p       e       ople
*                   hi p        e        ople
*                  hi p         e         ople
*                 hi p          e          ople
*                hi p           e           ople
*               hi p            e            ople
*              hi p             e             ople
*             hi p              e              ople
*            hi p               e               ople
*           hi p                e                ople
*          hi p                 e                 ople
*         hi p                  e                  ople
*        hi p                   e                   ople
*       hi p                    e                    ople
*      hi p                     e                     ople
*     hi p                      e                      ople
*    hi p                       e                       ople
*   hi p                        e                        ople
*  hi p                         e                         ople
* hi p                          e                          ople
*  hi p                         e                         ople
*   hi p                        e                        ople
*    hi p                       e                       ople
*     hi p                      e                      ople
*      hi p                     e                     ople
*       hi p                    e                    ople
*        hi p                   e                   ople
*         hi p                  e                  ople
*          hi p                 e                 ople
*           hi p                e                ople
*            hi p               e               ople
*             hi p              e              ople
*              hi p             e             ople
*               hi p            e            ople
*                hi p           e           ople
*                 hi p          e          ople
*                  hi p         e         ople
*                   hi p        e        ople
*                    hi p       e       ople
*                     hi p      e      ople
*                      hi p     e     ople
*                       hi p    e    ople
*                        hi p   e   ople
*                         hi p  e  ople
*                          hi p e ople
*                           hi people
```

```
*                    hi people
*                    hi people
*                    hi people
*                    hi people
*                    hi people
*                   hi people
*                  hi people
*                 hi people
*                hi people
*               hi people
*              hi people
*             hi people
*            hi people
*           hi people
*          hi people
*         hi people
*        hi people
*       hi people
*      hi people
*     hi people
*    hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   hi people
*   STOP SCROLLING
```

↑ Index

447. George Bowering
Re: Writer on Line Interview
Thu 20 Aug 1998

> im offended.

Is that habitual? Or have you been offended by something specific?

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

448. Michael Magee
Re: reactionary query
Thu 20 Aug 1998

from Henry's quote from Peirce:

"...Now such being the pragamticist's answer to the question what he means by the word "God", the question whether there really is such a being is the question whether all physical science is merely the figment - the arbitrary fig ment - of the students of nature, and further whether the _one_ lesson of Gautama Boodha, Confucius, Socrates, and all who from any point of view have had their ways of conduct determined by meditation upon the physico-psychical universe, be only their arbitrary notion or be the Truth behind the appear-ances which the frivolous man does not think of; and whether the superhuman courage which such contemplation has conferred upon priests who go to pass their lives with lepers and refuse all offer of rescue is mere silly fanaticism the passion of a baby, or whether it is strength derived from the power of the truth."

Thanks for this Henry I think it opens up much, though it's also a slippery slope, as Peirce must have recognized: he's relying on one of James's arguments from The Varieties of Religious Experience, namely, that God is "real" b/c, as a concept, he's been damn useful (why else bring in the sacrifical priests and lepers for back-up?) As James put it in Pragmatism, "how could pragmatism possibly deny God's existence? She could see no meaning in treating as 'not true' a notion that was pragmatically so successful." Or, as he wrote once to Oliver Wendell Holmes, "If God is dead or at least irrelevant, ditto everything pertaining to the beyong" (this is, incidentally, 13 yrs before Nietzsche's famous pronouncement). Now, you can see where this is headed: James likes "God" but he's setting up a situation where the old boy has to earn his keep. Needless to say, any Christain w/ even remotely fundamentalist leanings would throw a shit fit over this logic. Now, back to Peirce: he makes a somewhat different point, a kind of "18 million people can't be wrong" point (this is the number of people who bought Celine Dion's Titanic soundtrack, and so is quite obviously not true); but he also leans toward James in describing the cultural work that the concept does (the Priest's faith sends him to the leper). I wouldn't disagree entirely, but I'd want to bend the point somewhat - the key term to me is "faith" not "God." One always here's on television that people who believe in God have longer life spans than people who don't: but, not surprisingly, the media always leaves out a key, related finding, namely, that atheists of conviction (people who really "believe" in atheism) live just as long - it's us doubting, ambivalent suckers that die early, most likely from the wear and tear of stress. Now, again, what have we done to poor old "God" if we say, yes, let's keep him around, he relieves stress and increases our life span: one could say the same about a good jog in the park. And as for that priest, well, I wouldn't want to be in an argument where I had to argue for the good done in the name of God against someone arguing for the bad.

All I mean to suggest here is that once Pierce or James brings the pragmatic method to a discussion of God, God is in trouble; you start to see the writing on the wall. At the same time, I think one needs "God-terms" whose success are measured by how they operate in the culture, what they do, how they motivate. Dewey's God-term, in this sense, is "democracy," as it is for Ralph Ellison, as it is, I would say, for Cornel West. This doesn't make "democracy" any more true than "God" - and I'd agree w/ Jameson that democracy never in fact "exists," though I'd disagree with the conclusions he draws from this fact about its efficacy as a term. As an active symbol, I think democracy still earns its keep (though I like to add things to it eg, "plebeian democracy" "radical democracy"). "God" I'm less sure about.

-m.

↑ Index

449. henry
Re: reactionary query
Thu 20 Aug 1998

Well, Mike, some good points there - but basically you're repeating what Peirce himself said in the part you didn't quote: anybody who starts to prove God's existence or attributes immediately gets into trouble. - Henry

↑ Index

450. Michael Magee
Re: _Economist_ piece on the state of poetry
Thu 20 Aug 1998

Doesn't this idiot read Glamour magazine!?! (as a whole his piece represents most of the things in the world that I hate...at least until I have one more cup of coffee and reach equilibrium...) -m.

"In America and Britain, two countries with great poetic traditions and equally great poetic freedom, poetry has become more than culturally marginalised: it has fallen off the map. It is rarely reviewed in the pages of newspapers or popular magazines. Most big publishers, under pressure from their corporate bean-counters, dropped their poetry lists long ago."

↑ Index

451. Michael Magee
Re: reactionary query
Thu 20 Aug 1998

---

touche'

According to henry:
>
> Well, Mike, some good points there - but basically you're repeating what > Peirce himself said in the part you didn't quote: anybody who starts to > prove God's existence or attributes immediately gets into trouble.
> - Henry
>

↑ Index

452. David W. McFadden
Re: Bullworth
Thu 20 Aug 1998

[redacted] writes:
>>It's a strange and fascinating movie.
>>Some critics say it's profoundly racist. Others say it's the most >>leftist and subversive thing ever done in Hollywood.
>>Can it be both?
Leftists historically have never been immune from racism. And racism can certainly be subversive. But to this viewer Bullsworth wasn't even superficially racist. In fact it was profoundly anti-racist!

Now Saving Private Ryan, that was racist!
By the way, according to Yevgeny Yevtushenko it was Warren Beatty who, before the fall of the Soviet Union, smuggled the manuscript of YY's Silver and Steel: 20th Century Russian Poetry, out of Russia and plunked it down on somebody's desk at Doubleday. Pub. in 1993.
So it's only natural that when he needed a chorus he turned to Amiri Baraka (sp?).
Perhaps Warren Beatty should be given an Honorary Membership in the Poetics List, eh?
dwm
"I never speak to anyone under grade 11."
- Overheard on Wellesley Street near Jarvis Collegiate.

↑ Index

453. Jordan Davis
more recent economist article
Thu 20 Aug 1998

The infuriatingly dull-witted piece on the state of poetry collaged-in here is from the end of 1997, The Economist's Xmas special. While it is bad, it is old bad. There is an article in last week's Economist (the one with Old Glory full of bulletholes) reviewing David Lehman's new history of the New York School, _The Last Avant Garde_. Also discussed are Ashbery's new collection, Amy Clampitt and Raymond Carver's collecteds, and Mark Doty's new book.

Why do people keep saying John Ashbery's poetry is difficult and humorless?

Jordan

↑ Index

454. henry
Re: reactionary query
Thu 20 Aug 1998

On Thu, 20 Aug 1998 08:18:18 -0400 Michael Magee said:
>touche'
>
>According to henry:
>>
>> Well, Mike, some good points there - but basically you're repeating what >> Peirce himself said in the part you didn't quote: anybody who starts to >> prove God's existence or attributes immediately gets into trouble.
>> - Henry

the part in Peirce about the uselessness of argument in this sphere sounds a lot like Whitman. Both of them had Emersonian affinities; Peirce came out of a Boston family with Transcendentalist connections. But Nicolas of Cusa (ca.1440) in _Of Learned Ignorance_ seems better to me than all of them on these issues. - Henry Gould [p.s. oh-oh - I see Jordan has sent a post - now I'm in for it!! - back to the real world, monks!!]

↑ Index

455. james perez
brasil
Thu 20 Aug 1998

---

to whomever was looking for things brazilian for _Samizdat_ (sorry lost the original post and the computer is crash-happy today), check this site out

http://www.ekac.org/

it's one home of Eduardo Kac...he was born/grew up in Brazil and has done a lot of interesting things, mostly multimedia/technology...know that hyperpoetry stuff...now he teaches at School of the Arts Institute Chicago, or at least last I heard; if he can't provide you with stuff itself, maybe he knows some real live brazilians who can and as a post-script to my tech problems of today, I of course had my address book set up so that it sent this message originally to the listserv command post, trying again.

jperez

_____
Get Your Private, Free Email at http://www.hotmail.com

↑ Index

456. Peter Balestrieri
Regarding Civility on the List
Thu 20 Aug 1998

To David McFadden:

I would have thought it was obvious to anyone that the recent message posted by Laura Wright to the List regarding Todd Baron was a regrettable mistake, meant to be private, and mortifying to its sender. A MISTAKE. My post was meant to reflect my renewed belief in poetic justice and an exercising of my poetic License to Kill. Your reactions, with their gems from Bartlett's, are just silly. I would like to say that I am sloppy and stupid and that many of my ideals, ideas, and values are puppy-dog. I am often very lonely. Big deal. And as to your use of quotation, you're playing with fire. A panhandler walks up to a Wall Street financier and asks for a handout. Wall Street says, "Neither a borrower nor a lender be. William Shakespeare." The panhandler replies, "Fuck you! David Mamet."

PB

↑ Index

457. Susan Schultz
Re: more recent economist article
Thu 20 Aug 1998

Yes, Jordan, and the new _Economist_ article says something about Mark Doty's being "the finest American poet since Robert Lowell."

Susan Schultz

↑ Index

458. Erik Sweet
Need Persons and Poetry
Thu 20 Aug 1998

First off: need MTC Cronin to backchannel with Australian ground address

another thing that is:Poetics Journal, ed by Lyn Hejinian and Watten, is this available online via the EPC?

erik

↑ Index

459. Loss Pequen~o Glazier
Re: Need Persons and Poetry
Thu 20 Aug 1998

Erik, Unfortunately this is not available at the EPC, though it sure seems it would be a good thing. -- Loss Glazier

At 02:06 PM 8/20/98 -0400, you wrote:
>First off: need MTC Cronin to backchannel with Australian ground address
>
>another thing that is:Poetics Journal, ed by Lyn Hejinian and Watten,
>
>is this available online via the EPC?
>

>erik
>

↑ Index

460. Erik Sweet
Need Persons and Poetry/Cats
Thu 20 Aug 1998

I visited Bard to meet Scalapino in July and watched Watten give a lecture/reading....He gave out free xeroxed copies of Poetics Journal and mine was missing pages...I really enjoyed the piece done by Rod Smith using lines from old CIA manuels that he had found in the Washington DC area. My missing pages had Scalapino, Watten on HEttie Jones and Arkadii Dragomoshenko. Where can i order it, Small Press Distribution?

Anyone have an good feedback on the new Bernadette Mayer book "Another Smashed Pinecone," we picked it up this weekend in ny and it is great- good cover....

Oh yeah, this one writer, Travis Ortiz has a piece in the Poetics Journal that is interesting, "from variously, not then" he also has a piece he sent to me for "Tool a Magazine" which is equally interesting and we plan to put in numero # 2.

see ya

erik sweet

↑ Index

461. Jerry McGuire
deep south newsletter 2, schedule & registration
Thu 20 Aug 1998

NEWSLETTER OF THE DEEP SOUTH WRITERS CONFERENCE

Volume 4 Number 2
Summer 1998

ANNOUNCING THE THIRTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL FALL DEEP SOUTH WRITERS CONFERENCE
SEPTEMBER 24-27, 1998

The English Department of the University of Southwestern Louisiana is pleased to announce what is likely to be the liveliest Deep South Writers Conference ever. It is loaded with special events and features that will make it possible for everyone attending-every writer, fan, and student of great writing-to connect with our visiting writers and our own fine writing community in ways that will be both entertaining and profitable. Many of the events at this year's conference will focus on an outdoor motif, emphasizing literary and artistic approaches to nature. An extraordinary range of nature essayists, poets, and photographers will be available to meet with registrants for a weekend of workshops and readings. Here are some of the things we've got planned:

•A screening of the gripping neo-noir film The Last Seduction, followed by a discussion with its writer, Steve Barancik
•An exhibition of collaborative art-works by photographers and poets
•Panels, lectures, and workshops on genre writing, nature writing, journaling, the teaching of creative writing, and interart collaboration
•A special folklore panel treating questions of Death and Dying in literature (featuring an exhibition of poems and photographs of Mexican roadside shrines organized by New Mexico artist Paige DeShong)
•A return visit to Louisiana by William Pitt Root
•The debut of a special Nature edition of Many Mountains Moving •A panel of editors who will discuss the question, Who wants what I write?

•A Saturday Night "Poetry Crawl" (read on, read on . . .)

All this is in addition to our yearly readings by some of the best writers in the country. This year's distinguished visitors will include screenwriter Steve Barancik, Novelist Jodi Picoult, nature writer David Gessner, mystery writer Brian Andrew Laird, poet William Pitt Root, and poet and journal writer Pamela Uschuk. And as always, this year's conference will benefit from the participation of USL's creative writing faculty, including Joe Andriano, Darrell Bourque, Herb Fackler, Skip Fox, George Clark, Mark Lewandowski, Jerry McGuire, Burton Raffel, Denise Rogers, David Thibodaux, and Luis Alberto Urrea. USL folklorists Barry Ancelet and Marcia Gaudet will also participate in the conference, as will USL graduate students. Finally, we are especially delighted to announce that USL's celebrated writer-in residence, Ernest Gaines, will give a featured reading.

Our Featured Writers

Jodi Picoult is a critically-acclaimed author of five novels, including this year's The Pact, a novel about teen suicide and how it affects the family. Her work focuses on themes of love, family, marriage, and motherhood while examining current issues such as suicide, euthanasia, and unexpected pregnancy. Her books include Harvesting the Heart, Mercy, Picture Perfect, and Songs of the Humpback Whale. She lives in New Hampshire with her husband and three small children, and jokes she is well-versed in the juggling act of "writing while passing out sippy cups." She will offer a fiction workshop on Friday and a craft lecture and reading on Saturday, in addition to other conference activities open to registrants.

William Pitt Root is one of the premier poets in the United States. His work originates from the Beat milieu, but his nature-based poetry reflects affiliations with some of our great environmental poets, such as Gary Snyder and William Stafford. Faultdancing, Root's latest collection of poems, was selected for the recent Pitt Poetry Prize. He is the author of nearly a dozen other books of poetry. Dividing his time equally between New York City and Tucson, Arizona, he is a professor at Hunter College, while serving as official Poet Laureate of Tucson.

Brian Andrew Laird, a life-long native of the Sonoran Desert region, is a mystery writer, naturalist, editor, and short-story author. He is a fast rising member of the emerging "new mystery" community, and translates his expertise in the natural world to his novels and short stories. Laird's books include Bowman's Line, To Bury the Dead, and the forthcoming Best Shot. He is currently editing the special Nature issue of the literary journal Many Mountains Moving. Laird also serves as a freelance editor for the University of Arizona Press and teaches writing workshops and English classes both at the University of Arizona and Pima Community College. Laird will offer a craft lecture/workshop in mystery writing and a reading on Friday, and will participate in panels on Saturday and Sunday.

Pamela Uschuk will be offering a special workshop in journal writing and its role in the writer's life. A poet and fiction writer, she is currently co-writing a journaling book with poet Joy Harjo. Uschuk also teaches creative writing workshops and English classes in a wide variety of venues-at the university level, in community centers, and on Native American reservations in the west. Her numerous publications have garnered her several awards, including the Chester H. Jones Award in 1989. The wife of William Pitt Root, her own books of poetry include Without Birds,

Without Flowers, Without Trees.

David Gessner, author of A Wild, Rank Place: One Year on Cape Cod, lives on Cape Cod with his wife, writer Marina de Gramont. His work, which combines nature writing and memoir, has been published in such distinguished publications as Creative Nonfiction, The Boston Globe, Literal Latté, Exquisite Corpse, and Puerto del Sol. One of his essays, "Going Outward," was winner of the 1997

Associated Writing Programs Intro Journals Award. The University of Arizona Press will publish his most recent book, Under the Devil's Thumb, in June 1999. At Deep South

he will read from his work, and give a craft lecture on nature writing, and join with Pamela Uschuck in a workshop on nature writing.

Special Feature: Film Noir and Screen Writing

This year's conference will open on Thursday night, September 24th, with a special on-campus screening of acclaimed Tucson-based screenwriter Steve Barancik's 1994 film The Last Seduction, a wild and ruthless thriller that expertly captures the cold, darkly paranoid heart of the film noir genre. Barancik conducts frequent workshops on the art of screen writing and has made numerous appearances at film festivals nation-wide to discuss the craft, mood, and texture of film noir. Screenwriting hopefuls are strongly encouraged to attend Thursday night's screening of The Last Seduction, after which Barancik will host a discussion of the film. On Saturday, Barancik will give a craft lecture/workshop and take part in a panel on the genre voice, open to conference registrants.

Panels

Once again this year, the Deep South Writers Conference will present panels designed to allow conference participants to express their concerns and interests as writers and scholars. While all details have not been concluded as of this date, we expect presentations on creative writing pedagogy, on interart collaboration, and on writing and publishing genre fiction.

Special Feature: Panel of Editors

In addition, we have invited a diverse gathering of literary editors from every level of the professional publishing experience for an open and frank discussion of the sorts of writing editors seek today. As the publishing world continues in its present state of turmoil, a few hours spent in the company of such editors will prove invaluable for the aspiring writer. The roster will include:

Literary Journal: Naomi Horii and Luis Urrea (Many Mountains Moving), Jack Bedell (Louisiana Literature)
Literary/Scholarly: Jerry McGuire (Terra Poetica, Audit, College Literature)
Freelance/Small Press: Brian Andrew Laird
Daily Newspaper: Curtis Coughlan (The Daily Advertiser)
University Press: Judith Allen of University of Arizona Press

Intensive Writing Workshops

Most published authors agree that critical discussion of works-in-progress is an essential component of the writing process. The Conference offers intensive writing workshops for conference participants, encouraging reader response and fresh criticism on manuscripts in progress. Workshop registrants will critique their own work as well as the work of their peers under the guidance of an experienced writer. Manuscripts are examined in preparation for publication, and serious writers of all levels are encouraged to enroll. Participants receive copies of all manuscripts written by fellow workshop participants in advance with instructions on how to review and respond to them. Intensive writing workshops will be conducted by visiting writers in poetry and short fiction, and by USL writer Martha Hixon in children's fiction. In addition, the Council for the Development of French in Louisiana will sponsor a workshop for poetry and fiction in French. Enrollment in the workshops is limited to ten participants per workshop on a first-come basis, and involves a supplementary fee of $40 for each workshop. If the demand for workshops exceeds expectations, additional workshops will be scheduled. Writers wishing to enroll in one or more of these workshops should send their manuscripts to:

Dr. Jerry McGuire
Deep South Writers Conference
English Department, Box 44691
Lafayette, LA 70504-4691.

For poetry manuscripts, please submit 3 poems, typed. For prose manuscripts, submit up to 15 pages typed, double-spaced.

Do the Poetry Crawl

In keeping with our outdoor emphasis, writers and artists are encouraged to come with nature and the environment in mind. As before, the graduate students in the Creative Writing Concentration will host an open-microphone reading for all conference participants who would like to read from their work. This year's open reading will feature its own outdoor dimension, however, as members are encouraged to join in a moveable feast of readings in selected venues in the Lafayette community. After Saturday night's reading Jodi Picoult and Ernest Gaines, we'll gather up our forces and move from place to place (at each of these good food and/or drink will be available for the hungry, thirsty gang), giving open readings as we go. Come learn a little more about Lafayette's literary scene, and be part of the most literate floating opera in the state!

The Deep South Writers Conference Contest Results

As in years past, the winners of the various categories of the Deep South Writers Conference Contests will be honored at a special ceremony preceding Friday night's reading by Brian Andrew Laird and William Pitt Root. The winning authors in the categories of Short Fiction, Young Adult Fiction, Children's Fiction, Novel, French Poetry, and French Prose will be announced, as will the winners of the Ethel Harvey Award (Nonfiction), the John Z. Bennett Award (Poetry), the Paul T. Nolan Award (One-Act Play), and the James H. Wilson Award (Full-Length Play). Winners, contenders, and future hopefuls are encouraged to attend the ceremonies. After the reading, we'll convene at David Thibodaux's house for refreshments, where the editors (and many of the writers) of the special Nature issue of Many Mountains will unveil their work.

Special Events

Thursday: •Film: The Last Seduction
Friday: •Presentation of the special Nature issue of Many Mountains Moving
Saturday: •The Poetry Crawl
Thursday-Sunday •Video: Six Louisiana Artists Speak Out (interviews/discussion featuring poet Darrell Bourque, photographer Debbie Caffery, songwriter David Egan, dancer Cissy Whipp, and visual artists Elmore Morgan and Francis Pavy).
•Exhibition: Interart Collaborations between poets and photographers, organized by Lynda Frese and Jerry McGuire •Exhibition: Photographs of Mexican roadside crosses and shrines by Paige DeShong, with poems by border poets in response to the photographs (presented in connection with the folklore panel on Cemeteries, Death & Dying, and Creative Writers)

Conference Registration: How to Be a Part of the Weekend

There is a $40.00 registration for the conference which rises to $50.00 after September 11th. The Deep South Writers Conference is one of the most affordable writing conferences in the United States, due in large part to the support received from sponsors, without whom a gathering of talent like this would not be possible. The program is supported by a grant from the Louisiana Division of the Arts, by a Partnership Award from the Acadiana Arts Council, and by the Department of English and the College of Fine Arts at the University of Southwestern Louisiana. But the greatest measure of The Conference's success continues to be the enrollment of writers who wish to contribute to and benefit from such a gathering. Registration (see page

3 for schedule and registration form) includes lectures, panel discussions, and special events. For more information, interested writers and artists may contact Jerry McGuire at [redacted], or by email at

[redacted], or write to:

Deep South Writers Conference
English Department, Box 44691
University of Southwestern Louisiana
Lafayette, LA 70504-4691

And check out our website:
http://www.usl.edu/Departments/English/
(when you're there, click on "Deep South Writers Conference").

Lodging and Accommodations

We have arranged for several hotels to provide rooms at special conference rates. Please call one of the following, and be sure to tell them when making your reservation that you are attending the USL Deep South Writers Conference:

Holidome, 2032 NE Evangeline Thruway ([redacted]; [redacted]); one rate of $60. Reserve by Sept. 12.
Comfort Inn, 1421 SE Evangeline Thruway ([redacted]); $52 single, 57 double (all rooms have one queen-sized bed only). Reserve by Sept. 12.
Ramada Inn, 120 E. Kaliste Saloom Rd. ([redacted]); one rate of $50. Reserve by Sept. 12.

Travelodge, 1101 West Pinhook Rd. ([redacted]), one rate of $45. Reserve by Sept. 12.

We're looking forward to a great conference-please come join us!

DEEP SOUTH WRITERS CONFERENCE SCHEDULE OF EVENTS

Thursday, September 24

7 pm Film: The Last Seduction, Bayou Bijou Theater, Student Union
9 pm Q & A with Last Seduction screenwriter Steve Barancik

Friday, September 25

10-12 Workshop/Craft Lecture: Mystery Writing—Laird
10-12 Workshop: Creative Non-Fiction—Luis Urrea and Uschuk
10-12 Workshop: Poetry—Denise Rogers
10-12 Workshop: Fiction—Picoult

Noon: Lunch with authors

1:30-2:30 Craft Lecture: Nature Writing—Gessner
1:30-3:30 Workshop: Short Fiction—George Clark
1:30-3:30 Workshop: Poetry—Root
3:30-4:30 Craft Lecture/Workshop: Journalling–Luis Urrea and Uschuk
3:30-4:30 Reading: National Writing Project
4:30-5:30 Reading—Gessner and Uschuk
4:30-6 Workshop: Children's Fiction—Iskander
7 Awards Ceremony for 1998 Deep South Writers Contest
7:30 Featured Readings—Laird and Root, Fletcher Hall 134
9 Party at David Thibodaux's; with kickoff of Many Mountains Moving Nature Issue

Saturday, September 26

8-10 Hospitality and coffee at the Alumni House, book signings by all featured authors
9:30-11 Craft Lecture/Workshop: Screenwriting with Steve Barancik
10-11 Fiction Workshop for Beginners
10-11 Poetry Workshop for Beginners
10-12 Workshop: Nature Writing with Gessner and Uschuk
11-12 Craft Lecture: Reporting and Creative Non-Fiction—Cindy Urrea
11-12 Panel: Interart Collaboration

Noon: Lunch—"Caravans" to local restaurants

1:30-2:30 Panel: The Genre Voice—Finding a Voice and Exploring a Market
2:30-3:30 Pedagogy Panel: Genre Fiction and the Creative Writing Classroom
2:30-3:30 Craft Lecture: Poetry—Bourque, McGuire, Root
3:30-4:30 Folklore Panel/Exhibition: Cemeteries, Death & Dying, and the Creative Writer, with Gaudet, Rikki Clark, DeShong
5 The Louisiana All-Stars Reading, Lafayette Public Library
7 Featured Reading—Piqoult and Gaines, Fletcher Hall 134
9 Poetry Slam/Poetry Crawl/Open Mike—various locations to be announced

Sunday, September 27

9 Hospitality
10 Who wants what I write? Panel of Editors:
12 Closing Ceremonies

REGISTRATION AND FEES FOR THE
1998 DEEP SOUTH WRITERS CONFERENCE

Please fill out, detach, and mail to the address below:

Name_____
Address_____
_____
_____
_____
_____
Telephone_____email_____

PRE-REGISTRATION AND REGISTRATION
Pre-Registration
Fee.....$40.....
_____

Registration fee After September 9.....$50.....
_____

USL Students with ID.....free.....

_____

Other Students with ID.....$25.....

_____
_____

WORKSHOP FEES ($40 FOR ONE WORKSHOP; $20 FOR EACH ADDITIONAL WORKSHOP)

Please put an X beside the ones for which you wish to register:

Poetry Workshop—William Pitt Root.....
Poetry Workshop—Denise Rogers.....
Fiction Workshop—Jodi Picoult.....
Fiction Workshop—George Clark.....
Creative Non-Fiction—Luis Urrea and Pamela Uschuck.....
Craft Lecture/Workshop in Screenwriting--

Steve Barancik.....
Craft Lecture/Workshop in Journaling—Urrea and Uschuck.....
Craft Lecture/Workshop in Mystery Writing—Brian Andrew Laird.....
Craft Lecture/Workshop in Nature Writing—David Gessner and Uschuck.....
Children's Fiction Workshop—
Marcia Hixon.....
CODOFIL Workshop: Poetry and Fiction in French.....
Beginners Poetry Workshop with USL
Graduate Creative Writers ($20).....
Beginners Fiction Workshop with USL
Graduate Creative Writers ($20).....

Please indicate which fees you are paying (by placing an X after the dotted line following the entry) and return this form with your check made payable to: DEEP SOUTH WRITERS CONFERENCE. Send form and check (please be sure to specify name of participant, if different from name on check) to this address:

Deep South Writers Conference
English Dept., Box 44691
University of Southwestern Louisiana
Lafayette LA 70504-4691

Please call or email Jerry McGuire with any further questions:

telephone: [redacted]
email: [redacted]

The program is supported in part by a grant from the Louisiana Division of the Arts and by a Partnership Award from the Acadiana

Arts Council, with funds provided by the City of Lafayette, the Lafayette Parish Council, and the National Endowment for the Arts.

↑ Index

462. k.a. hehir
new from housepress: keyboard po (e/li)tics
Thu 20 Aug 1998

---

this came into my box. does anyone know more about it?
kevin

Keyboard Po(e/li)tics
>
> exploring the "pataphysics of the keyboard.
>
>
>
> house press is pleased to announce the release of KEYBOARD > PO(E/LI)TICS by neil hennessy and d.a.beaulieu. inspired by the work
> of bpNichol and steve mcCaffrey's TRG (toronto research group) and > other works of Canadian "pataphysics (the impossible science of > literature), KEYBOARD PO(E/LI)TICS explores the politics and poetics
> of the qwerty keyboard through postcards, chapbooks and concrete > poetry
>
>
> keyboard po(e/li)tics
>
> ISBN 1-894174-07-0
>
> limited edition of 40 handbound & printed copies
>
> (consisting of 2 chapbooks, 5 postcards, 3 broadsheets
>
> and a handprinted linocut envelope)
>
> $12.50
>
> contact housepress at:
>
> [redacted]
>
>
>

↑ Index

463. R M Daley

Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery

Thu 20 Aug 1998

On Wed, 19 Aug 1998, George Thompson wrote:

> im offended.
>
> Dear R M Daley,
>
> I find this kind of post utterly useless and a painful waste of time. No context, no substance. I've begun to automatically delete this kind of post from the various lists that I listen to, when I figure out the sort of people who like this sort of thing, and who are prone to it.
>
> If you want me to read your posts, please give me a reason to. Otherwise, deletion will be automatic.
>
> GTh

///dammitjosh/*alltoo reactionary queriesOURTIME/OUTfuck and nowour-PUBLICSCOLDINGSJOSHitstoomuchjosh gETOFFMYSPAMnotheotherkindof uckthatsrectangularalll somtime slipperyTOME babyTIME, stupid/late teafor ourstarfishand coffe, hey tonight its the wharfand drinkson me, topshelf-GRABmy comix no the german kind right...fine mess we're in now eh j these sa-lons can get to a hardworkin girl if you dont keep an eye on the delivery and the means- MY DELIVERYYOUR means - heard the one about the pyschiatrist and the three pink poodles babe no the pink pychiatrist actually- SHO TASTE GOOD- name of our band yeah howzat do ya fer@@@@@@@@@@@@@@ARTILLERYS IN PLACE SARGEXXXXXMAINTAIN POSITION RIGHT FLANK TO COVERXXXXXSCATTERING POSITIONWE CANT HOLD EM HLOD EM XXXXTO YOUR FEET go go go - LAST TIME out of feet eating sox- undel

↑ Index

464. George Thompson
Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery
Thu 20 Aug 1998

Thanks. Now I know what to do with your posts.

GT

> On Wed, 19 Aug 1998, George Thompson wrote:
>
> im offended.
>
> Dear R M Daley,
>
> I find this kind of post utterly useless and a painful waste of time. No context, no substance. I've begun to automatically delete this kind of post from the various lists that I listen to, when I figure out the sort of people who like this sort of thing, and who are prone to it.

> If you want me to read your posts, please give me a reason to. Otherwise, deletion will be automatic.
>
> GTh
>
> *///dammitjosh/alltoo reactionary queriesOURTIME/OUTfuck and nowourPUBLICSCOLDINGSJOSHitstoomuchjosh gETOFFMYSPAMnotheotherkindof uckthatsrectangularalll somtime slipperyTOME babyTIME, stupid/late teafor ourstarfishand coffe, hey tonight its the wharfand drinkson me, topshelfGRABmy comix no the german kind right...fine mess we're in now eh j these salons can get to a hardworkin girl if you dont keep an eye on the delivery and the means- MY DELIVERYYOUR means - heard the one about the pyschiatrist and the three pink poodles babe no the pink pychiatrist actually- SHO TASTE GOOD- name of our band yeah howzat do ya fer@@@@@@@@@@@@@ARTILLERYS IN PLACE SARGEXXXXXMAINTAIN POSITION RIGHT
> FLANK TO COVERXXXXXSCATTERING POSITIONWE CANT HOLD EM HLOD EM XXXXTO YOUR > FEET go go go - LAST TIME out of feet eating sox- undel

↑ Index

465. R M Daley

Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery

Thu 20 Aug 1998

On Thu, 20 Aug 1998, George Thompson wrote:

> Thanks. Now I know what to do with your posts.

whazzat?

jus wanna know whats so goldarn offensive?

> GT
>
> On Wed, 19 Aug 1998, George Thompson wrote:
>
> im offended.
>
> Dear R M Daley,
>
> I find this kind of post utterly useless and a painful waste of time. No context, no substance. I've begun to automatically delete this kind of post from the various lists that I listen to, when I figure out the sort of people who like this sort of thing, and who are prone to it.

> If you want me to read your posts, please give me a reason to. Otherwise, deletion will be automatic.
>
> GTh
>
> *///dammitjosh/alltoo reactionary queriesOURTIME/OUTfuck and nowourPUBLICSCOLDINGSJOSHitstoomuchjosh gETOFFMYSPAMnotheotherkindof uckthatsrectangularalll somtime slipperyTOME babyTIME, stupid/late teafor ourstarfishand coffe, hey tonight its the wharfand drinkson me, topshelfGRABmy comix no the german kind right...fine mess we're in now eh j these salons can get to a hardworkin girl if you dont keep an eye on the delivery and the means- MY DELIVERYYOUR means - heard the one about the pyschiatrist and the three pink poodles babe no the pink pychiatrist actually- SHO TASTE GOOD- name of our band yeah howzat do ya fer@@@@@@@@@@@@@@ARTILLERYS IN PLACE SARGEXXXXXMAINTAIN POSITION RIGHT
> FLANK TO COVERXXXXXSCATTERING POSITIONWE CANT HOLD EM HLOD EM XXXXTO YOUR > FEET go go go - LAST TIME out of feet eating sox- undel

↑ Index

466. david bromige

Rudeness on the List

Thu 20 Aug 1998

Then God says to the financier, "Go to more off-Broadway shows." Then God says to the panhandler, "Get a job!"

If Peter Balestrieri is annoyed with David McFadden for gently reprimanding Laura Wright's mistake, what shall we think of Peter Balestrieri for rudely reprimanding David McFadden's mistake?

I shall prefer the gentle correction to the rude one. There is so much of self-glorification in Peter Balestrieri's rudeness; that's what makes it hard to take. So he has a Poetic License to Kill, huh? Kinda makes a fella want to not wait for The Law.

In shooting David McFadden from the hip, Peter Balestrieri overlooked the possibility that David McFadden did _not_ recognize Laura Wright had made a mistake; if someone hasn't been on the List long, he might well not understand how her private dissection of Todd Baron had appeared before us all.

Are the Rude Planets in conjunction? For we also have the spectacle of R.Daley chewing up the carpet over George Thompson's correction. I have only been on the List a year and a half, but I have seen several previous outbursts of rudeness--sometimes completely unprovoked, as far as one could tell, and I have seen a number of postings that suggest some kind of List-civility is looked for. In this respect, I don't see why the List should be any different than social intercourse in general. It's more interesting if it has some Mind in it.

Peter Balestrieri doesn't think that David McFadden should make anything out of Laura Wright's unfortunate posting, because it was a mistake. But when Peter Balestrieri posted that Todd Baron's pigeons had come home to roost, he himself was piggy-backing on Laura Wright's mistake. I'm sure this saying can also be found in Bartlett's Quotations : "The pot should not call the kettle black."

David

↑ Index

467. George Thompson
Re: Writer on Line Interview/reactionatinquery
Thu 20 Aug 1998

> On Thu, 20 Aug 1998, George Thompson wrote:
>
> Thanks. Now I know what to do with your posts.
>
> whazzat?
>
> jus wanna know whats so goldarn offensive?

Okay. An answer, and that's it.

Not offensive. Just a waste of time.

Maybe I am older than you are.

I see before me just a dwindling fucking bit of daylight. Just a little.

If that is what you saw before you, would you waste your time reading your posts to this list?

I mean, why poetics?

And David Bromige is I bet older than I am.

GT

↑ Index

468. Jay Schwartz
Re: Rudeness on the List
Fri 21 Aug 1998

The bottom line in all of these ludicrous posts is the mistake of replying to the List instead of backchannel. A simple solution to all of these time-wasters:

1. Double-check in your replies that they are traveling to the correct destination.

2. If you intend to reply to an individual about a List-related matter, think very hard before you reply to the entire List. Think about if you were in a room with every List subscriber packed close enough to hear every word of your conversation. Is it interesting and useful public information?

All of the messages around the Todd Baron snafu should have gone backchannel to avoid embrassment and frustration for those of us who subscribe for information about the Poetry community.

We've been through this before. Ugh.

↑ Index

469. shemurph
the rude planets
Fri 21 Aug 1998

In a message dated 8/20/98 6:47:41 PM Pacific Daylight Time, [redacted] writes:

<< Are the Rude Planets in conjunction? >>

As a matter of fact, Mercury has been in retrograde, and will be until Sunday. If you have been feeling details going awry and things being exceptionally topsy turvy, your communications in a veritable snit 90% of the time, then you're about where you should be.

And that, friends, is the sum total of my astrological knowledge.

Sheila Murphy

↑ Index

470. R M Daley
Re: Rudeness on the List
Fri 21 Aug 1998

---

hmm but writing on this list IS VERY DIFFERENT from speaking to each other in a room over cocktails and black tights and seems unique in this, like a license to pass notes in class and perhaps not MIND in front of all the teachers , and by the way the teachers are invited, and giving a push and a shove now and then and personally and publicly in LIGHT very fading light or bright shiny floods rant in ways possible, as this is something presumably perhaps one thing in common on this group chat is all a raving interest in writing and reading and trying it out and putting it on - all diferent kinda ons I HOPE would be at least allowed, if comparisons serve, I have never been to a reading where someone voicing the least bit of dissonance or interest in playing with space in a breath or time on a page has been told they were wasting everyone's time--ie, isnt this just all protest against wasting it?!?is this possible??and if your time is being WASTED whose fault is that? chan says IF YOUR BORED > TRY IT FOUR MORE TIMES and if your're still bored, TRY IT TWENTY MORE TIMES - or turn off the TV

↑ Index

471. George Bowering
Re: more recent economist article
Fri 21 Aug 1998

> Yes, Jordan, and the new _Economist_ article says something about Mark Doty's being "the finest American poet since Robert Lowell."
>
> Susan Schultz

Okay. But who's Robert Lowell?

George Bowering.

,

2499 West 37th Ave.,
Vancouver, B.C.,
Canada V6M 1P4

fax: [redacted]

↑ Index

472. Todd Baron /*/ ReMap
Re: Rudeness on the List: "I" is another and another and an other and...gee whiz...
Fri 21 Aug 1998

---

speaking as one "todd baron"--I find all of the assumptions, amusements, assertions, and eruditions on one , Todd Baron, to be of benefit to Mr. Baron's theory that "dismishes the self as a center of a poetics".

Speaking for myself.
"I" thank all who attack me--in the name of me, myself, and I...

or as my mother used to sing.. "me and my shadow..."

yrs,

Mr. T

↑ Index

473. Douglas new Sun & Moon titles
Fri 21 Aug 1998

Sun & Moon Press is proud to announce the publication of NOD by Fanny Howe.

In NOD, her ninth book of fiction, major American novelist and poet Fanny Howe explores sibling rivalry within a family that, in the advent of World War II, is both disintegrating and stumbling into the terrible, dark adulthood of the later half of the Twentieth Century.
  Yet for all the dark forces at work in Howe's novel, she presents also a world of wonder, of sexual awakenings interlinked with the Irish countryside and culture in which the girls grow up, the strange stories and myths they heaar from the Norwegian north and retell through their own highly-wrought imaginations. The central figures of this fiction, Irene and Cloda, interact with one another and the man who has encamped in their ghost-, now guest-room, asif playing out the lives of the Brontes to a packed theater audience.

Cloth only, $18.95, with a 20% discount to list members.

Also a reminder:

DURA, by Myung Mi Kim paper $11.95
MIRRORS, by Marcel Cohen paper $12.95 (a Green Integer book)
AFTER, by Douglas Messerli paper $10.95
WITH EACH CLOUDED PEAK, by Friederike Mayrocker (trans.
    by Rosmarie Waldrop) paper $11.95 are all available with a 20% discount to list members.

A subscription to our new international poetry journal,
MR. KNIFE, MISS FORK is $20.00 for two issues; the second issue will be out in November.

Send orders via e-mail to [redacted]
Be sure to enclose your postal address.

Douglas Messerli

↑ Index

474. J. Kuszai
Bellamy,Killian,Rothenberg BEYONDthePAGE in SanDiego
Fri 21 Aug 1998

BEYOND THE PAGE PRESENTS:

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE:

What: Beyond the Page continues its series of monthly performance and arts events with JEROME ROTHENBERG, DODIE BELLAMY, and KEVIN KILLIAN reading from and/or performing their works.

Where:
Faultline Theatre, 3152 5th Avenue (at Spruce in Hillcrest), San Diego.

When:
Sunday, August 30th. 4:00 PM.

Contact: Stephen Cope at [redacted] or Joe Ross at [redacted].
E-mail at
[redacted], or [redacted].

* * * * * * * * *

JEROME ROTHENBERG is an acclaimed experimentalist and a central figure in the areas of performance poetry, ethnopoetics, and, to borrow his own words, "that dada strain". He has published dozens of volumes of his own writing and edited numerous seminal anthologies, including the monumental _Poems for the Millenium: The University of California Book of Modern and Postmodern Poetry_, edited with Pierre Joris.

DODIE BELLAMY is the author of _Feminine Hijinx_ (Hanuman, 1990), _Real: The Letters of Mina Harker and Sam D'Allesandro_ (Talisman House, 1995) and _The Letters of Mina Harker_ (Hard Press, 1998), as well as three chapbooks, _Answer_ (Leave Books, 1992), _Broken English_ (Meow, 1996), and _Hallucinations_ (Meow, 1997).

KEVIN KILLIAN is a poet, novelist, critic and playwright. His books include _Bedrooms Have Windows_, _Shy_, _Little Men_, _Arctic Summer_ and _Argento Series_. With Lewis Ellingham he has written _Poet Be Like God: Jack Spicer and the San Francisco Renaissance_ (Wesleyan, 1998), the first biography of the important US poet.

↑ Index

475. daniel bouchard

Terror on the tee vee: A Repeat

Fri 21 Aug 1998

